GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS BY THE MESSAGE OF OCTOBER 27, 1807.

[The following is an extract from that message.]

“NO former violations [by Great Britain] of maritime rights another is now added of very extensive effect. The Government of that nation has issued an order interdicting all trade by neutrals between ports not in amity with them; and being now at war with every nation on the Atlantic and Mediterranean seas, our vessels are required to sacrifice their cargoes at the first ports they touch, or to return home without the benefit of returning to any other market. Under this new law of the Ocean, our trade on the Mediterranean has been swept away by seizures and condemnations, and that in other seas has been threatened with the same fate.”

Note communicated by Lord Howick to Mr. Monroe, dated

DOWNING STREET, January 10, 1807.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State of Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's commands to acquaint Mr. Monroe that the French Government having issued certain orders, which, in violation of the usages of war, purport to prohibit the commerce of all neutral nations with His Majesty's dominions, and also to prevent such nations from trading with any other country in any articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Majesty's dominions. And the said Government having also taken upon itself to declare all His Majesty's dominions to be in a state of blockade, at a time when the fleets of France and her allies are themselves confined within their own ports by the superior valor and discipline of the British navy.

Such attempts, on the part of the enemy, giving to His Majesty an unquestionable right of retaliation, and warranting His Majesty in enforcing the same prohibition of all commerce with France, which that Power vainly hopes to effect against the commerce of His Majesty's subjects, a prohibition which the superiority of His Majesty's naval forces might enable him to support, by actually investing the ports and coasts of the enemy with numerous squadrons and cruisers, so as to make the entrance or approach thereto manifestly dangerous.

His Majesty, though unwilling to follow the example of his enemies by proceeding to an extremity so distressing to all nations not engaged in the war, and carrying on their accustomed trade, yet feels himself bound, by a due regard to the just defence of the rights and interests of his people, not to suffer such measures to be taken by the enemy, without taking some steps, on his part, to restrain this violence, and to retort upon them the evils of their own injustice. Mr. Monroe is, therefore, requested to apprise the American consuls and merchants residing in England, that His Majesty has, therefore, judged it expedient to order that no vessel shall be permitted to trade from one port to another, both which ports shall belong to, or be in possession of, France or her allies, or shall be so far under their control as that British vessels may not freely trade thereat; and that the commanders of His Majesty's ships of war and privateers have been instructed to warn every neutral vessel coming from any such port, and destined to another such port, to discontinue her voyage, and not to proceed to any such port; and every vessel after being so warned, or any vessel coming from any such port, after a reasonable time shall have been afforded for receiving information of this His Majesty's order, which shall be found proceeding to another such port, shall be captured and brought in, and, together with her cargo, shall be condemned as lawful prize. And that, from this time, all the measures authorized by the law of nations, and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different neutral Powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to vessels attempting to violate the said order after this notice.

HOWICK.

SPANISH DECREE.

By the greatest outrage against humanity and against policy, Spain was forced by Great Britain to take part in the present war. This Power has exercised over the sea, and over the commerce of the world, an exclusive dominion. Her numerous factories, disseminated through all countries, are like sponges which imbibe the riches of those [countries] without leaving them more than the appearances of mercantile liberty. From this maritime and commercial despotism England derives immense resources for carrying on a war, whose object is to destroy the commerce which belongs to each State from its industry and situation. Experience has proven that the morality of the British cabinet has no hesitation as to the means, so long as they lead to the accomplishment of its designs; and whilst this Power can continue to enjoy the fruits of its immense traffic, humanity will groan under the weight of a desolating war. To put an end to this, and to attain a solid peace, the Emperor of the French and the King of Italy issued a decree on the 21st of November last, in which, adopting the principle of reprisals, the blockade of the British isles is determined on; and his ambassador, His Excellency Francis de Beauharnois, grand dignitary of the order of the Iron Crown, of the Legion of Honor, &c. &c. having communicated this decree to the King our master, and His Majesty being desirous to co-operate, by means sanctioned by the rights of reciprocity, has been pleased to authorize His Most Serene Highness the Prince, Generalissimo of the Marine, to issue a circular of the following tenor:

“As soon as England committed the horrible outrage of intercepting the vessels of the royal marine, insidiously violating the good faith with which peace assures individual property and the rights of nations, His Majesty considered himself in a state of war with that Power, although his royal soul suspended the promulgation of the manifesto until he saw the atrocity committed by its seamen sanctioned by the Government of London. From that time, and without the necessity of warning the inhabitants of these kingdoms of the circumspection with which they ought to conduct themselves towards those of a country which disregards the sacred laws of property and the rights of nations, His Majesty made known to his subjects the state of war in which he found himself with that nation. All trade, all commerce is prohibited in such a situation, and no sentiments ought to be entertained towards such an enemy which are not dictated by honor, avoiding all intercourse which might be considered as the vile effect of avarice operating on the subjects of a nation which degrades itself by them. His Majesty is well persuaded that such sentiments of honor are rooted in the hearts of his beloved subjects; but he does not choose, on that account, to allow the smallest indulgence to the violators of the law, nor permit that, through ignorance, they should be taken by surprize; authorizing me, by these presents, to declare that all English property will be confiscated whenever it is found on board a vessel, although a neutral, if the consignment belongs to Spanish individuals. So, likewise, will be confiscated all the merchandise which may be met with, although it may be in neutral vessels, whenever it is destined for the ports of England or her isles. And, finally, His Majesty, conforming himself to the ideas of his ally the Emperor of the French, declares in his States the same law which, from principles of reciprocity and suitable respect, His Imperial Majesty promulgated under date of the 21st November, 1806.

The execution of this determination of His Majesty belongs to the chiefs of provinces, of departments, and of vessels, (baxelis,) and communicating it to them in the name of His Majesty, I hope they will leave no room for the royal displeasure.

God preserve you many years.

THE PRINCE, Generalissimo of the Marine.

No. 205.

[1st SESSION.]

GREAT BRITAIN.

REPORTED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, NOVEMBER 17, 1807.

The committee, to whom was referred so much of the message of the President of the United States, as relates to aggressions committed within our ports and waters by foreign armed vessels; to violations of our jurisdiction, and to the measures necessary for the protection of our ports and harbors, report, in part:

That, participating deeply in the general sensibility excited by the outrage committed upon the United States' frigate Chesapeake, by the British ship of war Leopard, on the 22d June last, and feeling it to be their duty to collect and present to the view of this House, without delay, all the facts relating to that atrocious act of aggression, they directed their first attention to that important subject, and have obtained from the State and Navy Departments the documents herewith presented, from which they are authorized to make the following statement, viz:

That the United States' frigate Chesapeake, being ordered on a cruise in the Mediterranean sea, under the command of Commodore James Barron, sailed from Hampton Roads on the 22d June last past, having on board a crew of more than three hundred and seventy men, and completely equipped with every thing necessary for such a ship of war sailing on such a cruise.

That in proceeding to sea, from Hampton Roads, she passed a British squadron at anchor in Lynnhaven bay, who at the time of her passing they were making signals to each other. That the British ship of war Leopard, of fifty guns, one of the squadron then at anchor within the limits of the United States, weighed immediately after these signals were thrown out, and stood to sea. That at half past three o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, at the distance of three leagues from Cape Henry, which was then bearing northwest by west, the Leopard came up with the Chesapeake, backed the main topsail and spoke her; when Commodore Barron, to promote her convenience, understanding her commander to say he had a communication to make which he would send on board, ordered the Chesapeake to be hove to. That an officer was accordingly sent from the Leopard to the Chesapeake, who, on his arrival, presented to Commodore Barron a note from the captain of the Leopard respecting some deserters from some of His Britannic Majesty's ships, supposed to be serving as part of the crew of the Chesapeake, and enclosing a copy of an order from Vice-Admiral Berkeley, requiring and directing the commanders of His Britannic Majesty's ships and vessels under his command, in case of meeting with the American frigate Chesapeake at sea, and without the limits of the United States, to show said order to the captain of her, and to require to search his ship for the deserters from certain ships therein named, and to proceed and search for the same; and if a similar demand should be made by the American, he is permitted to search for deserters from their service, according to the customs and usage of civilized nations on terms of amity with each other. The first of these papers will be found in document A. No. 1; the other among the documents received from the Department of State, No. 7.

That Commodore Barron gave to these communications an answer purporting that he knew of no such men as were described; that the recruiting officers for the Chesapeake had been particularly instructed by the Government, through him, not to enter any deserters from His Britannic Majesty's ships; that he knew of none such being in her; that he was instructed never to permit the crew of any ship under his command to be mustered by any officers but her own; that he was disposed to preserve harmony, and hoped his answer would prove satisfactory. See No. 2, in document A.

That the Leopard, shortly after this answer was received by her commander, ranged along side of the Chesapeake and commenced a heavy fire on her.

That when the attack upon the Chesapeake commenced, some of her guns were not securely fitted in their carriages; some of her sponges and wads were too large; but few of her powder horns were filled; her matches were not primed; some of her rammers were not in their proper places; her marines were not supplied with cartridges enough, while those they had were not of the proper size, and she was otherwise unprepared for action.

That the Chesapeake made no resistance whatever, but remained under the incessant fire of the Leopard from twenty to thirty minutes, when, having suffered much damage in her hull, rigging and spars, and lost three men killed, and eighteen wounded, Commodore Barron ordered his colours to be struck, and they were struck, he says in his log-book, after firing one gun, but the court of inquiry lately held upon his conduct, say before a single gun of any kind was fired from her.

That Commodore Barron, immediately after striking his colours, sent Lieutenant Smith on board the Leopard to inform her commander that he considered the Chesapeake her prize.

That the commander of the Leopard sent an officer on board, who took possession of the Chesapeake, mustered her crew, and carrying off four of her men, viz. John Strahan, William Ware, Daniel Martin, and John Wilson, abandoned the ship; and that Commodore Barron, after the ship was abandoned, and after writing to the commander of the Leopard the letter No. 3, and receiving from him the answer No. 4, in document A, finding that she was very much injured and had three and a half feet of water in her hold, returned, with the advice of his officers, to Hampton Roads.

The committee might add to this statement that it has been incontestably proven, as the accompanying printed document, No. 8, will show, that William Ware, John Strahan, and Daniel Martin, are citizens of the United States, and the two former natives of the State of Maryland; but they conceive it unnecessary for them, or for this House, to go into any inquiry upon that part of the subject, as, in their opinion, whether the men taken from the Chesapeake were or were not citizens of the United States, and whether the Chesapeake was or was not within the acknowledged limits of the United States at the time they were taken, the character of the act of taking them remains the same.

From the foregoing facts, it appears to your committee that the outrage committed on the frigate Chesapeake has been stamped with circumstances of indignity and insult, of which there is scarcely to be found a parallel in the history of civilized nations, and requires only the sanction of the Government under color of whose authority it was perpetrated to make it just cause of, if not an irresistible call for, instant and severe retaliation. Whether it will receive that sanction, or be disavowed and declared an unauthorized act of a subordinate officer, remains to be determined by the answer which shall be given to the demand of explanation; that answer, now daily expected, will either sink the detestable act into piracy, or expand it to the magnitude of premeditated hostility against the sovereignty and independence of this nation; and, until its true character shall be fixed and known, your committee deem it expedient to decline expressing any opinion as to the measures proper to be adopted in relation to it. But, as other acts of aggression have been committed within our ports and waters by British ships of war, as well anterior as posterior to this, some of them manifesting the same disregard of our national rights, and seeming to flow from the same contempt for the authority of our laws; and especially as the British squadron, of which the Leopard was one, after being notified of the President's proclamation ordering them to depart from the waters of the United States, which they knew had been published in conformity to act of Congress, anchored within the capes of Chesapeake bay, and in that situation remained, capturing American vessels, even within our acknowledged territorial limits, and sending them to Halifax for adjudication; impressing seamen on board American vessels; firing on vessels and boats, of all descriptions, having occasion to pass near them in pursuit of their lawful trade; and occasionally denouncing threats calculated to alarm and irritate the good people of the United States, particularly the inhabitants of Norfolk and Hampton; all which facts are substantiated by the accompanying documents, No. 1 to 6, the committee are of opinion that it is expedient to provide more effectually for the protection of our ports and harbors; but, not being prepared to report specifically on that subject, they ask further indulgence of the House, and beg leave to submit, for their consideration, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the attack of the British ship of war Leopard on the United States' frigate Chesapeake was a flagrant violation of the jurisdiction of the United States; and that the continuance of the British squadron (of which the Leopard was one) in their waters, after being notified of the proclamation of the President of the United States ordering them to depart from the same, was a further violation thereof.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 12, 1807.

SIR:

In compliance with the request stated in your letter of the 5th instant, I have the honor to communicate the several documents, numbered from 1 to 6, relative to aggressions committed by foreign armed vessels within the ports and waters of the United States; also document No. 7, relating to the outrage committed by the British ship of war Leopard on the American frigate Chesapeake.

To the above documents is added the evidence, received by the Department of State, relative to the national character of William Ware, John Strahan, and Daniel Martin, three of the seamen taken from the Chesapeake.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MADISON.

Deposition of Thomas Clarke, respecting an outrage committed by the Melampus.

BALTIMORE COUNTY, STATE OF MARYLAND, to wit:

This day personally appeared before me, one of the justices of the peace for said county, Thomas Clarke, the subscriber, who, being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, deposeth as follows:

That, being on a cruise, as a branch pilot of this State, for inward bound vessels, he, on the 23d instant, was taken on board the brig Three Brothers, Captain Pitts, from Bordeaux, bound to Baltimore, which vessel this deponent piloted to the entrance into the bay of Chesapeake. That, being close to Cape Henry, and about one mile and a half distant therefrom, and in five fathom water, a shot was fired at said brig by one of His Britannic Majesty's cruisers, called the Melampus, (a frigate of about thirty-six guns,) which said shot struck the water abreast the beams, at a short distance from said brig, upon which the said pilot hove to under the lee of said frigate, who immediately sent a boat on board the Three Brothers, under the command of an officer, who sent the captain of said brig, with his papers, on board the frigate. Shortly after, another boat was despatched from said frigate, who carried off ten men, who, this deponent understood, were picked up at sea by Captain Pitts. The same boat shortly after returned, with a prize-master and nine men, who took charge of said brig Three Brothers, and immediately after sent this deponent, two passengers, second mate, and crew of said brig, on board the frigate, leaving only the first mate on board the brig. Further, that, on arriving on board the frigate with the people aforesaid, the captain of the Three Brothers was ordered on board his vessel, which immediately after hoisted sail for Halifax, detaining on board the frigate the passengers and crew, as aforesaid. The passengers and this deponent were afterwards put on board a vessel from Boston, bound to Baltimore. Two of the brig's crew, viz: two black men, were sent in a vessel bound to Norfolk; and the remainder, viz: the second mate and two hands, who, this deponent verily believes, are American seamen, (having seen their protections,) were detained on board said frigate. And further this deponent saith not.

THOMAS CLARKE.

The foregoing was sworn to, before me, on the 30th day of April, 1807,

WILLIAM LOWREY.

The captain commandant of Fort Johnson to the commanding officer of H. B. M. sloop of war Driver, dated

SIR:

MAY 2, 1807.

The President of the United States of America having, by proclamation, bearing date May 23, 1807, forever interdicted His Britannic Majesty's sloop of war Driver from entering "any port or harbor of the United States," and the said vessel having entered this port, in contempt of the said proclamation, my duty compels me to demand that the sloop of war Driver do depart from this harbor within twenty-four hours from the date hereof. Need I add, sir, how repugnant it would be to my feelings should any blood be spilt, which must certainly be the case if this communication be not complied with. Lieutenant Wyndham, of the artillery, is charged with the delivery of this, and will receive your reply.

MICHAEL KALTEISEN, Captain Commandant.

The commanding officer of the British sloop of war Driver to the captain commandant of Fort Johnson, dated

SIR:

MAY 3, 1807.

I have received your letter, and having some doubts as to the authority by which it was written, I thought proper to satisfy myself on that head before I should reply.

By the threat it contains, you appear, like your Government, to have something to learn. A British subject knows too well how to respect and obey the laws of his own country, to offer intentionally an outrage to those of others, when once they are known to be such; but I have to observe, the proclamation you mention to have been issued by the President of the United States of America, in May, 1807, I know nothing of. Of that which was issued in May, 1806, I have only to say, that, so far from being either creditable or becoming to the President of a country wishing to be ranked among the civilized nations of the world, it would, in the opinion of every liberal and enlarged mind, have disgraced the sanguinary pen of Robespierre, or the most miserable and petty state of Barbary. It appears that the supposed offence is to be remedied by a repetition of the circumstances complained of, and that on those who, so far from having any thing to do with it, were not even on or near the American coast at the time; and as Captain Whitby's trial may probably at this moment be pending, with the concurrence of the United States, and the proclamation resting upon his being brought to justice, it ought not to have been thought of. However, as my proceeding to sea comes exactly within the limits of my intentions, according to the orders I am under, I shall do so whenever the pilot shall think it proper; which orders have for their view the advantage of the American flag, as well as the protection of the British. But I must observe, that, from the difficulty I have experienced in obtaining water for the purposes I wish, I shall be obliged to have recourse to such methods as are completely in my power, and which I should not otherwise have thought of. In the mean time, it is necessary to observe, that His Majesty's ship under my command is at all times perfectly ready to resist and punish any insult that may be offered to the flag he has the honor to bear, to the last drop of blood that shall remain of the dutiful and loyal subjects of an adored sovereign and exalted country. I am, &c.

I have received your letter of this day. The nature of the contents of it demands of me to transmit it immediately to the Government, which I shall do by a special messenger. I am, &c.

The captain commandant of Fort Johnson to the President of the United States, dated

SIR:

MAY 5, 1807.

I deem it my duty to despatch a special messenger to-day to lay before your excellency a correspondence that has taken place between myself and the commanding officer of His Britannic Majesty's sloop Driver, now lying in this harbor.

The said sloop, interdicted by your excellency from ever entering any port or harbor of the United States, anchored abreast this fort on Thursday, 30th of April. On Friday, May 1, my officers Lieutenants Roberts and Wyndham, waited upon the Governor of this State, to consult with him, and receive his orders, relative to measures necessary to be taken to expel said vessel from this port. They could not see him; in consequence, I addressed a note, on Saturday, May 2, to the commanding officer of said vessel, of which a copy is herewith sent, and marked No. (1.) On Sunday, May 3, I received an answer from the commanding officer of the said sloop Driver, of which No. (2) is the original. Its extraordinary language induced me to forward it immediately by an officer to your excellency. My reply thereto is marked No. (3.)

Lieutenant Wyndham, who is the bearer of these despatches, will furnish any further information that may be required. I beg leave to recommend him to the notice of your excellency.

Hoping that my conduct may meet your approbation,

I have the honor to remain, &c.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Maryland, to wit:

I, Samuel Sterett, Notary Public, by letters patent under the great seal of the State of Maryland, duly commissioned and qualified, residing in the city of Baltimore, in the State aforesaid, do hereby certify, attest, and make known, that, on the day of the date hereof, before me personally appeared George Davis, master of the brig Mercury, of Philadelphia, then lying in the port of Baltimore, and recently arrived from Bordeaux, who, being by me duly sworn, did depose, declare, and, for truth, say, that, on Tuesday, the 19th instant, being on his passage, and having the wind to the northward, with a strong current setting against them, the pilot on board the said brig brought her to anchor in seven and a half fathoms water, about two miles from the shore, and about twenty-five miles to the southward of Cape Henry. And this appearer saith, that, while so lying at anchor, he was boarded by an officer from the British frigate Melampus, who, after examining the brig's papers, requested this appearer to return with him on board the Melampus, which this appearer declined, thinking himself within the limits and maritime jurisdiction of the United States; the said officer also himself admitting that said brig was anchored within three miles of the shore. And this appearer saith that the said officer then left the brig, but in a little time came back, and informed this appearer that he had positive orders to take him and his papers, letter-bag, &c. on board the said frigate; that this appearer accordingly went with the said papers, and, on getting on board the frigate, his papers and letter-bag were carried into the cabin, and this appearer left on deck, and not permitted to accompany them; that, after his papers and letter-bag had been detained from him about three-quarters of an hour, they were restored to him, and he himself put on board the brig; that, immediately on getting aboard his own vessel, he descended into the cabin, and, on opening the said letter-bag, discovered that a number of the letters had been opened, and the invoices and bills of lading they originally contained thrown promiscuously into the bag, and in the greatest confusion and disorder, in which situation he lodged the said letters in the post-office of this city immediately on his arrival yesterday.

In testimony whereof, the said deponent hath hereunto subscribed his name, and I, the said notary, have hereunto set my hand, and affixed my notarial seal, the twenty-third day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seven.

Captain Harrison's report to the Collector of the Customs at Norfolk, respecting an outrage committed by the British squadron in the Chesapeake.

JULY 6, 1807.

The schooner Cynthia Ann, from Folly Landing, Captain Harrison, was fired at in Hampton Roads by a boat belonging to the British squadron, but, not thinking proper to stop, continued his way up to Norfolk, although they continued firing from the boat, to the number of fourteen or sixteen guns; but, of a sudden, found he was fired at from the tender* just ahead of him; he immediately rounded to, and was boarded, and asked why, a damned rascal, he did not heave to for the boat? to which he answered, that he did not know why he was to be stopped in his own harbor. The boat then came up, and the crew on board her also abused him, and said they wished they had sunk him, and that they aimed to hit him, which he thinks they did, as their shot seemed very well aimed. They ordered him to tow them back, which he did, and was dismissed.

SIR:

NORFOLK, July 6, 1807.

Above is a copy of a report made to me by Captain Harrison, which I consider it my duty to forward. All vessels are stopped coming to this place, and fired at within our harbors. This report I was requested to forward to you for your consideration.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. GELSTON, Notary Public.

CITY OF NEW YORK, ss:

John Squire, first lieutenant and commander of the United States' revenue cutter "Active," George R. Rice, second lieutenant, and Vinson Smith, mariner, acting as mate of the said vessel, being duly sworn, did depose and declare as follows, that is to say:

That they sailed, in their above respective capacities, in and with the said vessel, from Washington City, having on board as passenger the Vice President of the United States, and bound for this port of New York. That on the 29th day of June last past, at half past four P. M. the said vessel being then under easy sail, with the wind from the southwest, bound as aforesaid, Cape Henry bearing south about four miles distant, they saw four armed ships lying at anchor, at the distance of about four miles and a half to the southwest, which they were informed and verily believed were British ships of war, under the command of Commodore Douglas, and belonging to His Britannic Majesty; that the cutter being nearly abreast of the said ships, a gun was fired from one of them, and that immediately thereafter, they discovered a boat from the said ship in pursuit of the cutter; that the boat continued in chase of the cutter, and at about three miles distant therefrom, a gun was fired from the boat towards the cutter, which these deponents believe to be a swivel; that the boat continued to row and sail; and appeared to make every possible exertion to come up with the cutter, and actually gained on her until about six o'clock P. M. when they were within about one mile and a half of each other, and a breeze springing up, the boat fired a swivel, and soon after discontinued the pursuit; that during the said chase, one gun besides those before mentioned was fired from the boat, and two guns from one of the said ships; that these deponents verily believe that the said armed boat was in pursuit of the said cutter, as there was no other vessel near them, and that the pennant of the said cutter was flying from the time the said armed ships were discovered until the discontinuance of the pursuit by the said armed boat, and that the pennant is such as is worn only by vessels employed in aid of the revenue of the United States.

And these deponents further say, that, at the instance and request of the Vice President of these United States aforesaid, they made memoranda of the foregoing circumstances shortly after they had occurred.

DEAR SIR:

It being my duty, and for the information of Government, I enclose an advertisement recently published at St. John's, New Brunswick. It has the appearance and complexion of a repetition of Mr. G. Leonard's threats, and is calculated to interrupt the peaceable intercourse in the plaster trade carried on in this Bay.

This commander, J. Flintoph, arrived on the evening of the 5th instant, fired his guns promiscuously, and in every direction, even among houses. The shot is in my possession that rolled between innocent children, to the great alarm of the peaceable inhabitants of both Governments in this vicinity.

The schooner Boston, James Perry, commander, just arrived from Boston, was brought to, having received a shot in her foremast; but not being immediately boarded, the master bore away. I myself saw four shot strike the water, fired at said schooner Boston after she was within the limits of our port.

Captain Nathan Merryman, of the schooner Rising States, an American vessel, lumber loaded, was boarded as getting under way, the tide being proper to proceed through the narrows; the master much maltreated, being taken and carried on board the armed vessel and detained a considerable time, so as to lose his tide and time, greatly to his detriment.

The citizens of the United States, in this place, are much shocked and exasperated at such treatment, and have enjoined it on me to forward this statement; are desirous their application for some armed vessels of the United States to be stationed here may be reconsidered, as the only means to prevent such imperious proceedings in future.

With all esteem and respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

LEWIS FRED. DELESDE'RNIER.

The Honorable JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State to the United States.

PUBLIC INFORMATION.

To prevent as much as possible any interruption being given to the carrying trade between these provinces and the United States of America; notice is hereby given to all concerned, that any vessel employed in conveying plaster of paris and grindstones, from the quarries of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to the places of consumption southward and westward of Portland, shall pass free and unmolested; and I pledge my word of honor that I will not interrupt them in their lawful pursuits, unless it shall appear that they have on board deserters from His Majesty's navy or army; the same special regard will be paid to all persons coming within the description of fishermen. And to discourage and punish all those concerned in illicit traffic, I am determined to treat with the utmost severity such as are found delivering their cargoes into American vessels in the Bay of Passamaquoddy or its neighborhood, or who may clandestinely introduce any articles into either province contrary to law.

DUDLEY ISLAND, Eastport, July 9, 1807.

DEAR SIR:

From your desire, whilst at my house last evening, to give a statement of the proceedings relative to the pirate which laid off Frier's Head on day before yesterday, as far as I was acquainted, I will, as far as my memory, relate. On the morning of that day (it being the 7th inst.) Mr. Graves came from Mr. Rice's and informed me that the same vessel (as he supposed) that had committed depredations at this place some weeks past, had sent an armed boat the past night and taken an American schooner, commanded by Captain Heros, from Mr. Rice's island, which probably might, as she then lay, have toiled in so as to have touched the wharf; and likewise had taken Captain York, an American, out of his cabin, on board his own vessel; that Captain York and Captain Hewes, with his crew and a number of American citizens, were confined on board this said pirate, and that Mr. Rice had gone to inform you of the proceedings, being much alarmed from such conduct, not having any thing to justify it. I immediately went to Mr. Rice's island to get more information; there I observed that Captain York's vessel lay so near the shore, that at low water, and the wind blowing on, I supposed her stern must have touched the shore, and from whence I was informed he was taken. On Mr. Rice's return, being informed that you were to be there soon, I waited until about half flood; before this, Messrs. Dexter, Allen Joy, and others who had relations on board, came there with hopes to get them liberated. Fearful that some accident might prevent you from getting over soon enough to see what could be done, and a probability of a wind for them to go out, and from conjectures that she was a press vessel, and knowing a number taken who had no protections, (being landmen,) I concluded to go on board in a birch canoe alone, with such documents as to prove I was a public officer of the Commonwealth, expecting to get such as I knew to be citizens of our country liberated. For this purpose I was put home by those who were most interested; the boat, after landing me, crossed over towards the Narrows, with the expectations, as I understood, to land and go down to see the officers on Campo Bello, who were acquainted with those who were in confinement; that, from a representation, there was another possibility for release. Previous to this, a boat passed with five on board, as I discovered with my glass, which appeared to have come from Moose island, and were passing towards Campo Bello; this boat was fired at, and went on board, and soon after left the vessel with five. While I was preparing to go on board, I heard the discharge of a cannon; I immediately went out and discovered the revenue colors in the boat in which you was in, about one-third from Moose island, aiming directly for this island, and, as I supposed, three-quarters or one mile within the limits of the United States; the smoke of this discharge appeared to be aimed for you. While observing this, (being on the southeast part of this island) and, I suppose, a little more than one mile from this said pirate, another cannon was discharged; I suppose at you. I heard a ball very distinctly pass, in about the elevation of twenty degrees from me; this ball, I suppose, I heard strike, but did not see it. Supposing, from your being on your lawful employment, within our own waters, you would be sunk before you would be forced on board, I immediately directed my family to be on their guard, as I expected you would pass my house. Just on my going out, I observed another discharge, I supposed aimed for you; I did not hear any ball from this, but was informed by others, who I believe, that balls were fired every time, and am informed that one struck this island. In the course of this time the boat which landed me was fired at with a swivel; four balls were observed by them to strike the water and some near the boat. I judged this boat to be as much as one quarter of a mile within the limits of the United States. Before this, I observed a person who, since, I have heard was Doctor Edwards, coming from Moose island and bound up Soward's bay; three musket shot I saw fired towards him, and he was, after hard labor, forced on board. In all this time I did not see the least appearance of a flag displayed, which makes me give them the appellation of pirates. What I have here stated, I am willing to go before the proper authority of our country and testify to.

I am, dear sir, very respectfully, yours,

WILLIAM ALLAN.

DISTRICT OF PASSAMAQUODDY, July 14, 1807.

Continuation, stating the conduct of J. Flintoph, Commander of His Britannic Majesty's armed schooner the Pogge.

On the 6th instant, in the evening late, the Pogge again made her appearance in this bay, and immediately, under her guns, boarded and removed two American vessels, and took out of another the master and two hands; also by after information, vexed two others; one was fired upon, several shot cut her rigging and sails, examined and dismissed; the other was taken, crew removed on board the armed vessel, manned and brought back under her guns, as may further appear by the list herewith, and depositions from Nos. 1 to 8.

Narration. On the 7th instant early, being informed of the foregoing circumstances, I embarked in the revenue boat, accompanied by several of the principal inhabitants of Moose island, and proceeded to the southerly part of the port. We saw three cannon fired a-head of the revenue boat. Judge Lincoln's boat having put off a little before us, having two women and a child, with other passengers, the three shot just mentioned were fired at her. The revenue boat proceeded on round eastward of Dudley island to Rice's (or Fred isle.) I was surprised we had not been fired upon, when we learned every boat that passed in sight of the vessel had been brought to and forced alongside. I felt a conviction that an interview with the commander was indispensable; but judged it imprudence to board in foreign jurisdiction, in my own boat, and unintroduced. I proceeded to Snuglive on the island of Campo Bello; here I saw several which had been on board and were dismissed, who stated that a twelve pound carronade had been loaded and repeatedly ordered to be fired into the revenue boat. A British gentleman, who had also been on board, observed this commander acted like one insane or mad.

Having met with Colonel Thomas Wyen, (a judge of the bench for the county of Charlotte,) and having acquainted him with my object of requesting his introduction, he unhesitatingly took me in his boat and repaired alongside this armed vessel, where, after a guard being placed over the boat to prevent all intercourse between the vessel and boat, I was admitted on deck and below. Previously, and with much irritation, the commander peremptorily rejected any less demand or explanation relating to the present situation of the vessels in his custody, which I desired to present, make, and require; but the general observation made was breach of treaties, encroachment of territory, and illicit trade.

I took the liberty to expostulate as to his firing shot without his jurisdiction, but in vain; he should fire as often, when and where he pleased; got so petulant as to be rude, and use illiberal language; ordered Colonel Wyen immediately over the side into his boat, repeatedly. I was admitted to retire with a little more gentleness; I was glad to withdraw from such imperiousness. Shortly after I got on shore he dismissed one vessel and the master of the sloop, and his two people, as per list.

The same afternoon he fell down the tide, and went eastward with the other two.

COLLECTOR'S OFFICE, PORT OF PASSAMAQUODDY, September 1, 1807.

SIR:

Since my last of July the 15th, "stating the conduct of John Flintoph, Lieut. Commander of His Britannic Majesty's armed schooner the Pogge, (or Progui,) accompanied with sundry depositions," &c., in continuation, I take the liberty to state, for the further information of Government, some subsequent occurrences relating to a proceeding from these transactions.

The schooner Harmony of Islesboro, Paoli Hewes master and owner, which was then captured and carried into St. John's, New Brunswick, for adjudication, has undergone a rigorous trial, through the court of Vice Admiralty, is now returned by a decree of restoration, as may be more fully understood by examining the file of documents accompanying this communication, and were deposited at this office with earnest request they should be forthwith forwarded, together with Captain P. Hewes's memorial, protest, letter from his counsel, and an estimate of damages for costs and detention sustained by this defendant and claimant in the progress of the business to which he solicits, humbly, due attention and relief.

The other vessel also, carried to St. John's with the above, to wit, the schooner Nabby, of Eastport, John Pace, owner and master, burden about twenty-one tons, licensed to carry on the cod fishery, and employed in importing plaster of paris, by permit to touch and trade, has been condemned at their court, sold at public vendue for sixty dollars. The owner was so indigent as not to have it in his ability to buy her in, and the probability is she will be burnt; the proceeding in such cases.

I take the liberty to suggest, would it not be judicious, as soon as feasible, to have the boundary line from the mouth of the St. Croix into the bay of Fundy definitively ascertained, and permanently fixed. There is a gap through which all the wild creatures come in and commit depredations on our peaceable and unsuspecting citizens, and alarm us in our most retired moments of rest; not only threatening destruction, but actually throwing shot among unoffending individuals of every sex and age, passing and repassing in their domestic occupations, within the limits of their own peaceful government. This I experienced among others, and narrowly escaped being sunk in the revenue boat; a gun was loaded and repeatedly ordered to be fired into the boat, but the dispensation of Divine Providence, I presume, interposed.

I regret much that I have to make such observations, as well as to find that the imperiousness of the British naval commanders is so correspondent in all our extensive seacoast.

With sentiments of highest esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your most humble servant,

LEWIS FRED. DELESDERNIER, Collector of Passamaquoddy.

HAMPTON, July 11, 1807.

SIR:

Yesterday I applied to the proper authority in this place, for permission to send to Commodore Douglas a letter, (which was, at the same time, submitted to their inspection,) the object of which was to obtain a copy of Vice Admiral Berkeley's order respecting deserters, and under which the Leopard acted. The result enables me to forward you an exact copy.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES BARRON.

The Hon. JAMES MADISON.

By the Honorable GEORGE CRANFIELD BERKELEY, Vice Admiral of the White, and Commander-in-chief of His Britannic Majesty's ships and vessels employed in the river St. Lawrence, along the coast of Nova Scotia, the islands of St. John and Cape Breton, the Bay of Fundy, and at and about the island of Bermuda, or Sommers' islands:

Whereas, many seamen, subjects of His Britannic Majesty, and serving in His Majesty's ships and vessels, as per margin,* while at anchor in the Chesapeake, deserted and entered on board the United States' frigate the Chesapeake, and openly paraded the streets of Norfolk, in sight of their officers, under the American flag, protected by the magistrates of the town, and the recruiting officer belonging to the above-mentioned American frigate; which magistrates and naval officer refused giving them up, although demanded by His Britannic Majesty's consul, as well as the captains of the ships from which the said men had deserted; the captains and commanders of His Majesty's ships and vessels under my command are, therefore, hereby required and directed, in case of meeting with the American frigate Chesapeake at sea, and without the limits of the United States, to show to the captain of her this order, and to require to search his ship for the deserters from the before-mentioned ships, and to proceed and search for the same. And, if a similar demand should be made by the American, he is permitted to search for deserters from their service, according to the customs and usages of civilized nations, on terms of peace and amity with each other.

Given under my hand, at Halifax, Nova Scotia, the 1st day of June, 1807.

G. C. BERKELEY.

Upton Bruce, being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, deposeth and saith, that, among the servants belonging to his father (Norman Bruce) is a female slave named Phillis, a dark mulatto; that, at an early age, she became the mother of two children, as was universally admitted, by a white man named Andrew Ware. This fact was never questioned, and Ware himself never, to my knowledge, denied it. The children passed for, and were admitted to be his, and assumed his name; one was a boy, and being myself older than either of them, and brought up as it were in the same family, nothing like doubt rests upon my mind as to his birth and parentage. I am as well assured of it, as I can be of any fact of the kind, and no one, that I heard, ever presumed to suppose otherwise. This boy was raised upon my father's farm on Pipe creek, at the mills in Frederick county, and being the child of a slave, was reared with the children of other slaves, and stood upon the same footing. His mother is still living; she it was that nursed him in his infancy, and she he considered, acknowledged, and treated as his mother. When I engaged in the management of my father's property, which I did on reaching the years of manhood, this boy was then about twelve or fourteen years old, and he remained along with the other servants until about the age of twenty, when, in consideration of his color, the regard I had for his father, (then dead,) and the desire expressed by that father to have these children liberated, this boy was suffered to go at large; he promising to make some compensation, which never has been done. After leaving me, he was working about the country some few years, employed sometimes as wagoner, driving a team to and from Baltimore, until at length I learned he entered on board some vessel and had gone to sea; and this life, I had reason to believe, he persevered in, until, for some time past, hearing nothing of him, I supposed it probable he might be dead. His appearance may have changed since I last knew him; he then had his growth in height, and was, as near as I could now guess, about five feet six or seven inches high, of a slender make, a thin foot, and he bent or stood rather back upon his hams; his face somewhat round, a nose not large, lips not thick, and a chin rather small; his color was swarthy or Indian-like, remarkably bright though for a mulatto, and would pass for something nearer white; his hair was of a darkish color, inclined to curl, which he sometimes kept tied; and which, upon inspection, would show to be different from the hair of a white man, and yet far removed from the wool of an African. He went by the name of Romulus, and is, I should imagine, now about the age of twenty-eight or thirty.

William McNair, being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, deposeth and saith, it is about twelve years ago, when he was employed as an overseer by Upton Bruce, son of Norman Bruce, who then lived with his father on the farm at Pipe creek, of which he then had the management, his father giving it into his hands, and that among the lads under his direction was one of a very bright color, like a very dark white man, and plainly showed the mixture, and as descending from black and white parents; that among the female slaves was one called Phillis, who acknowledged this boy as her child, and no doubt could be of the fact, and was so universally known by the whole family and neighborhood. His mother was a dark mulatto, and his father, as was well understood, was Andrew Ware, who I knew well. This boy was as much a slave to Mr. Bruce as any other he had, and no doubt was suggested to the contrary that ever I heard, nor was his origin or birth questioned; that he is, by guess, five feet seven inches high, rather slender made, his hair rather curly, and his age, to the best of the deponent's knowledge, is now about thirty years; that he understood he made some agreement with his master, by which he was suffered to go at large; and the last time this deponent recollects to have seen him, was driving a team on the Baltimore road, between six and seven years ago; that he then passed by the name of Romulus, and this deponent understood he afterwards took to the sea.

mulatto woman, (slave to Norman Bruce, who lived on Pipe creek,) by Andrew Ware, a white man; that she knew the said child from that time until it grew up, and reached near the age of twenty; that during that time he remained in the family of the said Bruce as his slave, upon the same footing and treated as his other slaves; that when he grew up he was not a large man, being spare; a round or flattish face; that he must now be about thirty years of age or upwards; that then he passed and was called by the name of Romulus; that his mother had a daughter by the same father, as was acknowledged, and as appeared from her color and resemblance to her brother. This boy I always understood was the son of a slave, named Phillis, by a white man called Andrew Ware. I never heard to the contrary, nor can I doubt it, the boy acknowledging this Phillis as his mother, and she receiving him as her child, and it was so admitted and understood by the whole family and neighborhood. I knew this boy for several years afterwards, and until he grew up. He was in height about five feet five or six inches, his hair dark and somewhat curly, and his make thin. He went by the name of Romulus, and I know of no particular mark to distinguish him except a scar on one of his thumbs, I think occasioned by a bite in some fight he had; and is now, I suppose, about twenty-eight or thirty years of age. The following is extracted from the signatures to the original articles of agreement and roll of equipage of the schooner Eagle, Greenbury Griffin, master, bound from Norfolk to St. Bartholomew.

"August 9th.—John Strawhan, Queen Anne's county, Maryland."

I, Benjamin Davis, of Westport, in the county of Bristol and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, yeoman, being legally qualified to give evidence, do depose and say, that, about fourteen or fifteen years ago, William Howland, late of said Westport, mariner, deceased, brought to Westport with him a colored boy, then about six years of age; that the name of the said boy was Daniel Martin; that he was bound to the said William, as an apprentice or servant, under the authority of the laws of this Commonwealth, by the selectmen and overseers of the poor of said town of Westport, and the indentures were executed at the house of this deponent; that the said Daniel was afterwards, on his arrival at the age of fourteen years, an apprentice or servant of Nancy Howland, widow and relict of said William Howland, and it is now about seven years since I have seen the said Daniel. He was then of a common stature, straight built, and without any prominent marks by which to describe his person. It was always understood by me that the said Daniel was from some Spanish settlement in America.

I, Nancy Howland, of New Bedford, in the county of Bristol and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, widow and relict of William Howland, late of Westport, in said county, mariner, do depose and say, that, in the month of August, in the year of our Lord 1792, according to the best of my recollection, my said husband brought with him on a voyage from Buenos Ayres Daniel Martin, a colored boy, then in the seventh year of his age, who was bound to him, as an apprentice or servant, by his mother; that, after the death of my said husband, and at the arrival of said Daniel at the age of fourteen years, he bound himself, by a law of this Commonwealth, to me, the deponent, and, after living with me about one year, left me, and, since that time, I have never seen or heard from the said Daniel until the application to take this testimony. At the time the said Daniel left me, he was of a common stature, and I do not now recollect any peculiar marks by which he could be readily described; he was very straight at that time. The indentures by which he was bound, by accident and length of time, are mislaid or lost.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, November 12, 1807.

SIR:

In compliance with your letter of the 9th instant, I have the honor of herewith transmitting to you papers A, B, and C, which contain all the information that has been communicated to the Navy Department, in relation "to the outrage committed on the frigate Chesapeake."

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

R. SMITH.

To the Hon. THOMAS BLOUNT,
Chairman of the Committee of Congress upon aggressions, &c.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, November 23, 1807.

SIR:

Having this morning received the original record of the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry, I find, upon comparing them with the copy of the opinion transmitted to you in my letter of 12th instant, that in the copy sent to you, there are some errors, and an omission, which I hasten to correct.

In the first article of the opinion, second line, after Chesapeake, the words "of 38 guns" should be inserted.

In the twenty-seventh article, instead of reading "her marines were neither supplied with enough cartridges, nor were those which they had of the proper size—none of these circumstances could have," &c. it should read thus: "her marines were not supplied with enough cartridges, and none of those which they had were of the proper size—these circumstances, however, could not have," &c. There are other errors, but of no consequence, being entirely verbal.

The following concluding article is not in the copy sent to you:

"39. The court is, lastly, of opinion that the causes of the surrender of the Chesapeake were, her being attacked by a ship of superior force, at a time when such an attack not having been expected by her commander, no sufficient preparation for resistance had been made. That there were abundant causes, however, to have induced the expectation of such an attack, and that there was ample time to have made such preparation, the court have already stated. That the ship was prematurely surrendered, even under such circumstances, the court have also stated. And the reasons of such want of preparation, and improper surrender, will be found fully exhibited in former parts of this report."

These errors, and this omission, are explained in a letter from Littleton W. Tazewell, Esq., Judge Advocate to the court, to me, dated 17th November, 1807, and this morning received by me, of which the following is an extract:

"I have the honor now to forward to you the original record of the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry, convened here under your warrant, and of the evidence adduced before that court. Supposing that it might be satisfactory to you to be informed, at the earliest period, of the result of the proceedings of the court, I did myself the honor to forward you, some time since, on the day the report and opinion was agreed to, and delivered by the court, a copy of that report. On comparing them, you will find some slight differences between the report itself, and the copy sent you. This is caused by some alterations in, and additions to the opinion and report which the court deemed it proper to make, subsequent to the writing of my letter. The copy sent was taken from the original rough draught, before it was amended and modified, as was afterwards done."

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant, here, for the enlistment of seamen in the service of the United States. As the Melampus is at present in Hampton Roads, I submit to you, sir, the propriety of your directing these men (should they have entered for your service) to be returned to their duty on board His Majesty's ship before mentioned.

I have the honor to remain, with perfect truth and respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN HAMILTON.

Captain DECATUR.

BRITISH CONSUL'S OFFICE, NORFOLK, (Va.) March 7, 1807.

SIR:

Mr. John Murphy, master of the British merchant ship Herald, in this harbor, has represented to me that John Wilson, a seaman under articles to that ship, and John Murphy, (his son,) an apprentice, both subjects of His Majesty, have deserted and enlisted at the rendezvous for the naval service of the United States, in this borough, requesting me to use my official interposition with you to obtain for him the recovery of the persons before mentioned. It has, therefore, become my duty to solicit that the seaman and apprentice in question (if they should have entered for the navy of the United States) may be returned to the master of the Herald, and to the performance of their respective engagements on board of that ship.

I have the honor to remain, with perfect truth and respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

JOHN HAMILTON.

Captain DECATUR.

NORFOLK, March 8, 1807.

SIR:

Your communications with Captain Decatur have been transmitted to me by that officer.

I must observe, in answer, that John Murphy, appearing to be an apprentice to his commander, has been delivered to the civil authority.

I do not feel myself justified in delivering any men who are not apprentices, and who have voluntarily entered the service of the United States, unless claimed by the magistracy.

I have the honor to be, with high respect, sir, your obedient humble servant,

A. SINCLAIR.

BRITISH CONSUL'S OFFICE, NORFOLK, (Va.) March 9, 1807.

SIR:

I have had the honor to receive your letter, dated yesterday, acquainting me, in reply to my communications, addressed (through misinformation) to Captain Decatur, which he had done me the kindness to transmit to you, that John Murphy, being an apprentice to his commander, had been delivered up to the civil authority, but that you do not feel yourself justified in delivering up any men who are not thus bound, and who have voluntarily entered the service of the United States, unless claimed by the magistracy.

I can only regret that you do not consider yourself authorized to comply with my request.

I have the honor to remain, with perfect truth and respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

JOHN HAMILTON.

Lieutenant SINCLAIR.

NAVY YARD, WASHINGTON, April 7, 1807.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose you the result of my inquiries relating to the men mentioned in your letter of yesterday.

And have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

JAS. BARRON.

The Hon. R. SMITH, Secretary of the Navy.

William Ware, pressed from on board the brig Neptune, Captain Crafts, by the British frigate Melampus, in the Bay of Biscay, and has served on board the said frigate fifteen months.

William Ware is a native American; born on Pipe creek, Frederick county, State of Maryland, at Bruce's Mills, and served his time at said Mills; he also lived at Ellicott's mills, near Baltimore, and drove a wagon several years between Hagerstown and Baltimore; he also served eighteen months on board the United States' frigate Chesapeake, under the command of Commodore Morris and Captain James Barron; he is an Indian looking man.

Daniel Martin was pressed at the same time and place; he is a native of Westport, in Massachusetts, about thirty miles to the eastward of Newport, Rhode Island; served his time out of New York with Captain Marrowby in the Caledonian; refers to Mr. Benjamin Davis, merchant, and Mr. Benjamin Corce, of Westport; he is a colored man.

John Strachan, born on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, Queen Anne's county, between Centreville and Queen's town; refers to Mr. John Price and — Pratt, Esq., on Kent island, who knows his relations; Strachan sailed in the brig Martha Bland, Captain Wivill, from Norfolk to Dublin, and from thence to Liverpool; he there left the brig, and shipped on board an English Guineaman; he was pressed on board the Melampus, off Cape Finisterre; to better his situation he consented to enter, being determined to make his escape when opportunity offered; he served on board the frigate two years; he is a white man, about five feet seven inches high.

William Ware and John Strachan have protections; Daniel Martin says he lost his after leaving the frigate.

John Little, alias Francis, and Ambrose Watts, escaped from the Melampus at the same time; known to the above persons to be Americans, but have not been entered by my recruiting officer.

William Ware, Daniel Martin, and John Strachan, state that, some time in February last, there was an entertainment on board the Melampus, lying then in Hampton Roads; that while the officers of — were engaged, and all the ship's boats, except the captain's gig, being hoisted in, themselves, and the two other men mentioned, availed themselves of a moment to seize the gig and row off; that, as soon as they had got into the boat, they were hailed to know what they were going to do; they replied they were going ashore; a brisk fire of musketry instantly commenced from the ship; that, in defiance of balls, and the hazard of their lives, they continued to pull, and finally effected their escape to land, namely, Lowell's Point; that they then carefully hauled up the boat on the beach, rolled up the coat, and placed that and the oars in the boat, gave three cheers, and moved up the country.

UNITED STATES' FRIGATE CHESAPEAKE, CHESAPEAKE BAY, June 23, 1807.

SIR:

Yesterday at 6., A. M., the wind became favorable, and knowing your anxiety that the ship should sail with all possible despatch, we weighed from our station in Hampton Roads and stood to sea. In Lynnhaven bay we passed two British men of war, one of them the Bellona, the other the Melampus; their colors flying, and their appearance friendly. Some time afterwards, we observed one of the two line-of-battle ships that lay off Cape Henry to get under way, and stand to sea; at this time the wind became light, and it was not until near four in the afternoon that the ship under way came within hail. Cape Henry then bearing northwest by west, distance three leagues, the communication, which appeared to be her commander's object for speaking the Chesapeake, he said he would send on board; on which I ordered the Chesapeake to be hove to for his convenience. On the arrival of the officer he presented me with the enclosed paper (No. 1.) from the captain of the Leopard, and a copy of an order from Admiral Berkeley, which another officer afterwards took back, to which I gave the enclosed answer, (No. 2.) and was waiting for his reply. About this time I observed some appearance of a hostile nature, and said to Captain Gordon that it was possible they were serious, and requested him to have his men sent to their quarters with as little noise as possible, not using those ceremonies which we should have done with an avowed enemy, as I fully supposed their arrangements were more menace than any thing serious. Captain Gordon immediately gave the orders to the officers and men to go to quarters, and have all things in readiness; but before a match could be lighted, or the quarter-bill of any division examined, or the lumber on the gun-deck, such as sails, cables, &c., could be cleared, the commander of the Leopard hailed; I could not hear what he said, and was talking to him, as I supposed, when she commenced a heavy fire, which did great execution.

It is distressing to me to acknowledge, that I found from the advantage they had gained over our unprepared and unsuspecting state, did not warrant a longer opposition; nor should I have exposed this ship and crew to so galling a fire had it not been with a hope of getting the gun-deck clear, so as to have made a more formidable defence; consequently our resistance was but feeble. In about twenty minutes after I ordered the colors to be struck, and sent Lieutenant Smith on board the Leopard to inform her commander that I considered the Chesapeake her prize. To this message I received no answer; the Leopard's boat soon after came on board, and the officer who came in her demanded the muster book. I replied the ship and books were theirs, and if he expected to see the men he must find them. They called on the purser who delivered his book, and the men were examined; and the three men demanded at Washington, and one man more, were taken away. On their departure from the ship I wrote the commander of the Leopard the enclosed, (No. 3.) to which I received the answer, (No. 4.) On finding that the men were his only object, and that he refused to consider the ship his prize, and the officers and crew his prisoners, I called a council of our officers, and requested their opinion relative to the conduct it was now our duty to pursue. The result was that the ship should return to Hampton Roads, and there wait your further orders. Enclosed you have a list of the unfortunate killed and wounded, as also a statement of the damage sustained in the hull, spars, and rigging of the ship.

I have sent this letter to you by Captain Gordon, in order that you may have an opportunity of getting such information as you may wish.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES BARRON.

HON. ROBERT SMITH, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

No. 1.

HIS MAJESTY'S SHIP LEOPARD, AT SEA, June 22, 1807.

The captain of His Britannic Majesty's ship Leopard has the honor to enclose the captain of the United States' ship Chesapeake an order from the honorable Vice Admiral Berkeley, commander-in-chief of His Majesty's ships on the North American station, respecting some deserters from the ships (therein mentioned) under his command, and supposed to be now serving as part of the crew of the Chesapeake.

The captain of the Leopard will not presume to say any thing in addition to what the commander-in-chief has stated, more than to express a hope that every circumstance respecting them may be adjusted in a manner that the harmony subsisting between the two countries may remain undisturbed.

To the Commander of the United States' Ship Chesapeake.

AT SEA, June 22, 1807.

I know of no such men as you describe. The officers that were on the recruiting service for this ship were particularly instructed by the Government, through me, not to enter any deserters from His Britannic Majesty's ships, nor do I know of any being here. I am also instructed never to permit the crew of any ship that I command to be mustered by any other but their own officers. It is my disposition to preserve harmony, and I hope this answer to your despatch may prove satisfactory.

JAMES BARRON.

To the Commander of His Britannic Majesty's Ship Leopard.

CHESAPEAKE, AT SEA, June 22, 1807.

I consider the frigate Chesapeake your prize, and am ready to deliver her to any officer authorized to receive her. By the return of the boat I shall expect your answer,

And have the honor to be yours, &c.

JAMES BARRON.

To the Commander of His Britannic Majesty's Ship Leopard.

LEOPARD, AT SEA, June 22, 1807.

SIR:

Having to the utmost of my power fulfilled the instructions of my commander-in-chief, I have nothing more to desire, and must in consequence proceed to join the remainder of the squadron, repeating that I am ready to give you every assistance in my power, and do most sincerely deplore that any lives should have been lost in the execution of a service which might have been adjusted more amicably not only with respect to ourselves, but the nations to which we respectively belong.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient humble servant,

S. P. HUMPHREYS.

To the Commander of the United States' Ship Chesapeake.

The purport of the general order said to be issued by Admiral Berkeley was, that each and every vessel of his squadron should take by force, if they could not be obtained by other means, any British deserters that could be found on board the Chesapeake, and that on the part of the commanders of the ships of his squadron a search should be admitted for American deserters.

This, as well as my memory serves me, was the tenor of the paper handed me by the visiting officer of His Britannic Majesty's ship the Leopard, and stated to have been orders recently issued by Admiral Berkeley.

There were several names mentioned in the body of the demand, neither of which was known to us.

Return of dead and wounded on board the frigate Chesapeake, Commodore James Barron, June 23, 1807.

Killed.—John Lawrence, James Arnold, John Shakely.

Badly wounded.—John Haden, Cotton Brown, John Parker, George Percival, Peter Simmons, Robert McDonald, Francis Covnsven, James Epps.

Slightly wounded.—Commodore James Barron, Midshipman James Broom, Peter Elison, William Hendricks, Thomas Short, William Moody, David Creighton, John Marter, Emanuel Fernandy, John Wilson.

J. G. T. HUNT, Surgeon to the Chesapeake.

Captain CHARLES GORDON.

Agreeably to your requisition of this date to us directed, we have taken a strict and careful survey on the hull of the late United States' frigate Chesapeake, and find it as follows:

Twenty-two round shot in her hull, that is to say, twenty-one on the starboard and one on the larboard side. Given under our hands on board the late United States' frigate Chesapeake, June 23, 1807.

BENJAMIN SMITH, Lieutenant.

SIDNEY SMITH, Lieutenant.

SAMUEL BROOKER, Master.

Captain CHARLES GORDON.

Agreeably to your requisition, of this date, to us directed, we have taken a strict and careful survey on the masts and standing rigging of the late United States' frigate Chesapeake, and find them in the following state: The fore and mainmasts are incapable of being made sea-worthy; the mizzenmast badly wounded, but not incapable of being repaired on shore. Three starboard and two larboard main shrouds; two starboard fore shrouds; two starboard mizzen shrouds; main topmast stay; cap bobstay, and starboard main-lift, cut away; likewise the middle stay-sail stay.

Given under our hands on board the late United States' frigate Chesapeake, 23d June, 1807.

BENJAMIN SMITH, 1st Lieutenant.

SIDNEY SMITH, 5th Lieutenant.

SAMUEL BROOKER, Master.

Captain JAMES GORDON.

JUNE 23, 1807.

Agreeably to your requisition of this date, to us directed, we have taken a strict and careful survey on the sails, spare spars, and boats of the late United States' frigate Chesapeake, and find them in the following state: In the foresail four round shot holes, twelve grape shot holes, and the starboard leech cut away. In the main-sail three round shot holes full of grape ditto, and the foot rope cut away. Main topsail, one round shot hole; fore topmast staysail much injured by grape shot. In the spare fore ropemast two twelve pound shot holes, which have rendered it entirely unfit for service. Main skysail-mast cut in two.

The second cutter much injured by a shot hole, which went through and through her; cut both of her masts and three of her arms in two.

First cutter slightly injured.

Given under our hands on board the late frigate Chesapeake.

BENJAMIN SMITH, Lieutenant.

SIDNEY SMITH, Lieutenant.

SAMUEL BROOKER, Master.

Captain CHARLES GORDON.

FRIGATE CHESAPEAKE, HAMPTON ROADS, June 29, 1807.

SIR:

Enclosed I have the honor to forward you an exact copy of this ship's log-book, and have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

JAS. BARRON.

Hon. R. SMITH, Secretary of the Navy.

MONDAY, June 22.—Commences with light breezes from the southward and westward, and clear weather. At 7, A. M., hoisted out the jolly boat, and hoisted in the second cutter; run the jolly boat up astern. At quarter past 7 weighed anchor; made sail with a pleasant breeze from west southwest, and stood out for sea. At 9 passed two of His Britannic Majesty's ships at anchor; stowed the larboard anchor, and secured the boats. At meridian the light on Cape Henry bore southwest by south; people employed in clearing ship for sea. This day ends at meridian, and contains seventeen hours.

TUESDAY, June 23.—Commences with light breezes from the south and west, and clear weather. A ship in sight apparently standing for us. At 1, P. M., the wind hauled to the northward and eastward in studding sails, and hauled upon a wind, and at half past 3 the ship came up with us; backed the main topsail and spoke her; was boarded by her. She proved to be the British ship Leopard of fifty guns; they came on board to demand some men who had deserted from the English navy. The commodore refusing to give them up the boat returned; they ranged alongside of us, and commenced a heavy fire. We being unprepared, and the ship much lumbered, it was impossible to clear ship for action in proper time, though every possible exertion was made, and not suspecting an enemy so near, did not begin to clear the deck until the enemy had commenced firing. In about thirty minutes, after receiving much damage in our hull, rigging, and spars, and having three men killed, to wit: Joseph Arnold, Peter Shakely, and John Lawrence, and sixteen wounded, to wit: Commodore Barron, Mr. Broom, John Hadden, Cotton Brown, Peter Ellison, John Parker, George Percival, Peter Summers, Wm. Hendrick, W. Macdonald, Francis Conhoven, Thomas Short, Wm. Moody, David Creighton, John Martyr, James Epps, Emanuel Hendrichs, John Wilson, Wm. Warren, and John Bates; and having one gun ready fired, and hauled down our colors. The Leopard ceased firing, sent her boat on board, and mustered the ship's company. At sundown they left the ship, taking with them four men, viz. John Strahan, Daniel Martin, Wm. Ware, and John Wilson, who had deserted from their service; at the same time Lieutenant Allen went on board, and returned at 8 o'clock. The Leopard left us, and stood.

We then made sail, and stood in shore, having three and a half feet water in our hold. Crew employed in pumping and working ship in for Hampton Roads; got the anchors clear for coming to. At 6, A. M., took the third reef in the main topsail, and set top gallant sails; held a survey on the masts and rigging. At 8 Cape Henry bore southwest, distance four or five miles; employed ship in for Hampton Roads. At half past meridian came to with the starboard anchor in seven fathom water in Hampton Roads.

B.

NORFOLK, June 29, 1807.

SIR:

The enclosed papers, Nos. 1 and 2, you will perceive, are from the committee of the people of Norfolk, calling on me for aid, with the gunboats under my command, to prevent an invasion which has been threatened by the commanding officer of the British squadron, lying in the vicinity of this place. You will see, sir, by No. 3, my reply. The British commander has also threatened that he will again take possession of the Chesapeake. I have it also from the most unquestionable authority, that they have asserted, positively, that, in case the President should issue a similar order to that issued respecting the Leander, they will consider it as an act of hostility, and will commence hostile operations immediately. Under an impression that they will do as they say, I hope and feel satisfied my preparing to act on the defensive will meet the approbation of the President and yourself. If, however, it should be thought I have been precipitate, I beg it may be attributed to my extreme desire not to omit any service I might render my country. The four old gunboats are all that can be immediately equipped for service; those we commenced fitting this morning. They are now entirely ready for the reception of the men, who, I trust, will come forward in sufficient numbers to authorize our proceeding to Hampton to-morrow. Sir, as I have no doubt, from the threats the British have made, we shall have to fight, I shall not leave this until the boats are manned to my satisfaction; to do which it will take one hundred and sixty men. The British, if they attempt any thing against us, it will be in the night, with row-boats, or other boats that they may press. The row-boats belonging to their squadron are capable of carrying five hundred men with ease. This number, if we are full manned, I feel confident of being able to oppose. I beg you, sir, however, to bear in mind that our crews will be composed of volunteers who, notwithstanding their great zeal, will not possess all the skill we could wish. I should, however, be mortified if it were understood I wished to convey an idea that as much should not be expected from us as ought to be expected from any four gunboats; more I hope will not be expected.

The new boats at this place can be in readiness in a short time, should you choose to order it. Although, sir, I shall always be ready to serve my country in any way I can be useful, I hope, sir, if the frigates are to be fitted out, I shall not be continued in gunboats. The gentlemen who have volunteered their services have agreed to stay with us only until such time as we shall hear from Washington what steps will be taken, which will be on Thursday.

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of high respect, sir, your obedient servant,

STEPHEN DECATUR, JUN.

SIR:

We take pleasure in presenting to you the resolution of the committee appointed by the inhabitants of this borough, now enclosed. Requesting your answer to the resolution, we are,

With the highest respect, sir, your obedient servants,

THOMAS BLANCHARD,

No. 2.

NORFOLK, June 28, 1807.

Whereas, the committee have received information, from various sources, that the commander of the British ships of war have menaced the inhabitants of Hampton with an invasion for the purpose of procuring water. It is resolved that application be made to Captain Stephen Decatur, commander of the United States' naval force at this place, to equip the gunboats, by availing himself of the services of the captains and seamen who have professed them, to proceed to Hampton, or as near it as he may judge proper, to co-operate with the people in their defence in any manner he may judge most expedient, or to act as circumstances may dictate in preventing the execution of their threat.

Resolved, That Thomas Blanchard, Seth Foster, and J. W. Murdaugh, be a committee to wait on Captain Decatur with this application.

Extract from the minutes.

THEO. ARMISTEAD, Secretary of the Committee.

No. 3.

NORFOLK, June 28, 1807.

GENTLEMEN:

I have received your letter of this day, enclosing the resolution of the committee calling on me, as the commander of the naval force at this place, to equip and resist, with the gunboats under my command, a threatened invasion of the territory of the United States by the British, now lying in the waters of the Chesapeake.

Having the fullest confidence that the committee would not have made a request of this nature unless they were fully impressed with a belief that the hostility spoken of was certainly intended, I feel it my duty to repel, as far as I have power, any such attempt that may be made: for which purpose, if a sufficient number of volunteers can be procured, I will repair to Hampton with all possible expedition.

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of high respect, gentlemen, your obedient servant,
STEPHEN DECATUR.

To THOMAS BLANCHARD, SETH FOSTER, J. W. MURDAUGH, Esqrs.

Extract of a letter from Commodore Stephen Decatur to the Secretary of the Navy, dated

UNITED STATES' FRIGATE CHESAPEAKE, July 4, 1807.

When I was honored with your orders I was on board the gunboats; four of them are only wanting men to place them in a complete state of readiness for immediate service. The Chesapeake, when I took command of her, had been brought up into the bite of Craney island, in consequence of the threats of the British. Their movements, sir, are extremely suspicious; since the affair of the Leopard and Chesapeake, they have been at anchor inside the capes, and have brought to, by firing at, every vessel that has passed in or out of the capes. They have sent many insolent and menacing messages to Norfolk: such as, if the people did not supply them with articles they might want, they would come up and retake the Chesapeake, and cut out the French frigate Sibylle. This, sir, from their movements, it is my opinion they intend to attempt. Yesterday afternoon the four British ships came in and anchored in Hampton Roads. This morning they sent their tenders, and sounded quite through the narrows. The present situation of the Chesapeake and Sibylle is such, in consequence of the narrowness of the channel, that if an attempt was made on either of them by the ships, they could not render to each other that support which would be necessary. In consequence of this, I have determined to move up nearer the town, where we shall be able to take such position as will enable us, with the assistance of the fort, to make such a defence as may render abortive any attempt that may be made upon us.

I have just learned that the depth of the water from Hampton Roads to Norfolk will admit of three of the British squadron coming up.

Copy of a letter from Commodore Stephen Decatur, Jun. to the Secretary of the Navy, dated

UNITED STATES' FRIGATE CHESAPEAKE, July 4, 1807.

SIR:

I have just been informed by Doctor Bullus, who has returned from Norfolk, that Commodore Douglas, commander of the British squadron, has written to the inhabitants of Norfolk, that, in consequence of some resolves passed by a committee selected from the inhabitants of Norfolk and its vicinity, he has anchored his ships in such a position as to prevent any vessels going to or coming from Norfolk; which he is determined to do, if those resolves are not rescinded.

I have the honor to be, &c.

STEPHEN DECATUR, JUN.

Extract of a letter from Commodore Decatur to the Secretary of the Navy, dated

UNITED STATES' FRIGATE CHESAPEAKE, NORFOLK, July 8, 1807.

The menacing letter written by Commodore Douglas to the mayor of Norfolk, he has since stated, verbally, contained no menace; and he has further said, that he has no hostile intention against Norfolk. However, sir, you will see, by the enclosed affidavit, that his actions do not comport with his words. He has lightened his ship since the pacific message he sent to the mayor, and the day before yesterday he fired many shot at an Eastern Shore man. If he makes an attempt to come up with the force they speak of, I think I am not over sanguine when I say I believe they will not all go down again.

Extract of a letter from Commodore Decatur to the Secretary of the Navy, dated

UNITED STATES' FRIGATE CHESAPEAKE, July 12, 1807.

The British squadron lying in Hampton Roads bring to every vessel passing to this place, but have not detained any. The Bellona and Leopard continue in their former station in the Roads. The Triumph and Melampus have weighed, and are now at anchor in Lynnhaven bay.

C.

At a Court of Inquiry assembled on board the United States' ship Chesapeake, in the harbor of Norfolk, and State of Virginia, by order of the honorable Robert Smith, Secretary of the Navy of the United States, and continued by adjournment from day to day, from Monday, the 5th of October, 1807, until Wednesday, the 4th day of November, 1807.

Present, Captain Alexander Murray, President.

Captains Isaac Hull and Isaac Chauncey, Members thereof.

The following opinion and report was unanimously given, and directed by the court to be transmitted to the Honorable the Secretary of the Navy of the United States.

Pursuant to an order from the Hon. Robert Smith, Secretary of the Navy of the United States, to Captain Alexander Murray directed, dated the twelfth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seven, the court proceeded to inquire into the causes of the surrender of the Chesapeake, a frigate of the United States, then under the command of James Barron, Esq. a captain in the navy of the United States, to a British vessel of war, which surrender was made (as is in the said order stated) without that defence being made which might have been expected from the known valor of Americans; and having heard all the evidence adduced, as well by the Judge Advocate, as by the said Captain James Barron, and having maturely and thoroughly considered the same, (Captain James Barron having declined to offer any defence,) report to the honorable the Secretary of the Navy of the United States, as by his said warrant is required, a state of the matters touching the said surrender, together with their opinion thereon, as followeth:

1. It appears to the court, that the United States' ship Chesapeake, then under the command of James Barron, Esq. a captain in the navy of the United States, sailed from Hampton Roads, on an intended cruise in the Mediterranean sea; on the morning of the 22d of June last past, having on board a crew consisting of more than three hundred and seventy men, and completely equipped with every thing necessary for such a ship of war, sailing on such a cruise.
2. It appears to the court, that Captain Barron was appointed commodore of the ships and vessels destined for the Mediterranean service, on the 15th day of May last past, and hoisted his broad pendant on board the Chesapeake, the first time he came on board of her after her arrival in Hampton Roads; to wit, on or about the 6th day of June last past.
3. It appears to the court, that Commodore Barron visited the Chesapeake only twice during the period she remained in Hampton Roads, and before he came on board to proceed to sea; on neither of which occasions did he examine particularly into her state and condition.
4. It appears to the court, that the guns of the Chesapeake were never exercised before she proceeded to sea; that her crew were quartered but a few days previous to that time, and had never been called to quarters more than three times prior to her sailing for sea.
5. It appears to the court, that the ship was reported to Commodore Barron to be ready for sea, on the 17th day of June, that he came on board on the 21st, and that the ship sailed on the morning of the 22d of June last past.
6. It appears to the court, that antecedent to the sailing of the Chesapeake, there had been received on board of her, some persons who had been claimed by the British Government as deserters from their service, but who were not ordered to be delivered up by the American officers. That there was also a report in circulation, and generally known on board the Chesapeake, that a threat had been used by the captain of the British ship of war Melampus, to take these men from the Chesapeake. That Commodore Barron had full knowledge of the fact, that such men were on board his ship, that they had been demanded by the British Government, and had not been delivered up, the court are perfectly satisfied; but no positive evidence has been adduced to prove, that the report of the threat above mentioned was communicated to him before his ship sailed.
7. It appears to the court, that the Chesapeake, in proceeding from Hampton Roads to sea, passed a British squadron at anchor in Lynnhaven bay, who, at the time of her passing them, were making signals to each other, which was not only reported to Commodore Barron by one of his officers but actually observed by himself.
8. It appears to the court, that the British ship of war Leopard, of fifty guns, one of the squadron then at anchor within the limits of the United States, weighed immediately after these signals were thrown out, and stood to sea.
9. It does not appear to the court, that at this time there was any vessel in sight, or any other object to induce her to go to sea, but the Chesapeake.
10. It appears to the court, that at the time the Leopard got under weigh, the wind was at south southwest, and, therefore, fair for her to proceed to sea; but that, instead of availing herself of this to clear the land, she hauled by the wind, close round Cape Henry, and stood to the southward, under easy sail; thereby showing it was not her intention to get off the land speedily.
11. It appears to the court, that after this the wind became light and baffling, and likely to shift, and came out from the eastward: that when this happened, the Leopard shortened sail, and stood to the eastward.
12. It appears to the court, that after this, the wind did come out about south southeast, and that the Leopard then having thus got the weathergage, preserved it by tacking in shore, when the Chesapeake did so in order to get off her pilot, and after the Chesapeake again stood off to the eastward, that the Leopard wore, and bore down for her.
13. It appears to the court, that when the Leopard tacked and stood in shore, on the same tack with the Chesapeake, that her lower deck ports were all triced up.
14. It appears to the court, that when the Leopard run down for the Chesapeake, she rounded to on her starboard quarter, and to windward of her, and that at this time her tompions were out of her guns.
15. It appears to the court, that Commodore Barron was upon deck, observing the Leopard during the time these manœuvres were practising, and these appearances exhibited.
16. The court is of opinion, that the circumstances above stated were in themselves so suspicious, as to have furnished sufficient warning to a prudent, discreet, and attentive officer, of the probable designs of a ship of war conducted in that way, and ought to have induced Commodore Barron to have prepared his ship for action, especially with the information he possessed of the situation of his crew generally, of those who had been demanded by the British Government particularly, and of the general state of the ship at that time.
17. It appears to the court, that Commodore Barron, nevertheless, did not order his ship to be cleared for action, and that he did not call his men to quarters.
18. It appears to the court, that when the Leopard came alongside of the Chesapeake, an officer was sent from her, with a communication from Captain Humphreys, the captain of the Leopard, to Commodore Barron, which the latter could not, and did not misunderstand, but very correctly concluded to be a demand with which he ought not, and could not comply, and one which, if refused, would be enforced, if possible.
19. It appears to the court, that although such was the situation and impression of Commodore Barron at this time, yet that he did not still order his ship to be prepared for action, although ample time was allowed for that purpose, the British officer being detained on board the Chesapeake from thirty-five to forty-five minutes.

20. The court is of opinion, that the neglect of Commodore Barron to prepare his ship for action under such circumstances, is a direct breach of the fourth article of the rules and regulations for the government of the navy of the United States, adopted by an act of the Congress of the United States, passed on the 23d day of April, 1800, entitled "An act for the better government of the navy of the United States."

21. It appears to the court, that after the British officer left the Chesapeake, bearing a positive refusal from Commodore Barron to the demand which had been made by Captain Humphreys, and after Commodore Barron was himself satisfied that an attack upon his ship would be made, he did not take prompt, necessary, and efficient means to prepare his ship for battle. That his first order was merely to clear his gun-deck, and the second, given after the lapse of some time, was, to get his men to quarters secretly, without beat of drum; although, with such a crew as he had on board, and in such a situation as the ship then was, it was not to be expected that such orders could be effectually accomplished.

22. It appears to the court, that the conduct of Commodore Barron, during the attack of the Leopard, manifested great indecision, and a disposition to negotiate, rather than a determination bravely to defend his ship; that he repeatedly hailed the Leopard during her attack upon him; that he drew his men from their guns, to lower down boats, to send on board the attacking ship; and that he ordered his first lieutenant from his quarters during the attack, to carry a message on board the Leopard, at that time firing upon him.

23. It appears to the court, that during the attack, Commodore Barron used language, in the presence of his men, calculated to dispirit his crew, by ordering them to keep down, that they would all be cut to pieces.

24. It appears to the court, that Commodore Barron ordered the colors of the Chesapeake to be struck, and they were struck before a single gun of any kind was fired from her, and that at the time they were so struck, her main-deck battery was in a situation which would have enabled the return of a broadside in a very short time.

25. The court is therefore of opinion, that the Chesapeake was prematurely surrendered, at a time when she was nearly prepared for battle, and when the injuries sustained either in the ship or crew did not make such a surrender then necessary; and that for this, Commodore Barron falls under a part of the sixth article of the rules and regulations for the government of the navy of the United States, adopted by an act of the Congress of the United States, passed on the 23d day of April, 1800, entitled "An act for the better government of the navy of the United States."

26. The court is of opinion, that although the conduct of Commodore Barron, before and during the attack of the Leopard, evinced great inattention to his duty, and want of decision, yet that, during that attack, he exposed his person, and did not manifest, either by his orders or actions, any personal fear or want of courage.

27. It appears to the court, that although the Chesapeake might and ought to have been better defended than she was, yet that she was not in a situation, at the time of the attack made upon her, to have enabled so gallant a defence being made as might be expected. Some of her guns were not securely fitted in their carriages, some of her sponges and wads were too large, but few of her powder-horns were filled, her matches were not primed, some of her rammers were not in their proper places, her marines were neither supplied with enough cartridges, nor were those of which they had of the proper size. None of these circumstances, however, could have influenced Commodore Barron in striking his colors, because they were not known to him at the time.

28. The court is of opinion, that the conduct of all the other officers of the ship, except those whose duty it was to have remedied the deficiencies before stated, and of the crew generally, was proper, commendable, and honorable.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, NOVEMBER 19, 1807.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

NOVEMBER 19, 1807.

According to the request expressed in your resolution of the 18th instant, I now transmit a copy of my proclamation interdicting our harbors and waters to British armed vessels, and forbidding intercourse with them, referred to in my message of the 27th of October last.

TH: JEFFERSON.

By Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

During the wars which, for some time, have unhappily prevailed among the Powers of Europe, the United States of America, firm in their principles of peace, have endeavored, by justice, by a regular discharge of all their national and social duties, and by every friendly office their situation has admitted, to maintain with all the belligerents their accustomed relations of friendship, hospitality, and commercial intercourse. Taking no part in the questions which animate these Powers against each other, nor permitting themselves to entertain a wish but for the restoration of general peace, they have observed with good faith the neutrality they assumed; and they believe that no instance of a departure from its duties can be justly imputed to them by any nation. A free use of their harbors and waters, the means of refitting and of refreshment, of succor to their sick and suffering, have, at all times, and on equal principles, been extended to all, and this, too, amidst a constant recurrence of acts of insubordination to the laws, of violence to the persons, and of trespasses on the property of our citizens, committed by officers of one of the belligerent parties received among us. In truth, these abuses of the laws of hospitality have, with few exceptions, become habitual to the commanders of the British armed vessels hovering on our coasts, and frequenting our harbors. They have been the subject of repeated representations to their Government. Assurances have been given that proper orders should restrain them within the limits of the rights and of the respect due to a friendly nation; but these orders and assurances have been without effect; no instance of punishment for past wrongs has taken place. At length a deed, transcending all we have hitherto seen or suffered, brings the public sensibility to a serious crisis, and our forbearance to a necessary pause. A frigate of the United States, trusting to a state of peace, and leaving her harbor on a distant service, has been surprised and attacked by a British vessel of a superior force, one of a squadron then lying in our waters and covering the transaction, and has been disabled from service, with the loss of a number of men killed and wounded. This enormity was not only without provocation or justifiable cause, but was committed with the avowed purpose of taking by force, from a ship of war of the United States, a part of her crew; and that no circumstance might be wanting to mark its character, it had been previously ascertained that the seamen demanded were native citizens of the United States. Having effected her purpose she returned to anchor with her squadron within our jurisdiction. Hospitality under such circumstances ceases to be a duty: and a continuance of it, with such uncontrolled abuses, would tend only, by multiplying injuries and irritations, to bring on a rupture between the two nations. This extreme resort is equally opposed to the interests of both, as it is to assurances of the most friendly dispositions on the part of the British Government, in the midst of which this outrage has been committed. In this light the subject cannot but present itself to that Government, and strengthen the motives to an honorable reparation of the wrong which has been done, and to that effectual control of its naval commanders, which alone can justify the Government of the United States in the exercise of those hospitalities it is now constrained to discontinue.

In consideration of these circumstances and of the right of every nation to regulate its own police, to provide for its peace and for the safety of its citizens, and consequently to refuse the admission of armed vessels into its harbors or waters, either in such numbers or of such descriptions, as are inconsistent with these, or with the maintenance of the authority of the laws, I have thought proper, in pursuance of the authorities specially given by law, to issue this my Proclamation, hereby requiring all armed vessels bearing commissions under the Government of Great Britain, now within the harbors or waters of the United States, immediately and without any delay to depart from the same, and interdicting the entrance of all the said harbors and waters to the said armed vessels, and to all others bearing commissions under the authority of the British Government.

And if the said vessels, or any of them, shall fail to depart as aforesaid, or if they or any others, so interdicted, shall hereafter enter the harbors or waters aforesaid, I do in that case forbid all intercourse with them, or any of them, their officers or crews, and do prohibit all supplies and aid from being furnished to them or any of them.

And I do declare, and make known, that if any person from or within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, shall afford any aid to any such vessel contrary to the prohibition contained in this Proclamation, either in repairing any such vessel, or in furnishing her, her officers or crew, with supplies of any kind, or in any manner whatsoever, or if any pilot shall assist in navigating any of the said armed vessels, unless it be for the purpose of carrying them, in the first instance, beyond the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, or unless it be in the case of a vessel forced by distress, or charged with public despatches as hereinafter provided for, such person or persons shall, on conviction, suffer all the pains and penalties by the laws provided for such offences.

And I do hereby enjoin and require all persons bearing office, civil or military, within or under the authority of the United States, and all others, citizens or inhabitants thereof, or being within the same, with vigilance and promptitude to exert their respective authorities, and to be aiding and assisting to the carrying this Proclamation, and every part thereof, into full effect.

Provided nevertheless, that if any such vessel shall be forced into the harbors or waters of the United States, by distress, by the dangers of the sea, or by the pursuit of an enemy, or shall enter them charged with despatches or business from their Government, or shall be a public packet for the conveyance of letters and despatches, the commanding officer immediately reporting his vessel to the collector of the district, stating the object or cause of entering the said harbors or waters, and conforming himself to the regulations in that case prescribed under the authority of the laws, shall be allowed the benefit of such regulations respecting repairs, supplies, stay, intercourse, and departure, as shall be permitted under the same authority.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same.

Given at the city of Washington the 2d day of July, in the year of our Lord 1807, and of the sovereignty and independence of the United States the thirty-first.

GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 8, 1807.

DECEMBER 7, 1807.

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives:

Having recently received from our late minister plenipotentiary at the court of London a duplicate of despatches, the originals of which have been sent by the Revenge schooner, not yet arrived, I hasten to lay them before both Houses of Congress. They contain the whole of what has passed between the two Governments on the subject of the outrage committed by the British ship Leopard on the frigate Chesapeake. Congress will learn from these papers the present state of the discussion on that transaction, and that it is to be transferred to this place by the mission of a special minister.

While this information will have its proper effect on their deliberations and proceedings respecting the relations between the two countries, they will be sensible that, the negotiation being still pending, it is proper for me to request that the communications may be considered as confidential.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 18, 1807.

DECEMBER 18, 1807.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The communications now made, showing the great and increasing dangers with which our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise, are threatened, on the high seas and elsewhere, from the belligerent powers of Europe, and it being of the greatest importance to keep in safety these essential resources, I deem it my duty to recommend the subject to the consideration of Congress, who will doubtless perceive all the advantages which may be expected from an inhibition of the departure of our vessels from the ports of the United States.

Their wisdom will also see the necessity of making every preparation for whatever events may grow out of the present crisis.

Extract of a letter from the Grand Judge, Minister of Justice, to the Imperial Attorney General for the Council of Prizes.

PARIS, September 18, 1807.

SIR:

I have submitted to His Majesty the Emperor and King the doubts raised by His Excellency the Minister of Marine and Colonies, on the extent of certain dispositions of the Imperial Decree of the 21st November, 1806, which has declared the British Isles in a state of blockade. The following are His Majesty's intentions on the points in question:

1. May vessels of war, by virtue of the Imperial Decree of the 21st November last, seize, on board neutral vessels, either English property, or even all merchandise proceeding from the English manufacturers or territory?

Answer. His Majesty has intimated that, as he did not think proper to express any exception in his decree, there is no ground for making any in its execution, in relation to any whomsoever, (a l'égard de qui que ce peut être.)

2. His Majesty has postponed a decision on the question, whether armed French vessels ought to capture neutral vessels bound to or from England, even when they have no English merchandise on board.

REGNIER.

[NOTE. That a proclamation on the subject of impressments has been published by the British Government has been officially made known; but not the instrument itself. The enclosed form, however, has been published in such a manner as to leave no doubt of its correctness substantially. TH: J.]

BY THE KING.

A PROCLAMATION,

For recalling and prohibiting British seamen from serving foreign Princes and States.

GEORGE R.

Whereas it hath been represented unto us, that great numbers of mariners and seafaring men, our natural born subjects, have been enticed to enter into the service of foreign states, and are now actually serving, as well on board the ships of war belonging to the said foreign states, as on board the merchant vessels belonging to their subjects, notwithstanding our former Proclamation recalling them, contrary to the duty and allegiance which our said subjects owe unto us, and to the great disservice of their native country; we have therefore thought it necessary, at the present moment, when our kingdom is menaced and endangered, and when the maritime rights on which its power and greatness do mainly depend, are disputed and called in question, to publish, by and with the advice of our privy council, this our Royal Proclamation: We do hereby strictly charge and command all masters of ships, pilots, mariners, shipwrights, and other seafaring men, being our natural born subjects, who may have been enticed into the pay or service of any foreign state, or do serve in any foreign ship or vessel, that forthwith they and every of them do (according to their bounden duty and allegiance, and in consideration that their native country hath need of all their services) withdraw themselves, and depart from, and quit such foreign service, and do return home to their native country; or do enter on board such of our ships of war as they may chance to fall in with, either on the high seas, or in any rivers, waters, havens, roads, ports, or places, whatsoever or where-soever.

And, for the better execution of the purposes of this our Royal Proclamation, we do authorize and command all captains, masters, and others, commanding our ships and vessels of war, to stop and make stay of all and every such person or persons (being our natural born subjects) as shall endeavor to transport or enter themselves into the service of any foreign state, contrary to the intent and command of this our Royal Proclamation, and to seize upon, take, and bring away, all such persons as aforesaid, who shall be found to be employed or serving in any foreign merchant ship or vessel as aforesaid; but we do strictly enjoin all such our captains, masters, and others, that they do permit no man to go on board such ships and vessels belonging to states at amity with us, for the purpose of so seizing upon, taking, and bringing away, such persons aforesaid, for whose discreet and orderly demeanor the said captains cannot answer; and that they do take especial care that no unnecessary violence be done or offered to the vessel, or to the remainder of the crew, from out of which such persons shall be taken.

And in case of their receiving information of any such person or persons being employed or serving on board of any ship of war belonging to such foreign state at amity with us, we do authorize and command our captains, masters, and others, commanding our ships of war, to require of the captain or commander of such foreign ship of war, that he do forthwith release and discharge such person or persons, being our natural born subject or subjects; and if such release and discharge shall be refused, then to transmit information of such refusal to the commander-in-chief of the squadron under whose orders such captain or commander shall be then serving; which information the said commander-in-chief is hereby strictly directed and enjoined to transmit, with the least possible delay, to our minister resident residing at the seat of Government of that state to which the said foreign ship of war shall belong, or to our Lord High Admiral, or Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty for the time being, in order that we, being apprized of such proceeding, may forthwith direct the necessary steps to be taken for obtaining redress from the Government to which such foreign ship of war shall belong, for the injury done to us by the unwarranted detention of our natural born subjects in the service of a foreign state.

And whereas it has been further represented unto us, that divers mariners and seafaring men, our natural born subjects, have been induced to accept letters of naturalization, or certificates of citizenship, from foreign states; and have been taught to believe that, by such letters or certificates, they are discharged from that duty of allegiance which, as our natural born subjects, they owe to us; now we do hereby warn all such mariners, seafaring men, and others, our natural born subjects, that no such letters of naturalization, or certificates of citizenship, do, or can, in any manner, divest our natural born subjects of the allegiance, or in any degree alter the duty which they owe to us their lawful sovereign. But, in consideration of the error into which such mariners and seafaring men as aforesaid may have been led, we do hereby publish and declare our free pardon to all such our subjects, who, repenting of the delusion under which they have acted, shall immediately, upon the knowledge of this our Royal Proclamation, withdraw themselves from foreign service, and return to their allegiance to us; and we do declare that all such our subjects, who shall continue in the service of foreign states, in disregard and contempt of this our Royal Proclamation, will not only incur our just displeasure, but are liable to be proceeded against for such contempt, and shall be proceeded against accordingly; and we do hereby declare, that if any such masters of ships, pilots, mariners, seamen, shipwrights, or other seafaring men, (being our natural born subjects,) shall be taken in any foreign service by the Algerines, or other Barbary powers, and carried into slavery, they shall not be reclaimed by us as subjects of Great Britain.

And we do hereby notify, that all such our subjects as aforesaid, who have voluntarily entered, or shall enter, or voluntarily continue to serve on board of any ships of war belonging to any foreign state at enmity with us, are and will be guilty of high treason; and we do by this our Royal Proclamation declare, that they shall be punished with the utmost severity of the law.

Given at our Court at the Queen's Palace, the sixteenth day of October, one thousand eight hundred and seven, and in the forty-seventh year of our reign.

GOD SAVE THE KING.

No. 209.

[1st SESSION.

TRIPOLI—HAMET CARAMALLI.

REPORTED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 18, 1807.

The committee to whom was referred the letter of William Eaton, communicating a memorial from Hamet Caramalli, ex-Bashaw of Tripoli, report:

That the memorial is dated "Syracuse, the 18th of February, 1807," in which the memorial states, that he has sacrificed all his means of support, and exposed his life in the service of the United States; that he is in exile at Syracuse, far from his family, and deprived of every convenience of life; that he had hoped to be recompensed by an equivalent to his usefulness and to his sacrifices; that the promises made to him admitted no suspicion that so much time would have elapsed, and that hope not yet realized. He complains of the delay in affording him relief, and appeals to the magnanimity of Congress to restore to him his family, and to grant him a competent support.

The committee, having examined the subject, find the following to be a brief statement of the facts relative to the situation of the memorialist, and his claim to further remuneration from this Government.

The memorialist, Hamet Caramalli, being driven from the throne of Tripoli by his younger brother, the present reigning Bashaw; having made various unsuccessful efforts to regain it, and still meditating the recovery of his inheritance; in 1804, while the United States were prosecuting a war with that State, it was represented to the Executive that a co-operation with our forces was desirable to the ex-Bashaw; but, in order to enable him to carry on his operations with greater effect, it would be necessary to furnish him with arms, ammunition, and some money.

Considering that concerted operations with him against the reigning Bashaw, who was then his as well as our common enemy, was justifiable, and might be productive of beneficial effects to both, without binding this Government to pursue the war any longer than to effect the objects for which it was commenced, the Executive authorized Commodore Barron, then proceeding with his squadron to the Mediterranean, to enter into such an understanding with the ex-Bashaw, if he should deem it useful to co-operate with him; and, in that case, to furnish him with arms, ammunition, and money, to a moderate extent.

It appears to the committee, that Commodore Barron perfectly understood his instructions, to go no further than to authorize a co-operation with the ex-Bashaw, leaving the agents of our Government at full liberty to conclude a peace with the regency of Tripoli, whenever such terms should be offered by that Power, as our agent, authorized to negotiate a treaty and conclude such peace, should think proper to accept of; and the commodore's letter to General Eaton, who joined the ex-Bashaw in his operations by land, appears to be conformable to that opinion of his powers.

That, when the ex-Bashaw, with the aid of General Eaton and a number of other Americans, and with the assistance of the arms and other supplies furnished by Commodore Barron, had recovered the city of Derne, and the possession of that province, from which he had formerly been driven, overtures of peace were made by the reigning Bashaw to our agent, Mr. Lear, and a peace concluded with that regency.

That, in one of the articles of this treaty it is stipulated, that the Americans will use all the means in their power to persuade the ex-Bashaw to withdraw from the territory of the reigning Bashaw, but not employ force or improper means to effect it; and, in case he should withdraw himself as aforesaid, the reigning Bashaw engaged to deliver up to him his wife and children. It appears, however, to the committee, that the influence and resources of the ex-Bashaw were so small, although in possession of that province, that he, himself, considered it necessary to his own safety that he should withdraw; and, therefore, this circumstance can form no ground of a claim on this Government; and, that the stipulation in the treaty, on the part of the reigning Bashaw, to deliver up his wife and children, in case he should so withdraw himself, was not in consequence of any previous engagement, on the part of this Government, to effect that object.

That the ex-Bashaw left Derne in June, and arrived at Syracuse in July, 1805, and that he still resides at that place, with a few of his followers or suite, which are said to be about twelve or fifteen in number.

That, from the 12th of July, 1805, to the 12th of May, 1807, he received from Mr. Dyson, navy agent, on an order issued by Commodore Rodgers, two hundred dollars per month, amounting to four thousand four hundred dollars; and that, in the month of May or June last, the further sum of two thousand four hundred dollars, appropriated by an act, passed 21st April, 1806, was also paid him, amounting, in the whole, to six thousand eight hundred dollars; by which it will be seen, that, at the date of his memorial, he was receiving, regularly, two hundred dollars per month; and that, since its date, he has also received two thousand four hundred dollars.

That, although the wife and children of the ex-Bashaw were not delivered up on the 3d of June last, nor any provision made, by the reigning Bashaw for his support, yet he had given assurances to the American consul at Tripoli, that the wife and children would be delivered at any time a conveyance could be procured for them; and that expectations were entertained by the consul, that the ruling Bashaw would make some pecuniary arrangements for his brother and the other exiles.

From this view of the subject, although the United States are not under any obligation to support the ex-Bashaw, or to have given him what has already been bestowed, yet as an act of generosity, on the part of Government, towards an individual who may have rendered it services, and whose expectations may have been improperly raised, in relation to the transaction which is the cause of the present application, the committee are of opinion, that a sum, in addition to what has already been paid to him, should be placed in the power of the Executive, to be paid over, under his direction, to the said ex-Bashaw; but with the understanding, that he is not to expect any further pecuniary aid from this Government. The committee, therefore, submit the following resolution for the consideration of the House:

Resolved, That the sum of ——— dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the treasury, not otherwise appropriated, to be paid under the direction of the President of the United States, to Hamet Caramalli, ex-Bashaw of Tripoli.

SIR:

WASHINGTON CITY, November 3, 1807.

I beg leave, through the medium of the chair, to lay the enclosed communication before the Representatives of the United States in Congress.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

WILLIAM EATON.

To the Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Since the adjournment of the first session of the ninth Congress, I have received, at different times, communications from Hamet Caramalli, ex-Bashaw of Tripoli, stating his distressed situation, and imploring relief from the beneficence of the United States; which communications have been transmitted to the proper department. I have the honor to offer, for the consideration of Congress, a translated copy of the last address from him, (the original in Italian is in the office of the Department of State,) which is evidently intended for the representatives of the people of the United States, and is as follows:

SYRACUSE, February 18, 1807.

In the depth of my miseries, my only consolation has been the reliance I placed on the powerful support of a republic so distinguished throughout the world for that justice which protects and sustains whoever confides himself to her patronage. This credulity resigned me wholly to her discretion. But I could never have thought that this my confidence should work out my individual destruction. I have sacrificed all my means, and exposed my life in the service of the United States. It was impossible for me to expect, by way of recompense, an exilement in Syracuse far from my family, and deprived of every convenience of life. I hoped to be recompensed by an equivalent to my usefulness and to my sacrifices. The promises made to me admitted no suspicion that so much time should have elapsed and that hope not yet realized; or that I should not yet have found repose. Public ships of war have repeatedly returned hither which had been bearers of my communications. Seeing myself nevertheless unnoticed, I suspect my letters have been miscarried; for it is impossible to persuade me, my circumstances and wants being known to them, that the United States would abandon me.

My situation does not enable me to undertake a long voyage for the purpose of making a personal representation of my deplorable condition. I hope the exalted republic will not require this of me, in order to awaken their feelings to my just expressions of solicitude and concern for myself: it would be unjust to neglect my complaints, and severely felt by those who occasion them.

I have lost my family; I have lost my inheritance; my acquisitions and my fair prospects are lost also. I have, indeed, sacrificed my claim to the confidence of a faithful ally,* whom I abandoned through my partiality to the Americans. I had no right to apprehend that my devotion and my placency would overwhelm me in bottomless ruin.

To my own individual sufferings I ought to annex also those of my faithful people, whose attachment to me has involved in the same wretchedness; who suffer with me the same sequestration from their country, from their families, and from their property: all which they have left through violations of those whose duty it was to sustain them.

I will not, like the world, reproach the representatives of the American nation with ingratitude. I rather implore their commiseration towards me; at least so far as to restore to me my family, and to grant me a competence.

* Elfi Bey.

It is yet possible that, absent from my own country, I may become serviceable to the United States. My former subjects are ever ready to devote their lives to my service: mine with theirs I will hold ever ready to devote to that of the exalted republic,

And am, forever, most Serene Highnesses, HAMET BASHAW CARAMALLI, Son of Ali Bashaw, &c.

Some expectations have been lately entertained by our Government, from the representations of Consul Davis, that provisions would be made by the ruling Bashaw of Tripoli for the subsistence of his exiled brother. But upon information directly from Syracuse, by George Dyson, Esq. navy agent of the United States, now in this city, it is rendered certain, that no relief can be relied on from that quarter; and probable, that whatever encouragement of this nature had been held out by the usurper, it had no other object than to betray his brother to destruction.

Having had myself the chief influence, as an agent of the United States, in drawing the ex-Bashaw from his situation in Upper Egypt; and having, in conformity to treaty arrangements, been instrumental in reconciling him to the unparalleled reverse of abandoning his flattering prospects; of relinquishing forever his hopes of recovering the kingdom wrested from him by treason, and now apparently within his grasp; and of receding from victory, like a prisoner, to a land of strangers. Having effected this by the assurances which I was authorized to make to him, that his wife and family should be restored to him, and that a manly respect to his future well-being would be had by our country, it may not be deemed inconsistent with the dictates of commiseration towards the supplicant, nor with my duties of respect towards the honorable body to whom his supplications are addressed, if I indulge a remark on the occasion.

It is remarkable, for it is an incontestable truth that, whether the claims of the ex-Bashaw go to the justice or the generosity of the United States, the use which was made of his services contributed much if not wholly influenced the overtures of peace on the part of the ruling Bashaw; for it was negotiated at a time when no coercion of our squadron then in the Mediterranean had as yet been attempted to be tried upon him, and when the infirmities of Commodore Barron placed such an experiment at an incalculable distance. That no serious impressions had from any quarter been made on the apprehensions of the enemy after the transfer of the squadron from Commodore Preble to Commodore Barron, except what were impressed by the capture and subjugation of his eastern province, the internal revolution of his kingdom, and the annihilation of his army through the influence and co-operation of Hamet Bashaw. That the United States alone enjoy the advantages resulting from those events, while the ex-Bashaw, as he has truly represented, reaps no other benefit from his confidence and his exertions than privation and exile, but a little better than captivity.

It cannot be contested that Hamet Bashaw has two fair claims on this nation. To be reinstated in a situation as eligible as that from which he has been drawn, and to have his family restored to him: the former guaranteed by honorable promises, the latter by the solemnity of treaty stipulation. And it is firmly believed the people of the United States are liberally disposed to see those obligations cancelled.

From a country blessed beyond the common lot of nations, rich in her means, and proud in the righteousness of her dispositions, does not honor, justice, and humanity, give the world a right to expect that the hand of charity at least will be opened to a friend whom, without his fault or free agency, and from causes so notorious, accident has thrown into misery so profound as this unfortunate prince now suffers?

It ought not to be concealed from Congress also, that there are at Malta and elsewhere sundry foreigners, Frenchmen, Greeks, and Mahometans, whose wounds received in the service of the United States in the province of Derne render them incapable of acquiring a subsistence, and to whose cases no provisions made by law can be extended.

Most respectfully submitted.

WILLIAM EATON.

General Eaton to General Thomas.

SIR:

My statement to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, February 20, 1804, and to the Secretary of the Navy of August, 1805, are fair indices to all our engagements with Hamet Caramalli, ex-Bashaw of Tripoli, and to the result of the measures concerted with him. Much document concerning this subject has been exhibited, both to the committee of the Senate and to that of the House of Representatives, who had it under consideration during the first session of the ninth Congress; to which recurrence may now be had for information.

The general instructions from the Secretary of the Navy of 1804-5 to the commander-in-chief of the expedition, Commodore Barron, and the instructions of the Secretary of State of June 6, 1804, and April 20, 1805, to the commissioner, Mr. Lear, show the views and expectations of Government, both in regard to the operations of the force provided for the Mediterranean, and to the terms on which peace might be concluded. It will appear, on examination, that in both Government have been disappointed. To those exhibits, and the comments of the committee of the Senate thereon, in their report, it seems nothing need be added to enable your committee to form a clear opinion on the subject referred to them.

The following copy of an order from Commodore Rodgers, and the statement annexed, show the provisions passed to the Bashaw since our having removed him from the province of Derne, in his kingdom:

U. S. SHIP CONSTITUTION, SYRACUSE, July 12, 1805.

SIR:

For the subsistence of Hamet Bashaw, you will be pleased to pay him two hundred Spanish dollars per month, on account of the United States, giving him one month in advance.

This order to continue in force until the pleasure of the Government of the United States shall be made known to you through a regular channel; observing, at the same time, that, on his leaving this island without my consent, you are to consider this obligation as no longer obliging you to make him any further advances on account of the United States.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN RODGERS.

GEORGE DYSON, Esq. United States' Navy Agent, Syracuse.

I certify the above to be a true copy from the original:

GEORGE DYSON.

WASHINGTON CITY, November 12, 1807.

On the within order, Mr. Dyson paid him, up to the 12th of May, 1807, $4,400; and, in the end of May, or beginning of June of the same year, the further sum of $2,400, agreeably to special appropriation, amounting to $6,800.

The number of the Bashaw's suite, on arrival at Syracuse, was about forty, attached to his person; that number is reduced, by death or desertion, to about twelve or fifteen.

The moveable property, consisting of horses, camels, arms, and clothing, which he abandoned at Derne, did not exceed $50,000. But when drawn from Upper Egypt, he was at the head of the Mameluke Arabs, as General-in-chief, in alliance with Elfi Bey. He cannot return thither.

The sum of $30,000 or $40,000 might be considered a generous provision for his future subsistence; but, to enable him to enjoy it, he should be removed to some part of the Turkish dominions.

Very respectfully, sir,

WILLIAM EATON.

Hon. GENERAL THOMAS,

Chairman of the Committee on the memorial of Hamet Caramalli.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Thomas.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 11, 1807.

SIR:

In answer to your letter of the 10th instant, making certain inquiries relative to the ex-Bashaw of Tripoli, I have the honor to observe, that the execution of the act of Congress appropriating $2,400 to his immediate relief having taken place through the Navy Department, the information requested on that point does not belong to this.

On the other points, I have to state that the wife and children of the ex-Bashaw had not been delivered up on the 3d of June last; but the reigning Bashaw had given assurances to the American consul at Tripoli, that it would be done at any time when a conveyance should be procured for them; and expectations were entertained by the consul that some pecuniary arrangement would also be made by the reigning Bashaw for the exiles; to what precise or probable amount is not explained.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MADISON.

Hon. DAVID THOMAS, Chairman of a Committee of Congress.

The Secretary of the Navy to Mr. Thomas.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, November 16, 1807.

SIR:

I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 13th instant.

The sum of $2,400 appropriated by act of Congress of 21st April, 1806, for the relief of Hamet Caramalli, ex-Bashaw of Tripoli, was remitted to the officer commanding the naval forces in the Mediterranean, in June, 1806; and although the Navy Department does not possess any official information as to the fact of this money having been paid over to Hamet Caramalli, yet there exists good reason to presume that it was paid to him; that in May, 1807, $1,000, part of the $2,400, was paid to him, and that in June, 1807, the balance, viz. $1,400, was paid to him.

The commanding officer to whom the remittance was made has lately arrived in the country, and will shortly exhibit his accounts for settlement, when full information will be afforded upon the subject of these payments.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

ROBERT SMITH.

Hon. DAVID THOMAS,

Chairman of Committee upon Hamet Caramalli's petition, &c.

No. 210.

[1st SESSION.]

GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 4, 1808.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Having received an official communication of certain orders of the British Government against the maritime rights of neutrals, bearing date the 11th of November, 1807, I transmit them to Congress as a further proof of the increasing dangers to our navigation and commerce which led to the provident measure of the act of the present session laying an embargo on our own vessels.

TH: JEFFERSON.

FEBRUARY 2, 1808.

At the Court at the Queen's Palace, the 11th November, 1807, present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas certain orders, establishing an unprecedented system of warfare against this kingdom, and aimed especially at the destruction of its commerce and resources, were, sometime since, issued by the Government of France, by which "the British islands were declared to be in a state of blockade," thereby subjecting to capture and condemnation all vessels, with their cargoes, which should continue to trade with His Majesty's dominions:

And whereas by the same orders, "all trading in English merchandise is prohibited, and every article of merchandise belonging to England, or coming from her colonies, or of her manufacture, is declared lawful prize."

And whereas the nations in alliance with France, and under her control, were required to give, and have given, and do give, effect to such orders:

And whereas His Majesty's order of the 7th of January last has not answered the desired purpose, either of compelling the enemy to recall those orders, or of inducing neutral nations to interpose, with effect, to obtain their revocation, but, on the contrary, the same have been recently enforced with increased rigor.

And whereas His Majesty, under these circumstances, finds himself compelled to take further measures for asserting and vindicating his just rights, and for supporting that maritime power which the exertions and valor of this people have, under the blessing of Providence, enabled him to establish and maintain; and the maintenance of which is not more essential to the safety and prosperity of His Majesty's dominions, than it is to the protection of such states as still retain their independence, and to the general intercourse and happiness of mankind:

His Majesty is therefore pleased, by and with the advice of his privy council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that all the ports and places of France and her allies, or of any other country at war with His Majesty, and all other ports or places in Europe, from which, although not at war with His Majesty, the British flag is excluded, and all ports or places in the colonies belonging to His Majesty's enemies, shall, from henceforth, be subject to the same restrictions in point of trade and navigation, with the exceptions hereinafter mentioned, as if the same were actually blockaded by His Majesty's naval forces in the most strict and rigorous manner. And it is hereby further ordered and declared, that all trade in articles which are of the produce or manufacture of the said countries, or colonies, shall be deemed and considered to be unlawful; and that every vessel trading from or to the said countries, or colonies, together with all goods and merchandise on board, and all articles of the produce or manufacture of the said countries, or colonies, shall be captured, and condemned as prize to the captors.

But although His Majesty would be fully justified, by the circumstances and considerations above recited, in establishing such system of restrictions with respect to all the countries and colonies of his enemies, without exception or qualification; yet His Majesty, being nevertheless desirous not to subject neutrals to any greater inconvenience than is absolutely inseparable from the carrying into effect His Majesty's just determination to counteract the designs of his enemies, and to retort upon his enemies themselves the consequences of their own violence and injustice; and being yet willing to hope that it may be possible (consistently with that object) still to allow to neutrals the opportunity of furnishing themselves with colonial produce for their own consumption and supply; and even to leave open, for the present, such trade with His Majesty's enemies as shall be carried on directly with the ports of His Majesty's dominions, or of his allies, in the manner hereinafter mentioned;

His Majesty is therefore pleased further to order, and it is hereby ordered, that nothing herein contained shall extend to subject to capture or condemnation any vessel, or the cargo of any vessel, belonging to any country not declared by this order to be subjected to the restrictions incident to a state of blockade, which shall have cleared out with such cargo from some port or place of the country to which she belongs, either in Europe or America, or from some free port in His Majesty's colonies, under circumstances in which such trade from such free ports is permitted, direct to some port or place in the colonies of His Majesty's enemies, or from those colonies direct to the country to which such vessel belongs, or to some free port in His Majesty's colonies, in such cases, and with such articles, as it may be lawful to import into such free port; nor to any vessel, or the cargo of any vessel, belonging to any country not at war with His Majesty, which shall have cleared out from some port or place in this kingdom, or from Gibraltar or Malta, under such regulations as His Majesty may think fit to prescribe, or from any port belonging to his Majesty's allies, and shall be proceeding direct to the port specified in her clearance; nor to any vessel, or the cargo of any vessel, belonging to any country not at war with His Majesty, which shall be coming from any port or place in Europe which is declared by this order to be subject to the restrictions incident to a state of blockade, destined to some port or place in Europe belonging to His Majesty, and which shall be on her voyage direct thereto; but these exceptions are not to be understood as exempting from capture or confiscation any vessel or goods which shall be liable thereto in respect of having entered or departed from any port or place actually blockaded by His Majesty's squadrons, or ships of war, or for being enemies' property, or for any other cause than the contravention of this present order.

And the commanders of His Majesty's ships of war and privateers, and other vessels acting under His Majesty's commission, shall be, and are hereby, instructed to warn every vessel which shall have commenced her voyage prior to any notice of this order, and shall be destined to any port of France, or of her allies, or of any other country at war with His Majesty; or to any port or place from which the British flag as aforesaid is excluded, or to any colony belonging to His Majesty's enemies, and which shall not have cleared out as is hereinbefore allowed, to discontinue her voyage, and to proceed to some port or place in this kingdom, or to Gibraltar or Malta; and any vessel which, after having been so warned, or after a reasonable time shall have been afforded for the arrival of information of this His Majesty's order at any port or place from which she sailed, or which, after having notice of this order, shall be found in the prosecution of any voyage contrary to the restrictions contained in this order, shall be captured, and, together with her cargo, condemned as lawful prize to the captors:

And whereas countries, not engaged in the war, have acquiesced in the orders of France, prohibiting all trade in any articles the produce or manufacture of His Majesty's dominions; and the merchants of those countries have given countenance and effect to those prohibitions by accepting from persons, styling themselves commercial agents of the enemy, resident at neutral ports, certain documents, termed "certificates of origin," being certificates obtained at the ports of shipment, declaring that the articles of the cargo are not of the produce or manufacture of His Majesty's dominions, or to that effect:

And whereas this expedient has been directed by France, and submitted to by such merchants, as part of the new system of warfare directed against the trade of this kingdom, and as the most effectual instrument of accomplishing the same, and it is therefore essentially necessary to resist it;

His Majesty is therefore pleased, by and with the advice of his privy council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that if any vessel, after reasonable time shall have been afforded for receiving notice of this His Majesty's order at the port or place from which such vessel shall have cleared out, shall be found carrying any such certificate or document as aforesaid, or any document referring to, or authenticating the same, such vessel shall be adjudged lawful prize to the captor, together with the goods laden therein, belonging to the person or persons by whom, or on whose behalf, any such document was put on board.

And the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judges of the High Court of Admiralty and Courts of Vice-Admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein, as to them shall respectively appertain.

W. FAWKENER.

At the Court at the Queen's Palace, the 11th of November, 1807, present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas articles of the growth and manufacture of foreign countries cannot by law be imported into this country, except in British ships, or in ships belonging to the countries of which such articles are the growth and manufacture, without an order in Council specially authorizing the same:

His Majesty taking into consideration the order of this day's date, respecting the trade to be carried on to and from the ports of the enemy, and deeming it expedient that any vessel belonging to any country in alliance, or at amity with His Majesty, may be permitted to import into this country articles of the produce or manufacture of countries at war with His Majesty:

His Majesty, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, is therefore pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, that all goods, wares, or merchandises, specified and included in the schedule of an act, passed in the forty-third year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled "An act to repeal the duties of customs payable in Great Britain, and to grant other duties in lieu thereof, may be imported from any port or place belonging to any state not at amity with His Majesty, in ships belonging to any state at amity with His Majesty, subject to the payment of such duties, and liable to such drawbacks as are now established by law upon the importation of the said goods, wares, or merchandise, in ships navigated according to law; and with respect to such of the said goods, wares, or merchandise, as are authorized to be warehoused under the provisions of an act, passed in the forty-third year of His present Majesty's reign, entitled "An act for permitting certain goods imported into Great Britain, to be secured in warehouses without payment of duty, subject to all the regulations of the said last-mentioned act; and with respect to all articles which are prohibited by law from being imported into this country, it is ordered, that the same shall be reported for exportation to any country in amity or alliance with His Majesty.

And His Majesty is further pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that all vessels which shall arrive at any port of the United Kingdom, or at the port of Gibraltar or Malta, in consequence of having been warned pursuant to the aforesaid order, or in consequence of receiving information, in any other manner, of the said order, subsequent to their having taken on board any part of their cargoes, whether previous or subsequent to their sailing, shall be permitted to report their cargoes for exportation, and shall be allowed to proceed upon their voyages to their original ports of destination, (if not unlawful before the issuing of the said order,) or to any port at amity with His Majesty, upon receiving a certificate from the collector or comptroller of the customs at the port at which they shall so enter, (which certificate the said collectors and comptrollers of the customs are hereby authorized and required to give,) setting forth that such vessels came into such port in consequence of being so warned, or of receiving such information as aforesaid; and that they were permitted to sail from such port under the regulations which His Majesty has been pleased to establish in respect to such vessels. But in case any vessel so arriving shall prefer to import her cargo, then such vessel shall be allowed to enter and import the same, upon such terms and conditions as the said cargo might have been imported upon, according to law, in case the said vessel had sailed after having received notice of the said order, and in conformity thereto.

And it is further ordered, that all vessels which shall arrive at any port of the United Kingdom, or at Gibraltar, or Malta, in conformity and obedience to the said order, shall be allowed, in respect to all articles which may be on board the same, except sugar, coffee, wine, brandy, snuff, and tobacco, to clear out to any port whatever, to be specified in such clearance; and with respect to the last-mentioned articles, to export the same to such ports, and under such conditions and regulations only, as His Majesty, by any licence to be granted for that purpose, may direct.

And the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judges of the High Court of Admiralty and Courts of Vice-Admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein as to them shall respectively appertain.

W. FAWKENER.

At the Court at the Queen's Palace, the 11th of November, 1807, present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas the sale of ships by a belligerent to a neutral is considered by France to be illegal:

And whereas a great part of the shipping of France, and her allies, has been protected from capture during the present hostilities by transfers, or pretended transfers, to neutrals:

And whereas it is fully justifiable to adopt the same rule, in this respect, towards the enemy, which is applied by the enemy to this country:

His Majesty is pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that, in future, the sale to a neutral, of any vessel belonging to His Majesty's enemies, shall not be deemed to be legal, nor in any manner to transfer the property, nor to alter the character of such vessel; and all vessels now belonging, or which shall hereafter belong to any enemy of His Majesty, notwithstanding any sale or pretended sale to a neutral, after a reasonable time shall have elapsed for receiving information of this His Majesty's order at the place where such sale, or pretended sale, was effected, shall be captured and brought in, and shall be adjudged as lawful prize to the captors.

And the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judges of the High Court of Admiralty and Courts of Vice-Admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein as to them shall respectively appertain.

ALGIERS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS ON THE 10TH AND 16TH OF FEBRUARY, 1808.

[Reported on April 25, 1808.]

FEBRUARY 9, 1808.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate to Congress, for their information, a letter from the person acting in the absence of our consul at Naples, giving reason to believe, on the affidavit of a Captain Sheffield, of the American schooner Mary Ann, that the Dey of Algiers has commenced war against the United States. For this no just cause has been given on our part, within my knowledge. We may daily expect more authentic and particular information on the subject from Mr. Lear, who was residing as our consul at Algiers.

TH: JEFFERSON.

FEBRUARY 15, 1808.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate, for the information of Congress, a letter from the consul of the United States at Malaga to the Secretary of State, covering one from Mr. Lear, our consul at Algiers, which gives information that the rupture threatened on the part of the Dey of Algiers has been amicably settled, and the vessels seized by him are liberated.

TH: JEFFERSON.

NAPLES, November 9, 1807.

SIR:

I have the honor to inform you that, from the report of Captain Ichabod Sheffield, of the schooner Mary Ann, of New York, arrived on the 4th instant in this port from America, it appears that an unexpected war has taken place between the regency of Algiers and the United States. He has declared in this consulate, upon oath, that, on the 26th ultimo, he fell in, within the straits, with an Algerine frigate of forty-four guns, by which he was made a prize of, and which, without hardly any examination, took three men out of his said schooner, and ordered her into Algiers, under the charge of nine Turks, including a boy. He was in their possession till the 29th, when, being near the Barbary shore, he determined himself to endeavor to retake his vessel, in which he had the good fortune to succeed, having thrown four of the Turks overboard by surprise, secured four of the others, whom he embarked in a boat, and kept the boy, who is now on board. He after that shaped his course towards Italy, and came safe in our mole on the 4th aforesaid. Captain Sheffield has further declared that the brig Violet, of Boston, loaded with colonial produces for Leghorn, was also taken, within sight of him, by the said frigate; and that he had also heard they had captured an American ship and schooner a few days before.

I mention in haste these circumstances to you, in order that you may make them known to what Americans are or may arrive in your port, and take such steps as you deem most prudent for their safety.

I am, respectfully, your most obedient humble servant,

In the absence, and by the authorization, of FREDERICK DEGEN, Esq., consul of the United States,

J. B. DUCOSTER.

MARSEILLES, November 21, 1807.

STEPHEN CATHALAN, JUN.

NOTE.—Captain Sheffield retook his vessel with three men and a boy.

MARSEILLES, November 21, 1807.

SIR:

I had the honor of addressing you on the 5th of last August, and the 14th ultimo.

This, under cover of William Lee, Esq., our consul at Bordeaux, is to remit you, here enclosed, a copy of a letter I just received from our consul at Naples, dated the 9th instant, begging your reference to its unexpected contents.

I have already advised the American masters and citizens of the United States in my district, and am sending copies of the same to the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris and several consuls, in order that they may take proper steps for the safety of our merchant vessels and seamen.

In haste, I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

STEPHEN CATHALAN, JUN.

JAMES MADISON, Esq., Secretary of State of the United States, Washington.Extract of a letter from William Kirkpatrick, consul of the United States at Malaga, to the Secretary of State, dated

JANUARY 5, 1808.

By my last letter of the 15th December, I enclosed copies of the information I had received from Barcelona and Marseilles, regarding the hostilities commenced on our commerce by the cruisers of the Dey of Algiers, and am now happy in having it in my power to transmit a copy of a letter I have just received from Colonel Lear, under date of December 16 and 17, with the pleasing information that he has succeeded in adjusting matters with the Dey, and that the vessels captured had been set at liberty, which I hasten to communicate to you, by a vessel on the departure for Calais.

From Tobias Lear to William Kirkpatrick, Esq.

ALGIERS, December 16, 1807.

SIR:

You have undoubtedly before this, heard that three American vessels had been detained by a frigate of this place, in consequence of the annuities, for two years past, not having been sent from the United States in naval and military stores, as stipulated by treaty, notwithstanding the amount thereof has been repeatedly offered in cash.

These vessels are the ship Eagle of New York, Thater, master, from Bristol to Palermo; cargo, glass bottles; brig Violet of Boston, James Merrit, master, from Oporto to Leghorn; cargo, sugar, hides, indigo, &c.; and schooner Mary Ann of New York, Ichabod Sheffield, master, from the straits of Belle Isle to Leghorn; cargo, fish.

The two former have been in this port upwards of forty days. The schooner has not arrived, and is supposed to have made some other port. The people on board these vessels have been treated very well, and no pillage of any kind has been committed.

I have now the honor to inform you that I have adjusted this business with the Dey, who has received the amount of two years' annuities due, in cash, and the vessels are liberated, and that our commerce will receive no further molestation from the cruisers of this regency.

I pray you will have the goodness to give this as much publicity as possible, for the benefit of all concerned therein.

I have the honor, &c.

TOBIAS LEAR.

WM. KIRKPATRICK, Esq. Consul of the United States, Malaga.

DECEMBER 17, 1807.

P. S. We have this moment heard, by an arrival from Leghorn, that the schooner before mentioned has arrived in Naples, having been retaken by the captain, and part of the crew left on board, who threw overboard four of the captors, and put four others into the boat to shift for themselves.

I have myself received no advice of this, and on application to the Dey, who first sent me the information, he assures me that it shall not alter the arrangement made yesterday, and that our vessels may navigate without fear of molestation. At present all their cruisers are in port.

I have the honor, &c.

T. L.

Please to forward a copy of this letter to the Secretary of State of the United States by the first opportunity.

A true copy:

WM. KIRKPATRICK.

MALAGA, January 5, 1808.

[The following report was made to the House of Representatives on the 25th of April, 1808, by the committee to whom the foregoing papers were referred.]

The committee to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 9th and 15th of February relative to the rupture and amicable settlement with the Dey of Algiers, report:

That they have received from the Secretary of State a letter touching the relations of the United States with that regency, which they submit for the information and consideration of the House.

By order:

JOSIAH QUINCY, Chairman.

APRIL 25, 1808.

WASHINGTON, DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 12, 1808.

SIR:

As the documents in this office did not enable me fully to answer the queries contained in the letters written by you as chairman of the committee "to whom were referred the messages of the President of the United States of the 9th and 15th February, relative to the rupture and to the amicable settlement with the Dey of Algiers," I have delayed my reply to them, under the daily hope of receiving such communications from Colonel Lear, our consul general at Algiers, as would enable me to give you the information you ask for; but as yet I have received none. As further delay, however, may be inconvenient to the committee, I have the honor to state that our payments to Algiers are of two kinds:

1st. That stipulated by treaty, viz: twelve thousand sequins, equal to twenty-one thousand six hundred dollars, made annually in naval stores.

2d. Those made in conformity with what is called usage at Algiers, by which it is understood we are bound. These are

1st. The present on the presentation of a consul, $20,000.

2d. The biennial presents to the officers of Government, estimated at $17,000.

3d. Incidental and contingent presents, as well on the promotion of the principal officers of the Dey and regency, as for the attainment of any important object. Of these no estimate can be made.

As these presents are made in cash, or in articles procured at Algiers for the occasion, and as Col. Lear has been furnished with the means of making them, it is believed that they have been regularly made; but of this there is no positive information, as the accounts have not been received.

Various causes have occasionally delayed the payment of the annuity in naval stores. Some of these will readily suggest themselves to the committee. It may be proper here to state that the loss on the payment made in this way is from fifty to one hundred per cent., as the estimate of the stores is made by officers of the Algerine Government, without any reference to their cost. Hence, our agent has been instructed to use his efforts to obtain the substitution of a cash payment for that of naval stores: and to enable him the more readily to do this, he had authority to draw either on our bankers in London, or on this Department. Draughts, accordingly, to enable him to meet the arrangements he lately made at Algiers, have been received at this office; but owing to some cause, unknown to me, no despatches from him on that subject have come to hand. We know only that the annuity due in March, 1806, was then paid, and something advanced on account of the annuity which would become due in March, 1807. To meet the payment of this annuity, cannon had been purchased; but before they were shipped, it was understood that the present Dey would not have them, although they had been asked for by his predecessor. Hence, it became necessary to order other articles in place of them. This was done last summer; and the shipment would have been made but for the precarious state of our foreign relations, and a hope that Colonel Lear would be able to prevail on the Dey to receive money in lieu of naval stores.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MADISON.

The Hon. JOSIAH QUINCY, Esq.

COMMITTEE ROOM, February 13, 1808.

SIR:

The committee to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 9th instant, relative to the war, commenced against the United States by the Dey of Algiers, have instructed me to request that you would cause to be laid before them, the present state of the pecuniary stipulations of the United States with that regency; the period to which they are known to have been fulfilled; the amount and nature of the remittances on account of such annual payments as are not yet known to be discharged; specifying the persons, to whom, and the time when, such remittances were made.

The committee are also desirous of being informed of the present state of the Dey's maritime force, so far as that information is in the possession of your Department.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your humble servant,

JOSIAH QUINCY.

The Hon. the SECRETARY OF STATE.

COMMITTEE ROOM, February 13, 1808.

SIR:

The committee, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, of the 9th instant, relative to the war, commenced against the United States, by the Dey of Algiers, have instructed me to request a statement of the maritime force, which will be sufficient to give effectual protection to the commerce of the United States in the Mediterranean sea, against the power of the regency of Algiers.

The committee particularly solicit your opinion as to the number of vessels required; and the species best adapted for service in that sea, and on the Algerine coast. They request an estimate of the annual expense of such vessels and of the appropriation requisite to prepare them for the service.

The committee are also desirous that any information, in the possession of your Department, relative to the present state of the maritime force of that regency may be communicated to them.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your humble servant,

JOSIAH QUINCY.

The Hon. the SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 29, 1808.

SIR:

May I be permitted to inquire whether the committee of which you are the chairman wish a report from this office in reply to your letter of the 13th instant. We had made some progress in it when the last information was received from Algiers, which led to a belief that it might not be wanted; it was in consequence laid aside to give place to some more urgent business; but if you wish it, it will be again taken up.

With sentiments of the highest respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN GRAHAM, Chief Clerk, Department of State.

The Hon. JOSIAH QUINCY.

COMMITTEE ROOM, March 9, 1808.

SIR:

In reply to your inquiry, contained in Mr. Graham's letter of the 29th ult. I am instructed by the committee, to whom were referred the messages of the President of the United States of the 9th and 15th of February, relative to the rupture and to the amicable settlement with the Dey of Algiers, to state, that, notwithstanding "the late information from Algiers," they are desirous of the statements requested in my former letter.

They have also instructed me to request that, in addition to the information sought by that letter, you would communicate the causes which occasioned the omission, for two years, of the payment of the annuities to the Dey; the amount of the offers of cash mentioned in Mr. Lear's letter to Mr. Kirkpatrick, and when they were made; the sum finally accepted by the Dey in lieu of the stipulated maritime stores; when the remittances, which enabled Mr. Lear to make the cash payments, were made; whether the arrangements with the Dey, as to the cash liquidation, extend to future annuities; and what are the advantages accruing to the United States by payments in cash, instead of maritime stores.

The committee are also desirous to be informed whether any legislative interposition be necessary to secure hereafter punctual performance of the treaty stipulations with that regency.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your humble servant,

JOSIAH QUINCY.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE.

[The following letters were communicated to Congress on the 8th November, 1808.]

SIR:

ALGIERS, March 31, 1808.

A copy of what I had the honor of writing to you on the 28th instant, with its enclosures, accompanies this. The vessel which took the aforesaid letter did not sail until the 29th.

Yesterday I sent my drogman to the palace to know from the Dey what were his ultimate intentions (if he chose to declare them) respecting the business mentioned in my last; and to request that I might be allowed three months to receive the orders of my Government. The answer brought was, that if I paid the money in the course of the day we should stand as we were before; but if I did not, he should pursue his own measures. As I was yet uncertain whether his threats would be put in execution against me personally, or against our commerce, I remained fixed in my first resolution. This morning the two frigates, which had been preparing for some days past, made the signal for sailing; and as a formal message was sent to inform me that they had orders to capture American vessels, (the threats of personal violence to me having had no effect,) I thought it a duty which I owed to my Government and to my country, to prevent, if possible, the calamity which might fall on our citizens and their property; I therefore sent to inform the Dey, that if he should recall his orders from these vessels before they sailed, and make no renewal of them to these or others, I would pay the money; but that I considered it as a measure forced upon me, and as such should represent it to my Government. The order was recalled, after the frigates had got under way; and the money is to be paid to-morrow; which I shall obtain by bills on John Gavino, Esq. our consul in Gibraltar, to whom I shall give bills on the Secretary of State of the United States, to meet the same. The frigates have gone out, and the other cruisers will be got ready for sea immediately. A vessel is expected to sail in a few days for Alicante, by which I shall write to our consul, contravening the positive advices for our vessels not to leave the ports in which they may be; but, at the same time, directing them to be strictly on their guard.

I have this day had an opportunity of writing to Tripoli, (the first which has occurred for more than three months,) which I have improved; and by the same route to Tunis, giving information of what has passed.

Painful as has been my situation in this affair, I feel conscious of having discharged my duty to my country in the best, and indeed only manner in my power. While I could believe that the consequence of refusing to make this unjust payment would fall upon me personally, I was ready to meet it; but when I was convinced that my country would suffer in the persons and property of its citizens, I was obliged to yield.

My letters which accompany this contain all I have to say on our affairs here; and I shall only add the assurances of high respect, and sincere attachment with which

I have the honor to be, sir, your most faithful and obedient servant,

TOBIAS LEAR.

The Honorable JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State of the United States of America.

Mr. Lear to the Secretary of State.

ALGIERS, March 28, 1808.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose triplicate of my respects to you of the 4th of January, and duplicate of that of the 9th instant, and the schedule of my account with the United States. Since forwarding the first of these I have heard nothing respecting the United States, excepting by a letter from Mr. Montgomery, our consul in Alicante, that an embargo had been laid on all vessels in the ports of the United States.

It is with regret I have to inform you that our affairs here wear a different aspect from what they did when I had last the honor of writing to you. On the 16th instant the Dey sent me a message by my drogerman, that I should pay immediately sixteen thousand dollars for eight of the subjects of this regency, said to have been destroyed on board the American schooner Mary Ann, captured some time since by one of his frigates, as mentioned in my former letters. I returned for answer that I had not yet received any authentic advice of this business, and could therefore say nothing about it. The Dey then sent me word that he would wait the arrival of the courier from Alicante, by which I might receive some information. But on the 24th (the courier not having yet arrived) the drogerman informed me that the Dey had sent for him and ordered him to tell me that if I did not pay the money before night I should be sent to prison in chains.

I ordered him to return immediately to the Dey, and say, that I could not pay the money without the order of my Government, as it was an affair out of the usual course of our business here, and that I was ready to meet the event. He brought me word that the Dey would see me the next day at noon on the subject. He accordingly sent for me at noon on the 25th.

When I entered the palace I met Mr. Ulrich the Danish consul, who was descending from an audience of the Dey. He was seized by a Chaux, who carried him through the streets in a most indignant manner, to the slave prison, where he was loaded with an enormous chain, the reason assigned for which was, that he had been called upon for his biennial presents, which he declared he could not make without having time given him, as the vessel containing it, and annuities for the regency, had been taken by the English.

On meeting the Dey he demanded from me immediate payment for the prisoners before mentioned, together with an additional two thousand dollars for the boy said to have been carried in the schooner to Naples.

I told him with firmness that I could not pay it without the orders of my Government, as it was an extraordinary case, and requested time to write and receive an answer; but was answered, that if it was not paid immediately, I knew what the consequence would be; I replied, that let the consequence be what it might, I should not pay it. I was then ordered to leave his presence.

On descending to the area of the palace, where the Danish consul had been seized, I expected the same compliment which he had met with, and was prepared for it; but finding no one to molest me, I left the palace and returned to my own house, where I supposed the orders would be sent to have me arrested; but the day passed without my hearing any thing more of the matter. In the evening I met the French and Swedish consuls (the others being at their gardens) and we agreed to send for the other consuls the following morning, to concert measures for the liberation of the Dane. At noon we met at the Danish consul's house, with our respective drogermen, and proceeded to the palace, where we had an audience with the Dey, who, after some conversation, agreed to release the Danish consul from his chains, at the intercession made for him. From thence we went to the marine, where the consul had been sent to work with the other slaves carrying a chain of forty pounds weight, to receive and conduct him to his house. While we were with the Dey on the business before mentioned, he asked me, in presence of the consuls, if I did not intend to pay the money. I answered him as I had done the day before, to which he made the same reply; and I remain in daily expectation of experiencing the effects of this refusal, which is dictated by a sense of duty and a conviction that the honor of my country demands such conduct from me. I make no comments on the unpleasantness of my situation; my Government and my country will consider it, and do what is right respecting it.

As it is very likely that the cruisers which are now fitting out will have orders to capture American vessels, I have written to our consul in Alicante by this opportunity, which is unexpected, and the only one likely to occur soon, to convey notice to all the consuls of the United States in this sea, to guard our merchant vessels against the evil which may occur. A copy of my letter to him I have now the honor to enclose. In consequence of the barbarous outrage which has been committed on the Danish consul, and threatened to be put in execution against me, the consuls have been brought to reflect on their precarious situation here; and I trust that in a few days there will be a compact entered into among us, that we will use our best endeavors to enforce that article which exists in all the treaties between this regency and christian powers, securing the person and family of the consul from violence and outrage, in consequence of any thing he may do in the exercise of his official functions. And I hope each one will bind himself not to do any act as a public agent, while any one is held in, or threatened with, duance vile.

Our respective Governments I trust will sanction such a measure, and give orders to their consuls accordingly.

Notwithstanding all I have stated it is possible that the Dey may not proceed to extremities towards me, or commit hostilities on our commerce and citizens, until I hear from my Government on the subject. But I have thought it my duty to guard as much as possible against the evil by giving notice to our vessels which may be in this sea, as well as those in the Atlantic, for at present there is nothing to prevent their cruisers from passing the straits.

The camp is expected to march in a few days against Tunis, and their cruisers are said to be intended for that quarter; but there is no doubt but some of them will cruise in every part of this sea, and probably go into the Atlantic.

With sentiments of the highest respect, and most sincere attachment,

I have the honor to be, sir, your most faithful and obedient servant,

TOBIAS LEAR.

10th CONGRESS.]

No. 212.

[1st Session.]

GREAT BRITAIN—IMPRESSED AMERICAN SEAMEN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 2, 1808.

To the Senate of the United States:

MARCH 2, 1808.

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of November 30, 1807, I now transmit a report of the Secretary of State on the subject of impressments, as requested in that resolution. The great volume of the documents, and the time necessary for the investigation, will explain to the Senate the causes of the delay which has intervened.

TH: JEFFERSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 29, 1808.

Agreeably to a resolution of the Senate of the 30th November last, the Secretary of State has the honor to submit to the President, for the information of the Senate, the statements herewith enclosed, from No. 1 to 13, inclusive.

No. 1. A statement of impressments from American vessels into the British service, since the last report made from this Department on the 5th March, 1806, founded upon documents transmitted in the first instance to this office.

Those from No. 2 to 13 inclusive, being a series of returns and abstracts received from General Lyman, the agent of the United States at London, giving an account of the applications made by him in relation to seamen, from 1st April, 1806, to 30th June, 1807, and of the result of these applications, and exhibiting other particulars required by the resolution.

Not having received any returns from the West Indies since the date of the last report to the House of Representatives on this subject, nor from General Lyman for the quarter ending on the 1st January last, the Secretary of State has not the means at present of giving, with any degree of precision, the information asked for in the last clause of the resolution. From the returns in the office it would appear that four thousand two hundred and twenty-eight American seamen had been impressed into the British service since the commencement of the war, and that nine hundred and thirty-six of this number had been discharged, leaving in that service three thousand two hundred and ninety-two. General Lyman, in a letter dated on the 21st October, 1807, estimates the American seamen now detained in the British service at a number greatly beyond what is here stated; but he does not give the data on which his estimate is made.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MADISON.

The President of the United States.

No. 1.

FRANCE AND SPAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS MARCH 17, 1808.

MARCH 17, 1808.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I have heretofore communicated to Congress the decrees of the Government of France, of November 21, 1806, and of Spain of February 19, 1807, with the orders of the British Government of January and November, 1807.

I now transmit a decree of the Emperor of France, of December 17, 1807, and a similar decree of the 3d of January last by His Catholic Majesty.* Although the decree of France has not been received by official communication, yet the different channels of promulgation through which the public are possessed of it, with the formal testimony furnished by the Government of Spain in their decree, leave us without a doubt that such an one has been issued. These decrees and orders, taken together, want little of amounting to a declaration that every neutral vessel found on the high seas, whatsoever be her cargo, and whatsoever foreign port be that of her departure or destination, shall be deemed lawful prize; and they prove more and more the expediency of retaining our vessels, our seamen, and property within our own harbors, until the dangers to which they are exposed can be removed or lessened.

GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 22 AND 30, 1810.

MARCH 22, 1808.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

At the opening of the present session I informed the Legislature that the measures which had been taken with the Government of Great Britain for the settlement of our neutral and national rights, and of the conditions of commercial intercourse with that nation, had resulted in articles of a treaty which could not be acceded to on our part; that instructions had consequently been sent to our ministers there to resume the negotiations, and to endeavor to obtain certain alterations, and that this was interrupted by the transaction which took place between the frigates Leopard and Chesapeake. The call on that Government for reparation of this wrong produced, as Congress has been already informed, the mission of a special minister to this country, and the occasion is now arrived when the public interest permits and requires that the whole of these proceedings should be made known to you.

I therefore now communicate the instructions given to our minister resident at London, and his communications with that Government on the subject of the Chesapeake, with the correspondence which has taken place here between the Secretary of State and Mr. Rose, the special minister charged with the adjustment of that difference; the instructions to our ministers for the formation of a treaty; their correspondence with the British commissioners, and with their own Government on that subject; the treaty itself, and written declaration of the British commissioners accompanying it; and the instructions given by us for resuming the negotiation, with the proceedings and correspondence subsequent thereto. To these I have added a letter lately addressed to the Secretary of State from one of our late ministers, which, though not strictly written in an official character, I think it my duty to communicate, in order that his views of the proposed treaty, and of its several articles, may be fairly presented and understood.

Although I have heretofore, and from time to time, made such communications to Congress as to keep them possessed of a general and just view of the proceedings and dispositions of the Government of France towards this country, yet, in our present critical situation, when we find that no conduct on our part, however impartial and friendly, has been sufficient to ensure from either belligerent a just respect for our rights, I am desirous that nothing shall be omitted on my part which may add to your information on this subject, or contribute to the correctness of the views which should be formed. The papers which, for these reasons, I now lay before you, embrace all the communications, official or verbal, from the French Government, respecting the general relations between the two countries, which have been transmitted through our minister there, or through any other accredited channel, since the last session of Congress, to which time all information of the same kind had, from time to time, been given them. Some of these papers have already been submitted to Congress, but it is thought better to offer them again, in order that the chain of communications, of which they make a part, may be presented unbroken.

When, on the 26th of February, I communicated to both Houses the letter of General Armstrong to M. Champagne, I desired it might not be published, because of the tendency of that practice to restrain injuriously the freedom of our foreign correspondence; but perceiving that this caution, proceeding purely from a regard to the public good, has furnished occasion for disseminating unfounded suspicions and insinuations, I am induced to believe that the good which will now result from its publication, by confirming the confidence and union of our fellow-citizens, will more than countervail the ordinary objection to such publications; it is my wish, therefore, that it may be now published.

TH: JEFFERSON.

* See message of December 23, 1808, by which these decrees, with others, were transmitted to the Senate.

(CONFIDENTIAL.)

MARCH 22, 1808.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

In a separate message of this date I have communicated to Congress so much as may be made public of papers which give a full view of the present state of our relations with the two contending Powers of *France and England. Every one must be sensible that in the details of instructions for negotiating a treaty, and in the correspondence and conferences respecting it, matters will occur which interest sometimes, and sometimes respect, or other proper motives, forbid to be made public. To reconcile my duty, in this particular, with my desire of letting Congress know every thing which can give them a full understanding of the subjects on which they are to act, I have suppressed in the documents of the other message the parts which ought not to be made public, and have given them in the supplementary and confidential papers herewith enclosed, with such references as that they may be read in their original places as if still standing in them; and when these confidential papers shall have been read to the satisfaction of the House, I request their return, and that their contents may not be made public.

TH: JEFFERSON.

(CONFIDENTIAL.)

MARCH 30, 1808.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Since my message of the 22d instant, letters have been received from our ministers at Paris and London, extracts from which, with a letter to General Armstrong from the French Minister of Foreign Relations, and a letter from the British envoy residing here to the Secretary of State, I now communicate to Congress. They add to the materials for estimating the dispositions of those Governments towards this country; the proceedings of both indicate designs of drawing us, if possible, into the vortex of their contests; but every new information confirms the prudence of guarding against these designs, as it does of adhering to the precautionary system hitherto contemplated.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 5,† 1804.

SIR:

The information and observations which you have as yet received from me since your arrival in London, on the impressment of our seamen and other violations of our rights, have been in private letters only. The delay in making these injuries the subject of official communications proceeded, first, from an expectation that the British Government would have notified formally to the United States, as a neutral Power, the state of war between Great Britain and France, which would have been an apt occasion for combining with assurances of the fairness with which our neutral obligations would be fulfilled, our just claims on a correspondent respect for our neutral rights, and particularly of those which had been least respected during the last war: secondly, from the expected arrival of Mr. Merry, which, if he should not be charged with such a notification, might be a favorable opportunity for commencing the explanations and discussions which must precede a thorough correction of the wrongs which we experience.

Since the arrival of Mr. Merry, accordingly no time has been lost in calling his attention to the subject, and in preparing both it and him for the negotiation which is now to be committed to you. If appearances are to be trusted, his impressions and representations will be friendly to it. In my conversations with him, which have been free and full, he has expressed the best dispositions, has listened with candor to the appeals made, as well to the considerations of justice as of the solid interest of his nation; and, although he suggests serious difficulties on certain points, he will, I believe, sincerely co-operate in lessening them, and in bringing about an arrangement which will be acceptable to this country. The only topic on which any thing has passed in writing between the Department of State and him, is that of the pretended blockade of St. Domingo. Copies of my letter to him, and of his answer, are herewith enclosed; as also of the letter written to Mr. Thornton, some time before, and referred to in that to Mr. Merry, in relation to a like blockade of Martinique and Guadaloupe.

Although there are many important objects which may be thought to invite conventional regulations between the United States and Great Britain, it is evidently proper to leave, for subsequent consideration, such as are less urgent in their nature, or more difficult in their adjustment, and thereby to render the way plainer and shorter to an agreement with respect to objects which cannot be much longer delayed without danger to the good understanding between the two nations. With this view, the plan of a convention contemplated by the President is limited to the cases of impressments of our seamen, of blockades, of visiting and searching our vessels, of contraband of war, and of the trade with hostile colonies, with a few other cases affecting our maritime rights; embracing, however, as inducements to Great Britain to do us justice therein, a provision for the surrender of deserting seamen and soldiers, and for the prevention of contraband supplies to her enemies.

The plan digested for your use is subjoined. The first column contains the articles which are to be proposed in the first instance, and which are considered as within our just expectations; the second modifies the articles into the concessions which the British Government may possibly require, and which it may be expedient for us ultimately to admit.

* The documents relating to the negotiations with France, transmitted by this message, and by the message of the 20th March, will be found with those transmitted by the message of November 8, 1808, No. 217.

† Although an extract from this letter was communicated by the message of January 17, 1806, the entire letter is now inserted.

A Convention between the United States and Great Britain.

FIRST PROPOSAL.

ARTICLE I.

No person whatever shall, upon the high seas and without the jurisdiction of either party, be demanded or taken out of any ship or vessel belonging to citizens or subjects of one of the parties, by the public or private armed ships belonging to, or in the service of, the other, unless such person be at the time in the military service of an enemy of such other party.

ARTICLE II.

The same.

ARTICLE III.

The same.

ARTICLE IV.

The same.

ARTICLE V.

The same.

ARTICLE VI.

The same.

ARTICLE VII.

Omit the preamble.

SECOND AND ULTIMATUM.

ARTICLE I.

No seaman, seafaring, or other person shall, upon the high seas and without the jurisdiction of either party, be demanded or taken out of any ship or vessel belonging to the citizens or subjects of one of the parties, by the public or private armed ships belonging to, or in the service of, the other party; and strict and effectual orders shall be given for the due observance of this engagement; but it is to be understood that this article shall not exempt any person on board the ships of either of the parties from being taken therefrom by the other party, in cases where they may be liable to be so taken according to the laws of nations, which liability, however, shall not be construed to extend in any case to seamen, or seafaring persons being actually part of the crew of the vessel in which they may be, nor to persons of any description passing from one port to another port of either of the parties.

ARTICLE II.

No person being a subject or citizen of one of the parties, and resorting to, or residing in, the dominions of the other, shall in any case be compelled to serve on board any vessel, whether public or private, belonging to such other party; and all citizens or subjects whatever of the respective parties, at this time compulsively serving on board the vessels of the other, shall be forthwith liberated, and enabled, by an adequate recompense, to return to their own country.

ARTICLE III.

If the ships of either of the parties shall be met with, sailing either along the coasts or on the high seas, by any ship of war, or other public or private armed ships of the other party, such ships of war, or other armed vessels, shall, for avoiding all disorder in visiting and examining the same, remain out of cannon shot, unless the state of the sea, or the place of meeting render a nearer approach necessary; and shall in no case compel or require such vessel to send her boat, her papers, or any person from on board to the belligerent vessel; but the belligerent vessel may send her own boat to the other, and may enter her to the number of two or three men only, who may, in an orderly manner, make the necessary inquiries concerning the vessel and her cargo; and it is agreed that effectual provision shall be made for punishing violations of any part of this article.

ARTICLE IV.

Contraband of war shall consist of the following articles only: saltpetre, sulphur, cuirasses, pikes, swords, sword belts, knapsacks, saddles and bridles, cannons, mortars, fire arms, pistols, bombs, grenades, bullets, firelocks, flints, matches, and gunpowder, excepting, however, the quantity of the said articles which may be necessary for the defence or use of the ship, and those who compose the crew; and no other articles whatever, not here enumerated, shall be reputed contraband, or liable to confiscation, but shall pass freely, without being subjected to the smallest difficulty, unless they be enemy's property; and it is to be particularly understood, that under the denomination of enemy's property is not to be comprised the merchandise of the growth, produce, or manufactures of the countries or dominions at war, which shall have been acquired by the citizens or subjects of the neutral Power, and shall be transported for their account; which merchandise cannot, in any case, or on any pretext, be excepted from the freedom of the neutral flag.

ARTICLE V.

In all cases where the prize courts of either party shall pronounce judgment against any vessel or property claimed by citizens or subjects of the other, the sentence or decree shall mention the reasons or motives on which the same shall have been founded; and an authenticated copy of the sentence or decree, and of all the proceedings in the case, shall, if demanded, be delivered to the commander or agent of the said vessel, without any delay, he paying the legal fees for the same.

ARTICLE VI.

In order to determine what characterizes a blockaded port, that denomination is given only to a port where there is, by the disposition of the Power which attacks it with ships stationary or sufficiently near, an evident danger in entering.

ARTICLE VII.

[In consideration of the distance of the ports likely to be blockaded by either party, from the ports of the other party, and of other circumstances incident to their relative situations,] it is agreed that no vessel sailing from the ports of either shall, although cleared or bound to a blockaded port, be considered as violating in any manner the blockade, unless on her approach towards such port she shall have been previously warned against entering the same.

ARTICLE VIII.

Omit "captains,

It is agreed that no refuge or protection shall be afforded by either party to the "captains, officers," mariners, sailors, or other persons not found to be its own citizens or subjects, who shall desert from a vessel of the other party, of the crew whereof the deserter made a part; but, on the contrary, all such deserters shall be delivered up, on demand, to the commanders of the vessels from which they shall have deserted, or to the commanding officers of the ships of war of the respective nations, or to such other persons as may be duly authorized to make requisition in that behalf: Provided, that proof be made within two years from the time of desertion, by an exhibition of the ship's papers, or authenticated copies thereof, and by satisfactory evidence of the identity of the person, that the deserters so demanded were actually part of the crew of the vessels in question.

And for the more effectual execution of this article, adequate provision shall be made for causing to be arrested, on the application of the respective consuls or vice-consuls to the competent authorities, all deserters as aforesaid, duly proved to be such, in order that they may be sent back to the commanders of the vessels to which they belonged, or removed out of the country, and all due aid and assistance shall be given in searching for, as well as in seizing and arresting the said deserters; who shall even be detained and kept in the prisons of the country, at the request and expense of the said consuls or vice-consuls, until they shall have found an opportunity of sending them back, or removing them as aforesaid. But if they be not so sent back, or removed, within three months from the day of their arrest, they shall be set at liberty, and shall not again be arrested for the same cause.

ARTICLE VIII.

ARTICLE IX.

Omit "officers or."

It is further agreed that no refuge or protection shall be afforded, by either of the parties, to any "officers or" soldiers, not found to be its own citizens or subjects, who shall desert from the military service of the other; but that, on the contrary, effectual measures shall be taken, in like manner, and under like regulations and conditions as with respect to sailors, for apprehending any such deserting soldiers, and delivering them to the commanding officers of the military posts, forts, or garrisons from which they shall have deserted, or to the consuls or vice-consuls on either side, or to such persons as may be duly authorized to demand their restitution.

ARTICLE IX.

ARTICLE X.

Omitted.

It is, however, understood that no stipulation herein made shall be construed to empower the civil or military officers of either of the parties to enter forcibly into any of the forts, garrisons, posts, or other places, or to use violence of any sort within the jurisdiction of the other party, or be construed in any manner to contravene or derogate from the stipulation contained in the first of the above articles, against demanding or taking any persons out of vessels on the high seas, and without the jurisdiction of either of the parties.

ARTICLE X.

ARTICLE XI.

The same.

Each party will prohibit its citizens or subjects from clandestinely carrying away, from the territories or dominions of the other, any seamen or soldiers belonging to such other party.

ARTICLE XI.

ARTICLE XII.

The same.

Neither party shall permit any of the articles above enumerated as contraband of war, to be cleared out from its ports to any place within the jurisdiction of an enemy of the other party; and, in order to enforce this regulation, due proof and security shall be given, that all such articles of contraband as may be exported from the ports of either of the parties, have been actually destined elsewhere than within the jurisdiction of an enemy of the other party.

ARTICLE XII.

ARTICLE XIII.

The same.

This convention shall be in force for the term of eight years from the date of the exchange of ratifications. It shall be ratified on both sides within — months from the day of its signature, or sooner if possible, and the ratifications exchanged, without delay, in the United States, at the city of Washington.

ARTICLE XIII.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE PRECEDING PLAN.

The first article relates to impressments from American vessels on the high seas. The commanders of British armed vessels have, as is well known, been long in this practice. They have, indeed, not only continued it, under the sanction of their superiors, on the high seas, but have, with impunity, extended it to our own coasts, to neutral ports, and to neutral territory, and, in some instances, to our own harbors. The article does not comprehend these latter cases, because it would not be very honorable in Great Britain to stipulate against the practice of such enormities, nor in the United States to recur to stipulations as a security against it; and because it may be presumed that such particular enormities will not be repeated or unpunished, after a general stop shall have been put to impressments.

The article, in its first form, renounces the claim to take from the vessels of the neutral party, on the high seas, any person whatever not in the military service of an enemy; an exception which we admit to come within the law of nations, on the subject of contraband of war.

With this exception, we consider a neutral flag on the high seas as a safeguard to those sailing under it. Great Britain, on the contrary, asserts a right to search for and seize her own subjects; and under that cover, as cannot but happen, are often seized and taken off citizens of the United States, and citizens or subjects of other neutral countries, navigating the high seas under the protection of the American flag.

Were the right of Great Britain in this case not denied, the abuses flowing from it would justify the United States in claiming and expecting a discontinuance of its exercise; but the right is denied, and on the best grounds.

Although Great Britain has not yet adopted in the same latitude with most other nations the immunities of a neutral flag, she will not deny the general freedom of the high seas, and of neutral vessels navigating them, with such exceptions only as are annexed to it by the law of nations. She must produce, then, such an exception in the law of nations in favor of the right she contends for. But in what written and received authority will she find it? In what usage, except her own, will it be found? She will find in both that a neutral vessel does not protect certain objects denominated contraband of war, (including enemies serving in the war,) nor articles going into a blockaded port, nor, as she has maintained, and as we have not contested, enemy's property of any kind. But nowhere will she find an exception to this freedom of the seas, and of neutral flags, which justifies the taking away of any person, not an enemy in military service, found on board a neutral vessel.

If treaties, British as well as others, are to be consulted on this subject, it will equally appear that no countenance to the practice can be found in them. Whilst they admit a contraband of war by enumerating its articles, and the effect of a real blockade by defining it, in no instance do they affirm or imply a right in any sovereign to enforce his claims to the allegiance of his subjects on board neutral vessels on the high seas; on the contrary, whenever a belligerent claim against persons on board a neutral vessel is referred to in treaties, enemies in military service alone are excepted from the general immunity of persons in that situation; and this exception confirms the immunity of those who are not included in it.

It is not, then, from the law or the usage of nations, nor from the tenor of treaties, that any sanction can be derived for the practice in question. And surely it will not be pretended that the sovereignty of any nation extends, in any case whatever, beyond its own dominions, and its own vessels on the high seas; such a doctrine would give just alarm to all nations, and, more than any thing, would countenance the imputation of aspiring to a universal empire of the seas. It would be the less admissible, too, as it would be applicable to times of peace as well as to times of war, and to property as well as to persons. If the law of allegiance, which is a municipal law, be in force at all on the high seas on board foreign vessels, it must be so at all times there, as it is within its acknowledged sphere. If the reason alleged for it be good in time of war, namely, that the sovereign has then a right to the service of all his subjects, it must be good at all times, because at all times he has the same right to their service. War is not the only occasion for which he may want their services, nor is external danger the only danger against which their services may be required for his security. Again: if the authority of a municipal law can operate on persons in foreign vessels on the high seas, because, within the dominion of their sovereign, they would be subject to that law, and are violating that law by being in that situation, how reject the inference that the authority of a municipal law may equally be enforced on board foreign vessels on the high seas, against articles of property exported in violation of such a law, or belonging to the country from which it was exported? And thus every commercial regulation, in time of peace, too, as well as of war, would be made obligatory on foreigners and their vessels, not only whilst within the dominion of the sovereign making the regulation, but in every sea, and at every distance, where an armed vessel might meet with them. Another inference deserves attention: if the subjects of one sovereign may be taken by force from the vessels of another on the high seas, the right of taking them when found, implies the right of searching for them; a vexation of commerce, especially in time of peace, which has not yet been attempted, and which, for that as well as other reasons, may be regarded as contradicting the principle from which it would flow.

Taking reason and justice for the tests of this practice, it is peculiarly indefensible, because it deprives the dearest rights of persons of a regular trial, to which the most inconsiderable article of property captured on the high seas is entitled, and leaves their destiny to the will of an officer, sometimes cruel, often ignorant, and generally interested, by his want of mariners, in his own decisions. Whenever property found in a neutral vessel is supposed to be liable on any grounds to capture and condemnation, the rule in all cases is, that the question shall not be decided by the captor, but be carried before a legal tribunal, where a regular trial may be had, and where the captor himself is liable to damages for an abuse of his power. Can it be reasonable, then, or just, that a belligerent commander, who is thus restricted and thus responsible in a case of mere property of trivial amount, should be permitted, without recurring to any tribunal whatever, to examine the crew of a neutral vessel to decide the important question of their respective allegiances, and to carry that decision into instant execution, by forcing every individual he may choose into a service abhorrent to his feelings, cutting him off from his most tender connexions, exposing his mind and his person to the most humiliating discipline, and his life itself to the greatest dangers? Reason, justice, and humanity unite in protesting against so extravagant a proceeding. And what is the pretext for it? It is, that the similarity of language and of features between American citizens and British subjects are such as not easily to be distinguished; and that, without this arbitrary and summary authority to make the distinction, British subjects would escape, under the name of American citizens, from the duty which they owe to their sovereign. Is, then, the difficulty of distinguishing a mariner of one country from the mariner of the other, and the importance of his services, a good plea for referring the question, whether he belongs to the one or to the other, to an arbitrary decision on the spot, by an interested and irresponsible officer? In all other cases, the difficulty and the importance of questions are considered as reasons for requiring greater care and formality in investigating them, and greater security for a right decision on them. To say that precautions of this sort are incompatible with the object, is to admit that the object is unjustifiable; since the only means by which it can be pursued are such as cannot be justified.

The evil takes a deeper die when viewed in its practice as well as its principles. Were it allowable that British subjects should be taken out of American vessels on the high seas, it might at least be required that the proof of their allegiance should lie on the British side. This obvious and just rule is, however, reversed; and every seaman on board, though going from an American port, and sailing under the American flag, and sometimes even speaking an idiom proving him not to be a British subject, is presumed to be such, unless shown to be an American citizen. It may safely be affirmed that this is an outrage and an indignity which has no precedent, and which Great Britain would be among the last nations in the world to suffer, if offered to her own subjects and her own flag. Nor is it always against the right presumption alone, which is in favor of the citizenship corresponding with the flag, that the violence is committed. Not unfrequently it takes place in defiance of the most positive proof, certified in due form by an American officer. Let it not be said that, in granting to American seamen this protection for their rights, as such, the point is yielded; that the proof lies on the American side; and that the want of it in the prescribed form justifies the inference that the seaman is not of American allegiance. It is distinctly to be understood that the certificate, usually called a protection, to American seamen, is not meant to protect them under their own, or even any other neutral flag on the high seas. We can never admit that, in such a situation, any other protection is required for them than the neutral flag itself on the high seas. The document is given to prove their real character, in situations to which neither the law of nations, nor the law of their own country is applicable; in other words, to protect them within the jurisdiction of the British laws, and to secure to them within every other jurisdiction the rights and immunities due to them. If, in the course of their navigation, even on the high seas, the document should have the effect of repelling wrongs of any sort, it is an incidental advantage only of which they avail themselves, and is by no means to be misconstrued into a right to exact such a proof, or to make any disadvantageous inference from the want of it.

Were it even admitted that certificates for protection might be justly required in time of war from American seamen, they could only be required in cases where the lapse of time, from its commencement, had given an opportunity for the American seamen to provide themselves with such a document. Yet it is certain, that in a variety of instances, seamen have been impressed from American vessels, on the plea that they had not this proof of citizenship; when the dates and places of impressments demonstrated the impossibility of their knowing, in time to provide the proof, that a state of war had rendered it necessary.

Whether, therefore, we consult the law of nations, the tenor of treaties, or the dictates of reason and justice, no warrant, no pretext can be found for the British practice of making impressments from American vessels on the high seas.

Great Britain has the less to say in excuse for this practice, as it is in direct contradiction to the principles on which she proceeds in other cases. Whilst she claims and seizes on the high seas her own subjects voluntarily serving in American vessels, she has constantly given, when she could give, as a reason for not discharging from her service American citizens, that they had voluntarily engaged in it. Nay, more, whilst she impresses her own subjects from the American service, although they may have been settled and married, and even naturalized in the United States, she constantly refuses to release from hers American citizens impressed into it, whenever she can give for a reason that they were either settled or married within her dominions. Thus, when the voluntary consent of the individual favors her pretensions, she pleads the validity of that consent. When the voluntary consent of the individuals stands in the way of her pretensions, it goes for nothing! When marriage or residence can be pleaded in her favor, she avails herself of the plea. When marriage and residence, and even naturalization, are against her, no respect whatever is paid to either! She takes by force her own subjects voluntarily serving in our vessels. She keeps by force American citizens involuntarily serving in hers! More flagrant inconsistencies cannot be imagined.

Notwithstanding the powerful motives which ought to be felt by the British Government to relinquish a practice which exposes it to so many reproaches, it is foreseen that objections of different sorts will be pressed on you. You will be told first, of the great number of British seamen in the American trade, and of the necessity for their services in time of war and danger. Secondly, of the right and the prejudice of the British nation, with respect to what are called the British or narrow seas, where its domain would be abandoned by the general stipulation required. Thirdly, of the use which would be made of such a sanctuary as that of American vessels, for desertions, and traitorous communications to her enemies, especially across the channel to France.

1st. With respect to the British seamen serving in our trade, it may be remarked, first, that the number, though considerable, is probably less than may be supposed. Secondly, that what is wrong in itself cannot be made right by considerations of expediency or advantage. Thirdly, that it is proved by the fact, that the number of real British subjects gained by the practice in question, is of inconsiderable importance even in the scale of advantage. The annexed report to Congress on the subject of impressments, with the addition of such cases as may be in the hands of Mr. Erving, will verify the remark in its application to the present war. The statement made by his predecessor during the last war, and which is also annexed, is in the same view still more conclusive. The statement comprehends not only all the applications made by him in the first instance, for the liberation of impressed seamen, between the month of June, 1797, and September, 1801, but many also which had been made previous to this agency, by Mr. Pinkney and Mr. King, and which it was necessary for him to renew. These applications, therefore, may fairly be considered as embracing the greater part of the period of the war; and as applications are known to be pretty indiscriminately made, they may further be considered as embracing, if not the whole the far greater part of the impressments, those of British subjects as well as others. Yet the result exhibits two thousand and fifty-nine cases only, and of this number one hundred and two seamen only detained as being British subjects, which is less than one-twentieth of the number impressed, and one thousand one hundred and forty-two discharged, or ordered to be so, as not being British subjects, which is more than half of the whole number, leaving eight hundred and five for further proof, with the strongest presumption that the greater part, if not the whole, were Americans or other aliens, whose proof of citizenship had been lost or destroyed, or whose situation would account for the difficulties and delays in producing it. So that it is certain, that for all the British seamen gained by this violent proceeding, more than an equal number who were not so were the victims; it is highly probable that for every British seaman so gained, a number of others, not less than ten for one, must have been the victims, and it is even possible that this number may have exceeded the proportion of twenty to one.

It cannot, therefore, be doubted, that the acquisition of British seamen, by these impressments, whatever may be its advantage, is lost in the wrong done to Americans ignorantly or wilfully mistaken for British subjects, in the jealousy and ill-will excited among all maritime nations by an adherence to such a practice, and in the particular provocation to measures of redress on the part of the United States, not less disagreeable to them than embarrassing to Great Britain, and which may threaten the good understanding which ought to be faithfully cultivated by both. The copy of a bill brought into Congress, under the influence of violations committed on our flag, gives force to this latter consideration. Whether it will pass into a law, and at the present session, is more than can yet be said. As there is every reason to believe that it has been proposed with reluctance, it will probably not be pursued into effect, if any hope can be supported of a remedy, by an amicable arrangement between the two nations. But such is the feeling through this country, produced by the reiterated and atrocious cases of impressments and other insults on our flag, that a remedy of some kind will ere long be called for in a tone not to be disregarded. A copy of the bill referred to is herewith enclosed.

There is a further consideration which ought to have weight in this question. Although the British seamen employed in carrying on American commerce be, in some respects, lost to their own nation, yet such is the intimate and extensive connexion of this commerce, direct and circuitous, with the commerce, the manufactures, the revenue, and the general resources of the British nation, that in other respects its mariners, on board American vessels, may truly be said to be rendering it the most valuable services. It would not be extravagant to make it a question, whether Great Britain would not suffer more by withdrawing her seamen from the merchant vessels of the United States, than her enemies would suffer from the addition of them to the crews of her ships of war and cruisers.

Should any difficulty be started concerning seamen born within the British dominions, and naturalized by the United States since the treaty of 1783, you may remove it by observing: First, that very few, if any, such naturalizations can take place, the law here requiring a preparatory residence of five years, with notice of the intention to become a citizen, entered of record two years before the last necessary formality, besides a regular proof of good moral character, conditions but little likely to be complied with by ordinary seafaring persons. Secondly, that a discontinuance of impressments on the high seas will preclude an actual collision between the interfering claims. Within the jurisdiction of each nation, and in their respective vessels on the high seas, each will enforce the allegiance which it claims. In other situations, the individuals doubly claimed will be within a jurisdiction independent of both nations.

2d. The British pretensions to domain over the narrow seas are so obsolete, and so indefensible, that they never would have occurred as a probable objection in this case, if they had not actually frustrated an arrangement settled by Mr. King, with the British ministry, on the subject of impressments from American vessels on the high seas. At the moment when the articles were expected to be signed, an exception of the "narrow seas" was urged and insisted on by Lord St. Vincent; and being utterly inadmissible, on our part, the negotiation was abandoned. Mr. King seems to be of opinion, however, that, with more time than was left him for the experiment, the objection might have been overcome. This is not improbable, if the objection was not merely an expedient for evading a relinquishment of a favorite practice.

The objection, in itself, has certainly not the slightest foundation. The time has been, indeed, when England not only claimed but exercised pretensions scarcely inferior to full sovereignty over the seas surrounding the British Isles, and even as far as Cape Finisterre to the south, and Vanstaden, in Norway, to the north. It was a time, however, when reason had but little share in determining the law and the intercourse of nations; when power alone decided questions of right, and when the ignorance and want of concert among other maritime countries facilitated such an usurpation. The progress of civilization and information has produced a change in all these respects; and no principle in the code of public law is at present better established than the common freedom of the seas beyond a very limited distance from the territories washed by them. This distance is not, indeed, fixed with absolute precision. It is varied in a small degree by written authorities, and perhaps it may be reasonably varied, in some degree, by local peculiarities: but the greatest distance which would now be listened to any where, would make a small proportion of the narrowest part of the narrowest seas in question.

What are, in fact, the prerogatives claimed and exercised by Great Britain over these seas? If they were really a part of her domain, her authority would be the same there as within her other domain. Foreign vessels would be subject to all the laws and regulations framed for them, as much as if they were within the harbors or rivers of the country. Nothing of this sort is pretended. Nothing of this sort would be tolerated. The only instances in which these seas are distinguished from other seas, or in which Great Britain enjoys within them any distinction over other nations, are, first, the compliment paid by other flags to hers; secondly, the extension of her territorial jurisdiction, in certain cases, to the distance of four leagues from the coast. The first is a relic of ancient usurpation, which has thus long escaped the correction which modern and more enlightened times have applied to other usurpations. The prerogative has been often contested, however, even at the expense of bloody wars, and is still borne with ill-will and impatience by her neighbors. At the last treaty of peace at Amiens, the abolition of it was repeatedly and strongly pressed by France; and it is not improbable that, at no remote day, it will follow the fate of the title of "King of France," so long worn by the British monarchs, and at length so properly sacrificed to the lessons of a magnanimous wisdom. As far as this homage to the British flag has any foundation at present, it rests merely on long usage and long acquiescence, which are construed, as in a few other cases of maritime claims, into the effect of a general, though tacit convention. The second instance is the extension of the territorial jurisdiction to four leagues from the shore. This, too, as far as the distance may exceed that which is generally allowed, rests on a like foundation, strengthened, perhaps, by the local facility of smuggling, and the peculiar interest which Great Britain has in preventing a practice affecting so deeply her whole system of revenue, commerce, and manufactures: while the limitation itself to four leagues necessarily implies that beyond that distance no territorial jurisdiction is assumed.

But, whatever may be the origin or the value of these prerogatives over foreign flags in one case, and within a limited portion of these seas in another, it is obvious that neither of them will be violated by the exemption of American vessels from impressments, which are nowise connected with either; having never been made on the pretext either of withholding the wonted homage to the British flag, or of smuggling in defiance of British laws.

This extension of the British law to four leagues from the shore is inferred from an act of Parliament, passed in the year 1736, (9 G. II. c. 35) the terms of which comprehend all vessels; foreign as well as British. It is possible, however, that the former are constructively excepted. Should your inquiries ascertain this to be the case, you will find yourself on better ground than the concession here made.

With respect to the compliment paid to the British flag, it is also possible that more is here conceded than you may find to be necessary. After the peace of 1763 this compliment was peremptorily withheld by France, in spite of the remonstrances of Great Britain; and it remains for your inquiry, whether it did not continue to be refused, notwithstanding the failure at Amiens to obtain from Great Britain a formal renunciation of the claim.

From every view of the subject, it is reasonable to expect that the exception of the narrow seas, from the stipulations against impressments, will not be inflexibly maintained. Should it be so, your negotiation will be at an end. The truth is, that so great a proportion of our trade, direct and circuitous, passes through those channels, and such is its peculiar exposure in them to the wrong practised, that, with such an exception, any remedy would be very partial. And we can never consent to purchase a partial remedy by confirming a general evil, and by subjecting ourselves to our own reproaches as well as to those of other nations.

3d. It appears, as well by a letter from Mr. Thornton, in answer to one from me, of both which copies are enclosed, as from conversations with Mr. Merry, that the facility which would be given, particularly in the British channel, by the immunity claimed for American vessels, to the escape of traitors, and the desertion of others, whose services in time of war may be particularly important to an enemy, forms one of the pleas for the British practice of examining American crews, and will be one of the objections to a formal relinquishment of it.

This plea, like all others, admits a solid and satisfactory reply. In the first place, if it could prevail at all against the neutral claim, it would authorize the seizure of the persons described only, and in vessels bound to a hostile country only, whereas the practice of impressing is applied to persons, few, if any, of whom are alleged to be of either description, and to vessels whithersoever bound, even to Great Britain herself. In the next place, it is not only a preference of a small object on one side to a greater object on the other, but a sacrifice of right on one side to expediency on the other side.

Considering, nevertheless, the possible adherence of the British Government to this last objection, and the extreme importance to our seafaring citizens and commerce, of a stipulation suppressing a practice flagrant in its nature, and still more so in the abuses inseparable from it, you are left at liberty to concur, if necessary, in the modification as it stands in the second column. You will observe that this guards, in all cases, the crews of our vessels from being meddled with, and, in referring for an exception to the immunity on board our vessels to the law of nations, yields no principle maintained by the United States; inasmuch as the reference will be satisfied by the acknowledged exception of enemies in military service. Should persons, therefore, other than such, be taken, under pretext of the law of nations, the United States will be free to contest the proceeding; and there is the less difficulty in leaving the stipulation on this footing, as the case may never happen, and will be pretty sure to happen but rarely. You will observe, also, that, in the passage from one port to another of the respective countries, the vessels of the neutral parties are to protect all persons without exception. Independently of the general principle asserted by the United States, this respect is due to the peculiar character of the coasting trade, and the utter improbability that it will, at any time, be a vehicle to persons of any obnoxious description.

ON ARTICLE II. The reasonableness of this article is manifest. Citizens or subjects of one country residing in another, though bound by their temporary allegiance to many common duties, can never be rightfully forced into military service, particularly external service, nor be restrained from leaving their residence when they please. The law of nations protects them against both, and the violation of this law by the avowed impressment of American citizens residing in Great Britain may be pressed with the greater force on the British Government, as it is in direct inconsistency with her impressment of her own subjects bound by much stronger ties to the United States, as above explained, as well as with the spirit of her commercial laws and policy, by which foreigners are invited to a residence. The liberation of the persons comprehended by this article, therefore, cannot be justly or honorably refused, and the provision for their recompense and their return home is equally due to the service rendered by, and the wrong done to them.

ON ARTICLE III. This regulation is conformable to the law of nations, and to the tenor of all treaties, which define the belligerent claim of visiting and searching neutral vessels. No treaty can be cited, in which the practice of compelling the neutral vessel to send its boat, its officers, its people or its papers, to the belligerent vessel, is authorized. British treaties, as well as those to which she is not a party, in every instance where a regulation of the claim is undertaken, coincide with the article here proposed. The article is in fact almost a transcript of the ——— article of the treaty of 1786 between Great Britain and France.

The regulation is founded in the best reasons. 1st. It is sufficient for the neutral that he acquiesces in the interruption of his voyage, and the trouble of the examination, imposed by the belligerent commander. To require a positive and active co-operation on his part in behalf of the latter, is more than can be justified on any principle. 2d. The belligerent party can always send more conveniently to the neutral vessel, than this can send to the belligerent vessel, having neither such fit boats for the purpose, especially in a rough sea, nor being so abundantly manned. 3d. This last consideration is enforced by the numerous and cruel abuses committed in the practice of requiring the neutral vessel to send to the belligerent. As an example, you will find in the documents now transmitted a case where neither the smallness and leakiness of the boat, nor the boisterous state of the weather, nor the pathetic remonstrances of the neutral commander, had any effect on the imperious injunctions of the belligerent, and where the task was performed at the manifest peril of the boat, the papers, and the lives of the people. The limitation of the number to be sent on board the neutral vessel is a reasonable and usual precaution against the danger of insults and pillage.

ON ARTICLE IV. This enumeration of contraband articles is copied from the treaty of 1781 between Great Britain and Russia. It is sufficiently limited, and that treaty is an authority more likely than any other to be respected by the British Government. The sequel of the article, which protects the productions of a hostile colony converted into neutral property, is taken from the same model, with the addition of the terms, "in any case or on any pretext." This addition is meant to embrace more explicitly our right to trade freely with the colonies at war with Great Britain, and between them and all parts of the world, in colonial productions, being at the time not enemy's, but neutral property; a trade equally legitimate in itself with that between neutral countries directly, and in their respective vessels, and such colonies, which her regulations do not contest.

In support of this right, in opposition to the British doctrine, that a trade not allowed by a nation in time of peace cannot be opened to neutrals in time of war, it may be urged, that all nations are in the practice of varying more or less, in time of war, their commercial laws, from the state of these laws in time of peace; a practice agreeable to reason, as well as favorable to neutral nations; that the change may be made in time of war, on considerations not incident to a state of war, but on such as are known to have the same effect in time of peace; that Great Britain herself is in the regular practice of changing her navigation and commercial laws, in times of war, particularly in relation to a neutral intercourse with her colonies; that at this time she admits a trade between neutral countries and the colonies of her enemies, when carried on directly between them, or between the former and herself, interrupting only a direct trade between such colonies and their parent State, and between them and countries in Europe, other than those to which the neutral trade may respectively belong; that as she does not contest the right of neutrals to trade with hostile colonies, within these limitations the trade can be, and actually is, carried on indirectly between such colonies and all countries, even those to which the colonies belong; and, consequently, that the effect of her doctrine and her practice is not to deprive her enemy of their colonial trade, but merely to lessen the value of it in proportion to the charges incident to the circuitous course into which it is forced, an advantage to her which, if just in itself, would not be sufficient to balance the impolitic vexations accruing to neutral and friendly nations.

These views of the subject have entered into my conversations with Mr. Merry. He expresses, notwithstanding, a belief that Great Britain will turn an unfavorable ear to any proposition calculated to give her enemies the resources of their colonial trade, beyond the degree in which her present regulations permit. This is doubtless to be apprehended, but considering the proposition as an article which may find a balance in the general bargain, it may not be inadmissible; or if inadmissible in the extent proposed, a middle ground may perhaps be accepted. The colonial trade in question consists of four branches; first, between the colonies and Great Britain herself; secondly, between the colonies and the neutral countries carrying on the trade; thirdly, between the colonies and neutral countries not themselves carrying on the trade; fourthly, between the colonies and the countries to which they belong, or which are parties to the war with Great Britain.

The first and second branches are those with which her own regulations accord. The last is that to which her aversion will of course be the strongest. Should this aversion be unconquerable, let it be tried then, and then only, whether, on our yielding, or rather omitting that point, she will not yield to us, in return, the direct trade between hostile colonies and neutral countries generally. You will be careful, however, so to modify the compromise as will mark as little as may be a positive relinquishment of the direct trade between the belligerent nations and their colonies.

Should such a compromise be altogether rejected, you will limit the article to the simple enumeration of contraband, it being desirable that, without a very valuable consideration, no precedent should be given by the United States of a stipulated acknowledgment that free ships do not make free goods. And you will omit the article altogether, if a proper list of contraband cannot be agreed on, particularly one that excludes money, provisions, and naval stores.

ON ARTICLE V. This article, taken from the convention of 1800 between the United States and France, is conformable to the general practice of the prize courts in the latter, and is the more worthy of adoption every where, as it would contribute so much to the consistency and stability of the rules of admiralty proceedings. Without a single objection justly lying against it, it will have the important advantages of being a check on the inferior tribunals, of enabling the superior tribunal, where a faulty reason appears on the face of the sentence, to correct the wrong without delay or expense, and of being a check moreover on the decision of the superior tribunal itself. As prize causes also are tried by courts not of a third party, but of one of the parties interested, it is but reasonable that the ground should be known to the other, on which judgment has passed against its citizens or subjects, in order, if deemed proper, that negotiation may be employed for redressing past, or guarding against future, injustice.

ON ARTICLE VI. The fictitious blockades proclaimed by Great Britain, and made the pretext for violating the commerce of neutral nations, has been one of the greatest abuses ever committed on the high seas. During the late war they were carried to an extravagance, which would have been ridiculous, if in their effects they had not inflicted such serious and extensive injuries on neutral nations. Ports were proclaimed in a state of blockade, previous to the arrival of any force at them, were considered, in that state without regard to intermissions in the presence of the blockading force, and the proclamations left in operation after its final departure, the British cruisers during the whole time seizing every vessel bound to such ports, at whatever distance from them, and the British prize courts pronouncing condemnations wherever a knowledge of the proclamation at the time of sailing could be presumed, although it might afterwards be known that no real blockade existed. The whole scene was a perfect mockery, in which fact was sacrificed to form, and right to power and plunder. The United States were among the greatest sufferers; and would have been still more so, if redress for some of the spoiliations proceeding from this source had not fallen within the provisions of an article in the treaty of 1794.

From the effect of this and other arbitrary practices of Great Britain on the temper and policy of neutral nations towards her; from the spirit of her treaty made near the close of the late war with Russia; from the general disposition manifested at the beginning of the present towards the United States, and the comparative moderation observed in Europe with respect to blockades, (if indeed the two cases of the Weser and Elbe are not to be excepted,) it was hoped that the mockeries and mischiefs practised under the name of blockades would no where be repeated. It is found, however, that the West Indies are again the theatre of them. The three entire and extensive islands of Martinique, Gaudaloupe, and St. Domingo have been published as in a state of blockade, although the whole naval force applied to the purpose is inconsiderable; although it appears that a part of this inconsiderable force is occasionally seen at the distance of many leagues at sea; although it does not appear that more than one or two ports at the most have at any time been actually blockaded; and although complaints are heard, that the British ships of war do not protect their own trade against the numerous cruisers from the islands under this pretended blockade.

Enclosed herewith are three letters on this subject; two from me, the first to Mr. Thornton, the second to Mr. Merry, and the third from Mr. Merry to me. You will observe that he does not pretend to justify the measures pursued in the West Indies; but, on the contrary, wishes them to be regarded as proceeding from an officer who does not pursue the intentions of his Government. Still such measures prove that no general regulations or orders have been yet issued by that Government against the evil, as might reasonably have been expected, and that a stipulated security against it is an object as important as it is just.

In the two letters to Mr. Thornton and Mr. Merry the ground is marked out, on which you will be able to combat the false blockades, and to maintain the definition of a real one, contained in the proposed article which is a literal copy from the fourth article of the Russian treaty above cited. In addition to these letters, you will find enclosed a letter of the _____ of _____ to Mr. Pinkney, in which some views are taken of the subject, which may also be of use in your discussions with the British Government.

ON ARTICLE VII. This article is due, if not to all neutrals, at least to the United States, who are distinguished by the distance of their situation. Decisions of the British Court of Admiralty, have so far respected this peculiarity as to admit a want of information as a plea for going to a blockaded port, where such a plea would be refused to less remote countries. But more than this may fairly be claimed. A vessel knowing that a particular blockade existed two months before, may well conjecture that before her arrival at the port, which will require two months more, the blockade will have ceased; and may accordingly clear and steer for such port with an honest intention, in case of finding, on her approach, the fact otherwise, not to attempt an unlawful entrance. To condemn vessels under such circumstances would be manifestly unjust, and to restrain them from a distant voyage, to a port once in a state of blockade, until information of a change shall have travelled a like distance, must produce a delay and uncertainty little short of an absolute prohibition of the commerce. To require them even to go out of their course to seek at other ports information on the subject would be an unreasonable imposition. The British Government can have little objection to this article, after defining blockades as is agreed with Russia, and as is here proposed; since our distance is of itself a security against any concert with the blockaded for surreptitious entries, which might be attempted by nearer adventurers; and since in the case of blockades, by a force actually present, a preliminary notice may be required without impairing their efficacy, as might be the case with blockades, such as the preceding article guards against.

The only difference between the articles as standing in the different columns, consists in the preamble to that which is to be admitted, if the proposition of the other should not succeed. The article is preferable without the recital of any reason particular to the United States, because as a naked stipulation, it strengthens instead of weakening a general principle friendly to neutral and pacific nations.

ON ARTICLES VII, IX, and X. These are articles which are known to have been long wished and contemplated on the part of Great Britain, and together with the justice and in many views the expediency to Great Britain herself of the articles desired on our part may induce her to accede to the whole. The articles are in substance the same with a project offered to the American administration in the year 1800, by Mr. Liston, who appears to have borrowed it from corresponding stipulations in the convention between the United States and France in the year _____. The project was at that time dropped, owing, perhaps, in part to the change in the head of the Department of State, between whom and Mr. Liston it had been discussed, and principally to the difficulty of combining with it proper stipulations against British impressments on the high seas. Without such an equivalent, the project had little to recommend it to the United States. Considered by itself, it was, too, the less admissible, as one of its articles, under some obscurity of expression, was thought to favor the British pretension to impress British seamen from American vessels on the high seas.

A copy of this document is enclosed, as it may be not without use in showing the ideas of the British Government at that time, so far at least as its minister here was an organ of them.

The terms in which these articles are to be proposed, differ but slightly from those in which they may be admitted. In the former the delivery of deserters is confined to soldiers and seamen, without requiring a delivery of officers, whose desertion will not be from the service of their country, but on account of offences for which it might sometimes be more agreeable to the United States to be unbound to give them up for trial and punishment. At the same time this consideration ought not to be a bar to an arrangement which, in its general character, will be so important to the interests of the United States.

ON ARTICLE XI. This is a stipulation which is not to be yielded but in the event of its being made an indispensable condition. It cannot be essential for the object of it, whilst the British Government is left free to take the precautions allowable within its own jurisdiction for preventing the clandestine departure of its seamen or its soldiers in neutral vessels. And it is very ineligible to the United States, inasmuch as it will be difficult to enforce the prohibition, whether we regard the embarkation of such persons in British ports, or their landing on the American shores; and inasmuch as the inefficacy of regulations for such purposes, though made with due sincerity and care, may become a source of secret jealousy and dissatisfaction, if not of controversy and reproach.

The article is copied from that in the arrangement (of which you have a copy) discussed and brought near to a conclusion between Mr. King and the British ministry, and you are authorized to accede to it, on the supposition that it may again be insisted on. It is to be recollected, however, that the article was then understood to be the only price given for relinquishing the impressment of American seamen. The other offers, now substituted, will justify you in pressing the omission of the original one.

ON ARTICLE XII. The law of nations does not exact of neutral powers the prohibition specified in this article. On the other hand, it does not restrain them from prohibiting a trade which appears on the face of the official papers proceeding from the custom house to be intended to violate the law of nations, and from which legitimate considerations of prudence may also dissuade a Government. All that can be reasonably expected by belligerent from neutral Powers, is, that their regulations on this subject be impartial, and that their stipulations relative to it, when made in time of war, at least, should not preclude an impartiality.

It is not certain what degree of value Great Britain may put on this article, connected as it essentially is with the article which limits the list of contraband. It will at least mitigate her objection to such a limitation. With the range given to contraband by her construction of the law of nations, even as acquiesced in by the United States, a stipulation of this sort would be utterly inadmissible.

The last article, in making this city the place for exchanging the ratifications, consults expedition in putting the treaty into operation, since the British ratification can be forwarded at the same time with the instrument itself. And it is otherwise reasonable, that as the negotiation and formation of the treaty will have taken place at the seat of the British Government, the concluding formality shall be at that of the Government of the United States.

In addition to these articles, which, with the observations thereon, I am charged by the President to communicate to you as his instructions, he leaves you at liberty to insert any others which may do no more than place British armed vessels with their prizes on an equality, within our ports and jurisdiction, with those of France. This would only stipulate what would probably be done by gratuitous regulations there, and as it would no doubt be acceptable to Great Britain, it may not only aid in reconciling her to the principal objects desired by the United States, but may induce her to concur in the further insertion of articles corresponding with those in the convention of 1800 with France, which regulate more precisely and more effectually the treatment of vessels of the neutral party on the high seas.

The occasion will be proper, also, for calling the attention of the British Government to the reasonableness of permitting American consuls to reside in every part of her dominions where and so long as she permits our citizens to trade. It is not denied that she has a natural right to refuse such a residence, and that she is free, by her treaty with us, to refuse it in other than her European dominions. But the exception authorized with respect to the residence of consuls elsewhere having reference to the refusal of our trade elsewhere, the refusal of the one ought manifestly to cease with the refusal of the other. When our vessels and citizens are allowed to trade to ports in the West Indies, there is the same reason for a temporary admission of consuls to take care of it, as there is for their admission in ports where the trade is permanently allowed. There is the just expectation of your success on this point, as some official patronage is due to the rights of our citizens in the prize courts established in the West India Islands. Should the British Government be unwilling to enter into a stipulated provision, you may perhaps obtain an order to the Governors for that purpose. Or if consuls be objected to altogether, it is desirable that agents may be admitted, if nowhere else, at least in the islands where the Vice Admiralty Courts are established.

It has been intimated that the articles, as standing in the different columns, are to be considered, the one as the offer to be made, the other as the ultimatum to be required. This is, however, not to be taken too strictly; it being impossible to foresee the turns and the combinations which may present themselves in the course of the negotiation. The essential objects for the United States are the suppression of impressments, and the definition of blockades. Next to these in importance are the reduction of the list of contraband, and the enlargement of our neutral trade with hostile colonies. Whilst you keep in view, therefore, those objects, the two last as highly important, and the two first as absolutely indispensable, your discretion, in which the President places great confidence, must guide you in all that relates to the inferior ones.

With sentiments of great respect and esteem I remain, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MADISON.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 14, 1804.

SIR:

You will herewith receive the ratification, by the President and Senate, of the convention with the British Government, signed on the 12th of May, 1803, with an exception of the fifth article. Should the British Government accede to this change in the instrument, you will proceed to an exchange of ratifications, and transmit the one received without delay, in order that the proper steps may be taken for carrying the convention into effect. As the same considerations, which led to the arrangements settled by it, urge a prompt execution of them, it may be expected that the steps depending on that Government will be hastened. As far as your exhortations may be requisite, you will of course apply them.

The objection to the fifth article appears to have arisen from the posteriority of the signature, and ratification of this convention to those of the last convention with France, ceding Louisiana to the United States, and from a presumption that the line to be run in pursuance of the fifth article might thence be found, or alleged, to abridge the northern extent of that acquisition.

It may reasonably be expected that the British Government will make no difficulty in concurring in this alteration; because,

First. It would be unreasonable that any advantage against the United States should be constructively authorized by the posteriority of the dates in question; the instructions given to enter into the convention, and the understanding of the parties at the time of signing it, having no reference whatever to any territorial rights of the United States acquired by the previous convention with France, but referring merely to the territorial rights as understood at the date of the instructions for, and signature of, the British convention. The copy of a letter from Mr. King, hereto annexed, is precise and conclusive on this subject.

Secondly. If the fifth article be expunged, the north boundary of Louisiana will, as is reasonable, remain the same in the hands of the United States as it was in the hands of France, and may be adjusted and established according to the principles and authorities which would in that case have been applicable.

Thirdly. There is reason to believe that the boundary between Louisiana and the British territories north of it were actually fixed by commissioners appointed under the treaty of Utrecht, and that this boundary was to run from the Lake of the Woods westwardly in latitude 49; in which case the fifth article would be nugatory, as the line, from the Lake of the Woods to the nearest source of the Mississippi, would run through territory which on both sides of the line would belong to the United States. Annexed is a paper stating the authority on which the decision of the commissioners under the treaty of Utrecht rests, and the reasoning opposed to the construction making the 49th degree of latitude the northern boundary of Louisiana, with marginal notes in support of that construction. This paper will put you more readily into possession of the subject, as it may enter into your discussions with the British Government. But you will perceive the necessity of recurring to the proceedings of the commissioners, as the source of authentic information. These are not within our reach here, and it must consequently be left to your own researches and judgment to determine the proper use to be made of them.

Fourthly. Laying aside, however, all the objections to the fifth article, the proper extension of a dividing line in that quarter will be equally open for friendly negotiation after, as, without agreeing to the other parts of the convention, and considering the remoteness of the time at which such a line will become actually necessary, the postponement of it is of little or no consequence. The truth is, that the British Government seemed at one time to favor this delay, and the instructions given by the United States readily acquiesced in it. The annexed extracts from Mr. King's and Mr. Gore's letters will, with that from the Department of State, explain this observation.

The fourth article of the convention provides that the commissioners shall be respectively paid in such manner as shall be agreed between the two parties, such agreement to be settled at the time of the exchange of ratifications. It has been supposed that the compensation allowed to the commissioners under the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, who settled the St. Croix boundary, would be satisfactory to the British Government; and upon this idea the estimate, of which a copy is enclosed, was framed as the basis of an appropriation to be asked from Congress. The President authorizes you, therefore, to agree to the sum mentioned therein, viz. four thousand four hundred and forty-four dollars and forty-four cents, to be paid by each Government to the commissioner appointed by itself, the same sum being allowed the third commissioner, to be paid to him in equal portions by the two Governments. Should, however, the British Government insist upon a variation of the compensation from the sum abovementioned, you may consent to it, provided it does not exceed six thousand six hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-six cents, each party contributing equally to the payment, and each commissioner receiving the same sum as his colleagues.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to Mr. Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 5, 1804.

The treaty of 1794, so far as it relates to commerce, having expired on the first day of October last, (that being the date of the preliminary articles,) the commercial intercourse between the two countries is left to the regulations which the parties separately may think fit to establish. It may be expected, however, that the friendship and mutual interest between them will produce a continuance on both sides of such regulations as are just and equal, and an accommodation to those principles of such as, on either side, are otherwise than just and equal. On the side of the United States, their commercial regulations place Great Britain, in every respect, on the footing of the most favored nation. Great Britain cannot say as much with respect to hers. One instance at least is explained in a letter from this Department to Mr. King, of which a copy is enclosed, from which you will see that, although the act of Parliament to which it refers be no longer a breach of stipulation, it is not less a violation of equality than it is of sound policy. With respect to the British West Indies, it is not known that the United States are on a worse footing than other nations, whatever want of reciprocity there may be to the liberal regulations of the United States. With respect to the East India trade, it is understood that the treaty of 1794, by denying to American vessels both the coasting branch of it, and a direct intercourse between India and foreign countries, other than America, the United States were in both instances placed on a worse footing than other nations, and even on a worse footing than they themselves enjoyed prior to the treaty. The expiration of the treaty, and the friendly and favorable equality allowed by the United States to Great Britain in every branch of their trade, ought certainly to restore what the treaty suspended.

These observations are made not with a view to any negotiation whatever, leading at the present moment to a treaty on those or any other commercial points, or to discussions which might be misconstrued into a wish to take unreasonable advantage of a critical moment, but to enable you to present the ideas of your Government with more precision, to vindicate our commercial policy against misconceptions, and to avail yourself the better of fit occasions for obtaining from the British Government such relaxations as may be due to our example, and be calculated to cherish amity and useful intercourse between the two nations.

In my letter of —, I stated the reasonableness of admitting American consuls in the dependencies of Great Britain, whenever and wherever the American commerce should be admitted. The principle urged in this case is applicable to the East as well as to the West Indies. During the last war an American agent was, informally at least, allowed to reside at Calcutta, and take care of the trade of his countrymen. Mr. Jacob Lewis, who was appointed to succeed him, proceeded to London on his way thither, but peace having intervened his application for an exequatur was refused. It is of real importance to our trade with that country, that such a functionary should be permitted to reside in it; the more so, if it be true that the rule forbidding foreign factors to do so be enforced there. Be so good as to sound the British Government on this subject, and communicate its sentiments for the information of the President.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

LONDON, March 18, 1804.

I have lately received from Mr. Baring your letters of the 5th and 16th of January; that of October 24th, with the documents mentioned in it, had reached me at an earlier period.

I rejoice to hear that our Government has obtained complete and quiet possession of Louisiana. Independent of the vast importance of the acquisition, which surely cannot be held in too high estimation, it is very satisfactory to see the affair concluded in a manner so amicable, and at the same time so honorable to the nations who are parties to it. Both Governments have performed every thing which they had respectively stipulated, and each has therefore much reason to approve the conduct of the other. The transaction has, I trust, established their peace and friendship on a basis which will never be shaken.

I shall pay all the attention to the instructions contained in your letter of the 5th January which is due to their great importance. As soon as I am sufficiently possessed of the subject, I shall ask a conference with Lord Hawkesbury, to propose to his Government a convention between the two nations, for the adjustment of the points and on the principles of the project you have sent me. I hope to be able to commence the business in a week or ten days, and flatter myself that the negotiation will be productive of real advantage to the United States. Should it even not succeed in all its objects, the attempt must nevertheless be considered as a very satisfactory proof of a strong desire in our Government to preserve on just ground the friendship of this country, and is likely, by the explanations to which it may lead alone, to have that tendency. I am, however, far from thinking it improbable that a suitable convention may be formed, especially on some of the points that are deemed interesting.

The indisposition of the King still continues, though it has so much abated as to permit occasionally his attention to certain inferior objects of business. His life is no longer considered in danger. His disorder, a species of mental derangement, with which he was formerly attacked, has been less violent on this occasion; and, having proceeded in a great measure, as is believed, from other infirmities, will probably cease when they are removed, which is said to be nearly the case at present. In the interim, the administration must be considered as having lost much of its strength. The sickness of the King and his probable decline have put in motion all the interests that are connected with the monarchy. Those who had little hope of employment in his lifetime seem to have left the ministry, or rather to have become active against them. The old opposition has acquired greater energy, and become more formidable. Mr. Fox attacks it on all occasions in a manner the most direct and unqualified, and the support which Mr. Pitt sometimes gives it is yielded in a mode to do it more injury than service. It is obvious that he does not mean to connect his fortune with theirs; and I think I have observed, on some occasions, such a degree of attention and spirit of accommodation from him to Mr. Fox as to justify a presumption that he is not averse to a coalition with him, in case the terms are made acceptable. No change has taken place in our concerns since my last; and, as I am now authorized to negotiate a treaty, I shall not call the attention of the Government to them, otherwise than in the latter mode. It is probable that the omission to answer my communications and redress our injuries, with which it is justly chargeable, may furnish a motive for acceding to a more permanent arrangement.

There is no change in the state of the war. The menace of invasion is continued with the same effect here. Of the object and parties to the late conspiracy at Paris you will get more correct information from that quarter than I can give you.

I am, sir, with great respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

No. 22.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

LONDON, April 15, 1804.

Soon after my last, I requested an interview with Lord Hawkesbury, which took place on the 2d instant, in which I informed him that I had received your instructions to propose to his Government the regulation, by convention, of certain points, which I was persuaded both countries would find their advantage in placing on explicit and equitable ground. I stated to his lordship the concerns which it was desirous thus to regulate, in which I complied strictly with your views; and assured him that the object of the President was to fix the friendship of the two nations on the most solid basis, by removing every cause which had a tendency, in their intercourse and other relations, especially in time of war, to disturb it. In the conversation, I entered into detail on every point, in which I was met by his lordship with apparent candor, the sincerity of which I had no reason to doubt, which manifested a disposition equally strong in favor of the professed and indeed real object of the proposed negotiation. He requested me, in the conclusion, to furnish him a project, which he promised to submit to his cabinet, and to communicate to me the result of its deliberations on it as soon as he could. I have since sent him a project, but too recently to admit my obtaining an answer to it. I am inclined to think, from what passed in the conference, that some advantage may be fairly expected from the negotiation. His lordship did not bind himself to any thing, it is true; he even went so far as to express a wish that the principles of our treaty of 1794 might be adopted in the present convention where they applied, and an expectation that, if the accommodation which had been given, in certain cases, to the northern Powers should be stipulated in our favor, we should accord fully what they had yielded in return. Although I was very desirous to do justice to the moderate and friendly views of our Government on the occasion, yet I did not fail to give him to understand that I could not accede to his idea in either case. I shall endeavor to bring the business to a conclusion, and apprise you of the result as soon as possible; when I shall also communicate fully, and in detail, an account of what passes between us in the course of the transaction.

Not many of our vessels have been interrupted in their commerce with France or Holland; not one, that I recollect, has been condemned. Some of them have been brought in, under various pretexts, which have generally been discharged, without a long detention. I send you a copy of my correspondence with Lord Hawkesbury on the subject of the Brutus, Captain Haly, in which you find that ample recompense is promised for the injury complained of.

I have the pleasure to enclose you a copy of a communication from Mr. Dethonig, chargé des affaires of the King of Sweden at Constantinople, in which he promises his good offices to obtain, by intermediation with the Porte, the liberation of our citizens lately taken prisoners in the Philadelphia frigate, by the Bey of Tripoli. Having known Mr. Dethonig formerly in France, he voluntarily offered his good offices on this occasion, on hearing of the disaster.

I have also the pleasure to transmit you a copy of a letter from Mr. Harris, our consul at Petersburg, with one from the minister of the Emperor, which contains a very strong testimonial of his friendship for the United States. The assurances which he gives of the good offices of His Majesty with the Ottoman Porte, to obtain of the Bey of Tripoli the discharge of the men and restitution of the frigate, induced me to make my acknowledgment to his ambassador here of the sensibility which I felt to an act which was so humane and honorable to the author. I was led to this by the consideration that, as Mr. Harris was only vested with the character of a consul, such an expression from a person in my place might produce an immediate good effect. I flattered myself that the knowledge of the friendly disposition of the Emperor towards us might be even serviceable here.

The King still continues indisposed, though in what degree is uncertain. In other respects, the state of affairs has not varied since my last.

I am, with great respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

Project of a convention presented to Lord Hawkesbury, April 7, 1804.

ARTICLE 1. No person shall, upon the high seas, and without the jurisdiction of the other party, be demanded or taken out of any ship or vessel belonging to citizens or subjects of one of the other parties, by the public or private armed ships belonging to or in the service of the other, unless such person be at the time in the military service of an enemy of such other party.

ART. 2. No person, being a subject or citizen of one of the parties, and resorting to or residing in the dominions of the other, shall, in any case, be compelled to serve on board any vessel, whether public or private, belonging to such other party; and all citizens and subjects whatever of the respective parties, at the time compulsively serving on board the vessels of the other, shall be forthwith liberated, and enabled, by adequate recompense, to return to their own country.

A certified list of the crew, or protection from either Government, in such form as they shall respectively prescribe, showing that the person claiming under it is a citizen or subject of either Power, shall be deemed satisfactory evidence of the same; and in all cases where these documents may have been lost, destroyed, or by casualty not obtained, and any person claims to be a citizen or subject of either Power, such other evidence of said claim shall be received and admitted as would be satisfactory in a court of judicature.

ART. 3. If the ships of either of the parties shall be met sailing either along the coasts or on the high seas by any ship of war or other public or private armed ship of the other party, such ships of war or other armed vessels shall, for avoiding all disorder in visiting and examining the same, remain out of cannon shot, unless the state of the sea or place of meeting render a nearer approach necessary; and shall in no case compel or require such vessel to send her boat, or her papers, or any person from on board, to the belligerent vessel; but the belligerent vessel may send her own boat to the other, and may enter her, to the number of two or three men only, who may in an orderly manner examine the same; and it is agreed that effectual provision shall be made for preventing violations of any part of this article.

ART. 4. In order to determine what characterizes a blockaded port, that denomination is given only to a port where there is, by the dispositions of the Power which attacks it with ships stationary or sufficiently near, an evident danger in entering.

ART. 5. It is agreed that no vessel sailing from the ports of either party shall, although cleared and bound to a blockaded port, be considered as violating, in any manner, the blockade, unless, in her approach towards such port, she shall have been previously warned against entering the same.

ART. 6. It is agreed that no refuge or protection shall be afforded by either party to the mariners, sailors, or other persons, not found to be its own citizens or subjects, who shall desert from a vessel of the other party, of the crew whereof the deserter made a part; but, on the contrary, all such deserters shall be delivered up, on demand, to the commanders of the vessels from which they shall have deserted, or to the commanding officers of the ships of war of the respective nations, or to such other persons as may be duly authorized to make requisition in that behalf, provided that proof be made, within two years from the time of desertion, by an exhibition of the ship's papers, or authenticated copies thereof, and, by satisfactory evidence of the identity of the person, that the deserters so demanded were actually part of the crew of the vessels in question.

And for the more effectual execution of this article, adequate provision shall be made for causing to be arrested, on the application of the respective consuls, or vice-consuls, to the competent authorities, all deserters duly proved to be such, in order that they may be sent back to the commanders of the vessels to which they belonged, or removed out of the country, at the request and expense of the said consuls, or vice-consuls, until they shall have found an opportunity of sending them back, or removing them as aforesaid; but, if they be not so sent back or removed within three months from the day of their arrest, they shall be set at liberty, and shall not again be arrested for the same cause.

ART. 7. This convention shall be in force for the term of five years from the date of the exchange of ratifications. It shall be ratified on both sides within three months from the date of its signature, or sooner, if possible, and the ratifications exchanged, without delay, in the United States, at the city of Washington.

No. 24.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

LONDON, June 3, 1804.

The late struggle in the Parliament has produced the appointment of Mr. Pitt to the place of Mr. Addington, of Lord Harrowby to that of Lord Hawkesbury, (the latter being removed to the Home Department, from which Mr. Yorke retired,) and Lord Melville to the head of the Admiralty, in the room of Lord St. Vincent. Not many other changes are made, the present ministry being formed principally of Mr. Pitt and some few of his friends, with the other members of the late one. It is understood that the King would not consent to the admission of Mr. Fox into the ministry, in consequence of which the Grenvilles and Mr. Wyndham refused to enter it.

While the late ministry was on the decline, it seemed useless to press it on any concerns of ours. I remained tranquil, in the hope of availing myself with effect of the moment when it should either recover its strength, or, retiring, give place to another, with which I might treat on the important concerns entrusted to me. As soon as Lord Harrowby came into office, he notified it to the foreign ministers, and invited them to an interview at his office on the concerns of their respective countries. As each was introduced separately, I took occasion to mention to him the subjects which were depending with his predecessor, more especially the project of a treaty concerning impressments and other topics, and the interest of the State of Maryland in some bank stock, which I hoped might soon be concluded. I mentioned to him, also, that I had lately received from you the ratification of the treaty respecting boundaries, by the President, with the advice of the Senate, with the exception of the fifth article, which I wished to submit to his consideration. He replied, that he was glad I had turned his attention to those subjects, since he would make them the particular object of his research, but hoped that I would not press any of them, as he had so lately come into office, and had so many concerns before him of the first importance to his country, and of a nature very urgent. I assured him I had no disposition to hurry any point; should wait with pleasure his accommodation, though I hoped it would suit his convenience to conclude soon the affair of the bank stock, which was entrusted to the care of Mr. Pinkney. He promised me to examine the papers immediately, and to write me as soon as he understood them. Near a fortnight afterwards elapsed, and I heard nothing from him. As Mr. Pinkney was extremely impatient, and I really wished to get into communication on the other topics, also, I wrote him a note on the ——— ultimo, requesting an interview on the general subject, with permission to present to him Mr. Pinkney at the same time, which was granted on the 30th. As the particulars which occurred in this interview appear to me to be of a nature very interesting, I shall endeavor to state them with the utmost accuracy.

Mr. Pinkney opened his subject, the result of which seemed to promise a speedy conclusion of it, in a manner satisfactory to him. As he will doubtless communicate every thing that occurs in that concern, it is useless for me to repeat any thing that you will receive more fully from him. He withdrew as soon as his object was accomplished. I then asked his lordship if he had read the project relative to seamen, &c., which I had given to Lord Hawkesbury some time since, and which I had mentioned to him in our former interview. He replied that he had not; that I would recollect that he had requested me to delay the examination of it for the present, as it did not press; the Congress having adjourned, and the bill concerning it being postponed. I replied that I did recollect it, but that I hoped by this time he had examined it, and, being one which involved no difficulty, that he would be prepared to act on it. He said that he was not, nor did he know that he should be during the session of Parliament. I told him that his mind being thus expressed, I should certainly say nothing more on the subject for the present. I then asked him if he was disposed to examine the ratification of the treaty respecting boundaries, which I had also mentioned to him in our former interview. He said he had not time, but would be glad to know in what manner it had been ratified. I replied, with the exception of the fifth article. He censured, in strong terms, the practice into which we had fallen of ratifying treaties, with exceptions to parts of them, a practice which he termed new, unauthorized, and not to be sanctioned. I replied, that this was not the first example of the kind; that he must recollect one had been given in a transaction between our respective nations in their treaty of 1794; that in that case a proposition for a modification in that mode was well received, and agreed to; that to make such a proposition was a proof of an existing friendship, and a desire to preserve it; that a treaty was not obligatory till it was ratified, and, in fact, was not one till then. He said the doctrine was not so clear as I had stated it to be; that there were other opinions on it, and seemed to imply, though he did not state it, that an omission to ratify did an injury to the other party of a very serious kind. He asked me why the fifth article had been excepted from the ratification? I replied, that a doubt had arisen whether the ratification of it might not lay the foundation for disputes hereafter, from a cause which had no connexion with this transaction. This treaty was signed on the 12th of May, 1803: the late treaty with France, which obtained the cession of Louisiana, bore date on the 30th of April preceding. At the time this treaty was formed, neither our minister nor his had any knowledge of that with France; that the cession of Louisiana was not in the contemplation of either Government or its agent when their instructions were given or acted on, and, in consequence, the rights acquired under it ought not and would not be affected by this treaty. He observed, with some degree of severity in the manner, in substance, as well as I recollect, that, having discovered since this treaty was formed that you had ceded territory which you do not wish to part with, you are not disposed to ratify that article. I replied, that he had misconceived my idea; that we did not admit that the treaty would have any such effect, since it could not operate upon an interest which did not exist when it was made; that we were, however, anxious to prevent any misunderstanding on the subject by previous explanation and arrangement; that, by postponing the subject for the present, the door was left open for amicable negotiation and adjustment, which we wished; that, at present, we were treating upon a subject too remote from our settlements to be well understood, or, in point of interest, pressing; that, by the delay, there was no privation of right; and the amicable disposition which now subsisted between the two nations remaining, the affair could not otherwise than be adjusted hereafter to their mutual satisfaction. He repeated again the idea which he first expressed, implying strongly that we seemed desirous of getting rid of an article on finding that it did not suit us. I could not but feel the injustice of the insinuation, which was made much stronger by the manner which accompanied it; nevertheless, I only added that he ought not to expect to derive an advantage from a treaty, the conditions of which were not known to his or our Government when this treaty was made, in an interest in which we alone had paid the whole consideration. I offered to leave the ratification with him, but he declined taking it, observing that it was useless, as he could not act upon the subject at present.

The conduct of Lord Harrowby through the whole of this conference was calculated to wound and to irritate. Not a friendly sentiment towards the United States or their Government escaped him. In proposing a postponement of the interests in which we were a party, he did not seem to desire my sanction, but to assume a tone which supposed his will had settled the point. By his manner he put it out of my power, in assenting to the delay, to mingle with it any expressions declaratory of the pleasure with which I acceded to an arrangement which accommodated his Government or himself. Such expressions can never be used with propriety, except where they are voluntary, and acknowledged to be founded in generous motives. But no sentiment of that kind seemed to animate him on this occasion. Every thing that he said was uttered in an unfriendly tone, and much more was apparently meant than was said. I was surprised at a deportment of which I had seen no example before since I came into the country, and which was certainly provoked by no act of mine; yet I am persuaded it did not produce an improper effect on my conduct. I did not reciprocate the irritation by any thing that escaped me. I am equally well persuaded that I made no improper concession, and let it be clearly seen that I felt that I represented a respectable and independent nation, whose Government could not be intimidated, or compelled to lose sight of its dignity by an abandonment of its just claims in its transactions with any other.

I now consider these concerns as postponed indefinitely. I do not foresee at what time it will be proper for me to revive the subject. Much is said of the probability of a coalition between Great Britain and the Northern Powers, and the frequent cabinet consultations, at which the ministers of Russia and Sweden assist, give countenance to the report. If that should be the case, it is probable that the policy and tone of this Government towards neutral Powers may be less friendly or accommodating. The new minister may seek to distinguish his career from that of his predecessor by measures which may be deemed more enterprising. His system in the last war, so far as it affected us, was marked by an extraordinary harassment of neutral commerce; by the blockade of France, the islands, &c. Our unexampled prosperity and rapid rise, it is well known, excite their jealousy and alarm their apprehensions. It may be painful for them to look on and see the comforts and blessings which we enjoy, in contrast with the sufferings to which, by the calamities of war, they are doomed. Whether the conduct of Lord Harrowby was produced by any change of policy towards us, or by any other cause, transient or otherwise, it is utterly out of my power to ascertain at present. My most earnest advice, however, is to look to the possibility of such a change. The best security against it will be found in the firmness of our councils, and the ability to resent and punish injuries. It is said, on what authority I know not, that Mr. Merry will be recalled, and some person of the first distinction sent in his stead. If this is the case, although the exterior may be otherwise, yet it ought not to be considered as a measure adopted with a view to harmony, or from motives of respect to our Government, since, if such were the objects, the tone which I have above communicated would not have been assumed by Lord Harrowby, nor should I be among the last to hear of it. These remarks I have deemed it my duty to make, from the circumstances on which they are founded. Being sincerely anxious for peace, from a knowledge—such is the happy condition of our country—that much expense and injury must result from war, while it is impossible for us to derive any advantage from it, you may rest satisfied that I shall cherish our present amicable relations by all the fair and honorable means in my power; that I shall also be observant of events, and not fail to communicate to you with the greatest despatch possible whatever occurs, which may be deemed worthy your attention.

I am, sir, with great respect and esteem, your obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

LONDON, August 7, 1804.

SIR:

I received a note from Lord Harrowby on the 3d instant, requesting me to call on him at his office the next day, which I did. His lordship asked me in what light was our treaty viewed by our Government. I replied that it had been ratified, with the exception of the fifth article, as I had informed him on a former occasion. He observed that he meant the treaty of 1794, which, by one of its stipulations, was to expire two years after the signature of preliminary articles for concluding the then existing war between Great Britain and France. He wished to know whether we considered the treaty as actually expired. I said that I did presume there could be but one opinion on that point, in respect to the commercial part of the treaty, which was, that it had expired; that the first ten articles were made permanent; that other articles had been executed, but that these, being limited to a definite period, which had passed, must be considered as expiring with it. He said it seemed to him doubtful whether the stipulation of the treaty had been satisfied by what had occurred since the peace; that a fair construction of it might possibly require an interval of two years' peace after the war, which had not taken place in point of form, much less so in fact, for the state of things which existed between the countries through that period was far from being a peaceable one. I informed his lordship that the distinction had never occurred to us, though certainly it would receive from our Government all the consideration which it merited, especially if it was relied on, on his part. After some further conversation, he seemed to admit that the construction he had suggested of the stipulation referred to was rather a forced one; that, by the more obvious import of the article, the commercial part of the treaty must be considered as having expired. What, then, said he, is the subsisting relation between the two countries? Are we in the state we were at the close of the American war? By what rule is our intercourse to be governed respecting tonnage, imposts, and the like? I said that the law in each country, as I presumed, regulated these points. He replied that the subject was, nevertheless, under some embarrassment here. He asked how far it would be agreeable to our Government to stipulate that the treaty of 1794 should remain in force until two years should expire after the conclusion of the present war? I told his lordship that I had no power to agree to such a proposal; that the President, animated by a sincere desire to cherish and perpetuate the friendly relations subsisting between the two countries, had been disposed to postpone the regulation of their general commercial system till the period should arrive when each party, enjoying the blessings of peace, might find itself at liberty to pay the subject the attention it merited; that he wished those regulations to be founded in the permanent interests, justly and liberally viewed, of both countries; that he sought for the present only to remove certain topics which produced irritation in the intercourse, such as the impressment of seamen, and in our commerce with other Powers, parties to the present war, according to a project which I had had the honor to present his predecessor some months since, with which I presumed his lordship was acquainted. He seemed desirous to decline any conversation on this latter subject, though it was clearly to be inferred, from what he said, to be his opinion that the policy which our Government seemed disposed to pursue, in respect to the general system, could not otherwise than be agreeable to his. He then added, that his Government might probably, for the present, adopt the treaty of 1794 as the rule in its own concerns, or in respect to duties on importations from our country, and, as I understood him, all other subjects to which it extended; in which case, he said, if the treaty had expired, the ministry would take the responsibility on itself, as there would be no law to sanction the measure; that, in so doing, he presumed that the measure would be well received by our Government, and a similar practice in what concerned Great Britain reciprocated. I observed that, on that particular topic, I had no authority to say any thing specially, the proposal being altogether new and unexpected; that I should communicate it to you, and that I doubted not it would be considered by the President with the attention it merited. Not wishing, however, to authorize an inference that that treaty should ever form a basis of a future one between the two countries, I repeated some remarks which I had made to Lord Hawkesbury in the interview which we had just before he left the department of foreign affairs, by observing, that, in forming a new treaty, we must begin de novo; that America was a young and thriving country; that, at the time that treaty was formed, she had had little experience of her relations with foreign Powers; that ten years had since elapsed, a great portion of the term within which she had held the rank of a separate and independent nation, and exercised the powers belonging to it; that our interests were better understood on both sides at this time than they then were; that the treaty was known to contain things that neither liked; that I spoke with confidence on that point on our part; that, in making a new treaty, we might engraft from that into it what suited us, omit what we disliked, and add what the experience of our respective interests might suggest to be proper. And being equally anxious to preclude the inference of any sanction to the maritime pretensions of Great Britain under that treaty, in respect to neutral commerce, I deemed it proper to advert again to the project which I had presented some time since for the regulation of those points, to notice its contents, and express an earnest wish that his lordship would find leisure, and be disposed to act on it. He excused himself again from entering into this subject, from the weight and urgency of other business, the difficulty of the subject, and other general remarks of the kind. I told him that the most urgent part of the subject was that which respected our seamen; that our Government wished to adopt a remedy which would be commensurate with the evils complained of by both countries: his Government complained that deserters from their ships in America were not restored to them; ours, that our seamen were impressed in their ports, (those of Great Britain,) and on the high seas, in our vessels, and sometimes in our bays and rivers; that such injuries ought to be put an end to; and that we were willing to adopt a fair and efficacious remedy for the purpose. He said he was afraid, however well disposed our Government might be to give the aid of the civil authority to restore deserters to their vessels in the United States, that little advantage could be derived from such a stipulation. The bias and spirit of the people would be against it, with us, as it was here, under favor of which deserters would always find means to elude the most active search of the most vigilant peace officers. I replied that I did not think the difficulty would be found so great as he supposed; that our people were very obedient to the law in all cases; that, as soon as the apprehension and restoration of deserting seamen to their vessels was made a law, (as it would be, by becoming the stipulation of a treaty,) the public feeling on that point would change, especially when it was considered as the price of a stipulation which secured from impressment their fellow-citizens who might be at sea or in a foreign country; that sailors never retired far into the interior, or remained where they went long, but soon returned to the seaport towns to embark again in the sea service; that it was not likely they would be able to elude the search of the magistracy, supported, as it would be, by the Government itself. I found, on the whole, that his lordship did not wish to encourage the expectation that we should agree in any arrangement on this head, though he was equally cautious not to preclude it. I left him without asking another interview, and the affair, of course, open to further communication.

Mr. Pinkney has fortunately obtained an adjustment of the interest of Maryland in some stock in the Bank of England, by a transfer to him, as agent of the State, of the amount, by the Crown. The Government itself appeared well disposed to the object, but it and the Court of Chancery were so beset by a number of persons having claims on the State after the interest vested in the Crown, that it was very difficult to bring it to a happy conclusion. To quiet the claimants, and enable the Government to act in it with satisfaction to itself, required a spirit of accommodation, perseverance, and ability in the management of the trust, without which it could not have been effected. The terms on which the affair is concluded have appeared to me to be as advantageous to the State as it was possible to obtain. To approve them was the only duty left for me to perform, as the able and laborious attention which Mr. Pinkney paid to the subject rendered it altogether unnecessary for me to take any other part in it. After the expiration of Mr. Pinkney's office as commissioner under the treaty of 1794 with Great Britain, he ceased to have a right to draw his salary in that character: as, however, his continuance here, under the authority of the President, on the other duty, which was indispensable, exposed him to at least equal expense, I thought it proper to request our bankers to advance him five hundred pounds on that head, to be accounted for with you. This sum is rather more than his compensation as a commissioner would have been for an equal term; but as it was necessary to enable him to pursue the object and facilitate his return home, I flatter myself the President will approve the measure. The advance being made on my responsibility, under the circumstances of the case, can, of course, have no influence on the vote of compensation to be allowed him for the service, or in designating the party which ought to make it.

Mr. Lear having obtained a commutation of the tribute which was to have been paid to the Government of Algiers in naval stores into money, and drawn for the amount on our consul at Leghorn, who forwarded bills for the same on our Government to the house of Mr. Hengist Glennie here for sale, and it appearing that they could not be negotiated without considerable loss, I concurred with Mr. Erving in opinion that he had better save the public from so great an injury, by taking them up with some public moneys which he had in his hands. He has done so, as he most probably has already informed you. The money which the commissioners under the British treaty directed, by form, to be returned to me, was paid by my order into the hands of our bankers, by the clerk who brought the order of the commissioners to me.

I propose, in a week or ten days, to ask another interview of Lord Harrowby on the topics depending between our two Governments. By what has passed, you will infer that I have at present but little hope of bringing them to a conclusion. The practice of this Government is, however, on the whole, very favorable to us; our commerce enjoys a protection, which is a proof of the increasing respectability of our Government and country. None of our vessels that I know of have been condemned, but few are brought in under any pretext, and, in one case, compensation has been made for the detention. I hope to be able, after the proposed interview with Lord Harrowby, to fix the time when I shall set out for Spain.

I am, with great respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

LONDON, September 8, 1804.

SIR:

I obtained an interview with Lord Harrowby on the 1st instant, which I had asked, to ascertain the sentiments and disposition of his Government on the subjects which I had long before submitted to it. The conference was free and full on every point, in which I urged every thing which I could draw from the lights in my possession, to induce his Government to adopt the convention which I had proposed in the spirit of my instructions, for the suppression of impressments, &c., and to ratify that respecting our boundaries, with the exception of the fifth article, as the President had done. His lordship heard me with attention and apparent candor; he stated difficulties and received explanations, and finally promised to submit the subject to the cabinet, and give me as early an answer as he could. In examining that part of the project which respects impressments, he expressed some regret that the affair had been taken up with such earnestness in the Congress. I told him that business was conducted there differently from what it was here: that here the ministry in both Houses proposed and carried public measures; but that with us the members of the administration were excluded from the Legislature; that the branches were completely separate and distinct from each other; that although they were a check each on the other, yet that neither was responsible for the acts of the other: that the passage of a bill by both Houses was no evidence of the sense of the Executive on the subject of it until it had its sanction; that, in the present case, the motions which had been made in Congress were only to be considered as a proof of the great sensibility of the nation to the object of them; that the practice of impressing our men, which had been carried to great excess, was a cause of continued and high irritation throughout the Union; that it was very much to be wished that that cause could be removed by satisfactory arrangement between the Governments, which was deemed practicable, and which our Government with great earnestness and sincerity sought, as was shown by the propositions which I had made by its order; that the President certainly preferred a security of our rights by such an arrangement, as the Congress likewise did, as was seen by the failure of the motions alluded to, though made by members of great respectability, and strongly supported by the public feeling. He said much as to the extent of the propositions being of a nature quite hostile; of the time at which they were made being anterior to any proposal to negotiate; though in this idea he seemed to correct himself, as he was aware that Mr. King had endeavored to arrange the affair before his departure, and that I had expressed a similar desire soon after my arrival here. He spoke much of the difficulty attending my arrangement from the similitude of the people; of the great numbers of their seamen which it was known we had in our service. I replied that the arrangement was not proposed to be permanent, but for a short term, and experimental; that it looked to the evils complained of on his side as well as ours, and sought to remedy them; that it was believed the remedy it proposed would be effectual; but if the experiment should throw any light on the subject, so as to enable our Governments hereafter to arrange it better, much would be done. He declined giving any opinion on the articles in the project which respected this interest, though I inferred by his stating no objection to them that he did not deem them unreasonable. In speaking of those articles which defined in certain cases neutral rights, he observed that they only touched the subject in part; that if our Government adopted the proposition which he had made lately, of considering the treaty of 1794 in force until two years after the expiration of the present war, the whole subject would be provided for. I replied, that in touching the subject in the points to which the articles extended, and in those only our Government sought to put out of the way for the present, and during the war, all temporary or transient causes of irritation which might tend to the injury or to disturb the harmony of the two nations; that in seeking a postponement of a general arrangement of our commerce till peace, it was supposed that his Government would be accommodated by it, which consideration had had much weight with the President, since, as he wished all future arrangements of that kind to be founded in the mutual and permanent interests of both countries, so he was satisfied that those interests could at no time be so well examined or understood as when both parties, being happy in the enjoyment of peace, might have leisure to pay them the attention they merited; that the articles proposed did not stipulate any thing which his Government had not sanctioned by its treaties with other Powers, as well as by its present practice. He observed, however, that they omitted other objects which were included in those treaties, and which his Government deemed very important to its welfare; that these points had been paid for by the Powers to whom the concession had been made by stipulations which secured the interests which the project I had presented had omitted. In this remark he alluded more especially to the doctrine of the "ship's giving protection to the goods," which he called modern and theoretical, and to Russia as furnishing an example of the kind he stated. I told him that our Government was not disposed to give his trouble on that point, though it could have no motive to enter into any stipulation respecting it; that its whole conduct during the war had been friendly and conciliating; that he had not heard of any measures taken with the neutral Powers which ought to excite a jealousy of our views, or create a suspicion that the President was disposed to embarrass them in such cases; on the contrary, that I could assure him, if the objects to which the articles in the project extended were secured, that none others would be thought of. We then proceeded to examine the convention respecting the boundaries in the light in which the ratification by the President presented it. On that subject also I omitted nothing which the documents in my possession enabled me to say; in aid of which I thought it advisable, a few days afterwards, to send to his lordship a note explanatory of the motives which induced the President and Senate to decline ratifying the fifth article. As the affair had become by that circumstance in some degree a delicate one; and as it was in its nature intricate, I thought it improper to let the explanation which I had given rest on the memory of a single individual. By committing it to paper, it might be better understood by Lord Harrowby and by the cabinet, to whom he will doubtless submit it. As I send you a copy of that paper, it is useless to detail the substance of what passed between us on the subject of it. I sent him at the same time an abstract of the impressions, which Mr. Erving had furnished me, which had taken place since my communication to Lord Hawkesbury. As Mr. Erving gives you regular and correct information on that head, I do not annex it to this communication.

Before I left Lord Harrowby I informed him that, independent of the interesting nature of the subject of our conference, on which I should be happy to be enabled to communicate something that would be satisfactory to our Government, I had another motive for wishing an early answer from him respecting it; that I had lately received instructions from you to repair to Madrid in the character of envoy extraordinary, to join Mr. Pinkney in the adjustment of some points which grew out of the cession of Louisiana by France to the United States. He asked me if these did not respect our boundaries; to which I replied in the affirmative. We had some conversation on that point, in which I communicated a general idea of the ground on which our Government had concluded that West Florida was comprised in the cession. He seemed to have entertained a different one, but to hear with attention and candor the statement which I gave of the question. I told him that my absence would be short; that I should leave Mr. Purviance, the secretary of the legation, in the charge of our affairs in my absence, with which he seemed to be well satisfied, and assured me that an accommodation with the views of the President in the proposed mission would be a motive for giving me an early answer to the subjects depending here; by which, however, I understood only that he would endeavor as much as he could to prevent their proving a cause of my detention. I thought it proper at that time to communicate the fact of my mission to Spain, and of my desire to set out soon in discharge of it, that he and his Government might clearly see that it was a measure ordered by the President, and had relation to the concerns of the United States only. I told him that the President had taken this measure from motives of friendship for Spain, with whom the United States were desirous and expected to preserve that relation forever. I made this remark to preclude the possibility of any improper use being made of what had been said, on the presumption (which might inspire a disposition to make such use of it) that a disagreement between the United States and Spain, much less a rupture, could result from the negotiation, whereby a hope might be fostered by this Government that we should become a party to the present war on its side. If circumstances permitted, it would be agreeable to me, as in that case I should presume on the approbation of the President, to intimate the willingness of our Government to receive, in the proposed negotiation, the good offices of friendly Powers. Such intimation would make it less likely to view with jealousy the aid we may receive, should that be the case, from France. In making the suggestion, I should observe, that I did it from the knowledge I had of the pleasure with which the President would avail himself of opportunities to render good offices to the Powers with whom the United States were in amity. If our business here is closed satisfactorily, I should think myself at liberty to give such an intimation.

While we were conferring on these subjects generally, Lord Harrowby noticed the conduct of Captain Bradley, of the Cambrian, which he said his Government had disapproved and censured by his removal from the command, and ordering him home to account for it. He said that as this step had been taken before any complaint had been received from our Government, it could not be viewed otherwise than as a strong proof of the desire of His Majesty to cultivate the friendship of the United States; to which I readily assented.

Of the prospect of success in the points depending here, it is impossible for me to give any satisfactory opinion. The business has, however, now reached a stage to promise an early conclusion. Still it is of too much importance for me to precipitate it. I shall wait some days longer in patience before I call for an answer, as I deem it important, be the event what it may, to conclude the negotiation so far as respects my department, in a manner equally respectful to the Government as that in which it commenced.

You will receive within a copy of the project as I presented it to Lord Hawkesbury. You will find that I have omitted in it the fourth, fifth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth articles of that which you sent me. I omitted the fourth because it brought into view the question of contraband, and exposed us to the revival of the claim of this Government respecting provisions, which I saw, by what had taken place with Sweden, was likely to be insisted on; the fifth, because the present practice of the court conforms with it; the ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth because, being intended as accommodations to them, it would be in time to introduce them when asked for, when it would be more seasonable to seek some equivalent in return; though, indeed, it is not likely that they care much about them, especially at this moment. I was the more confirmed in the idea of omitting the fourth article, from a knowledge that the abandonment by treaty of the principle that free ships make free goods, would produce an ill effect with France. I had this information from authority the most direct, that is, that she would be likely to consider it, being in war, an unfriendly act. By presenting it in the form it bears, to which I was prompted by information recently obtained, and which could not have reached you, I hoped to secure the great objects which you had in view without hazarding any inconvenience whatever. It was also material to know that no case had then occurred (nor indeed has there since) in which the Admiralty have denied the right to our citizens to acquire merchandise, the growth of an enemy's country, and transport it as their own. There was, of course, no motive for securing it, especially at any expense.

I am, with great respect and esteem, your most obedient and very humble servant,
JAMES MONROE.

P. S. I find that there is a case of the kind adverted to above now depending before the Admiralty. The vessel, the Missouri, touched here on its way from Batavia, as is supposed to Holland. I think it best to take this up on its own merits, unconnected with the principle adverted to, for the reasons above mentioned, which I trust will be approved by the President.

Paper respecting the boundary of the United States, delivered to Lord Harrowby, September 5, 1804.

By the tenth article of the treaty of Utrecht, it is agreed "that France shall restore to Great Britain the bay and straits of Hudson, together with all lands, seas, seacoasts, rivers, and places situate in the said bay and straits which belong thereunto," &c.

It is also agreed, "that commissaries shall be forthwith appointed by each Power to determine, within a year, the limits between the said bay of Hudson and the places appertaining to the French; and also to describe and settle, in like manner, the boundaries between the other British and French colonies in those parts."

Commissaries were accordingly appointed by each Power, who executed the stipulations of the treaty in establishing the boundaries proposed by it. They fixed the northern boundary of Canada and Louisiana by a line beginning on the Atlantic, at a cape or promontory in $58^{\circ} 30''$ north latitude; thence, southwestwardly, to the lake Mistasin; thence, further southwest, to the latitude 49° north from the equator, and along that line indefinitely.

At the time this treaty was formed France possessed Canada and Louisiana, which she connected by a chain of forts extended from the mouth of the Mississippi, on all its waters, and on the lakes along the St. Lawrence to Montreal. Her encroachments eastward on the territory of the present United States, then British provinces, extended to the foot of the Alleghany mountain. It is well known that, on the Ohio, at a point formed by the confluence of the Alleghany and Monongahela branches, below which the stream takes the name of Ohio, that the French had built a fort which was called Duquesne; a fort which has been better known since by the name of Pittsburg. The adjustment of the boundary of the territory between the two Powers in this quarter, was the result of another war, and another treaty.

By the fourth article of the treaty of 1763, France ceded to Great Britain Canada, Nova Scotia, &c. in the north; and, by the seventh article, the bay and port of Mobile, and all the territory which she possessed to the left of the Mississippi, except the town and island of New Orleans.

By the seventh article it was also stipulated, that a line to be drawn along the middle of the Mississippi, from its source to the river Iberville, and thence along the middle of that river, and the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, to the sea, should be the boundary between the British territory to the eastward, and Louisiana to the west. At that time it was understood, as it has been ever since, till very lately, that the Mississippi took its source in some mountain at least as high north as the forty-ninth degree of north latitude.

By the treaty of 1783, between the United States and Great Britain, the boundary between these States, and Nova Scotia and Canada, is fixed by a line which is to run along the St. Croix and highlands, bounding the southern waters of the St. Lawrence, the forty-fifth degree of latitude to the water communication between the lakes, and along that communication to the Lake of the Woods, and through that lake to the northwestern point thereof; thence, a due west course, to the Mississippi. The line follows afterwards the course of the Mississippi to the thirty-first degree of north latitude.

By Mitchell's map, by which the treaty of 1783 was formed, it was evident that the northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods was at least as high north as the latitude 49° . By the observations of Mr. Thompson, astronomer to the Northwestern Company, it appears to be in latitude $49^{\circ} 37''$. By joining, then, the western boundary of Canada to its northern in the Lake of the Woods, and closing both there, it follows that it was the obvious intention of the ministers who negotiated the treaty, and of their respective Governments, that the United States should possess all the territory lying between the lakes and the Mississippi, south of the parallel of the forty-ninth degree of north latitude. This is confirmed by the courses which are afterwards pursued by the treaty, since they are precisely those which had been established between Great Britain and France in former treaties. By running due west from the northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods to the Mississippi, it must have been intended, according to the lights before them, to take the parallel of the forty-ninth degree of latitude as established under the treaty of Utrecht; and by pursuing thence the course of the Mississippi to the thirty-first degree of latitude, the whole extent of the western boundary of the United States, the boundary which had been established by the treaty of 1763 was actually adopted. This conclusion is further supported by the liberal spirit which terminated the war of our revolution; it having been manifestly the intention of the parties to heal, as far as could be done, the wounds which it had inflicted. Nor is it essentially weakened by the circumstance, that the Mississippi is called for by the western course from the Lake of the Woods, or that its navigation is stipulated in favor of both Powers. Westward of the Mississippi, to the south of the forty-ninth degree of north latitude, Great Britain held then no territory; that river was her western boundary. In running west, and ceding the territory to the river, it was impossible not to call for it; and, on the supposition that it took its source within the limits of the Hudson Bay Company, it was natural that it should stipulate the free navigation of the river; but, in so doing, it is presumed that her Government respected more a delicate sense of what it might be supposed to owe to the interest of that company, than any strong motive of policy, founded on the interests of Canada or its other possessions in that quarter. As Great Britain ceded at the same time the Floridas to Spain, the navigation of the Mississippi by her subjects, if it took place, being under a foreign jurisdiction, could not fail to draw from her own territories the resources which properly belonged to them, and therefore could not be viewed in the light of a national advantage. After the treaty of 1783, and at the time the convention in contemplation was entered into, the state of things was as is above stated. The territory which Great Britain held westward of the Lake of the Woods, was bounded south by the forty-ninth degree of north latitude; that which lay between the Lake of the Woods and the Mississippi, southward of that parallel, belonged to the United States; and that which lay to the west of the Mississippi, to Spain. It being, however, understood, by more recent discoveries or observations, that the source of the Mississippi did not extend so high north as had been supposed, and Great Britain having shown a desire to have the boundary of the United States modified in such manner as to strike that river, an article to that effect was inserted in the late convention; but, in so doing, it was not the intention of the American minister, or of the British minister, to do more than simply to define the American boundary. It was not contemplated by either of them, that America should convey to Great Britain any right to the territory lying westward of that line, since not a foot of it belonged to her; it was intended to leave it to Great Britain to settle the point as to such territory, or such portion of it as she might want, with Spain, or rather with France, to whom it then belonged. At this period, however, certain measures respecting the Mississippi, and movements in that quarter, took place, which seemed to menace the great interests of America that were dependent on that river. These excited a sensibility, acute and universal, of which, in equal degree, her history furnishes but few examples. They led to a discussion which terminated in a treaty with France, by which that Power ceded to the United States the whole of Louisiana, as she had received it of Spain. This treaty took place on the 30th of April, 1803, twelve days only before the convention between Great Britain and the United States was signed, and some days before the adoption of such a treaty was known to the plenipotentiaries who negotiated and signed the convention.

Under such circumstances, it is impossible that any right which the United States derived under that treaty could be conveyed by this convention to Great Britain, or that the ministers who formed the convention could have contemplated such an effect by it. Thus the stipulation which is contained in the fifth article of the convention has become, by the cession made by the treaty, perfectly nugatory; for, as Great Britain holds no territory southward of the forty-ninth degree of north latitude, and the United States the whole of it, the line proposed by that article would run through a country which now belongs exclusively to the latter.

No. 30.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, October 3, 1804.

SIR:

Some days after Lord Harrowby returned from Weymouth, I received from him a note of the 26th, expressing his regret that he had been so engaged since his return, that he had not been able to see me, and that he could not even then fix a time for the purpose. This note concluded with an invitation to dinner on the 29th at his house in the country. On an attentive consideration of the note, and all preceding circumstances, I was of opinion that his object by it was either to give me to understand, in a conciliating manner, that he could not conclude with me at present the business in which we were engaged, and wished it postponed, or that he sought an opportunity of conferring with me in retirement more freely on the subject of it than he could do at his office. In either view, I thought it incumbent on me to accept the invitation. I had, however, some doubt as to the mode; I hesitated at first whether I ought to meet him in an expression of regret at the delay to which I was subjected, but I could not well connect such a sentiment with an acceptance of the invitation; and there was the less reason so to do, as that was to take effect so soon; I therefore thought it best to let his measure have its course, to see the result of it, and then adopt such a one as might appear most advisable at the time. With this view, I confined my reply altogether to the invitation, which I accepted. The dinner party was small, yet so composed as evidently to preclude the idea of an interesting political conversation with me having been intended by it. Not a word was said on the subject; so that I returned with that material fact only added to the data on which I had to deliberate. In deciding the part it now became me to take, I saw distinctly that the motive first above mentioned had dictated the note to me of the 26th; that Lord Harrowby actually wished me to infer from it, that he could not now proceed in the business in which we were engaged, with the hope of an early conclusion of it, and was also desirous that the intimation should not affect the friendly relations subsisting between the two Powers. I resolved at once not to press the affair further at this time, from a belief that such pressure, instead of promoting the object desired, was more likely to increase the indisposition of this Government to any arrangement by treaty, as it seemed to lead directly from the safe ground on which I stood, to a vexatious and irritating controversy. I resolved also to hasten my departure for Spain, with as much despatch as the explanations incident to such a measure, under existing circumstances, would permit. There seemed, however, to be some considerable degree of delicacy and importance attached to the manner in which this decision should be communicated to his lordship. Two modes occurred, essentially different in character. The first supposed the negotiation at an end; the second as suspended only. To the first were opposed several strong objections, which were counterbalanced by no single advantage that could reasonably be hoped from it. 1st. A declaration by me to Lord Harrowby, that I considered the negotiation at an end, thereby implying that it had failed in its object, might appear to form a species of rupture between the two countries, especially when taken in connexion with my immediate departure from this, with intention to pass through France. 2d. A measure of such tone was not invited by, nor did it necessarily result from, his lordship's note of the 26th, which sought only delay, and in a conciliating manner. The circumstances of the country might induce him to expect an accommodation in that respect from a friendly Power; and to fail in giving it, create a deep impression of resentment in the mind of the ministry, and perhaps of the nation, against our Government and country. 3d. Such a measure, with the implication incident to it, was not justified by fact, or the true interest of the United States. The negotiation had not failed in its great objects, our commerce was never so much favored in time of war, nor was there ever less cause of complaint furnished by impressment. The state of Europe is unsettled; the events of war are uncertain; the United States are prosperous beyond the example of any other nation, and more might be lost at home and abroad by an appearance of hostility with any Power than could be expected from a formal concession of the points contended for. 4th. Such a declaration would also be contrary to the spirit in which the negotiation had been commenced, and carried to the present stage. It would lose the credit which our moderation had merited; expose to hazard fortunes that were secure; and even with less hope of advantage, in any view, than might be entertained from a continuance of the same system of moderation. 5th. My instructions did not authorize a measure so hazardous; they seemed to require only that I should make a fair experiment of the disposition of this Government, to arrange these points amicably, and submit the result to the wisdom of our Government, to act afterwards, on a view of all circumstances, as it might deem most advisable, unfettered by any commitment of mine. 6th. By keeping the negotiation open, it was in our power to renew it at pleasure; and it was probable, by preserving our neutrality, and profiting of the credit attached to it, that our attitude in it would every day become more imposing. Under these considerations, I resolved to pursue the latter course; to meet the friendly sentiments expressed in Lord Harrowby's letter of the 26th, with a like one on our part; to regret the delay, but to admit that the state of things might impose it on him; to state the necessity of my departure for Spain, but to declare the pleasure with which I should return to resume the negotiation. His lordship's reply, which is also enclosed, breathed the same sentiments; so that the affair rests precisely on that ground. The negotiation is suspended by mutual consent, to be revived on my return from Spain, or whenever the President shall otherwise provide for the same.

I took occasion, in my letter to Lord Harrowby, to state the route I should pursue to Madrid, through Holland and France, to scout the degrading suspicions which too often attach to such movements in such times—suspicions which are generally created by the artifices which are used to hide the movements, since they are considered, and perhaps properly, as proofs of guilt.

I thought proper to notify to Lord Harrowby, at the same time, that Mr. Purviance would be left in charge of our affairs here, and that I should be happy in having an opportunity to present him to his lordship in that character; which was arranged and done on the following day. I have committed this trust to Mr. Purviance, in full confidence that he will discharge it with perfect integrity, and a diligence and capacity to merit the approbation of the President. His compensation, which has proved totally inadequate to his station as secretary, becomes, of course, much more so to his present one, which will unavoidably expose him to many heavy additional expenses. I have taken the liberty to instruct our bankers to advance him the sum of one thousand dollars, which is necessary for his immediate accommodation, and trust that the President will make him such an allowance as may be suitable to his situation.

In the interview which I had with Lord Harrowby, we had much general conversation on the topics depending between us, which, as it corresponded with what has passed before, and communicated to you, it is unnecessary to repeat. He appeared to agree with me, with great sincerity, in the advantage to be derived to both countries from the preservation of their present amicable relations, and to be quite satisfied with the state in which the negotiation was left, assuring me that he would not fail to take it up on my return, with an earnest desire to conclude it to the satisfaction of both parties, though he intimated that there was great difficulty attending certain branches of it. He suggested that, as I was forced to go to Spain, he hoped that the suspension would prove equally convenient to us both; to which I assented. He thought it unnecessary for me to go to Weymouth to take leave of the King, as he kept no regular court there, and my absence would be short. He promised, however, to communicate to His Majesty my request to be presented to him there, as of his undertaking to prevent it; with which view, he desired me to address him a special note to that effect, to be submitted to the King; a copy of which is enclosed.

In the course of this conversation, Lord Harrowby expressed concern to find the United States opposed to Great Britain on certain great neutral questions in favor of the doctrines of the modern law, which he termed novelties. I replied that, in adhering to our principles, the President had endeavored to arrange them in a friendly manner with his Government; that he had taken no step of an opposite character; that he had sought no concert with the neutral Powers in support of them, as he had supposed that a satisfactory arrangement to both Governments might be made by direct communication between them, which he preferred. He observed, that although while the negotiation was suspended his Government would adhere to its principles, yet that it would act in what concerned us with moderation in the practice of them.

I informed you, in my letter of the 8th of September, that a case had occurred of an American vessel, engaged in commerce between Batavia and Holland, as was inferred by her having a European destination, being brought into port and subjected to trial. The case is not yet decided, though, in his remarks, while the cause was in hearing before the court, the judge maintained the British doctrine; it was postponed, to give time to ascertain what the regulations of the Government of Holland were, in peace, respecting our commerce with that colony. He did not say if they prohibited the trade, that he would condemn the vessel. It is probable she may be acquitted on some other point in the cause, without impugning that principle. It is understood that several other vessels engaged in the same trade, which were stopped and examined at the Texel by the British cruisers, were permitted to prosecute their voyage; hence, it is presumable that orders were given to that effect by the Government. It is certain that, on no principle or pretext whatever, has more than one of our vessels been condemned, on which judgment there is an appeal.

The whole subject is now before the President; on which I have to remark, that, in discharging this trust, I have endeavored, in every stage, to give full effect to the feelings and sentiments of my country in respect to the objects in question, especially the unwarrantable practice of impressment, without taking any step which should compromise our Government in the part it should take when the result was submitted to it. In that state the affair now is: for, after the expiration of a few months, it is perfectly consistent with it to revive the negotiation in such form as the President may deem advisable. The proceeding here lays a foundation for any course which the public honor and interest may dictate. If it is deemed expedient, in pursuing our just rights, to profit of time and circumstances, and, in the interim, unless they be secured by a fair and equal treaty, to act with moderation till the occasion invites to a more decisive and hazardous policy, the state of things permits it; or, if it should be deemed more advisable to adopt the latter course at present, the opportunity is fair for such a measure. The situation in which our Government will find itself on receiving this communication is a very different one from that in which I have stood throughout. If the latter course is preferred, it cannot be doubted that the moderation which has been so far observed will strengthen the Government in any the most vigorous measures which may be thought necessary. A virtuous and free people will be more united in support of such measures, however strong they may be, when they see, by the clearest evidence, that the cause is not only just, but that their Government has done every thing in its power which the national honor and interest would permit, to avoid such an extremity.

I shall apprise our consuls that Mr. Purviance is left in charge of our affairs during my absence; and have only to add that I expect to sail to-morrow or next day, in a vessel bound to Rotterdam, (my baggage being already on board,) on my way to Madrid, whither I shall proceed with all the despatch that may be practicable.

I am, sir, with great respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

Extract.—Mr. Madison to Mr. Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 6, 1805.

SIR:

The experience of every day shows more and more the obligation on both sides to enter seriously on the means of guarding the harmony of the two countries against the dangers with which it is threatened, by a perseverance of Great Britain in her irregularities on the high seas, and particularly in the impressments from American vessels. The extent in which these have taken place since the commencement of the war will be seen by the enclosed report, required from this Department by a vote of the House of Representatives; and the call for it, whilst negotiations on the subject were understood to be in train, is itself a proof of the public sensibility to those aggressions on the security of our citizens and the rights of our flag. A further proof will be seen in the motion, also enclosed, which was made by Mr. Crowninshield, and which will probably be revived at the next session. This motion, with his remarks upon it, appear very generally in the newspapers, with comments proceeding from a coincidence of the sensibility out of doors with that within. A still stronger proof of impatience under this evil will be found in the proceedings authorized by an act of Congress just passed, and which is likewise enclosed, against British officers committing on the high seas trespasses or torts on board American vessels, offences manifestly including cases of impressment.

In communicating these circumstances, it will occur to you, that whilst they may be allowed to proclaim the growing sensibility of the United States on the subject of impressments, they ought, by proper explanations and assurances, to be guarded against a misconstruction into marks of illiberal or hostile sentiments towards Great Britain. The truth is, and it may be so stated by you, that this practice of impressments, aggravated by so many provoking incidents, has been so long continued, and so often in vain remonstrated against, that, without more encouragement than yet appears, to expect speedy redress from the British Government, the United States are, in a manner, driven to the necessity of seeking for some remedy dependent on themselves alone. But it is no less true that they are warmly disposed to cherish all the friendly relations subsisting with Great Britain; that they wish to see that necessity banished by just and prudent arrangements between the two Governments; and that, with this view, you were instructed to open the negotiations which are now depending. It is impossible for the British Government to doubt the sincerity of these sentiments. The forbearance of the United States, year after year, and war after war, to avail themselves of those obvious means, which, without violating their national obligations of any sort, would appeal in the strongest manner to the interest of Great Britain, is of itself a sufficient demonstration of the amicable spirit which has directed their public councils. This spirit is sufficiently manifested also by the propositions which have been lately made through you, and by the patience and cordiality with which you have conducted the negotiation. I might add, as a further proof to the same effect, that, notwithstanding the refusal, of which we have official information, from Glasgow and Liverpool particularly, to restore American seamen deserting their ships in British ports, the laws of many of the States have been left, without interruption, to restore British deserters. One of the States (Virginia) has, even at the last session of its Legislature, passed an act for the express purpose of restoring such deserters, which deserves the more attention as it was done in the midst of irritations resulting from the multiplied irregularities committed by British ships in the American seas.

Mr. Merry has expressed some inquietude with respect to the clause in the act above referred to which animadvert on British trespasses on board American vessels, and his language, on several late occasions, has strongly opposed the expectation that Great Britain will ever relinquish her practice of taking her own subjects out of neutral vessels. I did not conceal from him my opinion that the terms "trespass," &c. would be applicable to the impressment of British subjects as well as others, or that the United States would never accede to that practice. I observed to him, that every preceding administration had maintained the same doctrine with the present on that point, and, such were the ideas and feelings of the nation on it, that no administration would dare so far to surrender the rights of the American flag. He expressed dissatisfaction also at the section which requires certain compliances, on the part of British ships of war entering our harbors, with arrangements to be prescribed by the collectors. He did not deny the right of the nation to make what rules it might please in such cases, but apprehended that some of them were such as the commanders might deem incompatible with their just pretensions, especially when subjecting them to the discretion of so subaltern an authority as that of the collectors, and, consequently, that the law would have the unfriendly effect of excluding British ships of war altogether from American ports. He was reminded, in reply, that the collectors were, according to the terms of the section, to be guided in the exercise of their power by the directions of the President; and it was not only to be presumed, but he might be particularly assured, that the directions given would be consistent with the usages due to public ships, and with the respect entertained for nations in amity with the United States. He asked whether, in transmitting the act to his Government, as his duty would require, he might add the explanation and assurances he had heard from me. I answered, that, without having received any particular authority for that purpose from the President, I could safely undertake that what I had stated was conformable to his sentiments.

Enclosed is another act of Congress, restraining and regulating the arming of private vessels by American citizens. This act was occasioned by the abuse made of such armaments in forcing a trade, even in contraband of war, with the island of St. Domingo, and by the representations made on the subject of that trade by the French chargé des affaires and minister here, and by the British minister, with respect to abuses which had resulted, or might result, from such armaments, in cases injurious to Great Britain. A report of these representations, as made to the President, is herewith enclosed. The act, in substituting a security against the unlawful use of the armaments in place of an absolute prohibition of them, is not only consistent with the obligations of a neutral nation, but conformable to the laws* and ordinances of Great Britain and France themselves, and is consequently free from objections by either. The interposition of the Government, though claimed in behalf both of Great Britain and of France, was most pressed in behalf of the latter. Yet the measure, particularly as it relates to the shipment of contraband articles for the West Indies, is likely to operate much more conveniently for Great Britain than for France, who cannot, like Great Britain, otherwise ensure a supply of these articles for the defence of their colonies.

In the project which you have offered to the British Government, I observe you have subjoined a clause for securing respect to certificates of citizenship. The effect of this clause, taken as it ought to be, and as was doubtless intended, in context with the preceding clause, is limited to the case provided for in that clause. Still it may be well, in order to guard against the possibility of its being turned into a pretext for requiring such certificates in other cases, that a proviso for the purpose be added, or that words of equivalent restriction be inserted.

Another subject requiring your attention is pointed at by the resolutions of the Senate, moved by Gen. Smith, on the subject of a British tax on exports, under the name of a convoy duty. A copy of the resolution is enclosed. A duty under that name was first laid in the year 1798; it then amounted to half of one per cent. on exports to Europe, and one per cent. on exports to other places, and consequently to the United States. The discrimination, being evidently contrary to the treaty then in force, became a subject of discussion between Mr. King and the British ministry. His letters to the Secretary of State and to Lord Grenville explain the objections urged by him, and the pretexts in support of the measure alleged by them. The subject was resumed in my letter of the 5th of March, 1804, to Mr. King, with a copy of which you have been already furnished. It was received by Mr. Gore, during the absence of Mr. King on the continent; and if any occasion was found proper by either for repeating the remonstrance against the duty, it appears to have been without effect. Whilst the treaty was in force, the discrimination was unquestionably a violation of its faith. When the war ceased, it lost the pretext that it was the price of the convoy, which, giving a longer protection to the American than to the European trade, justified a higher price for the former than for the latter. Even during war the exports are generally made as American property, and in American vessels; and, therefore, with a few exceptions only, a convoy, which would subject them to condemnation, from which they would otherwise be free, would be not a benefit, but an injury. Since the expiration of the treaty, the discrimination, as well as the duty itself, can be combated by no other arguments than those which, in the document referred to, are drawn from justice, friendship, and sound policy; including the tendency of the measure to produce a discontinuance of the liberal but unavailing example given to Great Britain by the regulations of commerce on our side, and a recurrence to such counteracting measures as are probably contemplated by the mover of the resolutions of the Senate. All these arguments gain strength, in proportion to the augmentations which the evil has latterly received; it being now stated that the duty amounts to four per cent. on the exports to the United States. These, according to Coxe's answer to Sheffield, amounted, in the year 1801, to about seven and a half millions sterling, and therefore levy a tax on the United States of about one million three hundred thousand dollars. From this is, indeed, to be deducted a sum proportioned to the amount of re-exportations from the United States; but, on the other hand, is to be added the increase of the exports since the year 1801, which probably exceed the re-exportations.

With the aid of these communications and remarks, you will be at no loss for the views of the subject most proper to be presented to the British Government, in order to promote the object of the resolutions; and the resolutions themselves ought powerfully to second your efforts, if the British Government feels the same desire, as actuates the United States, to confirm the friendship and confidence on both sides, by a greater conformity on that side to the spirit of the commercial regulations on this.

I have referred above to the enclosed copy of the motion made by Mr. Crowninshield, in the House of Representatives. The part of it which has relation to the trade with the West Indies was suggested, as appears in his introductory observations, by the late proclamations of the British West India Governors, excluding from that trade vessels of the United States, and certain articles of our exportations, particularly fish, even in British vessels. These regulations are to be ascribed partly to the attachment of the present administration in Great Britain to the colonial and navigation system; partly to the interested representations of certain merchants and others, residing in the British provinces on the continent. Without entering at large into the policy on which the colonial restrictions are founded, it may be observed that no crisis could be more ineligible for enforcing them than the present, because at none more than the present have the West Indies been absolutely dependent on the United States for the supplies essential to their existence. It is evident, in fact, that the United States, by asserting the principle of a reasonable reciprocity, such as is admitted in the trade with the European ports of Great Britain, and as is admitted even in the colonial trade of other European nations, so far at least as respects the vessels employed in the trade, might reduce the British Government at once to the dilemma of relaxing her regulations, or of sacrificing her colonies; and with respect to the interdict of supplies from the United States, of articles necessary to the subsistence and prosperity of the West Indies, in order to force the growth and prosperity of the continental provinces of Nova Scotia, &c., what can be more unjust than thus to impoverish one part of the foreign dominions, which is considered as a source of wealth and power to the parent country, not with a view to favor the parent country, but to favor another part of its foreign dominions, which is rather expensive than profitable to it? What can be more preposterous than thus, at the expense of islands which not only contribute to the revenue, commerce, and navigation, of the parent State, but can be secured in their dependence by that naval ascendancy which they aid, to foster unproductive establishments?

Considerations, such as these, ought to have weight with the British Government, and may very properly enter into frank conversations with its ministry on favorable occasions. However repugnant that Government may be to a departure from its system, in the extent contemplated by Mr. Crowninshield's motion, it may at least be expected that the trade, as opened in former wars, will not be refused under circumstances which, in the present, particularly demand it. It may be hoped that the way will be prepared for some permanent arrangement on this subject between the two nations, which will be conformable to equity, to reciprocity, and to their mutual advantage.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 12, 1805.

SIR:

The papers herewith enclosed explain particularly the case of the brig Aurora.

The sum of the case is, that while Spain was at war with Great Britain, this vessel, owned by a citizen of the United States, brought a cargo of Spanish produce, purchased at the Havana, from that place to Charleston, where the cargo was landed, except an insignificant portion of it, and the duties paid, or secured, according to law, in like manner as they are required to be paid, or secured, on a like cargo, from whatever port, meant for home consumption; that the cargo remained on land about three weeks, when it was re-shipped for Barcelona, in Old Spain, and the duties drawn back, with a deduction of three and a half per cent., as is permitted to imported articles in all cases, at any time within one year, under certain regulations, which were pursued in this case; that the vessel was taken on her voyage by a British cruiser, and sent for trial to Newfoundland, where the cargo was condemned by the court of Vice-admiralty; and that the cause was carried thence, by appeal, to Great Britain, where it was apprehended that the sentence below would not be reversed.

The ground of this sentence was, and that of its confirmation, if such be the result, must be, that the trade in which the vessel was engaged was unlawful; and this unlawfulness must rest, first, on the general principle assumed by Great Britain, that a trade from a colony to its parent country, being a trade not permitted to other nations in time of peace, cannot be made lawful to them in time of war; secondly, on the allegation that the continuity of the voyage from the Havana to Barcelona was not broken by landing the cargo in the United States, paying the duties thereon, and thus fulfilling the legal pre-requisites to a home consumption; and, therefore, that the cargo was subject to condemnation, even under the British regulation of January, 1798, which so far relaxes the general principle as to allow a direct trade between a belligerent colony and a neutral country carrying on such a trade.

With respect to the general principle which disallows to neutral nations, in time of war, a trade not allowed to them in time of peace, it may be observed,

First. That the principle is of modern date; that it is maintained, as is believed, by no other nation but Great Britain, and that it was assumed by her under the auspices of a maritime ascendancy, which rendered such a principle subservient to her particular interest. The history of her regulations on this subject shows that they have been constantly modified under the influence of that consideration. The course of these modifications will be seen in an appendix to the fourth volume of Robinson's Admiralty Reports.

Secondly. That the principle is manifestly contrary to the general interest of commercial nations, as well as to the laws of nations, settled by the most approved authorities, which recognizes no restraints on the trade of nations not at war, with nations at war, other than that it shall be impartial between the latter; that it shall not extend to certain military articles, nor to the transportation of persons in military service, nor to places actually blockaded or besieged.

Thirdly. That the principle is the more contrary to reason and to right, inasmuch as the admission of neutrals into a colonial trade shut against them in times of peace, may, and often does, result from considerations which open to neutrals direct channels of trade with the parent state, shut to them in times of peace, the legality of which latter relaxation is not known to have been contested; and inasmuch as a commerce may be, and frequently is, opened in time of war, between a colony and other countries, from considerations which are not incident to the war, and which would produce the same effect in a time of peace; such, for example, as a failure or diminution of the ordinary sources of necessary supplies, or new turns in the course of profitable interchanges.

Fourthly. That it is not only contrary to the principles and practice of other nations, but to the practice of Great Britain herself. It is well known to be her invariable practice in time of war, by relaxations in her navigation laws, to admit neutrals to trade in channels forbidden to them in times of peace, and particularly to open her colonial trade, both to neutral vessels and supplies, to which it is shut in times of peace; and that one at least of her objects in these relaxations, is to give to her trade an immunity from capture, to which, in her own hands, it would be subjected by the war.

Fifthly. The practice which has prevailed in the British dominions, sanctioned by orders of council and an act of parliament, (39 Geo. III. c. 98.) authorizing for British subjects a direct trade with the enemy, still further diminishes the force of her pretensions for depriving us of the colonial trade. Thus we see in Robinson's Admiralty Reports, passim, that during the last war a licensed commercial intercourse prevailed between Great Britain and her enemies, France, Spain, and Holland, because it comprehended articles necessary for her manufactures and agriculture, notwithstanding the effect it had in opening a vent to the surplus productions of the others. In this manner she assumes to suspend the war itself, as to particular objects of trade beneficial to herself, whilst she denies the right of the other belligerents to suspend their accustomed commercial restrictions in favor of neutrals. But the injustice and inconsistency of her attempt to press a strict rule on neutrals, is more forcibly displayed by the nature of the trade which is openly carried on between the colonies of Great Britain and Spain, in the West Indies. The mode of it is detailed in the enclosed copy of a letter from ———, wherein it will be seen that American vessels and cargoes, after being condemned in British courts, under pretence of illicit commerce, are sent on British account to the enemies of Great Britain, if not to the very port of the destination interrupted when they were American property. What respect can be claimed from others to a doctrine, not only of so recent an origin, and enforced with so little uniformity, but which is so conspicuously disregarded in practice by the nation itself, which stands alone in contending for it?

Sixthly. It is particularly worthy of attention, that the Board of Commissioners, jointly constituted by the British and American Governments, under the seventh article of the treaty of 1794, by reversing condemnations of the British courts, founded on the British instructions of November, 1793, condemned the principle, that a trade forbidden to neutrals in time of peace could not be opened to them in time of war; on which precise principle these instructions were founded. And, as the reversal could be justified by no other authority than the law of nations, by which they were guided, the law of nations, according to that joint tribunal, condemns the principle here combated. Whether the British commissioners concurred in these reversals, does not appear; but whether they did or did not, the decision was equally binding, and affords a precedent which could not be disrespected by a like succeeding tribunal, and ought not to be without great weight with both nations, in like questions recurring between them.

On these grounds the United States may justly regard the British captures and condemnations of neutral trade, with colonies of the enemies of Great Britain, as violations of right; and if reason, consistency, or that sound policy which cannot be at variance with either, be allowed the weight which they ought to have, the British Government will feel sufficient motives to repair the wrongs done in such cases by its cruisers and courts.

But, apart from this general view of the subject, a refusal to indemnify the sufferers, in the particular case of the Aurora, is destitute of every pretext; because, in the second place, the continuity of her voyage was clearly and palpably broken, and the trade converted into a new character.

It has been already noted, that the British regulation of 1798 admits a direct trade, in time of war, between a belligerent colony and a neutral country carrying on the trade; and admits, consequently, the legality of the importation by the Aurora, from the Havana to Charleston. Nor has it ever been pretended that a neutral nation has not a right to re-export to any belligerent country whatever foreign productions, not contraband of war, which may have been duly incorporated and naturalized, as a part of the commercial stock of the country re-exporting it.

The question then to be decided under the British regulation itself, is, whether in landing the cargo, paying the duties, and thus as effectually qualifying the articles for the legal consumption of the country as if they had been its native productions, they were not, at the same time, equally qualified with native productions for exportation to a foreign market. That such ought to be the decision results irresistibly from the following considerations:

1. From the respect which is due to the internal regulations of every country, where they cannot be charged with a temporizing partiality towards particular belligerent parties, or with fraudulent views towards all of them. The regulations of the United States, on this subject, must be free from every possible imputation; being not only fair in their appearance, but just in their principles, and having continued the same during the periods of war as they were in those of peace. It may be added, that they probably correspond, in every essential feature relating to re-exportations, with the laws of other commercial countries, and particularly with those of Great Britain. The annexed outline of them, by the Secretary of the Treasury, will at once explain their character, and show that, in the case of the Aurora, every legal requisite was duly complied with.

2. From the impossibility of substituting any other admissible criterion than that of landing the articles, and otherwise qualifying them for the use of the country. If this regular and customary proceeding be not a barrier against further inquiries, where, it may be asked, are the inquiries to stop? By what evidence are particular articles to be identified on the high seas or before a foreign tribunal? If identified, how is it to be ascertained whether they were imported with a view to the market at home or to a foreign market, or, as ought always to be presumed, to the one or the other, as it should happen to invite? Or, if to a foreign market, whether to one forbidden or permitted by the British regulations? For it is to be recollected, that among the modifications which her policy has given to the general principle asserted by her, a direct trade is permitted to a neutral carrier from a belligerent colony to her ports, as well as to those of his own country. If, again, the landing of the goods, and the payment of the duties, be not sufficient to break the continuity of the voyage, what, it may be asked, is the degree of internal change or alienation which shall have that effect? May not a claim be set up to trace the articles from hand to hand, from ship to ship, in the same port, and even from one port to another port, as long as they remain in the country? In a word, in departing from the simple criterion provided by the country itself, for its own legitimate and permanent objects, it is obvious that, besides the defalcations which might be committed on our carrying trade, pretexts will be given to cruisers for endless vexations on our commerce at large, and that a latitude and delays will accrue in the distant proceedings of admiralty courts still more ruinous and intolerable.

3. From the decision in the British High Court of Admiralty itself, given in the case of the Polly, Lasky, master, by a judge deservedly celebrated for a profound judgment, which cannot be suspected of leaning towards doctrines unjust or injurious to the rights of his own country. On that occasion he expressly declares: "It is not my business to say what is universally the test of a bona fide importation. It is argued that it would be sufficient that the duties should be paid, and that the cargo should be landed. If these criteria are not to be resorted to, I should be at a loss to know what should be the test; and I am strongly disposed to hold that it would be sufficient that the goods should be landed and the duties paid."—2 Robinson's Reports, p. 368-9.

The President has thought it proper that you should be furnished with such a view of the subject as is here sketched, that you may make the use of it best suited to the occasion. If the trial of the Aurora should not be over, it is questionable whether the Government will interfere with its courts. Should the trial be over, and the sentence of the Vice-admiralty court at St. John's have been confirmed, you are to lose no time in presenting to the British Government a representation corresponding with the scope of these observations; and, in urging that redress in the case, which is equally due to private justice, to the reasonable expectations of the United States, and to that confidence and harmony which ought to be cherished between the two nations.

The effect of the doctrine involved in the sentence of the court in Newfoundland on our carrying trade will at once be seen by you. The average amount of our re-exportations for three years, ending 30th September, 1803, has been thirty-two million three thousand nine hundred and twenty-one dollars. Besides the mercantile and navigation profits, the average revenue from drawbacks on goods re-exported for three years, ending 31st December, 1803, is one hundred and eighty-four thousand two hundred and seventy-one dollars, to which is to be added an uncertain but considerable sum, consisting of duties paid on articles re-exported, after having lost, through neglect or lapse of time, the privilege of drawback. A very considerable portion of this branch of trade, with all its advantages, will be cut off if the formalities heretofore respected are not to protect our re-exportations. Indeed, it is difficult to see the extent to which the apprehended innovation may be carried in theory, or to estimate the mischief which it may produce in practice. If Great Britain, disregarding the precepts of justice, suffers herself to calculate the interest she has in spoliating or abridging our commerce by the value of it to the United States, she ought certainly not to forget that the United States must, in that case, calculate by the same standard the measures which the stake will afford for counteracting her unjust and unfriendly policy.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

SIR:

LONDON, August 16, 1805.

I enclose you a copy of my letters to Lord Mulgrave, relative to the late seizures of our vessels by His Majesty's cruisers in the Channel and North Sea, and of his replies. I had yesterday an interview with him on the subject, in which he gave me a report from each of the King's law-officers in the Admiralty respecting the late decisions, and promised me another interview on that and the other topics depending between our Governments, as soon as I should desire it, after having perused the reports. By my note to him of this date, you will find that I consider these documents unsatisfactory on the great question, and have asked another interview. It appears, however, by them, that no recent order has been issued by the Government; hence it is probable that the late decisions on the point of continuity of voyage, which have carried the restraints on that commerce to a greater extent than heretofore, may have furnished to the parties interested a motive for these seizures. It is equally probable that the decision of the court of appeals in the case of the "Essex," as several of its members are also members of the cabinet, may have been dictated by policy, to promote the navigation of this country at the expense of that of the United States. In the late interview with Lord Mulgrave much general conversation took place on the subject, in which he assured me, in the most explicit terms, that nothing was more remote from the views of his Government than to take an unfriendly attitude towards the United States; he assured me also, that no new orders had been issued, and that his Government was disposed to do every thing in its power to arrange this and the other points to our satisfaction; by which, however, I did not understand that the principle in this case would be abandoned, though I think it probable that in other respects much accommodation may be obtained relative to that commerce.

Affairs here seem to be approaching a crisis. It is said that the combined fleets, having been previously joined by the Rochefort squadron, have entered Ferrol, and that the force now there is thirty-seven sail of the line. Sir Robert Calder has joined Admiral Cornwallis before Brest. The French fleet there consists of about twenty-six sail of the line. This force, so nearly united, is a very imposing one. The menace of invasion is kept up and increased. Every thing seems to indicate that an attempt will soon be made.

I have the honor to be, with great respect and regard, sir, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

DOVER STREET, July 31, 1805.

Mr. Monroe presents his compliments to Lord Mulgrave, and requests the honor of an interview with his lordship, on the subjects that were depending between their Governments at the time of Mr. Monroe's departure last autumn for Spain, and postponed at the instance of Lord Harrowby until his return. These subjects will be found in a communication to Lord Harrowby of the 5th of September last, which contains a project of a convention to define certain neutral rights, to discriminate between American and British seamen, and protect the former from impressment; and also to establish, by a modification of the convention entered into by Lord Hawkesbury and Mr. King, on the 12th of May, 1803, in the manner proposed, and for the reasons stated in that communication, the boundary between the territories of His Majesty and those of the United States on their northwestern frontier. The two first mentioned of these topics have been the cause of much irritation and complaint on the part of the United States, which cannot otherwise than be increased by the principles which appear to have been adopted in some late decisions of the court of admiralty, relative to the commerce of the United States with the colonies of the enemies of Great Britain, and with the parent country in the productions of such colonies. Mr. Monroe is persuaded that it is of great importance to both countries to arrange these points between them, and he flatters himself that it will be easy to do it on terms that will be equally safe and satisfactory to both parties.

MY LORD:

The late seizures of the vessels of the United States by His Majesty's cruisers is so important an event as to make it my duty to invite your lordship's attention to it. My Government will naturally expect of me immediately the best information I can obtain of the nature and character of the measure, the extent to which it has been and will be carried, and of the policy which dictates it. Being in a state of profound peace with His Britannic Majesty and his dominions, conscious of having cherished that relation, and performed all its duties with the most perfect good faith, it will be surprized at a measure which will be understood to breathe a contrary spirit. From the view which I have of the subject I can only state, that many of our vessels have been brought in under orders that were equally unknown to the parties that were affected by them, and to the representative of the United States accredited with His Majesty; that the principles on which some of them have been condemned are denied by our Government, and, as it is contended, upon the soundest principles of the law of nations. I wish to possess, and to give correct information on the whole subject, and shall be happy that your lordship will enable me to do it.

It would have been agreeable to me to have postponed this inquiry until I should be honored with the interview which I requested of your lordship on the 31st ultimo, and which you have been so good as to promise me next week; but the importance of the subject, the impression which the measure has made on the parties interested, and doubtless will make in the United States, together with the propriety of giving to my Government such information as is official and authentic only, will, I flatter myself, satisfy your lordship that I could not justify a longer delay.

I have the honor to be, my lord, your lordship's most obedient humble servant,

SIR:

I have just received the honor of your letter of yesterday's date, stating the existence of some measures relative to the vessels of the United States, of which you have cause to complain. As you have not mentioned either the nature or the period of the transaction to which you allude, I am not enabled to give you a satisfactory answer; and I am not aware of any recent occurrence of so pressing a nature as to require an explanation previous to the day on which I shall have the honor of seeing you in the course of the next week. If you will inform me more particularly of the ground of complaint, I shall, without delay, give the subject every attention in my power.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

To Lord Mulgrave.

DOVER STREET, August 12, 1805.

MY LORD:

I have been honored with your lordship's letter of the 9th instant, and shall willingly comply with your request in stating more fully the nature of the complaint to which I alluded in mine of the 8th, and the period within which it has occurred. By a report of the consul of the United States for this port and district, of which I have the honor to enclose you a copy, it appears that, in the course of a few weeks past, about twenty American vessels have been seized in the Channel and North Sea, by His Majesty's ships of war and privateers, and brought into his ports for trial: the officers who seized them stated (according to the report of some of the masters) that they had acted by order, as is to be presumed, of the Government. As this proceeding was sudden, without notice, and without example in the conduct of the present war, as it has embraced a considerable number of vessels, and may be extended to many others, it was impossible for me to reconcile it with the friendly relations subsisting between the two Powers. It is therefore my duty to request of your lordship such information respecting it, as I may transmit without delay to my Government. Of a measure so highly important to the rights and interests of the United States, no erroneous opinion should be formed, no incorrect idea entertained.

It is proper here to observe, that the decisions of the courts to which I alluded in mine of the 8th, the principles of which are considered by my Government as subversive of the established law of nations, were given in the case of the "Essex" a few weeks since, and in those of the "Enoch" and "Mars" on the 23d and 24th ultimo. These decisions impose restraints on the commerce of neutral nations with the enemies of Great Britain, which it is contended derive no sanction from that authority. The principle on which they are founded asserts a right in Great Britain to restrain neutral nations from any commerce with the colonies of an enemy in time of war which they do not enjoy in time of peace; or, in other words, denies, in respect to neutrals, the sovereignty of an enemy in time of war over its own colonies, which remain in other respects subject to its authority, and governed by its laws. It cannot well be conceived how there should be a difference on principle, in the rights of neutral Powers, to a commerce between any two ports of an enemy, not regularly blockaded, and any other two of its ports: how it should be lawful to carry on such commerce from one port to another of the parent country, and not from its colonies to the parent country. As the board of commissioners under the seventh article of the treaty of 1794, in revising the decisions of the British courts founded on the instructions of November 6, 1793, condemned this doctrine, there was just cause to expect that it would never have been revived. It is understood that no other Power admits it, and that it is also repugnant to the practice of Great Britain herself, with respect to her own colonies in time of war. It is easy to show that the doctrine is of modern date even in England; that the decisions of her courts have not been uniform, and that those in the cases referred to have carried the pretension to an extent which, by assuming cognizance, if not jurisdiction, in the interior concerns of the United States, is utterly incompatible with the rights of sovereignty, and the self-respect which, as an independent nation, they can never lose sight of. I forbear, however, to enter further into this subject at present, in the expectation that I shall be honored with such information from your lordship of the views of His Majesty's Government as will be satisfactory to that which I have the honor to represent.

I have the honor to be, my lord, &c.

Mr. Monroe presents his compliments to Lord Mulgrave, and has the honor to return his lordship the papers which he was so good as to deliver him yesterday. Mr. Monroe is sorry to find that those documents furnish no satisfactory explanation on the real ground of complaint on the part of the United States, as stated in his letter of the 12th; he will, therefore, be happy to see Lord Mulgrave again on the subject, as soon as it may be convenient for his lordship to receive him.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, August 20, 1805.

SIR:

I had an interview with Lord Mulgrave yesterday, on the late seizure of our vessels, which, I am sorry to observe, presented the prospect of a less favorable result than I had anticipated from the preceding one. He asserted the principle, in the fullest extent, that a neutral Power had no right to a commerce with the colonies of an enemy in time of war which it had not in time of peace, and that every extension of it in the former state, beyond the limit of the latter, was due to the concession of Great Britain, not to the right of the neutral Power. I denied the principle in equal extent, and insisted that Great Britain had no more right in war to interpose with or control the commerce of a neutral Power with the colonies of an enemy, than she had in peace. As we could not agree on the principle, I asked on what footing his Government was willing to place the trade? His reply showed that it was not disposed to relax in the slightest degree from the doctrine of the late decrees of the Courts of Admiralty and Appeals, which go to cut up by the roots the commerce of the United States in the produce of the colonies of its enemies, other than for the home consumption of their citizens. I urged, in as strong terms as I could, the objections which occurred to me to this pretension, but he showed no disposition to accommodate, so that we parted as remote from an accord as possibly could be. I asked Lord Mulgrave whether I should consider the sentiments which he expressed as those of his Government? He said he had in the commencement expressed a desire that our conversations should be considered rather as informal than official, as entered into more in the hope of producing an accord than in the expectation that we should ultimately disagree; that he was sorry to find that we could not agree; that, however, he should report the result to the Cabinet, and give me such an answer to my letters for my Government, of the views of his own, as it might wish to be taken of its conduct and policy in this business. I do not state the arguments that were used in the conference on each side, because those of Lord Mulgrave will probably be furnished by himself, and you will readily conceive those to which I resorted. What the ultimate decision of his Government may be, I cannot pretend to say. It is possible that he held the tone mentioned above, in the late conference, to see whether I could be prevailed on to accommodate with his views. It is difficult to believe that it will yield no accommodation on its part to our just claims, in the present state of public affairs.

In my former interview with Lord Mulgrave, he said that I should find by the reports which he gave me, that most of the vessels had been dismissed; and it appeared by the reports that some of them had been, one or two on the opinion of Dr. Lawrence, counsel for the captured, which had been taken in the absence of the King's proctor. I returned to him the reports, to obtain copies for you. General Lyman has informed me that others have been since dismissed, and, as he thought, some that had been seized on the new doctrine of continuity of voyage, though nothing to countenance such an expectation escaped Lord Mulgrave in the last conference.

It is decided, on consideration of all circumstances, that Mr. Bowdoin will repair to Paris, where he will probably remain until he receives the orders of the President, and that Mr. Erving will proceed immediately to Madrid, to relieve Mr. Pinckney. Mr. Bowdoin, by being on that ground, will be more in the way of obeying such orders as he may receive, than here; and both he and Mr. Erving, respectively, may perhaps take their ground with greater propriety in this stage, while it is known that our Government has not acted, than afterwards.

I am, sir, with great respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

(Duplicate.)

SIR:

I have already forwarded you copies of two letters to Lord Mulgrave, respecting the late seizure of American vessels, and you will receive with this a copy of a third one. His lordship has endeavored to manage this business without writing, from a desire, which has been very apparent, to get rid of it without any compromitment. With that view he gave me, in an early interview, a report of the King's advocate general and proctor on my first letter, which had been referred to them, which gave some explanation on the subject, which he might suppose would be satisfactory. I soon, however, assured him that it was not, and pressed an answer to my letters, which was promised, but which has not yet been given. A few days before Mr. Erving left this for the continent, I requested him to ask Mr. Hammond when I should be favored with one. I send you a note of the conversation between them. Having waited some time longer, I thought it my duty to press the point again, and, in so doing, to expose as fully as I could the fallacy and injustice of the principle on which Great Britain asserts the right to interdict our commerce with the colonies of her enemies, and elsewhere in the productions of those colonies. I do not know that I shall be able to obtain an answer to this or the other letters. The presumption is against it, because she does not wish to tie up her hands from doing what her interest may dictate, in case the new combination with Russia and Austria should be successful against France. In the mean time she seeks to tranquillize us by dismissing our vessels in every case that she possibly can. It is evident to those who attend the trials, that the tone of the judge has become more moderate; that he acquits whenever he can acquit our vessels, and, keeping within the precedent of the Essex, seizes every fact that the papers or other evidence furnish, in the cases which occur, to bring them within that limit. If any thing can be done in our affairs, it may be in a week or ten days; and if not done in that time, it most probably will not be during the present winter. I shall do every thing in my power to bring them to a satisfactory conclusion.

I am, sir, with great respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

P. S. I enclose you a copy of my letter to General Armstrong, by Mr. Erving.

[The remonstrance of Mr. Monroe, which was inserted here, may be found among the documents communicated by the Message of January 17, 1806, vol. ii. page 734.]

No. 35.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, October 18, 1805.

SIR:

I sent you lately, by Colonel Mercer, my note to Lord Mulgrave of the 23d ultimo, relative to the late seizures of our vessels, in which I thought proper to advert, at the conclusion, to the other topics that were depending when I left this country for Spain. I endeavored to touch those topics, especially the insults in our ports and impressment of our seamen, in a manner to show a due sensibility to such outrages, and, if possible, to conciliate this Government to concur in a suitable arrangement to prevent the like in future. It seemed to be improper, and it was certainly useless, to touch them without expressing the sense which the President entertained of the injury and indignity to which the United States had thereby been exposed. The acts were of a nature to require it, and the conduct of this Government since had increased the obligation to do it. It appeared, also, by your letters, which were received by Mr. Purviance in my absence, that the President expected that this Government would make such an example of the officers who had most signalized themselves by their misconduct, as would serve as a warning to the commanders of other vessels who may hereafter seek shelter or hospitality in our ports. This had not been done. On the contrary, I was informed, by the best authority, that Captain Bradley, of the Cambrian, whose conduct had been most offensive, had been promoted, immediately on his return, to the command of a ship of the line. By that measure, which prejudged the case, this Government seemed to have adopted those acts of its officers as its own, and even to announce to all others that the commission of like aggressions within our jurisdiction would pave the way to their preferment. It is said, it is true, that the translation of an officer from a frigate to a ship of the line is not considered in all cases a promotion, or, more correctly speaking, is not such a one as is solicited by the officers of the navy. The command of a frigate on a separate station, especially one which affords an opportunity to make prizes, is often preferred by them to that of a ship of the line in a fleet, and may perhaps be deemed a more important trust by the Government. Ostensibly, however, and in effect, it is a promotion; the least, therefore, that could be said of the disposition which this Government has shown respecting the misconduct of that officer, was, that if it had not been the cause, it certainly formed no obstacle to his. Under such circumstances, it seemed to be impossible to separate the officer from the Government in these outrages, and quite useless to demand the censure of him. I thought it, therefore, most advisable in the present stage, at least, to treat the affair in a general way, rather than in reference to a particular occurrence; and in looking to the offensive object, and paying any regard to what was due to the United States, the manner was as conciliating as I could make it.

Having waited near three weeks after my letter of the 23d ultimo to Lord Mulgrave, without hearing from him, I wrote him again on the 10th instant, and stated that, by the permission of the President, I proposed to sail to the United States this autumn, and, as the favorable season was far advanced, wished to depart with the least possible delay; that I should be happy to see the interesting concerns depending between our Governments satisfactorily arranged before I sailed; that I had been, and should continue to be, prepared to enter on them while I remained in England; and that the time of my departure would be made subservient to that very important object. To this note I received, some days afterwards, a short answer, which promised as early a reply to my communication as the additional matter contained in that of the 23d ultimo would permit. Having taken the liberty to inform you from Madrid that I should sail for the United States soon after my arrival here, it was my intention, after making a fair experiment to arrange the concerns with this Government, to have departed forthwith, be the success of it what it might. I considered myself as having the permission of the President to return home after such an experiment, and it was very much my wish, and that of my family, to avail ourselves of it. But, unfortunately, at that period, the seizures, which had just before commenced, began to assume a serious aspect. It became my duty, in my first letter to Lord Mulgrave, to notice them, and they soon claimed the principal attention. On the 10th, however, I thought myself perfectly at liberty to give notice of my intention to depart, in a guarded manner. I had already said every thing, in my several communications on the subjects that were depending, that I intended to say, unless it should be made necessary to add more by a reply to them; I had also waited in vain a sufficient time for a reply; I could not depart without giving timely notice of it, especially after the late correspondence; and the season was so far advanced, that, if I withheld it longer, I should be exposed to a winter passage, or compelled to remain until the spring. It was on these considerations that I wrote the above mentioned note to Lord Mulgrave, in the hope of promoting, without longer delay, a satisfactory arrangement of the points alluded to. But so vague is his answer, that it is quite out of my power to determine at this time whether it will be proper for me to sail or not in the course of the present season. Indeed, there is but one vessel now in port, destined to the United States, in which I should wish to embark with my family at so late a period. She will be commanded by Captain Tompkins, for Norfolk, who, I understand, proposes to set out in the beginning of next month. By that time I shall probably see more fully into the ultimate intentions and policy of this Government towards the United States; and I think I may venture to say, that, if I sail during the present autumn, it will be in that vessel.

I have no doubt that the seizures of our vessels was a deliberate act of this Government. I do not know that the measure was regularly submitted to and decided in the cabinet, but I am satisfied that that department of it, having cognizance of and control over the business, dictated the measure. The circumstances attending the transaction justify this opinion. Before the coalition with Russia and Sweden, the commerce was free. The blow was given when that coalition was formed. Great Britain has shown much political management in the whole of this affair. By the emendatory article of her treaty with Russia, in 1801, the latter abandons the right to the direct trade between the colonies of an enemy and the parent country, and agrees to rest on the ground which the United States may hold in that respect. It is to be presumed that she declined the seizure before the coalition was formed with the northern Powers, lest it might alarm them and endanger the coalition; and that she made the seizure afterwards, on the idea, that, as they were embarked in the war with her, they would become indifferent to the object, and leave her free to push her pretensions against us. The manner in which the pressure is made, being through the Admiralty Court, on a pretext that the trade is direct, although the articles were landed in our ports and the duties paid on them, is equally a proof of management on her part. It was obviously intended to urge, (indeed, Lord Mulgrave in our first interview began by urging,) that there had been no new measure, that the Government had not acted in the business, while the court, by considering every species of that commerce direct, and every accommodation on the part of our citizens with previous regulations fraudulent and evasive, should push the pretensions of the Government to such an extent as to annihilate it altogether. Lord Mulgrave insisted in express terms, in the second interview, that we ought not to carry it on at all with the parent country; that the importation into our country ought to be confined strictly to supplies necessary for the home consumption. I am equally confident that if Great Britain should succeed in establishing her pretensions against us, she would avail herself hereafter of the example with the northern Powers. It is, therefore, a question of great importance to them also.

With respect to our other concerns with Great Britain, I am sorry to say that I do not see any prospect of arranging them on just and reasonable terms at the present time. No disposition has been shown to prescribe, by treaty, any restraint on the impressment of our seamen whenever the Government may be so disposed, or even when any of its officers in the West Indies or elsewhere may think fit. On the subject of boundary nothing has been lately said, nor does there appear to be any inclination to enter on it. I have also reason to think that this Government is equally disposed to postpone an arrangement of our commerce in general, by treaty, for any number of years. On this point, however, I cannot speak with so much confidence as on the others, having never made any proposition that was calculated to obtain an explicit declaration of its sentiments. The conversations which I had with Lords Hawkesbury and Harrowby before I went to Spain, on the other subjects, naturally brought this into view; but being incidentally, it was only slightly touched. The proposition which was made by the latter, to consider the treaty of 1794 in force, was as a temporary expedient, not a permanent regulation. From that circumstance, and the manner in which they both spoke of that treaty, I concluded that their Government would be willing to revive it for an equal term. It might, however, have been made only to obtain delay. You will observe that in my note of the 23d ultimo I have taken the liberty to mention the subject in a manner to show that it is not one to which the United States are indifferent, or which the President wishes to postpone. Although I have no power to form a treaty of so comprehensive a nature, yet I thought I might with propriety open the subject, so far at least as to ascertain the views of this Government on it for your information.

On a review of the conduct of this Government towards the United States, from the commencement of the war, I am inclined to think that the delay which has been so studiously sought, in all these concerns, is the part of a system, and that it is intended, as circumstances favor, to subject our commerce at present and hereafter to every restraint in their power. It is certain that the greatest jealousy is entertained of our present and increasing prosperity, and I am satisfied that nothing which is likely to succeed will be left untried to impair it. That this sentiment has taken a deep hold of the public councils here was sufficiently proved by the late seizures, being at a time when the state of our affairs with Spain menaced a rupture, from which Great Britain could not fail to derive the most solid advantages. It was natural to expect, especially when we advert to the then critical situation of this country, that the Government would have seized the opportunity to promote that object by a more just and enlightened policy. The part, however, which it acted was calculated, so far as depended on it, to prevent one. It proves satisfactorily that no event is deemed more unfavorable to Great Britain than the growing importance of the United States, and that it is a primary object of her Government to check, if not to crush it. It is possible that this Government may be influenced in its conduct by a belief that the United States will not revive the treaty of 1794, unless they be driven to it by such means. It may also be attributable to a policy still more unfriendly. There is cause to believe that many prejudices are still fostered here in certain circles at least, which the experience of multiplied and striking facts ought long since to have swept away. Among these it is proper to mention an opinion, which many do not hesitate to avow, that the United States are, by the nature of their Government, being popular, incapable of any great, vigorous, or persevering exertion: that they cannot, for example, resist a system of commercial hostility from this country, but must yield to the pressure. It is useless to mention other prejudices still more idle, which had influence on past measures and certainly still exist with many of great consideration. With such a view of their interest, of the means of promoting it, and the confidence which is entertained of success, it cannot be doubted that it is their intention to push their fortune in every practicable line at our expense. The late seizure is probably an experiment on this principle of what the United States will bear, and the delay which is observed in answering my letters, only an expedient to give the Government time to see its effect. If it succeeds they will, I presume, pursue the advantage gained to the greatest extent, in all the relations subsisting between the two countries, more especially in the impressment of our seamen, the prostration and pillage of our commerce through the war, and in the more elevated tone of the Government in a future negotiation. If it fails, I am equally confident that their whole system of conduct towards the United States will change, and that it would then be easy to adjust our affairs with this country, and place them on an equal and a reciprocally advantageous footing. Perhaps no time was ever more favorable for resisting these unjust encroachments than the present one. The conduct of our Government is universally known to have been just, friendly, and conciliating towards Great Britain, while the attack by her Government on the United States is as universally known to be unjust, wanton, and unprovoked. The measure has wounded deeply the interests of many of her own people, and is not a popular one. The United States furnish them at all times one of the best markets for their manufactures, and at present almost the only one. Her colonies are dependent on us. Harassed as they are already with war, and the menaces of a powerful adversary, a state of hostility with us would probably go far to throw this country into confusion. It is an event which the ministry would find it difficult to resist, and therefore cannot, I presume, be willing to encounter.

But is it safe for the United States to attempt a vindication of their rights and interests in a decisive manner with Spain and Britain at the same time? Will it not unite them against us, and otherwise do us most essential injury? This is certainly a very important consideration, and will of course be maturely weighed by our Government. In my view of the subject the cases do not interfere. We probably shall never be able to settle our concerns with either power without pushing our just claims on each with the greatest decision. At present, though at war with each other, they harmonize in a system of aggression against us, as far as it is possible in such a state. Is it not presumable, then, that at peace their harmony will be greater and its effects more injurious? It seems to be a question, simply, whether we will resist their unjust pressure at this time or defer it to some other opportunity, and surely none can be more favorable for us or less so for them. They are now respectively much in our power. We can wound both essentially should it be necessary to push things to that extremity, without receiving much comparative injury in return. I am strong in the opinion that a pressure on each at the same time would produce a good effect with the other. Success with either could not well fail to produce it with the other. I am far from thinking that the incident with Britain should change our conduct towards Spain, or that the necessity we may be under to push our pretensions with Spain should relax our exertions against Great Britain. Some considerations indeed occur which make it probable that the latter incident was a fortunate one. By pressing both at the same time France may find herself relieved from a dilemma, in which a pressure on Spain alone might place her, in consideration of her conduct in the late negotiation; and being desirous to encourage our misunderstanding with England, she may be prompted to promote an adjustment of our differences with Spain, to leave us free to push the object with England. As these subjects have been practically much under my view, in the trusts with which I have been honored by the President, and have entirely engrossed my attention, I have thought that it would be agreeable to you to receive the result of my reflections on them.

I am, sir, with great respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

P. S. October 25, I have just had an interview with Mr. Hammond, in which I asked him when I should obtain an answer from Lord Mulgrave. He assured me that the subject was under the consideration of the cabinet, and that it was intended to give me as early an answer as its own importance and the other very important concerns of the Government would permit: that I knew they were contending for their existence, &c. I told him that I was detained here by that business alone and should have sailed long since for the United States had his Government placed our affairs on such a footing as to have enabled me: that we wanted nothing but what was just and reasonable. Nothing else material passed in the interview; Mr. Bowdoin sailed for the continent about ten days since. I have not heard of his arrival in Holland, and fear, as the winds have been unfavorable, that he has had a bad passage. Captain Tompkins will not sail until February, so that there is no prospect of an immediate passage in his vessel.

No. 37.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, November 26, 1805.

SIR:

I hasten to transmit to you a copy of a letter which I received yesterday from Lord Mulgrave, in reply to mine of August 12 and September 23. From the length of time which had elapsed, and other circumstances, I had almost concluded that his Government had resolved not to enter on the subject, but to leave me to get its determination as I could from the decisions of the Admiralty. I find, however, with much satisfaction, that it is intended to take it up; whence there is some cause to presume that the business may yet be placed on a satisfactory footing. I shall not fail to cherish a disposition to such an adjustment by all the means in my power, or to inform you without delay of whatever may occur in it.

I am, sir, with great respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

Lord Mulgrave to Mr. Monroe.

DOWNING STREET, November 25, 1805.

SIR:

Upon a deliberate consideration of the nature and importance of the question which you have opened in the two official notes which I had the honor to receive from you, and adverting to the grounds of reasoning upon which you have principally rested your representations, I deemed it indispensably necessary to a due discussion of the subject, that a reference should be made by me to those who are best acquainted with all the circumstances respecting the decisions which have taken place, and the rules which have been established in our courts of admiralty and appeal, as well as with the principles and practice according to which the law is therein administered. I have not yet received any report in consequence of the reference which I have made, but I hope at no distant period to be enabled to give a full and, I trust, conclusive answer upon this most important point. I trust that you will not consider the interval of time which is necessary for due investigation of so considerable a question, as a delay either inexpedient or misplaced.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

MULGRAVE.

JAMES MONROE, Esq., &c.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 15, 1806.

SIR:

The letters received from you since my last are down to No. 36, inclusive. The perseverance of the British Government in the principle which licenses the depredations on our commerce in colonial productions, with the losses already sustained, and still apprehended by our merchants, has produced a very general indignation throughout this country, and makes it necessary that you should renew and extend your remonstrances on the subject. In aid of the means for this purpose, furnished by the information and instructions given you from time to time, I forward you an examination of it just published, in which you will find a variety of facts and views of the British principle and proceedings that may be made to bear against them. I will forward also, in a few days, copies of sundry memorials from the merchants of our maritime cities, explaining the wrongs done them, and the disgust with which they are filled. They, with other documents accompanying them, will assist your endeavors to make on the Government impressions which the occasion calls for.

I shall only add at present, that, notwithstanding the conviction of the illegality of the British principle, which becomes more and more evident the more it is investigated, the President so far yields to a spirit of conciliation as to be still willing to concur in the adjustment on the point authorized in your instructions of January 5, 1804; but expects and enjoins that you will be particularly careful to use such forms of expression as will furnish no pretext for considering an exception of the direct trade between a belligerent nation and its colonies, as declaratory of a limitation of the neutral right, and not a positive stipulation, founded on considerations of expediency.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

No. 38.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

CHELTENHAM, December 11, 1805.

SIR:

The delicate state of health which my family has enjoyed of late, attributable, as is supposed, in a great measure, to the atmosphere of London, induced me to come here last week. A letter from Lord Mulgrave, which I received just before I left town, having revived the expectation that I should hear from him on the subject of my former ones, I thought it proper to apprise him of my proposed absence; as that it would be short; that Mr. Purviance would remain behind to receive and forward me his letters; and that I would repair to London to wait on him whenever it might be necessary.

By late accounts from the continent, it appears that the French have entered Vienna almost without opposition, the Austrian and Russian armies having left it open to them. It was a while reported, and believed, that the Emperor of Austria had made a separate peace, the conditions of which had been dictated to him by his adversary in the spirit of conquest; but this is now contradicted and disbelieved. The Emperor, it seems, plays a bolder game, and is willing to hazard all rather than make the sacrifices which it is supposed were insisted on. Thus the campaign seems to be hastening to its crisis, which will unfold the policy of some movements in the field and cabinet which may not have been heretofore well understood. It will soon be seen whether the Emperor of France has been drawn on, without system, by the brilliancy of his success against General Mack, to hazard more than an able and prudent commander ought to have done, or, having in view the accomplishment of a vast object, his movements, combined with those of General Massena in Italy, were judicious, and conformable to a plan wisely laid down in the commencement. It will soon be seen whether Prussia, who cannot be an indifferent spectator, and has much in her power, intends to act a part in the adventure, and performs it well; or, governed by circumstances, makes and breaks her resolutions as they change, and finally becomes a victim to unsteady and feeble councils. Whatever may have been the motive of the Emperor of France to take his present position, it is certainly a daring and hazardous one. It gives, in plain terms, the defiance to Europe; and, if Prussia takes part against him, he may be considered as fairly pitted against Europe; for the Powers that are on his side are not volunteers in the cause. If he experiences a serious reverse of fortune, they will, I think, quickly fall off. He must either succeed, that is, make at least a good and safe retreat in case of necessity, or he is utterly undone. It remains to be seen whether, in case he succeeds by completely vanquishing the armies opposed to him, he will be able to make a prudent use of his victories, for the purpose of consolidating and securing his own power; and of course whether his victories are to prove of any solid and permanent advantage to him. It may, perhaps, require greater talents in the present state of the world, in respect to that object, to turn such victories to the best account, than, at the head of the veteran armies of France, to gain them.

The situation of the United States, in respect to all these Powers, is, in every view, a very favorable one. So circumstanced are they, respectively, that while we have the means of doing each irreparable injury, all are interested in preserving the relations of peace and friendship with us; and none have it in their power to do us comparatively equal harm. As things now stand, each of the parties forms a complete counterpoise to the other, in a way best adapted to its own safety, and to our interest. Victorious by land, France has scarcely a ship at sea, and is, therefore, interested in the prosperity of our commerce. Victorious at sea, Great Britain finds herself compelled to concentrate her force so much in this quarter, with a view to her own security, that she would not only be unable to annoy us essentially in case of war, but even to protect her commerce and possessions elsewhere which would be exposed to our attacks. As to Spain, she ought not, perhaps, to be considered as a party to this controversy. If she were asked in which scale her interest lay, which party she wished to prevail, her friends or her enemies, she would most probably be at a loss to decide. I think it must be her interest that neither should succeed; but that the scales should stand suspended as they now are. If her enemies succeeded completely, she would be undone; and the same thing would happen if her friends did. Thus it appears that from none of these Powers have we any serious danger or injury to apprehend in the present state of affairs; nor, from what I can see, is it likely that we soon shall have. While the Powers of Europe are contending against each other, none of them can venture to break with us, in consideration of such motives as the just pretensions and claims of our Government may furnish; and by many causes they seemed to be destined to remain in that state some years longer, or at least in one of great jealousy and rivalry of interest, which may produce the same effect.

I have just received your letter of September 20th, respecting the ship Huntress, which has been given up to General Lyman, as I understand, by the order of the Admiralty. The cargo, consisting in provisions, having been much injured by the detention, was, at his suggestion, and by my direction, to have been lately disposed of. I shall communicate with him on the subject, and transmit you shortly a correct account of the business.

I am, sir, with great respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

No. 39.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, December 23, 1805.

SIR:

I came to town on the 20th, in consequence of a letter from General Lyman, of which a copy is enclosed. Although the suggestion which it communicated as proceeding from Dr. Lawrence, a proctor in the Admiralty, who has no connexion with the ministry, that the Government would suspend, on my application, the seizure of our vessels till the principle could be adjusted, might be founded on mere conjecture, yet I did not feel myself at liberty altogether to disregard it. After what had passed, it did not seem probable that the Government would expect any new application from me before it had answered those I had already made, or that it would adopt such an expedient to obtain one. If it was disposed to accommodate, the invitation already given was surely sufficiently strong. Still, it was not an impossible case. Dr. Lawrence's standing in the court is a very respectable one, and I knew that reference had been made to him in some of the cases that were depending, although he was employed by our citizens on the receipt of my first letters, and that on his opinion the vessels were discharged. But what gave more countenance to the presumption was certain extraneous circumstances which were likely to be felt by the Government. A strong paper, extracted from the National Intelligencer, which reprehended in decisive terms the conduct of this Government towards our commerce, had appeared in the Morning Chronicle, and produced some sensation in the city. In addition to which, the character of events on the continent, under the most favorable aspect in which they might be viewed, still wore an equivocal face. My experience here, without going further back in our history, has satisfied me that nothing inspires those in power with such friendly sentiments towards us, or brings to their recollection, with such glowing feelings and expressions, the circumstances of our common origin, language, &c. as adversity. Before I went to Spain, when this country stood alone pitted against its adversary, and I pressed a decision on the propositions I had presented, I heard some eloquent discourses on that topic, to which I was not insensible. But as soon as the prospect improves, the relationship is forgotten and scouted; nothing is thought of then but their maritime rights, which, by their pretensions, comprise a complete monopoly of the ocean sovereignty over all islands belonging to their enemies, &c. This change has been very visible of late, and is to be traced to the period of the organization of the new coalition. What the disposition of this Government is at this moment on these subjects I shall endeavor to ascertain. It is my intention to sound it thoroughly, in some suitable mode, and to profit of the opportunity, if one is offered, to arrange them on satisfactory terms.

The latest accounts from the scene of action state, with some degree of credibility, that the conflict was continued between the contending parties, near Austerlitz, on the 3d, 4th, and even the 5th; and that fortunately proved favorable to the allies; in what degree, however, is variously represented. Some accounts state that the French army was completely broken and put to rout, while others represent it only as a handsome check. In truth, less confidence is now due to official statements than they used to obtain. Since they have begun, under the pretext of ruses de guerre, to mistake simple facts, people at a distance do not well know what to believe. From every thing I can collect, it does not seem probable that any event has taken place to decide the fate of the campaign, much less of the war; nor is there any certainty that Prussia has taken a more decisive attitude towards France, as yet, though it is often reported to be the case. On this point you will doubtless receive better information from the continent than I can give you.

It is probable that negotiations for peace will be opened in the course of the winter, as it may be that most of the parties seriously wish it. The mission of Count Haugwitz was supposed to present to the Emperor of France a species of ultimatum, which, if adopted, would put an end to the war, or, being rejected, bring Prussia into it on the side of the allies. The following are said to be its conditions: that he should separate the crown of Italy from that of France, and withdraw his troops from Naples, Holland, and Switzerland, and leave those countries to the enjoyment of their independence. It is reported that the conditions, be they what they may, were known to and approved by the Emperor Alexander, whence it is inferred that they are such as Austria and Great Britain also would accede to. It is likewise reported that a provisional treaty was formed between Russia and Prussia, when Alexander was at Berlin, which stipulated that Prussia should join the allies in case France rejected the propositions of the latter. But I should not be surprised if it should ultimately appear that this mission was adopted by the King of Prussia to get rid, at the time, in a handsome manner, of the pressure of the Emperor Alexander; or, being adopted in good faith for the ostensible purpose, should nevertheless produce no immediate effect, either with respect to a general peace, or the union of Prussia with the allies in the war against France. It is not probable that the King of Prussia sent to the Emperor of France a positive, unqualified ultimatum, which should admit of no modification. A measure so bold and hazardous is not consistent with the character of the Prussian cabinet, which is more remarkable for its hesitation, and deliberation than the promptitude of its action; for its desire to preserve what it has by peace, than to risk every thing in an attempt to gain more by war. And, if the propositions which were to be made by the Prussian envoy were liable to modification, I cannot well discern how his mission is to be distinguished from ordinary ones, which commence in negotiation, and have a regular course and termination. In this view, it is not unlikely that the business may be referred to conferences or a congress to be held elsewhere, which, by management, may be prolonged for a considerable time, and whose result may finally depend on the fortune of other battles between the existing parties; unless, indeed, by the successes of France over her present opponents, and the high pretensions of her chief, Prussia should hereafter have no alternative, but be forced into the war in her own defence. Be the fact, however, as it may, with respect to Prussia, that is, whether she abstains from the war or becomes a party to it, and at an earlier or later period, I do not think that there is much prospect of a general peace in the course of this winter. I rather think that the war will go on till it produces some great change in the condition of one of the parties. The contest is, in truth, between France and her dependencies and the rest of Europe, and seems to be now so deeply laid that I cannot well perceive how a solid and permanent peace can be established between them till one or other gains so far the ascendancy as to be able to dictate the terms. The gigantic struggle of the French revolution had so far extended the bounds and contributed to the aggrandizement of France, at the expense of other Powers, that it seemed to be impossible for them to reconcile their safety with her existing state. The new dynasty, too, which grew out of the revolution, did not diminish, if it did not increase, the difficulty. It seems to have made up its mind that it was impossible for it to incorporate itself with the ancient ones, even by alliances, if such were to be formed in such a manner as to establish confidence, friendship, and an opinion of security between them. The French Emperor has not been able to attach to him the ancient nobility of France. He has taken many into his service, but even these are not the persons in whom he reposes his chief confidence. Thus, while he possesses powers utterly incompatible with the principles of the revolution, he finds himself under the necessity to rely principally for his support on the revolutionary party in the public councils, in the armies, and among the people. It cannot be doubted that he draws to his aid every species of support from every quarter, and by means which he deems best adapted to the end; still, the revolutionary party are his chief counsellors, his generals, and body guard. Where that business will end is a problem to be solved, which time alone can solve. Perhaps the result is connected with other causes in embryo, which may hereafter unfold themselves. From what I can see, he appears to think that foreign war tends to consolidate his power at home, and thus that consideration increases much the interval between him and foreign Powers, and also gives an additional impulse to the revolutionary movement, though directed to a different end. Should the issue be fairly made between France and the other Powers, it is by no means certain, provided the parties live, in whose favor the scale will preponderate. On one side there is a vast superiority of population; on the other an extraordinary concentration of talents, with proportional activity and enterprise, in the leaders of a great and powerful people. On both, the regular force is nearly equal; but the character of the troops, as well as of the people, is essentially different. On the side of France, they feel the impulse of the revolutionary movement; while, on that of Austria, there seems to be a consciousness of imbecility, an entire want of enterprise, and an evident indisposition to the conflict, which cannot be attributed to the want of courage, for there are no braver troops. Under such circumstances, the superiority of population promises to be of little avail. We have already seen, by the incursion into Germany, that no part of it, or but a very inconsiderable one, has been brought into action; that it is a lifeless mass, subject to the command of the victorious army in the field, though perhaps inferior to the force to be found in the smallest provinces. It seems probable, if the Emperor of France beats the armies opposed to him, that he may demolish the dynasties; but then would arise a question, whether, in case those events happened, the nations were subdued. The world has seen with astonishment, that Austria, who has among her people several millions of fighting men, has not been able to call into the field, at this great crisis, above two hundred thousand. Surely, it cannot be said that the defeat of that force is the subduction of Austria. Does it not, on the contrary, give good cause to presume that her Government has lost its influence, that the people have withdrawn their confidence from it, that it is tottering, and that every thing is ripe for a change, which the slightest external pressure may produce? If I may judge of Austria by what I saw of Spain, and I am told that in many respects the lines are parallel, there is much ground for these suggestions. I did not believe that there existed in Europe, if there did on the earth, a Government so completely worn out and exhausted, in all its institutions and functions as I found that to be; or that it was possible for any Government to produce such an impoverishing and destructive effect on the moral character of the people, which is naturally a manly one, and on the face of the country, its cultivation, and even on the soil itself, as is evident there. These considerations afford sufficient cause, at least, to doubt that, although the armies be defeated and the dynasties overthrown, the nations ought not to be considered as subdued, or liable to be disposed of as a conquered people, by arrangements that are likely to be durable. This is, however, in some measure a digression from the subject. In stating that I did not think it probable the existing strife between the Powers at war would be soon settled, I have thought that it might not be improper to explain the reasons of that opinion.

I will conclude these with a few additional remarks. Under existing circumstances, I think our attitude with all these Powers is a very imposing one; that, although with their loose system of political morality, inordinate pride, and extravagant pretensions, they will respectively commit all kinds of injustice and outrage against us, if permitted, it is nevertheless in our power, and will be while the present state lasts; to obtain of either, by a suitable pressure, any just and reasonable demand we may have against it. That nothing will be obtained without some kind of pressure, such a one as excites an apprehension that it will be increased in case of necessity, and that to produce that effect, and protect ourselves against unexpected and unfavorable results, which are always to be supposed and provided for, it will be proper to put our country, by invigorating the militia system, and increasing the naval force, in a better state of defence.

I am, with great respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

P. S. Since I came to town I have endeavored to ascertain whether any thing had lately occurred, to invite from me a new application to the ministry respecting the proceedings against our commerce; and the result has been to satisfy me that there had not. I called on my arrival at Downing street to see Lord Mulgrave; who, as I was informed, was at Bath with Mr. Pitt, as he had been more than a fortnight. I asked the young man in the office who is charged, in the absence of Mr. Hammond, with the American business, if Lord Mulgrave had prepared an answer for me; to which he replied in the negative. In conversation he gave me reason to infer that no decision had been made upon the subject. I requested him to inform his lordship that I had come to town to see him on that business, and should remain some time in the hope of hearing from him; which I was desirous of doing at this time, as the Congress was sitting, and several opportunities offered to bear my despatches to our Government. He promised to do so immediately, and assured me, that if he received his lordship's instructions to make any communications to me, that I should hear from him without delay. Four days were more than sufficient for the correspondence between them, whereas twice that term has now elapsed without my hearing any thing on the subject; so that I conclude that no change has taken place in the disposition of the cabinet on it. The business is in the regular train between the Government and myself. It appears to me that I have done every thing that it was proper to do, and must attend an answer, which, if much longer withheld, cannot be considered otherwise than as a decision of the Government to support present measures till some stronger motive presents itself.

It is unnecessary to add that, in giving my sentiments on these important subjects, I am far from being wedded to them; that being founded on a partial view only, that which is presented here, of those facts and circumstances which ought to be taken into consideration in making a decision, I have always given them with diffidence; and, as I well know that a combined view of all the great interests and concerns which merit attention will be taken by our Government in making the decision, by whom alone it can be taken with advantage, I shall, from that and many other considerations, have much greater confidence in its judgment than my own.

No. 40.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, January 28, 1806.

SIR:

I informed you lately, in a short note by Mr. Clark, who sailed in the Remittance, of the death of Mr. Pitt, which took place last week. The King hath since resolved to commit the administration to the opposition, as we are informed by all the gazettes of this day. It is said that he announced this to Lord Grenville yesterday, and authorised him, in conjunction with Mr. Fox, to form a new ministry from among their friends. It is expected that this will be done in a day or two, as they are now engaged in the business. This change has an aspect towards peace, and fully persuaded I am that it will be the serious object of those who may be thus brought into power to endeavor to make one. Mr. Fox, it is understood, will have the Department of Foreign Affairs. I shall see if it is possible, as soon as he is inaugurated, to obtain a change in the policy of this Government towards the United States; of which, I think, there is great probability. About a fortnight before Mr. Pitt's death, an order was sent to the suitable department to report the number of American vessels which had been seized, and condemned, or dismissed, with the damages incident thereto, which looked as if a change was contemplated even under him. The disasters on the continent tended to show the folly of the measure, to which the eyes of the new ministry will doubtless be more open. The present is a very important epoch in our concerns with this country and Spain, as to the commerce which we are to enjoy with the West Indies after a peace. There would be cause of regret if that event took place before they were adjusted. I have heard nothing from General Armstrong, or Mr. Bowdoin, for more than two months past. I shall do every thing in my power to avail myself of the favorable opportunity which is thus presented, by a concurrence of extraordinary events, to place our affairs with this country on an advantageous footing, and I hope not without effect. The considerations which made it improper for me to sail to the United States at any time since my return to England, seem now to operate with peculiar force. As the seizure of our vessels had then commenced, I could not withdraw without great compromise of our Government and myself, without remonstrating against it. And, after taking that step, I could not withdraw and leave the business unfinished, especially after the strong opposition which I made to it; which I thought the nature of the transaction merited, and the state of public affairs in Europe justified. Thus engaged, I have felt it imperiously my duty to pursue the business in all its windings. I shall, therefore, neither abandon the ground, nor relax in my exertions to accomplish the object till something conclusive is done, unless the President may think proper to consign the trust to some other person. I fear that the expectation of my return to the United States, which was authorised by my first letters after my return here, as by those of an earlier date, has prevented your communicating to me your sentiments on these important topics, as you otherwise might have done. I flatter myself, however, that you will have concluded from those which followed, as from the nature and course which this business has taken, that I should be detained through the winter; and, in consequence, that I shall soon have the pleasure to receive such communications from you. As the health of my family has been improved by the late excursion into the country, I expect them in town in a few days; since now that the ministry is about to change, and there is a fair prospect of accomplishing something to advantage, I do not wish to be absent a moment.

The President's message to Congress has produced a very good effect here. I have reason to think that it was not ill-received by the Government, as, at the levee and drawing room, I was shown rather more than usual attention by the King and Queen soon after it appeared, and have experienced from Lord Mulgrave, in an interview of ceremony at his own house since, as I had before at the court, much civility. By his deportment I was also convinced that the manner in which I had opposed the measure of his Government, had produced no improper effect. The message is considered by the public in general as furnishing satisfactory proof that our Government will vindicate its rights with firmness, in case this Government imposes on it the necessity. There seems to be no difference of opinion that, in case a misunderstanding took place between the two countries, it was attributable to this Government, and not to ours. In consideration of the effect which the extent of our commerce, as heretofore enjoyed, had on the fortunes of this country in impairing its own resources, or rather was supposed to have, and in supplying the wants of its enemies, the party in favor of the sentiments of the ministry was a strong one, as a measure of policy. But there did not appear to be any one, or at most very few, who approved the manner in which that measure was introduced, being without notice to our Government, and of course a surprise on our people; under the circumstance, too, of an existing negotiation, which made it more highly reprehensible. I expect in a day or two to give you more full information respecting the arrangement of the new ministry, and of the consequences likely to result from the change.

I am, sir, with great respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

No. 41.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, February 12, 1806.

SIR:

The arrangement of the new ministry was completed, and its members installed in their respective offices, in the course of the last week. It makes, as you will find by the list, a thorough change of character, as I hope it will of principle, in its measures, at least in respect to us. It is well known that the King yielded to this change with extreme reluctance; that he offered to supply the chief place, which had become vacant by the death of Mr. Pitt, by Lord Hawkesbury, who did not seem unwilling to accept it, and in other respects to preserve the power in the same hands, with a view, as is to be inferred, of pursuing the same system of measures; but the other members of the late ministry seemed disposed to retire, and as the opposition was not to be broken, and external causes pressed with great force, the change could no longer be resisted. The measure itself being resolved on, the King had the prudence not to embarrass it with conditions that were sure to be ill received, or not accepted. He assented at once to commit the administration to the opposition, and authorized Lord Grenville and Mr. Fox to form and present to him an arrangement for the purpose. The only obstacle which was understood to have arisen afterwards, respected the continuance of the Duke of York in the chief command of the forces, which was objected to by these gentlemen. That obstacle, however, was finally removed, by the King's assenting that the Duke might be assisted, or perhaps controlled, by a military council. The new ministry is composed of characters who have, till of late, been opposed to each other; from which circumstance, as from a knowledge that the King must retain a strong prejudice against some of them, it is believed by many, that it will not remain long in power. The presumption is not an unreasonable one, though there are many considerations to authorize a different conclusion. It is not likely that the causes which formed the union will soon be done away. It is more probable that they will acquire greater force. From present appearances, those which are external cannot well fail to do it, and they must tend of course to produce a correspondent effect internally. If the war continues between this country and France, or the present rivalry in peace, this Government will be compelled to preserve its independence, to arm the whole nation, whence the people must unavoidably have more influence in its measures. Such a course of things would be apt not only to preserve the union which already exists between many who have been hitherto opposed to each other, but to strengthen it, and even to increase the weight and consideration of those who were viewed for many years past with most jealousy, and now admitted into a participation of power with the greatest reluctance, in the direction of public affairs.

As soon as Mr. Fox took possession of his office, he requested an interview with the foreign ministers, which took place yesterday. We were introduced separately. As soon as the ceremony of the interview had passed, I observed that I presumed he had been too short a term in office to have made himself acquainted with what had occurred between his predecessors and myself, more especially the last one. He said he had not had time to read the papers, though he presumed he had a general idea on some of the topics. In respect to the immediate question, he asked whether I had made to them, or they to me, any proposition? I gave a short sketch of the part which our respective Governments had acted since the commencement of the present war towards each other. I told him that my Government had been ready to form a commercial treaty with his on the expiration of the late one; that it had agreed to postpone it to accommodate his, and with a desire that the arrangements which might be formed, being entered into at a time when each had sufficient leisure to attend to the object, and founded on a liberal view of their respective interests, might place their relations on such a footing as to secure their friendship from interruption, at least at an early day; that in the same spirit it had sought to put out of the way certain causes of a transient nature which might possibly create misunderstanding in the course of the war, such as the impressment of our seamen, blockades by proclamation, &c., according to a project which had been presented to Lord

Hawkesbury, and to both his successors; that those gentlemen never gave any definitive answer to that project, and urged, as a cause of their delay, the other and pressing engagements of their Government, with which I was well acquainted, as also that its conduct towards the United States in the course of the present war was as consonant to their principles and wishes in the most important points as they could desire it to be; that on that ground I left the business, when I went to Spain, in the expectation that no change in the existing relations between the countries would be made in my absence. I assured him that I was astonished to find, on my return, that on the contrary those relations had experienced a most essential change; that an attack had been made on our commerce on a principle which had heretofore been so completely settled between our Governments, and abandoned by his, as to have been a case for which no provision was proposed in the project referred to. I explained to him the ground of this remark, and informed him that I had written several notes to Lord Mulgrave on the subject, to which I had not been able to obtain an answer, on the main question, though he seemed desirous, by keeping it open, in his short replies, that I should not consider it as decided against the United States. I could not avoid intimating to him that the friendly disposition which our Government had shown had been most ungenerously requited by his; that it seemed as if it had pursued a just and friendly conduct towards the United States till the moment that the new coalition was formed, gave the present blow when the prospect was favorable to success, and kept the business in suspense to see the result of affairs on the continent and in the United States. He heard me with much attention and apparent interest; intimated that he had been accused of being too friendly to America, and when I spoke of the treaty with Russia, he observed that he had thought that the arrangement made by it was a good one, though I did not understand him as pledging himself by the remark to its conditions. I requested that he would make himself master, as soon as in his power, of the correspondence between Lord Mulgrave and myself, and give me an interview, which he promised. I am happy to add, on a view of all circumstances, that I think the prospect of arranging our affairs with this Government, especially that one which respects our trade with the colonies of its enemies, on satisfactory terms, a very favorable one. It is certain that nothing more favorable was, or could reasonably have been expected from the first interview with the present minister.

I am, sir, with great respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, February 28, 1806.

SIR:

Presuming that it may be satisfactory to the President and useful, to be made acquainted without delay with every incident that occurs, I have the pleasure to send you a copy of a late note to Mr. Fox, on our concerns in his hands. In our first interview he promised to examine the papers, and give me another at an early day; but as I did not hear from him within the time I had expected I called again, when he informed me that he had not yet been able to take up the American papers, but should soon do it. He asked in what shape the most interesting topic presented itself, alluding, as I understood, to the late seizures? I replied by a complaint on the part of the United States of a violation by Great Britain of the relations subsisting between the countries; and I illustrated the remark by a sketch of the conduct of his Government in the most material circumstances. To the merits of the case he said but little. What he did say, however, was conciliating; and he repeated, what he had said in the former interview, his earnest desire to see the affairs of the two countries placed on the most friendly footing. He assured me that I should hear from him as soon as he had read the papers, which he would do without delay. I intimated that, by giving him a summary of the whole, I might perhaps facilitate his research, to which he assented. It was on that ground that I addressed him the enclosed note.

I have since received your letter of January 13, in which you promise to send me an examination of the British principle lately published, the memorials of the merchants of our principal towns, and other documents illustrative of the subject. I shall be happy to receive these, and shall certainly endeavor to draw from them all the aid which they can furnish. The letter referred to in the commencement of that of the 13th has not come to hand, nor has any of a later date than December 4. I shall be attentive to the injunction contained in the last paragraph of that of the 13th.

As the subject is now fairly before the new ministry, who seem to be well disposed in the business, permit me to submit it to consideration whether it may not be better that no measure should be definitively adopted, or if already adopted, be executed, till a fair experiment be made of what may be expected of it. By suspending what might have been contemplated in another view, and even necessary, it may tend to conciliate those now in power, and be productive of good.

I have the honor to be, with great respect and consideration, your obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

PRINCE'S STREET, February 25, 1806.

SIR:

I have the honor to transmit you a note of the papers which are material in my correspondence with your predecessors on certain interesting topics, which have been for some time depending between our Governments, and are still unsettled. These are, 1st. The rights of neutral powers in certain specified cases; 2d. The impressment of American and desertion of British seamen; and 3d. The boundary between the United States and the British possessions in America. The papers referred to will, I presume, sufficiently illustrate these topics. I shall, however, be permitted to accompany them with some remarks, to explain the course which the business has taken, and the state in which you receive it.

Aware of the abuses which had been practised, in respect to neutral rights and seamen in the last war, and of their injurious effect on the interest of both countries, my Government was very desirous to prevent a repetition of them in the present one. With that view, and by its order, I had the honor to propose to Lord Hawkesbury, soon after the commencement of the war, an arrangement by convention of these interests, on such just and fair conditions as was presumed would have been readily acceded to. You will see by the project which I then presented to his lordship at his request, that the object was strictly to prevent abuses and the ill consequences incident to them, not to acquire any advantage to the United States by the establishment of controverted principles in the one, or unreasonable pretensions in the other case. In respect to neutral rights, it was proposed to adopt between the Governments, in such cases as were more liable to abuse, certain principles or rules of conduct which Great Britain had already assented to in her treaty with Russia in 1801. As those Powers had entered into that treaty for the express purpose of defining the law of nations in the cases to which it applied, and Great Britain had adopted its conditions afterwards in separate conventions with Denmark and Sweden, with the same view, it was concluded that her Government would not hesitate to admit its doctrine, or to observe its injunctions with other Powers. The same motive was felt and respected in the proposition which I had the honor to make in respect to seamen. The sensibility of the Government, and indeed of the whole nation, had been subjected to great and almost continual excitement by the abuses which had been committed in that line, on the high seas, in the islands, and sometimes in the ports, of the United States. The sons of respectable citizens had been snatched from them, many of whom were doomed never to return, to be slain in wars to which their country was not a party, or otherwise perish in a foreign service. No rule had been established by the Government to discriminate between American and British seamen, a thing not easily done by the most impartial, and the commanders of many of His Majesty's ships of war and privateers, especially the latter, acknowledged none but their own judgments in making the discrimination. The highest American documents were often either not looked at, or utterly disregarded. It was evidently improper that an interest of a nature so delicate and important, one which is so intimately connected with the sovereignty and independence of the nation should be left longer in such a state of oppression. My Government felt that it would be wanting in what it owed to its character as in its duty, if, it did not endeavor to put an end to a practice so injurious, and at the same time so degrading. It was therefore one of the objects of the project referred to, to provide a remedy for that evil. But it was understood that Great Britain complained likewise of an injury in respect to her seamen, though of a different kind; for that also, it was proposed to provide an adequate remedy. In protecting American citizens from impressment, my Government was far from desiring to extend its protection to any one who had not a just claim to it. It was ready to meet the injury complained of by Great Britain, and to suppress it by the most effectual means in its power. These propositions were neither accepted nor rejected by Lord Hawkesbury, though I think myself perfectly correct in stating that nothing occurred in our conferences, to justify an inference that he thought them unreasonable. They were postponed from time to time at his instance, and finally transferred to Lord Harrowby, his successor. I revived the subject immediately with Lord Harrowby, to whom I also submitted, at the same time, a proposition relative to boundaries. It happened that Lord Hawkesbury and Mr. King had made a convention on this latter subject within a few days of the time, when one was also concluded between the United States and France, whereby the province of Louisiana was ceded to those States. As it was not known to Lord Hawkesbury or Mr. King, when they formed their treaty, that one had been concluded with France, it was impossible that the conditions of the French treaty should be in any degree affected by that with Great Britain. It was, however, apprehended that, if the British treaty should be ratified by the President and Senate, after the conditions of the other were known, without providing against it, it might lay the foundation for such a pretension. It was therefore proposed to modify the convention in such a manner as to preclude a claim which would be equally unjust and unauthorized. As this subject is fully explained in my note to Lord Harrowby, of the 5th September, 1804, it is unnecessary to enter further into it at present. The conduct of Lord Harrowby in this business was essentially the same with that of his predecessor. It was postponed from time to time for the consideration of the cabinet, whose decision I was taught to expect, but never received. I had been ordered by my Government, before Lord Harrowby came into office, to repair to Spain on a special mission, as soon as the business with his lordship should be concluded. Of that fact, after waiting some time, I gave his lordship information, in the hope of promoting despatch. Still, however, the business was delayed, the cabinet, as I was informed, having come to no decision on any point, till finally it was agreed between us, to postpone the whole until my return from Spain, when it should be resumed and concluded. I left Great Britain on that mission in October, 1804, and returned in July, 1805.

At the epoch referred to, the relations between the two countries were of a character the most friendly. Not an American vessel had been condemned on any principle which was relied on by my Government, and only one that I knew of on any principle whatever. Their commerce with each other was, as it always will be when left to its natural course, most flourishing; and that which the United States claimed, as a neutral Power, with other nations on a footing which was perfectly satisfactory to their Government. At my return, however, the scene was completely changed. A system of seizure and condemnation of American vessels had been commenced on a principle respecting which, it was presumed, that no new discussion could ever arise; one which was considered as having been so completely settled between the Governments, that, in the project above referred to, it was not contemplated to make a provision for it: a principle which had been renounced by Great Britain in her treaty with the United States in 1794; which had been condemned by the commissioners who sat under that treaty; which had been renounced by the Court of Admiralty in a subsequent decision; by Lord Hawkesbury in a formal communication with my predecessor in 1801; by the treaty with Russia in the same year; and, what is perhaps still more conclusive, by the Government, in the sanction which had been given to that commerce for the two preceding years of the war. I could not otherwise than be much surprised at a proceeding which I considered objectionable in so many views, and hastened to remonstrate against it to Lord Mulgrave in several notes whose dates are annexed. To these his lordship never honored me with a conclusive answer, with one which acknowledged the measure an act of the Government, or disclaimed it on its part. The proceeding has been highly injurious to the United States, about one hundred and twenty of their vessels have been seized, several of which were condemned, all taken from their course, detained, and otherwise subjected to heavy losses and damages. To the immediate sufferers it has been very disastrous; but the ill effect has not been confined to them only. It has been severely felt in the general commerce of the country.

I have thought it my duty to give you above a sketch of the several topics depending between our Governments, which are submitted to your consideration. They are all of a nature very interesting, as I am persuaded you will find by a perusal of the documents referred to. But the late seizure and condemnation of American vessels, are acts which have proved so highly injurious to the United States, and have so essentially changed the relations which subsisted between the countries, that they will, I flatter myself, obtain from you a more immediate and particular attention. I beg you to be assured that I shall be happy to have it in my power to transmit to my Government, without delay, such communications on your part, which may serve not only to heal the wound which has been thus unexpectedly received, but to promote in other respects, by suitable arrangements, the reciprocal and permanent interests of both nations and the best understanding between their Governments.

I beg you to accept the assurance of the high consideration with which I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

JAMES MONROE.

The Right Honorable C. J. Fox, &c.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

LONDON, March 31, 1806.

Your letter of the 13th January is the last that I have received. The pamphlet enclosed with it has been republished here, and I have this day transmitted a copy of it to Mr. Fox, with whom I had an interview on the 28th. I had expected, from what passed between us on the 11th, that before this much progress would have been made in the adjustment of our affairs; I am, however, sorry to add that this has not been the case. In the late interview I complained of the delay which had taken place, more especially as the court continued to condemn our vessels on the principle it had heretofore done. Mr. Fox said that, till the business was arranged, he presumed the court would be consistent, but gave reason to expect that the condemnations would be suspended. He assured me explicitly that the late decision was not to be considered as an evidence of the disposition of the present ministry. I endeavored to fix with him the conditions of our adjustment of that question, but found that he was not prepared to conclude any thing. The tenor of his conversation, however, was perfectly consistent with what he had said before on it, as heretofore communicated to you. The interview terminated in his assuring me that he should devote the Easter holidays to a full examination of the whole subject, after which he would be prepared to meet me on it, and that he was persuaded we might conclude it in a month or six weeks from that time; that he would certainly give it all the despatch in his power. He intimated that if, indeed, a peace should take place, of which there was at present but little prospect, he was, nevertheless, desirous of settling this business amicably with the United States, with a view to preserve future harmony. I told him that we expected payment for the spoliations. He said that that was a very serious and difficult point, but gave no opinion on it. Finding that nothing could be done conclusively, I had only to assure him that I should be ready to meet him whenever he might be prepared, which I hoped would be immediately after the holidays. From what I can discern, I think that there is much reason to believe that Mr. Fox has the best disposition to settle our differences on just principles; but it must be recollected that some other of the members of the cabinet have not always thought with him on such topics. On the most deliberate reflection I am convinced that too much reliance ought not to be placed on these favorable appearances, and that there is cause to fear that if the Congress should separate without adopting a system of coercive policy, calculated to meet the most unfavorable result, their forbearance may contribute to the disappointment of our reasonable expectations. By this, however, I do not wish to imply that measures of the kind alluded to should be carried into prompt execution. I mean only that the attitude should be taken, but its operation be suspended, by suitable powers to the President, till he shall be duly notified that the negotiation has failed. Such a suspension will be deemed a sufficient mark of respect to those in the ministry who are disposed to a fair accommodation, and the attitude will, in my opinion, tend to aid their councils in producing that effect.

I am, sir, with great respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,
JAMES MONROE.

SIR:

LONDON, April 3, 1806.

As it appeared by what occurred in my interview with Mr. Fox on the 28th ultimo, that some weeks at least would elapse before I could hope to bring our business to any conclusion, I thought it proper to make a formal application to him on the 31st, for an order to suspend the seizure and condemnation of our vessels on the principle of the late decrees. I had not requested this in explicit terms before, because I hoped from what passed in our first interview, that the whole affair would have been concluded much sooner. I was fearful, too, that if the demand should be granted, it would become a reason why nothing more should be done. This latter reason, it is true, still remains in some degree in force, if, indeed, it had any weight at first. It was, however, outweighed by the consideration that the seizures were continued, and that I ought not, on a mere speculative point of expedience, as to the effect which such an application might have on the general question, to delay any longer my utmost exertion to put an end to the practice.

There were also some other considerations which prevented my making the application sooner, which had ceased, if they did not furnish motives, for making it in the present stage. The new ministry had a just claim to sufficient time to become acquainted with the merits of the question, and even to sound the Parliament on it, before it could be expected to take any step in the business. Had I made the demand at an earlier period I thought I should incur the imputation of a want of candor, without a reasonable prospect of hastening a decision, unless, indeed, by urging it unseasonably, I might promote an improper one. To Mr. Fox, especially, much attention was due in the mode of proceeding, on account of his character and principles in reference to our country, which are known to be just and liberal. It seemed probable that, by respecting that sentiment towards him in the measures taken, his feelings would be gratified and his mind conciliated, which could not otherwise than produce a good effect. His exertions on topics in which the United States were interested form an important trait in his political life, and it was evident, in our first and subsequent interviews, that he looked back on them with interest and satisfaction. This, therefore, formed a special motive for giving time and acting with delicacy in the business. At this period, however, the application seemed to be free from all these objections, while it had become obviously my duty to make it by the considerations stated in my note.

How the cabinet is disposed in this question it is not in my power to state. Some of its members are known to have differed with Mr. Fox, in respect to the policy of Great Britain towards the United States, on former occasions and in similar cases. It is possible that the spirit of conciliation on which the ministry is formed may be felt in the present one. Every view, however, which I have been able to take of the subject confirms me in the justice of the remarks which were communicated to you in my last of the 31st ultimo.

I enclose you a copy of a letter from Mr. Guillemard, claiming his compensation as fifth commissioner under the treaty of 1794, to the period of the dissolution of the Board, to which I promised to obtain him your answer. I have the pleasure also to send you a copy of my correspondence with the house of Baring & Co., at the instance of General Lafayette, on a subject interesting to him. As they have furnished him the accommodation which he desired, from considerations which cannot fail to be satisfactory to our Government, I hope the President will be disposed to secure, so far as depends on him, their ultimate reimbursement out of the land which has been granted to him by the Congress.

The house of Baring & Co. having lately presented to me a statement of my drafts from the continent, for my support and that of my family there, I have, after deducting a portion of what was on no principle chargeable to the United States, certified a sum which I wished to be allowed in their account with the Government. Other deductions are still to be made on the same principle, which will diminish the charge to the public, in any view incident to that business. These I propose to make on my return home, and, in the interim, I must stand in the account indebted to the public. You will observe that the salary of the Secretary, his travelling expenses, those of the messenger to Paris, and other charges, are comprised in the statement. I have flattered myself that the same principle, which was applied to Mr. Pinckney ten years past, when the expense of living was much less, would be extended to me. It is far from my intention, however, to make any difficulty on this point, having in truth no right to do it, and, from many considerations very interesting to me, most certainly not the disposition.

I am, sir, with great respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

[Enclosure.]

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Fox.

Mr. Monroe presents his compliments to Mr. Fox, and has the honor to send him a copy of an American essay containing an examination of the principle on which the Admiralty has lately condemned the vessels of the United States. As this work is written with great ability and candor, Mr. Monroe flatters himself that Mr. Fox will take the trouble to give it an attentive perusal.

Mr. Monroe has been much gratified by the assurances which Mr. Fox has given him in their several interviews of his disposition to adjust the differences between their Governments on the most just and liberal principles. He has high confidence in these assurances and in the prospect they afford of an early accomplishment of their object. In consideration, however, of the great length of time which has elapsed since the commencement of the seizures, and of that which will be required to complete the business, he deems it his duty to submit to Mr. Fox whether it will not be proper that his Majesty's Government should suspend the seizure and condemnation of American vessels on the principle in question. Mr. Monroe presumes that such a suspension, in any case where one of the parties to an amicable negotiation was suffering very extensive injuries under the operation of a principle which they were desirous to adjust, would be proper. In the present one, however, it seems to him to be made peculiarly so by a late decision of the Lords Commissioners of Appeals, in the case of William Trefrey, which confirms the principles of the former decisions, which have been, as Mr. Monroe presumes, so justly complained of by his Government. He apprehends that this decision, unless followed by the suspension proposed, will be considered by the United States and his Majesty's cruisers, as a sanction by the present Government to the policy which has been heretofore pursued. In case His Majesty's Government thinks proper to adopt the measure which is requested, Mr. Monroe hopes that Mr. Fox will be so good as to give him early notice of it, that he may transmit it to his Government without delay.

SIR:

I received yesterday a note from Mr. Fox appointing to-morrow (Saturday 19th,) for an interview, with which I shall of course comply. I met him afterwards and had a conversation with him in the Queen's drawing room, which, being of an interesting nature, I hasten to communicate to you. He took me aside, and observed that we must now soon settle our business. I replied, that I hoped he was ready to do it. He intimated that he was so essentially; that we would begin it on Saturday and pursue it without delay until it was concluded. Some remarks of his having led the conversation to the merits of the principal topic, I told him that he must leave us in the enjoyment of the trade in question, and pay us for the property taken. To the first proposition he immediately assented. To the second he said there would be objections. He added that he had taken steps to prohibit the further condemnation of our vessels and cargoes, as I had desired, of which he intended to have informed me by note, but had been prevented by other business; he had no objection, however, still to do it. I cannot be positive whether he said that the prohibition extended also to the seizure of our vessels, though I rather think it did. When I see him to-morrow I shall easily ascertain this. He observed that we must make some arrangements to accommodate them in return; that the practice of buying, or pretending to buy, enemy's vessels, as was done in the north, ought to be suppressed, and he hoped that I would join him in it. I said that we would do all we could to prevent fraudulent practices; that such purchases were rarely made by our citizens, as we were rather sellers than purchasers of ships. He considered it in that light, and I found wished some precedent from us, which might avail him in the north, and make more acceptable at home the accommodation given us in other respects. I left this topic open, having said nothing to compromit myself on it. As the whole of this conversation, though apart, was, nevertheless, in a public room, full of company, it was impossible to make it more precise. I could not therefore attempt to ascertain to what length he was willing to leave the commerce with enemies' colonies free. I shall doubtless collect his idea on that point to-morrow, since it seems best to hear his proposition before I say any thing on it, and I shall not fail in any case to attend to your instruction of January 13th.

I have sent you two copies of a pamphlet, entitled "An Inquiry into the State of the Nation," &c. which is attributed to Lord Holland, and as I presume with reason. It breathes very liberal sentiments towards the United States, and in regard to them, as to other objects, is probably intended to prepare the public mind for the system of policy adopted by the present ministry. It looks towards a general peace and may be written to promote it. Communications have taken place between this Government and that of France lately, which are supposed to touch that subject; but as I know nothing on it which the papers do not contain, it is useless for me to hazard conjectures on facts which are of a general character and equally well known to you.

I am, sir, with great respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

P. S. I have also sent you a work of Lord Sheffield's, which treats much on our subject. He appears to have worked himself up to a pitch of great passion, and to misstate facts so obvious to detection, as to allow that apology for it.

The 13th January is the date of the last letter I have from you.

SIR:

I have the pleasure to inform you that I had an interview with Mr. Fox yesterday, in which we conferred on all the interesting topics depending between our Governments. The result was as satisfactory in respect to his own views as his more early communications had promised, and gave a prospect more favorable of the disposition of the cabinet generally than I had anticipated. The substance of what passed in our conference of the 17th was fully confirmed in this, and his sentiments on some points on which I had not then clearly understood them were made more explicit. The prohibition mentioned in my letter of the 18th is to be extended to the seizure as well as the condemnation of our vessels, of which he is to give me official notice in a day or two. On the principle, there seems to be no question between us but in respect to the direct trade between the colony and the parent country. To the justice of our claim of indemnity he said little, but I see that it is a point which the ministry will find it difficult to concede, from a variety of considerations. I am, however, not without the hope that it may be placed on a satisfactory footing. He expressed a desire to take up the subject of commerce generally, more especially in respect to the West Indies, the intercourse between which and the United States he thought it important to both countries to arrange at this time. I showed a willingness to meet him on the general subject or any part of it, on which we could agree. The sentiments which he expressed on this and every other subject to which our conversation extended, were of a very liberal kind, and communicated with frankness and candor. He admitted that it ought not to be expected that the United States would allow their productions and resources which were necessary to the existence of the West India colonies, to be drawn from them otherwise than on fair principles of reciprocity. It was finally agreed that he should write me a second letter, which would be in reply to those I had written to Lord Mulgrave, in which he would explain the views of his Government on the subject of them. He promised to write this letter in a week or ten days if not prevented by unexpected events. This letter will of course lay the foundation, on the part of his Government, of the negotiation.

I am, sir, with great respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 23, 1806.

SIR:

Your last letter bears date on the 12th of February. Those of the 18th October, 11th, 26th November, 11th and 23d December, and 28th January, had been previously received.

Congress adjourned the evening before the last. The gazettes before and herewith sent will give you a general view of the proceedings of the session. As soon as the laws passed shall be ready, a complete copy of them will be forwarded. For the present I enclose only a copy of the act shutting our market, after the 15th November next, against certain articles of British manufacture. Notwithstanding the hope that the new ministers of Great Britain bring into the cabinet dispositions more just and favorable to the United States than their predecessors, it was thought most consistent both with self-respect and with sound policy not to allow a change of persons, without an actual or promised change of measures, to arrest the meditated course of remedial provisions. You will not fail, however, by due explanations, to guard the act against the imputation of motives and views of a nature to excite feelings on the other side, unfriendly to a fair estimate of their true interests. You may with confidence affirm, that a resort to such a manifestation of the sensibility of this country to wrongs so long continued, and of late so grievously extended, has been had with the most sincere reluctance; and that nothing is necessary on the part of Great Britain, to smooth the way to perfect cordiality, and to all the beneficial intercourses of commerce, but a redress, which the United States are willing to limit to the clearest demands of justice and right. As a proof of their solicitude to bring about a final and amicable adjustment of all points in question between the two countries, and of their readiness to establish the principles of navigation and commerce in a form that will extend the latter, and render the former no longer a source of discord, the measure has been adopted of appointing yourself, and Mr. Pinkney, of Baltimore, commissioners extraordinary and plenipotentiary for those purposes. The objects of the appointment, as described in the terms of it, are "to settle all matters of difference between the United States and the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, relative to wrongs committed between the parties on the high seas, or other waters, and for establishing the principles of navigation and commerce between them."

No time will be lost in preparing the instructions for your joint negotiation; and Mr. Pinkney will doubtless not fail to be ready to embark with as little delay as possible.

With great respect, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, April 28, 1806.

SIR:

Having waited a week after my interview with Mr. Fox, on the 19th, without receiving either of the communications which he then promised me, I called on him on the 25th to know the cause, and to confer freely again on our affairs, if he should be so disposed. As he anticipated the object of the visit, we soon entered on it. After some introductory remarks on other topics, he began by asking what was the minimum of our demands respecting the seizures? Could we not agree in some modification of our respective pretensions, some compromise? For example, to adopt some plan which might answer our object without compromising his Government. As I perceived that he alluded principally to our claim to an indemnity, I observed, that if the principle was admitted to be with us, the indemnity followed of course. But, says he, cannot we agree to suspend our rights, and leave you, in a satisfactory mode, the enjoyment of the trade? In that case, nothing would be said about the principle, and there would be no claim to an indemnity. I told him that I could not agree to such an adjustment; that the right was unquestionably with us; the injury had been severe and unprovoked, and that we could not abandon our claim in either case. He entered into such a view of the subject as showed a disposition to yield what accommodation he could, in a manner the least objectionable on his part. He did not seem desirous of dis-curring the question of right, nor did he deny that an indemnity was fairly incident to it. He then asked, how the fact stood relative to the continuity of the voyage? On what ground did the charges rest of the Congress having made regulations to evade the principle insisted on by the Court of Admiralty? I replied, on none whatever; that the question of continuity had never occurred between our Governments; that it was a creature of the Court of Admiralty, who had set it up as doctrine, and supported it by such charges to justify the condemnation; that my Government had never admitted the right in his to impose any restraint on the trade of neutrals with enemies' colonies, other than with the parent country; that his Government had repeatedly admitted and established that claim by the most solemn acts, as had been proved by the documents in his possession; that he must be sensible if my Government was capable, in any case, of passing acts to evade a principle, it would not do it in the present one, where it could only serve to create doubts to the prejudice of the United States, and by giving a new sanction to the former pretensions of his Government, revive a controversy which had been already amicably settled in their favor. I added, that I possessed an official document which fully proved what I had advanced, respecting our regulations, which, with his permission, I would send him; he expressed a desire to receive it. Well, says he, I perceive that your minimum and maximum are the same. I replied, that I did not see how it could be otherwise; that we only sought what was strictly just, and ought not to be desired to relinquish any portion of that. He then proceeded to insist that our vessels which should be engaged in that commerce must enter our ports, their cargoes be landed, and the duties paid on them. I said that such restraints were incompatible with our just rights. He urged, also, that we must unite in a plan to prevent the fraudulent sale and use of enemies' vessels. I was apprehensive that any stipulation on that head might lay the foundation of new disputes. He thought we were interested, as ship-builders, in suppressing such frauds; besides, says he, you must yield something to justify the concessions that are expected from us. I told him that I should be glad to see his project, or that he would answer my letters in such a manner as to lay the foundation of a treaty. He assured me that he would do so as soon as he could, but as he had failed to comply with his former promise, he was afraid to make another as to time, but gave me reason to expect one in a week or ten days. As I had cause to suspect from his remarks on the whole subject, that an order to prohibit the seizure and condemnation of our vessels had not been issued, I asked him explicitly the question. He said that none had been issued; that, in truth, such a step would be to give up the point in negotiation. I inferred, however, that the measures which he informed me, on the 17th and 19th, he had taken for that purpose, were of a nature to produce the desired effect; these are, I suppose, confidential in the cabinet with the Court of Admiralty, &c. The order itself has most probably been withheld for the present, that it might be connected with the general subject, on the principle above adverted to by Mr. Fox. I could not, however, push the inquiry on that point further at the time, from motives of delicacy to him, nor did there appear to be any strong reason for it. I cannot suppose that nothing is done in that respect, and am persuaded that the business is so far advanced, that, if intended, as I presume, the order must soon be issued.

On the day after the interview above mentioned, I sent Mr. Fox a copy of Mr. Gallatin's letter to you, explaining the mode of entering goods and paying the duties on them in the United States, as I had promised. I had not done this to Lord Mulgrave, because the state of the business with him would have given it the air of a concession on my part. I availed myself of the opportunity to state explicitly, that I could not enter into any adjustment which did not provide a reasonable indemnity for injuries. It seemed to me obvious, that that claim formed a principal difficulty in the cabinet; and I was persuaded that it might have a good effect to give him what would be considered the ultimatum on it. I have not heard from Mr. Fox since, though it is presumable that I soon shall, for I do not suspect him of the want of good faith in his communications with me. It is proper, however, to add, that, independent of the real importance of the subject, and the responsibility incident to any concessions which may be made in our favor by the present ministry of the pretensions of the former, circumstances which are likely to inspire caution and create delay in the cabinet, the additional one of his being a member of the House of Commons for the management of the prosecution of Lord Melville, cannot fail to increase it. I shall, nevertheless, do every thing in my power, consistent with propriety, to bring the business to as early a conclusion as possible; and to comprise in the adjustment, in the manner enjoined by my instructions, the important questions respecting our seamen and boundaries.

You will observe, that Mr. Fox insisted, in the late interview, on restricting the trade with enemies' colonies in a greater degree than he had done in the preceding one. I am convinced that this was produced by the cabinet deliberations on the subject; for I am strong in the opinion, that, if left to himself, he would meet in arrangements, which would place the whole business, and, indeed, all our relations, on the most broad and liberal basis; in a firm belief that, by so doing, he would advance the best interests of his country. But he has to consult and accommodate with others, some of whom may, perhaps, not entertain, in all respects, the same sentiments, or be equally prepared to encounter in a new scheme of policy ancient and deep-rooted prejudices. When I get his answer, I may remind him of his former concession in this respect, if it should appear that any advantage was likely to result from it. I shall not fail, however, to pay great attention to this particular object, and will certainly not agree to any restraint on the trade which can be avoided, or is likely to be disapproved by the President.

I am, sir, with great respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,

JAS. MONROE.

[Enclosed in Mr. Monroe's of 28th April, 1805.]

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Fox.

PRINCE'S STREET, April 26, 1806.

Mr. Monroe presents his compliments to Mr. Fox, and has the honor to enclose him a copy of the official document mentioned in their interview of yesterday, being a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Secretary of State, explaining the manner in which duties are paid on goods imported into and exported from the United States. Mr. Fox will find by this document that the regulations respecting that subject are uniform, and applicable to all articles exported, and that they were not adopted to favor any particular commerce, as has been erroneously supposed. Mr. Fox will be the more sensible of this fact when he recollects that the Government of the United States never admitted the right in Great Britain to inhibit the commerce in question; that, on the contrary, it had concluded, on the highest possible evidence, as is proved by the papers in Mr. Fox's possession, that Great Britain had relinquished the pretension.

Mr. Monroe considers it his duty to observe to Mr. Fox, that as his Government thinks itself entitled to the commerce referred to, and that the citizens of the United States have been injured by the attack which has been made on it by His Majesty's cruisers and privateers, under circumstances, too, that were peculiarly calculated to inspire a confidence in their security, his instructions forbid his entering into any adjustment which does not look to the object of a reasonable compensation. He makes this communication with candor, in the hope that Mr. Fox will take it into consideration in the answer which he has been so good as to promise him at an early day.

Mr. Monroe flatters himself that His Majesty's Government will be animated by a sincere desire to meet the Government of the United States in such an arrangement as will establish the relations of the two countries on a ground of permanent friendship, and that it will be of opinion, independent of the satisfaction to be derived from rendering justice to a friendly Power which it has injured without provocation, that the recompense due to the sufferers is but a trifling consideration when compared with so great a national object. Mr. Monroe hopes that Mr. Fox will see the propriety of placing this business in his answer on such grounds as may promise a satisfactory adjustment of it, and for the reasons stated in his note of the 31st ultimo, that his Majesty's Government will not hesitate in the present stage to prohibit the further seizure and condemnation of American vessels on the principle in question.

Extract.—Mr. Madison to Mr. Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 15, 1806.

SIR:

Since my last of the 23d of April, I have received your several letters of the 20th February and 11th March.

This will be put into the hands of Mr. Pinkney, whose appointment jointly with you, by a commission extraordinary, has been already communicated, and who proceeds to London with the powers and instructions for carrying the joint commission into effect. This you will find embraces a larger field of negotiation and convention than fell within the instructions heretofore given you in your capacity of minister plenipotentiary alone. The commission extraordinary, therefore, will not be without important objects, even if those previously committed to yourself should fortunately have been obtained. Mr. Pinkney carries with him also a commission and letter of credence as your successor, in case you should persist in your intention of returning after the occasion which suspended it shall be over. A letter of farewell also for yourself goes by him, of the same provisional character.

As the joint commission does not include the subject of the convention of limits not yet acceded to by Great Britain, as varied by the Senate here, it will remain with you alone, or your successor, to continue the endeavors to bring that business to a conclusion. If any repugnance should be shown to the erasure of the fifth article as proposed by the Senate, and thereby leaving unsettled for the present the boundaries in the northwest quarter of the Union, and preference should be given to a proviso against any constructive effect of the Louisiana convention on the intention of the parties at the signature of the depending convention, you may concur in the alteration with a view to bring the subject in that form before the ratifying authority of the United States.

I must observe to you, however, that either another proviso, or a clear understanding to the same effect, or at least an understanding that the question is open for future settlement, will be proper in order to supersede pretensions which the British Government may otherwise found on their possession of the island of Grand Menau, and the silence of the instrument with respect to it. This island is of considerable extent, is clearly within the general limits of the United States as fixed by the treaty of peace, and is understood not to be within the exception made by the treaty of islands appurtenant to Nova Scotia, since all such islands must be either west, east, or north of the coast of that province, and within six leagues thereof; whereas the island of Grand Menau is nearly due south of the nearest part of the coast, and is either in the whole, or with the exception of a mere point, beyond the distance of six leagues. No just title can therefore be alleged on the British side, and care would have been taken to guard against a pretended one, by a clause to that effect, if the facts of British settlement and the exercise of British jurisdiction had been known at the time. The documents now transmitted will sufficiently explain the subject, and enable you to annex a proper clause to the convention. One of these documents will give you a view, at the same time, of a late case in which an American vessel, bringing plaster of Paris from Nova Scotia to the United States, was condemned. In strictness of law the condemnation may have been not objectionable, but considering the continuance of the trade for a length of time, and the official sanction added to the usage, the case makes a very strong appeal to the equity and liberality of the British Government. The dependence of the British settlements in that quarter on supplies from the United States more essential to them than plaster is to us, suggests other considerations not unworthy of attention. These, however, will be brought most advantageously into view in one of the branches of the joint negotiation.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, Ministers Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the United States in London.

GENTLEMEN:

I herewith enclose a commission and letters of credence, authorizing you to treat with the British Government concerning the maritime wrongs which have been committed, and the regulation of commerce and navigation between the parties. Your authority is made several as well as joint, as a provision for any contingency depriving either of the co-operation of the other.

The importance of the trust is evinced by its being made the occasion of an extraordinary mission as well as by the subjects which it embraces. And I have great pleasure in expressing the confidence which the President feels in the prudence and talents to which the business is committed.

It is his particular wish that the British Government should be made fully to understand that the United States are sincerely and anxiously disposed to cherish good-will and liberal intercourse between the two nations; that an unwillingness alone to take measures not congenial with that disposition has made them so long patient under violations of their rights and of the rules of a friendly reciprocity; and when forced at length by accumulating wrongs to depart from an absolute forbearance, they have not only selected a mode strictly pacific, but, in demonstration of their friendly policy, have connected with the measure an extraordinary mission, with powers to remove every source of difference, and even to enlarge the foundations of future harmony and mutual interest.

There can be the less ground of umbrage to the British Government in the act, prohibiting the importation of certain articles of British manufacture, 1st. Because there is nothing on the face of the act beyond a mere commercial regulation, tending to foster manufactures in the United States, to lessen our dependence on a single nation by the distribution of our trade, and to substitute for woollens and linens manufactures made from one of principal agricultural staples. 2dly. Because it is far short of a reciprocity, with British exclusions of American articles of export. 3d. Because, as a commercial measure discriminating in time of war between British and other nations, it has examples in British practice. It deserves attention, also, that a discrimination was made, and under another name still exists, in the amount of convoy-duty imposed on the trade between Great Britain with Europe and with America. 4th. Because the measure cannot be ascribed to a partiality towards the enemies of Great Britain, or to a view of favoring them in the war; having for its sole object the interest of the United States, which it pursues in a mode strictly conformable to the rights and the practice of all nations.

To observations of this kind it may be useful to add that the measure was undertaken before the late change in the British ministry, and does not therefore imply any particular distrust of the views of the new one, but merely a belief that it was most consistent with self-respect not to be diverted by an occurrence of that nature from a ground which had been deliberately and publicly assumed; not to mention that no assurances sufficiently decisive had been received, that a disposition to correct the evil in question predominated in the present cabinet, whilst it was known that some of its most distinguished members have heretofore been among the warmest champions of the maritime doctrines in which those evils have their origin.

In one respect the act may even be favorable to the objects of the present cabinet, if it should be disposed to make unpopular concessions refused by their predecessors, since concessions alone can now regain a lost market for certain important and popular classes of British manufactures.

In fine, the act may truly be represented as so far from derogating from the amicable dispositions of the United States towards Great Britain, that it has resulted solely from the inefficacy of their protracted and reiterated endeavors otherwise to obtain a just redress, and from a hope that an appeal, in this peaceable form, to the reflections and interests of an enlightened nation would be more successful in removing every obstacle to a perfect and permanent cordiality between the two nations.

The instructions given to Mr. Monroe, January 5, 1804, having taken into view, and being still applicable to a great proportion of the matter now committed to your joint negotiations, it will be most convenient to refer you to those instructions as your general guide, and to confine the present to the alterations and additions, which a change of circumstances, or a contemplation of new objects, may require.

The first article of the project comprised in the instructions of 1804 relates to the impressment of seamen. The importance of an effectual remedy for this practice derives urgency from the licentiousness with which it is still pursued, and from the growing impatience of this country under it. So indispensable is some adequate provision for the case, that the President makes it a necessary preliminary to any stipulation requiring a repeal of the act shutting the market of the United States against certain British manufactures. At the same time he authorizes you, in case the ultimatum, as stated in the article above referred to, should not be acceptable to the British Government, to substitute one in the terms following: "No seamen nor seafaring persons shall, upon the high seas, and without the jurisdiction of either party, be demanded or taken out of any ship or vessel belonging to the citizens or subjects of one of the parties, by the public or private armed ships or men of war, belonging to or in the service of the other party; and strict orders shall be given for the due observance of this engagement."

An article in these terms was, with the acquiescence of Lord Hawkesbury and Mr. Addington, concerted between Mr. King and Lord St. Vincent, on the approaching renewal of the late war. It was frustrated by an exception of the "narrow seas," inserted by Lord St. Vincent; an exception so evidently inadmissible both in principle and in practice, that it must have been intended as a pretext for evading the stipulation at that time. Perhaps the present ministry may neither be disposed to resort to such a pretext, nor unwilling to avail themselves of the precise sanction as far as it was given by their predecessors.

With respect to contraband, which is the subject of the fourth article, it may be observed, that as it excludes naval stores from the list, and is otherwise limited to articles strictly military, it must, if admissible to Great Britain, leave but feeble objections to an abolition of contraband altogether. In the present state of the arts in Europe, with the intercourse by land, no nation at war with Great Britain can be much embarrassed by leaving those particular articles subject to maritime capture. Whilst belligerent nations, therefore, have little interest in the limited right against contraband, it imposes on neutrals all the evils resulting from suspicious and vexatious searches, and from questions incident to the terms used in the actual enumeration. It is not an unreasonable hope, therefore, that, in place of this article, an entire abolition of contraband may be substituted. Should this be found unattainable, it may be an improvement of the article as it stands to subjoin, for the sake of greater caution, to the positive enumeration a negative specification of certain articles, such as provisions, money, naval stores, &c. as in no case to be deemed within the meaning of the article, with a proviso that the specification shall not be construed to imply in the least that any articles not specified in the exception shall on that account be liable to be drawn into question.

A doctrine has been lately introduced by the British courts, and at length adopted by the instructions of June, 1803, to British cruisers, which regards contraband conveyed in one voyage as affecting a resumed or return voyage, although the contraband shall have been previously deposited at its port of destination. It will be a further improvement of the article to insert a declaratory clause against this innovation and the abuses incident to it.

The fourth article, besides the stipulation on the subject of contraband, relates to two other subjects: 1st, That of free ships free goods; 2d, That of a trade with enemies' colonies.

1st. With respect to the first, the principle that a neutral flag covers the property of an enemy is relinquished, in pursuance of the example of the Russian treaty, on which the article is modelled; the relinquishment, however, being connected with and conditioned on the provision required in favor of the neutral right to the colonial trade. The importance of that principle to the security of neutral commerce and to the freedom of the seas has at all times been felt by the United States; and, although they have not asserted it as the established law of nations, they have ever been anxious to see it made a part of that law. It was with reluctance, of course, that a contrary stipulation was authorized, and merely as a means of obtaining from Great Britain the recognition of a principle now become of more importance to neutral nations possessing mercantile capital than the principle of "free ships free goods." It is to be particularly kept in view, therefore, that such a contrary stipulation is to be avoided, if possible; and if unavoidable, that the stipulation be so modified as to interfere as little as possible with the spirit and policy of any provisions in favor of the principle which may be likely to be introduced into a treaty of peace among the present belligerent Powers of Europe. Should it be known that Russia as well as France mean to insist on such a provision, and that such a stipulation by the United States, however modified, will materially affect her confidence and good-will towards them, the objection to the measure will acquire a force that can yield only to the consideration that, without such a sacrifice, the provisions for the security of our seamen and of our neutral commerce cannot be obtained, and that the sacrifice will effectually answer these purposes.

2d. The vast importance of the colonial trade, with the circumstances and the excitement which have taken place since the date of the original instructions to Mr. Monroe, will require that the neutral right on this subject be provided for in an appropriate article, and in terms more explicit than are used in the article under review. As the right in this case turns on the general principle that neutrals may lawfully trade, with the exceptions of blockades and contraband, to and between all ports of an enemy, and in all articles, although the trade shall not have been open to them in time of peace, particular care is to be taken that no part of the principle be expressly or virtually abandoned, as being no part of the law of nations. On the contrary, it is much to be desired that the general principle, in its full extent, be laid down in the stipulation. But as this may not be attainable, and as too much ought not to be risked by an inflexible pursuit of abstract right, especially against the example and the sentiments of great Powers having concurrent interests with the United States, you are left at liberty, if found necessary, to abridge the right in practice, as is done in the supplement of October, 1801, to the treaty of June of that year between Russia and Great Britain; not omitting to provide that, in case Great Britain should, by her treaties or instructions, leave to any other nation the right in a greater extent than it is stipulated to the United States, they may claim the enjoyment of it in an equal extent.

The abuses which have been committed by Great Britain, under the pretext that a neutral trade from enemy colonies, through neutral ports, was a direct trade, render it indispensable to guard against such a pretext by some express declaration on that point. The most that can be conceded on the part of the United States is, that the landing of the goods, the securing the duties, and the change of the ship, or, preferably, the landing of the goods alone, or with the securing the duties, shall be requisite to destroy the identity of the voyage and the directness of the trade; and that the ordinary documents of the customhouse officers shall be sufficient evidence of the facts or fact.

A satisfactory provision on this subject of a trade with enemy colonies is deemed of so much consequence to the rights and interests of the United States, and is so well understood to have been contemplated, along with a like provision against the impressment of seamen, in the late act of Congress prohibiting the importation of certain classes of British manufactures, that, as was enjoined with respect to the provision against impressment, no stipulation is to be entered into not consistent with a continuance of that act, unless the provision with respect to the colonial trade be also obtained.

In remodelling the provision with respect to the colonial trade, you may, with great propriety, urge a distinction between the West India colonies and the very distant ones in the East Indies, and elsewhere, and the reasonableness of limiting to the former the exception of the direct trade with their parent countries out of the general neutral right. The distinction is supported by several considerations, particularly by the greater difficulty in the case of the more distant colonies, of previously knowing, and eventually proving, the regulations as they may have actually stood in time of peace, and by the ruinous delays and expenses attending the judicial investigations. The British courts have, in fact, admitted the distinction so far as to presume the lawfulness of the neutral trade with the East India colonies, as being generally open in peace as well as war, whilst they reverse the presumption with respect to the West Indies.

In addition to what is proposed on the subject of blockades in the sixth and seventh articles, the perseverance of Great Britain in considering a notification of a blockade, and even of an intended blockade, to a foreign Government, or its ministers at London, as a notice to its citizens, and as rendering a vessel, wherever found in a destination to the notified port, liable to capture, calls for a special remedy. The palpable injustice of the practice is aggravated by the auxiliary rule prevailing in the British courts, that the blockade is to be held in legal force until the Governmental notifications be expressly rescinded, however certain the fact may be that the blockade was never formed, or had ceased. You will be at no loss for topics to enforce the inconsistency of these innovations with the law of nations, with the nature of blockades, with the safety of neutral commerce, and particularly with the communication made to this Government by order of the British Government in the year 1804, according to which, the British commanders and Vice-admiralty courts were instructed not to consider any blockade of the islands of Martinique and Gaudaloupe as existing, unless in respect of particular ports which may actually be invested, and then not to capture vessels bound to such ports, unless they shall previously have been warned not to enter them.

The absurdity of substituting such diplomatic notifications in place of a special warning from the blockading ships, cannot be better illustrated than by the fact, that before the notification of a proposed blockade of Cadiz, in the year 1805, was received here from our minister at London, official information was received from Cadiz that the blockade had actually been raised by an enemy's fleet.

It may be worth your attention that a distinction has been admitted by the British prize courts, in consideration of the distance of the United States from the European blockades, between their citizens and those of States less distant; the notice required for the former, being more positive than is made necessary for the latter. You will be able to avail yourselves in the discussion, and perhaps in the modification of the article, of the reasons on which such a distinction rests.

The instructions in the hands of Mr. Monroe are silent with respect to convoys. If the footing on which the neutral right on that subject is placed by the Russian and British treaty of 1801, can be turned to advantage in your negotiations, and should be understood to coincide with the present way of thinking of Russia, and other maritime Powers, an article corresponding with the regulations in that treaty may be admitted. But as the United States are not in the practice of convoying their trade, nor likely to be so within the period of any stipulation now to be made, and as the progress of opinion is rather favorable than discouraging to the enlargement of neutral rights, it is not, in a general view, desirable that any stipulation, such as Great Britain will probably admit, should, at this time, be entered into. In whatever arrangement on the subject, limiting the protecting right of public ships of war, may be deemed expedient, you will be careful so to express the limitation that it may be applied to the exercise of the right without affecting the abstract right itself.

There remains, as an object of great importance, some adequate provision against the insults and injuries committed by British cruisers in the vicinity of our shores and harbors. These have been heretofore a topic of remonstrance, and have, in a late instance, been repeated with circumstances peculiarly provoking, as they include the murder of an American seaman within the jurisdictional limits of the United States. Mr. Monroe is in full possession of the documents explaining a former instance. Herewith will be received those relating to the late one. They not only support a just demand of an exemplary punishment of the offenders, and of indemnity for the spoiliations, but call for some stipulations guarding against such outrages in future. With this view, it is proper that all armed belligerent ships should be expressly and effectually restrained from making seizures or searches within a certain distance from our coasts, or taking stations near our harbors commodious for those purposes.

In defining the distance protected against belligerent proceedings, it would not, perhaps, be unreasonable, considering the extent of the United States, the shoalness of their coast, and the natural indication furnished by the well defined path of the Gulf stream, to expect an immunity for the space between that limit and the American shore. But at least it may be insisted that the extent of the neutral immunity should correspond with the claims maintained by Great Britain, around her own territory. Without any particular inquiry into the extent of these, it may be observed, 1st. That the British act of Parliament in the year 1736, 9 G. II. c. 35, supposed to be that called the Hovering Act, assumes, for certain purposes of trade, the distance of four leagues from the shores. 2d. That it appears that, both in the reign of James I, and of Charles II,* the security of the commerce with British ports was provided for by express prohibitions, against the roving or hovering of belligerent ships so near the neutral harbors and coasts of Great Britain, as to disturb or threaten vessels homeward or outward bound, as well as against belligerent proceedings generally, within an inconvenient approach towards British territory.

With this example, and with a view to what is suggested by our own experience, it may be expected that the British Government will not refuse to concur in an article to the following effect:

"It is agreed that all armed vessels belonging to either of the parties engaged in war, shall be effectually restrained by positive orders, and penal provisions, from seizing, searching, or otherwise interrupting or disturbing vessels to whomsoever belonging, whether outward or inward bound, within the harbors or the chambers formed by headlands, or any where at sea, within the distance of four leagues from the shore, or from a right line from one headland to another; it is further agreed, that, by like orders and provisions, all armed vessels shall be effectually restrained by the party to which they respectively belong, from stationing themselves, or from roving or hovering so near the entry of any of the harbors or coasts of the other, as that merchantmen shall apprehend their passage to be unsafe, or in danger of being set upon and surprised; and that in all cases where death shall be occasioned by any proceeding contrary to these stipulations, and the offender cannot conveniently be brought to trial and punishment under the laws of the party offended, he shall, on demand made within ——— months, be delivered up for that purpose."

If the distance of four leagues cannot be obtained, any distance not less than one sea league may be substituted in the article. It will occur to you that the stipulation against the roving and hovering of armed ships on our coasts so as to endanger or alarm trading vessels, will acquire importance as the space entitled to immunity shall be narrowed.

Another object not comprehended in the instructions of 1804 to Mr. Monroe, is rendered important by the number of illegal captures and injuries which have been committed by British cruisers since that date. An indemnity for them is due on every consideration of justice and friendship, and is enforced by the example heretofore given by Great Britain herself, as well as by other nations which have provided by treaty for repairing the spoiliations practised under color of their authority. You will press this as an object too reasonable not to be confidently expected by the United States; many of the claims, indeed, for indemnification, are so obviously just, that a refusal to satisfy them cannot be decently made, and ought not, therefore, to be presumed.

The two modes most readily presenting themselves, for a comprehensive provision for the claims, are, first, the establishment of a board analogous to that provided for in the 7th article of the treaty of 1794; secondly, the substitution of a gross sum to be distributed among the claimants according to a liquidation to be made under the authority of the United States.

The second is the mode most eligible, if the gross sum to be allowed be thought to approach the amount of losses to be indemnified. To assist you in estimating these, the statements addressed to this department by the underwriters and others, are herewith transmitted. These statements, with those furnished by Mr. Lyman, to November 1, will have to be reduced according to the redress which shall have been judicially afforded, and on the other hand to be augmented by the addition of cases not reported here, and to be collected from the sources of information within your own reach.

If the first mode should be adopted, great care will be requisite, in describing the cases, to employ such general terms as will comprehend all that are fairly entitled to redress. It will be well at the same time to secure, by specifying, such of the cases as can be specified, and as are least susceptible of objection. Under this head may be classed, 1st. Cases in which the official communication made by Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. King, of the 11th day of April, 1801, has been violated. 2d. Cases in which the rules of blockade, stated in Mr. Merry's communication to the Department of State, on the 12th day of April, 1804, have been violated. 3d. Cases where the territorial jurisdiction of the United States has been violated.

The list of neutral rights asserted in the report of the Secretary of State to the President, on the 25th day of January, 1806, will suggest other specifications which may be attempted. It may be worth recollecting that the British order of Council, bearing date 24th June, 1803, and subjecting to capture vessels on a return voyage which had carried contraband in the outward voyage, was never promulged, nor was it known that such a rule was to be enforced until the summer of 1805. Could the rule be regarded otherwise than as it certainly is, an innovation on the law of nations? All captures before it was made known, and contrary to antecedent practice, would be marked by an unjust surprise, fairly entitling them to redress.

The business to come before such a Board may be much diminished by the reference of cases, particularly of costs and damages, and such others, whose description, by common consent, entitles them to redress, to the King's advocate, and an advocate to be named on your part, who may be authorized to report the sums due, subject to the approbation, in each case, of Mr. Lyman, our agent. As far as the cases fall within the observation here made, a liquidation of them may be carried on during the period of negotiation.

Although the subject of indemnifications for past wrongs is to be pressed as of great magnitude in a satisfactory adjustment of our differences with Great Britain, yet, as the British Government may be inflexible in refusing an arrangement implying that her maritime principles of capture were contrary to the law of nations, whilst she would not be inflexible in stipulating a future practice conformable to our wishes, it is not thought proper that a provision for indemnities should be an absolute condition of the repeal of the act of Congress concerning British manufactures, provided satisfactory arrangements shall be made relative to impressments, and the trade with enemies' colonies. Still, however, it is to be kept in view, that there are claims founded on acts of British cruisers violating the law of nations, as recognized by Great Britain herself, and others founded on unexpected departures, without notice, from rules of practice deliberately settled, and formally announced. Of these examples have been referred to in the communication of Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. King, and of Mr. Merry to the Department of State.

With respect to claims of these several kinds, it is evident that provision is clearly due for them, and that it may be made without any implication which can alarm the pride, or the caution which may be professed. You will not fail, therefore, to bring, if necessary, these claims into view, as distinguished from others founded on controverted principles, and to let it be understood, that a refusal of them will be a painful ingredient in the negotiations for extinguishing discontents on both sides, and consolidating and perpetuating the friendship between them. In case this distinction should operate in the adjustment, it will furnish an additional reason for preferring a gross sum to the liquidations of a joint Board: First, because it will admit of a liberal sum, if the British Government should be liberally disposed, on presumptions not affecting her maritime principles. Secondly, because it will leave the United States free to apply the gross sum in redressing claims according to our maritime principles. A precedent for such an expedient may be found in the convention of January, 1756, between Great Britain and Prussia, whereby a gross sum of twenty thousand pounds sterling was paid to the latter as an extinguishment of claims on account of illegal captures, without reference to the precise rules by which it was to be applied. The treaty of Pardo, in January 1739, between Great Britain and Spain, is another precedent. In that treaty the sum of ninety-five thousand pounds sterling was stipulated, in the like general manner, to be paid to Great Britain by Spain, as a compromise for all reparations of maritime injuries.

If the United States succeed in making satisfactory arrangements on the principal points of impressments of seamen, colonial trade, and still more, if provision be also made for indemnity for spoliations, it may be naturally expected that Great Britain will require, not only the repeal of the prohibitory act of last session, but also some security that the United States will not, by subsequent acts of the same nature, place her on a worse footing than other nations. She may reasonably urge that demand, on the double plea of having yielded on those points which were the subjects of complaint on the part of the United States, and of her being now, for want of a commercial treaty, placed in that respect at the discretion of the United States; whilst they are precluded by their treaties with the enemies of Great Britain (Holland, France, and Spain) from the power of laying prohibitions or restrictions particularly affecting those nations.

The most natural arrangement in that respect will be simply to agree that the two parties shall enjoy in the ports of each other, in regard to commerce and navigation, the privileges of the most favored nation. But the article should be framed so as to embrace, first, every privilege, and particularly the exemption from higher duties of every description, either on exports or imports, and including convoy duties, that are paid by the most favored nation. Secondly, all the possessions of Great Britain, in every part of the world; which will secure admission at all times in both the East and West Indies, on the same terms as are now, or may in future be, enjoyed by the most favored nation, whether it be a friend or an enemy.

The same clause of the footing of the most favored nation may be extended, not only to navigation and commercial intercourse between the two nations, but to points which relate to the rights and duties of belligerents and neutrals: an arrangement which would secure to Great Britain the same right in relation to the admission of her armed vessels in our ports, and to the exclusion of her enemies' privateers and of their prizes, which are now enjoyed by Holland, Spain, and other most favored nations; whilst it would place the rights of the United States, as neutrals, on the same footing with Russia, or the most favored nation, in respect to search, convoys, blockades, and contraband.

If it shall be thought eligible to place the reciprocal commercial privileges of the two nations on a more definite basis than they would be placed by the general expression of the most favored nation, (a stipulation which is liable to the difficulty of ascertaining the equivalent to be given in cases where a privilege is granted by one of the contracting parties to another nation, in exchange for some favor which the other contracting party cannot specifically give,) it may be done either by abolishing all alien duties, either on vessel or cargo, or both, and reciprocally placing the vessels of the other nation on the same footing with national vessels, conformably to a provision in which Great Britain concurred by an act of Parliament in the year 1802, or by fixing the maximum of alien duty which each nation shall have the right to impose on the vessels or cargoes of the other nation. But should the last plan be adopted, care must be taken, 1. That, in fixing the maximum of the alien duty to be levied on vessels, all charges whatever, and under whatever name known, whether tonnage, light-house money, port charges, &c. shall be included. 2. That the maximum of the alien duty to be levied on merchandise imported in the vessels of the other nation (beyond the duties levied on similar articles imported in the national vessels) shall be a per centage on the value of the merchandise itself, and not on the original duty. 3. That the right of imposing such maximum duties, either on the vessels or merchandise, shall never be exercised so as to contravene the other stipulation of enjoying the privileges of the most favored nation. 4. That the stipulation shall not embrace vessels and cargoes coming from or going to ports from which the vessels or cargoes of the United States are excluded.

Should the expedient of a maximum be adopted, it must not be overlooked that the productions of the United States exported to Great Britain employ a far greater tonnage than the exports from Great Britain to the United States; that the higher the maximum, therefore, the more favorable to Great Britain, who may avail herself, according to the degree of it, to secure to her vessels the carriage of our bulky productions, of which her duty on tobacco imported in American vessels is an example, leaving to the United States the opportunity only of securing to their vessels the carriage of her unbulky exports; and that, consequently, no maximum ought to be admitted more unfavorable to the United States than the regulations likely to prevail, if uncontrolled by treaty. A mutual abolition of alien duties would probably be favorable to the navigation of the United States, which would then have to contend on equal terms with British navigation, for which it may be expected to be a match at least at all times, and more than a match when Great Britain is at war, which is not less than half the time.

The only great branch of commercial intercourse which would remain unprovided for, is that of intercourse with the British colonies and dependencies; and if nothing can be obtained on that ground, care also must be taken, in framing the article, for reciprocally enjoying the privileges of the most favored nation, not to deprive the United States of the right of making such regulations as they may think proper, in relation to vessels coming from ports from which their own vessels are excluded, or in relation generally to the intercourse with such ports.

As the United States confer no particular benefit on the British possessions in the East Indies by their intercourse with that country, it can hardly be expected that Great Britain will grant any thing more than the general stipulation to be placed on the footing of the most favored nation; or possibly a stipulation to the United States of the privileges heretofore granted to foreigners; which, in relation to the country trade, and the trade from India ports to all foreign countries, as well as that owning the vessel, exceeded the privileges stipulated in the treaty of 1794. But, as relates to the West Indies and North American colonies, it must be a permanent object of the United States to have the intercourse with them made as free as that with Europe. The relative situation of the United States and those colonies, and particularly those wants which we can alone supply, must necessarily produce that effect at some no very distant period. And it should not be voluntarily retarded, either by abandoning by treaty the strong hold which our right of stopping the intercourse gives us, or by accepting any temporary or trifling privilege, the exercise of which would diminish the probability of soon obtaining a perfectly free trade.

It is not probable that Great Britain will be disposed to open the intercourse to our vessels with her North American colonies; nor does it appear that any limitation or restriction can be offered by the United States calculated to quiet the apprehension of Great Britain, that to open the trade to our vessels would destroy their own. It is not perceived that any thing else can be proposed but perfect reciprocity, as is contemplated in relation to the intercourse between the United States and the British dominions in Europe; such reciprocity to consist either of a total abolition of alien duties, or of a fixed maximum as above stated; and the intercourse to be also either general, or confined to articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States and of the said colonies, respectively. It must not be forgotten, as relates to our commerce with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, that, however advantageous to both parties, it is more beneficial to the United States than to those colonies. The importance of not less than thirty, perhaps fifty thousand tons of plaster to our agriculture, needs no comment; and, notwithstanding our exclusion from their ports, we have, in fact, as the trade has hitherto been carried on, a greater share of it than themselves. This, however, is the result of a connivance in practice, which may possibly be withdrawn. The produce of their fisheries is brought by them from Halifax to Boston, and by us from Boston carried to the West Indies. Their plaster is brought by them from Fundy Bay to Maine, and by us from Maine to New York, Philadelphia, and the Chesapeake. A strong jealousy seems to exist between the shipping interest of Massachusetts and that of those colonies. Hence the wish of their legislative assemblies to prohibit the exportation of plaster in their own vessels to our Eastern ports; and hence the law which laid the lighthouse-money tax, and a high duty on their fish, taking away, at the same time, the drawback on the re-exportation of such fish. An enlightened policy, and a mutual wish to promote the real interest and welfare of the inhabitants on both sides, should induce both Governments to throw the trade perfectly open. But it cannot be denied that it will give us a very great share of their carrying trade.

The minimum which should be accepted in relation to the intercourse with the West Indies, will be the admission of our vessels laden solely with articles of our growth, produce, or manufacture, the importation of which in British vessels is not prohibited, on the same terms as British vessels solely laden with the colonial articles shall be admitted in our ports; that is to say, either without alien duties, or with a fixed maximum of such alien duties, with the two following restrictions: 1st. That Great Britain may prohibit our vessels from exporting from the British West India islands, in sugar and coffee, more than one-half of the proceeds of their inward cargoes. 2dly. That such sugar and coffee shall be exported only to the United States, or that the vessels thus admitted in the West Indies shall be obliged to return and land their cargoes in the United States; provided they may, however, on their return, touch at any other West India island, or the Bahamas, to complete their cargo. For it is usual to carry the specie which proceeds from the sale of a cargo in the West Indies to Turk's Island or the Bahamas, and there load with salt for the United States. Although these restrictions, and particularly the first, be inconvenient, yet they may be acquiesced in. As respects the first restriction, the value of our average exportations to the British West India islands being six millions of dollars, and our exportations from thence, in every article, (sugar and coffee excepted,) being three millions of dollars, the privilege of bringing in return, in sugar and coffee, one-half of the value of our exportations, will just complete the return cargoes. But it would be desirable that the restriction should be altogether dispensed with, or that Great Britain should allow the exportation in those two articles to the amount of two-thirds or three-fourths of the value of our cargoes. As relates to Great Britain, if she once yields the point of admission, the restrictions which are proposed seem to be amply sufficient to remove her minor objections. We now import, notwithstanding the nominal prohibitions to some amount in American vessels, about one million and a half dollars, being the whole amount imported from the British islands in both American and British vessels. The value of our average importations from all the world is, in sugar, seven millions eight hundred thousand; in coffee, eight millions four hundred thousand; or more than sixteen millions of dollars. The value of our annual consumption, exclusively of the New Orleans sugar, is, in sugar, four millions; in coffee, one million five hundred thousand, or five and a half millions of dollars.

To permit us, therefore, to import for three millions, cannot enable us to re-export. And three millions of dollars compared with the value of the sugar and coffee exported annually from the British West Indies, which amounts to not less than — millions, cannot in any degree affect their own commerce or navigation.

The second restriction is intended still more effectually to remove any apprehension that our vessels might become carriers of British West India produce to any other country than the United States. And it may even, if insisted on, be further agreed that no drawback shall be allowable on the re-exportation of those articles imported from the British West Indies in American vessels; provided, however, that on that condition the first mentioned restriction limiting the quantity which may be thus imported from the British West Indies in American vessels, shall be dispensed with. The utmost care is to be taken in framing the restriction on re-exporting from the United States the produce of the British West Indies imported in American vessels, so to express it as to leave no possible pretext for applying the restriction to any similar articles, whether produced within the United States or imported from any other than British possessions.

It will be a reasonable stipulation on the part of Great Britain, that, at all times and places at which the trade of the United States is admitted generally or partially, the residence of consuls and factors shall also be admitted.

The duration of the commercial part of the treaty, and of any other parts which do not establish in their full extent the rights of neutral nations, ought not to exceed the term of eight years; and an abridgment even of that term may perhaps be rendered expedient by the tenor of articles not inconsistent with these instructions.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, &c.

No. 48.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

LONDON, May 17, 1806.

After my interview with Mr. Fox, on the 25th ultimo, I waited a fortnight without hearing from him. This new instance of delay surprised me, because he had shown a sensibility to the former one, and did not seem aware of the necessity of adding to it. Independent of the general object, the war with Prussia, and the blockades incident to it, the doctrine and practice respecting which it was necessary to arrange, furnished a new motive for a communication with him. On mature reflection, I thought it best to call informally, which I did on the 11th, with a view to enter on these topics in the familiar manner I had heretofore done. Mr. Fox was at the office, but did not receive me. He sent the expression of his regret at not being able to do it, being, as he said, just going to attend the cabinet, who were waiting for him. I called again on the 13th, and experienced the same result, though I had left word that I should then be there. I was informed, by his desire, that a summons from the King, to attend him at the palace, prevented his receiving me on that day. I met him, on the 15th, at the drawing room, but had no opportunity of speaking to him. Sir Francis Vincent, the First Under Secretary of State, being acquainted with my desire, promised to arrange with him an interview, and to inform me of it. These are the only circumstances worthy of notice which have occurred here since my last, till to-day. I mention them that you may be better enabled to judge correctly, in all respects, of the light in which the incident of this day ought to be viewed. Early this morning I received from Mr. Fox a note, of which a copy is enclosed, which you will perceive embraces explicitly a principal subject depending between our Governments, though in rather a singular mode. A similar communication is, I presume, made to the other ministers, though of that I have no information. The note is couched in terms of restraint, and professes to extend the blockade further than was heretofore done; nevertheless it takes it from many ports already blockaded; indeed, from all east of Ostend, and west of the Seine, except in articles contraband of war and enemy's property, which are seizable without a blockade. And in like form of exception, considering every enemy as one Power, it admits the trade of neutrals within the same limit to be free in the productions of enemies' colonies, in every but the direct route between the colony and the parent country. I have, however, been too short a time in possession of this paper to trace it in all its consequences in regard to this question. It cannot be doubted that the note was drawn by the Government in reference to the question; and, if intended by the cabinet as a foundation on which Mr. Fox is authorized to form a treaty, and obtained by him for the purpose, it must be viewed in a very favorable light. It seems clearly to put an end to further seizures on the principle which has been heretofore in contestation. I am engaged, by invitation, with Mr. Fox, on the 19th, when it is probable I may have an opportunity of conversing with him, and thereby enabled to form a satisfactory opinion on the subject. I hasten, however, to forward you the enclosed, with the above details, as it is important for you to have them. It is worthy of attention, that, at the drawing-room, on the 15th, it was whispered about that the bill for prohibiting the importation of British goods, &c. had passed the Senate, of which it was said that intelligence had that morning been received. It evidently produced some sensation, which was doubtless the stronger from the idea then entertained that the bill was to commence its operation at an early day. I observe, however, with pleasure, that, on the whole, the measure is considered by the Government papers, on account of the distant period at which it does commence, rather as a pacific than a hostile one. I persuade myself that the present ministry will see, in the circumstance of delay, a strong proof of the disposition of the United States, not only to preserve the relations of peace with Great Britain, but of their confidence that the ministry is animated with the same desire. I cannot help remarking, likewise, the fact that this paper was sent me immediately after the passage of the bill was known. It furnishes a strong presumption that the Government papers judge correctly of the sentiments of the Government on that point. It may be inferred that a knowledge of the passage of the bill hastened the communication to me. But my own opinion is, that the business, having had its regular course, was advanced to such a stage that it would have been made had the intelligence not been received. This opinion, however, is formed on circumstances only, and may be erroneous. I hope soon to be able to give you more certain and satisfactory information respecting it.

I am, sir, with great respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

[Referred to and enclosed in the preceding despatch.]

Mr. Fox to Mr. Monroe.

DOWNING STREET, May 16, 1806.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's commands to acquaint Mr. Monroe that the King, taking into consideration the new and extraordinary means resorted to by the enemy for the purpose of distressing the commerce of his subjects, has thought fit to direct that the necessary measures should be taken for the blockade of the coast, rivers, and ports, from the river Elbe to the port of Brest, both inclusive; and the said coast, rivers, and ports are, and must be considered as blockaded; but that His Majesty is pleased to declare that such blockade shall not extend to prevent neutral ships and vessels, laden with goods not being the property of His Majesty's enemies, and not being contraband of war, from approaching the said coasts, and entering into and sailing from the said rivers and ports, (save and except the coasts, rivers, and ports from Ostend to the river Seine, already in a state of strict and rigorous blockade, and which are to be considered as so continued;) provided the said ships and vessels so approaching and entering (except as aforesaid) shall not have been laden at any port belonging to or in the possession of any of His Majesty's enemies; and that the said ships and vessels so sailing from the said rivers and ports (except as aforesaid) shall not be destined to any port belonging to or in the possession of any of His Majesty's enemies, nor have previously broken the blockade.

Mr. Monroe is therefore requested to apprise the American consuls and merchants residing in England that the coast, rivers, and ports above mentioned must be considered as being in a state of blockade; and that, from this time, all the measures authorized by the law of nations, and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different neutral Powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to vessels attempting to violate the said blockade after this notice.

The undersigned requests Mr. Monroe to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

C. J. FOX.

No. 49.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, May 20, 1806.

Sir:

I had supposed that it might be possible to have some conversation with Mr. Fox last night, at his house, on our affairs, especially on his note of the 16th instant; but in this I was mistaken. The occasion was not a favorable one, being an assemblage of a vast crowd, and he apparently indisposed, as he retired early in the evening. I asked Sir Francis Vincent the cause of the delay to which our affairs were exposed? He said it was not owing to Mr. Fox. As he did not mention the interview which he had promised to arrange for me, I concluded that he had not done it. I made no direct inquiry on that point, but took occasion to remark that I presumed Mr. Fox was not desirous of meeting me till he was prepared to act. He replied that he was not authorized to say so, but would confer freely with him on the subject, and inform me of the result. Alluding to our non-importation bill, and presuming it had passed, he said he thought it a strong measure. I thought otherwise, and flattered myself that the distant period at which it was to commence would be considered by his Government, as I was satisfied it was intended by ours, as a strong proof of its disposition to arrange the business amicably. I told him that I was persuaded that, if it had been known early in the session of Congress that the ministry had changed, no such measure would have been resorted to, as our Government would most probably have deemed it unnecessary with the present ministry, whose disposition was believed by it to be just and friendly towards the United States. But as the subject had been taken up and acted on before the change was known, it seemed to be impossible for the Congress to dismiss it altogether, without incurring the suspicion either that the object was deemed unimportant by it, or that no effort would be made to support our rights; that the strongest proof which our Government could give, under existing circumstances, of its friendly disposition towards Great Britain, and of its confidence in a similar one in the present ministry, had been given by the late period to which the commencement of the act was postponed. He did not consider it as any obstacle to an amicable arrangement. I had much conversation with Lord Holland, who told me frankly that he viewed that proceeding pretty much in the light that I did; that, in fact, there seemed to be no other way of acting than "by letting the affair down easily," after what had been done. I mention these remarks of Lord Holland from the circumstance of his being the near relative and confidential friend of Mr. Fox, and an influential member of Parliament.

From what I could collect, I have been strengthened in the opinion, which I communicated to you in my last, that Mr. Fox's note of the 16th was drawn with a view to a principal question with the United States—I mean that of the trade with enemies' colonies. It embraces, it is true, other objects, particularly the commerce with Prussia, and the North generally, whose ports it opens to neutral Powers, under whose flag British manufactures will find a market there. In this particular especially the measure promises to be highly satisfactory to the commercial interest, and it may have been the primary object of the Government. You will observe that I have not considered the note as a reply to mine, or as being any way connected with them. It was not communicated to me as such, and it was evidently improper for me to consider it in that light. In directing the publication of it, I have expressed no sentiment of the contents, but left them to the criticism of the public.

With respect to the delay to which I am exposed, it is utterly out of my power to explain to you the cause. I have no reason to change the opinion which I have heretofore expressed of Mr. Fox's disposition on the subject, though I have had no late communication with him. His present reserve is unfavorable, but it may be otherwise accounted for, and on principles which are quite natural, and therefore presumable. He may have experienced more difficulties in the cabinet than he had expected. Many of the members may be indisposed to an arrangement on such terms as can be accepted, and most of them willing to postpone any decision until the result of the proceedings in Congress is known. Under these circumstances, he may find it most eligible to avoid any further communication with me for the present. It becomes, therefore, very difficult, if not altogether improper, for me to press the business at this time. It seems to be my duty to postpone such pressure to the same epoch, that is, till the final proceedings of Congress are known. I shall doubtless receive with them the instructions of the President on the whole subject, which I beg to assure you I shall use my utmost exertions to carry into effect.

I am, with great respect and esteem, sir, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, Ministers Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States in London.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 30, 1806.

GENTLEMEN:

Under the third article of the treaty of 1794, as it has been expounded, Indian traders on each side have a right to resort to and trade with the tribes within the limits of the other party, with an exception of the country covered by the charter of the Hudson's Bay Company.

This article is found in its operation to be very seriously detrimental to the United States.

1st. It gives to the British traders dealing with the Indians on our side of the boundary opportunities of gaining an influence, which it cannot be doubted that they have frequently employed in stirring up the Indians against the United States.

2dly. The mixture of British traders with the American traders produces collisions and heart-burnings, with mutual efforts to make the Indians their partisans; and sometimes their avengers, against the property and persons of their rivals.

3dly. The animosity of the British traders, in such cases, against their rivals is easily extended against the United States, and the Indian partisans still more readily pass from a vindictive spirit against the American traders to a hostile one against the nation to which they belong.

5thly. These evils are not even attended with any real reciprocity of advantage to the American traders, it being a fact that they never go among the Indians on the British side for the purpose of traffic; and it being more-over known that such a traffic is rendered unsafe by the sway possessed over the Indians by the Northwest Company of British traders, and by the preventive measures employed by their interested jealousies. It is indeed certain that no British trader not of the company can, with advantage, or, as is said, even with safety, participate in the trade with Indians within the British limits.

These observations, which are strengthened by the unlimited duration of the stipulation, sufficiently explain the importance of amending the article in such a manner as will mutually authorize the parties to confine the Indian trade within their respective limits to their own traders.

The British Government, though vigilant and habitually rigid in maintaining every commercial advantage, may, perhaps, in a moment of liberality and of general adjustment, listen to such an amendment; and it is the wish of the President that the experiment be made. In recommendation of the change, you will be able to remind them, 1st, that it will have the valuable effect of cutting off forever one source of jealousy and ill-will; 2d, that, as the stipulated privilege does not extend to Louisiana, but is limited by the treaty to the small tribes eastward of the Mississippi, and by circumstances still further limited to those northwest of the Ohio, the trade is, in itself, of too little weight to be put into the scale against the advancement of friendship and harmony; 3d, that the value of the privilege to Great Britain is reduced to almost nothing, by the consideration that, whether this scanty portion of Indian trade be carried on by American or British traders, the goods furnished will be of British manufacture; and that, if furnished by the former, the peltries and furs taken in return will be added to the surplus of those articles now exported free of duty from the United States to Great Britain.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

No. 50.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

LONDON, June 9, 1806.

On the 31st ultimo accounts were received here from the United States that the President and Senate had adopted the measure of a special mission to this country, in which Mr. Pinkney and myself were associated. These accounts, which appeared to be well authenticated at first, have been confirmed since by letters to individuals, so that the fact seems to be unquestionable. I have not received official information of it, but expect it from you daily.

A suspension of further proceeding in the business in which I have been engaged seemed to be the natural consequence of this measure as soon as it was known. It has accordingly already produced that effect, and will probably preserve it in the same state till Mr. Pinkney arrives. I hope, therefore, that I shall soon have the pleasure of seeing him.

My former letters, the last of which was of May 20th, showed how this business stood at that time. I have since seen Mr. Fox twice—on the 4th, and again on the 7th instant. The first interview was at his own house, on the anniversary of the King's birth, in a general rendezvous of the diplomatic corps. In that we touched on some interesting subjects, particularly the outrages lately committed at New York by the British cruisers, our non-importation act, and the affair of General Miranda. But as we could not treat those subjects with advantage in a crowd, it was agreed to postpone the consideration of them to the 6th, when I promised to attend him at his office for the purpose of entering more fully into it. The interview was afterwards deferred by him to the 7th, when it took place.

Although the object of this latter meeting was special, yet it naturally brought into view the other topics in which we had been engaged, and with them that of the appointment above mentioned. Mr. Fox asked me, soon after we met, whether such an appointment was made. I told him that I had no official information of it, but I believed that it was. He said that Mr. Merry had informed him in his last letter that the measure was decided on, but had not been communicated to the Senate. What effect, added he, will it produce in our business? It was evident that he thought it ought to suspend it. It was of course useless for me, had it even been proper, and I of a different opinion, to express it. My answer, therefore, corresponded with his expectation. I availed myself of the opportunity to assure Mr. Fox that Mr. Pinkney was every way well qualified for the trust, and that I was persuaded he would be well satisfied with the appointment.

The general subject being thus disposed of, we proceeded to those which had been touched on in our conversation of the 4th. I told Mr. Fox that the outrage in the case of the unfortunate victim, John Pierce, had been committed, as appeared by the affidavits published, within the jurisdiction of the United States. I stated that the harbor of New York had been blocked up by those frigates as if it were an enemy's port; that they did not appear to have taken their station there for hospitality or shelter, but for invasion. I told him of the outrages which had been committed at the same port in the autumn of 1804, by the same frigates, as of the conduct of his Government in that respect, recalling, in the first instance, the officer who had given most offence, but finally promoting him to the command of a ship of the line. Mr. Fox said that he wanted information respecting the late unfortunate event; should it appear that the officers had acted improperly, due attention should be paid to the subject. He added, that he had already written to Mr. Merry in that sentiment, and would also express it in a letter to me. In speaking of the non-importation act, he expressed his regret that it had passed. He said it had the air of a menace, and that it was not agreeable to do things by compulsion. I reminded him how long we had complained of injuries which his Government had not attempted to justify—injuries which were not imaginary or perspective, but real and sovero, which affected equally the honour and the interest of the United States. I added, that, under such circumstances, his Government had no right to complain of the act referred to. I assured him, however, that I was of opinion, if the ministry had not changed, that a bill of a very different import would have been adopted; that I had reason to believe that the tone of our Government and of the Congress had been essentially moderated by the information which I had given of his assurances that our differences should be settled amicably, and on just principles; that the act which had passed, in consequence of that information, was little more than a declaration to the citizens of the United States that the object would be duly attended to. I observed that he must be sensible, after the subject had been taken up by Congress, as it was before the change of the ministry was known, that it was impossible for that body to dismiss it, without some expression of its sense of the rights of the United States in the question in dispute, without exposing itself to the charge of having abandoned them. He seemed finally to admit that the Congress could not well have avoided doing something in the business, and that the measure which had been adopted ought to be considered as a moderate one. I was glad to hear this sentiment from Mr. Fox, because I had feared that he would urge the passage of the act as a discharge from the obligation which his communications with me had, in a certain degree, imposed on him, in respect to the conditions on which he was disposed to make the settlement, and in which, in some particular and interesting points, he was precise and explicit.

I then observed to Mr. Fox that I should be glad he would state, in the letter which he had promised, his willingness to resume the business when Mr. Pinkney should arrive, and with a view to conciliation and despatch, objects which merited attention at the present time, that he would also advert in it to the several subjects which we had under consideration, in the sentiments which he had expressed in our conferences. He seemed to be aware that the proposition was a reasonable one, and promised without hesitation to comply with it; but, says he, I am afraid that I cannot be very distinct in it. I replied, that I should leave that to himself, but that I presumed he could easily recollect what had passed between us on each point; that, in respect to the trade with enemies' colonies especially, I did suppose that it had been intended by the late order to place it on the ground of the Russian treaty, and that he might go with safety in his letter as far as the order went. He neither admitted nor denied the fact explicitly, though he did not seem willing to give his sanction to the inference I had drawn. I criticised the order as well as I could from memory, to show why I had made the inference, without, however, expressing any approbation of the order. He said it was true that the produce of enemies' colonies might, under the exceptions stated in the order, find admission in neutral vessels into the enemies' ports, but yet he did not seem willing to admit that that was the particular object of the order. I did not press this point further, because I saw no motive for it. I concluded, however, from this conversation, as I had done from what had occurred before, that this measure had been taken to prevent the further seizure and condemnation of our vessels on the principle in discussion between our Governments, and that an acknowledgment of it had been withheld from a consideration mentioned by Mr. Fox in one of our conferences, that such acknowledgment would be to give up the point in negotiation. Several circumstances, independent of those alluded to, support this idea. It is not necessary to state them, because I trust that the business will, ere long, be placed on a much more solid footing.

Of General Miranda's affair, Mr. Fox asked me, on the 4th, what I thought. It appeared to me to acquire some importance by late accounts. He thought so. What, said he, would be the consequence of his success? He presumed that Great Britain and the United States would be the principal gainers. I was of the same opinion. On the 7th, after he had had time to reflect on the subject, I asked him what part his Government intended to take in it. He said that it was a delicate business to interfere in. By engaging in it, the difficulty of making a peace might be increased, if the object was pursued; and it would not be agreeable to abandon the people after promising them support. Of peace, however, he added, that there was not much prospect at present; though, in expressing that idea, I thought he did it with less force than on a former occasion. I inferred, from that circumstance, that there existed some correspondence between this Government and that of France on the subject.

I am, with great respect and esteem, sir, your very obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, Ministers Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States, in London.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 11, 1806.

GENTLEMEN:

Since the date of my last, (May 30,) I have obtained from the Secretary of War the enclosed copies of a correspondence between an officer of the United States and an agent of the British Northwest Company for the Indian trade. The correspondence may be of use in explaining the inconveniences resulting from the constructive permission given by the treaty of 1794 to British traders to carry on trade among Indians within the limits of the United States, and the importance of such an amendment of the treaty as has been suggested to you.

I enclose, also, as connected with the subject, copies of two letters from this Department to Mr. Merry; and of the opinion of the Attorney General in answer to a claim of British traders to carry supplies of merchandise to the Indian tribes within the limits of Louisiana, and to certain immunities in their general trade with our Indians.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

No. 1.

Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

LONDON, July 25, 1806.

You will have been surprised at not hearing from us sooner on the business confided to us under the commission with which we are honored by the President. The delay proceeded from a desire to give you some satisfactory information of our progress in it, which it was not in our power to do. It happened, unfortunately, just about the time of Mr. Pinkney's arrival, on the 24th ultimo, that Mr. Fox was taken ill of a dropsical complaint, from which he has not yet recovered, and probably never will. That circumstance opposed to us a serious obstacle, which it was difficult to surmount, even in the first stage. As Mr. Fox was the official organ of the Government, we could not approach it in that mode through any other channel; and as he and his friends are believed to be favorably disposed to the object of our mission, and are strong in the cabinet, it seemed to be hazardous to make any experiment for that purpose which might have a tendency to irritate them. Thus we were kept for some time at a stand. Every necessary step was taken with the Department of Foreign Affairs, without making any advance. At length, through the good offices of Lord Holland, to whom, as the relative of Mr. Fox, we presumed we might apply without giving offence to him or his friends, we obtained our recognition of the King; and we trust, now that the door is open, that we shall soon be able to proceed in the business on which we have to treat with some suitable organ of the Government. We persuade ourselves, if Mr. Fox should continue unable to act, that some other person will be appointed to meet us in his stead. We have the pleasure to enclose you a copy of the several notes which have passed in this introductory stage of the business.

Our audience of the King took place on the 21st instant. The reception was quite a favorable one. To the assurances which we gave of the friendly policy of the United States towards Great Britain, as particularly exemplified by the present mission, His Majesty in return expressed himself to be highly satisfied with the proof which that measure gave of that disposition in their Government, as that Mr. Pinkney had been selected by the President from among their citizens to be employed in it. His other remarks, though not applicable to the topic of existing differences, were, nevertheless, of a conciliatory and friendly character.

We beg you to be assured that we shall continue to exert our best efforts to accomplish the important objects of our mission. Of the actual disposition of this Government on that subject, and of the prospect of a satisfactory adjustment, it is not in our power to speak, from any recent occurrence. The general view, as founded on the sentiments which have been expressed by those about the Government with whom we have conferred, is favorable. We cannot but believe that the delay to which we were subjected in obtaining our recognition by the King ought to be attributed to Mr. Fox's indisposition alone. It is, however, proper to mention, that a negotiation with France is still depending, and that many entertain the expectation that it will terminate in peace. We are not aware that such an event is likely soon to happen, and flatter ourselves, even in case it should, that the motive for preserving a good understanding with the United States, in the present situation of the world, is otherwise sufficiently strong with this Government to induce it to accede to a fair and satisfactory adjustment of differences with them.

We have received your letter of May 30, and shall not fail to pay due attention to the instruction it communicates.

We have the honor to be, with great consideration and esteem, sir, your most obedient servants,

JAMES MONROE,
WILLIAM PINKNEY.

To Mr. Fox.

LOW LAYTON, June 21, 1806.

Mr. Monroe presents his compliments to Mr. Fox, and has the honor to inform him of the arrival of Mr. Pinkney at Liverpool, and to request that he will be so good as to give an order that his baggage and effects may be landed and brought to London. Mr. Monroe presumes that Mr. Pinkney, being in a diplomatic character, will be permitted to proceed on his journey hither without the sanction of a passport; should it be necessary, he requests that Mr. Fox will be so good as to send him one.

From Mr. Fox.

STABLE YARD, June 22, 1806.

Mr. Fox presents his compliments to Mr. Monroe, and will be very glad to see him here to-morrow, at 12 o'clock.

Mr. Fox is very much obliged to Mr. Monroe for his note informing him of Mr. Pinkney's arrival. He imagines that no passport is necessary for that gentleman to proceed to London. The order respecting his baggage and effects shall be immediately expedited.

To Mr. Fox.

LOW LAYTON, June 23, 1806.

Mr. Monroe presents his compliments to Mr. Fox, and regrets that he had not the pleasure of receiving his note of yesterday till so late an hour this day as to render it impossible for him to comply with his obliging invitation. The hour appointed for him to call in Stable Yard had not only passed, but he concluded that, before he could arrive in Downing street, Mr. Fox would have left it and gone to the House of Commons. Mr. Monroe will be happy to wait on Mr. Fox at any other time which may be convenient to him.

Mr. Monroe expects Mr. Pinkney in town to-night. As soon as he arrives, he will have the pleasure to inform Mr. Fox of it, and to request the appointment of an hour when he may have the honor of presenting him to Mr. Fox.

To Mr. Fox.

LOW LAYTON, June 25, 1806.

Mr. Monroe presents his compliments to Mr. Fox, and has the honor to inform him of the arrival of Mr. Pinkney, in the character of joint commissioner extraordinary and plenipotentiary from the United States to His Britannic Majesty. Mr. Monroe requests that Mr. Fox will be so good as to appoint a time when he may have the honor of presenting Mr. Pinkney to him. He will avail himself of the same opportunity to deliver to Mr. Fox a copy of their joint letters of credence.

From Sir Francis Vincent.

DEAR SIR:

STABLE YARD, June 27, 1806.

Mr. Fox has been, and indeed still continues, so unwell with severe rheumatism, that it is not in his power, as yet, to fix a day to have the honor of seeing you and Mr. Pinkney, which, I assure you, he is very anxious and impatient to do; but as soon as he is able, I shall have the honor of informing you. In the mean time, Mr. Fox hopes that you will have the goodness to excuse this unavoidable delay.

Mr. Fox requests that you will offer Mr. Pinkney his best compliments on his safe arrival. May I request that you would do me the honor to offer mine also?

Believe me, dear sir, your very faithful, humble servant,

F. VINCENT.

To Sir Francis Vincent.

DEAR SIR:

LOW LAYTON, June 27, 1806.

It is with extreme regret that I heard yesterday of the indisposition of Mr. Fox, and I beg you to be assured that I would on no consideration whatever hasten our interview at the expense of his quiet. I shall explain the cause of the delay to Mr. Pinkney, who will, I am satisfied, unite with me in this sentiment. I sincerely hope that his recovery will be rapid, and that I shall soon have the pleasure of seeing him in good health.

Accept my acknowledgment for the very obliging expressions contained in your favor of this date; and believe me to be, with great consideration and esteem, very truly, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

From Mr. Fox.

STABLE YARD, July 15.

Mr. Fox presents his compliments to Mr. Monroe, and begs to have the honor of seeing him here, with Mr. Pinkney, at 3 o'clock to-day.

[A similar note to Mr. Pinkney.]

From Sir Francis Vincent.

MY DEAR SIR:

ARLINGTON STREET, Tuesday evening, July 15.

The King does not come to town till Monday, on which day you and Mr. Pinkney may certainly be presented to His Majesty.

Yours ever, and most sincerely,

F. VINCENT.

JAMES MONROE, Esq., &c. &c. &c.

From Lord Holland.

DEAR SIR:

SUNDAY NIGHT, July 20.

Lord Howick, whom I have seen, will be very happy to be of any use to you, but is not the person who can officially present you, on producing your credentials. If you wish to settle the business through him, he will be ready to receive you any time before 12 at the Admiralty. Since I saw him I have written to Lord Spencer, who is the regular person on such an occasion, to supply my uncle's place; and though my letter went late this night, I hope his answer to it will find you as soon as this. I am sure, if time allows, he will be happy to receive Mr. Pinkney and yourself, and present you in form, &c. to the King.

My uncle begged me to express his regret at having disappointed Mr. Pinkney and yourself, and, feeling his health uncertain, was almost afraid of again fixing an hour; but as you will be in that part of the town, and his best hour is from four to five, or thereabouts, perhaps Mr. Pinkney and you will be so good as to call about that time at Stable Yard.

Believe me, dear sir, ever your obliged,

HOLLAND.

P. S. If you settle to go to court with Lord Spencer, have the goodness to inform Lord Howick by a line, as he will otherwise wait for your commands till past 12 o'clock.

JAMES MONROE, Esq., &c. &c. &c.

From Lord Spencer.

ST. JAMES'S PLACE, July 21, 1806.

Lord Spencer presents his compliments to Mr. Monroe, and has the honor to inform him, by desire of Mr. Fox, who is too much indisposed to have it in his power to receive him and Mr. Pinkney this morning, that the King will be at the Queen's house to-day at 2 o'clock, when, if it will be convenient for Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney to attend, Lord Spencer will be very happy to have the honor of introducing Mr. Pinkney to His Majesty, for the purpose of delivering his credentials from the United States; and if Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney are desirous of seeing Lord Spencer before they go to the Queen's house, he will be at his office at Whitehall at 1 o'clock, where, if they would have the goodness to call, he will have the honor of receiving them.

To Lord Spencer.

PORTLAND PLACE, July 21, 1806.

Mr. Monroe presents his compliments to Lord Spencer, and begs to inform his lordship that Mr. Pinkney and himself will have the honor to wait on him at Whitehall at 1 o'clock, at which hour his lordship has been so good as to intimate that he will be prepared to receive them. Mr. Monroe very much regrets the indisposition of Mr. Fox; but Mr. Pinkney and himself will avail themselves with pleasure of his lordship's obliging offer to do them the honor of presenting them to His Majesty to-day at 2 o'clock. Although Mr. Monroe is already an accredited minister at this court, yet as he is invested with a new character, being included in the special mission from the United States, he presumes that it will be proper that he should also have the honor of being presented to His Majesty as a party to it. Mr. Pinkney and Mr. Monroe will have the honor of delivering to Lord Spencer a copy of their joint letter of credence at 1 o'clock.

To Lord Howick.

PORTLAND PLACE, July 21, 1806.

Mr. Monroe presents his compliments to Lord Howick, and begs to assure his lordship that he is very sensible of his obliging attention in offering, as he is just informed by Lord Holland, his good offices to procure Mr. Pinkney and himself the honor of being presented to His Majesty to-day, which has been hitherto delayed by the much lamented indisposition of Mr. Fox. Mr. Monroe has the honor to inform Lord Howick that he has just received a letter from Lord Spencer, intimating that his lordship will do Mr. Pinkney and himself the honor of presenting them to His Majesty to-day. He hastens to give Lord Howick this information, in consequence of a suggestion from Lord Holland that Lord Howick would be so good as to remain at home till 12 o'clock for the purpose of receiving them.

From Sir Francis Vincent.

MY DEAR SIR:

STABLE YARD, July 21, 1806.

I am very sorry to be under the necessity of asking you and Mr. Pinkney whether you should consider it as of great inconvenience to postpone your presentation to the King until his next coming to town, which will be early next week, as it has not yet been in Mr. Fox's power to announce it officially to His Majesty. In the mean time, every communication from you and Mr. Pinkney will meet with the same attention as if this ceremony had been gone through; an attention which it will always be the pride of the Foreign Office to show to the ministers of the United States, our half-countrymen. And from this delay no detriment will arise to the great cause, as I fear some days must yet elapse before Mr. Fox will be well enough to discuss business; he is, however, better. Pray write me a line in answer to this. I have not written to Mr. Pinkney. Will you make my excuse to him, as I am anxious for your getting this soon?

Believe me, dear sir, most truly yours,

F. VINCENT.

JAMES MONROE, Esq., &c. &c. &c.

NOTE.—On Friday, the 11th, Sir Francis Vincent promised us an interview with Mr. Fox on the 15th, which Mr. Fox invited by his note of that date. We attended at Mr. Fox's house, according to appointment, but did not see him, his health not permitting it. On the evening of the same day Sir Francis Vincent wrote the note which bears his name of that date. The arrangement with Lord Holland was made on the 20th, for which the circumstance of our dining with him furnished a favorable opportunity. Sir Francis Vincent's note of the 21st was written before he was acquainted with that arrangement.

[Owing to the haste in despatching the original, the copy of the correspondence annexed to it was not so full as that accompanying the duplicate.]

No. 2.

SIR:

LONDON, August 11, 1806.

It was intimated to us by Sir Francis Vincent, soon after the date of our last, that as the state of Mr. Fox's health was not likely soon to permit him to attend to us or the subjects of our mission, Lord Grenville would be asked to communicate with us in his stead; and Sir Francis promised that he would endeavor, without loss of time, to arrange with Lord Grenville to that effect.

On the 1st instant Sir Francis informed us, by a note to Mr. Monroe, that Lord Grenville had been applied to, and that he would fix an early day for our reception. Believing that we should not make the most profitable use of the opportunity if we waited for a note from Lord Grenville, we determined to write him immediately, and request him to appoint a time for receiving us. He accordingly appointed Monday, the 4th, which, on account of an interfering engagement not at first adverted to, was changed to the day following.

His lordship received us with great cordiality, but, as we had expected, was not prepared to enter into any formal consideration of the subjects embraced by our commission; which, as the letter of credence had been delivered to the King, and had not been seen by Lord Grenville, we thought it advisable to submit to his perusal. He told us that he was at present able to say little more than that His Majesty's Government was earnestly desirous of giving the most prompt and effectual attention to what we had to propose, and of adjusting satisfactorily whatever was in any degree calculated to disturb the good understanding which ought to subsist between us; that he had always entertained and acted upon a sincere disposition to cultivate the most friendly connexion and intercourse with the United States, and that he could say for his colleagues that such was their disposition also; that we were aware that the delay we had hitherto experienced arose entirely from the illness of Mr. Fox, to whose Department subjects of this description particularly belonged; that he himself, having only recently returned to a situation of confidence in His Majesty's councils, was of course but very imperfectly acquainted with those immediate transactions and discussions which had a bearing upon the relations of the two countries; that he could not, therefore, at this moment, undertake even to converse with us upon them otherwise than very loosely and informally; but that he should, notwithstanding, be glad to hear from us a statement of the principal points which it was supposed our negotiation would involve. His lordship added, that if Mr. Fox should unfortunately continue to be disqualified by indisposition from attending personally to the affairs of our mission, it would be necessary to receive His Majesty's pleasure whether this important duty should be committed to some other of the Secretaries of State, or to commissioners to be specially appointed to treat with us; and that this would not be delayed beyond the actual necessity of the occasion.

The statement which his lordship invited was of course given with as much minuteness as was thought to be prudent; and it drew from him several remarks, some of which, although not very interesting, it may be proper to state.

On the subject of the impressment of our seamen, he suggested doubts (which we endeavored to remove by suitable explanations) of the practicability of devising the means of discrimination between the seamen of the two countries within (as we understood him) their respective jurisdictions; and he spoke of the importance to the safety of Great Britain, in the present state of the power of her enemy, of preserving in their utmost strength the right and the capacity of Government to avail itself in war of the services of its seamen. These observations were connected with frequent professions of an earnest wish that some liberal and equitable plan should be adopted for reconciling the exercise of this essential right with the just claims of the United States, and for removing from it all cause of complaint and irritation.

To a very brief sketch of the views of our Government relative to belligerent proceedings in the vicinity of our coasts and harbors, he replied that there could be no objection on their part to a suitable provision on that head. And as this topic recalled the recollection of Captain Whithy's outrages at New York, his lordship took occasion to say that, if they had been truly represented, they would meet with the severest censure here; that Captain Whithy could not be condemned upon such grave charges unheard, but that he would return to answer for his conduct.

To what was suggested by us on the subject of contraband, he replied only that he and Mr. Jay had copied the enumeration in their treaty from the British treaty with Sweden.

Upon the commercial subject, very little was said on either side. For obvious reasons, it was not proper that we should do more than lead to it in a very general way. On the West Indian branch of it, Lord Grenville remarked that he did not feel the difficulties which were supposed by many to belong to it; and that he regretted that the twelfth article of Mr. Jay's treaty had not been retained, as it would have prepared the way for the more complete admission of the United States into that trade. We inferred, from the little that passed on this point, that Lord Grenville looked to a prevailing prejudice here, at variance with his own opinion, as likely to oppose itself to our views.

As the illness of Mr. Fox had hitherto restrained Mr. Monroe from sending to him a note which he had prepared on the subject of Captain Whithy's proceedings, he took the opportunity afforded by this interview of asking the opinion of Lord Grenville as to the course which, in reference to that interesting object, would now be most proper; intimating at the same time his own desire that his communication, delayed thus long by motives of delicacy and respect towards Mr. Fox, should, as soon as possible, be brought under the serious consideration of His Majesty's Government. Lord Grenville stated his opinion and his wish to be, that the note should be retained for the present.

On the 7th Mr. Fox underwent the operation of tapping, by which he was much relieved; and his friends have since had strong hopes of his permanent recovery.

On the 9th, we called on Sir Francis Vincent, and stated to him what had passed with Lord Grenville. He now assured us that Mr. Fox wished extremely to act in our affairs himself, and the late favorable appearances seemed to justify an expectation that his convalescence would be sufficiently rapid to enable him to indulge that wish. He even went so far as to express his conviction that if there was one reason more than another why Mr. Fox was at this time particularly anxious to remain in office, it was his strong desire to settle personally with us every question relative to our country.

The public papers will inform you, that Lord Lauderdale has been sent by this Government to Paris on the subject of peace. According to some opinions, the basis and the terms had been settled by previous correspondence, and his lordship was simply to perform the office of signing a treaty already adjusted. Others have supposed that he has been sent to make the usual experiment; and others again, that, although much has been agreed upon, there are certain points upon which this Government has been misunderstood by that of France, which require to be explained by an envoy, and are of course still open.

The terms of M. d'Aubril's treaty are yet unknown; and the treaty itself is in all respects as mysterious as at first.

We need not suggest to you the various conjectures which it would be possible to form as to the causes to which it is owing that our negotiation is not yet in train, and as to the probable effect of our mission. We have not been inattentive to what has passed here and upon the continent; but we are disposed to give credit to the professions of just and amicable views which we have so often heard, and to the precise assurances which have so frequently been given us, that Mr. Fox's illness alone has suspended our progress. In the actual state of things, it would be vain, and probably injurious, and certainly harsh, to be very urgent for despatch. You may be assured, however, that we shall lose no opportunity of fulfilling the just expectations of our Government with as little delay as possible.

We have the honor to be, with great consideration and esteem, your most obedient servants,

JAMES MONROE,
WILLIAM PINKNEY.

From Sir Francis Vincent.

MY DEAR SIR:

DOWNING STREET, August 1, 1806.

Having communicated to Lord Grenville, as I told you I would, your and Mr. Pinkney's anxiety to see one of his Majesty's ministers, his lordship has desired me to inform you that he will fix as early a time as he can to have the honor of receiving you. If you will have the goodness to communicate this to Mr. Pinkney, I trust he will dispense with my troubling him with a similar notification.

Believe me ever, dear sir, most truly and sincerely yours,

F. VINCENT.

JAMES MONROE, Esq., &c.

To Lord Grenville.

PORTLAND PLACE, August 2, 1806.

Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney present their compliments to Lord Grenville, and request the honor of an interview with his lordship on the interesting subjects which form the object of the special mission with which they are honored by their Government to His Britannic Majesty. They make this request in consequence of the much lamented indisposition of Mr. Fox, which has hitherto and still continues to put it out of his power to meet them on that important business.

From Lord Grenville.

DOWNING STREET, August 2, 1806.

Lord Grenville presents his compliments to Mr. Monroe and to Mr. Pinkney, and will be happy to have the honor of seeing them on Monday next at 1 o'clock.

[A similar note sent to Mr. Pinkney.]

From Lord Grenville.

DOWNING STREET, August 3, 1806.

Lord Grenville presents his compliments to Mr. Monroe and to Mr. Pinkney: Lord Grenville when he made the appointment for to-morrow at 1 o'clock, did not recollect an engagement he had in the city at that hour, and therefore requests to have the honor of seeing Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney on Tuesday, at 1 o'clock.

[A similar note sent to Mr. Pinkney.]

No. 3.

Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, August 15, 1806.

SIR:

We have the honor to transmit, herewith enclosed, a duplicate of our last, under date of the 11th instant.

Some circumstances have since occurred with which it is proper that you should be made acquainted.

On the 13th we dined with Lord Grenville at his house in Downing street, where we met the Lord Chancellor, Lord Howick, Lord Auckland, Marquis Wellesley, Lord Holland, Mr. Erskine, and several other persons of distinction. After dinner it was mentioned to us by Lord Grenville, as well as by Sir Francis Vincent, that Lord Auckland and Lord Holland had been appointed and commissioned to treat with us; that Sir Francis Vincent had directions to communicate this circumstance to us, and that he would not fail to do so formally on the next day. Sir Francis has not in fact made this communication, but we doubt not we shall very soon receive it.

Just before we retired, Lord Auckland invited us to visit him in the country, "where," he added, "I trust we shall be able to do some good to mankind, if your powers are sufficiently extensive." He seemed to suppose that we should be under the necessity of consulting our Government in the progress of our negotiation, upon questions to arise out of it. To his inquiries on this head, (which were connected with the most liberal and conciliatory professions,) it was replied that we had no reason to believe that our powers would be found to be, in any essential particular, inadequate to their object. He did not explain the nature of the topics to which these doubts applied, but it is to be presumed that we shall not long be left to conjecture them.

Mr. Erskine sails for the United States in the course of next week, as the successor of Mr. Merry.

The calculation of the day is against the success of Lord Lauderdale's mission.

It was intimated to Mr. Monroe that his note on the subject of Captain Whitty's improper conduct at New York as not being comprehended within the objects of the joint commission, might be sent to Mr. Fox, and that it would now be attended to. He proposes to take immediate advantage of this suggestion, and to transmit a copy of his note, and of the answer to it, as soon as it is received. It was expressly stated, though not in a manner to authorize the communication to be considered as an official act, that Captain Whitty was recalled, and would be subjected to a trial by a court martial.

We have the honor to be, with great consideration and esteem, sir, your most obedient servants,

JAS. MONROE,
WM. PINKNEY.

No. 4.

Extract of a letter from Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney to the Secretary of State.

SIR:

LONDON, August 21, 1806.

We have the pleasure to transmit you a copy of a note from Mr. Fox of yesterday, which announces the appointment of Lords Holland and Auckland to meet us on the subjects which are embraced by our joint commission. We flatter ourselves that we shall enter on this business in the course of a few days, and that we shall be able in a short time afterwards to speak with some confidence of the result. We add, with pleasure, that we see no reason at this time to think the prospect less favorable to a satisfactory one than we have heretofore presumed it to be. Aware of the considerations which urge despatch, we have been, and shall continue to be, attentive to that object, though it is far from being in our power to promise any thing explicit on that point.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Monroe.

DOWNING STREET, August 20, 1806.

Mr. Secretary Fox presents his compliments to Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney, and he has the honor to inform them that His Majesty has been graciously pleased (Mr. Fox not being yet sufficiently recovered to attend to business of such magnitude,) to appoint Lord Holland and Lord Auckland to enter with Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney upon the discussion of all matters now depending between His Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States.

Mr. Fox feels it his duty, in expressing his regret at being unable at the present moment to undertake this important business himself, to observe that His Majesty, in this appointment of commissioners, has given a fresh proof of his most anxious and constant desire to bring to a speedy termination all discussions between the two countries, and to form such arrangements as may tend to render perpetual a system of mutual friendship and cordiality so conducive to the honor and interests of both.

Mr. Fox begs Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney will accept the assurances of his high consideration.

No. 5.

Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, September 11, 1806.

SIR:

Our first meeting with Lord Holland and Lord Auckland took place in Downing street, on the 22d of August.* After the usual exchange of powers, we stated, at their request, the objects of our mission, and the general nature of the stipulations by which we expected them to be provided for. They took minutes of what was said by us, for the purpose of making their report to the cabinet, and threw out some observations, but of a very loose and inconclusive character, upon several branches of the subject. They resisted, with great earnestness and decision, as an impracticable subject, the claim of indemnity, which we pressed as standing upon unquestionable grounds of justice. They appeared to consider the subject of impressment as extremely delicate and embarrassing, and that of our trade with the colonies of their enemies as presenting important though not equal difficulties; and Lord Auckland expressed a strong desire, which of course we discouraged, that the former should be suffered to rest upon mere understanding, and find no place in the projected treaty. The best dispositions were, however, professed to arrange every thing upon fair and amicable principles, and nothing was suggested to impair the hope that the result of our negotiation would be entirely satisfactory. We were told at parting that an early day would be mentioned for renewing our conferences.

On the 28th† we met them again upon their own appointment. We were then told that the purpose of this interview was to obtain from us an explanation of our views with reference to some of the points upon which we had touched at the former meeting. We were accordingly asked to state precisely what equivalent stipulation for restoring British seamen leaving their service we would be disposed to insert in the article relative to impressment. Having ascertained that it was vain to expect their consent to an arrangement on this interesting topic, in which some such provision was not an ingredient, we gave them at length a project upon this point, extracted from Mr. Monroe's instructions of 1804, requesting them, however, to receive it as perfectly extra official, and combining it, as you will perceive, with the provisions in their most advantageous form, for which it was required as the equivalent. A copy of this paper is among the enclosures. We presumed that this course, while it hazarded nothing, would at least promote despatch, and that the air of frankness which belonged to it would be likely to influence advantageously the temper and character of our discussions upon this and every other question before us.

We were also asked to explain the footing upon which we desired to place the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British European dominions. This we did by intimating, as we had done at the former meeting, that the footing of the most favored nation was in a general view the most natural. Their inquiries, however, looked to some precise and equal arrangement of tonnage and imposts, and the countervailing power in the treaty of 1794 was slightly mentioned. Without encouraging at this time any discussion on this point, which they did not seem to be prepared or inclined to enter into, we thought it proper to suggest for their consideration the expedient of a mutual abolition of alien duties.

On the impressment subject, it was soon apparent that they felt the strongest repugnance to a formal renunciation or abandonment of their claim to take from our vessels on the high seas such seamen as should appear to be their own subjects; and they pressed upon us with much zeal, as a substitute for such an abandonment, a provision that the persons composing the crews of our ships should be furnished with authentic documents of citizenship, the nature and form of which should be settled by treaty; that these documents should completely protect those to whom they related; but that, subject to such protections, the ships of war of Great Britain should continue to visit and impress on the main ocean as heretofore.

They enforced their preference for this sort of arrangement in a desultory conversation, by observing that they supposed the object of our plan to be to prevent the impressment at sea of American seamen, and not to withdraw British seamen from the naval service of their country in times of great national peril, for the purpose of employing them ourselves; that the first of these purposes would be effectually accomplished by a system which should introduce and establish a clear and conclusive distinction between the seamen of the two countries, which on all occasions would be implicitly respected; that if they should consent to make our commercial navy a floating asylum for all the British seamen who, tempted by higher wages, should quit their service for ours, the effect of such a concession upon their maritime strength, on which Great Britain depended, not only for her prosperity but her safety, might be fatal; that, on the most alarming emergency, they might thus be deprived, to an extent which it was impossible to calculate, but which could not fail to be great, of their only means of security; that our vessels might become receptacles for deserters to any amount, even from the military marine in the ports of neutral States, and when once at sea might set at defiance the just claims of the service to which such deserters belonged; that, even within the United States, it could not be expected that any plan for recovering British deserters could be efficacious, and that moreover the plan we proposed was inadequate in its range and object, inasmuch as it was merely prospective, confined wholly to deserters, and in no respect providing for the case of the vast body of British seamen now employed in our trade to every part of the world. To this it was replied, that one of the suppositions on which much reliance had been placed was that of an extreme case, which was barely possible in fact, and which, if it should happen at all, and redress should not be afforded by the interference of the neutral Power in whose port the unlawful refuge should be attempted, could not be considered as within the spirit of such a provision as we had suggested; that another of these suppositions ascribed undue importance to the resource in question, which, while it severely oppressed and irritated their friends, could add little to the effective strength of their navy; that the number of men thus violently taken from our vessels, if American citizens should be deducted, had always been comparatively small; that if Great Britain should now be admitted (as intended by the plan) to the benefit of our domestic regulations for apprehending and securing within our country future deserters from her merchant and other vessels, the number to which such a resource could apply must hereafter be considerably less, and in time be wholly insignificant; that it would be in their own power to prevent us, by suitable regulations, from carrying their seamen from their own ports, and would become our duty to assist in restoring them when they should desert and be found within our jurisdiction; that there was every reason to believe that this assistance would be as effectual as it was known to be in the case of our own seamen deserting from our own vessels; for that, even if it should be admitted that a motive might now be imagined of sufficient power to induce the people of the United States to give shelter and protection to deserting British seamen, it was obvious that this motive arose out of the claim and practice on the part of Great Britain which it was now proposed to renounce, and would cease with them; that there would moreover be open to this country the fair and reasonable exercise of the right of regaining her own seamen within her own jurisdiction, as opportunity occurred, in whatsoever vessel they should be found; that impressment upon the high seas by those to whom that service is necessarily confided must, under any conceivable guards, be frequently abused, and in its best form cannot fail to generate private animosity and national resentment, and of course to endanger the friendly relations of the two countries; that if it were for no other cause, we should see with deep regret the power of impressment at sea under any modifications, however plausible, insisted upon; but that it was besides impossible that we should acknowledge in favor of any foreign Power the claim to such jurisdiction on board our vessels found upon the main ocean as this sort of impressment implied—a claim as plainly inadmissible in its principle, and derogatory from the unquestionable rights of our sovereignty, as it was vexatious in its practical consequences.

Upon the commercial subject, we collected that the East India trade would not be likely to give much trouble; but that an open trade to the British West Indies will be obtained, if at all, with great difficulty. Lord Auckland expressed an opinion that there should be a restriction upon the tonnage, as in the twelfth article of the treaty of 1794, which we told him at once could never be assented to; and Lord Holland spoke of a duty to be imposed by our Government upon importations from their islands, which should be of sufficient amount to check the exportation of the articles so imported to Europe. His idea was, of course, that no part of this duty should be remitted as a drawback, and he wished to comprehend in this plan our importations from enemy colonies, without which it could have no other effect than to force the imports from the British colonies into our internal consumption, and leave the imports from enemy colonies for exportation. We thought it proper to oppose ourselves in a particular manner to the last mentioned application of this plan, and it was not persisted in.

The trade with enemies' colonies was still viewed as an embarrassing subject, and continuous voyages even between neutral European ports and these colonies were strongly protested against. It appeared to be certain, however, that our opponents would finally agree that the continuity of the voyages should in all cases be held to be broken by the landing of the cargoes in the United States, and perhaps also the paying or securing the duties, as heretofore practised. We did not bring into view at this time the distinction which we mean hereafter to urge in favor of our commerce with the East India colonies of the other parties to the war.

In the course of this conference Lord Auckland renewed a proposal which he had glanced at in our first interview, that the treaty of 1794 should be made the basis of the present negotiation. This was rejected in such a manner as to obtain for the rejection his entire acquiescence. His lordship, towards the close of the meeting, inquired if Congress had not at their last session passed some law affecting their commercial relations with Great Britain. We had been restrained from calling their attention to the act prohibiting, &c. by the apprehension that, as they could not be supposed to be ignorant of it, we might be thought, by pressing it officiously and ostentatiously into notice, to wish to make use of it as a menace; but we now took occasion to explain, in as conciliatory a manner as was consistent with the complete justification of the law, its origin and character. They requested us to give them a copy of the act, and we sent it accordingly the next day.

On the 4th instant, at night, we received from the British commissioners a note upon the subject of the act of Congress, of which a copy is enclosed. It appeared to us, that it would be prudent to found upon this note a request of an immediate interview, in the course of which, it might perhaps be practicable to avail ourselves of their anxiety, that a suspension of the act should be pressed upon our Government, to advance our negotiations, with reference, at least, to the most interesting of the topics involved in it. To our note desiring an interview, Lord Holland replied that he would be glad to see us on the —, but that Lord Auckland being out of town, would not probably be able to attend; Lord Auckland did not in fact, and we believe could not, attend. We opened the conference with Lord Holland, by observing that we had been withheld by considerations, which he would easily comprehend, from being the first to mention the act of the American Government which formed the subject of their note, but that it had been constantly present to our minds, as making it peculiarly desirable that we should understand one another as soon as possible, upon some, if not all, of the points in discussion between us; and as presenting the prospect of a dilemma, as the period prescribed for its commencement approached without finding us forward in our negotiation. After a short vindication of the act, in the course of which we did not omit to represent it in connexion with the special mission which grew out of it, as manifesting the friendly sentiments and views of our Government towards that of His Majesty, we observed, that relying upon the dispositions which their lordships constantly had avowed, and by which they were evidently animated, to establish between the two countries, by a suitable adjustment of all subsisting differences, the most perfect and lasting harmony, it was our earnest desire to take some effectual step, which should save the honor of both Governments, for ensuring the suspension which their lordships had recommended; that there might be reason to apprehend that, unless some advantageous change should appear to have taken place in the state of things, which, in the opinion of Congress, required the adoption of the measure in question, it would not easily be abandoned even for a time; that no such change has taken place, for that all the subjects of complaint which had excited the sensibility of Congress at their last session, and led to the passage of this act, were still as much at large as ever; that it was, indeed, true that commissioners, in the highest degree acceptable, had been appointed by His Majesty's Government to treat with us, and that the spirit of justice and amity displayed by their lordships promised the happiest results; but that it was also true that up to this period it could only be said, as might equally be said of the period when this act was finally past, that negotiations were depending; that we were, therefore, extremely anxious, when we should transmit their lordships' note to the United States, to be enabled to accompany it with assurances that, although much remained to be done, the two subjects of impressment and trade with enemies' colonies would certainly be adjusted to the satisfaction of our Government.

Lord Holland told us, in reply, that we were aware that the first of these subjects was full of difficulty, and required that the feelings and opinions of many persons should be managed and consulted; that it touched the most delicate and momentous of their national concerns, and called for much inquiry and deliberation; that he hoped it would soon be practicable, (and we might be confident that there should be no unreasonable delay,) to submit to us a plan, to which both sides might without reluctance consent; that, in the mean time, we could state to our Government, what was unquestionably true, that those with whom we were treating were diligently and anxiously employed in endeavors to devise an arrangement which should be convenient and honorable to us, and at the same time free from improper hazard to Great Britain; that it appeared to him, that the actual pendency of the negotiations here, (unless their sincerity were distrusted, as he was sure it would not be,) would furnish an adequate motive to Congress for merely postponing the commencement of a law which was originally a very strong measure, and would certainly, if allowed to go into operation at a moment when Great Britain was affording, in the face of the world, an unequivocal demonstration of her wish to remove every ground of misunderstanding between us, acquire a character of extreme harshness; that it was greatly to be lamented that the discussions in which we were now engaged had not been sooner begun, but, that knowing as we did to what cause the delay was to be ascribed, we knew also that it was unavoidable. His lordship mingled with these observations the most amicable assurances, and took an occasion, which a remark from one of us presented, to express his conviction that the event of a peace between Great Britain and France would be so far from creating any indisposition, or producing any obstacles on the part of this country to a liberal adjustment with us, that it would rather facilitate that adjustment, by removing from some of the topics the peculiar interest and difficulty which the present crisis imparts to them.

After some further efforts on our part to promote the object of this interview, without departing from that tone of conciliation which prudence as well as inclination recommended, we separated, and soon afterwards we prepared and sent to the British commissioners an answer to their note of the 4th, of which you will find a copy enclosed.

To these details, we take the liberty to add our opinion, formed upon a careful view of the whole subject, that it will be proper, upon the meeting of Congress in December, to suspend the act for prohibiting the importation of certain articles of British manufacture, so as to afford further time for the completion of the negotiations which it evidently presumes, and which are now in train.

The ground which Congress have taken in this just and salutary measure we are far from wishing to abandon; but to suspend and to abandon it are very different things. The last would wound deeply the honor of the nation, and prostrate the character of the Government; but the first is in perfect conformity with the spirit and purpose of the law; and while it would furnish a signal proof of the equity and moderation of our public councils, would preserve unimpaired that firm and dignified attitude which it becomes us at all times, but now especially, to maintain. The suspension will be so far from relinquishing the measure, or weakening its effect, that it will distinctly imply a re-assertion of its principle and policy, and an unshaken resolution to act upon and enforce it as soon as negotiation shall have been sufficiently and unsuccessfully tried.

The death of Mr. Fox, which every hour is expected to announce, may, and probably will, retard our progress for some time; but our hopes are strong that we shall finally, and without much further delay, accomplish the great objects confided to us. The temper which the British commissioners have obviously brought to the negotiation, corresponding with that which has been manifested towards the mission by those who hold official stations here, as well as by the public in general, is as friendly and respectful to our Government and country as could be desired. We shall continue our exertions to fulfil, with all possible despatch, the instructions with which we have been honored, and shall communicate to you by the earliest opportunity whatever of importance shall occur.

We have the honor to be, with great consideration and esteem, sir, your most obedient servants,

JAS. MONROE,
WM. PINKNEY.

P. S. September 12. We have just received separate notes to the same effect from Lord Auckland, of which copies are enclosed. They authorize us to expect that the conference of Wednesday next, to which he invites us, will enable us to give you details of a more precise and interesting nature than it has been practicable to give in the letter to which this is a postscript.

We omitted to mention in this letter that we have been assured by the British commissioners (particularly by Lord Holland) that a liberal and satisfactory article, relative to the extent of our jurisdiction over the waters near our own coast, and the exemption of the defined limits from all the operations of war, will be cheerfully agreed to, and that an article for defining blockade will meet with no opposition.

September 13. The last account of Mr. Fox's health of this morning is, that the symptoms have increased to so alarming a degree, that he is not expected to survive many hours.

From Lord Holland.

DOWNING STREET, August 23, 1806.

DEAR SIR:

I have seen Lord Auckland this morning, and, if not inconvenient to you and Mr. Pinkney, we thought of proposing to you to meet us at the Foreign Office, Downing street, at twelve o'clock next Wednesday, [27th August.] On that day we can exchange our powers, and will, if you please, take minutes of the general objects of your mission.

I am, dear sir, ever sincerely yours,

HOLLAND.

JAMES MONROE, Esq., &c.

To Lord Holland.

PORTLAND PLACE, August 24, 1806.

MY LORD:

I have been honored with your note of yesterday, inviting Mr. Pinkney and myself to meet your lordship and Lord Auckland at the Foreign Office in Downing street, at twelve o'clock on Wednesday next for the purpose of exchanging our powers and commencing the business confided to us by our respective Governments. I have conferred with Mr. Pinkney on the subject, and have to assure your lordship that we shall be punctual to the appointment which you have been so good as to give us.

I am, with great consideration and esteem, very sincerely yours,

JAMES MONROE.

The Right Hon. LORD HOLLAND, &c.

From Lord Holland and Lord Auckland.

DOWNING STREET, August 28, 1806.

Lord Holland and Lord Auckland present their compliments to Mr. Monroe, and request that, if it be not inconvenient to him, he will have the goodness to meet them in Downing street, on Monday next, [1st September,] at twelve precisely.

[A similar note sent to Mr. Pinkney.]

To Lord Holland and Lord Auckland.

AUGUST 29, 1806.

Mr. Monroe presents his compliments to Lord Holland and Lord Auckland, and has the honor to inform them that Mr. Pinkney and he will not fail to wait on their lordships in Downing street, on Monday next at twelve o'clock.

To Lord Holland and Lord Auckland.

SEPTEMBER 2, 1806.

Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney present their compliments to Lord Holland and Lord Auckland, and have the honor to enclose to their lordships a copy of the act of Congress which they requested in their interview of yesterday.

From Lord Holland and Lord Auckland.

DOWNING STREET, September 4, 1806.

GENTLEMEN:

We have received a copy (sent by you, at our request,) of the "act of Congress to prohibit, from and after the 15th of next November, the importation into the territories of the United States of a very large description of goods, wares, and merchandise, from any port or place situated in Great Britain or Ireland."

On a full consideration of that act, we think it our duty to express our earnest hope and expectation that some means may be found to suspend the execution of a measure so opposite in its temper and tendency to the disposition and views with which our pending negotiation has been commenced and is carrying on.

That measure, unless suspended, will take effect, if not before our discussions can be closed, at least before it is possible that their result can be known in the United States; and would obviously lead to the necessity of proposing to Parliament similar steps on the part of this country, by which mutual irritation would be excited, and fresh impediments created in the way of such a final adjustment as, we trust, is mutually desired.

We rely on you for taking such immediate steps in this business as may best contribute to a happy termination of our treaty, and to a cordial and permanent friendship between His Majesty's subjects and the citizens of the United States.

We have the honor to be your faithful, humble servants,

VASSAL HOLLAND,
AUCKLAND.

P. S. The sailing orders of the North American mail will, in course, be issued this evening, unless you should wish to have them delayed for a day or two.

To Lord Holland and Lord Auckland.

SEPTEMBER 4, 1806. Ten o'clock, P. M.

Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney present their compliments to Lord Holland and Lord Auckland, and have the honor to request an interview with their lordships, at as early a moment as shall suit their convenience, on the subject of their note of this day, which they have just received. In the mean time, the delay suggested, in the postscript of their lordships' note, of the sailing orders of the North American mail, will be extremely agreeable to Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney.

From Mr. Allen, Secretary of Lord Holland.

HOLLAND HOUSE, Friday, September 5.

DEAR SIR:

Lord Holland, understanding by your and Mr. Pinkney's note of yesterday, that you are desirous to have some conversation with him before the sailing of the American packet, will be happy to meet you and Mr. Pinkney tomorrow at the Foreign Office, at half-past eleven o'clock.

I have the honor to be, dear sir, &c.

JOHN ALLEN.

JAMES MONROE, Esq., &c.

The American Ministers to Lord Holland.

SEPTEMBER 10, 1806.

The undersigned ministers extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the United States of America, present their compliments to Lord Holland and Lord Auckland, and have the honor to inform them that they will hasten to transmit to their Government their lordships' note of the 4th instant, the receipt of which has already been acknowledged.

The undersigned consider it their duty to assure Lord Holland and Lord Auckland, that nothing is more remote from the views of their Government than to oppose any obstacle to a fair and satisfactory conclusion of the present negotiation. They are persuaded, if all the circumstances which have occurred between the two Governments since the commencement of the present war are taken impartially into consideration, that not the slightest doubt can remain on that point. It is certain that the act of Congress to which their lordships have objected is attributable to other causes of a very imperious nature, and that it furnishes no sufficient reason to call in question the sincerity with which the United States have uniformly sought to preserve the most friendly relations with Great Britain. The undersigned are, however, far from being desirous to look back to incidents, a review of which can serve only to produce regret. It is more important, and therefore more agreeable, to look forward, and to provide by suitable arrangements against the like in future.

The undersigned flatter themselves that nothing will occur on either side to excite irritation or to create new obstacles in the way of an adjustment, which it is confidently believed the interest of both countries requires. They indulge the hope that the present negotiation, which has been entered into by both Governments with a sincere desire to adjust all subsisting differences and to place their navigation and commerce on a basis of reciprocal advantage, will succeed in all its objects. The undersigned will not fail to promote that desirable result by all the means in their power. They will be happy in communicating to their Government a copy of their lordships' note of the 4th instant, to do justice to the friendly disposition which their lordships have brought into the negotiation; and, in the mean time, the undersigned will always be prepared to promote, by their joint labors, with the greatest possible despatch, and on fair conditions, a satisfactory conclusion of it.

The undersigned request Lord Holland and Lord Auckland to accept the assurance of their high consideration.

JAMES MONROE.
WILLIAM PINKNEY.

[Enclosed in Mr. Monroe and Pinkney's despatch of 11th September.]

ART. 1. No person whatever shall, on the high seas, and without the jurisdiction of either party, be demanded or taken out of any ship or vessel belonging to citizens or subjects of one of the parties, by the public or private armed ships belonging to or in the service of the other, unless such person be at the time in the military service of an enemy of such other party.

No person, being a subject or citizen of one of the parties, and resorting to or residing in the dominions of the other, shall in any case be compelled to serve on board any vessel, whether public or private, belonging to such other party; and all citizens or subjects whatever of the respective parties at this time compulsively serving on board the vessels of the other shall be forthwith liberated, and enabled, by an adequate recompense, to return to their own country.

In all questions which may arise within the dominions of either Power, respecting the national character of any person who claims to be a citizen or subject of the other Power, due credit shall be given to such public documents as his Government may have granted for his protection; and where such documents may have been lost, destroyed, or by casualty not obtained, and any person claims to be a citizen or subject of either party, such other evidence of said claim shall be received and admitted, as would be satisfactory in a court of judicature. The high contracting parties engage that due care shall be taken that such documents shall be granted in their respective ports to such persons only as are justly entitled to them, and by suitable officers who shall be specially designated for the purpose.

ART. 2. It is agreed that no refuge or protection shall be afforded by either party to the mariners, sailors, or other persons not found to be its own citizens or subjects, who shall desert from a vessel of the other party, of the crew whereof the deserter made a part; but; on the contrary, all such deserters shall be delivered up, on demand, to the commanders of the vessels from which they shall have deserted, or to the commanding officers of the ships of war of the respective nations, or to such other persons as may be duly authorized to make requisition in that behalf, provided that proof be made within two years from the time of desertion, by an exhibition of the ship's papers, or authenticated copies thereof, and by satisfactory evidence of the identity of the person, that the deserters so demanded were actually part of the crew of the vessels in question.

And for the more effectual execution of this article, adequate provision shall be made for causing to be arrested, on the application of the respective consuls or vice-consuls to the competent authorities, all deserters, duly proved to be such, in order that they may be sent back to the commanders of the vessels to which they belonged, or removed out of the country. And all due aid and assistance shall be given in searching for as well as in seizing and arresting the said deserters, who shall even be detained and kept in the prisons of the country, at the request and expense of the said consuls or vice-consuls, until they shall have found an opportunity of sending them back or removing them as aforesaid. But if they be not sent back or removed within three months from the day of their arrest, they shall be set at liberty, and shall not be again arrested for the same cause.

From Lord Auckland to Mr. Monroe.

OFFICE FOR TRADE, WHITEHALL, September 12, 1806.

MY DEAR SIR:

Lord Holland and I have received your note of September 10, in answer to ours of the 4th instant. The unhappy consideration which at present occupies Lord Holland has prevented him from meeting me since I returned from Dropmore; but I have received several letters from him, in which he expresses great anxiety that you should be informed by me that we are not neglecting the joint object which we all have in view.

If you and Mr. Pinkney (to whom I send a duplicate of this note) could conveniently come to Downing street at eleven o'clock next Wednesday morning, [September the 17th,] I shall then be able to state provisionally (in Lord Holland's absence) many particulars which may deserve your consideration and advance our next official discussion.

I am, my dear sir, most sincerely yours,

AUCKLAND.

To Lord Auckland.

MY LORD:

PORTLAND PLACE, September 14, 1806.

I have had the pleasure to receive your letter of the 12th, and shall, with Mr. Pinkney, not fail to meet your lordship at Downing street on Wednesday next, at eleven o'clock in the morning. We will receive there any communications which your lordship will be so good as to make on the interesting subjects which engage our joint attention, not doubting that every interview will contribute to advance the business to its desired conclusion. We are aware that Lord Holland's domestic distress and duties will deprive us of the pleasure of seeing him for the present, and hope that your lordship will prevent that circumstance giving him the least anxiety. I beg your lordship to present, &c. and to be assured of the great consideration and esteem with which

I have the honor, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

No. 6.

Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

LONDON, November 11, 1806.

We flattered ourselves, at the date of our last despatch, which was of September 11th, that we should have been able to have concluded a treaty with the British commissioners, and to have transmitted it to you before this, on all the interesting topics which are embraced by our instructions, and on terms that would be approved by our Government. The disposition which had been shown by the members of the cabinet, with most of whom we had had conversations on the subject, and the sentiments which had been expressed in our conferences by the plenipotentiaries who had been appointed to meet us, independent of other considerations of a favorable character, had inspired us with great confidence in such a result. We regret, however, to be now under the necessity of stating to you, that although every topic has been frequently taken into consideration and discussed, and there is good cause to believe that a satisfactory arrangement may be obtained of many of the great points, and an admissible one of the inferior, that, nevertheless, nothing has been concluded on any point, and an insurmountable difficulty has occurred on one which is deservedly considered of the first importance to our country.

The opportunity by which we propose to forward this communication is so pressing as to time, that we fear we shall not be able to give you all the details which have attended the negotiation since the 11th September; we shall, however, endeavor to comprise in it every circumstance which may be necessary to convey a just idea of its present state and probable result.

You were apprised by our last of the delay to which we had been previously exposed by the indisposition of Mr. Fox. It happened unfortunately that the same cause subjected us afterwards to much interruption in the prosecution of the business, which was finally suspended altogether, for several weeks, by his death. We add, however, with pleasure, that we experienced no delay on account of Mr. Fox's indisposition, which did not appear to us, in consideration of all circumstances, to be natural and reasonable; that the business was resumed by the British commissioners as soon after his death and interment as a suitable respect for his memory would permit; and that it has been pursued by them since in a manner to evince an evident desire on their part to bring it to a speedy conclusion.

Our attention was naturally drawn from the commencement of the negotiation to its principal objects, the impressment of our seamen, and the trade with enemies' colonies; the former of which presented the most serious difficulties with this Government. As we knew that the tranquillity of our country, if not its peace, was essentially connected with a suitable provision for this great interest, it seems useless to proceed to those of minor consideration, till it should be satisfactorily disposed of. Hence the greater portion of our time and labor has been bestowed in our several conferences on this latter topic. We have said every thing that we could in support of our claim, that the flag should protect the crew, which we have contended was founded in unquestionable right, whose enjoyment it was indispensable to secure, by an unqualified and positive stipulation in its favor. We have also proposed, in a spirit of accommodation, every suitable expedient that we could devise, consistent with that principle, to obviate the inconveniences which it was urged on the other side were likely to result from its admission. But all our efforts have so far proved ineffectual. The right was denied by the British commissioners, who asserted that their Government to seize its subjects on board neutral merchant vessels on the high seas, and who also urged that the relinquishment of it at this time would go far to the overthrow of their naval power, on which the safety of the state essentially depended. At one time, and that very recently, there was a prospect of an agreement on conditions which appeared to be just and fair between the parties, but that seems now to have completely vanished. It was urged by the British commissioners, that the proposition which we have made, to give the aid of the local authorities of the United States, to apprehend and restore deserters from their vessels, as an inducement for their Government to acknowledge the right which we contended for in favor of the vessels of the United States on the high seas, did not furnish a complete remedy for the evil complained of. It did not follow, they observed, that such deserters would, in all, or even most cases, retire into the country; they might, on the contrary, go on board an American vessel which might put immediately to sea, where our flag would protect them; that such desertions might also take place in a neutral port, and be attended with like consequences. They were, therefore, desirous that we should stipulate that a law should be passed by the Congress, (to be of course reciprocal,) which should make it penal for the commanders of American vessels to take deserters from those of Great Britain under such circumstances, they being British subjects, and likewise to make it the duty of our Government to restore them on their arrival in the United States, on suitable application, and due proof being made of their persons. We agreed to provide a remedy for this presumptive evil. They then observed that the term "deserters" was too limited, according to their law, to comprehend those who might leave their merchant vessels; that it would apply only to such as left their ships of war; they, therefore, proposed that we should enlarge its import by adding the following terms, "seafaring people quitting their service," to which we also agreed; taking care, however, by confining their operation always to the case of real desertion from some vessel, not to give them a greater range in the sense of our law than we had at first intended. To our original project, thus amended, the British commissioners seemed to give their assent; they agreed expressly to propose an article to the cabinet to that effect; from which circumstance, and from what had previously occurred in our conferences, we were led to conclude that they would also support it. To give the cabinet full time for deliberation on the subject, our next meeting was postponed to so distant a day as to admit it. We are sorry to add, that the result of that deliberation was a rejection of the project, and, with it, an end to all hope of obtaining at this time, in its stead, any satisfactory stipulation by treaty respecting impressments.

Our next interview had been appointed to take place on the 5th instant. On the preceding day we received a note from the British commissioners, with a report from a law officer of the crown, which seemed to be communicated to prepare us for what they had to announce more formally the next day. The report of the crown officer had been made in answer to an inquiry from them, on what ground Great Britain claimed a right to take by force her seamen from on board the merchant vessels of other Powers on the high seas. The report justified the pretension by stating that the King had a right, by his prerogative, to require the service of all his seafaring subjects against the enemy, and to seize them by force wherever found, not being within the territorial limits of another Power; that as the high seas were extra-territorial, the merchant vessels of other Powers navigating on them were not admitted to possess such a jurisdiction as to protect British subjects from the exercise of the King's prerogative over them. We were desired to consider the communication as a private one, at least in that stage. At our meeting the next day, the British commissioners stated explicitly, but in a very conciliating manner, that it was not in their power to adopt an article in the spirit of our project; that the Board of Admiralty had been consulted on the subject, as had also been the crown officers in Doctors' Commons, who united all, without exception, in the opinion that the right of their Government, in the case in question, was well founded, and ought not to be relinquished; they added that, under such circumstances, the relinquishment of it was a measure which the Government could not adopt, without taking on itself a responsibility which no ministry would be willing to meet, however pressing the emergency might be. They presented to us at the same time a counter-project, which they intimated they did in obedience to instructions from their Government. It was proposed by this that laws should be passed by the parties, respectively, whereby it should be made penal for the commanders of British vessels to impress American citizens on board American vessels on the high seas, and for the officers of the United States to grant certificates of citizenship to British subjects. The negotiation being thus brought, as it were, to an issue on this very important point, the discussion of the whole subject was necessarily resumed at considerable length, and with great earnestness. We maintained, with all the force in our power, the right of our Government, on the principle and to the extent we had done before, and denied as strenuously the pretension advanced by Great Britain; their counter-project we declared was utterly inadmissible, as its adoption, so far from securing the just rights of the United States, and remedying the evils of which they complained, would prove an abandonment of their rights, and a sanction, in a considerable degree at least, to future injuries. The British commissioners, after supporting with great force, but with candor, the claim of their Government, assured us that it was willing to do any thing in its power to satisfy the United States on the ground of their complaints, which might be done without a relinquishment of their claim. This interview terminated in the appointment of another to take place on the 7th, when it was agreed that the subject should be definitively disposed of, and, in the interim, that each party should revolve it in mind, to see if it might not be possible to suggest some plan which should prove equally satisfactory to both. We met on the 7th, according to appointment, and, having repeated what we had said before of their counter-project, which we deemed altogether inadmissible, and having also stated that we could adopt none which did not allow our ships to protect their crews, or suggest any accommodation other than what we had already proposed as an inducement to their Government to admit the principle, and it appearing that no change had taken place in their instructions, we came at length to the main question, (that which had, in truth, been the great object of the meeting,) what was next to be done under existing circumstances? Should the negotiation cease? The British commissioners expressed an earnest desire that it should not. We had repeatedly stated, that unless this interest was provided for in a satisfactory manner, it would be useless to touch the other points, since a continuance of the same abuses on their part would render of no effect any arrangement, however eligible, which might be made of them. They intimated that their Government gave at present no cause of offence to the United States by impressments, and that we might be satisfied it would continue to pursue the same policy; that it might be better that neither party should abandon its rights, and that each should endeavor to act, in respect to the injuries complained of by the other, in such manner as to prevent future complaints. They thought that, with such a disposition on both sides, seconded by a correspondent exertion, which they assured us existed, and would be made on their part, it was likely that the interest of each country would be placed on a footing equally secure for temporary purposes, and much more so in respect to a permanent good understanding, than it could be for either, by a treaty, which should even stipulate for it the object which it sought. We desired them to communicate to us, by note, the ideas which they had thus expressed, which they readily undertook by proceeding to give a sketch of them at the time, and evidently showing a disposition to make it as acceptable to us as they could do consistently with the principles of their Government. We adjourned to meet again on the 12th instant, without having come to any positive decision as to the part which it became us to take in the delicate conjuncture in which we were placed. We did not fail, however, in showing our regret that no suitable provision had been made for the very important question which had been so long under consideration, to express our sincere desire to pursue that course in respect to the other objects of the negotiation which our duty, under existing circumstances, would permit, and which might be most likely to promote a good understanding between the two countries.

On the 9th instant we received from the British commissioners the note which they had promised us in the last interview, which we have found to correspond in all respects with what we have been taught to expect. We have also weighed, with due consideration, the great question which is propounded by it, and are decidedly of opinion that it is our duty to proceed to the other objects of the negotiation, leaving that of impressment on the ground on which it will be placed by this note, and our acting on it. Many strong reasons favor this course, while none occur to us of any weight against it. When we take into view all that has passed on this subject, we are far from considering the note of the British commissioners as a mere circumstance of form. We persuade ourselves, that by accepting the invitation which it gives, and proceeding in the negotiation, we shall place the business almost, if not altogether, on as good a footing as we should have done by treaty, had the project which we offered them been adopted. The time at which this note was presented to us, and the circumstances under which it was presented, being when the negotiation was absolutely at a stand on this very question, and we had informed the British commissioners that we could do nothing if it was not provided for, give the act a peculiar degree of solemnity and obligation. It was sent to us as a public paper, and intended that we should so consider it, and with the knowledge and approbation of the cabinet. It ought, therefore, to be held as obligatory on the Government, in its just import, as if the substance had been stipulated in a treaty. It is just, also, to give it a liberal construction in favor of the United States, in consideration that it is the act of the British Government. In that view it merits attention; that every thing is expressed in it that could be desired, except the relinquishment of the principle; that in speaking of impressments, the exercise of that act on the high seas is not mentioned, an omission which we know to have been intentional. From a full view of all these circumstances, we think it fair to infer that this Government intends to conform its conduct in future to the just claims of the United States on this great interest, while, by particular motives of policy, it deems it improper to relinquish a claim, especially at this time, which has been long sustained and acted on by it, and which has been heretofore strongly supported by the national feeling, or more properly speaking, prejudice: for we cannot believe that the interest of the nation is in favor of it, more especially if the project which we proposed should be adopted, or correspondent regulations entered into, to produce the same effect, by friendly co-operation between the two Governments. We are therefore of opinion, if the negotiation had contemplated an arrangement of this point alone, that it would be proper to close the business amicably, on the ground on which it is thus placed, rather than to break it off abruptly, and take an unfriendly attitude, from which no advantage could possibly arise in any one respect, and much injury might, and most probably would, for a time at least, even to this very interest. How much stronger, then, is the obligation to proceed, when the other objects of the negotiation are taken also into view, all of which it is highly interesting to arrange, and several of which, of the first importance, it is, as we believe, in our power to arrange? We are aware that our instructions impose on us the necessity of providing satisfactorily for this great interest, as one of the conditions on which a treaty shall be formed; but it does not appear that the fair object of that instruction will not be satisfied by the arrangement thus made. The prohibition not to conclude a treaty, otherwise than on the condition adverted to, is fairly to be understood as applicable to a refusal, on the part of this Government, to arrange the business on just principles, and an adherence by it to its former improper and offensive conduct, which it is well known is not the case. Impelled by these considerations and motives, we shall go forward in the negotiation, and use our best efforts to place the other points on the most advantageous footing that may be practicable. We are the more confirmed in this resolution from the consideration that we shall be able to do it without exposing our Government or country to any the slightest inconvenience. It is known to the British commissioners that in proceeding, under existing circumstances, we shall do it on our own responsibility; a responsibility, however, which we undertake in full confidence that our conduct and the motives of it will be approved.

We shall meet the British commissioners to-morrow to proceed in the negotiation, which we are persuaded it will not require any considerable length of time to conclude. All the other topics have been heretofore brought into view and discussed, but without any intention in that stage, on either side, to push a definitive settlement of them. So much, however, has been said on each by the British commissioners, as to enable us, as we presume, to form a tolerably correct estimate of what may be obtained on several, especially those of the greatest importance. In respect to the trade with enemies' colonies, they have repeatedly told us, that on condition we would land the cargoes in the United States, store them for a month, and change the ship, they would agree that the trade might be free afterwards in the productions of those colonies to other countries, including the parent country of the colony. We have refused to comply with the condition in respect to the storing of the goods for a month, and changing the ship. Some arrangement more advantageous to us than their proposition will, we have no doubt, be obtained. The question of blockade, and others connected with it, may, we think, be satisfactorily arranged. They will agree also to acknowledge our jurisdiction to the extent of a league from our coast; we have claimed that acknowledgment to the extent of three leagues. The trade with India they will put on the footing it held under the treaty of 1794. That with the West Indies must, we fear, rest on the ground of the most favored nation only. Something, we think, may also be done in favor of an intercourse with the British provinces to the north of us. But our claim to an indemnity has been much discouraged, though we have never ceased to press it with great zeal. We shall continue to use our best endeavors to place all these great concerns on the most just and advantageous ground in our power, and shall hasten to communicate to you the result, with the greatest possible despatch, as soon as the business is concluded.

We have been cautious not to compromit ourselves with respect to the law which was passed the last session of the Congress, prohibiting the importation of certain British manufactures into the United States after the 15th of this month, either with this Government or individuals. We think it our duty, however, to observe, that our opinion of the propriety of suspending that law remains unchanged, as it was communicated to you in our letter of September the 11th. Indeed, the uniform conciliating disposition of this Government has strengthened us in that opinion.

Of the state of the war on the continent, the gazettes which accompany this will give you all the information which we possess. Of the ultimate views of Prussia, under existing circumstances, we know nothing. So far, she has followed the example and participated in the fortune of Austria, as exhibited in the last campaign; and so far has Austria imitated hers of the same epoch, by viewing with an apparent indifference events which menace the overthrow of both.

We have the honor to be, with great respect, your most obedient servants,

JAS. MONROE,
WM. PINKNEY.

HOLLAND HOUSE, November 8, 1806.

His Majesty's commissioners and plenipotentiaries have the honor to represent to the commissioners and plenipotentiaries of the United States:

That the project of an article on the subject of impressing seamen, together with the reasons by which the commissioners of the United States have urged the expediency of an arrangement on that subject, has been laid before His Majesty's Government, and has been considered with the same friendly and conciliatory disposition which has marked every step of the negotiation.

That His Majesty's Government has not felt itself prepared to disclaim or derogate from a right which has ever been uniformly and generally maintained, and in the exercise of which the security of the British navy may be essentially involved; more especially in a conjuncture when His Majesty is engaged in wars which enforce the necessity of the most vigilant attention to the preservation and supply of the naval force of his kingdom.

That His Majesty's Government, animated by an earnest desire to remove every cause of dissatisfaction, has directed His Majesty's commissioners to give to Mr. Monroe and to Mr. Pinkney the most positive assurances that instructions have been given, and shall be repeated and enforced, for the observance of the greatest caution in the impressing of British seamen; and that the strictest care shall be taken to preserve the citizens of the United States from any molestation or injury; and that immediate and prompt redress shall be afforded upon any representation of injury sustained by them.

That the commissioners of the United States well know that no recent causes of complaint have occurred, and that no probable inconvenience can result from the postponement of an article subject to so many difficulties. Still, that His Majesty's commissioners are instructed to entertain the discussion of any plan that can be devised to secure the interests of both states, without any injury to rights to which they are respectively attached.

That, in the mean time, the desire of promoting a right conclusion of the proposed treaty, and of drawing closer the ties of connexion between the two countries, induces His Majesty's commissioners to express their readiness to proceed to the completion of the other articles, in the confident hope that the result cannot fail to cultivate and confirm the good understanding happily subsisting between the high contracting parties, and still further to augment the mutual prosperity of His Majesty's subjects and of the citizens of the United States.

VASSAL HOLLAND.
AUCKLAND.

TO JAMES MONROE, Esq. and WILLIAM PINKNEY, Esq.

PROJECT.

In order to prevent the vessels of either party becoming a sanctuary at sea for deserters from the vessels of the other party, it is expressly stipulated by the high contracting parties that they will respectively enact laws whereby it shall be made penal for the commanders or masters of the vessels of either of the parties, who may happen to be in the ports of some third Power, or in the ports of one of the parties, with the vessels of the other party, to receive on board and carry to sea (knowing them to be such) the sailors belonging to and deserting from such vessels. It is further agreed, whenever the vessels having on board the sailors who may have so deserted in a neutral port shall arrive at any port of the party to which they belong, that such party shall cause such deserters to be delivered up, on proper application, supported by lawful evidence, to the agent or consul of the other party, who may be duly authorized by his Government to act in such cases.

COUNTER-PROJECT.

Whereas, when the one nation is at war and the other at peace, it is not lawful for the belligerent to impress or carry off from on board the vessels of the neutral sea faring persons, who are the native subjects of the neutral, or others who are not the subjects of the belligerent; and whereas, from the similarity of language and appearance, it may be difficult to distinguish the subjects of the two states, the high contracting parties agree, that for the greater security of the subjects of the neutral, they will enact such laws respectively as shall subject to heavy penalties the commanders of the belligerent ships who shall impress or carry off the native subjects of the neutral, or others, not being the subjects of the belligerent, from on board the neutral vessels, on any pretence whatever. And they further agree to enact laws, respectively, making it highly penal in the subjects of the neutral to grant any certificates of the birth and country of seafaring persons, without due evidence and proof of the same.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, Ministers Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States in London.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 28, 1806.

Your despatch of the 11th of September has been duly received. Although the tenor of the discussions which it recites does not exhibit on the part of the British commissioners the readiness in yielding to the justice of our claims and to the energy of your statements which might be wished, yet the general spirit of conciliation with which they profess, and appear to have met you, cherishes a hope that further explanations on your part, and reflection on theirs, will have brought the negotiation to a favorable result. In this hope, and in consideration of the amicable views and manner in which a suspension of the non-importation act is pressed, the President has not hesitated in his determination to recommend the measure to Congress, whose session will commence on Monday next. This will be done, not in his first general message, which has been already put into its final form, but in a message appropriated to the subject, which will follow as soon as the course of business will conveniently admit.

In your communication of this compliance, so far as depends on the President, with the object of the British commissioners, seconded by your recommendation, you will not fail to let it be understood, as a proof of his earnest desire to smooth the way to a happy adjustment of all differences between the two nations, and to make every sacrifice for the purpose which may be reconcilable with that consistency and just policy in the national proceedings which cannot be abandoned.

This letter, with another to Mr. Monroe, will be put into the hands of Mr. Merry, who, in consequence of the arrival of Mr. Erskine, is now on his return. I have made him acquainted with the general posture of your negotiations, and with the intention of the President to recommend to Congress the proposed suspension of the prohibitory act.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, Ministers Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States in London.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 3, 1806.

The President having this day complied with the recommendation in your letter of September 11, by a special message to Congress on the subject of the non-importation act of the last session, I lose not a moment in forwarding to Mr. Merry's care the enclosed copy, hoping that it will either find him still at Alexandria, or overtake him before the vessel gets out of reach.

I remain, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, Ministers Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States in London.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 6, 1806.

The detention of the Leonidas enables me to enclose a copy of the bill suspending the non-importation act of the last session, as it was passed by the House of Representatives this day, with only five dissenting voices.

In the object, the House is supposed to have been unanimous, the difference of opinion being produced by a disagreement about the time to which the suspension should be limited. As the bill passed with unusual celerity, it is not improbable that the suspension may be further extended by the Senate, especially as a proposal to suspend till the 30th December next was lost by a majority of sixty to forty in the House.

Enclosed I transmit a copy of the documents referred to in the President's message, respecting the approaches of the Spaniards upon the Orleans Territory, and a few printed copies of the special message, recommending a suspension of the non-importation law.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

Mr. Madison to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 20, 1806.

You will have seen by my letter of the 6th, which went by sundry other conveyances, that the bill suspending the non-importation act had passed the House of Representatives. I now enclose it in the form of a law, with an amendment providing for a further suspension by the Executive, in case the state of things between the two countries should require it. In the Senate the vote for the bill was unanimous. I add a continuation of the newspapers, and refer to them for the current information of a public nature.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

No. 7.

Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

LONDON, December 27, 1806.

We have the pleasure to acquaint you that we have this day agreed with the British commissioners to conclude a treaty on all the points which have formed the object of our negotiation, and on terms which we trust our Government will approve. It will require only a few days to reduce it to form. When that is done, we shall transmit it to you by a special messenger. We hasten to communicate to you this interesting intelligence for the information and guidance of our Government in such measures as may have reference to the subject.

We have the honor to be, with great consideration and esteem, sir, your most obedient servants,

JAS. MONROE,
WM. PINKNEY.

JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State, Washington.

No. 8.

Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

Sir:

LONDON, January 3, 1807.

We have the honor to transmit you a treaty which we concluded with the British commissioners on the 31st of December. Although we had entertained great confidence from the commencement of the negotiation that such would be its result, it was not until the 27th that we were able to make any satisfactory arrangement of several of the most important points that were involved in it. On the next day we communicated to you that event by several despatches, three of which were forwarded by vessels from Liverpool, so that we hope you will receive very early intelligence of it. We commit this, with the treaty, to Mr. Purviance, who, we flatter ourselves, will have the good fortune to arrive in time to deliver it to you before the adjournment of Congress.

The necessity we feel ourselves under to forward to you the treaty without delay will, we fear, render it impossible for us to enter so fully into the subject of it as on many considerations it might be proper to do. We are aware that such instruments must be construed by an impartial view of their contents, uninfluenced by extraneous matter. A knowledge, however, of the sense in which the several articles of a treaty were understood by the parties to it may in most cases be useful. It is also just to remark, that some circumstances occurred in the course of this negotiation, which, although they do not appear on the face of the instrument itself, yet, as they may have no inconsiderable influence on the future relations of the two countries, it is peculiarly important to explain. We shall endeavor to give such explanations, where they may be necessary, in the best manner that may be found compatible with the despatch which the occasion so imperiously requires, and, we flatter ourselves, without omitting any thing on any point that may be deemed of essential importance.

The first article of the present treaty, which stipulates that peace shall subsist between the parties, is taken from that of 1794, and is found in most of the modern treaties.

The second article confirms those of a permanent nature in the treaty of 1794. The British commissioners were very desirous to introduce the permanent articles of that treaty, in the form of new stipulations, into the present one. They insisted, with great earnestness, that that article which relates to the trade with the Indian tribes should be so amended as to admit the traders of Canada and the Hudson Bay Company to participate with us in that trade with the tribes in Louisiana. They seemed to admit that, by a fair construction of the article, they could not support such a claim, but contended that it was justified by its spirit. Their solicitude on this point, which they had supposed was an unimportant one to the United States, created some embarrassment and delay in the business. They intimated that it proceeded from a desire to conciliate the public opinion in this country in favor of the treaty, which became necessary in consequence of the concessions which they thought they made us on other points. As we were decidedly of opinion that the article in the treaty of 1794 could not apply to territory afterwards acquired, and could see nothing in its spirit which entitled it to such an extension, and more especially as our instructions contemplated a different result, it was impossible for us to adopt their proposal. They finally agreed, therefore, though not without evident reluctance, to the article in its present form.

We regret to say that the third article, which regulates our trade with the British possessions in India, which, with one essential and most unfavorable difference, is the same with the thirteenth article of the treaty of 1794, is not what we had been led to hope it would be practicable to make it. Aware of the importance attached to this commerce in America, we have used the most zealous and persevering efforts, not only to prevent the introduction of new restraints upon it, but even to emancipate it from some of those which the treaty of 1794 had distinctly sanctioned. The India Company have, however, been less accommodating than was at first expected, and hence the rejection of all the amendments proposed by us, one of which sought to omit entirely, and (when that was refused) to modify the proviso copied from the treaty of 1794, that our voyages from the British possessions should be direct to the United States. This amendment, in both its shapes, was repelled in such a manner as to convince us that nothing would be gained by continuing to press it; and we gave it up, at length, with great reluctance. In this stage of the business, the British commissioners insisted upon an amendment on their part, by which our voyages to British India were required to be direct from the United States. This unexpected amendment was proposed at the instance of the India Company, after the project of the British commissioners (which, with reference to this subject, was a literal copy of the thirteenth article of the treaty of 1794) had not only been presented to us, but fully discussed, and, as we understood, settled. The real intention and office of it were said by Lord Holland and Lord Auckland to be no more than to make the article speak unequivocally what was the true meaning of the article in the late treaty. We replied to this, that the article in the late treaty was not susceptible of this limited construction; that its obvious import was, that only the voyage from India should be direct; that this had been solemnly adjudged by their own courts of law; and that the practice had been, and still continued to be so. We were answered by the production of a paper, purporting to be a report of ———, that, in their opinion, an American vessel was not entitled to a clearance from a port in Great Britain to Calcutta, under the treaty of 1794. We were told, moreover, that Lord Grenville when he made the treaty, the India Company when it sanctioned, and the British Government when it ratified it, did not mean to authorize any other than direct voyages, outward as well as homeward, between the United States and their Indian possessions; and that if the treaty was liable to another construction, it arose from mere inadvertence in adjusting the phraseology; but that, in truth, it was not a fair and natural interpretation of words which authorized a commerce between two defined limits; that a commerce between one of these limits and some third place was intended to be allowed, although not a word was said about it in the article. Having given the obvious answer to these suggestions, we urged as long and as zealously as was thought advisable the inconveniences to which our trade with India would be subjected by prohibiting any of the modes in which it was prosecuted, as well as the unfriendly appearance of the new restriction, for which there existed no adequate motive. We spoke of the sensibility which would be excited in our country by such an ill-timed and ungracious interference, the interests which it would affect, and the passions which it would enlist against the entire treaty; to all which it was finally answered, that the India Company could not be prevailed upon to relax upon this point; that, moreover, it ought not to be forgotten that this was a trade from which their own subjects were ordinarily excluded, in favor of the company's monopoly; that this monopoly, as a losing concern, seemed at present to require peculiar protection; that our admission into British India at all was a boon for which we did not and could not give any equivalent; and, of course, that we could not justly complain if that admission was somewhat qualified, with a view to the mitigation of the evils by which it was undoubtedly attended, and which it was not possible wholly to prevent, especially if we were not placed upon a more disadvantageous footing in that respect than other friendly Powers; which was so far from being the case, that we were unquestionably admitted by the article, as they proposed to amend it, upon much better terms than any other nation, inasmuch as our commerce (exclusive of the advantage of being secured by treaty) would be subject only to British duties; whereas the Danes and Swedes paid alien duties to a considerable amount, without enjoying any privilege (whatever might be said to the contrary) to which we were not equally entitled. We were at last reduced to the necessity of accepting the article with the obnoxious amendment, rendered less obnoxious, perhaps, by the clause relative to the most favored nation; or making a treaty without any article upon the subject, which would have the same, and probably worse effects; or of making no treaty at all. We preferred the first.

The fourth and fifth articles regulate the trade between the United States and the British possessions in Europe. By these we are persuaded that much greater satisfaction will be given to our Government and country than in the preceding one. The three first clauses of the fifth article, which place the vessels and merchandise of each country in the ports of the other, in respect to duties and prohibitions, on the footing of the most favored nation, are taken from the treaty of 1794. To these we were not aware that any well founded objection was ever made. But the subsequent clauses give a new character to this intercourse. The right which the British Government reserved, by the treaty of 1794, to impose a tonnage duty on American vessels equal to the duty which was payable on British vessels in the United States, is, by the first of these clauses, made reciprocal. Under that reservation, or rather, as we presume, on the pretext of it, the British Government had actually imposed a tonnage duty on American vessels of six shillings and five pence sterling per ton, being almost three times the amount of the duty which was payable on British vessels in the United States. And as the United States had expressly stipulated not to raise the duty on British vessels higher than it then was, it was out of their power, without a palpable violation of that stipulation, to countervail the duty imposed by Great Britain on American vessels. But by making the reservation reciprocal, the United States have an unquestionable right to raise the duty on British vessels to the same level, wherever that may be. And by confining the reciprocity strictly to the principle of national equality, that is, an equality of tonnage duties which shall be payable on the vessels of each party in the ports of the other, a right is reserved to each to give what preference it thinks fit, within that limit, to its own vessels and people. At present, such preference is given by our law to the amount of forty-four cents per ton, which is not only protected by this clause against any countervailing measure, other than by lessening the duty, but the right is secured to increase it in the degree above stated. By this we do not wish to imply that it would be advisable to take all the advantage of this circumstance which the article admits of. The presumption is, that the British Government will, in case the treaty is ratified, repeal the additional duty on American vessels, which will leave them charged, in common with their own and those of every other nation, with the sum of four shillings and five pence per ton. Should our Government think proper to raise the duty on British vessels to the same point, it may, perhaps, be advisable not to increase the present discrimination. The last clause of this article, which stipulates that the same duties of exportation and importation shall be paid on all goods and merchandise, and that the same drawbacks and bounties shall be allowed in both countries, whether the same be in British or American vessels, will, it is also hoped, be found of very essential advantage to the United States. The right which Great Britain had reserved by the treaty of 1794, to countervail the difference of duty payable in the United States on Asiatic goods, when imported in British or American vessels, had been productive of very serious injury. The duties which had been imposed by the British Government on American productions, on that principle, were so high, making in most cases a difference of ——— shillings per ton in favor of British vessels, that it must have been impossible in peace for our navigation to have borne it. The evil was the greater, because the species of commercial warfare in which it engaged us, in consideration of the comparative value and bulk of the articles subject to it in each country, furnished no remedy. On the contrary, as the principle was unfavorable, the further it was carried the worse would be its effect. By this clause it is presumed that the evil will be completely done away, while we flatter ourselves that the stipulation in favor of drawbacks and bounties, without exposing us to any inconvenience, will be productive of some advantage.

It is proper to remark that we did not omit to propose an arrangement on the subject of export duties, by which the United States should at least be placed, in that respect, upon the footing of all other nations. The discrimination to our prejudice in the British duties on exportation, which took their rise in the convoy duty of the last war, has undoubtedly an unkind and an oppressive effect. This discrimination is found in the 43 Geo. III. ch. 68, a permanent act, (which repealed the then existing duties, and substituted others,) and in the 43 Geo. III. ch. 70, which imposes additional duties during the present war. Taking the war duty and the permanent duty together, the consumers in the United States of certain British manufactures (for the duties in question apply only to British manufactures, and not to all of them, British cotton, yarn, and manufactures, and some other articles, being excepted) pay two and a half per cent. ad valorem, more than the consumer in Europe, or within the straits, pays on the same goods.

The only mode in which it could be supposed to be possible that this unpleasant distinction could be removed was, by applying to the subject the rule of the most favored nation. Great Britain was not likely, in her present situation, to stipulate against all export duties, or even to agree to a maximum. Neither was she likely, by considering the actual duties as originally, and even now, convoy duties, and therefore, in their principle applicable only to the navigation which her convoys protect, to relieve from them wholly, or in part, such merchandise as should be carried to our country in American vessels, and leave them to oppress her own tonnage; thus offering a bounty in favor of American ships against her own. The rule of the most favored nation was, therefore, finally suggested with a hope that it would meet with no objection. It was, however, perseveringly opposed. We were told that the single effect of such an arrangement would be to compel Great Britain to raise the export duties against other countries, not to reduce them as to us; and that this would be of no advantage to the United States, but might be a serious embarrassment to Great Britain. It was urged, on our part, that, if Great Britain could not give up entirely the excess of export duty now paid by us, it did not follow that it might not be fairly distributed among the consumers of her merchandise in every part of the world, so as still to produce the same revenue, with more regard to justice; that, as her best customers, we had a right to be placed upon at least an equal footing with other nations, and to complain if we were rather distinguished by the peculiar burthens which she undertook to impose upon us; that the discrimination against us, upon the notion that the duty had reference to convoy, was a fallacy, since part of the discrimination was permanent, and, of course, a peace as well as a war duty, since we, who paid the duty, derived no benefit from the convoy, which was professed to be the consideration of it; and since the protection of their own trade, in their own navigation, being a general and national concern, there was no sound reason why the relative expense of particular convoys should be allowed to suggest the relative measure of the duties which were to supply the means of affording them. They replied to the idea of distributing the amount of the discrimination among all the consumers of their merchandise, by referring us to the present state of Europe. They reminded us that their own colonies in America paid the same export duty that was paid by us, and repeated that, as it was only the discrimination between the United States and Europe, of which we could not demand to have any part of the duty, against which we have any right to complain, withdrawn from us, and we could gain nothing by forcing this country to add to the burthens of others already overwhelmed and impoverished by the calamities of war. We were obliged, though very reluctantly, to abandon this object.

The sixth article relates to the commerce with the West Indies, which it was found impossible to arrange in a satisfactory manner. There were many serious obstacles to an agreement on this point, some of which seemed to be peculiarly applicable to the present time. The British West India merchants had, at an early stage, represented that, by the trade which our citizens enjoyed with the colonies of their enemies, we had so completely stocked the markets of the continent with West India productions as to shut those markets on them. They had remonstrated earnestly against any arrangement of that point which should sanction, in any degree, our trade with those colonies. This question had taken deep hold of the minds of a great proportion of this community, among whom may be classed not those in the mercantile line only, who were immediately engaged in the trade, but the whole commercial interest, and many in other circles of great consideration in the country. Of this fact sufficient proof was furnished by the debate which took place, in the last session of Parliament, on the bill for regulating the intercourse between the United States and the West Indies. The British commissioners seemed to have taken from that debate, more especially from the support which their opponents apparently received from the public, a very strong admonition not to touch the subject by treaty at this time. They were apprehensive that any regulation of this trade, however fair it might be, which should accompany their sanction of that with the colonies of their enemies, would produce the worst effect with all parties, and endanger any treaty which might be formed. They were, therefore, desirous of postponing the subject for the present; to which we agreed. In the stipulation which provided for the postponement, we have, as you will perceive, in conformity with our instructions, reserved the right to our Government to counteract any regulations by which the British Government may exclude us from a fair participation in that commerce. While the war lasts, we shall enjoy it, in a certain degree, by the consent of the British Government, by necessity; and the reservation cannot fail to be considered by it as a powerful weapon of defence, to be used when occasion calls for it. It must be seen that it will be impossible for the Congress to prohibit an intercourse between the United States and the West Indies in British vessels, without producing a very serious effect on their whole navigation and commercial interests. We flatter ourselves, therefore, that it may be found practicable, and perhaps not difficult, to arrange this business hereafter to the satisfaction of both countries.

The seventh article relates to the appointment of consuls by each party in the territories and ports of the other. It was taken from the treaty of 1794.

The eighth article, which specifies the causes for which vessels may be captured or detained, including among them the circumstance of their having enemies' property on board, is (except the last clause) a transcript of the seventeenth article of the treaty of 1794. The stipulation contained in that clause (that the parties shall be allowed adequate damages and charges of the trial in all cases of unfounded detention or other contravention of the regulations of the present treaty) will, we presume, produce the salutary effect contemplated by it. There is, perhaps, no principle in the maritime pretensions of this country which has been more abused in practice than that which this provision is intended to remedy. That damages should be allowed in all such cases is, it is true, a doctrine recognised by the Court of Admiralty. It cannot, however, be doubted that, by providing for them in the treaty, the obligation to allow them will acquire greater force with the court, and even the Government itself, while it cannot fail to give a useful admonition to the cruisers.

The ninth article regulates what shall be deemed contraband of war.

You will observe that tar and turpentine, except when destined to a place of naval equipment, are not comprised in the list, and that provisions are altogether omitted. We endeavored to exclude from it naval stores, but without effect. We succeeded, however, in exempting the vessel on the return voyage, after depositing her cargo at the port of her destination, from being detained on the pretence that it consisted of contraband articles.

The provision in the tenth article, relative to vessels sailing without knowledge of a blockade, is somewhat altered from the treaty of 1794. The precise effect of the change cannot, perhaps, be pronounced with certainty; but it seems to be clear that it cannot be otherwise than advantageous. The alterations consist in the introduction into the preamble of "the distance and other circumstances incident to the situation of the contracting parties," and of the word "such" into the provision which follows. The first amendment appears to justify an inference that, on account of the peculiar circumstances, local and relative, thus recited as the reasons why, in the opinion of the contracting parties, "it may frequently happen that vessels may sail for a port or place without knowing that it is besieged, blockaded, or invested." Our vessels ought not to be liable to be judicially affected with knowledge of a blockade, so as to subject them to penalty by the evidence usually held to be sufficient for that purpose. Sir William Scott decided, in 1799, that, in consequence of the distance of the United States from Europe, we were entitled to a more favorable rule, in that respect, than other countries; and our article may be fairly considered as adopting that idea, and acting upon it. On the foundation of the single fact of distance, Sir William Scott justified a conjectural destination from America to Amsterdam, although the blockade of that port had been notified; and the parties concerned were proved to have known of the commencement of it. The article, as it now stands, seems necessarily to imply, at least, the same indulgence; and, if it does, it certainly goes further than Sir William Scott's opinion, which does not admit that an inquiry can be made of the blockading force, as our article unquestionably does, in the cases to which it applies. It does not appear to be unreasonable to hold that, a peculiar motive being now assigned in the preamble for the provision which it introduces, a correspondent peculiar effect is contemplated by that provision; and no such effect can follow from it, if it be not that (as our distance makes it impossible "that we should have constant information of the state of the blockade, whether it continues or is relaxed,) the mere notification of the blockade, or even the knowledge that the blockade has been commenced de facto, shall not be sufficient to make the destination illegal; but that, notwithstanding such notification or knowledge, we shall receive warning at the port or place blockaded. The words, "without knowing that the same is either besieged, blockaded, or invested," will admit of this interpretation, since, by reason of our distance, it may, in our case, be truly said (and has, in substance, been judicially said) to be one thing to know that a blockade has been notified or instituted, and another that it continues. We endeavored, without success, to obtain the consent of the British commissioners to the article proposed in your project. They would only agree, as you will perceive, to take its preamble, and engraft it upon the article of 1794, observing that this would give to that article a new and more favorable, though certainly an undefined, character; and that, at a moment when their maritime efforts in this mode of hostility might more than ever become indispensable to the national safety, it was impossible to do more. We pressed them long and earnestly to connect with the clause a definition of blockade, to which, in the early stages of our negotiation, it was believed there would be no objection. We found them, however, decidedly averse to such a definition by treaty, notwithstanding the precedent afforded by Lord St. Helen's convention with Russia. They maintained that the British doctrine was already as explicit upon this point as any definition could make it; that it was difficult, if not impracticable, to agree upon one which should be at the same time accurate and complete; that the clause, in its present form, would do much towards the accomplishment of our object; and that what remained it would be in their power, as it certainly was in their inclination, to supply as effectually as in the treaty itself, by taking occasion to state, in a letter which it was intended should be delivered to us, on their part, at the time of the signature of the treaty, in which you will hereafter find explained the theory and practice of the British Government on this subject.

This reasoning was in no degree satisfactory, and it was resisted accordingly, but without effect. The proposed substitute for a definition by treaty might be of some value, and was not therefore opposed; but it was obvious, that it would be greatly impaired, if not wholly destroyed, by the nature of the letter of which we had received a full explanation, and in which the suggested statement was to be inserted.

The eleventh article regulates the great question of our commerce with enemies' colonies, the interruption of which was one of the principal causes of the late disagreement between the two countries. We trust that the compromise which has been made on this point will be advantageous to our commercial interest, and satisfactory to our Government. The British commissioners were very desirous of burthening this intercourse with several severe restrictions, to place, as they did not hesitate to state, their own merchants on an equal footing in the great markets of the continent with those of the United States. With that view, and to settle all questions concerning the continuity of the voyage, they proposed that all articles of West India produce should be stored in the United States for the term of one month, be transported thence to Europe in another ship from that in which they were brought, and be likewise subjected to a duty of at least four per cent. on re-exportation. They finally agreed, however, to relinquish all these pretensions, except the landing of the goods in the United States, and the payment (by which is understood the securing of the payment in the mode prescribed by our law) of one per cent. on such European articles as may be carried from thence to the colonies; and of two per cent. on such West India productions as may be carried to Europe, including the parent and every other country. We are persuaded that this arrangement will be attended with less inconvenience to the parties than the other restrictions above mentioned, or either of them. The storing of the goods, especially for a month, seemed to be peculiarly objectionable, as it would have subjected us to a serious injury, without being attended with any circumstances to alleviate the regret inseparable from it. We flatter ourselves that the sum agreed to be paid will not be felt as a heavy one by our merchants, whose patriotism will be gratified by the recollection, that the duty which they pay will redound to the advantage of their country. By the compromise which is made, the practical enjoyment of the rights of each party is forborne, in the manner stated and for the term specified, while the rights themselves are reserved. The stipulation being in the form of a concession on the part of Great Britain, is intended to mitigate her principle where it applies, but in no respect to enlarge the sphere of its operation. No judicial decision of the Court of Admiralty in this country has hitherto extended the British principle to enemies' colonies in the East Indies, and it is understood that it does not apply to the greater part, if to any of them. Some cases are depending before it from the Vice-admiralty Courts of Halifax and Columbo, which will bring the point into question. Should the opinion of the court be, that the principle is applicable to the colony to which the cause relates, then the party will have the advantage of the provision contained in this article; should it, on the contrary, decide that it does not apply to such colony, then the trade between it and the parent country will be free. This view of the subject was entertained equally by the British commissioners and ourselves, and is that, as they assure us, which the Court of Admiralty will adopt in its decisions. We endeavored to exempt this branch of the trade with enemies' colonies from the operation of the British principle, but that was found to be impracticable. We flatter ourselves that the arrangement made respecting it will be deemed the next most eligible one that could have been adopted, and that it will produce in practice, in a great measure, if not altogether, the same effect.

The twelfth article establishes the maritime jurisdiction of the United States to the distance of five marine miles from their coast, in favor of their own vessels and the unarmed vessels of all other Powers who may acknowledge the same limit. This Government contended that three marine miles was the greatest extent to which the pretension could be carried by the law of nations, and resisted, at the instance of the Admiralty and the law officers of the Crown, in Doctors' Commons, the concession, which was supposed to be made by this arrangement, with great earnestness. The ministry seemed to view our claim in the light of an innovation of dangerous tendency, whose admission, especially at the present time, might be deemed an act unworthy of the Government. The outrages lately committed on our coast, which made some provision of the kind necessary as a useful lesson to the commanders of their squadrons, and a reparation for the insults offered to our Government, increased the difficulty of obtaining any accommodation whatever. The British commissioners did not fail to represent that which is contained in this article, as a strong proof of a conciliating disposition in their Government towards the Government and people of the United States. The limit established was not so extensive as that which we had contended for, and expected to have obtained; we persuade ourselves, however, that the great object which was contemplated by any arrangement of the subject, will result from that which has been made. The article in the treaty, in connexion with the causes which produced it, forms an interesting occurrence in the history of our country, which cannot fail to produce the most salutary consequences. It is fair to presume, that the sentiment of respect which Great Britain has shown by this measure for the United States, will be felt and observed in future by her squadrons in their conduct on our coast, and in our bays and harbors. It is equally fair to presume, that the example of consideration which it affords in their favor, by a nation so vastly preponderant at sea, will be followed by other Powers.

By the thirteenth article it is agreed, that the sum for which bonds shall be given by the commanders of privateers, before they receive their commissions, to indemnify those who shall be injured by their misconduct, shall be increased to a greater amount than was required by the nineteenth article of the treaty of 1794. It is also enjoined in stronger and more definite terms on the belligerent, in this than in the former article, to see that its ships of war and privateers shall observe, in a manner the most favorable to neutrals, the acknowledged principles and rules of the law of nations in the search of merchant vessels. We endeavored to obtain an arrangement more adequate to the object, and relinquished the pursuit of it with regret. While the subject of visitation and search was under consideration, the British commissioners assured us that their Government would regulate it in a satisfactory manner to the United States, by act of Parliament, especially in respect to privateers; which assurance they repeated when the treaty was signed.

The following articles to the twenty-first, inclusive, are taken from the treaty of 1794. The British commissioners showed a desire to retain them, and as it appeared that they had, in substance, been introduced into the treaty with France of 1801, and that an attempt on our part to omit them would be thought unaccommodating and captious, we agreed to them.

The twenty-second article contains a new and useful provision in favor of the unfortunate, in the case of shipwreck.

The twenty-third article, after declaring that it is the intention of the high contracting parties that the people of their respective dominions shall be on the footing of the most favored nations, stipulates that, in case either of the parties shall hereafter grant any additional advantages in navigation or commerce to any other nation, the citizens or subjects of the other party shall fully participate in them. This article is deemed peculiarly important in many views, but more especially in its application to the British possessions in the East Indies. If it can be shown that any peculiar accommodation is, or shall be hereafter, granted to any other Powers, we become entitled to it of course.

The twenty-fourth article engages that the parties shall communicate to each other the laws which their respective Legislatures may enact for the abolition or limitation of the African slave trade, and that they will also use their best endeavors to procure the co-operation of other Powers for the complete abolition of that trade. As this engagement reposes on the basis of our laws, it follows that it does not enjoin any obligation unknown to them. If it should be acted on at all by our Government, further than by communicating to this the laws of Congress, as is proposed in the first part of the article, the sphere of its operation would be a very contracted one till the year 1808. After that period, such a co-operation, on a more enlarged scale, would become a constitutional measure of the Government, and, as we think, a suitable one. Mr. Fox had taken great interest in this question, and it is understood that, in suggesting the idea, in the address of the House of Commons to the King, of obtaining the co-operation of other Powers, the United States were held particularly in view. The British commissioners proposed the article, and showed great desire that we should accede to it. As this stipulation was not comprised within the scope of our instructions, we have thought it our duty to explain to you the cause to which its admission into the treaty is to be attributed.

The twenty-fifth article was introduced for the purpose of protecting other Powers having treaties with either party in the enjoyment of the rights secured by them. The stipulation contained in our treaty with France in 1803, of certain commercial privileges in favor of French and Spanish subjects, for a definite term, in Louisiana, made such a provision particularly necessary.

The twenty-sixth article fixes the term of the treaty to ten years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications.

We are sorry to add that this treaty contains no provision against the impressment of our seamen. Our despatch of the 11th of November communicated to you the result of our labors on that subject, and our opinion, that, although this Government did not feel itself at liberty to relinquish formally, by treaty, its claim to search our merchant vessels for British seamen, its practice would, nevertheless, be essentially, if not completely abandoned. That opinion has been since confirmed by frequent conferences on the subject with the British commissioners, who have repeatedly assured us that, in their judgment, we were made as secure against the exercise of their pretension by the policy which their Government had adopted in regard to that very delicate and important question, as we could have been made by treaty. It is proper to observe, however, that the good effect of this disposition, and of its continuance, may depend, in a great measure, on the means which may be taken by the Congress hereafter to check desertions from the British service. If the treaty is ratified, and a perfectly good understanding produced by it between the two countries, it will be easy for their Governments, by friendly communications, to state to each other what they respectively desire, and in that mode to arrange the business as satisfactorily as it could be done by treaty.

We regret, also, to be under the necessity of stating that no provision has been made by the treaty to indemnify our citizens for their losses by the late seizures, and other violations of the law of nations. This object engaged our attention in every stage of the negotiation, and was not abandoned by the signature of the treaty. On the day it was signed, we stated in explicit terms to the British commissioners, that we could not conclude without having a satisfactory assurance by them of the part their Government intended to take, equally in regard to the vessels and cargoes which had been condemned, and to the suits that were depending. The principle established in the correspondence between Mr. King and Lord Hawkesbury we admitted should form the bound of our claim in respect to the seizures for an imputed illegal trade, for every violation of which, in cases of condemnation, we expected a full indemnity, and a dismissal of all the causes still depending that were protected by it. The British commissioners observed, that it was neither their wish nor expectation that we should relinquish our claim; on the contrary, they were willing we should preserve it: with which view they proposed that we should present them a paper bearing date prior to the signature, which should make the reservation in such form as we thought best suited to the object. They intimated that, in cases of vested right, it was not in the power of their Government to interfere to the prejudice of the parties, and that it would be hard on the Government, and unpopular in the ministry, to apply the public money to such a purpose; still, they said nothing to preclude that expectation; on the contrary, they encouraged it, and were still more explicit in suggesting that the depending cases would not be unfavorably adjudged. They seemed desirous that, while we should reserve our claim, their Government should retain a right to pursue such a course of conduct in regard to it as might be dictated hereafter by circumstances. To enter into an engagement in favor of our claim, in the present state of things, appeared to them as being likely to expose their Government to the imputation of having done it by coercion, and to deprive it of a claim to any merit for such accommodation as it might, under other circumstances, be disposed to yield. Should the circumstances of collision which had taken place between the two countries be done away, and their commerce and friendly relations be re-established, as they hoped was already in a great measure done, and would be so completely by this treaty, their Government, they thought, would feel itself more at liberty to yield accommodations on this topic than in the actual state. This was the substance of the communication made to us on this subject by the British commissioners before the signature of the treaty, on which, and our declaring explicitly that we would reserve the right in the manner they had proposed, in full confidence that their Government would respect it, we proceeded to sign the treaty. We have had an interview with the British commissioners since the signature, and were happy to find that they had not forgotten what had passed between us on that occasion. We had asked the interview, as we informed them, for the purpose of conferring on this subject, and of obtaining their sentiments in so distinct a form as to leave us under no embarrassment in the communication it was our duty to make to you on it. Nothing passed in this interview on their part to change the ground on which the business had been placed in the former one. They intimated, however, that it might be advantageous, and would certainly be proper for us, in the present stage, to confer with Lord Howick on this subject, since any declaration from him could not fail, according to its import, to merit the peculiar attention of our Government. We have accordingly seen and conferred with Lord Howick upon this topic, whose sentiments appeared to correspond strictly with those which had been delivered to us by the British commissioners. He intimated, however, that it would be better for us to address the note which should contain a reservation of our rights to indemnity to him than to the commissioners, to which we assented, as we could not perceive that that circumstance would make any difference in the case. We are engaged in preparing this paper, which we expect to present to his lordship in a few days, though we fear it will not be ready in time to enable us to obtain his answer to it to be forwarded to you with this despatch. We shall not fail to communicate to you without delay whatever may occur on this subject. We think it our duty, however, to add, that we do not wish our Government to be too sanguine in the expectation of a satisfactory result. In the deliberation on this subject, it may, perhaps, be better to presume that such a one may not be obtained, as it is not provided for in the treaty. The above statement is, nevertheless, perfectly correct, and we beg you to be assured that we shall continue to exert our best endeavors to secure an object which we consider of so much importance. We shall send you a statement of the cases of condemnation, and of the causes still depending, which is less extensive, in both views, than may have been supposed.

It happened when the negotiation had reached a very advanced stage, that an account was received here of the decree of the Emperor of France at Berlin, of November 21, which declared Great Britain and Ireland in a state of blockade, and all British manufactures and the produce of British colonies lawful prize. This circumstance produced a strong impression on this Government, which was very seriously felt in our concerns. It seemed probable for some days that it would subject the negotiation to a long suspension, if it did not entirely defeat its object. The British commissioners informed us that that decree of the Government of France had opposed a powerful obstacle to the conclusion of any treaty with us, before our Government should be consulted on the subject, and its answer obtained as to the part it might take in regard to it; that in case the United States submitted to a violation of their neutral rights by France in the manner contemplated by that decree, it would be impossible for Great Britain to respect them; that by concluding a treaty with the United States, by which they should not only bind themselves to the observance of such rights, but agree to concessions or relaxations of what they conceive to be their unquestionable rights of war, after knowing the contents of that decree, they might be understood to restrain themselves from counteracting the policy of France, which it would be improper to do, unless our Government should engage to support its rights against the measures of France. In consideration of these circumstances, they proposed that we should proceed in the business so far as to agree on all the articles of a treaty, to reduce them to form, and then transmit the instrument to the United States, to become obligatory in case our Government should enter into a satisfactory engagement of the kind proposed. We replied in very explicit terms to the British commissioners, that we considered their proposition altogether inadmissible on our part, and not likely to accomplish, if we could agree to it, the object which they contemplated by it; that such a proposition to our Government, under the circumstances attending it, would amount in substance to an offer to it of the alternative between the treaty and a war with France, since, if our Government refused to give the satisfaction which they desired, the treaty would be lost; and if such satisfaction was given, and the treaty concluded, and France should persist to execute her decree according to the construction given of it here, war seemed to be inevitable; that if it should happen that our Government should approve the treaty, it was not to be presumed that it would make any sacrifice, or stipulate any thing not contained in the instrument, especially so very important an act as that alluded to, as the condition on which it was to be obtained; that the arrangement of our differences and other concerns with Great Britain was an affair which rested on its own ground, and had no connexion with our relations with France; that His Majesty's Government ought to suppose that the United States would not fail, in any case, to support, with becoming dignity, their rights with any Power, and that it must be sensible that it would be more at liberty to enter into suitable friendly explanations with the Government of France on the subject of the decree in question, after the adjustment of their differences with Britain, than while they existed; as it likewise must be that the prospect of obtaining satisfactory explanations on that point of France would be better while they acted under their own impulse, as an independent and friendly Power, than it would be in case they entered into an engagement of the kind proposed with her adversary. The British commissioners admitted that these considerations were entitled to much attention; at length, however, after the subject had been, as we had reason to believe, maturely weighed by the cabinet, they informed us that their Government still thought it incumbent on it to make a reservation of their right to counteract the policy of France, in case our Government did not give them the satisfaction they desired, either by suitable assurances before the ratification of the treaty, or by its conduct afterwards. With this view, they presented us a paper, which we have the honor to transmit with this despatch. In transmitting to you this paper, it is our duty to observe that we do not consider ourselves a party to it, or as having given it in any the slightest degree our sanction. The incident which produced the paper was unexpected on our part, and, without entering into its merits, we used our best exertions to diminish its effect in relation to the objects of our negotiation. The British commissioners brought the incident into view, and made it the subject of discussion in the manner above stated, as they did the part which it became their Government to take in the depending negotiation in consequence of it. We therefore thought, not only that we were at liberty, but that it was imperiously our duty to use our best exertions to make the paper which they proposed to present to us, in reference to the decree of France, as little injurious as possible, and even to urge that decree as a strong reason why Great Britain should be more explicit and satisfactory in her definition of neutral rights, as well for the purpose of vindicating herself against the strong denunciation it contained, as to enable our Government to urge with more force with the Government of France its objections to the decree. We were glad to find that these remarks were not altogether without effect, as will appear by the paper referred to, especially the definition it gives of a blockade, which is tolerably correct.

You will observe that the commerce between the United States and the British colonies, which bound them to the east and north, has not been regulated by this treaty. The British commissioners refused to agree to any arrangement of it, in consequence of our declining to admit their Canada and Hudson Bay traders into Louisiana.

It has occurred to us, that it might be advantageous to the United States, and consistent with the views of our Government, to comprise both these objects, under suitable regulations, in a separate convention, especially if they can be made instrumental to a satisfactory establishment of our boundaries. We have reason to think, that in the form of a new act in connexion with these other objects, it would be more agreeable to this Government to settle the question of boundary, according to the views of the President and Senate, than by ratifying the convention already entered into, with the exception of the fifth article. The British commissioners have expressed their willingness to proceed in the business for the purpose of arranging all these topics in a satisfactory manner, as Lord Howick has likewise done; and it seems to be highly important to take advantage of this disposition to settle amicably with this Government, at the present time, every remaining cause of strife, so far as it may be practicable. Should we undertake to form such a convention, the commercial part of it, with respect to Louisiana, as well as the British provinces, will, of course, be limited to the same term, not to exceed that of the treaty. We shall also be attentive to the conditions on which the traders with the Indian tribes are to be admitted into Louisiana, by being particularly careful that it be done on such conditions as to render it impossible for them to do any injury. We are persuaded that such regulations might be adopted, as would, even at this time, have that effect. We are confident that our population will have so far spread over the whole surface of that country, by the time the treaty would expire, as to supersede the necessity of renewing it.

We have the honor to be, with great consideration and esteem, sir, your most obedient servants,

JAS. MONROE,
WM. PINKNEY.

Treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America.

His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, being equally desirous to promote and perpetuate the good understanding and friendship which happily subsist between the subjects of the United Kingdom and the citizens of the United States, and for that purpose to regulate the commerce and navigation between their respective countries, territories, and people, on the basis of reciprocity and mutual convenience, have respectively named their plenipotentiaries, and have given to them full powers to make and conclude a treaty of amity, navigation and commerce; that is to say, His Britannic Majesty has named for his plenipotentiaries, Henry Richard Vassal, Lord Holland, one of His Majesty's privy council and lord keeper of His Majesty's privy seal, and William, Lord Auckland, one of his Majesty's privy council, and President of the committee of council for all matters of trade and foreign plantations: and the President of the United States, by and with the advice of the Senate thereof, hath appointed for their plenipotentiaries, James Monroe and William Pinkney, commissioners extraordinary and plenipotentiaries; who, after having exchanged their respective full powers, have agreed on the following articles:

ART. 1. There shall be a firm, inviolable and universal peace, and a true and sincere friendship, between His Britannic Majesty, his heirs and successors, and the United States of America, and between their respective countries, territories, cities, towns, and people, of every degree, without exception of persons or places.

ART. 2. It is agreed that the several articles of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between His Majesty and the United States, made at London, on the nineteenth day of November, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, which have not expired, nor, as yet, had their full operation and effect, shall be confirmed in their best form, and in their full tenor; and that the contracting parties will also from time to time enter into friendly explanation on the subject of the said articles, for the purpose of removing all such doubts as may arise or have arisen as to the true import of the same, as well as for the purpose of rendering the said articles more conformable to their mutual wishes and convenience.

ART. 3. His Majesty agrees that the vessels, belonging to the United States of America, and sailing direct from the ports of the said States, shall be admitted and hospitably received in all the seaports and harbors of the British dominions in the East Indies; and that the citizens of the said United States may freely carry on a trade between the said territories and the said United States in all articles of which the importation or exportation respectively to or from the said territories shall not be entirely prohibited. Provided only that it shall not be lawful for them in any time of war between the British Government and any other Power or State whatever, to export from the said territories, without the special permission of the British Government there, any military stores, or naval stores, or rice. The citizens of the United States shall pay for their vessels, when admitted into the said ports, no other or higher tonnage than shall be payable on British vessels when admitted into the ports of the United States; and they shall pay no higher or other duties or charges on the importation or exportation of the cargoes of the said vessels than shall be payable on the same articles when imported or exported in British vessels. But it is expressly agreed, that the vessels of the United States shall not carry any of the articles exported by them from the said British territories to any port or place, except to some port or place in America, where the same shall be unladen, and such regulations shall be adopted by both parties as shall, from time to time, be found necessary to enforce the due and faithful observance of this stipulation.

It is also understood, that the permission granted by this article is not to extend to allow the vessels of the United States to carry on any part of the coasting trade of the said British territories; but the vessels going with their original cargoes, or part thereof, from one port of discharge to another, are not to be considered as carrying on the coasting trade; neither is this article to be construed to allow the citizens of the said States to settle or reside within the said territories, or to go into the interior parts thereof, without the permission of the British Government established there; and if any transgressions should be attempted against the regulations of the British Government in this respect, the observance of the same shall and may be enforced against the citizens of America, in the same manner as against British subjects or others transgressing the same rule. And the citizens of the United States, whenever they arrive in any port or harbor in the said territories, or if they should be permitted in manner aforesaid to go to any other place therein, shall always be subject to the laws, government, and jurisdiction of whatever nature, established in such harbor, port, or place, according as the same may be. The citizens of the United States may also touch for refreshment at the island of St. Helena, but subject in all respects to such regulations as the British Government may, from time to time, establish there.

ART. 4. There shall be between all the dominions of His Majesty in Europe, and the territories of the United States, a reciprocal and perfect liberty of commerce and navigation. The people and inhabitants of the two countries respectively shall have liberty, freely and securely, and without hindrance and molestation, to come with their ships and cargoes to the lands, countries, cities, ports, places, and rivers, within the dominions and territories aforesaid, to enter into the same, to resort there, and to remain and reside there, without any limitation of time; also to hire and possess houses and warehouses for the purposes of commerce; and generally, the merchants and traders on each side shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce, but subject always, as to what respects this article, to the laws and statutes of the two countries respectively.

ART. 5. It is agreed that no other or higher duties shall be paid by the ships or merchandise of the one party in the ports of the other than such as are paid by the like vessels or merchandise of all other nations. Nor shall any other or higher duty be imposed in one country on the importation of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the other, than are or shall be payable on the importation of the like articles being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country.

Nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the exportation or importation of any articles to or from the territories of the two parties respectively, which shall not equally extend to all other nations. But the British Government reserves to itself the right of imposing on American vessels entering into the British ports in Europe a tonnage duty equal to that which shall at any time be payable by British vessels in the ports of America; and the Government of the United States reserves to itself a right of imposing on British vessels entering into the ports of the United States a tonnage duty equal to that which shall at any time be payable by American vessels in the British ports in Europe.

It is agreed that in the trade of the two countries with each other, the same duties of exportation and importation on all goods and merchandise, and also the same drawbacks and bounties, shall be paid and allowed in either country, whether such importation or exportation shall be in British or American vessels.

ART. 6. The high contracting parties not having been able to arrange at present by treaty any commercial intercourse between the territories of the United States and His Majesty's islands and ports in the West Indies, agree that until that subject shall be regulated in a satisfactory manner, each of the parties shall remain in the complete possession of its rights in respect to such an intercourse.

ART. 7. It shall be free for the two contracting parties respectively to appoint consuls for the protection of trade, to reside in the dominions and territories aforesaid; and the said consuls shall enjoy those liberties and rights which belong to them by reason of their function. But before any consul shall act as such, he shall be in the usual forms approved and admitted by the party to whom he is sent; and it is hereby declared to be lawful and proper, that in case of illegal or improper conduct towards the laws or Government, a consul may either be punished according to law, if the laws will reach the case, or be dismissed, or even sent back; the offended Government assigning to the other the reasons for the same.

Either of the parties may except from the residence of consuls such particular places as such party shall judge proper to be so excepted.

ART. 8. It is agreed that in all cases where vessels shall be captured, or detained on just suspicion of having on board enemy's property, or of carrying to the enemy any of the articles which are contraband of war, or for other lawful cause, the said vessel shall be brought to the nearest or most convenient port; and if any property of an enemy should be found on board such vessel, that part only which belongs to the enemy, or is otherwise confiscable, shall be made prize, and the vessel, unless by law subject to condemnation, shall be at liberty to proceed with the remainder of the cargo without any impediment. And it is agreed that all proper measures shall be taken to prevent delay in deciding the cases of ships or cargoes so brought in for adjudication, and in the payment or recovery of any indemnification adjudged or agreed to be paid to the masters or owners of such ships.

It is also agreed that in all cases of unfounded detention, or other contravention of the regulations stipulated by the present treaty, the owners of the vessel and cargo so detained shall be allowed damages proportioned to the loss occasioned thereby, together with the costs and charges of the trial.

ART. 9. In order to regulate what is in future to be esteemed contraband of war, it is agreed that under the said denomination shall be comprised all arms and implements serving for the purposes of war by land or by sea, such as cannon, muskets, mortars, petards, bombs, grenades, carcasses, saucisses, carriages for cannon, musket-rests, bandoliers, gunpowder, matches, saltpetre, balls, pikes, swords, head-pieces, cuirasses, halberts, lances, javelins, horse-furniture, holsters, belts, and generally all other implements of war; as also timber for ship building, copper in sheets, sail-cloth, hemp, and cordage, and in general (with the exception of unwrought iron and firplanks, and also with the exception of tar and pitch, when not going to a port of naval equipment, in which case they shall be entitled to pre-emption) whatever may serve directly to the equipment of vessels; and all the above articles are hereby declared to be just objects of confiscation whenever they are attempted to be carried to an enemy. But no vessel shall be detained on pretence of carrying contraband of war, unless some of the above-mentioned articles not excepted are found on board of the said vessel at the time it is searched.

ART. 10. Whereas, in consideration of the distance and of other circumstances incident to the situation of the high contracting parties, it may frequently happen that vessels may sail for a port or place belonging to an enemy without knowing that the same is either besieged, blockaded, or invested, it is agreed that every vessel so circumstanced may be turned away from such port or place; but she shall not be detained, nor her cargo, if not contraband, be confiscated, unless after such notice she shall again attempt to enter, but she shall be permitted to go to any other port or place she may think proper; nor shall any vessel or goods of either party that may have entered into such port or place before the same was besieged, blockaded, or invested by the other, and be found therein after the reduction or surrender of such place, be liable to confiscation, but shall be restored to the owners or proprietors thereof.

Neither of the parties when at war shall, during the continuance of the treaty, take from on board the vessels of the other the subjects of the opposite belligerent, unless they be in the actual employment of such belligerent.

ART. 11. Whereas differences have arisen concerning the trading with the colonies of His Majesty's enemies, and the instructions given by His Majesty to his cruisers in regard thereto, it is agreed that during the present hostilities, all articles of the growth, produce, and manufacture of Europe, not being contraband of war, may be freely carried from the United States to the port of any colony not blockaded belonging to His Majesty's enemies, provided such goods shall previously have been entered and landed in the United States, and shall have paid the ordinary duties on such articles so imported for home consumption; and, on re-exportation, shall, after the drawback, remain subject to a duty equivalent to not less than one per cent. ad valorem; and that the said goods and the vessels conveying the same shall, from the time of their clearance from the American port, be bona fide the property of citizens and inhabitants of the United States; and in like manner that all articles, not being contraband of war, and being the growth and produce of the enemy's colonies, may be brought to the United States, and after having been there landed, may be freely carried from thence to any port of Europe not blockaded, provided such goods shall previously have been entered and landed in the said United States, and shall have paid the ordinary duties on colonial articles so imported for home consumption; and, on re-exportation, shall, after the drawback, remain subject to a duty equivalent to and not less than two per cent. ad valorem; and provided that the said goods and the vessel conveying the same be bona fide the property of citizens and inhabitants of the United States.

Provided always, That this article, or any thing therein contained, shall not operate to the prejudice of any right belonging to either party; but, that after the expiration of the time limited for the article, the rights on both sides shall revive and be in full force.

ART. 12. And whereas it is expedient to make special provisions respecting the maritime jurisdiction of the high contracting parties on the coast of their respective possessions in North America on account of peculiar circumstances belonging to those coasts, it is agreed that in all cases where one of the said high contracting parties shall be engaged in war, and the other shall be at peace, the belligerent Power shall not stop except for the purpose hereafter mentioned, the vessels of the neutral Power, or the unarmed vessels of other nations, within five marine miles from the shore belonging to the said neutral Power on the American seas.

Provided That the said stipulation shall not take effect in favor of the ships of any nation or nations which shall not have agreed to respect the limits aforesaid, as the line of maritime jurisdiction of the said neutral state. And it is further stipulated, that if either of the high contracting parties shall be at war with any nation or nations which shall not have agreed to respect the said special limit or line of maritime jurisdiction herein agreed upon, such contracting party shall have the right to stop or search any vessel beyond the limit of a cannon shot, or three marine miles from the said coast of the neutral Power, for the purpose of ascertaining the nation to which such vessel shall belong; and with respect to the ships and property of the nation or nations not having agreed to respect the aforesaid line of jurisdiction, the belligerent Power shall exercise the same rights as if this article did not exist; and the several provisions stipulated by this article shall have full force and effect only during the continuance of the present treaty.

ART. 13. With respect to the searching of merchant ships, the commanders of ships of war and privateers shall conduct themselves as favorably as the course of the war then existing may possibly permit towards the most friendly Power that may remain neuter, observing as much as possible the acknowledged principles and rules of the law of nations; and for the better security of the respective subjects and citizens of the contracting parties, and to prevent their suffering injuries by the men of war or privateers of either party, all commanders of ships of war and privateers, and all others, the said subjects and citizens, shall forbear doing any damage to those of the other party, or committing any outrage against them; and if they act to the contrary, they shall be punished, and shall also be bound in their persons and estates to make satisfaction and reparation for all damages, and the interest thereof, of whatever nature the said damages may be.

For this cause all commanders of privateers, before they receive their commissions, shall hereafter be compelled to give, before a competent judge, sufficient security by at least two responsible sureties, who have no interest in the said privateer, each of whom, together with the said commander, shall be jointly and severally bound in the sum of two thousand pounds sterling, or, if such ship be provided with above one hundred and fifty seamen or soldiers, in the sum of four thousand pounds sterling, to satisfy all damages and injuries, which the said privateers or officers, or men, or any of them, may do or commit during their cruise, contrary to the tenor of this treaty, or to the laws or instructions for regulating their conduct; and further, that in all cases of aggressions, the said commissions shall be revoked and annulled.

It is also agreed, that whenever a Judge of a Court of Admiralty of either of the parties shall pronounce sentence against any vessel, or goods, or property, belonging to the subjects or citizens of the other party, a formal and duly authenticated copy of all the proceedings in the cause, and of the said sentence, shall, if required, be delivered to the commander of the said vessel, without the smallest delay, he paying all legal fees and demands for the same.

ART. 14. It is further agreed, that both the said contracting parties shall not only refuse to receive any pirates into any of their ports, havens, or towns, or permit any of their inhabitants to receive, protect, harbor, conceal or assist them in any manner, but will bring to condign punishment all such inhabitants as shall be guilty of such acts or offences.

And all their ships, with the goods or merchandises taken by them and brought into the ports of either of the said parties, shall be seized, as far as they can be discovered, and shall be restored to the owners, or the factors or agents duly deputed, and authorized in writing by them, (proper evidence being shown in the Court of Admiralty for proving the property,) even in case such effects should have passed into other hands by sale, if it be proved that the buyers knew, or had good reason to believe, or suspect that they had been piratically taken.

ART. 15. It is likewise agreed, that the subjects and citizens of the two nations shall not do any acts of hostility or violence against each other, nor accept commissions or instructions so to act from any foreign Prince or state, enemies to the other party; nor shall the enemies of one of the parties be permitted to invite, or endeavor to enlist in the military service, any of the subjects or citizens of the other party; and the laws against all such offences and aggressions shall be punctually executed; and if any subject or citizen of the said parties, respectively, shall accept any foreign commission or letters of marque for arming any vessel, to act as a privateer against the other party, it is hereby declared to be lawful for the said party to treat and punish the said subject or citizen having such commission or letters of marque as a pirate.

ART. 16. It is expressly stipulated, that neither of the said contracting parties will order or authorize any acts of reprisal against the other, on complaints of injuries and damages, until the said party shall first have presented to the other a statement thereof, verified by competent proof and evidence, and demanded justice and satisfaction, and the same shall either have been refused or unreasonably delayed.

ART. 17. The ships of war of each of the contracting parties shall at all times be hospitably received in the ports of the other, their officers and crews paying due respect to the laws and Government of the country. The officers shall be treated with that respect which is due to the commissions which they bear, and, if any insult should be offered to them by any of the inhabitants, all offenders in this respect shall be punished as disturbers of the peace and amity between the two countries. And both contracting parties agree, that in case any vessel of the one should, by stress of weather, danger from enemies, or other misfortunes, be reduced to the necessity of seeking shelter in any of the ports of the other, into which such vessel could not in ordinary cases claim to be admitted, she shall, on manifesting that necessity to the satisfaction of the Government of the place, be hospitably received, and permitted to refit and to purchase at the market price such necessaries as she may stand in need of, conformably to such orders and regulations as the Government of the place, having respect to the circumstances of each case, shall prescribe. She shall not be allowed to break bulk or unload her cargo, unless the same shall be bona fide necessary to her being refitted; nor shall she be obliged to pay any duties whatever, except only on such articles as she may be permitted to sell for the purpose aforesaid.

ART. 18. It shall not be lawful for any foreign privateers, (not being subjects or citizens of either of the said parties,) who have commissions from any Power or State in enmity with either nation, to arm their ships in the ports of either of the said parties, nor to sell what they have taken, nor in any other manner to exchange the same; nor shall they be allowed to purchase more provisions than shall be necessary for their going to the nearest port of that Prince or State from whom they obtained their commissions.

ART. 19. It shall be lawful for the ships of war and privateers belonging to the said parties, respectively, to carry whithersoever they please the ships and goods taken from their enemies, without being obliged to pay any fees to the officers of the Admiralty, or to any judges whatever; nor shall the said prizes, when they arrive at and enter the ports of the said parties, be detained or seized; nor shall the searchers or other officers of those places visit such prizes, (except for the purpose of preventing the carrying of any part of the cargo thereof on shore in any manner contrary to the established laws of revenue, navigation, or commerce;) nor shall such officers take cognizance of the validity of such prizes, but they shall be at liberty to hoist sail and depart as speedily as may be, and carry their said prizes to the places mentioned in their commissions or patents, which the commanders of the said ships of war or privateers shall be obliged to show.

No shelter or refuge shall be given in their ports to such as have made a prize upon the subjects or citizens of either of the said parties; but, if forced by stress of weather or the dangers of the sea to enter them, particular care shall be taken to hasten their departure, and to cause them to retire as soon as possible. Nothing in this treaty contained shall, however, be construed to operate contrary to the former and existing public treaties with other sovereigns or states; but the two parties agree that, while they continue in amity, neither of them will in future make any treaty that shall be inconsistent with this or the preceding article.

Neither of the said parties shall permit the ships or goods belonging to the subjects or citizens of the other to be taken within cannon shot of the coast, nor within the jurisdiction described in Article 12, so long as the provisions of the said article shall be in force, by ships of war or others having commissions from any prince, republic, or state whatever. But in case it should so happen, the party whose territorial rights shall thus have been violated shall use his utmost endeavors to obtain from the offending party full and ample satisfaction for the vessel or vessels so taken, whether the same be vessels of war or merchant vessels.

ART. 20. If at any time a rupture should take place (which God forbid) between His Majesty and the United States, the merchants and others of each of the two nations, residing in the dominions of the other, shall have the privilege of remaining and continuing their trade, so long as they do it peaceably, and commit no offence against the laws; and in case their conduct should render them suspected, and the respective Governments should think proper to order them to remove, the term of twelve months from the publication of the order shall be allowed them for that purpose, to remove with their families, effects, and property; but this favor shall not be extended to those who shall act contrary to the established laws; and, for greater certainty, it is declared that such rupture shall not be deemed to exist while negotiations for accommodating differences shall be pending, nor until the respective ambassadors or ministers, if such there shall be, shall be recalled or sent home on account of such differences, and not on account of personal misconduct, according to the nature and degree of which both parties retain their rights either to request the recall or immediately to send home the ambassador or minister of the other, and that without prejudice to their mutual friendship and good understanding.

ART. 21. It is further agreed, that His Majesty and the United States, on mutual requisitions by them respectively, or by their respective ministers or officers authorized to make the same, will deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with murder or forgery committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum within any of the countries of the other; provided that this shall only be done on such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the offence had there been committed. The expense of such apprehension and delivery shall be borne and defrayed by those who make the requisition and receive the fugitive.

ART. 22. In the event of a shipwreck happening in a place belonging to one or other of the high contracting parties, not only every assistance shall be given to the unfortunate persons, and no violence done to them, but also the effects which they shall have thrown out of the ship into the sea shall not be concealed or detained, or damaged, under any pretext whatever. On the contrary, the above mentioned effects and merchandise shall be preserved, and restored to them upon a suitable recompense being given to those who shall have assisted in saving their persons, vessels, and effects.

ART. 23. And it being the intention of the high contracting parties, that the people of their respective dominions shall continue to be on the footing of the most favored nation, it is agreed that, in case either party shall hereafter grant any additional advantages in navigation or trade to any other nation, the subjects or citizens of the other party shall fully participate therein.

ART. 24. The high contracting parties engage to communicate to each other, without delay, all such laws as have been or shall be hereafter enacted by their respective Legislatures, as also all measures which shall have been taken for the abolition or limitation of the African slave trade; and they further agree to use their best endeavors to procure the co-operation of other Powers for the final and complete abolition of a trade so repugnant to the principles of justice and humanity.

ART. 25. And it is further agreed, that nothing herein contained shall contravene or affect the due execution of any treaty or treaties now actually subsisting between either of the high contracting parties and any other Power or Powers.

ART. 26. This treaty, when the same shall have been ratified by His Majesty and by the President of the United States, with the advice of their Senate, and the respective ratifications mutually exchanged, shall be binding and obligatory on His Majesty and on the said States for ten years, from the date of the exchange of the said ratification, and shall be reciprocally executed and observed with punctuality and the most sincere regard to good faith.

In faith whereof, we, the undersigned, plenipotentiaries on the part of His Majesty the King of Great Britain, and the commissioners extraordinary and plenipotentiaries on the part of the United States of America, have signed this present treaty, and have caused to be affixed thereto the seal of our arms.

Done at London, this thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and six.

WM. PINKNEY.

GEORGE R.

George the Third, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, Duke of Brunswick and Lunenburg, Arch Treasurer, and Prince Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, &c. &c. To all and singular to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Whereas, for the better treating of and arranging certain subjects now in discussion between us and our good friends the United States of America, the President of the United States, with the consent and by the authority of the Senate and House of Representatives of the said United States, has nominated, constituted, and appointed James Monroe, Esquire, and William Pinkney, Esquire, commissioners extraordinary to conduct the said discussion on behalf of the said United States; and we, reposing especial trust and confidence in the wisdom, loyalty, diligence, and circumspection of our right trusty and well beloved councillor Henry Richard, Lord Holland, and our right trusty and well beloved councillor, William, Lord Auckland, have nominated, constituted, and appointed, and by these presents do nominate, constitute, and appoint them our true, certain, and undoubted commissioners, procurators, and plenipotentiaries, giving to them all, and all manner of faculty, power, and authority, together with general as well as with special orders, (so as the general do not derogate from the special, nor on the contrary,) for us and in our name to meet, confer, treat, and conclude with the said James Monroe and William Pinkney, being duly furnished with sufficient powers, on the part of our said good friends the United States of America, of and concerning all such matters and things as may be requisite and necessary for accomplishing and completing the several ends and purposes hereinbefore adverted to, and of and concerning all such matters and things as may tend to the mutual interests and advantage of our subjects or dominions, and of those of our said good friends, and to the promoting and maintaining a mutual friendship, good understanding, and intercourse between our subjects or dominions, and those of our said good friends, and for us and in our name to sign all such article or articles, or other instruments whatsoever, as may be agreed upon between the said plenipotentiaries, and mutually to deliver and receive the same in exchange; and to do and perform all such other acts, matters, and things, as may be anywise proper and conducive to the purposes above adverted to, in as full and ample manner, and with the like validity and effect, as we ourself, if we were present, could do and perform the same; engaging and promising on our Royal word, that we will accept, ratify, and confirm all such acts, matters, and things as shall be so transacted and concluded by our aforesaid commissioners, procurators, and plenipotentiaries; and that we will never suffer any person to violate the same, in whole or in part, to act contrary thereto.

In testimony and confirmation of all which, we have caused our great seal of our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to be affixed to these presents, signed with our Royal hand.

Given at our court at St. James's, the twentieth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and six, and of our reign the forty-sixth.

Note from Lord Holland and Lord Auckland.

LONDON, December 31, 1806.

The undersigned, Henry Richard Vassal, Lord Holland, and William, Lord Auckland, plenipotentiaries of His Britannic Majesty, have the honor to inform James Monroe and William Pinkney, commissioners extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the United States of America, that they are now ready to proceed to the signature of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, on the articles of which they have mutually agreed.

But at the same time, they have it in command from His Majesty to call the attention of the commissioners of the United States to some extraordinary proceedings which have lately taken place on the continent of Europe, and to communicate to them officially the sentiments of His Majesty's Government thereupon.

The proceedings alluded to are certain declarations and orders of the French Government, issued at Berlin, on the 21st of November last.

In those orders the French Government seeks to justify or palliate its own unjust pretensions by imputing to Great Britain principles which she never professed, and practices which never existed. His Majesty is accused of a systematic and general disregard of the law of nations recognised by civilized states, and more particularly of an unwarrantable extension of the right of blockade; whereas His Majesty may confidently appeal to the world on his uniform respect for neutral rights, and his general and scrupulous adherence to the law of nations, without condescending to contrast his conduct in these particulars with that of his enemy; and with regard to the only specific charge, it is notorious that he has never declared any ports to be in a state of blockade, without allotting to that object a force sufficient to make the entrance into them manifestly dangerous.

By such allegations, unfounded as they are, the enemy attempts to justify his pretensions of confiscating, as lawful prize, all produce of English industry or manufacture, though it be the property of neutrals; of excluding from his harbors every neutral vessel which has touched at any port of His Majesty's dominions, though employed in an innocent commerce; and of declaring Great Britain to be in a state of blockade, though his own naval ports and arsenals are actually blockaded, and he is unable to station any naval force whatever before any port of the United Kingdom.

Such principles, are, in themselves, extravagant and repugnant to the law of nations; and the pretensions founded on them, though professedly directed solely against Great Britain, tend to alter the practice of war among civilized nations, and utterly to subvert the rights and independence of neutral Powers. The undersigned cannot, therefore, believe that the enemy will ever seriously attempt to enforce such a system. If he should, they are confident that the good sense of the American Government will perceive the fatal consequences of such pretensions to neutral commerce, and that its spirit and regard to national honor will prevent its acquiescence in such palpable violations of its rights, and injurious encroachments on its interest.

If, however, the enemy should carry these threats into execution, and if neutral nations, contrary to all expectation, should acquiesce in such usurpations, His Majesty might probably be compelled, however reluctantly, to retaliate in his just defence, and to adopt, in regard to the commerce of neutral nations with his enemies, the same measures which those nations shall have permitted to be enforced against their commerce with his subjects. The commissioners of the United States will, therefore, feel that, at a moment when His Majesty and all neutral nations are threatened with such an extension of the belligerent pretensions of his enemies, he cannot enter into the stipulations of the present treaty, without an explanation from the United States of their intentions, or a reservation on the part of His Majesty in the case above mentioned, if it should ever occur.

The undersigned, considering that the distance of the American Government renders any immediate explanation on this subject impossible, and animated by a desire of forwarding the beneficial work in which they are engaged, are authorized by His Majesty to conclude the treaty without delay. They proceed to the signature, under the full persuasion that, before the treaty shall be returned from America with the ratification of the United States, the enemy will either have formally abandoned or tacitly relinquished his unjust pretensions, or that the Government of the United States, by its conduct or assurances, will have given security to His Majesty that it will not submit to such innovations on the established system of maritime law; and the undersigned have presented this note from an anxious wish that it should be clearly understood on both sides, that, without such an abandonment on the part of the enemy, or such assurances or such conduct on the part of the United States, His Majesty will not consider himself bound by the present signature of his commissioners to ratify the treaty, or precluded from adopting such measures as may seem necessary for counteracting the designs of his enemy.

The undersigned cannot conclude without expressing their satisfaction at the prospect of accomplishing an object so important to the interests and friendly connexion of both nations, and their just sense of the conciliatory disposition manifested by the commissioners of the United States during the whole course of the negotiation.

VASSAL HOLLAND,
AUCKLAND.

Extra official communication with regard to the Canada Trade.

A memorial has been presented to Lord Holland and Lord Auckland on the part of the Canada merchants, setting forth a variety of injuries which they complain of having sustained from the Government and servants of the United States, and praying that their complaints may be attended to, and redress obtained for them in the discussions which are at present pending between the American and British commissioners.

The injuries brought forward in their memorial may be reduced to the three following heads: 1st, their exclusion from Louisiana; 2d, their being made to pay higher duties for the goods they import into the United States from Canada than the duties payable by the citizens of the United States on the importation of the same goods in American vessels into the Atlantic ports of the United States; 3d, certain minor grievances which they contend to be in like manner contrary to the letter and spirit of the treaty of 1794.

By the third article of the treaty of 1794, "it is agreed that it shall at all times be free to His Majesty's subjects and to the citizens of the United States freely to pass and repass by land or inland navigation into the respective territories and countries of the two parties on the continent of America, and to navigate all the lakes and waters thereof, and freely to carry on trade with each other."

But, notwithstanding this express stipulation, which secures to His Majesty's subjects, without limitation or reservation, the right of commercial intercourse by land or inland navigation with all the territories of the United States on the continent of America, the Governor of Louisiana has thought proper to exclude them from the commerce of that extensive province, unless they abjure their allegiance to His Majesty, and take an oath of allegiance to the United States; and the same Governor has also taken it upon him to prohibit the introduction of any goods or merchandise which are not the property of citizens of the United States.

This arbitrary proceeding, besides being a direct violation of the treaty of 1794, is highly detrimental to the private interest of the Canada merchants, for it excludes them from a country where they have been carrying on trade successfully for many years without interruption from the Spaniards; having latterly pushed their commercial posts even to the banks of the Missouri, and augmented the sale of their goods in Louisiana to the amount of about forty or fifty thousand pounds annually.

By the second paragraph of the third article of the treaty of 1794, "it is agreed that all goods and merchandise, whose importation into the United States shall not be wholly prohibited, may freely, for the purpose of commerce, be carried into the same in the manner aforesaid by His Majesty's subjects; and such goods or merchandise shall be subject to no higher duties than those payable by citizens of the United States on the importation of the same in American vessels into the Atlantic ports of the said States."

But, notwithstanding this stipulation that the duties on goods imported into the United States from Canada shall be no higher than the duties paid for the same goods when imported in American vessels into the Atlantic ports of the United States, the custom-house officers of the inland ports practise a mode of estimating the duties on goods imported from Canada, which has the effect of raising the duty on the prime cost of these goods to twenty-two pounds per cent. instead of sixteen pounds ten shillings per cent. which is the amount of the duty payable for the goods, when imported in American vessels into the Atlantic ports of the United States.

As these goods are destined ultimately for the Indian market, this difference gives a decided advantage in that commerce to the citizens of the United States over the subjects of His Majesty, contrary to the spirit and obvious meaning of the treaty of 1794, the basis of which, in all its stipulations with regard to the inland trade, were impartiality, equality, and reciprocity of advantage.

The manner in which this evasion of the treaty is effected will appear from the account given of it by the Canada merchants in their memorial above referred to.

They state "that, by the revenue laws of the United States, all goods imported into their territory, not charged with a particular duty, pay a duty of fifteen per cent. ad valorem, excepting goods from the Cape of Good Hope, and from the countries beyond it; that, in calculating this duty, ten per cent. is first added to the prime cost of the goods, and the duty afterwards calculated on the amount, in the following manner:

Prime cost in Europe, -	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	£100
Ten per cent. added, -	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	10
									£110

Fifteen per cent. duty on one hundred and ten pounds amounts to sixteen pounds ten shillings; but that, in estimating the duty on goods imported from Canada, the custom-house officers add ten per cent. not to the prime cost, but to their value at Montreal, where it is the custom for merchants to add thirty-three and a third per cent. to the prime cost in Europe, as an equivalent for the expense and risk of transporting them so far; and that, proceeding on this principle, the duties on goods imported into the United States from Canada are calculated in the following manner:

Prime cost in Europe, -	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	£100 00 0
Additional charge at Montreal, -	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	33 6 8
									133 6 8
Additional ten per cent. -	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	13 6 8
									£146 13 4

Duty of fifteen per cent. on one hundred and forty-six pounds thirteen shillings and four pence amounts to twenty-two pounds: so that the same goods which pay a duty of only sixteen pounds eight shillings, when imported by an American dealer, pay a duty of twenty-two pounds, when brought to the same market by a British dealer, contrary to the obvious spirit and meaning and to the express stipulation of the treaty of 1794.

Under the third head of minor grievances are to be classed the following: 1st, though British subjects are entitled, in the terms of the treaty of 1794, "freely to pass and repass by land or inland navigation into the territories of the United States," yet they are obliged to pay six dollars for a license to trade with the Indians within the boundaries of the United States by the servants of the States; and, when they arrive at the American ports in the interior, they are often compelled to dismiss their canoe men, and to hire others at a great expense and inconvenience. 2d, though it is agreed in the treaty "that no duties shall be payable on any goods which shall merely be carried over any of the portages or carrying places, on either side, for the purpose of being immediately reembarked and carried to some other place or places," yet various attempts have been made to collect such duties at the American portages, which have at length compelled the British traders to abandon the Grande Portage, and to establish a new portage at Kiminesti within the British line.

Though the arrangement of the Indian trade by the treaty of 1794 was "intended to render in a great degree the local advantages of each party common to both, and thereby to promote a disposition favorable to friendship and good neighborhood," yet the revenue officers of the United States, without considering the difficulty of observing in the lakes and rivers of Canada those regulations with regard to the approach to shores and ports which are applicable to the ports of the ocean, have in many instances, and in particular in the case of the two batteaux, stopped at Michilimackinac, manifested a disposition to harass and impede the trade of British merchants on pretences the most frivolous and unfounded, and in a manner equally vexatious and injurious to them.

Mr. Madison to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 3, 1807.

The triplicate of your communications of November 11th has just been received. Those of September 11th had been previously received in due time.

The turn which the negotiation has taken was not expected, and excites as much of regret as of disappointment. The conciliatory spirit manifested on both sides, with the apparent consistency of the interests of Great Britain, with the right of the American flag, touching impressments, seemed to promise as much success to your efforts on that subject as on the others; and notwithstanding the perseverance of the British cabinet in resisting your reasonable propositions, the hope is not abandoned that a more enlightened and enlarged policy will finally overcome scruples, which doubtless proceed more from habits of opinion and official caution than from an unbiassed regard to all the considerations which enter into the true merits of the question.

In the mean time, the President has, with all those friendly and conciliatory dispositions which produced your mission and pervade your instructions, weighed the arrangement held out in your last letter, which contemplates a formal adjustment of the other topics under discussion, and an informal understanding only on that of impressment. The result of his deliberations which I am now to state to you, is, that it does not comport with his views of the national sentiment or the legislative policy, that any treaty should be entered into with the British Government which, whilst on every other point it is either limited to or short of strict right, would include no article providing for a case which, both in principle and in practice, is so feelingly connected with the honor and the sovereignty of the nation, as well as with its fair interests, and indeed with the peace of both nations.

The President thinks it more eligible, under all circumstances, that if no satisfactory or formal stipulation on the subject of impressment be attainable, the negotiation should be made to terminate without any formal compact whatever, but with a mutual understanding, founded on friendly and liberal discussions and explanations, that in practice each party will entirely conform to what may be thus informally settled. And you are authorized, in case an arrangement of this kind shall be satisfactory in its substance, to give assurances that, as long as it shall be duly respected in practice by the other party, more particularly on the subjects of neutral trade and impressments, it will be earnestly, and probably successfully, recommended to Congress by the President, not to permit the non-importation act to go into operation. You are also authorized to inform the British Government that the President, adhering to the sentiments which led him to recommend to Congress at the commencement of the session a suspension of that act, and trusting to the influence of mutual dispositions and interests in giving an amicable issue to the negotiation, will, if no intervening intelligence forbid, exercise the authority vested in him by the act of continuing its suspension from the 1st day of July to the term limited by the act, and which will afford to Congress, who will then be in session, the opportunity of making due provision for the case.

You will perceive that this explanation of the views of the President requires, that if, previous to the receipt of it, a treaty not including an article relating to impressments should have been concluded, and be on the way, the British commissioners should be candidly apprised of the reason for not expecting its ratification; and that on this ground they be invited to enter anew on the business, with an eye to such a result as has just been explained and authorized.

Having thus communicated the outline assigned by the President as your guide in the important and delicate task on your hands, I proceed to make a few observations which are suggested by the contents of your last despatches, and which may be of use in your further discussions and your final arrangements.

IMPRESSMENTS.

The British Government is under an egregious mistake in supposing that "no recent causes of complaint have occurred" on this subject. How far the language of Mr. Lyman's books may countenance this error I cannot say, but I think it probable that even there the means of correcting it may be found.

In the American seas, including the West Indies, the impressments have, perhaps, at no time been more numerous or vexatious. It is equally a mistake, therefore, to suppose "that no probable inconvenience can result from the postponement of an article" for this case.

The remedy proposed in the note from the British commissioners, however well intended, does not inspire the confidence here which gave it so much value in their judgment. They see the favorable side only of the character of their naval commanders. The spirit which vexes neutrals in their maritime rights is fully understood by neutrals only. The habits generated by naval command, and the interest which is felt in the abuse of it, both as respects captures and impressments, render inadequate every provision which does not put an end to all discretionary power in the commanders. As long as the British navy has so complete an ascendancy on the high seas, its commanders have not only an interest in violating the rights of neutrals within the limits of neutral patience, especially of those whose commerce and mariners are unguarded by fleets; they feel moreover the strongest temptation, as is well known from the occasional language of some of them, to covet the full range for spoliation opened by a state of war. The rich harvest promised by the commerce of the United States gives to this cupidity all its force. Whatever general injuries might accrue to their nation, or whatever surplus of reprisals might result to American cruisers, the fortunes of British cruisers would not be the less certain in the event of hostilities between the two nations.

Whilst all these considerations require, in our behalf, the most precise and peremptory security against the propensities of British naval commanders, and, on the tender subject of impressment more than any other, it is impossible to find equivalent, or even important motives on the British side, for declining such a security. The proposition which you have made, aided by the internal regulations which the British Government is always free to make, closes all the considerable avenues through which its seamen can find their way into our service. The only loss, consequently, which could remain, would be in the number at present in this service, with a deduction of those who might from time to time voluntarily leave it, or be found within the limits of Great Britain, or of her possessions; and in the proportion of this reduced number who might otherwise be gained by impressment. The smallness of this loss appears from the annual amount of impressments which has not exceeded a few hundred British seamen, the great mass consisting of real Americans and of subjects of other neutral Powers. And even from the few British seamen ought to be deducted those impressed within neutral ports, where it is agreed that the proceeding is clearly unlawful.

Under this view of the subject, the sacrifice which Great Britain would make dwindles to the merest trifle; or rather there is just reason to believe that, instead of a loss, she would find an actual gain, in the excess of the deserters who would be surrendered by the United States, over the number actually recoverable by impressment.

In practice, therefore, Great Britain would make no sacrifice by acceding to our terms; and her principle, if not expressly saved by a recital, as it easily might be, would in effect be so by the tenor of the arrangement; inasmuch as she would obtain, for her forbearance to exercise what she deems a right, a right to measures on our part which we have a right to refuse; she would, consequently, merely exchange one right for another; she would also, by such a forbearance, violate no personal right of individuals under her protection. The United States, on the other hand, in yielding to the claims of Great Britain on this subject, would necessarily surrender what they deem an essential right of their flag, and of their sovereignty, without even acquiring any new right; would violate the rights of the individuals under the protection of both, and expose their native citizens to all the calamitous mistakes, voluntary and involuntary, of which experience gives such forcible warning.

I take for granted that you have not failed to make due use of the arrangement concerted by Mr. King with Lord Hawkesbury, in the year 1802, for settling the question of impressments. On that occasion, and under that administration, the British principle was fairly renounced in favor of the rights of our flag. Lord Hawkesbury having agreed to prohibit impressments altogether on the high seas, and Lord St. Vincent requiring nothing more than an exception of the narrow seas—an exception resting on the obsolete claim of Great Britain to some peculiar dominion over them—I have thought it not amiss to enclose another extract from Mr. King's letter giving an account of that transaction.

In the note of November 8, from the British commissioners, the security held out to the crews of our vessels is, that instructions have been given, and will be repeated, for enforcing the greatest caution, &c. If the future instructions are to be repetitions of the past, we well know the inefficacy of them. Any instructions which are to answer the purpose, must differ essentially from the past, both in their tenor and their sanctions. In case an informal arrangement should be substituted for a regular stipulation, it may reasonably be expected from the candor of the British Government that the instructions on which we are to rely should be communicated to you.

COLONIAL TRADE.

It may reasonably be expected that on this subject the British Government will not persist in attempting to place the United States on a worse footing than Russia. In agreeing to consider the storing for a month, and changing the ship, as a naturalization of the property, the concession would be on our side, not on theirs; and in making this a condition on which alone we could trade with enemies' colonies, even directly to and from our own ports, beyond the amount of our own consumption, we should make every sacrifice short of a complete abandonment of our principle, while they would retain as much of their pretension as is compatible with any sacrifice whatever; a pretension, too, which they have in so many ways fairly precluded themselves from now maintaining. In addition to the many authorities for this remark, already known to you, you will find one of the highest grade in 5th vol. of Tomlin's edition of Brown's Cases in Parliament, p. 328, Hendricks and others against Cunningham and others, where it was expressly admitted by the House of Lords, in a war case before them, that "it is now established, by repeated determinations, that neither ships nor cargoes, the property of subjects of neutral Powers, either going to trade at or coming from the French West India islands, with cargoes purchased there, are liable to capture; and, therefore, when a ship and cargo so circumstanced are seized and condemned, the seizure and condemnation shall be reversed, and the value of the ship and cargo accounted for and paid to the owners by the captors."

As it has generally happened that the British instructions issued to the Vice-admiralty courts and naval commanders have not come first to light in British prints, I enclose one of November 14, which has just made its appearance in ours. As it relates to the present subject it claims attention, as a proof that all question as to the legality of the voyage, in a Russian trade with the enemies of Great Britain, is excluded, by limiting the right of capture to cases where the innocence or ownership of the articles are questioned. The instruction may at least be considered as co-extensive in its favorable import with the article in the Russian treaty, which you have been authorized to admit into your arrangements; and in that view, as well as on account of its date, the instruction may furnish a convenient topic of argument or expostulation.

If the British Government once consent that the United States may make their ports a medium of trade between the colonies of its enemies and other countries, belligerent as well as neutral, why should there be a wish to clog it with the regulations suggested? Why not, in fact, consent to a direct trade by our merchants between those colonies and all other countries? Is it that the price may be a little raised on the consumers by the circuit of the voyage and the charges incident to the port regulations? This cannot be presumed. With respect to the enemies of Great Britain, the object would be unimportant. With respect to her neutral friends, it would not be a legitimate object. Must not the answer then be sought in the mere policy of lessening the competition with, and thereby favoring the price of British and other colonial productions re-exported by British merchants from British ports; and sought, consequently, not in a belligerent right, or even in a policy merely belligerent, but in one which has no origin or plea but those of commercial jealousy and monopoly?

BLOCKADES.

On this subject it is fortunate that Great Britain has already, in a formal communication, admitted the principle for which we contend. It will be only necessary, therefore, to hold her to the true sense of her own act. The words of the communication are, "that vessels must be warned not to enter." The term warn technically imports a distinction between an individual notice to vessels and a general notice by proclamation or diplomatic communication; and the terms not to enter equally distinguishes a notice at or very near the blockaded port, from a notice directed against the original destination or the apparent intention of a vessel nowise approaching such a port.

MARGINAL JURISDICTION ON THE HIGH SEAS.

There could surely be no pretext for allowing less than a marine league from the shore, that being the narrowest allowance found in any authorities on the law of nations. If any nation can fairly claim a greater extent, the United States have pleas which cannot be rejected; and if any nation is more particularly bound by its own example not to contest our claim, Great Britain must be so by the extent of her own claims to jurisdiction on the seas which surround her. It is hoped, at least, that within the extent of one league you will be able to obtain an effectual prohibition of British ships of war from repeating the irregularities which have so much vexed our commerce and provoked the public resentment, and against which an article in your instructions emphatically provides. It cannot be too earnestly pressed on the British Government, that in applying the remedy copied from regulations heretofore enforced against a violation of the neutral rights of British harbors and coasts, nothing more will be done than what is essential to the preservation of harmony between the two nations. In no case is the temptation or the facility greater to ships of war for annoying our commerce, than in their hovering on our coasts and about our harbors; nor is the national sensibility in any case more justly or more highly excited than by such insults. The communications lately made to Mr. Monroe, with respect to the conduct of British commanders, even within our own waters, will strengthen the claim for such an arrangement on this subject, and for such new orders from the British Government, as will be a satisfactory security against future causes of complaint.

EAST AND WEST INDIA TRADES.

If the West India trade cannot be put on some such footing as is authorized by your instructions, it will be evidently best to leave it as it is, and of course with a freedom to either party to make such regulations as may be justified by those of the other.

With respect to the East India trade, you will find a very useful light thrown on it in the remarks of ———, of which several copies were forwarded in October. They will confirm to you the impolicy, as explained in your instructions, of putting the trade under the regulations admitted in the treaty of 1794. The general footing of other nations in peace with Great Britain will be clearly more advantageous; and on this footing it will be well to leave or place it, if no peculiar advantages, of which there are intimations in ——— remarks, can be obtained.

INDEMNIFICATIONS.

The justice of these ought to be admitted by Great Britain whenever the claim is founded on violations of our rights, as they may be recognised in any new arrangement or understanding between the parties. But in cases, of which there are many examples, where the claim is supported by principles which she never contested, the British Government ought to have too much respect for its professions and its reputation to hesitate at concurring in a provision analogous to that heretofore adopted.

It is not satisfactory to allege that in all such cases redress may be attained in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings. If this were true, there would be sound policy, as well as true equity and economy, in transferring the complaints from partial tribunals, occupied with a great mass of other cases, to a joint tribunal exclusively charged with this special trust. But it is not true that redress is attainable in the ordinary course of justice, and under the actual constitution and rules of the tribunals which administer it in cases of captures. Of this the facts within your knowledge, and particularly some which have been lately transmitted to Mr. Monroe, are ample and striking proofs, and will doubtless derive, from the manner of your presenting them, all the force with which they can appeal to the sentiments and principles which ought to guide the policy of an enlightened nation.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

Mr. Madison to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 18, 1807.

GENTLEMEN:

Your despatch of January 3d, with the treaty signed December 31st, with the British commissioners, were safely delivered on the 15th instant; your letter of December 27th, notifying the approach of that event, had been previously received in time to be included in a communication of the President to Congress, then in session. A copy of the instrument in its actual form, with the declaration of the British commissioners on signing it, was received by Mr. Erskine on the day of the adjournment of Congress, and communicated by him to the Executive.

The observations relating to the whole subject, as it is now presented, with such instructions in detail as will explain the views of the President, will be prepared with as little delay as possible, and transmitted by Mr. Purviance, who holds himself in readiness to be the bearer.

For the present, I am charged by the President to refer you to my letter of February 3d, and to signify his desire that the negotiation may proceed in the form therein stated, but without being brought to an absolute conclusion, until further instructions shall arrive.

You will conform also to the views of the President, in forbearing to enter into any conventional arrangements with the British Government which shall embrace a trade or intercourse of its subjects with the Indian tribes within any part of the territories westward of the Mississippi, under the authority of the United States. Considerations derived from a recent knowledge of the State and of the aboriginal inhabitants of that extensive region, irresistibly oppose the admission of foreign traders into it.

I have only to add, that a proclamation will immediately issue, suspending the non-importation measure until the next session of Congress. This will be a sufficient evidence to the British Government of the conciliatory sentiments of the President, and of his sincere desire that no circumstance whatever may obstruct the prosecution of experiments for putting an end to differences which ought no longer to exist between two nations having so many motives to establish and cherish mutual friendship.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

The American ministers to Lord Howick.

LONDON, March 14, 1807.

MY LORD:

In conformity with the intimation which your lordship was so good as to make to us at a late interview, relative to certain claims and prize causes which had been brought into discussion, in the course of the late negotiation between His Majesty's commissioners and those of the United States, we have the honor to transmit to your lordship the copy of a note to Lord Holland and Lord Auckland, in which those claims and prize causes are fully explained. It is proper to add, that at the time of the signature of the treaty, it was distinctly understood between the commissioners on both sides that this subject was not to be affected by it, but was to remain completely open for future adjustment.

We leave it, upon the statement contained in that note and the documents to which it refers, in perfect confidence that it will be viewed by your lordship with the interest which belongs to it; and that every thing which is suitable to the high and honorable character of His Majesty's Government, and the just claims of the United States, will be done with relation to it as promptly as circumstances will permit.

We have the honor to be, my lord, your lordship's most obedient, humble servants,

JAS. MONROE,
WM. PINKNEY.

The Right Hon. Lord Viscount Howick, &c.

[Referred to in the preceding note to the British minister.]

Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney to Lord Holland and Lord Auckland.

LONDON, August 20, 1806.

The undersigned, commissioners extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the United States of America, think it necessary to give to Lord Holland and Lord Auckland, the commissioners extraordinary and plenipotentiary of His Majesty, a brief explanation in writing of the claims, which they have already had the honor to mention to their lordships in a recent conference, of sundry American citizens, for suitable compensation for losses and damages sustained in the course of the present war, by reason of irregular or illegal captures or condemnation of their vessels and other property; and, at the same time, to call the attention of their lordships to the situation of certain prize causes, arising out of some of these captures, now depending in the tribunals of this country.

The undersigned are happy in having it in their power to state, that, according to the information they have been able to obtain, such of these claims as relate to captures, which, from causes peculiar to themselves, have excited in America a more than ordinary degree of sensibility, are not so considerable in number as at first was supposed.

The complaints of this description, to which the undersigned would particularly invite the attention of their lordships, have been produced by seizures as prize, made in direct violation of rules of maritime practice, previously declared by His Majesty's Government to the Government of the United States; and in no degree revoked or affected by any arrangement between them, or even by any notification that they were about to be abandoned.

Of these seizures the most important, and in every view the most interesting, were made in the year 1805, and in the early part of the year 1806, of the ships and merchandise of American citizens, upon the pretension, that the voyages in which they were engaged were direct or continuous between the colonies of His Majesty's enemies and some port in Europe.

Although it is certain, that the Government of the United States has never admitted that illegality can be imputed to such a trade, even when confessedly continuous or direct, and had concluded, that the question had been otherwise formally settled in its favor; the undersigned believe it to be unnecessary to bring that point into view with any reference to the cases now under consideration. It is sufficient to state that, at the date of these seizures, the merchants of the United States did explicitly understand, and were justified in a confident belief, founded, not only upon antecedent practice, but upon a formal communication, in the year 1801, to the American minister in London from His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Department of Foreign Affairs, that the circumstances by which these voyages were accompanied, had been and were distinctly admitted by the British Government and by British Courts of Prize, to break their continuity, and render them unquestionably lawful.

The following detail will show, more precisely, the nature and effect of the communication to which the undersigned allude.

The public and private armed ships of this country having seized American vessels, bound from the United States to the Spanish West Indies, on the pretext, that their cargoes consisted of articles of the growth of Spain, then at war with Great Britain, and the Vice-admiralty Court of Nassau having condemned the cargo of one of these vessels upon that pretext, Mr. King, in a note to Lord Hawkesbury, of the 13th of March, 1801, remonstrated against these acts as palpable abuses. The subject of this remonstrance was immediately referred to the King's Advocate, whose report of the 16th of March, 1801, after declaring that the sentence of the Vice-admiralty Court was erroneous, concludes with the following exposition of the law, as understood in Great Britain, relative to the commerce of neutrals with belligerents and their colonies. "It is now distinctly understood, and has been repeatedly so decided by the High Court of Appeal, that the produce of the colonies of the enemy may be imported by a neutral into his own country, and may be re-exported from thence, even to the mother country of such colony; and, in like manner, the produce and manufactures of the mother country may, in this circuitous mode, legally find their way to the colonies. The direct trade, however, between the mother country and its colonies has not, I apprehend, been recognized as legal, either by His Majesty's Government, or by his tribunals.

"What is a direct trade, or what amounts to an intermediate importation into the neutral country, may sometimes be a question of some difficulty. A general definition of either, applicable to all cases, cannot well be laid down. The question must depend upon the particular circumstances of each case. Perhaps the mere touching in the neutral country to take fresh clearances may properly be considered as a fraudulent evasion, and is in effect the direct trade; but the High Court of Admiralty has expressly decided, (and I see no reason to expect that the Court of Appeal will vary the rule,) that landing the goods and paying the duties in the neutral country breaks the continuity of the voyage, and is such an importation as legalizes the trade, although the goods be reshipped in the same vessel, and on account of the same neutral proprietors, and be forwarded for sale to the mother country or the colony."

An extract from this report, containing the foregoing passage, was transmitted by the Duke of Portland, in a letter of the 30th of March, 1801, to the lords commissioners of the admiralty. His grace's letter concludes thus:

"In order, therefore, to put a stop to the inconveniences arising from these erroneous sentences of the Vice-admiralty courts, I have the honor to signify to your lordships the King's pleasure that a communication of the doctrine laid down in the said report should be immediately made by your lordships to the several judges presiding in them, setting forth what is held to be the law upon the subject by the superior tribunals, for their future guidance and direction."

On the 11th of April, 1801, Lord Hawkesbury communicated to Mr. King, for the information of the Government of the United States, a copy of the above letter of the Duke of Portland, which is stated by his lordship to have been written by His Majesty's command, in consequence of Mr. King's representation of the preceding month, together with a copy of the extract from the report of the King's advocate, referred to in his grace's letter, and already above quoted. Upon the receipt of this communication, Mr. King transmitted it to his Government, in a letter (of which a copy is annexed) containing the following observations: "I take the liberty of suggesting the expediency of publishing these copies in our newspapers, as the most expeditious means of communicating the same to the cruising ships and privateers in the American seas. Having intimated this suggestion to Lord Hawkesbury, before he prepared and sent me his answer, there can be no exceptions here against such a publication." The publication was directed, and took place accordingly.

The undersigned are persuaded that Lord Holland and Lord Auckland will at once perceive that the report of the King's Advocate, thus unequivocally adopted by His Majesty's Government, and communicated, as an act to be respected and confided in, through the American minister to the Government of the United States, and finally to their citizens and to Europe, through the medium of a publication expected and authorized, cannot, in any fair construction, be viewed as any thing short of a formal declaration, on the part of Great Britain, "that the landing of the cargo and the payment of the duties in the neutral country would be considered as legalizing the circuitous trade, even between a belligerent and its own colonies."

The practice during the late, and the two first years of the present war, was in perfect conformity with this document, and by that conformity increased its authority, and furnished an additional justification, if any had been required, for a dependence upon the doctrine which it announced.

In the summer of 1805, however, when a large amount of American property was afloat, undeniably entitled to the protection of the above rule, and committed to the high seas under an implicit reliance upon a strict adherence to it, the rule was suddenly abandoned, and British cruisers fell upon this trade, thus sanctioned by the express admission, as well as by the acquiescence of their Government; and these captures are understood to have received the highest judicial sanction.

The undersigned have no desire to dwell upon this subject. They are convinced that the liberal and equitable sentiments which distinguish His Majesty's Government, render unnecessary the further explanations of which it is susceptible. Referring to two notes from the undersigned, Mr. Monroe to Lord Mulgrave, of the 23d of September, 1805, and to Mr. Fox, of the 25th of February, 1806, the undersigned have only to declare their sincere conviction that His Majesty's Government will not fail to see in the facts, which they have had the honor to state, an irresistible call upon it to repair the injurious effects of these seizures. As to the few cases of this class now depending before the lords commissioners of appeal, or in other prize courts of His Majesty, the undersigned feel assured that measures will be taken to cause them to be favorably disposed of, and that suitable reparation will moreover be secured to the parties injured for the loss and damage they have sustained. The undersigned have the honor to transmit, herewith, a list of all the cases of this class, in which are distinguished such as are still judicially depending.

The next class of these cases (of which lists and estimates will hereafter be furnished) comprehends captures, during the existing war, contrary to the tenor of a letter of the 5th January, 1804, from Sir Evan Nepean to Mr. Hammond, on the subject of the blockade of Martinique and Guadaloupe, of which a copy was enclosed in a letter of the 12th of April, 1804, from Mr. Merry to Mr. Madison, of both of which letters copies are herewith transmitted.

The citizens of the United States complain that they have suffered severely by captures, in violation of the rules laid down with so much fairness and precision in this communication; and that, where condemnations have not followed, compensation equivalent to the actual loss has not been, and cannot be, procured in the ordinary course by any exertions on their part. The pretext for some of these captures has been the breach of an alleged blockade of Martinique or Guadaloupe; for others, the breach of an imaginary blockade off Curaçoa; and for others the breach of an equally imaginary blockade of other ports and places. In all these cases, either the actual investment of the particular port was wanting, or the vessel, seized for an imputed criminal destination to it, had not been warned as required. The just extent of these claims the undersigned are not able to state, but they presume that it cannot be considerable.

The only remaining claims which are reducible to any precise class, are those which relate to captures within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. Of these, as well as some others of a miscellaneous nature, which the undersigned have not at present the means of presenting distinctly to Lord Holland and Lord Auckland, lists shall hereafter be prepared and laid before their lordships, accompanied by suitable explanations.

The undersigned request Lord Holland and Lord Auckland to accept the assurance of their perfect consideration.

JAS. MONROE,
WM. PINKNEY.

Mr. Erskine, Envoy, &c. of Great Britain, to Mr. Madison.

WASHINGTON, March 12, 1807.

SIR:

I am charged by His Majesty to express to the Government of the United States His Majesty's perfect confidence in their good sense and firmness in resisting the unjust pretensions contained in the decree issued by the French Government at Berlin, on the 21st November, which, if suffered to take effect, must prove so destructive to the commerce of all neutral nations.

His Majesty has learnt that the measures announced in this decree have already, in some instances, been carried into execution by the privateers of the enemy, and there could be no doubt that His Majesty would have an indisputable right to exercise a just retaliation. Neutral nations cannot, indeed, expect that the King should suffer the commerce of his enemies to be carried on through them, whilst they submit to the prohibition which France has decreed against the commerce of His Majesty's subjects. But though this right of retaliation would unquestionably accrue to His Majesty, yet His Majesty is unwilling, except in the last extremity, to have recourse to measures which must prove so distressing to all nations not engaged in the war against France.

His Majesty, therefore, with that forbearance and moderation which have at all times distinguished his conduct, has determined, for the present, to confine himself to the exercise of the power given him by his decided naval superiority, in such a manner only as is authorized by the acknowledged principles of the law of nations, and has issued an order for preventing all commerce, from port to port, of his enemies, comprehending in this order not only the ports of France, but those of other nations, as, either in alliance with France, or subject to her dominion, have, by measures of active offence, or by the exclusion of British ships, taken a part in the present war.

His Majesty feels an entire confidence that the moderation and justice of this conduct will be duly appreciated by the United States, and has charged me to express to their Government, in the strongest terms, the regret he has experienced in being thus compelled, in his own defence, to act in a manner which must prove in some degree embarrassing to the commerce of neutral nations, and his sincere desire to avoid any stronger measures, to which, however, if the injustice and aggression of his enemies should not be resisted by those nations whose rights and interests are invaded by so flagrant a violation of all public law, it may be ultimately necessary for the King to have recourse.

I have the honor to be, with great respect and consideration, sir, your obedient servant,
D. M. ERSKINE.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Erskine.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 20, 1807.

SIR:

I have laid before the President your letter of the 12th instant, communicating the views of His Britannic Majesty in relation to the French decree of November 21, 1806, and to the principle of retaliation, through the commerce of the neutrals who may submit to the operation of that decree, as also the measure actually taken, of prohibiting all neutral commerce from port to port, of his enemies, not only the ports of France, but those of such other nations, as, either in alliance with France, or subject to her dominion, have, by measures of active offence, or by the exclusion of British ships, taken a part in the present war.

The President cannot be insensible, sir, to the friendship and confidence towards the United States which are signified by his Britannic Majesty in this communication. In making this acknowledgment, however, the President considers it not less incumbent on him, to reserve for a state of things which it is hoped may never occur, the right of discussing the legality of any particular measures to which resort may be had, on a ground of retaliation. At this time, it would suffice to observe, that it remains to be more fully ascertained in what sense the decree in question will be explained, and to what extent it will be carried into execution; and, consequently, whether in any case the United States can be involved in questions concerning measures of retaliation, supposed to accrue to one belligerent from such a proceeding by another. But it is worthy the justice and liberality of the British Government to recollect, that, within the period of those great events which continue to agitate Europe, instances have occurred in which the commerce of neutral nations, more especially of the United States, has experienced the severest distresses from its own orders and measures, manifestly unauthorized by the law of nations. The respect which the United States owe to their neutral rights, and the interest they have in maintaining them, will always be sufficient pledges, that no culpable acquiescence on their part will render them accessory to the proceedings of one belligerent nation, through their rights of neutrality, against the commerce of its adversary.

With regard to the particular order issued against the trade of neutrals from one port to another, of the enemies of Great Britain, no fair objection can lie against it, provided it be founded on, and enforced, by actual blockades, as authorized by the law of nations. If, on the other hand, the order has reference not to such a blockade, but to a supposed illegality of the neutral trade from one to another of the described ports, the remark is obvious that, on that supposition, the order is superfluous, the trade being, as interdicted by the law of nations, liable at all times, without any such order, to the capture of British cruizers, and the condemnation of British courts; and if not interdicted as such by the law of nations, it can no otherwise be made illegal than by a legal blockade of the ports comprehended in the order. This inference is applicable even to the case of a neutral trade between the ports of France herself, since it is not a principle of the acknowledged law of nations that neutrals may not trade from one to another port of the same belligerent nation; and it would be an innovation on that law, not before attempted, to extend the principle to a neutral trade between ports of different countries, confessedly open in times of peace as well as of war.

If the British order refers for its basis to the principle of retaliation against the French decree, it falls under the observations already made on that subject, and which need not be repeated.

I have the honor to be, with great respect and consideration, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES MADISON.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Erskine.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 29, 1807.

Further reflection on the tenor and tendency of the order of His Britannic Majesty, communicated by your letter of the 12th instant, which was answered by mine of the 20th, induces me to resume that important subject.

From the difficulty of supposing that the order can have for its basis either a legal blockade, impossible to be extended to all the ports described in the order, or a supposed illegality of the trade between those ports—an illegality which has never been applied by the British Government or its Admiralty courts to an accustomed trade, even between ports of the same belligerent nation, and is utterly at variance with the conduct of both in reference to a trade between a belligerent nation and its allies, a necessity seems to result of ascribing the order to the policy of countervailing, through the commerce of neutrals, the French decree of the 21st November last.

In this view of the order, it demands, on the part of the United States, the most serious attention both to its principle and to its operation.

With respect to its principle, it will not be contested that a retaliation by one nation on its enemy, which is to operate through the interest of a nation not an enemy, essentially requires not only that the injury inflicted should be limited by the measure of injury sustained, but that every retaliating step, in such a case, should be preceded by an unreasonable failure of the neutral party, in some mode or other, to put an end to the inequality wrongfully produced.

Were it certain, therefore, that the French decree is to be enforced in the sense in which it was taken, and that, in violation of the treaty between France and the United States, the commerce of the latter will not be exempted, the British order, being peremptory in its import and immediate in its execution, might justly be regarded by the United States as a proceeding equally premature and unfriendly.

But, in the uncertainty as to the real meaning of that decree, and whilst a presumption offered itself that the decree, if avowed and executed in an unlawful extent, might not embrace the commerce of the United States, they are bound by justice to their interests, as well as by respect for their rights, to consider the British order as a ground for serious complaint and remonstrance.

Should it prove that the decree had not the meaning ascribed to it, and particularly should the respect of France for her treaties with the United States except their trade from the operation of the decree, the order of the British Government will stand exposed to still severer comments. It will take the character of an original aggression; will furnish to the French Government a like ground with that assumed by itself for retaliating measures; and will derive a very unfavorable feature from the consideration that it was a palpable infraction of a treaty just signed on the part of the British Government, and expected, at the date of the order, to be speedily ratified on the part of the United States.

The necessity of presenting the subject in its true light is strengthened by the operation which the British order will have on a vast proportion of the entire commerce of the United States. Not to dwell on the carrying branch of the commerce between the ports and countries of Europe, and which the immunity given by our flag, in consequence of treaties with the enemies of Great Britain, to British property, and not enjoyed by the property of her enemies, has hitherto been advantageous to Great Britain; and, without inquiring into the effect of an application of the interdict to other quarters of the globe, all of which are evidently within the comprehensive terms of the order, it cannot be overlooked that the character and course of nearly the whole of the American commerce, with the ports of Europe, other than that of Great Britain, will fall under the destructive operation of the order. It is well known that the cargoes exported from the United States frequently require that they be disposed of partly at one market, and partly at another. The return cargoes are still more frequently collected at different ports, and not unfrequently at ports different from those receiving the outward cargoes. In this circuitous voyage, generally consisting of several links, the interest of the undertakers materially requires also either a trade or a freightage between the ports visited in the circuit. To restrain the vessels of the United States, therefore, from this legitimate and customary mode of trading with the continent of Europe, as is contemplated by the orders, and to compel them, on one hand, to dispose of the whole of their cargoes at a port which may want but a part, and, on the other hand to seek the whole of their returns at the same port, which may furnish but a part, or perhaps no part, of the articles wanted, would be a proceeding as ruinous to our commerce as contrary to our essential rights.

These observations, which are made in conformity with the sentiments of the President, cannot fail, sir, to have all the weight with an enlightened and friendly Government to which they are entitled; and the President persuades himself that the good effect of the truths which they disclose will be seen in such measures as will remove all ground for dissatisfaction, and demonstrate on that side the same sincere disposition to cultivate harmony and beneficial intercourse as is felt and evinced by the United States and their Government.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

The Hon. DAVID M. ERSKINE, Esq., &c.

Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

LONDON, April 22, 1807.

We had the honor to receive your letter of February 3d on the 6th instant, and are now to give you a detail of the measures we have pursued, in obedience to the instructions it communicated.

To enable you to form a just idea of those measures, it will be proper to state concisely what had occurred at the time of receiving your letter, after the departure of Mr. Purviance with the treaty and our despatch of the 3d of January.

Soon after that date, we resumed our conference with the British commissioners, as we intimated it was our intention to do, and had nearly digested with them the project of a supplemental convention upon the principal topics alluded to in the last paragraph of that despatch, when an entire change took place in the British ministry; Lord Grenville and his associates being compelled to retire, in favor of the friends of the late Mr. Pitt. This change, of course, suspended the further progress of the business, and in that state it still remains.

Before this change in the administration, we had presented to the British commissioners, according to an agreement which accompanied the signature of the treaty, an antedated note on the subject of indemnity, and another to Lord Howick on the same subject, previously seen and approved by the British commissioners. With these papers (of which copies are now transmitted) the British commissioners not only expressed their perfect satisfaction, but assured us then, as they have frequently done since, that the just confidence with which that agreement had inspired us in regard to its object would not be disappointed.

We had many conferences with the British commissioners, previous to the late change, upon the subject of impressments, in which they invariably declared to us that the practice of their Government would be strictly conformable to the spirit of the article which they had settled with us, and which was afterwards rejected by the cabinet. They stated that the prejudice of the navy, and of the country generally, was so strong in favor of their pretension that the ministry could not encounter it in a direct form; and that, in truth, the support of Parliament could not have been relied on in such a case. It was their idea that, by discontinuing the practice in the mode proposed by them, which might be done without giving any shock to the public feeling, this prejudice might be gradually overcome, and an arrangement, by treaty, on this very delicate and difficult subject rendered ultimately practicable. The United States would, in the interim, enjoy the security they sought, without any abandonment of their rights, and be induced to yield, in return, as their confidence increased, the equivalents which we had offered in our project.

The footing upon which the note of the British commissioners (which is and must be considered as equally obligatory as if actually inserted in the treaty) left this point was supposed to be the less liable to exception on our part, because, while it affords a pledge unquestionably intended to secure the substance of our object, and constantly admitted here to be equal to that effect, it keeps it nevertheless for our advantage completely open for future negotiation and more formal adjustment. The note declares that the discussion of any plan will be entertained that can be devised "to secure the interests of both States without injury to rights to which they are respectively attached," and consequently provides for a renewal of negotiation with a sincere view to such an arrangement as shall be practically consistent with the declared pretensions of the United States, and yet leave untouched the British principle; or, in other words, an arrangement in which Great Britain shall agree to conform her conduct to our views without renouncing the claim which she has hitherto maintained and acted upon. It was supposed, therefore, to be the clear import of that note that the conduct of Great Britain would not, while the discussion of such a plan as it might be proper to insert in a treaty stood postponed at the request of its commissioners, encroach in practice upon rights which we had so strongly asserted and vindicated as rights not to be abandoned; which it was well understood our Government and country would not suffer to be invaded in future, as they had been during the past; and which the British commissioners themselves, acting under the immediate orders of the cabinet, had in their note distinctly recognized as fit to be preserved hereafter from injury and violation. This conclusion was thought to be the more just and natural, when it was remembered that it was supported, not only by the verbal admissions and declarations of the British commissioners, which would, of course, as they well knew, be reported to our Government, but by the language of such parts of the note as looked particularly to the future practice of Great Britain on the subject of impressments. It was believed to be fortified, too, by the obvious consideration that the United States would be authorized, notwithstanding any adjustment by treaty upon other points, in case of the impressment on the high seas of a single mariner from on board an American vessel, to view it as an act of aggression, and to resent it accordingly. This right existed, undoubtedly, independently of that note; but it seemed, notwithstanding, to derive from it a new and high sanction favorable to its just effect; and certainly the sensibility and determination which have been manifested on this point by the United States, especially of late, and by the American commissioners during the recent negotiation, must have inspired this Government with the conviction that a perseverance in such outrages upon their sovereignty and the rights of their citizens would be wholly incompatible with the peaceable relations of the two countries, which it was the professed object of the British commissioners and their Government to preserve. It is proper, however, for us to state, that it was our intention to have requested of this Government written explanations on this topic of impressment, as well as on that of indemnity, for the purpose of transmitting them to you. The approaching departure of Mr. Monroe for the United States would, it was thought, furnish a suitable occasion for such an application.

Towards the end of the last month the change took place in the ministry, and on the 27th the diplomatic corps had their first interview with Mr. Canning, who succeeded Lord Howick in the Foreign Department. Although the meeting was general, a separate audience was given, as is usual, to the representatives of each Power. At Mr. Canning's request, we gave him a concise but just view of the state of the business between our Governments. He appeared not to have heard before of what had taken place relative to the project of a supplemental convention. He said that he had come too recently into office to be able to say any thing decisive on any of the topics of which we had given him a sketch, but that he would soon make himself acquainted with them, and give us another interview. His professions, which were of a general nature, were conciliatory.

Such was the state of affairs when we had the honor to receive your letter of February the 3d. We were anxious to carry into effect the instructions contained in that letter in the best manner in our power, and with the least possible delay. It became especially our duty to make known to the new ministry, as soon as we might be able, the understanding which had subsisted between the British commissioners, and, through them the late cabinet, and us, as to the condition on which we had consented to continue the negotiation after our project relative to impressments had been rejected; that, in fact, we had no authority to treat after that event; that our Government was not bound, or supposed or intended to be bound, to ratify what we had done, if it disapproved of it. We were equally desirous of turning to the best account the appeal, which a refusal to ratify by our Government would make to the interests of this country, in an effort to arrange by treaty this great point with the new ministry. The first measure seemed to be free from difficulty. The statement proposed was an act of justice to our Government, and of duty to it and our country, which might be discharged without the slightest hazard to the public interest. Indeed, as it was presumable that this Government would soon receive intelligence from Mr. Erskine, which, without such an explanation, could hardly fail to produce an unfavorable effect, it appeared to be indispensably necessary to make it, to prevent a public injury. The second object, however, was evidently involved in more difficulty. From what we had seen, in the debates of Parliament, of the disposition of several of the members of the new ministry, before they came into power, on subjects which were connected with our treaty, independent of other causes, we had reason to believe that great caution ought to be observed in any communication which we might make to it on that point. Although Lord Holland and Lord Auckland had retired from their offices of Lord Privy Seal and President of the Board of Trade, they still retained their situations as commissioners extraordinary and plenipotentiary, and, as we presumed, would continue to do so until the business in which we had been engaged with them should be concluded. In every view it seemed to be just and expedient to confer with them on the subject of our late despatch. We accordingly obtained an early interview, in which we communicated, in confidence, the substance of that despatch, as well in conformity with the orders of the President as in the hope that they might be able to assist us in the accomplishment of its objects. But we found them under circumstances of such peculiar delicacy with the new ministry, that it was not in their power to give us the slightest aid. They informed us that, on the change of the ministry, Lord Howick had communicated to Mr. Canning the state in which our business stood, and more particularly the progress which had been made in the proposed plan of a convention, in the expectation that he would have requested them to proceed in it; that, however, no such request had been made, in consequence of which they should feel it their duty, in case he continued silent, to withdraw from the commission. They expressed their regret that they had not been able to arrange with us by treaty the subject of impressment, as they wished to have done; but assured us that the order, which they had engaged should be issued in their note of November 8, had been actually issued about that time, and in terms calculated, as they had understood, to accomplish the object desired. They saw no objection to our being furnished with a copy of that order, and presumed that it might still be obtained. In adverting to the understanding which had subsisted between us on the failure of the article which had been submitted to the cabinet for providing against impressments at sea, we were happy to find that they retained a perfect recollection of it in the sense in which we have stated it above. They admitted that we had a right to expect from the new ministry an explanation of its views relative to the project of a convention, and to indemnity and impressment, from the particular state in which those great subjects were left, and the claims which we had on the Government from what had been done in them. Of our prospect of making with the present ministry a satisfactory arrangement against impressments by treaty, they said nothing; but they repeated, what they had often said before, that they had done all on that point in their power; and declared it as their opinion, that if their friends had remained in office, well disposed as they knew them to be towards the United States, the mode in which we were now about to pursue this object would not tend to produce, in that or any other respect, a favorable effect. They could, therefore, give us no advice as to the part which it became us to take in the present juncture. They intimated, however, that, by obtaining an interview and conferring with Mr. Canning, we might probably ascertain the sentiments of his Government on the whole subject, and be enabled thereby to pursue the course which would be the best adapted to the spirit of our instructions and the interests of our country.

Immediately after our interview with the British commissioners, we asked one of Mr. Canning, which was obtained on the — instant. It was our intention to have confined ourselves in the first instance to the topics above mentioned, and to the information which we thought it our duty to give him of the understanding which had subsisted between the British commissioners and ourselves, of the condition on which we had proceeded to the other points of negotiation after the project of an article relative to impressments had been rejected. As soon, however, as we glanced at the objects of the interview, he observed that he had just received intelligence, which, if true, would make it unnecessary for us to enter at present on any of the topics alluded to; that it had been represented to him that an officer just arrived from America had that morning informed the Admiralty that the treaty which had been lately concluded here, had been rejected by our Government; that he had not seen the officer, and therefore could not state the grounds on which the information rested. He observed that such an event would place the relations of the two countries in an embarrassing situation, and wished to know whether we had received any intelligence of a like import. We perceived at once that the important feature in your despatch of February 3d, respecting the disclosure of which to the new ministry, we had entertained some doubts, was not only either already known to it or soon would be, but that inferences of a dangerous tendency were likely to be drawn from the refusal of our Government to ratify the treaty, in case it should occur, which such an event could not justify. We saw therefore the necessity of communicating to Mr. Canning immediately the substance of that despatch, as well for the purpose of preventing those errors, as to obey the instructions contained in it, over which, in the respect alluded to, we should have exercised any discretion with great reluctance. We assured Mr. Canning that there could be no foundation for the report of the rejection of the treaty, as we were satisfied that Mr. Purviance, who had carried it to our Government, could not have arrived in the United States in time to enable the President to submit it to the consideration of the Senate before the 3d of March, when Congress must have adjourned, and that he must be sensible that, until the receipt of our despatch, no step, at least of so decisive a character, would be taken in the business. We stated, however, that we had great reason to believe that the treaty would not be ratified in its present form, for a cause which was well known to His Majesty's late Government. We then communicated to him fully all the circumstances on which that remark was founded, particularly the nature of our instructions relative to impressments; the knowledge which the British commissioners had of them; the entire suspension of the negotiation at a certain period on the failure with the cabinet of a project of an article for the regulation of that point; the considerations which induced us afterwards to proceed in the negotiation, founded on the note of the British commissioners of the 8th of November, the nature of which we fully explained; and finally the condition on which we did proceed in the business, that is, that our Government would not be bound to ratify the treaty, if it should not be satisfied with the substitute for such an article offered in that note. He asked us, in case the treaty should not be ratified, in what state our Government wished to place the relations of the two countries? We replied that it was its wish that the subject of impressment should be resumed and arranged. We explained to him the nature of the article, on the failure of which the negotiation had been suspended, and showed that great Britain would gain by it much more than an equivalent for the forbearance of the practice of which we complained, independent of the other good effects likely to result from it. On this point he gave no opinion, but asked what the relation should be in case no such agreement as we desired should take place respecting impressments? We replied that in such a case, it would be the desire of our Government that no treaty should be concluded, but that the relations should be placed informally on the most friendly footing, adhering in the explanations which we gave him on this head to the ideas contained in your letter of February 3; but without mentioning the actual receipt of such a letter. He said he was glad to find that our Government looked in all events to amicable arrangement. We told him that we had not heard from you since the treaty had arrived in America; but that full instructions would doubtless be forwarded to us as soon after that event as possible. He then observed that, under present circumstances, he thought it would be better to let the whole business rest, as it would be impossible for either party to move in it with advantage. He promised, in case the officer above mentioned brought any thing material, to inform us of it, and to appoint a time for another interview, which, however, he has not since done. We enclose a copy of his note of the next day.

It is impossible for us to give you a satisfactory opinion as to the prospect of arranging this important business with the present ministry. All the facts on which such an opinion should be formed, not previously known to you, are stated above. As, however, we are not perfectly aware of the consequences of any act on our part, which might tend to lessen the obligation of this Government to ratify the treaty, in case it should be ratified by the President and Senate, we have thought it best (especially as Mr. Canning, after promising us an appointment, has shown no disposition towards another interview,) to leave things in their present state until we hear from you. We flatter ourselves that we shall soon have that satisfaction, as we see by the gazettes that Mr. Purviance must have arrived at Washington about the 12th of March. In the mean time we have placed our affairs on a footing the most favorable for any course which our Government may take, and we beg you to be assured that we shall, with the utmost zeal and promptitude, adopt that which shall be thought the most expedient.

We have the honor to be, with the highest respect and consideration,

JAMES MONROE,
WILLIAM PINKNEY.

P. S. We are preparing a letter to you explanatory of the project of a supplemental convention mentioned above which will be forwarded in a few days. A copy of the project of the British commissioners will be enclosed. It is not our intention to proceed, even if this Government should be so disposed to do any thing conclusive upon the subjects embraced by it, until the views of the President shall be known to us relative to such of the topics as were not contemplated by the instructions originally given to the mission.

Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

LONDON, April 25, 1807.

We had the honor to inform you, in our letter of the 22d instant, that the British commissioners having proposed to us to endeavor to adjust the terms of a supplemental convention relative to boundary, to a trade by sea between the United States and the British northern colonies, and to the subjects reserved for future explanation by the second article of our treaty, we had resumed our conferences with them, and had made considerable progress in digesting the plan of such a convention, when the business was interrupted by an entire change of the King's ministers. It is the purpose of this despatch concisely to explain that negotiation and its objects.

After many interviews and much discussion, the British commissioners at length presented to us the project of which a copy is now transmitted, differing in many essential particulars from that which had been originally offered on our part.

The first article in our plan, which, like the first article in their project, defined the connecting line between the mouth of the St. Croix, as heretofore settled by commissioners, and the Bay of Fundy, was copied from the convention of Mr. King and Lord Hawkesbury, and adopting the ship channel between Deer island and Campo Bello island, first included and then excepted the latter. The British commissioners alleged that the article, in that shape, accomplished its object by a useless inconsistency; that it gave a line of property and jurisdiction beyond its own views, merely to furnish occasion for an exception of almost equal importance with the whole residue of the subject; and that the navigation of the east passage being secured to the United States by a precise provision, the whole effect of the first article of the convention of 1803 would be produced at once by running the line along the middle of the west passage. They therefore proposed an article framed upon that principle, to which no objection of any weight has occurred to us. We do not perceive that, in substance, this article is different from the other, while it is more simple and intelligible in its plan. Even if the commencement of one of the parallel east lines, within which, by the treaty of peace, the United States are entitled to all islands within twenty leagues of any part of our shores (not within the limits of Nova Scotia) should be admitted to depend upon the channel through which our line from the St. Croix is conducted to the Bay of Fundy, it would probably be indifferent to the United States whether the east or the west channel were adopted. Grand Manan seems to be considerably southward of an east line drawn even from West Quoddy Head, and we know of no other island, taking into consideration the exception in the treaty of peace, to the title of which the commencement of that line can now be important.

To the fifth article, regulating our boundary in the northwest, which has encountered much zealous opposition here, even in the form suggested by the British commissioners, from the prejudices, supposed interests, and mistaken views of many persons, an explanation of some of which will be found in an idle paper written by Lord Selkirk, (of which a copy is enclosed,) we finally objected, that the division line between our respective territories in that quarter ought to be drawn from the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods due north or south until it shall intersect the parallel of forty-nine degrees, and from the point of such intersection due west along and with that parallel. This was agreed to by the British commissioners.

We objected, also, to the terms, defining the extension of the west line, viz: "as far as the territories of the United States extend in that quarter." It appeared to us that, by these words, a great portion of the subject was in danger of being set at large; that the provision would, perhaps, do no more than establish between the parties the commencement of the line, and might, of course, leave it open to Great Britain to found a claim hereafter to any part of the tract of country to the westward of that commencement, upon the notions of occupancy or conquest, which you will find stated by Lord Selkirk in the paper above mentioned, or upon some future purchase from Spain, as intimated by others. We therefore proposed to omit the words in question altogether, which the concluding proviso appeared to render wholly unnecessary, even upon the ideas of the British commissioners. This was not agreed to; but it was said there would be no objection to give to this part of the description a character of reciprocity, so as to make it read "as far as their said respective territories extend in that quarter." A copy is enclosed of our plan of a fifth article, as also of the same article, with the description above quoted, merely made reciprocal.

It is proper to observe in this place, that the project of the British commissioners contemplates what, of course, had not entered into our plan, a permanent concession, on our part, of access, through our territories in the northwestern quarter, to the river Mississippi, for the purpose of enabling British subjects to enjoy the navigation of that river, as secured to them by the treaty of peace and the treaty of 1794, and the like access to the rivers falling into the Mississippi from the westward. The desired concession, however, amounts simply to a right of passage, and is claimed, not only as an equivalent for such a permanent adjustment of boundary as is here thought, or affected to be thought, highly advantageous to us, and injurious to Great Britain, but (as regards access to the Mississippi) upon the idea, among others, that the treaty of peace, which secures to Great Britain the free navigation of that river, appears to have looked to it, in common with the treaty of 1763, as overreaching our northern limit, and consequently as being accessible to the British in the territory of Hudson's Bay. It is probable that this demand, so far as respects the waters falling into the Mississippi from the westward, would not be persisted in, if no other difficulty should present itself.

The seventh article of the project is wholly that of the British commissioners, and proposes to extend, as you were apprised by our letter of the 3d of January would be attempted by them, for the term of the treaty, the privileges of trade and inland navigation, secured by the third article of the treaty of 1794, to the territories of the contracting parties to the north and south of the dividing line established by the fifth article, in other words, to Louisiana and the territory of the Hudson's Bay Company, with the exception only of the actual settlements of that company, and their immediate neighborhood. This, if agreed to, must undoubtedly be considered as a concession to Great Britain; although the proposed arrangement throws open to us, for the first time, the territories of the Hudson's Bay; although they still insist that their admission into the trade of Louisiana is a necessary consequence of our acquisition of it, coupled with the third article of the treaty of 1794; and although they sometimes intimate that the independent tribes of savages, who inhabit that vast region, have a right to carry on within it their usual traffic with whom they please, and, of course, to authorize a continuance of the customary British trade to which this article relates; and, if not absolutely to authorize it, at least to give to Great Britain a claim upon the United States for a recognition of it, (especially in connexion with the treaty of 1794,) upon fair terms and equivalents. We resisted this proposal by every consideration which has been stated by you, or has occurred to ourselves. We dwelt particularly upon the high motives of duty and the urgent views of policy, connected with the public tranquillity, as suggested by recent facts, or by the state and peculiar population, as far as they were known, of the country to the westward of the Mississippi, as well as by the nature and character of the traffic itself, which were likely to influence our Government against any plan which should admit British, or any other foreign traders into it. We were not able, however, to produce any disposition to dispense with this demand, and had abundant reason to apprehend that a rejection of it by the United States would be considered here as an unfriendly act, without an adequate motive, and might prevent the completion of any satisfactory arrangement of the other points embraced by the proposed convention. Still, if the consideration of this subject should be resumed, we shall not fail to renew our efforts, whatever may be the prospect of success, to reconcile this Government to the failure of this favorite object, unless the instructions we may receive from you should appear to point to a different course.

There is another feature in this article which it is proper to notice. It relates to a subject with which you are already familiar, the mode of calculating the ad valorem duties on goods imported into the United States, under the third article of the treaty of 1794. The calculation is understood to be made upon the value in Canada, not upon the value at the place of original exportation. This is complained of, not as a hardship merely, but as a plain infringement of the treaty. The object is not, perhaps, of such value as to make a perseverance in this doubtful practice desirable, and it is certain that the explanation, if made at this time (and if not made now, it will probably be pressed hereafter with increased zeal, as being demanded by good faith) will be received in this country as the effect of a just and liberal policy towards Great Britain. The remaining provisions of the article in favor of Great Britain are of no importance, and will, perhaps, be best explained by the enclosed copy of an "extra official communication with regard to the Canada trade," made to us by Lord Holland and Lord Auckland some time ago.

The eighth article of the project relates to a trade by sea, between some port or ports of the British northern provinces and the United States, in the vessels of either party. The article is not such as we entirely approve, but connected with an act of Parliament, which it was proposed to pass immediately, and of which the draught was shown to us by the British commissioners, it would, perhaps, go near to accomplish the object of our Government. Our project contained an article upon this subject, proposing an open trade in native productions, with the same system of duties as is contained in our treaty. We were told that, although well disposed towards our object, it was impossible for the Government to venture at present upon a measure striking so plainly and essentially at their colonial system; that, with the aid of the good understanding between the two countries, which would grow out of the adjustment of all points of difference, their plan would be found, in its practical effect, to be nearly, if not altogether, as convenient and beneficial to us as our own; and that, by taking a form as little calculated as possible to alarm the advocates of rigorous monopoly, it was more likely to become the successful means of introducing more enlightened opinions and a more liberal practice into the whole colony system of this country.

The 9th article merely prescribes the duration of the commercial articles of the convention.

We ought to add that we had inserted in our project upon the subject of boundary, an article relative to Grand Manan, but found it impracticable to retain it. The British commissioners had been induced to believe that Great Britain had been in possession of that island for a great number of years, and that, although this possession might not amount to a title, it was a reasonable ground upon which to presume every thing which constituted title, so as to make it improper for them to bring it into question. We argued in vain that the title to Grand Manan must depend upon two plain questions of fact; whether, being within twenty leagues of our shores, it was included within the parallel east lines, described in the treaty of peace as comprehending the islands which should belong to the United States; and whether, if that should be so, it was at the making of that treaty or at any time before within the limits of Nova Scotia; that it was impossible to pretend that the last of these questions could be answered in favor of Great Britain, and that there was strong reason to believe that the answer to the first would be found to be in favor of the United States; that their possession, such as it was, (although its precise nature did not appear and ought not to be taken for granted,) commenced after the treaty of peace, and could neither give them a title, nor, in any fair reasoning applicable to the claims of sovereign States, justify a presumption of these facts upon which their title must rest; facts which were so easily capable of ascertainment, and which it was the immediate object of our article to ascertain, in the same manner as other disputed facts relative to boundary had already been, and again were by this convention proposed to be ascertained. It was retorted that our title to Moose island, Frederick island, and Dudley island, in the bay of Passamaquoddy, was, under the treaty of peace, of a very questionable kind, and that, even if it should be admitted, that their title to Grand Manan was also doubtful, it was but a fair and equitable compromise, that, as we were suffered to hold, principally upon the score of possession, three islands to which Great Britain might make out a claim of considerable strength, she should, on her part, be suffered to retain, upon the same score of long possession, the only island not given up to the United States, to which they seemed to think they had any shadow of pretension. We replied by denying that it was at all doubtful that these islands belonged to the United States; but, as it was evident that there was no disposition to yield upon the main point, we finally thought it most advisable to forbear to press the subject for the present, and to leave the case of Grand Manan for future adjustment, as an independent case, freed from the disadvantage of this idea of compromise.

We have only to repeat, what is stated in our last, that we do not mean in any event to act conclusively upon the project in question until the views of the President, relative to such parts of it as were not embraced by our original instructions, shall have been communicated to us. The intimations thrown out towards the end of our despatch of the third of January may perhaps produce such a communication.

We have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

[Enclosed in Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney's letter of the 25th April, 1807.]

Additional and explanatory articles, signed the — day of —, 1807, to be added to the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, signed at London, the 31st day of December, 1806.

Whereas, by the second article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded at London, on the 31st day of December, 1806, between His Majesty and the United States of America, it is agreed that the several articles of the treaty of 1794, "which have not expired, nor as yet had their full operation and effect, shall be confirmed in their best form and in their full tenor; and that the contracting parties will also, from time to time, enter into friendly explanations on the subject of the said articles, for the purpose of removing all such doubts as may arise, or have arisen, as to the true import of the same, as well as for the purpose of rendering the said articles more conformable to their mutual wishes and convenience;" and it being the sincere desire of His Britannic Majesty and of the United States that certain points should be so explained as to promote mutual satisfaction and friendship; and, for this purpose, the respective plenipotentiaries who concluded and signed the aforesaid treaty of the 31st of December, 1806, having already exchanged their full powers, have, in virtue of the same, entered into these additional and explanatory articles.

ART. 1. The line hereinafter described shall, and is hereby declared to be, the boundary between the mouth of the river St. Croix and the Bay of Fundy; that is to say, a line beginning in the middle of the channel of the river St. Croix, at its mouth, as the same has been ascertained by the commissioners appointed for that purpose; thence through the middle of the channel, between Deer island, Marvel island, and Campo Bello island on the east, and Moose island, Dudley island, and Frederick island on the west; and round the south point of Campo Bello island to the Bay of Fundy; and the islands and waters eastward of the said boundary are hereby declared to be within the jurisdiction and part of His Majesty's province of New Brunswick, and the islands and waters westward of the said boundary are declared to be within the jurisdiction and part of Massachusetts, one of the said United States; notwithstanding which, a full and entire right of navigation is reserved to the United States in the channel between Deer island on the east and north, and Moose island and Campo Bello island on the west and south, and round the east point of Campo Bello island into the Bay of Fundy; the aforesaid channel frequently affording the only convenient and practicable navigation.

ART. 2. And whereas it has become expedient that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, mentioned and described in the treaty of peace between His Majesty and the United States, should be ascertained and determined, and that the line between the source of the river St. Croix and the said northwest angle of Nova Scotia should be run and marked, according to the provisions of the said treaty of peace, it is agreed that, for this purpose, commissioners shall be appointed in the following manner, viz: One commissioner shall be named by His Majesty, and one by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof; and the said two commissioners shall agree in the choice of a third; or, if they cannot agree, they shall each propose one person, and of the two names so proposed, one shall be taken by lot, in the presence of the two original commissioners; and the three commissioners so appointed shall be sworn impartially to ascertain and determine the said northwest angle of Nova Scotia, pursuant to the provisions of the said treaty of peace; and likewise to cause the same boundary line between the source of the river St. Croix, as the same has been determined by the commissioners appointed for that purpose, and the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, to be run and marked, according to the provisions of the treaty aforesaid; the said commissioners shall meet at Boston, and have power to adjourn to such other place or places as they shall think fit; they shall have power to appoint a secretary, and employ such surveyors and other assistants as they shall judge necessary; the said commissioners shall draw up a report of their proceedings, which shall describe the line aforesaid, and particularize the latitude and longitude of the place ascertained and determined as aforesaid to be the northwest angle of Nova Scotia; duplicates of which report, under the hands and seals of the said commissioners, or of a majority of them, together with duplicates of their accounts, shall be delivered to such persons as may be severally authorized to receive the same in behalf of their respective Governments; and the decision and proceedings of the said commissioners, or of a majority of them, made and had as aforesaid, shall be final and conclusive.

ART. 3. It is further agreed that the said commissioners, after they shall have executed the duties assigned to them in the preceding article, shall be, and they hereby are, authorized upon their oaths impartially to ascertain and determine the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, according to the provisions of the aforesaid treaty of peace, and likewise to cause the boundary line, described in the said treaty of peace, between the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, and the said northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, to be run and marked pursuant to the provisions of the said treaty; the said commissioners shall meet at Boston, and have power to adjourn to such other place or places as they shall think fit; they shall have power to appoint a secretary, and employ such surveyors and other assistants as they shall judge necessary; the said commissioners shall draw up a report of their proceedings which shall describe the boundary line aforesaid, and particularize the longitude and latitude of the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, duplicates of which report, under the hands and seals of said commissioners, or of a majority of them, together with duplicates of their accounts, shall be delivered to such persons as may be severally authorized to receive the same, in behalf of their respective Governments, and the decision and proceedings of the said commissioners, made and had as aforesaid, shall be final and conclusive.

ART. 4. It is further agreed that the aforesaid commissioners shall respectively be paid in such manner as shall be agreed between the two parties, such agreement to be settled at the time of the ratification of this convention; and all other expenses incurred by the said commissioners shall be defrayed jointly by the two parties, the same being previously ascertained and allowed by the said commissioners; and, in case of death, sickness, or necessary absence, the place of any commissioner shall be supplied in the same manner as such commissioner was appointed, and the new commissioner shall take the same oath and do the same duties.

ART. 5. It is agreed that a line drawn due west from the Lake of the Woods along the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude shall be the line of demarcation [division line] between His Majesty's territories and those of the United States to the westward of the said lake, as far as the territories of the United States extend in that quarter; and that the said line shall, to that extent, form the southern boundary of His Majesty's said territories, and the northern boundary of the said territories of the United States; provided that nothing in the present article shall be construed to extend to the northwest coast of America, or to the territories belonging to or claimed by either party, on the continent of America, to the westward of the Stony mountains.

ART. 6. It is agreed by the United States that His Majesty's subjects shall have, at all times, free access from His Majesty's aforesaid territories by land or inland navigation into the aforesaid territories of the United States to the river Mississippi, with the goods and effects of His Majesty's said subjects, in order to enjoy the benefit of the navigation of that river, as secured to them by the treaty of peace between His Majesty and the United States, and also by the third article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation of one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four. And it is further agreed that His Majesty's subjects shall, in like manner, and at all times, have free access to all the waters and rivers falling into the western side of the river Mississippi, and to the navigation of the said river.

ART. 7. It is agreed that the privileges of intercourse and trade by land or inland navigation, secured to His Majesty's subjects, and to the citizens of the United States, and to the Indians dwelling on each side of the boundary line between the respective territories on the continent of America, by the third article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, signed at London, the 19th of November, 1794, as well as by the explanatory article, concluded at Philadelphia, in 1796, shall extend to all the territories belonging to either of the high contracting Powers on the continent of America, (the actual settlements of the Hudson's Bay Company, and the immediate neighborhood of those settlements, always excepted,) situated on either side of any part of the boundary line described in the preceding article, so that all the rights and privileges secured to His Majesty's subjects and to the citizens of the United States by the aforesaid article of the treaty of 1794, as well as by the explanatory article of 1796, shall be enjoyed by them in the aforesaid territories. It is further agreed that goods or merchandise imported, by land or inland navigation, from the territories of the one Power into those of the other, shall not be subjected to other or higher duties when so imported than would be payable for the same goods if imported directly into the said territories from Europe, or from beyond the seas, and, therefore, that the value of the said goods and merchandise shall be estimated by their respective custom-house officers, in the same manner as if they were so directly imported from Europe or from beyond the seas. It is further agreed that no duties shall be exacted from the traders of either Power for licenses to trade with the Indians for themselves, their servants, or their canoe men, or for passes for their canoes, or for any other purpose whatever. But, if such licenses are required by either Power as a measure of police or internal regulation, they shall be granted by the Power requiring them to the subjects or citizens of the other, without any fee or gratuity, and shall not be withheld from any person demanding them for himself, his servants, or his canoe men, except for some offence committed, or impropriety of conduct on the part of the person for whom the license is demanded. It is further agreed that no restrictions or limitations shall be applied by either Power to the trade of the subjects or citizens of the other Power with the Indians living on its own side of the boundary line, except such limitations and restrictions as a regard to its own safety may, from time to time, compel it to adopt with regard to the trade of its own subjects or citizens.

ART. 8. Whereas it is expedient that the exchange of gypsum, grindstones, and certain other articles of the produce of His Majesty's colonies in North America, and of British manufactures, and British West India produce, to be exported from the said colonies, in return for horses, cattle, grain, provisions, slaves, pitch, tar, turpentine, and certain other articles, the produce of the United States, should be permitted, encouraged, and regulated, by sea, between the subjects of His Majesty and the citizens of the United States: it is agreed that measures shall be taken as speedily as may be for giving a legalized exchange and intercourse for the purposes aforesaid, at such port or ports as shall be fixed, for the vessels of either party, with such fair and equal regulations, restrictions, or extensions, from time to time, as may best promote the said objects, consistently with the respective and essential interests of navigation and trade.

ART. 9. Lastly, This treaty, when the same shall have been ratified by His Majesty and the President of the United States, by and with the advice of their Senate, and the respective ratifications mutually exchanged, shall be binding and obligatory upon His Majesty and upon the said States, and shall be by them respectively executed and observed with punctuality and the most sincere regard to good faith; and it is agreed that the first six articles of this treaty shall be permanent, and that the seventh and eighth articles shall be limited in their duration to ten years, to be computed from the day on which the ratification of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, signed at London on the 31st of December last, shall have been exchanged.

In faith whereof, &c.

ARTICLE 5.

As proposed by the American commissioners.

It is agreed that a line drawn due north or south (as the case may require) from the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods, until it shall intersect the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude, and from the point of such intersection, due west, along and with the said parallel, shall be the dividing line between His Majesty's territories and those of the United States to the westward of the said lake; and that the said line, to and along and with the said parallel, shall form the southern boundary of His Majesty's said territories and the northern boundary of the said territories of the United States: provided that nothing in the present article shall be construed to extend to the northwest coast of America, or to the territories belonging to or claimed by either party on the continent of America to the westward of the Stony mountains.

ARTICLE 5.

As the British commissioners would agree to make it.

It is agreed that a line drawn due north or south (as the case may require) from the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods until it shall intersect the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude, and from the point of such intersection, due west, along and with the said parallel, shall be the dividing line between His Majesty's territories and those of the United States to the westward of the said lake, as far as their said respective territories extend in that quarter; and that the said line shall, to that extent, form the southern boundary of His Majesty's said territories and the northern boundary of the said territories of the United States: provided that nothing in the present article shall be construed to extend to the northwest coast of America, or to the territories belonging to or claimed by either party on the continent of America to the westward of the Stony mountains.

Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

LONDON, May 7, 1807.

We had the honor to receive, on the 27th of last month, your letter of the 18th of March, to which the detailed explanations contained in our letters of the 22d and 25th ultimo render any particular reply unnecessary.

We transmit, enclosed, a statement of the American prize causes for hearing in the High Court of Appeals. That which was forwarded by Mr. Purviance was very hastily prepared by General Lyman, under a misconception of our views, and included only cases in the High Court of Admiralty.

We have the honor to be, with the highest respect and consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servants,
 JAMES MONROE,
 WILLIAM PINKNEY.

JAMES MADISON, Esq., &c.

Mr. Madison to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney.

GENTLEMEN:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 20, 1807.

My letter of March 18th acknowledged the receipt of your despatches and of the treaty signed on the 31st December, of which Mr. Purviance was the bearer, and signified that the sentiments and views of the President, formed on the actual posture of our affairs with Great Britain, would, without any useless delay, be communicated. The subject is accordingly resumed in this despatch, with which Mr. Purviance will be charged. To render his passage the more sure and convenient, he takes it in the sloop of war Wasp, which will convey him to a British port, on her way to the Mediterranean. She will touch also at a French port, probably l'Orient, with despatches for General Armstrong and Mr. Bowdoin, and will afford a good opportunity for any communications you may have occasion to make to those gentlemen.

The President has seen, in your exertions to accomplish the great objects of your instructions, ample proofs of that zeal and patriotism in which he confided, and feels deep regret that your success has not corresponded with the reasonableness of your propositions and the ability with which they were supported. He laments more especially that the British Government has not yielded to the just and cogent considerations which forbid the practice of its cruisers in visiting and impressing the crews of our vessels, covered by an independent flag, and guarded by the laws of the high seas, which ought to be sacred with all nations.

The President continues to regard this subject in the light in which it has been pressed on the justice and friendship of Great Britain. He cannot reconcile it with his duty to our seafaring citizens, or with the sensibility or sovereignty of the nation, to recognise, even constructively, a principle that would expose, on the high seas, their liberty, their lives—every thing, in a word, that is dearest to the human heart, to the capricious or interested sentences which may be pronounced against their allegiance by officers of a foreign Government, whom neither the law of nations nor even the laws of that Government will allow to decide on the ownership or character of the minutest article of property found in a like situation.

It has a great and necessary weight, also, with the President, that the views of Congress, as manifested during the session which passed the non-importation act, as well as the primary rank held by the object of securing American crews against British impressment, among the objects which suggested the solemnity of an extraordinary mission, are opposed to any conventional arrangement, which, without effectually providing for that object, would disarm the United States of the means deemed most eligible as an eventual remedy.

It is considered, moreover, by the President, the more reasonable, that the necessary concession in this case should be made by Great Britain rather than by the United States, on the double consideration, first, that a concession on our part would violate both a moral and political duty of the Government to our citizens, which would not be the case on the other side; secondly, that a greater number of American citizens than of British subjects are, in fact, impressed from our vessels; and that, consequently, more of wrong is done to the United States than of right to Great Britain, taking even her own claim for the legal criterion.

On these grounds the President is constrained to decline any arrangement, formal or informal, which does not comprise a provision against impressments from American vessels on the high seas, and which would, notwithstanding, be a bar to legislative measures such as Congress have thought or may think proper to adopt for controlling that species of aggression.

Persevering, at the same time, in his earnest desire to establish the harmony of the two nations on a proper foundation, and calculating on the motives which must be equally felt by Great Britain to secure that important object, it is his intention that your efforts should be renewed, with a view to such alterations of the instrument signed on the 31st December, as may render it acceptable to the United States.

That you may the more fully understand his impressions and purposes, I will explain the alterations which are to be regarded as essential, and proceed then to such observations on the several articles as will show the other alterations which are to be attempted, and the degree of importance respectively attached to them.

1. Without a provision against impressments, substantially such as is contemplated in your original instructions, no treaty is to be concluded.

2. The eleventh article, on the subject of colonial trade, cannot be admitted, unless freed from the conditions which restrict to the market of Europe the re-exportation of colonial produce, and to European articles the supplies to the colonial market.

3. The change made by the third article, in the provisions of the treaty of 1794, relative to the trade with the British possessions in India, by limiting the privilege to a direct trade from the United States as well as to them, is deemed an insuperable objection.

4. Either an express provision is to be insisted on for indemnifying sufferers from wrongful captures, or at least a saving, in some form or other, of their rights against any implied abandonment.

5. Articles 18 and 19 to be so altered as to leave the United States free, as a neutral nation, to keep and place other helligerent nations on an equality with Great Britain.

6. No such alternative as is presented by the declaratory note on the subject of the French decree of November 21, 1806, will be admissible.

First. The considerations which render a provision on the subject of impressments indispensable have been already sufficiently explained.

Second. The essential importance of the amendment required in the eleventh article results from the extensive effect which the article, if unamended, would have on the system of our commerce, as hitherto carried on with the sanction or acquiescence of Great Britain herself.

It was hoped that the British Government, in regulating the subject of this article, would at least have yielded to the example of its treaty with Russia. It could not have been supposed that a modification would be insisted on, which shuts to our neutral commerce important channels, left open by the adjudications of British courts, and particularly by the principle officially announced by that Government to this, through Mr. King, in the year 1801.

According to that principle and those adjudications, the indirect trade through our neutral ports was as free from enemies' colonies to every other part of the world as to Europe; and as free to such colonies, in the articles of all other countries, as in European articles.

According to the tenor of the article, and the general prohibitory principle assumed by Great Britain, to which it has an implied reference, the productions, both of the continental and of the insular colonies in America, can no longer be re-exported, as heretofore, to any part of Asia or Africa, or even of America, and, consequently, can no longer enter into the trades carried on from the United States to the Asiatic or African shores of the Mediterranean, nor to any of the places beyond the Cape of Good Hope offering a market for them, nor, finally, to any other enemy or neutral colonies in this quarter, to which, in reason as well as according to practice, they ought to be as re-exportable as to the countries in Europe to which such colonies belong.

In like manner, the importations from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, more especially the cotton fabrics of China and India, can no longer be sent, as heretofore, to the West Indies or the Spanish main, where they not only now yield a great profit to our merchants, but, being mixed in cargoes with the produce of this country, facilitate and encourage the trade in the latter. Besides the effect of the article in abridging so materially our valuable commerce, the distinction which it introduces between the manufactures of Europe and those of China and India, is chargeable with evils of another sort. In many cases it might not be easy to pronounce on the real origin of the articles. It is not improbable that supposititious attempts, also, might be occasionally made by the least scrupulous traders. With such pretexts as these, arguing from the abuse made of less plausible ones, the interruptions and vexations of our trade by the greedy cruisers which swarm on the ocean, could not fail to be augmented in a degree not a little enforcing the objection to the article in its present form.

As the prohibitory principle of Great Britain does not extend to the case of a colonial trade usually open, and no judicial decision has professedly applied the principle to such a trade, it is a reasonable inference, that the article will not be so construed as to interfere with the trade of that description, between enemy colonies beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and other countries and ports in that quarter. But, on the other hand, it may not be amiss to guard against a construction of the article that would abolish the rule observed in the prize courts of Great Britain, which, in the case of the Eastern colonies, presumes that these ports were always open, and thereby throws on the captors, instead of the claimants, the disadvantage of proving the fact in question.

It is observable that the duration of this article is limited to the period of the present hostilities, whilst the others are to be in force for ten years; so that if there should be a peace and a renewal of the war, as is very possible, within the latter period, the onerous parts of the bargain would survive a part, in consideration of which they were assumed. Justice and reciprocity evidently require that the more important articles of the treaty should be regarded as conditions of each other, and therefore that they should be co-durable. In this point of view, you will bring the subject under reconsideration, and without making this particular amendment an ultimatum, press it with all the force which it merits. This amendment ought to be the less resisted on the British side, as it would still leave to that side an advantage resulting from the nature of the two great objects to be attained by the United States, namely, the immunity of our crews, and of our neutral commerce, which are connected with a state of war only; whereas, the stipulations valued by Great Britain will operate constantly throughout the period of the treaty, as well in a state of peace as in a state of war.

Whatever term may finally be settled for the continuance of this regulation, it will be proper to retain the clause which saves the right involved in the article from any constructive abandonment or abridgment. Even the temporary modification of the right, as it will stand without the inadmissible restrictions now in the article, is considered as an important sacrifice on the part of the United States to their desire of friendly adjustment with Great Britain. To an admission of the article, with these restrictions, the President prefers the footing promised to the colonial trade, by the deference of Great Britain for the maritime Powers, and by an unfettered right of the United States to adapt their regulations to the course which her policy may take.

That the operation of the article, in its present form, might be more fully understood, it was thought proper to avail the public of the ideas of a citizen of great intelligence and experience with respect to our commerce. His remarks, contained in the paper herewith enclosed, afford a valuable elucidation of the subject. They will suggest, at the same time, some explanatory precautions worthy of attention, particularly in the case of articles, which, paying no duty on importation into the United States, do not fall under the regulation of drawbacks, and in the case of securing by bond, instead of actually paying the duties allowed to be drawn back. It appears by the observations in your letter of January 3d, that the bond was understood, as it surely ought to be, equivalent to actual payment. But this is a point so material, that it cannot be too explicitly guarded against the misinterpretation of interested cruisers, and the ignorance or perverseness of inferior courts.

Third. The necessity of the change required in the third article, in order to secure an indirect as well as direct trade to the British East Indies, will be fully explained by the observations which have been obtained from several of our best informed citizens on the subject, and which are herewith enclosed.

As this latitude of intercourse was stipulated by the thirteenth article of the treaty of 1794, as judicially expounded by the British superior courts; as it was enjoyed by the United States prior to that epoch, and has been always enjoyed, both before and since, by other friendly nations; and as there is reason to believe that the British Government has been at all times ready, since the article expired, to renew it in its original form, it may justly be expected that the inserted innovation will not be insisted on. Should the expectation fail, the course preferred is to drop the article altogether, leaving the trade on the general footing of the most favored nation, or even trusting to the interest of Great Britain for such regulations as may correspond with that of the United States.

Should the negotiation take up the East India article of the treaty of 1794, you will find several amendments suggested in the extracts above referred to, some of which may be attempted with the greater chance of success, as they are harmless, if not favorable to the British system. To these suggestions may be added, a privilege to American vessels of touching at the Cape of Good Hope. The objection to such a stipulation, under the present defeasible title of Great Britain to the Cape, may be obviated by a descriptive provision, not necessarily applicable to it, in the event of its restitution by a treaty of peace, but embracing it, in case the British title should be established by that event. It may be agreed "that vessels of the United States may touch for refreshment at all the ports and places in the possession of Great Britain on or in the African or Asiatic seas."

Fourth. Without a provision, or a reservation, as to the claims of indemnity, an abandonment of them may be inferred from a treaty, as being a final settlement of existing controversies. It cannot be presumed that a precaution against such an inference, in any mode that may be most effectual, can be opposed or complained of. On the contrary, it excites just surprise that so much resistance should be made to indemnifications supported by the clearest rules of right, and by a precedent in a former treaty between the two countries, from which so many other articles have been copied. The only colorable plea for refusing the desired provision, flows from a presumption, not only that the British courts are disposed, but that they are competent, to the purpose of complete redress. Not to repeat observations heretofore made on this subject, an unanswerable one is suggested by the clause in the ——— article of the treaty, annulling the principle, or rather the pretence, that vessels without contraband of war on board, returning from a port to which they had carried articles of that sort, were subject to capture and condemnation. Previous even to this recognition, it had been settled as the law of nations, by the British High Court of Admiralty, that vessels so circumstanced were exempt from interruption. Yet a British order of August, 1803, expressly declares them to be lawful prizes; and it is well known that a number of American vessels have been seized and condemned under that order. Here, then, is a class of wrongs undeniably entitled to redress, and which neither can, nor ever could possibly be redressed in the ordinary course; it being an avowed rule with the prize courts, to follow such orders of the Government as either expounding or superseding the law of nations. Even cases not finally decided would probably be considered as falling under the rule existing at the time of the capture, and consequently be added to this catalogue of acknowledged but unredressed injuries.

Fifth. Articles 18 and 19. An effect of these articles is to secure to British cruisers and their prizes a treatment in American ports more favorable than will be permitted to those of an enemy, with a saving of contrary stipulations already made, and a prohibition of any such in future. As none of our treaties with the belligerent nations (France excepted) stipulate to their cruisers an equality in this respect, and as there are parties to the war with whom we have no treaties, it follows that a discrimination is made in the midst of war between the belligerent nations, which it will not be in the power of the United States to redress.

Weighty considerations would dissuade from such a deviation from a strict equality towards belligerent nations, if stipulated at a time least liable to objection. But it would be impossible to justify a stipulation in the midst of war, substituting for an existing equality an advantage to one of the belligerent parties over its adversaries; and that, too, without any compensation to the neutral, shielding its motive from the appearance of mere partiality. Hitherto the United States have avoided, as much as possible, such embarrassments; and with this view have gratuitously extended to all belligerents the privileges stipulated to any of them. Great Britain has had the benefit of this scrupulous policy; she can, therefore, with the less reason expect it to be relinquished for her benefit.

The last paragraph of the nineteenth article establishes a just principle as to the responsibility of a neutral nation, whose territory has been violated by captures within its limits; but by extending the principle to the two miles added to our jurisdiction by the twelfth article, qualified as that addition is, it is made peculiarly important that an amendment should take place.

Passing by the failure of a reciprocity, either in the terms or the probable operation of the responsibility, the United States seem to be bound to claim from the enemies of Great Britain redress for a hostile act, which such enemies may not have renounced their right to commit within the given space; making thus the United States liable to the one party, without a correspondent liability to them in the other party; and, at the same time, entitling Great Britain to redress for acts committed by her enemies, which she has reserved to herself a right to commit against them.

Should all the other belligerent nations, contrary to probability, concur in the addition of two miles to our jurisdiction, this construction would still be applicable to their armed ships; those unarmed alone being within the additional immunity against British cruisers; and the armed as well as the unarmed ships of Great Britain being expressly within the additional responsibility of the United States.

Sixth. No treaty can be sanctioned by the United States under the alternative presented by the declaratory note on the subject of the French decree of November 21st. It is hoped that the occasion which produced it will have vanished, and that it will not be renewed in connexion with a future signature on the part of Great Britain. The utmost allowable in such a case would be, a candid declaration that, in signing or ratifying a treaty, it was understood on the part of Great Britain, that nothing therein contained would be a bar to any measures, which, if no such treaty existed, would be lawful as a retaliation against the measures of an enemy. And with such a declaration, it would be proper, on the part of the United States, to combine an equivalent protest against its being understood, that either the treaty or the British declaration would derogate from any rights or immunities against the effect of such retaliating measures, which would lawfully appertain to them as a neutral nation, in case no such treaty or declaration existed.

Having given this view of the alterations which are to be held essential, I proceed to notice such others, as, though not included in the ultimatum, are to be regarded as more or less deserving your best exertions. This will be most conveniently done, by a review of the several articles in their numerical order.

The second, fourth, and fifth articles all relate to the trade and navigation between the two countries. The two first make no change in the stipulations of the treaty of 1794. The last has changed, and much for the better, the provisions of that treaty on the subject of tonnage and navigation.

Two important questions, however, enter into an estimate of these articles.

The first is, whether they are to be understood as a bar to any regulations, such as navigation acts, which would merely establish a reciprocity with British regulations. From the construction which seems to have been always put on the same stipulations in the treaty of 1794, it is concluded that no such bar could be created, and, consequently, that the articles are, in that respect, unexceptionable. It may be well, nevertheless, to ascertain that the subject is viewed in this light by the British Government.

The second question is, whether the parties be, or be not, mutually restrained from laying duties, as well as prohibitions, unfavorably discriminating between articles exported to them and like articles exported to other nations.

According to the construction put by the United States on the same clauses in the treaty of 1794, the mutual restraint was applicable to discriminations of both kinds. The British discriminating duties on exports, introduced under the name of convoy duties, and since continued and augmented under other names, were accordingly combated during the existence of the treaty, as infractions of its text. The British Government, however, never yielded to our construction, either in discussion or in practice. And it appears, from what passed in your negotiations on this subject, that the construction which is to prevail admits discriminating duties on exports.

In this point of view, the stipulation merits very serious attention. It cannot be regarded as either reciprocal or fair in principle, or as just and friendly in practice.

In the case of prohibitions, where both Governments are on an equal footing, because it is understood that both have the authority to impose them, neither is left at liberty to exercise the authority.

In the case of duties, where the British Government possesses the authority to impose them, but where it is well known that the authority is withheld from the Government of the United States by their constitution, the articles are silent; and, of course, the British Government is left free to impose discriminating duties on their exports, whilst no such duties can be imposed by that of the United States. How will it be in practice? Stating the exports of Great Britain to the United States at six millions sterling only, the present duty of four per cent. levies a tax on the United States amounting to two hundred and forty thousand pounds, or one million sixty-five thousand six hundred dollars; and there is nothing, whilst the war in Europe checks competition there, and whilst obvious causes must for a long time enfeeble it here, that can secure us against further augmentations of the tribute.

Even under a regulation placing the United States on the footing of the most favored nation, it appears that the British Government would draw into its treasury, from our consumption, three-eighths of the revenue now paid into it by the United States. Such a footing, however, would be material, as giving the United States the benefit of the check accruing from the more manufacturing state of the European nations. But to be deprived of that check by the want of an article, putting us on the footing of the nations most favored by Great Britain, and at the same time deprived of our own checks by clauses putting Great Britain on the commercial footing of the nations most favored by the United States, would, in effect, confirm a foreign authority to tax the people of the United States, without the chance of reciprocity or redress.

The British duty on exports to the United States has another effect, not entirely to be disregarded. It proportionally augments the price of British manufactures re-exported from the United States to other markets, and so far promotes a direct supply from Great Britain by her own merchants and ships. Should this not be the effect of her regulations as now framed, there is nothing that would forbid a change of them, having that for its object.

On these considerations, it is enjoined upon you by the President, to press, in the strongest terms, such an explanation or amendment of this part of the treaty, as will, if possible, restrain Great Britain altogether from taxing exports to the United States, or at least place them on the footing of the most favored nation; or if neither be attainable, such a change in the instrument, in other respects, as will reserve to the United States the right to discriminate between Great Britain and other nations in their prohibition of exports; the only discrimination, in the case of exports, permitted by the constitution. The unwillingness of the President to risk an entire failure of the projected accommodation with Great Britain restrains him from making an amendment of this part of the treaty a sine qua non; but he considers it so reasonable, and so much called for by the opinions and feelings of this country, that he is equally anxious and confident with respect to a compliance on the part of the British Government.

Art. 6. This article, as taking the case of the West India trade out of any general stipulation of privileges granted to other nations, may prove convenient, by disencumbering measures which may be taken against the British monopoly from questions of which that stipulation might otherwise be susceptible.

Art. 7, though to remain, if desired, would be more reasonable without the last paragraph, or with a right only to except places and periods at which the trade of the other party may not be permitted.

Art. 8. This article is framed with more accuracy than the seventeenth, on the same subject, in the treaty of 1794, and is improved by the additional paragraph at the close of it. But as such general stipulations have not been found of much avail in practice, and as it continues to be the wish of the President to avoid, especially at the present juncture, unnecessary confirmations of the principle that a neutral flag does not protect enemies' property, an omission of the article is much preferred, unless it be so varied as to be free from this objection. This may easily be done, by substituting a general stipulation "that, in all cases where vessels shall be captured or detained for any lawful cause, they shall be brought to the nearest or most convenient port, and such part only of the articles on board as are confiscable by the law of nations shall be made prize; and the vessel, unless by that law subject also to confiscation, shall be at liberty to proceed," &c.

There ought to be the less hesitation on the British side in making this change, as the article, in its present form, departs from that of 1794; and there is the more reason on our side for requiring the change, as the addition of "for other lawful cause," after specifying the two cases of enemy's property and contraband of war, is probably valued by Great Britain as supporting her doctrine, and impairing ours, with respect to colonial trade. The only case other than those specified to which the right of capture is applicable is that of blockades, which might have been as easily specified as provided for by such a residuary phrase; and the pretext for appropriating this phrase to the case of the colonial trade would be strengthened by the specific provision, in a subsequent article, for the case of blockades.

It cannot be alleged that the specification of the two cases of enemy's property and contraband of war is necessary to prevent uncertainty and controversy; the United States having sufficiently manifested their acquiescence in these causes of capture. If there be a source of uncertainty and controversy, it is in the expressions "other lawful cause," and "otherwise confiscable;" and this source could not be increased by the change here proposed.

Art. 9. This article is an improvement of that on the same subject in the treaty of 1794, inasmuch as it excepts from the list of contraband tar and pitch, when not bound to a port of naval equipment; and, when so bound, substitutes pre-emption for forfeiture. It has an advantage, also, in the clause renouncing the principle of the British order of June, 1803, against vessels returning from places to which they had carried contraband of war.

On the other hand, it would not have been unreasonable to expect that the British Government would, in a treaty with the United States, have insisted on no stipulation less favorable than her stipulation on the same subject with Russia, especially as the naval stores exported from the United States are equally the growth and produce of the country.

Consistency, again, as well as reason, evidently required that the exception in favor of tar and pitch should have been extended to every species of naval stores equally applicable to other uses than those of war, and destined to places other than those of naval equipment.

Lastly, it is observable that even turpentine and rosin are not included with tar and pitch in the favorable exceptions, though of a character so kindred as to leave no pretext for the distinction.

Neither has the British Government the slightest ground for regarding as a concession the stipulated immunity of a vessel which, on her outward voyage, had carried contraband to a hostile port. The principle asserted by her order on that subject is an innovation against the clearest right of neutrals, as recognised and enforced even by British courts. The very language of the article implies that this is a pretence for the innovation.

These considerations urge a remodification of the article, and they are strengthened by the great dislike of the President to formal recognitions, at this particular moment, of principles combated by some, and unfavorable to all neutral nations. So ineligible, indeed, in his view, is any step tending in the least to retard the progress of these principles, that naval stores are to be left on a stipulated list of contraband in the event only of an inflexible refusal of the British Government to omit them; nor are they to be retained, in any event, without an addition or explanation that will except turpentine and rosin, as well as tar and pitch; there being no plausible motive for the distinction, and the quantity and value of the two former exported from the United States being found, on inquiry, to make them of equal importance with the two latter. It can scarcely be supposed that the British Government will insist on this unwarrantable distinction. It is not, indeed, improbable that it has been a mere inadvertence. Such an inference is favored by the circumstance of your speaking, in your comment on this article, of tar and turpentine as being the two exceptions. Whatever the true state of the case may be, it is thought better to omit a list of contraband altogether than not to include in the exception from it turpentine and rosin, as well as tar and pitch.

Art. 10. The abuse of blockades has been so extravagant, and has produced so much vexation and injury to the fair commerce of the United States, that as, on one hand, it is of great importance to find a remedy, so, on the other, it is the more necessary that the remedy should be such as not itself to admit of abuse. The considerations which reconciled you to the tenor of the article as at least a constructive approach to a solid provision for the case, are allowed the weight which they justly merit; whilst the course which your discussions took is a proof of the exertions which were used to give the article a more satisfactory form.

The failure, however, of the British commissioners to substantiate a favorable construction of the article, by a proper explanatory letter addressed to you, with their reasons for refusing to insert in the treaty a definition of blockade, justify apprehensions that the vague terms which alone were permitted to compose the article would be more likely to be turned against our object by courts and cruisers, and perhaps by a less liberal cabinet, than to receive in practice the more favorable construction which candor anticipated.

The British doctrine of blockades, exemplified by practice, is different from that of all other nations, as well as from the reason and nature of that operation of war. The mode of notifying a blockade by proclamations and diplomatic communications, of what, too, is to be done, rather than of what, in fact, had been done, is more particularly the evil which is to be corrected. Against these nominal blockades the article does not sufficiently close the door. The preamble itself, which refers to distance of situation as a frequent cause of not knowing that a blockade exists, though, in one view, giving the United States the advantage of a favorable presumption, in another view carries an admission unfavorable to our principle, which rests not on the distance of situation, but on the nature of the case, and which consequently rejects, in all cases, the legal sufficiency of notifications in the British mode. The preamble is liable to the remark, also, that it separates our cause from the common one of neutral nations in a less distant situation, and that the principle of it may even be pleaded against us in the case of blockades in the West Indies. These considerations would have been outweighed by the advantage of establishing a satisfactory rule on this subject in favor of our trade; but, without such a provision in the article, it is thought less advisable to retain it than to trust to the law of blockades, as laid down by all writers of authority, as supported by all treaties which define it, and more especially as recognised and communicated to the United States by the British Government, through its minister here, in ——— last; not to mention the influence which the course of events and the sentiments of the maritime nations in friendship with Great Britain may have in producing a reform on this subject.

The last paragraph, though subjecting persons in civil as well as military service of an enemy, to capture in our vessels, may prove a valuable safeguard to ordinary passengers and mariners, against the wrongs which they now frequently experience, and which affect the vessel as well as themselves.

Art. 12. It is much regretted that a provision could not be obtained against the practice of British cruisers, in hovering and taking stations for the purpose of surprising the trade going in and out of our harbors; a practice which the British Government felt to be so injurious to the dignity and rights of that nation, at periods when it was neutral. An addition of two miles, nevertheless, to our maritime jurisdiction, so far as to protect neutral and other unarmed vessels, notwithstanding its want of any thing like a due reciprocity, is not without its value. This value will at the same time be very materially impaired, if the stipulation cannot be liberated from the clause requiring the consent of the other belligerent nations, as necessary to exempt their vessels from search and seizure. None of the other belligerent nations have, in fact, unarmed vessels engaged in our trade, nor are they likely to have any during the war; and these alone could derive advantage from their consent, their armed vessels being expressly excepted. There can be no motive with them, therefore, to agree to the regulation. They would rather be tempted to embarrass it, with a view to continue, as much as possible, vexations which lessen the mutual good will of the parties. And as, by their not agreeing to the regulation, the right is reserved to British cruisers to examine all vessels for the purpose of ascertaining whether they may not belong to a belligerent, the disturbance of our trade might be little diminished within the additional two miles. Besides the mere interruption of a search concerning the vessel, it is hardly to be expected, from the general spirit of cruisers, that the search will not be extended to the cargo; and if the latter should be thus or otherwise found or suspected to be of a confiscable sort, that the temptation to capture would be resisted, the less so, perhaps, as the increased distance from the shore and the increased difficulty of proof would favor the chance of condemnation, or at least countenance courts in their propensity to refuse damages and costs to the claimants.

To secure the advantage promised by this article, the right of search ought to be suppressed altogether, the additional space enjoying in this respect the same immunity as is allowed to the marine league. To this object the President wishes your endeavors to be directed.

I reserve for the seventeenth article another view of the subject, which will claim your attention.

Art. 13. The general provision here copied from the treaty of 1794, though not hitherto found of much effect in controlling the licentiousness of cruisers, and very different from the special rules in favor of neutrals contained in most treaties which touch the subject of search, enters very properly into a comprehensive arrangement between two friendly nations. The introductory sentence alone, which consists of new matter, invites particular notice. The expressions "as the course of the war may possibly permit," and "observing, as much as possible, the acknowledged principles and rules of the law of nations," however favorably intended by the British negotiators, will not improbably be construed into a relaxation of the neutral right in favor of belligerent pleas, drawn from circumstances of which belligerent nations will be the judges. The expressions may easily be so varied as to refer simply to the law of nations for the rule, and to the friendship of the parties for the spirit, according to which the search is to be conducted. If such an amendment should be deliberately rejected by the British Government, it will be a proof of a lurking danger that will recommend an omission of what relates to the subject of search, in preference to retaining it.

Articles 14, 15, and 16, call for no particular observation.

Art. 17. So much of this article as relates to the admission of ships of war would be advantageously exchanged for a general stipulation, allowing on this subject the privilege granted to the most favored nation. It would then be in the power of the United States to limit the number admissible at one time, whereas such an indefinite admission of British ships imposes on our neutrality a like indulgence to the fleets of other nations. Such an alteration of the article is the more reasonable and important, as there will be but little reciprocity in its operation; the United States having but few ships, and the inconveniences from British ships in our ports being much greater than those from our ships in British ports.

The engagement to treat officers of the navy with respect is not only too indefinite to be enforced by penal regulations, but implies a reproachful defect of hospitality and civility. In this light it was viewed during the discussions of the treaty of 1794. The clause probably grew then out of recent complaints, well or ill founded, of disrespectful conduct on some occasion towards British officers. If latter occurrences were to be consulted, it would be a more apt provision now to stipulate for the punishment of naval commanders making insulting and ungrateful returns for the kindness and respect shown them in our ports and towns. The President makes almost a point of excluding this part of the article.

Articles 18 and 19 already noticed.

Art. 20. Considering the great number of British merchants residing in the United States, with the great means of influence possessed by them, and the very few American merchants who reside in Great Britain, the inconvenience which may be incident to such a protracted right, to remain during a state of war, is evidently much greater on our side than on the other. In this view the stipulation is very unequal. The liberal spirit of it is, at the same time, highly commendable. It were only to be wished that the readiness on one side to make sacrifices of this sort, to a spirit which ought to pervade every part of a treaty between the parties, had been less met by an apparent disposition on the other side rather to extort from than to emulate it.

Art. 21 Not agreeable, but not to be an insuperable obstacle.

Art. 22 is altogether proper.

Art. 23. This article granting the privileges of the most favored nation, seems to require explanation, if not alteration. The term "shall continue to be on the footing of the most favored nation," implies that the parties are now on that footing. To look no further, the discrimination between exports from Great Britain to Europe and to the United States is a proof that the fact is otherwise.

But may not the expression be construed into a barrier against laws on the part of the United States, establishing a reciprocity with the British navigation act and West India regulations? It might be impolitic to extend such laws to all other nations, as it would be unjust to extend them to such as had not adopted the restrictive system of Great Britain. And yet a discrimination might be arraigned, as not continuing Great Britain on the same footing with other nations.

The object of this article, so far as it is a legitimate one, would be sufficiently provided for by a mutual stipulation of the privileges in trade and navigation enjoyed by the most favored nation; and such stipulations, moreover, ought in justice to import or imply that where privileges are granted to a third nation in consideration of privileges received, the privileges cannot be claimed under the stipulation without a return of the same or of equivalent privileges. The condition is certainly not without difficulties in the execution, but it avoids a greater evil. Should Spain or France open her colonies to our ships and productions on our granting certain privileges to her trade, these could not be claimed or expected by the most friendly nation who would not pay the price of them.

Arts. 24 and 25 are entirely proper.

Art. 26. It is particularly desirable that the duration of the treaty should be abridged to the term limited in the instructions of the 5th January, 1804.

Having taken this view of the subject with reference to a formal treaty under new modifications, it is necessary to recollect that you were authorized by my letter of February 3 to enter into informal arrangements, and that before the receipt of my letter of March 18 a plan of that sort may have been definitively settled. In such a state of things, it is impossible to do better than to leave your own judgments, aided by a knowledge of circumstances unknown here, and by the sentiments of the President now communicated, to decide how far it may be eligible, or otherwise, to attempt to supersede that informal arrangement, by opening the negotiation herein contemplated.

Should, on another hand, the negotiation be found in the state authorized by my letter of March 18, that is to say, matured provisionally only, and consequently leaving the door open for the experiment now provided for, it must equally remain with your own judgments, guided by a comparison of the terms of the provisional arrangement with the present instructions, to decide how far it may be best to close the former, or to pursue the objects of the latter, with a view, in case of failure, to return to and close the former.

Whatever may be the course recommended by the actual state of things, you will feel the propriety of smoothing the way for it, by the explanations which will best satisfy the British Government that the several steps taken on the part of the United States have proceeded from their solicitude to find some ground on which the difficulties and differences existing between the two countries might be amicably and permanently terminated. You will be equally aware of the importance of transmitting hither as early and as circumstantial information of your proceedings and prospects as opportunities will permit; and will particularly keep in mind the earnest desire of the President to possess in due time every material, preparatory to the communications relating to our affairs with Great Britain, which will be so anxiously expected on the meeting of Congress on the first Monday in December.

Since the contents of this despatch were determined on and mostly prepared, advices have been received of the change which is taking place in the British administration. Composed as the new one is likely to be, or rather is said to be, the event will subject our British affairs to new calculations. The difference in the general complexion ascribed to the politics of the rival parties towards the United States, and the language held by some individuals of the one now entering the cabinet, augur, on one hand, fresh obstacles to a favorable negotiation; on the other hand, however, a less degree of confidence in their own strength than was felt by their predecessors, and a dread of furnishing these with such a topic as might be found in a real or impending collision with this country, may be a powerful control on illiberal dispositions towards it. Another favorable consideration is, that an important member of the new ministry, Lord Hawkesbury, was formerly, as the head of the Foreign Department, the person who negotiated with Mr. King a relinquishment of impressments on the high seas; who made to the same public minister the communications assuring to neutrals a re-exportation of colonial produce unfettered in any respect other than by the condition of its having been landed and paid the ordinary duties; and, finally, who communicated to this Government, through Mr. Merry, the instructions given to the British commanders and courts in the West Indies, in which blockades, and the mode of giving notice of them, were defined in terms liable to no objection. His concurrence, therefore, in an admissible provision on these cardinal points, is due to that consistency which all men value more or less, and to which you will of course appeal, as far as circumstances may invite and delicacy permit. The inducement to touch that string is the greater, as it has not appeared that, in any of the late parliamentary discussions, this nobleman has joined in the unfriendly language held in relation to the neutral and commercial right, of this country. It is to be recollected, also, that Lord Sidmouth was at the head of the administration at the period alluded to, and consequently ought to be induced, by a like regard for his character, to promote the adjustment we claim, in case he should be excepted, as is said to be not improbable, out of the dismissal of his colleagues.

There are considerations, moreover, which cannot be without weight with a prudent cabinet, however composed. They must know that, apart from the obstacles which may be opposed here to the use of British manufactures, the United States, by a mere reciprocation of the British navigation and colonial laws, may give a very serious blow to a favorite system—a blow that would be felt, perhaps, as much too in its example as in its immediate operation. Should this policy be adopted by the United States as it respects the British West Indies, the value of those possessions would be either speedily lost, or be saved not otherwise than by a compliance with the fair reciprocity claimed by this country. It can no longer be unknown to the most sanguine partisan of the colonial monopoly that the necessities of life and of cultivation can be furnished to those islands from no other source than the United States; that immediate ruin would ensue if this source was shut up; and that a gradual one would be the effect of even turning the supplies out of the present direct channel into a circuitous one through neutral ports in the West Indies. In this latter alternative, (the least unfavorable that presents itself,) the produce of this country would be carried probably to a Danish island, with the same mercantile profit and the same employment of our navigation as if carried to the British island consuming it; and would thence be transported to the British island with little advantage to British ships, which would necessarily be sent in ballast, and confined to a sickly climate, whilst the enhanced price of the supplies would be fatal, first to the prosperity, and finally to the existence of those dependencies.

It ought to occur, moreover, to the British Government, that its marine may become as dependent as its colonies on the supplies of the United States. As an auxiliary resource for naval stores, this country must be at all times important to Great Britain. But it will be the sole, and, therefore, an essential one, in case that of the Baltic, and even of the Black Sea, should fail. And it may be justly remarked, that a prohibition of this branch of our exports would be a less sacrifice than that of any other important one, inasmuch as some of the articles of which it consists, being necessary to ourselves, and of an exhaustible nature, make it a problem whether the regulation would not, in itself, accord with our permanent interests.

Lastly, it should not be forgotten that the United States are one of the granaries which supply the annual deficit of the British harvests. The northern part of Europe, the usual concurrent resource, is in a situation that must disable it for some time, whatever the course of events may be, to spare any of its stock of food; nor can any substitute, other than the redundant harvests of the United States, be relied on to make up that deficiency. Add to this prospect the possibility of an unfavorable season requiring enlarged importations of bread from the only source that can furnish it, and the risk of losing this would be an evil which no provident councils would neglect to guard against by any measures equitable in themselves, or even by concessions neither dishonorable nor materially injurious.

On the other hand, Great Britain, having been led by her peculiar system to carry her commercial exclusions and restrictions to the utmost limit permitted by her immediate wants, would find no countervailing resources to be turned against the United States. She could not prohibit the importation of our productions. These are necessities which feed her people, which supply her manufactories, which keep up her navy, and which, by direct and indirect contributions to her revenue and credit, strengthen all her faculties as a great Power. As little could she prohibit the exportation of her manufactures to the United States. This is the last evil she would think of inflicting on herself. If it withheld from us the means of enjoyment, it would take from her own people the means of existence.

Would war be a better resort? That it would be a calamity to the United States is so well understood by them, that peace has been cherished in the midst of provocations which scarcely permitted honor to listen to interest, to reason, or to humanity. War they will continue to avert by every policy which can be reconciled with the essential duties which a nation owes to itself. But what will be the gain and the loss to Great Britain by a choice of this resort? The spoils of our defenceless commerce might enrich her greedy cruisers, and flatter the sentiments of national wealth. A temporary spasm might, at the same time, be produced in the affairs of the United States. But these effects weigh little against the considerations which belong to the opposite scale. To say nothing of the hostile use that might be made against Great Britain of fifty thousand seamen, not less hardy or enterprising than her own, nor of her valuable possessions in our neighborhood, which, though little desired by the United States, are highly prized by her, nor of the general tendency of adding the United States to the mass of nations already in arms against her, it is enough to observe that a war with the United States involves a complete loss of the principal remaining market for her manufactures, and of the principal, perhaps the sole, remaining source of supplies, without which all her faculties must wither. Nor is it an unimportant circumstance, though it seems to have engaged little of her attention, that in the loss would be included all the advantages which she now derives from the neutrality of our flag and of our ports, and for which she could find no substitutes in distributing her manufactures, and even her fish, to their necessary markets, and in obtaining the returns which she wants. The more these collateral advantages are inquired into, the more important will the interest appear which Great Britain has in preserving them.

These are views of the subject, which, though not to be presented to Great Britain with an air of menace or defiance, equally forbidden by respect to ourselves and to her, may find a proper way to her attention. They merit hers as well as ours; and if they ought to promote on both sides a spirit of accommodation, they show at the same time that Great Britain is not the party which has the least interest in taking counsel from them.

Such are the instructions and explanations under which the task is consigned to you, of renewing the discussions with the British Government. The President is well assured that it will be executed with all the advantage which talents and patriotism can contribute; and he is unwilling to believe that that Government will finally prefer, to the reasonable terms proposed, the serious state of things which will be left by a miscarriage of this ulterior appeal to the motives which ought to govern a just and friendly nation. As it is possible, however, that this favorable calculation may not be verified, and it will necessarily remain to be decided whether such a state of things can be obviated by any additional proposition not beyond the justifiable limits of concession, the President has taken the case into his serious deliberation, and has concluded to authorize you, in the event of a rejection of every arrangement already authorized, but in that event only, to admit an article to the following effect:

"It is agreed that, after the term of ——— months, computed from the exchange of ratifications, and during a war in which either of the parties may be engaged, neither of them will permit any seaman, not being its own citizen or subject, and being a citizen or subject of the other party, who shall not have been for two years, at least, prior to that date, constantly and voluntarily in the service, or within the jurisdiction of the parties, respectively, to enter or be employed on board any of its vessels navigating the high seas; and proper regulations, enforced by adequate penalties, shall be mutually established for distinguishing the seamen of the parties, respectively, and for giving full effect to this stipulation."

You will observe that the proposition is so framed as not to comprehend among British seamen those who have been made citizens of the United States, and who must necessarily be so regarded within their jurisdiction and under their flag. This modification of the article cannot produce any real objection on the part of Great Britain: 1. Because the legal prerequisites to naturalization, in the United States, imply, what is sufficiently known, that the number of seamen actually naturalized, or likely to be so, is too small to claim attention in any arrangement on this subject. 2. Because the right of British subjects to naturalize themselves in a foreign trade and navigation, as laid down by the judicial authority of Great Britain, ought to restrain the Government from making a difficulty on this point.—(See Durnford and East's Reports, Wilson vs. Marriatt, and the same case in Bosanquet and Buller's Reports.)

You will observe, also, that the article does not extend to British seamen navigating, not the high seas, but our interior waters. Should the success of the proposition be endangered by this distinction, it may be given up; but it cannot well be supposed of sufficient importance to have that effect. The objection, too, is answered by the consideration, that, as Great Britain would regard the proposed disuse of her seamen as a commutation for her claim to impress them, which is limited to the high seas, the principle of the compromise does not embrace the seamen not employed on the high seas.

If an attempt should be made to bind the United States to deliver up the seamen to Great Britain, instead of excluding them merely from their own service, you are to say at once, that it would be inconsistent with our principles, and cannot be acceded to.

It will occur to you that the period of two years has been chosen in allusion to the period established by Great Britain as sufficiently incorporating alien with British seamen. Her own example, at least, must have weight with her, and the implied appeal to it may be of use in shielding the measure against public prejudices to which the Government may not wish to expose itself.

If the British Government be not predetermined against a friendly adjustment, it is confidently presumed that the concession proposed will not only overcome all obstacles to your success on the essential points, but may be turned to account in promoting the amendment of the other articles.

Should the concession, however, contrary to all expectation, not succeed even as to the essential objects, the course prescribed by prudence will be, to signify your purpose of transmitting the result to your Government, avoiding carefully any language or appearance of hostile anticipations, and receiving and transmitting at the same time any overtures which may be made on the other side with a view to bring about an accommodation. As long as negotiation can be honorably protracted, it is a resource to be preferred, under existing circumstances, to the peremptory alternative of improper concessions or inevitable collisions.

The last suggestion I have to make to you is, that in case of great difficulties in readjusting the multiplied provisions embraced by the treaty of December, particularly those relating to commerce, it may be advisable to simplify the transaction by confining it to the few essential objects, or by not adding more than a few others of least difficulty and most importance. A general article may suffice for the rest, giving reciprocally, in regard to trade and navigation, armed ships and prizes, the privileges of the most favored nation, and leaving for more leisurely and detailed provision whatever further may conduce to the mutual interests, and correspond with the friendly dispositions of the parties. A general stipulation of this sort applied to the subject of commerce would have the advantage to the United States of abolishing and preventing British discriminations on exports, and to Great Britain the like advantage with respect to American discriminations on imports.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

*Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison, Secretary of State.

SIR:

RICHMOND, February 28, 1808.

It appears by your letter of May 20, 1807, which was forwarded by Mr. Purviance to Mr. Pinkney and myself at London, and received on the 16th July, that you had construed several articles of the treaty which we had signed with the British commissioners on the 31st December, 1806, in a different sense from that in which they were conceived by us. As the course we were instructed to pursue by your letter of February 3d, with regard to that treaty, which was confirmed in that of May 20th, was in no degree dependent on our construction of any of its articles, or on the political considerations which induced us to sign it, we deemed it unnecessary to enter into any explanation in reply, either of our construction of its articles, or of the political considerations alluded to. We thought it more consistent with our duty to look solely to the object of our instructions, and to exert our utmost efforts to accomplish it, and we acted in conformity to that sentiment. The result of these efforts was made known by the documents which I had the honor to present to you when I was lately at Washington, being copies of a joint despatch which Mr. Pinkney and I had forwarded by Mr. Rose. We had flattered ourselves that it might have been practicable to obtain the amendments of the treaty which the President desired, as the state of affairs in Europe had become more favorable to such a result, but in that we were disappointed. We found no difficulty in accomplishing the other object, of setting it aside, as we were instructed to do, in case the proposed amendments were not acceded to.

At this time there is no objection to such an explanation that I am aware of, and there are many reasons why it should be given. You will be sensible that, so far as an unfavorable estimate is entertained of that transaction, it must, in the degree, tend to injure those who gave it the sanction of their names, and you will be equally sensible that if the United States are in any degree interested in it, at this time, it must consist in its being viewed in a just, rather than an unfavorable light. In retiring from the station which I have lately held, this is the last act of public and private duty which I have to perform in relation to it. It is to me, in many views, a painful duty, but still it is one which it is highly incumbent on me to execute.

It is far from my desire to compromit Mr. Pinkney, in this letter, in the slightest circumstance. In the management of the business, which was entrusted to us jointly, we acted with the greatest harmony, and exerted our best efforts to accomplish the object of our instructions. I am not aware that, in speaking of any part of the treaty, I shall give it a construction in which he would not concur, but that presumption is founded altogether on what took place between us in the course of the negotiation. To this communication he is not a party, nor, indeed, does he know that such a one will be made. In every view, therefore, it is improper, and would be unjust, that he should be considered as having any concern in it.

The impressment of seamen from our merchant vessels is a topic which claims a primary attention from the order which it holds in your letter, but more especially from some important considerations that are connected with it. The idea entertained by the public, is, that the rights of the United States were abandoned by the American commissioners in the late negotiation, and that their seamen were left, by tacit acquiescence, if not by formal renunciation, to depend for their safety on the mercy of the British cruisers. I have, on the contrary, always believed, and still do believe, that the ground on which that interest was placed by the paper of the British commissioners of November 8, 1806, and the explanations which accompanied it, was both honorable and advantageous to the United States; that it contained a concession in their favor, on the part of Great Britain, on the great principle in contestation, never before made by a formal and obligatory act of the Government, which was highly favorable to their interest; and that it also imposed on her the obligation to conform her practice under it till a more complete arrangement should be concluded to the just claims of the United States. To place this transaction in its true light, and to do justice to the conduct of the American commissioners, it will be necessary to enter at some length into the subject.

The British paper states that the King was not prepared to disclaim or derogate from a right on which the security of the British navy might essentially depend, especially in a conjuncture when he was engaged in wars which enforced the necessity of the most vigilant attention to the preservation and supply of his naval force; that he had directed his commissioners to give to the commissioners of the United States the most positive assurances that instructions had been given, and should be repeated and enforced, to observe the greatest caution in the impressing of British seamen, to preserve the citizens of the United States from molestation or injury, and that immediate and prompt redress should be afforded on any representation of injury sustained by them. It then proposes to postpone the article relative to impressment, on account of the difficulties which were experienced in arranging any article on that subject, and to proceed to conclude a treaty on the other points that were embraced by the negotiation. As a motive to such postponement and the condition of it, it assures us that the British commissioners were instructed still to entertain the discussion of any plan which could be devised to secure the interests of both States, without injury to the rights of either.

By this paper it is evident that the rights of the United States were expressly to be reserved, and not abandoned, as has been most erroneously supposed; that the negotiation on the subject of impressment was to be postponed for a limited time, and for a special object only, and to be revived as soon as that object was accomplished; and, in the interim, that the practice of impressment was to correspond essentially with the views and interests of the United States. It is, indeed, evident, from a correct view of the contents of that paper, that Great Britain refused to disclaim or derogate only from what she called her right, as it also is; that, as her refusal was made applicable to a crisis of extraordinary peril, it authorized the reasonable expectation, if not the just claim, that even in that the accommodation desired would be hereafter yielded.

In our letter to you of November 11th, which accompanied the paper under consideration, and in that of January 3d, which was forwarded with the treaty, these sentiments were fully confirmed. In that of November 11th, we communicated one important fact, which left no doubt of the sense in which it was intended by the British commissioners that that paper should be construed by us. In calling your attention to the passage which treats of impressment, in reference to the practice which should be observed in future, we remarked that the terms "high seas" were not mentioned in it, and added, that we knew that the omission had been intentional. It was impossible that these terms could have been omitted intentionally, with our knowledge, for any purpose other than to admit a construction that it was intended that impressments should be confined to the land. I do not mean to imply that it was understood between the British commissioners and us, that Great Britain should abandon the practice of impressment on the high seas altogether. I mean, however, distinctly to state, that it was understood that the practice heretofore pursued by her should be abandoned, and that no impressment should be made on the high seas, under the obligation of that paper, except in cases of an extraordinary nature, to which no general prohibition against it could be construed fairly to extend. The cases to which I allude were described in our letter of November 11th. They suppose a British ship of war and a merchant vessel of the United States lying in the Tagus, or some other port, the desertion of some of the sailors from the ship of war to the merchant vessel, and the sailing of the latter with such deserters on board, they being British subjects. It was admitted that no general prohibition against impressment could be construed to sanction such cases of injustice and fraud, and to such cases, it was understood, that the practice should in future be confined.

It is a just claim, on our part, that the explanations which were given of that paper by the British commissioners, when they presented it to us, and afterwards while the negotiation was depending, which we communicated to you in due order of time, should be taken into view in a fair estimate of our conduct in that transaction. As the arrangement which they proposed was of an informal nature, resting on an understanding between the parties, in a certain degree confidential, it could not otherwise than happen that such explanations would be given us, in the course of the business, of the views of their Government in regard to it; and if an arrangement by informal understanding is admissible, in any case, between nations, it was our duty to receive those explanations; to give them the weight to which they were justly entitled, and to communicate them to you with our impression of the extent of the obligation which they imposed. It is in that mode only that what is called an informal understanding between nations can be entered into. It presumes a want of precision in the written documents connected with it, which is supplied by mutual explanations and confidence. Reduce the transaction to form, and it becomes a treaty. That an informal understanding was an admissible mode of arranging this interest with Great Britain, is made sufficiently evident by your letter of February 3, 1807, in reply to ours of November 11th, of the preceding year.

Without relying, however, on the explanations that were given by the British commissioners of the import of that paper, or of the course which their Government intended to pursue under it, it is fair to remark on the paper itself, that as by it the rights of the parties were reserved, and the negotiation might be continued on this particular topic, after a treaty should be formed on the others, Great Britain was bound not to trespass on those rights while that negotiation was depending, and in case she did trespass on them in any the slightest degree, the United States would be justified in breaking off the negotiation and appealing to force in vindication of their rights. The mere circumstance of entertaining an amicable negotiation by one party for the adjustment of a controversy, where no right had been acknowledged in it, by the other, gives to the latter a just claim to such a forbearance on the part of the former. But the entertainment of a negotiation for the express purpose of securing interests sanctioned by acknowledged rights, makes such claim irresistible. We were, therefore, decidedly of opinion that the paper of the British commissioners placed the interest of impressment on ground which it was both safe and honorable for the United States to admit; that, in short, it gave their Government the command of the subject for every necessary and useful purpose. Attached to the treaty, it was the basis or condition on which the treaty rested. Strong in its character in their favor on the great question of right, and admitting a favorable construction on others, it placed them on more elevated ground in those respects than they had held before, and, by keeping the negotiation open to obtain a more complete adjustment, the administration was armed with the most effectual means of securing it. By this arrangement the Government possessed a power to coerce without being compelled to assume the character belonging to coercion, and it was able to give effect to that power without violating the relations of amity between the countries. The right to break off the negotiation and appeal to force could never be lost sight of, in any discussion on the subject, while there was no obligation to make that appeal till necessity compelled it. If Great Britain conformed her practice to the rule prescribed by the paper of November 8th, and the explanations which accompanied it, our Government might rest on that ground with advantage; but if she departed from that rule, and a favorable opportunity offered for the accomplishment of a more complete and satisfactory arrangement, by a decisive effort, it would be at liberty to seize such opportunity for the advantage of the country. These considerations, founded on a view of the proposed arrangement itself, furnished strong inducement to us to proceed to the other objects of the negotiation. There were other considerations of a different character which recommended it with still greater force. Had we refused to proceed in the negotiation, what was the alternative which such a refusal presented to our view? The negotiation would have been at an end, after having failed in all its objects: for if this interest was not arranged, none others could be. The attitude which the Governments held towards each other was, in a certain degree, hostile. Injuries had been inflicted by one party and resentment shown by the other; the latter having taken a step in the case of the non-importation law which was intended to vindicate the public rights and honor, by being made the means of obtaining a redress of those injuries. The measure was intended for the ministry of Mr. Pitt, from which the injuries were received, but by the removal of that ministry, and the delay which took place in the passage of the law, it came into operation against the ministry of Mr. Fox and Lord Grenville, who would not have rendered those injuries, and against whom, of course, such a weapon would not have been raised.

Notwithstanding the existence of that law, and the attitude which still remained between the Governments, it was impossible to appeal to it as a strong motive of action with the new ministry. Such an appeal was sure to produce more harm than good. It would have lost us all claim on the generous feelings and liberal policy which the new ministry was believed to indulge, and disposed to adopt towards the United States.

The negotiation, therefore, with the new ministry was conducted by policy as well as by inclination on friendly and conciliatory principles. Should it fail, however, in its object, and be broken off, the relation between the parties would change in an instant. From that moment the new ministry would stand on the ground of the old one, and the nation be united in all its political parties against us. The attitude would become, in fact, what the exterior announced it to be—hostile; and it was difficult to perceive how it could be changed, and peace be preserved, with honor to the United States. They could not recede from the ground which they had taken, or accept, by compulsion, terms which they had rejected in an amicable negotiation. War, therefore, seemed to be the inevitable consequence of such a state of things; and I was far from considering it an alternative which ought to be preferred to the arrangement which was offered to us. When I took into view the prosperous and happy condition of the United States, compared with that of other nations; that, as a neutral Power, they were almost the exclusive carriers of the productions of the whole world; and that in commerce they flourished beyond example, notwithstanding the losses which they occasionally suffered, I was strong in the opinion that those blessings ought not to be hazarded in such a question. Many other considerations tended to confirm me in that sentiment. I knew that the United States were not prepared for war; that their coast was unfortified, and their cities in a great measure defenceless; that their militia in many of the States were neither armed nor trained; and that their whole revenue was derived from commerce. I could not presume that there was just cause to doubt which of the alternatives ought to be preferred. Had it, however, been practicable to terminate the negotiation without such an adjustment as that proposed, and without taking any decisive measure in consequence of its failure, what was to become of the non-importation law? If suffered to remain in force, it was sure to produce war. Great Britain, it was known, would enter into no arrangement by treaty which did not provide for its repeal; and there was little reason to presume, after the rupture of the negotiation, by which the relation between the parties would be less friendly, that she would become more accommodating. It was, on the contrary, fairly to be concluded that, if any arrangement whatever should be practicable, it would be a less advantageous one than that which we had sanctioned. Some disposition of it was therefore indispensably necessary in any course which might be taken.

These considerations had much weight in deciding that which was pursued, and I frankly own that a sincere desire to afford to the administration an honorable opportunity for its repeal, since, under existing circumstances, it did not seem probable that it could be longer useful, and might be injurious, was a strong motive with me to incur the responsibility which I took on myself in that transaction. To the arrangement proposed we gave our sanction. We undertook to submit it to the consideration of our Government, taking care to inform the British commissioners that we had no power to conclude a treaty that would be obligatory on the United States, which did not arrange in a satisfactory manner the interest of impressment. We agreed also to proceed in a discussion of the other objects of the negotiation, and eventually concluded a treaty, it being understood, from what we had frequently stated, that, if our Government should disapprove the arrangement relative to impressment, the whole would fall with it. Thus, the United States enjoyed the advantage of being at liberty to accept or reject the arrangement, while on the British Government it was binding. With one party it was a project; with the other a treaty. There was, in truth, nothing unreasonable in this circumstance, as the British commissioners acted in presence of the cabinet, consulted and took its instruction on every point; while our distance from our Government rendered such a recurrence to it impossible. This advantage, however, proceeded from the nature of the transaction; it was not the effect of finesse on our part. We advanced in the negotiation, and concluded a treaty in a firm belief that, although it fell short of what we had expected to obtain, it was nevertheless, in the then state of affairs, such a one as the United States might adopt with credit and advantage. I have no doubt that the British commissioners entertained still greater confidence in such a result. The circumstance of our finally agreeing to sanction the arrangement, rather than break off the negotiation, at which issue we had frequently stood in the progress of it, was calculated to make that impression. But it was much strengthened by a knowledge that the whole arrangement would expose them to very severe and probably successful attacks from the opposition, while they had no expectation that it would be popular in the country.

By your letter of February 3, 1807, in reply to ours of November 11, 1806, the course which the Government resolved to pursue was announced. By it we were informed that the President disapproved the informal arrangement proposed by the British commissioners relative to impressment, and was resolved to enter into no treaty with the British Government which, when limited to or short of strict right on every other point, should include in it no article on that particular one; that, in case such an article could not be obtained, we should terminate the negotiation without any formal compact whatever, but with a mutual understanding, founded on friendly and liberal discussions and explanations, that in practice each party would entirely conform to what should be thus informally settled between them; and we were authorized to give assurances, in case such an arrangement should be satisfactory in substance, that, as long as it should be respected in practice, particularly on the subjects of neutral trade and impressment, the President would earnestly, and probably successfully, recommend it to Congress not to permit the non-importation law to go into operation; and, in the mean time, that he would exercise the power vested in him by an act of Congress, if no intervening intelligence forbade it, of suspending its operation till the meeting of Congress, who, being in session, would have an opportunity to make due provision for the case; and finally, that, if a treaty which did not provide for the interest of impressment should have been concluded before the receipt of that letter, we should candidly apprise the British commissioners of the reasons why it would not be ratified, and invite them to enter again on the business with a view to such a result as was desired.

By this letter the arrangement which we had sanctioned, comprising the informal one relative to impressment, and that by treaty on the other topics, was rejected, and, in lieu of it, we were instructed to enter into an informal understanding or arrangement of the whole subject, and, as was to be inferred from the fair import of the letter, on the same conditions. It was the more to be presumed that the Government was willing to accept, in the mode which it proposed, the conditions which we might be able to obtain in the other, from the consideration that the latter were under its view at the time the instructions were given by the paper of the British commissioners of November 8th, and our letter of the 11th, and the certainty with which it, as well as we, must have been impressed, that more favorable could not be expected.

In defending myself against the imputation of having sacrificed the rights of our seamen, I shall be permitted to derive support from the conduct of the Government itself in the same interest. Under that impression, I have to remark that I consider the conduct of the Government as furnishing the most ample vindication of that of the American commissioners. The Government was equally willing to enter into some arrangement which should preserve the peace of the country, although it should not accomplish the object which had been so ardently desired. The only difference between the plan which we sanctioned and that which it proposed was, that the whole arrangement should be informal. Had the administration resorted to war as a preferable alternative, or been willing to leave the business unsettled, its policy and example might have been pleaded against us; but, in offering to accept the same conditions in an informal mode, and to withdraw, in some form, the non-importation law as a motive to it, it showed that the considerations which had been respected by us had as much weight with it.

But the conduct of the administration furnishes other strong arguments in favor of the arrangement proposed by the American commissioners. By engaging to observe the informal arrangement which we were instructed to enter into, as long as Great Britain should observe it, it seemed as if the United States would be deprived of the right of insisting on other terms however favorable the opportunity for it might be, while Great Britain would be at liberty to depart from such arrangement whenever the events of war furnished her an adequate motive for it. This was the opposite of our arrangement as I have stated above, by which, as we presumed, she would be bound, and we free. Certainty to our merchants was all important. Any fair, well defined rule, within which they might prosecute in safety their enterprises, although it might fall short, in some respects, of our just claims, might perhaps be preferable to frequent collisions which put every thing at hazard. In any event it was an object of great importance to keep the peace of the country in our own hands, by retaining the right to resort to war when it suited us, and then only.

I will now proceed to the other topics, which are adverted to in your letter of May 20, 1807, and on which I shall be as concise as possible. In your examination of the treaty, you notice several of primary importance, which you conceive to have been improperly arranged in the articles which refer to them. I will pursue, in my remarks, the order which you have traced.

You consider the eleventh article as objectionable in having shut to our commerce important channels which were left open to it, by the decisions of the British courts, and the principles contained in the communications from Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. King. In support of that opinion you observe, that, as the article stipulates that the United States may carry the manufactures and productions of Europe from their own ports to any colony of the enemies of Great Britain, they are prohibited by it from carrying the manufactures or productions of the countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, in like manner, to such colonies. You observe also, that as the United States are authorized to carry from their own ports the productions of enemy colonies to Europe, they are prohibited from carrying those productions to the southern coasts of the Mediterranean, or beyond the Cape of Good Hope, or to any other enemy or neutral colonies in this quarter.

I am persuaded that you will be satisfied, on further consideration, that this construction of that article is unfounded. It is not the object of the article to regulate the general commerce of the countries, or to compromise their claims in any case to which the regulation does not explicitly extend. The regulation prescribed by it applies to a case of controversy between the parties, in a point of immediate contact, and it was the object of the article to adjust the controversy in that point. If we advert to the issue which was made up between them, as clearly defined by the orders of the British Government, the decisions of the Courts of Admiralty under them, and the discussions which took place between the Governments on the subject, we shall find that in no view can the construction, which you impute to the article, be supported.

The issue lately made up between the parties involved solely the question, what circumstances or acts, to be performed in the neutral country, were necessary to break the continuity of a voyage from the colony of an enemy to its parent country, or some enemy country in Europe? This point had been settled, as was presumed, by former decisions of the British Courts of Admiralty, and explanations of the British Government, in a manner which was so far satisfactory to the United States, as to justify a belief that if those decisions and explanations had been adhered to, the existing controversy on this subject would not have arisen. But in 1805 the British Courts of Admiralty insisted on the performance of new acts in the United States, or what amounted to the same thing, extended by construction the doctrine of former decisions in such a manner as to make the performance of new acts, such too as were of a nature highly onerous and oppressive, indispensably necessary. On this special point, the parties were at issue, and the sole object of the article was to adjust, by temporary arrangement, the controversy on that point. The rights of the parties, in every other instance, not within the scope of the adjustment, were to remain of course untouched, and in that particular one, to revive at the expiration of the term limited for the duration of the article.

A concise analysis of the several orders of the British Government, relative to the trade of neutral Powers with enemy colonies will place in a clear point of view the ground of the controversy between the parties and the precise object and effect of the regulation, proposed by the article under consideration. The first order bears date on the 6th November, 1793. It directed the British cruisers to bring in for lawful adjudication all vessels laden with goods, the produce of any colony of France, or carrying provisions or supplies for such colony. That order amounted in express terms to a declaration of war against the neutral Powers, and it was issued in that spirit by the British Government. The policy, however, which dictated the order did not last long; events soon produced a change of policy, and with it a revocation, or to use the technical phraseology of the Admiralty, a relaxation of the order. The second order was of the 8th January, 1794. It directed the cruisers "to bring in all vessels laden with goods, the produce of the French West India Islands, and coming directly from any port of the said islands to any port in Europe." This order being directory prescribed the case in which neutral vessels engaged in such a trade should be seized, and thereby confined the seizure to that case only. No vessel engaged in that trade which did not come within the scope of the order could be touched. Thus the effect of the order was to inhibit the direct trade of the United States, between enemy colonies and Europe, in the productions of those colonies. It left the trade free between the United States and enemy colonies and between the United States and Europe, and of course every other country. It left it free also in the direct line between enemy colonies and Africa and Asia. By confining the restriction to Europe, those countries were necessarily exempted from its operations. The third order of the 25th January, 1798, directed the cruisers to "bring in all vessels laden with cargoes, the produce of any island of France, Spain, or Holland, and coming directly from any port of the said islands or settlements to any port in Europe, not being a port of Great Britain, nor of the country to which such ships, being neutral, belonged." The sole effect of this order was to extend to the neutral Powers of Europe the accommodation which had been yielded to the United States by that of 8th January, 1794. The next order bears date on the 24th June, 1803. It directs the cruisers not to seize any vessel which shall be carrying on trade directly between the colonies of the enemies and the neutral country to which the vessel belongs, and laden with the property of inhabitants of such neutral country, provided such vessel shall not be supplying, nor have supplied, the enemy on the outward voyage with any articles of contraband of war, &c." The sole object of this order appears to have been to introduce a new rule relative to contraband, by subjecting a vessel to seizure on that account, on her return voyage after depositing her cargo at her place of destination. It prohibits the seizure of neutral vessels, European as well as American, engaged in a trade between enemy colonies and the neutral countries, by positive inhibition. That trade had been left free before, by the restriction of the seizure to vessels engaged in the direct trade between enemy colonies and the parent country. It was now secured by positive inhibition. The right to carry on the trade from the neutral country to other countries, was left on the ground on which it stood before. That this order was not intended to affect that trade, and did not affect it, is made sufficiently evident by many decisions of the Courts of Admiralty which have been given since the order was issued. In proof of this, I refer to all the cases that were decided by the British Courts of Admiralty, touching the trade of neutrals with enemy colonies, in the years 1805 and 1806, and more especially to that of the William, Trefrey, it being the last one, and containing a summary of the whole doctrine.

If we recur to the decisions of the courts themselves, we shall find a full confirmation of what is here advanced. We shall find that in conforming their decisions to the spirit of the orders of the Government, they inhibit the direct trade only between the colony and the parent country, or some other country of Europe; that they do not call in question the trade between neutral Powers, in the productions of enemy colonies, after those productions were allowed to have been incorporated into the stock of the country; that they gave recent and high offence only by the new doctrines advanced on this latter point, which, by assuming to investigate the motives of the parties engaged in the trade, and to reject acts which were before deemed satisfactory by decisions the most solemn, and to impose new conditions the most onerous and oppressive, laid that commerce completely at the mercy of British tribunals. The most material cases are those of the Immanuel, which involved the question of a trade between Bordeaux and St. Domingo, that is, the direct trade between the parent country and its colony, in which the goods were condemned on that account, [Robin. Rep. vol. 2, page 186.] and of the Polly, Lasky, in which the vessel was taken on a voyage from Marblehead to Spain, charged with the productions of the Havana, brought to Marblehead by the same vessel. In this case the question of continuity of voyage was involved, and the court decided in favor of the American claim, on ground that gave no offence. It was admitted, in explicit terms by the judge, that an American had a right to import the produce of the Spanish colonies into his own country, and to carry them on thence to the general commerce of Europe, and that the landing of the cargo and payment of the duties would be sufficient criteria of a bona fide importation, [2 Rob. Rep. p. 361.] The next cases were those of the Essex, Orme, of the Rowhena, and some others of the same kind in 1805, which turned on the point of continuity of voyage, in which the court, pushing its doctrine to the unjust and pernicious extent complained of, produced the controversy which took place between the two countries. The communication between Mr. King and Lord Hawkesbury is of the same character. The Advocate General admits in his report, which was adopted by Lord Hawkesbury and communicated by him to Mr. King, that by the relaxation of the general principle respecting the trade with enemy colonies, it was distinctly understood, and had been repeatedly so decided by the Court of Appeal, that the produce of enemy colonies might be imported into the neutral country and re-exported thence even to the mother country of such colony; and in the like manner that the produce and manufactures of the mother country might be carried to its colonies. He states that the direct trade between the mother country and its colonies had not been recognised as legal; that what amounted to an intermediate importation into the neutral country might sometimes be a question of difficulty; that the mere touching in the neutral country to take fresh clearances, might perhaps be deemed evasive, and in effect the direct trade; but that the High Court of Admiralty had expressly decided, (and he saw no reason to expect that the Court of Appeal would vary the rules,) that landing the goods, and paying the duties in the neutral country, would break the continuity of the voyage, and was such an importation as would legalize the trade, although the goods were re-shipped in the same vessel, on account of the same proprietors, and were forwarded for sale to the mother country of the colony.

This communication corresponds in every the minutest circumstance with the spirit of the orders and decisions of the courts, as above explained. It insists, and in terms that are far from being positive, that the direct trade only between the mother country and the colony was inhibited. It admits, that the trade through the neutral country to the mother country of the colony was lawful, and fixes, with great precision, the acts to be performed in the neutral country, which would be sufficient to incorporate the goods into the stock of the country, and break the continuity of the voyage. In the latter part of the report alluded to, the Advocate General seems to make a kind of reservation of the right of the Court of Appeal to revise the decisions of the High Court of Admiralty, which he represents to have settled the doctrine. But he makes that reservation, if, indeed, it was intended as one, in such terms as to preclude the idea that it would ever be taken advantage of, especially when it is considered that the report was adopted by the Government, and communicated officially by the Secretary of State to a foreign minister. It is certain, however, that through the Court of Appeal the new encroachment on the rights of the United States was made, which produced the controversy which ensued immediately afterwards.

The discussion which took place between Lord Mulgrave and myself, in 1805, on the subject of the seizures then made, treated the encroachment in that line as the special cause of complaint on the part of the United States. Although the British pretension to inhibit even the direct trade had not been countenanced by the Government, yet the commerce of the United States had been made, in a certain degree, to accommodate with it by the merchants. They were content to decline the direct trade, and to prosecute their enterprises through the United States, equally with the mother country and its colonies. It was natural, in the course of a controversy which involved such important interests, that the rights of the parties should be taken up on principle and carried to the greatest extent. To the light thrown upon the subject, by a very able essay which I received from you, I was much indebted, and I acknowledge, in this communication, the aid which it afforded me with peculiar satisfaction. A vindication, however, of the cause, on principle, however extensive the range may be, could not affect the origin of the controversy, nor give to the article entered into for its adjustment a construction different from that which, by well-established rules, is fairly applicable to it.

From this view of the several orders of the British Government, and from the exposition given of them by the courts and by the Government itself, it appears, that the sole object of those that were issued after that of 6th November, 1793, was to inhibit the direct trade of the United States between enemy colonies and Europe; that they did not touch and were not intended to interfere with the trade between the United States and Europe, even the parent country, and a fortiori between the United States and Asia and Africa. It was, indeed, the object of the order of November 6, 1793, to suppress the commerce of neutral Powers with enemy colonies altogether; but that being abandoned, the next idea that occurred was to embarrass that trade, by forcing it through neutral countries. Here, then, arose a new question, which turned entirely on another principle; that a neutral Power had a right to carry on trade, from its own ports, in any articles, though of foreign produce, which had been incorporated into the stock of the country, not contraband of war, and to all countries, was not controverted. That point, otherwise clear and indisputable in itself, had been long settled by the highest tribunals, and by the most eminent jurists in England. The circumstances which constituted such an incorporation of foreign articles into the stock of the country, had also been settled by the same authorities; still, the question which now arose turned on this latter point. In forcing this commerce through neutral ports with a view to embarrass it, it became necessary (to give the greatest effect to that expedient) to increase the difficulties in those ports, which was done in the manner already stated.

If the instructions of the British Government did not inhibit the trade in question, the adjustment contained in the article under consideration could not affect it. That article supposes a difference between the parties, relative to a trade with enemy colonies, and the instructions which interfere with it. The article could not operate on any trade to which the instructions did not extend, and concerning which there was no controversy. In the present case the conclusion is the more irresistible, because there did not exist even a possibility of controversy in regard to that trade.

But it is inferred that, because it is stipulated that the produce of enemy colonies may be carried to Europe from the United States, that the ports of Asia and Africa are shut on them; and, that because it is stipulated that the manufactures of Europe may be carried from the United States to the West Indies, that those of Asia and Africa are prohibited from being carried there. This objection has been already obviated. Had the instructions of the British Government inhibited that trade, and a controversy between the Governments arisen from the inhibition, as the article does not extend to the case, the most that could have been inferred would have been, that it was unprovided for, and that the rights of the parties would remain in the same state respecting it, as if the article had not been entered into. It is easy to explain the cause why the term "Europe" was introduced into the article, in reference to the ports to which colony produce might be carried, and "European," in reference to the manufactures which might be carried to enemy colonies, and to show that they were adopted with a view to open, on the widest scale, the ports which had been at any time shut on them by the British orders. Although the policy of these orders, as well as of the principle on which they are founded, is more particularly applicable to the direct trade between enemy colonies and their mother country, yet as the term "Europe" had been adopted in the modifications that were made in them, first, at the instance of the United States; and afterwards at that of the neutral European Powers, as the widest scale within which the inhibition operated, it was thought best to use that term to prevent the possibility of mistake, as to the extent of the adjustment. Had terms of more extensive import been adopted, they could not have been more effectual to the object, while they might have tended to enlarge the sphere of British pretensions, by extending it to cases to which it would be highly improper to give a sanction.

But it is supposed that, although the orders of the British Government may not have inhibited this trade, it is comprised in the general inhibition of the British principle. If the British principle inhibits such a trade, which I do not admit, it does not follow that a sanction to that inhibition is given by this article, for reasons already stated. If the provision of the article does not extend to that trade, the rights of the parties cannot be affected by it. They remain equally in force against the principle as against the instructions, had they inhibited it. But the claim to an exemption from that trade, from the operations of the British principle, rests on still stronger ground, admitting that it ever extended to it, which, however, I am far from admitting. It can be shown that the orders themselves take it completely from within the scope of that principle. By instructing the cruisers to seize vessels engaged in a particular trade, every other trade is allowed. It is in that mode, that what is called a relaxation of the British principle, is effected. The order reduces the principle to its own standard, or, in other words, becomes the principle itself. If this doctrine is not true, it is impossible to designate in what mode the relaxation, which is universally admitted of the British principle, is wrought; or to prove that there has been any relaxation of it whatever. If the orders have not that effect, of what avail are they? That they have that effect is proved by the decisions of the courts, and the practice under them. I am aware of the broad doctrine held by the courts on this subject, but that doctrine, necessarily ambiguous, from the dilemma in which the courts were placed by the inconsistent orders of the Government, if not reconcilable to this construction, (as I think it is, when the whole subject is taken into view,) is contradicted by the decisions of the same courts, and the explanations of the Government itself.

I say that this trade is not inhibited by the British principle, because it supposes a trade between enemy colonies and the mother country. But a trade between the United States and Asia and Africa, let the subject of it be what it may, is not a trade of that kind. It is a trade with independent Powers, at peace with Great Britain, with whom we have a right to trade, by all the rules which Great Britain has at any time insisted on. It would be of dangerous tendency to admit that Great Britain had a pretension to interfere with such a trade in any case. After the goods are received into the United States, no matter of what articles they consist, or from what quarter they came, they are the property of the country, and may, of right, be shipped to any other country. The British principle does not controvert this doctrine; it asserts, in its widest range, the right only to seize them on their route to the neutral country, and from it to the mother country of the colony, or some other enemy country of Europe, provided they be not incorporated into the stock of the neutral country. If they are, they may go under the arrangement made to the countries to which the British principle applies; but they require no sanction from the British Government to go to those to which it does not apply. The destination of the vessel alone would, as I presume, dispel every doubt of the legality of the trade, and preclude all further inquiry concerning it. The question of continuity of voyage could never arise in such a case. It is certain, that the arrangement alluded to gives no sanction to it, and for the best of all reasons, that the trade was not admitted, or even contended to be comprised, within the range of British principle.

I shall close my remarks on this point by observing, that as the arrangement of the acts to break the continuity of the voyage from the United States to the parent country, and other enemy countries of Europe, in the produce of their colonies, and from the United States to those colonies, in the manufactures of Europe, is confined strictly to that object; the rights of the parties remain unimpaired in every other circumstance relative to that trade; that, as the article contains no stipulation against the direct trade from the colony to the parent country, the right to carry on even that trade is not necessarily suspended by it; that if, in any view, it can be considered as suspended, it is by implication arising out of the whole transaction, rather than from the stipulation itself. How much stronger, then, is the conclusion already drawn from other premises, that nothing is to be deduced from that article to justify the construction which has been imputed to it.

The remarks above made refer more particularly to a trade between the United States and Europe in the produce of enemy colonies. They are, however, equally applicable to the other objection stated in your letter, of a trade between the United States and enemy colonies in the produce or manufactures of Africa or Asia. None of the orders alluded to inhibit that commerce, and it is most certain that the article alluded to gives no sanction to such a pretension.

As to the conditions by which it is agreed to break the continuity of the voyage, I have to observe that they are as favorable as you had expected. We were authorized to stipulate, if better conditions could not be obtained, that the goods should be landed, the duties paid, and the ship changed. We stipulated only that the goods should be landed and the duty paid, making the duty on European goods one per cent., and on colony productions two. By exempting the party from the necessity of changing the ship, an important advantage was certainly secured. By fixing the duty at one per cent. in the one instance, and at two in the other, it was not possible that the slightest embarrassment should be thrown in the way of the trade. The duty payable on manufactures consumed in the country is about fifteen per cent., and on West India productions twenty-five; the trifling amount made payable to the country on the re-exportation of the articles could not be felt by the merchant; it would fall on the European consumer. It could not be felt as a heavy imposition on the trade itself; our only competitor in it would be Great Britain, whose merchants would labor under the disadvantages incident to war in a thousand shapes, more especially as the ports of the whole continent would be shut on them, in not being able to get their goods into those ports otherwise than by smuggling them, a mode which could not fail to be onerous if it succeeded, but which was likely to fail in most cases. It should be remembered, also, that the increased duties which would accrue to the country would tend in the highest degree to interest the whole community in support of a commerce in which the commercial part was most materially interested. It is the policy of the European Powers having colonies in the West Indies to make the parent country the entrepôt of the productions of the colonies. Is not that policy worthy the attention and imitation of the United States, in respect to the trade of the colonies in question? The duty received would make some recompense to the nation for the expenses incurred and sums expended in supporting our right to that trade. Besides, by making the ports of the United States the entrepôts for such productions, the country in general would derive some advantage from the measure. Every ship engaged in the commerce which entered an American port would bring something to and take something from it. The vast amount of Asiatic, European, and West India articles brought to our markets would cheapen the price of those articles at home; and each ship, while in port, and in the prosecution of her voyage, would require supplies in provision and other articles, which would raise the price of those articles, to the great advantage of the general interest of the country.

The limitation of the article to the term specified was a condition which we presumed might prove advantageous to the United States, while it could not possibly injure them. It is expressly stipulated that the right of both parties shall revive at the expiration of the term. Those of the United States, therefore, would then be in force, and to the full extent of their pretensions, in the same manner as if the stipulation had not been entered into. In another war they might insist on conditions which this stipulation did not secure; and if Great Britain did not yield to their demand, they might resort to any expedient to compel her which the wisdom of their councils might dictate. Any encroachment on the part of Great Britain on their rights, as heretofore contended for, might be considered by their Government an act of hostility, and treated accordingly. The least favorable conditions that she could offer would be those already settled, which the United States might accept or reject, as they thought best. As a youthful, prosperous, and rising nation, it could not be doubted that in the next war their situation would be more imposing than in the present one. The presumption is, that they would be able then to obtain better conditions than at present.

On the third article I have to observe, in addition to what is stated in our joint letter of January 3, 1807, that nothing would have been more easy than to have omitted any provision on the subject of it, and to have placed that trade on the footing of the most favored nation. To obtain better terms by treaty was utterly impossible. We were much inclined to omit any provision on the subject, because we were aware that the arrangement made would fall short of the expectation of our Government and country, and most probably subject us to censure. We acceded to that arrangement from a conviction that it secured us better terms than we should be likely to enjoy if left to depend on the pleasure of the British Government, stimulated as we knew that was to restrict us in it by the India Company and other interests of the country. It is impossible to conceive too high an idea of the jealousy which is entertained of the United States in a commercial view by that Government, and of the danger with which it thinks Great Britain is menaced by their extraordinary prosperity and rapid growth. The boldness of the projects, and the activity and ability with which they are prosecuted by our merchants and mariners, excite the admiration of Europe. Great Britain has seen that, wherever our citizens gained a foothold, they never lost it. Without distrusting her own means, or the hardness and activity of her people, she finds that our own position, remote from Europe, contiguous to the West Indies and the southern continent, and as near to India as herself, gives us advantages against which she cannot cope. The effort which we made and persevered in for several months to gain admission into British India on more favorable terms, and the disposition which was shown by the British commissioners to yield, excited a sensation (or, more properly speaking, an alarm) in the Board of India Directors, and of the commercial people in general, even among those who had no particular interest in the question, which was extremely obvious. Had we made no provision in the treaty to secure our admittance into India on certain conditions, we had much reason to believe that that commerce would have been fettered to an extreme degree, and in every form.

We were extremely anxious to provide that our citizens might make their shipments from Europe, to take specie from Spain and Portugal, goods from England, &c., and that they might touch at the Cape of Good Hope, at the Isle of Bourbon, at the Mauritius, &c.; that they might carry on the coasting trade in India, and be permitted to pass from Calcutta to China. These advantages were insisted on; but the pressure which we made produced reports from the Board of Directors, at the instance of the Government, and from political men conversant in these topics, which fixed the Government in its decision not to grant them. I repeat, however, that it would have been easy to have omitted the regulation from the treaty, and placed the trade on the footing of the most favored nation, as it would have been at any time afterwards had the state of affairs in other respects permitted it.

By your instructions, a provision in favor of indemnity was not made an indispensable condition of a treaty. We were authorized to conclude one without it; we were therefore persuaded that the ground on which that interest was placed could not fail to be approved. The arrangement which we made authorized a just claim to expect a dismissal of all the causes that were depending in the Courts of Admiralty, and even to an indemnity in the cases of condemnation. The documents which we forwarded to you in our joint letter of — give a full view of this subject, and to them I beg to refer.

Your fifth objection applies to the eighteenth and nineteenth articles of the treaty, and, in the first instance, to the prohibition it contains of extending the privileges which are made reciprocal between the parties to other nations, which is supposed to be a breach of neutrality. Had I conceived that those articles were justly exposed to that imputation, I should certainly not have assented to them; but I saw no foundation for the imputation. With Spain and Holland we have treaties which secure them all the rights to which they are entitled. It is usual, and certainly proper, for a nation, in estimating its claims on other Powers, to examine its treaties with them, and not to think of setting up a pretension beyond the limit of such treaties. By treaty, neither of those Powers have any right in the case in question, nor have we in the ports of either. By treaty, Great Britain had enjoyed those rights in the ports of the United States, as we had in her ports from the year 1794. Spain and Holland knew the conditions of that treaty, which was in force at the commencement of the present war, and some time afterwards, and would have been in force till late in the last year had a special condition of the twelfth article been carried into effect. To renew the treaty in the express terms of the former one—a treaty which deprived no one Power of any existing conventional right; which subjected none to conditions to which they had not been always subjected; which allowed to Great Britain, on principles of reciprocity, a privilege which there was no reason to presume that any other Power, especially Spain, would consent to reciprocate with the United States—did not seem to be liable to the objection stated to it. The general principle which you advance, of extending those privileges to as small a number of Powers as possible, had also some weight in inducing us to accede to the arrangement. France is admitted to an enjoyment of them in the same extent with Great Britain; she therefore has no cause of complaint. I do not think that the stipulation forbids any arrangement of the Government relative to the number of ships of war that shall be admitted into the ports of the United States at one time, or any regulation relative to their conduct while within the ports of the United States, provided it be general and equally applicable to both Powers. A stipulation that the ships of war of each nation shall be hospitably received into the ports of the other does not necessarily imply that there is to be no rule as to the numbers to be admitted into the ports to which they shall be confined, or the order they shall observe while in port. All these topics have been at all times, as I have reason to believe, the object of regulation by Great Britain; and I have equal reason to believe that her Government did not consider itself as having abandoned its right to regulate them by this article.

Your next objection applies to the last paragraph of the nineteenth article taken in connexion with the twelfth article. By your construction of those parts of the treaty, the United States would be bound to claim redress, in favor of Great Britain, of her enemies, for any acts of hostility which they might commit on her ships of war or merchant vessels within the additional limit, while she might commit with impunity like acts of hostility on the ships of war and merchant vessels of her enemies in case they did not acknowledge it, and against their ships of war in case they did, although her own ships of war in both cases would be protected within it. I was decidedly of opinion, and still am, that while those articles secure to the United States an unconditional advantage, none whatever is stipulated by them in favor of Great Britain which must not of necessity be common to her enemies; that her privilege, on the contrary, whatever it may be, must be founded on their consent, follow, and terminate with it.

The twelfth article stipulates that Great Britain shall not stop the vessels of the United States within five marine miles of their coast, except for the purpose of examining whether they be American or those of another Power; and that she shall not stop the unarmed vessels of other Powers within the same limit, provided they acknowledge it, except to ascertain whether they belong to those who have acknowledged it. The vessels of the Powers who do not adopt the regulation are not affected by it. They remain under the ordinary protection of the law of nations, which extends to the distance of cannon shot, or three miles from the coast. Beyond that limit the enemies of Great Britain have a right to search and seize her vessels, without being amenable to the United States; and the same right is reserved to her by this article as if it had not been entered into. Vessels of war are expressly excluded from the advantage of the regulation.

It is the sole object of the twelfth article to secure to the United States an accommodation, by extending their jurisdiction on their coast, in what concerns themselves, from three to five miles. The stipulation is unconditional as to them, but conditional as to other Powers, dependent on their acknowledging the same limit. It is made reciprocal, by being extended to the British dominions northward of the United States; a circumstance which merits attention, as it precludes the idea that any other equivalent was expected or intended to be given for it. It would have been extended to the dominions of Great Britain in Europe and elsewhere had the British commissioners desired it; they declined it, from a fear that it might produce some innovation in the general doctrine of the law of nations on the subject. This is, I think, fairly to be inferred from the instrument itself.

The last paragraph of the nineteenth article stipulates that neither of the parties shall permit the ships or goods belonging to the subjects or citizens of the other to be taken within cannon shot of the coast, nor within the jurisdiction described in the twelfth article, so long as the provisions of the said article shall be in force, by the ships of war of other Powers; but in case it should so happen, the party whose territorial rights shall thus have been violated shall endeavor to obtain from the offending party full and ample satisfaction for the vessel or vessels so taken, whether the same be vessels of war or merchant vessels.

If any advantage is given to Great Britain by the arrangement proposed by the twelfth article and this clause of the nineteenth, to the prejudice of her enemies or of the United States, it must be by this clause. She can certainly claim none under the twelfth article. This clause consists of two distinct members of very different import. The first contains a general stipulation conformable to the law of nations, applicable to all the dominions of both parties, and equally so to their ships of war and merchant vessels. With respect to the latter, however, it is conditional. The second member applies to the arrangement made in the twelfth article, and in the sense and spirit of that article. If the twelfth article is carried into effect in favor of other powers, which can only be done by their consent, then the advantage which is secured to them by it will accrue likewise to Great Britain. What is that advantage? Protection to their merchant vessels within the additional two miles, and nothing else. It is obvious that the protection which is stipulated in favor of ships of war is provided for by the first member of the clause, and not by the second. It cannot be by both, for the distance defined by them is different, it being three miles in one and five miles in the other. It is equally obvious that the stipulation contained in the second member of the clause relative to the twelfth article, is intended to operate in the spirit of that article, and to be dependent on it. By the terms "nor within the jurisdiction described in the twelfth article so long as the provisions of the said article shall be in force," the stipulation contemplated is made conditional. In force in respect to whom? Not the United States, because it was unconditional as to them. It was conditional only with respect to other Powers. Other reasons might be given to show that the arrangement under consideration is not liable to the objection made to it, but I presumed that those stated will be satisfactory.

The difficulty to obtain the accommodation which was yielded in the twelfth article was extreme. We labored most earnestly to extend it to other Powers without their consenting to reciprocate it in favor of Great Britain, but that could not be accomplished. The British commissioners urged that as Great Britain predominated at sea, and must lose by the concession in any form, it would be unjust for her to make the concession in their favor, unless they would allow her the advantage of it. Finding that it was impossible to extend the additional limit to other Powers on other terms, we thought it advisable to adopt the arrangement in respect to them conditionally, putting it in their power to accept or reject it as they thought fit. We flattered ourselves that as they could not lose by it, they would not refuse their assent to an arrangement by which they might gain, especially as it would prove advantageous to a friendly Power. We deemed it highly important to establish the additional limit in favor of the United States, from the advantage it might afford to their commerce within it, and from the effect which the measure seemed likely to produce on the future conduct of the British squadrons on our coast, by whom it could not fail to be considered as a severe censure on the past.

It is readily admitted that more suitable terms might have been adopted to accomplish the object in view. But it ought to be recollected that as the right of jurisdiction imposes of necessity the obligation of protection, without a special exception to it, there was some difficulty in making an arrangement which should secure to the United States the advantage which they desired, and at the same time exempt them from the duty incident to it.

To your sixth objection little need be added to what is stated on the subject of it in our letter of January 3, 1807. As the paper of the British commissioners to which it relates had no sanction whatever from us, as was fully shown by that letter, the objection cannot be said to apply to any part of our conduct. The paper was produced by the decree of the Emperor of France of the 21st November, 1806, and was intended by the British commissioners to operate as a reservation of right in their Government not to ratify the treaty, or not to be precluded, under certain circumstances, in case it did not ratify it, from adopting such measures as it might find necessary to counteract the restrictions imposed by that decree. The exercise of the right reserved was made dependent on the abandonment of the principle of that decree by the French Government, or an assurance from the Government of the United States, or such conduct as would be equivalent, that the pretension would not be submitted to by it. We apprised the British commissioners that our Government would enter into no engagement whatever of what it would do in any case with another Power. Had the treaty been ratified even without any notice being taken of that paper, it could not have imposed the slightest obligation on the United States, either to perform any act on their part, or to submit to any on the part of Great Britain. I had supposed, however, in the case of ratification, that we should have been instructed to present to the British Government, with the instrument of ratification, a counter-declaration to that effect. The whole subject was before our Government with our strong and decided objection to the paper. All that we could do was to transmit it to you, with a correct statement of what had occurred in the negotiation respecting it, which we did. To the Government it belonged to take the step which the occasion required, not to us.

Having noticed the objections which are specially stated in your letter of May 20, 1807, and given our view of the several parts of the treaty to which they relate, I shall proceed to make explanatory remarks on the other articles, in order to do justice to the conduct of the American commissioners in regard to them.

Art. 5. You admit that this article is an essential improvement of that on the same subject in the treaty of 1794. It certainly improves it in two important interests: 1st, in that of the navigation of the United States; and 2d, in that of duties on American productions carried to the British market. The tonnage on American ships in British ports had been raised to — sterling per ton, while that on British ships in the ports of the United States was only fifty cents or two shillings and three-pence per ton; and the duty on the bulky productions of the United States in American bottoms had been raised to such a height under the countervailing regulations which the treaty allowed, as to secure, in time of peace, the entire carriage of those productions to British vessels, if indeed it did not materially affect the price of the articles themselves. What made it more unfortunate was, that the United States could not adopt any measure to remedy those evils without committing a direct and palpable violation of the treaty, as they were bound by it not to raise the existing duties higher than they were at the time the treaty was concluded. Those evils would, however, have been completely done away by this article. By it the United States would have had a right to raise the duty on British vessels to any height to which the British Government might raise it on theirs—a check which could not fail to prove adequate to the object; while they had also a right to give what preference they thought fit to their own vessels, which might be done by reducing the duty on them below the tonnage which was imposed on those of Great Britain. This arrangement secured to the United States an advantage which Great Britain could not countervail, as the necessity she is under to avail herself of every resource which she can command to raise revenue for indispensable purposes renders it impossible for her to make a like discrimination in favor of her own vessels. The inhibition of all discriminating duties on the production of the one and manufactures of the other party, whether they be carried in American or British bottoms, was a stipulation which it was presumed would also prove highly advantageous to the United States. The pernicious tendency of that principle was well known to you, and we were happy to be able to suppress it.

The objections which you urge to other parts of the article apply to clauses in the treaty of 1794, which it was impossible for us to change. I have, however, to observe that there is nothing in it to prevent the passage of a navigation act, provided it be adopted as a measure of general policy. Most of the nations of Europe, especially France, would be happy, in a general view, to see the United States resort to that expedient to counteract the restrictive system of England; and as it is one which could not essentially affect them, they could find no motive of that kind to inspire a wish to oppose it; nor could the United States, as I supposed, find one to exempt them from it.

We regretted that we could not obtain a stipulation which should compel Great Britain to repeal the laws which impose so high a duty on her manufactures when exported to the United States. Our letter showed that we did every thing in our power to obtain such a stipulation. I was, however, persuaded that the want of it would not expose us to all the evils which you seem to apprehend from it, admitting that the British construction of that clause in the former treaty was a sound one, and that nothing is contained in the twenty-third article of the present one to discountenance it. It is certain that no Government will ever tax exports higher than indispensable necessity compels it; because such a tax tends in all cases essentially to check industry, and to destroy the most productive source of national prosperity. The inhibition imposed by the constitution of the United States on the Congress to tax in the slightest degree their exports, affords a strong argument, drawn from the acknowledged wisdom of its framers, against the policy of such a tax in the abstract; and I am persuaded that the reasons against it are as strong with Great Britain, if not stronger, than with any other nation. Without taking a more comprehensive view of the subject, it is sufficient to observe that a tax on British exports must operate as a bounty in favor of American manufactures, which are already in an advanced state in certain ports in the Union. Great Britain must be sensible of this fact; and, aware of the encouragement which the present export duty gives them, and of the consequences attending it, I should presume that there was not much cause to apprehend that she would tax the export of her manufactures to the United States to prevent their being sent thence to other countries. The sole effect of such a tax would be to secure to her own vessels the carriage of the articles, if indeed that were attainable. In both cases, the manufactures of Great Britain would be the subject of the commerce. The supply of the great, the productive, and increasing markets of the United States must be a primary object of British policy, and Great Britain would doubtless be cautious not to hazard it for one comparatively of much less importance.

Art. 6. As this was approved, I shall only observe that I considered the reservation contained in it important, as it enabled the United States to counteract the British policy in respect to the trade with the West Indies, which is the object of it, by means the most efficacious, whenever they should be resorted to. The trade of Great Britain with the United States is carried on principally by circuitous voyages, in which her vessels pass from the ports of the United States to the West Indies. By suspending the intercourse between the United States and her West Indies in British vessels, the chain would be broken, and the whole commerce in such vessels be in a great measure suspended. The provision in the article obviously looks to such an object, and the time of carrying it into effect, unless the trade should be placed on satisfactory ground, would have depended altogether on the United States.

Having already noticed the subjects which are embraced by the following articles, I shall add but little more on any of them to what is said in our joint letter of January 3, 1807. The seventh was taken literally from the treaty of 1794. The eighth and ninth amended, as you allow, the articles in that treaty on the same subject. The tenth, relative to blockade, taken in connexion with the British paper of December 31, 1806, placed, as I presumed, that interest on ground which would be satisfactory. The preamble cannot affect it unfavorably, as it does not alter the acknowledged law. The only effect which it could have would be to admonish the courts to be cautious in admitting evidence of notice, on account of the distance of the United States from the blockaded ports. It was supposed to give the United States a claim to a more favorable rule, in respect to evidence, than was allowed to Powers more contiguous to the theatre of action. The doctrine contained in Mr. Merry's note to you was not contested by the British commissioners. It is, on the contrary, maintained in their note to us of December 31, 1806, in which it is asserted to be notorious "that the King did not declare any ports to be in a state of blockade without allotting to that object a force sufficient to make the entrance into them manifestly dangerous." I quote the passage in their note, to observe that the doctrine is not made conditional on any other part of it, but is laid down as the established law. It justifies the additional remark, that the preamble was not intended, and cannot be construed, to alter the law. It follows that it cannot produce any other effect than that which is above imputed to it.

The thirteenth article relates to the search of merchant vessels, and differs from the nineteenth of the treaty of 1794 in the introductory sentence, which enjoins it on the commanders of ships of war and privateers to observe, in the course of the war which may then exist, as much as possible, the acknowledged rules and principles of the law of nations, and also in the penal sum (which it increases) to be given by the commanders of privateers before they receive their commissions, as a security for their good conduct under them. It was supposed that in this, as in the preceding case, the law remained untouched, and that the stipulation produced no other effect than to enjoin it on the Governments, respectively, to be particularly attentive to the conduct of its officers in the respect alluded to.

The thirteenth article and the paper of the British commissioners of the 31st of December, 1806, obviously look to the Russian convention as the standard of the acknowledged law respecting the search of merchant vessels and blockade. That instrument was held constantly in view on both sides, in every discussion on those subjects, and indeed on every other to which it extends, and its doctrine admitted, especially in those, to be the established law. We were extremely desirous, and used our best exertions, to introduce articles to the same effect into our treaty, but it was utterly impossible to accomplish it. It must, however, be allowed, that if engagements of the kind alluded to, especially in regard to blockade, for which there was a special document, would not be observed, that it would be useless to stipulate them by treaty.

On the subject of the seventeenth article I have already made some remarks under another head. I cannot think that a stipulation to receive the ships of war of each party hospitably into the ports of the other restrains them from limiting the number of ships to be admitted at one time, or from designating the ports to which they shall be admitted. A stipulation to admit them settles only, as I presume, the principle that they shall be admitted, and leaves open to arrangement the other points connected with it. This opinion is supported by a passage in the article itself, as to the ports, which secures to vessels which might be driven by stress of weather, &c. into ports not open to them in ordinary cases, an hospitable reception in such ports. Had the right to designate the ports been given up by the general stipulation, there would have been no necessity for that contained in this passage. The remark is equally applicable to the other case, that of the number to be admitted at one time, as that must be an affair of special and strict regulation; an exception which admitted none, by securing rights to them in case they entered, would necessarily defeat the limitation itself.

The stipulation which relates to the good treatment of the officers of each party in the ports of the other, being reciprocal, contains no reflection on one which is not applicable to the other, and I will venture to affirm that it is equally necessary in regard to Great Britain as to the United States. It is well known, in respect to the latter, that the passions which were excited by the revolution did not long survive the struggle; that the sword was no sooner sheathed than the calamities of the war were forgotten. The injured are always the first to forgive. It is, however, just to remark, that time has essentially effaced from the people of both nations the hostile impression which that arduous conflict produced. The twenty-third article was thought to contain a useful stipulation, by securing to the United States the advantages in navigation and commerce which Great Britain might afterwards grant to any other nation. That stipulation was obviously founded on the right of the most favored nation, and subject, of course, to the conditions incident to it. It amounts to this, that if Great Britain should concede any accommodation to another Power in commerce with her East or West India colonies, or any other part of her dominions, gratuitously, the United States would be entitled to it on the same terms; but if she made such accommodation in consideration of certain equivalents to be given her in return, that the United States would not be entitled to those advantages without paying equivalents. The doctrine is the same in its application to the United States. If they should grant any privileges in trade to France or Spain for admission into their West India colonies, Great Britain would be entitled to the same, provided she admitted the United States into her islands also, and not otherwise. I could not perceive, therefore, how it was possible that the United States should be injured by the stipulation contained in this article, while it was probable that they might derive some advantage from it. It could not restrain them from passing a navigation act to place them on an equal footing with Great Britain, especially if it was made general, or applied only to her and the other nations having such acts. The right to pass such an act was not taken away by any other stipulation in the treaty, and there was nothing in this article that had such a tendency. The terms, "shall continue to be on the footing of the most favored nation," &c. refer to the principles established by the preceding articles, and not to the existing laws or regulations of either party. If the latter was the case, it would follow that the tonnage duties, the discriminating duties, &c. would remain as they were. The preceding articles were intended, in the points to which they extended, to establish a standard of equality between the parties, to which the regulations of each, whether they exceeded or fell short of it, should be brought. It could not be doubted that the British export duty was of the first description; that it violated the principle of the most favored nation. The British commissioners admitted the fact, and did not pretend to justify it on that ground. They urged in its favor, only, that the same duty was imposed on exports to their own colonies in America; and that if any change was made in it, to satisfy the claim of the United States, on the principle of the right of the most favored nation, it would be to raise it on the goods exported to other countries, not to reduce it on those sent to the United States. The principle, however, established by this article, being applicable to that duty, it was to be presumed that it might fairly be relied on to obtain a modification of it, either by reducing the duty on exports to the United States, or raising it on those to other nations. There is nothing in this article to restrain the United States from adopting measures to counteract the British policy with respect to the West Indies. If that object had not been secured, by a special article, from a possibility of being affected by the others, the principle established by the present one could not have affected it otherwise than beneficially.

Having replied to your objections to the several articles of the treaty and the papers connected with it, and given our view of them, I shall proceed to make some remarks on the whole subject, to do justice to the conduct of the American commissioners in that transaction.

In every case which involved a question of neutral right, or even of commercial accommodation, Great Britain was resolved to yield no ground which she could avoid, and was evidently prepared to hazard war rather than yield much. There seemed to be no mode of compelling her to yield than that of embarking in the war with the opposite belligerent, on which great question it belonged to the national councils to decide. We had pressed the claims of the United States, in the negotiation, to the utmost limit that we could go, without provoking that issue. It is most certain that better terms could not have been obtained, at the time we signed the treaty, than it contains.

The state of the war in Europe suggested, likewise, the propriety of caution on our part. Russia was then on the side of England, and likely to continue so; and Austria, known to be in the same interest, was holding an equivocal attitude, and ready to take advantage of any favorable event that might occur. Prussia, lately powerful, had been defeated, but was not absolutely subdued; her King, the ally and friend of Alexander, kept the field with him, and made head against France. The Emperor of France, far removed from his dominions, was making the bold and dangerous experiment of the effect which his absence might produce in the interior, and in a situation to be compelled to risk every thing, if pressed by his adversary, on the precarious issue of a single battle. These were strong reasons why we should not throw ourselves too decisively into that scale.

The situation of the United States, always a respectable one, was then less imposing than it usually was. It was known that they were not on good terms with Spain, and that France was the ally of Spain. Their interior, too, was disturbed by a conspiracy of doubtful extent and dangerous tendency, the consequences of which were sure to be greatly magnified by all who were unfriendly to our happy system of Government. Those circumstances could not fail to be taken into view by any the most friendly administration in England, when pressed to make concessions which it was unwilling to make. Add to these considerations the important one, that the British ministry had become much impaired in its strength, especially in what concerned the United States, by the death of a very eminent and distinguished statesman, and had not the power, or thought that it had not, to pursue a liberal policy towards the United States, and that its power was evidently daily diminishing.

These considerations induced us to sign the treaty, and submit it to the wisdom of our Government, after obtaining the best conditions that it was possible to obtain. We were aware that, in several points, it fell short of the just claims of our country. But we were persuaded that such an arrangement was made of the whole subject as justified us in the part which we took. In the rejection or adoption of the treaty I felt no personal interest. Having discharged my duty with integrity and zeal, I neither wished applause nor dreaded censure. Having the highest confidence in the wisdom, the rectitude, and patriotism of the administration, I was satisfied that it would pursue the course which an enlightened view of the public interest and a just sensibility to the national honor might dictate.

Our letter of January 3 was written in haste, and was deficient in many of the explanations which would otherwise have been given of the treaty. I was happy, when at Washington, to find that you were perfectly willing to receive any explanation which I might now be disposed to give of that transaction, and to allow them the weight which they might deserve. In making this communication, I have indulged the freedom which belonged to it, in full confidence that it would be approved.

I cannot conclude this letter without adding my most ardent wish that the administration may succeed in conducting our affairs with every Power to the happiest result. My retirement, which had been long desired, and delayed only by the arduous and very important duties in which I was engaged, had become necessary as a relief to my mind, after much fatigue, and to the interest of my family, which had been neglected and greatly injured by my absence in the public service. It is still my desire to cherish retirement. Should it, however, be our unfortunate destiny, which I most earnestly hope will not be the case, to be involved in foreign war or domestic trouble, and should my services be deemed useful, I will not hesitate, at the desire of the administration, to repair again to the standard of my country.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and esteem, your very obedient servant,
 JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Monroe.

Sir:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 22, 1807.

In my letter of March 18th to the joint commission, it was signified that, in a conventional arrangement on the subject of boundaries, it would be inconsistent with the views of the President to open any part of Louisiana to a British trade with the Indians. From the evident solicitude of the British Government on this point, it is highly probable that the determination of the President will be a bar to any adjustment of that part of the differences between the two countries; nor is it very probable, considering the jealousy and want of information on the British side, that, independently of that obstacle, the adjustment would, at this time, be concluded. That you may not, however, be without any information which might contribute to its accuracy, or put you on your guard against propositions militating against any of our just pretensions, I transmit herewith copies of a communication from the Governor of New York, and of another from the Governor of Vermont. With respect to the last, it may be sufficient merely to save the right of correcting the alleged error at a future day. With respect to the subject of the former, it may be proper either to leave that also open to future discussion, or rather to provide for a joint examination and report relative to the islands and channels in the St. Lawrence, &c. The most obvious and convenient demarcation would seem to be the channel best fitted for navigation. But as a more equal division of the islands might possibly be made, without losing sight of a sufficient channel for common use, and as military positions may be involved in the case, it may be most safe and satisfactory to both parties to proceed on more thorough and impartial information than is now possessed by either. I address these communications to our ordinary minister at London, merely because the subject has not been formally transferred to the joint commissioners. They will, of course, be for the use of the latter, if this branch of the negotiation should remain in their hands.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Monroe.

Sir:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 6, 1807.

The documents herewith enclosed, from No. 1 to No. 9, inclusive, explain the hostile attack, with the insulting pretext for it, lately committed near the capes of Virginia by the British ship of war the Leopard on the American frigate the Chesapeake.

No. 10 is a copy of the proclamation issued by the President, interdicting, in consequence of that outrage, the use of our waters, and every other accommodation, to all British armed ships.

This enormity is not a subject for discussion. The immunity of a national ship of war from every species and purpose of search on the high seas, has never been contested by any nation. Great Britain would be second to none in resenting such a violation of her rights and such an insult on her flag. She may bring the case to the test of her own feelings by supposing that, instead of the customary demand of our mariners, serving compulsively even on board her ships of war, opportunities had been seized for rescuing them, in like manner, whenever the superiority of force, or the chance of a surprise, might be possessed by our ships of war.

But the present case is marked by circumstances which give it a peculiar die. The seamen taken from the Chesapeake had been ascertained to be native citizens of the United States, and this fact was made known to the bearer of the demand, and doubtless communicated by him to his commander previous to the commencement of the attack. It is a fact, also, affirmed by two of the men with every appearance of truth, that they had been impressed from American vessels into the British frigate from which they escaped, and by the third, that having been impressed from a British merchant ship, he had accepted the recruiting bounty under that duress, and with a view to alleviate his situation till he could escape to his own country: add, that the attack was made during a period of negotiation, and in the midst of friendly assurances from the British Government.

The printed papers herewith sent will enable you to judge of the spirit which has been roused by the occasion. It pervades the whole community; is abolishing the distinctions of party; and, regarding only the indignity offered to the sovereignty and flag of the nation, and the blood of citizens so wantonly and wickedly shed, demands, in the loudest tone, an honorable reparation.

With this demand you are charged by the President. The tenor of his proclamation will be your guide in reminding the British Government of the uniform proofs given by the United States of their disposition to maintain faithfully every friendly relation; of the multiplied infractions of their rights by British naval commanders on our coasts and in our harbors; of the inefficacy of reiterated appeals to the justice and friendship of that Government; and of the moderation, on the part of the United States, which reiterated disappointments had not extinguished; till at length no alternative is left, but a voluntary satisfaction on the part of Great Britain, or a resort to means depending on the United States alone.

The nature and extent of the satisfaction ought to be suggested to the British Government, not less by a sense of its own honor than by justice to that of the United States. A formal disavowal of the deed, and restoration of the four seamen to the ship from which they were taken, are things of course, and indispensable. As a security for the future, an entire abolition of impressments from vessels under the flag of the United States, if not already arranged, is also to make an indispensable part of the satisfaction. The abolition must be on terms compatible with the instructions to yourself and Mr. Pinkney on this subject; and, if possible, without the authorized rejection from the service of the United States of British seamen who have not been two years in it. Should it be impossible to avoid this concession on the part of the United States, it ought, as of itself more than a reasonable price for future security, to extend the reparation due for the past.

But beyond these indispensable conditions, the United States have a right to expect every solemnity of form, and every other ingredient of retribution and respect, which, according to usage and the sentiments of mankind, are proper in the strongest cases of insult to the rights and sovereignty of a nation. And the British Government is to be apprised of the importance of the full compliance with this expectation, to the thorough healing of the wound which has been made in the feelings of the American nation.

Should it be alleged as a ground for declining or diminishing the satisfaction in this case, that the United States have themselves taken it by the interdict contained in the proclamation, the answer will be obvious. The interdict is a measure not of reparation, but of precaution, and would, besides, be amply justified by occurrences prior to the extraordinary outrage in question.

The exclusion of all armed ships whatever from our waters is, in fact, so much required by the vexations and dangers to our peace, experienced from these visits, that the President makes it a special part of the charge to you to avoid laying the United States under any species of restraint from adopting that remedy. Being extended to all belligerent nations, none of them could of right complain, and with the less reason, as the policy of most nations has limited the admission of foreign ships of war into their ports to such numbers as being inferior to the naval force of the country, could be readily made to respect its authority and laws.

As it may be useful, in enforcing the justice of the present demand, to bring into view applicable cases, especially where Great Britain has been the complaining party, I refer you to the ground taken and the language held by her in those of Falkland's island and Nootka sound, notwithstanding the assertion of Spain, in both cases, that the real right was in her, and the possessory only in Great Britain. These cases will be found in the Annual Registers for 1771 and 1790, and in the parliamentary debates for those years. In the latter you will find also two cases referred to, in one of which the French King sent an ambassador extraordinary to the King of Sardinia, in the most public and solemn manner, with an apology for an infringement of his territorial rights in the pursuit of a smuggler and murderer. In the other case, an ambassador extraordinary was sent by the British Government to the court of Portugal with an apology for the pursuit and destruction, by Admiral Boscawen, of certain French ships on the coasts of this last kingdom. Many other cases, more or less analogous, may doubtless be found, (see particularly the reparation by France to Great Britain for the attack on Turk's island in 1764, as related in the Annual Register and in Smollett's continuation of Hume, vol. 10; the proceedings in the case of an English merchantman which suffered much in her crew and otherwise from the fire of certain Spanish xebecs cruising in the Mediterranean, and the execution of the lieutenant of a privateer for firing a gun into a Venetian merchantman, which killed the captain, as stated in the Annual Register for 1784, page 94.) The case of an affront offered to a Russian ambassador in the reign of Queen Anne, though less analogous, shows, in a general view, the solemnity with which reparation is made for insults having immediate relation to the sovereignty of a nation.

Although the principle, which was outraged in the proceedings against the American frigate, is independent of the question concerning the allegiance of the seamen taken from her, the fact that they were citizens of the United States, and not British subjects, may have such an influence on the feelings of all, and, perhaps, on the opinions of some unacquainted with the laws and usages of nations, that it has been thought proper to seek more regular proofs of their national character than were deemed sufficient in the first instance. These proofs will be added by this conveyance, if obtained in time; if not, by the first that succeeds.

The President has an evident right to expect from the British Government, not only an ample reparation to the United States in this case, but that it will be decided without difficulty or delay. Should this expectation fail, and, above all, should reparation be refused, it will be incumbent on you to take proper measures for hastening home, according to the degree of urgency, all American vessels remaining in British ports, using for the purpose the mode least likely to awaken the attention of the British Government. Where there may be no ground to distrust the prudence or fidelity of consuls, they will probably be found the fittest vehicles for your intimations. It will be particularly requisite to communicate to our public ships in the Mediterranean the state of appearances, if it be such as ought to influence their movements.

All negotiation with the British Government on other subjects will, of course, be suspended until satisfaction on this be so pledged and arranged as to render negotiation honorable. Whatever may be the result or the prospect, you will please to forward to us the earliest information.

The scope of the proclamation will signify to you that the President has yielded to the presumption that the hostile act of the British commander did not pursue the intentions of his Government. It is not indeed easy to suppose that so rash and so critical a step should have originated with the admiral, but it is still more difficult to believe that such orders were prescribed by any Government, under circumstances such as existed between Great Britain and the United States.

Calculations founded on dates are also strongly opposed to the supposition that the orders in question could have been transmitted from England. In the same scale are to be put the apparent and declared persuasion of the British representative, Mr. Erskine, that no orders of a hostile spirit could have been issued or authorized by his Government, and the coincidence of this assurance with the amicable professions of Mr. Canning, the organ of the new administration, as stated in the despatch of April 22 from yourself and Mr. Pinkney.

Proceeding on these considerations, the President has inferred that the justice and honor of the British Government will readily make the atonement required; and, in that expectation, he has forborne an immediate call of Congress, notwithstanding the strong wish which has been manifested by many that measures depending on their authority should without delay be adopted. The motives to this forbearance have, at the same time, been strengthened by the policy of avoiding a course which might stimulate the public cruisers, in this quarter, to arrest our ships and seamen now arriving, and shortly expected in great numbers from all quarters. It is probable, however, that the Legislature will be convened in time to receive the answer of the British Government on the subject of this despatch, or even sooner, if the conduct of the British squadron here, or other occurrences, should require immediate measures beyond the authority of the Executive.

In order to give the more expedition and security to the present despatch, a public armed vessel, the Revenge, is specially employed, and Doctor Bullus is made the bearer, who was on board the Chesapeake, on his way to a consulate in the Mediterranean, and will be able to detail and explain circumstances which may possibly become interesting in the course of your communications with the British Government.

The vessel, after depositing Doctor Bullus at a British port, will proceed with despatches to a French port, but will return to England with a view to bring the result of your transactions with the British Government. The trip to France will afford you and Mr. Pinkney a favorable opportunity for communicating with our ministers at Paris, who, being instructed to regulate their conduct on the present occasion by the advices they may receive from you, will need every explanation that can throw light on the probable turn and issue of things with Great Britain.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 30, 1807.

GENTLEMEN:

Your letter of April 25th, enclosing the British project of a convention of limits, and your proposed amendments, has been duly received. The following observations explain the terms on which the President authorizes you to close and sign the instrument.

1st. The modification of the 5th article (noted as one which the British commissioners would have agreed to) may be admitted in case that proposed by you to them be not attainable. But it is much to be wished and pressed, though not made an ultimatum, that the proviso to both should be omitted. This is in no view whatever necessary, and can have little other effect than as an offensive intimation to Spain that our claims extend to the Pacific Ocean. However reasonable such claims may be compared with those others, it is impolitic, especially at the present moment, to strengthen Spanish jealousies of the United States, which it is probably an object with Great Britain to excite by the clause in question.

2d. The privileges of British trade and intercourse with the Indians, allowed by existing stipulations, are not to be extended to Indians dwelling within the limits of the United States as determined by the treaty of peace.

The motives for excluding foreign traders from the territories of the United States westward of the Mississippi, have been heretofore stated to you. These motives gain strength daily. It is manifest, also, that the proposition on the part of Great Britain fails essentially in the point of real and fair reciprocity; first, as it excepts the possessions of the Hudson Bay Company, without any equivalent exception on our side of the boundary; secondly, as the use of the privilege by our traders on the British side of the boundary is known to be attended with danger and secret obstructions, to which British traders on our side of the boundary are in no degree exposed; 3dly, as all chance of competition with British traders on the British side would be completely frustrated by the disparity of duties and of prices, under which the American and British traders would respectively carry their merchandise to the Indian market on that side. The British Government now complains of the disadvantage resulting to their Indian traders on the eastern side of the Mississippi, from an excess of duty amounting to about six per cent. In the Indian trade within the British territory, the difference against our traders is equal to the difference between the duties imposed in the United States and those imposed in Canada, or rather, as no duties are probably imposed in Canada, equal to the full amount imposed in the United States, that is, to 15 or 20 per cent. It is enough to be under this inequality, as it relates to the existing stipulation. To extend it as proposed is more than can be fairly expected. The bargain would be still far worse on our side, if the British proposals contemplate a free access to the waters westward of the Mississippi, with goods free of duty for the Indians of Louisiana.

Having already transmitted to Mr. Monroe sundry documents throwing light on our relations with the Indians in the northwest quarter, I add a few others not a little curious as well as not uninteresting.

3d. Access by land or inland navigation from the British territories, through the territory of the United States, to the river Mississippi, is not to be allowed to British subjects with their goods or effects, unless such articles shall have paid all the duties, and be within all the custom-house regulations, applicable to goods and effects of citizens of the United States. An access through the territory of the United States to the waters running into the western side of the Mississippi, is under no modification whatever to be stipulated to British subjects.

There can be no good reason with Great Britain for wishing an access to the Mississippi for goods free of duty, because the river can never be a highway to any other market than the consumption of our citizens; and as this cannot be attained without a previous payment of the usual duties, it must be the same thing whether the duties be paid on or after entering the limits of the United States; or rather the only difference would be in the greater facility of evading the duties in the latter than in the former case; a facility which cannot be supposed to be approved by Great Britain, or admissible by the United States.

4th. It may be agreed that the ad valorem duties now payable on goods imported into the United States from the neighboring territories of Great Britain shall be regulated according to the value thereof, estimated in the same manner as if directly imported from beyond sea, and that licences to Indian traders, and passes for their canoes and carriages, shall be freely granted; but that the British traders shall in all respects be subject to the restrictions and precautions with respect to the articles to be supplied to the Indians as are imposed on citizens of the United States engaged in the same trade.

I have only to express the President's approbation of the idea of keeping open, for future decision, our right to the island of Grand Manan, and to suggest as a desirable addition to the eighth article, a clause providing "that in the mean time British vessels shall not be restrained from carrying plaster, &c. to any ports of the United States." It appears that a disposition exists to compel the British vessels to trade to the more distant ports of the United States, instead of resorting to the nearer ones, whence the plaster, &c. is now conveyed by vessels of the United States. To the spirit and outrages which prevail in that quarter, I refer to the communications from the collector of Passamaquoddy, herewith enclosed. Affidavits of the facts stated by the collector have also been transmitted by him.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

LONDON, August 4, 1807.

I avail myself of the opportunity afforded by Mr. Biddle to communicate to you a copy of a correspondence, and the substance of a conference between Mr. Canning and myself, relative to the late aggression on the peace and sovereignty of the United States by the British ship Leopard, in an attack on the Chesapeake, off the capes of Virginia.

Mr. Canning's private letter of July 25, which gave the first intelligence of the occurrence, left it doubtful whether the British officers had been culpable in it; and as I knew how very reprehensible their conduct had been on our coast on many other occasions, and to what height the sensibility of our citizens had been excited by it, I thought it not improbable that something might have occurred to divide the blame between the parties. It was under that impression that my answer was written. On the next day, the leading features of the transaction were presented to the public through the medium of the gazettes, which were taken from private accounts received directly from Halifax, by a vessel which had been despatched by Admiral Berkeley with the official one. By these it was evident that the British officer was completely the aggressor in an outrage of great enormity, attended with circumstances which increased the offence. It was understood, likewise, from good authority, that the official intelligence which the Government had received corresponded with and confirmed the other accounts already before the public.

On full consideration of these circumstances, I concluded that it would be highly improper for me to leave the affair on the ground on which Mr. Canning had placed it. I could see no other motive in him to obtain further information relative to the transaction than for the purpose of ascertaining whether the men said to be deserters, and for whom the attack was made, were American citizens or British subjects; to which it was impossible for me to give any countenance. I thought it indispensable, therefore, to call on the Government to disavow the principle, and to engage such other reparation to the United States as their injured honor obviously required. It appeared to me that any delay in taking that step, which depended on an abstract principle, and required no argument to illustrate or facts to support it, would have a tendency to weaken a claim which was unquestionable, and to countenance the idea that it would not be supported with suitable energy.

I had, before the knowledge of this event, obtained the appointment of an interview with Mr. Canning, on other business, to take place on the 29th ultimo. We met according to the appointment. I observed, in opening the conference, that, although the topics which had brought us together were important, the late occurrence, at the entrance of the Chesapeake, had, in a great measure, put them out of sight. He expressed his regret that such an event, which would at all times furnish cause of concern, should have happened at the present time. He asked if the men in question were American citizens or British subjects? I replied that that was a point which could not come into view in the case; that it was one which, according as the fact might be, would make the cause more or less popular in either country, but could not affect the principle; that, on principle, a ship of war protected all the people on board, and could not be entered to be searched for deserters, or for any purpose, without violating the sovereignty of the nation whose flag she bore; that, in the present case, I had been assured that the men were American citizens, and that the British minister at Washington had been made acquainted with it. He said little on the subject, but, by the tendency of what he did say, seemed to imply that his Government could not lose sight of the consideration above alluded to; nor indeed did he admit, by any thing that escaped him, that the abstract principle itself would not be insisted on. His remarks, however, were generally of a conciliatory and friendly character. Without pledging himself on any point, he seemed desirous to satisfy me that no new orders had been issued by the present ministry to the commandant of the British squadron at Halifax. I observed that, as the notes which had passed between us were informal, and on a very limited view of the subject on my part, it would be proper for me, now that the circumstances were better known, to present him an official note on it. He admitted the propriety of it.

I then drew Mr. Canning's attention to the subjects on which I had asked the interview, being the case of the Impetueux, Captain Love's correspondence, the conduct of Captain Douglas, and of the British squadron, generally, on our coast. I observed that I had heretofore postponed any official communication on these points, from a desire to connect them with the greater object depending between our Governments, and, of course, from motives the most friendly; that I brought them to his view at this time in consequence of Mr. Pinkney and myself having commenced the other business, as he knew had been done. He promised to attend to them.

On the 29th of July I wrote Mr. Canning the note which I had promised him in the late interview. I addressed it in terms which I thought suitable to the occasion, observing to state in it that I took the step from a sense of duty applicable to my station, as the resident minister, and without authority from my Government. I considered the act as that of the British officer, in which the Government had no agency, was not bound to support, and which it would be honorable for it to disavow. I flattered myself that some advantage might arise from the measure, and that, under the circumstances in which it was taken, no injury possibly could. His reply is dated on the 3d instant, which, though addressed in rather a harsh tone, may be considered as conceding essentially the point desired. It is my intention to say nothing more to him on the subject till I hear from you, and in the mean time to observe the most conciliatory conduct that circumstances will admit.

Such is the state of this country at the present crisis, that it is impossible to foresee what will be its course of conduct towards the United States. There has been, at all times since the commencement of the present war, a strong party here for extending its ravages to them. This party is composed of the ship owners, the navy, the East and West India merchants, and certain political characters of great consideration in the state. So powerful is this combination, that it is most certain that nothing can be obtained of the Government on any point but what may be extorted by necessity. The disasters to the north ought to inspire moderation, but, with respect to the northern Powers, it seems to have produced directly the opposite effect. A fleet of about twenty-five ships of the line, with a suitable number of frigates, &c., and above twenty thousand men, has been lately equipped and sent to the Baltic, as it is said, to take possession of the Danish and Russian navies. This measure is imputed to an understanding which, it is supposed, has been established between the cabinets of Russia and Paris by the late peace, and which has for its object a concert of measures for the purpose of attempting to force on this country a maritime code more favorable to neutral nations. The motive assigned for the expedition is that of taking possession of the Danish fleet, to keep it out of the hands of the French. That the Russian fleet is one of the objects is not so generally believed, though perhaps not less probable.

Mr. Pinkney and myself have taken the first step in our business; we will write you in a few days the state of it. You may be assured that we shall do every thing in our power to promote, in the mode most likely to succeed, the object of our instructions and the interests of our country. Want of time prevents my going into further detail.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MONROË.

JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State, Washington.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Monroe.

FOREIGN OFFICE, Saturday, July 25, 1807.

Mr. Canning presents his compliments to Mr. Monroe, and, with sentiments of the deepest regret, hastens to inform him that intelligence has just been received of a transaction which has taken place, off the coast of America, between a ship of war of His Majesty and a frigate belonging to the United States; the result of which has been the loss of some lives on board the American frigate.

The particulars of this transaction, and the grounds of the justification of the British officer, and of the admiral under whose orders he acted, Mr. Canning is not at present enabled to communicate to Mr. Monroe.

If Mr. Monroe should have received any accounts of it, Mr. Canning trusts that he will lose no time in communicating them to Mr. Canning.

But whatever the real merits and character of the transaction may turn out to be, Mr. Canning could not forbear expressing without delay the sincere concern and sorrow which he feels at its unfortunate result, and assuring the American minister, both from himself and on the behalf of His Majesty's Government, that, if the British officers should prove to have been culpable, the most prompt and effectual reparation shall be afforded to the Government of the United States.

JAMES MONROE, Esq., &c.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Canning.

PORTLAND PLACE, Monday, July 27, 1807.

Mr. Monroe presents his compliments to Mr. Canning, and is much obliged to him for the information communicated in his note of Saturday. Mr. Monroe has heard with extreme regret the account it contains of a rencounter between a British ship of war and an American frigate, off the coast of the United States. He has no knowledge of the subject, except what Mr. Canning's note has furnished, but will not fail to communicate the earliest intelligence which he may receive of an event so deeply to be lamented. Mr. Monroe derives, in the mean time, much satisfaction from the friendly assurance of Mr. Canning that this unfortunate occurrence was not authorized by His Majesty's Government, and that suitable reparation will be made for the injury, if, on inquiry, the British officer shall be found the aggressor.

The Right Honorable GEORGE CANNING, &c.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Canning.

SIR:

PORTLAND PLACE, July 29, 1807.

Although I have no instruction from my Government on the subject, it is my duty to request the attention of His Britannic Majesty's Government to a late aggression on the sovereignty of the United States of a very extraordinary nature. The circumstances of the transaction are too distinctly marked to leave any doubt of the extent of the outrage, or of the reparation which it obviously claims. By accounts, which are entitled to full confidence, it appears that, on the 23d of June last, His Majesty's ship the Leopard attacked an American frigate off the coast of the United States, with a view to assert and enforce the unfounded and most unjustifiable pretension to search for deserters; and, after having killed and wounded a number of her men, entered on board and carried away forcibly several of the crew. The conduct of the British officer, which in itself forms an act of complete hostility, is rendered more reprehensible from the consideration that, just before this aggression, he held a station within the jurisdiction of the United States, in the waters of the Chesapeake, where, while he enjoyed the rights of hospitality, he projected this attack against the ship of a neutral Power, whose commander, relying on the good faith of His Majesty's Government and the friendly relations subsisting between Great Britain and the United States, could not have suspected the design. I might state other examples of great indignity and outrage, many of which are of recent date, to which the United States have been exposed off their coast, and even within several of their harbors, from the British squadron; but it is improper to mingle them with the present more serious cause of complaint. I have called your attention to this subject, in full confidence that His Majesty's Government will see, in the act complained of, a flagrant abuse of its own authority, and that it will not hesitate to enable me to communicate to my Government, without delay, a frank disavowal of the principle on which it was made, and its assurance that the officer who is responsible for it shall suffer the punishment which so unexampled an aggression on the sovereignty of a neutral nation justly deserves.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, sir, your very obedient servant,

JAS. MONROE.

The Right Hon. GEORGE CANNING, &c.

From Mr. Canning.

SIR:

FOREIGN OFFICE, August 3, 1807.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your official note of the 29th ultimo, which I have lost no time in laying before the King.

As the statement of the transaction to which this note refers is not brought forward either by the authority of the Government of the United States, or with any precise knowledge of the facts on which it is founded, it might have been sufficient for me to express to you His Majesty's readiness to take the whole of the circumstances of the case, when fully disclosed, into his consideration, and to make reparation for any alleged injury to the sovereignty of the United States, whenever it should be clearly shown that such injury has been actually sustained, and that such reparation is really due.

Of the existence of such a disposition on the part of the British Government, you, sir, cannot be ignorant: I have already assured you of it, though in an unofficial form, by the letter which I addressed to you on the first receipt of the intelligence of this unfortunate transaction; and I may, perhaps, be permitted to express my surprise, after such an assurance, at the tone of that representation which I have just had the honor to receive from you.

But the earnest desire of His Majesty to evince, in the most satisfactory manner, the principles of justice and moderation by which he is uniformly actuated, has not permitted him to hesitate in commanding me to assure you, that His Majesty neither does nor has at any time maintained the pretension of a right to search ships of war, in the national service of any State, for deserters.

If, therefore, the statement in your note should prove to be correct, and to contain all the circumstances of the case, upon which complaint is intended to be made, and if it shall appear that the act of His Majesty's officers rested on no other grounds than the simple and unqualified assertion of the pretension above referred to, His Majesty has no difficulty in disavowing that act, and will have no difficulty in manifesting his displeasure at the conduct of his officers.

With respect to the other causes of complaint, (whatever they may be,) which are hinted at in your note, I perfectly agree with you, in the sentiment which you express, as to the propriety of not involving them in a question, which of itself is of sufficient importance to claim a separate and most serious consideration.

I have only to lament that the same sentiment did not induce you to abstain from alluding to these subjects on an occasion which you were yourself of opinion was not favorable for pursuing the discussion of them.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, your most obedient, humble servant,

GEORGE CANNING.

JAMES MONROE, Esq., &c.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State of the United States.

SIR:

LONDON, August 14, 1807.

I had the honor to transmit you, with my letter of the 4th instant, a copy of a correspondence with Mr. Canning, relative to the late aggression in the case of the Chesapeake frigate. You will receive with this a copy of a more recent one on the same subject.

By Mr. Canning's queries in his last note, I was led to consider them as preparatory to an embargo on American vessels. I could not conceive why he should request information of me, whether the President's proclamation was authentic, and when it would be carried into effect, if it was not intended to found some measure on my reply of an unfriendly nature. The information desired was not necessary to remove any doubts of his Government on the points to which it applied, or to enable it to do justice to the United States in regard to the aggression of which they complained. The presumption that an embargo was intended gained strength from the circumstance that most of the gazettes had recommended, and that the public mind seemed to be essentially prepared for it. It was my most earnest wish to prevent, as far as in my power, so unjust and pernicious a procedure. As the measure contemplated, whatever it might be, seemed to be suspended for my answer, I was extremely solicitous, by the manner, to deprive this Government of all pretext for any of the kind alluded to. By replying generally that I had no instructions from my Government, and could state nothing on its part respecting the late occurrence, I avoided giving a direct answer to Mr. Canning's queries; and by drawing his attention to the application, which it was to be presumed would soon be made on the part of my Government on that subject, I endeavored to show more strongly the impolicy and injustice which would stamp any such measure on the part of Great Britain in the present stage.

No step has yet been taken by this Government of an unfriendly character towards the United States, and, from the communication which Mr. Canning made to the House of Commons on the day he received my last note, which you will find in the gazettes sent, I am persuaded that things will remain in the state in which they are, till your despatch is received. I trust that a disposition exists to make such reparation on the point in question, as will be satisfactory to the United States, and that it will be practicable and not difficult to preserve the friendly relations subsisting between the two countries. The party, however, in favor of war, consisting of the combined interests mentioned in my last, is strong and active, so that it is impossible to foresee the result.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAS. MONROE.

[Referred to in Mr. Monroe's despatch of August 14.]

From Mr. Canning to Mr. Monroe.

SIR:

FOREIGN OFFICE, August 8, 1807.

Having received from His Majesty's minister in America an unofficial printed paper, purporting to be a copy of a proclamation of the President of the United States, I have to request that you will be pleased to acquaint me whether you have received any communication from your Government which enables you to pronounce if such paper be authentic.

In the event of your being empowered to admit its authenticity, I have further to request of you, that you will inform me whether you are also authorized to announce it to be the intention of the Government of the United States to carry into effect the measures stated in the proclamation of the President, without requiring or waiting for any explanation, on the part of the British Government, with respect to the late unfortunate transaction, upon which the determination to resort to these measures is professed to be founded.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE CANNING.

P. S. I have the honor to enclose an American newspaper containing a copy of the paper in question.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Canning.

SIR:

PORTLAND PLACE, August 9, 1807.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of yesterday, and should not hesitate to communicate the information which you have desired, if I possessed it; but as I have not heard from my Government on the subject of the unfortunate occurrence alluded to, it is not in my power to state to you any thing on the part of my Government respecting it. I have no doubt that I shall be instructed, in a very few days, to make a communication to His Majesty's Government on that highly interesting event, in which I shall be enabled to furnish a full and just view of all the circumstances attending it. As soon as I receive instructions, I shall hasten to apprise you of it.

I have the honor, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

LONDON, September 16, 1807.

I had the honor to receive your letter of July 6th, by Doctor Bullus, on the 31st ultimo, and did not lose a moment in entering on the business committed to me by it in the manner which seemed most likely to obtain success. The details shall be communicated to you in my next despatch. All that I can state at present is, that the whole subject has been placed fully before this Government, in as strong an appeal to its interest and judgment as I could make; and that as a week has elapsed since my official note was presented, I am in daily expectation of receiving its decision on it. The moment is in many views very favorable to a satisfactory result, but still it is not in my power, from any thing that has occurred, to speak with confidence of it. The joint negotiation committed to Mr. Pinkney and myself was suspended by the intelligence of the affair with our frigate, and has never been revived since. That intelligence reached this about a week after Mr. Purviance, so that we had only been able, with the utmost diligence, to take the preliminary step of presenting to Mr. Canning, in conformity to our instructions, a project, and of explaining to him, in the most minute and comprehensive manner that we could, every circumstance appertaining to it. No answer was given to our communication; the suspension, therefore, of the negotiation was imputable to Mr. Canning; had he answered our communication, and proposed to proceed in the negotiation, it would have become a question for the commission to have decided how far it would have been proper, under existing circumstances, to comply with the invitation. His silence, however, relieved us from that dilemma.

Permit me to present to you Mr. Joseph A. Smith, of South Carolina, and to refer you to him for much information of a general nature on the subject of our affairs with this country. Having been long in Europe, and visited almost every part, he possesses great information of the political state of its several Powers, especially of Russia, from whose sovereign he received very distinguished marks of attention. In much communication which I have had with Mr. Smith for a year past, I have found him to be animated with strong sentiments of patriotism towards his country; and as he has expressed a desire of being personally known to the President and yourself, I have been happy to promote his object by giving him this introduction.

I am, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

P. S. A copy of my note to Mr. Canning is enclosed.

No. 10.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Canning.

PORTLAND PLACE, September 1, 1807.

Mr. Monroe presents his compliments to Mr. Canning, and has the honor to inform him that he has just received instructions from his Government relative to the late attack on the United States' frigate Chesapeake by His Majesty's ship Leopard, off the coast of the United States.

Mr. Monroe requests that Mr. Canning would have the goodness to give him an early interview on that subject.

Mr. Monroe requests Mr. Canning to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

No. 11.

From Mr. Canning to Mr. Monroe.

FOREIGN OFFICE, September 1, 1807.

Mr. Canning presents his compliments to Mr. Monroe, and requests the honor of seeing him at the Foreign Office on Thursday next, at twelve o'clock.

Mr. Canning would have proposed to see Mr. Monroe to-morrow, if he had not been under the necessity of attending the levee and council at the Queen's palace.

Mr. Canning requests Mr. Monroe to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

No. 12.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Canning.

SIR:

PORTLAND PLACE, September 7, 1807.

By the order of my Government, it is my duty to request your attention to the aggression lately committed on the peace and sovereignty of the United States, by His Britannic Majesty's ship of war Leopard, in an attack on an American frigate, the Chesapeake, off the capes of Virginia. The object of this communication is to obtain of His Majesty's Government a suitable reparation for that outrage, and such an arrangement of the great interest which is connected with it, as will place the future relations of the two Powers on a solid foundation of peace and friendship.

In bringing this subject again to the view of His Majesty's Government, it is unnecessary to dwell on circumstances which are already so well known to you. By the documents which I have the honor to transmit to you, it is shown, that while the outrage was unprovoked and unexpected on one side, there was nothing to extenuate it on the other. The commander of His Majesty's squadron on the coast of the United States appears to have acted on a presumption that he possessed the power to make war, and to decide on the causes of war. It will be difficult to explain the conduct of that officer on any other principle, and equally so to find an example of an aggression marked with such high indignity and injustice to a friendly Power.

The pretext for this aggression could not fail to heighten the sense of injury which the act itself was so signally calculated to excite. My Government was taught to infer from it, that there was no limit to a pretension which had already produced so much mischief, and against which so many remonstrances had been presented, in its application to merchant vessels. But I find, with great satisfaction, that this pretension forms no topic for discussion between us in respect to ships of war; and I trust that the just and enlightened policy which produced the decision in one instance will surmount the obstacle which has hitherto embarrassed it in the other.

The national character of the men who were taken thus violently from on board the Chesapeake makes no part of the question. It is impossible that it should come into view in estimating the injury which the United States have received. The outrage involved a great and uncontested principle, which ought not, in any view, to be affected by appealing to national sensibilities on either side. I have, however, the honor to transmit you documents, which will, I presume, satisfy you that they were American citizens.

With respect to the reparation which my Government ought to receive for this outrage, it will only be necessary to appeal to those sentiments which Great Britain would be sure to indulge, under like circumstances, to that sensibility to national honor which has distinguished so many epochs of her history. It will be recollected that the injury, which in itself was great, was much aggravated by the circumstances which attended it; that the peaceful relations of the United States were violated, and their unsuspecting confidence surprised. But I forbear to recite details which it is painful to contemplate. You will, I am persuaded, be satisfied, that in every light in which the subject can be seen, the honor of my Government, and of the whole nation, has been greatly outraged by the aggression, and that it becomes the honor of His Majesty's Government to make a distinguished reparation for it.

In presenting, in this friendly manner, this important subject to the consideration of His Majesty's Government, I am particularly instructed to request its attention to the great cause to which this and so many other injuries of a like kind may be traced—the impressment of men from the merchant vessels of the United States. In many essential circumstances, the objections which are applicable to impressments from ships of war, are equally applicable to those from merchant vessels. To the individuals who suffer by the practice, the injury is the same in either case. Their claim on their Government for protection is in both cases equal; every maxim of public law, and private right, which is violated in one, is equally violated in the other. The relation of the belligerent to the neutral Power extends to certain objects only, and is defined in each by known laws. Beyond that limit the rights of the neutral are sacred, and cannot be encroached on without violence and injustice. Is there a question of contraband, is the vessel destined to a blockaded port in violation of established principles, or does she contain enemies' property, the greatest extent to which the maritime law is carried by any nation? In these cases she is conducted to port for trial; the parties are heard by an impartial and responsible tribunal, and are heard again by appeal, if they desire it. Are any of the passengers on board the neutral vessel in the naval or military service of the enemy? If such are found, they are made prisoners; but, as prisoners, they have rights which the opposite belligerent is bound to respect. This practice, however, looks to other objects than are here recited. It involves no question of belligerent on one side, and of neutral on the other. It pursues the vessel of a friend for an unlawful purpose, which it executes in a manner equally unlawful. Every commercial vessel of the United States that navigates the ocean is liable to be invaded by it, and not an individual on board any of them is secure while the practice is maintained. It sets up every officer of His Majesty's navy as a judge, from whose decision there is no appeal. It makes him a judge, not of property, which is held most sacred, nor of the liberty of his fellow subjects only, however great the trust, and liable to abuse on the main ocean, but that of the citizens of another Power, whose rights as a nation are trampled on by the decision; a decision, in rendering which, every rule of evidence is violated, as it puts the proof of innocence on the accused; and is further highly objectionable, as there is too much reason to believe that it has been often guided more by the fitness of the party for service than any other circumstance. The distressing examples of this system of aggression, as it has effected individuals, on a scale of vast extent, it is unnecessary to recount here; they may be easily imagined. Voluminous documents, which prove them, are in the possession of both Governments.

It is possible that this practice may, in certain cases, and under certain circumstances, have been extended to the vessels of other Powers; but with them there was an infallible criterion to prevent error. It would be easy to distinguish between an Englishman and a Spaniard, an Italian, or a Swede; and the clear and irresistible evidence of his national character, and perhaps of his desertion, would establish the British claim to the individual, and reconcile the nation into whose service he had entered to his surrender. But the very circumstances which would constitute an infallible criterion in those cases, would be sure to produce endless error in the other. Who is so skilful in physiognomy as to distinguish between an American and an Englishman, especially among those whose profession and whose sea-terms are the same? It is evident that this practice, as applied to a foreign nation, to any great extent, has grown out of the American revolution, and that it is impossible for the United States not to see in it the assertion of a claim which is utterly incompatible with that great event. When the character of this claim, and the pernicious tendency of the practice, are maturely weighed, it must furnish cause for surprise that some just and friendly arrangement has not long since been adopted, to prevent the evils incident to it.

My Government is aware that His Majesty's Government has also an interest of importance to attend to in this delicate concern, and I am instructed to state on its part, that the best disposition exists to provide for it. The United States are far from desiring to profit of a resource which does not belong to them, especially to the prejudice of a friendly Power. In securing them against the practice, which is found to be so highly injurious to their dearest rights, and most valuable interests, every suitable provision will be made to give equal security to those of Great Britain. On this point I am authorized to enter into such an engagement as will, I am persuaded, be adequate to the object.

This great interest of impressment has been blended in all its relations, as you will perceive, by no act of the United States. Its connexion with the late disastrous incident has been produced by an extraordinary act of violence, of which they were the victims only. That act, which exhibits the pretensions in its widest range, has become identified with the general practice, in the feelings and sympathies of the nation, and in the sentiments of the Government. I trust, therefore, that His Majesty's Government will be equally disposed to take up the whole subject at this time, and, in making the reparation which the particular injury claims, provide a remedy for the whole evil. My Government looks to this complete adjustment with confidence, as being indispensably necessary to heal the deep wound which has been inflicted on the national honor of the United States by so great and unjustifiable an outrage.

I avail myself, with great satisfaction, of the opportunity which this communication affords, to acknowledge the prompt assurance which you gave me of the disposition of His Majesty's Government to make a suitable reparation to the Government of the United States, for the injury of which, by its order, it is now my duty to complain; and for the frank disavowal of the pretension on which it was founded. I hastened to transmit copies of those documents to my Government, by whom, I trust, they are by this time received.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Canning.

PORTLAND PLACE, September 9, 1807.

Mr. Monroe presents his compliments to Mr. Canning, and has the honor to inform him that he called at his office yesterday, for the purpose of making some remarks on the subject treated in the note which he addressed on the — instant to Mr. Canning. Mr. Monroe regrets that he had not the pleasure of seeing Mr. Canning at that time, and requests that he will be so good as to give him an interview to-morrow, at such hour as may be most convenient to him. Mr. Monroe will be happy to attend Mr. Canning in the country, should it be more agreeable to Mr. Canning to receive him there.

From Mr. Canning, in answer.

BURLINGTON HOUSE, Wednesday, September 9, 1807, 8 $\frac{3}{4}$ P. M.

Mr. Canning presents his compliments to Mr. Monroe, and will be happy to have the honor of seeing him at the Foreign Office, to-morrow, at 12 o'clock.

Mr. Canning has but this minute received Mr. Monroe's note.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

LONDON, October 10, 1807.

I have the honor to transmit you, by Doctor Bullus, a copy of my correspondence with Mr. Canning, on the subject which was committed to my care by your letter of the 6th of July last. You will find by it, that the pressure which has been made on this Government, in obedience to the instruction contained in that letter, has terminated in a decision to send a minister to the United States to adjust the business there. What the powers of that minister will be, whether it is intended to confine them to the sole object of reparation for the special outrage, or to extend them, in case the proposed separation of that from the general topic of impressment is admitted, to the latter object, it is not in my power to state. Mr. Canning has given me no information on that head in conference, and his note is not explicit on it. It states that the minister, who shall be sent to the United States, to bring the dispute relative to the attack on the Chesapeake to a conclusion, shall not be empowered to entertain, as connected with that subject, any proposition respecting the search of merchant vessels; a presumption is authorized, by those terms, that the minister will have power to treat on the general topic after the special one is arranged. But it is possible that that presumption may have been raised for some other purpose, or that the terms which excite it were introduced merely to convey the idea that the mission should be confined to the special object.

In the discharge of this delicate and important trust, I thought that I should be able more effectually to promote its object, by opening the subject to Mr. Canning in conference, than by an official note. As the attitude taken by my Government, which was evidently supported by the whole nation, was of a very impressive nature, it seemed probable, from the feverish state of the public mind here in regard to us, that a tone of conciliation, which should not weaken the pressure, would be more likely to succeed in obtaining the reparation desired, than an official and peremptory demand. Under this impression, I had several conferences with Mr. Canning, the substance of which in each I will endeavor to state with precision. A knowledge of what passed in these interviews, in aid of that which is afforded by the correspondence, will enable you to form the most correct idea of the object of the proposed mission that present circumstances will admit of.

The first interview was on the 3d of September, as soon as it could be obtained after the receipt of your letter of July the 6th, which was on the 30th of August. I informed Mr. Canning, that as I wished the discussion in which we were about to enter to terminate amicably and honorably to both our Governments, I had asked the interview for the purpose of promoting that desirable end; that by explaining to each other fully, in friendly conference, the views of our respective Governments relative to the late aggression, I was persuaded that it would be more easy for us to arrange the business to the satisfaction of both parties, than by any other mode which we could pursue. He expressed his sensibility to that which I had chosen, and his readiness to concur in it. I then stated in detail, in explicit terms, the reparation which my Government thought the United States entitled to, and expected that they should receive, for the injury and indignity offered by the late aggression: that the men taken from the frigates should be restored to it; that the officers who had committed the aggression should be exemplarily punished; that the practice of impressment from merchant vessels should be suppressed; and that the reparation consisting of those several acts should be announced to our Government, through the medium of a special mission, a solemnity which the extraordinary nature of the aggression particularly required. I observed, that as the aggression, and the principle on which it was founded, had been frankly disavowed as soon as known, by his Government, I was persuaded that there could be no serious objection on its part to any of the acts which it was desired should constitute the proposed reparation; that to the first act, the restoration of the men, there could doubtless be none, as the least that could be done after such an outrage would be to replace the United States, as far as it might be practicable, on the ground they held before the injury was received; that the punishment of the officers followed, as a necessary consequence, to the disavowal of the act; that the suppression of the practice of impressment from merchant vessels had been made indispensable by the late aggression, for reasons which were sufficiently well known to him. I stated to him that the mode in which it was desired that the reparation should be made, by a special mission, was that which had been adopted by other Powers, and by Great Britain herself, for injuries less severe than the one alluded to, of which I gave him the examples furnished me in your letter of July 6th. Mr. Canning took a note of what I had stated, and made some general remarks on the whole subject, which were intended to give his view of it, on each point, but without compromising himself in a positive manner on any one. He said that, by the proclamation of the President, and the seizure and detention of some men who had landed on the coast to procure water, the Government seemed to have taken redress into its own hands; he complained of the difference, which he said had been made between France and England, by restoring deserters to the vessels of the former, and not the latter; he insisted that the late aggression was an act different in all respects to the former practice, and ought not to be connected with it, as it showed a disposition to make a particular incident, in which they were in the wrong, instrumental to an accommodation in a case where his Government held a different doctrine. I urged, in reply, that the proclamation could not be considered as an act of hostility or retaliation for injuries, though the aggression had provoked, and would have justified any the strongest act of reprisal, but as a mere measure of police, which had become indispensable for the preservation of order within the limits of the United States. I informed him that the men who had landed from the squadron, in defiance of the proclamation, and of the law on which it was founded, had been restored to it; that with respect to the other point, the difference said to be made in the case of deserters from British and French ships, I was unacquainted with the fact, but was satisfied, if the statement was correct, that the difference was imputable to the local authorities, and not to the national Government, because, as the United States were not bound by treaty to restore deserters from the service of either nation, it was not presumable that their Government would interfere in the business. I observed, however, that if such a preference had been given, there was a natural and justifiable cause for it, proceeding from the conduct of the squadrons of France and England on the coast of the United States, and on the main ocean; it being a well known fact, that the former did not maintain as a right, or adopt in practice, the doctrine of the latter to impress seamen from our merchant vessels. I then discussed at length, and urged with great earnestness, the justice and policy of his terminating at this time all the differences which had arisen between our Governments from this cause, by an arrangement which should suppress the practice on the part of Great Britain, and remedy the evil of which she complained. In aid of those reasons which were applicable to the merits of the question, I urged the example given by the late ministry, in the paper of November 8th, presented to Mr. Pinkney and myself by the British commissioners, which had, as I thought, laid the foundation of such an arrangement. I stated that, as it was stipulated by that paper that the negotiation should be kept open for the purpose of arranging this great interest, without prejudice to the rights of either Power, it was fairly to be understood, as the sense of both parties, that our rights were to be respected, until that arrangement was concluded; whence it would follow that the same effect would be produced in practice, as if it had been provided for by treaty. I relied on this paper, and the construction which I thought it admitted, with which, however, the practice had since in no degree corresponded, to show the extent to which the former ministry had gone in meeting the just views of our Government, and thereby to prove that the present ministry, in improving that ground, had nothing to apprehend from the preceding one. Mr. Canning admitted that the view which I had taken of this paper derived much support from its contents, and the time and circumstances under which it was presented, but persisted in his desire to keep the subject separate. I proposed, as an expedient to get rid of his objection, that we should take up and arrange both points informally; in which case, provided it was done in a manner to be obligatory, I offered to frame my note, which should demand reparation for the outrage, in general terms, so as that it should not appear, by official document, that the subjects had any connexion in the negotiation. I urged that unless it was intended to make no provision against impressment from merchant vessels, I could see no objection to his meeting me on that ground, as, after what had passed, it was impossible to take up either subject without having the other in view, and equally so to devise any mode which should keep them more completely separate, than that which I proposed. Mr. Canning still adhered to his doctrine of having nothing to do with impressment from merchant vessels till the affair of the Chesapeake was disposed of, after which he professed his willingness to proceed to the other object. In this manner the conference ended without having produced the arrangement which I had hoped for it. Mr. Canning's conduct was in all other respects conciliatory.

My note to Mr. Canning was founded on the result of this conference. As it had not been in my power to come to any agreement with him on the general subject of impressment from merchant vessels, I considered it my duty to combine it with the affair of the Chesapeake, in the paper which I presented him to claim reparation for the outrage. I thought it best, however, to omit the other acts of which it was desired that the reparation should consist. It seemed probable that specification of each circumstance, in the note, would increase the indisposition of the ministry to accommodate, and give it support with the nation, in a complete rejection of the demand. I expressed myself, therefore, in regard to the other acts, in general and conciliatory terms, but with all the force in my power. The details had been communicated to Mr. Canning in conference too recently to be forgotten. Still it was just that no improper inference should be drawn from the omission of them. To prevent it, I obtained an interview of Mr. Canning immediately after my note was presented, in which, after reminding him of the omission alluded to, the motive to which, I presumed, he could not mistake, I added that my object in asking the interview had been to repeat to him informally, what I had stated in the former one, the other acts of which my Government expected that the reparation should consist. In this interview nothing occurred without the limit of the special object for which it had been obtained. Mr. Canning did not lead the conversation to any other topic, and I could not invite it.

Mr. Canning's answer to my note was delayed more than a fortnight. Having refused to treat the subjects in connexion, and intimated in plain terms that if I was not authorized to separate them, it would be useless to prolong the discussion, I thought it improper to press it. My reply was equally explicit, so that with it the negotiation ended. The measure which he announced, as being determined on by the King in case I could not agree to the separation, is completely the act of his Government. You will observe that it is announced in a form which precludes, in a great degree, the idea of its being adopted, at my suggestion, as an act of reparation, and in a tone of decision which seemed equally to preclude my holding any communication with him on it.

My mission, being thus brought to an end, has afforded an opportunity for me to return to the United States, as I have long desired. Nothing but the great interest which I take in the welfare of my country, and my earnest desire to give all the aid in my power to the present administration, in support of the pure principles of our most excellent constitution, would have detained me here so long. In the present state, however, it is not possible, if in any it would be, for me to render any service by a longer continuance here. As soon, therefore, as I had answered Mr. Canning's note, I communicated to him my intention to return, and requested that he would be so good as to obtain for me an audience of the King for the purpose of taking my leave of him. This was granted on the 7th of this month, in which I renewed the assurance of the sincere desire of my Government to preserve the most friendly relation between the United States and Great Britain, which sentiment was reciprocated by His Majesty. Mr. Pinkney succeeds me by an arrangement with Mr. Canning, which will appear in the enclosed copy of my correspondence with him, and which I have full confidence the President will approve. I regret that, in transferring the business into his hands, I do not leave him altogether free from difficulty.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

P. S. Not being satisfied with the undefined character of the proposed mission to the United States, and Mr. Canning having communicated nothing new to me on the subject in my interview with him on the day I was presented to the King, although an opportunity was afforded for the purpose, I wrote him a note, after the commencement of this letter, to make certain inquiries on that head, a copy of which note and of his answer is herewith enclosed. You will observe that he still holds himself aloof on it. I thought it my duty, and that it comported with strict delicacy, to make the inquiry, and I cannot but consider his reserve as affording cause for an unfavorable inference. It is probable, however, as the door is left open for further communication between us until the moment of my departure, that he will take some other occasion to explain himself more fully on the subject. You may be assured that I will seek every favorable opportunity to obtain such explanation of him.

[Enclosed in the preceding letter.]

From Mr. Canning.

SIR:

FOREIGN OFFICE, October 22, 1807.

Having seen in the American newspapers an official article, (of which I have the honor to enclose a copy,) prohibiting all intercourse between the inhabitants of the United States and His Majesty's ships of war, universally, I have the honor to request that you will have the goodness to inform me whether this prohibition will extend to the ship of war in which a minister, accredited from His Majesty, and charged with a mission to the American Government, shall arrive in any of the ports of the United States? Or whether you or Mr. Pinkney can undertake to furnish Mr. Rose with such documents as shall ensure his admission into the American ports, and a reception therein suitable to the character with which he is invested?

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

GEORGE CANNING.

JAMES MONROE, Esq., &c.

To Mr. Canning.

SIR:

PORTLAND PLACE, October 23, 1807.

I have the honor to state, in reply to your letter of yesterday, that the case to which you alluded is specially provided for by the proclamation of the President. You will observe, on a view of that document, that an exception is made, from the prohibition it contains on other vessels, in favor of such ships of His Majesty as may enter the ports of the United States with despatches from His Majesty's Government. Had the case of a public minister, employed in a special mission to my Government, not been comprised in that exception, as it clearly is, I have no hesitation in stating that he would be received without delay at any port at which he might arrive. I have the honor to add, that Mr. Pinkney and myself will be happy to give to His Majesty's minister every facility in our power to secure him the reception at the port of his destination which is due to his public character, and promote his speedy arrival at the seat of the Government of the United States.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

The Right Hon. GEORGE CANNING, &c.

From Mr. Canning.

SIR:

FOREIGN OFFICE, October 23, 1807. Half past 10, P. M.

I have to acknowledge the honor of your answer to my letter of yesterday evening. It appears to me to be so important to have a clear understanding on the subject to which that letter refers, that I cannot forbear requesting you to have the goodness to call at the Foreign Office to-morrow at two o'clock, if that hour should suit your convenience.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

GEORGE CANNING.

JAMES MONROE, Esq., &c.

Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

LONDON, October 10, 1807.

We avail ourselves of the opportunity afforded by the return of the schooner Revenge, to give you a brief account of the transactions of the joint mission, from the time of Mr. Purviance's arrival in England until the receipt of intelligence here of the late outrage in the American seas upon the sovereignty of our country.

Your letter of the — day of May was delivered to us on the — day of July, and we lost no time in obtaining an interview with Mr. Canning on the subjects to which it relates. In the course of that interview, we entered at large into the explanations required by our instructions, and, at the same time, recalled to Mr. Canning's attention the statement, which we had made to him at former conferences, relative to our want of power to bind our Government by a treaty which should not provide in a satisfactory manner for the subject of impressment. That we might be enabled to give to Mr. Canning a more complete view of the grounds of the President's disapprobation of the instrument signed in December last, and of the alterations in that instrument which we had to propose, we thought it advisable to suggest these alterations in the margin of a copy of it, and to prepare moreover separate clauses relative to impressments and indemnity. Of these papers, copies are herewith transmitted.

We had scarcely finished our explanations, when Mr. Canning intimated the propriety of putting them into the form of a note. He expressed, however, his readiness and his wish, for the purpose of saving time, to receive immediately the papers above mentioned, which, as containing the project of such an arrangement as would be acceptable to the President, we did not hesitate to deliver to him. An official note being required by Mr. Canning, we had no choice but to consent to that course, and, as you will find in the copy of the note itself, a brief recapitulation of the substance of what we thought it prudent to say to him, in that stage of the transaction, upon the principal points embraced by it, it is unnecessary to repeat it here. It is proper, however, to observe, that, although nothing was said by Mr. Canning which authorized us to calculate with certainty on the ultimate success of renewed negotiation, there was nothing in his language or manner of an unfriendly character.

Our note was prepared with as much expedition as the importance and delicacy of its topics would permit, but, before it was possible to send it to Mr. Canning, he reminded us of it by a note, of which a copy is enclosed. Our note, which we hope will meet with the President's approbation, was delivered to Mr. Canning on the next day. We did not think it proper, for obvious reasons, either in conversation or in our note, to enter into any argument in support of the different alterations suggested by our project to the proposed treaty. This it was thought would be more regularly as well as advantageously attempted when negotiation should be resumed. It is only necessary to add, that before Mr. Canning had replied to our note, information was received of the outrage committed by the Leopard, and that our proceedings were in consequence suspended.

We have the honor to enclose the copy of a bill delivered to us some time ago by Lord Auckland for permitting an intercourse, by sea, between the British North American colonies and the United States. This bill was brought into the House of Commons, during the last session of Parliament, by Mr. Rose and Mr. Eden, and has passed into a law. You will perceive that it has in view the eighth article of the project of a convention of limits, already transmitted to you. A copy is also enclosed of the communication which we have thought it our duty to make to General Armstrong and Mr. Bowdoin.

We have the honor to be, with the highest respect and consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servants,

JAS. MONROE,
WM. PINKNEY.

JAMES MADISON, Esq., &c.

P. S. We have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letters of the 17th and 30th of July. There not being time to prepare a copy of the project presented Mr. Canning for Dr. Bullus, it will be forwarded by another opportunity without delay.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

[Transmitted in Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney's despatch of October 10, 1807.]

Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Canning.

LONDON, July 24, 1807.

The undersigned, ministers extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the United States of America, have the honor to inform Mr. Canning that they are instructed by the President of the United States to propose to His Majesty's Government a renewal of negotiation, relative to the objects of the mission of the undersigned, with a view to a more satisfactory result than is found in the instrument signed on the 31st of December last, by His Majesty's plenipotentiaries and those of the United States.

The undersigned are persuaded that His Majesty's Government will see in this measure an unquestionable proof of the sincere desire of the President to place the friendly relations of the two countries beyond the reach of those misunderstandings which either the absence or the inadequacy of precise arrangements on subjects of the greatest delicacy and importance might from time to time occasion.

It is under the influence of this solicitude, that the President has charged the undersigned to express to His Majesty's Government his unfeigned regret that the instrument above mentioned does not appear to him to be such as he can approve, and, at the same time, to declare his entire confidence that the just and liberal sentiments which animate His Majesty's Government, corresponding with those which belong to the Government of the United States, cannot fail to lead, without delay or difficulty, to such an issue of the negotiation, which is now proposed, as shall be suited, in all respects, to the rights and interests of both nations, and, therefore, calculated to ensure a long continuance of the friendship which so happily subsists between them.

The undersigned have already had the honor to present to Mr. Canning a paper, which, taken in connexion with a project on the subject of impressment, and another on the subject of certain claims to compensation by American citizens, presented by the undersigned at the same time, will be found to exhibit a complete view of the alterations which the instrument above mentioned is deemed by the President to require. They forbear to trouble Mr. Canning with a recapitulation of the details which these papers contain; but there are some explanations upon the topics of impressment and compensation which they do not furnish, and which it is, therefore, incumbent upon the undersigned to avail themselves of this occasion to give.

It was one of the primary objects of the mission of the undersigned to adjust with His Majesty's Government a formal and explicit arrangement relative to a practice by British ships of war, which has excited in a very great degree the sensibility of the American people, and claimed the anxious attention of their Government. The practice alluded to is that of visiting on the main ocean the merchant vessels of the United States, navigating under the American flag, for the purpose of subjecting their crews to a hasty and humiliating inquisition, and impressing as British seamen such of the mariners as upon that inquisition the visiting officer declares to be so. The effect of this practice is, that the flag of an independent Power is dishonored, and one of the most essential rights of its sovereignty violated; that American citizens, either mistaken for British subjects, or assumed to be such without sufficient inquiry, are forced from the quiet pursuits of a lawful commerce into the severe and dangerous service of a foreign military navy, to expose their lives in fighting against those with whom their country is at peace; and that the merchant vessels of the United States are frequently thus stripped of so large a portion of their hands, before their voyages have been performed, as to bring into the most imminent peril, and sometimes to produce the actual loss of the vessels, their cargoes, and their remaining crews. It cannot be thought surprising that a practice like this should act with peculiar force upon the feelings of those whom it oppresses, and that the sensation should extend itself to their countrymen and their Government.

The Government of the United States has accordingly made this pretension the subject of frequent discussion with Great Britain, and, when an extraordinary mission to His Majesty's Government was last year determined on, it was one of the instructions to the undersigned, to whom the duties of that mission were confided, to make no treaty which should not provide for that object. In the first stages of the negotiation which followed that mission, the undersigned were led to indulge a confident expectation that such a provision would be obtained. At length, however, the rejection by His Majesty's Government of a project of an article on this point, which, without touching the question of right, offered on the part of the United States an effectual equivalent for the mere forbearance of the practice, having extinguished all hope of an immediate adjustment of this subject by treaty, the undersigned felt that they were called upon by candor, as well as by their duty to their Government, to inform the British commissioners, that the project relative to impressment having failed, they had no power to conclude a treaty upon the other points which had been discussed between them, so as to bind the Government of the United States. The undersigned did accordingly give them this information in the most explicit terms, and the negotiation was, in consequence, for a short time suspended. It was soon afterwards, however, suggested by His Majesty's commissioners, that if this topic should be expressly reserved for future conventional arrangement, and a pledge given to the United States for resuming the consideration of it, at a convenient season, with that view; and if in the mean time such an informal understanding should be substituted as in its practical effect would remove the vexation complained of, it might, perhaps, be yet possible to conduct the negotiation to a result which would not be unacceptable to the respective Governments; and in pursuance of this suggestion the British commissioners presented to the undersigned, on the 8th day of November last, the official note, of which a copy is herewith enclosed. The undersigned transmitted to their Government for its consideration a copy of this note, together with a statement of the circumstances connected with it, and, without giving it their sanction, agreed in the mean time to concur with the British commissioners, as they were invited to do, in an effort to adjust the stipulations of a treaty upon the remaining objects of their mission, and to leave the effect of what should be so adjusted to their Government.

It appears that the President of the United States considers this collateral proceeding upon a concern of such paramount importance as unsuitable to the nature of it, as well in the mode as in its terms. In this opinion the President does but continue to respect the considerations which heretofore induced him to believe that an arrangement upon this point ought to stipulate with precision against the practice in question, and that the manner of it would properly be that which should be chosen for the arrangement of the other points of discussion; and in the instructions which, in conformity with that opinion, he has now given to the undersigned, he does but manifest his reliance upon the spirit of justice and amity which he is assured His Majesty's Government will bring to the renewed consideration of a subject, so interesting to the rights and feelings of a friendly nation, for such an adjustment of this, as well as of every other question belonging to the relations of the two countries, as shall confirm their dispositions to mutual kindness and promote the happiness of both.

The subject of compensation will perhaps be sufficiently explained by the enclosed copies of two notes from the undersigned to Lord Holland and Lord Auckland, and to Lord Howick. It will appear, from the last of these notes, that this subject, for which the projected treaty did not provide, was not to be affected by it; but on the contrary that the rights of the United States, and the claims of their citizens, were understood to be reserved for future adjustment, as completely as if no treaty had been made; and it will occur to Mr. Canning that the project of an article on this point which they had the honor to leave with him at their late interview is in the spirit of that understanding, and is besides so entirely free from objection, that no motive is likely to exist against the adoption of it.

There is another subject to which the undersigned have the orders of the President to invite the attention of His Majesty's Government, as affecting materially and giving a new and unexpected character to the proposed treaty. They allude to the written declaration, relative to the French decree of the 21st of November last, by which His Majesty's plenipotentiaries accompanied their signature of the treaty; a declaration which, in its actual form creates unnecessary embarrassments in the way of an acceptance of the treaty by the United States.

The undersigned persuade themselves that, as this proceeding, to which no sanction was given on their part, imposed on the United States no new obligation, and could only be intended to declare that, in signing or ratifying the treaty, it was understood by Great Britain that nothing contained in it would be a bar to any measure, which, if no such treaty had been signed, would be lawful as a measure of retaliation against her enemy, and as the occasion which produced it does not now appear to exist as then supposed, it will not be thought that any thing is sacrificed by withdrawing it as unnecessary.

The undersigned request Mr. Canning to accept the assurances of their distinguished consideration.

JAMES MONROE,
WILLIAM PINKNEY.

[Received in Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney's despatch of October 10.]

Copy of proposed alterations.

Article 3. Omit the words "and sailing direct from the ports of the said States."

Omit the words "between the said territories and the United States," and substitute "with the said territories."

After the words near the end of the first paragraph, "where the same shall be unladen," insert "or to some port or place, or ports or places, in China, or the Indian, or other seas beyond the Cape of Good Hope, from whence the said vessel shall proceed as aforesaid to some port or place in America, and there unlade their cargoes."

After the words "British territories," near the beginning of the second paragraph, insert "without the special permission of the British Government there."

After the words "St. Helena," near the end of the article, insert "or at such other places as may be in the possession of Great Britain in the African or Indian seas."

At the end of the article add, "and it is further agreed that if any other trade in and with the said British territories in the East Indies than is hereby authorized, or any other, or greater rights, or advantages in respect thereof shall be granted or permitted to the citizens or subjects of any European nation, the same shall be common to the citizens of the United States."

Article 5. At the end of the first paragraph insert, "nor shall any higher duties or charges be imposed in one country on the exportation of any articles to the ports of the other, than such as are payable on the exportation of the like articles to every other foreign country."

Article 7. Propose to strike out the last paragraph.

Article 8. Omit the words "on just suspicion of having on board enemy's property, or of carrying to the enemy any of the articles which are contraband of war."

Omit the word "other," immediately following these words, and substitute "any."

Omit the words "if any property of an enemy should be found on board such vessel."

Omit the words "belonging to an enemy or."

Omit the word "otherwise."

Article 9. After "tar and pitch," add "turpentine and rosin."

Article 10. At the end of the first paragraph introduce a definition of the blockade, "In order to determine what characterizes a blockade, that denomination is given only to a port where there is, by the disposition of the Power which blockades it with ships stationary, an evident danger in entering."

Article 11. Omit "during the present hostilities."

After the word "Europe," which immediately follows the above words, insert "or elsewhere."

Insert the same words after the word "Europe," in the second branch of the provision.

After the word "paid," insert "or secured to be paid."

After the words "and shall," in the proviso about duties, insert "except only mahogany and fustic."

At the end of the paragraph which precedes the last proviso, introduce the following: "It is understood that no inference is to be drawn from this article, to affect any question now or hereafter to be judicially depending, touching the legality or illegality of a direct trade from Europe or elsewhere, by citizens of the United States, with enemies' colonies beyond the Cape of Good Hope."

Article 12. Omit the last paragraph.

And the following words in the first paragraph, "except for the purpose hereafter mentioned."

Article 13. In the first paragraph of the article omit the words, "as favorably as the course of the war then existing may possibly permit, towards the most friendly Power that may remain neuter," &c. and the words, "as much as possible." So as to make it read thus: "According to the acknowledged principles and rules of the law of nations, and as favorably moreover as the course of the war then existing may possibly permit, towards the most friendly Power that may remain neuter."

Article 17 to be struck out, and the following to be substituted: "The ships of war and privateers of the two nations, as well as their prizes, shall be treated in their respective ports as those of the nation most favored."

Article 19. The two last paragraphs to be struck out.

Article 23 to stand thus: "It is agreed that, in case either party shall hereafter grant any additional advantages in navigation or trade to any other nation, the subjects or citizens of the other party shall fully participate therein freely, where it is freely granted to such other nation, or on yielding the same compensation where the grant is conditional."

Article 26. Period to be five years.

INDEMNITY ARTICLE.

Complaints having been made by divers merchants and others, citizens of the United States, that during the war in which His Majesty is engaged, they have sustained loss and damage by reason of the irregular or illegal captures or condemnations of their vessels and other property, under color of authority or commission from His Majesty, contrary to the tenor of a communication from Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. King, of the 11th April, 1801, of which a copy is annexed to this treaty; or contrary to the tenor of a letter from Mr. Merry to Mr. Madison, of the 12th April, 1801, of which, also, a copy is hereto annexed; or otherwise, contrary to the known and established rules of the law of nations; and the said merchants and others having further complained that full and complete redress for the said losses and damages has not been, and cannot be, for various causes, had and obtained in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, His Majesty agrees, that he will, without delay, cause the most effectual measures to be taken, in concert with the United States, for an impartial examination of the said complaints; and that he will cause full and complete reparation to be made thereupon to the parties entitled, as justice, and equity, and the nature of the respective cases shall appear to require.

Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

Sir:

LONDON, October 22, 1807.

We have the honor to transmit, enclosed, a duplicate of our joint letter to you by Dr. Bullus, together with a copy of the project of alterations to which it refers, and which could not be prepared in time to be sent with the original. We also enclose a printed copy of the act of Parliament relative to an intercourse by sea between the United States and the British North American colonies, of which a manuscript copy has already been transmitted.

Since the departure of Dr. Bullus, communications have taken place between Mr. Canning and ourselves, with which it is proper that you should be made acquainted.

On the 15th instant we received from Mr. Canning a note, requesting a conference on the following Saturday, (the 17th,) accompanied by a note, of which a copy is enclosed, explanatory of the purpose for which the conference was desired. Our reply was merely that we should wait on him at the time proposed. Mr. Canning opened this conference by observing, that before he stated the view which his Government had taken of the subject to which his note alluded, he had to request, if we saw no objection to it, an explanation of that part of our official note of the 24th of July, which, speaking of the written declaration of the British commissioners of the 31st of December last, suggests an opinion, that the occasion which produced it "does not now appear to exist as then supposed." He then read the concluding paragraphs of the declaration, and observed, that it was with a view to the reservation contained in them, that his inquiry, which we might be assured had the most friendly motive, was made. We replied, by stating with exactness the real foundation of the opinion in question, which, as he seemed to wish it, we promised to repeat in a note, to be sent to him without delay. A copy of the note afterwards delivered to him, in pursuance of this engagement, being among the enclosures, we beg leave to refer to it for the substance of what was stated by us upon this point in conversation.

Mr. Canning closed this interview by saying, that he feared it would be necessary to postpone what he had further to communicate until another opportunity; and requested us to meet him again on Monday, the 19th. Supposing that he was not in town on Sunday, and that nothing would be gained by sending in our promised note before the time appointed for our adjourned conference, we took the note with us, and delivered it ourselves, on Monday. Mr. Canning appeared to be satisfied with the explanation, to which we thought it our duty strictly to confine ourselves; but he did not seem to be prepared to proceed with the conference, and intimated that he would be glad to meet us again for that purpose on the Thursday or Friday following, and would give us notice which of those days would be most convenient.

A proclamation relative to the searching of the national and merchant vessels of neutral Powers for British seamen, having appeared in the London Gazette on the 17th, (with which the newspapers, already forwarded, and now sent, will make you acquainted,) we thought this a suitable occasion, of which it was incumbent on us to take advantage, for leading to an explanation of that proceeding. We began by expressing a hope that this paper was not intended to shut the door against negotiation and concession on the subject of impressment on board the merchant vessels of the United States, upon which Mr. Canning already knew the opinion and feeling of our Government. Mr. Canning replied, that the proclamation was not intended to have that effect; that it was simply a statement of the principles and practice upon the points to which it relates, which the British Government understood to be warranted by public law and long established usage; that such a statement did not exclude the idea of amicable discussion and adjustment with a Power which favored a different doctrine, and sought for the introduction of a different practice; that, as it did no more than declare with truth and precision the past and actual state of their rules upon these interesting points, no more was done by it to shut the door against negotiation and arrangement with the United States, than would have been done without it by the mere operation of the rules themselves, of which it was declaratory; that, while in this view, it could have no inconvenient effect, it was manifestly useful, and imperiously required in another; that it was indispensably necessary, for the information of their naval commanders, especially upon distant stations, who, after what had lately happened, would, without some such guide, be at a loss to know how to regulate their conduct, and would thus be exposed to the perpetual hazard, either of falling short of their duty or of exceeding it, in matters of the highest moment; that it was so far from being meant to wear an unfriendly appearance, or to increase the difficulties in the way of a good understanding with our country, that it was believed by His Majesty's Government to exhibit their disposition to conciliation in a way not to be mistaken, and to facilitate the establishment of such an understanding; that the proclamation had been prepared nearly three months ago, but had not been published until it was ascertained that the subject of it could not be affected by any negotiation, of which the result could soon be known; that the effect of Mr. Rose's mission, whatever might be hoped, could not appear for some months, and that, in the mean time, it seemed to be proper, that without changing the state of things to the prejudice of either party, their navy should not be left to conjecture their duty on subjects of such delicacy and importance, upon which so much had occurred to produce misconception and irritation; that it was impossible to consider in connexion his (Mr. Canning's) first note to Mr. Monroe, upon the receipt of intelligence of the affair of the Leopard and Chesapeake, the promptitude with which the King's Government had disavowed the intention of asserting a claim to search national ships for deserters, the explicit prohibition of such a practice in the proclamation, at a time when it was very generally maintained by the press, and notoriously countenanced by public opinion as lawful, expedient, and essential; and the mission, which was about to proceed to the United States, without being persuaded that, in the transaction in question, the views of Government were of the most friendly character.

These explanations were followed by others of a less satisfactory description. He said, in the progress of the conversation, that he ought not to leave us under the impression that there was any prospect that the Government of Great Britain could recede from its declared pretensions relative to searching on the high seas the merchant ships of neutral nations for British seamen; that the present state of the world, and the nature and mode of that hostility which France was now waging against this country, of which the great instrument was avowed to be the systematic exclusion of the trade, productions, and manufactures of Great Britain and her colonies from their usual markets, rendered it to the last degree hazardous, if not absolutely impracticable, to stipulate for the abandonment of a practice to which the navy and the people of England attached so much importance, even although the Government should itself be persuaded that it might be done with safety.

We endeavored to impress upon Mr. Canning the unfortunate influence which such views and sentiments could not fail to have upon any negotiation which might be attempted, in whatever form, between the two countries; but although his manner was as conciliatory as it could be, he did not allow us to believe that these sentiments would be relinquished, or, consequently, that Mr. Rose would have powers upon the general topic of impressment.

We have not since heard from Mr. Canning, but are every moment in expectation of an appointment for another interview.

We deem it to be so important that you should be in possession of the foregoing details before the Government of the United States takes its course relative to Mr. Rose's mission, that we have determined to send this despatch by Mr. Rose himself, who is so good as to offer to take charge of our letters. As he sails immediately in a frigate now at Portsmouth, the presumption is that he will arrive before Mr. Monroe, who will sail in a few days in the Augustus for Norfolk.

We shall add in a postscript any thing that shall occur before Mr. Rose leaves town.

We have the honor to be, with the highest respect and consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servants,
 JAMES MONROE,
 WILLIAM PINKNEY.

P. S. Mr. Canning's note, (erroneously dated on the 17th instead of the 15th instant,) of which a copy is enclosed, states the existence of a mutual understanding between him and us, "by which, on the receipt of the first accounts of the unfortunate encounter between the Leopard and the Chesapeake, we agreed to confine our official discussions to that single subject until it should be finally adjusted." It may not be improper to mention, although the fact is of no real importance, that this statement is inaccurate. Upon the receipt of intelligence that the proposed treaty of December last was not likely to be accepted by our Government, there was an understanding (as heretofore explained to you) that it might be necessary to suspend our proceedings until the arrival of more precise information upon that point, and perhaps until the arrival of our instructions. Mr. Canning confounds that epoch with the more recent one to which he alludes. His conduct in forbearing to press our negotiation after the affair of the Chesapeake was known was undoubtedly such as we approved and desired, but it did not arise out of any agreement with us.

P. S. October 24th. We received yesterday evening a note from Mr. Canning dated the 22d, transmitting the answer of this Government to our note of the 24th July. Copies of these papers are enclosed.

JAS. MONROE,
 WM. PINKNEY.

JAMES MADISON, Esq., &c.

[Referred to in the preceding despatch.]

Mr. Canning to Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney.

GENTLEMEN:

FOREIGN OFFICE, October 17, [15,] 1807.

The mutual understanding, by which, on the receipt of the first accounts of the unfortunate encounter between the Leopard and the Chesapeake, we agreed to confine our official discussions to that single subject until it should be finally adjusted, has alone prevented me from returning long ago an official answer to your note of the 24th of July.

The nature of Mr. Monroe's instructions has unfortunately precluded that settlement, which His Majesty's Government so anxiously desired, of the question respecting the Chesapeake, by negotiation, between that gentleman and myself. But that question being now put into a train of separate adjustment, by the appointment of a minister on the part of His Majesty to proceed to America for that special purpose, and the return of Mr. Monroe to America making it necessary that you should be apprised of the sentiments of His Majesty's Government as to the state in which the treaty signed by you and His Majesty's commissioners on the 31st of December last is left, by the refusal of the President of the United States to ratify that instrument, I have to request a conference with you for that purpose previous to Mr. Monroe's departure.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, gentlemen, your most obedient, humble servant,
GEORGE CANNING.

Messrs. MONROE and PINKNEY, &c.

Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney to Mr. Canning.

SIR:

LONDON, October 18, 1807.

In our interview of yesterday you requested that we would explain the ground of the opinion (that which is expressed in our letter to you of July 24th,) that the occasion which induced the British commissioners to present to us the note of the 31st of December preceding had ceased to exist.

We hasten to comply with that request, as we shall do to give an explanation of any other passage in that letter which you may desire.

We were of opinion, at the time when the British commissioners presented to us that paper, that the decree of the Government of France, to which it related, ought not to be considered applicable to the United States, because such a construction was plainly repugnant to the treaty subsisting between the United States and France, and likewise because the decree might be understood to relate only to France and the dominions subject to her arms. We alluded, however, in our letter of July 24th, to circumstances which had occurred since the date of the decree, as fixing unequivocally an interpretation of it which we at first supposed to be reasonable.

Great anxiety having been excited by a different construction which many believed the decree to be susceptible of, the minister of the United States at Paris requested of the Minister of Marine, who was charged with its execution, an explanation of the sense in which it was understood by his Government, who assured him that it was not intended that it should in any degree interfere with the provisions of the treaty of 1800 between the United States and France.

We relied also upon the fact, not only that no countenance had been given by any practice or judicial decision in France to a different construction, but that the practice was in precise conformity with the view above suggested; and that, in a cause in which the question had been formally brought into discussion, the court had sanctioned the conclusion that the treaty between the two nations was to be exactly fulfilled, and that the decree was to be so construed as not to infringe it.

We think it proper to confine ourselves to the explanation which you have desired of the passage alluded to in our former letter, and not to enter in this communication, in any other respect, on the subject of the paper with which it is connected.

We have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servants,
JAS. MONROE,
WM. PINKNEY.

Right Hon. GEORGE CANNING, &c.

Mr. Canning to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney.

GENTLEMEN:

FOREIGN OFFICE, October 22, 1807.

The considerations which have hitherto suspended our communication on the subject of the treaty returned from America having ceased by the termination of the discussion between Mr. Monroe and myself respecting the encounter between the Leopard and the Chesapeake, I have now the honor to transmit to you the answer which I have been commanded by His Majesty to return to your note of the 24th of July.

I have the honor to be, with high consideration, gentlemen, your most obedient, humble servant,
GEORGE CANNING.

Messrs. MONROE and PINKNEY, &c.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in returning an answer to the official note with which Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney have accompanied their communication of the copy of the treaty which has been sent back unratified from America, is commanded, in the first place, to inform the American commissioners that His Majesty cannot profess himself to be satisfied that the American Government has taken any such effectual steps with respect to the decree of France, by which the whole of His Majesty's dominions are declared in a state of blockade, as to do away the ground of that reservation which was contained in the note delivered by His Majesty's commissioners at the time of the signature of the treaty; but that, reserving to himself the right of taking, in consequence of that decree, and of the omission of any effectual interposition on the part of neutral nations to obtain its revocation, such measures of retaliation as His Majesty might judge expedient, it was nevertheless the desire and determination of His Majesty, if the treaty had been sanctioned by the ratification of the President of the United States, to have ratified it on His Majesty's part, and to have given the fullest extent to all its stipulations.

Some of the considerations upon which the refusal of the President of the United States to ratify the treaty is founded, are such as can be matter of discussion only between the American Government and its commissioners; since it is not for His Majesty to inquire, whether, in the conduct of this negotiation, the commissioners of the United States have failed to conform themselves in any respect to the instructions of their Government.

In order to determine the course which His Majesty has to pursue in the present stage of the transaction, it is sufficient that the treaty was considered by those who signed it as a complete and perfect instrument. No engagements were entered into on the part of His Majesty, as connected with the treaty, except such as appear upon the face of it. Whatever encouragement may have been given by His Majesty's commissioners to the hope expressed by the commissioners of the United States, that discussions might thereafter be entertained with respect to the impressment of British seamen from merchant vessels, must be understood to have had in view the renewal of such discussions, not as forming any part of the treaty then signed, (as the American commissioners appear to have been instructed to assume,) but separately, and at some subsequent period more favorable to their successful termination.

But the alterations proposed by the President of the United States in the body of the treaty thus formally concluded, appear to require more particular observations.

The undersigned is commanded distinctly to protest against a practice altogether unusual in the political transactions of States, by which the American Government assumes to itself the privilege of revising and altering agreements concluded and signed on its behalf by its agents duly authorized for that purpose; of retaining so much of those agreements as may be favorable to its own views, and of rejecting such stipulations, or such parts of stipulations, as are conceived to be not sufficiently beneficial to America.

If the American Government has a right to exercise such a revision, an equal right cannot be denied to others; and it is obvious that the adoption of such a practice by both parties to a treaty would tend to render negotiation indefinite, and settlement hopeless; or rather to supersede altogether the practice of negotiation through authorized commissioners, and to make every article of a compact between State and State the subject of repeated reference and of endless discussion. The alteration of particular articles in a treaty, after the whole has been carefully adjusted and arranged, must necessarily open the whole to renewed deliberation. The demands of one party are not to be considered as absolute, nor the concessions of the other as unconditional.

What may have been given on the one hand, in consideration of advantage to be derived in return from accompanying stipulations, might have been refused if those stipulations had been less favorable, and must necessarily be withdrawn if they are changed.

It cannot be admitted that any Government should hold those with whom it treats to all that has been granted by them in its favor, relaxing at the same time on its part the reciprocal conditions for which its own faith has been engaged; or that, after having obtained by negotiation a knowledge of the utmost extent of concession to which the other contracting party is prepared to consent in the conclusion of a treaty, it should require yet further concession without equivalent as the price of its ratification.

The undersigned is therefore commanded to apprise the American commissioners that, although His Majesty will be at all times ready to listen to any suggestions for arranging in an amicable and advantageous manner the respective interests of the two countries, the proposal of the President of the United States for proceeding to negotiate anew upon the basis of a treaty already solemnly concluded and signed, is a proposal wholly inadmissible. And His Majesty has therefore no option, under the present circumstances of this transaction, but to acquiesce in the refusal of the President of the United States to ratify the treaty signed on the 31st December, 1806.

The undersigned requests Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

GEORGE CANNING.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, October 28, 1807.

SIR:

I have the honor to send you a copy of a correspondence with Mr. Canning, touching a difficulty which he supposed Mr. Rose might experience in entering the bay of Chesapeake, in consequence of the proclamation of the President. In the interview invited by his last note I expressed my surprise that any doubt should exist on the subject of it, and assured him that Mr. Pinkney and myself would be responsible for Mr. Rose's prompt admission into our harbors, and arrival at Washington, without suffering the slightest molestation; on the contrary, that he should receive every attention and facility on the route which he might require. I told him that no document from us would be necessary for that purpose; but that, to put the question beyond all doubt, we would give him a passport, which should go to every object in detail, and that we would also give him letters of introduction to the Governors of Maryland and Virginia, the States through which he would pass, to be taken advantage of if he found that they would be useful. With this explanation and arrangement Mr. Canning was satisfied.

I also send you a copy of a letter from Mr. Rose, Sen., and my answer relative to the mission of his son to the United States. Although Mr. Rose's letter is unofficial, I have thought it proper, in consideration of his near connexion with the minister and station in the Government, to communicate it.

I leave this to-morrow to meet in the channel the Augustus, the ship in which I propose to sail with my family to the United States. She has left this port, and is on her way to Portsmouth, where she will receive us. Mr. Rose, by going in a frigate, will most probably arrive before me, and even before Doctor Bullus. It is important that you should possess all the information which I can give respecting the business in which I have been lately engaged with Mr. Canning, and of Mr. Rose's mission, at the moment of his arrival. I have therefore thought it advisable to commit to him this letter, and a copy of my correspondence with Mr. Canning, as Mr. Pinkney and I have done our joint despatch. I expect to be at sea in a week from this date, and shall proceed to Washington immediately after my arrival in the United States, to communicate to you such further information as I may have relative to the important concerns of our country in which I have been employed.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

No. 16.

[Enclosed in Mr. Monroe's despatch of October 28.]

Mr. Canning to Mr. Monroe.

SIR:

FOREIGN OFFICE, September 23, 1807.

I have laid before the King my master the letter which I had the honor to receive from you on the 8th of this month.

Before I proceed to observe upon that part of it which relates more immediately to the question now at issue between our two Governments, I am commanded in the first instance to express the surprise which is felt at the total omission of a subject upon which I had already been commanded to apply to you for information—the proclamation purported to have been issued by the President of the United States. Of this paper, when last I addressed you upon it, you professed not to have any knowledge beyond what the ordinary channels of public information afforded, nor any authority to declare it to be authentic.

I feel it an indispensable duty to renew my inquiry on this subject. The answer which I may receive from you is by no means unimportant to the settlement of the discussion which has arisen from the encounter between the Leopard and the Chesapeake.

The whole of the question arising out of that transaction is, in fact, no other than a question as to the amount of reparation due by His Majesty for the unauthorized act of his officer: and you will therefore readily perceive that, in so far as the Government of the United States have thought proper to take that reparation into their own hands, and to resort to measures of retaliation, previously to any direct application to the British Government or to the British minister in America for redress, in so far the British Government is entitled to take such measures into account, and to consider them in the estimate of reparation which is acknowledged to have been originally due.

The total exclusion of all ships of war belonging to one of two belligerent parties, while the ships of war of the other were protected by the harbors of the neutral Power, would furnish no light ground of complaint against that neutral, if considered in any other point of view than as a measure of retaliation for a previous injury: and, so considered, it cannot but be necessary to take it into account in the adjustment of the original dispute.

I am, therefore, distinctly to repeat the inquiry whether you are now enabled to declare, sir, that the proclamation is to be considered as the authentic act of your Government? And, if so, I am further to inquire whether you are authorized to notify the intention of your Government to withdraw that proclamation, on the knowledge of His Majesty's disavowal of the act which occasioned its publication?

The light in which you are directed to represent Admiral Berkeley's conduct, and the description which you give of the character of the measure imputed to him, that "he acted as if he had the power to make war, and to decide the causes of war," sufficiently evince the necessity of comprehending in this discussion all the circumstances which have led to or have followed the action with the Chesapeake.

Undoubtedly the attack upon a national ship of war is an act of hostility, and the very essence of the charge against Admiral Berkeley, as you represent it, is the having taken upon himself to commit an act of hostility without the previous authority of his Government.

The provocation which may have led to such an act without such previous authority, if it cannot justify, may possibly extenuate it; as the steps which have been taken in reprisal, though they cannot alter the character of the original act, may and do materially affect every question concerning the reparation claimed for it.

On this ground it is, that, while I am commanded to repeat to you (what you consider so satisfactory) that the general and unqualified pretension to search ships of war for deserters is not asserted by this country, I am precluded from concurring in the inference, that therefore the national character of the men who were violently taken from on board the Chesapeake makes no part of the present question.

If the right to search ships of war for deserters is not insisted upon by this country, it is not because the employment and the detention of British mariners on board the national ships of any State are considered as less injurious towards Great Britain than their employment on board of merchant vessels, (a proposition which would be manifestly absurd.) It is not intended to allow that the sailors of Great Britain would be justly employed against her consent in foreign ships of war, but merely that redress is, in that case, to be sought for by Government from Government, and not to be summarily enforced by the unauthorized officer of any of His Majesty's ships of war.

It follows from this reasoning, that not only the national character of the men taken out of the Chesapeake is matter for consideration, but that the reparation to be made by the British Government to that of the United States would depend, among other circumstances, on the question, whether an act, which the British Government would be justified in considering as an act of hostility, had been committed by the Government of the United States (in refusing to discharge British seamen in their national service) previously to the commission of an act of hostility of an officer of His Majesty?

The act of the British officer would still be an unauthorized act, and, as such, liable to complaint and disapprobation; but the case, as between Government and Government, would be materially varied.

At the same time that I offer to you this explanation of the principles upon which His Majesty has authorized me to discuss with you the subject of your representation, and that I renew to you the assurances of the disposition to conduct that discussion in the most amicable form, and to bring it to a conclusion satisfactory to the honor and to the feelings of both countries, it is matter of regret that you should have been instructed to annex to the demand of reparation for the attack of the Leopard upon the Chesapeake any proposition whatever respecting the search for British seamen in merchant vessels; a subject which is wholly unconnected with the case of the Leopard and the Chesapeake, and which can only tend to complicate and embarrass a discussion in itself of sufficient delicacy and importance.

In stating the grounds upon which your Government expect with confidence that "the whole subject of impressment shall be taken up at this time," and that, in making the reparation which is claimed for the particular injury alleged to have been sustained by the United States in the late unfortunate transaction off the capes of Virginia, "a remedy shall be provided for the whole evil," you appear to have been directed to assume that this act of violence (such as you describe it) is the natural and almost necessary result of the practice of impressment of British seamen from the merchant vessels of other States; and to represent the particular transaction, and the general question of impressment, as "identified in the feelings and sympathies of your nation, as well as in the sentiment of your Government."

With every attention due to the feelings of the people of the United States, I am sure you will readily allow that those feelings cannot properly be considered as affecting the merits of the case.

The first ebullitions of national sensibility may very naturally have communicated an impulse to the proceedings of the American Government, but it cannot be expected that they should guide the deliberate opinions and conduct of the Government with which you have to treat. I would further observe to you, that your Government cannot reasonably claim any advantage in argument from the expressed sense of its own people, unless it be prepared at the same time to take upon itself a responsibility (which there is no desire of attributing to it) for the outrage and indecency with which, upon the late occasion, that expression has in too many instances been accompanied. It is better for temperate reasoning, and, assuredly, it is more advantageous for the Government of the United States, that the consideration of popular feeling should be wholly omitted in this discussion.

The right and the practice of which you are instructed to complain as irreconcilable with justice, and intolerable in all their parts, have been exercised by Great Britain from the earliest ages of the British naval power, even without any qualification or exception in favor of national ships of war.

The grounds upon which such a distinction has been admitted in later times, and upon which, for the course of nearly a century, the Crown has forborne to instruct the commanders of its ships of war to search foreign ships of war for deserters, I have already had the honor to explain to you; and you will have perceived that those grounds are wholly inapplicable to ships in the merchant service.

That a foreign Power will not, knowingly, retain in its national service mariners, the natural born subjects of His Majesty, who have been recalled by public proclamation, may be regarded as a presumption arising out of the hostile nature of the act, and out of the probable consequences to which such an act of hostility must lead.

But with respect to merchant vessels there is no such presumption.

When mariners, subjects of His Majesty, are employed in the private service of foreign individuals, under private civil contracts, the King's subjects and the foreign individuals with whom they serve enter into engagements inconsistent with the duty of His Majesty's subjects towards him; but to those engagements the Government of the foreign nation has not made itself a party.

In such cases, the species of redress which the practice of all times has admitted and sanctioned, is that of taking those subjects at sea out of the service of such foreign individuals, and recalling them to the discharge of that previous and paramount duty which they owe to their sovereign and to their country.

That the exercise of this right involves some of the dearest interests of Great Britain, your Government is ready to acknowledge; and has accordingly authorized you to propose certain regulations which you apprehend would be equivalent in their effect for the preservation of the interests concerned.

There will be no indisposition here to entertain, at a proper time, the discussion of such proposed regulations. But when you recollect that many proposals to this effect have already been brought forward, and have been found wholly inadmissible; when you have yourself recently had occasion to experience the difficulty of framing any satisfactory arrangement upon the subject, with all the anxiety which is properly felt by both Governments for the speedy adjustment of the difference between them, and for the "healing of that deep wound" which you state to have been "inflicted on the national honor of the United States," surely it is not well advised to make the termination of that difference, and the healing of that wound, dependent wholly on the complete success of an attempt which has already been made so often, and which has hitherto uniformly failed.

Your own reasoning shows that you are aware of the more than ordinary difficulty which must attend any arrangement for the prevention of desertion between two nations, whose similarity of manners and habits and whose identity of language interpose so many impediments to the discrimination of "national character."

To these circumstances, and not (as you almost seem to insinuate) to any peculiar harshness towards the United States, it is owing, that the exercise of this right, as with respect to them, is necessarily more frequent than with respect to any other nation; and it is felt by them to be more rigid and vexatious. But those circumstances cannot furnish an argument for the suspension of the exercise of the right with respect to America, unless it be contended that multiplicity of frauds and difficulty of detection are reasons against suspicion or motives for acquiescence.

As little foundation is there for the complaint, that the practice has grown out of the recognition of American independence, and that the character of that event is affected by its continuance.

It is needless to repeat that these rights existed in their fullest force for ages previous to the establishment of the United States of America as an independent Government; and it would be difficult to contend that the recognition of that independence can have operated any change in this respect, unless it can be shown that, in acknowledging the Government of the United States, Great Britain virtually abdicated her own rights as a naval Power; or unless there were any express stipulations by which the ancient and prescriptive usages of Great Britain, founded in the soundest principles of natural law, though still enforced against other independent nations of the world, were to be suspended whenever they might come in contact with the interests or the feelings of the American people.

I would now recall your attention to the consideration of the question respecting the late transaction between the Leopard and the Chesapeake, which, till the receipt of your letter, I imagined to be the only question actually in discussion between us, and in consideration of the delicacy and pressing importance of which we had, by common consent, waived the consideration of all other matters pending between our two Governments.

Into the discussion of this question I am prepared to enter, with what disposition on the part of His Majesty's Government to consult the feelings and the honor of the Government of the United States it is not necessary for me here to declare, for you have yourself done justice to the sincerity of that disposition.

The difficulties in the way of such adjustment are already smoothed by the disavowal, voluntarily offered at the very outset of the discussion, of the general and unqualified pretension to search ships of war for deserters. There remained only to ascertain the facts of the particular case, and to proportion the reparation to the wrong.

Is the British Government now to understand that you, sir, are not authorized to enter into this question separately and distinctly, without having obtained, as a preliminary concession, the consent of this country to enter into discussion with respect to the practice of searching merchant vessels for deserters?

Whether any arrangement can be devised by which this practice may admit of modification, without prejudice to the essential rights and interests of Great Britain, is a question which, as I have already said, the British Government may at a proper season be ready to entertain; but whether the consent of Great Britain to the entering into such discussion shall be extorted as the price of an amicable adjustment, as the condition of being admitted to make honorable reparation for an injury, is a question of quite a different sort, and one which can be answered no otherwise than by an unqualified refusal.

I earnestly recommend to you, therefore, to consider whether the instructions which you have received from your Government may not leave you at liberty to come to an adjustment of the case of the Leopard and the Chesapeake, independently of the other question, with which it appears to have been unnecessarily connected.

If your instructions leave you no discretion, I cannot press you to act in contradiction to them. In that case there can be no advantage in pursuing a discussion which you are not authorized to conclude; and I shall have only to regret that the disposition of His Majesty to terminate that difference amicably and satisfactorily is for the present rendered unavailing.

In that case, His Majesty, in pursuance of the disposition of which he has given such signal proofs, will lose no time in sending a minister to America, furnished with the necessary instructions and powers for bringing this unfortunate dispute to a conclusion consistent with the harmony subsisting between Great Britain and the United States. But, in order to avoid the inconvenience which has arisen from the mixed nature of your instructions, that minister will not be empowered to entertain, as connected with this subject, any proposition respecting the search of merchant vessels.

It will, however, be far more satisfactory to His Majesty to learn that, upon reconsideration, you think yourself authorized to separate the two questions.

I hope you will allow me to express, at the same time, the sincere pleasure which I should feel in having to treat with you, sir, personally, for the re-establishment of a good understanding between our two countries.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE CANNING.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Canning.

SIR:

PORTLAND PLACE, September 29, 1807.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 23d of this month, and shall transmit it without delay to my Government.

I perceive by it, with great regret, that His Britannic Majesty's Government is not disposed to enter into an arrangement, at this time, of all the differences that have arisen between our Governments, respecting the impressment of seamen from American vessels by British cruisers; that it is willing to look to one object only, the late aggression, and provide for it, while the other is left to depend on future adjustment. My Government had presumed that His Majesty's Government would have seen, in the recent and greater injury, a strong motive for bringing the whole subject into one view, and providing for it at the same time. The excess of the latter outrage could not fail to revive, in the minds of the suffering party, a high sense of former injuries; and it was reasonable to infer that the great injustice, inseparable from the practice, of which the incident furnished so striking an example, would have produced between our Governments the most prompt and friendly co-operation in the means of suppressing it. That the United States have suffered a greater injury by a recent occurrence than they had done before, cannot be a good reason, and ought not to be a motive, for delaying redress of the others, especially when it is considered that they were already in a train of amicable accommodation and arrangement. Since, however, you inform me that His Majesty's Government is unwilling to take up the subject in a combined view, it is unnecessary for me to press it.

You ask whether I am authorized to separate this latter incident from the general practice, and to treat it as a distinct topic? On this point I have to state, that my instructions, which are explicit, enjoin me to consider the whole of this class of injuries as an entire subject; and, indeed, so intimately are they connected in their nature, that it seems to be difficult, if not impossible, to separate them for any useful purpose to either party. My Government, being sincerely desirous to place the relations of the two Powers on the solid basis of permanent friendship, is satisfied, as well by what has occurred in the general practice as by the more awful admonition derived from the late incident, that that can only be done with effect, by mounting to the source of the evil, and providing an adequate remedy for it. In pursuing this great object, it is my duty to repeat that my Government does not seek to confine the remedy proposed to the injuries which the United States have suffered, and continue to suffer, but is desirous to extend it to those also which are complained of by Great Britain. Experience has shown that both parties complain of injuries, though certainly of a very different character and less urgent nature. How much more advisable, then, is it not, in every view, for them to enter into an arrangement which shall provide an adequate remedy for their respective injuries; which shall bind the honor of each Government to do what is just and right in respect to the other, and enlist the feelings of each nation on its side, than to suffer things to remain longer in their present state? How much more advantageous would not such an arrangement be likely to prove to Great Britain, in the particular object which she has in view, than her adherence to a practice which rejects a means which could not fail to be more productive; a practice which cannot be maintained in principle; which leads by immutable causes, that ought to inspire different sentiments in the parties to each other, to great and constant abuse; and which is also considered by the United States as subversive of their rights, and degrading to their character as an independent Power?

So much I have thought it proper to state, in order to place in a just light the conduct of my Government on the present occasion, on this great and very interesting subject of impressment. Well knowing its desire to cultivate the most friendly relations with Great Britain, on just and honorable conditions, it would be highly improper that any doubt should be suffered to exist on that point.

You inform me that His Majesty has determined, in case my instructions do not permit me to separate the late aggression from the general practice of impressment, to transfer the business to the United States, by committing it to a minister, who shall be sent there with full powers to conclude it. To that measure I am far from being disposed to raise any obstacle, and shall immediately apprise my Government of the decision to adopt it. Under such circumstances, I perfectly agree with you in the opinion, that it would be useless to pursue a discussion which it would be impossible for me to bring to a satisfactory conclusion.

It is still my duty to give the explanation which you have desired of the motives which induced the President to adopt the measures announced in his proclamation of the 2d of July last. However great the injury which the United States had received, by the aggressions complained of, it is just that it should be shown that the President did not lose sight in those measures of the friendly relations subsisting between the two Powers. When the hostile nature of the attack on the Chesapeake is taken into view, and the general conduct of the British squadron, within the waters of the United States, before and after the attack, I am persuaded that there was no limit to which the President would not have been justified in going, which he might have thought essential to the honor and safety of the nation. Before the attack, the British squadron had violated the jurisdiction of the United States, by the impressment of men within it, whom the commander had refused to surrender; and, after the attack, the attitude which he assumed continued to be of a very menacing and hostile character. An act of hostility, it must be admitted, justifies any act of a like nature towards the party who commits it. The President, however, did not believe that His Majesty's Government had authorized the conduct of the British squadron, and his measures were evidently founded on that belief. They were marked by no circumstance of hostility or of retaliation towards Great Britain; but were intended simply to preserve order within the jurisdiction of the United States, to which end the removal of the British squadron without their limits became indispensable. After the acts of violence which had been committed by that squadron, it was impossible that it should remain longer there without increasing the irritation and widening the breach between the two nations, which it was the earnest object of the President to prevent. There certainly existed no desire of giving a preference in favor of the ships of war of one belligerent party to those of another. Before this aggression it is well known that His Britannic Majesty's ships lay within the waters of the Chesapeake, and enjoyed all the advantages of the most favored nation; it cannot, therefore, be doubted that my Government will be ready to restore them to the same situation as soon as it can be done consistently with the honor and rights of the United States.

I cannot conclude this communication without expressing my earnest hope that the differences, which have unhappily arisen between our Governments, may soon be settled on conditions honorable and satisfactory to both the parties. To have co-operated with you, in the accomplishment of so great and useful a work, would have been highly gratifying to me. The disposition which you have brought to the discussion, and the sentiments which you communicated on the principal transaction, when the first intelligence of it was received, have inspired me with great confidence that we should soon have been able to bring it to such a conclusion. To have been a party to it, would have terminated my mission to His Majesty in the mode which I have long and sincerely desired.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAS. MONROE.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Canning.

PORTLAND PLACE, October 9, 1807.

Mr. Monroe presents his compliments to Mr. Canning, and requests that he will be so good as to inform him whether it is intended that the minister, whom His Majesty proposes to send to the Government of the United States, shall be employed in a special mission, without having any connexion, immediate or eventual, with the ordinary legation. Mr. Monroe has inferred from Mr. Canning's note that the mission will be of the special nature above described; but he will be much obliged to Mr. Canning to inform him whether he has taken a correct view of the measure. Mr. Monroe would also be happy to know of Mr. Canning at what time it is expected that the minister will sail for the United States. Mr. Canning will be sensible that Mr. Monroe's motive in requesting this information is, that he may be enabled to communicate it without delay to his Government, the propriety of which he is persuaded Mr. Canning will readily admit.

Mr. Monroe requests Mr. Canning to accept the assurance of his high consideration.

From Mr. Canning.

FOREIGN OFFICE, October 10, 1807.

Mr. Canning presents his compliments to Mr. Monroe; and, in acknowledging the honor of his note of yesterday, has great pleasure in assuring him that he is at all times ready to answer any inquiries to which Mr. Monroe attaches any importance, and which it is in Mr. Canning's power to answer with precision, without public inconvenience. But it is not in Mr. Canning's power to state with confidence what may be the eventual determination of His Majesty in respect to the permanent mission in America. The mission of the minister whom His Majesty is now about to send will certainly be limited in the first instance to the discussion of the question of the Chesapeake.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, November 23, 1807.

SIR:

I have the honor to transmit a duplicate of my letter of the 17th, enclosing a copy of the orders of council, lately issued by this Government relative to neutral trade.

When I was about to ask a conference with Mr. Canning on the subject of these orders, I received a note from him requesting an interview. Although it was to be presumed that the purpose of this interview would appear to be the mere explanation of certain ambiguities in the details of this extraordinary measure, it seemed to furnish the opportunity, which I was preparing to seek, of remonstrating against the measure itself. It had occurred to me that it would not be proper that, by appearing to interest myself in its subordinate provisions, I should unnecessarily compromise with a transaction, of which the whole scheme and principle were so hostile to the incontestable rights of my country, and of which, however modified, the effect could not fail to be in the last degree injurious to its commerce. Under this persuasion I was disposed to leave that part of the subject, at least in the first instance, to the committee of merchants trading to the United States, of whose proceedings I was kept constantly informed, and from whose communications with the Board of Trade more useful results were, in this view, to be expected than from mine with the Foreign Department. It was, besides, not unnatural to hope that, while this respectable body of men were employed in demanding explanations of what was supposed to be doubtful in the phraseology of the orders, some of them, with whose opinions I was acquainted, would disclose to Government, with advantage to the discussion I had in contemplation, their conviction of their fatal tendency in a commercial, if not in a political sense. In the hope of such a disclosure I was not wholly disappointed; but the administration had decided irrevocably on their new system, which now appears to have been long meditated in secret. The only effect of the interference of the committee will be found in their printed report herewith transmitted. It will be seen that the explanations which this report contains are far from softening the harsh spirit of the orders, or furnishing any evidence of a disposition on the part of Government to make them more respectful to neutral rights, or less inconvenient in their execution. On the contrary, the blockade, which the orders institute against the ports of France and her allies, and against such other ports as the British flag may be excluded from, is, by these explanations, extended to the ports of the allies of Great Britain, so far as to prevent our carrying to them from the United States colonial productions.

In some respects, too, they have put a precise negative upon a favorable interpretation of the orders, adopted on their first publication by several intelligent merchants, by which much of their pernicious character would have disappeared in practice; and it is declared by them, contrary to all expectation, and with a wonderful disregard of justice, that one of the great agricultural products of the United States, after being forcibly drawn into Great Britain as the commercial vortex of the world, is, upon re-exportation, to go charged with a British duty.

My interview with Mr. Canning took place two days ago. He commenced the conversation by saying that he had requested to see me, not with the intention of discussing the general propriety of the late orders of council, for that, being already adopted, discussion could now answer no valuable purpose; but with the view of explaining to me such of their provisions as had been supposed to be liable to misconstruction, or might appear to me to be doubtful. He then read to me a paper, which was the same in substance with the report of the committee of merchants. It was not, however, stated in this paper, as he read it, that re-exported cotton was not to be exempt from duty, in common with our other native commodities. And when I remarked to him that the prohibition contained in his paper, of the direct carriage of colonial produce from neutral ports to the ports of His Majesty's allies, was not warranted by any thing in the orders of council, he struck it out as a mistake, after having examined the orders, and satisfied himself that they did not comprehend the case. The truth is, however, that this prohibition is supposed here to be a necessary part of the system, and that upon that ground, or as being justified by the rule of the war of 1756, it is the intention of the Government to enforce it.

As soon as Mr. Canning had finished the reading of this paper, I told him that as he had intimated a wish to decline the present discussion of the principle and propriety of the orders, I certainly would not urge it at this time; but that as the explanations which he had just given relative to their details had not, in any degree, served to diminish the deep concern and extreme astonishment with which I had at first perused them, I would take the liberty in the course of a few days to trouble him with a note, in which should be given a view of the entire subject, as it presented itself to me. He replied, that there could be no objection to such a note.

To an observation of mine, that the orders menaced with absolute ruin the trade of the United States in all its important branches, and would probably exclude from the European seas, and drive back upon our shores, even the produce of our own soil, Mr. Canning answered that they had not appeared to him to be at all likely to produce these effects; and he invited me to state my ideas upon that point. This led insensibly to a conversation upon the whole subject, in which I endeavored to show that the orders were unjust, ill-timed, and impolitic; destructive at once of all the great maxims in which the civilized world have a common interest, (and Great Britain more than the rest,) and of the prosperity of the nations at war, as well as of those at peace, and rested by Great Britain upon grounds which were not correct in fact, or sufficient if the facts were admitted.

To prove that the effect of the orders upon American commerce would be such as I had suggested, it was only necessary to compare their provisions with the known law of France, which had been adopted by her allies, and extended to the countries subject to her arms. The decrees of France, and of the States in alliance with her, exclude from their respective ports all vessels coming from a British port; and the British orders declare that no neutral vessel shall go to an enemy port, unless from a port of the United Kingdom, from Gibraltar or Malta, or from a port of His Majesty's allies; under such regulations, too, as His Majesty shall think fit to prescribe.

As the communication with enemy ports, through the "ports of His Majesty's allies," under the British licenses, can be little more than nominal, (and if it were not so would probably soon be prohibited by the other parties to the war,) it is difficult to imagine, even if there were nothing more in the orders of council, in what way, consistently with them, an American vessel, with whatsoever cargo she should be freighted, could, to any other effect than that of confiscation, find her way to a port of any of the enemies of Great Britain.

Before these orders were issued, it was possible that a neutral, going from a British port, might evade the laws of some of the opposite belligerents, at the hazard of seizure and forfeiture, by fictitious papers and declarations as to the port of her departure; but, if such an evasion was difficult, as undoubtedly it was, before the issuing of these orders, it is now become impossible. The obligation now attempted to be imposed upon all neutral vessels to take their departure for a belligerent port upon the continent from a British port, (with the single unavailing exception above mentioned,) coupled with the known power of the British navy to render that obligation effectual, will make deception upon this point no longer practicable, if it were even to be desired; and thus, such of the staple commodities of the United States, as have heretofore had all Europe for their market, will, by the operation of this new article in the law of prize, be made to depend almost wholly on British consumption.

The trade of American citizens in the surplus of colonial productions, imported from the colonies of the parties to the war, will be yet more completely discouraged. To bring them here for consumption would be absurd, if indeed it should be allowed; and, once brought here, they could only go elsewhere in search of seizure and confiscation.

But even if it should be admitted that the laws of one or more of the opposite belligerents may be eluded, so far as respects the touching at or coming from a British port; or that the ports of His Majesty's allies may, in that view, afford some facility to the transportation of American commodities to France, or the countries connected with her; the orders of council meet this ill-fated trade with another obstacle, for which it is not easy to find a motive, but which cannot be surmounted. "Certificates of origin" are necessary to the admission and safety of neutral cargoes in the ports of France, and, it is believed, in those of her allies, and in the ports of the countries which, not being the allies of France, she controls by her arms. The British orders subject to capture and condemnation, as prize of war, any neutral vessel carrying such a document, and the cargo to which it applies. How is this to be evaded, unless by a most hazardous concealment by the neutral of the interdicted document, of which the consequence would frequently be the loss of vessel and cargo by the sentence of a British Court of Admiralty; while, if the concealment should be successful, and the British regulations, hereafter to be made, should not counteract its effect, (as they easily may, and probably will, either wholly or partially,) the introduction of the cargo into the enemy port would still have to contend with the impediment already mentioned?

With difficulties so formidable and so multiplied, no trade can struggle with success. The consequence must be that our merchants can have no inducement to send to this country cargoes of any description much beyond the internal demand, which, for some of our productions, exists but in a slight degree, for others to an inadequate extent, and for colonial productions not at all. And even with a view to British consumption, the obstacles and discouragements to American commerce will be great and destructive. The new system cannot fail to produce the necessary consequence of all such invasions of the rights and interests of mankind—a disposition to evade it. The attempts which will arise out of that disposition will be encountered by intolerable inquisitions, by seizures, detentions, and confiscations upon arbitrary presumptions, involving the innocent with the guilty. And if these alarming hazards should not be sufficient to beat down the enterprising spirit of our people, so as to banish from this commerce, thus limited in its range, the usual competition, it will follow that it must be overdone, to the ruin of those who embark in it, and finally of the commerce itself. In this work of destruction Great Britain will not only act, but suffer. The wound which she inflicts upon a Power, hitherto her best customer, will be deeply felt by herself, without the prospect of a single advantage, within the reach of imagination to suggest, to atone for it.

In the course of my remarks upon this branch of the subject I had called those parts of the French decrees, which require certificates of origin, and refuse admission into the ports of France to such neutral vessels as come from Great Britain, mere municipal regulations. Mr. Canning observed, upon this phrase, that it was inapplicable to the provision which prescribes certificates of origin; erroneously supposing that the want of that document subjected a neutral vessel and cargo to French capture on the high seas. I assured him that this was a misapprehension; and finding that he was not unwilling to attend to an explanation of the whole of the French system, as I understood it, and of its bearing upon the British orders of council in the light of a justification of those orders, I went at some length into such an explanation. Mr. Canning received it in a very friendly manner; but did not give me any reason to believe that it was likely to produce an effect upon the measure against which it was directed. It may not, perhaps, be improper to trouble you with a hasty sketch of what I thought it my duty to urge on this topic. I am conscious that I have not done justice to the subject; but it will be recollected that it is an extremely delicate one, and that the necessity for discussing it was sudden and unforeseen.

I introduced my explanations with a brief analysis of the British measure. Its great feature is the establishment, by the sole operation of an order of council, an unexampled blockade, not existing, or pretended to exist, in fact, of all the ports and places of France and her allies, and all other countries at war with His Majesty; of all other ports and places in Europe from which the British flag is excluded; and of all ports and places in the colonies belonging to His Majesty's enemies. It does more than this, however. The first order declares, "that all trade in articles of the produce or manufacture of the said countries or colonies shall be deemed unlawful," &c.

Upon these two provisions, connected with that which relates to certificates of origin, the measure relies for its whole efficacy. The rest is but gratuitous exception and qualification, which may at any time be withdrawn.

In the preamble to the first order we are in substance referred, for the inducements to this measure, to the French decree of November, 1806, coupled with an imputed acquiescence in that decree by the nations at peace. That decree contains provisions which seem, at first sight, to be of different characters. The British orders point to the first article, which declares the British islands in a state of blockade; and to the fifth, which prohibits all trading in English merchandise, &c., as trenching upon neutral rights by setting up new rules of maritime capture. The remaining articles seem to be admitted to be, and undoubtedly are, municipal laws, resting upon the foundation of territorial sovereignty.

If the first article be considered in an abstract state, it would be difficult to avoid the conclusion that it was intended to affect the rights of neutrals upon the ocean. It is not in that state, however, that it ought to be considered; since it is found, in fact, in a state of connexion with other provisions. So connected, it appears to be susceptible of an interpretation consistent with neutral rights. Without going into an argument upon this point, it may be allowable to infer that it was not meant to give to the declaration contained in this article, unaccompanied by the shadow of an actual blockade, the incidents which only belong to such a blockade, from the single consideration that some of the subsequent articles are not to be reconciled with that intention. The seventh and eighth articles are particularly important in this view, and are fortified by the municipal scope and tendency of the whole decree.

The fifth article is yet more evidently than the first a municipal rule. Its terms can be completely satisfied by such a construction; while, without it, no office can be assigned to the seventh and eighth.

It is to be admitted, however, that the phraseology of the decree, especially of the first article, was such as very naturally to excite the attention of the nations at peace, as being liable to an exposition hostile to their just neutral claims. The minister of the United States at Paris was, accordingly, among the first to demand of the Minister of Marine, (who was charged, in what concerned his department, with the execution of it,) "the official explanation which may have been given to this decree, so far as it involves the rights of neutral nations." The answer was prompt and explicit. Here I read General Armstrong's letter of the 10th of December last to the French Minister of Marine, and the reply of that minister of the 24th of the same month, as communicated by the President to Congress, in February, 1807. I relied particularly on the following passages in that reply.

"I consider the imperial decree of the 21st of November last as thus far conveying no modification of the regulations at present observed in France with regard to neutral navigators, nor consequently," &c.

"That the declaration expressed by the first article not at all changing the present French laws concerning maritime capture," &c.

"That an American vessel cannot be taken at sea for the mere reason that she is going to a port of England, or is returning from one; because, conformably with the seventh article, we are limited," &c.

"That the provisions of articles second and fifth naturally apply to foreign citizens domiciliated in France," &c.

It is obvious that these explanations, which cannot be evaded by the suggestion that they are not sufficiently precise, or that the Minister of Marine, who undertook to give them, was not the regular organ of such a communication, impress upon all the obnoxious parts of this decree the character of domestic rules, operating, not on the seas, but in the interior of France, against which, however inconvenient, neutral nations could offer neither resistance nor remonstrance as infringements of their neutral rights. Nor, in that light, could Great Britain be justified in complaining of them. In peace, as well as in war, she has her navigation and other laws, modifying the intercourse of other nations with her ports, with an exclusive view to her own advantage; and it was not to be expected that, in the contest in which she is engaged, her enemy would, if he could do without them, encourage her manufactures by consuming them, or her colonies by purchasing their productions.

As domestic regulations, then, it is impossible to maintain that the articles of the French decree form any apology for the British orders, upon any intelligible notion of the right of retaliation. The British orders annihilate the whole public law of Europe relative to maritime prize, and substitute a sweeping system of condemnation and penalty in its place. The French decree produced no change at all in that law. The last was no more than a legitimate, though possibly an ungracious exercise of the rights of local sovereignty; while the former can be referred only to force, and look for the scene of their operation to the ocean.

But the decree of France has been explained, not only by the French Minister of Marine, but by the practice under it, to which, more than to those explanations, or even to the decree itself, the states at peace were to look for its real importance to their rights and their prosperity. And here I read an extract from a letter to Mr. Monroe and myself from General Armstrong, of the 8th of February last, confirmed by all subsequent information, in which he states that the practice under this decree "is entirely that of the old regulations. Its operation is accordingly confined to neutral ships passing from British ports to those of France or her allies."

Now, let the mere theory of the decree be what it may, if in effect it does not violate the rights of neutral nations, it furnishes no foundation for a real, extensive, practical measure on the part of Great Britain, which sweeps from the seas every thing to which those rights can apply.

But the orders of council rely (as they ought to do) not merely on the provisions of the French decree, but on the forbearance of neutral nations "to interpose with effect to obtain their revocation."

So far as respects the United States, (who could only be bound to take care of their own rights,) it has been seen that their minister lost no time in doing what only he could properly do. He required official explanation of those parts of the decree upon which Great Britain founds her retaliating system, at the expense of the United States; and the answer to his demand removed all real ground of complaint—an answer with which he had the more reason to be satisfied, as the contemporaneous and subsequent practice corresponded with it. This he communicated to his Government; and it cannot be imagined that, without even the pretext of an actual grievance, the United States were called upon "to interpose" against a mere form of words, by which none were injured, lest Great Britain should construe their forbearance into a surrender of the rights of their neutrality, and build upon that imputed surrender the ruin of their lawful commerce.

It is suggested in the orders that the parts of the French decree which it recites "have recently been enforced with increased rigor." To this I might reply that I have no knowledge of any such fact, as respects the provisions in question. But, be the fact as it may, it is obvious that the United States cannot be said to acquiesce in that of which they have not yet been apprised. They have met the transaction, as it presented itself to them, with effect; and, if it has lately taken a new shape, they cannot be made responsible for it by Great Britain, even upon her own principles, until they shall have had an opportunity of being informed of this recent change, and of dealing with it as their honor and interests may require.

It appeared that Mr. Canning had supposed it to be understood by me that the French decree had always operated, according to the British construction of it, against all neutral nations, with an exception in favor of the United States. Upon this supposition, he intimated that such a peculiar exemption might (although he was far from saying or intending to imply that it was so) have been purchased by sacrifices, when it was perhaps incumbent on the nation enjoying it, instead of thus withdrawing itself from the common cause of neutrals, to insist upon its rights as identified with theirs, and to obtain the recantation of what was hostile to them. To this I replied that the answer of the French Minister of Marine did not turn upon any such peculiar exemption, nor did the French practice rest upon it; nor did the view which I had taken of the decree itself suppose it. But, if it were otherwise, it would be recollected that any peculiar immunity which American commerce might enjoy from the effect of this decree must stand, not upon subsequent compromise, but upon an antecedent treaty, with which the decree, as understood here, was certainly inconsistent, and which, so far as they conflicted, might well be allowed to create exceptions not expressed in the decree itself. I added, although the observation could not be important to the United States, that, if any neutral state had even obtained an exemption from the decree after it was promulgated, and if, moreover, this exemption was not common to all neutral nations, it was not to be admitted that the exemption (not being purchased by unequal means) would give to Great Britain a just pretence for retaliating against France, through the rights of the nation thus exempted. I forebore, however, from enlarging upon this topic, as wholly inapplicable to the case under consideration; as I did from touching at all upon the general right of retaliation, as, under all circumstances, unimportant to it.

Upon the subject of certificates of origin I made but few remarks. The French decree of November last does not require them. They are prescribed by a former arrêt, and are intended solely to prevent the introduction into France of British merchandise or colonial produce. The decree requiring them is, in form, as well as effect, a perfectly domestic law. The British orders, however, affect to consider it as part of a "new system of warfare," directed against the trade of this country; and Mr. Canning had imagined, as I have already stated, that it operated upon the high seas. It was only necessary to rectify this error, and to show, in few words, the inadmissible nature of a measure, whether combined with others or not, which, founding itself upon an extravagant claim by one belligerent to force its commodities upon the other, whether it will have them or not, retaliates upon neutrals with maritime capture, if, in their ordinary trade, they attempt a compliance with such of the local regulations of that other belligerent as have for their object the exclusion of those enemy commodities from its own territories.

Towards the close of our interview, I asked Mr. Canning if Mr. Rose was authorized to mention to the Government of the United States the determination of His Majesty's Government to adopt a measure which could not but be viewed by it as of the highest moment, and for which nothing that had hitherto passed could be supposed in any degree to prepare it. He told me that Mr. Rose had no authority to mention this step, and was, as he believed, ignorant of the intention of Government to take it; that his mission had, as I knew, a special purpose; and that it was not meant that his functions should interfere with those of Mr. Erskine, to whom a communication of the orders would be made; that they had delayed that communication until the judgment of practical men had been exercised upon the orders, so as to lead to the explanation and complete amendment of their ambiguities and defects, and until he should have had an interview with me; but that it would certainly be made with very little further delay, and that, instead of waiting for the packet, he believed they should send out a vessel for that sole object, of which he intended to apprise me, as presenting the means of forwarding my despatches also.

I have only to add to this very hasty letter, that, as I had more opportunity of discussing the British orders of council with Mr. Canning than, at the commencement of our interview, was likely to be afforded, I am at present inclined not to send him a note, as I should otherwise, perhaps, have thought it my duty to do. I am not aware that such a step can now be of any utility. Remonstrance before the measure was adopted might have been useful; but the studied secrecy with which it was prepared made that impracticable. I can say little in a note which I have not already suggested in conversation, and the reports which reach me from the continent render it prudent to pause. The President may be assured, however, that, if any chance should occur of doing good, either by personal representations or otherwise, I will not omit to avail myself of it.

An attempt will, I think, be made by some of the merchants trading to the United States to prevail upon their whole body in the different parts of the kingdom to urge the Government, if not to an abandonment, at least to a considerable modification of the orders, so as, perhaps, to leave the trade of our country in its native productions free. I do not believe that the attempt will succeed. The orders, in their present shape, are more popular than could have been expected. There are, indeed, many who are at a loss to conceive the policy which has dictated them, and are convinced that they cannot be vindicated upon principle. But they have the appearance of vigor suited to the crisis, and gratify, moreover, many passions and peculiar interests.

The peril of the moment is truly supposed to be great beyond all former example; and it is therefore believed to require efforts of a new and extraordinary character, which, in common times, would be admitted to threaten the dangers which now they are intended to prevent. Experience only will teach them that moderation and justice would still be the best foundations of their power, and the surest means of defence.

This measure will not, probably, and indeed cannot, be long persisted in. Its injurious consequences to their own trade and manufactures will soon be perceived. The speculation is said to be, that it will create a pressure upon the Government of France, which will compel it to emancipate neutral commerce from the thralldom of its late restrictions; but it does not seem to be considered that the greater pressure will be here, with the smaller capacity to bear it.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect and consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Extract.—Mr. Madison to Mr. Pinkney.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 23, 1807.

Mr. Erskine having been so good as to let me know that the mail of this evening will carry his despatches for a British packet, which will sail from New York immediately on their arrival there, and other conveyances now failing, I avail myself of the opportunity to enclose you a copy of a message from the President to Congress, and their act in pursuance of it, laying an immediate embargo on our vessels and exports. The policy and the causes of the measure are explained in the message itself. But it may be proper to authorize you to assure the British Government, as has been just expressed to its minister here, that the act is a measure of precaution only, called for by the occasion; that it is to be considered as neither hostile in its character, nor as justifying, or inviting, or leading to hostility with any nation whatever, and particularly as opposing no obstacle whatever to amicable negotiations and satisfactory adjustments with Great Britain, on the subjects of difference between the two countries.

The suddenness of the present opportunity does not allow me time to add more than a newspaper containing a part of the proceedings of Congress in relation to the embargo.

P. S. As you may be able to find conveyances to Paris, whither none will for some time offer hence, I request the favor of you to communicate to General Armstrong the contents of this letter, and, through him, or otherwise, to Mr. Erving, at Madrid.

Extract.—Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, January 26, 1808.

I had the honor to receive this morning your letter of the 23d of last month enclosing a copy of a message from the President to Congress, and of their act in pursuance of it laying an embargo on our vessels and exports.

It appeared to be my duty to lose no time in giving such explanations to the British Government of this wise and salutary measure as your letter suggests, and accordingly I went to Downing-street immediately, and had a short conference with Mr. Canning, who received my explanations with great apparent satisfaction, and took occasion to express the most friendly dispositions towards our country. I availed myself of this opportunity to mention a subject of some importance connected with the late orders of council. I had been told that American vessels, coming into British ports, under warning, could not obtain any document to enable them to return to the United States in the event of its being found imprudent either to deposit their cargoes here, or to resume their original voyages. Although they are not prohibited from returning, yet, as the warning is endorsed on their papers, the return may be hazardous without some British document to prove compliance with it, and give security to the voyage. Mr. Canning took a note of what I said, and assured me, that whatever was necessary to give the facility in question would be done without delay; and he added that it was their sincere wish to show, in every thing connected with the orders of council, which only necessity had compelled them to adopt, their anxiety to accommodate them, so far as was consistent with their object, to the feelings and interests of the American Government and people. I was induced by these observations to mention, and to make several strong remarks upon the duty intended to be imposed on our cotton when re-exported to the continent, and the adherence to the determination not to allow to our vessels warned into British ports any change of destination. He told me that these subjects (with which, however, it was evident he was very little acquainted) should be taken into immediate consideration, and that he would let me know the result. I am to have another interview with him in the course of a few days.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

LONDON, February 2, 1808.

I had an interview this morning with Mr. Canning, at his own request. One object of the interview related to the message of the President of the 27th of October last, of which a newspaper copy had been received from Mr. Erskine. A call for a copy of this message was expected in Parliament, and Mr. Canning wished to be in a situation to produce it. I could not assist him, and I suppose the newspaper copy will be considered sufficient.

As soon as this subject was disposed of, Mr. Canning observed that he had requested to see me principally for the purpose of conversing with me privately and extra officially upon the duty proposed to be laid, in consequence of their late blockading orders, upon cotton intended for re-exportation to enemy ports upon the continent. The very few occasional remarks which I had made upon this subject at our last interview (already mentioned in my letter of the 26th ult.) had led him to suppose that it was only to the mode of excluding our cotton from France that the United States would be likely to object, and that if their object could be accomplished in another way, the measure would cease to be offensive. Having admitted (what, indeed, was sufficiently obvious before) that they looked to the intended duty upon cotton as a complete prohibition, he said that, if it would be more acceptable to the United States, the form of the proceeding should be changed, so as to leave the exclusion of cotton from the continent to the mere effect of the blockade; their desire to consult our feelings and wishes, in whatever did not entirely counteract the great end of the measure, would dispose them to adopt such a modification of their plan. In the course of his explanations upon this point, he introduced professions of good will towards our country, of regret that France had imposed upon them the necessity of resorting to a step which might be supposed to press with severity upon our interests, and of an anxious desire that a return to a system of equity and moderation on the part of her enemies, would speedily enable Great Britain to abandon (as she would in that case instantly do) the whole of the recent orders in council. He stated that it was peculiarly important towards the just effect of the orders (of which it was the object to compel France to relieve the commerce of the world from the oppression of her late decrees) that considerable supplies of cotton should not be introduced into the continent; that it had been hoped and believed that the United States would not view as harsh or unfriendly a constrained attempt by Great Britain to prevent such supplies from being received by the other parties to the war, especially as it was certain that Great Britain could herself consume almost the whole of the cotton which we were in the habit of sending abroad; and that they had preferred the imposition of a duty upon cotton to a direct prohibition through the operation of the blockade, because it was consistent with the various and extensive modifications of the blockade to which they had been led, not merely by views of advantage to themselves, but by a respect for the convenience and feelings of other nations, and particularly of America. In fine, he wished to know my private opinion, before the subject came before Parliament, whether an alteration in this respect, from a prohibitory duty to an absolute interdict, would be likely to be acceptable to us. I replied, in as conciliatory a manner as I could, that, as soon as I had understood that a duty was to be proposed on re-exported cotton, I had been disposed to take for granted that the object was not revenue, but prohibition; that, whether the object were the one or the other, it was, as he knew, my opinion that the United States would hold that object, as well as the means, and the whole system connected with them, to be utterly inadmissible; and that I did not feel myself authorized to say to which of the courses he had suggested, my Government would give the preference, or that it would feel any preference for either.

Mr. Canning at length asked me if I should think it worth while to consult my Government on this subject, observing, at the same time, that he would not wish it to be done if there was the least danger of giving offence; and assuring me that what he had said proceeded from motives the most amicable and respectful towards us. He added, that, upon reflection, this would perhaps be the most convenient mode, as it would give them a good deal of trouble to accommodate their plan, as prepared for Parliament, to a change of so much importance, in season to be acted upon.

I answered, in substance, (as I saw it was his wish) that I would mention what had passed to you, and that I did not doubt that the motives of his proposal, whatever might be thought of the proposal itself, would be acceptable to the President. He requested me to say to you, that, although the necessary bills would be proposed, and would pass in Parliament, according to their first project of a duty, yet that the alteration above suggested would be adopted whenever it should be known that it would be agreeable to us.

I need not trouble you with any reflections upon this conversation. But it is my duty to say, that, although Mr. Canning's manner was extremely conciliatory, not a word escaped him to encourage a hope that the orders of council would be in any degree abandoned, or that I should gain any thing by urging a reconsideration of them. I threw out some intimations with that tendency, but soon perceived that it could not be useful to follow them up.

I have the honor to be, &c.

HON. JAMES MADISON.

Extract.—Mr. Madison to Mr. Pinkney.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 19, 1808.

A vessel having been engaged to carry from the port of New York public despatches and mercantile letters to Europe, I avail myself of the opportunity of forwarding you a series of gazettes which contain the proceedings of Congress, and such current information as will give you a view of our internal affairs. They will be put, with this letter, into the hands of Mr. Nourse, a passenger in the despatch vessel, who will deliver them at London; and as the vessel, which will have previously touched at L'Orient, will, after waiting ten or twelve days at Falmouth, return to that port, and thence to the United States, you will have an opportunity of sending thither any communications you may wish to make to Paris, as well as of transmitting to your Government such as may follow up your correspondence, which, at the present period, will be the more acceptable the more it be frequent and full.

My last, which was committed to the British packet, enclosed a copy of the act of embargo, and explained the policy of the measure. Among the considerations which enforced it, was the probability of such decrees as were issued by the British Government on the 11th of November; the language of the British gazettes, with other indications, having left little doubt that such were meditated. The appearance of these decrees has had much effect in reconciling all descriptions among us to the embargo, and in fixing in the friends of the measure their attachment to its provident guardianship of our maritime interests.

Mr. Erskine communicated, a few days ago, the several late decrees of His Government, with expressions of the regret felt by His Britannic Majesty at the necessity imposed on him for such an interference with neutral commerce, and assurances that His Majesty would readily follow the example, in case the Berlin decree should be rescinded, or would proceed, pari passu, with France, in relaxing the rigor of their measures. Mr. Erskine was asked whether his Government distinguished between the operation of the French decree, municipally on land, and its operation on the high seas. On this point he was unable to answer; as he also was to an inquiry whether the late British decrees had reference to the late extension of the French decree with respect to the United States. He seemed also, as is perhaps the case with his Government, to have taken very little into consideration the violations of neutral commerce, and, through them, the vast injury to France, antecedent to the Berlin decree. It is probable that something further is to pass between us on this subject.

SIR:

LONDON, February 23, 1808.

Mr. Canning has just sent me a note, of which a copy is enclosed, relative to an intended alteration, upon the subject of cotton, in their bill for carrying into execution the late orders in council. You will perceive that he lays some stress upon the accidental observations which (as already explained to you in my letter of the 26th of last month) were drawn from me, some time since, upon the singularly offensive project of imposing a transit duty upon our cotton. I mentioned to you, in my letter of the 2d instant, that he appeared to have misapprehended the tendency of these observations, and that, in a subsequent conversation, he showed a disposition to remove this obnoxious feature from their plan, for the purpose of substituting an absolute interdict of the export of that article, under an idea that we should cease then to object to it; but that I thought it my duty to decline to give him any encouragement to do so, although I agreed, as he seemed to wish it, to mention his disposition to you. A few days ago he sent for me again, and renewed his proposal of an immediate change, with respect to cotton, from a prohibitory duty to a direct prohibition. My answer was the same in substance as it had been before. He then suggested the alternative arrangement which you will see stated in his note; but, adhering to the determination I had formed, upon the first appearance of the orders in council, to make no compromise (without precise directions from my Government) with the system which they announce, by becoming a party to its details, I received this proposal as I had done the other.

The British Government, however, had resolved to adopt this last mentioned plan, whether it received my concurrence or not, upon a presumption that it would be more acceptable to us, and, perhaps, too, under the idea that it was more defensible than their original scheme; and the purpose of Mr. Canning's note is merely to signify to me, in a manner as friendly and respectful as possible to the United States, their intention to propose it to Parliament. One object of all this is certainly to conciliate us, although it may be another to free their system, as far as they can, from the disadvantage of one of the formidable reproaches which their opponents cast upon it. But the wise and magnanimous course would be at once to tread back their steps upon the whole of this ill-judged measure, instead of relying upon small and unsubstantial modifications, which neither produce an effect upon its character and principle, nor mitigate the severity of its practical consequences. I might, if I thought it advisable, take the occasion, which Mr. Canning's note undoubtedly furnishes, to press upon him once more the policy as well as the justice of such a course. But I believe it, under all circumstances, to be more prudent to wait for your instructions, which must, I think, be very soon received.

I have already had the honor to send you two copies of the resolutions moved in the House of Commons by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as tables of export duties, to which their bill should refer. I have enclosed in another letter, with which this will be accompanied, a copy of the bill itself, which will, however, undergo several alterations. These will be found to be explained (as far as I am acquainted with them) in the letter above mentioned.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

HON. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney.

SIR:

FOREIGN OFFICE, February 22, 1808.

I have already had the honor of assuring you, in conversation, of the disposition which is felt by the British Government, to give due weight to the observations which you have made to me, respecting the unfavorable impression likely (in your opinion) to be excited in the United States, by the duty proposed to be levied upon cotton, destined for the use of the enemy, but brought into the ports of this country, conformably to the tenor of the orders of council of the 11th November last.

You are already apprised that the principle, upon which the whole of this measure has been framed, is that of refusing to the enemy those advantages of commerce which he has forbidden to this country.

The simple method of enforcing this system of retaliation would have been to follow the example of the enemy, by prohibiting altogether all commercial intercourse between him and other States.

It was from considerations of indulgence to neutral trade, that the more mitigated measure of permitting intercourse under the restraints and regulations of a duty in transitu was adopted; and, being adopted with this view, it was not immediately felt by the British Government that there might be a distinction taken by neutral States, with respect to articles the produce of their own soil; and that while the commutation of prohibition into duty was acknowledged as an indulgence, when applied to articles of foreign commerce, of which they were only the carriers, it might be considered as an invidious imposition when applied to their own productions.

From the moment that this distinction has been explained to the British Government, they have been desirous of manifesting every attention to it; and if you, sir, had been possessed of the necessary authority from your Government, there would have been no difficulty in entering into a specific agreement with you upon the subject. In order, however, to obviate the objection in a great degree, I have the honor to inform you that it is intended to be proposed to Parliament, that all cotton, brought into this country, in conformity to the orders of council, should be absolutely prohibited from being exported to the territories of the enemy. But as you are not prepared to take upon yourself to say that in no case the option would be acceptable, an option will still be left to the neutral owner, either to acquiesce in the total prohibition, or to re-export the article, on the payment of such a duty as Parliament may judge it expedient to impose.

I flatter myself, sir, that this alteration in the legislative regulations, by which the orders of council are intended to be carried into execution, will be considered by you as a satisfactory evidence of the disposition of His Majesty's Government to consult the feelings as well as the interests of the United States, in any manner which may not impair the effect of that measure of commercial restriction, to which the necessity of repelling the injustice of his enemies has obliged His Majesty reluctantly to have recourse.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE CANNING.

WILLIAM PINKNEY, Esq. &c.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Canning.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, February 23, 1808.

Mr. Pinkney presents his compliments to his excellency Mr. Canning, and has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of his note of yesterday, relative to an alteration on the subject of cotton, in the legislative regulations, by which the late orders in council are intended to be carried into execution, which Mr. Pinkney will hasten to transmit to his Government.

Mr. Pinkney requests Mr. Canning to accept assurances of his high consideration.

Mr. Erskine to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, February 23, 1808.

I have the honor to transmit to you the copies of certain orders of council which His Majesty has thought proper to issue in consequence of the hostile conduct of France towards the navigation and commerce of Great Britain and of neutral States.

His Majesty has been induced hitherto to forbear recurring to measures of this nature, by the expectation that the Government of the neutral States, who have been the objects of the French decrees, would have been awakened to a just sense of what they owe to their interests and own rights, and would have interposed with effect either to prevent the execution of the French decrees, or to procure their abrogation.

But His Majesty having been disappointed in this just expectation, and perceiving that the neutral nations, so far from opposing any effectual resistance, have submitted to whatever regulations France may have prescribed for giving effect to her decrees, can no longer refrain from having recourse to such measures as, by retorting on the enemy the inconveniences and evils produced by his injustice and violence, may afford the only remaining chance of putting an end to a system, the perseverance in which is no more injurious to His Majesty's dominions than to nations not parties to the war between Great Britain and France.

The principle upon which His Majesty finds himself compelled to proceed would justify a complete and unqualified retaliation on this part of the system, announced and acted upon by France, in respect to His Majesty's dominions; and His Majesty might, therefore, have declared in a state of rigorous and unmitigated blockade all the coasts and colonies of France and her allies. Such a measure the maritime power of Great Britain would have enabled His Majesty to enforce; nor would those nations which have acquiesced without effectual remonstrance in the French decree of blockade, have derived any right from the more perfect execution of a corresponding determination, on the part of His Majesty, to complain of His Majesty's enforcing that measure, which the enemy has executed imperfectly only from the want of the means of execution.

His Majesty, however, actuated by the same sentiments of moderation by which His Majesty's conduct has been uniformly governed, has been desirous of alleviating as much as possible the inconveniences necessarily brought upon neutral nations by a state of things so unfavorable to the commercial intercourse of the world, and has therefore anxiously considered what modifications it would be practicable to apply to the principle upon which he is compelled to act, which would not, at the same time that they might afford relief from the pressure of that principle upon neutral or friendly nations, impede or enfeeble its operation upon the enemy.

In pursuance of this desire, the order in council, which, if it had ended with the sixth paragraph, would have been no more than a strict and justifiable retaliation for the French decree of November, 1806, proceeds, as you will observe, sir, to provide many material exceptions which are calculated to qualify the operation of the order upon neutral nations in general, but which must be considered as most peculiarly favorable to the particular interests of the United States.

It will not escape you, sir, that by this order in council, thus modified and regulated, the direct intercourse of the United States with the colonies of the enemy is unrestrained; an indulgence, which, when it is considered to be (as it really is) not only a mitigation of that principle of just reprisal upon which the order itself is framed, but a deviation in favor of the United States, from that ancient and established principle of maritime law by which the intercourse with the colonies of an enemy in time of war is limited to the extent which that enemy was accustomed in time of peace to prescribe for it, and which, by reference to the conduct of France in a time of peace, would amount to a complete interdiction, cannot fail to afford to the American Government a proof of the amicable disposition of His Majesty towards the United States.

You will observe, sir, also, that the transportation of the colonial produce of the enemy from the United States to Europe, instead of being altogether prohibited, which would have been the natural retaliation for the rigorous and universal prohibition of British produce and manufactures by France, is freely permitted to the ports of Great Britain, with the power of subsequently re-exporting it to any part of Europe, under certain regulations.

The object of these regulations will be the establishment of such a protecting duty as shall prevent the enemy from obtaining the produce of his own colonies at a cheaper rate than that of the colonies of Great Britain. In this duty it is evident that America is no otherwise concerned than as being to make an advance to that amount for which it is in her own power amply to indemnify herself at the expense of the foreign consumer.

Another most important relaxation of the principles upon which His Majesty's orders proceed is, that which licenses the importation of all flour and meal, and all grains, tobacco, and other articles, the produce of the soil of America, with the exception of cotton, through the ports of His Majesty's dominions into those of his enemies, without the payment of any duty on the transit. This is, I beg leave to observe, an instance in which His Majesty has deprived this measure of its most efficacious and hurtful operation against the enemy, through motives of consideration for the interests of America. The reason why His Majesty could not feel himself at liberty, consistent with what was necessary for the execution of his purpose in any tolerable degree to allow this relaxation to apply to cotton, is to be found in the great extent to which France has pushed the manufacture of that article, and the consequent embarrassment upon her trade, which a heavy impost upon cotton, as it passes through Great Britain to France, must necessarily produce.

I cannot refrain from calling the attention of the Government of the United States to the contrast between the different modes in which His Majesty's orders and those of France are carried into execution. By His Majesty's, the utmost consideration is manifested for the interests of those nations whose commerce he is reluctantly compelled to impede, and ample time allowed for their becoming acquainted with the new regulations and conforming to them; whereas France, without any previous notice, and without any interval, applies her orders to trade already entered upon in ignorance of any such orders, and subjects to condemnation ships whose voyages, when commenced, were in strict conformity to all the regulations at that time promulgated by France.

Even with these and other modifications, His Majesty is not unaware that a measure extorted from him by the injustice of the enemy must inevitably produce inconveniences to the neutral parties who are affected by its operation. The right of His Majesty to resort to retaliation cannot be questioned. The suffering occasioned to neutral parties is incidental, and not of His Majesty's seeking. In the exercise of this undoubted right, His Majesty has studiously endeavored to avoid aggravating unnecessarily the inconveniences suffered by the neutral. And I am commanded by His Majesty especially to represent to the Government of the United States the earnest desire of His Majesty to see the commerce of the world restored once more to that freedom which is necessary for its prosperity, and his readiness to abandon the system which has been forced upon him, whenever the enemy shall retract the principles which have rendered it necessary. But His Majesty entertains the conviction, upon which alone his present measures are founded, that it would be vain to hope for such a retraction until the enemy shall himself have been made to feel a portion of the evils which he has endeavored to inflict upon others.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your obedient servant,

D. M. ERSKINE.

The Hon. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to Mr. Erskine.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 25, 1808.

SIR:

Having laid before the President your letter of the 23d of February, explaining the character of certain British orders of council issued in November last, I proceed to communicate the observations and representations which will manifest to your Government the sentiments of the President on so deep a violation of the commerce and rights of the United States.

These orders interdict to neutral nations, or rather to the United States, now the only commercial nation in a state of neutrality, all commerce with the enemies of Great Britain, now nearly the whole commercial world, with certain exceptions only, and under certain regulations, but too evidently fashioned to the commercial, the manufacturing, and the fiscal policy of Great Britain; and, on that account, the more derogatory from the honor and independence of neutral nations.

The orders are the more calculated to excite surprise in the United States, as they have disregarded the remonstrances conveyed in my letters of the 20th and 29th March, 1807, against another order of council, issued on a similar plea, in the month of January, 1807. To those just remonstrances no answer was indeed ever given; whilst the order has been continued in its pernicious operation against the lawful commerce of the United States, and we now find added to it others instituting still more ruinous deprivations, without even the addition of any new pretext; and when, moreover, it is notorious that the order of January was of a nature greatly to overbalance in its effects any injuries to Great Britain that could be apprehended from the illegal operation of the French decree on which the order was to retaliate, had that decree in its illegal operation been actually applied to the United States and been acquiesced in by them.

The last orders, like that of January, proceed on the most unsubstantial foundation. They assume for fact an acquiescence of the United States in an unlawful application to them of the French decree; and they assume for a principle that the right of retaliation, accruing to one belligerent against a neutral, through whom an injury is done by another belligerent, is not to have for its measure that of the injury received, but may be exercised in any extent and under any modifications which may suit the pleasure or the policy of the complaining party.

The fact, sir, is unequivocally disowned. It is not true that the United States have acquiesced in any illegal operation of the French decree; nor is it even true that, at the date of the British orders of November 11, a single application of that decree to the commerce of the United States on the high seas can be presumed to have been known to the British Government.

The French decree in question has two distinct aspects; one clearly importing an intended operation within the territorial limits as a local law, the other apparently importing an intended operation on the high seas.

Under the first aspect, the decree, however otherwise objectionable, cannot be said to have violated the neutrality of the United States. If the governing Powers on the continent of Europe choose to exclude from their ports British property or British productions, or neutral vessels proceeding from British ports, it is an act of sovereignty which the United States have no right to controvert. The same sovereignty is exercised by Great Britain at all times, in peace as well as in war, towards her friends as well as her enemies. Her statute book presents a thousand illustrations.

It is only, therefore, under the other aspect of the decree, that it can have violated neutral rights; and this would have resulted from its execution on the high seas, whether on the pretext of nominal blockade, or with a view to enforce a domestic regulation against foreign vessels, not within the domestic precincts, but under the authority and protection of the law of nations.

Has, then, the French decree been executed on the high seas against the commerce of the United States with Great Britain? and have the United States acquiesced in the unlawful and injurious proceeding?

I state, sir, on undeniable authority, that the first instance in which that decree was put in force against the neutral rights of the United States, was that of the Horizon, an American ship, bound from Great Britain to Lima, wrecked within the territorial jurisdiction of France, but condemned under an exposition of the decree, extending to the high seas its operation against neutrals. This judicial decision took place as late as the 16th day of October, 1807, and was not officially known to the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, till some time in November. At the date, therefore, of the first order of Great Britain, no injury whatever had been done to her, though an aggression on the commerce of the United States. No presumption even had been sufficiently authorized that the express stipulations in the treaty of France with the United States would not exempt their commerce at least from the operation of any edict incompatible with them. At the date even of the latter orders of November 11th, it appears that the only aggression, which had then occurred, was pretty certainly unknown to the British Government, and could therefore have had no share in producing this alleged retaliation.

To the fact that the case of the ship Horizon was the first that occurred of an execution of the French decree on the high seas, I am able to add, that as late as the 30th November, no other case had been brought into the French court of prizes. From accounts which have lately appeared, it is more than probable that unlawful captures by French cruises have since taken place, but it remains to be known whether they are to be referred to the concurrence of the French Government in the judgment pronounced in the case of the Horizon, or not rather to a French decree of the 17th December last, professing to be a retaliation on the British orders of November 11th.

I state, with equal confidence, that at no time have the United States acquiesced in violations of their neutral rights, injurious to Great Britain, or any other belligerent nation. So far were they in particular from acquiescing in the French decree of November, 1806, that the moment it was known to the minister at Paris, he called for explanations of its meaning, in relation to the United States, which were favorable, and uncontradicted by the actual operation of the decree; that he steadily watched over the proceedings under it, with a readiness to interpose against any unlawful extension of them, to the commerce of the United States; that no time was lost, after the decree came to the knowledge of the Government here, in giving him proper instructions on the subject; that he was equally prompt, on receiving the decision of the court in the case of the Horizon, in presenting to the French Government a remonstrance in terms which can never be censured for a defect of energy; and that by the first opportunity after that decision reached the President, the particular instructions required by it were forwarded to that minister. Nor is it to be forgotten, that, previous to the British orders of November, it had been explicitly communicated to the British Government, by the American minister at London, that explanations uncontradicted by any overt act had been given to our minister at Paris, which justified a reliance that the French decree would not be put in force against the United States; and that the communication was repeated to the British Government immediately on the publication of those orders.

What more could have been required on the part of the United States to obviate retaliating pretensions of any sort on the part of Great Britain? Retaliations are measures of rigor in all cases. Where they are to operate through a third and involuntary party, they will never be hastily resorted to by a magnanimous or a just Power, which will always allow to the third party its right to discuss the merits of the case, and will never permit itself to enforce its measures, without affording a reasonable time for the use of reasonable means for substituting another remedy. What would be the situation of neutral Powers, if the first blow levelled through them by one belligerent against another was to leave them no choice but between the retaliating vengeance of the latter, and an instant declaration of war against the former? Reason revolts against this as the sole alternative. The United States could no more be bound to evade the British orders by an immediate war with France, than they were bound to atone for the burning of the French ship of war, on the shore of North Carolina, by an immediate resort to arms against Great Britain.

With respect to the principle assumed by the British orders, it is perfectly clear that it could not justify them in the extent given to their operation, if the facts erroneously assumed could have been fully sustained.

Retaliation is a specific or equivalent return of injury, for injury received; and where it is to operate through the interests of a third party, having no voluntary participation in the injury received, the return ought, as already observed, to be inflicted with the most forbearing hand.

This is the language of common sense and the clearest equity. As the right to retaliate results merely from the wrong suffered, it cannot, in the nature of things, extend beyond the extent of the suffering. There may often be a difficulty in applying this rule with exactness, and a reasonable latitude may be allowable on that consideration. But a manifest and extravagant departure from the rule can find no apology.

What, then, is the extent of the injury experienced by Great Britain from the measures of her enemies, so far as the operation of those measures through the United States can render them in any sense responsible?

A mere declaration by a belligerent, without the intention or the means to carry it into effect against the rights and obligations of a neutral nation, and thence against the interests of another belligerent, could afford no pretext to the latter, to retaliate at the expense of the neutral. The declaration might give just offence to the neutral, but it would belong to him alone to decide on the course prescribed by the respect he owed to himself. No real damage having accrued to the belligerent, no indemnity could accrue.

For the same reason, a declaration of a belligerent, which he is known to be either not in a situation, or not to intend to carry but partially into execution against a neutral, to the injury of another belligerent, could never give more than a right to a commensurate redress against the neutral. All remaining unexecuted, and evidently not to be executed, is merely ostensible, working no injury to any, unless it be in the disrespect to the neutral, to whom alone it belongs to resent or disregard it.

Bring the case before us to this plain and equitable test. The French decree of November, 1806, undertook to declare the British isles in a state of blockade, to be enforced, if you please, against the neutral commerce of the United States, on the high seas, according to the faculty possessed for the purpose. As far as it was actually enforced, or an effect resulted from an apprehension that it could and would be enforced, it was an injury to Great Britain, for which, let it be supposed, the United States were answerable. On the other hand, as far as it was not enforced, and evidently either would not or could not be enforced, no injury was experienced by Great Britain, and no remedy could lie against the United States. Now, sir, it never was pretended that at the date of the first British order, issued in January, 1807, any injury had accrued to or was apprehended by Great Britain from an execution of the French decree against the commerce of the United States, on the theatre of their neutral rights; so far from it, that the order stands self condemned as a measure of retaliation, by expressly stating that the fleets of France and her allies, instead of being able to enforce the blockade of the British isles, were themselves confined to their own ports by the entire superiority of the British navy; converting thus, by the strangest of reasonings, the security of Great Britain against injury from the French decree, into a title to commit injury on a neutral party. In the November orders, also, whilst it is admitted that the French decree could not be but imperfectly executed for want of means, it is asserted that the intention of the French decree, and not the injury accruing from its operation through the commerce of the United States, is the scale by which the retaliating injury against them is to be measured.

Such are the pretexts and such the principles on which one great branch of the lawful commerce of this country became a victim to the first British order, and on which the last orders are now sweeping from the ocean all its most valuable remains.

Against such an unprecedented system of warfare on neutral rights and national independence, the common judgment and common feelings of mankind must forever protest.

I touch, sir, with reluctance, the question on which of the belligerent sides the invasion of neutral rights had its origin. As the United States do not acquiesce in these invasions by either, there could be no plea for involving them in the controversy. But as the British orders have made the decree of France, declaring, contrary to the law of nations, the British islands in a state of blockade, the immediate foundation of their destructive warfare on our commerce, it belongs to the subject to remind your Government of the illegal interruptions and spoliations suffered, previous to that decree, by the neutral commerce of the United States, under the proceedings of British cruisers and courts, and, for the most part, in consequence of express orders of the Government itself. Omitting proofs of inferior note, I refer to the extensive aggressions on the trade of the United States, founded on the plea of blockades, never legally established according to recognised definitions, to the still more extensive violations of our commerce with ports of her enemies not pretended to be in a state of blockade, and to the British order of council issued near the commencement of the existing war. This order, besides its general interpolation against the established law of nations, is distinguished by a special ingredient, violating that law as recognised by the course of decisions in the British courts. It subjects to capture and condemnation all neutral vessels returning with lawful cargoes, on the sole consideration that they had in their outward voyage deposited contraband of war at a hostile port.

If the commerce of the United States could, therefore, in any case, be reasonably made the victim and the sport of mutual charges and reproaches between belligerent parties, with respect to the priority of their aggressions on neutral commerce, Great Britain must look beyond the epoch she has chosen for illegal acts of her adversary, in support of the allegation on which she founds her retaliating edicts against our commerce.

But the United States are given to understand that the British Government has, as a proof of its indulgent and amicable disposition towards them, mitigated the authorized rigor it might have given to its measures, by certain exceptions peculiarly favorable to the commercial interests of the United States.

I forbear, sir, to express all the emotions with which such a language, on such an occasion, is calculated to inspire a nation which cannot for a moment be unconscious of its rights, nor mistake for an alleviation of wrongs regulations, to admit the validity of which would be to assume badges of humiliation never worn by an independent Power.

The first of these indulgencies is a commercial intercourse with the dependencies of the enemies of Great Britain, and it is considered as enhanced by its being a deviation, in favor of the United States, from the ancient and established principle of maritime law, prohibiting altogether such an intercourse in time of war.

Surely, sir, your Government, in assuming this principle in such terms, in relation to the United States, must have forgotten their repeated and formal protests against it, as these are to be found in the discussions and communications of their minister at London, as well as in explanations occasionally made on that subject to the British representative here. But permit me to ask more particularly, how it could have happened that the principle is characterized as an ancient and established one? I put the question the more freely, because it has never been denied that the principle, as asserted by your Government, was, for the first time, introduced during the war of 1756. It is, in fact, invariably cited and described in all judicial and other official transactions, "as the rule of 1756." It can have no pretension, therefore, to the title of an ancient rule.

And, instead of being an established rule or principle, it is well known that Great Britain is the only nation that has acted upon, or otherwise given a sanction to it. Nay, it is not even an established principle in the practice of Great Britain herself. When first applied in the war of 1756, the legality of a neutral trade with enemies' colonies was not contested by it. In certain cases only of the colonial trade, the allegation was, that the presumptive evidence arising from circumstances against the bona fide neutrality of the ownership justified the condemnation as of enemies' property. If the rule of condemnation was afterwards, during that war, converted into the principle now asserted, it could not possibly have been in operation, in its new shape, more than a very few years. During the succeeding war of 1778, it is admitted by every British authority, that the principle was never brought into operation. It may be regarded, in fact, as having been silently abandoned. And within the period of war, since its commencement in 1793, the manner in which the principle has been alternately contracted and extended, explained sometimes in one way, sometimes in another, rested now on this foundation, now on that, is no secret to those who have attended to its history and progress in the British orders of council and the British Courts of Admiralty.

With the exception, therefore, of a period, the last in modern times from which authentic precedents of maritime law will be drawn, and throughout which the United States, more interested in the question than any other nation, have uniformly combated the innovation, the principle has not in the British tribunals been in operation for a longer term than three, four, or five years, whilst in no others has it ever made its appearance, but to receive a decision protesting against it.

Such is the antiquity, and such the authority, of a principle, the deviations from which are held out as so many favors consoling the United States for the wide spread destruction of their legitimate commerce.

What must be said as to the other exceptions, which seem to have been viewed as claims on the gratitude of the United States? Is it an indulgence to them in carrying on their trade with the whole continent of Europe, to be laid under the necessity of going first to a British port, to accept a British license, and to pay a tribute to the British exchequer, as if we had been reduced to the colonial situation which once imposed these monopolizing restraints?

What, again, must be said as to the other features which we see blended on the face of these regulations? If the policy of them be to subject an enemy to privations, why are channels opened for a British trade with them which are shut to a neutral trade? If, in other cases, the real object be to admit a neutral trade with the enemy, why is it required that neutral vessels shall perform the ceremony of passing through a British port, when it can have no imaginable effect but the known and inevitable one of prohibiting the admission of the trade into the port of destination?

I will not ask why a primary article of our productions and exports, cotton-wool, is to be distinguished, in its transit, by a heavy impost not imposed on other articles, because it is frankly avowed, in your explanation of the orders, to be intended as an encouragement to British manufactures, and a check to the rival ones of France. I suppress, also, though without the same reason for it, the inquiry why less rigorous restrictions are applied to the trade of the Barbary Powers than are enforced against that of a nation, such as the United States, and in relations such as have existed between them and Great Britain.

I cannot, however, pass without notice the very unwarrantable innovations contained in the two last of the orders. In one of them, a certificate of the local origin of a cargo, although permitted in the port of departure, and required in the port of destination, by regulations purely domestic in both, and strictly analogous in principle to regulations in the commercial code of Great Britain, is made a cause of capture on the high seas, and of condemnation in her maritime courts. In the other order, the sale of a merchant ship by a belligerent owner to a neutral, although a transaction as legal, when fair, as a dealing in any other article, is condemned by a general rule, without an atom of proof or of presumption, that the transfer in the particular case is fraudulent, and the property therefore left in an enemy.

In fine, sir, the President sees in the edicts communicated by you, facts assumed which did not exist, principles asserted which never can be admitted, and, under the name of retaliation, measures transcending the limits reconcilable with the facts and the principles, as if both were as correct as they are unfounded. He sees, moreover, in the modifications of this system, regulations violating equally our neutral rights and our national sovereignty. He persuades himself, therefore, that your Government will see in the justice of the observations now made, in addition to those I had the honor verbally to state to you in the first instance, that the United States are well warranted in looking for a speedy revocation of a system which is every day augmenting the mass of injury, for which the United States have the best of claims to redress.

I have the honor to be, with great respect and consideration, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES MADISON.

The Hon. DAVID M. ERSKINE, Esq.

Mr. Rose to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, January 26, 1808.

Having had the honor to state to you, that I am expressly precluded by my instructions from entering upon any negotiation for the adjustment of the differences arising from the encounter of His Majesty's ship Leopard and the frigate of the United States the Chesapeake, as long as the proclamation of the President of the United States of the 2d of July, 1807, shall be in force, I beg leave to offer you such further explanation of the nature of that condition, as appears to me calculated to place the motives, under which it has been enjoined to me, thus to bring it forward in their true light.

In whatever spirit that instrument was issued, it is sufficiently obvious that it has been productive of considerable prejudice to His Majesty's interests, as confided to his military and other servants in the United States, to the honor of his flag, and to the privileges of his ministers accredited to the American Government. From the operation of this proclamation have unavoidably resulted effects of retaliation and self-assumed redress, which might be held to affect materially the question of the reparation due to the United States, especially inasmuch as its execution has been persevered in after the knowledge of His Majesty's early, unequivocal, and unsolicited disavowal of the unauthorized act of Admiral Berkeley, his disclaimer of the pretension exhibited by that officer to search the national ships of a friendly Power for deserters, and the assurances of prompt and effectual reparation, all communicated without loss of time to the minister of the United States in London, so as not to leave a doubt as to His Majesty's just and amicable intentions. But His Majesty, making every allowance for the irritation which was excited, and the misapprehensions which existed, has authorized me to proceed in the negotiation upon the sole discontinuance of measures of so inimical a tendency.

You are aware, sir, that any delay which may have arisen in the adjustment of the present differences, is not imputable to an intention of procrastination on the part of His Majesty's Government; on the contrary, its anxiety to terminate, as expeditiously as possible, the discussion of a matter so interesting to both nations has been evinced by the communication made by Mr. Secretary Canning to Mr. Monroe, before that minister of the United States was even informed of the encounter, and now by the promptitude with which it has despatched a special mission to this country for that express purpose.

I can have no difficulty in stating anew to you, with respect to the provisions of my instructions, calculated as they are to insure an honorable adjustment of the important point in question, and to remove the impressions which the late cause of difference may have excited in the minds of this nation, that I am authorized to express my conviction that they are such as will enable me to terminate the negotiation amicably and satisfactorily.

Having learned from you, sir, that it is solely as a measure of precaution the provisions of the proclamation are now enforced, I must persuade myself that a due consideration of His Majesty's conduct in this transaction will remove, as well any misapprehensions which may have been entertained respecting His Majesty's dispositions towards the United States, as the grounds upon which that enforcement rests; and the more so, as it has long been a matter of notoriety, that the orders issued to the officers of His Majesty's navy, in his proclamation of the 16th October, 1807, afforded ample security that no attempt can again be made to assert a pretension which His Majesty from the first disavowed.

I may add, that if His Majesty has not commanded me to enter into the discussion of the other causes of complaint, stated to arise from the conduct of his naval commanders in these seas, prior to the encounter of the Leopard and the Chesapeake, it was because it has been deemed improper to mingle them, whatever may be their merits, with the present matter, so much more interesting and important in its nature; an opinion originally and distinctly expressed by Mr. Monroe, and assented to by Mr. Secretary Canning. But if upon this more recent and more weighty matter of discussion, upon which the proclamation mainly and materially rests, His Majesty's amicable intentions are unequivocally evinced, it is sufficiently clear that no hostile disposition can be supposed to exist on his part, nor can any views be attributed to his Government, such as requiring to be counteracted by measures of precaution, could be deduced from transactions which preceded that encounter.

In offering these elucidations, I should observe, that the view in which I have brought forward the preliminary which I have specified, is neither to demand concession or redress, as for a wrong committed: into such the claim to a discontinuance of hostile provisions cannot be construed; but it is simply to require a cessation of enactments injurious in their effects, and which, if persisted in, especially after these explanations, must evince a spirit of hostility, under which His Majesty could not authorize the prosecution of the present negotiation, either consistently with his own honor, or with any well-founded expectation of the renewal or duration of that good understanding between the two countries which it is equally the interest of both to foster and to ameliorate.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,
G. H. ROSE.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Rose.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 5, 1808.

I have had the honor to receive and lay before the President your letter of the 26th January, in which you state that you are "expressly precluded by your instructions from entering upon any negotiation for the adjustment of the differences arising from the encounter of His Britannic Majesty's ship Leopard and the frigate of the United States the Chesapeake, as long as the proclamation of the President of the 2d of July, 1807, shall be in force."

This demand, sir, might justly suggest the simple answer, that, before the proclamation of the President could become a subject of consideration, satisfaction should be made for the acknowledged aggression which preceded it. This is evidently agreeable to the order of time, to the order of reason, and, it may be added, to the order of usage, as maintained by Great Britain, whenever, in analogous cases, she has been the complaining party.

But as you have subjoined to the preliminary demand certain explanations, with a view, doubtless, to obviate such an answer, it will best accord with the candor of the President to meet them with such a review of the whole subject as will suggest the solid grounds on which he regards such a demand as inadmissible.

I begin with the occurrences from which the proclamation of July 2d resulted. These are in general terms referred to by the instrument itself. A more particular notice of the most important of them will here be in place.

Passing over, then, the habitual but minor irregularities of His Britannic Majesty's ships of war in making the hospitalities of our ports subservient to the annoyance of our trade, both outward and inward, a practice not only contrary to the principles of public law, but expressly contrary to British ordinances enforced during maritime wars to which she bore a neutral relation, I am constrained, unwelcome as the task is, to call your attention to the following more prominent instances.

In the summer of the year 1804, the British frigate the Cambrian, with other cruisers in company, entered the harbor of New York. The commander, Captain Bradley, in violation of the port laws relating both to health and revenue, caused a merchant vessel just arrived, and confessedly within the limits and under the authority of the United States, to be boarded by persons under his command, who, after resisting the officers of the port in the legal exercise of their functions, actually impressed and carried off a number of seamen and passengers into the service of the ships of war. On an appeal to his voluntary respect for the laws, he first failed to give up the offender to justice, and finally repelled the officer charged with the regular process for the purpose.

This procedure was not only a flagrant insult to the sovereignty of the nation, but an infraction of its neutrality also, which did not permit a belligerent ship thus to augment its force within the neutral territory.

To finish the scene, this commander went so far as to declare, in an official letter to the minister plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty, and by him communicated to this Government, that he considered his ship, whilst lying in the harbor of New York, as having dominion around her within the distance of her buoys.

All these circumstances were duly made known to the British Government, in just expectation of honorable reparation. None has ever been offered. Captain Bradley was advanced from his frigate to the command of a ship of the line.

At a subsequent period, several British frigates, under the command of Captain Whitby, of the Leander, pursuing the practice of vexing the inward and outward trade of our ports, and hovering, for that purpose, about the entrance of that of New York, closed a series of irregularities with an attempt to arrest a coasting vessel, on board which an American citizen was killed by a cannon ball, which entered the vessel whilst within less than a mile from the shore.

The blood of a citizen thus murdered, in a trade from one to another port of his own country, and within the sanctuary of its territorial jurisdiction, could not fail to arouse the sensibility of the public, and to make a solemn appeal to the justice of the British Government. The case was presented moreover to that Government by this in the accent which it required, and with due confidence that the offender was to receive the exemplary punishment which he deserved. That there might be no failure of legal proof of a fact sufficiently notorious of itself, unexceptionable witnesses to establish it were sent to Great Britain, at the expense of the United States.

Captain Whitby was, notwithstanding, honorably acquitted; no animadversions took place on any other officer belonging to the squadron; nor has any apology or explanation been made since the trial was over, as a conciliatory offering to the disappointment of this country at such a result.

A case of another character occurred in the month of September, 1806. The Impetueux, a French ship of seventy-four guns, when aground within a few hundred yards of the shore of North Carolina, and therefore visibly within the territorial jurisdiction and hospitable protection of the United States, was fired upon, boarded, and burnt, by three British ships of war, under the command of Captain Douglas. Having completed this outrage on the sovereignty and neutrality of the United States, the British commander felt no scruple in proceeding thence into the waters near Norfolk, nor, in the midst of the hospitalities enjoyed by him, to add to what had passed a refusal to discharge from his ships impressed citizens of the United States, not denied to be such, on the plea that the Government of the United States had refused to surrender to the demand of Admiral Berkeley certain seamen alleged to be British deserters; a demand which it is well understood your Government disclaims any right to make.

It would be very superfluous to dwell on the features which mark this aggravated insult. But I must be permitted to remind you, that in so serious a light was a similar violation of neutral territory, by the destruction of certain French ships on the coast of Portugal by a British squadron, under the command of Admiral Boscawen, regarded by the court of Great Britain, that a minister extraordinary was despatched for the express purpose of expiating the aggression on the sovereignty of a friendly Power.

Lastly, presents itself the attack by the British ship of war Leopard on the American frigate Chesapeake, a case too familiar in all its circumstances to need a recital of any part of them. It is sufficient to remark, that the conclusive evidence which this event added to that which had preceded, of the uncontrolled excesses of the British naval commanders, in insulting our sovereignty and abusing our hospitality, determined the President to extend to all British armed ships the precaution heretofore applied to a few by name, of interdicting to them the use and privileges of our harbors and waters.

This was done by his proclamation of July 2, 1807, referring to the series of occurrences, ending with the aggression on the frigate Chesapeake, as the considerations requiring it. And if the apprehensions from the licentious spirit of the British naval commanders, thus developed and uncontrolled, which led to this measure of precaution, could need other justification than was afforded by what had passed, it would be amply found in the subsequent conduct of the ships under the command of the same Captain Douglas.

This officer, neither admonished by reflections on the crisis produced by the attack on the Chesapeake, nor controlled by respect for the law of nations or the laws of the land, did not cease within our waters to bring to, by firing at, vessels pursuing their regular course of trade; and, in the same spirit which had displayed itself in the recent outrage committed on the American frigate, he not only indulged himself in hostile threats and indications of a hostile approach to Norfolk, but actually obstructed our citizens in the ordinary communication between that and neighboring places. His proceedings constituted, in fact, a blockade of the port, and as real an invasion of the country, according to the extent of his forces, as if troops had been debarked, and the town besieged on the land side.

Was it possible for the Chief Magistrate of a nation, who felt for its rights and its honor, to do less than interpose some measure of precaution, at least against the repetition of enormities which had been so long uncontrolled by the Government whose officers had committed them, and which had at last taken the exorbitant shape of hostility and of insult, seen in the attack on the frigate Chesapeake? Candor will pronounce that less could not be done; and it will as readily admit that the proclamation comprising that measure could not have breathed a more temperate spirit, nor spoken in a more becoming tone. How far it has received from those whose intrusions it prohibited the respect due to the national authority, or been made the occasion of new indignities, needs no explanation.

The President, having interposed this precautionary interdict lost no time in instructing the ministers plenipotentiary of the United States to represent to the British Government the signal aggression which had been committed on their sovereignty and their flag, and to require the satisfaction due for it; indulging the expectation that His Britannic Majesty would at once perceive it to be the truest magnanimity, as well as the strictest justice, to offer that prompt and full expiation of an acknowledged wrong which would re-establish and improve, both in fact and in feeling, the state of things which it had violated.

This expectation was considered as not only honorable to the sentiments of His Majesty, but was supported by known examples, in which, being the complaining party, he had required and obtained, as a preliminary to any counter complaints whatever, a precise replacement of things, in every practicable circumstance, in their pre-existing situation.

Thus, in the year 1764, Bermudians, and other British subjects, who had, according to annual custom, taken possession of Turk's island for the season of making salt, having been forcibly removed, with their vessels and effects, by a French detachment from the island of St. Domingo, to which Turk's island was alleged to be an appurtenance, the British ambassador at Paris, in pursuance of instructions from his Government, demanded, as a satisfaction for the violence committed, that the proceedings should be disavowed, the intention of acquiring Turk's island disclaimed, orders given for the immediate abandonment of it on the part of the French, every thing restored to the condition in which it was at the time of the aggression, and reparation made of the damages which any British subjects should be found to have sustained, according to an estimation to be settled between the Governors of St. Domingo and Jamaica. A compliance with the whole of this demand was the result.

Again: In the year 1789 certain English merchants having opened a trade at Nootka Sound, on the northwest coast of America, and attempted a settlement at that place, the Spaniards, who had long claimed that part of the world as their exclusive property, despatched a frigate from Mexico, which captured two English vessels engaged in the trade, and broke up the settlement on the coast. The Spanish Government was the first to complain, in this case, of the intrusions committed by the British merchants. The British Government, however, demanded that the vessels taken by the Spanish frigate should be restored, and adequate satisfaction granted, previous to any other discussion.

This demand prevailed, the Spanish Government agreeing to make full restoration of the captured vessels, and to indemnify the parties interested in them for the losses sustained. They restored also the buildings and tracts of land, of which the British subjects had been dispossessed. The British, however, soon gave a proof of the little value they set on the possession by a voluntary dereliction, under which it has since remained.

The case which will be noticed last, though of a date prior to the case of Nootka Sound, is that of Falkland's islands. These islands lie about one hundred leagues eastward of the Straits of Magellan. The title to them had been a subject of controversy among several of the maritime nations of Europe. From the position of the islands, and other circumstances, the pretension of Spain bore an advantageous comparison with those of her competitors. In the year 1770 the British took possession of Port Egmont, in one of the islands, the Spaniards being at the time in possession of another port, and protesting against a settlement by the British. The protest being without effect, ships and troops were sent from Buenos Ayres, by the Governor of that place, which forcibly dispossessed and drove off the British settlers.

The British Government, looking entirely to the dispossession by force, demanded, as a specific condition of preserving harmony between the two courts, not only the disavowal of the Spanish proceedings, but that the affairs of that settlement should be immediately restored to the precise state in which they were previous to the act of dispossession. The Spanish Government made some difficulties, requiring particularly a disavowal, on the part of Great Britain, of the conduct of her officers at Falkland's islands, which, it was alleged, gave occasion to the steps taken by the Spanish Governor, and proposing an adjustment by mutual stipulations in the ordinary form.

The reply was, that the moderation of His Britannic Majesty, having limited his demand to the smallest reparation he could accept for the injury done, nothing was left for discussion but the mode of carrying the disavowal and restitution into execution; reparation losing its value if it be conditional, and to be obtained by any stipulation whatever from the party injured.

The Spanish Government yielded. The violent proceedings of its officers were disavowed; the fort, the port, and every thing else were agreed to be immediately restored to the precise situation which had been disturbed; and duplicates of orders, issued for the purpose to the Spanish officers, were delivered into the hands of one of the British principal Secretaries of State. Here, again, it is to be remarked, that satisfaction having been made for the forcible dispossession, the islands lost their importance in the eyes of the British Government, and were, in a short time, finally evacuated, and Port Egmont remains, with every other part of them, in the hands of Spain.

Could stronger pledges have been given, than are here found, that an honorable and instant reparation would be made in a case, differing no otherwise from those recited, than as it furnished to the same monarch of a great nation opportunity to prove that, adhering always to the same immutable principles, he was as ready to do right to others as to require it for himself.

Returning to the instructions given to the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at London, I am to observe, that the President thought it just and expedient to insert, as a necessary ingredient, in the adjustment of the outrage committed on the American frigate, a security against the future practice of British naval commanders in impressing from merchant vessels of the United States, on the high seas, such of their crews as they might undertake to denominate British subjects.

To this association of the two subjects, the President was determined, first, by his regarding both as resting on kindred principles, the immunity of private ships, with the known exceptions made by the law of nations, being as well established as that of public ships; and, there being no pretext for including in these exceptions the impressment (if it could be freed from its enormous and notorious abuse) of the subjects of a belligerent by the officers of that belligerent. The rights of a belligerent against the ships of a neutral nation accrue merely from the relation of the neutral to the other belligerent, as in conveying to him contraband of war, or in supplying a blockaded port.

The claim of a belligerent to search for and seize, on board neutral vessels on the high seas, persons under his allegiance, does not, therefore, rest on any belligerent right under the law of nations, but on a prerogative derived from municipal law, and involves the extravagant supposition that one nation has a right to execute, at all times, and in all cases, its municipal laws and regulations on board the ships of another nation, not being within its territorial limits.

The President was led to the same determination, secondly, by his desire of converting a particular incident into an occasion for removing another and more extensive source of danger to the harmony of the two countries; and, thirdly, by his persuasion that the liberality of the propositions, authorized with this view, would not fail to induce the ready concurrence of His Britannic Majesty; and that, the more extensive source of irritation and perplexity being removed, a satisfactory adjustment of the particular incident would be the less difficult. The President still thinks that such would have been the tendency of the mode for which he had provided; and he cannot, therefore, but regret that the door was shut against the experiment by the peremptory refusal of Mr. Canning to admit it into discussion, even in the most informal manner, as was suggested by Mr. Monroe.

The President felt the greater right as the step he had taken towards a more enlarged and lasting accommodation became thus a bar to the adjustment of the particular and recent aggression which had been committed against the United States. He found, however, an alleviation in the signified purpose of His Britannic Majesty to charge with this adjustment a special mission to the United States, which, restricted as it was, seemed to indicate a disposition from which a liberal and conciliatory arrangement of one great object at least might be confidently expected.

In this confidence, your arrival was awaited with every friendly solicitude, and our first interview having opened the way by an acquiescence in the separation of the two cases insisted on by His Britannic Majesty, notwithstanding the strong grounds on which they had been united by the President, it was not to be doubted that a tender of the satisfaction claimed by the United States for a distinguished and an acknowledged insult by one of his officers would immediately follow.

It was not, therefore, without a very painful surprise that the error of this expectation was discovered. Instead of the satisfaction due from the original aggression, it was announced that the first step towards the adjustment must proceed from the party injured; and your letter now before me formally repeats that, as long as the proclamation of the President, which issued on the 2d July, 1807, shall be in force, it will be an insuperable obstacle to a negotiation, even on the subject of the aggression which preceded it; in other words, that the proclamation must be put out of force before an adjustment of the aggression can be taken into discussion.

In explaining the grounds of this extraordinary demand, it is alleged to be supported by the consideration that the proceeding and pretension of the offending officer has been disavowed; that general assurances are given of a disposition and intention in His Britannic Majesty to make satisfaction; that a special minister was despatched with promptitude, for the purpose of carrying into effect the disposition; and that you have a personal conviction that the particular terms, which you are not at liberty previously to disclose, will be deemed by the United States satisfactory.

With respect to the disavowal, it would be unjust not to regard it as a proof of candor and amity towards the United States, and as some presage of the voluntary reparation which it implied to be due. But the disavowal can be the less confounded with the reparation itself, since it was sufficiently required by the respect which Great Britain owed to her own honor; it being impossible that an enlightened Government, had hostility been meditated, would have commenced it in such a manner, and in the midst of existing professions of peace and friendship. She owed it, also, to consistency with the disavowal, on a former occasion, in which the pretension had been enforced by a British squadron against the sloop of war Baltimore, belonging to the United States; and, finally, to the interest which Great Britain has, more than any other nation, in disclaiming a principle which would expose her superior number of ships of war to so many indignities from inferior navies.

As little can the general assurances that reparation would be made claim a return which could properly follow the actual reparation only. They cannot amount to more than a disposition, or at most a promise, to do what the aggressor may deem a fulfilment of his obligation. They do not prove even a disposition to do what may be satisfactory to the injured party, who cannot have less than an equal right to decide on the sufficiency of the redress.

In despatching a special minister for the purpose of adjusting the difference, the United States ought cheerfully to acknowledge all the proof it affords, on the part of His Britannic Majesty, of his pacific views towards them, and of his respect for their friendship. But whilst they could not, under any circumstances, allow to the measure more than a certain participation in an honorable reparation, it is to be recollected that the avowed and primary object of the mission was to substitute, for the more extended adjustment proposed by the United States at London, a separation of the subjects, as preferred by His Britannic Majesty; and you well know, sir, how fully this object was accomplished.

With respect to the personal conviction which you have expressed, that the terms which you decline to disclose would be satisfactory to the United States, it is incumbent on me to observe, that, with the highest respect for your judgment, and the most perfect confidence in your sincerity, an insuperable objection manifestly lies to the acceptance of a personal and unexplained opinion in place of a disclosure which would enable this Government to exercise its own judgment in a case affecting so essentially its honor and its rights. Such a course of proceeding would be without example; and there can be no hazard in saying, that one will never be afforded by a Government which respects itself as much as yours justly does; and, therefore, can never be reasonably expected from one which respects itself as much as this has a right to do.

I forbear, sir, to enlarge on the intrinsic incongruity of the expedient proposed. But I must be allowed to remark, as an additional admonition of the singular and mortifying perplexity in which a compliance might involve the President, that there are, in the letter of Mr. Canning, communicating to Mr. Monroe the special mission to the United States, pregnant indications that other questions and conditions may have been contemplated, which would be found utterly irreconcilable with the sentiments of this nation.

If neither any nor all of these considerations can sustain the preliminary demand made in your communication, it remains to be seen whether such a demand rests with greater advantage on the more precise ground on which you finally seem to place it.

The proclamation is considered as a hostile measure, and a discontinuance of it as due to the discontinuance of the aggression which led to it.

It has been sufficiently shown that the proclamation, as appears on the face of it, was produced by a train of occurrences terminating in the attack on the American frigate, and not by this last alone. To a demand, therefore, that the proclamation be revoked, it would be perfectly fair to oppose a demand that redress be first given for the numerous irregularities which preceded the aggression on the American frigate, as well as for this particular aggression, and that effectual control be interposed against repetitions of them. And as no such redress has been given for the past, notwithstanding the lapse of time which has taken place, nor any such security for the future, notwithstanding the undiminished reasonableness of it, it follows that a continuance of the proclamation would be consistent with an entire discontinuance of one only of the occurrences from which it proceeded.

But it is not necessary to avail the argument of this view of the case, although of itself entirely conclusive. Had the proclamation been founded on the single aggression committed on the Chesapeake, and were it admitted that the discontinuance of that aggression merely gave a claim to the discontinuance of the proclamation, the claim would be defeated by the incontestable fact that that aggression has not been discontinued. It has never ceased to exist, and is in existence at this moment. Need I remind you, sir, that the seizure and asportation of the seamen belonging to the crew of the Chesapeake entered into the very essence of that aggression; that, with an exception of the victim to a trial forbidden by the most solemn considerations, and greatly aggravating the guilt of its author, the seamen in question are still retained; and, consequently, that the aggression, if in no other respect, is by that act alone continued and in force?

If the views which have been taken of the subject have the justness which they claim, they will have shown that on no ground whatever can an annulment of the proclamation of July 2 be reasonably required as a preliminary to the negotiation with which you are charged. On the contrary, it clearly results, from a recurrence to the causes and objects of the proclamation, that, as was at first intimated, the strongest sanctions of Great Britain herself would support the demand that, previous to a discussion of the proclamation, due satisfaction should be made to the United States; that this satisfaction ought to extend to all the wrongs which preceded and produced that act; and that, even limiting the merits of the question to the single relation of the proclamation to the wrong committed in the attack on the American frigate, and deciding the question on the principle that a discontinuance of the latter required of right a discontinuance of the former, nothing appears that does not leave such a preliminary destitute of every foundation which could be assumed for it.

With a right to draw this conclusion, the President might have instructed me to close this communication with the reply stated in the beginning of it, and perhaps in taking this course he would only have consulted a sensibility to which most Governments would, in such a case, have yielded. But adhering to the moderation by which he has been invariably guided, and anxious to rescue the two nations from the circumstances under which an abortive issue to your mission necessarily places them, he has authorized me, in the event of your disclosing the terms of reparation which you believe will be satisfactory, and on its appearing that they are so, to consider this evidence of the justice of His Britannic Majesty as a pledge for an effectual interposition with respect to all the abuses against a recurrence of which the proclamation was meant to provide, and to proceed to concert with you a revocation of that act, bearing the same date with the act of reparation to which the United States are entitled.

I am not unaware, sir, that, according to the view which you appear to have taken of your instructions, such a course of proceeding has not been contemplated by them. It is possible, nevertheless, that a re-examination, in the spirit in which I am well persuaded it will be made, may discover them to be not inflexible to a proposition, in so high a degree liberal and conciliatory. In every event, the President will have manifested his willingness to meet your Government on a ground of accommodation, which spares to its feelings, however misapplied he may deem them, every concession not essentially due to those which must be equally respected, and, consequently, will have demonstrated that the very ineligible posture given to so important a subject in the relations of the two countries, by the unsuccessful termination of your mission, can be referred to no other source than the rigorous restrictions under which it was to be executed.

I make no apology, sir, for the long interval between the date of your letter and that under which I write. It is rendered unnecessary by your knowledge of the circumstances to which the delay is to be ascribed.

With high consideration and respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MADISON.

GEORGE H. ROSE, Esq. His Britannic Majesty's Minister, &c. &c. &c.

Mr. Rose to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, March 17th, 1808.

Being deeply impressed with the sense of His Majesty's anxiety that full effect should be given to those views of justice and moderation, by which his conduct has been regulated through the whole of the unfortunate transaction whence the present differences have arisen, and of the disappointment with which he would learn the frustration of his just and equitable purposes, I have felt it incumbent upon me, on the receipt of the letter which you did me the honor to address to me on the 5th instant, to apply anew to this matter the most ample and serious consideration. It is with the most painful sensations of regret that I find myself, on the result of it, under the necessity of declining to enter into the terms of negotiation, which, by direction of the President of the United States, you therein offer. I do not feel myself competent, in the present instance, to depart from those instructions which I stated in my letter of the 26th of January last, and which preclude me from acceding to the condition thus proposed.

I should add, that I am absolutely prohibited from entering upon matters unconnected with the specific object I am authorized to discuss, much less can I thus give any pledge concerning them. The condition suggested, moreover, leads to the direct inference that the proclamation of the President of the United States of the 2d of July, 1807, is maintained either as an equivalent for reparation for the time being, or as a compulsion to make it.

It is with the more profound regret that I feel myself under the necessity of declaring that I am unable to act upon the terms thus proposed, as it becomes my duty to inform you, in conformity to my instructions, that, on the rejection of the demand stated in my former letter, on the part of His Majesty, my mission is terminated. And as His Majesty's Government, in providing me with those instructions, did not conceive that, after the declaration of his sentiments respecting the affair of the Chesapeake was made known to this Government, the state of any transactions pending or unterminated between the two nations could justify the perseverance in the enforcement of the President's proclamation, I can exercise no discretion on this point.

As on a former occasion I detailed, though minutely, the motives for that demand on the part of His Majesty, which I with so much concern learn to be deemed inadmissible by the Government of the United States, I should here abstain from an exposition of them, which visibly can have no further effect upon the negotiation, if I did not deem it essential that they should not be left under any misapprehension which I might be able to remove. I shall, therefore, take a short review of the transaction which has given rise to these discussions, in order the more correctly to determine the soundness of the principles upon which that demand is made.

Certain deserters from His Majesty's navy, many of them his natural born subjects, having entered into the service of the United States, were repeatedly and fruitlessly demanded by the British officers of the recruiting officers of the United States, but were retained in their new service. As it was a matter of notoriety that several of these deserters were on board the frigate of the United States, the Chesapeake, they were demanded of that frigate on the high seas by His Majesty's ship Leopard, and all knowledge of their presence on board being denied, she was attacked, and four of them, one avowedly a native Englishman, were taken out of her. Without being deterred by the consideration of how far circumstances hostile in their nature had provoked, though they undoubtedly by no means justified this act of the British officer, His Majesty's Government directed that a positive disavowal of the right of search asserted in this case, and of the act of the British officer as being unauthorized, and a promise of reparation, should be conveyed to the American minister in London, before he had made any representation by order of the United States. This disavowal, made on the 2d of August last, was transmitted by him to his Government before the 6th of that month; but before Mr. Monroe had received his orders to demand reparation, His Majesty learned, with what surprise it is needless to dwell upon, that the President of the United States had interdicted, by proclamation bearing date the 2d of July, 1807, the entry of all their ports to the whole of his navy; this surprise was certainly increased, when, in the letter delivered by that minister to require redress for the wrong, although it went into details unconnected with it, not only no concern was expressed on the part of the United States at having felt themselves compelled to enact measures of so much injury and indignity towards a friendly Power, but no mention was made of the causes of such measures being resorted to, or even of the fact of their having been adopted. In addition to the embarrassment arising from these circumstances, and the insufficiency of the explanations subsequently given to Mr. Canning, the introduction of a subject foreign to that of the complaint became the main impediment to the success of the discussions which took place in London. When I had the honor to open the negotiation with you, sir, as I had learned that the President's proclamation was still in force, it became my duty, conformably to my instructions, to require its recall as a preliminary to further discussion; had it not been in force, I was not ordered to have taken it into consideration in the adjustment of reparation; and it was considered as hardly possible that it should not have been recalled immediately upon the knowledge of His Majesty's disavowal of the attack upon the Chesapeake, as an unauthorized act. But His Majesty could not suffer the negotiation to be carried on, on his behalf, under an interdict, which, even if justifiable in the first moment of irritation, cannot be continued after the declaration of His Majesty's sentiments upon the transaction, except in a spirit of hostility.

It might have been fairly contended that, in the first instance, the exercise of such an act of power, before reparation was refused or unduly protracted, was incompatible with the purposes and essence of a pacific negotiation and with a demand of redress through that channel; but such have been His Majesty's conciliatory views, that this argument has not been insisted on, although it might now be the more forcibly urged, as it appears that the Government of the United States was from the first sensible, that even had hostility been meditated by the British Government, it would not have commenced it in such a manner. But the exception taken is to the enforcement, continued up to the present time, of measures highly unfriendly in their tendency, persisted in not only after the disavowal in question; the promise of the proffer of suitable reparation, and the renewed assurances of His Majesty's amicable disposition, but after security has been given in a public instrument, bearing date the 16th of October, 1807, that the claim to the seizure of deserters from the national ships of other Powers cannot again be brought forward by His Majesty's naval officers. It is unnecessary to dwell upon the injury and indignity to which His Majesty's service is exposed, both as touching the freedom and security of correspondence of his agents and accredited ministers in the United States, or as resulting from a measure which in time of war excludes the whole of his navy from all their ports, which ports are completely open to the fleets of his enemies. It will be sufficient to observe, that, even where exemptions from it are granted, they are made subject to such conditions, that if the three last British ships of war which have entered these ports upon public business, two of them, His Majesty's ship Statira having on board a minister sent out for the adjustment of the present differences, and a schooner bearing despatches, in consequence of their inability to procure pilots, were obliged to enter their waters without such assistance, and were exposed to considerable danger. Great Britain, by the forms established, could repair the wrongs committed, even to the satisfaction of the United States, no otherwise than by the channel of negotiation; yet she avowed distinctly that a wrong was committed, and that she was ready to make reparation for it; it cannot, therefore, be contended that the unavoidable delay of actual reparation subjected her to the imputation of persisting in an aggression which was disclaimed from the first. If this be true, however much she will regret any impediment in the adjustment of a difference in which the feelings of this nation are so materially interested, can she, consistently with a due care of her own honor and interests, allow it to be concluded on her part under an adherence to a conduct which has a decided character of enmity in the proceedings held towards her by the other party?

I know not in what view the perseverance in the President's proclamation up to this moment can be considered but in that of a measure of retaliation, or of self-assumed reparation, or a measure intended to compel reparation; unless it be that which, if I rightly understand, you define it to be a measure of precaution.

If, when a wrong is committed, retaliation is immediately resorted to by the injured party, the door to pacific adjustment is closed, and the means of conciliation are precluded. The right to demand reparation is incompatible with the assumption of it. When parties are in a state of mutual hostility, they are so far on a footing, and, as such, they may treat; but a party disclaiming every unfriendly intention, and giving unequivocal proofs of an amicable disposition, cannot be expected to treat with another whose conduct towards it has the direct effects of actual hostility. If, then, the enforcement of the President's proclamation, up to the present moment, is a measure of self-assumed reparation, it is directly repugnant to the spirit and fact of amicable negotiation; if it is a measure to compel reparation, it is equally so; and, by the perseverance in it, Great Britain has dispensed with the duty of proffering redress. But if it is a measure of precaution, in order to secure reparation, or in order to compel it, it falls under the objections I have just stated. If it is a precaution adopted as a guard against acts of violence apprehended on the part of His Majesty's naval officers, it surely cannot be considered as being as effectual a security as that arising from the renewed assurances of His Majesty's friendly disposition, which imply a due observance of the rights of nations with which Great Britain is in amity, by all persons holding authority under His Majesty's Government; from the disavowal of the pretension of the search of national ships, and from the further assurance of that disavowal given in His Majesty's proclamation of the 16th of October last. Neither under these concurrent circumstances can the plea of necessity be maintained; and if such a proceeding has not the plea of necessity, it assumes the character of aggression. If these concurrent securities against such an apprehension have any value, the necessity no longer exists; if they are of no value, negotiation cannot be attempted, as the basis upon which it rests, the mutual confidence of the two parties, would be wholly wanting.

From the moment after the unfortunate affair of the Chesapeake, that His Majesty's naval commanders in these waters had ascertained that they were safe from the effervescence of that popular fury, under which the most glaring outrages were committed, and by which they were very naturally led to the supposition that they were objects of particular hostility, and that a state of war against them, requiring precautions on their part, had commenced, no conduct has been imputed to them which could vindicate the necessity of maintaining in force the President's proclamation. Since that time such of those officers as have been necessitated by the circumstances of the war to remain in these waters, have held no communication with the shore, (except in an instance too trifling to dwell upon, and instantly disavowed by the commanding officer;) and they have acquiesced quietly in various privations, highly prejudicial to the service they were upon, and, in consequence of an interdict, which had they been regardless of their duties towards a State in amity with their sovereign, and had they not carefully repressed the feelings its tone and language had a direct tendency to provoke in them, would have rather excited than have averted the evils it was stated to be intended to prevent; were they regardful of these duties, it was unnecessary. Had they felt themselves obliged completely to evacuate the waters of the United States, especially whilst an enemy's squadron was harbored in them, they could have done it but under the admission of hostile compulsion; and under such compulsion, carried into full effect, His Majesty could not have dissembled the extent of the injury received.

In the several cases adduced, in which Great Britain required certain preliminaries previously to entering into negotiation, she regulated her conduct by the same principles to which she now adheres; and refused, whilst no hostility was exhibited on her part, to treat with Powers whose proceedings denoted it towards her, and who maintained their right in what they had assumed.

From the considerations thus offered, I trust that neither the order of reason nor that of usage is in contradiction to the demand I have urged; nor am I aware how the order of time opposes the revocation in the first instance of that act, which affects injuriously one of the parties, and is still avowed by the other.

The subject is thus presented to you, sir, in the light in which it was natural that it should offer itself to His Majesty's Government. It certainly conceived the President's proclamation to rest chiefly, and most materially, upon the attack made upon the frigate of the United States, the Chesapeake, by His Majesty's ship Leopard, although other topics were adduced as accessories. In this apprehension it may be held to have been sufficiently warranted, by the precise time at which, and the circumstances under which, it was issued, and by its whole context; and the more so, as the impulse under which it was drawn up appears to have been so sudden, as to have precluded a due examination of all the grounds of allegation contained in it. And here I beg leave to assure you, that with respect to the spirit and tone of that instrument, it would be highly satisfactory to me if I could feel myself justified in expressing, on the part of His Majesty, any degree of coincidence with the opinions you have announced; or, when thus appealed to, and making every allowance for the irritation of the moment, I could dissemble the extreme surprise experienced by Great Britain, that the Government of a friendly nation, even before an amicable demand of reparation was made, and yet meaning to make that demand, should have issued an edict directing measures of injury very disproportionate to what it knew was an authorized offence, and both in its terms and its purport so injurious to the Government to which that demand was to be addressed, and tending to call forth in both nations the feelings under which a friendly adjustment would be the most difficult. But if, as I learn from you, sir, the proclamation rests substantially on other causes, it is then peculiarly to be regretted, that, together with the demand for redress made in September last, the Government of the United States did not think fit to offer a negotiation or an explanation of so momentous a measure, or to declare that its recall must be more or less connected with the adjustment of other alleged wrongs. Neither did it think it necessary to return any answer to the remonstrance given in by His Majesty's envoy at Washington, on the 13th July, 1807, in which he represented "that he considered that interdiction to be so unfriendly in its object, and so injurious in its consequences to His Majesty's interests, that he could not refrain from expressing the most sincere regret that it ever should have been issued, and most earnestly deprecating its being enforced."

It could not be supposed that a circumstance of so great weight could be overlooked by His Majesty's Government, in determining the line of conduct to be held in the negotiation; and as little could it be expected to pass it over, when, on the failure of the discussion with Mr. Monroe, it directed a special mission to be sent to the United States. It had the less reason to imagine that any other grievances could be connected with that for the adjustment of which I am empowered to negotiate, as Mr. Monroe, in his letter to Mr. Canning of the 29th July last, had stated, with respect to other subjects of remonstrance, that it was improper to mingle them with the present more serious cause of complaint—an opinion to which Mr. Canning declared his perfect assent in his letter to that minister of the second of the subsequent month; so that this act was left as single and distinct, to be singly and distinctly considered. His Majesty's Government, therefore, could not, consistently with any view of the subject then before it, or indeed with the just object of my mission, direct or empower me to enter upon matters not connected with that of the Chesapeake; and they could with the less propriety do it, as, in order to render the adjustment of differences of such a nature the more easy and the more conspicuous, the ministers charged especially with such offices have been, with few, if any exceptions, restricted to the precise affair to be negotiated. With respect, therefore, to those other causes of complaint, upon which you inform me that the President's proclamation rests, I cannot be furnished with documents enabling me either to admit or to controvert those statements of grievance foreign to the attack upon that ship contained in your letter, or authorized to discuss the matters themselves. I shall, therefore, not allow myself to offer such comments as my personal knowledge of some of those transactions suggest to me, although their tendency would materially affect both the marked manner in which those transactions are portrayed, and the disadvantageous light in which His Majesty's Government is represented to have acted respecting them. I am moreover led to the persuasion that my Government will be the more easily able to rescue itself from inculpation, by the inference arising from passages in Mr. Monroe's letter to Mr. Secretary Canning of the 29th of September last, that the differences unhappily existing between the two nations were in a train of adjustment.

If His Majesty has not permitted me to enter into the discussion of the search of neutral merchant ships for British seamen, together with the adjustment of the amount of reparation for the attack upon the Chesapeake, it was nowise with a view of precluding the further agitation of that question at a suitable time, but it was that the negotiation might be relieved from the embarrassment arising from the connexion of the present matter with the one so foreign to it, and, as it was but too well known, so difficult to be adjusted; of a right distinctly disclaimed with one which Great Britain has at all times asserted, of enforcing her claim to the services of her natural born subjects when found on board merchant vessels of other nations; a claim which she founds in that principle of universal law, which gives to the State the right of requiring the aid and assistance of her native citizens. The recurrence, therefore, to that cause of negotiation which had been originally settled between Mr. Secretary Canning and Mr. Monroe, and which had been alone broken in upon by the orders subsequently received by that minister, can only be considered as a resumption of that course of things which Great Britain strenuously contended there was no ground to depart from. I may observe, that this purpose might have been effected without the intervention of a special minister.

It will be in your recollection, sir, that in our first interview I stated the condition which makes the subject of the present letter, before I was informed by you that the President of the United States would consent to the separation of the two subjects.

I had trusted that the exposition which I added in my letter of the 26th of January, to the verbal explanation I had before offered of the grounds of His Majesty's demand, was both in its purport and in the terms in which it was couched such as to prevent a suspicion that they were in their intention derogatory to the honor, or calculated to wound the just sensibility of this nation. I may add, that such a supposition could not be reconciled with the various ostensible and unequivocal demonstrations of His Majesty's good faith, and anxiety that this transaction should be brought to an amicable termination, which were exhibited even prior to any remonstrances on the part or by order of this Government. The other topics which I felt myself authorized to advance in that letter, in illustration of that amicable disposition on the part of the King, were brought forward from the conviction I entertained that they must be of a nature to be satisfactory to this Government, and therefore such as it was particularly my duty to enforce, but not with a view to rest upon them the right to advance the claim which I have stated.

I may here remark, it is obvious, that far from requiring that the first steps towards an arrangement of reparation should be taken by the United States, Great Britain has already made them openly and distinctly; they are indubitable testimonies to the respect borne and decidedly marked by Great Britain to the ties of amity subsisting between the two nations, and of her cordial desire to maintain them unimpaired; and as such alone they were urged.

As His Majesty would have derived sincere satisfaction from the evidence of corresponding feelings on the part of the United States, so it would be the more painful to me to dwell upon a series of insults and menaces, which, without any provocation of warlike preparation on the part of Great Britain, have been for months accumulated upon her through the United States, and but too frequently from quarters whose authority necessarily and powerfully commanded attention.

I ought, perhaps, to apologize for adverting to an incidental expression in your letter, if I did not think it right to remove any ambiguity respecting the nature of the claim which Great Britain maintained to her seamen, native citizens of the realm, who have deserted from her service to that of other Powers; it is that, on demand, they shall be discharged forthwith, and consequently they shall instantly be freed from their newly contracted obligations.

Before I close this letter, allow me to state to you, sir, that I have felt it my duty to transmit to His Majesty's Government the exposition contained in your letter of the 5th instant, of the various demands on the honor and good faith of Great Britain on which the complaint is made, that satisfaction has not been afforded to the United States, and on which, conjointly with the affair of the Chesapeake, you inform me that the proclamation of the President of the United States of the 2d of July, 1807, is founded. It will be for His Majesty's Government to determine, on the part of Great Britain, whether any, and what obligations remain to be fulfilled by her; whether any denial or such protraction of redress has occurred on her part, as to render necessary or justifiable the perseverance in an edict, which, when not necessary or justifiable, assumes a character of aggression; and whether, on the result of these considerations, the present negotiation can be resumed on the part of His Majesty, with a due regard for his own honor, or with a prospect of a more successful termination.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,
G. H. ROSE.

IN SENATE OF THE U. S., April 16, 1808.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 4th instant, the correspondence between Mr. Monroe and Mr. Canning, and between Mr. Madison and Mr. Rose, relative to the attack made upon the frigate Chesapeake by the British ship of war Leopard; and also the communications made to the Senate by the President of the United States, on the 30th day of March last, containing a letter from Mr. Erskine to the Secretary of State, and a letter from Mr. Champagny to General Armstrong, reported:

That, on a review of the several orders, decrees, and decisions of Great Britain and France, within the period of the existing war, it appears that, previous to the measures referred to in the letters from Mr. Erskine to the Secretary of State, and from Mr. Champagny to General Armstrong, various and heavy injuries have been committed against the neutral commerce and navigation of the United States under the following heads:

1st. The British order of June, 1803, unlawfully restricting the trade of the United States with a certain portion of the unblockaded ports of her enemies, and condemning vessels with innocent cargoes, on a return from ports where they had deposited contraband articles.

2d. The capture and condemnation, in the British courts of admiralty, of American property, on a pretended principle, debarring neutral nations from a trade with the enemies of Great Britain interdicted in time of peace. The injuries suffered by the citizens of the United States, on this head, arose, not from any public order of the British council, but from a variation in the principle upon which the courts of admiralty pronounced their decisions. These decisions have, indeed, again varied, without any new orders of council being issued; and in the higher courts of admiralty some of the decisions, which had formed the greatest cause for complaint, have been reversed, and the property restored. There still remains, however, a heavy claim of indemnity for confiscations which were made during the period of these unwarrantable decisions, and for which all negotiation has hitherto proved unavailing.

3d. Blockades notified to the minister of the United States at London, and thence made a ground of capture against the trade of the United States, in entire disregard of the law of nations, and even of the definition of legal blockades, laid down by the British Government itself. Examples of these illegitimate blockades will be found in the notifications of the blockade of May 16, 1806, of the coast from the river Elbe to Brest, inclusive; blockade of 11th May, 1807, expounded 19th June, 1807, of the Elbe, Weser, and Ems, and the coast between the same; blockade 11th of May, 1807, of the Dardanelles and Smyrna; blockade of 8th January, 1808, of Carthage, Cadiz, and St. Lucar, and of all the intermediate ports between Carthage and St. Lucar, comprehending a much greater extent of coast than the whole British navy could blockade according to the established law of nations.

4th. To these injuries, immediately authorized by the British Government, might be added other spurious blockades by British naval commanders, particularly that of the island of Curacao, which, for a very considerable period, was made a pretext for very extensive spoliations on the commerce of the United States.

5th. The British proclamation of October last, which makes it the duty of the British officers to impress from American merchant vessels all such of their crews as might be taken or mistaken for British subjects; those officers being the sole and absolute judges in the case.

For the decrees and acts of the French Government violating the maritime law of nations, in respect to the United States, the committee refer to the instances contained in the report of the Secretary of State, January 25, 1806, to the Senate, in one of which, viz: a decree of the French General Ferrand, at St. Domingo, are regulations sensibly affecting the neutral and commercial rights of the United States.

The French act, next in order of time, is the decree of November 21, 1806, declaring the British isles in a state of blockade, and professing to be a retaliation on antecedent proceedings of Great Britain, violating the law of nations.

This decree was followed, first, by the British order of January, 1807, professing to be a retaliation on that decree, and subjecting to capture the trade of the United States, from the port of one belligerent to a port of another; and, secondly, by the orders of November last, professing to be a further retaliation on the same decree, and prohibiting the commerce of neutrals with the enemies of Great Britain, as explained in the aforesaid letter of Mr. Erskine.

These last British orders again have been followed by the French decree of December 17, purporting to be a retaliation on the said orders, and to be put in force against the commerce of the United States, as stated in the aforesaid letter of Mr. Champagny.

The committee forbear to enter into a comparative view of these proceedings of the different belligerent Powers, deeming it sufficient to present the materials from which it may be formed. They think it their duty, nevertheless, to offer the following remarks, suggested by a collective view of the whole:

The injury and dangers resulting to the commerce of the United States from the course and increase of these belligerent measures, and from similar ones adopted by other nations, were such as first to induce the more circumspet of our merchants and ship-owners no longer to commit their property to the high seas, and at length to impose on Congress the indispensable duty of interposing some legislative provision for such an unexampled state of things.

Among other expedients, out of which a choice was to be made, may be reckoned—

- 1st. A protection of commerce by ships of war.
- 2d. A protection of it by self-armed vessels.
- 3d. A war of offence as well as of defence.
- 4th. A general suspension of foreign commerce.
- 5th. An embargo on our vessels, mariners, and merchandise.

This last was adopted, and the policy of it was enforced, at the particular moment, by accounts, quickly after confirmed, of the British orders of November, and by the probability that these would be followed, as has also happened by an invigorated spirit of retaliation in other belligerent Powers; the happy effect of the precaution is demonstrated by the well-known fact that the ports of Europe are crowded with captured vessels of the United States, unfortunately not within the reach of the precaution.

With respect to a protection of our commerce by ships of war, it must be obviously impracticable, in any material degree, without a lapse of time, and an expense which amounts to a prohibition of that resort, besides that it would necessarily involve hostile collisions with one or more of the belligerent Powers.

Self-armed merchantmen would have the same tendency, at the same time that they would be utterly inadequate to a security against the multiplied fleets and cruisers to be encountered.

An entire suspension of foreign commerce, as the resort in the first instance, would evidently have produced some inconveniences, not incident to the embargo as it was modified. But the committee do not suppress their opinion that, after a reasonable time, it may not improperly take the place of the embargo, in case of a protracted adherence by the belligerent Powers to their destructive proceedings against our neutral commerce.

With respect to a resort to war, as a remedy for the evils experienced, the committee will offer no other reflection than that it is in itself so great an evil that the United States have wisely considered peace and honest neutrality as the best foundation of their general policy. It is not for the committee to say under what degree of aggravated injuries and sufferings a departure from this policy may become a duty, and the most pacific nation find itself compelled to exchange, for the calamities of war, the greater distresses of longer forbearance.

In the present state of things, the committee cannot recommend any departure from that policy which withholds our commercial and agricultural property from the licensed depredations of the great maritime belligerent Powers. They hope that an adherence to this policy will eventually secure to us the blessings of peace, without any sacrifice of our national rights; and they have no doubt that it will be supported by all the manly virtue which the good people of the United States have ever discovered on great and patriotic occasions. But the committee would suggest on this subject that better counsels in the belligerent Governments, producing a juster conduct towards neutral nations, would render a continuance of the embargo unnecessary, and that it will be a provident measure to vest in the Executive a power, in such an event to suspend, until the next session of Congress, wholly, or in part, the several acts prohibiting the departure of our vessels for foreign ports.

Although the committee have abstained from entering into any particular comparison of the proceedings of the French and British Governments towards the United States, they cannot reconcile it with their duty, or with the just sensibility of the nation, not to advert to the tenor and language of the late communications made by the respective organs of those Governments.

In the letter of Mr. Champagny the United States are not only threatened with confiscation, as the final destiny of American property seized under French decrees, unless dispositions shall be manifested by them against Great Britain satisfactory to France, but they are even declared, without reserve of any sort, to be actually in a state of war against Great Britain.

In the letter of Mr. Erskine to the Secretary of State the United States are explicitly charged with justly subjecting their commerce to confiscations, under the British orders, by not opposing an effectual resistance against the decrees of France; in other words, by not making war against that nation in case no other interposition should be effectual. There are in this exposition of the British orders certain features which claim particular attention. Among the regulations of which they consist, it is provided that the commerce of the United States, bound from their own ports to its legal and ordinary markets, shall pass through British ports; shall there, in all cases, take their clearances from British officers; shall in some cases obtain special licenses, and, in others, pay a direct and avowed tax: thus putting the United States on a commercial footing even worse than was allowed to British colonies, which were left free to carry their exports directly to foreign markets, in cases where an intermediate voyage to the parent country would be too oppressive. In the present case not a single article is permitted to be sent from the United States to the most southern ports of Europe, without a previous voyage to Great Britain, and, in some instances, not without purchasing even that privilege—without paying a tribute to the British treasury!

The committee have taken into consideration the documents relating to the attack on the frigate Chesapeake; but they have not deemed it their duty, in the actual posture of that subject, to make any other remark than that it strengthens the motives for persevering in all the provisional and precautionary measures hitherto contemplated.

The committee finally beg leave to submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the committee do bring in a bill authorizing the President of the United States, in the event of such peace or suspension of hostilities between the belligerent Powers of Europe, or of such changes in their measures affecting neutral commerce, as may render that of the United States sufficiently safe, in his judgment, to suspend the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto, under such exceptions and restrictions as the public interest and circumstances of the case may appear to require: Provided, Such suspension shall not extend beyond — days after the commencement of the next session of Congress.

Resolved, That the committee do bring in a bill authorizing the President of the United States to suspend the operation of the several acts prohibiting the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise, if, in his judgment, the public interest should require it: Provided, That such suspension shall not extend beyond — days after the commencement of the next session of Congress.

Resolved, That the committee be instructed to report a bill prohibiting after the — day of — all commercial intercourse with such of the belligerent nations, whose edicts against the neutral commerce of the United States may render such prohibition expedient.

Resolved, That the committee be further instructed to report a bill expatriating all citizens of the United States, commanding ships or vessels of the United States, who shall be convicted of voluntarily accepting any license, or paying any tax, in conformity to the British orders in council of the 11th of November last.

Resolved, That the committee be further instructed to report a bill imposing on the navigation and commerce of foreign nations restrictions, corresponding with the restrictions imposed by them, respectively, on the commerce and navigation of the United States.

No. 215.

[2d SESSION.]

GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, NOVEMBER 8, 1808, * JANUARY 17 AND 30, 1809, AND JUNE 16, 1809.

JANUARY 17, 1809.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate to Congress certain letters which passed between the British Secretary of State, Mr. Canning, and Mr. Pinkney, our minister plenipotentiary at London. When the documents concerning the relations between the United States and Great Britain were laid before Congress, at the commencement of the session, the answer of Mr. Pinkney to the letter of Mr. Canning had not been received, and a communication of the latter alone would have accorded neither with propriety nor with the wishes of Mr. Pinkney. When that answer afterwards arrived, it was considered that as what had passed in conversation had been superseded by the written and formal correspondence on the subject, the variance in the statements of what had verbally passed was not of sufficient importance to be made the matter of a distinct and special communication; the letter of Mr. Canning, however, having lately appeared in print, unaccompanied by that of Mr. Pinkney in reply, and having a tendency to make impressions not warranted by the statements of Mr. Pinkney, it has become proper that the whole should be brought into public view.

TH: JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 30, 1809.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress a letter recently received from our minister at the court of St. James's, covering one to him from the British Secretary of State, with his reply. These are communicated, as forming a sequel to the correspondence which accompanied my message to both Houses of the, 17th instant.

TH: JEFFERSON.

JUNE 15, 1809.

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 13th instant, I transmit extracts from letters from Mr. Pinkney to the Secretary of State, accompanied by letters and communications to him, from the British Secretary of State for the Foreign Department; all of which have been received here since the last session of Congress.

To these documents are added a communication just made by Mr. Erskine to the Secretary of State, and his answer.*

JAMES MADISON.

*Extract:—The Secretary of State to Mr. Pinkney, minister of the United States at London.*DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 8, 1808.

Having just learned that the present mail will arrive at New York in time for the British packet, I avail myself of the opportunity of forwarding your commission and letters of credence, as successor to Mr. Monroe, in the legation at London.

Since my last, which went by Mr. Nourse, in a despatch vessel, bound first to L'Orient, and then to Falmouth, I have received your communications of the 23d November, and — of December. These, with a representation from General Armstrong to the French Government on the subject of the decree of Berlin, as expounded and enforced in the case of the ship Horizon, were thought by the President to throw so much light on the course likely to be pursued by Great Britain and France in relation to the United States, that he had the documents confidentially laid before Congress.

Mr. Erskine has made a written communication on the subject of the British orders. I shall answer him as soon as the very urgent business on hand will permit.

*Mr. Madison to Mr. Pinkney.*DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 22, 1808.

My last bore date the 8th instant, and went by the British packet. It acknowledged your letter of November 23d and — December. I have since received these referred to in the latter, and also that of January 26, which came to hand last evening.

I cannot enclose my answer to Mr. Erskine's communication of the British orders; the unceasing pressure of other matters, on a state of health still feeble, having thus far delayed it. You will anticipate the complexion which will necessarily be given to it by the character of measures, not only violating our rights, and stabbing our interests, but superadding, under the name of indulgencies, a blow at our national independence and a mockery of our understandings.

Extract:—Mr. Madison to Mr. Pinkney.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 4, 1808.

My last was of March 22, and went under the care of Mr. Rose. I now forward printed copies of the correspondence with him on the subject of his mission, and of the antecedent documents relating to the case of the Chesapeake. As soon as the voluminous residue of the communications made to Congress issues from the press, it shall also be forwarded. You will find that they include certain documents relating to France, which were thought proper for the knowledge of Congress at the present crisis.

To those communications I add copies of Mr. Erskine's letter to me on the subject of the British decrees of November last, and of my answer. And that you may have a view of the ground which has been taken with respect to the French decree of November, 1806, and to the judicial exposition in the case of the Horizon, giving to it an illegal operation against the United States, I enclose copies of two letters to General Armstrong on those subjects.

The President made to Congress, a few days ago, other communications relating to the present crisis with Great Britain and France, among which were Mr. Erskine's letter, now enclosed, and a letter from Mr. Champagny to General Armstrong, explaining the course meditated by the French Government with respect to the commerce of the United States. These being excepted from the confidential character attached to the others, have been published, and will be found among the printed enclosures. Your letter of February 26 was enclosed in the communication to Congress, but not in the exception.

The conduct of the two great contending nations towards this country, as it will now appear to it and to the world, fully displays their mutual efforts to draw the United States into a war with their adversary. The efforts on both sides are too little disguised to be worthy the discernment of either, and are addressed, moreover, to motives which prove great ignorance of the character of the United States, and, indeed, of human nature.

From the posture in which Mr. Rose's final reply to the compromise proposed to him placed the question of adjustment in the case of the Chesapeake, it remains with the British Government to resume it, if adjustment be their object. Whether a tender of reparation will be made here, or to you, will also lie on that side. It will certainly be most becoming that Government, under all circumstances, to make the reparation here; and this course might of right be insisted on by this Government. The President, nevertheless, in the liberal spirit which always governs him, authorizes you to accept the reparation, provided it be tendered spontaneously, be charged with no condition, unless it be that, on the receipt of the act of reparation here, the proclamation of July 2 shall be revoked; and provided the reparation shall add to the disavowal of the attack on the Chesapeake an express engagement that the seamen retained shall be immediately restored, and that the guilty officer experience an exemplary punishment. The reparation will be the more satisfactory, and not exceed a just expectation, if the restoration of the seamen be made to the very ship from which they were wrested, and if provision be made for the wounded survivors and for the families of those who lost their lives by the attack.

I must repeat, however, that it is considered entirely proper that the reparation should be offered here rather than in London; and it is only in the event of a decided repugnance in the British Government to make it through a functionary here, that you are to accept it there.

* These documents are annexed to those communicated the 23d May, 1808. No. 222.

The answer to Mr. Erskine's letter on the British orders will furnish the grounds to be taken in your communications with his Government on that subject. If the cabinet can be brought to view the orders in their true light, a revocation of the whole of them cannot fail to take place, unless they mean to violate every maxim of justice, or are fixed in hostile purposes against the United States. In not regarding the orders, indeed, as acts of hostility, and in trusting for redress to the motives and the means to which they have appealed, the United States have given the most signal proof of their love of peace, and of their desire to avoid an interruption of it, with the British nation.

Still it is to be understood, that whilst the insult offered in the attack on the American frigate remains unexpiated, you are not to pledge or commit your Government to consider a recall of the orders as a ground on which a removal of the existing restrictions on the commerce of the United States with Great Britain may be justly expected.

The two letters to General Armstrong of 22d May, 1807, and February 8, 1808, are proofs of the sincerity and impartiality with which the President has proceeded in relation to the belligerent parties, and may perhaps assist you in repressing unjust suspicions imbibed by the British cabinet. It would be happy for all parties, the belligerent as well as the United States, if truth could in this case be made to prevail, and if the retaliating rivalry of the former against the latter could be converted into an emulation, as politic as it would be magnanimous in both, to take the lead in a fair, lawful, and conciliatory course towards a nation which has done no wrong to either. Should the experiment be made on either side, it would probably be followed on the other, and it could never happen that the side first doing justice would suffer on that account.

In the present state of our relations to Great Britain, it would be premature to mark out the course to be pursued with respect to further negotiations on other topics than those above noticed. You are authorized, however, to continue your interpositions in behalf of our impressed or detained seamen; and, in the event of a repeal of the British orders, and of satisfactory pledges for repairing the aggression on the Chesapeake, to enter into informal arrangements for abolishing impressments altogether, and mutually discontinuing to receive the seamen of each other into either military or merchant service, conformably to the instructions on this point transmitted by Mr. Purviance.

You will find, by a passage in Mr. Rose's reply of March 17, that the British Government does not maintain the principle that the obligation of the United States extends beyond the discharge of deserters from their public service; and, by an order of the Navy Department here, already carried into execution, of which a copy is enclosed, that it has lately been decided that no foreign seamen, whether deserters or not, shall serve on board our ships of war. The principles respectively manifested by these documents ought to facilitate such an adjustment as is contended for by the United States.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Pinkney.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 30, 1808.

My last was of the 4th instant, and went by a British packet from New York. I now forward a copy of it.

Congress ended their session on the night of the 25th instant. The series of newspapers herewith sent affords a view of their proceedings subsequent to the communications last made to you. Some other points are included, which throw light on the workings of public opinion and the state of public affairs.

You will find that the critical posture of our foreign relations has produced provisions of different kinds for our greater security, and particularly that no pains have been spared to stop every leak by which the effect of the embargo laws might be diminished. I refer you also to the report made to the Senate, by a committee on the documents relating to the affair of the Chesapeake, and on the letters of Mr. Champagny and Mr. Erskine; and indicating the spirit which may be expected to influence the future policy of this country, if kept under the excitement resulting from the system now pursued against it.

You will observe, at the same time, that whilst a determination is sufficiently evinced against a dishonorable acquiescence in the despotic edicts enforced on the high seas, the United States are ready to resume their export trade as soon as the aggressions on it shall cease; and that, in a hope that this might happen during the recess of Congress, the President is authorized, in such an event, to suspend, in whole or in part, the several embargo laws.

The conditions on which the authority is to be exercised appeal equally to the justice and policy of the two great belligerent Powers which are now emulating each other in a violation of both. The President counts on your endeavors to give to this appeal all the effect possible with the British Government. General Armstrong will be doing the same with that of France. The relation in which a revocation of its unjust decrees by either will place the United States to the other is obvious, and ought to be a motive to the measure, proportioned to the desire which has been manifested by each to produce collision between the United States and its adversary, and which must be equally felt by each to avoid one with itself.

Should the French Government revoke so much of its decrees as violate our neutral rights, or give explanations and assurances having the like effect, and entitling it therefore to a removal of the embargo as it applies to France, it will be impossible to view a perseverance of Great Britain in her retaliating orders in any other light than that of war, without even the pretext now assumed by her.

In order to entitle the British Government to a discontinuance of the embargo, as it applies to Great Britain, it is evident that all its decrees, as well those of January, 1807, as of November, 1807, ought to be rescinded, as they apply to the United States, and this is the rather to be looked for from the present administration, as it has so strenuously contended that the decrees of both dates were founded on the same principles and directed to the same object.

Should the British Government take this course, you may authorize an expectation that the President will, within a reasonable time, give effect to the authority vested in him on the subject of the embargo laws. Should the orders be rescinded in part only, it must be left to his free judgment to decide on the case. In either event, you will lose no time in transmitting the information to this Department and to General Armstrong, and particularly in the event of such a course being taken by the British Government as will render a suspension of the embargo certain or probable, it will be proper for you to make the communication by a courier to General Armstrong, to whom a correspondent instruction will be given; and to provide a special conveyance for it hither, unless British arrangements shall present an opportunity equally certain and expeditious.

Extract:—Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, May 9, 1808.

I had a conversation with Mr. Canning on Friday last, in consequence of the arrival of the Osage.

As it was obviously expected that I should seek an interview with him, I went to Downing street on the 5th with that object. He had been indisposed, and was not at his office; but in answer to a note which I sent him in the evening, he asked to see me next day at his house in Bruton street.

The Osage had for some time been looked for with considerable anxiety, and the Government had apparently anticipated a communication (and perhaps a proposal) of some importance from me, as soon as my despatches should be received. As I had, in fact, no communication to make, it seemed to be proper that I should render the disappointment of as little moment as possible, by the manner of announcing it, without, however, putting any thing to hazard by an indiscreet manifestation of unnecessary solicitude.

The little which I supposed it requisite to say on this occasion appeared to be very well received; and, if any disagreeable impression was left on the mind of Mr. Canning, it certainly was not visible. A feeling of regret was perhaps perceptible, and a hope was intimated that the time was not far distant, when I should be enabled to do what at present was out of my power; but nothing occurred which could be construed into a symptom of impatience, jealousy, or dissatisfaction. There was, undoubtedly, no real ground for any thing of the sort; but it was, notwithstanding, quite possible that the importance, which it had become a habit to attach to the arrival of the Osage, from circumstances principally accidental, might have produced a disposition to think otherwise.

I thought it advisable to make use of this opportunity (although the topic was, in many views, more delicate than it had been) to suggest the propriety of yielding, as the moment was sufficiently favorable to such a course, upon the subject of the late orders in council, of which I had seen nothing to change my original opinion. There was reason to apprehend, however, that it might be worse than useless to press the suggestion upon my own authority merely, while I could say nothing of the French decrees; and, accordingly, I forbore to do so.

An idea has evidently gone forth, since the Osage arrived, founded upon rumors of a doubtful description, that our relations with France have grown to be extremely precarious, and that we are consequently about to come to an understanding of a very friendly kind with Great Britain. It is not improbable that the Government has, in some degree at least, adopted this idea.

I have the honor to enclose a copy of a notification, recently received from Mr. Canning, of the blockade of Copenhagen and of the other ports of the island of Zealand, which I have caused to be communicated in the usual manner to our consuls and citizens.

There being no particular inducement for detaining the Osage, Lieutenant Lewis, who will be charged with my letters, will leave town the day after to-morrow; and the ship will sail as soon after she reaches Falmouth as possible.

[Referred to in Mr. Pinkney's despatch of May 9, 1808.]

Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney.

FOREIGN OFFICE, May 4, 1808.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's command to acquaint Mr. Pinkney, that His Majesty has judged it expedient to establish the most rigorous blockade of the port of Copenhagen, and all the other ports in the island of Zealand. Mr. Pinkney is therefore requested to apprise the American consuls and merchants residing in England, that the entrances of all the ports above mentioned are and must be considered as being in a state of blockade, and that from this time all the measures authorized by the law of nations, and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different neutral Powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to all vessels attempting to violate the said blockade after this notice.

The undersigned requests Mr. Pinkney to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

GEORGE CANNING.

Extract:—Mr. Pinkney to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, June 5, 1808.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th of April, by Mr. Bethune, together with the printed and other copies of papers mentioned in it.

I am to have an interview with Mr. Canning in a few days, (which he will agree to consider extra official,) in the course of which I intend to press, by every argument in my power, the propriety of their abandoning immediately their orders in council, and of proposing in America (the only becoming course, as you very properly suggest) reparation for the outrage on the Chesapeake. I shall for obvious reasons do this, informally, as my own act.

Your unanswerable reply to Mr. Erskine's letter of the 23d February has left nothing to be urged against the orders in council upon the score of right; and there may be room to hope that the effect, which that reply can hardly have failed to produce upon ministers, as well by its tone as by its reasoning, will, if followed up, become, under actual circumstances, decisive. The discussion, which Mr. Rose's preliminary in the affair of the Chesapeake has undergone, gives encouragement to an expectation that this Government will not now be backward to relinquish it, and to renew their overture of satisfaction in a way more consistent with reason, and more likely to produce a just and honorable result.

You may be assured that I will not commit our Government by any thing I shall do or say, and that, if I cannot make things better than they are, I will not make them worse.

My view of the course which our honor and our interests have required, and still require, is, as you know, in precise conformity with that of the President; but if it were otherwise, I should make his view, and not my own, the rule of my conduct.

Extract:—Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, June 29, 1808.

I had a long interview this morning with Mr. Canning, which has given me hopes that the object mentioned in your letter of the 30th of April, (a duplicate by the packet, for the St. Michael has not yet arrived,) may be accomplished, if I should authorize the expectation which the same letter suggests. Some days must elapse, however, before I can speak with any thing like certainty on this subject. The St. Michael will probably have arrived before that time, and will furnish me with an opportunity of giving you not only the result but the details of what has passed and may yet occur. I beg you, in the mean time, to be assured that the most effectual care shall be taken to put nothing to hazard, and to avoid an improper commitment of our Government.

I was questioned on the affair of the Chesapeake. There seems to be a disposition here to consider the amende honorable as already made, and, in a great degree, at least, by Mr. Rose's mission; but I am strongly inclined to think that it will not be at all difficult to induce them to renew their overture in the same manner, on terms more conformable with the view which you very justly take of this interesting subject. I was told (it was not said officially) that the persons taken out of the Chesapeake would be readily restored. The punishment of the officer (otherwise than by his recall, which has been done) will, perhaps, form the greatest embarrassment; but I will endeavor to ascertain, informally, what will be done on that and every other part of the case. My sole object will be, of course, to lead them, as occasion offers, (as far as in my power,) to do what they ought, in the way most for our honor. I can the more properly do this now, as Mr. Canning has himself proposed the subject to me, as intimated above.

Extract:—Mr. Madison to Mr. Pinkney.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 18, 1808.

Your communications by Lieutenant Lewis were safely delivered on the evening of the 8th instant. As it had been calculated that the interval between the return of Mr. Rose, and the departure of Lieutenant Lewis, would give sufficient time to the British Government to decide on the course required by the posture in which the affair of the Chesapeake was left, its silence to you on that subject could not fail to excite the particular attention of the President: and the appearance is rendered the more unfavorable, by the like silence, as we learn from Mr. Erskine, of the despatches brought to him by the packet which left England, and arrived at New York, at nearly the same time with the Osage. I have intimated to Mr. Erskine the impressions made by this reserve, without, however, concealing our hope that the delay does not imply a final purpose of withholding reparation, and that the next communications from London will be of a different import. They must at least ascertain the real views of the British Government on this interesting subject.

There was certainly no just ground for Mr. Canning to expect any particular communications from you on the arrival of the Osage, unless they should have grown out of such accounts from France as would second our demands of justice from Great Britain, particularly the revocation of her orders in council; and in imparting to him what you did from that quarter, every proof of candor was given which the occasion admitted. If Mr. Canning was disappointed because he did not receive fresh complaints against the orders in council, he ought to have recollected that you had sufficiently dwelt on their offensive features in the first instance; and that, as he had chosen to make the formal communication of them to this Government through another channel, it was through that channel rather than through you that answers to it would be most regularly given.

The communications and instructions forwarded by Mr. Purviance, who was a passenger in the St. Michael, will enable you to bring the British Government to a fair issue on the subject of its orders. If it has nothing more in view than it is willing to avow, it cannot refuse to concur in an arrangement rescinding on her part the orders in council, and on ours the embargo. If France should concur in a like arrangement, the state of things will be restored which is the alleged object of the orders. If France does not concur, the orders will be better enforced by the continuance of the embargo against her than they are by the British fleets and cruisers; and, in the mean time, all the benefits of our trade will be thrown into the lap of Great Britain. It will be difficult, therefore, to conceive any motive in Great Britain to reject the offer which you will have made, other than the hope of inducing, on the part of France, a perseverance in her irritating policy towards the United States, and on the part of the latter hostile resentments against it.

If the British Government should have elected the more wise and more worthy course of meeting the overture of the President in the spirit which dictated it, it is to be hoped that measures will have been taken in concert with you, and though its minister here, for hastening as much as possible the renewal of the intercourse which the orders and the embargo have suspended; and thereby smoothing the way for other salutary adjustments.

It appears that the British Government, not satisfied with the general blockade by her orders of November 11, has superadded a particular blockade, or rather a diplomatic notification of an intended one, of Copenhagen, and the other ports in the island of Zealand; that is to say, a strict and legal blockade of the whole island. The island cannot be much less than two hundred miles in its outline, and is described as abounding in inlets. It is not probable, therefore, if it be possible, that a blockade, within the true definition, should be carried into effect. And as all defective blockades, whether so in the disproportion of force to the object, or in the mode of notification, will authorize fair claims of indemnification, it is the more necessary that guarded answers should be given in such cases as heretofore suggested.

Since the British order of——— evidently inviting our citizens to violate the laws of our country, by patronizing on the high seas their vessels destitute of registers and other necessary papers, and therefore necessarily smugglers if not pirates, the circular letter of Mr. Huskisson has made its appearance, in which the United States are named as alone within the purview of the order. A more extraordinary experiment is, perhaps, not to be found in the annals of modern transactions. It is levelled, moreover, against a nation towards which friendship is professed, as well as against a law the justice and validity of which is not contested; and it sets the odious example, in the face of the world, directly in opposition to all the principles which the British Government has been proclaiming to it. What becomes of the charge against the United States for receiving British subjects who leave their own country contrary to their allegiance? What would be the charge against them if they were, by proclamation, to invite British subjects, those too expressly and particularly prohibited from leaving their country, to elude the prohibition; or to tempt, by interested inducements, a smuggling violation or evasion of laws, on which Great Britain founds so material a part of her national policy? In the midst of so many more important topics of dissatisfaction, this may not be worth a formal representation. But it will not be amiss to let that Government understand the light in which the proceeding is regarded by this. I have already touched on it to Mr. Erskine, with an intimation that I should not omit in it my observations to you.

The French decree, said to have been issued at Bayonne, has not yet reached this country. Such a decree, at such a time, has a serious aspect on the relations of the two countries, and will form a heavy item in our demands of redress. It is much to be regretted, at the same time, that any of our vessels, by neglecting to return home, and conforming to the arbitrary regulations of one belligerent, should expose themselves to the arbitrary proceedings of another. So strong and general an indignation seems particularly to prevail here against the Americans in Europe, who are trading under British licenses, and thereby sacrificing, as far as they can, the independence of their country, as well as frustrating the laws which were intended to guard American vessels and mariners from the dangers incident to foreign commerce, that their continuance in that career ought to be frowned upon, and their return home promoted in every proper manner. It appears, by information from our consul at Tangier, that great numbers of our vessels are engaged in a trade between Great Britain and Spanish ports, under licenses from the former, and that the experiment proves as unsuccessful as it is dishonorable; the greater part of them being either arrested in port, or by French and Spanish cruisers.

Extract:—Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, August 4, 1808.

The St. Michael arrived at Falmouth, on Thursday the 14th of last month, after a passage of eight days from L'Orient. Captain Kenyon delivered me on Wednesday the 20th, (upon my arrival in town from Brighton, where I had been for a short time on account of my health,) your letters of the 30th April, and your private letter of the 1st of May, together with newspapers, printed copies of the embargo act, and its supplements, and of papers laid before Congress at their last session. Mr. Hall brought me a letter from General Armstrong of the 26th of June, (of which I send an extract,) and Mr. Upson brought me a private letter from him, with the following postscript of the 1st of July; "An order has been received from Bayonne to condemn eight other of our ships."

On Friday, the 22d of July, I had an interview with Mr. Canning, and renewed my efforts to obtain a revocation of the British orders of January and November, 1807, and of the other orders dependent upon them. I have already informed you, in my private letter of the 29th of June, that, on the morning of its date, I had a long conversation with Mr. Canning, which had rendered it somewhat probable that the object mentioned in your letter of the 30th of April, (of which I had received a duplicate by the packet,) would be accomplished, if I should authorize the expectation which that letter suggests, but that some days must elapse before I could speak with any thing like certainty on the subject; and I have mentioned in another private letter (of the 10th of July) that it was understood between Mr. Canning and myself that another interview should take place soon after the prorogation of Parliament. In effect, however, Mr. Canning was not prepared to see me again, until the 22d of July, after I had been recalled to London by the arrival of the St. Michael, and had, in consequence, reminded him of our arrangement by a private note.

In the interview of the 29th of June, I soon found it necessary to throw out an intimation that the power vested in the President by Congress, to suspend the embargo act and its supplements, would be exercised, as regarded Great Britain, if their orders were repealed as regarded the United States. To have urged the revocation upon the mere ground of strict policy, or of general right, and there to have left the subject, when I was authorized to place it upon grounds infinitely stronger, would have been, as it appeared to me, to stop short of my duty. Your letters to Mr. Erskine (which Mr. Canning has read and considered) had exhausted the first of these grounds; and endless discussions here, in every variety of form, in and out of Parliament, had exhausted the second. There was, besides, no objection of any force to my availing myself, without delay, of the powerful inducements which the intimation in question was likely to furnish to Great Britain to abandon her late system; and it seemed to be certain that, by delaying to present these inducements to Mr. Canning's consideration, I should not only lose much time, but finally give to my conduct a disingenuous air, which, while it must be foreign to the views and sentiments of the President, could hardly fail to make a very unfavorable impression upon the minds of Mr. Canning and his colleagues. I thought, moreover, that if I should reserve the suggestion for a late stage of our discussions, it would be made to wear the appearance of a concession reluctantly extorted, rather than of, what it was, the spontaneous result of the characteristic frankness and honorable policy of our Government.

The intimation once made, a complete development of its natural consequences, if properly acted upon, followed of course; and, taking advantage of the latitude afforded by the informal nature of a mere conversation, I endeavored to make that development as strong an appeal as, consistently with truth and honor, I could, (and there was no necessity to do more) to the justice and the prudence of this Government.

It was not possible, however, that Mr. Canning could require to be assisted by my explanations. It was plain, upon their own principles, that they could not equitably persevere in their orders in council, upon the foundation of an imputed acquiescence, on our part, in French invasions of our neutral rights, when it was become (if it was not always) apparent that this imputation was completely and in all respects an error; when it was manifest that these orders, by letting loose upon our rights a more destructive and offensive persecution than it was in the power of France to maintain, interposed between us and France, furnished answers to our remonstrances against her decrees and pretexts for those decrees, and stood in the way of that very resistance which Great Britain affected to inculcate, as a duty, at the moment when she was taking the most effectual measures to embarrass and confound it; and when it was also manifest that a revocation of those orders would, if not attended or followed by a revocation of the decrees of France, place us at issue with that Power, and result in a precise opposition, by the United States, to such parts of our anti-commercial edicts as it became us to repel.

In a prudential view, my explanations seemed still less to be required. Nothing could be more clear than that, if Great Britain revoked her orders, and entitled herself to a suspension of the embargo, her object, (if it were any thing short of the establishment and practical support of an exclusive dominion over the seas) must, in some mode or other, be accomplished, whether France followed her example or not. In the first case, the avowed purpose of the British orders would be fulfilled, and commerce would resume its accustomed prosperity and expansion. In the last, the just resistance of the United States (more efficacious than that of the British orders) to French irregularities and aggressions, would be left to its fair operation, (and it was impossible to mistake the consequences,) while the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain, being revived, would open the way for a return to good understanding, and, in the end, for an adjustment of all their differences.

On the 29th of July I met Mr. Canning again, and was soon apprised that our discussions, if continued at all, must take a new form.

These, and many other reflections of a similar tendency, which I forbear to repeat, could not have escaped the penetration of Mr. Canning, if they had not been suggested to him in considerable detail. But whatever might be their influence upon his mind, he certainly did not pronounce any opinion; and what he said consisted principally of inquiries, with a view to a more accurate comprehension of my purpose. He asked if I thought of taking a more formal course than I was now pursuing; but immediately remarked that he presumed I did not, for that the course I had adopted was undoubtedly well suited to the occasion. I told him that I was so entirely persuaded that the freedom of conversation was so much better adapted to the nature of our subject, and so much more likely to conduct us to a beneficial result, than the constraint and formality of written communication, which usually grew into protracted discussion, and always produced embarrassment when there was any thing of delicacy in the topics, that I had not intended to present any note.

This interview (in the progress of which other points were incidentally touched upon) did not authorize any very confident opinion that Mr. Canning approved of what had been suggested to him; and still less could it warrant any anticipation of the final opinion of his Government. But the manner in which my communication was received, and the readiness shown by Mr. Canning to proceed in the mode which was peculiarly favorable to my object, connected with the reasonableness of the object itself, induced me to think it rather probable that the issue would be satisfactory.

The interview of the 22d of July was far from producing any thing of an unpromising complexion. I urged again much of what had been said at the last conference, and suggested such further considerations as had since occurred to me in support of my demand. Mr. Canning was still much more reserved than I had hoped to find him, after so much time had been taken for deliberation; but, from all that passed, I was more than ever inclined to believe that the orders would be relinquished. He seemed now to be extremely desirous of ascertaining whether I was authorized and disposed, with a view to a final arrangement, to present what I had suggested, as to the suspension of the embargo, in a more precise shape. I told him, after some conversation upon this point, that, although I would prefer that course which was the least formal, yet, if every thing should be first matured, I might be able to combine, with a written demand that their orders should be repealed, such an assurance as I had already mentioned, that the embargo would be suspended; but that I would consider of this with reference to the manner and terms. He then observed, that I would perhaps allow him a little time to reflect whether he would put me to the necessity of presenting such a paper; and, upon my assenting to this, he said that he would give me another appointment towards the end of the following week. As I was on the point of leaving him, he asked me if I would endeavor to prepare, before the next interview, such a note as we had talked of; but he had scarcely made this proposal before he added, "but you will, doubtless, desire first to know what are our ideas and intentions upon the whole subject."

On the 29th of July I met Mr. Canning again, and was soon apprised that our discussions, if continued, must take a new form. He began by inquiring if I had received any intelligence of a late affair on the Lakes, which had caused great alarm and anxiety among the British traders, and of which an account had just been put into his hands. He then read, very rapidly, from a letter, apparently written in Canada, a complaint of an attack upon some British boats, in violation of the third article of the treaty of 1794, and observed that this was the more to be regretted, as it followed some recent misunderstandings in the Bay of Passamaquoddy. I told him that I had no intelligence, official or private, of these transactions, which he would perceive took place upon our borders, at a great distance from the seat of Government, and that of course I could only express my conviction that the Government of the United States would disavow whatever was improper in the conduct of its agents, and would in other respects act as good faith and honor required.

This matter being disposed of, Mr. Canning said that he had thought long and anxiously upon what I had suggested to him at our late conferences; that the subject had at first struck him as much more simple and free from difficulty than upon careful examination it was found to be; that, in the actual state of the world, it behooved both him and me to move in this affair with every possible degree of circumspection, an intimation which he did not explain; that, without some explicit proposal on my part, in writing, upon which the British Government could deliberate and act, nothing could be done; and, finally, that he must leave me to consult my own discretion whether I would make such a proposal.

I answered that, with such a previous understanding between us as I had counted upon, I should feel no objection to take occasion to say, in an official note requiring the revocation of their orders in council, that the orders being rescinded as to us, it was the intention of the President to suspend the embargo as to Great Britain; but that I expected to be told, before my note was presented, what would be the reply to it, and what its consequences in every direction; and that I could not conjecture, if it was really meant to acquiesce in my demand, (the exact nature of it being, in point of fact, understood by this Government just as well as if it had been made in writing,) or if more time than had already been afforded was required for deliberation, why it was necessary that I should, in the last case, take the step in question at all, or, in the first case, without being frankly apprised of the effect it would produce.

Mr. Canning replied that my wish in this particular could not be acceded to; that, if I presented a note, they must be left at perfect liberty to decide upon what it proposed; that he could not give me even an intimation of the probable consequences of it; and, in a word, that he would neither invite nor discourage such a proceeding. He observed, too, that there were some points belonging to the subject which it was necessary to discuss in writing; that my suggestions implied that the embargo was produced by the British orders in council; that this could not be admitted; and that there were other questions incident to these two measures, with the examination of which it was proper to begin upon an occasion like the present. I remarked, in answer, that, with an actual result in view, and with a wish to arrive at that result without delay, nothing could be worse imagined than to entangle ourselves in a written correspondence, undefined as to its scope and duration, upon topics on which we were not likely to agree; that if I were compelled to frame my note, with a knowledge that it was to provoke argument, instead of leading at this momentous crisis to a salutary change in the state of the world, he must be conscious that I, too, must argue, and that I could not justify it to my Government to abstain from a complete assertion of all its pretensions, and a full exposure of the true character of those acts of which it complained as illegal and unjust. And where would this end? To what wholesome consequence could it lead?

My remarks having no effect, I made a further slight attempt to ascertain the reception which my note would meet with, if I should determine to present one. This attempt failed; but I believed it to be apparent that, if any other consequence than mere discussion should follow the receipt of my note, it would be at a great distance.

At the close of the conference I observed, that, as the footing upon which this interview had placed this subject made delay of no importance, I should take time to prepare such further proceeding as might appear to me to be required by the occasion.

I ought to mention that I give you in this letter the substance only of the conversation which it states, and that there was nothing in any degree unfriendly in the language or manner of Mr. Canning. I need not say that I thought it my duty to adopt the same tone and manner.

My desire to send a duplicate of this hasty letter by the packet induces me to defer, until another opportunity, all reflections upon the turn which this affair has taken.

As there is now no occasion for detaining the St. Michael, she will be despatched immediately for L'Orient.

Extract:—General Armstrong to Mr. Pinkney.

PARIS, June 26, 1808.

The St. Michael arrived at L'Orient on the 1st instant, and the Government messenger at Paris on the 8th. A passport for the vessel to Falmouth, and thence to L'Orient again, was immediately requested, but one in this form could only be granted by order of the Emperor, and this was not given till the 18th. These circumstances will account for the long detention of your despatches. We have reason to regret that the views of our Government, founded on the justice and wisdom of the belligerent Powers, are so little likely to succeed. Attempts of this character made here (and they have not been unfrequent) have hitherto done no good; nay, the repetition of these may be fairly presumed to have done mischief, inasmuch as it has tended to establish a creed, that words, in some form or other, are the only means we have to employ. The French Council of Prizes, which is, I am told, as like the English Court of Admiralty as one egg is like another, has lately begun its career of condemnation. Between the 1st and 15th instant, five cases have been decided, and I am assured that orders have been received from Bayonne for condemning all American cases "en bloc." What has suspended the axe since the 15th, we can but conjecture. It may be presumed that the reflections of the Spanish junta on the political and other relations subsisting between Spain and the United States, through the medium of the colonies, may have produced this pause. That it is not owing to any conquest which good principles have obtained over bad ones, is certain. Are things any better on your side the channel? &c.

Extract:—Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, September 6, 1808.

I have an opportunity of writing by Mr. Bethune, who leaves town to-morrow for Falmouth, to embark for the United States in the British packet, and I cannot omit to take advantage of it, although I have still nothing conclusive to communicate.

The Hope arrived off Falmouth and landed Mr. Atwater on the 16th of last month, and immediately proceeded on her voyage to Havre, with a fair wind. Mr. Atwater arrived in London on the 20th, in the evening, and delivered your letter of the 18th of July.

My public letter of the 4th August will have apprised you of the footing on which my different interviews with Mr. Canning left the subject of the British orders in council; and my private letter of the 2d of that month will have made you acquainted with my intention to present, in an official note, what I had ineffectually suggested in conference.

To such a course there could not, even in the first instance, have been any other objection than that it was calculated to lead to discussion rather than to adjustment; but whatever might be its tendency, it is certain that I could have no inducement to resort to it, until it was indicated by Mr. Canning as indispensable, nor any motive to decline it afterwards.

At our last interview, and not before, it was unexpectedly found that it was in that mode only that I could obtain a knowledge of the light in which this Government thought fit to view the overture I had been directed to make to it; and I determined, in consequence, to lay before it, in writing, the intention of the President, with the same frankness which had characterized my verbal communications.

I have now the honor to transmit a copy of the note, which, in conformity with that determination, I delivered in person to Mr. Canning, on the 26th of last month, a few days after its date. To this note no answer has yet been returned, but it is to be presumed that it will not be much longer withheld.

You will perceive that some time had elapsed after I had sent off my despatches by the St. Michael (the 8th August) before my note was presented. The truth is, that I had employed a part of that time in framing a note of great length, which, when nearly completed, I thought it prudent to abandon, in favor of one that held out fewer invitations to unprofitable discussions, which, although I would not shun them if pressed upon me, I did not suppose it proper that I should seek.

I believed, too, that a little delay on my part would be far from being disadvantageous. There would still be sufficient time for obtaining a final answer to my proposal, in season for the meeting of Congress; and as the temper of this Government, so far as it had been tried, had not appeared to be favorable to my purpose, I believed that I should act in the spirit of my instructions, and consult the honor of my Government, by avoiding, under such circumstances, the appearance of urgency and precipitation.

Upon the terms or general plan of my note it is not, I hope, necessary to remark. You will discover that it was prepared under a persuasion that, whatever might be its effect, it was infinitely better to make it as conciliatory as, without a sacrifice of principle or national dignity, was possible.

The topics to be embraced by it were such as did not demand, but rather forbade, minute expositions. While it was difficult to urge, in their full force, without seeming to aim at exciting a disposition unfriendly to the object of my instructions, all the considerations which justified the United States in remonstrating against the British orders, it was yet more difficult, without a degree of harshness scarcely suited to the occasion, and without also the hazard of indiscretion, to display in detail the signal injustice and impolicy of persevering in them, after what I had proposed. This could be done, and had been done, in conversation; but it did not, upon trial, appear to be equally practicable in the more formal and measured proceeding which I was now called upon to adopt.

I considered, besides, that an overture so highly advantageous to Great Britain, which the United States were not bound to make by any obligations of equity, although it was wise to make it, did not require, with any view to the character of my country, or even to the success of the overture itself, to be again recommended by an anxious repetition of arguments already fully understood.

As soon as my note was prepared, I called at the Foreign Office to arrange an interview with Mr. Canning, for the purpose of enabling me to accompany the delivery of it with a communication which I deemed important, as well as of affording him an opportunity of asking and receiving such explanations as he might desire. The interview took place on the 26th of August.

It had occurred to me that it would be proper (and could not be injurious) to read to Mr. Canning, from your letter to me of the 18th July, a brief summary of the instructions under which I was acting. This had not been requested; but it could not be unacceptable, and it was, besides, well calculated to do justice to the liberal sentiments by which my instructions had been dictated, as well as to give weight to my efforts in the execution of them.

I was led, by the reading of these passages, (without having originally intended it,) into a more extensive explanation than I had before attempted of the influence which the proposal of my Government would have, in truth, as well as in the judgment of the world, upon the supposed justice of their new system, as it affected the United States. To that explanation, with the particulars of which I will not, and indeed, for want of time, cannot, at present trouble you, I added a concise recapitulation of some of the prudential considerations which had been so often pressed before; and there I left the subject.

[Enclosed in the preceding despatch.]

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Canning.

SIR:

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, August 23, 1808.

I have had the honor, in consequence of the orders of the President, to recall your attention, in the course of several recent interviews, to the British orders in council of the 7th of January, and 11th November, 1807, and to the various other orders founded upon or in execution of them; and I now take the liberty to renew, in the mode which I have understood to be indispensable, my instances on that subject.

I need scarcely remind you, sir, that the Government of the United States has never ceased to consider these orders as violating its rights, and affecting most destructively its interests, upon grounds wholly inadmissible, both in principle and fact.

The letters of Mr. Madison to Mr. Erskine, of the 20th and 29th of March, 1807, produced by the official communication of that minister of the order of the 7th of January, and the answer of Mr. Madison of the 25th of March, 1808, to a like communication of the orders of the 11th of November, contained the most direct remonstrances against the system which these orders introduce and execute, and expressed the confident expectation of the President that it would not be persisted in.

That expectation has not yet been fulfilled; but it has, notwithstanding, not been relinquished. The President is still persuaded that its accomplishment will result from a careful review by His Majesty's Government, made in the spirit of moderation and equity, of the facts and considerations which belong to the occasion.

It is not my purpose to recapitulate in this note the statements and reasonings contained in the above-mentioned letters of Mr. Madison, in support of the claims of the Government of the United States, that the British orders be revoked. I content myself with referring to those letters for proofs which it is not necessary to repeat, and for arguments which I could not hope to improve.

But there are explanations which those letters do not contain, and which it is proper for me now to make. Even these, however, may be very briefly given, since you have already been made acquainted, in our late conversations, with all their bearings and details.

These explanations go to show that, while every motive of justice conspires to produce a disposition to recall the orders of which my Government complains, it is become apparent that even their professed object will be best attained by their revocation.

I have the honor to state to you, sir, that it was the intention of the President, in case Great Britain repealed her orders as regarded the United States, to exercise the power vested in him by the act of the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States, under certain conditions, to suspend the operation of the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several supplementary acts thereto," by suspending the embargo law and its supplements as regards Great Britain.

I am authorized to give you this assurance in the most formal manner; and I trust that, upon impartial inquiry, it will be found to leave no inducement to perseverance in the British orders, while it creates the most powerful inducements of equity and policy to abandon them.

On the score of justice, it does not seem possible to mistake the footing upon which this overture places the subject; and I venture to believe that in any other view there is as little room for doubt.

If, as I propose, your orders should be rescinded as to the United States, and our embargo rescinded as to Great Britain, the effect of these concurrent acts will be that the commercial intercourse of the two countries will be immediately resumed; while, if France should adhere to maxims and conduct derogatory to the neutral rights of the United States, the embargo, continuing as to her, will take the place of your orders, and lead, with an efficacy not merely equal to theirs, but probably much greater, to all the consequences that ought to result from them.

On the other hand, if France should concur in respecting those rights, and commerce should thus regain its fair immunities, and the law of nations its just dominion, all the alleged purposes of the British orders will have been at once fulfilled.

If I forbear to pursue these ideas through all the illustrations of which they are susceptible, it is because the personal conferences to which I have before alluded, as well as the obvious nature of the ideas themselves, render it unnecessary.

I cannot conclude this note without expressing my sincere wish that what I have now suggested, in conformity with the liberal sentiments and enlightened views of the President, may contribute, not only to remove the more immediate obstacles to the ordinary intercourse of trade between your country and mine, in a manner consistent with the honor of both, but to prepare the way for a satisfactory adjustment of every question important to their future friendship.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

The Right Honorable GEORGE CANNING, &c.

Extract:—Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

DEAR SIR:

LONDON, September 21, 1808.

The Hope arrived at Cowes, from France, on the 13th instants.

Not having heard from Mr. Canning, although he returned to London on the 16th, I called again yesterday at Downing street, and was assured that the answer to my note would be sent to-night, or early to-morrow morning. Mr. Atwater will of course be able to leave town on Friday, and embark on Saturday, with a copy of it.

I have been told, since the arrival of the last British packet, (but do not believe it,) that there is more probability than I had anticipated that the late events in Spain and Portugal (which ought not to be considered as deciding any thing) will have an effect on public opinion in America against the continuance of the embargo, and favorable to all the purposes of Great Britain. If this were true, I should think that it was deeply to be lamented. I may misunderstand the subject, but I cannot persuade myself that any thing that has happened on this side the Atlantic ought to induce us to retreat in any degree from our present system.

If we should resolve to trade with Spain and Portugal (Great Britain and France persisting in their orders and decrees) in any way to which Great Britain would not object, we must suspend the embargo as to those countries only, or as to those countries and Great Britain, or we must repeal it altogether.

The temptation to the first of these courses is, even in a commercial sense, inconsiderable; the objections to it endless. The object to be gained (if no more was gained than ought to be gained) would be trifling. There could, indeed, be no gain. An inadequate market, redundantly supplied, would be more injurious than no market at all. It would be a lure to destruction, and nothing more.

A suspension of the embargo so limited in its nature as this would be, (supposing it to be in fact what it would be in form,) would have a most unequal and invidious operation in the different quarters of the Union, of which the various commodities would not, in the ports of Portugal and Spain, be in equal demand. A war with France would be inevitable, and such a war, so produced, from which we could not hope to derive either honor or advantage, would place us at the mercy of Great Britain, and, on that account, would in the end do more to cripple and humble us than any disaster that could otherwise befall us.

The actual state of Spain and Portugal is, moreover, not to be relied upon. My first opinion on that subject remains; but even the most sanguine will admit that there is great room for doubt. The Emperor of France is evidently collecting a mighty force for the reduction of Spain, and Portugal must share its fate. And even if that force should be destined (as some suppose) first to contend with Austria, the speedy subjugation of Spain is not the less certain. If France should succeed, Spain and Portugal would again fall under the British orders of November, as well as under the operation of the French decrees. Our cargoes would scarcely have forced their way to the ocean in search of this boasted market, before they would be once more in a state of prohibition; and we should, in the mean time, have incurred the scandal of suffering an improvident thirst of gain to seduce us from our principles into a dilemma presenting no alternative but loss, in all the senses of that word.

But it is not even certain what Great Britain would herself finally say to such a partial suspension of the embargo. She would doubtless at first approve of it; but her ultimate course, (especially if war between France and the United States were not the immediate consequence, or if the measure were eventually less beneficial to herself than might be supposed at the outset,) ought not to be trusted. That she would approve at first is hardly to be questioned; and the considerations upon which she would do so are precisely those which should dissuade us from it. Some of these are—the aid it would afford to her allies as well as to her own troops co-operating with them, and its consequent tendency to destroy every thing like system in our conduct; its tendency to embroil us with France; its tendency to induce us, by overstocking a limited market, to make our commodities of no value, to dissipate our capital, to ruin our merchants without benefiting our agriculture, to destroy our infant manufactures without benefiting our commerce; its tendency to habituate us to a trammelled trade, and to fit us for acquiescence in a maritime despotism. But there are other reasons—our trade with Spain and Portugal, while it lasted, would be a circuitous trade with Great Britain and her colonies, for their benefit; our productions would be carried in the first instance to Spain and Portugal, would be bought there for British account, and would find their way to the West Indies, or centre here, as British convenience might require; and thus, in effect, the embargo would be removed as to Great Britain, while it continued as to France, and we professed to continue it as to both. And if any profits should arise from this sordid traffic, they would become a fund to enable us to import into the United States, directly or indirectly, the manufactures of Great Britain, and thus relieve her in another way, while her orders would prevent us from receiving the commodities of her enemy. It would be far better openly to take off the embargo as to Great Britain, than, while affecting to continue it as to that Power, to do what must rescue her completely (and that, too, without advantage to ourselves) from the pressure of it, at the same time that it would promote her views against France in Portugal and Spain.

As to withdrawing the embargo from Great Britain as well as Spain and Portugal, while the British orders are unrepealed, the objections to that course are just as strong now as they were four months ago. The change in Spain and Portugal (if it were even likely to last) cannot touch the principle of the embargo as regards Great Britain, who re-asserts her orders of November in the very explanations of the 4th of July, under which we must trade with those countries, if we trade with them at all. If we include Great Britain in the suspension, and exclude France, we do now what we have declined to do before, for the sake of delusive commerce, which may perish before it can be enjoyed, and cannot in any event be enjoyed with credit, with advantage, or even with safety. We take part at once with Great Britain against France, at a time the least suited that could be imagined to such a determination; at a time when it might be said that we were emboldened by French reverses to do what before we could not resolve upon, or were tempted by the prospect of a scanty profit, exaggerated by our cupidity and impatience, to forget what was due to consistency, to character, to permanent prosperity. We sanction, too, the maritime pretensions which insult and injure us. We throw ourselves, bound hand and foot, upon the generosity of a Government that has hitherto refused us justice, and all this when the affair of the Chesapeake and a host of other wrongs are unredressed, and when Great Britain has just rejected an overture which she must have accepted with eagerness if her views were not such as it became us to suspect and guard against.

To repeal the embargo altogether would be preferable to either of the other courses, but would, notwithstanding, be so fatal to us, in all respects, that we should long feel the wound it would inflict, unless, indeed, some other expedient, as strong at least, and as efficacious in all its bearings, can (as I fear it cannot) be substituted in its place.

War would seem to be the unavoidable result of such a step. If our commerce should not flourish in consequence of this measure, nothing would be gained by it but dishonor; and how it could be carried on to any valuable purpose it would be difficult to show. If our commerce should flourish in spite of French and British edicts and the miserable state of the world, in spite of war with France, if that should happen, it would, I doubt not, be assailed in some other form. The spirit of monopoly has seized the people and Government of this country. We shall not, under any circumstances, be tolerated as rivals in navigation and trade. It is in vain to hope that Great Britain will voluntarily foster the naval means of the United States. Even as allies we should be subjects of jealousy. It would be endless to enumerate in detail the evils which would cling to us in this new career of vassalage and meanness, and tedious to pursue our backward course to the extinction of that very trade to which we had sacrificed every thing else.

On the other hand, if we persevere, we must gain our purpose at last. By complying with the little policy of the moment, we shall be lost. By a great and systematic adherence to principle, we shall find the end of our difficulties.

The embargo and the loss of our trade are deeply felt here, and will be felt with more severity every day. The wheat harvest is likely to be alarmingly short, and the state of the continent will augment the evil. The discontents among their manufacturers are only quieted for the moment by temporary causes. Cotton is rising, and will soon be scarce. Unfavorable events on the continent will subdue the temper, unfriendly to wisdom and justice, which now prevails here. But, above all, the world will, I trust, be convinced that our firmness is not to be shaken.

Our measures have not been without effect. They have not been decisive, because we have not been thought capable of persevering in self-denial, if that can be called self-denial which is no more than prudent abstinence from destruction and dishonor.

I ought to mention that I have been told by a most respectable American merchant here, that large quantities of such woollen cloths as are prohibited by our non-importation act have been and continue to be sent to Canada, with the view of being smuggled into the United States.

I need not tell you that I am not induced to trouble you with my hasty reflections because I think you stand in need of them. I give them merely because I believe that you are entitled to know the impressions which a public servant on this side of the water receives from a view of our situation.

P. S. September 24. Mr. Canning's answer, received last night, confirms all my late anticipations. It is a little extraordinary that, if a written proposal was required from me with the idle motive mentioned in the accompanying paper, no such motive was suggested at the time, and even that other motives were suggested. The fact probably is, that they wished to evade the overture, and hoped that it would not be formally made. Being made, it was difficult to dispose of it; and hence the delay.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, September 24, 1808.

SIR:

I am now enabled to transmit to you a copy of Mr. Canning's answer, received only last night, to my note of the 23d of August. This answer was accompanied by a letter, of which also a copy is enclosed, recapitulating what Mr. Canning supposes to be "the substance of what has passed between us at our several interviews, previous to the presentation of my official letter."

To the accompanying paper I think it indispensable that I should reply without delay, supporting with politeness, but with firmness, the statements which I have already had the honor to make to you of the conversations in question, and correcting some errors upon points which Mr. Canning has thought fit to introduce into his letter, but which I had not supposed it necessary to mention in detail in my despatches.

I shall not detain Mr. Atwater with a view to this reply, but will take care to forward a copy of it by an early conveyance. My official note, and the answer to it, being perfectly explicit, Mr. Canning's misapprehensions (for such they are) of previous verbal communications can scarcely be very important in a public view; but it is, nevertheless, of some consequence, that, whatever may be the object of his statement, I should not make myself a party to its inaccuracies by even a tacit admission of them.

I do not perceive that a formal reply to the more official paper can now be of any advantage, but I shall probably take occasion to combine with my reply to the one paper some observations upon the other.

I regret extremely that the views which I have been instructed to lay before this Government have not been met by it as I had at first been led to expect. The overture cannot fail, however, to place in a strong light the just and liberal sentiments by which our Government is animated, and, in other respects, to be useful and honorable to our country.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

[Enclosed in Mr. Pinkney's letter of September 24.]

Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney.

FOREIGN OFFICE, September 23, 1808.

SIR:

In laying before the King your letter of the 23d of August, and in communicating to you the enclosed answer which I have received His Majesty's commands to return to it, I confess that I feel some little embarrassment from the repeated references which your letter contains to what has passed between us in conversation—an embarrassment arising, in no degree, as you are perfectly aware, from any feeling of distrust in you, personally, but from a recollection of the misrepresentation, which took place in America, of former conferences between us. You gave me, on that occasion, the most satisfactory proof that such misrepresentation did not originate with you, by communicating to me that part of your despatch in which the conferences particularly referred to were related, and related correctly; but this very circumstance, while it establishes your personal claim to entire confidence, proves, at the same time, that a faithful report of a conference on your part is not a security against its misrepresentation. It was for that reason principally, that, after hearing with the most respectful attention all that you had to state to me verbally on the subject of the present overture, I felt myself under the necessity of requiring, as "indispensable," a written communication upon the subject. It is for that reason, also, that as, in your written communication, you refer me to our late conversations for the "bearings and details" of your proposal, I feel it necessary to recapitulate, as shortly as I can, what I conceive to have passed in those conversations, beyond what I find recorded in your letter.

The principal points in which the suggestions brought forward by you in personal conference appear to me to have differed, in some degree, from the proposal now stated by you in writing, are two: the first, that, in conversation, the proposal itself was not distinctly stated as an overture authorized by your Government; the second, that the beneficial consequences likely to result to this country from the acceptance of that proposal, were "pursued" through more ample "illustrations."

In the first of our conferences, I understood you to say little more, on the authority of your Government, than that you were instructed to remonstrate against the orders in council of the 7th of January, and of the 11th of November, 1807, but to add, as from yourself, an expression of your own conviction that, if those orders were repealed, the President of the United States would suspend the embargo with respect to Great Britain. Upon the consequences of such a suspension of the embargo, while it would still continue to be in force against France, you expatiated largely; still speaking, however, as I understood, your own individual sentiments. It was suggested by you that America, in that case, would probably arm her merchant ships against the aggressions of France, an expedient to which, you observed, it would be perfectly idle to resort against Great Britain. The collision of armed vessels would probably produce war, and the United States would thus be brought into the very situation in which we must wish to place them, that of hostility to France, and virtual, if not formal alliance with Great Britain.

In our second conference you repeated and enforced these arguments, calculated to induce the British Government to consent to the repeal of the orders in council; and in this conference, though not stating yourself to be authorized by your Government formally to offer the suspension of the embargo as an immediate consequence of that repeal, yet you did profess (as I understood you) a readiness to take upon yourself to make that offer, provided that I would give you beforehand an unofficial assurance that, coupled with that offer so made, the demand of the repeal of the orders in council of January and November, 1807, would be favorably received. I, of course, declined to give any such previous assurance; but as you appeared to attach great importance to this suggestion, and as I was led to think that a compliance with it might relieve you from a difficulty in executing the instructions of your Government, I consented to take a few days to consider of it, and to reserve my definitive answer until I should see you again.

I never doubted, in my own mind, as to the inexpediency and impropriety of encouraging you to take an unauthorized step, by an unofficial promise that it should be well received. But, in a matter of such delicacy, I was desirous of either confirming or correcting my own opinion by the opinions of others. The result was, that, in a third interview, which took place shortly after the second, I had the honor to inform you, that, after the most mature deliberation, I found it impossible to yield to your suggestion; and that it therefore remained for you to frame your proposition according to the instructions of your Government, or to your own unbiassed discretion.

My own share in these several conferences, beyond what is implied in the above statement, was very small. I have, as you know, always rather wished to refer the argumentative discussion of the subject of the orders in council to the official correspondence I have more than once been taught to expect you to open upon it, than to engage with you in a verbal controversy, which, if confined to ourselves, would be useless; if afterwards to be reduced into writing for the purpose of being communicated to our respective Governments, superfluous.

But the representations which you have repeatedly made against the orders in council of January and November, as "violating the rights of the United States, and affecting most destructively their best interests, upon grounds wholly inadmissible, both in principle and in fact," I have uniformly maintained the "unquestionable right" of His Majesty to "resort to the fullest measures of retaliation, in consequence of the unparalleled aggression of the enemy, and to retort upon that enemy the evils of his own injustice;" and have uniformly contended that, "if third parties suffer from those measures, the demand of reparation must be made to that Power which first violates the established usages of war and the rights of neutral States."

There was, indeed, one point upon which I was particularly anxious to receive precise information, and upon which, from your candor and frankness, I was fortunate enough to obtain it. The connecting together, in your proposed overture, the suspension of the embargo and the repeal of the orders in council, (as well those of November as the preceding one of the 7th of January,) might appear to imply that the embargo had been the immediate consequence of those orders; and I was therefore desirous to ascertain whether, in fact, the orders in council of November had been known to the Government of the United States, previously to the message of the President proposing the embargo, so as to be a moving consideration to that message. I had the satisfaction to learn from you, sir, that such was not the fact; that rumors, indeed, might have reached America of some measure of further retaliation being in the contemplation of the British Government; that, perhaps, (as I understood you,) some more severe and sweeping measure might have been expected, but that of the orders in council of the 11th of November as having been actually issued, there was no certain knowledge in America, or at least none in the possession of the American Government, at the time of proposing the embargo.

Such, sir, is, according to the best of my recollection, correctly the substance of what has passed between us at our several interviews, previous to the presentation of your official letter; and such I have represented to have been the substance of what passed on these several occasions, in the report of our conferences which it has been my duty to make to the King.

If, in this recapitulation, there is any thing mistaken, or any thing omitted, you will do me the justice to believe the error unintentional, and you may rely on my readiness to set it right.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

GEORGE CANNING.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney.

FOREIGN OFFICE, September 23, 1808.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, had the honor to receive the official letter addressed to him by Mr. Pinkney, minister plenipotentiary of the United States, respecting the orders in council issued by His Majesty on the 7th January and 11th November, 1807.

He has laid that letter before the King; and he is commanded to assure Mr. Pinkney that the answer to the proposal, which Mr. Pinkney was instructed to bring forward, has been deferred only in the hope that the renewed application, which was understood to have been recently made by the Government of the United States to that of France, might, in the new state of things which has arisen in Europe, have met with such a reception in France as would have rendered the compliance of His Majesty with that proposal consistent, as much with His Majesty's own dignity, and with the interests of his people, as it would have been with His Majesty's disposition towards the United States.

Unhappily there is now no longer any reason to believe that such a hope is likely to be realized, and the undersigned is, therefore, commanded to communicate to Mr. Pinkney the decision which, under the circumstances as they stand, His Majesty feels himself compelled, however unwillingly, to adopt.

The mitigated measure of retaliation, announced by His Majesty in the order in council of the 7th January, and the further extension of that measure (an extension in operation, but not in principle) by the orders in council of November, were founded (as has been already repeatedly avowed by His Majesty) on the "unquestionable right of His Majesty to retort upon the enemy the evils of his own injustice;" and upon the consideration, that "if third parties incidentally suffered by these retaliatory measures, they were to seek their redress from the Power by whose original aggression that retaliation was occasioned."

His Majesty sees nothing in the embargo laid on by the President of the United States of America, which varies this original and simple state of the question.

If considered as a measure of impartial hostility against both belligerents, the embargo appears to His Majesty to have been manifestly unjust, as, according to every principle of justice, that redress ought to have been first sought from the party originating the wrong. And His Majesty cannot consent to buy off that hostility, which America ought not to have extended to him, at the expense of a concession made, not to America, but to France.

If, as it has more generally been represented by the Government of the United States, the embargo is only to be considered as an innocent municipal regulation, which affects none but the United States themselves, and with which no foreign State has any concern; viewed in this light, His Majesty does not conceive that he has the right, or the pretension, to make any complaint of it, and he has made none. But, in this light, there appears not only no reciprocity, but no assignable relation, between the repeal, by the United States, of a measure of voluntary self restriction, and the surrender, by His Majesty, of his right of retaliation against his enemies.

The Government of the United States is not now to be informed that the Berlin decree of November 21st, 1806, was the practical commencement of an attempt, not merely to check or impair the prosperity of Great Britain, but utterly to annihilate her political existence, through the ruin of her commercial prosperity; that, in this attempt, almost all the Powers of the European continent have been compelled, more or less, to co-operate; and that the American embargo, though most assuredly not intended to that end, (for America can have no real interest in the subversion of the British power, and her rulers are too enlightened to act from any impulse, against the real interests of their country) but, by some unfortunate concurrence of circumstances, without any hostile intention, the American embargo did come in aid of the "blockade of the European continent," precisely at the very moment when, if that blockade could have succeeded at all, this interposition of the American Government would most effectually have contributed to its success.

To this universal combination His Majesty has opposed a temperate but a determined retaliation upon the enemy; trusting that a firm resistance would defeat this project, but knowing that the smallest concession would infallibly encourage a perseverance in it.

The struggle has been viewed by other Powers, not without an apprehension that it might be fatal to this country. The British Government has not disguised from itself that the trial of such an experiment might be arduous and long, though it has never doubted of the final issue. But if that issue, such as the British Government confidently anticipated, has providentially arrived, much sooner than could even have been hoped; if "the blockade of the continent," as it has been triumphantly styled by the enemy, is raised even before it had been well established; and if that system, of which extent and continuity were the vital principles, is broken up into fragments utterly harmless and contemptible; it is nevertheless important, in the highest degree, to the reputation of this country, (a reputation which constitutes great part of her power,) that this disappointment of the hopes of her enemies should not have been purchased by any concession; that not a doubt should remain to distant times of her determination and of her ability to have continued her resistance; and that no step, which could even mistakenly be construed into concession, should be taken on her part, while the smallest link of the confederacy remains undissolved, or while it can be a question whether the plan devised for her destruction has, or has not, either completely failed, or been unequivocally abandoned.

These considerations compel His Majesty to adhere to the principles on which the orders in council of the 7th of January, and the 11th of November, are founded, so long as France adheres to that system, by which His Majesty's retaliatory measures were occasioned and justified.

It is not improbable, indeed, that some alterations may be made in the orders in council, as they are at present framed; alterations calculated not to abate their spirit or impair their principle, but to adapt them more exactly to the different state of things which has fortunately grown up in Europe, and to combine all practicable relief to neutrals, with a more severe pressure upon the enemy.

But of alterations to be made with this view only, it would be uncandid to take any advantage in the present discussion; however, it might be hoped that in their practical effect they might prove beneficial to America, provided the operation of the embargo were not to prevent her from reaping that benefit.

It remains for the undersigned to take notice of the last paragraph of Mr. Pinkney's letter. There cannot exist, on the part of Mr. Pinkney, a stronger wish than there does on that of the undersigned and of the British Government, for the adjustment of all the differences subsisting between the two countries.

His Majesty has no other disposition than to cultivate the most friendly intercourse with the United States.

The undersigned is persuaded that Mr. Pinkney would be one of the last to imagine, what is often idly asserted, that the depression of any other country is necessary or serviceable to the prosperity of this. The prosperity of America is essentially the prosperity of Great Britain; and the strength and power of Great Britain are not for herself only, but for the world. When those adjustments shall take place, to which, though unfortunately not practicable at this moment, nor under the conditions prescribed by Mr. Pinkney, the undersigned nevertheless confidently looks forward, it will perhaps be no insecure pledge for the continuance of the good understanding between the two countries, that they will have learned duly to appreciate each other's friendship; and that it will not hereafter be imputed to Great Britain, either on the one hand that she envies American industry as prejudicial to British commerce, or on the other hand that she is compelled to court an intercourse with America as absolutely necessary to her own existence.

His Majesty would not hesitate to contribute, in any manner in his power, to restore to the commerce of the United States its wonted activity; and if it were possible to make any sacrifice for the repeal of the embargo, without appearing to deprecate it as a measure of hostility, he would gladly have facilitated its removal, as a measure of inconvenient restriction upon the American people.

The undersigned is commanded, in conclusion, to observe, that nothing is said in Mr. Pinkney's letter of any intention to repeal the proclamation by which the ships of war of Great Britain are interdicted from all those rights of hospitality in the ports of the United States which are freely allowed to the ships of His Majesty's enemies.

The continuance of an interdiction, which, under such circumstances, amounts so nearly to direct hostility, after the willingness professed and the attempt made by His Majesty, to remove the cause on which that measure had been originally founded, would afford but an inauspicious omen for the commencement of a system of mutual conciliation; and the omission of any notice of that measure, in the proposal which Mr. Pinkney has been instructed to bring forward, would have been of itself a material defect in the overture of the President.

But the undersigned is commanded no further to dwell upon this subject than for the purpose of assuring Mr. Pinkney that on this, and every other point in discussion between the two Governments, His Majesty earnestly desires the restoration of a perfect good understanding, and that His Majesty would decline no measure for the attainment of that object which should be compatible with his own honor and just rights and with the interests of his people.

The undersigned requests Mr. Pinkney will accept the assurances of his high consideration.

GEORGE CANNING.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Canning.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, September 24, 1808.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your answer to my official note of the 23d of last month, relative to the British orders in council of January and November, 1807, together with a statement of "the substance of what has passed between us at our several interviews, previous to the presentation of that note."

I shall lose no time in transmitting to my Government copies of both these papers, upon the last of which I will take the liberty in the course of a few days to trouble you with some observations.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

The Right Hon. GEORGE CANNING, &c. &c. &c.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, October 11, 1808.

SIR:

I have the honor to transmit, enclosed, a copy of my reply to Mr. Canning's letter to me of the 23d of last month, accompanying his official answer of the same date to my note of the 23d of August.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

The Honorable JAMES MADISON, &c. &c. &c.

[Alluded to in the above letter of Mr. Pinkney.]

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Canning.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, October 10, 1808.

SIR:

If my reply to the letter which you did me the honor to address to me on the 23d of last month should be of greater length than the occasion may be thought to require, you will, I am sure, impute it to its real cause, an earnest desire on my part, arising from a feeling of sincere respect for you, that the statement, which I am to give of facts deemed by you to be important, should be full as well as accurate.

I will not fatigue you, sir, with assurances that no person could be less disposed than I am to find fault with the object of your letter, which appears to be to guard against all misrepresentation of "what has passed in our late interviews beyond what you find recorded in my note." You have told me that I have, personally, no concern in that object, and I did not require to be told that my Government has as little. I understand, indeed, that the circumstance, which has suggested a peculiar motive for this proceeding, was one of those newspaper misrepresentations, which every day produces where the press is free, which find no credit, and beget no consequence, and for which it is greatly to be feared your expedient will provide no remedy. Of my conduct, when that circumstance occurred, in giving you unsolicited proofs that I had transmitted to Mr. Secretary Madison a faithful report of our conferences, mistaken by public rumor or private conjecture, it is not necessary for me to speak; for you have yourself done justice to it.

The motive to which I am indebted for the honor of your letter appears to have been instrumental in producing another effect equally unexceptionable. But you will allow me to say, that, until the receipt of that letter, I had not been apprised, by the slightest intimation, that it was in any degree owing to such a cause that you declined, on the part of His Majesty's Government, after two conferences, in which I had been suffered, if not encouraged, to unfold myself, individually as well as officially, at great length and with perfect frankness to give an answer to my verbal overture.

At our first interview (on the 29th of June) verbal communication was not discountenanced, but commended for, after I had made myself understood as to the purpose for which the interview had been requested, you asked me if I thought of taking a more formal course; but immediately added that you presumed I did not, for that the course I had adopted was well suited to the occasion. My reply was, in substance, that the freedom of conversation was better adapted to our subject, and more likely to conduct us to an advantageous conclusion, than the constraint and formality of written intercourse, and that I had not intended to present a note. At the second interview (on the 22d of July) it did not occur to me that I had any reason to conclude, and certainly I did not conclude, that verbal communication had not continued to be acceptable as a preparatory course; and it was not until the third interview (on the 29th of July) that it was rejected as inadmissible. But even then I was not told, and had not the smallest suspicion, that this rejection was to be ascribed, either wholly or partially, to the motive which your letter has since announced to me. That this motive had, nevertheless, all the influence now imputed to it I am entirely confident, and I take notice of it only because, as I have not mentioned it to my Government in my official account of our conferences, I can no otherwise justify the omission, either to it or to you, than by showing that I had, in truth, no knowledge of the fact when that account was transmitted.

I may take occasion to set forth, in the present letter, the import of all that can be material of our several conversations, according to my recollection of them; but there are some points to which I ought to pay a more particular attention, because you have thought them entitled to it; although I should myself, perhaps, have been inclined to think that they had lost much of their importance by the presentation of my note and the receipt of your written answer; both of which are perfectly intelligible, upon these points at least, without the aid of the conferences that preceded them.

You observe, that "the principal points in which the suggestions brought forward by me, in personal conference, appear to you to have differed in some degree from the proposal stated by me in writing, are two: the first, that in conversation the proposal itself was not distinctly stated as an overture authorized by my Government; the second, that the beneficial consequences, likely to result to this country from the acceptance of that proposal, were "pursued" through more ample "illustrations."

With regard to the first of these supposed differences, I feel persuaded, sir, that, upon further recollection, it will occur to you, that, at our first conference, I told you explicitly that the substance of what I then suggested, (that is to say, that your orders being repealed as to us, we would suspend the embargo as to Great Britain,) was from my Government; but that the manner of conducting and illustrating the subject, upon which I had no precise orders, was my own. I even repeated to you the words of my instructions as they were upon my memory; and I did not understand, either then or afterwards, that there was any doubt as to their existence or their sufficiency, or any desire to have a more exact and formal communication of them while the result of our discussions was distant and uncertain. I said, undoubtedly, that I had been directed to require the revocation of the British orders in council; but I said also that, although the Government of the United States still supposed itself to be authorized to expect their repeal upon the ground of right as it existed from the first, (a subject, however, which I informed you I did not wish at that time to agitate,) I was, notwithstanding, empowered to give you the above-mentioned assurances, which would, as I presumed, hold out inducements to Great Britain, as well on the score of policy as on that of justice, to fulfil that expectation. I should scarcely have undertaken to offer such assurances as from myself, or upon my own "conviction" that the President would act in conformity with them. And I should still less (if that were possible) have ventured to ask of you that you would make them, in that form, the subject of repeated conferences, and even of reference to others, as placing the question of a recall or continuance of the orders in council upon new grounds of prudence and equity.

If it is merely intended (as I doubt not it is) to say that I did not make, or declare my intention to make, my overture in writing, before I had endeavored to prepare for it by personal explanations such a reception as I felt it deserved, and before I could ascertain what shape it would be most proper to give to it, or how it would be met by this Government, nothing can be more correct.

It was my sincere wish that my proposal, which I believed to be advantageous to Great Britain, as well as honorable to the United States, should be accepted; and accordingly I preferred a mode of proceeding, which, while it was calculated to avoid unprofitable discussions upon topics of some delicacy and great difficulty, would furnish opportunities for frank and friendly communication upon all the bearings of my proposal, and lead to the result at which I aimed, if that result should be practicable, in such way as, upon mature reflection, and after a liberal interchange of sentiments, should be found to be most for the honor of our respective Governments. These views were laid before you without reserve, and seemed to be approved; and I confess to you, sir, that when I was afterwards informed that, if I would obtain an answer to my overture, I must make it in writing, and that I must not look for any previous intimation of the nature of that answer, I did not allow myself any longer to anticipate with much confidence such an issue as I desired.

The second difference, which your letter supposes to exist between my note and verbal suggestions, cannot, I think, in any view, be very material. I will say something upon it, however.

My note declares that, if I forbear to pursue certain ideas through all the illustrations of which they are susceptible, it is because our personal conferences, as well as the obvious nature of the ideas themselves, render it unnecessary. This implies, undoubtedly, that more had been said in our conferences, explanatory of these ideas, than is to be found in the note itself; and that implication can scarcely be otherwise than true, if I "expatiated largely," as you very justly say I did, "upon the consequences of a suspension of the embargo as to Great Britain, while it still continued to be enforced against France."

The general idea to which the note refers is, that justice and interest conspired to recommend that you should take advantage of my proposal. The particular positions are, that if your orders and our embargo should be rescinded in the manner suggested, our commercial intercourse would be immediately revived; that, if France followed your example, and retracted her decrees, the avowed purpose of your orders would be accomplished; that, if France refused to retract, the American embargo, continuing as to her, would occupy the place of your orders, and perform their office even better than they could perform it themselves, without any of the disadvantages inseparable from such a system.

It is certain that, in our conversations, I endeavored to prove that these general and particular notions were founded in truth, by a variety of arguments, thrown out in a very desultory way, with more zeal than precision, and with that entire freedom which unlimited confidence in your candor, and a firm opinion that the views of my Government would derive new titles to respect from a full examination, were calculated to produce.

I should not deal ingenuously with you, sir, if I were to pretend that I think myself able to recapitulate these disjointed arguments as they were actually delivered; and I am quite sure that I shall consult your gratification, as well as my own credit, by declining such an undertaking. But I think I can state, in a condensed form, what I intended you should understand; and I presume that what I did say was not very wide of my real impressions.

Upon the footing on which my overture would place the justice of the British orders, I did not go into much detail at any one of the three interviews mentioned in your letter. But, combining my unconnected and occasional observations on that point, as they were made at different times, and more especially as they were afterwards given and enlarged upon when I had the honor to see you on the 26th of August, (of which, however, it is proper to say I have only a very scanty memorandum,) their import will not, perhaps, be found to be much, if at all, mistaken in such parts of the following statement as relate to that branch of the subject.

I meant to suggest, then, that upon your own principles it would be extremely difficult to decline my proposal; that your orders inculcate, as the duty of neutral nations, resistance to the maritime decrees of France, as overturning the public law of the world, and professedly rely upon that duty, and an imputed abandonment of it, for their inducement and their justification; that, of these orders, that of the 7th of January, 1807, (of which the subsequent orders of November are said, in your official reply to my note of the 23d of August, to be only an extension, "an extension in operation, not in principle,") was promulgated and carried into effect a few weeks only after the Berlin decree had made its appearance, when the American Government could not possibly know that such a decree existed, when there had been no attempt to enforce it, and when it had become probable that it would not be enforced at all to the prejudice of neutral rights; that the other orders were issued before the American Government, with reference to any practical violation of its rights, by an attempt to execute the Berlin decree in a sense different from the stipulations of the treaty subsisting between the United States and France, and from the explanations given to General Armstrong by the French Minister of Marine, and afterwards impliedly confirmed by General Champagny, as well as by a correspondent practice, had any sufficient opportunity of opposing that decree, otherwise than it did oppose it; that your orders, thus proceeding upon an assumed acquiescence not existing in fact, retaliated prematurely, and retaliated a thousand-fold, through the rights of the United States, wrongs rather threatened than felt, which you were not authorized to presume the United States would not themselves repel, as their honor and their interest required; that orders, so issued, were, to say the least of them, an unseasonable interposition between the injuring and the injured party, in a way the most fatal to the latter; that by taking justice into your own hands, before you were entitled to do so, at the expense of every thing like neutral rights, and even at the expense of other rights, justly the objects of yet greater sensibility, and by inflicting upon neutral nations, or rather upon the United States, the only neutral nation, injuries infinitely more severe and extensive than it was in the power of France to inflict, you embarrassed and confounded, and rendered impracticable, that very resistance which you demanded of us; that my proposal destroyed all imaginable motives for continuing, whatever might have been the motives for adopting, this new scheme of warfare; that it enabled you to withdraw, with dignity, and even with advantage, what should not have come between France and us; that its necessary tendency was to place us at issue with that Power, or, in other words, in the precise situation in which you have maintained we ought to be placed, if it should persist in its obnoxious edicts; that the continuance of our embargo, so modified, would be at least equivalent to your orders, for that, in their most efficient state, your orders could do no more, as regards the United States, than cut off their trade with France, and the countries connected with her, and that our embargo remaining as to France and those countries, would do exactly the same; that if the two courses were barely, or even nearly, upon a level, in point of expediency, Great Britain ought to be forward to adopt that which was consistent with the rights, and respectful to the feelings, of others; that my proposal, however, had powerful recommendations, which the orders in council had not; that it would re-establish, without the hazard of any disadvantage, before new habits had rendered it difficult if not impossible, a traffic which nourished your most essential manufactures, and various other important sources of your prosperity; that it would not only restore a connexion, valuable in all its views, but prepare the way for the return of mutual kindness, for adjustments greatly to be desired, and, in a word, for all those consequences which follow in the train of magnanimity and conciliation, associated with prudence and justice.

Among the observations intended to illustrate my opinion of the certain, probable, and possible effects of the concurrent acts which my proposal had in view, were those to which you alluded in the sixth paragraph of your letter. Having stated that renewed commercial intercourse between Great Britain and the United States would be the first effect, I remarked, in the progress of the conversation, that the edicts of France could not prevent that intercourse, even if France should adhere to them; although Great Britain, by her superior naval means, might be able to prevent the converse of it; that the power of France upon the seas was in no degree adequate to such a purpose, and, if it were otherwise, that it was not to be supposed that the United States, resuming their lawful commerce with this country, after a recall of the British orders in council, would take no measures against systematic interruptions of that commerce by force and violence, if such should be attempted.

If, when I was honored with the different interviews before mentioned, I had been able to conjecture the nature of the arguments which were to have an influence against my proposal, as I now find them stated in your answer to my note, I should probably have ventured to suggest, in addition to the remarks actually submitted to your consideration, that, if "the blockade of the European continent," by France and the Powers subservient to or in combination with her, to which your orders, as "a temperate but determined retaliation," were opposed, has been "raised even before it had been well established," and if "that system," so opposed, "of which extent and continuity were the vital principles, has been broken up into fragments utterly harmless and contemptible," there seems scarcely to be left, in your own view of the subject, any intelligible justification for perseverance in such of the retaliatory measures of Great Britain as operate through the acknowledged rights of a Power, confessedly no party to that combination, and ready to fulfil her fair neutral obligations if you will suffer her to do so. Under such circumstances, to abandon, what it is admitted to have lost its own legitimate object, is not "concession;" it is simple justice. To France, indeed, it might be concession. But it is not France, it is the Government of America, neither subservient to France nor combined with France, a third party whose rights and interests your orders deeply affect, without any adequate necessity, according to your own showing, that requires their recall; and that, too, upon terms, which cannot but promote the declared purposes of these orders, if any remain to be promoted. I say "without any adequate necessity according to your own showing;" for I am persuaded, sir, you do not mean to tell us, as upon a hasty perusal of your answer to my note might be imagined, that those rights and interests are to be set at naught, "lest a doubt should remain to distant times of the determination and the ability of Great Britain to have continued her resistance," or that your orders may, indefinitely, give a new law to the ocean, lest the motive to their repeal should be mistaken by your enemy. If this might, indeed, be so, you will, perhaps, permit me to say, that, highly as we may be disposed to prize the firm attitude and vast means of your country, at this eventful moment, it would possibly suggest to some minds a reluctant doubt on the subject of your observation, "that the strength and power of Great Britain are not for herself only, but for the world."

I might also have been led to intimate that my proposal could apparently lose nothing by admitting, that, "by some unfortunate concurrence of circumstances, without any hostile intention, the American embargo did come in aid of "the before-mentioned" blockade of the European continent, precisely at the very moment when, if that blockade could have succeeded at all, this interposition of the American Government would most effectually have contributed to its success." Yet, I should probably have thought myself bound to remind you, that, whatever may be the truth of this speculation, the same embargo withheld our tonnage and our productions from that communication with the colonies of your enemies and with the European continent, which you had asserted your right to prevent; which, as a direct communication (with the continent,) you had in fact prohibited; which, even through British ports, or in other qualified forms, you had professed to tolerate, not as that which could be claimed, but as an indulgence that could at any time be withdrawn; which, as a traffic for the United States to engage in, you had at least discouraged, not only by checks and difficulties in the way of its prosecution, but by manifesting your intentions to mould it into all the shapes which the belligerent, fiscal, or other peculiar policy of Great Britain might require, and to subject it to the exclusive jurisdiction of her municipal code, armed with all the prerogatives of that universal law to which nations are accustomed to look for the rights of neutral commerce.

In giving an account of our second conference you say "that, though not stating myself to be authorized by my Government formally to offer the suspension of the embargo as an immediate consequence of the repeal of the orders in council, yet I did profess my readiness to take upon myself to make that offer, provided that you would give me beforehand an unofficial assurance that, coupled with that offer so made, the demand of the repeal of the orders would be favorably received; that you, of course, declined to give any such previous assurance; but, as I appeared to attach great importance to this suggestion, and you were led to think that a compliance with it might relieve me from a difficulty in executing the instructions of my Government, you consented to take a few days to consider of it, and to reserve your definitive answer until you should see me again." You then observe that you "never doubted, in your own mind, as to the inexpediency and impropriety of encouraging me to take an unauthorized step, by an unofficial promise that it should be well received." I am sure you did not, sir; but I must take the liberty to say that I am equally sure that I never thought of asking you to give me encouragement to take an unauthorized step of any kind. I am, indeed, truly mortified that my conduct has appeared to you in that light; and I should not be readily consoled, if I did not reflect that, in condescending to listen, even for a moment, to what must have struck you as an irregularity, as vain and nugatory in its purpose as reprehensible in its principle, you must at least have given me credit for good intentions, and for a strong desire, sincerely felt, although erroneously obeyed, that our countries should find themselves in that relative position which suits the interests and tends to the happiness of both.

When I professed a readiness to make my proposal in writing, it was, as you state, provisionally; but I did not intimate that I was acting without authority, nor did I comprehend that such was, as I now know it to have been, your impression. The provisional nature of my offer arose out of circumstances, and was afterwards pressed upon conviction that, if it was meant to adopt the views of the President, nothing more could be necessary. I understood you to be desirous of ascertaining whether I was empowered and disposed, with a view to a final arrangement, to present what I had suggested, in a written form, as an overture originating with my Government. I said, of course, that, every thing being first matured, a note should be presented, but that I would, with your permission, take a little time to consider of the manner and terms. I did not at that time suppose that we were conversing about a written proposal which was to be made only to be rejected, or even for the purpose of deliberation; and consequently, in professing my willingness to make it as soon as we were prepared for it, I presumed that I had done all that you desired. And I was confirmed in this opinion, not only by your saying nothing, as I supposed, to the contrary, but by your requesting me, as I was about to leave the room, to employ myself, before the next interview, upon such a note as we had been talking of; and then retracting that request, by observing, that I would doubtless first desire to know what were your ideas and intentions upon the subject of it, with which I was given to understand I should be made acquainted at another conference.

At the third interview, after speaking of a transaction upon the lakes, of which your traders complained, and of another occurrence in the bay of Passamaquoddy, you observed, that you had thought long and anxiously upon what I had suggested to you; that the subject had at first struck you as being much more simple than upon careful examination it had been found to be; that, in the actual state of the world, it behooved both you and me to move in this affair with every possible degree of circumspection; that, without some explicit proposal on my part, in writing, upon which the British Government could deliberate and act, nothing could be done; and, finally, that you must leave me to consult my own discretion whether I would make such a proposal.

It appeared to me that, if this determination should be persisted in, my overture was not likely to be successful; and I urged, accordingly, the propriety of going on in a course which would lead us to a better issue. That course was, that we should understand one another as to our respective views, and that a concise note, which I had in fact prepared since the last meeting, should then be presented and acted upon. You informed me that my wish in this particular could not be acceded to; that, if I presented a note, you must be left at perfect liberty to decide upon what it proposed; that you could not give me even an intimation of the probable consequences of it; and, in a word, that you would neither invite nor discourage such a proceeding. You added that there were some points belonging to the subject which it would be proper to discuss in writing, one of which was the connexion between our embargo and your orders of November, supposed to be implied by my proposal. I remarked that, with an actual result in view, and with a wish to arrive at that result without delay, it could not be advisable to entangle ourselves in a written correspondence, undefined as to its scope and duration, upon topics on which we were not likely to agree; and that, if I were to frame my note, with a knowledge that it was to provoke argument, instead of leading at this crisis to a salutary change in the state of the world, you must be conscious that I too must argue. And where would this end? To what wholesome consequence would it conduct us? At the close of the interview I observed that, as the footing upon which the subject was now placed made delay of no importance, I should take time to prepare such further proceeding as the occasion required.

On the 26th of August I had the honor to see you again, and, after entering more at large than I had before believed to be proper into a consideration of the effect of my proposal on the equity of adhering to your orders in council, and, after reading to you parts of my instructions, I delivered an official note, in which the proposal was made in the form required.

Something was said at this interview of the affair of the Chesapeake, and the President's proclamation, which it is not, I presume, necessary to repeat. It will be sufficient to state, that you asked me what was to be done with these subjects? And that my reply was, that they had no connexion with the present; but that I could say, with confidence, that my Government had every disposition to attend to them, with a view to such an adjustment as would be honorable to both parties. I did not suppose that it was expected (for you did not intimate such an expectation) that renewed negotiation upon these points should, as well as the repeal, upon terms, of your orders in council, be invited by a formal overture from the Government of America.

I will not trouble you with many observations more.

You state in your letter that "there was one point upon which you were particularly anxious to receive precise information, and upon which, from my candor and frankness, you were fortunate enough to obtain it." This was, "whether in fact the orders in council of November had been known to the Government of the United States previously to the message of the President proposing the embargo, so as to be a moving consideration to that message?" I quote this passage principally that I may recall to your recollection that my suggestions upon the subject of it were not made officially, or as being authorized or furnished by any communication from my Government, or in answer to any direct inquiries on your part. They were very briefly made near the close, as I think, of our third interview, in consequence of your intimation, (intended, perhaps, to amount to an inquiry,) that my proposal implied that the embargo had been produced by the orders of November; to which you added that this could not be admitted, and, (as I comprehended what you said,) that it even required to be made the subject of some notice or discussion in writing, as intimately connected with my proposal, if it should be brought forward in that shape; and I understood you to assign this as one of the reasons why a written overture was indispensable. In replying to that intimation, and the remarks which followed it, I professed to speak, as I did in fact speak, from general information only, and disclaimed, as it was my duty to do, all authority to say more upon the nature and origin of the embargo than I had some time before communicated to you, in obedience to the orders of the President. The purpose of my observations was chiefly to show that there was no inducement for embarking in formal discussions upon this point; and I assured you that it was not in my power, either as respected instructions from my Government, or knowledge of facts, to do so. My opinion was, and I spoke accordingly, that it was one of those questions which might be left completely at rest, without the least injury to the wisdom or the justice of our conclusions upon the great object of our conferences. There could be no objection, however, to my giving you on this head such conjectural information as I was able; on the contrary, by fully disclosing to you my own materials for forming an opinion upon it, you would be enabled more distinctly to see that I could take no part in any discussion which you might propose to apply to it. And I could not but be assured that any anxiety you might feel to obtain a knowledge of the facts in question sprung from considerations which had every claim to my respect; for I knew that your mind was far above the reach of prejudice, which would ascribe the American embargo to participation in the councils or views of your adversary, or of any foreign Power whatsoever.

My suggestions were to the following effect: that I believed that no copy of your orders of November had arrived in the United States, at the date of the President's message; that a recent change in the conduct of France to our prejudice did appear to be known; that intelligence had been received, and a belief entertained, of your intention to adopt some further measure, as a measure of retaliation against France, by which our commerce and our rights would be affected; that there was reason to conclude that you had actually adopted such a measure; that (as I collected from American newspapers) this had appeared from private letters and the newspapers of this country, received in the United States some days before the message of the President, and probably known to the Government; that, in a word, various information concurred to show that our trade was likely to be assailed by the combined efforts of both the belligerent parties; and that the embargo was a measure of wise and peaceful precaution, adopted under this view of reasonably anticipated peril.

You observe, in another part of your letter, "that you have always rather wished to refer the argumentative discussion of the subject of the orders in council to the official correspondence which you have more than once been taught to expect me to open upon it." If I should object to any part of this statement, of which the substance is undoubtedly correct, it would be to the words "more than once." Your wish has always appeared to be such as you now represent it, and you had reason to expect that I would commence a written discussion of the orders of November soon after their publication. I had told you that I should do so, and you had said that there could be no objection to it. But you were afterwards informed that, upon reflection, I had determined to leave the subject where it was, until I should know the pleasure of my Government.

The orders had been officially communicated, not to me, but to Mr. Madison, through the British minister at Washington. It seemed, therefore, to be proper, (unless my instructions should make it otherwise,) that the view which the Government of the United States took of them should find its way to you through the same channel; and, accordingly, the letters of Mr. Madison, to which I have referred in my note of the 23d of August, did open at great length a discussion, which I could have no inducement to shun, although I did not continue to think myself authorized to commence it.

It only remains to add, that your share in our several conversations was, what you represent it to have been, not considerable; and that your manner, although reserved, was, as it always is, perfectly friendly.

I need not say that if, in this letter, written under the influence of sincere concern, the proposal I had the honor to lay before you has been unsuccessful, any thing is to be found which you could wish to be otherwise than it is, I shall be the first to regret that I have not been able to do justice to my own feelings and intentions.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

WM. PINKNEY.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, November 25, 1808.

SIR:

I have the honor to send enclosed a copy of a letter, received last night from Mr. Canning, in answer to my letter to him of the 10th of last month.

The tone of this letter renders it impossible to reply to it with a view to a discussion of what it contains; although it is not without further inadvertencies as to facts, and many of the observations are open to exception. I intend, however, to combine, with an acknowledgment of the receipt of it, two short explanations. The first will relate to the new and extraordinary conjecture, which it intimates, that my authority was contingent; and the second will remind Mr. Canning that my letter of the 10th of October does not, as he imagines, leave unexplained the remark that "the provisional nature of my offer to make my proposal in writing arose out of circumstances;" but, on the contrary, that the explanation immediately follows the remark.

The Union is not yet returned from France. Lieutenant Gibbon arrived in London more than three weeks ago, and delivered your letter of the 9th of September, with duplicates of papers in the case of the Little William, and copies of letters which lately passed between the Department of State and Mr. Erskine.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

The Hon. JAMES MADISON, &c.

[Referred to in the preceding despatch.]

Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney.

SIR:

FOREIGN OFFICE, November 22, 1808.

I regret exceedingly that an unusual and unintermitting pressure of official business has prevented me from finding an earlier opportunity to reply to your letter of the 10th of last month.

The observations which I have to offer upon some parts of that letter are not, indeed, of such a nature, as to make it matter of any great importance whether you receive them a week sooner or later; as they refer less to any point of public interest to our two Governments than to what has passed personally between ourselves.

But I should have been much mortified if you could have been led to believe me deficient in attention to you; the manner as well as the substance of the communication, which I have had the honor to receive from you, entitling it to the most prompt and candid consideration. Your understanding of the motives which induced me to accompany my official note of the 23d September with my letter of the same date, is so far imperfect, as that you seem to imagine that the wish to guard against misrepresentation was the only motive which induced me to write that letter, and that, from that motive alone, I should, in any case, have troubled you with it. Whereas, I must have expressed myself very incorrectly indeed, if I did not convey to you the assurance, that if what had passed between us in conversation had not been referred to by you in your official letter of the 23d August, I certainly should not have thought it necessary or proper to preserve any written record of your verbal communications, which I understood at the time to be confidential, and which I certainly was so far from attempting or intending to "discountenance," that I have no doubt but I expressed myself (as you say I did) in favor of "the course which you adopted, as well suited to the occasion." But you state, at the same time, most correctly, that it was as a preparatory course, that I understood and encouraged this verbal and confidential communication. I never did, nor could understand it as being intended to supersede or supply the place of an official overture. I never did nor could suppose that the overture of your Government, and the answer of the British Government to it were intended to be intrusted solely to our respective recollections. Accordingly, when the period arrived at which you appeared to be prepared to bring forward an official proposal, I did, no doubt, express my expectation that I should receive that proposal in writing.

It is highly probable that I did not (as you say I did not) assign to you, as the motive of the wish which I then expressed, my persuasion that written communications are less liable to mistake than verbal ones; because that consideration is sufficiently obvious, and because the whole course and practice of office is, in that respect, so established and invariable, that I really could not have supposed the assignment of any specific motive to be necessary, or account for my requiring a written statement of your proposals previous to my returning an official answer to them.

I had taken for granted all along that such would, and such must be, the ultimate proceeding on your part, however you might wish to prepare the way for it by preliminary conversations.

In framing your note, I did not pretend to anticipate how much of what had been stated by you in our several conferences you would think it proper to repeat in writing. But, whatever the tenor of your note had been, I should have felt it right to conform strictly to it, in the official answer, avoiding any reference to any part of your verbal communications, except such as, by repeating them in writing, I should see that it was your intention to record as official.

I confess, however, I was not prepared for the mixed course which you actually did adopt, I am persuaded, (I am sincerely persuaded,) without any intention of creating embarrassment—that of referring generally to what had passed in our conferences, as illustrative of your official proposition, and as tending to support and recommend it, but without specifying the particular points to which such reference was intended to apply; a course which appeared at first sight to leave me no choice, except between the two alternatives of either recapitulating the whole of what you had stated in conversation for the purpose of comprehending it in the answer, or of confining myself to your written note, at the hazard of being suspected of suppressing the most material part of your statement.

The expedient to which I had recourse, of accompanying my official note with a separate letter, stating, to the best of my recollection, the substance of what I had heard from you in conversation, appeared to me, after much deliberation, to be the most respectful to you.

Such having been the motives which dictated my letter, I cannot regret that it was written, since it has produced, at a period so little distant from the transaction itself, an opportunity of comparing the impressions left on our minds, respectively, of what passed in our several conferences, and of correcting any erroneous impression on either side.

There are two points in which our recollections do appear to differ in some degree.

The first relates to the authority which you had, and that which I understood you to state yourself to have, at the time of our first conference, for bringing forward a direct overture, in the name of your Government; the second to the expectation which I stated myself to have entertained "more than once," of your opening an official correspondence on the subject of the orders in council.

With respect to the first point, you will give me credit, when I assure you that my understanding of what was said by you, not only in the first, but in our second conference, was precisely what I have stated it to be in my letter; and you will, I hope, forgive me, if, after the most attentive perusal of your letter of the 10th October, and after a careful comparison of different passages in it, while I am compelled, by your assurance, to acknowledge that I must have misapprehended you, I find grounds in your statement to excuse, if not to account for, my misapprehension.

According to your recollection, you told me explicitly, in our first conference, "that the substance of what you then suggested, that is to say, that our orders being repealed as to the United States, the United States would suspend the embargo as to Great Britain," was from your Government; "that the manner of conducting and illustrating the subject (upon which you had no precise orders) was your own," and you even quoted part of your instructions to me which was to that effect.

In a subsequent paragraph, you state that "nothing can be more correct than my apprehension that you did not make, nor profess to intend making, an overture, in writing, before you had endeavored to prepare for it such a reception as you felt it deserved, and before you could ascertain what shape it would be most proper to give to that overture, and how it would be met by the British Government."

And in another part of your letter, you admit that "when you expressed your readiness to make your proposal in writing, it was (as I have stated) provisionally;" and you inform me that "the provisional nature of your offer arose out of circumstances;" the nature of which circumstances you do not explain, nor have I any right to require such an explanation.

But, comparing these several statements together; seeing that, in our first interview, you declared no intention of making a proposal in writing; that, in our second interview, (a month or five weeks afterwards) you described that intention as "provisional" and contingent; and protesting at the same time (as I do in the most solemn manner) that I cannot find any trace in my memory of any communication whatever of any part of your instructions communicated to me as such; seeing also, that, whatever might be the nature and extent of your instructions from the President of the United States as to the substance of the overture to be made to the British Government, the manner, the time, and the conditions of that overture were evidently considered by you as left to your own discretion; it surely may be pardonable in me to have mistaken (as I most unquestionably must have done,) the precise limits at which the authority of your Government ended and your own discretion began, and to have imagined (which I very innocently did) that a proposition, over which you appeared to have a power so nearly absolute, was a proposition in a great measure of your own suggestion. I do not mean that I supposed you to bring forward such a measure without reference to the knowledge which you must of course have had of the general feeling, disposition, and intentions of your Government, but without its specific instructions for that purpose at that time.

In attributing to you this exercise of judgment, in addition to the many others, which it is confessed you were at liberty to exercise, I really intended to convey no imputation disrespectful to you; I can conceive abundance of cases in which it would have been not only excusable but highly meritorious.

My mistake, at least, was a very harmless one, as, whether the fact were that you had no precise authority to give in an official proposal, or that you had such an authority, but subject to contingencies which had not occurred, the practical result must be of necessity the same.

What these contingencies might be, it is not for me to inquire; but if they were of the nature of which I now cannot but conjecture they may have been; if the overture which you were authorized to make to the British Government was to be shaped and timed according to the result of any other overture to any other Government, I am then at once able to account for all those appearances which misled me into a belief of the want of a precise authority on your part. This consideration leads me to the other point, on which alone there appears a difference between us upon any matter of fact, but a difference by no means so wide as it appears.

Admitting the general correctness of my statement of the expectation which I was taught to entertain of a written communication from you, on the subject of the orders in council, you add, that it was, however, only in November last, and immediately after the publication of the orders in council, that you had directly announced to me your intention of opening a correspondence upon them—an intention, from which you afterwards desisted, "until you should receive the pleasure of your Government." The correctness of this statement I do not dispute; but you, I am sure, will agree with me, sir, in recollecting how many times, "more than once," since the period of that first intention of yours being announced and withdrawn, my expectations that you were about to "receive the pleasure of your Government" upon this subject have been excited by the notification in America, and the destination hither of ships employed by the United States, as it was generally supposed, for the special purpose of conveying representations or proposals from the American Government to the Governments of France and Great Britain, upon the subject of their respective maritime decrees and orders.

Such was the universal belief, both in America and in England, upon the arrival of the Osage, upon that of the Hope, of the St. Michael, and of another vessel named, I think, the Union. I have certainly no right to affirm that you shared in the expectation which so universally prevailed; I have no right to say that the Government of the United States designedly created that expectation; but that it did prevail, and that I very sincerely believed it to be well founded, you, I think, must do me the justice to recollect, as, in one instance, at least, that of the Osage, so strong was my persuasion that you must have received instructions from your Government, that I took the liberty of sending to you to inquire whether you had not some communication to make to me, and received for answer that you had none.

It is to these missions that I particularly referred, when I said that I had "more than once expected you to open a correspondence with me upon the subject of the orders in council." This expectation it was that alone prevented me sending instructions to Mr. Erskine to reply to the note addressed to him by Mr. Madison on the 25th of March, in answer to that note of Mr. Erskine's in which he communicated the orders in council, and in allusion to these missions, particularly to that of the Osage; and to the expectation, which had been founded here upon the return here of that vessel after its voyage to France, it was, that I made that declaration in Parliament, which, I see, has been the subject of some misapprehension (I will not say misrepresentation) in America; that, "since the termination of Mr. Rose's mission, the American Government had not made any communication here, in the shape of remonstrance, or in a tone of irritation." I am not aware, sir, that there is any other part of your letter which requires that I should trouble you with many observations.

Your report of your answer to the inquiry, which I took the liberty of making, "whether the orders in council of November were known to the Government of the United States previously to the message of the President proposing the embargo, was to be a moving consideration to that message," does not appear to differ in any material degree from my statement of it. That your answer to such an inquiry was official, or authorized by your Government, I did not assert nor presume. I have already said that it was not till you had, in your official letter of the 23d of August, referred to what passed in conversation, that I should have thought any such reference allowable on my part; and, even then, the generality of your reference precluded me from judging correctly how much of what you had stated in conversation was from official authority, how much from your own personal information or opinion.

You inform me that your answer to this question was of the latter description only; but, even if it were only from your individual authority, it was very material and highly gratifying to learn that the embargo, which had been sometimes represented, both here and in America, as the direct and immediate consequence of the orders in council of November, and as produced solely by them, was, in your opinion, "a measure of precaution against reasonably anticipated peril."

The purpose of this letter is not to renew the discussion upon the subject of your proposal, but merely to clear up any misunderstanding which had existed between us in the course of that discussion. I cannot conclude it, however, without adverting very shortly to that part of your letter in which you argue that the failure of France, in the attempt to realize her gigantic project of the annihilation of the commerce of this country, removes all pretext for the continuance of the retaliatory system of Great Britain. This impotency of the enemy to carry his projects of violence and injustice into execution might, with more propriety, be pleaded with him as a motive for withdrawing decrees at once so indefensible and so little efficacious for their purpose, than represented as creating an obligation upon Great Britain to desist from those measures of defensive retaliation which those decrees have necessarily occasioned. If the foundation of the retaliating system of Great Britain was (as we contend it to have been) originally just, that system will be justifiably continued in force, not so long only as the decrees which produced it are mischievously operative, but until they are unequivocally abandoned; and, if it be thus consistent with justice to persevere in that system, it is surely no mean motive of policy for such perseverance, that a premature departure from it, while the enemy's original provocation remains unrepealed, might lead to false conclusions as to the efficacy of the decrees of France, and might hold out a dangerous temptation to that Power to resort to the same system on any future occasion; a result which, not Great Britain alone, but all commercial nations are deeply interested in preventing. I have now, sir, only to express my sense of the candor and liberality with which this discussion has been conducted on your part, and my acknowledgments for the justice which you render to my disposition to treat you, at all times, with reciprocal respect, and to listen to you with the attention to which, personally, as well as officially, you have every claim.

I cannot forego the hope that it may yet fall to our lot to be instrumental in the renewal of that good understanding between our two Governments, which is as congenial to the feelings as it is essential to the interests of both countries; which nothing but the forced and unnatural state of the world could have interrupted; and which there is, on the part of the British Government, the most anxious and unabated desire to restore.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

GEORGE CANNING.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

LONDON, December 3, 1808.

I have the honor to send, enclosed, a copy of my reply to Mr. Canning's letter to me of the 22d ultimo. A copy of the letter, to which it is an answer, was transmitted a few days since by the British packet, and a duplicate has been sent to Liverpool.

The Union is not yet arrived from France, and we have no intelligence of her.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

The Honorable JAMES MADISON, &c.

[Enclosed in Mr. Pinkney's despatch of December 3.]

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Canning.

SIR:

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, November 28, 1808.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 22d instant, and to transmit a copy of it to my Government.

Without desiring to protract a discussion, in the conduct of which neither your sincerity nor mine will, I feel assured, be doubted by any one, I may be permitted to say, that the authority under which I acted in our late communications was not contingent, as you now appear to conjecture, and that the remark contained in my letter of the 10th of October, "that the provisional nature of my offer to make my proposal in writing arose out of circumstances," will be found explained, in the same letter, by passages which immediately follow the remark.

I have said, in my letter of the 10th of October, that "I had no precise instructions as to the manner of conducting and illustrating the subject confided to my management;" but you will suffer me to enter my friendly protest against all suppositions that the overture was left to my own discretion; that I had a power "nearly absolute" over it, or that it was, "in a great measure, of my own suggestion."

I will trouble you no further, sir, on this occasion, than to assure you that nothing could give me more sincere pleasure than to see fulfilled the hope which you express, that it may yet fall to our lot to be instrumental in the renewal of good understanding between our two Governments.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

The Right Hon. GEORGE CANNING.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney.

SIR:

FOREIGN OFFICE, December 24, 1808.

In my official note of the 23d September, I stated to you the probability that some alterations might be made in the orders in council, with a view to adapt their operation more exactly to the altered state of Europe, and to combine all practicable relief to neutrals with a more severe pressure upon the enemy.

As this statement was, however, only incidental, and as I at the same time disclaimed any intention of taking advantage of such proposed alterations in the discussions then pending between us, seeing that, if made, they would not be founded on the admission of any of the principles for which you were contending, it was, perhaps, not necessary that I should trouble you with any further communication upon this subject. But the order, of which I have the honor to enclose a copy, having been passed by His Majesty in council on Wednesday last, I am desirous, previous to its actual publication, of explaining to you the grounds on which the more extended alterations which were in contemplation have been suspended.

It was intended to relax, in a certain degree, the regulations of the orders in council, with respect to such of the Powers in hostility with His Majesty as were not, or should not place themselves, in a state of hostility with Spain; but at the same time that this relaxation was extended to other Powers, to prohibit absolutely, by strict, rigorous, and unmitigated blockade, all intercourse whatever with France.

The adoption by these Powers, who were to have been the objects of such relaxations, of the views and projects of France with respect to Spain, does away all assignable ground of distinction between France and these Powers; and that part, therefore, of the intended alterations does not take place.

The alterations contained in the enclosed orders in council stand upon a separate ground, and, as I have more than once understood from you that the part of the orders in council which this order goes to mitigate is that which was felt most sorely by the United States, I have great pleasure in being authorized to communicate it to you.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE CANNING.

WILLIAM PINKNEY, Esq.

[Order in council, enclosed in Mr. Canning's letter of December 24.]

His Majesty, in virtue of the powers reserved to him, by two certain acts passed in the 48th year of His Majesty's reign, the one entitled "An act for granting to His Majesty, until the end of the next session of Parliament, duties of customs on the goods, wares, and merchandises therein enumerated, in furtherance of the provisions of certain orders in council;" the other entitled "An act for granting to His Majesty, until the end of the next session of Parliament, certain duties, on the exportation from Ireland, of goods, wares, and merchandise therein enumerated," is pleased, by and with the advice of his privy council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that the operation of the aforesaid acts be suspended, as to any duties on exportation, granted by the said acts, so far as relates to articles being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any country, for the time being, in amity with His Majesty, and from the ports of which the British flag is not excluded, imported direct from such country into any port or place of the United Kingdom, either in British ships or in ships of the country of which such articles are the growth, produce, or manufacture.

And His Majesty is further pleased, with the advice aforesaid, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that the said duties on exportation be suspended, as to all goods, wares, or merchandise, which have been or may be condemned as prize, until further order shall be made therein.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Canning.

Sir:

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, December 28, 1808.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 24th instant, communicating an order passed by His Majesty in council on Wednesday last, and have transmitted copies of these papers to my Government.

It is perfectly true, as the concluding paragraph of your letter supposes me to believe, that the United States have viewed with great sensibility the pretension of this Government (which, as a pretension, the present order plainly re-asserts, without much, if at all, modifying its practical effect) to levy imposts upon their commerce outward and inward, which the orders in council of the last year were to constrain to pass through British ports.

But it is equally true, that my Government has constantly protested against the entire system with which that pretension was connected, and has, in consequence, required the repeal, not the modification, of the British orders in council.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. PINKNEY.

Extract:—Mr. Pinkney to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, March 10, 1809.

I have received from Mr. Canning a notification of blockade, of which a copy is enclosed.

[Referred to in Mr. Pinkney's despatch of March 10, 1809.]

FOREIGN OFFICE, March 8, 1809.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's commands to acquaint Mr. Pinkney that His Majesty has judged it expedient to establish the most rigorous blockade of the isles of Mauritius and Bourbon; Mr. Pinkney is, therefore, requested to apprise the American consuls and merchants residing in England, that the isles above mentioned are, and must be, considered as being in a state of blockade, and that, from this time, all the measures authorized by the law of nations, and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different neutral Powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to all vessels attempting to violate the said blockade after this notice.

The undersigned requests Mr. Pinkney to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

GEORGE CANNING.

Extract:—Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, May 1, 1809.

I had the honor to receive, on the 25th of March, the letter of your predecessor of the 10th of February; and, on the 15th of last month, Lieutenant Reed delivered to me your letter of the 15th of March.

Upon the receipt of your letter of the 15th of March, it became my obvious duty to ask a conference with Mr. Canning. It took place accordingly on Monday, the 17th of April.

At the close of the conference, he told me that my communications were such as would require reflection, and would naturally make him anxious to see me again; and that he would fix as early a day as possible, and give me notice.

Our next interview took place on the 27th of April.

Mr. Canning read the new order in council, and then proceeded very briefly to suggest the practical alterations which it would introduce.

I thought I should best discharge my duty by forbearing useless discussion, and by receiving it as it was offered, but without making myself a party to it; an actual improvement, capable of future extension, under the auspices of just and friendly sentiments and enlightened policy.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney.

SIR:

FOREIGN OFFICE, April 30, 1809.

When I had the honor to transmit to you, on the 24th of December last, the orders in council passed on the 21st of that month, I referred to that passage of my official note of the 23d of September, 1808, in which I stated to you that "it is not improbable, indeed, that some alterations may be made in the orders in council, as they are at present framed—alterations calculated not to abate their spirit or impair their principle, but to adapt them more exactly to the different state of things which has fortunately grown up in Europe, and to combine all practicable relief to neutrals with a more severe pressure upon the enemy;" and I at the same time explained to you the grounds on which the design of the larger alterations which had been in contemplation in September was for the time laid aside. By the order of council, which I have now the honor to enclose to you, that design, as explained in my official note of September 23, is fully carried into execution.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE CANNING.

WILLIAM PINKNEY, Esq.

At the Court at the Queen's Palace, the 26th of April, 1809: Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in council.

Whereas, His Majesty, by his order in council of the 11th of November, 1807, was pleased, for the reasons assigned therein, to order that "all the ports and places of France and her allies, or of any other country at war with His Majesty, and all other ports or places in Europe from which, although not at war with His Majesty, the British flag is excluded, and all ports or places in the colonies belonging to His Majesty's enemies, should from henceforth be subject to the same restrictions in point of trade and navigation as if the same were actually blockaded in the most strict and rigorous manner;" and also to prohibit "all trade in articles which are the produce or manufactures of the said countries or colonies;" and whereas, His Majesty, having been nevertheless desirous not to subject those countries which were in alliance or in amity with His Majesty to any greater inconvenience than was absolutely inseparable from carrying into effect His Majesty's just determination to counteract the designs of his enemies, did make certain exceptions and modifications expressed in the said order of the 11th of November, and in certain subsequent orders of the 25th of November, declaratory of the aforesaid order of the 11th of November and of the 18th of December, 1807, and the 30th of March, 1808:

And whereas, in consequence of divers events which have taken place since the date of the first-mentioned order, affecting the relations between Great Britain and the territories of other Powers, it is expedient that sundry parts and provisions of the said orders should be altered or revoked:

His Majesty is therefore pleased, by and with the advice of his privy council, to revoke and annul the said several orders, except as hereinafter expressed; and so much of the said several orders, except as aforesaid, is hereby revoked accordingly. And His Majesty is pleased, by and with the advice of his privy council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that all the ports and places as far north as the river Ems, inclusively, under the Government styling itself the Kingdom of Holland, and all ports and places under the Government of France, together with the colonies, plantations, and settlements in the possession of those Governments, respectively, and all ports and places in the northern parts of Italy, to be reckoned from the ports of Orbitello and Pesaro, inclusively, shall continue, and be subject to the same restrictions, in point of trade and navigation, without any exception, as if the same were actually blockaded by His Majesty's naval forces in the most strict and rigorous manner; and that every vessel trading from and to the said countries or colonies, plantations or settlements, together with all goods and merchandise on board, shall be condemned as prize to the captors.

And His Majesty is further pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, that this order shall have effect from the day of the date thereof with respect to any ship, together with its cargo, which may be captured subsequent to such day, on any voyage which is and shall be rendered legal by this order, although such voyage, at the time of the commencement of the same, was unlawful, and prohibited under the said former orders; and such ships, upon being brought in, shall be released accordingly; and with respect to all ships, together with their cargoes, which may be captured in any voyage which was permitted under the exceptions of the orders above mentioned, but which is not permitted according to the provisions of this order, His Majesty is pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, that such ships and their cargoes shall not be liable to condemnation, unless they shall have received actual notice of the present order before such capture, or, in default of such notice, until after the expiration of the like intervals, from the date of this order, as were allowed for constructive notice in the orders of 25th November, 1807, and the 18th of May, 1808, at the several places and latitudes therein specified.

And the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, and Judges of the Courts of Vice-admiralty, are to give the necessary directions herein as to them may respectively appertain.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, NOVEMBER 8, 1808.

(Confidential.)

NOVEMBER 8, 1808.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The documents communicated with my public message of this day contain such portions of the correspondence therein referred to of the ministers of the United States at Paris and London, as relate to the present state of affairs between those Governments and the United States, and as may be made public. I now communicate, confidentially, such supplementary portions of the same correspondences as I deem improper for publication, yet necessary to convey to Congress full information on a subject of their deliberations so interesting to our country.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Extract:—Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to General Armstrong, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 22, 1807.

The two last letters received from you were of December 24, and January 16.

The decree of November 21, communicated in the first, had previously reached us, and had excited apprehensions which were repressed only by the inarticulate import of its articles, and the presumption that it would be executed in a sense not inconsistent with the respect due the treaty between France and the United States. The explanations given you by the Minister of Marine were seen by the President with much pleasure, and it only remains to learn that they have been confirmed by the express authority of the Emperor. We are the more anxious for this information, as it will fortify the remonstrances which have been presented at London against the British order of January 7th. Should it, contrary to expectation, turn out that the French decree was meant, and is to operate according to the latitude of its terms, you will, of course, have made the proper representations, grounded as well on the principles of public law, as on the express stipulations of the convention of 1800. Nothing, besides, could be more preposterous than to blend with an appeal to neutral rights and neutral nations, a gross infraction of the former, and outrage on the sentiments of the latter, unless it be to invite a species of contest on the high seas, in which the adversary has every possible advantage. But on the more probable supposition that the decree will not be unfavorably expounded, it will be still necessary to press on the French Government a despatch of such orders to their cruisers in every quarter, as will prevent a construction of the decree favorable to their licentious cupidity. The moment your letter was received, the answer of the French Minister of Marine to your note was communicated to General Turreau, with a call on him to transmit it immediately to the French Governors in the West Indies. This he readily engaged to do. But notwithstanding this precaution, there are proofs that the West India privateers have, under color of the edict, committed depredations which will constitute just claims of redress from their Government.

Mr. Erving has forwarded a Spanish decree also, avowedly pursuing the example and the views of the French Emperor. The terms of this decree are even more vague, or rather more broad, than those of the prototype; and if not speedily recalled or corrected, will doubtless extend the scene of spoliations already begun in that quarter; and, of course, thicken the cloud that hangs over the amity of the two nations.

Extract:—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Monroe.

SIR:

PARIS, July 7, 1807.

The accounts you have had of recent captures made by French privateers of American vessels, under cover of the decree of November last, are not correct; at least, if such captures have been made, I know nothing of them; the only captures I have at any time heard of were those made from Porto Ferrajo. They are by no means of recent date, and have all (I believe,) been redressed by the council of prizes. Two of these cases, to which I attended personally, received decisions equally favorable and prompt; interest and damages were given to the plaintiffs, and I know not why decisions equally favorable should not have been given in the other cases. I have within a week been informed by Mr. Erving that he had reason to believe that a French privateer, then in a port of Spain, had plundered American ships, either going to or coming from England, of dry goods to the amount of three hundred dollars. Before any thing could be done in Spain for the recovery of these goods, the ship went to sea, and professedly for the purpose of returning to the port of her armament. Believing her to have arrived there, I put all the evidence I possessed before M. Decrès, who closes his answer with the following assurance. “Your excellency may be assured that, as far as it depends on me, the captains of these vessels, or their owners, shall obtain, if there is ground for it, a prompt and full reparation.”* I quote this to show you that there is no disposition in the minister of this Government to sanction or protect such enterprises upon our commerce. From the uses you may be able to make of the facts, and their relation to your question generally, I subjoin a brief exposition of the construction now given to the November decree. It was, you know, admitted by both ministerial and judicial authorities, that this decree did not infract the provisions of the treaty of 1800, between the United States and France. Still it was contended that vessels of the United States, coming from any port of Great Britain, since the date of the edict, could not be admitted to entry in the ports of France. This rule, without some qualifications, was likely to become mischievous, and I accordingly obtained the following modifications of it, and hope to obtain a further modification, which will render it perfectly harmless. These changes took place as circumstances rose to produce them; for though the necessity for them was both foreseen and represented, it was only upon real, not upon hypothetical cases, that the ministers of His Majesty were willing to act.

1. Vessels leaving ports of the United States before a knowledge of the arrêt had been promulgated there, are not subject to the rule.

2. Vessels not coming directly from a British to a French port are not subject to the rule.

* Votre excellence peut être assurée qu'il ne tiendra pas à moi, que les capitaines de ces navires, ou leurs propriétaires, n'obtiennent, s'il y a lieu, une réparation prompte et pleine.

3. The cargoes of vessels coming directly from a British to a French port, and offered for entry, on proof that the touching of the ship in England, &c. was involuntary, are put in depôt or sequestration, until His Majesty shall have decided on the sufficiency of the proof offered; or they are at once given up to the consignees, on their giving security to abide the decision which shall be ultimately taken by the Emperor in their respective cases. The vessels can go out freely, and without impediment of any kind. The former rule, of which this is an amelioration, was, that ships as well as cargoes, coming under this description, should be sequestered, &c. The further alteration which I have asked, is, the establishment of some principle which shall regulate the kind and degree of proof required with respect to the alleged application of a force majeure, &c.; my own opinion is, that this may best be found in the greater or less correspondence which shall exist between the cargo when shipped in America, and when arrived here. If the correspondence be complete, the evidence ought to be considered as complete also, that they were not in Great Britain for the purposes of commerce; and, not being there for these purposes, the inference is fair, that their going there at all was involuntary. This is a rule the ministers will consent to; whether His Majesty will do so also will be known in a few days. He is expected here about the beginning of August.

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

PARIS, August 3, 1807.

We had yesterday our first audience of the Emperor since his return to Paris. Happening to stand near the minister of Denmark, I overheard His Majesty say to that minister, "So M. Baron, the Baltic has been violated." The minister's answer was not audible to me, nor did it appear to have been satisfactory to the Emperor, who repeated, in a tone of voice somewhat raised and peremptory, "But, sir, the Baltic has been violated." From Mr. Deyer he passed to myself and others, and lastly to the ambassador of Portugal, to whom, it is said, he read a very severe lecture on the conduct of his court. These circumstances go far to justify the whispers that begin to circulate, that an army is organizing to the south for the purpose of taking possession of Portugal, and another to the north for a similar purpose with regard to Denmark; and, generally, that having settled the business of belligerents, with the exception of England, very much to his own liking, he is now on the point of settling that of neutrals in the same way. It was, perhaps, under the influence of this suggestion, that Mr. Deyer, taking me aside, inquired whether any application had been made to me with regard to the projected union of all the commercial States against Great Britain, and on my answering in the negative, he replied, "You are much favored, but it will not last." I give you this detail, not from any importance it has in itself, but from the circumstance of its containing all that I have yet heard in relation to a project highly interesting to the United States, and of which you ought to be immediately apprised.

August 9. Not a syllable has yet been mentioned with regard to the projected union, &c. As far as I can learn, they are satisfied that the course we are pursuing is honest to ourselves, and not dishonest to either of the belligerents.

August 15. We had this morning an audience of the Emperor. The seizure of Copenhagen by the British gave room for a new conversation with the minister of Denmark, in the course of which he stated the British force to have been but ten or twelve thousand men; demanded what had become of the Prince Regent, and asked why the Government had not defended the city? As in the former audience from Baron Deyer he came directly to me, and, after some questions merely personal, he adverted to the outrage committed by the Leopard on the Chesapeake. "This," said he, "is abominable; they have pretended hitherto to visit merchantmen, and that they had a right to do so; but they, even they, have set up no such pretensions with respect to armed ships. They would now arrange it by giving up a right or usage which never existed; but they will arrange it; they are afraid to go to war with your country."

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

MR. MADISON.

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Champagny.

SIR:

PARIS, August 9, 1807.

Your excellency is not unapprised that soon after the promulgation of the imperial decree of the 2d of November last, one of similar character and injunctions was issued by the Prince of Peace, in behalf of His Catholic Majesty. Under this order, sundry vessels belonging to the citizens of the United States have been captured on the high seas, brought into the ports of Spain, and are now before the Court of Admiralty for examination. To this brief statement I subjoin an extract from a letter of the 27th ultimo, from the chargé des affaires of the United States at Madrid, which will show your excellency that the fate of these vessels will depend, not on the construction which might be given to the Spanish decree by the Spanish tribunals, but on the practice which shall have been established by France, under her decree of November last; and that Prince Massirano has accordingly been directed to ask from your excellency such exposition of that decree, and of the practice under it, as shall regulate, on this head, the conduct of Spanish courts and cruisers towards neutral commerce in general. Assured, as I feel myself, that this exposition, whenever given, will not be less friendly and liberal than that already found in the decisions of His Imperial Majesty's council of prizes, and correspondence of his Minister of Marine, viz: that the provisions of the decree in question do not infract any of the rights of commerce stipulated by treaty between France and the United States; it is incumbent on me to pray your excellency, that it (the exposition required) be given as expeditiously as possible, to the end that the legitimate commerce of the United States be relieved from all further annoyance growing out of the doubtful meaning and operation of the Spanish decree aforesaid.

Your excellency will permit me to avail myself of this occasion to recall to your attention the subject of my letter of the 26th of June last. I learn from Antwerp that the cargoes mentioned in that letter are yet under sequestration, and that considerable loss, as well by diminution of price in the articles, as by accumulation of interest and charges, has been already incurred.

Your excellency will do me the honor to accept the assurances of my profound respect.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

His Excellency the PRINCE OF BENEVENTO.

Mr. Champagny (Prince of Benevento) to Mr. Armstrong.

MONSIEUR:

Août 21, 1807.

J'ai reçu la lettre que vous m'avez fait l'honneur de m'adresser le 9 de ce mois, relativement à des bâtimens Américains conduits dans les ports d'Espagne, par suite des dispositions que cette Puissance a prises contre le commerce Anglais, à l'exemple de la France.

Comme l'exécution des mesures maritimes indiquées par le décret impérial du 21 Novembre, 1806, appartient naturellement à son excellence le Ministre de la Marine, et que d'ailleurs il a déjà eu l'honneur de vous adresser de premières observations sur l'application de ce décret, je me suis empressé de lui transmettre votre lettre, et de lui demander les nouvelles explications que vous pouvez désirer. Dès qu'elles m'auront été adressées, j'aurai l'honneur de vous en donner connaissance.

Agréez, monsieur, l'assurance de ma haute considération,

CHAMPAGNY.

Son Ex. le Gen. ARMSTRONG.

Mr. Champagny to Mr. Armstrong.

SIR:

AUGUST 21, 1807.

I have received the letter which you did me the honor of addressing me on the 9th of this month, relative to American vessels carried into ports of Spain, in consequence of the measures taken by that Power against the English commerce, in imitation of France.

As the execution of the maritime measures indicated by the imperial decree of the 21st of November, 1806, rests naturally with his excellency, the Minister of Marine, and that, moreover, he has already had the honor of addressing you some first observations on the application of that decree, I transmitted without delay your letter, and asked from him the new explanations which you might desire. When they shall have been forwarded to me, I will have the honor of informing you of them.

Accept the assurance of my high consideration,

CHAMPAGNY.

His Excellency Gen. ARMSTRONG.

Mr. Armstrong to the French Minister of Exterior Relations.

SIR:

PARIS, September 24, 1807.

I have this moment learned that a new and extended construction, highly injurious to the commerce of the United States, was about to be given to the imperial decree of the 21st of November last. It is therefore incumbent upon me to ask from your excellency an explanation of His Majesty's views in relation to this subject, and, particularly, whether it be His Majesty's intention, in any degree, to infract the obligations of the treaty now subsisting between the United States and the French empire?

I pray your excellency, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

His Excellency the MINISTER OF EXTERIOR RELATIONS.

Mr. Regnier to the Procureur General of the Council of Prizes.

PARIS, le 18 Septembre, 1807.

J'ai soumis à Sa Majesté, l'Empereur et Roi, monsieur, les doutes que s'était formé son excellence le Ministre de la Marine et les Colonies sur l'étendue de quelques dispositions du décret impérial du 21 Novembre, 1806, qui a déclaré les Isles Britanniques en état de blocus. Voici quelles sont les intentions de Sa Majesté sur les points qui avaient mis en question:

1. Les bâtimens armés en guerre, peuvent-ils, en vertu du décret impérial du 21 Novembre dernier, saisir sur les bâtimens neutres, soit les propriétés Anglaises, soit même toutes marchandises provenant de manufactures du territoire Anglais?

Sa Majesté m'a fait connaître que, puis qu'elle avait jugé à propos de n'exprimer aucune exception dans son décret, il n'y avait pas lieu d'en faire dans l'exécution à l'égard de qui que ce pût être.

2. Sa Majesté a sursis à statuer sur la question de savoir si les armemens Français doivent s'emparer des bâtimens neutres qui vont en Angleterre, ou qui en sortent, lors même qu'il n'ont point à bord de marchandises Anglaises.

3. Sur la troisième question, qui était de savoir si les armemens Français sont passibles de la retenue ordonnée par l'article 6 du décret du 21 Novembre, Sa Majesté a déclaré que la disposition de cet article n'était susceptible d'aucune restriction; c'est-à-dire, que la retenue doit avoir lieu sur le produit de toutes les confiscations de marchandises et propriétés qui ont été, ou pourraient être, prononcées en exécution du décret, sans égard au lieu de la saisie ou à la qualité des saisissans.

Vous voudrez bien, monsieur, notifier ces décisions au conseil des prises, les faire consigner sur les registres, et m'accuser la réception de ma lettre.

Récevez, &c. &c.

Le Grand Juge, Ministre de la Justice,

REGNIER.

LE PROCUREUR GENERAL IMPERIAL, Conseil des Prises.

[TRANSLATION.]

PARIS, September 18, 1807.

I have submitted, sir, to His Majesty the Emperor and King, the doubts of his excellency the Minister of Marine and Colonies on the extent of some of the provisions of the imperial decree of November 21, 1806, which has declared the British Islands in a state of blockade. The following are the intentions of His Majesty on the points in question:

1. Can armed vessels, under the imperial decree of the 21st of November last, seize, in neutral vessels, either English property or merchandise proceeding from the manufactures of the English territories?

His Majesty notifies me, that since he had not thought proper to express any exception in his decree, there is no ground to make any in the execution, with respect to any thing whatsoever.

2. His Majesty has not decided the question, whether French armed vessels may possess themselves of neutral vessels going to or from England, although they have no English merchandise on board.

3. On the question whether French armed vessels are subject to the deduction ordered by the sixth article of the decree of November 21, His Majesty has declared that the provision of that article was not susceptible of any restriction; that is to say, that the deduction must take effect on the proceeds of all confiscations of merchandise and property which have been or may be pronounced in execution of the decree, without regard to the place of seizure or character of the captors.

You will be so good, sir, as to notify these decisions to the council of prizes, to have them entered in the registers, and to acknowledge the receipt of my letter.

Accept, &c. &c.

The Grand Judge, Minister of Justice,

REGNIER.

IMPERIAL PROCUREUR GENERAL of the Council of Prizes.

Mr. Champagny to Mr. Armstrong.

MONSIEUR:

FONTAINEBLEAU, le 7 Octobre, 1807.

Vous m'avez fait l'honneur de m'inviter le 24 Septembre à vous transmettre quelques éclaircissemens sur l'exécution du décret de blocus des isles Britanniques envers les bâtimens des Etats Unis.

Les dispositions de tous les réglemens et de tous les traités relatives à l'état de blocus ont paru applicables à la circonstance actuelle, et il résulte des explications qui viennent de m'être adressées par le procureur general impérial près le conseil des prises, que Sa Majesté a regardé tout bâtiment neutre, sortant des ports Anglais, avec des cargaisons de marchandises Anglaises, ou d'origine Anglaise, comme pouvant être valablement saisi par les bâtimens de guerre Français.

Le décret de blocus est rendu depuis près d'onze mois; les principales Puissances d'Europe, loin de réclamer contre ses dispositions, les ont adoptées. Elles ont reconnu qu'il fallait en rendre l'exécution complete pour la rendre plus efficace; et il a paru qu'il était facile d'accorder ces mesures avec la conservation des traités, sur-tout dans un temps où les infractions de l'Angleterre contre les droits de toutes les Puissances maritimes rendent leurs intérêts communs, et tendent à les unir pour le soutien de la même cause.

Recevez, monsieur, &c. &c.

CHAMPAGNY.

Son Exc. le Gén. ARMSTRONG, Min. Plén. des Etats Unis.

[TRANSLATION.]

SIR:

FONTAINEBLEAU, October 7, 1807.

You did me the honor on the 24th of September, to request me to send you some explanations as to the execution of the decree of blockade of the British islands as to vessels of the United States.

The provisions of all the regulations and treaties relative to a state of blockade have appeared applicable to the existing circumstance; and it results, from the explanations which have been addressed to me by the imperial procureur general of the council of prizes, that His Majesty has considered every neutral vessel going from English ports, with cargoes of English merchandise, or of English origin, as lawfully seizable by French armed vessels.

The decree of blockade has been now issued eleven months; the principal Powers of Europe, far from protesting against its provisions, have adopted them. They have perceived that its execution must be complete to render it more effectual, and it has seemed easy to reconcile these measures with the observance of treaties, especially at a time when the infractions by England of the rights of all maritime Powers render their interest common, and tend to unite them in support of the same cause.

Accept, &c. &c.

CHAMPAGNY.

His Ex. Gen. ARMSTRONG, Min. Plen. of the United States.

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

PARIS, November 12, 1807.

It was not till yesterday that I received from Mr. Skipwith a copy of the decree of the council of prizes in the case of the Horizon. This is the first unfriendly decision of that body, under the arrêt of the 21st of November, 1806. In this case, and on the petition of the defendant, the court has recommended the restitution of the whole cargo. I did not, however, think proper to join in asking, as a favor, what I believed myself entitled to as a right. I subjoin a copy of my note to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and am, sir, your most obedient and very humble servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

[Enclosed in Mr. Armstrong's letter of November 12.]

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Champagny.

SIR:

PARIS, November 12, 1807.

The document to which these observations are prefixed will inform your excellency than an American ship, trading under the protection of the laws of nations, and of particular treaties, and suffering shipwreck on the coast of France, has recently been seized by His Majesty's officers, and adjudged by his council of prizes as follows, viz: "Our council puts at liberty the American vessel, the Horizon, shipwrecked the 30th of May last, near Morlaix; and, consequently, orders that the amount arising from the sale legally made of the wreck of the said vessel, together with the merchandise of the cargo, which, according to an estimate made in presence of the overseers of the administrations of the marine and custom-house shall have been acknowledged not to proceed from English manufactures, nor from English territory, shall be restored to Captain McClure, without deducting any other expenses than those relative to the sale; and with regard to the other merchandise of the cargo, which, from the result of the said estimate, shall be acknowledged to come from manufactures, or English territory, by virtue of the fifth article of the decree of the 21st of November, 1806, they shall be confiscated for the use of the State; the whole to be sold by the forms prescribed in the regulations; and the application of the product to be made in conformity to the arrangements of the said decree, deduction being made for the expense of saving the goods, and that of the support of the crew, until the day that the captain shall receive the notification of the present decision."

The reasons upon which this decision are founded are at once so new and so alarming to the present friendly relations of the two Powers, that I cannot but discuss them with a freedom in some degree proportioned to my sense of their novelty and importance.

"Considering," says the council, "first, that the neutrality of the ship and cargo was sufficiently established, the whole ought to be restored, (agreeably to the provisions of the convention of the 30th of September, 1800,) provided no merchandise of English origin had been found in her, and, of course, that she had not been brought within the limits of the imperial decree of the 21st of November, 1806."

Here is an open and unqualified admission that the ship was found within the rules prescribed by the convention of 1800; that, according to these rules, her cargo and herself ought to have been restored; and that such would have been the fact, but for the operation of the decree of the 21st of November, 1806.

In the letter your excellency did me the honor to write to me on the 7th of October last, you thought it "easy to reconcile the obligations of this decree with the preservation of those arising from treaties." It was not for me to examine the means by which this reconciliation was to be effected: they no doubt fully existed, and yet exist, in His Majesty's good pleasure; and taking for granted this fact, I saw in the opinion nothing but proofs of friendly dispositions and pledges that these were not to be either wantonly destroyed or diminished. How inauspicious, however, to its authority, and the consolations derived from it, is this recent act of the council of prizes!—an act which explicitly acknowledges the opposite characters and conflicting injunctions of these two instruments; and which, of course, draws after it considerations the most serious to the Government of the United States.

The second reason of the council is, "that the decree declaring (British) merchandise good prize had principally in view captures made on the high seas; but that the question, whether shipwrecked goods ought to be restored or confiscated, having always been judged under the fourteenth article of the regulation of the 26th of July, 1778, and, according to their character, (which might have rendered lawful, or have even commanded their seizure at sea,) there is no room to introduce, in this case, any new distinction, which, however philanthropic it may appear, has not as yet been adopted as a rule by any maritime nation."

The doctrine resisted in this passage, and which inculcates the duty of extending protection to the unfortunate, is not new to His Majesty's council of prizes. They have themselves consecrated it by their decision of the 5th of March, 1800. By that decision they restored an enemy's ship, (the Diana) on the single reason, that "she had been compelled to enter a French port by stress of weather." "I should equally fail," says the attorney general, "in respect to myself and to the council, before whom I have the honor to represent the Government, were I not to maintain a principle consecrated by our laws, and by those of all nations. In all circumstances, let the loyalty of the French Government serve as the basis of your decisions. Prove yourselves at once generous and just; your enemies will know and respect your magnanimity." Such was the principle adopted by the council in the year 1800, and in the case of an enemy's ship; yet we are now told that this very principle, so honorable to the court, to the nation, and to human nature, is utterly unknown to all maritime people. And on what occasion do we hear this? When an enemy's ship is again thrown on the French coast? No: it has been reserved for the wreck of a neutral and a friendly vessel! for a ship of the United States! It is not denied, that, had this ship escaped the rocks and made the port of Morlaix, the only inhospitality to which she would have been exposed (under the most rigorous interpretation of the law in question) would have been that of being ordered again to sea. Has, then, the misfortune of shipwreck so far altered her condition, as to expose her to the injury of confiscation also? and is this among the principles which the defender of maritime rights means to consecrate by his power and his wisdom? It is impossible.

The third reason of the council is, "that the application of the fifth article aforesaid, in as far as it concerns the Americans and other nations, is the result both of the general expressions of that very article, and of the communication recently made by his excellency, the grand judge, concerning the primitive intention of the sovereign."

This reason will be found to be substantially answered in my reply to reason No. 5 of the council. It will be seen that the opinion given here that "the application of article fifth of the imperial decree, to American commerce, is the result of the general expressions of that very article," was not the opinion of the council on the 5th of March last, when they judged the case of the Hibernia. They then declared, in totidem verbis, that the decree "said nothing of its own influence on the convention of 1800" between the United States and France.

The fourth reason of the council is, "that the expedition in question having certainly been made with full knowledge of the said decree, no objection can be drawn, with any propriety, from the general rules forbidding a retrospective action, nor, even in this particular case, from the posterior date of the act in which the sovereign decides the question; since that act sprung from his supreme wisdom, not as an interpretation of a doubtful point, but as a declaration of an anterior and positive disposition."

A distinction is here attempted to be taken between the interpretation of a doubtful point and the declaration of an anterior and positive rule. This distinction cannot be maintained: for, if the rule had been positive, there would have been no occasion for the declaration. Neither the Minister of Marine, nor the council of prizes, could have had any doubts on the subject; the execution of the decree would have been prompt and peremptory; nor would a second act on the part of His Majesty, after the lapse of twelve months, have been necessary to give operation to the first. Need I appeal to your excellency's memory for the facts on which these remarks turn? You know that doubts did exist. You know that there was, under them, much hesitation in pronouncing. You know that, as late as the 9th of August, I sought an explanation of the decree in question; and that even then your excellency (who was surely a competent and legitimate organ of His Majesty,) did not think yourself prepared to give it. The conclusion is inevitable. His Majesty's answer, transmitted to the court of prizes on the 18th of September last, through the medium of the grand judge, was in the nature of an interpretation, and, being so, could not, without possessing a retroactive quality, apply to events many months anterior in date to itself.

The fifth reason of the council, and the last which enters into my present view of the subject, is, "that, though one of the principal agents of His Majesty had given a contrary opinion, of which the council had at no period partaken, this opinion being that of an individual, could not, whatever consideration its author may merit, balance the formal declaration given in the name of His Majesty himself; and that, if the communication of this opinion had, as is alleged, given room to and served as a basis for many American shipments, and particularly of the one in question, this circumstance, which may call for the indulgence of His Majesty, in a case in which the confiscation is entirely to the advantage of the State, does not prevent a council, rigid in its duty, to pronounce in conformity to the decree of the 21st of November, and of the declaration which followed it."

It would appear from this paragraph that, not finding it easy to untie the knot, the council had determined to cut it. Pressed by the fact that an interpretation of the decree had been given by a minister of His Majesty, specially charged with its execution, they would now escape from this fact, and from the conclusions to which it evidently leads, by alleging, 1st, That at no time had the council partaken of the opinion given by the minister; and, 2d, That this opinion, being that of an individual, could not possess either the force or the authority of one truly ministerial.

It appears to me, as I think it will appear to your excellency, that the council have, in these statements, been less correct than is usual to them on similar occasions. If, as they now assert, they have never partaken of the minister's opinion; if they have never even hesitated on the question, whether the decree of November did or did not derogate from the treaty of 1800, why, I ask, suspend the American cases generally; or why decide as they did in the case of the Hibernia? If I mistake not, we find in this case the recognition of the very principle laid down by the Minister of Marine. That officer says, "In my opinion, the November decree does not work any change in the rules at present observed with respect to neutral commerce, and, consequently, none in the convention of the 8th Vendemiaire, year 9." And what says the council? "Admitting that this part of the cargo (the rum and ginger,) was of British origin, the dispositions of the November decree, [which contain nothing with regard to their own influence over the convention of the 8th Vendemiaire, year 9,] evidently cannot be applied to a ship leaving America on the 6th of the same month of November; and, of course, cannot have authorized her capture in the moment she was entering the neutral port of her destination." We have here three distinct grounds of exemption from the effects of the November decree:

1st. The entire silence of that decree, with regard to its own influence over the convention of 1800.

2d. The early period at which the ship left the United States; and,

3d. The neutral character of the port to which she was destined. If such, sir, were the principles admitted by the council on the 25th of March last, with what correctness can it be now said, "that at no period have they partaken of the opinion of the minister?"

The second fact asserted by the council is, that the interpretation of the decree in question, given on the 24th of December, 1806, was private, not public; or, in other words, that it was the interpretation of the man, not that of the minister, and, as such, cannot outweigh the more recent declaration coming directly from His Majesty himself.

On the comparative weight of those declarations I shall say nothing, nor shall I do more to repel the first part of the insinuation, (that the minister's declaration was that only of the individual,) than to submit to your excellency my letter of the 20th of December, 1806, claiming from that minister an official interpretation of the decree in question, and his answer of the 24th of the same month, giving to me the interpretation demanded.

To your excellency, who, as late as the 21st of August last, considered the Minister of Marine as the natural organ of His Majesty's will, in whatever regarded the decree aforesaid, and who actually applied to him for information relating to it, this allegation of the council of prizes, and the reasoning founded upon it, cannot but appear very extraordinary, and will justify me in requesting that His Majesty may be moved to set aside the decision in question, on the ground of error in the opinion of the council.

If, in support of this conclusion, I have drawn no arguments from the treaty of 1800, nor from the laws of nations, your excellency will not be at a loss to assign to this omission its true cause. It would surely have been a useless formality to appeal to authorities, not only practically, but even professedly extinct. In the letter of the Minister of Justice of the 18th of September, we are told by His Majesty himself, that, "since he had not judged proper to make any exception in the letter of his decree, there was no room to make any in its execution;" and in the report of your excellency's predecessor, of the 20th of November, 1806, we have these memorable words:

"England has declared these places blockaded, before which she had not a single ship of war.

"She has done more; for she has declared in a state of blockade places which all her assembled forces were incapable of blockading—immense coasts, and a vast empire.

"Afterwards, drawing from a chimerical right, and from an assumed fact, the consequence that she might justly make her prey of every thing going to the places laid under interdiction by a simple declaration of the British Admiralty, and of every thing arising therefrom, and carrying this doctrine into effect, she has alarmed neutral navigators, and driven them to a distance from ports whither their interests attracted them, and which the law of nations authorized them to frequent.

"Thus it is that she has turned to her own profit, and to the detriment of Europe, but more particularly of France, the audacity with which she mocks at all rights, and insults even reason itself.

"Against a Power which forgets to such a pitch all ideas of justice and all humane sentiments, what can be done but to forget them for an instant one's self?"

Words cannot go further to show the extinguished authority, in the one case, of the treaty subsisting between the United States and His Imperial Majesty, and, in the other, of the law of nations; to appeal to them, therefore, would be literally appealing to the dead.

Accept, sir, &c. &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

To His Excellency the MINISTER OF FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

PARIS, December 1, 1807.

I have this moment received a letter from His Majesty's Minister of Foreign Relations, of which I subjoin a copy; and am, sir, with very high consideration, your most obedient and most humble servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

[Enclosed in the above.]

Mr. Champagny to General Armstrong.

SIR:

MILAN, November 24, 1807.

The execution of the measures taken against the English commerce has frequently caused reclamations on your part. The intention of His Majesty, without doubt, is, that every particular abuse may be repressed; but the Federal Government cannot make any complaint against the measures themselves; and while the United States allow that their vessels may be visited by England, that she may drag them into her ports and turn them from their destination; while they do not oblige England to respect their flag and the merchandise which it covers; while they permit that Power to apply to them the absurd rules of blockade which it has set up, with the view of injuring France; they bind themselves, by that tolerance towards England, to allow also the application of the measures of reprisals which France is obliged to employ against her. His Majesty regrets, without doubt, to have been forced to recur to such measures: he knows all that the commercial classes may have to suffer in consequence of them, particularly those who, having habitual relations with England, using a common language, and often mixing their interests, might more frequently occasion an apprehension of some commercial connivance with the English, inasmuch as they would have greater facilities in covering it. This circumstance made it necessary to use towards them precautions more exact, and an unceasing watchfulness, in order not to be exposed to abuses which might result from a less constant vigilance. But it is not to France, it is to England, that these inconveniences to individuals ought to be imputed. She it is who has given the example of measures unjust and illegal, and infringing on the sovereignty of nations. To oblige her to renounce them, it has become necessary to combat her with her own arms; in violating the rights of all nations she has united them all by a common interest; and it is for them to have recourse to force against her, to forbid her the search (la visite) of their vessels, the taking away of their crews, and to declare themselves against measures which wound their dignity and their independence. The unjust pretensions of England will be kept up as long as those whose rights she violates are silent; and what Government has had more to complain of against her than the United States? All the difficulties which have given rise to your reclamations, sir, would be removed with ease, if the Government of the United States, after complaining in vain of the injustice and violations of England, took with the whole continent the part of guarantying itself therefrom. England has introduced into the maritime war an entire disregard for the rights of nations; it is only in forcing her to a peace that it is possible to recover them. On this point the interest of all nations is the same, all have their honor and their independence to defend.

Accept, sir, &c.

CHAMPAGNY.

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

PARIS, December 27, 1807.

I forward by Mr. McElhony a copy of a second and very extraordinary decree of this Government with regard to neutral commerce. Whether it be meant to stimulate Great Britain to the commission of new outrages, or to quicken us in repelling those she has already committed, the policy is equally unwise, and so decidedly so, that I know not a single man of consideration who approves of it. It is, however, not less true that it is as difficult to find one who will hazard an objection to it. Td, who in this way is permitted to go further than any other person, dare not avow his opinion of it, nor (bad as he thinks it) will he do more than state that the present moment would appear to dictate some modifications. To this point he stands engaged to go, and I wait the result with much anxiety. The Emperor is expected here on the last day of the month.

I have the honor to be, with very great respect, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

P. S.—As Mr. Lee thinks it probable that both the copies of my despatch of the 15th November are taken to England, I send a third copy of it with this. There is no longer a doubt that the Emperor wished to get hold of the royal family of Portugal. There is a degree of wickedness that makes even scoundrels honest. This is verified in the conduct of Aranjó. In every other act of his life he betrayed his master; in this he served, and perhaps saved him. The assailant confided to him his whole secret, and, abandoned as he was, he could not lend himself to its execution.

I have seen a letter from the Minister of Marine, in which he says, "The vessels of friendly and allied Powers now in the ports of the empire shall not be permitted to depart until further orders." The professed object of this measure is "to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy;" the real object to induce the British to arrest all such vessels [of ours] as may be within their grasp. Thus the two rivals are to go on endeavoring which can most outrage law and justice. The letter above mentioned was written to the minister of Denmark. A similar notice has not yet been sent to me: it is therefore possible that His Majesty's care is restricted to vessels of Powers both friendly and allied; that it is a squeeze purely fraternal. If so, we may escape for this time. I state this, however, as a thing barely possible.

I am, sir, with very high consideration, your most obedient servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG

Extract:—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, January 22, 1808.

The conjecture offered in my last letter, with regard to the embargo of our vessels, turns out to be correct; the order was intended to be confined to the vessels of friendly and allied Powers, or Powers having both these characters; the word neutral crept into it merely by mistake. An extract from the minister's letter to me on this subject is as follows, to wit: "No order has been given to retain neutral vessels in the ports of the empire; and as soon as I knew of the error committed in this respect, I hastened to correct it, and to notify expressly that neutral vessels, and particularly those of the United States, should enjoy an entire freedom." I subjoin, also, a copy of a letter, in answer to the remonstrances I have made against the new arrê of the 17th of December last; by this you will see that the captures under this decree, like those under that of November, 1806, are in the nature of detention, and that, in the contingency of an exclusion of British commerce from the United States, the ships and cargoes will be immediately released. I expect, from one moment to another, the Emperor's orders for immediately raising all the sequestrations which have taken place under the November decree.

[Referred to in Mr. Armstrong's despatch of January 22, 1808.]

Translation of a letter from Mr. Champagny to General Armstrong, dated

SIR:

PARIS, January 15, 1808.

The different notes which you have done me the honor to address to me have been laid before His Majesty.

The proceedings of England towards all Governments are so contrary to the law of nations, and all the rules constantly observed even among enemies, that no recourse against this Power is any longer to be found in the ordinary means of repression. In order to annoy her, it is become necessary to turn against her the arms which she makes use of herself; and, if transient inconveniences result therefrom, it is to her alone that they are to be imputed. Since England respects no laws, how could they be respected with regard to her? The maritime laws which she violates, ought they still to be a protection to her? And if some Powers tolerate the infractions committed on their independence, could they have the right to require that France alone should restrain herself within limits which her enemy has every where overleaped?

The United States, more than any other Power, have to complain of the aggressions of England. It has not been enough for her to offend against the independence of their flag, nay, against that of their territory and of their inhabitants, by attacking them even in their ports, by forcibly carrying away their crews; her decrees of the 11th November have made a fresh attack on their commerce and on their navigation, as they have done on those of all other Powers.

In the situation on which England has placed the continent, especially since her decrees of the 11th November, His Majesty has no doubt of a declaration of war against her by the United States, whatever transient sacrifices war may occasion; they will not believe it consistent either with their interest or dignity to acknowledge the monstrous principle and the anarchy which that Government wishes to establish on the seas. If it be useful and honorable for all nations to cause the true maritime law of nations to be re-established, and to avenge the insults committed by England against every flag, it is indispensable for the United States, who, from the extent of their commerce, have oftener to complain of these violations. War exists, then, in fact, between England and the United States; and His Majesty considers it as declared from the day on which England published her decrees. In that persuasion, His Majesty, ready to consider the United States as associated with the cause of all the Powers who have to defend themselves against England, has not taken any definitive measures towards the American vessels which may have been brought into our ports; he has ordered that they should remain sequestered until a decision may be had thereon, according to the disposition which shall have been expressed by the Government of the United States.

Extract:—Mr. Madison to Mr. Armstrong.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 8, 1808.

Your letters and communications by Doctor Bullus were duly delivered on the 14th day of December; the same conveyance brought a copy of the sentence pronounced by the French prize court in the case of the Horizon, giving a judicial effect to the decree of November 21, 1806, as expounded in the answer of Mr. Champagny to your letter of the 12th November, 1807.

Whilst the French Government did not avow or enforce a meaning of the decree of November, 1806, in relation to the United States extending its purview beyond the municipal limits, it could not, in strictness, be regarded as an infraction either of our neutral or conventional rights; and, consequently, did not authorize more than a demand of reasonable explanations of its doubtful import, or friendly expostulations with respect to the rigor and suddenness of its innovations.

The case is now essentially changed. A construction of the decree is avowed and executed, which violates as well the positive stipulations of the convention of September 30, 1800, as the incontestable principles of public law. And the President charges you to superadd, to whatever representations you may have previously made, a formal remonstrance in such terms as may be best calculated either to obtain a recall of the illegal measure, so far as it relates to the United States, or to have the effect of leaving, in full force, all the rights accruing to them from a failure to do so.

That the execution of local laws against foreign nations on the high seas is a violation of the rights of the former and the freedom of the latter, will probably not be questioned. A contrary principle would, in fact, imply the same exclusive dominion over the entire ocean as is enjoyed within the limits of the local sovereignty, and a degradation of every other nation from its common rights and equal rank.

If it be contended that the decree, as a retaliation on the other belligerent, at the expense of neutral nations, is justified by a culpable acquiescence in the prior measures of that belligerent operating through neutrals, you will be able to deny such acquiescence; and to urge, moreover, that, on every supposition, the retaliating measure could not be justly enforced in relation to neutrals, without allowing them, at least, a reasonable time for choosing between due measures against the prior wrong and an acquiescence in both. The copy of the representations to the British Government, through its minister here, on the subject of its orders of January, 1807, will at once disprove an acquiescence on the part of the United States, and explain the grounds on which the late extension of the French decree of November, 1806, is an object of just remonstrance.

The conduct of the French Government in giving this extended operation to its decree, and, indeed, in issuing one with such an apparent or doubtful import against the rights of the sea, is the more extraordinary, inasmuch as the inability to enforce it on that element exhibited the measure in the light of an empty menace, at the same time that it afforded pretexts to her enemy for severe retaliations, for which ample means are found in her naval superiority.

The accumulated dangers to which the illegal proceedings of the belligerent nations have subjected the commerce and navigation of the United States, have at length induced Congress to resort to an embargo on our own vessels, as a measure best fitted for the crisis; being an effectual security for our mercantile property and mariners now at home and daily arriving, and, at the same time, neither a measure nor just cause of war. Copies of this act were soon after its passage transmitted to Mr. Pinkney, with an authority to assure the British Government that it was to be viewed in this light, and that it was not meant to be the slightest impediment to amicable negotiations with foreign Governments. He was requested to avail himself of an opportunity of communicating to you and Mr. Erving this view of the subject; and I hope that you will have been thence enabled to present it to the French Government. Not relying, however, on that indirect opportunity, I send by this another copy of the act, with an instruction from the President, that you make it the subject of such explanations as will guard against any misconception of the policy which led to it. It is strictly a measure of precaution, required by the dangers incident to external commerce, and, being indiscriminate in its terms and operation towards all nations, can give no just offence to any. The duration of the act is not fixed by itself, and will, consequently, depend on a continuance or cessation of its causes, in a degree sufficient, in the judgment of the Legislature, to induce or forbid its repeal. It may be hoped that the inconveniences, felt from it by the belligerent nations may lead to a change of conduct which imposed the inconveniences of it on ourselves. France herself will be a sufferer, and some of her allies far more so. It will be very agreeable to find in that consideration, and still more in her sense of justice, a sufficient motive to an early manifestation of the respect due to our commercial rights. The example would be worthy of the professions which she makes to the world on this subject.

February 18. Since the above was written I have been under a degree of indisposition, which has suspended the proposed continuation of it, and which now will oblige me to be very brief; the more so, as the vessel has been some days detained, which was engaged for the special purpose of conveying public despatches and private letters to Europe.

The delay has enabled me to inform you that Mr. Erskine, a few days ago, communicated, by instructions from his Government, its late decrees of November 11th, and those forming a sequel to them. The communication was accompanied with assurances that much regret was felt by His Britannic Majesty at the necessity which the conduct of his enemy had created for measures so embarrassing to neutral commerce, and that His Majesty would readily follow an example of relinquishing such a course, or even of making relaxations pari passu with his enemy.

Whether these intimations have any reference to the distinction between such parts of the French decree as operate municipally on shore, and such as, operating on the high seas, violate the rights of neutrals, or to a distinction between the former restriction and the late extension of the decree with respect to the United States, Mr. Erskine did not seem authorized to say. The probability is that neither of these distinctions entered into the views of the British cabinet. But it is certainly neither less the duty nor the true policy of the Emperor of the French so to vary his decree as to make it consistent with the rights of neutrals, and the freedom of the seas, and particularly with his positive stipulations to the United States. This may be the more reasonably expected, as nothing can be more clear, as has been already observed, than that the effect of the decree, as far as it can be carried into effect, would not be sensibly diminished by abolishing its operation beyond the limits of the territorial sovereignty.

In remonstrating against the injustice and illegality of the French decree, I am aware that you may be reminded of antecedent injuries to France and her allies through British violations of neutral commerce. The fact cannot be denied, and may be urged with great force, in our remonstrances against the orders to which Great Britain has given a retaliating character, since the French decree might on the same ground be pronounced a retaliation on the preceding conduct of Great Britain. But ought the legitimate commerce of neutrals to be thus the victim and the sport of belligerents contesting with each other the priority of their destructive innovations, and, without leaving either of them to neutrals, even the opportunity or the time for disproving that culpable acquiescence which is made the pretext by both for the wrongs done to them? And I must repeat that, apart from all questions of this nature, the French decree, or at least the illegal extensions of it to the United States, remain chargeable with all the impolicy which has been pointed out.

I find by accounts from Hamburg, Bremen, Holland, and Leghorn, that the trade and property of our citizens have been much vexed by regulations subaltern to those of the original decree of November 21, 1806. How far the complaints are founded on proceedings violating our public rights, or on such as are unfriendly and inequitable towards our citizens who have placed their property within those jurisdictions, you will be able to decide better than we can do at this distance; and the President refers to your own judgment the kind of representation to the French Government which those and other analogous cases may require.

Enclosed is a copy of the answer from the Minister of Marine, to my letter of the 13th instant, in relation to the sale of a part of the cargo of the ship James Adams. It would now appear, that the promises of forbearance made by another Department are applicable only to vessels sequestered in the ports, and not to such as have been captured at sea.

FIFTH DIVISION OF PRIZES, PARIS, February 15, 1808.

I observe to you, moreover, the question now is, not as to a vessel sequestered in port, but as to a prize made at sea, and seized for a contravention of the decree of the 17th December last; that the provisional sale ordered on account of the "average" is for the interest as well of the captured as of the captors, and that it is directed according to the case provided for by the regulation of the 2d Prairial, 11th year.

Extract:—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, February 22, 1808.

Mr. Patterson offers so good a conveyance that I cannot but employ it. Nothing has occurred here since the date of my public despatches (the 17th instant,) to give to our business an aspect more favorable than it then had; but, on the other hand, I have come at the knowledge of two facts, which, I think, sufficiently show the decided character of the Emperor's policy with regard to us: these are, 1st, that in a council of administration held a few days past, when it was proposed to modify the operation of the decrees of November, 1806, and December, 1807, (though the proposition was supported by the whole weight of the council,) he became highly indignant, and declared that these decrees should suffer no change, and that the Americans should be compelled to take the positive character, either of allies or of enemies: 2d; that on the 27th of January last, twelve days after Mr. Champagny's written assurances that these decrees should work no change in the property sequestered until our discussions with England were brought to a close, and seven days before he repeated to me verbally these very assurances, the Emperor had, by a special decision, confiscated two of our ships and their cargoes, (the Julius Henry and *Juniatta) for want merely of a document, not required by any law or usage of the commerce in which they had been engaged. This act was taken, as I am informed, on a general report of sequestered cases, amounting to one hundred and sixty, and which, at present prices, will yield upwards of one hundred millions of francs; a sum the magnitude of which alone renders hopeless all attempts at saving it. Danes, Portuguese, and Americans will be the principal sufferers.

If I am right in supposing that the Emperor has definitively taken his ground, I cannot be wrong in concluding that you will immediately take yours.

* These cases have been referred to the Grand Judge.

Extract:—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, March 9, 1808.

The conversation alluded to in the copy of the letter of _____ did not take place till the 8th instant, when the Emperor declared, that if means could be found to make an exception to the operation of the November decree, such exception should have his consent.

Extract:—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, March 15, 1808.

I stated in my last letter the substance of a declaration made by the Emperor, viz: that if means could be found to except American property from the operation of the decree of November, 1806, without infringing the principles of the decrees, he would immediately make the exception. No time was lost in communicating this declaration to me; and I was invited to point out the means it required, and assured that they should be immediately submitted to His Majesty. Little as I liked the proposition, and much as I doubt the sincerity of the declaration out of which it grew, I could not refuse any agency of mine in rescuing so much of the American property sequestered in the ports of France as should come within this new rule. I accordingly wrote the note, (a copy of which is subjoined to this letter,) pointing out, in a few words, the property to which that rule would apply. This note was put into the Emperor's hand by the Prince of Benevento, who, though six days have now elapsed, has not yet received an answer.

[Note referred to in the extract from Mr. Armstrong's letter of the 15th March, 1808.]

The imperial decree of November, 1806, contains no authority to sequester the cargoes of neutral vessels touching at English ports, and subsequently coming into those of France, excepting in cases in which the captains or supercargoes may have made false declarations. The penalty provided by that decree for offences other than those of false declarations is immediate departure from the empire; and as in these cases no false declarations have been made, nor are alleged to have been made, so no penalty, other than that of departure from the empire can be legally inflicted.

Extract:—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, April 5, 1808.

I received the despatches you did me the honor to address to me by Mr. Lewis, on the 26th ultimo.

Though I had complained often and earnestly of both the principles and operation of the Emperor's decrees of November, 1806, and December, 1807, (having written at least twenty notes on the different cases which have arisen under them,) yet, as the President's orders were express, that, on receipt of your letter, I should superadd, to whatever representations might have been previously made, a formal remonstrance against those decrees, I did not lose a moment in writing and presenting the enclosed note; the terms of which will, I hope, appear to be such as were proper or necessary to the case, and calculated either to obtain a recall of the illegal measures, or to leave in full force the rights accruing to the United States from a failure on the part of France to recall them. To this note I have not yet received an answer, nor have I reason to expect one soon, as the Emperor has left Paris, (it is said for Spain,) and had, at no time before he set out, indicated any alteration in the views which originally produced the decrees in question.

Mr. Pinkney found means (in the return to the continent of M. D'Alopeus) to communicate the President's views on the subject of the general embargo, and particularly the desire he had that it should not be considered as a measure of hostility against any foreign nation. Some explanations of this kind, were, perhaps, necessary in England, where, from the misrepresentations of our own people, the character of the policy was likely to be misunderstood; but as neither the same nor any other reason existed for making them here, none have been offered.

[Enclosed in the preceding despatch.]

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Champagny.

PARIS, April 2, 1808.

Sir:

Having submitted to the Government of the United States copies of the imperial decrees of the 21st of November, 1806, and 17th December, 1807, and of the expositions which your excellency has been pleased, at different times, to give of them, I have recently received the instructions of the President to remonstrate against both the provisions and operation of the said decrees, on the ground of their infracting, as well the positive stipulations of a particular treaty, as the incontestable principles of public law.

In discharging this duty, your excellency will permit me to recall to your remembrance the twelfth and fourteenth articles of the treaty made between the United States and France, on the 30th of September, 1800. These articles provide—

1st. That "it shall be lawful for the citizens of either country to sail with their ships and merchandise (contraband goods always excepted) from any port whatever, to any port of the enemy of the other, and to sail and trade with their ships and merchandise, with perfect security and liberty, from the countries, ports, and places of those who are enemies of both, or of either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatsoever; and to pass not only directly from the places and ports of the enemy aforesaid to neutral ports and places, but also from one place belonging to an enemy to another place belonging to an enemy, whether they be or be not under the jurisdiction of the same Power, unless such ports or places shall be actually blockaded, besieged, or invested."

2d. That "vessels sailing for a port or place belonging to an enemy, without knowing that the same is either besieged, blockaded, or invested, may be turned away from such port or place, but they shall not be detained, nor any part of their cargo (not contraband) confiscated, unless, after notice of such blockade or investment, they shall again attempt to enter; but they shall be permitted to go to any other port or place they shall think proper."

3d. That "free ships shall give a freedom to goods, and that every thing shall be deemed to be free and exempt which shall be found on board the ships belonging to the citizens of either of the contracting parties, although the whole lading, or any part thereof, should appertain to the enemies of either; contraband goods being always excepted."

These stipulations are not more clear in themselves, nor of more indisputable application and authority in the present case, than the injunctions of public law by which they are enforced, viz: That local regulations (excepting by virtue of convention) cannot apply to foreign nations on the high seas, without violating the rights of the one, and the freedom of the other; that blockades can only exist when places are so invested that no serious attempt can be made to approach them without exposing the parties making them to imminent danger; that merchant vessels may be visited without any degradation to the flag of the nation to which they belong, &c. But why multiply proofs of a position which is not denied? Does not the official report of your enlightened predecessor of the 21st of November, 1806, admit the illegitimacy of the original decree? Does it not expressly say, that the doctrines of blockade introduced by England are monstrous and indefensible? and that the practice, like the doctrine, is a mockery of right, and an insult upon reason? After strictures so severe, because so just, what can be said for the policy of France, which differs in nothing from that of England? Has your excellency attempted to defend either the theory or the practice of this policy, on the ground of its conformity to the principles of public law? Or have you done more at any time, or on any occasion, than to seek a justification for it on the bare suggestion that the United States have acquiesced in the measures of England? And how has even this suggestion been maintained? By an exposition of the wrongs inflicted on American commerce! and which have been notoriously practised by all the belligerents in turn. Have not the ships of the United States been encountered by all? Have they not been turned from their original destination? Have they not been dragged into foreign ports for adjudication? Have they not, in several instances, been burnt on the high seas? Is not the argument, founded on this state of things, equally good for either, or for all the belligerents? And can France derive from it rights which do not equally accrue to her enemies? There is, however, another and a better answer to this suggestion, which your excellency has already seen in the letter I had the honor of writing to you on the 16th of February last, viz: that the suggestion is neither well nor plausibly founded; and that the United States neither have submitted, nor will submit, to the usurpations of Great Britain nor to those of any other nation.

Accept, sir, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

His Excellency the MINISTER OF FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Extract:—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, April 12, 1808.

I have detained Mr. Lewis till to-day, on the supposition that my letter of the 2d instant would be answered. This was, however, a mere accommodation to forms, as the absence of the Emperor and of the Minister of Foreign Relations rendered this supposition highly improbable. There being then no public reason for Mr. Lewis's longer stay in Paris, and the permission to the Osage to prosecute her voyage to England not including one to return to France, I have thought it best that he should embark with such despatches as were ready, proceed to Falmouth in England, and thence, after receiving Mr. Pinkney's orders, return with all possible expedition to the United States. He has accordingly been instructed to this effect.

Extract:—Mr. Madison to Mr. Armstrong.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 2, 1808.

Since my last, of which Lieutenant Lewis was the bearer, I have received your several letters of 27th of December, 22d of January, 15th and 17th of February, with their respective enclosures.

That of the 15th of January, from Mr. Champagny to you, has, as you will see by the papers herewith sent, produced all the sensations here which the spirit and style of it were calculated to excite in minds alive to the interests and honor of the nation. To present to the United States the alternative of bending to the views of France against her enemy, or of incurring a confiscation of all the property of their citizens carried into the French prize courts, implied that they were susceptible of impressions by which no independent and honorable nation can be guided; and to prejudge and pronounce for them the effect which the conduct of another nation ought to have on their councils and course of proceeding, had the air at least of an assumed authority, not less irritating to the public feelings. In these lights the President makes it your duty to present to the French Government the contents of Mr. Champagny's letter; taking care, as your discretion will doubtless suggest, that while you make that Government sensible of the offensive tone employed, you leave the way open for friendly and respectful explanations, if there be a disposition to offer them; and for a decision here on any reply which may be of a different character.

Congress closed their session on the 25th ultimo. For a general view of their proceedings, I refer to the series of newspapers heretofore and now forwarded, and to other prints which are added. Among their acts of chief importance is that which vests in the President an authority to suspend, in whole or in part, the embargo laws.

The conditions on which the suspending authority is to be exercised will engage your particular attention. They appeal equally to the justice and the policy of the two great belligerent Powers now emulating each other in violations of both. The President counts on your best endeavors to give to this appeal all the effect possible with the French Government. Mr. Pinkney will be doing the same with that of Great Britain. The relation in which a recall of its retaliating decrees by either Power will place the United States to the other, is obvious, and ought to be a motive to the measure proportioned to the desire which has been manifested by each to produce collisions between the United States and its adversary, and which must be equally felt by each to avoid one with itself.

Should wiser councils or increasing distresses induce Great Britain to revoke her impolitic orders against neutral commerce, and thereby prepare the way for the removal of the embargo, as it applies to her, France could not persist in the illegal part of her decrees, if she does not mean to force a contest with the United States. On the other hand, should she set the example of revocation, Great Britain would be obliged, either by following it to restore to France the full benefit of neutral trade, which she needs, or, by persevering in her obnoxious orders after the pretext for them had ceased, to render collisions with the United States inevitable.

In every point of view, therefore, it is so clearly the sound policy of France to rescind so much at least of her decrees as trespass on neutral rights, and particularly to be the first in taking the retrograde step, that it cannot be unreasonable to expect that it will be immediately taken.

The repeal of her decrees is the more to be expected, above all, if Great Britain should repeal, or be likely to repeal, hers, as the plan of the original decree at Berlin did not extend to a violation of the freedom of the seas, and was restricted to a municipal operation for nearly an entire year, notwithstanding the illegal British orders of January, 1807, and as a return of France to that restricted scope of her plan would so immaterially diminish its operation against the British commerce; that operation being so completely in the power of France on land, and so little in her power on the high seas.

But although we cannot of right demand from France more than a repeal of so much of her decrees as violate the freedom of the seas, and a great point will be gained by a repeal of that part of them, yet, as it may not have the effect of inducing a repeal of the whole illegal system of the British Government, which may seek pretexts or plead a necessity for counteracting the unprecedented and formidable mode of warfare practised against her, it will be desirable that as little room as possible should be left for this remaining danger to the tranquil enjoyment of our commercial rights.

In whatever degree the French Government may be led to change its system, you will lose no time in transmitting the information to this Department and to Mr. Pinkney, and by hired conveyances, if necessary. A correspondent instruction is given to Mr. Pinkney.

It is of the greater importance that you should receive from each other the earliest notice of any relaxations, as each Government is under a pledge to follow such an example by the other. And it is not of less importance that the President or Congress should be acquainted with the facts, that the proceedings here may be accommodated to them.

That you may know the grounds on which the British orders of November have been arranged by this Government, I enclose a copy of the answer to Mr. Erskine's note communicating them, a copy of the note being also enclosed.

The other documents communicated will put you in full possession of the relations of the United States with Great Britain, as resulting from the issue of our general negotiations, and from that of the mission of Mr. Rose.

This despatch is forwarded by Mr. Baker, who takes his passage from Baltimore, in a vessel engaged, as was the Osage which sailed from New York, for the special purpose of public and mercantile correspondences with Europe. She will proceed in the first instance to L'Orient, where she will leave Mr. Baker, and thence proceed with despatches for Mr. Pinkney to Falmouth, where she will remain a few days to receive communications from him: she will then return to L'Orient, in order to bring back Mr. Baker, with your communications.

Extract:—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

PARIS, June 25, 1808.

The St. Michael arrived at L'Orient on the 1st instant, and, like the Osage, was immediately put under sequestration. It was not till the 8th that Mr. Baker arrived here.

The remonstrance ordered, with respect to the terms of Mr. Champagny's letter of the 15th of January, shall be executed the moment the Prince of Benevento returns from Valençay, and I hope in a way which, while it makes the French Government sensible of the offensiveness of those terms, will not obstruct the road to friendly and respectful explanations on its part.

To give this a chance of finding Mr. Livingston at Bordeaux, I must close it here.

With very high respect, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

J. MADISON, Esq., Secretary of State.

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

PARIS, July 18, 1808.

I avail myself of the detention of the Arcturus, to transmit copies of two letters which I have written to M. de Champagny; the one in execution of the President's orders with regard to the offensive terms employed by that minister in his note of the 15th of January last; the other demanding from him, on the part of His Government, an avowal or disavowal of the conduct of Rear Admiral Baudin in burning or otherwise destroying, on the high seas, four American ships and their cargoes.

I have the honor to be, sir, with very high consideration, your most obedient and very humble servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

JAMES MADISON, Esq., Secretary of State.

[Referred to in Mr. Armstrong's despatch of 18th July.]

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Champagny.

SIR:

PARIS, July 10, 1808.

Your excellency will see, by the enclosed extracts from two letters which His Majesty's Minister of Marine has done me the honor to address to me on the 18th of April and 13th of June last, that the property taken from the four American ships destroyed by Rear Admiral Baudin has been placed under the jurisdiction of the Imperial Council of Prizes, to be judged by it, as a case of ordinary capture.

To your excellency it will be unnecessary to remark that, whatever may be the decision of the council in relation to the merchandise which has been saved, the case presents a question of much higher import, and entirely beyond the jurisdiction of a maritime court, viz. the kind and degree of reparation which shall be due for the ships and merchandise which have been destroyed. And, by way of opening this subject, your excellency will permit me to ask whether His Majesty's Government does or does not justify the conduct of Rear Admiral Baudin in burning or otherwise destroying, on the high seas, the ships and merchandise of a neutral and friendly Power?

I pray your excellency, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

M. CHAMPAGNY.

[Referred to in Mr. Armstrong's letter of July 18.]

Extract:—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Champagny.

SIR:

PARIS, July 4, 1808.

It has been made the duty of the undersigned to bring to the view of the French Government an official note addressed to him, on the 15th of January last, by His Majesty's Minister of Exterior Relations, and which, in the opinion of the President, is calculated to derogate from the rights of the United States, as an independent nation. The note is in the following words, viz:

(See Mr. Champagny's letter of the 15th of January, 1808, page 244.)

On this note the undersigned would remark—

1st. That the United States have a right to elect their own policy with regard to England, as they have with regard to France, and that it is only while they continue to exercise this right, without suffering any degree of restraint from either Power, that they can maintain the independent relation in which they stand to both: whence, it follows, that, to have pronounced, in the peremptory tone of the preceding note, the effects which the measures of the British Government ought to have produced on their counsels and conduct, was a language less adapted to accomplish its own object than to offend against the respect due from one independent nation to another; and,

2dly. That the alternative to be found in the last paragraph, and which leaves the United States to choose between an acquiescence in the views of France against Great Britain, and a confiscation of all American property sequestered by order of His Imperial Majesty, is equally offensive to both Governments; to France, as it would impute to her a proposition founded in wrong to individuals; and to the United States, as it would imply on their part a subjection to pecuniary interests totally inconsistent with their principles, and highly dishonorable to their character.

His excellency will be persuaded that the President, in directing the undersigned to make this representation, had no object in view beyond that of seeking an explanation, which cannot but tend to promote the harmony of the two Powers.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

His Excellency the MINISTER OF FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Armstrong.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 21, 1808.

Herewith you will receive a copy of the papers relating to one of the vessels which were destroyed at sea by the French frigates returning from the West Indies. I observe that, in your letter to Mr. Champagny of the 2d of April, you have incidentally noticed this occurrence. If ample reparation should not have been made to the sufferers, the President thinks it proper that, as their cases become authenticated, you should present them in terms which may awaken the French Government to the nature of the injury and the demands of justice. The burning of neutral vessels detained on the high seas is the most distressing of all the modes by which belligerents exert force contrary to right, and, in proportion as it is destitute of apology, ought at least to be the promptitude and amplitude of the redress.

If it be contended that the destruction in these cases proceeded solely from the danger that otherwise intelligence might reach a pursuing or hovering force, it may be answered, that, if such a plea were of greater avail, it would only disprove an hostility of intention, without diminishing the obligation to indemnify, on the most liberal scale, the injured individuals. It may be added, that, if the outrage on the individuals was not meant as an hostility towards their nation, the latter might justly expect a tender of such explanations as would leave no doubt on this subject.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

General ARMSTRONG, Minister Plenipotentiary of the U. S., Paris.

Extract:—Mr. Madison to Mr. Armstrong.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 22, 1808.

Your despatches by Lieutenant Lewis were delivered on the 8th instant.

It is regretted that the interval between his arrival and the date of your letter to Mr. Champagny, during which I presume some verbal intercommunication must have taken place, had produced no indication of a favorable change in the views of the French Government with respect to its decrees; and still more that, instead of an early and favorable answer to your letter, it should have been followed by such a decree as is reported to have been issued on the 22d April, at Bayonne. The decree has not yet reached the United States, and therefore its precise import cannot be ascertained. But if it should be, as it is represented, a sweeping stroke at all American vessels on the high seas, it will not only extend our demands of reparation, but is rendered the more ominous with respect to the temper and views of the Emperor towards the United States by the date of the measure.

The arrival of Mr. Baker with my letter of May 2d, of which a copy is herewith sent, will have enabled you to resume the subject of the decrees, with the fairest opportunity that could be given to the French Government for a change of the unjust and unwise course which has been pursued; and I assure myself that you will not have failed to turn the communications with which you are furnished to the best account. If France does not wish to throw the United States into the war against her, for which it is impossible to find a rational or plausible inducement, she ought not to hesitate a moment in revoking at least so much of her decrees as violate the rights of the sea, and furnish to her adversary the pretext for his retaliating measures. It would seem as if the imperial cabinet had never paid sufficient attention to the smallness of the sacrifice which a repeal of that portion of its system would involve, if an act of justice is to be called a sacrifice.

The information by the return of the Osage from England is not more satisfactory than that from France. Nothing was said on the subject of the Chesapeake, nor any thing done or promised as to the orders in council. It is probable that further accounts from the United States were waited for, and that the arrival of the St. Michael will have led to a manifestation of the real views of that Government on those and other subjects. In the mean time, it cannot be doubted that hopes were cherished there of some events in this country favorable to the policy of the orders, and particularly that the offensive language and proceedings of France would bring on a hostile resistance from the United States; in which case the British Government would be able to mould every thing to its satisfaction. There is much reason to believe that, if the British Government should not concur in a mutual abolition of the orders and of the embargo, it will result from an unwillingness to set an example which might be followed, and might, consequently, put an end to the irritating career of her enemy, on which the calculation is built. Might not use be made of this view of the matter in those frank and friendly conversations which sometimes best admit topics of a delicate nature, and in which pride and prejudice can be best managed without descending from the necessary level? In every view, it is evidently proper, as far as respect to the national honor will allow, to avoid a style of procedure which might co-operate with the policy of the British Government, by stimulating the passions of the French.

Extract of a letter from General Armstrong to the Secretary of State, dated

SIR:

PARIS, July 26, 1808.

It would have given me the highest pleasure to have drawn from this Government such explanations on the general subject of our differences with them as would have met the friendly and equitable views of the United States; but I owe it, as well to you as to myself, to declare that every attempt for that purpose hitherto made has failed, and under circumstances which by no means indicate any change in their aspect for the better.

With very high consideration, I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

JAMES MADISON, Esq., Secretary of State.

Extract:—Mr. Armstrong to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, August 7, 1808.

I wrote a few lines to you yesterday. Two weeks have gone by without any new condemnation. My remonstrances continue to be unanswered.

P. S. I enclose a copy of my note of yesterday to M. de Champagny.

[Referred to and enclosed in Mr. Armstrong's despatch of August 7, 1808.]

Extract:—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Champagny.

PARIS, August 6, 1808.

Mr. Armstrong presents his compliments to M. de Champagny, and begs leave to inform him that, having for some months past made trial of the artificial waters of Rivoli without any useful effect, his physician has prescribed for him those of Bourbon l'Archambault. Should M. de Champagny have any communication to make to Mr. Armstrong, he will be pleased to address them as usual to the Hotel de Légation Américaine, Rue Vaugirard, No. 100, whence they will be regularly and promptly transmitted to Bourbon.

On leaving Paris, Mr. Armstrong thinks proper to express his regrets that the political relations of the two Powers should continue to wear an aspect less auspicious to their future good understanding than is wished for by those who are the friends of both.

That His Majesty has a right to make such municipal regulations as he may deem proper, with regard to foreign commerce, neither is, nor has been, denied: for example, he may forbid the entry into the ports of France of American ships which have touched in England, or been destined to England; and he may either sequester or confiscate such vessels of the United States as shall infract these laws, after due promulgation and notice thereof; but beyond this the United States hope and believe that His Majesty will not go.

M. de Champagny will not fail to seize the distinction which these remarks present, between the authority of municipal regulations and that of public law; and will decide whether it does or does not offer a ground on which the good understanding, so long and so usefully maintained between the United States and France, may be preserved, and a degree of intercourse between them renewed, which shall have the effect of re-animating their former industry.

Does His Majesty fear that the balance of trade, arising from this renewed industry, would go to the advantage of England? Means are certainly not wanting to prevent this consequence. Would it not be entirely avoided by making it a condition of the commerce in question, that all ships leaving France shall take (in some article or articles of their produce or manufacture) the full amount of the cargoes they bring hither?

Ships sailing under this regulation would or would not go voluntarily to England. If they went voluntarily, it would only be because that country afforded the best markets for the productions of France; in which case the habitual results would be entirely changed, and England, ceasing to receive a balance for her manufactures, would begin to pay one to the United States on the productions of France. Could France wish a state of commerce more prosperous than this?

If, on the other hand, the American ships did not go voluntarily to England, but were captured and sent in for adjudication, it may be fairly presumed that the United States could no longer hesitate about becoming a party to the war against England.

Thus, in either case, the interests of His Majesty would be directly advanced by the measure: in the one, the wants of France and her colonies would be not only regularly supplied, but she would herself become an entrepôt for the supply of the continent; in the other, the wishes of His Majesty, as expressed in February last, would be directly promoted.

Mr. Armstrong has the honor of renewing to M. de Champagny the assurances of his very high consideration.

To His Excellency M. DE CHAMPAGNY, Minister of Exterior Relations.

BOURBON L'ARCHAMBAULT, August 28, 1808.

Since my arrival at this place, I have been honored by the receipt of your despatch of the 21st ultimo, and would immediately return to Paris to renew my discussions with M. de Champagny, either personally, as you suggest, or by writing, had I not the most solemn conviction that any new experiment, made at the present moment, in either form, and of official character, would certainly be useless, and probably injurious.

(Confidential.)

Extract:—Gen. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

BOURBON L'ARCHAMBAULT, August 30, 1808.

We have somewhat overrated our means of coercing the two great belligerents to a course of justice. The embargo is a measure calculated, above any other, to keep us whole and keep us in peace; but, beyond this, you must not count upon it. Here it is not felt, and in England (in the midst of the more recent and interesting events of the day) it is forgotten.

I hope that, unless France shall do us justice, we will raise the embargo, and make in its stead the experiment of an armed commerce. Should she adhere to her wicked and foolish measures, we ought not to content ourselves with doing this; there is much, very much besides that we can do, and we ought not to omit doing all we can, because it is believed here that we cannot do much, and even that we will not do what we have the power of doing.

10th CONGRESS.]No. 217.[2d SESSION.

SPAIN.

REPORTED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, NOVEMBER 16, 1808, AND JUNE 9, 1809.

Mr. LOVE, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 16th instant, the petition of thirty-six American citizens confined, under sentence of slavery, at Carthagena, in South America, made the following report:

That it appears, from the statement of the petitioners, that, in February, 1806, they sailed from New York on board the Leander, a ship owned by Samuel G. Ogden, the command of which was, after getting to sea, assumed by General Miranda.

That, from New York, the said ship sailed to Jacmel, where the said Miranda procured two schooners, on board which the petitioners were placed, which, together with the Leander, sailed, under the command of Miranda, about the last of March, in the same year, for the northern parts of South America, and arrived on the coast of Terra Firma in the latter part of April following.

That, upon their arrival on the said coast, the two schooners, on board which the petitioners were embarked, were captured by two Spanish armed vessels: the ship Leander, with Miranda on board, having made her escape.

That the petitioners, together with ten others, were convicted by a Spanish tribunal, at Porto Cabello, of the crime of piracy, from the circumstances of suspicion which attached to their situation, and not from any act of that kind committed on the high seas; that the ten others abovementioned were sentenced to death, and the petitioners some to eight, others to ten years' slavery, which they now are suffering; some chained together, others closely confined under heavy irons and a guard, destined to other places and to a similar punishment.

The petitioners state that they were entrapped into the service of the said Miranda, on the said expedition, by assurances, made at the time of their engagements, that they were to be employed in the service of the United States, and under the authority of the Government. For a truth of their statement, and a confirmation of the charges they make against certain persons of having thus deceived and betrayed them into an involuntary co-operation in the design of fitting out an armament against a nation in amity with the United States, they refer to the testimony of several persons, said to be inhabitants of the city of New York, and to have had proposals made to them similar to those by which the petitioners were induced to engage on board the Leander.

The petitioners also state that no opportunity was offered them of escaping from the service of the said Miranda and his associates; that they were restrained under the most rigorous discipline, and at Jacmel, the only place where an opportunity of escape might have been probable, they were strictly guarded to prevent it. For the truth of this they refer to certain captains of vessels then at Jacmel belonging to the ports of Philadelphia and Baltimore.

The committee further report that the foregoing statements of the petitioners are unaccompanied by any competent testimony in support of them, and, at the same time, are uncontradicted by any opposing circumstances; they are of opinion that a very strong probability of the petitioners not having been guilty of the crime of wilfully engaging in the unlawful expedition of Miranda attends their application; first, because the petitioners have made a detailed statement of facts relative to the deception practised on them, referring to such species of evidence as to render their contradiction easy, if not founded in truth, and thus lessen their claim on their country, and diminish their hopes of liberation; second, because it is presumed they were proven to the Spanish tribunal before which they were convicted to have been offenders in a secondary degree, those who were proven to have been more heinously guilty having been sentenced to suffer death.

The committee, however, are of opinion, that, should the petitioners have been guilty of a crime against the United States by a voluntary or otherwise culpable infraction of its laws, the dictates of humanity, no less than the principles of justice, ought to influence the Legislature of the United States to adopt the proper means for restoring them to their country, in order that they may expiate the offence by a punishment suited to but not transcending the magnitude of their crime.

The committee, therefore, beg leave to submit the following resolution for the consideration of the House:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to adopt the most immediate and efficacious means in his power to obtain from the Viceroy of Grenada, in South America, or other proper authority, the liberation of thirty-six American citizens, condemned on a charge of piracy, and now held in slavery in the vaults of St. Clara, in Carthagena, and that the sum of ——— dollars be appropriated to that purpose.

VAULTS OF ST. CLARA, CARTHAGENA, September 16, 1808.

To the honorable the Congress of the United States of America in Congress assembled, the petition of thirty-six American citizens confined at Carthagena, South America, under sentence of slavery, humbly sheweth:

That we, your petitioners, were brought from New York in the armed ship Leander, Thomas Lewis, commander, on the 2d of February, 1806, together with a number of others, mostly inhabitants of that State and city, under the most specious engagements of their country; to establish which, they beg leave to state that Colonel William Smith, then surveyor of the port of New York, William Armstrong, Daniel D. Durning, and John Fink, butcher, of the city of New York, declared they were authorized to enlist a number of men to go to New Orleans, to serve as guards to the United States' mails, and a number of others as mechanics. Some backwardness on the part of several of your petitioners to engage being discovered by William Smith, he read passages from letters to prove his authority, and several paragraphs from newspapers to convince them of the validity of their engagements. William Armstrong and Daniel D. Durning were appointed to command them, and were to accompany them to the city of Washington, where they were to receive clothing and accoutrements, and thence to New Orleans. The ship Leander, owned by Samuel G. Ogden, and formerly in the St. Domingo trade, was procured for the conveyance of your petitioners to the city of Washington, for which purpose she was hauled down to the watering place, where your petitioners went on board her the 1st day of February, 1806, and the next day (the 2d) the ship put to sea. Shortly after Miranda, under the name of Martin, and a number of persons hitherto unknown to your petitioners, appeared on board, in the character of his officers; which, for the first time, awakened strong suspicions in the breasts of your petitioners that they had been entrapped into the power of wicked and designing men, and that, too, when retreat was impracticable. From New York your petitioners were carried to Jacmel, in the island of St. Domingo, where they were exercised in military duty, under the most arbitrary stretch of power, by Miranda and his officers. At Jacmel several attempts to escape proved abortive, from the vigilance of our oppressors, they having procured guards to be stationed in all the passes leading from Jacmel to other parts of the island, where your petitioners might expect to receive aid and protection from their countrymen. At Jacmel two schooners were hired, on board of which your petitioners were sent, under the care of a number of officers, whose wariness still remained unabated, and on the 27th March, 1806, the ship, accompanied by the two schooners, proceeded towards the coast of Terra Firma, where, after touching at the island of Aruba for refreshments, she arrived on the 28th of April, when two armed vessels hove in sight, which, after some manœuvring, the ship engaged, but soon ran away, leaving the two schooners to be captured. They were carried into Porto Cabello, where your petitioners were proceeded against as pirates, a number of warlike implements being found on board, which were placed there without the knowledge of your petitioners. And on the 12th July following the process against us closed at Caraccas, sentencing ten, whom they considered to be criminally engaged, to be hanged and beheaded, and the remainder, your petitioners, to eight and ten years' slavery on the public works at Omoa, Boca Chica, and the island of Porto Rico. Your petitioners were all sent to this place, where those sentenced to Boca Chica were put to work, chained two and two, and the residue, in double irons and close confinement, strongly guarded, waiting for an opportunity to be sent to their respective places. Upon several occasions your petitioners were told by William Armstrong, Thomas Lewis, and others, that they were sent out by the Government of the United States. To prove to the satisfaction of your honorable body the truth of the above statement, your petitioners beg you will examine Robert Laverty, John Stagg, John Ritter, Matthew Morgan, Richard Platt, Adam Ten Brook, and John Miller, of New York, who were under the same engagements with your petitioners. Francis White and Thomas McAllister, butchers in the Bear market, New York, Mr. Brinkeroff, tavern keeper, near the Bear market, David Williams, John Garret, and a Mr. Kemper, weigh-master, whose son was executed at Porto Cabello, were present when all or most of your petitioners were engaged, and can prove beyond all doubt that your petitioners could have had no other idea than that of entering into the service of the United States. Captain Bomberry, of the ship Mary, of Baltimore, Captain Israel, of the brig Robert and Mary, Captain Waldron, of the schooner Victory, and Captain Abbott, of the brig Charleston Packet, all of Philadelphia, were eye-witnesses to the tyranny and oppression under which your petitioners labored while at Jacmel. When the crew of the Bee, one of the schooners which was chartered by the Leander, refused to go in her, a number of officers from the ship, with Lewis at their head, came on board the Bee, and, after beating and cutting the men with sticks and sabres in the most brutal manner, dragged them on board the Leander, put them into irons under a strong guard, and kept them there until the moment of sailing, when they were sent on board the Bee, with orders to keep near and to leeward of the ship. Another man who had effected his escape from a French privateer, and found his way to Jacmel, with the hope of getting a passage home in some of his country vessels, was seized at the instance of Thomas Lewis, commander of the Leander, and colonel under Miranda, thrown into prison, and compelled to go in the expedition or to starve in jail.

Your petitioners are confident that, when your honorable body become thoroughly acquainted with the circumstances of art and deception which betrayed them into the expedition, the destination of which they had no knowledge until it was too late to retreat, you will not only punish such of their betrayers as are within the reach of your power, but will adopt proper measures to restore your unfortunate petitioners to liberty and their families. We beg leave to mention that Jeremiah Powell, who was an officer of high confidence in the expedition, was pardoned without hesitation by the Spanish monarch, on the application of his father. Your petitioners have embraced many opportunities to convey to your honorable body the prayer of a petition, but, from the length of time elapsed since they sent off their last, and not hearing of any measures being adopted in their favor, they fear none ever arrived; and by the present opportunity several copies of this petition have been transmitted to gentlemen residing in different parts of the United States, with the hope that some of them may arrive safe.

Your petitioners cannot for a moment believe that the United States will suffer officers under her constitution to kidnap her citizens into expeditions and services fitted out and maintained by a foreign outlaw against Powers with whom she is at amity and peace, under the specious pretence of engaging them into the service of their country, without punishing the aggressors, and using every effort to regain her citizens. Such is the case of your unfortunate petitioners, who entreat you, as children would a parent, to relieve them from total destruction, on the brink of which they have been thrown by the practice of frauds and villainies hitherto unheard of.

A short time since a British ship of war arrived at this place, the commander of which, Edward Kittoe, Esq. upon being applied to by nine of our companions, who declared themselves to be British born subjects, and being made acquainted with the circumstances which led to our capture, immediately sent on a petition to the Viceroy of this kingdom, in behalf of us all, but particularly for such as are British subjects, whom we expect will eventually be liberated. Nothing but humanity and a strong desire to relieve distress could have induced Captain Kittoe to this step, who, we are confident, as much as ourselves, regrets its failure of success, and to whom we feel every way indebted, and shall ever recollect it with gratitude and thanks.

When your petitioners remonstrate against any harsh treatment of these people, they invariably ask, "Why don't your country liberate you? it rests solely with them."

Your petitioners feel confident, from the justness of their claim to the interference and protection of the constituted authorities of their country, measures will be adopted to restore them to liberty; and having no doubt but your honorable body will afford them that protection which citizens have a right to claim from their country, your petitioners beg that your honorable body will convey them an answer, and your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

CARTHAGENA, August 12, 1808.

On my arrival at this place, I was applied to in behalf of the unfortunate men captured under the orders of General Miranda, who are under sentence of transportation to the different public works at Omoa, Porto Rico, &c., among whom are several British subjects, (whose names are inserted below.) I am well aware of the enormity of their crime, as I understand they were taken without colors or papers; but, as a British officer, I conceive it a duty to plead for those in distress wherever they may be found; and I trust, from the known lenity of your excellency's character, I shall not plead in vain. The men in question are originally of British descent, and are allied to my nation by many ties. They have no consul, no minister to prefer the prayer of their petition to your excellency, having been prevented by the war between our nations from making known their situation to the President of the United States. Suffer me, therefore, to address your excellency, and beg for their release, on a solemn promise that they will never be found again in arms on a similar occasion. As I am the bearer of welcome tidings to the inhabitants of the province under your excellency's command, make me also the bearer of them to the unhappy sufferers now confined in Carthagena. It is true I am unauthorized to make this request in the name of the British Government for the men in general, but I am convinced the step will be approved; and if your excellency will lend a favorable ear to my petition, the circumstance will not pass unnoticed on their part; at all events, your excellency will have the prayer of many individuals for your eternal happiness, and among them will be found, not the least fervent, those of your excellency's most humble servant,

EDWARD KITTOE,
Commander of H. B. M. Ship Sebrina.

P. S. If my request for the liberation of all General Miranda's men is by your excellency deemed unreasonable or improper, I beg to confine it particularly to such as are British subjects: that is an indispensable duty I owe to them and to my country.

Names of British subjects under sentence of transportation at Carthagena:

VAULTS OF ST. CLARA, CARTHAGENA, September 16, 1808.

RESPECTED SIR:

I have taken the liberty to direct to your care a memorial of thirty-six American citizens, who have been lying in shackles more than two years, a great proportion of which time in stocks, upon the broad of their backs, not even taken out to answer the ordinary calls of nature, with the request that you would present, or procure it to be presented to the Legislature of the United States; and, should it be acted upon the approaching session of Congress, to be good enough, by the first convenient opportunity, to acquaint us with what is to be done, and what prospect we have of being liberated from this loathsome confinement, little short of death. I enclose you a copy of a petition, which the commander of a British frigate presented to the Viceroy of this kingdom, in our behalf, with liberty to publish it in the Telegraph, with a suitable caption, should you think proper. Indeed, I think it would serve our cause. However, its effect I submit to your better judgment, well convinced you will feel disposed to succor suffering humanity; and, if unable to bring to condign punishment the authors of our misfortunes, you will not withhold your aid to release us from this miserable condition. Our number has been reduced by deaths and escapes from forty-seven to thirty-six. I also enclose to your charge, a letter for my father, which I beg you would put on board some of the wood shallops belonging to Otter Point, which always may be found at the wharf, the foot of the Marsh market; or, if they cannot conveniently be found, to leave it at Mrs. Hay's, in Old Town, not far from Mr. Asque's, near the Baptist meeting, with the injunction to send it on as speedily as possible. For a description of the fraud and deception which placed us in this unhappy situation, I refer you to the memorial itself.

I am, your obedient humble servant,

ROBERT SAUNDERS, JUN.

Mr. THOMAS DOBBIN, Printer, Baltimore.

[The following report on the same subject was made to the House of Representatives, 9th June, 1809.]

The committee to whom was referred, on the 31st ultimo, the petition of sundry American prisoners confined under sentence of slavery, at Carthagena, in South America, report:

That it appears, from the statement of the petitioners, they were, by various misrepresentations and deceptions, incautiously drawn into the service of General Miranda, in an expedition, hostile in its intention, against one of the Spanish settlements in South America; that they were engaged, under various pretences, of serving their country; and, acting in conformity to its laws, some ostensibly were to go to New Orleans, and act as guards to the United States' mail; others were to follow their different mechanical professions in that country; and the residue were engaged for a direct voyage to St. Domingo and back to New York; and, that they had no suspicion that they were engaging in a hostile enterprise against a nation in amity with the United States.

That, accordingly, the petitioners were embarked at New York, in the month of February, 1806, on board the ship Leander, Thomas Lewis, commander; that, when the vessel had got to sea, General Miranda, by the name of Martin, assumed the chief command; and several other persons, till then unknown to the petitioners, appeared as officers on board; that the petitioners were carried to Jacmel, in the island of St. Domingo, where they were exercised in military duty by Miranda and his officers, under the most arbitrary stretch of power; that at Jacmel several attempts were made to escape, which proved abortive; guards having been placed in all the passes, and every precaution taken to prevent it.

That, at Jacmel, Miranda procured two schooners, on board of which the petitioners were placed, which schooners, together with the Leander, proceeded, about the last of March, in the same year, under the command of Miranda, to the northern part of South America; and arrived on the coast of Terra Firma in the latter part of April following.

That, on their arrival on the said coast, the two schooners, on board of which the petitioners were placed, were captured by two Spanish armed vessels; that the petitioners, together with ten others, were convicted by the Spanish tribunal at Porto Cabello, of piracy, from the circumstances of suspicion that attached to their situation, and not from any act of that kind committed by them; that the ten others above mentioned were sentenced to death, and the petitioners, some of them to eight, and others to ten years' slavery, the punishment of which sentence they are now suffering under heavy irons, and other circumstances of distress, painful to the feelings of humanity to relate.

The committee, under a persuasion that the facts stated by the petitioners are substantially true, and on a full view of all the circumstances of this case, are induced to submit the following resolution for the consideration of the House:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to adopt the most immediate and efficacious means in his power to obtain the liberation of the petitioners, if it shall appear to his satisfaction that they were involuntarily drawn into the unlawful enterprise in which they were engaged; and that — dollars be appropriated to that purpose.

GREAT BRITAIN AND FRANCE.

REPORTED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, NOVEMBER 22, 1808.

The committee to whom was referred so much of the message of the President of the United States of the 8th instant as respects our relations with foreign Powers, report in part:

After a period of twenty-five years of peace, hardly interrupted by recent hostilities, and of prosperity unparalleled in the history of nations, the United States are, for the first time since the treaty which terminated the revolutionary war, placed in a situation equally difficult, critical, and dangerous.

Those principles recognised by the civilized world, under the name of law of nations, which heretofore controlled belligerent Powers, regulated the duties of neutrals, and protected their rights, are now avowedly disregarded or forgotten by Great Britain and France. Each of those two nations captures and condemns all American vessels trading with her enemy or her enemy's allies; and every European Power having become a party in the contest, the whole of our commerce with Europe and European colonies becomes liable to capture by either one or the other. If there be any nominal exception, it is made on a condition of tributes, which only adds insult to the injury.

The only plea urged in justification of those hostilities, is that of retaliation, grounded on a presumed acquiescence of the United States in previous aggressions by the other party. Waiving a discussion of the correctness of the principle of retaliation—a principle doubtful in itself, and altogether inadmissible to the extent to which it has been carried, and when operating on the neutral rather than on the enemy—it is altogether untrue that the United States have ever voluntarily acquiesced in the unlawful aggressions of either nation, omitted or delayed any measures calculated to obtain redress, or in any respect deviated from that impartiality to which they were bound by their neutrality. France has alluded to the violations of the national flag, and of the sovereignty of the United States in the instances of Pierre's murder, of the outrage on the Chesapeake, and of the destruction of the Impetuous. The measures taken to obtain redress in those cases are of public notoriety, and it may be added, that with the exception of the last, those aggressions on the sovereignty of the United States did not affect their neutrality, and gave no right to France either of complaint or interference. Setting aside irregularities of less importance, and equally chargeable to both nations, such as the British order of June, 1803, and the decree of the French General Ferrand, the principal violations by England of the neutral rights of America prior to the Berlin decree of November, 1806, and which, if acquiesced in, might have given grounds of complaint to France, are, the capture of American vessels laden with colonial produce, founded on a renewal of that pretended principle generally called the "rule of 1756;" the impressment of American seamen, compelled thereby to become the auxiliaries of England against France; and proclamation or nominal blockades, particularly that of the coast from the river Elbe to Brest, notified in May, 1806.

It will not be asserted that the United States ever tamely acquiesced in either of those pretensions. It will not be denied that, with respect to the two first, the most strenuous efforts were incessantly made to procure an alteration of the British system.

It is true that to the nominal proclamation blockades of England the United States had opposed only spirited and repeated remonstrances, and that these had not always been successful. But the measures which a neutral nation may be supposed bound to take against the infractions of its neutrality, must always bear a certain proportion to the extent and nature of the injury received, and to the means of opposition. It cannot certainly be pretended that a hasty resort to war should, in every such instance, have become the duty of America. Nor can the irregularities of England in declaring in a state of blockade a certain extent of coast, part of which was not, and the whole of which could not, even by her powerful navy, be actually invested and blockaded, be pleaded in justification of that decree by which France, without an efficient fleet, pretends to announce the blockade of the dominions of a Power which has the incontestable command of the sea, and before no port of which she can station a single vessel.

The Milan decree of 1807 can still less rest for its defence on the supposed acquiescence of the United States in the British orders of the preceding month, since those orders, which have not certainly been acquiesced in, were not even known in America at the date of the decree. And it is proper here to add, that the French have, particularly by the sequestration of certain vessels in their ports, and by burning our ships on the high seas, gone even beyond the tenor of their own extraordinary edicts.

The allegation of an acquiescence in the Berlin decree of November, 1806, by which alone the British Government pretends to justify the orders of council, is equally unfounded. In the note on that subject, addressed on the 31st December, 1806, by the British Government to the American ministers, after having stated that "they would not believe that the enemy would ever seriously attempt to enforce such a system," the following declaration is expressly made: "If, however, the enemy should carry these threats into execution, and if neutral nations, contrary to all expectation, should acquiesce in such usurpations, His Majesty might probably be compelled, however reluctantly, to retaliate in his just defence, &c." The two requisites necessary in the opinion of Great Britain to justify retaliation are stated to be, the execution of the decree, and the acquiescence of neutral nations. Yet within eight days after, and in the face of that declaration, without waiting for ascertaining either of those facts, the retaliating British order of January 7th, 1807, was issued, which, contrary to the acknowledged law of nations, subjected to capture vessels of the United States sailing from the ports of one belligerent to a port of another belligerent.

The United States, in the meanwhile, and without delay, had taken the necessary steps to ascertain the manner in which the French Government intended to execute their decree.

That decree might be construed merely as a municipal law forbidding the introduction of British merchandise, and the admission of vessels coming from England. Under that aspect, and if confined to that object, the neutral rights of America were not affected by its operation.

A belligerent may, without any infraction of neutral rights, forbid the admission into his ports of any vessel coming from the ports of his enemy. And France had undoubtedly the same right to exclude from her dominions every species of British merchandise, which the United States have exercised, in forbidding the importation of certain species. Great Britain might be injured by such regulations; but America had no more right to complain of that part of the decree, than France had to object to the American non-importation act. So far, indeed, as respects the United States, they were placed by the municipal part of the decree in the same situation in relation to France, in which they are placed in their intercourse with Great Britain, by the permanent laws of that country. The French decree forbids American vessels to import British merchandise into France. The British navigation act forbids American vessels to import French merchandise into England. But that broad clause of the Berlin decree which declared the British islands in a state of blockade, though not followed by regulations to that effect, still threatened an intended operation on the high seas. This, if carried into effect, would be a flagrant violation of the neutral rights of the United States, and, as such, they would be bound to oppose it. The minister of the United States at Paris immediately applied for explanation on that subject; and the French Minister of Marine, on the 24th December, 1806, seven days before the date of the above-mentioned note of the British Government, stated, in answer, that the decree made no alteration in the regulations then observed in France with regard to neutral navigation, or to the commercial convention of the United States with France that the declaration of the British islands being in a state of blockade, did not change the existing French laws concerning maritime captures; and that American vessels could not be taken at sea for the mere reason of their being going to or returning from an English port.

The execution of the decree comported for several months with those explanations: several vessels were arrested for having introduced articles of English growth or manufacture, and among them some which, being actually from England, and laden with English colonial produce, had entered with forged papers, as if coming from the United States. But no alteration of the first construction given by the French Government took place until the month of September, 1807. The first condemnation on the principle that the decree subjected neutral vessels to capture on the high seas, was that of the Horizon on the 10th of October following; prior to that time there could have been no acquiescence in a decree infringing the neutral rights of the United States, because till that time it was explained, and, what was more important, executed in such manner as not to infringe those rights, because till then no such infraction had taken place. The ministers of the United States at London, at the request of the British minister, communicated to him, on the 18th October, 1807, the substance of the explanations received, and of the manner in which the decree was executed; for they were at that time ignorant of the change which had taken place.

It was on the 18th September, 1807, that a new construction of the decree took place, an instruction having on that day been transmitted to the council of prizes by the Minister of Justice, by which that court was informed that French armed vessels were authorized under that decree to seize, without exception, in neutral vessels, either English property or merchandise of English growth or manufacture. An immediate explanation having been asked from the French Minister of Foreign Relations, he confirmed, in his answer of the 7th October, 1807, the determination of his Government to adopt that construction. Its first application took place on the 10th of the same month, in the case of the Horizon, of which the minister of the United States was not informed until the month of November; and, on the 12th of that month, he presented a spirited remonstrance against that infraction of the neutral rights of the United States. He had in the meanwhile transmitted to America the instruction to the council of prizes of the 18th September. This was received on the — of December, and a copy of the decision in the case of the Horizon having at the same time reached Government, the President, aware of the consequences which would follow that new state of things, communicated immediately to Congress the alterations of the French decree, and recommended the embargo, which was accordingly laid on the 22d December, 1807; at which time it was well understood in this country that the British orders of council of November preceding had been issued, although they were not officially communicated to our Government.

On the 11th of November preceding the British orders of council had been issued, declaring that all the ports of France, of her allies, and of any other country at war with England, and all other ports of Europe, from which, although not at war with England, the British flag was excluded, should thenceforth be considered as if the same were actually blockaded; that all trade in articles of the produce or manufactures of the said countries should be deemed unlawful; and that every vessel trading from or to the said countries, together with all goods and merchandise on board, and also all articles of the produce or manufacture of the said countries, should be liable to capture and condemnation.

These orders cannot be defended on the ground of their being intended as retaliating on account of the Berlin decree, as construed and uniformly executed from its date to the 18th September, 1807, its construction and execution having till then infringed no neutral rights. For, certainly, the monstrous doctrine will not be asserted, even by the British Government, that neutral nations are bound to resist, not only the acts of belligerent Powers, which violate their rights, but also those municipal regulations, which, however they may injure the enemy, are lawful, and do not affect the legitimate rights of the neutral. The only retaliation to be used in such cases must be such as will operate on the enemy without infringing the rights of the neutral. If solely intended as a retaliation on the Berlin decree, as executed prior to the month of September, the British orders of council should have been confined to forbidding the introduction into Great Britain of French or enemy's merchandise, and the admission into British ports of neutral vessels coming from a French or other enemy's port. Indeed, the ground of retaliation, on account of any culpable acquiescence of neutrals in decrees violating their rights, is abandoned by the very tenor of the orders; their operation being extended to those countries from which the British flag was excluded, such as Austria, although such countries were neither at war with Great Britain, nor had passed any decree in any way affecting or connected with neutral rights.

Nor are the orders justifiable on the pretence of and acquiescence on the part of the United States in the French decree as construed and executed subsequent to the 18th September, 1807, when it became an evident infraction of their rights, and such as they were bound to oppose. For their minister at Paris immediately made the necessary remonstrances, and the orders were issued not only without having ascertained whether the United States would acquiesce in the injurious alteration of the French decree, but more than one month before that alteration was known in America. It may even be asserted that the alteration was not known in England when the orders of council were issued; the instruction of the 18th September, 1807, which gave the new and injurious construction not having been promulgated in France, and its first publication having been made in December, 1807, and by the American Government itself.

The British orders of council are therefore unjustifiable on the principle of retaliation, even giving to that principle all the latitude which has ever been avowedly contended for. They are in open violation of the solemn declaration made by the British ministers in December, 1806, that retaliation, on the part of Great Britain, would depend on the execution of an unlawful decree, and on the acquiescence of neutral nations in such infraction of their rights. And they were also issued notwithstanding the official communication made by the ministers of the United States, that the French decree was construed and executed so as not to infringe their neutral rights, and without any previous notice or intimation denying the correctness of that statement. The Berlin decree, as expounded and executed subsequent to the 18th September, 1807, and the British orders of council of the 11th November ensuing, are, therefore, as they affect the United States, contemporaneous aggressions of the belligerent Powers, equally unprovoked and equally indefensible on the presumed ground of acquiescence. These, together with the Milan decree of December, 1807, which filled the measure, would, on the principle of self-defence, have justified immediate hostilities against both nations on the part of the United States. They thought it more eligible in the first instance, by withdrawing their vessels from the ocean, to avoid war, at least for a season, and, at the same time, to snatch their immense and defenceless commerce from impending destruction.

Another appeal has, in the mean time, been made, under the authority vested in the President for that purpose, to the justice and true interest of France and England. The propositions made by the United States, and the arguments urged by their ministers, are before Congress. By these the very pretext of the illegal edicts was removed; and it is evident that a revocation by either nation, on the ground on which it was asked, either must have produced what both pretended to have in view, a restoration of the freedom of commerce and of the acknowledged principles of the law of nations; or, in case of refusal by the other belligerent, would have carried into effect, in the most efficient manner, the ostensible object of the edicts, and made the United States a party in the war against him. The effort has been ineffectual. The propositions have been actually rejected by one of the belligerent Powers, and remain unanswered by the other. In that state of things, what course ought the United States to pursue? Your committee can perceive no other alternative but abject and degrading submission—war with both nations, or a continuance and enforcement of the present suspension of commerce. The first cannot require any discussion. But the pressure of the embargo, so sensibly felt, and the calamities inseparable from a state of war, naturally create a wish that some middle course might be discovered, which should avoid the evils of both, and not be inconsistent with national honor and independence. That illusion must be dissipated; and it is necessary that the people of the United States should fully understand the situation in which they are placed.

There is no other alternative but war with both nations, or a continuance of the present system. For war with one of the belligerents, only, would be submission to the edicts and will of the other; and a repeal, in whole or in part, of the embargo, must necessarily be war or submission.

A general repeal, without arming, would be submission to both nations. A general repeal, and arming of our merchant vessels, would be war with both, and war of the worst kind, suffering the enemy to plunder us without retaliation upon them.

A partial repeal must, from the situation of Europe, necessarily be actual submission to one of the aggressors, and war with the other.

The last position is the only one on which there can be any doubt; and it will be most satisfactorily demonstrated by selecting amongst the several modifications which might be suggested, that which may, on first view, appear the least exceptionable; a proposition to repeal the embargo so far only as relates to those Powers, which have not passed or do not execute any decrees injurious to the neutral rights of the United States.

It is said that the adoption of that proposition would restore our commerce with the native Powers of Asia and Africa, and with Spain, Portugal, Sweden, and Russia. Let this be taken for granted, although the precise line of conduct now pursued by most of those nations in relation to the United States is not correctly ascertained. So far as relates to any advantages which would result from that measure, if confined to its ostensible object, it will be sufficient to observe that the exports of articles of the domestic produce of the United States, during the year ending the 30th September, 1807, amounted to forty-eight millions seven hundred thousand dollars, and that the portion exported to the countries above enumerated falls short of seven millions; an amount too inconsiderable, when compared with the bulk of our exports, to deserve attention, even if a question affecting the independence of the nation was to be decided by considerations of immediate profit.

But the true effect of the proposition would be to open an indirect trade with Great Britain, which, through St. Bartholomew and Havana, Lisbon, Cadiz, or Gottenburg, would receive, at prices reduced by glutted markets, and for want of competition, all the provisions, naval stores, raw materials for her manufactures, and other articles which she may want. Whether she would be satisfied with that favorable state of things, or whether, considering that boon as a pledge of unqualified submission, she would, according to the tenor of her orders, interrupt our scanty commerce with Russia, and occasionally, under some new pretext, capture rather than purchase the cargoes intended for her own use, is equally uncertain and unimportant. Nor can it be doubted that a measure which would supply exclusively one of the belligerents, would be war with the other. Considered merely as a question of profit, it would be much more eligible at once to raise the embargo in relation to Great Britain, as we would then at least have the advantages of a direct market with the consumer. But the proposition can only be defended on the ground that France is the only aggressor, and that, having no just reason to complain of England, it is our duty to submit to her orders. On that inadmissible supposition, it would not only be more candid, but also a more dignified as well as a more advantageous course, openly to join England, and to make war against France. The object would be clearly understood, an ally would be obtained, and the meanness of submission might be better palliated.

It appears unnecessary to pursue any further the examination of propositions which the difficult situation of the United States could alone have suggested, and which will prove more inadmissible or impracticable as the subject is more thoroughly investigated. The alternative is painful; it is between a continued suspension of commerce and war with both England and France. But the choice must ultimately be made between the two, and it is important that we should be prepared for either the one or the other.

The aggressions of England and France, collectively, affecting almost the whole of our commerce, and persisted in notwithstanding repeated remonstrances, explanations, and propositions the most candid and unexceptionable, are, to all intents and purposes, a maritime war waged by both nations against the United States. It cannot be denied that the ultimate and only effectual mode of resisting that warfare, if persisted in, is war. A permanent suspension of commerce, after repeated and unavailing efforts to obtain peace, would not properly be resistance; it would be withdrawing from the contest, and abandoning our indisputable right freely to navigate the ocean. The present unsettled state of the world, the extraordinary situation in which the United States are placed, and the necessity, if war be resorted to, of making it at the same time against both nations, and these the two most powerful of the world, are the principal causes of hesitation. There would be none in resorting to that remedy, however calamitous, if a selection could be made on any principle of justice, or without a sacrifice of national independence.

On a question of such difficulty, involving the most important interests of the Union, and which has not, perhaps, until lately been sufficiently considered, your committee think the House alone competent to pronounce a decisive opinion; and they have, in this report, confined themselves to an exposition of the subject, and to such introductory resolutions as will be equally applicable to either alternative. The first of these, being merely declaratory of a determination not to submit to foreign aggressions, may, perhaps, at a first view, appear superfluous. It is, however, believed by the committee, that a pledge by the representatives of the nation that they will not abandon its essential rights, will not, at this critical moment, be unacceptable. The misapprehensions which seem to have existed, and the misrepresentations which have been circulated respecting the state of our foreign relations, render also such declaration expedient; and it may not be useless that every foreign nation should understand that its aggressions never will be justified or encouraged by any description of American citizens. For the question for every citizen now is, whether he will rally round the Government of his choice, or enlist under foreign banners? Whether he will be for his country, or against his country?

The committee respectfully submit the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the United States cannot, without a sacrifice of their rights, honor, and independence, submit to the late edicts of Great Britain and France.
2. Resolved, That it is expedient to prohibit, by law, the admission into the ports of the United States of all public or private armed or unarmed ships or vessels belonging to Great Britain or France, or to any other of the belligerent Powers having in force orders or decrees violating the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States; and also the importation of any goods, wares, or merchandise, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the dominions of any of the said Powers, or imported from any place in the possession of either.
3. Resolved, That measures ought to be immediately taken for placing the country in a more complete state of defence.

No. 219:

[2d SESSION.

GREAT BRITAIN, FRANCE, AND SPAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 23, 1808.

DECEMBER 23, 1808:

To the Senate of the United States:

According to the request of the Senate, in their resolution of November 14, that copies should be laid before them of all the orders and decrees of the belligerent Powers of Europe, passed since 1791, affecting the commercial rights of the United States, I now transmit them a report of the Secretary of State of such of them as have been attainable in the Department of State, and are supposed to have entered into the views of the Senate.

TH: JEFFERSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 21, 1808.

The Secretary of State, in pursuance of the resolution of the Senate of the 14th of November, respectfully reports to the President of the United States copies of such belligerent acts, decrees, orders, and proclamations as affect neutral rights of commerce, and as have been attainable in the Department of State, with the exception, however, of sundry acts, particularly blockades, of doubtful import or inferior importance, which it was supposed would have inconveniently extended the delay and the size of the report.

JAMES MADISON.

ART. 3. Their said Majesties reciprocally engage to shut all their ports against French ships; not to permit the exportation, in any case, from their said ports for France, of any military or naval stores, or corn, grain, salt meat, or other provisions; and to take all other measures in their power for injuring the commerce of France, and for bringing her, by such means, to just conditions of peace.

ART. 4. Their Majesties engage to unite all their efforts to prevent other Powers, not implicated in this war, from giving, on this occasion of common concern to every civilized State, any protection whatever, directly or indirectly, in consequence of their neutrality, to the commerce or property of the French, on the sea, or in the ports of France.

Extract from a treaty between His Britannic Majesty and the King of Spain, signed at Aranjuez, the 25th of May, 1793.

ART. 4. Their said Majesties engage reciprocally to shut their ports against French vessels; not to permit that there shall, in any case, be exported from their ports for France either warlike or naval stores, or wheat, or other grains, salted meat, or other provisions; and to take every other measure in their power to distress the trade of France, and reduce her by that means to just conditions of peace.

ART. 5. Their said Majesties also engage, the present war being generally interesting to every civilized State, to unite all their efforts in order to prevent those Powers which do not take part in the said war, from affording in consequence of their neutrality, any protection, direct or indirect, on the seas or in the ports of France, to the commerce and property of the French.

Extract from a convention between His Britannic Majesty and the King of Prussia, signed at the camp before Mayence, the 14th July, 1793.

ART. 3. The high contracting parties having already taken the resolution to shut all their ports against French ships, and not to permit the exportation, in any cases, from their said ports for France, of any military or naval stores, or corn, grain, salt meat, or other provisions, they reciprocally engage to continue those measures, and promise to employ all other means which shall be in their power for injuring the commerce of France, and for bringing her, by such means, to just conditions of peace.

ART. 4. Their Majesties engage to unite all their efforts to prevent, on this occasion of common concern to every civilized State, other Powers, not implicated in the war, from giving, in consequence of their neutrality, any protection whatever, directly or indirectly, to the commerce or property of the French, on the sea, or in the ports of France.

Extract from a convention between the Emperor of Austria and His Britannic Majesty, signed at London, the 30th August, 1793.

ART. 2. Their said Majesties reciprocally engage to shut their ports against French vessels; not to permit, in any instance, warlike or naval stores, corn, grain, salted meat, or other provisions, to be exported from their said ports for France, and to take all other means in their power to annoy the commerce of France, and thereby to reduce her to just conditions of peace.

ART. 3. Their Majesties engage to unite all their efforts to prevent other Powers, who shall not take part in this war, from giving, on this occasion of common interest to every civilized State, any protection whatever, direct or indirect, in consequence of their neutrality, to the commerce or to the property of the French, at sea or in the ports of France.

GEORGE R.

Additional instructions to the commanders of His Majesty's ships of war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France. Given at our court at St. James's, the eighth day of June, 1793, and in the thirty-third year of our reign.

1st. That it shall be lawful to stop and detain all vessels laden wholly or in part with corn, flour, or meal, bound to any port in France, or any port occupied by the armies of France, and to send them to such ports as shall be most convenient, in order that such corn, meal, or flour, may be purchased on behalf of His Majesty's Government, and the ships be released after such purchase, and after a due allowance for freight; or that the masters of such ships, on giving due security, to be approved of by the Court of Admiralty, be permitted to proceed to dispose of their cargoes of corn, meal, or flour, in the ports of any country in amity with His Majesty.

2d. That it shall be lawful for the commanders of His Majesty's ships of war and privateers, that have or may have letters of marque against France, to seize all ships, whatever be their cargoes, that shall be found attempting to enter any blockaded port, and to send the same for condemnation, together with their cargoes, except the ships of Denmark and Sweden, which shall be prevented from entering on the first attempt, but on the second shall be sent in for condemnation likewise.

3d. That in case His Majesty shall declare any port to be blockaded, the commanders of His Majesty's ships of war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France, are hereby enjoined, if they meet with ships at sea, which appear from their papers to be destined to such blockaded port, but to have sailed from the ports of their respective countries before the declaration of the blockade shall have arrived there, to advertise them thereof, and to admonish them to go to other ports; but they are not to molest them afterwards, unless it shall appear that they have continued their course with intent to enter the blockaded port, in which case they shall be subject to capture and condemnation: as shall likewise all ships wheresoever found, that shall appear to have sailed from their ports, bound to any port which His Majesty shall have declared to be blockaded, after such declaration shall have been known in the country from which they sailed; and all ships which, in the course of the voyage, shall have received notice of the blockade in any manner, and yet shall have pursued their course with intent to enter the same.

GEORGE R.

Additional instruction to the commanders of all our ships of war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France. Given at our court at St. James's, the sixth day of November, 1793, and in the thirty-fourth year of our reign.

That they shall stop and detain all ships laden with goods the produce of any colony belonging to France, or carrying provisions or other supplies for the use of any such colony, and shall bring the same, with their cargoes, to legal adjudication in our Courts of Admiralty.

By His Majesty's command:

H. DUNDAS.

GEORGE R.

Instructions to the commanders of our ships of war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France. Given at our court at St. James's, the eighth day of January, 1794.

Whereas, by our former instruction to the commanders of our ships of war and of privateers, dated the 6th day of November, 1793, we signified that they should stop and detain all ships laden with goods the produce of any colony belonging to France, or carrying provisions or other supplies for the use of any such colony, and should bring the same, with their cargoes, to legal adjudication: We are pleased to revoke the said instruction, and, in lieu thereof, we have thought fit to issue these, our instructions, to be duly observed by the commanders of all our ships of war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France:

1. That they shall bring in, for lawful adjudication, all vessels, with their cargoes, that are laden with goods the produce of the French West India Islands, and coming directly from any port of the said islands to any port in Europe.

2. That they shall bring in, for lawful adjudication, all ships, with their cargoes, that are laden with goods the produce of the said islands, the property of which goods shall belong to subjects of France, to whatsoever ports the same may be bound.

3. That they shall seize all ships that shall be found attempting to enter any port of the said islands that is or shall be blockaded by the arms of His Majesty or his allies, and shall send them in, with their cargoes, for adjudication, according to the terms of the second article of the former instructions, bearing date the 8th day of June, 1793.

4. That they shall seize all vessels laden wholly or in part with naval or military stores, bound to any port of the said islands, and shall send them into some convenient port belonging to His Majesty, in order that they, together with their cargoes, may be proceeded against, according to the rules of nations.

GEORGE R.

Instructions to the commanders of our ships of war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France, Spain, or the United Provinces. Given at our court at St. James's, the 25th day of January, 1798, in the thirty-eighth year of our reign.

Whereas, by our former instructions to the commanders of our ships of war and privateers, dated 8th January, 1794, we signified that they should bring in, for lawful adjudication, all vessels, with their cargoes, that were laden with goods the produce of the French West India Islands, and coming directly from any port of the said islands to any port in Europe; and likewise all ships, with their cargoes, that were laden with goods the produce of the said islands, the property of which goods should belong to subjects of France, to whatsoever ports the same might be bound; and that they should seize all ships that should be found attempting to enter any port of the said islands that was or should be blockaded by the arms of His Majesty or his allies, and should send them in, with their cargoes, for adjudication; and, also, all vessels laden wholly or in part with naval or military stores, bound to any port of the said islands, and should send them into some convenient port belonging to His Majesty, in order that they, together with their cargoes, might be proceeded against, according to the law of nations: And whereas, in consideration of the present state of the commerce of this country, as well as of that of neutral countries, it is expedient to revoke the said instructions, we are pleased hereby to revoke the same; and, in lieu thereof, we have thought fit to issue these our instructions, to be observed from henceforth by the commanders of all our ships of war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France, Spain, and the United Provinces.

1. That they shall bring in, for lawful adjudication, all vessels, with their cargoes, that are laden with goods the produce of any island or settlement belonging to France, Spain, or the United Provinces, and coming directly from any port of the said islands or settlements to any port in Europe, not being a port of this kingdom, nor a port of that country to which such ships, being neutral ships, shall belong.

2. That they shall bring in, for lawful adjudication, all ships, with their cargoes, that are laden with goods the produce of the said islands or settlements, the property of which goods shall belong to subjects of France, Spain, or the United Provinces, to whatsoever ports the same may be bound.

3. That they shall seize all ships that shall be found attempting to enter any port of the said islands or settlements that is or shall be blockaded by the arms of His Majesty, and shall send them in, with their cargoes, for adjudication, according to the terms of the second article of the former instructions, bearing date the 8th day of June, 1793.

4. That they shall seize all vessels laden wholly or in part with naval or military stores, bound to any port of the said islands or settlements, and shall send them into some convenient port belonging to His Majesty, in order that they, together with their cargoes, may be proceeded against, according to the rules of the law of nations.

By His Majesty's command:

PORTLAND.

Lord Grenville to Mr. King.

DOWNING STREET, March 22, 1799.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of His Britannic Majesty, has received His Majesty's commands to acquaint Mr. King, minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, that the King, judging it expedient to avail himself of the superiority of his naval forces for the defence of his dominions, has signified his commands to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to cause the most rigorous blockade to be established at the entrance of all the ports of Holland, which will be maintained and enforced in the strictest manner, according to the usages of war acknowledged and observed in similar cases.

Mr. King is therefore requested to apprise the American consuls and merchants residing in England that the above-mentioned ports of the United Provinces are, and must be considered as being in a state of blockade, and that from this time no neutral vessel can be suffered to enter them, upon any consideration, or under any pretence whatsoever; and that all the measures authorized by the law of nations and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different neutral Powers will henceforth be adopted and executed with respect to vessels destined for the said ports, or such as shall attempt to enter them after this notice.

Lord Grenville to Mr. King.

The undersigned, Secretary of State, has received His Majesty's command to inform Mr. King that His Majesty has judged it expedient to suspend for the present the blockade of all the ports in the United Provinces, which was established by His Majesty's orders,* and which was announced to Mr. King by the undersigned, in his note dated March 22d last.

GRENVILLE.

Additional instructions by the commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, &c.

The right honorable Lord Pelham, one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, having transmitted us, as additional instructions, under His Majesty's signet and sign manual, dated the 24th June, 1803, as follows:

To the commanders of His Majesty's ships of war and privateers.

In consideration of the present state of commerce, we are pleased hereby to direct the commanders of our ships of war and privateers not to seize any neutral vessel which shall be carrying on trade directly between the colonies of enemies, and the neutral country, to which the vessel belongs, and laden with the property of inhabitants of such neutral country: provided, that such neutral vessels shall not be supplying, nor shall have, on the outward voyage, supplied the enemy with any articles contraband of war, and shall not be trading with any blockaded port.

By His Majesty's command:

PELHAM.

We send you herewith a printed copy of the said additional instructions for your information and guidance, dated 13th July, 1803.

[Signed by the Lords of the Admiralty.]

To the Judge of the Vice-admiralty court of the island of Ceylon.

Mr. Merry to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, April 12, 1804.

Mr. Thornton not having failed to transmit to His Majesty's Government an account of the representation which you were pleased to address to him under date of the 27th October, last year, respecting the blockade of the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe, it is with great satisfaction, sir, that I have just received His Majesty's commands, signified to me by his principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, under date of the 6th January last, to communicate to you the instructions which have, in consequence of your representation, been sent to Commodore Hood, and to the judges of the Vice-admiralty courts in the West Indies.

* Supposed to be those of November 27, 1799.

I have, accordingly, the honor to transmit to you, sir, enclosed, the copy of a letter from Sir Evan Nepean, secretary to the Board of Admiralty, to Mr. Hammond, His Majesty's Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, specifying the nature of the instructions which have been given.

His Majesty's Government doubt not that the promptitude which has been manifested in redressing the grievance complained of by the Government of the United States, will be considered by the latter as an additional evidence of His Majesty's constant and sincere desire to remove any ground of misunderstanding that could have a tendency to interrupt the harmony which so happily subsists between this Government and that of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANTHONY MERRY.

SIR:

ADMIRALTY OFFICE, January 5, 1804.

Having communicated to the Lords of the Admiralty, Lord Hawkesbury's letter of the 23d ultimo, enclosing the copy of a despatch which his lordship had received from Mr. Thornton, His Majesty's chargé d'affaires in America, on the subject of the blockade of the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe, together with the report of the Advocate General:

Thereupon, I have their lordships' commands to acquaint you, for his lordship's information, that they have sent orders to Commodore Hood not to consider any blockade of those islands as existing, unless in respect of particular ports which may be actually invested, and then not to capture vessels bound to such ports, unless they shall previously have been warned not to enter them, and that they have also sent the necessary directions on the subject to the judges of the Vice-admiralty courts in the West Indies and America.

I am, &c.

GEORGE HAMMOND, Esq.

EVAN NEPEAN.

Mr. Merry to Mr. Madison.

WASHINGTON, April 12, 1804.

SIR:

I have the honor to acquaint you that I have just received a letter from Rear Admiral Sir John Duckworth, commander-in-chief of His Majesty's squadron at Jamaica, dated the 2d of last month, in which he desires me to communicate to the Government of the United States that he has found it expedient for His Majesty's service to convert the siege, which he lately attempted, of Curaçoa, into a blockade of that island.

I cannot doubt, sir, that this blockade will be conducted conformably to the instructions which, as I have had the honor to acquaint you in another letter of this date, have been recently sent on this subject to the commander-in-chief of His Majesty's forces, and to the judges of the Vice-admiralty courts, in the West Indies, should the smallness of the island of Curaçoa still render necessary any distinction of the investment being confined to particular ports.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANT. MERRY.

Circular from Lord Harrowby to the ministers of the neutral nations residing in London, communicated to Colonel Monroe.

DOWNING STREET, August 9, 1804.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's commands to acquaint Mr. Monroe, that the King has judged it expedient (for the protection of his subjects and the annoyance of his enemies) to establish the most rigorous blockade at the entrances of the ports of Fécamp, St. Valéry-aux-Caux, Dieppe, Treport, the Somme, Etaples, Boulogne, Calais, Gravelines, Dunkirk, Nieuport, and Ostend, and to maintain and enforce the same in the strictest manner, according to the usages of war acknowledged in similar cases. Mr. Monroe is therefore requested to apprise the American consuls and merchants residing in England, that the entrances of the above-mentioned ports are, and must be considered as being in a state of blockade; and that from this time all the measures authorized by the law of nations, and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different neutral Powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to vessels attempting to violate the said blockade after this notice.

The undersigned requests Mr. Monroe, &c. &c.

HARROWBY.

GEORGE R.

To our Courts of Admiralty, and to the commanders of our ships of war and privateers. Given at our court at St. James's, the 17th day of August, 1805, in the 45th year of our reign.

We are pleased hereby to direct the commanders of our ships of war and privateers not to seize any neutral vessel, which shall be carrying on trade directly from the colonies of the enemy to the ports of this kingdom, and laden solely with the property of inhabitants of the neutral country to which the ship belongs; provided such neutral ship has already cleared out, or shall clear out, from such colony, prior to the 1st day of November next, and shall not have supplied the enemy with any articles contraband of war on the outward voyage, and shall not have entered or be coming from any blockaded port. And in case any neutral vessel, trading as aforesaid, hath been, or shall be detained or brought before any of our Courts of Admiralty, it is our will and pleasure that such ships, together with their cargoes, be forthwith liberated.

By His Majesty's command:

HAWKESBURY.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Monroe.

DOWNING STREET, April 8, 1806.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's commands to acquaint Mr. Monroe, that, in consequence of His Majesty the King of Prussia having taken possession of various parts of the electorate of Hanover, and other dominions belonging to His Majesty, in a forcible and hostile manner; and having also notified, that all British ships shall be excluded from the ports of the Prussian dominions, and from certain other ports in the north of Europe, and not suffered to enter or trade therewith, in violation of the just rights and interests of His Majesty and his dominions, and contrary to the established law and practice of nations in amity with each other: His Majesty has judged it expedient to establish the most rigorous blockade at the entrances of the Ems, the Weser, the Elbe, and the Trave, and to maintain and enforce the same in the strictest manner, according to the usages of war, acknowledged and allowed in similar cases.

Mr. Monroe is therefore requested to apprise the American consuls and merchants residing in England, that the entrances of the above-mentioned rivers are and must be considered as being in a state of blockade; and that from this time all the measures authorized by the law of nations, and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different neutral Powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to vessels attempting to violate the said blockades after this notice.

The undersigned requests Mr. Monroe to accept the assurance of his high consideration.

C. J. FOX.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Monroe.

DOWNING STREET, May 16, 1806.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's commands to acquaint Mr. Monroe, that the King, taking into consideration the new and extraordinary means resorted to by the enemy for the purpose of distressing the commerce of his subjects, has thought fit to direct that the necessary measures should be taken for the blockade of the coast, rivers, and ports, from the river Elbe to the port of Brest, both inclusive; and the said coast, rivers, and ports are and must be considered as blockaded; but that His Majesty is pleased to declare that such blockade shall not extend to prevent neutral ships and vessels, laden with goods not being the property of His Majesty's enemies, and not being contraband of war, from approaching the said coast, and entering into and sailing from the said rivers and ports (save and except the coast, rivers, and ports from Ostend to the river Seine, already in a state of strict and rigorous blockade, and which are to be considered as so continued,) provided the said ships and vessels so approaching and entering (except as aforesaid) shall not have been laden at any port belonging to or in the possession of any of His Majesty's enemies; and that the said ships and vessels so sailing from the said rivers and ports (except as aforesaid) shall not be destined to any port belonging to or in the possession of any of His Majesty's enemies, nor have previously broken the blockade.

Mr. Monroe is therefore requested to apprise the American consuls and merchants residing in England, that the coast, rivers, and ports above mentioned, must be considered as being in a state of blockade, and that from this time all the measures authorized by the law of nations, and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different neutral Powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to vessels attempting to violate the said blockade after this notice.

The undersigned requests Mr. Monroe, &c.

C. J. FOX.

Lord Howick to Mr. Monroe.

DOWNING STREET, September 25, 1806.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's commands to acquaint Mr. Monroe, that the King having been pleased, on the 16th of May last, to cause it to be signified that he had directed the necessary measures to be taken for the blockade of the coast, rivers, and ports, from the river Elbe to the port of Brest, both inclusive, His Majesty is now pleased to declare, that so much of such blockade as extended from the river Elbe to the river Ems, both inclusive, is for the present discontinued; and that, from the date hereof, the navigation of the coast, rivers, and ports, from the river Elbe to the river Ems, both inclusive, is as free as if such blockade had not taken place.

The undersigned requests Mr. Monroe to accept the assurances, &c.

HOWICK.

At a court at the Queen's Palace, the 7th of January, 1807: Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in council.

Whereas the French Government has issued certain orders, which, in violation of the usages of war, purport to prohibit the commerce of all neutral nations with His Majesty's dominions, and also to prevent such nations from trading with any other country in any articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Majesty's dominions; and whereas the said Government has also taken upon itself to declare all His Majesty's dominions to be in a state of blockade, at the time when the fleets of France and her allies are themselves confined within their own ports by the superior valor and discipline of the British navy; and whereas such attempts, on the part of the enemy, would give to His Majesty an unquestionable right of retaliation, and would warrant His Majesty in enforcing the same prohibition of all commerce with France, which that Power vainly hopes to effect against the commerce of His Majesty's subjects, a prohibition which the superiority of His Majesty's naval forces might enable him to support by actually investing the ports and coasts of the enemy with numerous squadrons and cruisers, so as to make the entrance or approach thereto manifestly dangerous; and whereas His Majesty, though unwilling to follow the example of his enemies by proceeding to an extremity so distressing to all nations not engaged in the war, and carrying on their accustomed trade, yet feels himself bound, by due regard to the just defence of the rights and interests of his people not to suffer such measures to be taken by the enemy, without taking some steps on his part to restrain this violence, and to retort upon them the evils of their own injustice; His Majesty is thereupon pleased, by and with the advice of his privy council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that no vessel shall be permitted to trade from one port to another, both which ports shall belong to or be in the possession of France or her allies, or shall be so far under their control as that British vessels may not trade freely thereat; and the commanders of His Majesty's ships of war and privateers shall be, and are hereby, instructed to warn every neutral vessel coming from any such port, and destined to another such port, to discontinue her voyage, and not to proceed to any such port; and any vessel, after being so warned, or any vessel coming from any such port, after a reasonable time shall have been afforded for receiving information of this His Majesty's order, which shall be found proceeding to another such port, shall be captured and brought in, and together with her cargo shall be condemned as lawful prize; and His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judges of the High Court of Admiralty, and the Courts of Vice-admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein as to them shall respectively appertain.

W. FAWKENER.

Extract of a letter from the honorable David M. Erskine, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty, to the Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, June 26, 1807.

I have the honor to inform you that His Majesty has judged it expedient to re-establish the most rigorous blockade at the entrances of the rivers Ems, Weser, and Elbe, inclusive, in consequence of the present position of the enemy upon the continent, which enables him to command the navigation of those rivers.

BY THE KING.

A Proclamation for recalling and prohibiting British seamen from serving foreign Princes and States.

GEORGE R.

Whereas, it hath been represented to us, that great numbers of mariners and seafaring men, our natural born subjects, have been enticed to enter into the service of foreign States, and are now actually serving as well on board the ships of war belonging to the said foreign States, as on board the merchant vessels belonging to their subjects, notwithstanding our former proclamation recalling them, contrary to the duty and allegiance which our said subjects owe unto us, and to the great disservice of their native country; we have, therefore, thought it necessary, at the present moment, when our kingdom is menaced and endangered, and when the maritime rights on which its power and greatness do mainly depend, are disputed and called in question, to publish, by and with the advice of our privy council, this our royal proclamation: We do hereby strictly charge and command all masters of ships, pilots, mariners, shipwrights, and other seafaring men, being our natural born subjects, who may have been enticed into the pay or service of any foreign State, or do serve in any foreign ship or vessel, that forthwith they, and every of them, do, (according to their bounden duty and allegiance, and in consideration that their native country hath need of all their services,) withdraw themselves, and depart from, and quit such foreign service, and do return home to their native country; or do enter on board such of our ships of war as they may chance to fall in with, either on the high seas, or in any rivers, waters, havens, roads, ports, or places whatsoever or wheresoever.

And for the better execution of the purposes of this our royal proclamation, we do authorize and command all captains, masters, and others, commanding our ships and vessels of war, to stop and make stay of all and every such person and persons (being our natural born subjects) as shall endeavor to transport or enter themselves into the service of any foreign State, contrary to the intent and command of this our royal proclamation, and to seize upon, take, and bring away all such persons as aforesaid, who shall be found to be employed or serving in any foreign merchant ship or vessel as aforesaid; but we do strictly enjoin all such, our captains, masters, and others, that they do permit no man to go on board such ships and vessels belonging to States at amity with us, for the purpose of so seizing upon, taking, and bringing away such persons aforesaid, for whose discreet and orderly demeanor the said captains cannot answer; and that they do take especial care that no unnecessary violence be ever done or offered to the vessel, or to the remainder of the crew, from out of which such persons shall be taken.

And in case of their receiving information of any such person or persons being employed, or serving on board of any ship of war belonging to such foreign State at amity with us, we do authorize and command our captains, masters, and others commanding our ships of war, to require of the captain or commander of such foreign ship of war, that he do forthwith release and discharge such person or persons, being our natural born subject or subjects; and if such release and discharge shall be refused, then to transmit information of such refusal to the commander-in-chief of the squadron, under whose orders such captain or commander shall be then serving; which information the said commander-in-chief is hereby strictly directed and enjoined to transmit, with the least possible delay, to our minister residing at the seat of Government of that State to which the said foreign ship of war shall belong, or to our Lord High Admiral, or Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, for the time being, in order that we, being apprized of such proceeding, may forthwith direct the necessary steps to be taken for obtaining redress from the Government to which such foreign ship of war shall belong, for the injury done to us by the unwarranted detention of our natural born subjects in the service of a foreign State.

And whereas, it hath been further represented unto us, that divers mariners and seafaring men, our natural born subjects, have been induced to accept letters of naturalization, or certificates of citizenship, from foreign States, and have been taught to believe that, by such letters or certificates they are discharged from that duty of allegiance which, as our natural born subjects, they owe to us: Now we do hereby warn all such mariners, seafaring men, and others, our natural born subjects, that no such letters of naturalization, or certificates of citizenship, do or can in any manner divest our natural born subjects of the allegiance, or in any degree alter the duty which they owe to us, their lawful Sovereign. But in consideration of the error into which such mariners and seafaring men as aforesaid may have been led, we do hereby publish and declare our free pardon to all such, our subjects, who, repenting of the delusion under which they have acted, shall immediately, upon knowledge of this our royal proclamation, withdraw themselves from foreign service, and return to their allegiance to us; and we do declare that all such, our subjects, who shall continue in the service of foreign States, in disregard and contempt of this our royal proclamation, will not only incur our just displeasure, but are liable to be proceeded against for such contempt, and shall be proceeded against accordingly; and we do hereby declare, that if any such masters of ships, pilots, mariners, seamen, shipwrights, and other seafaring men, (being our natural born subjects) shall be taken in any foreign service by the Algerines, or other Barbary Powers, and carried into slavery, they shall not be reclaimed by us as subjects of Great Britain.

And we do hereby notify that all such, our subjects, as aforesaid, who have voluntarily entered, or shall enter, or voluntarily continue to serve, on board of any ships of war belonging to any foreign State at enmity with us, are and will be guilty of high treason; and we do, by this our royal proclamation, declare that they shall be punished with the utmost severity of the law.

Given at our court at the Queen's Palace, the sixteenth day of October, one thousand eight hundred and seven, and in the forty-seventh year of our reign. God save the King.

At the court at the Queen's Palace, the 11th of November, 1807: Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in council.

Whereas certain orders, establishing an unprecedented system of warfare against this kingdom, and aimed especially at the destruction of its commerce and resources, were, some time since, issued by the Government of France, by which "the British islands were declared to be in a state of blockade," thereby subjecting to capture and condemnation all vessels, with their cargoes, which should continue to trade with His Majesty's dominions:

And whereas, by the same order, "all trading in English merchandise is prohibited, and every article of merchandise belonging to England, or coming from her colonies, or of her manufacture, is declared lawful prize:"

And whereas the nations in alliance with France, and under her control, were required to give, and have given, and do give, effect to such orders:

And whereas His Majesty's order of the 7th of January last has not answered the desired purpose, either of compelling the enemy to recall those orders, or of inducing neutral nations to interpose, with effect, to obtain their revocation, but, on the contrary, the same have been recently enforced with increased rigor:

And whereas His Majesty, under these circumstances, finds himself compelled to take further measures for asserting and vindicating his just rights, and for supporting that maritime power which the exertions and valor of his people have, under the blessing of Providence, enabled him to establish and maintain; and the maintenance of which is not more essential to the safety and prosperity of His Majesty's dominions, than it is to the protection of such States as still retain their independence, and to the general intercourse and happiness of mankind:

His Majesty is therefore pleased, by and with the advice of his privy council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that all the ports and places of France and her allies, or of any other country at war with His Majesty, and all other ports or places in Europe, from which, although not at war with His Majesty, the British flag is excluded, and all ports or places in the colonies belonging to His Majesty's enemies, shall, from henceforth, be subject to the same restrictions in point of trade and navigation, with the exceptions hereinafter mentioned, as if the same were actually blockaded by His Majesty's naval forces, in the most strict and rigorous manner: And it is hereby further ordered and declared, that all trade in articles which are of the produce or manufacture of the said countries or colonies, shall be deemed and considered to be unlawful; and that every vessel trading from or to the said countries or colonies, together with all goods and merchandise on board, and all articles of the produce or manufacture of the said countries or colonies, shall be captured and condemned as prize to the captors.

But although His Majesty would be fully justified, by the circumstances and considerations above recited, in establishing such system of restrictions with respect to all the countries and colonies of his enemies, without exception or qualification, yet His Majesty being, nevertheless, desirous not to subject neutrals to any greater inconvenience than is absolutely inseparable from the carrying into effect His Majesty's just determination to counteract the designs of his enemies, and to retort upon his enemies themselves the consequences of their own violence and injustice; and being yet willing to hope that it may be possible (consistently with that object) still to allow to neutrals the opportunity of furnishing themselves with colonial produce for their own consumption and supply, and even to leave open, for the present, such trade with His Majesty's enemies as shall be carried on directly with the ports of His Majesty's dominions, or of his allies, in the manner hereinafter mentioned:

His Majesty is, therefore, pleased further to order, and it is hereby ordered, that nothing herein contained shall extend to subject to capture or condemnation any vessel, or the cargo of any vessel, belonging to any country not declared by this order to be subjected to the restrictions incident to a state of blockade, which shall have cleared out with such cargo from some port or place of the country to which she belongs, either in Europe or America, or from some free port in His Majesty's colonies, under circumstances in which such trade, from such free ports, is permitted, direct to some port or place in the colonies of His Majesty's enemies, or from those colonies direct to the country to which such vessel belongs, or to some free port in His Majesty's colonies, in such cases, and with such articles, as it may be lawful to import into such free port; nor to any vessel, or the cargo of any vessel, belonging to any country not at war with His Majesty, which shall have cleared out under such regulations as His Majesty may think fit to prescribe, and shall be proceeding direct from some port or place in this kingdom, or from Gibraltar, or Malta, or from any port belonging to His Majesty's allies, to the port specified in her clearance; nor to any vessel, or the cargo of any vessel, belonging to any country not at war with His Majesty, which shall be coming from any port or place in Europe which is declared by this order to be subject to the restrictions incident to a state of blockade, destined to some port or place in Europe belonging to His Majesty, and which shall be on her voyage direct thereto; but these exceptions are not to be understood as exempting from capture or confiscation any vessel or goods which shall be liable thereto in respect of having entered or departed from any port or place actually blockaded by His Majesty's squadrons or ships of war, or for being enemy's property, or for any other cause than the contravention of this present order.

And the commanders of His Majesty's ships of war and privateers, and other vessels acting under His Majesty's commission, shall be, and are hereby, instructed to warn every vessel which shall have commenced her voyage prior to any notice of this order, and shall be destined to any port of France, or of her allies, or of any other country at war with His Majesty, or to any port or place from which the British flag, as aforesaid, is excluded, or to any colony belonging to His Majesty's enemies, and which shall not have cleared out as is hereinbefore allowed, to discontinue her voyage, and to proceed to some port or place in this kingdom, or to Gibraltar or Malta; and any vessel which, after having been so warned, or after a reasonable time shall have been afforded for the arrival of information of this His Majesty's order at any port or place from which she sailed, or which, after having notice of this order, shall be found in the prosecution of any voyage contrary to the restrictions contained in this order, shall be captured, and, together with her cargo, condemned as lawful prize to the captors.

And whereas countries not engaged in the war have acquiesced in these orders of France, prohibiting all trade in any articles the produce or manufacture of His Majesty's dominions; and the merchants of those countries have given countenance and effect to those prohibitions by accepting from persons, styling themselves commercial agents of the enemy, resident at neutral ports, certain documents, termed "certificates of origin," being certificates obtained at the ports of shipment, declaring that the articles of the cargo are not of the produce or manufacture of His Majesty's dominions, or to that effect:

And whereas this expedient has been directed by France, and submitted to by such merchants, as part of the new system of warfare directed against the trade of this kingdom, and as the most effectual instrument of accomplishing the same, and it is therefore essentially necessary to resist it:

His Majesty is therefore pleased, by and with the advice of his privy council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that if any vessel, after reasonable time shall have been afforded for receiving notice of this His Majesty's order, at the port or place from which such vessel shall have cleared out, shall be found carrying any such certificate or document as aforesaid, or any document referring to or authenticating the same, such vessel shall be adjudged lawful prize to the captor, together with the goods laden therein, belonging to the person or persons by whom, or on whose behalf, any such document was put on board.

And the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judges of the High Court of Admiralty and Courts of Vice-Admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein as to them shall respectively appertain.

At the court at the Queen's Palace, the 11th of November, 1807: Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in council.

Whereas articles of the growth and manufacture of foreign countries cannot by law be imported into this country, except in British ships, or in ships belonging to the countries of which such articles are the growth and manufacture, without an order in council specially authorizing the same:

His Majesty, taking into consideration the order of this day's date, respecting the trade to be carried on to and from the ports of the enemy, and deeming it expedient that any vessel belonging to any country in alliance, or at amity with His Majesty, may be permitted to import into this country articles of the produce or manufacture of countries at war with His Majesty:

His Majesty, by and with the advice of his privy council, is therefore pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, that all goods, wares, or merchandise, specified and included in the schedule of an act, passed in the forty-third year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled "An act to repeal the duties of customs payable in Great Britain, and to grant other duties in lieu thereof," may be imported from any port or place belonging to any State not at amity with His Majesty, in ships belonging to any State at amity with His Majesty, subject to the payment of such duties, and liable to such drawbacks, as are now established by law upon the importation of the said goods, wares, or merchandise, in ships navigated according to law; and with respect to such of the said goods, wares, and merchandise as are authorized to be warehoused under the provisions of an act passed in the forty-third year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled "An act for permitting certain goods imported into Great Britain to be secured in warehouses without payment of duty," subject to all the regulations of the said last mentioned act; and with respect to all articles which are prohibited by law from being imported into this country; it is ordered that the same shall be reported for exportation to any country in amity or alliance with His Majesty.

And His Majesty is further pleased, by and with the advice of his privy council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that all vessels which shall arrive at any port of the United Kingdom, or at the port of Gibraltar or Malta, in consequence of having been warned pursuant to the aforesaid order, or in consequence of receiving information, in any other manner, of the said order, subsequent to their having taken on board any part of their cargoes, whether previous or subsequent to their sailing, shall be permitted to report their cargoes for exportation, and shall be allowed to proceed upon their voyages to their original ports of destination, (if not unlawful before the issuing of the said order,) or to any port at amity with His Majesty, upon receiving a certificate from the collector or comptroller of the customs at the port at which they shall so enter, (which certificate the said collectors and comptrollers of the customs are hereby authorized and required to give,) setting forth that such vessels came into such port in consequence of being so warned, or of receiving such information as aforesaid, and that they were permitted to sail from such port under the regulations which His Majesty has been pleased to establish in respect to such vessels; but in case any vessel so arriving shall prefer to import her cargo, then such vessel shall be allowed to enter and import the same, upon such terms and conditions as the said cargo might have been imported upon, according to law, in case the said vessel had sailed after having received notice of the said order, and in conformity thereto.

And it is further ordered, that all vessels which shall arrive at any port of the United Kingdom, or at Gibraltar, or Malta, in conformity and obedience to the said order, shall be allowed, in respect to all articles which may be on board the same, except sugar, coffee, wine, brandy, snuff, and tobacco, to clear out to any port whatever, to be specified in such clearance; and, with respect to the last mentioned articles, to export the same to such ports, and under such conditions and regulations only, as His Majesty, by any license to be granted for that purpose, may direct.

And the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judges of the High Courts of Admiralty and Courts of Vice-Admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein as to them shall respectively appertain.

W. FAWKENER.

At the court at the Queen's Palace, the 11th of November, 1807: Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in council.

Whereas the sale of ships by a belligerent to a neutral is considered by France to be illegal:

And whereas a great part of the shipping of France and her allies has been protected from capture during the present hostilities by transfers, or pretended transfers, to neutrals:

And whereas it is fully justifiable to adopt the same rule, in this respect, towards the enemy, which is applied by the enemy to this country:

His Majesty is pleased, by and with the advice of his privy council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that, in future, the sale to a neutral of any vessel belonging to His Majesty's enemies shall not be deemed to be legal, nor in any manner to transfer the property, nor to alter the character of such vessel; and all vessels now belonging, or which shall hereafter belong, to any enemy of His Majesty, notwithstanding any sale, or pretended sale, to a neutral, after a reasonable time shall have elapsed for receiving information of this His Majesty's order at the place where such sale, or pretended sale, was effected, shall be captured and brought in, and shall be adjudged as lawful prize to the captors.

And the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lord Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judges of the High Court of Admiralty and Courts of Vice-Admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein as to them shall respectively appertain.

W. FAWKENER.

At the court at the Queen's Palace, the 25th of November, 1807: Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in council.

Whereas it has been represented that it would be expedient to fix certain periods, at which it shall be deemed that a reasonable time shall have elapsed for receiving information, at different places, of His Majesty's order in council of the 11th of November instant, respecting the trade with His Majesty's enemies, and in their produce and manufactures: His Majesty, taking the same into consideration, and being desirous to obviate any difficulties that may arise in respect thereto, and also to allow ample time for the said order being known to all persons who may be affected thereby, is pleased, by and with the advice of his privy council, to order and declare, and it is hereby ordered and declared, that information of the said order of the 11th of November instant shall be taken, and held to have been received in the places hereinafter mentioned, at the periods respectively assigned to them, namely:

Ports and places within the Baltic; December 21, 1807.

Other ports and places to the northward of Amsterdam; December 11, 1807.

From Amsterdam to Ushant; December 4, 1807.

From Ushant to Cape Finisterre; December 8, 1807.

From Cape Finisterre to Gibraltar, inclusive; December 13, 1807.

Madeira; December 13, 1807.

Ports and places within the straits of Gibraltar, to Sicily and Malta, and the west coast of Italy inclusive; January 1, 1808.

All other ports and places in the Mediterranean beyond Sicily and Malta; January 20, 1808.

Ports and places beyond the Dardanelles; February 1, 1808.

Any part of the north and western coast of Africa, or the islands adjacent, except Madeira; January 11, 1808.

The United States, and British possessions in North America and the West Indies; January 20, 1808.

Cape of Good Hope, and east coast of South America; March 1, 1808.

India; May 1, 1808.

China, and the coast of South America; June 1, 1808.

And every vessel sailing on or after those days, from those places, respectively, shall be deemed and taken to have received notice of the aforesaid order; and it is further ordered, that, if any vessel shall sail within twenty days after the periods above assigned, respectively, from any of the said places, in contravention of the said order of the 11th of November instant, and shall be detained as prize on account thereof, or shall arrive at any port in this kingdom, destined to some port or place within the restriction of the said order, and proof shall be made to the satisfaction of the Court of Admiralty, in which such vessel shall be proceeded against, in case the same shall be brought in as prize, that the loading of the said vessel had commenced before the said periods, and before information of the said order had actually been received at the port of shipment, the said vessel, together with the goods so laden, shall be restored to the owner or owners thereof, and shall be permitted to proceed on her voyage in such manner as if such vessel had sailed before the day so specified as aforesaid: and it is further ordered, that no proof shall be admitted, or be gone into, for the purpose of showing that information of the said order of the 11th of November instant had not been received at the said places respectively, at the several periods before assigned: and the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judges of the High Court of Admiralty and Courts of Vice-Admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein as to them shall respectively appertain.

W. FAWKENER.

At the court at the Queen's Palace, the 25th of November, 1807: Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in council.

Whereas His Majesty, by his order in council, dated 11th November instant, respecting the trade to be carried on with His Majesty's enemies, was pleased to exempt from the restrictions of the said order all vessels which shall have cleared out from any port or place in this kingdom, under such regulations as His Majesty may think fit to prescribe, and shall be proceeding direct to the ports specified in the respective clearances; His Majesty, taking into consideration the expediency of making such regulations, is pleased, by and with the advice of his privy council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that all vessels, belonging to countries not at war with His Majesty, shall be permitted to lade in any port of the United Kingdom any goods being the produce or manufacture of His Majesty's dominions, or East India goods, or prize goods, (all such goods having been lawfully imported) and to clear out with, and freely to convey the same, to any port or place in any colony in the West Indies or America, belonging to His Majesty's enemies, such port or place not being in a state of actual blockade, subject to the payment of such duties as may at the time when any such vessels may be cleared out be due by law on the exportation of any such goods, or in respect of the same being destined to the ports of the colonies belonging to His Majesty's enemies; and likewise to lade, clear out with, and convey, as aforesaid, any articles of foreign produce or manufacture, which shall have been lawfully imported into this kingdom, provided His Majesty's license shall have been previously obtained for so conveying such foreign produce or manufactures: and it is further ordered, that any vessel, belonging as aforesaid, shall be permitted to lade in any port of the United Kingdom any goods, not being naval or military stores, which shall be of the growth, produce, or manufacture of this kingdom, or which shall have been lawfully imported, (save and except foreign sugar, coffee, wine, brandy, snuff, and cotton,) and to clear out with, and freely to convey the same to any port, to be specified in the clearance, not being in a state of actual blockade, although the same shall be under the restrictions of the said order; and likewise to lade, clear out, and convey foreign sugar, coffee, wine, brandy, snuff, and cotton, which shall have been lawfully imported, provided His Majesty's license shall have been previously obtained for the exportation and conveyance thereof: and it is hereby further ordered, that no vessel shall be permitted to clear out from any port or place in this kingdom to any port or place of any country subjected to the restrictions of the said order, with any goods which shall have been laden (after notice of the said order) on board the vessel which shall have imported the same into this kingdom, without having first duly entered and landed the same in some port or place in this kingdom; and that no vessel shall be permitted to clear out from any port or place in this kingdom to any port or place whatever, with any goods the produce or manufacture of any country subject to the restrictions of the said order, which shall have been laden after notice, as aforesaid, on board the vessel importing the same, without having so duly entered and landed the same; or any goods whatever which shall have been laden after such notice in the vessel importing the same, in any port or place of any country subjected to the restrictions of the said order, without having so duly entered and landed the same in some port or place in this kingdom, except the cargo shall consist wholly of flour, meal, grain, or any article or articles the produce of the soil of some country which is not subjected to the restrictions of the said order, except cotton, and which shall have been imported in an unmanufactured state direct from such country into this kingdom, in a vessel belonging to the country from which such goods have been brought, and in which the same were grown and produced.

And it is further ordered, that any vessel belonging to any country not at war with His Majesty may clear out from Guernsey, Jersey, or Man, to any port or place under the restrictions of the said order, which shall be specified in the clearance, not being in a state of actual blockade, with such articles only not being naval or military stores, as shall have been legally imported into such islands respectively from any port or place in this kingdom direct; and with respect to all such articles as may have been imported into the said islands, respectively, from any port or place under the restrictions of the said order, it shall not be permitted to any vessel to clear out with the same from any of the said islands, except to some port or place in this kingdom: and the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judges of the High Court of Admiralty and Courts of Vice-Admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein as to them shall respectively appertain.

W. FAWKENER.

At the court at the Queen's Palace, the 25th of November, 1807: Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in council.

Whereas His Majesty, by his order in council, dated the 11th of November instant, respecting the trade to be carried on with His Majesty's enemies, was pleased to exempt from the restrictions of the said order all vessels belonging to any country not at war with His Majesty, together with their cargo, which shall be coming from any port or place in Europe which is declared in the said order to be subject to the restrictions incident to a state of blockade, direct to some port or place in Europe belonging to His Majesty; and also all vessels which shall be cleared out from Gibraltar or Malta, under such regulations as His Majesty may think fit to prescribe, and which shall be proceeding direct to the ports specified in their respective clearances:

And whereas it is expedient to encourage the trade from Gibraltar and Malta to countries under the restrictions of the said order, subject to regulations to be made in respect thereto; His Majesty is therefore pleased to prescribe the following regulations in regard to such trade accordingly, and by and with the advice of his privy council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that all sorts of flour and meal, and all sorts of grain, tobacco, and any other article in an unmanufactured state, being the growth and produce of any country not being subjected by the said order to the restrictions incident to a state of blockade, except cotton and naval and military stores, which shall have been imported into Gibraltar or Malta direct from the country where the same were grown and produced, shall, without any license, be permitted to be cleared out to any port or place not being in a state of actual blockade, without the same being compelled to be landed: but neither the said article of cotton, however imported, nor any article which is not the growth, produce, or manufacture of this kingdom, or which has not been imported in a British ship, or from this kingdom direct, (except fish,) and which shall have been laden at the port of original shipment after the period directed by an order of this date to be taken as the time at which notice of the said order of the 11th of November shall be considered as having been received at such port of shipment, shall be permitted to be exported from Gibraltar or Malta, except to some port or place in this kingdom; and all other articles of the growth, produce, and manufacture of this kingdom, or which shall have been imported into Gibraltar or Malta in a British ship, or from some port or place in this kingdom, together with the article of fish, however imported, may be exported to any ports or places in the Mediterranean or Portugal, under such license only as is hereinafter directed to be granted by the Governor of Gibraltar and Malta respectively.

And it is hereby further ordered, that licenses be granted by the Governors, Lieutenant Governors, or other persons having the chief civil command at Gibraltar or at Malta, respectively, but in His Majesty's name, to such person or persons as the said Governors, Lieutenant Governors, or persons having the chief civil command, shall think fit, allowing such person or persons to export from Gibraltar direct to any port in the Mediterranean, or to any port of Portugal, or to any port of Spain without the Mediterranean, not further north than Cape Finisterre, and from Malta direct to any port being within the Mediterranean, with any articles of the produce or manufacture of His Majesty's dominions, and any articles which shall have been imported into Gibraltar or Malta from this kingdom, to whomsoever such articles shall appear to belong, (not being naval or military stores,) in any vessel belonging to any country not at war with His Majesty, or in any vessel not exceeding one hundred tons burthen, and being unarmed, belonging to the country to which such vessel shall be cleared out and going; and also to import in any such vessel or vessels, as aforesaid, from any port within the Mediterranean, to Gibraltar or Malta, or from any port in Portugal or Spain, as aforesaid, to Gibraltar; such port and such destination respectively to be specified in such license, any articles of merchandise whatsoever, and to whomsoever the same may appear to belong; such articles to be specified in the bill of lading of such vessel, subject, however, to such further regulations and restrictions, with respect to all or any of the said articles so to be imported or exported, as may be inserted in the said licenses by the Governors, Lieutenant Governors, or other persons having the chief civil command at Gibraltar or Malta, for the time being, respectively, as to them shall from time to time seem fit and expedient.

And it is further ordered, that in every such license shall be inserted the names and residence of the person or persons to whom it shall be granted, the articles, and their quantities permitted to be exported, the name and description of the vessel, and of the master thereof, the port to which the vessel shall be allowed to go, which shall be some port not under actual blockade; and that no license so to be granted shall continue in force for longer than two months from its date, nor for more than one voyage; nor any such license be granted, or acknowledged to be valid if granted, to permit the clearance of any vessel to any port which shall be actually blockaded by any naval force of His Majesty or of his allies.

And it is further ordered, that the commanders of His Majesty's ships of war and privateers, and all other whom it may concern, shall suffer every such vessel sailing conformably to the permission given by this order, or having any license as aforesaid, to pass and repass direct between Gibraltar or Malta, and such port as shall be specified in the license, in such manner, and under such terms, regulations, and restrictions, as shall be expressed therein.

And it is further ordered, that, in case any vessel so sailing as aforesaid, for which any such license as aforesaid shall have been granted, and which shall be proceeding direct upon her said voyage, shall be detained and brought in for legal adjudication, such vessel, with her cargo, shall be forthwith released by the Court of Admiralty or Vice-Admiralty in which proceedings shall be commenced, upon proof being made that the parties had duly conformed to the terms, regulations, and restrictions of the said license; the proof of such conformity to lie upon the person or persons claiming the benefit of this order, or obtaining or using such licence, or claiming the benefit thereof.

And it is hereby further ordered, that no vessel belonging to any State on the coast of Barbary shall be prevented from sailing with any articles of the growth or produce of such State, from any port or place in such State, to any port or place in the Mediterranean or Portugal, such port or place not being actually blockaded by some naval force belonging to His Majesty or his allies, without being obliged to touch at Gibraltar or Malta.

And the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judges of the High Court of Admiralty and Courts of Vice-Admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein as to them shall respectively appertain.

W. FAWKENER.

At the court at the Queen's Palace, the 25th of November, 1807: Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in council.

Whereas His Majesty, by his order in council of the 11th of November instant, was pleased to order and declare that all trade in articles which are of the produce or manufacture of the countries and colonies mentioned in the said order, shall be deemed and considered to be unlawful, (except as is therein excepted;) His Majesty, by and with the advice of his privy council, is pleased to order and declare, and it is hereby ordered and declared, that nothing in the said order contained shall extend to subject to capture and confiscation any articles of the produce and manufacture of the said countries and colonies laden on board British ships, which would not have been subject to capture and confiscation if such order had not been made.

And the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judges of the High Court of Admiralty and Courts of Vice-Admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein as to them shall respectively appertain.

At the court at the Queen's Palace, the 25th of November, 1807: Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in council.

His Majesty, taking into consideration the circumstances under which Portugal has been compelled to shut her ports against the ships and goods of His Majesty's subjects, is pleased, by and with the advice of his privy council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that all ships and goods belonging to Portugal, which have been and are now detained in the ports of this kingdom or elsewhere, shall be restored, upon being pronounced by the High Court of Admiralty, or by the Court of Vice-Admiralty in which proceedings may have been or shall be commenced, to belong to subjects and inhabitants of Portugal, and not otherwise liable to confiscation; and that the said ships and goods shall be permitted to proceed to any neutral port or to Portugal: and it is further ordered, that the ships and goods belonging to Portugal shall not, until further orders, be liable to detention; provided such ships and goods shall be trading to or from any port of this kingdom, or to and from Gibraltar or Malta, and proceeding direct to the port specified in their clearance, or between neutral port and neutral port, or between Portugal and the ports of her own colonies, or from any port of His Majesty's allies, and proceeding direct to the ports specified in their respective clearances; provided such ports shall not be at the time in a state of actual blockade: and it is further ordered, that the ships of Portugal shall not be considered as entitled, under any treaty between His Majesty and Portugal, to protect any goods laden therein which may be otherwise subject to confiscation.

And the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judges of the High Court of Admiralty and Courts of Vice-Admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein as to them shall respectively appertain.

CIRCULAR.

FOREIGN OFFICE, January 8, 1808.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's commands to acquaint Mr. Pinkney that His Majesty has judged it expedient to establish the most rigorous blockade at the entrances of the ports of Carthagea, Cadiz, and St. Lucar, and of all the intermediate ports, situated and lying between the ports of Carthagea and St. Lucar. Mr. Pinkney is, therefore, requested to apprize the American consuls and merchants residing in England, that the entrances of all the ports above mentioned are, and must be, considered as being in a state of blockade; and that, from this time, all the measures authorized by the law of nations, and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different Powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to vessels attempting to violate the said blockade after this notice.

GEORGE CANNING.

WM. PINKNEY, Esq., &c.

ANNO QUADRAGESIMO OCTAVO

GEORGH III. REGIS.

CAP. XXVI.

An act for granting to His Majesty, until the end of the next session of Parliament, duties of customs on the goods, wares, and merchandise therein enumerated, in furtherance of the provisions of certain orders in council. March 28, 1808.

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN:

Whereas measures which have been taken by Powers at war with your Majesty, prohibiting, in violation of the law of nations, all intercourse with this kingdom, and all trade in any articles of its growth or manufacture, have rendered it necessary for your Majesty to issue orders in council to counteract the disadvantages which were thereby imposed upon the trade of your Majesty's subjects, and to retaliate upon the enemy the evils which he intended to inflict upon this kingdom; and whereas it is expedient and necessary, in order effectually to accomplish the object of such orders, that duties of customs should be granted upon certain goods exported from Great Britain: we, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom, in Parliament assembled, do most humbly beseech your Majesty: that it may be enacted:—

And be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That, from and after the passing of this act, there shall be raised, levied, collected, and paid, unto His Majesty, his heirs, and successors, upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, enumerated or described in the tables A, B, and C, annexed to this act, exported from Great Britain, the several duties of customs, as the same are respectively described and set forth in figures in the said tables.

And be it further enacted, That the duties granted and imposed by this act, and made payable according to the weight, tale, gauge, measure, or value of any goods, wares, or merchandise charged with such duties, shall be charged and payable upon any greater or less weight, number, quantity, or value thereof than the weight, number, quantity or value particularly inserted, described, and set forth in the tables hereunto annexed, marked A, B, and C, in proportion to the actual weight, number, quantity, or value of such goods, wares, or merchandise.

And be it further enacted, That, where any goods, wares, and merchandise, which are allowed to be, or shall have been, warehoused or otherwise secured at the time of the importation thereof, without payment of the duties due thereon, shall be taken out, or entered inwards for home consumption, and the duties of customs and excise then due thereon shall have been paid, and the same shall afterwards be entered for exportation; then, and in every such case, the duties of customs by this act imposed shall be paid on the exportation of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, notwithstanding the payment of any drawbacks to which the exporter thereof may, in such case, under any law or laws then in force, be entitled.

And whereas, by an order in council, dated the twenty-fifth of November, one thousand eight hundred and seven, it was ordered and declared that information of a certain other order in council, of the eleventh of November, one thousand eight hundred and seven, should be taken and held to have been received in the places hereinafter mentioned, at the periods respectively assigned to them, namely: ports and places within the Baltic, on the twenty-first of December, one thousand eight hundred and seven; other ports and places to the northward of Amsterdam, on the eleventh of December, one thousand eight hundred and seven; from Amsterdam to Ushant, on the fourth of December, one thousand eight hundred and seven; from Ushant to Cape Finisterre, on the eighth of December, one thousand eight hundred and seven; from Cape Finisterre to Gibraltar, inclusive, on the thirteenth of December, one thousand eight hundred and seven; Madeira, the thirteenth of December, one thousand eight hundred and seven; ports and places within the Straits of Gibraltar to Sicily and Malta, and the west coasts of Italy, inclusive, on the 1st of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight; all other ports and places in the Mediterranean beyond Sicily and Malta, on the twentieth of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight; ports and places beyond the Dardanelles, on the first of February, one thousand eight hundred and eight; any part of the north and western coast of Africa, or the islands adjacent, except Madeira, on the eleventh of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight; the United States and British possessions in North America and the West Indies, on the twentieth of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight; Cape of Good Hope and the east coast of South America, on the first of March, one thousand eight hundred and eight; India, on the first of May, one thousand eight hundred and eight; China and the coast of South America, on the first of June, one thousand eight hundred and eight: Be it therefore enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend to prevent any vessel which shall have sailed from any such port or place before the period above specified as aforesaid, and which shall have been brought into or shall have come into any port in Great Britain under any warning given in pursuance of any of the said orders in council, from proceeding on her voyage to any port or place whatever, without entering or landing any part of her cargo in Great Britain, (except cotton wool, or yarn, or Jesuit's bark,) and without the payment of any duty granted by this act upon any part of the cargo (except cotton wool, or yarn, or Jesuit's bark;) Provided, always, That, if the port or place to which such vessel shall proceed shall belong to a country in amity with His Majesty, and from which the British flag is not excluded, such vessel shall, in that case, be permitted to proceed, without being compelled to land any part of her cargo, or to pay any duty imposed by this act, in respect of the same.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend to charge with any of the duties granted by this act any goods, wares, or merchandise (except cotton wool, or yarn, and Jesuit's bark) imported into Great Britain in any vessel, under any license bearing date before the 11th day of November last, or in any vessel which shall have been cleared out from the port or place from which such goods, wares, or merchandise were imported before the period in this act specified, as to such port or place as the period at which the said orders in council shall be taken and held to have been received, in any cases in which the said goods, wares, or merchandise shall, upon their importation, have been or shall be warehoused for exportation only.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend to charge with any of the duties granted by this act any goods, wares, or merchandise on the exportation from Great Britain, (except cotton wool, or yarn, or Jesuit's bark,) which shall have been or shall be imported into Great Britain prior to the first day of June, one thousand eight hundred and eight, from any free port in any of His Majesty's plantations in the West Indies, or any other port or place, under any license from the Governor of any of His Majesty's plantations duly authorized for that purpose, bearing date prior to the twenty-first day of January last, in case such goods, wares, or merchandise, shall, on their importation into Great Britain, have been or shall be warehoused for exportation only.

Provided also, and be it further enacted, That no goods, wares, or merchandise described in the said tables A and B, of the growth and produce of St. Domingo, which shall have been or shall be imported into Great Britain by license, in return for goods exported to the said island, bearing date prior to the fifth of February, one thousand eight hundred and eight, and which shall have been or shall be warehoused for exportation, shall be liable, on the exportation thereof, to any of the duties of customs granted by this act; and all such goods, wares, and merchandise, the growth and produce of St. Domingo, which shall have been or shall be imported into Great Britain under any license bearing date subsequently to the said fifth day of February, shall, upon the exportation thereof from Great Britain, be chargeable with and subject and liable to one half part only of the duties of customs granted by this act upon goods, wares, and merchandise of the like description, upon their exportation from Great Britain.

And be it further enacted, That all goods, wares, or merchandise, which have been or may be condemned as prize, shall, on the exportation thereof from Great Britain, be charged with and subject and liable to the duties by this act imposed on the exportation of the like goods, wares, or merchandise respectively, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary, notwithstanding: Provided always, That nothing in this act contained shall extend to charge with any of the duties granted by this act, any goods, wares, or merchandise (except cotton wool, or yarn, or Jesuit's bark,) which shall have been or shall be brought into any port in Great Britain for adjudication before the passing of this act, whether the same shall have been or shall be subsequently restored or condemned as prize.

And be it further enacted, That the duties of customs described and set forth in figures in the said tables hereunto annexed, marked A, B, and C, on the several goods, wares, and merchandise specified therein, shall be paid to the proper officer authorized to receive the duties of customs on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into Great Britain, and may and shall respectively be managed, ascertained, raised, levied, collected, answered, paid, and recovered, except where any alteration is expressly made by this act, in such and the like manner, and by the same means, ways, or methods, as former duties of customs upon goods, wares, or merchandise, in general, and also by any such special means, ways, or methods, respectively, as former duties of customs upon goods, wares, or merchandise of the same sorts or kinds were or might be managed, ascertained, raised, levied, collected, answered, paid, and recovered; and the goods, wares, or merchandise whereon duties of customs are by this act charged, as the same are respectively inserted, described, and set forth in the said tables, upon exportation thereof from Great Britain, shall be, and the same are hereby made subject and liable to all and every the conditions, regulations, securities, rules, restrictions, seizures and forfeitures, to which goods, wares, or merchandise, in general, and also all and every the special conditions, rules, regulations, restrictions, seizures, sales, and forfeitures, respectively, to which the like goods, wares, or merchandise were subject and liable by any act or acts of Parliament in force on and immediately before the passing of this act, respecting the revenue of customs, except where any alteration is expressly made by this act; and all pains, penalties, fines, and forfeitures, of whatever nature or kind the same may be, as well pains of death as others, for any offence whatever committed against or in breach of any act or acts of Parliament in force on or immediately before the passing of this act, made for securing the revenue of customs, or for the regulation or improvement thereof, and the several clauses, powers, provisoes, and directions contained in any such act or acts, shall (unless where expressly altered by this act) extend to, and be respectively applied, practised, and put in execution, in respect of the several duties of customs hereby charged, in as full and ample a manner, to all intents and purposes whatever, as if all and every the said acts, clauses, provisoes, powers, directions, fines, pains, penalties, or forfeitures, were particularly repeated and re-enacted in the body of this act, and made part thereof.

And be it further enacted, That in all cases where, by the said tables, the duties of custom by this act imposed upon the exportation of goods, wares, and merchandise from Great Britain, are charged, not according to the weight, tale, gauge, or measure, but according to the value thereof; such value shall be considered as the same shall be at the port of exportation, without any deduction or abatement whatever; and such value shall be ascertained by the declaration of the exporter or proprietor of such goods, wares, or merchandise, or his known agent, in the manner and form, and under all the rules, regulations, and restrictions, and subject to the same forfeitures and penalties, as are prescribed and directed for ascertaining and collecting the duties to be paid upon goods, wares, and merchandise, according to the value thereof, by an act passed in the twenty-seventh year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled, "An act for repealing the several duties of customs and excise, and granting other duties in lieu thereof, and for applying the said duties, together with the other duties composing the public revenue, for permitting the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise, the produce or manufacture of the European dominions of the French King, into this kingdom, and for applying certain unclaimed moneys remaining in the exchequer for the payment of annuities on lives to the reduction of the national debt;" and in case any goods, wares, or merchandise, chargeable with any such duty by this act, according to value, shall not be valued according to the true price or value thereof, and according to the true intent and meaning of this act, then it shall be lawful for the proper officer or officers of the customs to cause the same to be detained; and the said goods, wares, and merchandise shall be dealt with, and the proper officers of the customs shall proceed, with relation to the said goods, wares, and merchandise so detained, in every respect in the manner prescribed in such case by the said recited act.

And be it further enacted, That in case any goods, wares, or merchandise, upon which duties of custom are hereby imposed, shall be detained by any officer of the customs, on account of the same not being valued according to the true and real value thereof, and according to the true intent and meaning of this act, it shall be lawful for the commissioners of His Majesty's customs in England and Scotland, respectively, for the time being, or any three or more of them, respectively, upon proof being made to their satisfaction that no fraud was intended, to direct the entry to be amended, upon such terms and conditions as, under the circumstances of the case, shall appear to the said commissioners of the customs in England and Scotland, respectively, to be reasonable, and as they shall think fit to direct: Provided always, that, if the importer, exporter, or proprietor of such goods, wares, or merchandise, shall accept the terms or conditions prescribed by the said commissioners of the customs, respectively, such importer, exporter, or proprietor shall not have or be entitled to any recompense or damage on account of the detention of such goods, wares, or merchandise, or have or maintain any action whatever for the same; any law, custom, or usage to the contrary, notwithstanding.

And be it further enacted, That such of the duties of customs, by this act imposed, as shall arise in that part of Great Britain called England, shall be under the management of the commissioners of the customs in England for the time being; and such thereof as shall arise in that part of Great Britain called Scotland, shall be under the management of the commissioners of the customs in Scotland for the time being.

And be it further enacted, That in case the whole or any part of the cargo of any vessel, which shall arrive in any port of Great Britain, shall consist of any goods, wares, or merchandise whatever, of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any country or place within the limits of the charter granted to the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, such vessel shall forthwith proceed to the port of London, where all such goods, wares, and merchandise shall be landed, lodged, and secured, under His Majesty's lock, in some of the warehouses belonging to the said united company, at the expense of the proprietors of such goods, wares, and merchandise, and be there examined, and an account taken thereof by the proper officers of the customs and of the excise, in cases where that revenue is concerned, and such goods, wares, and merchandise shall remain so secured until the exportation thereof; and, before any such goods, wares, and merchandise shall be taken out of such warehouse for the purpose of exportation, the several duties of customs, as the same are described and set forth in figures in the table hereunto annexed, marked C, shall be first paid to the proper officer of the customs; and in those cases in the said table, marked C, where the duties to be paid on the exportation of any such goods, wares, and merchandise shall not be charged according to the weight, tale, gauge, or measure, but according to the value thereof, such value shall be ascertained by the declaration of the proprietor, or his known agent, in the manner and form, and under the rules, regulations, and restrictions, and subject to the same forfeitures and penalties as are prescribed and imposed for ascertaining and collecting duties to be paid according to the value thereof, by the said recited act passed in the twenty-seventh year of his present Majesty; and, in case any such goods, wares, or merchandise shall not be valued according to the true and real value thereof, then it shall be lawful for the proper officer or officers of the customs to cause the same to be detained, and the said goods, wares, and merchandise shall be dealt with, and the proper officers of the customs shall proceed, in the manner prescribed in such case by the said recited act: Provided always, That such goods, wares, or merchandise so detained (cotton wool excepted) shall be sold only for the purpose of being exported from Great Britain, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, also, That, in case any part of the cargo of any such ship or vessel, so consisting in part of East Indian goods, wares, or merchandise, as aforesaid, shall consist of goods, wares, or merchandise, not being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any country or place within the limits of the charter granted to the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, such last mentioned goods, wares, and merchandise shall be duly entered, either to be secured or lodged in warehouses, according to the rules, regulations, and restrictions of an act passed in the forty-third year of his present Majesty, entitled "An act for permitting certain goods imported into Great Britain to be secured in warehouse without payment of duty;" and of a certain other act, passed in the forty-fifth year of his present Majesty, entitled "An act to authorize the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury to permit certain articles to be warehoused in different ports in Great Britain, upon giving security for the payment of duties upon the articles therein mentioned;" and of a certain other act, passed in the forty-sixth year of his said Majesty, entitled "An act to extend the provisions of an act made in the forty-third year of his present Majesty, for permitting certain articles to be warehoused in Great Britain, to other articles not therein mentioned, and to alter the condition of the bond directed to be given by an act of the twenty-fourth year of his present Majesty, by the masters and owners of vessels and boats licensed by the Lords of the Admiralty, provided such goods, wares, and merchandise, by law, may be so lodged or secured; otherwise the full duties of customs and of excise, (in cases where any such duties are payable on such goods, wares, and merchandise) due thereon, shall be paid to the proper officers of the customs and excise; and all such goods, wares, and merchandise, so brought into the port of London, shall, on the exportation thereof, be charged with the duties due and payable by this act on any such goods, wares, and merchandise, respectively, as the same are described and set forth in the tables hereunto annexed, marked A and B, as the case may be."

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the collector and comptroller of the customs of any port in Great Britain, by the report of any vessel which shall arrive at such port with any cargo, part whereof shall consist of goods, wares, or merchandise of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any country or place within the limits of the charter granted to the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, that such goods, wares, and merchandise do not exceed in value one-fourth part of the whole value of the cargo of such vessel, then, and in such case, it shall be lawful for the owner, consignee, or captain of such vessel, after giving such security as shall be directed by the commissioners of the customs in England and Scotland respectively, or any three of them, for the due conveyance of such goods, wares, and merchandise as aforesaid to the port of London, there to be warehoused as aforesaid, and not before to land the cargo of such vessel at the port of her arrival, except such goods, wares, and merchandise as aforesaid, and either to cause such goods, wares, and merchandise to be conveyed in the same ship to the port of London, or to cause the same to be transhipped, in order to be conveyed to the said port, upon the said security, and under such regulations and restrictions for securing the conveying the same to the said port, as shall be directed by the commissioners of the customs in England and Scotland respectively.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That the proprietor or proprietors of any goods, wares, or merchandise, brought into Great Britain, may, if he or they shall be so disposed, instead of paying the full duties of customs and excise due and payable thereon, secure or lodge in warehouses, approved by the commissioners of the customs of England or Scotland, respectively, without payment of duty in the first instance, any goods, wares, and merchandise, which, by virtue of any law in force at the time of passing this act, are allowed to be so secured and warehoused, under the conditions and regulations of the said recited acts passed in the forty-third, forty-fifth, and forty-sixth years of his present Majesty, respectively; and all such goods, wares, and merchandise, so warehoused, on which the full duties of customs and excise shall have been paid, shall, on the exportation thereof, be subject and liable to, and be charged with the duties of customs imposed by this act, as inserted and set forth in the tables hereunto annexed, as the case may be.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the commissioners of customs, or any three or more of them, upon the request of the owner, proprietor, or consignee of any goods, wares, or merchandise warehoused, to destroy the same, in such manner as they shall respectively direct, without payment of duty, and upon payment only of any charges and expenses due thereon.

And be it further enacted, That the importers, proprietors, or consignees of any goods, wares, or merchandises, which shall have been lodged in warehouses, or otherwise secured, according to the directions of the said recited act passed in the forty-third year of his present Majesty, or any other act or acts of Parliament, by virtue and under the authority of which any such goods, wares, or merchandise shall have been so lodged or secured, shall, within fifteen calendar months, to be computed from the day on which such importers, proprietors, or consignees of such goods, wares, or merchandise, shall have made their first entry thereof, clear and take from and out of such warehouses or places, respectively, all such goods, wares, and merchandise, either for the purpose of being exported according to the directions of this act, on payment of the duties hereby imposed, or to be used or consumed in Great Britain: Provided always, That such goods, wares, and merchandise may legally be taken out for that purpose, on payment of the full duties of customs and excise that are or may be due or payable thereon at the time the same are so taken out; and in case any such importers, proprietors, or consignees, shall fail or neglect so to do, it shall be lawful for the commissioners of the customs in England or Scotland, respectively, to cause all such goods, wares, or merchandise to be publicly sold or exposed to sale; and, after such sale, the produce thereof shall first be applied to or towards the payment of the freight, primage, and charges of warehouse room, and other charges that shall arise thereon, next to the duties of customs and excise, and the overplus (if any) shall be paid the proprietor, or other persons authorized to receive the same: Provided always, That in case any goods, wares, or merchandise, so remaining and directed to be sold, shall be of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any country or place within the limits of the charter granted to the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, or any goods, wares, and merchandise which shall be prohibited to be used or consumed in Great Britain, then, and in such case, all such goods, wares, or merchandise shall be sold only for the purpose of being exported, and not on any pretence whatever to be used or consumed in Great Britain: Provided, That no such goods, wares, or merchandise shall be so sold, unless a price can be obtained for the same equal, at least, to the full amount of all duties of customs and excise, charged and chargeable thereon, together with the expenses; but if such price cannot be obtained, then, and in such case, all such goods, wares, or merchandise shall be effectually destroyed by and in the presence of the proper officers of the customs, and also the officers of the excise, in case any duties of excise are payable thereon, who are hereby respectively authorized and required to destroy the same accordingly; and the proprietor or owner of such goods, wares, and merchandise, shall have no claim, either in law or equity, to the value of such goods, wares, or merchandise, or any part thereof, so destroyed as aforesaid, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary, notwithstanding: Provided always, That all such goods, wares, and merchandise may be re-exported to the country from which they were brought, or to the country from which the vessel in which such goods, wares, or merchandise were imported shall belong, or shall have belonged, without payment of the duties imposed by this act, and upon payment only of such warehouse or port duties as shall have become due thereon: Provided, That the British flag shall not, at the time of such re-exportation, be excluded from such country respectively.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to charge the duties imposed by this act on any goods, wares, or merchandise whatever that shall be exported from Great Britain to that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland, or on any goods, wares, or merchandise, the growth, produce, or manufacture of Ireland, having been imported from thence directly to Great Britain, on the exportation thereof to any country whatever.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to charge the duties by this act imposed on the exportation of any flour, or meal, or articles not being either in the whole or in any part manufactured, being of the growth or produce of any State in Europe or America in amity with His Majesty, and imported in any ship belonging to such State, or in any British ship navigated according to law directly from any such State (except coffee, sugar, pimento, cocoa-nuts, hides, tallow, oil, and cotton wool, or yarn, or Jesuit's bark.)

Provided also, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to charge with the duties imposed by this act any goods, wares, or merchandise, of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any British colony, plantation, or settlement in Africa or America, which shall have been imported directly from such colony, plantation, or settlement, respectively, and exported to any port or place whatever.

Provided also, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to charge with the duties imposed by this act any goods, wares, or merchandise that shall have been imported by the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, or by any subjects of His Majesty trading within the limits of the charter of the said company, with their license, upon the exportation of such goods, wares, or merchandise from Great Britain to any port or places whatever.

Provided also, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to charge the duty by this act imposed on any wine, spirits, or tobacco, which shall be shipped for the use of His Majesty's army or navy; but such wine, spirits, or tobacco, shall be subject and liable to all and every the rules, regulations, and conditions, limitations, securities, penalties, and forfeitures, to which such articles so shipped would have been subject and liable if this act had not been made.

Provided also, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to charge with the duties by this act imposed any goods, wares, or merchandise, exported from Great Britain to the Isle of Man, by virtue and under the authority of any license which the Commissioners of His Majesty's Customs in England or Scotland, or any three or more of them, respectively, are, or may be, by law, authorized and empowered to grant.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That the duties by this act imposed on goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from Great Britain, shall not be charged, or payable on any goods, wares, or merchandise, not manufactured, either in the whole or in part, nor upon any wine, or any article of provision, (spirits excepted) exported to any British colony, plantation, or settlement, in Africa or America, or to any British settlement within the limits of the charter granted to the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, any thing in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

And be it further enacted, That no ship or vessel of the United States of America which shall enter any port in Great Britain or Ireland, in consequence of her having been warned not to proceed to a blockaded port under His Majesty's order in council of the eleventh of November, one thousand eight hundred and seven, shall be liable to be charged with the duty of two shillings a ton of the burthen of any ship or vessel belonging to the inhabitants of the said United States, imposed by an act of the thirty-seventh year of His Majesty's reign, which has been continued and revived by several subsequent acts.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing herein contained, shall extend to affect or take away any of the rights or privileges of the West India Dock Company, of the London Dock Company, or of the East India Dock Company.

And be it further enacted, That the duties granted and imposed by this act shall continue in force until the end of the next session of Parliament, unless His Majesty, by his order in council, shall think fit to suspend or reduce the same, or any part thereof.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for His Majesty, at any time, by order in council, to suspend the operation of this act as to any duties, or proportion or part of any duties, granted by this act, in respect of any country for the time being in amity with His Majesty, and to allow the exportation to any such country so in amity with His Majesty as aforesaid, of any goods, wares, and merchandise, made subject by this act to any duties on exportation, without the payment of such duties, upon such terms and conditions, and subject to such restrictions, as to His Majesty may seem fit.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend to prevent His Majesty from prohibiting the exportation of any articles, matters, or things, to any country or place from which the British flag is excluded, in any case in which it would have been lawful for His Majesty to prohibit such exportation if this act had not passed.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That the duties imposed by an act, passed in the forty-third year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled An act for granting to His Majesty, during the present war, and until the ratification of a definitive treaty of peace, additional duties on the importation and exportation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise, and on the tonnage of ships and vessels in Great Britain; on certain goods, wares, and merchandise therein enumerated and described, and which, by another act passed in the forty-third year of his present Majesty's reign entitled An act for permitting certain goods imported into Great Britain to be secured in warehouse without payment of duty, were directed to be paid on all such goods, wares, and merchandise, sugar excepted, which should be exported from the warehouses or places in which such goods, wares, and merchandise had been lodged or secured, under the directions of the said last recited act, shall not be due or payable on any such goods, wares, and merchandise so exported, on which other duties are charged, according to the table marked A, hereunto annexed; but that the duties on any such goods, wares, and merchandise, as set forth in the said table, shall, during the continuance of such duties, be instead and in lieu of the duties charged and imposed thereon by the said two last recited acts passed in the forty-third year of his present Majesty's reign.

And be it further enacted, That all the moneys arising from the duties of custom by this act imposed (the necessary charge of raising and accounting for the same excepted,) shall, from time to time, be paid into the receipt of His Majesty's exchequer at Westminster, distinctly and apart from all other branches of the public revenue; and that there shall be provided and kept in the office of the auditor of the said receipt of exchequer a book, or books, in which all the moneys arising from the said duties, and paid into the said receipt, as aforesaid, shall be entered separate and apart from all other moneys paid and payable to His Majesty, his heirs and successors, upon any account whatever; and the said moneys paid in as aforesaid, into the receipt of His Majesty's exchequer, shall from time to time, as the same shall be paid into the said receipt, be issued and applied to such services as shall then have been voted by the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in this present session of Parliament, for the service of the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, or shall be voted by the said Commons for the service of any subsequent year.

And be it further enacted, That if any action or suit shall be brought or commenced against any person or persons for any thing done in pursuance of this act, or of any order in council referred to in this act, such action or suit shall be commenced within three calendar months next after the fact committed, and not afterwards, and shall be laid in the county or place where the cause of complaint did arise, and not elsewhere; and the defendant or defendants in every such action or suit may plead the general issue, and give this act and the special matter in evidence at any trial to be had thereupon; and if the jury shall find for the defendant or defendants in any such action or suit, or if the plaintiff or plaintiffs shall be nonsuited, or discontinue his or their action or suit after the defendant or defendants shall have appeared, or if, upon demurrer, judgment shall be given against the plaintiff or plaintiffs, the defendant or defendants shall have treble costs, and have the like remedy for the same, as any defendant has in other cases to recover costs by law.

And be it further enacted, That this act may be varied, altered, or repealed, by any act or acts to be made in this present session of Parliament.

TABLES TO WHICH THIS ACT REFERS.

A.

A table of duties of customs, payable on the exportation of certain foreign goods, wares, and merchandise, therein enumerated or described, not being imported by the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, (which, on importation, are allowed to be secured under the regulations of 43 Geo. III. cap. 132; 45 Geo. III. cap. 87; and 46 Geo. III. cap. 137, without payment of the duties due thereon,) and which shall be exported from Great Britain, except as is provided in the act to which this table is annexed.

GEORGE R.

Instructions to the commanders of our ships of war and privateers. Given at our court at Windsor, the 11th day of April, 1808, in the forty-eighth year of our reign.

Our will and pleasure is, that you do not interrupt any neutral vessel laden with lumber and provisions, and going to any of our colonies, islands, or settlements, in the West Indies or South America, to whomsoever the property may appear to belong, and notwithstanding such vessel may not have regular clearances and documents on board; and in case any vessel shall be met with, and being on her due course to the alleged port of destination, an endorsement shall be made on one or more of the principal papers of such vessels, specifying the destination alleged, and the place where the vessel was so visited. And in case any vessel so laden shall arrive and deliver her cargo at any of our colonies, islands, or settlements aforesaid, such vessel shall be permitted to receive her freight, and to depart, either in ballast, or with any goods that may be legally exported in such vessel, and to proceed to any unblockaded port, notwithstanding the present hostilities, or any future hostilities which may take place; and a passport for such vessel shall be granted to the vessel by the governor, or other person having the chief civil command of such colony, island, or settlement.

CAP. XXXIV.

An act to prohibit, until the end of the next session of Parliament, the exportation of cotton wool from Great Britain.—14th April, 1808.

Whereas it is expedient to prohibit, for a limited time, the exportation of cotton wool from Great Britain, except in the manner hereinafter mentioned; Be it therefore enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That from and after the passing of this act, no person or persons whatever shall, directly or indirectly, export, carry, or convey, or cause or procure to be exported, carried, or conveyed out of or from any port or place in Great Britain, or shall load or lay on board, or cause or procure to be laden or laid on board, in any ship, or other vessel or boat, any cotton wool, in order to be carried, exported, or conveyed out of any such port or place, except to Ireland, and also except as hereinafter is provided.

2. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for His Majesty, by any license under his royal sign-manual, to authorize any person to export from Great Britain, for his or their own account, or for account of any subject or subjects of any State in amity with His Majesty, any cotton wool, under such regulations, restrictions, and securities, as may be specified in the said license.

3. And be it further enacted, That all cotton wool, which shall be so exported, carried, or conveyed in or laid on board any ship, or other vessel or boat, in order to be exported, carried, or conveyed out of Great Britain, contrary to this act, shall be forfeited; and that every offender therein shall forfeit also the sum of forty shillings for every pound weight of such cotton wool which shall be so exported, carried, or conveyed, or so laden in, or laid on board any ship, or other vessel or boat, in order to be exported, carried, or conveyed out of Great Britain; and also the ship, vessel, or boat, wherein the same shall be exported, or in or upon which the same shall be laden or laid, in order to be exported, together with her guns, furniture, ammunition tackle, and apparel, shall be forfeited; and the same respectively may be seized by any officer or officers of the customs.

4. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend to prevent any cotton wool being carried coastwise, upon any certificate which shall be directed to be given by the commissioners of the customs in that behalf.

5. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures created and incurred by this act shall and may be sued for, prosecuted, recovered, and disposed of, in such manner, and by such ways, means, and methods, as any penalties incurred on any goods, ships, or vessels, forfeited for any offence against the laws of customs, may now be legally sued for, prosecuted, recovered, and disposed of; and the officer or officers concerned in seizures or prosecutions under this act, shall be entitled to and receive such share of the produce arising from the seizures as they are now by law entitled to, upon prosecution of seizures for unlawful importation, and to such share of the produce arising from any pecuniary fine or penalty, or composition paid for any offence against this act, as they are now by any law or regulation entitled to upon prosecution for pecuniary penalties.

6. And be it further enacted, That all personal actions and suits, indictments, informations, and all prosecutions and proceedings whatsoever, which have been, or shall hereafter be prosecuted or commenced against any person or persons, for having refused to receive any entry or entries for the exportation of any cotton wool, or to clear out any ship or vessel laden with cotton wool intended to be exported before the passing of this act, are and shall be discharged and made void by virtue of this act; and that if any action or suit shall be prosecuted or commenced against any person or persons, for or by reason of any such act, matter, or thing, he, she, or they may plead the general issue, and give this act and the special matter in evidence; and if the plaintiff or plaintiffs, in any action or suit so to be prosecuted or commenced, shall become nonsuit, or forbear further prosecution, or suffer discontinuance, or if a verdict pass against such plaintiff or plaintiffs, the defendant or defendants shall recover his, her, or their double costs, for which he, she, or they shall have the like remedy as in cases where the costs by law are given to the defendant.

7. And be it further enacted, That this act may be altered, amended, or repealed by any act or acts to be made in this present session of Parliament.

8. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force until the end of the next session of Parliament.

CAP. XXXVII.

An act for making valid certain orders in council, and warrants of the commissioners of the treasury, for the entry and warehousing of certain goods imported in neutral vessels, and for indemnifying all persons concerned therein; for the remitting of forfeitures in certain cases; and for enabling His Majesty to allow, during the continuance of hostilities, and until two months after the commencement of the next session of Parliament, the importation of goods from countries from which the British flag is excluded, in any vessels whatever. [April 14, 1808.]

Whereas several neutral vessels, bound to ports on the continent of Europe from which the British flag has been excluded, have arrived in the ports of the United Kingdom, having been warned or brought into such ports in consequence of His Majesty's orders in council for that purpose, and parts of the cargoes of such vessels have been admitted to entry for home consumption, or warehoused for exportation; and other parts of such cargoes, consisting of goods the growth, produce, or manufacture of countries within the limits of the charter granted to the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, not imported by the said company, have been warehoused for exportation only: And whereas, in consequence of the late events in Portugal, wine and other commodities have been brought from the dominions of the Crown of Portugal in vessels not owned and navigated according to law, and have been admitted to entry or warehoused in the same manner, and subject to the same duties only, as if the same had been imported in British built vessels, owned and navigated according to law: And whereas such goods have been so entered and warehoused, in obedience to orders of council and warrants of the commissioners of His Majesty's treasury, which it has been deemed expedient under the circumstances to issue for such purposes; which orders and warrants, and the proceedings thereupon, were not authorized by law; but it is expedient, under the circumstances, that the same should be authorized by act of Parliament; and it is also expedient that the importation of goods from countries from which the British flag is excluded shall be allowed for a limited time in any vessels:

1. Be it therefore enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That all such importations, admissions to entry, warehousing for home consumption or for exportation, and securing in warehouses goods of the produce or manufacture of places within the limits of the charter granted to the East India Company for exportation only; and also all importations and admissions to entry, and warehousing of goods and commodities from the dominions of the Crown of Portugal, which have been made as aforesaid, before the passing of this act, whether under orders in council or by warrants of the commissioners of the treasury, shall be deemed and taken to be good in law; and all persons concerned in advising, issuing, or carrying the same into execution shall be, and are, hereby indemnified accordingly; any thing in any act of Parliament to the contrary notwithstanding; and no vessels, goods, or commodities which have been admitted to entry, or imported, or warehoused, or secured under any such order or warrant, shall be subject to any forfeiture, or the owner thereof be subject to any penalty by reason thereof.

2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the importers, proprietors, or consignees of any goods or commodities that may have been, or which shall be, brought into any port of the United Kingdom, in any ship or vessel which shall have come in, in consequence of any warning under the said orders in council, or in any ship or vessel which shall have sailed from any port or place within the respective limits enumerated in His Majesty's order in council of the twenty-fifth day of November one thousand eight hundred and seven, before the respective days specified in the said order, on or after which days the vessels sailing from such ports or places are to be deemed to have received notice of the aforesaid order of the eleventh day of November, one thousand eight hundred and seven, duly to enter and land any such goods or commodities, either for the purpose of securing the same in warehouses for exportation, or on payment of the full duties of customs and excise due thereon, as the case may warrant; and that no ship or vessel so arriving as aforesaid shall be liable to forfeiture, or the owners or proprietors thereof, to any penalty by reason of such ship or vessel not being built, owned, or navigated according to law, or not being in any other respect legally authorized to import into this kingdom the goods or commodities of which the cargo shall consist; nor shall any goods or commodities, being part of the cargo of any such ship or vessel so brought in as aforesaid, be liable to forfeiture, or the owners thereof to any penalty, by reason of any such goods or commodities being in packages not allowed by law, or for being in any other manner prohibited to be imported into this kingdom; any law, custom, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for His Majesty, by order in council, or license, and in Ireland for the Lord Lieutenant, or other chief governor or governors, and the privy council of Ireland, by order in council, or license, when and as often as the same shall be judged expedient, to permit, during the continuance of hostilities, and until two months after the commencement of the next session of Parliament, any such goods, wares, or merchandise as shall be specified in such order in council or license, to be imported into any part of Great Britain or Ireland respectively, from any port or place from which the British flag is excluded, in any ship or vessel belonging to any country, whether in amity with His Majesty or not; any law in force, in the United Kingdom, or in Great Britain or Ireland respectively, to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding.

4. Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to exempt from seizure any goods or commodities which shall be unshipped, or attempted to be unshipped, for the purpose of being illegally conveyed on shore, or before due entry shall have been made thereof.

5. And be it further enacted, That this act may be altered, amended, or repealed, by any act or acts to be passed in this session of Parliament.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney.

FOREIGN OFFICE, May 4, 1808.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's command to acquaint Mr. Pinkney that His Majesty has judged it expedient to establish the most rigorous blockade of the port of Copenhagen, and of all the other ports in the island of Zealand. Mr. Pinkney is therefore requested to apprise the American consuls and merchants residing in England, that the entrances of all the ports above mentioned are, and must be considered as being, in a state of blockade; and that, from this time, all the measures authorized by the law of nations, and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different neutral Powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to all vessels attempting to violate the said blockade after this notice.

The undersigned requests Mr. Pinkney to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

CAP. LXXXV.

An act to regulate the trade between Great Britain and the United States of America until the end of the next session of Parliament. [June 23, 1808.]

Whereas it is expedient to permit goods, wares, and merchandise, being of the growth, produce, and manufacture of the United States of America, to be imported directly from thence into Great Britain, in British or American ships or vessels, subject to such duties only as are payable on the like commodities when imported from other foreign countries; may it therefore please your Majesty, that it may be enacted: And be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That from and after the end of the present session of Parliament it shall and may be lawful for any person or persons to import into Great Britain directly from any of the territories of the United States of America, in British built ships or vessels, owned, navigated and registered according to law, or in ships or vessels built in countries belonging to the United States of America or any of them, or in ships or vessels taken by any of the ships or vessels of war belonging to the Government or any of the inhabitants of the said United States, having commissions or letters of marque and reprisal from the Government of the said United States, and condemned as lawful prize in any Court of Admiralty of the said United States, of which condemnation proof shall be given to the commissioners of His Majesty's customs, or any four or more of them, in England or Scotland, respectively, and owned by the subjects of the said United States, or any of them, and whereof the master and three-fourths of the mariners at least are subjects of the said United States, any goods, wares, or merchandise, the growth, production, and manufacture of the said United States, which are not prohibited by law to be imported from foreign countries, and to enter and land such goods, wares, and merchandise, upon payment of the duties, and subject to the conditions and regulations hereinafter mentioned; any law, custom, or usage to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding.

2. And be it further enacted, That all such goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into Great Britain, either in such ships or vessels, or in British built ships or vessels, owned, navigated, and registered, according to law, shall and may be entered and landed, upon payment of such duties of customs and excise, and no higher, except as hereinafter is provided, as are payable on goods, wares, and merchandise of the like denomination or description, upon their importation into Great Britain from any other foreign country; and in cases where different duties are imposed upon goods, wares, and merchandise of the like denomination or description, imported from different foreign countries, then upon payment of the lowest duties which by law are now required to be paid on the importation of any such goods, wares, or merchandise from any other foreign country: Provided always, That where any goods, wares, or merchandise are imported from the said United States, in any ship or vessel not being British built, owned, navigated, and registered according to law, such goods, wares, and merchandise shall be subject and liable to the duties due and payable on similar articles when so imported from any other foreign country.

3. And be it further enacted, That any tobacco, being the growth or production of any of the territories of the United States of America, may be imported into Great Britain in British or American ships or vessels, owned and navigated as hereinbefore required, upon payment of the same duties of customs and excise as are now paid on tobacco imported by British subjects from any British colony or plantation in America; and that any snuff, being the production and manufacture of any of the said territories, may be imported into Great Britain in manner before mentioned, upon payment of such duties of customs and excise, as snuff, being the production or manufacture of Europe, imported from Europe, is subject to, and may be warehoused and again exported, such tobacco and snuff to be subject respectively, nevertheless, to all and singular the regulations, restrictions, penalties, and forfeitures relating to the importation and exportation thereof, or in any other respect relating thereto, of an act made and passed in the twenty-ninth year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act for repealing the duties on tobacco and snuff, and for granting new duties in lieu thereof;" and of another act, passed in the thirtieth year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled "An act to explain and amend an act made in the last session of Parliament, entitled An act for repealing the duties on tobacco and snuff, and for granting new duties in lieu thereof, or of any other act since made relating thereto:" Provided always, That such tobacco shall be accompanied by a manifest as by law required.

4. And be it further enacted, That all goods, wares, and merchandise so imported from the United States of America, shall, upon the exportation thereof from Great Britain, be entitled to the same drawbacks as are by law allowed upon the exportation of goods, wares, and merchandise of the like denomination and description when exported from Great Britain; and that there shall be allowed and paid the same drawbacks and bounties on goods, wares, and merchandise exported from Great Britain to the territories of the said United States, or any of them, as are allowed by law upon the exportation of goods, wares, or merchandise of the like denomination or description, to any of the islands, plantations, or colonies belonging to the crown of Great Britain, in America: Provided always, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to repeal, or in anywise to alter, the duties of package, scavage, balliage, or portage, or any other duties payable to the mayor, commonalty and citizens of the city of London, or to the Lord Mayor of the said city for the time being, or to any other city or town corporate within the kingdom of Great Britain, or to repeal or in anywise to alter any special privilege or exemption to which any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, is or are now entitled by law; but the same shall be continued as heretofore.

5. And be it further enacted, That the duties of customs and excise upon, for, and in respect of any goods, wares, and merchandise imported into Great Britain from the said United States, by virtue and under the authority of this act, shall and may be respectively managed, ascertained, raised, levied, collected, answered, paid, recovered, allowed, appropriated, and applied, in such and the like manner, and in or by any or either of the means, ways, or methods, by which the duties of customs and excise, and drawbacks of duties of customs and excise upon goods, wares, or merchandise of the same sorts or kinds respectively imported from or exported to any other foreign country were or might be managed, ascertained, raised, levied, collected, answered, paid, recovered, allowed, appropriated, and applied, and the goods, wares, or merchandise, so by this act respectively made liable to the payment of or chargeable with duties of customs and excise, or so entitled to drawback of duties of customs and excise, upon the importation thereof into, or exportation thereof from Great Britain, or on any other account whatever, shall be and the same are hereby made subject and liable to all and every the conditions, regulations, rules, restrictions, and forfeitures, to which goods, wares, or merchandise in general, and also all and every the special conditions, rules, restrictions, regulations, and forfeitures, respectively, to which the like goods, wares, or merchandise respectively were subject and liable by any act or acts of Parliament in force on and immediately before the passing of this act, respecting the revenues of customs and excise; and all and every pain, penalty, fine, or forfeiture of any nature or kind whatever, for any offence whatever committed against or in breach of any act or acts of Parliament in force on and immediately before the passing of this act, made for securing the revenue of customs and excise, or for the regulation or improvement thereof, and the several clauses, powers, and directions therein contained, shall and are hereby directed and declared to extend to, and shall be respectively applied, practised, and put in execution for and in respect of the several duties of customs and excise and drawbacks of duties of customs and excise, hereby charged and allowed, in as full and ample manner, to all intents and purposes whatever, as if all and every the said acts, clauses, provisions, powers, directions, fines, pains, penalties, or forfeitures, were particularly repeated and re-enacted in the body of this act.

6. Provided always, and be it enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for His Majesty, by and with the advice of his privy council, by any order in council, or by any proclamation made for that purpose, to cause the provisions of this act to be suspended for such time as His Majesty, his heirs, and successors may deem expedient and necessary; any thing in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

7. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force to the end of the next session of Parliament.

By the honorable Sir Alexander Cochrane, K. B. Rear Admiral of the Red, and Commander-in-chief of His Majesty's ships and vessels employed and to be employed at Barbadoes, the Leeward Islands, &c.

Whereas an intimation has been received from the right honorable Lord Viscount Castlereagh, one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, that the strictest naval blockade is to be established over the leeward French Carribean islands: the several captains, commanders, and commanding officers under my orders, are hereby authorized and directed to stop all neutral vessels destined for any of the ports of the said islands; and if they shall appear to be ignorant of the existence of the blockade, and have no enemy's property or board, the masters of such neutral vessels shall be apprized thereof, and warned not to proceed to such ports, and a notice written to that effect upon one or more of the principal ship's papers.

But if a neutral vessel shall appear to be so warned, or to be otherwise informed of the existence of the blockade, or to have sailed from her last clearing port after it may be reasonably supposed that this notification might have been made public there, and yet be found attempting or intending to enter either of the ports of the said islands, such vessel shall be seized and sent into port for legal adjudication. And with respect to neutral vessels coming out of said ports, having any colonial produce, goods, or merchandise on board, appearing to have been laden after knowledge of the blockade, such vessels shall, in like manner, be seized and sent in for legal adjudication.

Given on board the Belleisle, Carlisle bay, Barbadoes, October 14, 1808.

ALEXANDER COCHRANE.

By command of the Rear-Admiral:

JOHN S. TRACEY.

Copy of the decree of the National Convention of the 9th of May, 1793, 2d year of the republic of France.

The National Convention, after having heard the report of their Marine Committee; considering that the flag of the neutral Powers is not respected by the enemies of France; that two cargoes of flour arrived at Falmouth in Anglo-American vessels, and purchased before the war for the service of the marine of France, have been detained in England by the Government, who would not pay for them, except at a price below that at which flour had been sold:

That a vessel from Papenburg, called the Therisia, commanded by Captain Hendrick Kob, laden with divers effects belonging to Frenchmen, has been conducted to Dover, the 2d of March last, by an English cutter:

That a privateer of the same nation has carried into the same port of Dover, the 18th of the same month, the Danish ship Mercury, Christianlund, Captain Freuchen, expedited from Dunkirk on the 17th with a cargo of wheat for Bordeaux:

That the ship John, Captain Shkleley, laden with near six thousand quintals of American wheat, bound from Falmouth to St. Malo, has been taken by an English frigate, and conducted to Guernsey, where the agents of the Government have simply promised to pay the value of the cargo because it was not on account of the French:

That one hundred and one French passengers of different professions, embarked at Cadiz, by order of the Spanish minister, in a Genoese ship called the Providence, Captain Ambrose Briasco, bound to Bayonne, have been shamefully pillaged by the crew of an English privateer:

That the divers reports which are successively made by the maritime cities of the republic announce that these same acts of inhumanity and injustice are daily multiplied and repeated with impunity throughout the seas:

That, under such circumstances, all the rights of nations being violated, the French people are no longer permitted to fulfil, towards the neutral Powers in general, the vows which they have so often manifested, and which they will constantly make for the full and entire liberty of commerce and navigation, decrees as follows:

ART. 1. The French ships of war and privateers may arrest and bring into the ports of the republic, the neutral vessels which shall be laden wholly, or in part, either with articles of provision belonging to neutral nations, and destined for an enemy's port, or with merchandises belonging to an enemy.

ART. 2. The merchandise belonging to an enemy shall be declared good prize, and confiscated to the profit of the captors; the articles of provisions belonging to neutral nations, and laden for an enemy's port, shall be paid for according to their value in the place to which they were destined.

ART. 3. In all cases the neutral vessels shall be released as soon as the unloading of the articles of provision arrested, or of the merchandises seized, shall have been effected. The freight thereof shall be paid at the rate which shall have been stipulated by the persons who shipped them. A just indemnification shall be allowed, in proportion to their detention, by the tribunals who are to have cognizance of the validity of the prizes.

ART. 4. These tribunals shall be bound to transmit, three days after their decision, a copy of the inventory of the said articles of provision or merchandise, to the Minister of Marine, and another to the Minister for Foreign Affairs.

ART. 5. The present law, applicable to all the prizes which have been made since the declaration of war, shall cease to have effect as soon as the enemy Powers shall have declared free and not seizable, although destined for the ports of the republic, the articles of provision belonging to neutral nations, and the merchandises laden in neutral vessels, and belonging to the Government or citizens of France.

Extract of the Register of Arrêts of the Committee of Public Safety, Finance, and Supplies.

25TH BRUMAIRE, 3d year of the Republic, (November 18, 1794.)

The Committee of Public Safety, Commerce, and Supplies, order as follows:

ART. 1. The vessels of the United States of America, and those of other neutral Powers, shall be permitted to enter the ports of the republic and retire from them when they please; nor shall it be permitted to any constituted authority to retard their departure, or to oblige the captains to sell their cargoes against their will.

ART. 2. When the captains or owners of neutral vessels are disposed to sell their cargoes to the public, they shall be paid for them according to the bargain which they make.

ART. 3. It is enjoined to all the commandants of naval armaments, fleets, divisions, and squadrons of the republic, to respect and cause to be respected, upon their responsibility, in favor of the neutral and allied Powers, the rights of nations and the stipulations of treaties, conforming themselves strictly to the terms of the decree of the Convention of the 27th July, 1793.

ART. 4. In consequence, they are expressly prohibited from turning these vessels from their course; taking from on board of them their captains, sailors, or passengers, other than soldiers or sailors actually in the service of an enemy Power, or of seizing the effects or merchandise which shall be found in them.

ART. 5. Are excepted from the prohibition contained in the preceding article—

1. Merchandises belonging to the enemies of the republic, until such enemy Powers shall have declared that the merchandises of the French shall be free on board neutral vessels.

2. Such merchandises of the neutral Powers, also, as are deemed contraband of war, and under which are comprised all arms, instruments, and munitions of war, and every kind of merchandise and other effects destined for an enemy's port actually seized or blockaded.

[Articles 6, 7, 8, and 9, regulate the manner of proceeding where neutral vessels are brought in, upon a presumption of having enemy's goods on board.]

ART. 10. The Commission of Marine shall present, without delay, a statement of the individuals, born subjects of the Powers with whom the republic is at war, who were taken before the present day upon neutral vessels, that particular arrêts may be taken in each case.

ART. 11. The indemnities which are due to the captains of neutral Powers who were detained by an embargo at Bordeaux, shall be liquidated without delay by the Commission of Marine and Colonies, conformable to an arrêt of the Committee of Public Safety of the 17th Germinal; and this commission shall render an account, in the course of ten days, of the actual state of these demands.

ART. 12. The Commission of Marine is specially charged to receive and adjust the accounts which shall be presented to it by an agent of the United States, for such supplies as the Americans have furnished to the administration of St. Domingo; and it shall take the necessary measures to procure to the parties interested the most prompt justice, and shall also present to the Committees of Public Safety, of Finance, Commerce, and Supplies, the result of its operations in these respects.

ART. 13. The Commission of Foreign Relations is instructed to deliver a copy of this arrêt to the minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, in answer to his memorial of the 9th Fructidor (September 3) last.

CAMBACERES, &c.

Extract from the Register of Arrêts of the Committee of Public Safety of the 14th Nivose, 3d year of the republic (3d January, 1795.)

The Committee of Public Safety, considering that, by the twenty-third article of the treaty of commerce between France and the United States of America, bearing date on the 6th of February, 1778, it is agreed:

1. That the people of France and America may navigate reciprocally, in complete safety, with their vessels, and without exception as to the owners of the merchandise charged upon such vessels, or as to the ports from whence they come, and although the Power for which they may be destined be actually at war, or become afterwards the enemy of the one or the other contracting party; that they may equally navigate in full safety with their vessels and merchandise, and frequent the places, ports, and harbors of the enemies of both nations, or of either, and carry on trade, not only from the port of an enemy to that of a neutral Power, but also from different ports of the same enemy.

2. That free vessels shall make free goods, and that any thing shall be considered as free which shall be found on board the vessels of either contracting nation, although it belong, in whole or in part, to the enemies of either the one or the other; contraband always excepted.

3. That the same liberty shall be extended to those who are found on board free vessels, although they be the enemies of either the one or the other contracting nation; and, in consequence, that such persons shall not be taken from such vessels, unless they be soldiers in the actual service of the enemy.

Considering that the crimes of England, having given to the war of despotism against liberty a character of injustice and atrocity without example in the annals of mankind, the National Convention found itself obliged, in using the right of reprisal, to decree, on the 9th of May, 1793, that the vessels of war and cruisers of the republic might take and conduct into the ports of France such vessels of the neutral Powers as they should find charged, in whole or in part, with provisions belonging either to such Powers or the enemies of France. Soon afterwards, however, and on the 1st July, 1793, the Convention restored in full vigor the dispositions of the treaty above mentioned of the 6th of February, 1778, but which were again revoked by a decree of the 27th of the same month, in respect to provisions and merchandises belonging to an enemy; upon which latter ground it has stood since, leaving the provisions and merchandises of neutral Powers, in such vessels, free. In regard to which the French Government has not to reproach itself with having waited, to show itself just and loyal, that the cabinet of London might revoke, as it did a long time afterwards, the order given by it the preceding year to seize all neutral vessels carrying provisions or merchandises into France.

Considering that since, and notwithstanding the notoriety with which this cabinet continues to insult and violate the rights of neutral nations by causing their vessels, charged with merchandise, destined for the ports of France, to be seized, yet the National Convention has enjoined it, by the seventh article of the law of the 13th of this month, upon all officers, civil and military, strictly to observe, in all their dispositions, the treaties which unite France with the neutral Powers of the ancient continent, as likewise with the United States of America, declaring all articles of a contrary import in any other law to be absolutely null and void.

Fully, therefore, to carry into effect the said law, according to its true intent and meaning, it is hereby ordered:

ART. 1. The Commission of Marine and of the Colonies shall notify, without delay, to all the commanders of armed vessels, divisions, and squadrons, the article above mentioned of the law of the 13th of this month; and, in consequence, that they are to consider the fifth article of the arrêt of the 25th Brumaire last, which authorized the seizure of merchandises belonging to an enemy on board neutral vessels, until such enemy shall have declared French property on board such vessels free, as now null and void.

ART. 2. The merchandises called contraband, though belonging to a neutral Power, shall continue subject to seizure.

ART. 3. All arms, instruments, and munitions of war of every kind, horses, and their equipage, and all kinds of merchandises, and other effects, destined for an enemy's port actually blockaded or besieged, shall be deemed contraband of war.

Decree of the Executive Directory on the conduct of the flag of the French republic towards neutral vessels, 14th Messidor, 4th year, (2d July, 1796.)

The Executive Directory, considering that, if it belongs to French loyalty to respect the treaties or conventions which assure to neutral or friendly Powers the commercial advantages, of which the result ought to be common to the contracting Powers, these same advantages, if they are turned to the benefit of our enemies, either through the feebleness of our allies or of neutrals, through fear, from views of interest, or from any other motive, would provoke, indeed, the inexecution of the articles by which they should be stipulated, decree what follows:

It shall be notified, without delay, to all the neutral or allied Powers that the flag of the French republic shall be used against neutral vessels, be it for the purpose of confiscation, search, or detention, (visite ou prehension) in the same manner that they suffer the English to use theirs in regard thereto.

The Minister of Foreign Relations is charged with the execution of the present decree, which shall not be printed.

Decree of the Executive Directory concerning the navigation of neutral vessels, loaded with merchandise belonging to the enemies of the republic, and the judgments on the trials relative to the validity of maritime prizes. 12th Ventose, 5th year, (2d March, 1797.)

The Executive Directory, having examined the law of the 9th May, 1793, which, forasmuch as the flag of neutral Powers not being respected by the enemies of the French republic, and all the laws of nations being violated to her prejudice, it is no longer permitted to the French people to fulfil towards these Powers, in general, the wish which it has so often manifested, and which it will constantly form, for the full and entire liberty of commerce and of navigation, orders, among other things:

1. That the French vessels of war and privateers may stop and carry into the ports of the republic neutral vessels which may be found, loaded entirely or in part with merchandise belonging to the enemy.

2. That the merchandise belonging to the enemy shall be declared good prize, and confiscated for the benefit of the captors.

3. That, in all cases, the neutral vessels shall be released the moment the unloading of the merchandise seized shall have been effected; that the freight shall be paid at the rates which shall have been stipulated by the freighters, and a just indemnity shall be allowed for their detention by the tribunals whose duty it may be to take cognizance of the validity of the prizes.

4. That these tribunals shall moreover be bound to transmit, three days after their judgment, a copy of the inventory of the merchandise to the Minister of the Marine, and another copy to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

5. That the present law, applicable to all prizes which have been made since the declaration of war, shall cease to have its effect when the enemy Powers shall have declared free and not seizable, though destined for the ports of the republic, the merchandise loaded on board neutral vessels, which shall belong to the French Government or its citizens.

Having likewise examined the law of the 27th July, 1793, which, in maintaining that of the 9th May preceding, here above recited, orders that it should have its full and entire execution, and that, in consequence, all other regulations which may be contrary to it are and remain repealed; a repeal which evidently comprehends the law of the 1st of the same month of July, by which the vessels of the United States of America had been excepted from the law of the 9th May, in conformity to the fifteenth article of the treaty of the 6th February, 1778.

Having also examined the seventh article of the law of the 13th Nivose, 3d year, (3d January, 1795,) which enjoins on all the agents of the republic, on all the commandants of the armed force, on the officers, civil and military, to cause to be respected and observed, in all their arrangements, the treaties which unite France to the neutral Powers of the ancient continent and to the United States of America; and adds that no blow shall be aimed at those treaties, and that all regulations which may be contrary to them are annulled; considering that this last law does not derogate from that of the 9th May, 1793, save only in favor of those neutral Powers whose treaties actually subsisting with the French republic are contrary to its regulations; that, consequently, it is important for the information, as well of the commandants of the armed force of the republic, and of the vessels commissioned by it, as of the tribunals charged with deciding on the validity of the prizes, to take measures for preventing either that it should be supposed that treaties existed which never were made, or that treaties concluded for a limited time which is expired, should be considered as still being in force, or that those which have been modified since their formation should be considered as yet requiring a literal execution; that to this last description belongs particularly the treaty of amity and commerce concluded the 6th February, 1778, between France and the United States of America; that, in effect, by the second article of this treaty, France and the United States of America mutually engage not to grant any particular favor to other nations, in relation to commerce and navigation, which does not become forthwith common to the other party; and that it is added by the same article, that this other party shall enjoy the favor gratuitously, if the grant is gratuitous, or on making the same compensation if the grant is conditional; that thus the provisions stipulated in favor of England by the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded at London, the 19th November, 1794, between that Power and the United States of America, are considered to have been in behalf of the French republic itself, and, in consequence, modifying, in the points where they differed, the treaty concluded 6th February, 1778; that it is agreeably to these provisions that the French Government has declared, by its decrees of the 14th and 28th Messidor, 4th year, (2d and 16th July, 1796,) as it is likewise forced to do at present, that it will use the just measures of reciprocity which it had a right to exercise in that respect, in every thing which has a relation to the circumstances of the war, as also to the political, commercial, and maritime interests of the French republic; that, consequently, it is necessary to settle, by reconciling the treaties of the 6th February, 1778, and 19th November, 1794, every doubt as to the case where this right of reciprocity ought to be exercised:

Considering that there have been quite lately raised, as to the manner of stating the proofs of property in the ships and merchandise pretended to belong to neutrals, doubts and controversies which never would have taken place if the provisions of the ancient regulations relative to this business had been better known; that it consequently is of importance to recite these provisions, and to cause to be executed the fifth article of the law of the 14th February, 1793, which has maintained them:

After having heard the Ministers of Justice, of the Marine, and of the Colonies, decrees what follows:

ART. 1. The Commissioners of the Executive Directory, near the civil tribunals of the Departments, shall take care that, on the trials as to the validity of maritime prizes, no judgment shall be founded on the seventh article of the law of the 13th Nivose, 3d year, (2d January, 1795,) unless the Minister of Justice be previously consulted, in conformity to the third article of the law of the 8th Floréal, 4th year, (27th April, 1796,) relative to the treaties in virtue of which some neutrals might pretend to withdraw themselves, by means of the first of these laws, from the execution of that of the 9th May, 1793.

ART. 2. The Minister of Justice will consequently examine if the treaties appealed to still remain in force, or whether they have been modified since their adoption. He shall be furnished, for this purpose, by the Minister of Exterior Relations, with all the information (renseignements) of which he shall be in want, and he shall refer the same to the Executive Directory, as is prescribed by the law of the 8th Floreal, 4th year, (27th April, 1796.)

ART. 3. The Executive Directory reminds all French citizens that the treaty entered into on the 6th February, 1778, between France and the United States of America, has been, from the terms of its second article, in strict right (de plein droit) modified by that which was entered into in London, on the 19th November, 1794, between the United States of America and England. In consequence, agreeably to the seventeenth article of the treaty of London of the 19th November, 1794, all merchandise belonging to an enemy, or not sufficiently proven to be neutral, loaded under the American flag, shall be confiscated; but the vessel on board of which it shall have been found shall be released and returned to the proprietor. It is enjoined on the Commissioners of the Executive Directory to cause to be accelerated, by all the means in their power, the judgment on the trials which shall take place, either in relation to the validity of the capture of the cargo, or in relation to freights and demurrage, (surestaries.)

ART. 2. Agreeably to the eighteenth article of the treaty of London of the 19th November, 1794, there shall be added the following articles to those declared contraband by the twenty-fourth article of the treaty of the 6th February, 1778, viz: wood for ship building, pitch, tar, and rosin, copper in sheets, canvass, hemp, and cordage, and every thing that serves, directly or indirectly, for the armament and equipment of vessels, except unwrought iron and fir-plank. These several articles shall be confiscated whenever they shall be destined, or when it is attempted to carry them, to the enemy.

ART. 3. Agreeably to the twenty-first article of the treaty of London of the 19th November, 1794, every individual known to be American, who holds a commission given by the enemies of France, as also every mariner of that nation making a part of the crew of private or public ships (navires ou vaisseaux) of the enemy, shall be, from that act alone, declared a pirate, and treated as such, without allowing him, in any case, to show that he had been forced by violence, menaces, or otherwise.

ART. 4. In conformity to the law of the 14th February, 1793, the regulations of the 21st October, 1744, and of the 26th July, 1778, as to the manner of proving the right of property in neutral ships and merchandise, shall be executed, according to their form and tenor.

In consequence, every American vessel shall be a good prize which has not on board a list of the crew, (rôle d'équipage), in proper form, such as is prescribed by the model annexed to the treaty of the 6th February, 1778; a compliance with which is ordered by the twenty-fifth and twenty-seventh articles of the same treaty.

ART. 5. It is enjoined on the Commissioners of the Executive Directory to call the severity of the tribunals to the fraudulent manoeuvres of every ship-owner calling himself a neutral American, or other, on board a vessel in which shall be found, as has frequently been done during the present war, either maritime papers (papiers de mer) in blank, though signed and sealed, or papers, in form of letters, containing the signatures of individuals, in blank; or of double passports or sea-letters, which indicate different destinations to the vessel; or double invoices, bills of lading, or any other ship papers, which assign to the whole or to a part of the same merchandise different proprietors or different destinations.

ART. 6. From the regulations of the present decree, that of the 9th Frimaire last, (29th November, 1795,) concerning the freights and demurrage, is referred to what relates to the demurrage only.

The present decree shall be inserted in the bulletin of the laws. The Ministers of the Marine and of the Colonies, of Justice, and of Foreign Relations, are charged with its execution, each one in what concerns him.

Law which determines the character of vessels from their cargo, especially those loaded with English merchandise.

29TH NIVOSE, 6th year, (18th January, 1798.)

After having heard the report of a special commission on the message of the Executive Directory of the 15th Nivose, relative to English merchandise; considering that the interest of the republic requires the most prompt measures against all vessels which shall be loaded with it:

ART. 1. The character of vessels in what concerns their quality as neutral or enemy, shall be decided by their cargo; in consequence, every vessel found at sea laden in whole or in part with merchandise coming (provenant) from England or her possessions, shall be declared good prize, whoever may be the proprietors of these productions or merchandise.

ART. 2. Every foreign vessel which shall, during her voyage, have entered a port of England, shall not be admitted into a port of the French republic, save only when there is a necessity for her entering, (de relâche), in which case she shall be bound to leave the said port so soon as the cause of her entering it (de sa relâche) shall have ceased.

Decree of the Executive Directory in explanation of that of the 12th Ventose, 5th year, (2d March, 1797,) concerning the navigation of neutral vessels, of the 28th Ventose, 7th year, (18th March, 1799.)

The Executive Directory having examined its decree of the 12th Ventose, 5th year, (2d March, 1797,) concerning the navigation of neutral vessels, loaded with merchandise belonging to the enemies of the republic, and the judgment on the trials as to the validity of maritime prizes; considering that the fourth article of that decree, in what relates to the rôles d'équipages with which neutral vessels ought to be furnished, has had improper interpretations, so far as concerns the rôles d'équipages of American vessels, and that it is time to do away the obstacles resulting therefrom to the navigation of the vessels of that nation.

After having heard the Minister of Exterior Relations and the Minister of Justice declare that, by the fourth article of the said decree, it was not understood that the navigation of American vessels, relatively to the form of their rôles d'équipages, was subjected to other conditions than those imposed on all neutrals by the twelfth article of the ordinance of 1744, and by the ninth article of that of the 26th July, 1778:

The Ministers of the Marine and of Justice, each in what concerns him, are charged with the execution of the present decree, which shall be inserted in the bulletin of laws.

Decree of the Executive Directory as to those who compose the crews of the vessels of the enemies of France, 8th Brumaire, 7th year, (October 29, 1799.)

The Executive Directory, on the report of the Minister of Exterior Relations, considering that the squadrons, privateers, and vessels of England and Russia are in part manned by foreigners; considering that this violation is a manifest abuse of the law of nations, and that the Powers of Europe have not taken any measures to stop it, decree:

ART. 1. Every person, native (ou originaire) of friendly countries allied to the French republic, or neutral, holding a commission given by the enemies of France, or making part of the crews of the vessels of war or other enemy vessels, shall, for that act alone, be declared a pirate, and treated as such, without being allowed in any case to allege that he was forced by violence, menaces, or otherwise.

ART. 2. The Executive Directory of the Batavian, Ligurian, Cisalpine, and Roman republics shall be informed of this measure.

ART. 3. The provisions contained in the first article shall be notified to the Powers neutral or allied to the French republic.

Decree of the French republic on the mode of executing its decrees of the 8th Brumaire, 7th year, (29th October, 1799,) concerning those who compose the crews of enemy vessels, 24th Brumaire, 7th year, (14th November, 1799.)

ART. 1. In execution of the third article of the decree of the Executive Directory of the 8th of this month, the allied or neutral Powers shall be invited to take the necessary measures for recalling, within a time which shall be fixed, those mariners of their respective nations, actually embarked on board the vessels of war or other vessels belonging to England.

ART. 2. The ambassadors, ministers, and envoys of the republic near the respective Powers shall receive particular instructions on this subject.

ART. 3. The period of the execution of the decree of the 8th Brumaire shall be determined by a subsequent decree.

ART. 4. The Minister of Exterior Relations is charged to make arrangements with the Minister of Marine and the Colonies for the execution of the present decree.

Law which repeals the first article of that of 29th Nivose, 6th year, (18th January, 1798,) relative to maritime cruising.

ARTICLE 1. The first article of the law of the 29th Nivose, 6th year, (18th January, 1798,) relative to maritime cruising, is repealed.

The consuls of the republic order that the above law shall be published and executed, and that the seal of the republic shall be affixed to it.

BONAPARTE.

Decree of the consuls of the republic which puts in force the ordinance of the 26th July, 1778, concerning the navigation of neutral vessels, 29th Frimaire, 8th year, (19th December, 1800.)

The consuls having examined the law of the 23d Frimaire, 8th year, (13th December, 1800,) which repeals the first article of the law of the 25th Nivose, 6th year, (14th January, 1798,) relative to maritime cruising; considering that the repeal of that law necessarily renews that state of the law antecedently existing:

That this, as fixed by the ordinance of the 26th July, 1778, is considered the most proper to conciliate the interests of the republic with the rights of neutral Powers; wishing to prevent, on the part of French or neutral owners, (armateurs.) errors or interpretations which shall counteract the views under which the law of the 29th Nivose, 6th year, (18th January, 1798,) has been repealed, decree what follows:

ART. 1. The regulations prescribed by the ordinance of the 26th July, 1778, concerning the navigation of neutral vessels, shall be strictly observed by all those to whom they shall be applicable; but, in case of a controversion on their part, they are to suffer the confiscations and condemnations in damages fixed on by the said ordinance and the laws.

ART. 2. The Ministers of Justice, of the Marine, of Exterior Relations, and of the Finances, are charged, each one in what concerns him, with the execution of the present decree, which shall be inserted in the bulletin of the laws.

IMPERIAL CAMP, BERLIN, November 21, 1806.

Napoleon, Emperor of the French and King of Italy, considering:

1. That England does not admit the right of nations as universally acknowledged by all civilized people;
2. That she declares as an enemy every individual belonging to an enemy State, and, in consequence, makes prisoners of war, not only the crews of armed vessels, but also of merchant vessels, and even the supercargoes of the same;
3. That she extends or applies to merchant vessels, to articles of commerce, and to the property of individuals, the right of conquest, which can only be applied or extended to what belongs to an enemy State;
4. That she extends to ports not fortified, to harbors and mouths of rivers, the right of blockade, which, according to reason and the usage of civilized nations, is applicable only to strong or fortified ports;
5. That she declares blockaded, places before which she has not a single vessel of war, although a place ought not to be considered blockaded but when it is so invested as that no approach to it can be made without imminent hazard; that she declares even places blockaded which her united forces would be incapable of doing, such as entire coasts, and a whole empire;

6. That this unequalled abuse of the right of blockade has no other object than to interrupt the communications of different nations, and to extend the commerce and industry of England upon the ruin of those of the continent;

7. That this being the evident design of England, whoever deals on the continent in English merchandise favors that design and becomes an accomplice;

8. That this conduct in England (worthy only of the first ages of barbarism,) has benefited her, to the detriment of other nations;

9. That it being right to oppose to an enemy the same arms she makes use of, to combat as she does, when all ideas of justice and every liberal sentiment (the result of civilization among men) are disregarded;

We have resolved to enforce against England the usages which she has consecrated in her maritime code.

The present decree shall be considered as the fundamental law of the empire, until England has acknowledged that the rights of war are the same on land as at sea; that it cannot be extended to any private property whatever, nor to persons who are not military, and until the right of blockade be restrained to fortified places, actually invested by competent forces.

Imperial decree of the 21st November, 1806.

ART. 1. The British islands are declared in a state of blockade.

ART. 2. All commerce and correspondence with the British islands are prohibited. In consequence, letters or packets addressed either to England, to an Englishman, or in the English language, shall not pass through the post office, and shall be seized.

ART. 3. Every subject of England, of what rank and condition soever, who shall be found in the countries occupied by our troops, or by those of our allies, shall be made a prisoner of war.

ART. 4. All magazines, merchandise, or property whatsoever belonging to a subject of England, shall be declared lawful prize.

ART. 5. The trade in English merchandise is forbidden. All merchandise belonging to England, or coming from its manufactories and colonies, is declared lawful prize.

ART. 6. One-half of the proceeds of the confiscation of the merchandise and property declared good prize by the preceding articles, shall be applied to indemnify the merchants for the losses which they have suffered by the capture of merchant vessels by English cruisers.

ART. 7. No vessel coming directly from England, or from the English colonies, or having been there since the publication of the present decree, shall be received in any port.

ART. 8. Every vessel contravening the above clause, by means of a false declaration, shall be seized, and the vessel and cargo confiscated as if they were English property.

ART. 9. Our tribunal of prizes at Paris is charged with the definitive adjudication of all controversies which may arise within our empire, or in the countries occupied by the French army, relative to the execution of the present decree. Our tribunal of prizes at Milan shall be charged with the definitive adjudication of the said controversies, which may arise within the extent of our kingdom of Italy.

ART. 10. The present decree shall be communicated by our Minister of Exterior Relations to the Kings of Spain, of Naples, of Holland, of Etruria, and to our allies, whose subjects, like ours, are the victims of the injustice and the barbarism of the English maritime laws.

Our Ministers of Exterior Relations, of War, of Marine, of Finances, of Police, and our Postmasters General, are charged each in what concerns him with the execution of the present decree.

PARIS, December 26.

IMPERIAL DECREE.

Rejoinder to His Britannic Majesty's order in council of the 11th November, 1807.

AT OUR ROYAL PALACE AT MILAN, December 17, 1807.

NAPOLEON, Emperor of the French, King of Italy, and Protector of the Rhenish Confederation:

Observing the measures adopted by the British Government, on the 11th November last, by which vessels belonging to neutral, friendly, or even Powers the allies of England, are made liable, not only to be searched by English cruisers, but to be compulsorily detained in England, and to have a tax laid on them of so much per cent. on the cargo, to be regulated by the British Legislature:

Observing that, by these acts, the British Government denationalizes ships of every nation in Europe; that it is not competent for any Government to detract from its own independence and rights, all the sovereigns of Europe having in trust the sovereignties and independence of the flag; that if, by an unpardonable weakness, and which in the eyes of posterity would be an indelible stain, if such a tyranny was allowed to be established into principles, and consecrated by usage, the English would avail themselves of it to assert it as a right, as they have availed themselves of the tolerance of Government to establish the infamous principle that the flag of a nation does not cover goods, and to have to their right of blockade an arbitrary extension, and which infringes on the sovereignty of every State; we have decreed and do decree as follows:

ART. 1. Every ship, to whatever nation it may belong, that shall have submitted to be searched by an English ship, or to a voyage to England, or shall have paid any tax whatsoever to the English Government, is thereby and for that alone declared to be denationalized, to have forfeited the protection of its King, and to have become English property.

ART. 2. Whether the ships thus denationalized by the arbitrary measures of the English Government enter into our ports, or those of our allies, or whether they fall into the hands of our ships of war, or of our privateers, they are declared to be good and lawful prize.

ART. 3. The British islands are declared to be in a state of blockade, both by land and sea. Every ship, of whatever nation, or whatsoever the nature of its cargo so may be, that sails from the ports of England, or those of the English colonies, and of the countries occupied by English troops, and proceeding to England, or to the English colonies, or to countries occupied by English troops, is good and lawful prize, as contrary to the present decree, and may be captured by our ships of war, or our privateers, and adjudged to the captor.

ART. 4. These measures, which are resorted to only in just retaliation of the barbarous system adopted by England, which assimilates its legislation to that of Algiers, shall cease to have any effect with respect to all nations who shall have the firmness to compel the English Government to respect their flag. They shall continue to be rigorously in force as long as that Government does not return to the principle of the law of nations, which regulates the relations of civilized States in a state of war. The provisions of the present decree shall be abrogated and null, in fact, as soon as the English abide again by the principles of the law of nations, which are also the principles of justice and of honor.

All our ministers are charged with the execution of the present decree, which shall be inserted in the bulletin of the laws.

NAPOLEON.

H. B. MARET, Secretary of State.

Extract of a letter from General Armstrong to the Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, April 23, 1808.

Orders were given on the 17th instant, and received yesterday at the imperial custom-house here, "to seize all American vessels now in the ports of France, or which may come into them hereafter."

April 25, 1808.

Postscript.—I have this moment received the following explanation of the above-mentioned order, viz: That it directs the seizure of vessels coming into ports of France after its own date, "because no vessel of the United States can now navigate the seas, without infracting a law of the said States, and thus furnishing a presumption that they do so on British account, or in British connexion."

The special agents of the Executive Directory to the Windward islands:

Considering that the laws, as well ancient as modern, forbid neutrals to carry the enemy contraband or prohibited merchandises;

Considering, that notwithstanding the complaints of the minister plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States of North America, of which he has informed us by his letter of the 2d July, 1796; those States, and especially Virginia, have fitted out vessels, loaded with horses, for the English;

Decree, that from this day forward, all vessels loaded with merchandises, designated by the name of contraband, as arms, instruments, munitions of war, of what kind soever, horses and their furniture, shall be stopped by the ships of war and privateers, to be seized and confiscated for the benefit of the captors.

DECREE.

The special agents of the Executive Directory to the Windward islands:

Considering that the ports of the Windward and Leeward islands, as well as those of Demarara, Essequibo, and Berbice, delivered up to the English, occupied and defended by emigrants, are in a state of regular siege, and not entitled to the same advantages as the ports of the different English colonies, possessed by that Power before the war, or to other rights;

Considering that it is against every principle to treat a horde of insurgents, destitute of country, without Government, and without a flag, with the same respect as civilized nations preserve towards each other during a war;

Considering that, by the authentic acts which are in our possession, it is proved that the divers places of the colonies delivered up to the English by the rebel Frenchmen and Batavians, no more belong to the British Government than La Vendée, in which the English ministry had, in like manner, mercenary troops under pay; some regiments clad in the same uniform as those of England; considering that in virtue of the second article of the treaty of alliance, concluded at Paris on the 6th of February, 1778, between the United States and France, the former Power engaged to defend the American possessions in case of war; and that the Government and the commerce of the United States have strangely abused the forbearance of the republic of France, in turning to its injury the favors granted to them of trading in all the ports of the French colonies;

That, by permitting neutral vessels any longer to carry provisions of war and of subsistence to men evidently in a state of rebellion, would be to prolong civil war, and the calamities and crimes following therefrom, decree as follows:

ART. 1. The ships of the republic and French privateers are authorized to capture and conduct into the ports of the republic, neutral vessels destined for the Windward and Leeward islands of America, delivered up to the English, and occupied and defended by the emigrants. These ports are, Martinico, St. Lucia, Tobago, Demarara, Berbice, Essequibo; and at the Leeward, Port-au-Prince, St. Marcks l'Archaye, and Jeremie.

ART. 2. Every armed vessel, having a commission from either of the said ports, shall be reputed a pirate, and the crews adjudged and punished as such.

ART. 3. The vessels and cargoes described in the first and second articles are declared good prize, and shall be sold for the benefit of the captors.

ART. 4. Every captured vessel, which shall have cleared out, under the vague denomination of West Indies, is comprehended in the first and second articles.

ART. 5. The decree of the 4th of last Nivose, in pursuance of the resolution of the Executive Directory of the 14th Messidor, 4th year, shall be executed till further orders, as far as shall not be contravened by the present decree.

This decree shall be printed, transcribed in the register of the criminal and commercial tribunals, sent to all the French colonial ports, read, published, and posted up, wherever it may be necessary. It shall be notified officially to the neutral Governments of St. Croix, St. Thomas, and St. Bartholomew's.

Enjoining the criminal and commercial tribunals of Guadaloupe, their delegates in the different French colonies and elsewhere, the Rear-Admiral Commandant on the West India station, and the head of the administration, to aid in executing the present decree, each in his respective department.

Experience has, for too much time, taught the General that all kind of regard and modification towards those scoundrels who maintain the rebellion in Hispaniola by furnishing every thing necessary to the rebels, against the will and approbation of their respective Governments, and who, by those acts of cupidity, dishonor the flags they sail under; and finding the necessity of putting a stop to rapacity, and to treat them as pirates, has proclaimed and proclaims:

ART. 1. All individuals whomsoever found on board of any vessel or vessels, allies or neutrals, bound to any ports in Hispaniola occupied by the rebels, shall suffer death.

Those found on board of any vessel, allies or neutrals, coming out of any ports in Hispaniola occupied by the rebels, shall suffer death.

Those found at two leagues distance from any port of the coast of Hispaniola occupied by the rebels, on board of allies or neutrals, shall suffer death.

ART. 2. The General informs, that all prisoners made in those different cases shall be brought into one of the ports of Hispaniola occupied by the French, to be tried by military commission, which is to pronounce sentence.

ART. 3. This proclamation shall be put into execution on the 1st Floréal, (21st April;) and, until that time, all the preceding proclamations, in order to prevent all kinds of communication with the coast of Hispaniola occupied by the rebels, shall be strictly executed.

ART. 4. Of this present proclamation, registered at the colonial inspection, one hundred copies are printed, published, and posted up in all the chief places around the east part of Hispaniola, and all necessary steps shall be taken to its publicity in all the islands and continent of America.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of State of His Catholic Majesty to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid.

SIR:

ARANJUEZ, February 15, 1800.

The King, wishing to lessen as much as possible the evils resulting to the nation from the scandalous traffic which many of his subjects carry on with Gibraltar by means of neutral vessels, and making use of just reprisals against the enemies of his crown, who have declared the ports of Cadiz and St. Lucar de Barrameda blockaded, His Majesty has thought proper to declare that, from this day, he should consider Gibraltar as blockaded; and that, under this view, all captures of neutral vessels going to the said place should be held as legitimate; for which purpose, and that ignorance may not be pleaded, His Majesty has commanded me to communicate this declaration for the information and government of your court.

I place myself at your disposition, and pray God to preserve your life many years.

MARINO LUIS DE URQUEJO.

[TRANSLATION.]

ARANJUEZ, February 19, 1807.

By the greatest outrage against humanity and against policy, Spain was forced by Great Britain to take part in the present war. This Power has exercised over the sea and over the commerce of the world an exclusive dominion. Her numerous factories, disseminated through all countries, are like sponges which imbibe the riches of those countries, without leaving them more than the appearances of mercantile liberty. From this maritime and commercial despotism England derives immense resources for carrying on a war whose object is to destroy the commerce which belongs to each State from its industry and situation. Experience has proven that the morality of the British cabinet has no hesitation as to the means, so long as they lead to the accomplishment of its designs; and whilst this Power can continue to enjoy the fruits of its immense traffic, humanity will groan under the weight of a desolating war. To put an end to this, and to attain a solid peace, the Emperor of the French and King of Italy issued a decree on the 21st of November last, in which, adopting the principle of reprisals, the blockade of the British isles is determined on; and his ambassador, his excellency Francis de Beauharnois, Grand Dignitary of the Order of the Iron Crown, of the Legion of Honor, &c. &c. having communicated this decree to the King our master, and His Majesty being desirous to co-operate by means sanctioned by the rights of reciprocity, has been pleased to authorize His Most Serene Highness the Prince Generalissimo of the Marine to issue a circular of the following tenor:

As soon as England committed the horrible outrage of intercepting the vessels of the royal marine, insidiously violating the good faith with which peace assures individual property and the rights of nations, His Majesty considered himself in a state of war with that Power, although his royal soul suspended the promulgation of the manifesto, until he saw the atrocity committed by its seamen sanctioned by the Government of London. From that time, and without the necessity of warning the inhabitants of these kingdoms of the circumspection with which they ought to conduct themselves towards those of a country which disregards the sacred laws of property and the rights of nations, His Majesty made known to his subjects the state of war in which he found himself with that nation. All trade, all commerce, is prohibited in such a situation, and no sentiments ought to be entertained towards such an enemy which are not dictated by honor, avoiding all intercourse which might be considered as the vile effect of avarice, operating on the subjects of a nation, which degrades itself in them. His Majesty is well persuaded that such sentiments of honor are rooted in the hearts of his beloved subjects; but he does not choose, on that account, to allow the smallest indulgence to the violators of the law, nor permit that, through their ignorance, they should be taken by surprise, authorizing me by these presents to declare that all English property will be confiscated whenever it is found on board a vessel, although a neutral, if the consignment belongs to Spanish individuals. So, likewise, will be confiscated all merchandise which may be met with, although it may be in neutral vessels, whenever it is destined for the ports of England or her isles. And, finally, His Majesty, conforming himself to the ideas of his ally the Emperor of the French, declares in his States the same law which, from principles of reciprocity and suitable respect, His Imperial Majesty promulgated under date of the 21st of November, 1806.

The execution of this determination of His Majesty belongs to the chiefs of provinces, of departments, and of vessels (barques;) and, communicating it to them in the name of His Majesty, I hope they will leave no room for his royal displeasure.

God preserve you many years.

THE PRINCE GENERALISSIMO OF THE MARINE.

His Majesty has been pleased to issue the following royal decree.

JANUARY 3, 1808.

The abominable outrage committed by the English vessels of war in the year 1804, by the express order of their Government, on four frigates of my royal navy, which, navigating under the full security of peace, were iniquitously surprised, attacked, and captured, determined me to break off all connexion with the British cabinet, and to consider myself in a state of war with a Power which had so unjustly violated the laws of nations and of humanity.

An aggression so atrocious gave me a sufficient motive to break all those ties which unite one nation to another, even if I had not considered what I owed to myself and to the honor and glory of my crown, and of my beloved subjects. Two years of war had passed without producing, on the part of Great Britain, a diminution of her pride, or a renunciation of the unjust domination which she exercised over the sea; on the contrary, confounding her friends with her enemies and with neutrals, she has manifested her decided will to treat all with the same tyranny. Under these considerations, I determined, in February of the last year, conforming myself to the wise measures adopted by my intimate ally the Emperor of the French and King of Italy, to declare, as I did declare, the British isles in a state of blockade, to see if, by this step, I could convince the British cabinet that it ought to renounce its unjust domination over the sea, and resolve on making a solid and durable peace. Far from this; not only has it rejected the propositions which have been made to it on the part of my intimate ally the Emperor of the French and King of Italy, as well those made by himself as those made through the medium of several Powers, friends of England; but, having committed the greatest atrocity and piracy, in the scandalous attack on the city and port of Copenhagen, it has thrown off the mask in such a way that no one can doubt that its insatiable ambition aspires to the exclusive commerce and navigation of every sea. Nothing proves it more than the measures which it has just adopted, under date of the 14th November last, not only declaring all the coasts of France, of Spain, of their allies, and those occupied by the arms of the one or the other Power, in a state of blockade, but subjecting the vessels of neutral

Powers, friends, and even allies of England, not only to be searched by English cruisers, but likewise to touch, contrary to their will, at an English port, and also subjecting them to the arbitrary payment of a certain per centage on their cargoes, as may be determined by the English Legislature. Authorized, then, by the just right of reciprocity, to take those measures which may seem to me proper to prevent the abuse which the British cabinet is making of its forces with respect to the neutral flag, and to see if, in this way, a renunciation of so unjust a tyranny can be obtained, I have come to the determination to adopt, and I will that there be adopted in all my dominions, the same measures which my intimate ally, the Emperor of the French and King of Italy, has adopted; and they are as follows:

Considering that, by the act above mentioned of the 14th November last, the British cabinet has denationalized the vessels of all the nations of Europe, and that it is not at the discretion of any Government to accommodate (transiger) as to its independence and its rights, all the sovereigns of Europe being guarantees of the sovereignty and of the independence of their flags; and that, if, through an unpardonable weakness, which would be an indelible stain in the eyes of posterity, such tyranny should be suffered to be laid down as a principle, and consecrated by use, the English would take it as granted to establish it as a right in the same way that they have availed themselves of the tolerance of Governments to establish the infamous principle that the flag does not cover the merchandise, and to give to its right of blockade an arbitrary extension aimed at the sovereignty of all States, I have decreed, and do decree as follows:

ART. 1. Every vessel, of whatever nation she may be, which may have been visited (visitado) by an English ship, or may have submitted to touch at a port of England, or may have paid any duty to the English Government, is, from that act, declared to be denationalized, loses the protection of its flag, and makes itself English property.

ART. 2. The vessels so denationalized by the arbitrary measures of the British Government, whether they enter into our ports, or enter those of our allies, or whether they fall into the possession of our ships of war or our privateers, are good and valid prize.

ART. 3. The British isles are declared in a state of blockade, as well by sea as by land. Every vessel, of whatever nation she may be, whatever may be her cargo, despatched (expedido) from the ports of England, or of the English colonies, or from the countries occupied by the English troops, will be a good prize, as contravening this decree, will be liable to capture by our ships of war or by our privateers, and will be adjudged to the captor.

These measures, which are nothing more than a just reciprocation of the barbarous system adopted by the English Government, which assimilates its legislation to that of Algiers, will cease to have effect on all those nations who know how to oblige the English Government to respect their flag, and will continue in full force until the English Government return to the adoption of those principles of the law of nations which establish the relations of civilized States in time of war.

The dispositions of the present decree will be revoked and have no effect so soon as the English Government shall have returned to the adoption of those principles of the law of nations, which are equally those of justice and of honor.

You will keep this in mind, and communicate it to those to whom belongs its execution.

Signed with the royal hand of His Majesty at Aranjuez, on the 3d of January, 1808.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, ON THE 30TH OF DECEMBER, 1808.

DECEMBER 30, 1808.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

At the request of the Governor, the Senate, and House of Representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, I communicate certain resolutions entered into by the said Senate and House of Representatives, and approved by the Governor, on the 23d instant. It cannot but be encouraging to those whom the nation has placed in the direction of their affairs, to see that their fellow-citizens will press forward in support of their country, in proportion as it is threatened by the disorganizing conflicts of the other hemisphere.

TH: JEFFERSON.

SIR:

LANCASTER, December 23, 1808.

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, passed this day, I have the honor of transmitting to you certain resolutions, with a request that you will be pleased to lay them before the Congress of the United States.

Accept assurances of high consideration and esteem.

SIMON SNYDER.

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq.

Whereas, the situation of the United States in relation to foreign Powers is eminently critical, and calls for all their energies, unanimity, and patriotism, to preserve those rights and that independence for which our fathers fought and conquered; and whereas, in such times, it is the duty of the constituted authorities to aid the common cause of our country, by declaring anew their devotion to the principles of the Declaration of Independence: therefore,

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, That we have the fullest confidence in the wisdom, the patriotism, and the integrity of the administration of the General Government, and that we pledge ourselves to co-operate with them, to the utmost extent of our power, in all measures which may be deemed expedient to maintain our national honor and our national rights.

Resolved, That we consider the embargo as a wise, pacific, and patriotic measure, called for by the best interests of the nation, and well calculated to induce an observance of our national rights without a resort to the horrors and desolations of war, so repugnant to the feelings of humanity and the principles of free Government.

Resolved, That as the ocean is the common highway of nations, and as this commonwealth is deeply interested in the preservation of its freedom, should those pacific measures not produce the desired effect, we are firmly determined to unite our efforts with those of the General Government in the maintenance of its rights.

Resolved, That the Governor of this commonwealth be requested to forward copies of the foregoing resolutions to the President of the United States, with a request that they may be communicated by him to the Congress of the United States.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MAY 23, AND JUNE 16, 1809.

[The following documents were communicated by the message of May 23, 1809; See Foreign Relations, vol. 1, page 74.]

Mr. Erskine to Mr. Smith.

WASHINGTON, April 17, 1809.

SIR:

I have the honor to inform you, that I have received His Majesty's commands to represent to the Government of the United States, that His Majesty is animated by the most sincere desire for an adjustment of the differences which have unhappily so long prevailed between the two countries, the recapitulation of which might have a tendency to impede, if not prevent an amicable understanding.

It having been represented to His Majesty's Government, that the Congress of the United States, in their proceedings at the opening of the last session, had evinced an intention of passing certain laws which would place the relations of Great Britain with the United States upon an equal footing, in all respects, with the other belligerent Powers, I have accordingly received His Majesty's commands, in the event of such laws taking place, to offer, on the part of His Majesty, an honorable reparation for the aggression, committed by a British naval officer, in the attack on the United States' frigate Chesapeake.

Considering the act passed by the Congress of the United States, on the 1st of March, (usually termed the non-intercourse act,) as having produced a state of equality in the relations of the two belligerent Powers, with respect to the United States, I have to submit, conformably to instructions, for the consideration of the American Government, such terms of satisfaction and reparation, as His Majesty is induced to believe will be accepted in the same spirit of conciliation with which they are proposed.

In addition to the prompt disavowal made by His Majesty, on being apprised of the unauthorized act, committed by his naval officer, whose recall, as a mark of the King's displeasure, from a highly important and honorable command, immediately ensued, His Majesty is willing to restore the men forcibly taken out of the Chesapeake, and, if acceptable to the American Government, to make a suitable provision for the unfortunate sufferers on that occasion.

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of the highest respect and consideration, &c.

D. M. ERSKINE.

HON. ROBERT SMITH, &c.

Mr. Smith to Mr. Erskine.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 17, 1809.

I have laid before the President your note, in which you have, in the name and by the order of His Britannic Majesty, declared that His Britannic Majesty is desirous of making an honorable reparation for the aggression committed by a British naval officer in the attack on the United States' frigate the Chesapeake; that, in addition to his prompt disavowal of the act, His Majesty, as a mark of his displeasure, did immediately recall the offending officer from a highly important and honorable command; and that he is willing to restore the men forcibly taken out of the Chesapeake, and, if acceptable to the American Government, to make a suitable provision for the unfortunate sufferers on that occasion.

The Government of the United States having, at all times, entertained a sincere desire for an adjustment of the differences which have so long and so unhappily subsisted between the two countries, the President cannot but receive with pleasure assurances that His Britannic Majesty is animated by the same disposition, and that he is ready, in conformity to this disposition, to make atonement for the insult and aggression committed by one of his naval officers in the attack on the United States' frigate the Chesapeake.

As it appears, at the same time, that, in making this offer, His Britannic Majesty derives a motive from the equality, now existing, in the relations of the United States with the two belligerent Powers, the President owes it to the occasion, and to himself, to let it be understood that this equality is a result incident to a state of things, growing out of distinct considerations.

With this explanation, as requisite as it is frank, I am authorized to inform you that the President accepts the note delivered by you, in the name and by the order of His Britannic Majesty, and will consider the same, with the engagement contained therein, when fulfilled, as a satisfaction for the insult and injury of which he has complained. But I have it in express charge from the President to state, that, while he forbears to insist on a further punishment of the offending officer, he is not the less sensible of the justice and utility of such an example, nor the less persuaded that it would best comport with what is due from His Britannic Majesty to his own honor.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. SMITH.

The Hon. DAVID M. ERSKINE,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty.

Mr. Erskine to Mr. Smith.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, April 18, 1809.

I have the honor of informing you that His Majesty, having been persuaded that the honorable reparation which he had caused to be tendered for the unauthorized attack upon the American frigate Chesapeake, would be accepted by the Government of the United States in the same spirit of conciliation with which it was proposed, has instructed me to express his satisfaction, should such a happy termination of that affair take place, not only as having removed a painful cause of difference, but as affording a fair prospect of a complete and cordial understanding being re-established between the two countries.

The favorable change in the relations of His Majesty with the United States, which has been produced by the act (usually termed the non-intercourse act) passed in the last session of Congress, was also anticipated by His Majesty, and has encouraged a further hope that a reconsideration of the existing differences might lead to their satisfactory adjustment.

On these grounds and expectations, I am instructed to communicate to the American Government His Majesty's determination of sending to the United States an envoy extraordinary, invested with full powers to conclude a treaty on all the points of the relations between the two countries.

In the mean time, with a view to contribute to the attainment of so desirable an object, His Majesty would be willing to withdraw his orders in council of January and November, 1807, so far as respects the United States, in the persuasion that the President would issue a proclamation for the renewal of the intercourse with Great Britain, and that whatever difference of opinion should arise in the interpretation of the terms of such an agreement, will be removed in the proposed negotiation.

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of the highest consideration and esteem, sir,

Your most obedient servant,

The Hon. ROBERT SMITH, &c.

D. M. ERSKINE.

Mr. Smith to Mr. Erskine.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 18, 1809.

The note, which I had the honor of receiving from you this day, I lost no time in laying before the President, who, being sincerely desirous of a satisfactory adjustment of the differences unhappily existing between Great Britain and the United States, has authorized me to assure you that he will meet, with a disposition correspondent with that of His Britannic Majesty, the determination of His Majesty to send to the United States a special envoy, invested with full powers to conclude a treaty on all the points of the relations between the two countries.

I am further authorized to assure you, that in case His Britannic Majesty should, in the mean time, withdraw his orders in council of January and November, 1807, so far as respects the United States, the President will not fail to issue a proclamation, by virtue of the authority, and for the purposes specified in the eleventh section of the statute commonly called the non-intercourse act.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect and consideration, sir, your most obedient servant,

R. SMITH.

The Hon. DAVID M. ERSKINE,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty.

Mr. Erskine to Mr. Smith.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, April 19, 1809.

In consequence of the acceptance by the President, as stated in your letter dated the 18th instant, of the proposals made by me on the part of His Majesty, in my letter of the same day, for the renewal of the intercourse between the respective countries, I am authorized to declare, that His Majesty's orders in council of January and November, 1807, will have been withdrawn as respects the United States on the 10th day of June next.

I have the honor to be, with great respect and consideration, sir, your most obedient servant,

D. M. ERSKINE.

The Hon. ROBERT SMITH, &c. &c.

Mr. Smith to Mr. Erskine.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 19, 1809.

Having laid before the President your note of this day, containing an assurance that His Britannic Majesty will, on the 10th day of June next, have withdrawn his orders in council of January and November, 1807, so far as respects the United States, I have the honor of informing you, that the President will, accordingly, and in pursuance of the eleventh section of the statute, commonly called the non-intercourse act, issue a proclamation, so that the trade of the United States with Great Britain may, on the same day, be renewed in the manner provided in the said section.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect and consideration, sir, your obedient servant,

R. SMITH.

Hon. DAVID M. ERSKINE, &c. &c.

By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas it is provided by the eleventh section of the act of Congress, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes;" that, "in case either France or Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States," the President is authorized to declare the same by proclamation; after which the trade suspended by the said act, and by an act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto, may be renewed with the nation so doing; and whereas the honorable David Montague Erskine, His Britannic Majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, has, by the order and in the name of his Sovereign, declared to this Government that the British orders in council of January and November, 1807, will have been withdrawn, as respects the United States, on the 10th day of June next: Now, therefore, I, James Madison, President of the United States, do hereby proclaim that the orders in council aforesaid will have been withdrawn on the said 10th day of June next; after which day the trade of the United States with Great Britain, as suspended by the act of Congress above mentioned, and an act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto, may be renewed.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the United States, at Washington, the nineteenth day of April, in the [L. s.] year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and nine, and of the independence of the United States the thirty-third.

JAMES MADISON.

By the President:

R. SMITH, Secretary of State.

*Mr. Erskine to Mr. Smith.

SIR:

WASHINGTON, June 15, 1809.

I have the honor to enclose a copy of an order of His Majesty in council, issued on the 26th of April last.

In consequence of official communications sent to me from His Majesty's Government, since the adoption of that measure, I am enabled to assure you, that it has no connexion whatever with the overtures which I have been authorized to make to the Government of the United States, and that I am persuaded that the terms of the agreement, so happily concluded by the recent negotiation, will be strictly fulfilled on the part of His Majesty.

The internal evidence of the order itself would fully justify the foregoing construction; and, moreover, it will not have escaped your notice, that the repeal has not thereby been made of the orders of the 7th January, 1807, which, according to the engagement I have entered into on the part of His Majesty, is to be abrogated with the other orders, in consequence of the adjustment of differences between the two countries, and the confidence entertained of a further conciliatory understanding.

I have the honor to be, &c.

D. M. ERSKINE.

The Hon. ROBERT SMITH, &c. &c.

Mr. Smith to Mr. Erskine.

SIR:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 15, 1809.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of this day, communicating the order in council, issued by His Britannic Majesty, on the 26th of April last.

However well persuaded the President may at all times have been, that the arrangement, so happily effected by the late negotiation, would be strictly fulfilled on the part of His Britannic Majesty, he has, nevertheless, received with satisfaction your renewed assurance to that effect, with the further assurance, founded on official communications to you from your Government, since the adoption of the order in council of the 26th of April, that that order was not intended to have any connexion whatever with the overtures which you had been authorized to make to the Government of the United States.

I have the honor, &c.

INTERDICTION OF FOREIGN ARMED VESSELS.

REPORTED TO THE SENATE, JUNE 23, 1809.

Mr. SECT, from the committee to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate, "to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the exclusion of foreign armed vessels from the ports and harbors of the United States," submitted the following report:

That, in the opinion of the committee, such an interdiction is within the just and neutral rights of the United States, and, under other circumstances, would be highly expedient and proper. So long as a neutral nation shall confine itself to strict measures of impartiality, allowing no benefit to one belligerent, not stipulated by treaty, which it shall refuse to another, no cause whatever is afforded for exception or complaint. The right to admit an armed force into a neutral territory belongs exclusively to the neutral; and when not guaranteed by treaty, as is oftentimes the case, such admission compromises the neutrality of the nation, which permits to one belligerent alone such an indulgence.

* This and the following note were transmitted by the message of June 15, 1809.

As a measure of safety as well as of peace, it is incumbent upon the United States to carry into effect such a provision. So long as we are without a competent force to protect our jurisdiction from violation, and our citizens from outrage, and our flag from insults, so long ought no asylum to be given but in distress to the armed vessels of any nation. The committee will not bring into view the many injuries and insults which the United States have sustained from the hospitable grant of their ports and harbors to belligerents, nor the facility which has thereby been afforded to them to lay our commerce under contribution. It is sufficient to remark, that great injuries have been sustained, and that imperious duty requires arrangements at our hands to guard our country in future from similar aggressions.

The United States are at this moment under no obligation to withhold the restraints within their power upon the admission of foreign armed vessels into their ports; but the committee are strongly impressed with the propriety of avoiding any legislative interference at this time, which, by any possibility, might be construed into a desire to throw difficulties in the way of promised and pending negotiations. They are desirous that a fair experiment be made to adjust our differences with the two belligerent nations, and that no provisions be interwoven in our laws, which shall furnish a pretext for delay, or a refusal to yield to our just and honorable demands.

Calculating that the overtures which have been made by Great Britain will be executed in good faith, the committee are willing to believe that the stipulated arrangements will be of such a character as to guard our flag from insult, our jurisdiction from aggression, our citizens from violation, and our mercantile property from spoliation. Under these impressions, which the committee have stated as briefly as possible, they beg leave to submit to the consideration of the Senate the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the further consideration of the subject be postponed until the next session of Congress.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JUNE 26, 1809.

To the Senate of the United States:

JUNE 26, 1809.

The considerations which led to the nomination of a minister plenipotentiary to Russia, being strengthened by evidence since received of the earnest desire of the Emperor to establish a diplomatic intercourse between the two countries, and of a disposition in his councils favorable to the extension of a commerce mutually advantageous, as will be seen by the extracts from letters from General Armstrong and Consul Harris, herewith confidentially communicated:

I nominate John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, to be minister plenipotentiary of the United States to the court of St. Petersburg.

JAMES MADISON.

Mr. Harris to Mr. Madison.

SIR:

ST. PETERSBURG, July 7 [19,] 1808.

No opportunity has offered for the conveyance of the enclosed since the date thereof; this delay has enabled me to transmit you a copy of a note which has been written me by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, announcing the appointment of Mr. de Daschoff, in quality of chargé d'affaires and consul general to the United States.

The minister, in a particular conference I had with him, assured me of the great desire of the Emperor that this gentleman should proceed to his destination without delay, and personally carry His Majesty's sentiments upon the subject of the relations he was so anxious should be firmly established between the two States.

As a direct opportunity to America is likely to offer in about two weeks, I shall defer writing you more particularly till then, and have the honor to remain, with the greatest respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

LEVETT HARRIS.

The Hon. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State of the U. S. Washington.

[TRANSLATION.]

Count de Romanzoff to Mr. Harris.

ST. PETERSBURG, June 13, 1808.

The undersigned, Minister of Foreign Affairs, has the honor to inform Mr. Levett Harris, that His Imperial Majesty, wishing more and more to strengthen the ties of friendship between Russia and the United States of America, has judged it proper to name Mr. Daschoff, assesseur of the college, his consul general to Philadelphia, conferring on him, at the same time, the title of his chargé d'affaires near the Congress of the United States.

The undersigned prays the consul general to communicate this to his Government, and he seizes this occasion to reiterate to him the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

THE COUNT NICOLAS DE ROMANZOFF.

Extract of a letter from General Armstrong, minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, to the Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, November 24, 1808.

Mr. Short, who arrived on the 15th instant, and who delivered to me your letter of the 9th of September, not wishing to have his appointment known here, it has accordingly been concealed. But though this course has been adopted, and is still observed in conformity to Mr. Short's personal wishes, I did not think myself at liberty to keep from the Russian Minister of Foreign Relations (who is now here) the fact, that the President had determined to send a minister to St. Petersburg, and that his arrival there might be soon expected. The manner in which the Count received this intelligence showed the propriety of giving it. Besides expressions of the highest satisfaction on his own part, as well as on that of his master, he immediately despatched a courier to St. Petersburg, for the purpose of arresting or modifying the arrangements already taken, or about to be taken, with regard to Mr. Daschoff's departure for America. He wished, in particular, to be informed of the grade of public character which the gentleman appointed would bring with him, and added, that "an imperial minister of equal rank would be immediately appointed." Nor did he stop here: "Ever since I came into office," he said, "I have been desirous of producing this effect; for, in dissolving our commercial connexions with Great Britain, it became necessary to seek some other Power in whom we might find a substitute; and, on looking around, I could see none but the United States who were at all competent to this object."

COMMUNICATED, NOVEMBER 29, 1809,* DECEMBER 12, AND DECEMBER 16, 1809, AND MAY 1, 1810.

WASHINGTON, December 12, 1809.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

According to the request of the House of Representatives, expressed in their resolution of the 11th instant, I now lay before them a circular letter from Mr. Jackson to the British consul of the United States, as received in a gazette, at the Department of State; and also a printed paper, received in a letter from our minister in London, purporting to be a copy of a despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr. Erskine, of the 23d of January last.

JAMES MADISON.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

WASHINGTON, December 16, 1809.

Agreeably to the request expressed in the resolution of the 13th instant, I lay before the House extracts from the correspondence of the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at London.

JAMES MADISON.

Brief account of an unofficial conversation between Mr. Canning and Mr. Pinkney, on the 18th of January, 1809, continued on the 22d of the same month. [Transmitted by Mr. Pinkney to the Secretary of State.]

I dined at Mr. Canning's, with the corps diplomatique, on the 18th January. Before dinner he came up to me, and, entering into conversation, adverted to a report which he said had reached him that the American ministers (here and in France) were about to be recalled. I replied, that I was not aware that such a step had been resolved upon. He then took me aside, and observed, that, according to his views of the late proceedings of Congress, the resolutions of the House of Representatives, in Committee of the Whole, appeared to be calculated, if passed into a law, to remove the impediments to arrangement with the United States, on the subject of the orders in council and the Chesapeake, by taking away the discrimination between Great Britain and France in the exclusion of vessels of war from American ports. He added that it was another favorable circumstance that the non-importation system, which seemed to be in contemplation, was to be applied equally to both parties, instead of affecting, as heretofore, Great Britain alone.

I proposed to Mr. Canning that I should call on him in the course of a day or two for the purpose of a free communication upon what he had suggested. To this he readily assented; and it was settled that I should see him on the Sunday following (the 22d,) at 12 o'clock, at his own house.

In the interview of the 22d, Mr. Canning's impressions appeared to be in all respects the same with those which he had mentioned on the 18th; and I said every thing which I thought consistent with candor and discretion to confirm him in his disposition to seek the re-establishment of good understanding with us, and especially to see, in the expected act of Congress, (if it should pass,) an opening for reconciliation.

It was of some importance to turn their attention here, without loss of time, to the manner of any proceeding that might be in their contemplation. It seemed that the resolutions of the House of Representatives, if enacted into a law, might render it proper, if not indispensable, that the affair of the Chesapeake should be settled at the same time with the business of the orders and embargo, and this I understood to be Mr. Canning's opinion and wish. It followed that the whole matter ought to be settled at Washington, and, as this was moreover desirable on various other grounds, I suggested that it would be well (in case a special mission did not meet their approbation) that the necessary powers should be sent to Mr. Erskine.

* See this message, Foreign Relations, vol. 1, page 75.

In the course of the conversation, Mr. Canning proposed several questions relative to our late proposal; the principal were the two following:

1st. In case they should wish, either through me or through Mr. Erskine, to meet us upon the basis of our late overture, in what way was the effectual operation of our embargo as to France, &c. after it should be taken off as to Great Britain, to be secured? It was evident, he said, that if we should do no more than refuse clearances for the ports of France, &c. or prohibit, under penalties, voyages to such ports, the effect which my letter of the 23d of August, and my published instructions, proposed to have in view, would not be produced; for that vessels, although cleared for British ports, might, when once out, go to France instead of coming here; and that this would in fact be so, (whatever the penalties which the American laws might denounce against offenders) could not, he imagined, be doubted; and he, therefore, presumed that the Government of the United States would not, after it had itself declared a commerce with France, &c. illegal, and its citizens who should engage in it delinquents, and after having given to Great Britain, by compact, an interest in the strict observation of the prohibition, complain if the naval force of this country should assist in preventing such a commerce.

2d. He asked whether there would be any objection to making the repeal of the British orders and the American embargo contemporaneous? He seemed to consider this as indispensable. Nothing could be less admissible, he said, than that Great Britain, after rescinding her orders, should for any time, however short, be left subject to the embargo in common with France, whose decrees were subsisting, with a view to an experiment upon France, or with any other view. The United States could not, upon their own principles, apply the embargo to this country one moment after its orders were removed, or decline, after that event, to apply it exclusively to France, and the Powers connected with her in system.

I took occasion, towards the close of our conversation, to mention the recent appointment of Admiral Berkeley to the Lisbon station. Mr. Canning said, that whatever might be their inclination to consult the feelings of the American Government on that subject, it was impossible for the Admiralty to resist the claim of that officer to be employed (no other objection existing against him) after such a lapse of time since his return from Halifax, without bringing him to a court martial. The usage of the navy was, in this respect, different from that of the army. But I understood Mr. Canning to say that he might still be brought to a court-martial, although I did not understand him to say that this would be the case. He said that Admiral Berkeley, in what he had done, had acted wholly without authority. I did not propose to enter into any discussion upon the subject, and, therefore, contented myself with speaking of the appointment as unfortunate.

In both of these conversations, Mr. Canning's language and manner were in the highest degree conciliatory.

Copy of a despatch from Mr. Secretary Canning to the Hon. D. M. Erskine.

SIR:

FOREIGN OFFICE, January 23, 1809.

If there really exist in those individuals who are to have a leading share in the new administration of the United States that disposition to come to a complete and cordial understanding with Great Britain, of which you have received from them such positive assurances in meeting that disposition, it would be useless and unprofitable to recur to a recapitulation of the causes from which the differences between the two Governments have arisen, or of the arguments already so often repeated in support of that system of retaliation to which His Majesty has unwillingly had recourse.

That system His Majesty must unquestionably continue to maintain, unless the object of it can be otherwise accomplished.

But after the profession, on the part of so many of the leading members of the Government of the United States, of a sincere desire to contribute to that object in a manner which should render the continuance of the system adopted by the British Government unnecessary, it is thought right that a fair opportunity should be afforded to the American Government to explain its meaning, and to give proof of its sincerity.

The extension of the interdiction of the American harbors to the ships of war of France as well as of Great Britain, is, as stated in my former despatch, an acceptable symptom of a system of impartiality towards both belligerents; the first that has been publicly manifested by the American Government.

The like extension of the non-importation act to other belligerents is equally proper in this view. These measures remove those preliminary objections, which must otherwise have precluded any useful or amicable discussion.

In this state of things, it is possible for Great Britain to entertain propositions which, while such manifest partiality was shown to her enemies, were not consistent either with her dignity or her interest.

From the report of your conversations with Mr. Madison, Mr. Gallatin, and Mr. Smith, it appears:

1. That the American Government is prepared, in the event of His Majesty's consenting to withdraw the orders in council of January and November, 1807, to withdraw contemporaneously on its part the interdiction of its harbors to ships of war, and all non-intercourse and non-importation acts, so far as respects Great Britain; leaving them in force with respect to France, and the Powers which adopt or act under her decrees.

2. (What is of the utmost importance, as precluding a new source of misunderstanding which might arise after the adjustment of the other questions,) that America is willing to renounce, during the present war, the pretension of carrying on in time of war all trade with the enemy's colonies, from which she was excluded during peace.

3. Great Britain, for the purpose of securing the operation of the embargo, and of the bona fide intention of America to prevent her citizens from trading with France and the Powers adopting and acting under the French decrees, is to be considered as being at liberty to capture all such American vessels as may be found attempting to trade with the ports of any of these Powers; without which security for the observance of the embargo, the raising of it nominally with respect to Great Britain alone, would, in fact, raise it with respect to all the world.

On these conditions His Majesty would consent to withdraw the orders in council of January and November, 1807, so far as respects America.
