BRITISH WEST INDIA AND NORTH AMERICAN COLONIAL TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES FEBRUARY 9, 1818.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee to whom was referred that part of the President's message which relates to the commercial intercourse of the United States with the British West India islands and North American colonies, and also the petition of the inhabitants of different parts of the District of Maine on the same subject, reported :

That by the statement marked A, annexed to this report, it appears that the average amount of duties upon merchandise annually imported into the United States from the British West India islands and North American colonial possessions from 1802 to 1816, excluding the period from the commencement of the restrictive system to the termination of the late war, exceeds two millions of dollars. The value of the merchandise upon which these duties accrued is supposed to be equal to seven millions of dollars per annum. The statement B shows that the average annual amount of exports to the same places, principally of domestic production, up to 1817, excluding the time of the operation of the restrictive system and the continuance of the war, has exceeded six millions five hundred thousand dollars. The statement C shows that in the year 1815 the amount of duties on merchandise imported in American vessels from the British West India islands and North American colonial possessions was to the amount of duties imported in British vessels as one to four; in 1816, as one to five and a half, or two to eleven. Taking the ratio of 1816 as the basis of calculation, and it is believed to afford the safest and most solid, as past experience shows, a constant diminution of the amount of duties on goods imported in vessels of the United States, it is estimated, supposing the same proportion exists in the exports, that American vessels are used in the transportation annually of $2,177,924 worth of merchandise, and British vessels $11,322,076 worth of the most bulky articles of commerce, one half of which are of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States. This inequality in the advantages of this commerce, to the injury of the navigating interest of this country, arises from the rigorous enforcement of the colonial system of Great Britain as to the United States, while it is relaxed to all other nations who are friendly to the British empire and have colonial possessions. The portion of the commerce which is carried on in American vessels arises from accidental and temporary suspensions of the system which the governors of the islands, &c., are permitted, under the pressure of dire necessity, to direct—an employment for our seamen and vessels precarious and momentary, rather irritating and tantalizing than profitable. This intercourse appears to the committee in the worst possible state as it regards the navigation of the United States, while it is in the best for that of Great Britain. Justice and policy require on the part of every wise government its best exertions to secure to its own citizens a perfect equality in the transportation of merchandise with the people of every nation, respectively, with whom it has commercial intercourse. Some governments are governed by a policy more contracted, desiring to give to their navigation the exclusive transportation of their native products, while they desire their participation in carrying the productions of other countries. The committee are satisfied that the United States will never be governed by the selfish views of the latter class, but trust that it has not been, nor will it ever be, regardless of the just motives of the former: so far it is a duty to protect the navigating interest. This duty can be performed in relation to the subject of this report by conventional stipulation with Great Britain, formed upon the basis of reciprocity, or by legislative acts operating exclusively against the British navigator engaged in this trade. With the first mode this House has no further concern than to know that the other branch of the Government has performed its duty. Repeated and hitherto unavailing applications have been made to the British Government. It is not, however, surprising that they have been unsuccessful, since no adequate motive at present exists to induce Great Britain to arrange this intercourse by convention. The offer contained in the articles annexed to this report, the most rational and reciprocally advantageous of any ever made, may be considered as dictated by a spirit of accommodation which, under the pressure of adequate motives, might be fostered into a determination to grant all that we could reasonably ask or they be expected to yield. The three first articles, with some practicable modifications, would, by the adaptation of our commercial laws to the stipulation contained in them, confining the commerce strictly to those articles which Americans were permitted to carry, would place the trade upon as favorable grounds as could be expected. It would, no doubt, in a short time be followed by a complete abandonment of the residue of the present jealous system of exclusion. The committee cannot, however, but approve the prompt rejection of this proposition, since these articles are connected with another altogether inadmissible, without a departure from what they deem the settled policy of this country in relation to the trade with the Indians within its jurisdiction. The British ministry having assured this Government that these articles were all that could be granted consistent with their opinions of the best interest of the British empire, there is no longer any hope of effecting this desirable object by negotiation. It remains for Congress to determine what course is to be pursued. If it were possible to separate the interest of one class of the community from that of another, it must be obvious that, however fatal to the navigator, the present state of things is not injurious to the cultivator of the soil. The productions of his labor are carried with facility to a ready market, and he receives in return all those articles which taste and habit have rendered necessary to his comfort. But this separation is impossible, and the necessary connexion between the two interests is apparent, when it is remembered that the competition of American with foreign navigation is essential to keep down the expense of transportation always paid by the cultivator and consumer. If this injury is not now apparent, it will ultimately be felt when the total ruin of the navigation interest will deprive us of the power to remedy the evil. The committee forbear to press those important considerations of preparation for national defence so inseparably connected with the inquiry. They feel that there is on this point but one sentiment among the representatives of the people and in the nation. Experience, prudence, gratitude for the glory shed upon our country, and the confident and delightful anticipation of future renown, all conspire to insure the necessary sacrifices for the preservation and interest of the seamen of the United States. This object, so far as it may be promoted by a participation in the commercial intercourse with the British American colonies, may be effected by a trifling and temporary sacrifice of the interests of agriculture. A slight knowledge of the situation of the British West India colonies authorizes the position that a commerce with the United States is essential to their prosperity if not to their existence. The best market for the sale of their surplus products is found here, while the grain, provisions, and lumber, articles of the first necessity, received in return, are procured on terms infinitely more advantageous than they are to be had for their use in any other part of the world. But for occasional supplies of those articles from the United States some of the islands would be deserted by their inhabitants, or a change produced in their agriculture ruinous to their commercial interest. The people of the United States are in a very different situation. The British West India market is convenient, but not necessary to their accommodation. All the articles imported from them can be procured abundantly, upon terms equally advantageous, from other quarters. The annexed tables, marked D and E, show the amount of imports of the chief articles of their product from the British West Indies, &c., and the proportion it bears to the whole amount of imports of similar articles from other West India islands, &c. Many of these can be and are procured from other quarters of the world with which commerce in American vessels is not restrained. The demand for all can be supplied without a recourse to the British West India islands, and a supply from other quarters will be obtained by the employment of American vessels and American seamen in common with the vessels and seamen of the country from which it may be brought. The only danger to be apprehended is that the cultivator, losing the British West India market for the use of his exports, would lose with it the ability to procure the commodities he formerly received in return. The extent of this danger depends upon the correctness of the position laid down—that this commerce is essential to the British West India islands, and only convenient to the United States. If the necessities of life can only be or are procured on terms infinitely more advantageous here than anywhere else, it follows they will still be carried to the British West Indies, if not directly under a convention between two governments, circuitously through some mutually friendly port. It is perfectly true that the West India islands are capable of producing all that is necessary for their own subsistence, but this must be at the expense of their commercial importance; the abandonment of the most profitable for, to them, an unprofitable cultivation. The general use and consequent high price of West India produce will insure a continuance of the usual course of agriculture, and will, as heretofore, operate as a bounty upon the growth of breadstuffs in the United States. In favorable seasons and in peaceful times Europe affords a surplus of human aliment, and supplies are to be found on the African coast of the Mediterranean; but these come loaded with the increased expenses and the dangers of the lengthened transportation of heavy articles. In the event of one of those desolating tempests of but too frequent occurrence in these otherwise favored regions, destroying in an instant the labors of a life, and scattering the hoards collected by prudence for the subsistence of the colony, the distance from these places of relief renders timely assistance to the unfortunate impossible. The North American colonies cannot furnish these necessary supplies. The navigation of the principal river which carries the greatest portion of her stores to the ocean is closed the better part of the year, and is not practicable at that season which is usually marked by these calamities. It is believed, too, that by far the largest portion of the apparent exports of Canada of breadstuffs, and even of lumber, &c., are carried from the United States. There must be at all times a dependence to a certain extent upon this country. And if a conventional relaxation is not produced by a prohibition of this direct intercourse, or the imposition of such charges as shall amount almost to prohibition, it follows that the trade will be circuitous. In this event the export trade, instead of being carried on exclusively in British bottoms, will be prosecuted in American vessels and the vessels of that foreign nation in whose ports the parties may, by tacit arrangement, meet for the exchange of their commodities. The return cargoes, if of British growth, will, under the navigation act of the United States, be brought wholly in American vessels.

The only question remaining to be examined is as to the mode of effecting this desirable result—by total prohibition of all intercourse, or by burdensome charges on the trade if confined to British vessels? The committee believe that the latter is to be preferred, and have accordingly reported a bill. There is no essential difference between them, except as the one or the other is more or less inconvenient in its execution. The effect of onerous duties is more slow but equally certain; the pressure will soon be felt, and the beneficial consequences gradually follow. The stream of commerce will easily and naturally flow into the desired channel without the risk of those dangers which a sudden and violent effort to divert it might produce. A short time will prove the efficacy of this arrangement, and justify its continuance, modification, or abandonment. It is recommended, too, by its facility of execution; it requires no further alteration in the existing laws; it is not necessary to arm for its enforcement the petty officers of the customs with powers dangerous and odious to a free people.

For further and more detailed information on the subject of this report, the committee refer the House to a document marked F, furnished from the Department of State.

Notes on the practical effect of the treaty lately made between Great Britain and the United States.

1. The duties and tonnage on British and American ships and goods are equalized, except as it respects the colonies of Great Britain in North America and the West Indies, to which the treaty does not apply.
2. Since the peace the colonial system of Great Britain has been enforced with unusual rigor, neither American vessels nor property being admitted into her colonies.
3. American vessels are admitted into the French, Spanish, Dutch, Danish, and Swedish colonies in the West Indies, under certain restrictions as to imports and exports; and the vessels of those nations are admitted under similar restrictions into the ports of the British colonies in the West Indies.
4. Very heavy duties have been recently imposed in the British West Indies on American produce, even when carried in British ships, and also on the exportation of plaster of Paris from the colony of Nova Scotia to the adjoining State of the Union.

Observations on the preceding facts.

1. In the agreement to equalize the duties on the carrying trade of the two countries it will be seen at the first glance that the positive advantages are on the side of Great Britain. Our exports are wholly composed of bulky articles, such as lumber, provisions, cotton, tobacco, tar, &c., &c., the whole of which are of primary necessity to the manufactures and colonies of Great Britain, and require for their transportation a quantity of tonnage ten-fold larger than that which would be requisite to bring back their value in British manufactures. Thus a single ship from London or Liverpool frequently brings to the United States twenty times the value of the cargo which the same carried from the United States; and of the one hundred sail of vessels which sailed for Ireland during the last season, not more than one would be requisite to bring back the returns in Irish linens, the only article of merchandise imported from that country. Now, the only advantage which the United States derives from the treaty is the removal of the duty imposed on their produce when carried to British ports in their own bottoms. It was found proper to remove this duty by giving up the immense advantages that would accrue from the exclusive carriage of our own productions. It may, however, be observed, with truth, that the British market has for many years been as necessary to our productions as those productions were to that market. But the period of monopoly has passed away, and our raw materials will find as ready a sale in the other parts of Europe as they have lately found in Great Britain. These observations apply more particularly to the intercourse between the United States and the European ports of Great Britain.
  2. The seizure and condemnation of American vessels under the charge of violating the laws which regulate the West India trade leave no doubt as to the determination of the British Government to enforce its colonial system in the most rigid manner. This severity on the part of Great Britain will warrant a counteraction on ours.
  3. We have at present an unrestricted entry into all the ports of the island of Cuba, and, although Spain may at a future day fix certain limits to our imports and exports, yet there can be no doubt of our having a partial entry for any lumber and other bulky commodities necessary to her colonists, as well as a free export of such as are not wanted for the commerce of the mother country. There is a mutual advantage in this exchange which will insure its continuance for many years.
- We have also admission into the Dutch, French, Swedish, and Danish settlements in the West Indies, under such regulations, however, as the respective governments think proper to impose. These are of a nature to leave us many advantages and to employ a very large tonnage. We have also free admission into the Portuguese settlements in Brazil, where we might more reasonably expect a total seclusion. In a word, the other European nations have so far yielded to the course which Nature points out for the supply of their colonies with necessaries that they have no restrictions whatever as to the mode in which they are carried. Great Britain alone says that we shall not be the carriers of the articles which we ourselves furnish, although they are indispensable not only to the well being but frequently to the very existence of her colonies in the West Indies.

We should have less reason to complain if the rigor which is shown towards us were dealt out in equal measure to other nations. But this is so far from being the case, that vessels under the flag of any European nation having colonies in the West Indies are admitted under certain limitations as to the size and the nature of their cargoes, the latter of which, however, may be composed of the very articles generally carried from the United States, as well as of indigo, dye woods, specie, &c., and, what must appear very singular in the conduct of a nation affecting extraordinary morality in its public as well as private character, by far the greatest part of the commerce carried on under this admission of foreign vessels into her West India islands is in direct contravention of the laws of the respective governments to which they belong.

4. Does it accord with the spirit of liberality which we are to presume dictated the late treaty to impose most extraordinary duties on our productions, even when carried to her settlements in her own vessels? She may say, with apparent reasons, that she must encourage the consumption of the commodities which are of her own growth or of that of her North American colonies, and that ultimately the consumer must pay the duty. But I trust that before these observations are closed it will appear that this proceeding is grounded in jealousy and a reliance (I hope a mistaken one) in our apathy.

In considering the treaty without reference to the West Indies, it would at first appear that the carrying trade is left open to both the parties, and that there is a fair and equal chance for its emoluments. But on a nearer view, and in connexion with the excepted ports, it will be seen that Great Britain has such decided advantages over us that, unless some vigorous measures are adopted on our part, the shipping interest of this country must necessarily sustain incalculable loss. Instead of a gradual increase that might rationally be looked for in a country where every other branch of trade is progressive, we must be prepared to see our tonnage reduced at the end of four years to one-half its actual quantity. Great Britain leads annually six hundred sail of ships in her West India settlements, which make but one voyage a year. They sail from the West Indies generally between the months of May and August, and consequently arrive in England between June and October. Of those which arrive first, as many as are requisite are freighted to bring dry goods, &c., to the United States, and if freights do not offer they are loaded by the owners with salt, crates of earthen ware, coal, copperas, and a variety of bulky articles of small value, the profits on which generally afford a moderate freight. When these cargoes are landed in the United States, and others consisting of provisions, lumber of all sorts, stock, and such other articles as are admitted into the British colonies, are taken in, they proceed to their West India settlements with all the prospects of advantage afforded by an exclusive trade, and they arrive in season to take another freight to England. Now, if the trade between the United States and the West Indies in British ships were prohibited by our Government, all the British ships employed in making the indirect voyages of which we have just spoken would remain idle until the months of November and December, at which time they generally sail from Europe to the West Indies, or they must perform the intermediate voyage by proceeding to the British settlements on this continent to procure their lumber and provisions. But in this operation the advantage of the outward freight is lost, for those settlements cannot consume the great quantity of coarse goods which are readily disposed of in the United States, and, indeed, a sufficiency is supplied by vessels regularly employed between these settlements and the mother country. Thus every article of lumber and provisions carried from the North American colonies to the West Indies by vessels trading in this circuitous manner must be subject to the charge of double freight. But there is still a greater inconvenience which cannot be surmounted. Quebec is the only one of the colonies which can furnish breadstuffs for the West Indies. Now, it must be evident that the West India ships arrive in Europe too late to proceed to Quebec, as they would certainly be caught by the ice. In this event, therefore, of the seclusion of these ships from our ports, they would be unable to procure the profitable employment which they now enjoy by their circuitous voyages already described.

Again, a considerable tonnage is employed in carrying timber from the Bay of Fundy to Europe. The vessels employed in this trade, like those employed in that of the West Indies, bring freights or coarse goods to the United States, and then proceed to execute the main object of their voyage, after having secured one freight to the United States.

It must be seen on a moment's reflection that these operations produce an injury to our carrying trade commensurate to the benefit which they yield to that of Great Britain. For it is evident that in the instances here noticed the voyages to the United States are merely incidental to others of greater importance, and yet the cargoes brought to this country are precisely those which, under proper restrictions on our part, would be brought by our own vessels and by the other British ships employed in a regular trade between the two countries. In fact, it is an evil growing out of the British colonial system highly prejudicial to the maritime interests of this country. It is not even confined to the cases already noticed. British ships have brought freights or cargoes to the United States, where they have taken in lumber and provisions, with which they have proceeded to Jamaica, and, after landing their cargoes and finding freights scarce, they have gone in a few days to New Orleans for a load of cotton or tobacco for a European port; thus carrying three freights, two of which, at least, ought to have been carried by the ships of our own country. Now, the American tonnage proceeding from the northern and in fact from all the Atlantic States is compelled to proceed to New Orleans in ballast, because it cannot land cargoes of lumber and provisions in the West Indies as the British do. The case is equally strong when applied to the shipping belonging to the British colonies in North America. Vessels come from New Brunswick with cargoes of plaster, fish, &c., which yield a good freight and afford returns in provisions and lumber, which are carried to the West Indies and their value brought to us again in rum, &c. In these operations the American shipping cannot participate, and the singularity of this case is aggravated by the consideration that it is in the United States only that a market can be found for the plaster. There is something so unnatural in this restriction as to plaster that we should have supposed that even the jealous policy of Great Britain would have revolted at it, and surely great reliance must have been had on our forbearance when the experiment was hazarded. But one solid advantage is derived from the minuteness with which the British colonial system is enforced. It develops the views and intentions of Great Britain in a manner too clear to be misunderstood, and shows most forcibly the necessity of an early and vigorous reaction on our part.

In the formation of the treaty it is to be presumed that the parties, by relinquishing tonnage duties on the one side and bounties on the other, intended to leave the commerce of the two countries open to fair and open competition, and if one of the parties thought proper to make exceptions as to the trade of particular ports or places, it would not have been expected that those exceptions should in any way operate to the positive disadvantage of the other party. Thus, if Great Britain had reserved to herself and to her colonies in North America the privilege of directly supplying her West India settlements with provisions and lumber, however irrational and unnatural the scheme may have been, we had no right to complain. But when she avails herself of the exception of her colonies from the operation of the treaty, in order to destroy or diminish the apparent equivalent which we have or should have received in return for our concessions, it would be extreme folly to suppose that our Government would not take the necessary steps to remedy so serious an evil. The treaty would otherwise prove nothing more or less than an act of self-immolation.

But there is another feature in the treaty which, although it has excited but little observation, because its practical effects have not yet been felt, yet requires the immediate interference of the Legislature. British ships may import into the United States, on equal terms with our own ships, the productions and manufactures of the whole globe; whereas we can carry to Great Britain, in our vessels, only certain articles of our own produce, and those, too, in an unmanufactured state. The staples of the eastern and middle States are virtually excluded from British ports by bounties granted in favor of her own and of her colonial productions. British ships may bring from the Baltic to the United States the bulky articles of hemp, iron, cordage, and coarse linens; from Holland and Germany a great variety of coarse goods, the wines and brandy and even plaster of France; and also the wines and fruits of Spain and Portugal, as well as the salt of the latter countries, the last and only resource of a great number of our vessels returning from Europe, together with all the productions of the countries bordering on the Mediterranean, and, in a word, as before observed, of the whole universe. Thus it appears that the operation of the treaty in its present form, and without interruption by restrictive measures on our part, will soon place us in nearly the same relation in which her colonies stand to Great Britain, with the additional and very convenient circumstance of our requiring no aid from her to support our establishment. We receive the produce and manufactures of Great Britain, of her colonies, and of the whole universe, in her own bottoms; we furnish the most precious raw materials to her manufactures, and to her colonies lumber and provisions of a quality suited to the habits of her colonists, such as can be procured with convenience in this country only, and such as are always necessary to their convenience and frequently to their very existence. We receive from their colonies in North America all their productions, and more especially one that has no value except in our country, and yet, being of a very bulky nature, requires and employs for its transport a very extensive tonnage. Thus we furnish a very extensive nursery for British seamen and an ample field for the employment of British capital, and what is the return for all these advantages and for all this complaisance on our part? Why, it is the privilege of carrying in our own bottoms a part of our own productions to Great Britain on the same terms that similar goods are carried from our country in her ships. And this is the same nation which but a short time ago threatened to drive our flag from the ocean, and from the ocean she will drive it, without firing a gun, if we sleep at our posts.

We are to presume from the character of the individuals who acted as our Commissioners in the formation of the treaty that they were fully aware of the consequences that might flow from the exclusion of the British colonies from its operation, and they must have been sensible that some moderate concessions would have been made by the British Government in regard to their colonial trade, or that the severity of its regulations would be met by a corresponding counteraction on our part. It appears, therefore, singular that no mention has been made relative to the subject in any of the official communications of the Government to Congress, nor, in fact, any notice taken of it, until a motion was made by Mr. King calling for some rigorous measures on our part to meet those already adopted by the British Government. From the sentiments expressed by some of the House it may be inferred that it is considered as a very delicate subject. It is certain that it is much to be regretted that the conduct of Great Britain should render it a subject of necessary legislation in our national councils. But it must be observed that the date of the British tariff of duties on our produce carried to the West Indies is subsequent to that of the treaty. We may therefore be considered at issue on the point of restriction, and we may as well commence our operations now as at some future period, when the minds of our people may be more irritated by the operations of the present system. There may be some difference of opinion as to the manner in which we ought to proceed in regard to the West India trade; but this, I think, will soon disappear when we look narrowly into the nature of the West India settlements and of the many local circumstances by which they are affected. Soon after the American Revolution Great Britain excluded the vessels of the United States from her West India ports. She had determined to try the experiment of supplying them from her colonies on this continent. She, however, permitted her own vessels to carry supplies from the United States; and yet so inadequate were these supplies to meet the extraordinary demand occasioned by hurricanes, that, according to the statements of Bryan Edwards, the historian, in the short period of six years no less than fifteen thousand human beings perished in her West India colonies from hunger and bad provisions. But there is now no longer a deficiency of tonnage or capital for the ample supply of those colonies, provided our ports are open as they then were. There is, on the contrary, a redundancy both of shipping and capital, and nothing is wanted but a continuance of our complaisance to insure the profitable employment of one and the other. The views of Great Britain have been developed by acts of an unequivocal character, and it now rests with us to show whether she has judged us correctly in calculating on our forbearance now, as she did on the former occasion. Then, if we are not arrested by any considerations in regard to her, we have only to settle the question as it respects the interest of our own country. This subject may be brought before us in a very simple form: Can Great Britain support her West India colonies in comfort, or even in safety, without supplies from the United States? I answer, with confidence, that she cannot; and that, consequently, we are entitled to and can apply from her a reasonable participation in the carriage of the articles which we alone can furnish. If she monopolizes the carriage of her plaster, may we not as reasonably monopolize the carriage of our supplies, which are as useful to them as her plaster is to us.

We have already shown in what manner she now supplies her islands from the United States, and how much that mode of supply operates to our prejudice, and, from the single fact of her taking supplies from us in any form or manner, it might fairly be inferred that she is unable to furnish them from her own resources. For can any one, knowing the uniform course of her policy towards us, doubt for a moment as to the motives of her conduct on this occasion? Would she permit the importation of a barrel of meal or one stave from this country if she could furnish that barrel or that stave from her own possessions? But we shall endeavor to supply proofs of a more positive character. Let us then suppose all communication to be interdicted between the United States and the British West India islands, and that the latter are compelled to rely on their own resources or those of the mother country and her colonies on this continent for supplies of lumber and provisions.

It is well known that the West India islands are unable to support themselves, otherwise the question as to supplying them would never have been agitated. The single circumstance of their being liable to be occasionally visited by hurricanes is of itself sufficient evidence of their dependence on foreign aid. They must then depend on supplies from the mother country and her colonies in North America. Let us now see to what extent they may safely rely on the one and the other. England and Ireland can furnish salt provisions in abundance, and wheaten and rye flour. The latter are the only articles of dry provisions that can be furnished from Europe. Peas and beans have been tried frequently, but have been found a most unwholesome food for the slaves. Rye flour is also a bad food, as it proves uniformly sour before its arrival, and makes at best but a weak and unwholesome food in the manner in which it must be used by the negroes, as they cannot submit it to the process of fermentation before it is used. The mode of preparing food adopted by the negroes is, and necessarily must be, extremely simple, and must require but little time or fuel; a small earthen or iron pot composes the whole of a negro's culinary apparatus, and into this pot everything must go. During the late war the experiment was fully made with rye flour, and it was universally condemned and abandoned as soon as Indian meal could be procured. Wheaten flour, although wholesome and nourishing, yet, requiring more preparation than Indian meal or rice, is found less agreeable than the latter articles, even when perfectly sweet; but it will be seen that of necessity it must generally be delivered to the negro in an unsound state, and of course must prove an unwholesome diet. Thus we see that Great Britain can furnish but one article of dry provisions to her islands, and even that one of a doubtful character as to its effects on the health of the negroes. Of her means for supplying lumber I presume it is needless to say anything, as she relies on foreign supplies for her own consumption. The islands must then depend on Nova Scotia and Canada for all their lumber, and for such dry provisions as the mother country cannot supply. Nova Scotia can export no dry provisions; on the contrary, she imports for her own consumption. Fish she can supply in great variety and abundance. White pine lumber abounds in the Bay of Fundy, but good lumber of other kinds is very scarce there. The only and last resource, therefore, is Canada. Here flour and lumber of some kinds may be procured; but there are so many untoward circumstances attending the mode of supply from Canada that the object can only be attained in a very imperfect manner. Thus we see that the West Indies can be supplied with flour, fish, and a certain portion of lumber, from Canada and Nova Scotia; and we will, for argument's sake, suppose that these supplies may be fully equal to the demands of the islands; we will further suppose that the planters, as well as the slaves, are compelled to eat Canadian flour and to use none but Canadian and Nova Scotia lumber and fish; we will even go further, and suppose that a regular intercourse is established, and that the demands of the colonies in the West Indies are ascertained and the shipments duly proportioned to those demands. Are there then no contingencies which may occasionally diminish, if not wholly defeat, the object of this arrangement? It is well known that vessels of burden can make but one voyage annually to Quebec, and that, consequently, the whole supply of dry provisions, consisting only of bread and flour, for one year's consumption, must be deposited in the warm climate of the West Indies between the months of June and September, and that during the remaining eight months of the year the consumer must eat the flour of the preceding year's growth, under all its progressive and, I may add, rapid stages of deterioration, until the supplies of the ensuing year arrive. But this is not the only inconvenience attending this mode of supply; a much larger capital must be employed in the business, because the merchant in the West Indies who supplies the estates must make his investments for the remainder of the year during the four months in which the supplies are brought to market, and he will demand a price proportioned to the inconvenience sustained by his heavy advances and to the danger of totally losing whatever stock he may have on hand when new provisions arrive; thus the provisions which, under the most favorable circumstances, would be dear, become much more so. But we will even suppose that this inconvenience is obviated by a submission on the part of the planter; we will then have placed the matter in the most favorable point of view that our opponents could require.

It is well known that the island of Jamaica has more internal resources than any of the other British islands in the West Indies. She raises such large quantities of ground provisions and has such extensive plantation walks, as they are called, that she does not import one-tenth part of the provisions consumed by her black population. The clearances from our custom-houses will show that she receives from us proportionably less negro and more fine provisions than any other of the British islands. I make this assertion on the additional authority of the best-informed merchants of this city; but the weight of my observations on this particular point are but little affected by a supposition of the quantity of negro provisions being greater or less than that here stated.

According to the official returns of the number of negroes in that island in the year 1787, the latest official record that I can find, there were—250,000 negroes.

40,000 white and colored persons in the island.

290,000 being the whole population.

We have already supposed that the whole of the white population shall receive its dry provisions from abroad, but that the negroes and colored people receive only one-tenth of their provisions in the same manner. Let us then suppose that under this order of things the island should be visited by one of those dreadful hurricanes by which it is so frequently ravaged and which destroy all the fruits of the earth that are exposed to the violence of their action. The consequences of this awful visitation cannot be contemplated without horror and without deprecating the blind and inveterate policy that could subject such an extensive population to all the miseries of famine and consequent insurrections and massacres that would ensue. If it is imagined that I speak in terms of exaggeration, let me refer to the authentic history of Bryan Edwards. But enough can be proved without any such reference; for it must be remembered that these scourges would only occur at those precise periods when the islands can receive no immediate supplies from Canada, and that they are too remote from England to receive aid from that quarter. Hurricanes prevail almost exclusively in the months of September and October, during which latter month the navigation of the St. Lawrence generally closes.

I have selected the island of Jamaica for the particular object of my observations because it is equal in value to all the other islands, and because it has proportionally greater resources. The same observations will apply with still greater force to the other insular possessions of Great Britain in the West Indies.

When we take into consideration the amount of British capital vested in the West Indies, estimated many years ago by Bryan Edwards at the enormous sum of 70,000,000 sterling; of the value and extent of the British shipping employed in the West India trade, which, in 1787, was no less than 1,069 vessels, or 155,009 tons; and also the amount of the mercantile capital actively and usefully employed in this trade, can we for one moment suppose that Great Britain will put in jeopardy the whole or any considerable part of these important possessions merely to preserve to herself the comparatively small consideration of monopolizing the carriage of our lumber and provisions, in which we have a rational claim to participate? Such a supposition but ill accords with the wary and calculating spirit that governs her commercial policy.

But let us admit that, deaf to all the suggestions of reason and common prudence, she should persist in this course of interdiction, are there no other considerations opposed to its operation? Will she lay aside all regard to the comfort, to the established habits and to the interests of her colonists, which are identified with her own? The charges incident to the cultivation of the favored island of Jamaica are already so high that, on an average, the estates of that island scarcely pay the legal interest of the capitals vested in them; and it is well known that her possessions in the Antilles have for many years been considered rather as splendid than useful appendages to the crown. Many of the sugar estates have lately been converted into pasture from the inability of the proprietors to support the heavy charges incident to the manufacture of sugar and rum, and from the decrease of population. Our embargo and the late war have contributed considerably to produce this effect. The preceding observations are made under a presumption that Great Britain is at peace with all the world. But if we represent her as engaged in a war with any of the maritime nations of Europe, her West India colonies must be absolutely dependent on the United States for their supplies. For even if Great Britain and her North American colonies could furnish the materials, the charges of carriage and insurance would render them insupportably dear. Whilst writing these notes I received from a friend the return of the naval officer of Jamaica of the imports and exports of that island for one year, viz: from the 30th September, 1803, to September 30, 1804; of some of the items of this document I may speak hereafter. At present I shall only observe that it was made at a time when Great Britain was at war with France, and when she found it necessary, as she always must do on similar occasions, to suspend the operations of her colonial system. From the part which we then performed in furnishing and carrying supplies to her islands, it may easily be imagined what must be the situation of these islands when the mother country is at war with us. The writer can state, on the authority of several respectable residents in the island of St. Croix, that, from the commencement of our embargo in ——— to the conclusion of the late war, no less than 7,000 slaves perished from hunger and bad provisions; the island during that time was in possession of the British. Its proximity to Porto Rico gave it many advantages over the other British islands.

It may, however, be justly observed that the object is well worth the attention and even solicitude of Great Britain. By the return of which I have just spoken, and which will be found annexed to these notes, it appears that the amount of tonnage which entered Jamaica from America in one year was 69,525 tons, and we can form some estimate of the proportion of that tonnage which belonged to the United States by the proportion of goods stated to have been carried by American vessels. I should be disposed to consider the proportion at least as eight tons of American to one of British shipping. But if the tonnage employed in carrying to Jamaica 69,525 tons be doubled it will give a tolerably accurate view of the whole tonnage sent from America to the West Indies in one year, viz: 139,050 tons. This tonnage, divided, gives 1,390 vessels, of 100 tons, performing one voyage in a year, or 695, of the same burden, performing two voyages in a year; or 347, of 200 tons, performing two voyages in a year. Now, can it be reasonably expected that, as a maritime nation, we will permit Great Britain to load by far the largest part of this tonnage in our ports with articles which she cannot supply, and which are absolutely necessary to her colonies, without some equivalent? Are we to count for nothing the market which we afford for the consumption of her West India produce, and without which one most important item, viz: rum, must lose one-half its value?

The writer closes his observations on this very important subject with a personal one relative to himself. He has lived many years in the West Indies, and has been intimately connected with their commerce for the last thirty-five years.

ST. JAGO DE LA VAGA, JAMAICA, December 1.

By the return of the naval officer laid before the House of Assembly, on Tuesday the 13th November, the following is a summary of the exports and imports of this island from the 30th September, 1803, to 30th September, 1804:

Imports from the United States of America in American vessels.

64,362 barrels of corn meal and flour.	267 quintals of fish.
16,119 bags } of bread.	11,741 barrels of beef.
6,223 barrels }	17,038 barrels of pork.
3,895 kegs }	5,247 firkins of butter.
3,063 tierces of rice.	65,435 bushels of corn.
2,275 hhds. }	6,768,271 feet of lumber.
15,743 barrels }	7,997,957 staves and heading.
444 kegs }	12,733,207 shingles.
2,743 boxes }

In British vessels.

12,937 barrels of corn meal and flour.	1,596 barrels of pork.
648 barrels } of bread.	49 firkins of butter.
513 kegs }	162 casks.
561 tierces of rice.	3,892 bushels of corn.
261 hhds. } of fish.	400,845 feet of lumber.
845 barrels }	411,902 staves and heading.
100 kegs.	242,000 shingles.
565 boxes.	93 casks of tobacco.
667 barrels of beef.	1,467 barrels of naval stores.

From British America.

816 barrels of flour.	191 barrels of pork.
100 bags } of bread.	80 firkins of butter.
88 barrels }	4,300 bushels of corn.
109 kegs }	719,971 feet of lumber.
10 quintals }	302,750 staves and heading.
1,904 hhds. }	139,750 shingles.
13,798 barrels } of fish.	153 logs.
324 kegs }	60,000 feet of mahogany.
368 boxes }	154 casks of oil.
362 barrels of bread.	92 hhds. of beer.

Exports—Total from Kingston.

3,940 tierces }	1,024 casks }
144 barrels }	5,645 bags }
12,008 puncheons } of rum.	632 casks }
541 hhds }	16,313,386 pounds of coffee.
64 casks of molasses.

Total from the out ports.

61,970 hhds. } of sugar.	981 bags }
8,862 tierces }	70 casks }
717 barrels }	13,927 bags }
30,204 puncheons } of rum.	785 casks }
372 hhds }	5,750,594 pounds of coffee.
365 casks of molasses.

GRAND TOTAL.

103,352 hhds. } of sugar.	1,854 bags }
12,802 tierces }	1,094 casks }
2,207 barrels }	19,572 bags }
42,207 puncheons } of rum.	1,417 casks }
913 hhds }	22,063,980 pounds of coffee.
429 casks of molasses.

Increase since last year, in coffee only, 4,240,977 pounds.

Decrease about—

6,000 hogsheads of sugar.	2,644 bags of ginger.
16,148 puncheons } of rum.	1,537 bags }
560 hhds }	68 casks }
93 casks of molasses.

The tonnage of vessels trading to this island between September 30, 1803, and September 30, 1804, was—

From Great Britain and Ireland.....	93,433 tons.
From America.....	69,525 "
From the Spanish Main.....	4,101 "
Traders under free port act.....	14,826 "
Droggers.....	3,382 "

During the above period 1,813 horses, 2,132 mules, 218 asses, and 2,107 horned cattle have been imported, and from Great Britain and Ireland 54,507 barrels of herrings.

ARTICLE 1. His Britannic Majesty consents to extend to the United States the provisions of the free port act, as established by the 45 Geo. III, chap. 57, (except as far as relates to negro slaves, which, under the abolition acts, can no longer be lawfully exported from any British possession to any foreign country;) that is to say, that any sloop, schooner, or other vessel whatever, not having more than one deck, and being owned and navigated by subjects of the United States, may import into any of the free ports in his Majesty's possessions in the West Indies, from the United States, any of the articles enumerated in the above act, being of the growth or production of the United States, and any coin, bullion, diamonds, and precious stones; and the said articles, being of the growth or production of the United States, and also all other articles imported into the said free ports by virtue of this convention from the United States, shall be subject in all respects to the same rules, regulations, and restrictions, and shall enjoy the same advantages as to re-exportation as are now applied to similar articles when imported by authority of said act from any other foreign country, and re-exported from the said possessions of his Majesty. His Britannic Majesty further consents that any vessel of the United States, as above described, may export from any of the said ports to the United States rum of the produce of any British colony or possession; and also all manner of goods, wares, or merchandise which shall have been legally imported into those possessions of his Majesty in which the said free ports are established, except masts, yards, or bowsprits, pitch, tar, and turpentine, and also except such iron as shall have been brought from the British colonies or plantations in America.

And whereas, by an act passed in the 48th year of his Majesty's reign, chapter 125, rice, grain, and flour are added to the articles previously allowed to be imported into the said free ports, it is agreed that those articles may be imported from the United States into the said free ports in vessels of the United States, as above described; and it is agreed on the part of the United States that any facilities granted in consequence of this convention to American vessels in his Majesty's said colonies and possessions shall be reciprocally granted in the ports of the United States to British vessels of a similar description engaged in the intercourse so allowed to be carried on; and that if at any future period during the continuance of this convention his Britannic Majesty should think fit to grant any further facilities to vessels of the United States in the said colonies and possessions, British vessels trading between the said colonies and possessions and the United States shall enjoy in the ports of the latter equal and reciprocal advantages. It is further agreed that articles imported into the said free ports of the United States by virtue of this convention shall pay the same duties as are or may be payable upon similar articles when imported into the said free ports from any other foreign country; and the same rule shall be observed on the part of the United States in regard to all duties chargeable upon all such articles as may, by virtue of this convention, be exported from the said free ports to the United States.

But his Britannic Majesty reserves to himself the right to impose higher duties upon all articles so allowed to be imported into the said free ports from the United States, or from any other foreign country, than are or may be chargeable upon all similar articles when imported from any of his Majesty's possessions.

ART. 2. His Britannic Majesty engages to allow the vessels of the United States to import into the Island of Bermuda the following articles, viz: tobacco, pitch, tar, turpentine, hemp, flax, masts, yards, bowsprits, staves, heading, boards and plank, timber, shingles, and lumber of any sort; bread, biscuit, flour, peas, beans, potatoes, wheat, rice, oats, barley, and grain of any sort, such commodities being the growth or production of the Territories belonging to the United States of America; and to export from the said island to the United States, in vessels of the said States, any goods or commodities whatever which are now by law allowed to be exported from his Majesty's colonies and possessions in the West Indies to any foreign country or place in Europe; and also sugar, molasses, coffee, cocoa, nuts, ginger, and pimento; and also all goods the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, upon the same terms and subject to the same duties only as would affect similar articles when imported from the United States into Bermuda, or exported from Bermuda to the United States in British ships. And it is agreed on the part of the United States that a similar equality shall prevail in the ports of the said States with regard to all British vessels trading in similar articles between the United States and the Island of Bermuda.

ART. 3. It is agreed that vessels of the United States may resort to Turk's Island for the purpose of taking in cargoes of salt for the United States; and that the vessels so resorting to the said island shall be allowed to import tobacco, cotton and wool, the produce of the said United States, upon the same terms and subject to the same duties as British ships when engaged in a similar intercourse. It is agreed on the part of the United States that a similar equality shall prevail in the ports of the said States with regard to all British vessels trading in the same articles between the United States and the said Turk's Island.

ART. 4. It is agreed that the navigation of all lakes, rivers, and water communications, the middle of which is or may be the boundary between his Britannic Majesty's territories on the continent of North America and the United States, shall, with the exception hereinafter mentioned, at all times be free to his Majesty's vessels and those of the citizens of the United States. The inhabitants of his Britannic Majesty's territories in North America and the citizens and subjects of the United States may freely carry on trade and commerce by land or inland navigation, as aforesaid, in goods and merchandise the growth, produce, or manufacture of the British territories in Europe or elsewhere, or of the United States, respectively, within the territories of the two parties, respectively, on the said continent, (the countries within the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company only excepted;) and no other or higher duties or tolls, or rates of carriage or portage, than which are or shall be payable by natives, respectively, shall be taken or demanded on either side. All goods or merchandise, whose importation into the United States shall not be wholly prohibited, may freely, for the purposes of commerce, above mentioned, be carried into the said United States in the manner aforesaid by his Britannic Majesty's subjects; and such goods or merchandise shall be subject to no other or higher duties than would be payable by citizens of the United States on the importation of the same in American vessels into the Atlantic ports of the United States; and in like manner all goods and merchandise the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, whose importation into his Majesty's said territories in America shall not be entirely prohibited, may freely, for the purposes of the commerce above mentioned, be carried into the same by land, or by means of such lakes, rivers, and water communications, as above mentioned, by the citizens of the United States; and such goods and merchandise shall be subject to no other or higher duties than would be payable by his Majesty's subjects on the importation of the same from Europe into the said territories.

No duties shall be levied by either party on peltries or furs which may be brought in the manner aforesaid by land or inland navigation from the said territories of one party into the said territories of another; but tolls or rates of ferriage may be demanded and taken in manner above mentioned on such peltries or furs. It is further agreed that nothing in this article contained as to the navigation of rivers, lakes, or water communication, shall extend to give a right of navigation upon or within the same in those parts where the middle is not the boundary between his Britannic Majesty's territories and the United States of America.

OCCUPATION OF AMELIA ISLAND.

COMMUNICATED BY THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
JANUARY 20, 1819.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 20, 1819.

SIR: In answer to the questions in your letter of the 16th instant I have the honor to state that Amelia Island is held under the authority of the act of Congress of January 15, 1811, and is intended to be held as long as the reasons upon which it was taken shall continue, subject, of course, to any other provision which Congress may deem necessary or expedient. It is under a military government. No customs are collected, no vessels being permitted to enter the port. Of its population the only evidence possessed is contained in the extract of a letter from Colonel Bankhead, a copy of which is herewith inclosed.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your most humble and obedient servant,

J. Q. ADAMS.

FERNANDINA, AMELIA ISLAND, December 24, 1817.

SIR: Most of the inhabitants at this place at this time are followers of Aury and those persons who have been drawn here from motives of speculation, who are, I suspect, of that profligate character generally engaged in the violation or evasion of our revenue laws.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

JAMES BANKHEAD,

BRITISH WEST INDIA AND NORTH AMERICAN COLONIAL TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE FEBRUARY 19, 1819.

Mr. MACON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred so much of the documents accompanying the Commercial Convention with Great Britain as relates to the colonial trade, made the following report; which was read:

That the object of the negotiation with Great Britain respecting the colonial trade is the establishment of a regulation whereby a trade in articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States and of the British colonies may be carried on between them; and secondly, a regulation whereby the shipping of the two countries may be placed on an equal footing in the carrying on of this trade.

In respect to the articles of the trade, the United States would agree that all articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States and of the respective colonies should be included, and all other articles excluded. But as Great Britain probably would not consent to this arrangement, the United States would not object to the catalogue of articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States and of the said colonies enumerated in the British acts of Parliament, and according to which the trade has heretofore been carried on in British bottoms.

As respects duties and charges, they should be placed on a footing of reciprocal equality. If Great Britain would consent to impose no higher or other duties on articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States imported into the colonies than upon the like articles imported from her continental colonies, (whence only they can be obtained,) the United States might agree to impose no greater or other duties and charges on articles of the produce and manufacture of her colonies than on the like articles from other countries. To this adjustment Great Britain will probably disagree. In lieu thereof, and as a compensation for the stipulation not to impose greater or other duties on the colonial articles of Great Britain than on the like articles of other countries, it might be stipulated, on the part of Great Britain, that the duties and charges on articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States should not exceed by more than ——— per cent. those which should be imposed on the like articles imported from the British continental colonies.

In no event should articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States pay higher duties and charges in the direct voyage from the United States than in the indirect or circuitous voyage through New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Bermudas, or other intermediate ports; and as the direct trade should not be more restrained in respect to the articles thereof than the indirect or circuitous trade, no article should be allowed to go or come indirectly or circuitously which might not go or come directly.

There is nothing in principle or policy that forbids the confining of this trade to articles of the produce or manufacture of the respective countries—that is, of the United States and of the British colonies. Articles of the produce and manufacture of other portions of the British territories coming through these colonies being excluded from the United States as articles not of the produce and manufacture of the United States are excluded from Great Britain, and would be excluded from the British colonies.

As respects the shipping employed in this trade, it must be placed on a footing of practical and reciprocal equality, both as respects duties and charges and the equal participation of the trade. On this adjustment even there will exist an advantage in favor of the English navigation, as it will be exclusively employed in the transportation of articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States between the intermediate colonies aforesaid and the West India colonies, and likewise, in a disproportioned degree, in the distribution of these articles among the British West India colonies.

Furthermore, as the voyage from the United States to New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Bermuda is a short one, and would yield but little profit, the duties and charges must be as great on the British ships and the articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States composing their cargoes arriving in the British West India colonies through these intermediate colonies as on the same ships and articles arriving directly from the United States; otherwise the direct trade will be deserted in favor of the circuitous trade, and thereby the object of the arrangement, an equality in the employment of the shipping of the two countries, will be defeated. So far as the operation of the late navigation law is understood it seems to have been advantageous, and especially in the increase of the American shipping engaged in the direct trade between the United States and Great Britain and the corresponding decrease of that of Great Britain; but sufficient time has not yet been afforded satisfactorily to ascertain this point, nor to determine other questions that are in a course of solution.

Perhaps it would be prudent to allow time for this important experiment; and, to suffer the negotiation on this subject to remain where it is for the present, it ought not to be forgotten that, without cutting off the trade with New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Bermuda, this experiment cannot be fairly made. Whether it would be expedient at the present session to adopt this measure is perhaps doubtful.

If the effect of our navigation law, reinforced according to the above suggestion, should prove to be such as it not improbably will be, it might and probably would be our true footing to adhere to the law and decline any convention with Great Britain touching the colony trade.

IMPRISONMENT OF WILLIAM WHITE, AN AMERICAN CITIZEN, AT BUENOS AYRES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DECEMBER 15, 1819.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In conformity with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 24th of February last, I now transmit a report of the Secretary of State, with extracts and copies of several letters touching the causes of the imprisonment of William White, an American citizen, at Buenos Ayres.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, December 14, 1819.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 14, 1819.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 24th of February last, requesting the President to cause to be laid before that House, at the next session of Congress, any information which might be in his power touching the causes of the imprisonment of William White, an American citizen, at Buenos Ayres, has the honor herewith to submit to the President extracts from a communication of Mr. John Graham, together with copies of several letters to and from Mr. W. G. D. Worthington, which contain all the information in possession of this Department upon that subject.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Extract from a communication of Mr. Graham, one of the Commissioners to South America, to the Department of State.

"3d. That of Mr. William White. This requires some detail. This gentleman made himself known to Judge Bland, at Montevideo, as an American citizen, and was by him introduced to me. He took an early occasion to state how much he had been injured by the government of Buenos Ayres; that to his exertion they were indebted for the fleet which gave them Montevideo; that they had refused to pay him the money due him; had thrown him into prison, and ultimately banished him. We, Judge Bland and I, explained to him that this was not a case on which we could act. He came on board the frigate, remained there all night in consequence of the wind, and before he went off gave me a large parcel of papers in relation to his case. I did not wish to take them, as I did not think it probable that I could make any use of them, for the reasons above stated, and because I saw on opening them that Mr. Worthington had made an unsuccessful attempt to obtain permission for him to visit Buenos Ayres to settle his affairs there, the object he seemed then to have in view. He requested me, however, to take them and read them; that they would be interesting as matter of history, and if I found I could do anything for him he would be obliged to me. Upon this consideration I took them. I looked over them, and, so far as I understood them, did not find that they presented a case for us to act on." "Under these circumstances, Mr. White obtained permission from Captain Sinclair to come up to Buenos Ayres in the ship's tender, and very unexpectedly presented himself at our lodgings to ask our aid. We told him that he had embarrassed us exceedingly by coming up in the tender, a vessel which, from respect to us, had been exempted from search, and that an implied pledge, at least, had been given that no violation of the law should be permitted, and that he had now, without consulting us, presented himself at our house; that under such circumstances we could not interfere in his behalf or offer him any advice how he should proceed—the alleged object for which he called on us. The only doubt was whether it was not our duty to state to the Government what had taken place. To this he said he would have no objection, particularly as his arrival was no longer a secret, and as any consequence would be less injurious to him than going back to Montevideo without obtaining for his family some relief. We, accordingly, the next day informed the director what had taken place. He was evidently very seriously affected when he heard that Mr. White had come up—before he knew what was the object of our communication, remarked that he could not be permitted to land. After a little while he recovered himself and said, that, so far as he was individually concerned, he would have no objection, as White owed him money. He then put it upon the ground of popular indignation, observed that White was exceedingly obnoxious. On my remarking that, as a citizen of the United States, I hoped that justice would be done him as a fellow-citizen, he said that he did not know what he was; he sometimes claimed to be an English subject, and had certainly aided and assisted the British in getting into Buenos Ayres; that he was a notorious smuggler and violator of the laws, &c. White was afterwards arrested, and we left him in prison. There was some reason to think that he preferred being there, at least for the present, to going back to his family without accomplishing his object. He is understood to be a restless intriguer, and had, probably, political objects in view, as connected with his money affairs."

Buenos Ayres, May —, 1818.

Sir: Soon after we received the letter which you addressed to us, we sent you a message that we had been told by the director that you would not be permitted to land, but that you might appoint an attorney to manage any business you had there. We have now to add that a subsequent communication with the Secretary of State leads us to believe that this determination will not be departed from.

Under these circumstances, we deem it proper to return to you the papers which you sent us for perusal.

WM. WHITE, Esq.

Copy of a letter from Mr. Worthington to Mr. Adams, dated Baltimore, December 4, 1819.

Sir: On the receipt of your letter of the 30th June last, inclosing a copy of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States of the 24th February, calling for information on the imprisonment, at Buenos Ayres, of Mr. White, an American citizen, as I answered you on the 3d July, I immediately wrote to the Rio de la Plata for full and precise information on the case. I have yet received no answer, and as my letter may have miscarried, or an answer may arrive too late for the ensuing session of Congress, I feel it my duty to afford you all the knowledge I have on the subject, loose and unsatisfactory as it may be. In my letter of the 9th July, 1818, from Santiago de Chili, amongst nineteen packages of different papers forwarded to your Department, I sent a duplicate of Wm. P. White's case, marked "No. 4," which package, I presume, was composed of, 1st. A copy of White's letter from Montevideo, of the 29th November, 1817, to me. 2d. My answer to him of the 10th December, 1817. 3d. My memorial for him to his excellency Mr. Pueyrredon, the supreme director of the United Provinces of the Rio de la Plata, of the 13th January, 1818; and 4th. The answer to me from Mr. Secretary Tagle, of the 23d January, 1818.

From the press of business then before me I omitted to make a note on the case, as was customary with me. Now, all that I know, in addition to what those papers furnish, is simply this:

Mr. Tagle's answer was not handed till the very day, nay a few hours before I stepped into the coach to cross the Pampas for Chili, as will be seen by comparing dates with the second part of my diary, &c. So, if it had even been expedient and necessary, I had no chance to contest it. I never heard anything more of M. White (having sent him a copy of Tagle's letter) till my return, in March last, to Buenos Ayres, when his son brought me a letter from his father wishing me to meet him in a boat out in the roads of Buenos Ayres. I requested his son to tell him I would do no such thing; I had taken leave of the Government and was just about embarking for the United States; that I had appointed Mr. Strong consul, and should refer his letter to him, who would, no doubt, attend to anything right and proper in his case. I did so, and have sent Mr. Strong a copy of the resolution under consideration, but have not yet heard from him.

White has been in prison at least two or three times at Buenos Ayres, also at Montevideo; and I was told was put in prison while our Commissioners in the Congress were at Buenos Ayres. So that I know not on what particular imprisonment the resolution wants information.

I was told that he and a certain man named Larea were once hunted down in Buenos Ayres by the popular indignation for being the contrivers or authors of various odious proceedings, speculations, taxations, &c. There is some account given of him in the first volume of Brackenridge's Voyage to South America, page 239.

He is a native of Pittsfield, Massachusetts, said to possess splendid abilities; but in South America, for these ten or twelve years past, has always been in difficulties, with some short intervals of precarious affluence and show. My own opinion of him was that he had so commingled and identified himself with the fiscal and speculative concerns of Buenos Ayres and Montevideo, and certain men there, both natives and foreigners, both in power and out of power, that it was hard to unravel whether he "was a man more sinned against than sinning."

In speaking on his case to the supreme director, Mr. Pueyrredon, he said White was a man without principles. I replied: It is said he is a man of great talents. Pueyrredon answered that he was a man of showy but not of solid abilities; that he had been much overrated. I have heard it said he had claims against some men of weight and influence in Buenos Ayres, and, to get rid of being called to account or being compelled to pay him, they procured his imprisonments and banishment.

Others say that his having procured a high duty to be laid on yerba, and then monopolized it, having previously purchased up large quantities, was the cause, under the popular fury, of his being disgraced, imprisoned, banished, &c. A proceeding of this kind on yerba would have the same effect on the people of South America as a similar proceeding on whiskey in some parts of our country. So you may judge of his imprudence.

When he addressed his complaint to me, I nevertheless determined, noxious as he appeared to be to almost everybody, if, on investigating it, I found him entitled to redress as an American citizen, to enforce his claim. But I discovered, from the best information that I could procure, by his agencies in the affairs of Buenos Ayres, Montevideo, and countries with which the United States had always been neutral, that he had, in a manner, stepped beyond the line of neutrality in his negotiations and speculations in the struggles of those powers; and, if he had not absolutely forfeited, he had at most only a very equivocal claim on the protection and interference of the Government of the United States in his patriot and anti-patriot dilemmas.

Wishing to preserve the influence which I had with the Government of Buenos Ayres for the benefit of our citizens bona fide and unquestionably entitled to my services, I thought it best not rashly to jeopardize my fair standing by attempting to force Mr. White out of embarrassments of which he assumed to be chief author himself, and into similar or worse difficulties his own imprudence would again shortly plunge him. He never was imprisoned when I was in Buenos Ayres. The Commissioners can tell, I suppose, why he was when they were there. I did all for him that I could and ought to have done, both in the manner and the matter. I am sorry that it is not in my power to be as precise in this respect as I could wish. I inclose Mr. White's original letter to me; also Mr. Secretary Tagle's original letter, a translation of which I forwarded, is herein, as first mentioned.

Any further information on this or any other South American subject will be cheerfully furnished by me.

With the most distinguished consideration, &c.,

W. G. D. WORTHINGTON.

Mr. White to Mr. Worthington.

MONTEVIDEO, November 29, 1817.

SIR: The accompanying copies of proceedings against me by a political faction which preceded the Government of the Ex-Director Alvear, in April, 1815, I beg leave to lay before you; and I do this in the hope that you will not find the investigation of the subjects to which they refer foreign to the commission with which you are charged by the Government of our country.

It is unnecessary I should detail reflections on the subject of this process in order to demonstrate that in it are stamped the features of a despotism rendered more odious as it strikes at the root of individual rights, while it is pretended to be an effort towards the establishment of rational liberty; but I flatter myself with the hope that the present administration will adopt a more liberal policy, and that I shall, under your protection, be restored to the enjoyment of that, and also of the laws of a country to promote whose independence I have made efforts that were crowned with the most extraordinary success.

This agency, and in which I made so considerable disbursements, was always considered as that of a private character and myself as a subject of an independent Government, having uniformly resisted the idea of seeking the advancement of my fortune and happiness by attaching myself to the interest of any other Government in however small a degree opposed to those of our common country. In a word, I have never solicited nor received the honors of Argentine citizenship. There are many foreigners and some countrymen now in Buenos Ayres who were witnesses to the degree of eclat with which I acquitted myself in this agency; and everything which envy and malice can suggest, with regard to my accounts, must be considered as calumny until these accounts be dispassionately examined. From them must result a large balance in my favor; independent of which I was deprived of property of great value under authority of the Government of Buenos Ayres, and without a shadow of process, as far as regards two vessels and stores, which may be estimated at more than $40,000. I hope for a restitution not less summary; and, in whatever case, that you will not consider as incompatible with your public duty the requiring the recognizance of my rights to the protection of my person and property, conformably to law, during such periods as shall be necessary for me to regulate my accounts with the Government and private persons in Buenos Ayres, and that you will honor me with a communication on this subject of my address.

With considerations of profound respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM P. WHITE.

W. G. D. WORTHINGTON, Esq.,

Agent, &c., from the Government of the United States of America at Buenos Ayres.

Buenos Ayres, January 13, 1818.

SIR: Permit me to lay before your excellency the request of William P. White, who claims to be a citizen of the United States. He alleges that his presence and personal attendance are actually necessary to enable him to settle certain commercial transactions which he heretofore had in this city; and that, in consequence of a decree under the Government of the Ex-Director Don Ignacio Alvares, he was sent out of the country and not permitted to return since. He requests that the decree against [him] may be repealed, and that he may be permitted (as are all other citizens of the United States) to come and reside in the city of Buenos Ayres in safety sufficiently long to close those old commercial concerns, &c. He confidently expects this from the justice of your administration, as may be seen by a copy of his letter to me of the 29th of November last; and viewing Mr. White simply as any other citizen of the United States, I bring before you this application, under the full persuasion that the most proper order will be taken in the premises.

I have the honor to be, with the most distinguished consideration, &c.,

W. G. D. WORTHINGTON.

His Excellency JUAN MARTIN DE PUEYRREDON,

Supreme Director of the United Provinces of the Rio de la Plata.

[Translation.]

Mr. Tagle to Mr. Worthington.

To Señor Don W. G. D. WORTHINGTON, Special Agent of the United States, from the Secretary of State in the Department of Government:

MY DISTINGUISHED FRIEND AND SIR: I have submitted to the consideration of his excellency the Supreme Director your recommendation for the return of William P. White to this capital from Montevideo; and, on his view of the subject, his excellency has charged me to manifest to you that he is extremely sorry that he cannot accede to it, because the political circumstances of this country oppose the return of the said White to it. He was proscribed from these provinces for reasons of the greatest weight, and which, if he should return, would expose him to inconveniences which it might not be in the power of the Government to obviate. These considerations deprive his excellency of the satisfaction which he would have in complying with your wish on this occasion. I avail myself [of it] to protest to you the consideration with which I am de V. S. S. 2 S. M. B.

CLAIM OF JOSEPH KRITTMAN AGAINST THE CITY OF HAMBURG.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE FEBRUARY 18, 1820.

The SECRETARY OF STATE, to whom, by a resolution of the Senate, was referred, on the 16th of February last, the memorial of Joseph Krittman, to consider and report thereon, has the honor of submitting the following report:

From the statement of the memorialist it appears that in the month of October, 1811, while attempting to depart without a passport from Hohenfelde, a dependency of the city of Hamburg, where he had been some time residing, he was arrested and his effects were seized by a warrant from the mayor of Hohenfelde, which was then subject to the dominion of France. That after various proceedings in sundry subordinate tribunals, he obtained, first, a special order for the delivery to him of a part of his effects, and afterwards, on the 18th of November, 1811, an order from the prefect for the restoration of them all. He complains that these orders were ineffectual, and that, besides enduring much personal ill treatment from the mayor and other police officers, a part of his effects, to a very large amount in value, were never restored to him. It appears also that an attachment was laid upon them by the wagoner whom he had employed for their conveyance, upon which a judgment was obtained in the wagoner's favor against him.

The memorialist in 1812 applied to Mr. Barlow, then minister of the United States in France, for his official interposition in his favor; and at his instance Mr. Krittman's memorial and papers were referred to the consideration of the highest judicial officer of that country, and in March, 1813, the memorialist obtained from the tribunal of the first instance at Hamburg a new decree for the examination, appraisal, and restoration of his effects, which decree remained, however, without execution until the ancient authority of the senate of Hamburg was restored, in consequence of the occupation of that place by the Russian army under General Tettenborn.

From this restored government a third order for the restoration of his effects was issued on the 2d of April, 1813; but at the execution of the order, at which he states his opponents refused to be present, it appeared that the most valuable part of the effects had been stolen or ruined; and the memorialist alleges that his loss, in consequence thereof, with interest and expenses to the 10th of August, 1814, amounted to more than $15,000.

In September, 1814, the memorialist alleges that he petitioned the senate of Hamburg for a further decision upon his complaint, and at various times since he has urged his claims upon that body, without success. He states that a part of his effects remain there still under seizure, and that he has not been able to learn whether the senate of Hamburg have deemed it worth their while to reconsider his claims, but that his friends at Hamburg concur with him in the opinion that, if the Government of the United States would interfere in his behalf, a letter from the proper authority to the senate of Hamburg would enable him to obtain justice and to recover his losses.

It may be doubted whether the facts, as stated by the memorialist himself, are of a character to justify the abandonment of his cause, which has left him in the uncertainty with regard to the ultimate proceedings of the senate of Hamburg of which he complains. The only interference in his behalf by the Government of the United States which could be expedient or proper is believed to be by instructing the consul of the United States at Hamburg to represent to the senate the substance of his memorial to Congress, and the confidence with which the Government of the United States rely that the senate will do justice to his case, of the merits of which, from its nature, they must exclusively be the judges. This instruction will accordingly be given.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

[1ST SESSION.]

CLAIM OF JAMES SMITH AND OTHERS AGAINST FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE MARCH 22, 1820.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the subscribers respectfully sheweth:

That they are native citizens of the United States and were resident merchants within the same in the year 1806, and both before and since. In the month of November of that year the ship Bordeaux Packet, Spafford master, sailed from the port of Philadelphia, bound for Antwerp, with a cargo consisting of the produce of the United States and of colonial goods, consigned to the house of J. Ridgway, Mertens & Co., merchants at that place, where she arrived on the 27th of February, 1807. In the month of December, 1806, the brig Diamond, Manson master, sailed from the said port of Philadelphia with a similar cargo and destination, and arrived at Antwerp the 18th April, 1807. In the month of January, 1807, the ship Helena, Smith master, sailed from the port of Charleston with a like cargo and destination, and arrived at Antwerp the 10th April, 1807; and in the same month of January the ship North America, Dean master, sailed from the port of Savannah with a like cargo and destination, and arrived the said 10th April, 1807. In these cargoes your memorialists were, respectively, interested as proprietors, and both vessels and cargoes were, without exception, American property, duly documented as such, and were proceeding to the said port of Antwerp under the faith of treaties and the relations of amity subsisting between the United States and the several powers of Europe, and particularly with France. Your memorialists further state that, on their passage out, these vessels were detained by British cruisers and sent into different ports of England, when, after a short time, they were liberated, and from whence, without landing any of their cargoes, they proceeded to the port of destination and arrived at the respective dates before mentioned. At the port of Antwerp they were instantly seized, the cargoes were deposited in the custom-house stores under the exclusive control of the officers of Government, and, although repeated and faithful efforts were made by the consignees to obtain their release generally, and also to obtain permission for their reshipment and exportation from France, those efforts, as is notorious to all the world, proved abortive.

The ground upon which these seizures were made, though informally stated by a subordinate officer to have been the decree of Berlin of the 21st November, 1806, has never been made known from the Government of France. That the decree of Berlin by any of its provisions authorizes the seizure and detention it is impossible to contend; for the penalty of exclusion from the ports of France pronounced upon vessels and their cargoes in the predicament of those before mentioned was asked by the agents of your memorialists as a favor, and refused. It follows, of course, that the interdict of the Berlin decree could not be applied by the French Government to this property; and if it could have been, from any forced construction of that order, the invincible ignorance of it by your memorialists when their property left the United States would have constituted, with every just government, a ground of exemption from its penalties. Your memorialists, however, submit that the seizure was, and was known to be by those who made it, an act of lawless violence, without pretence of justification, and intended, through the restraint of American property, to produce an influence upon the American Government and upon her relations to the two great belligerents.

Your memorialists further submit that, after three years of nearly unremitting exertions by the consignees to save this property, the director general of the customs at Paris, on the 23d June, 1810, ordered the sale of all these cargoes, and that their proceeds should be lodged provisionally, according to the language of his mandate, in the caisse d'amortissement; and on the 9th July following the sale commenced, and was continued until the 15th of the same month, when the result in net proceeds was as follows, viz:

The cargo of the Bordeaux Packet produced, net.....	920,382 62 francs.
“ the Diamond.....	1,005,090 62 “
“ the Helena.....	631,065 28 “
“ the North America.....	1,003,300 40 “
Making a total in francs of.....	3,559,836 92
and in dollars.....	667,469 43

This sale was not, your memorialists beg leave to state, the consequence of any judicial proceeding whatever; for at no time after the arrival of the said vessels down to the present moment has there been a recourse by the officers of France to any tribunal of any kind, for the purpose of establishing against the property or its owners any charge of offence against the laws or ordinances of France or the decrees of the then Emperor. The cargoes were never libelled; the consignees were never cited to answer; the sale never purported to be the result of any judicial sentence or order; the property was taken from the possession of your memorialists by mere force, and the proceeds withheld from them by the continuance of the same force.

Your memorialists were induced to hope that, upon the establishment of a new order of things in France, the justice of that Government would have restored to them the proceeds of their property, which had been provisionally lodged in the caisse d'amortissement, and the interest from the time of its first detention; but they are compelled to make known that the most sedulous exertions to this effect have proved abortive, and that, unless the Government of the United States shall support by the weight of its name and authority the claims of your memorialists, there is no reason to expect that they can be made effectual. What France has granted to the citizens of other states in redress of wrongs proceeding from the same source, though far less flagrant in their character, your memorialists cannot believe will be withheld from citizens of the United States, if their Government shall think it proper to grant them its aid and protection; and a more reasonable case for such aid and protection your memorialists believe cannot be presented.

They therefore respectfully pray your honorable body to adopt such measures as shall have the effect of restoring to them the property of which they were wrongfully dispossessed by the authority of France, and of obtaining compensation for the detention of it from the year 1807.

The SECRETARY OF STATE, to whom, on the 16th of February, 1819, by a resolution of the Senate, the memorial of James Smith and others was referred to consider and report thereon, has the honor of submitting the following report:

The claims of the memorialists belong to a class which, among many others, has been repeatedly and very earnestly pressed upon the attention of the Government of France. Copies are herewith submitted to the Senate of the correspondence between the minister of the United States at Paris and the minister of foreign relations upon this subject, before and since the reference of the memorial to this Department. From the grounds of resistance to the claims most recently assumed on the part of the French Government, it would appear that any relief which the memorialists may be entitled to expect can result only from measures within the exclusive competency of the legislative authority.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 20, 1820.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Gallatin, dated Paris, January 20, 1817, to Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State.

“Having received no answer from the Duke de Richelieu to my letter of the 9th November last, I addressed to him, on the 26th December, a short note, of which and of his answer, dated the 16th instant, copies are inclosed.”

“In the interview which accordingly took place to-day the Duke for the first time declared that he did not consider us as being of right entitled to an indemnity from the present French Government on account of spoliations committed by that of Bonaparte on our commerce. In support of his position that the existing Government was not responsible for the acts of injustice done by the former, he alleged, 1st. The example of Naples in rejecting our application to the same effect. 2d. The conduct of the allied powers who, although dictating within the walls of Paris terms of peace to France, had not carried the demand of indemnities for their subjects to the extent claimed by us. 3d. The constant refusal of Bonaparte to indemnify us for these acts of injustice which he had committed himself. In the course of the conversation the Duke hinted, without positively expressing it, that any indemnity which might be allowed by the present Government would be a favor."

"After having repeated what had already been stated on former occasions, that the United States could not be bound by the acts of other powers to which they were not parties, and that the denial of justice by others could not justify a similar conduct on the part of France, I told the Duke that I thought it unnecessary, unless he thought proper to do it in an official shape, to enter into a discussion of the question of right, since he knew as well as myself that under all the circumstances of the case the present Government of France was, according to the acknowledged principles of public law, responsible for the acts of those who had been in the possession of the Government during the expulsion of the Bourbons, and who had been recognized by all the powers of Europe. I requested, therefore, that he would proceed to state what he had concluded to offer in answer to the basis proposed in my note of the 9th of November. He said that his offer would fall very short of our demands; that he would not go beyond an indemnity for vessels burnt at sea, and for those the proceeds of which had only been sequestered and deposited in the caisse d'amortissement; and that it would even be difficult to obtain from the Chambers the authority to pay to that extent. He added that he would make his proposal in writing, and that this could not be attended with much delay. I then said that I could not give any opinion on his proposal until I had received his note, but that I wished him to understand that if the Government of the United States thought it proper (which I could not at present promise) to accept an indemnity for certain classes only of our claims, this never would be purchased by a relinquishment of the other just demands of our citizens."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Gallatin to the Duke de Richelieu, dated Paris, November 9, 1816.

"Exclusively of other special orders of the same nature which may not be known to me, the cargoes of seven vessels arrived at Antwerp in the beginning of the year 1807, and which were permitted to be landed there, were also sequestered and finally sold by virtue of an order of Government, dated the 4th May, 1810. In all these cases there has been no condemnation, no final decision. The vessels and cargoes were only seized and sold by order of Government, and the proceeds of sales deposited in the caisse d'amortissement or in some other public chest."

"The right to demand and obtain a decision on all those suspended cases is undeniable. Either the proceeds of sales will be restored to the lawful owners by virtue of that decision, or the present Government of France must go beyond what has been done by the former Government and decree the final confiscation of property which even that Government had been unwilling to condemn. I will not permit myself for a moment to suppose that there can be any hesitation on that question."

PARIS, February 19, 1819.

"I had the honor to receive your despatches Nos. 10, 11, and 12. An indisposition which has confined me in my chamber for more than three weeks, and of which I am just recovering, has as yet prevented my using the arguments contained in the first in those quarters where it may be useful to remove unfavorable impressions, but I will not fail to attend to that subject whenever a convenient opportunity shall offer.

"The agitation which took place here after the termination of the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, the subsequent change of ministry, and afterwards my indisposition, had prevented my renewing my application on the subject of American claims. Immediately after the receipt of your despatch No. 12, although it would have been desirable to have had a previous conversation with Marquis Dessolle, I thought it advisable, upon the whole, to call his attention to the subject before the budget of this year was presented to the Chambers, and addressed him a letter, of which a copy is inclosed."

PARIS, February 11, 1819.

MONSIEUR LE MARQUIS: I have the honor to transmit to your excellency a memorial addressed by Mr. Parish, a citizen of the United States, to his excellency the minister of finance on the subject of a claim which it appears has been laid before that department.

Having been confined for the last three weeks by indisposition, I have been prevented from asking an interview of your excellency, with which I was desirous of being favored before I presented to you this memorial and renewed my application for the settlement of the American claims in general. But having recently received very special orders from my Government, accompanied by a particular recommendation of Mr. Parish's claim, I am no longer at liberty to defer the discussion of this interesting concern.

I have, therefore, to request your excellency to have the goodness to examine the official notes which I had the honor to address to the Duke of Richelieu upon the subject of these claims, and to which I have yet received no answer. I shall not now enlarge upon the view presented in my note of the 9th

November, 1816. By that of the 22d April, 1817, it will be seen that the negotiations on that subject were suspended solely in consideration of the trying situation in which France was then placed, and especially of the embarrassments of the administration by the enormous and unexpected mass of claims brought forward by the subjects of the allied powers. These obstacles are now happily removed; every demand of all the European powers and their subjects has been amicably adjusted and settled; the rights, so legitimate, of the citizens of the United States alone remain unsatisfied. My Government, preserving an unshaken confidence in his Majesty, cannot doubt that the time has at length arrived when ample justice will be rendered to its claims.

With respect to that of Mr. Parish, it may be remarked that it is very simple and is susceptible of being adjusted without waiting the result of or in the least interfering with a general settlement. In fact, the cargoes in question were never condemned, but were only sold for the joint benefit of all, and the proceeds deposited, provisionally, in the Sinking Fund. It is further important to remark that, by an order of the French Government, permission was granted to the consignees of cargoes sequestered at that period at Antwerp to take possession and dispose of them, on their giving an obligation to become responsible for the amount to the public treasury in the event of a decision pronouncing their confiscation. The house of Mr. Ridgway, consul of the United States, together with that of Mr. Parish, refused their assent to a condition which implied an admission of the legality of the seizure. The European consignees, with whom this consideration had no weight, received and sold their goods, and their obligations were subsequently returned to them. Thus, by refunding to the houses of Ridgway and Parish the proceeds of the cargoes consigned to them, the decision which was virtually carried into effect in the case of all others similarly situated will only receive its due application as it regards them.

I have to observe that, although the claims of both these houses are perfectly similar to each other, that of Mr. Parish is the only one which appears to have been taken into consideration by the department of finance.

In the hope that my health may soon permit me to confer personally with your excellency, I have the honor to be, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, July 3, 1819.

SIR: I transmitted, in my despatch No. 100, the copy of the letter which I had addressed to Marquis Dessolle on the 11th of February last, on the subject of American claims in general, and more particularly of that of Messrs. Gracie and Parish.

On the 23d of March, in transmitting to the same minister a letter from Mr. Hyde de Neuville in behalf of Mr. Gracie, I reminded him of my preceding note, and requested that a report which the director general of the douanes was shortly to make on the claim might be communicated to me before the minister of finances should decide upon it. This was the more important as the director was known to be decidedly hostile to the claim and to the restitution of any sum which had, in any shape, found its way to the public treasury.

My request was not complied with, but Mr. Parish still thought that the affair had taken a favorable turn, and not expecting an immediate decision, left this city for Antwerp, and went thence on some business to England. From this last country he wrote me a few days ago and transmitted the inclosed copy of a letter addressed to him by the minister of finances, and by which he is informed that his claim is inadmissible.

The minister's letter is incorrect as to facts. The order to sell and to pay into the treasury the proceeds of the sales of sequestered property is not and was not by the then existing Government considered as a condemnation. When the vessels in question arrived at Antwerp, the only penalty to which they were liable for having touched in England was to be refused admission, and the only question was whether this exclusion should be enforced, or whether the consignees should be permitted to sell the cargoes. It was not at all by giving a retrospective effect to the Milan decree that the cargoes were sold. The sale took place about the same time that the property seized at St. Sebastian was sold; it was done by virtue of an order from Government, distinct from the Rambouillet decree, and for which no motive was assigned. I have requested Mr. Parish's lawyer to procure copies of the order of sale, and of that by which the money was paid into the public treasury instead of the caisse d'amortissement; for although the substance of the orders is known, the text has not been communicated.

But however easy it might be to answer the minister's letter, there would be some inconvenience in pursuing that course or in prosecuting further Mr. Parish's claim, distinct from others of the same nature.

I was, indeed, always averse to that discrimination, and did not share that gentleman's hopes of success; but as he was very sanguine, and we had heretofore failed in obtaining relief, I could not resist his solicitations, especially after the receipt of your despatch No. 12.

The decision of the minister of finances, founded on the assumed principle that no redress remains when the money has been paid into the treasury and been expended, would apply with equal force to all the American claims. If it becomes necessary to combat seriously that doctrine, it will be better to do it generally, and in a direct correspondence with the minister of foreign affairs, than by answering a letter which is not addressed to me, and applying my arguments to a single case.

I am still in hopes of receiving the instructions which I was led to expect from your despatch No. 12. If circumstances induce me to renew my application before these are received, it is my intention either not to take notice of the letter of the minister of finances, or to consider it merely as the proof that he could not, according to existing laws, on his sole responsibility, and without a diplomatic arrangement, order the claim to be liquidated.

His letter places, nevertheless, our claims on a still more unfavorable footing than that on which they heretofore stood. We had applied to this Government for indemnity; we had stated the arguments by which our claims were supported, and receiving no written answer, we had it, however, placed on record that we had been verbally answered that the pressure of the demands of the allies was the reason why ours were not yet taken into consideration. This was not much; but still this Government was not in the least committed by the decision of any of its ministers against us.

In the present state of things I will try, until I am positively instructed, to keep the negotiation alive, but without urging a decision, unless I can ascertain that a favorable result will be thus obtained.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

PARIS, May 22, 1819.

SIR: You have applied, in behalf of Mr. Archibald Gracie, of New York, for the restitution of the value of the cargoes of three American ships, the Perseverance, the Hiram, and the Mary, sequestered by the Imperial Government in 1807, and the proceeds of which were afterwards confiscated by it.

Having had a detailed statement laid before me of the circumstances connected with this transaction, the documents exhibited establish the following facts:

On the 21st November, 1806, a decree was issued at Berlin by which the British islands were placed in a state of blockade. By articles seven and eight of this decree every vessel coming directly from England or from the English colonies, or having been there since the publication of the said decree, was refused admission into any port; and every vessel attempting to contravene that clause by means of a false declaration was, together with the cargo, subject to seizure and confiscation as if they were English property. It was while these legislative measures were in force that the three ships in question arrived to your address. They had put into England; a circumstance which was, however, not considered by the custom-house as an irremissible cause of confiscation, there being reason to presume that it was through stress of weather.

In the interval of time previous to the decision which was to be made by the chief of the State, a proposal was made to you to dispose, conditionally, of the cargoes of these vessels on your engaging to refund the proceeds in the event of their final confiscation. You refused your assent to this offer, and at a subsequent period claimed its execution. But things had then changed, the legislative measures having become more rigorous.

By a decree of November 23, 1807, it was declared (article 1) "That all vessels which, after touching in England from any cause whatsoever, shall enter the ports of France, shall be seized and confiscated, together with their cargoes, without exception or distinction of goods and merchandise."

By a retrospective effect, which I am certainly very far from wishing to justify, but to which it is proper to advert, because it forms one of the prominent features of the case, this decree of November 23 was enforced as to these three vessels. It was ineffectually that the director general of the customs represented to the head of the Government that the English had no interest whatever in these three vessels, and that they were solely and bona fide American property, an immediate sale of their cargoes having been ordered by the supreme authority on the 4th of May, 1810. This order was carried into execution on the 15th of June following; and the proceeds, at first deposited in the Sinking Fund, were subsequently withdrawn, in conformity also with the same superior orders, and placed in the public treasury as having definitively become the property of the State.

I admit, with you, sir, the iniquity of these measures, and, with you, I deplore their effects; but to repair them is not within the compass of my power. If the cargoes in question still existed in the custom-house stores, they should be immediately restored to you; but having been sold, their proceeds no longer exist. The whole transaction was terminated, irrevocably terminated, four years prior to the restoration; and it is not within the power of his Majesty's Government to revive an obsolete claim, to renew a discussion on rights which are extinct, or to repair individual losses by an augmentation of the public burdens.

With the expression of my regrets, be pleased, sir, to accept the assurance of my perfect consideration.

The Minister of Finance and Secretary of State,

THE BARON LOUIS.

DELAY OF SPAIN TO RATIFY THE TREATY OF 1819.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE MARCH 27, 1820.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to Congress an extract of a letter from the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at St. Petersburg, of the 1st of November last, on the subject of our relations with Spain, indicating the sentiments of the Emperor of Russia respecting the non-ratification by his Catholic Majesty of the treaty lately concluded between the United States and Spain and the strong interest which his Imperial Majesty takes in promoting the ratification of that treaty. Of this friendly disposition the most satisfactory assurance has been since given directly to this Government by the minister of Russia residing here.

I transmit also to Congress an extract of a letter from the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid of a later date than those heretofore communicated, by which it appears that at the instance of the chargé des affaires of the Emperor of Russia a new pledge had been given by the Spanish Government that the minister who had been lately appointed to the United States should set out on his mission without delay with full power to settle all differences in a manner satisfactory to the parties.

I have further to state that the Governments of France and Great Britain continue to manifest the sentiments heretofore communicated respecting the non-ratification of the treaty by Spain, and to interpose their good offices to promote its ratification.

It is proper to add that the Governments of France and Russia have expressed an earnest desire that the United States would take no step for the present on the principle of reprisal which might possibly tend to disturb the peace between the United States and Spain. There is good cause to presume, from the delicate manner in which this sentiment has been conveyed, that it is founded in a belief as well as a desire that our just objects may be accomplished without the hazard of such an extremity.

On full consideration of all these circumstances, I have thought it my duty to submit to Congress whether it will not be advisable to postpone a decision on the questions now depending with Spain until the next session. The distress of that nation at this juncture affords a motive for this forbearance which cannot fail to be duly appreciated. Under such circumstances the attention of the Spanish Government may be diverted from its foreign concerns and the arrival of a minister here be longer delayed. I am the more induced to suggest this course of proceeding from a knowledge that while we shall thereby make a just return to the powers whose good offices have been acknowledged, and increase, by a new and signal proof of moderation, our claims on Spain, our attitude in regard to her will not be less favorable at the next session than it is at the present.

JAMES MONROE.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Campbell to the Secretary of State, dated St. Petersburg, October 20, (November 1,) 1819, containing details of a conversation with Count Nesselrode.

"Your despatch, No. 3, of June 3, I had the honor to receive a few days ago.

"After some general conversation he* inquired (as I presumed he would do, and waited for him to introduce the subject) if I had any certain account of what Spain was doing or had done respecting the treaty lately concluded by her minister at Washington with our Government. I had shortly before received from Mr. Gallatin a letter confirming the account which had already reached me through the newspapers, that the King had refused to ratify the treaty until he should obtain some previous explanations relating, as stated by Mr. Gallatin, to two points: First. The declaration Mr. Forsyth was instructed, on exchanging the ratifications, to put in, that the grant to the Duke d'Alagon for lands in the ceded territory which, though intended to be, was not, by the terms of the treaty, made null, should be considered as null; and second, an engagement required by Spain, on the part of our Government, not to recognize the independence of any of the Spanish colonies; and that to demand these explanations a minister extraordinary was to be sent to Washington, though Mr. Forsyth had offered, as instructed, to give full explanations on any point connected with the treaty. I therefore informed the Count I had received authentic information, though not from my Government, that the King had refused his assent to the treaty until he should obtain explanations on certain points, for which purpose he proposed sending a minister extraordinary to Washington. I took this occasion to remark further that by official information from my Government I felt myself authorized to state that Mr. Onis, the Spanish minister, was fully empowered to conclude the treaty, and might have yielded more than he did without exceeding his authority; and that the points on which it was now proposed to ask explanations had been fully discussed before the treaty was signed and their intent and meaning explicitly understood by both parties, of which the Spanish court was fully informed, and our minister there was instructed to give ample explanations, which he offered to do, on any points relating to the treaty that might be supposed to require them. I added that the treaty was undoubtedly, under all circumstances, highly favorable to Spain, and that I was satisfied a strong desire on the part of my Government to preserve peace alone induced them to agree to its provisions; that I presumed he had been informed respecting the terms of the treaty by Mr. Poletica, with whom I understood you had freely communicated on the subject. He said Mr. Poletica had advised him that, from the explanations received from you respecting it, the treaty was by him considered favorable to Spain. I then referred to the grant to the Duke d'Alagon, briefly stated the nature of it as made known to me, and observed that should the views of the King, as now avowed in relation to it, supposed the principal point on which the explanation was required be acquiesced in, the chief object of entering into the treaty would be thereby frustrated; that by one of its provisions the United States Government agreed to pay, on account of Spain, to their own citizens, for spoliations committed by her subjects or in her ports contrary to treaty, five millions of dollars out of the proceeds of the sales of lands in the ceded territory; but should this grant, said to include a very large portion of those lands, be confirmed, the sum assigned for that purpose would fail, and of course this provision of the treaty could not be complied with.

"He appeared to feel the full force of the remark, giving his consent to the conclusion drawn and proceeded to observe it was to be regretted that Spain did not understand her own interest better than she seemed to do; that it was difficult to conceive, in her present situation, what could induce her to take the course she had done and refuse to ratify a treaty favorable to herself and concluded by her minister vested with full power for the purpose. He then remarked on the great importance of preserving peace, as far as practicable, among the civilized nations of the world, inquired what Spain could now do in regard to the business by sending a minister to Washington, and what course our Government would be likely to adopt on the occasion.

"I replied that, as to Spain, I could form no opinion of the motives by which she was governed. I did not perceive what she could do, unless she receded from her objections to the treaty; and as to my own Government, though I was satisfied of its strong desire to preserve peace, I could not pretend to say what course it might conceive itself called on to take on the present occasion, though I presumed no decisive measures would be adopted to change essentially the relations between the two countries until Congress should convene, early in December, and the course then pursued would probably depend upon what Spain should in the meantime do.

"He then inquired how soon I expected to hear from my Government after it had been advised of the refusal on the part of Spain to ratify the treaty; and, being told that I could not state the precise time with any degree of certainty, but that it would undoubtedly be as soon as despatches could reach this from Washington, he expressed, with some earnestness, his wish that I should make known to him, at as early a day as might be convenient, such information as I might receive from my Government on this subject."

N. B. The correspondence and papers referred to in the above list relating to affairs with Great Britain are included in vol. 4, Foreign Relations, from page 370 to page 405.

The following relates to affairs with France:

PARIS, May 21, 1819.

"A set of officers is established by law in every port of France, known by the name of "Courtiers interpretes conducteurs de navires," who have the exclusive right of acting as ship-brokers, and as interpreters in all transactions and declarations, written or verbal, relative to vessels, whether with the custom-houses or elsewhere. A tariff, approved from time to time by the minister of the interior, determines their fees, which vary in the several ports, but are always much greater for foreign than for French vessels. Several complaints having been made both as to the principle and as to abuses flowing from that monopoly, Mr. Laine, then minister of the interior, decided, in October, 1817, as being a correct interpretation of the law, or a necessary exception to it, that every man might always act for himself without the interposition of the brokers, and that a foreigner acting with the assistance of the consul of his nation must be deemed to act by himself.

Gross abuses had prevailed at Havre, where the brokers had constantly extorted from the American captains fees more than double of those fixed by the tariff, a circumstance which had not been communicated to me. Mr. Beasley, in the summer of 1818, was induced to avail himself of the authority given by Mr. Laine's decision, and soon acted in behalf of all the American captains, who ceased to employ the brokers. Their usual declarations were received in that way at the custom-house, but rejected by the administration of the "octroi." The case having been stated to me, and the former abuses being at the same time brought to view, I made, in July and August last, the proper representations to the Duke of Richelieu. The administration of the "octroi" was instructed to receive the declarations of the captains through the consul or his chancellor; a new instruction confirming the former one was transmitted from the Department of the Interior; and the Duke of Richelieu, in a letter of the 12th of September, 1818, gave me the assurance that the brokers should be kept within the bounds of the tariff, and that all abuses in that respect would be suppressed. Considering the point as settled, and having about that time departed for England, I did not trouble you with a communication of these details.

The brokers, denying the power of the minister of the interior to give that construction to the law, had, in the meanwhile, instituted a suit against one of the captains and against the chancellor and secretary of Mr. Beasley for having infringed the provisions of the said law. Mr. Beasley having intervened as consul, and declared that they had acted by his direction, it was expected that the court would declare itself incompetent. This, however, has not taken place. The tribunal of Havre rejected the interposition of the consul, forbade the chancellor and secretary to interfere in future with the functions of the brokers, and condemned them to pay the expenses of the suit. On appeal to the royal court of Rouen, this tribunal reversed the decision of that of Havre, by admitting the consul's intervention, but not considering the letters of the minister of the interior as sufficient evidence, gave only an interlocutory decree, by which Mr. Beasley was directed to produce, within three months, a decision from the competent authority, showing that he was authorized to act and to delegate his authority in the manner he had done it. The brokers having appealed to the court of cassation, this last court has confirmed the decision of that of Rouen, on the special ground that the contended for exception to the law might result from a diplomatic arrangement, but not from a simple decision of the minister of the interior.

Previous to this decree of the court of cassation, Mr. Decazes, now minister of the interior, had, on the 17th February last, rescinded Mr. Laine's decision of October, 1817, on the ground that the law was peremptory; in consequence of which Mr. Beasley has ceased to act as interpreter, and the brokers again act exclusively as such. Mr. Decazes, by another decision of the 24th February, approved a new tariff, by which the fees of the brokers are more than doubled and made about equal to those which they had formerly illegally extracted from the American captains. Both decisions were made without any previous notice to me or to any other foreign minister, without any concert with the Department of Foreign Affairs, and without being brought before the council of ministers.

Several of the foreign ministers have made representations against those decisions of Mr. Decazes. I was obliged to wait for the decree of the court of cassation and for a copy of it, in order to bring before the Department of Foreign Affairs both the questions which arose from the lawsuit, and in which we were alone concerned, and those more immediately belonging to the brokers' fees and exclusive privilege. I have now the honor to inclose copies of the letters which I have addressed to Marquis Dessolle on those subjects, and also of the correspondence which had taken place last year.

You will perceive that with respect to the suit I have asked, first, a special decision from the King's Government which shall satisfy the court of Rouen that Mr. Beasley had been duly authorized to act as he did, and thus put an end to the suit now pending; second, a general decision which may shelter our consuls from any direct or indirect prosecutions before "correctional" or criminal tribunals for their official acts. It must, on this last point, be observed that no French public functionary can be either sued or prosecuted here for any of his official acts without the previous permission of the council of State.

As to the other questions I have asked, first, that our consuls might act as interpreters for their countrymen in their transactions with the custom-houses and other administrations; second, that the tariff should be reduced and fixed at the same rate for American as for French vessels. In those several demands I have chiefly dwelt on the principle of reciprocity.

The questions relative to the suit have, at my request, been referred to the minister of justice. I infer, from a long conference with Mr. Dessolle, that the ministry will support Mr. Decazes in his construction of the law, which they say cannot be modified even by a subsequent treaty without the assistance of the legislative body. Mr. Dessolle seemed to receive more favorably the application for a modification of the tariff.

That minister having no knowledge of the English language, I had hoped, by addressing him in French, to accelerate decisions in the business to be transacted with him.

PARIS, May 5, 1819.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to your excellency a memorial, accompanied by eleven documents, addressed to you by Mr. Beasley, consul for the United States at Havre, in relation to the differences between him and the brokers-interpreters of that place, on the subject of which I had the honor to make communications to the Duke of Richelieu in my several letters of the 28th of July, 3d and 10th of August, 1818.

It is proper that I should recall to your excellency that, in consequence of the decision promulgated on the 25th October, 1817, declaring the right of every individual to act for themselves, and without the intervention of a broker, in their own affairs, every master of a vessel, being a foreigner, was considered as acting for himself when accompanied by the consular agents of his nation; it was, I say, solely in consequence of that decision that the consul of the United States at Havre officiated as an intermediate agent, either personally or by his chancellor, in making the customary declarations required of American captains by the administrations of the customs and of the direct contributions. This decision was further confirmed by one of the ministers of the interior, made upon a full investigation of the statements of the brokers and of my representations, and of the explanations furnished to him by his excellency the minister of foreign affairs.

The brokers had, notwithstanding, instituted a suit in the tribunal of correctional police at Havre against Captain Cowell, an American, and Messrs. Taylor and Touret, the former the chancellor and the latter the secretary of the consul of the United States, on the plea of their having made the customary declarations to the administration of the customs without resorting to them, and in conformity with the decision of October 25, 1817. It was to no purpose that the consul interposed by taking up their defence, the tribunal at Havre having, by sentence of August 26, 1818, set aside the interposition of the consul, condemned Taylor and Touret to pay the costs of the suit, and forbade them to interfere with the duties of the brokers in future.

On an appeal to the royal court at Rouen the correctional sentence of the court at Havre was reversed by a decree of December 8, 1818; but it went no further than to pronounce an interlocutory judgment, referring Messrs. Taylor and Touret to the competent authority to decide whether Mr. Beasley, as consul of the United States, has a right to exercise the functions of a ship-broker and interpreter in behalf of his countrymen in competition with the persons appointed by the French Government; and, in that case, whether he has the right of delegating such functions to his chancellor or to his secretary. This decree was confirmed on the 26th of March, 1819, by the court of cassation, to which the brokers had appealed. For the text of these two decrees I beg leave to refer your excellency to the documents annexed to the consul's memorial.

I am aware that the minister of the interior, by a circular bearing date February 17, 1819, appears to have annulled the decision of his predecessor; but this measure is applicable only to the grounds of the question, and can have no retroactive effect on the incidental difficulty growing out of the suit. It is not my intention to discuss the merits of the main question at present. I will have the honor to present to your excellency my remarks on that subject in a distinct shape and in a separate note. My sole object at present is to support the request of the consul, so far as it goes, to obtain either from your excellency, the council of State, or from any other competent authority, an official and formal decision which may serve to satisfy the royal court of Rouen, and terminate a vexatious suit which should never have been instituted.

It is not my intention now to request a decision to that precise effect which may authorize the consul to act in future in behalf of his countrymen concurrently with the brokers, but one declaring his right to do so as well at the period when he did so act as on the 8th of December, the date of the sentence of the court at Rouen. Such a decision is merely the declaration of the fact as it then stood; and the consul having acted, as I have before remarked, strictly in conformity with the decisions pronounced by his Majesty's Government, has an unquestionable right to its protection from all suits founded on this pretence either against him or his chancellor.

By the sentence of the royal court at Rouen Messrs. Beasley, Taylor, and Touret were bound to abide by or appeal from the decision to be given within the term of three months, commencing from the 8th of December, 1818, the date of the sentence. This term began effectually only on the 26th of March, 1819, the day of the date of the sentence of the court of cassation. I beg your excellency will be pleased to recollect that it will expire on the 26th of June, and that it is requisite that the decision should be submitted to the court at Rouen before that day.

To the request of the consul permit me, sir, to add a few remarks, which are, however, intended to apply only to the suit and not to the grounds of the main question.

The consuls of France in the United States could never have been exposed to what has been experienced by the American consul at Havre. With a view to protect the agents of foreign powers from local vexations, and to prevent their being dragged from court to court, it is provided, not by a temporary law but by the Constitution of the United States, that the Supreme Court, which in cases of personal concern is to be considered in the light of a court of cassation, should serve for all such agents and even for consuls as the first court to bring suit in, and the only one in which, even in criminal cases, they could be sued. In the cases in which other courts have attempted to take cognizance of offences charged on a consul, the Government has undertaken the defence by committing it to the Attorney General, whose duty it was made to oppose and prove the incompetency of the court. This was the course taken in the case of Mr. Kosloff, the Russian consul, when under a criminal accusation. It has been further determined that consuls were not liable to prosecution for acts done in the performance of their duties—a point on which, I think, Mr. Lescallier, late consul of France in the United States, is enabled to give some information.

Thus we find that in the United States, where all the national public officers may be prosecuted for their official acts by any individual thinking himself aggrieved by them, foreign consuls enjoy a special exemption; whereas, here, the consul of the United States has, in consequence of the suit brought against his chancellor when acting by his orders, been actually prosecuted, and his case has now for nine months been pending in the tribunals, for an official act performed with the express sanction of the Government, and without the smallest interposition having yet been manifested in his favor.

The suit has, however, been brought by persons bearing a public character, whose conduct had necessitated the interference of the consul of whom they complained. With my note of the 10th of August, 1818, I transmitted to the Duke of Richelieu several original documents establishing the fact that the brokers-interpreters at Havre had obliged the masters of six vessels only to pay a sum of 1,427 francs beyond what was authorized by the tariff; and I proved that, in the course of two years and a half, they must have illegally exacted and received from the American commerce nearly seventy thousand francs more than their lawful dues. The Duke of Richelieu, in his letter of the 12th September following, gave me an assurance that these abuses should in future be repressed. But the owners and captains, remotely situated as they are, were unable to commence two hundred suits against the brokers for the recovery of the sums thus unjustly exacted; and they, availing themselves of impunity, have become the complaining party; while, on the other hand, we see the consul of the United States arraigned before the tribunals.

Upon all these considerations, I conceive myself authorized to demand of his Majesty's Government not only the special decision required by the American consul at Havre to dismiss the present suit, but, in addition, that the consuls of the United States who have his Majesty's exequatur be protected in the free and unmolested exercise of their duties, and no longer exposed to be sued for their official acts in correctional or criminal courts.

I can offer the assurance that, leaving to their Government the care of making such representations as may be necessary, the American consuls will, in the discharge of their duties, confine themselves strictly within the limits prescribed by the established rules of his Majesty's Government.

I beg your excellency to receive the assurance of my perfect consideration,

ALBERT GALLATIN,

Mr. Gallatin to the Marquis Dessolle.

PARIS, May 12, 1819.

Sir: By a letter of the 25th of October, 1817, from the ministry of the interior, it was declared, in reference to the duties of ship-brokers acting as interpreters, that every individual had the right of acting for himself, and without the intervention of a broker, in his own business, and that every foreign master of a vessel was considered as acting for himself if attended by the consular agents of his nation.

His excellency the minister of the interior, relying upon the authority of the law for the appointment of brokers, revoked, by his letter of February 17, 1819, the declaration above referred to. The question relating to the duties attributed by the common law of nations to consuls, or the exercise of which may, for reasons of convenience, be granted to them, remains untouched. Whether it be necessary, therefore, to annul a law unless it may have been modified by a diplomatic agreement is a question which I shall not take upon me to discuss.

It is sufficient that, by the decision of the 17th February, 1819, it is admitted that the law may be so modified by diplomatic agreement—a principle which has been further admitted by the tribunals, namely: by the royal court of Rouen, in a decree of the 8th December, 1818; by the court of cassation, in one of the 26th of March, 1819, and in the preambles thereto. I had the honor to inclose to your excellency copies of these decrees in my note of the 5th instant.

No difficulty, therefore, can exist to the forming such diplomatic arrangements as the case may require. I thought, indeed, that this was the light in which what had been done in 1818 was viewed. The decision of the minister of the interior, of the 31st of August of that year, explanatory of and confirming that of the 25th of October, 1817, was produced by the difficulties created by the brokers and by the representations addressed by me to his excellency the minister of foreign affairs, and was not given until the explanations communicated by him to the minister of the interior were fully considered. It might therefore be viewed as the result of a diplomatic arrangement; and from the total silence of the letter of the 17th of February, 1819, on that point, it is presumable that on this occasion neither the letter of August 31, 1818, nor the circumstances which produced it were communicated to his excellency the minister of the interior. However that may be, the exclusion which now affects the consuls appears to be at variance with the principles generally received as forming the common law of nations, and is at once highly injurious to the American commerce, and contrary to the principle of reciprocity.

Without enlarging on the first point, I shall only remark that the establishment of consuls having originated in the aid and protection to be afforded by them to the commerce and interests of their countrymen with the local authorities, the right of assisting them as interpreters in the custom-houses, excise offices, and other administrations, seems to be a necessary part of their duties.

The serious inconveniences resulting to the American commerce from the establishment of the brokers-interpreters have been already stated in my former notes, a proof of which is afforded by the simple fact of the interposition of the American consuls. Receiving no salaries from their Government, they must necessarily receive a suitable compensation for their services when required by their countrymen; nor would they have been resorted to but for the extravagant demands of the brokers, which are to be traced to their possession of an exclusive right, and to the tariff.

Although the fees payable to the brokers have been regulated, yet there are unforeseen cases constantly occurring which serve as a pretext for demanding an additional compensation for some service not specified in the tariff. Enjoying a monopoly of the duty, their demands were unavoidably complied with. They even carried the practice so far for several years as to exact from the American captains more than double the fees allowed by the tariff. Of this fact I have exhibited proof in my note to the Duke of Richelieu of the 10th of August last. This proceeding having been remonstrated against, they presented a demand to the government to alter the tariff and raise their fees—a measure that would necessarily add to the burdens under which the trade already labored, and give the sanction of law to the abuses so justly complained of.

But the tariff itself, although requiring the approbation of the Government, is prepared and proposed by the local authorities, by the chambers and tribunals of commerce, which, being composed of French merchants, throw the whole burden upon the commerce of foreigners. This tariff, varying in different ports of the kingdom, is, however, uniformly higher for foreigners than for Frenchmen.

As long as the establishment of the brokers continues in force upon its present footing, there is no other remedy, either for the rates laid down by the tariff or for the abuses practiced under favor of the monopoly, than by resorting to the consuls. Let the brokers moderate their demands; let their compensation be proportioned to their services, and they alone will be employed. The right of the consuls to act as interpreters in behalf of their countrymen will only be exercised in cases where the fees demanded, either in virtue of the tariff or otherwise, shall be found to be exorbitant. That right alone can effectually check abuses, and will be specially exercised for that purpose.

I pass on to the principle of reciprocity.

In the United States, as in France, extraordinary duties are laid by the customs on foreign commerce for the benefit of the public treasury. I must remark, however, that they are more moderate than in France, and that the United States, as I have on former occasions given the assurance, are ready to form a convention with France stipulating the repeal of these extraordinary duties by both parties.

But, in the United States, when these duties are once paid, the subjects of France and the citizens of the United States are placed upon a perfect equality. All fees, for any service whatever, payable to public officers of every description, are precisely the same for both, and the Frenchman enjoys the right, in common with the American, of employing the services as an agent or interpreter of his consignee or one of his clerks, or of any other individual. In a word, the French consul may act in all these different ways in behalf of his countrymen. Hence we see that, in consequence of the facility enjoyed by Frenchmen to employ such interpreters as they find most convenient, and of their total exemption from the vexations produced by monopoly and extortion, they seldom apply to their consuls, whose interference is only required in cases of difference or dispute; their right, however, remains unimpaired, and has never been questioned.

I have therefore to request of your excellency that the Americans shall be placed by the tariff upon the same footing as Frenchmen in regard to the fees payable to the brokers-interpreters, and that the consuls of the United States shall enjoy the right of acting for their countrymen in the manner pointed out by the declarations of the 25th October, 1817, and 31st August, 1818, and especially that they may assist them as interpreters in the different administrations concurrently with the brokers-interpreters. I here offer the assurance that the most perfect reciprocity will, in every respect, be observed in the United States.

The Government of the United States has seen with satisfaction the great increase of the trade between the two countries in the latter years—a point on which the French custom-houses can furnish precise data. From America I have none more recent than those published in 1816, in which year the United States imported, exclusive of wines, brandies, dried fruits, and other articles of that nature, to an amount of about sixty millions in merchandise, the produce of French industry. More than two-thirds of these consist of articles of modes and luxury, manufactured at Paris, and of Lyons silks, exported from Havre. They imported into France at least an equal value in cotton and other raw materials. Your excellency will doubtless concur with me in the opinion, that a trade so extensive and beneficial to both nations should not be shackled by local vexations or by those petty interests which have given rise to the representations forming the object of the present note and of that which I had the honor of addressing to you on the 5th of the present month.

I eagerly seize on this occasion to renew to your excellency the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

PARIS, May 14, 1819.

SIR: When I had the honor to address to your excellency my note of the 12th instant I was not informed that the brokers-interpreters at Havre had obtained an alteration of the tariff in their favor.

I am no less surprised than concerned to learn that, as far back as the 24th of February last, his excellency the minister of the interior approved this new tariff, which allows to the brokers-interpreters, for French ships when loaded, fifty centimes on every ton of goods entered and twenty-five centimes at clearing; for foreign ships, one franc (100 centimes) per ton of measurement at entry, and, if they clear out with cargo, fifty centimes per ton of goods.

By the former tariff, American ships, arriving from the United States, paid, altogether, from fifty to ninety centimes per ton.

An American ship of three hundred tons, which is about the medium tonnage of our vessels employed in the trade to Havre, paid, according to the former tariff, one hundred and fifty francs, and according to the present, four hundred and fifty francs on clearing out with cargo, and three hundred on clearing out in ballast.

By which it appears that the brokers are now authorized by law to demand the exorbitant fees which, for two years and a half, they had been receiving contrary to law, and, instead of being punished for their violations of the tariff, their extortions have received the sanction of the law.

I had the honor, in my note of the 10th of August, 1818, denouncing these abuses, to inform the Duke of Richelieu of the exertions then making by the brokers to obtain this alteration of the tariff, and I expressed the hope that they would be unavailing, and that no new burden would be imposed on the American commerce.

The Duke of Richelieu, in his answer of the 12th September following, says: "The administration will take measures that they" (the brokers at Havre) "shall strictly conform to the existing tariff, and the abuses they may have committed shall be repressed."

Relying on this assurance, I was far from expecting that the tariff would have been augmented without any previous notice.

I am persuaded that the greater part of these circumstances have been unknown, and that no hesitation will be felt in reducing and equalizing the tariff, and giving the requisite attention to the representations contained in my note of the 12th of the present month.

I request your excellency to accept the assurances, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

PARIS, September 12, 1818.

SIR: I have the honor to return to you the seven original acquittances inclosed in your letter of the 10th of August last, relative to the charges exacted by the brokers at Havre from American vessels.

The administration will take measures to enforce their strict observance of the existing tariff, and to put a stop to the abuses that may have been practiced by them.

Be pleased, sir, to accept the assurances, &c.,

RICHELIEU.

PARIS, July 28, 1818.

MONSIEUR LE DUC: I am informed that his excellency the minister of the interior addressed a circular letter to the several Chambers of Commerce, bearing date the 25th of October, 1817, and intended to define the rights and duties of the brokers-interpreters, conductors of vessels. In that letter are the following paragraphs, which I beg leave to transcribe from the copy with which I have been furnished:

"An exception to these privileges occurs at once upon considering the right attributed to every individual of acting for himself, and without the intervention of a broker in his own concerns.

"So that no French captain, no foreign captain or trader who speaks French, is bound to employ a broker, either in settling his freight or in making his declarations at the custom-house, or, in fine, for any other formality whatever if he acts in person.

"But if he employs another, he is to resort to the person designated by law; he can only be assisted by a broker, nor can the custom-house admit any other.

"Nevertheless, foreign consuls, acting personally or by their accredited vice consuls or chancellors, have claimed the right of assisting the shipmasters as well as other persons of their nation, and of acting for them as interpreters; and it has been admitted that this was precisely one of the principal objects of their establishment. By virtue of this reciprocal privilege, every foreign shipmaster is considered as acting in person when he is accompanied by the consular agents of his nation duly accredited, and that whether he speaks the French language or not.

"In regard to translations, it is exclusively the duty of the broker to translate all documents produced in disputes on commercial matters; but the exclusive right of interpreters is not to be understood as extending to any other act or to any other case, &c."

The consul of the United States at Havre has accordingly assisted lately several American captains in making the necessary declarations at the custom-house for the purpose only of entering and clearing the vessels; but he has been interrupted in the exercise of those functions, which he thought, indeed, inherent to his office, and which were so explicitly recognized by the instructions above quoted.

The officers of the custom-house, after some hesitation, and on the consul's formal demand and making himself responsible for the consequences, have received the declarations made by the captains with his assistance; but the brokers have not only entered a protest, of which I have the honor to inclose a copy, they have also, as therein intimated, actually brought suits before the tribunal of first instance against the American captain and consul's chancellor.

The controller of the indirect contributions (at one of whose bureaus it is necessary to make declarations of the wines and spirits which may be on board for the use of the captain and crew) has positively refused to admit such declarations through the consul; and in a letter, of which I have also the honor to inclose a copy, he has intimated his determination to seize all American vessels whose captains shall not have made the declarations with the assistance of the brokers.

This refusal and this determination on his part, rendering the instructions of his excellency the minister of the interior altogether nugatory, I beg leave to request your excellency that such orders may be given to the several administrations and authorities as will carry those instructions into effect, and as may protect the American consul and captains against the proceedings with which they are threatened.

It is proper to add, that the captains and owners of French vessels are at perfect liberty in the United States to use, in their transactions with the custom-house or with any other public office, the assistance of the consuls of their nation, and to employ such agents as they may think proper.

I request your excellency to accept, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

The same to the same.

PARIS, August 3, 1818.

MONSIEUR LE DUC: I had the honor to write to your excellency, on the 28th of last month, in relation to the opposition made to the consul of the United States at Havre by the controller of the indirect contributions and by the brokers of that place; I have now that of transmitting a copy of one of the seizures made by the controller aforesaid of part of the stores of the American vessels entered by the assistance of the consul, and also a printed copy of a letter said to have been addressed by the brokers to his excellency the minister of the interior, and which has been published and circulated at Havre.

It does not belong to my functions to discuss the questions which the brokers have raised respecting the construction of the laws of France and the validity of the orders which have emanated from his Majesty's Government. To those orders, leaving it to the minister of the United States to make such representations as the case might require, the American consul and captains must and will always submit. But whilst they act in conformity with such orders they are entitled to the protection of his Majesty's Government, and I beg leave to claim it for them in this instance.

Not only have they been summoned before the tribunals for having made declarations at the custom-house which had been actually received as legal by its officers, but the controller of the indirect contributions has, by his refusal to receive declarations made in the same manner, altogether defeated the object of the circular of the minister of the interior, and he subjects the American captains, by his seizure of stores and vessels, to indefinite expense and delays.

It is to this last circumstance that I wish more particularly to call your excellency's attention at this moment, as a letter from the director general of the indirect contributions would, it is presumed, be sufficient to compel the officers of that administration at Havre to comply with the orders of Government and to act in the same manner as the custom-house officers.

Permit me, therefore, to request that orders may be given to the controller aforesaid to receive the declarations made at any of the bureaus of his administration by the American captains with the assistance of their consul, and to release the stores, vessels, or other property which may have been seized by his orders under color of such declarations having been thus made without the assistance of the brokers.

The urgency of that measure induces me to confine this letter to that sole object, but I may hereafter add to it some representations concerning the rate of emoluments charged to American vessels by the brokers at Havre, and which has been the primary cause of the consul's interference.

I request your excellency to accept, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

The same to the same.

PARIS, August 10, 1818.

MONSIEUR LE DUC: In the letter which I had the honor to address to your excellency on the third of this month I alluded to the illegal fees charged by the brokers of Havre to the captains of American vessels.

I have now the honor to inclose a copy of the tariff and some of the brokers' accounts, showing that their charges have considerably exceeded the rates fixed by it. These legal rates vary from 40 to 87½ centimes per ton, according to the size of the vessels, and taking the average of the first six months of this year would have amounted to 56½ centimes per ton. The brokers have for several years demanded one franc and fifty centimes per ton.

Prior to this year this demand was always enforced without any reservation, in proof of which their books may be examined; and the inclosed accounts, No. 1 to 6, show that in some instances they have received even more. The difference between the legal charges, according to the tariff, and those made and received by the brokers, in these six vessels alone, amounts to 1,427 francs, as appears from the following statement:

	Tons.	Due by the tariff. Francs.	Charged by brokers. Francs.
Pocahontas.....	280	150	570
Ceylon.....	210	135	350
Chatsworth.....	266	150	380
Emmeline.....	212	135	315
Mary Augusta.....	234	135	370
Catharine.....	178	120	267
In six vessels.....	1,380	825	2,252

Although the statement of the vessels entered at Havre from 1st July, 1815, to the 31st December, 1817, is not in my possession, I believe that there could not have been, during that period, less than 300, measuring, together, about 75,000 tons, on which the legal charges of the brokers, as fixed by the tariff, could not have exceeded 45,000 francs, and on which they must have charged and received more than 110,000 francs.

In December last the American captains determined, with the advice of the consul, to resist these exorbitant and illegal demands, and the brokers so far yielded as to receive one franc per ton; they refused, however, to give final receipts, and made a reserve of the other fifty centimes in case they should be adjudged to them. But they have lately again required the payment of one franc fifty centimes per ton, and have given receipts of the form exhibited in the account No. 7, and by which they oblige themselves to refund the fifty centimes if they are not entitled to them by competent decision.

The statement of the American vessels entered at Havre from the 1st January to the 30th of June, 1818, is in my possession. They were in number 74, measuring 19,040 tons, on which the legal charge of the brokers, according to the tariff, was 10,720 francs, as appears by the following abstract:

	Francs.
From 90 to 120 tons, none.....
From 120 to 150 tons, 6 vessels, at 105 francs per vessel.....	630
From 150 to 200 tons, 11 vessels, at 120 francs per vessel.....	1,320
From 200 to 250 tons, 19 vessels, at 135 francs per vessel.....	2,565
From 250 to 300 tons, 15 vessels, at 150 francs per vessel.....	2,225
From 300 to 350 tons, 16 vessels, at 165 francs per vessel.....	2,640
From 350 to 400 tons, 3 vessels, at 180 francs per vessel.....	540
From 400 and above 4 vessels, at 200 francs per vessel.....	800
74 vessels, by tariff.....	10,720

At the rate of one franc per ton, the brokers have received on these vessels 19,040 francs, or 8,320 francs beyond what they were entitled to; and their reserve of fifty centimes amounts to a further sum of 9,520 francs, which the captains have also been obliged to leave in the hands of their consignees. Lately, as has already been stated, the brokers again demand the immediate payment of the whole at the rate of one franc fifty centimes per ton.

These abuses were, till lately, but very partially known to me, and the tariff was communicated only a few days ago. I am sure that, being now brought to the knowledge of your excellency, they will be suppressed and their authors discountenanced. It is understood that they are endeavoring at this time to obtain an alteration in the tariff. It is hoped that this attempt will be defeated, and that no new charges will be authorized on the American commerce, whose growing importance is equally beneficial to both countries, and which should not be impeded by such petty vexations.

Permit me to request that the accounts No. 1 to 7, being original papers belonging to the parties, may be returned to me.

I request your excellency to accept, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

PARIS, September 30, 1818.

SIR: The consul of the United States at Havre informs me that the local authorities there refuse to recognize the chancellor of that consulate or to receive declarations or other official papers presented by him, alleging that no exequatur has been granted to him for the exercise of his functions.

The consul himself having duly received the exequatur of his Majesty, and in the regular exercise of his official duty appointed his chancellor, by an act or commission under his hand and seal, this appointment belonging, under our laws and usages, to the consul alone, the appointment was made known to the prefect of the department, and the recognition of the chancellor by that officer was signified to the consul, who supposed that no further formalities were requisite. But, either from some misapprehension on the part of the local authorities or from a formality, the necessity of which is now for the first time made known to this legation, they require an exequatur, or a superior order of some kind, to induce them to acknowledge the chancellor of the consulate officially. The mayor of Havre is particularly mentioned as having demanded the chancellor's exequatur to be represented to him.

I have the honor to inclose the commission furnished by the consul of the United States at Havre to his chancellor, and to request that an exequatur, if the usages of France render it necessary for that affair, may be granted upon it, or that such orders may be given that he may be duly recognized by all the subordinate authorities with whom he may have occasion, in the discharge of his official duties, to have any intercourse.

I have the honor to be, &c. [in the absence of the minister of the United States.]

D. SHELDON.

PARIS, October 17, 1818.

SIR: With the letter you did me the honor to write to me on the 30th September last, I received the document showing the appointment of Mr. Thomas Taylor as chancellor of the consulate of the United States at Havre.

In transmitting it to me for the purpose of obtaining the exequatur of the King, it may have escaped your recollection that, chancellors not being entitled to that credential, it would be impossible for me to comply with your request.

That request appears, further, to be connected with particular circumstances which have already been taken into consideration; and in consequence of the explanations given, both to the minister of the interior and to the director general of the administration of the customs, I infer that the chancellors of foreign consuls residing in France will, in future, experience no difficulty in the exercise of the duties specially assigned to them in that capacity.

I have the honor to return, inclosed, the commission of Mr. Taylor.

Be pleased, sir, to accept the assurance, &c.,

D'HAUTERIVE.

PARIS, May 22, 1819.

SIR: A new quarantine of ten days has again been laid on our vessels, and I have again renewed my annual representation on that subject. I have the honor to inclose a copy of my letter to Marquis Dessolle, who, in a conference, has promised to pay immediate attention to the subject. They are at this moment much alive to anything connected with the importation of contagious diseases, a Swedish vessel having lately arrived from Tunis to Marseilles with persons on board having actually the plague; they and the vessel are under strict confinement at the lazaretto of Marseilles, and the circumstance has not been permitted to transpire publicly.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

P. S. May 24.—Mr. Dessolle informed me verbally last evening that it had been agreed to take off the quarantine on our vessels. An occurrence in relation to it at Havre induced me to write to him again on the subject to-day, and I annex a copy of this letter.

A. G.

Mr. Gallatin to the Marquis Dessolle.

PARIS, May 17, 1819.

MONSIEUR LE MARQUIS: A quarantine of ten days has again been imposed on all vessels arriving in France from any port of the United States, even though such vessels may have clean bills of health. The Nimrod, arrived lately at Havre from New York, with 27 passengers on board, is now in that situation. Those passengers are compelled to remain crowded on board the vessel, without any possible result but that of perhaps creating instead of preventing sickness.

No contagious disease is known to prevail in any part of the United States. No other reason is assigned for this measure than the existence of a malignant fever at St. Domingo, Martinico, or Guadaloupe. This is the fourth time within less than four years that a similar general measure has been adopted without sufficient motives. Every time Government has listened to my representations and removed the quarantine, but not till after considerable loss and inconvenience had been suffered by individuals.

I can only refer to my former letters and briefly repeat their substance.

The yellow fever is essentially a tropical disease. A year hardly elapses without its appearing in some of the West India islands. This in itself, considering the distance and difference of climate, affords no reason whatever for laying under an interdict vessels from the United States. It is only when that disease does actually extend to some of their ports that cautionary measures become useful and necessary so far as relates to such ports. The most southern ports of the United States are, of course, on account of the great and long summer heats, most exposed. The yellow fever has never been known to exist north of the 43d degree of latitude; it has never, in any part of the United States, made its appearance before the latter part of the month of June; it always disappears with the first frost; it has not, during the last fourteen years, appeared once anywhere north of Charleston, in South Carolina.

Any quarantine laid on vessels coming with clean bills of health from ports of the United States where no contagious disease is known to exist is a measure wholly useless as it relates to the prevention of such diseases, and extremely prejudicial to the commercial intercourse between the two countries. Whenever it is generally known, the passengers will be landed in England, and arrive forty-eight hours afterwards in France, without any other result than causing them some additional expense and inconvenience. As the delay of ten days' quarantine is an extra charge, equal to about twenty per cent. on the freight, the vessels will also be induced to land their cargoes in England, whence the cotton will be brought in French vessels to France. The expense will fall on the consumer, and in some instances the return cargoes of the American vessels will be purchased in England instead of France.

Such is nearly the substance of the arguments which have already, on former occasions, been successfully used with your excellency's predecessor. Last year, during my absence, Mr. Sheldon having made a similar application, he was, in answer, informed, by a letter of 28th September, 1818, from Mr. D'Hauterive, that the quarantine was taken off, in pursuance of a decision taken by the council of ministers, and on the ground that no contagious disease then prevailed in the United States.

The circumstances being now the same, I hope that the determination will be similar, and that the quarantine will be taken off, and not hereafter be renewed, except with respect to such ports as may at the time be afflicted with a contagious disease and such vessels as may not have clean bills of health.

I request your excellency to accept, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

The same to the same.

PARIS, May 24, 1819.

MONSIEUR LE MARQUIS: Your excellency having informed me verbally that the quarantine on American vessels had been removed, I had not intended to trouble you again on the subject; but I receive daily representations in relation to it, and every day's delay is attended with some new inconvenience. I am informed by my letters of the 22d that one of the passengers on board the Nimrod, named Bourguency, was released and permitted to proceed to Paris by virtue of an order from the Department of the Interior. This fact, provoking with respect to all the American passengers and mortifying to myself, whilst it proves that no importance is attached by this Government to the quarantine, makes me still more anxious to receive the official information that it has been in fact removed.

I pray your excellency to accept, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

[Extracts.]

PARIS, October 25, 1819.

"I had the honor, in conformity with your request, to transmit, in my despatches Nos. 40 and 51, copies of the French tariff and of the communications of our several consuls on the subject of the extra duties and charges laid in the ports of France on the commerce of the United States." "American vessels are daily withdrawing from the trade, and if the evil is not corrected the whole of the commerce between the two countries will soon be carried on almost exclusively in French vessels. Our counter-vailing system of extra duties is wholly inefficient to protect our navigation; and if they are still more increased on the same plan, the French duties continuing the same, the ultimate effect would be that all our importations from France would be made in American and all our exportations to France in French vessels. This, considering the respective bulk of both, would give to the French four-fifths of the navigation between the two countries.

"Although the general conversations I have had on the subject gave no hopes of obtaining relief through the medium of negotiations, and although I felt a reluctance to make an application that would not probably be favorably received, the circumstances appeared so urgent that I have thought it my duty to address to the minister of foreign affairs the letter of which a copy is inclosed. I hope to be able to communicate to you their determination in time for Congress to act during the ensuing session, if that course shall be deemed eligible.

"The difficulty in that case will be to find an efficient remedy. I have already alluded to it in my despatch No. 88, in which I suggested the utility of obtaining an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which would authorize Congress to lay a duty on produce of the United States when exported in foreign vessels; but that process is uncertain and dilatory. On reflecting on the subject it has appeared to me that another mode might be adopted, which I beg leave to submit to your consideration.

"It consists in repealing our existing discriminating duty (of ten per cent. on the ordinary duty) on merchandise imported in foreign vessels, and in substituting to it an additional duty on those vessels, equal, on an average, to the extra duty which foreign countries lay on our produce, when imported there in American vessels.

"To apply this to France, and taking the French extra duty on cotton, which is our principal export there, as the criterion, the difference between the duty laid here on cotton when imported in our vessels, and that laid on it when imported in French vessels, is about one cent and a quarter per pound. Supposing, then, that a vessel carries at the rate of about 1,000 pounds of cotton to the ton, the difference amounts to about twelve dollars and a half per ton; and this is the additional tonnage which, being laid in our ports on all French vessels, without regard to their inward or outward cargoes, would countervail in a direct manner the French extra duty. This statement shows the greatness of the evil to be corrected, since, even admitting some error in the estimated quantity of cotton which vessels carry on an average, the difference against the vessels of the United States is more than the whole price of the freight. Calculated on tobacco, that difference is still greater, and amounts to nearly seventeen dollars per ton; for although the duty, when imported in American vessels, is but two-thirds per pound of that laid on cotton, a vessel will carry at least twice as much tobacco per ton as cotton. There can be no doubt that, taking into consideration the whole trade, the additional tonnage duty of twelve dollars and a half per ton on French vessels generally substituted to our existing discriminating duties, will no more than countervail the extra duties laid by the French government on our vessels.

"But in order to render this plan altogether efficient, I think it would be necessary to authorize also the President, in case the Government of France should attempt to defeat it by laying additional duties on our vessels, to increase in the same proportion the proposed tonnage duty on French vessels; and a provision might be added that all those extra duties should cease on our part whenever France consented to repeal theirs.

"I have alluded only to the general extra duties paid into the public treasury; but there are various other local charges laid on our vessels, such as pilotage, brokerage, &c., which are sometimes heavy and always vexatious, but which it is more difficult to countervail, because they are not uniform. Their nature and amount are stated in the consular communications formerly transmitted. That which relates to the ship-brokers of Havre is fully explained in my despatch No. 103, and I must add, that to the letters which I addressed to the minister of foreign affairs on that subject I have received no further answer. The average amount of those various charges might be estimated and added to the suggested additional tonnage duty. But the most efficient mode to obtain redress in those cases would be to lay another specific duty on French vessels, equal to the charges which, in the ports to which those vessels respectively belong, are laid on American vessels. That specific duty would, of course, vary according to the French ports from which the vessels came; and although there might be some difficulty in the execution, it seems to me that it may be surmounted by making the certificate of our consuls legal evidence of the amount of the extra charges imposed in their respective consular districts on American vessels.

"The importance of this subject will be my apology for having offered these suggestions. Of the greatness of the injury sustained by our commerce, and of the necessity of applying without delay a remedy, there can be no doubt. I hope that I may be mistaken on one point, and no endeavors shall be omitted on my part to induce this Government to alter their policy, but I firmly believe that nothing will produce that effect but the adoption of countervailing measures on the part of the United States."

PARIS, October 25, 1819.

MONSIEUR LE MARQUIS: I had the honor on my arrival here to communicate, verbally, to his excellency the Duke de Richelieu that I was authorized by my Government to conclude with that of France commercial arrangements founded on a footing of perfect equality, and such as might promote an intercourse equally advantageous to both countries. With that view I had requested him to examine the convention concluded in July, 1815, between Great Britain and the United States, the bases of which they were ready to adopt in their commercial relations with France. The peculiar circumstances which prevented at that time the further prosecution of that subject have fortunately ceased to exist, and I have now the honor to bring it again to the consideration of your excellency.

Both France and the United States have, in order to encourage their own navigation, passed laws laying extra duties on foreign vessels and on the merchandise imported in such vessels; but the inequality is at present so much greater in France than in the United States, and the mode heretofore adopted in America to counteract that inequality is so defective, that if this system was permitted to continue on both sides the commercial intercourse between the two countries would in a short time be carried on almost exclusively in French vessels. In order to obtain their due share in the navigation between the two countries, (and they claim nothing more than their share,) the United States will be compelled to alter their laws and to lay such additional extra duties on the tonnage of French vessels or on merchandise imported therein as will, in that respect, restore a perfect equality in the commercial intercourse of the two nations.

This plan, however, of each Government laying extra duties in order to countervail those laid by the other is attended with serious inconveniences on both sides. The ship owners of each country are always apt to think that the extra duties paid by them are greater and more oppressive than those laid on the vessels of the other. They claim the protection of their Government, and ask that these should be enhanced; a species of commercial hostility takes place, which may have an unfavorable effect on the friendly relations of the two countries, and the ultimate and unavoidable tendency of the system is to lessen their commerce and to throw it in other channels.

Any attempt on the part of either country to engross for its vessels the carrying trade between the two will certainly be defeated by the other; and if, as it is believed, they have no other aim than that of a fair reciprocal equality, this will be attained with much greater facility and certainty by both mutually agreeing to abolish altogether all extra duties, than by each trying to countervail those of the other.

The bases of an arrangement founded on that principle would be:

1. That in the United States no higher tonnage duties or other charges should be laid on French than on American vessels, nor any higher duties on articles of the produce or manufacture of France, when imported from France into the United States in French vessels, than when imported in the same manner in American vessels.

And, reciprocally, that in France no higher tonnage duties or other charges should be laid on American than on French vessels, nor any higher duties on articles of the produce or manufacture of the United States, when imported from the said States into France in American vessels, than when imported in the same manner in French vessels.

2. That no higher duties should be laid in France on articles of the produce or manufacture of the United States than on similar articles of the same value of the produce or manufacture of any other foreign country.

And, reciprocally, that no higher duties should be laid in the United States on articles of the produce or manufacture of France than on similar articles of the same value of the produce or manufacture of any other foreign country. These being, in substance, the same principles on which the commercial convention between the United States and Great Britain is founded, have the advantage of being recommended by the experience of two great maritime nations, equally jealous of their commercial prosperity. I may add that they have, either by positive treaties or by mutual municipal laws, been adopted in the commercial intercourse between the United States and Sweden, the Netherlands, Germany, and Prussia.

The great inequality, to the disadvantage of America, which now exists in her intercourse with France renders it important that the determination of his Majesty's Government on this subject should be communicated as soon as possible. It would be with great reluctance that the United States would find themselves obliged, in self-defence, to lay additional extra duties on French vessels; and they have given satisfactory evidence of their earnest disposition to cultivate and promote their commercial relations with France by the reduction of duties on French wines, which, without any previous stipulation in favor of the American commerce, was decreed during the last session of Congress.

I request your excellency to accept the assurances of the distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be,

Your excellency's most obedient and humble servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, November 8, 1819.

"Marquis Dessolle invited me to a conference on the 6th instant on the subject of the commercial arrangement proposed in my note to him of the 25th of October. He appeared to admit generally the correctness of the principles therein assumed as the basis of a negotiation, but he added that other causes of inequality might exist besides those arising from discriminating duties, and alluded to the frequent desertion of French seamen in America, to our refusal to deliver them, and to the great inconvenience to which this circumstance subjected French vessels. This subject is not immediately connected with that of the equalization of duties, and I believe that the evil complained of is not of great magnitude. If in their tariff they had only gone far enough to balance in some degree our natural superiority, there would not perhaps have been much reason to complain; but the existing system is intolerable. The minister has promised to write, and I hope to be able to communicate the final result before the end of the year."

"I have received the inclosed answer to my letter of the 14th of May last on the subject of the fees of the ship-brokers of Havre. The new tariff is thereby confirmed, and the extortions of which they had been guilty are made, on the plea of usage, a justification of Mr. Decaze's decision. That we had submitted without remonstrance to that imposition, and that the fees bear a just proportion to the services rendered, are assertions contrary to fact. It would, however, be an error to suppose that either this measure or the disinclination to enter into commercial arrangements arise from a hostile spirit against the United States. The ministry's dispositions towards them are, on the contrary, rather friendly than otherwise. In the case of the brokers, the decision is consistent with the general principles by which France is administered." "It is only an additional tonnage duty, to be taken into consideration with other extra charges whenever they become the subject either of negotiation or of legislative measures."

PARIS, November 6, 1819.

SIR: In your note of the 14th of May last you did me the honor to address to me some observations relating to the new tariff given to the ship-brokers at Havre on the 24th of February.

The advance of the dues, as exhibited by it in their favor, is not so real as may seem at first view. In fact, it has long since been generally admitted that the rates of the old tariff were insufficient; and, in consequence, custom had sanctioned the demand of higher rates since the peace as being more adequate to the pains and trouble of the brokers. To these new charges, adopted with the consent of the parties, and even of the American consuls at Havre, no objection whatever had been made since 1814 until the present. These are the same rates which were formerly spontaneously agreed to by the parties concerned, and are now established by the new tariff, which only confirms and sanctions by law the practice hitherto observed in this particular.

If the rates fixed by it are higher for foreign than for French vessels, it is because the brokers require more time and trouble in managing the business of the former than of the latter. The difference, then, in the charge in either case is to be referred to an unquestionable principle of equity; this difference has always existed in France, and is founded in justice and proportioned to the trouble of the brokers, who, being subjected in the former case to double labor, are therefore entitled to a double compensation. With respect to the difference in the tonnage by measurement or by goods, it has been ascertained that it was always intended that the brokerage should be uniform, both in the case of Frenchmen and foreigners, and paid upon the tonnage by measurement only. Orders have, therefore, been given forthwith to rectify the error that has taken place on this point, so that the tonnage by measurement may serve as the only rule for the rate of brokerage to be charged on French and foreign ships indiscriminately.

Be pleased, sir, to accept the assurances of the high consideration with which I have the honor to be, &c.,

THE MARQUIS DESSOLLE.

PARIS, December 9, 1819.

SIR: The change of ministry has thrown new delays in the discussion of the commercial propositions which I had made to this Government. Mr. Pasquier has promised to take them immediately into consideration, and seems to understand both the reasonableness of what we ask and the difficulty of acceding to it without giving great displeasure to the shipping interest of France. The council of commerce, (consisting of eminent merchants,) to whom the proposals had, in the first instance, been referred, have reported that a nominal equality would give a decided superiority to our navigation; that the French discriminating duties were, however, too high, and that they should be reduced to two-thirds of their present amount. I have explicitly declared that if, instead of abolishing all those duties on both sides, an equalization was attempted, the reduction proposed by the council of commerce was altogether insufficient, and I could not accede to it.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State, Washington.

---

PARIS, January 15, 1820.

SIR: I have spoken several times to Mr. Pasquier since my letter of the 9th ultimo on the subject of the discriminating duties. He always professed sentiments friendly to whatever might increase the commercial relations between the two countries, and appeared disposed to meet in some manner the overture made on our part; but he always added that the French merchants were extremely averse to a total abolition. I addressed to him, on the 6th instant, the letter of which a copy is inclosed, and he had positively promised to send me, yesterday, an answer, which is not yet received. The departure of the Stephanie compels me to write to you without waiting for it. I understood that at all events that answer would not be decisive, and a project of a law making sundry alterations in the custom-house duties was yesterday presented to the Chamber of Deputies, which contains no alteration in the discriminating duties of which we complain. The effect of these becomes every day more manifest. At Nantes, where not a single American vessel has arrived within the last twelve months, eight French vessels have arrived with cargoes of American produce within the last six months of 1819. I am confident that this Government will make no sufficient alteration until they are compelled to do it by our own acts. A clause in your act leaving a contingent power to suspend its operation in case an arrangement should take place is all that appears necessary to obviate every objection.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

PARIS, January 6, 1820.

SIR: I beg leave to recal to your excellency's attention the letter respecting the commercial relations between France and the United States, which I had the honor to address to your predecessor on the 27th of October last.

Marquis Dessolle, in a conference on the subject, informed me that it had been referred to the council of commerce, whose opinion has for a considerable time been transmitted to the Department of Foreign Affairs. Congress being now in session, it becomes urgent that I should, without delay, communicate to my Government the decision of that of his Majesty on the overture I had the honor to make. It is the earnest desire of the United States that an arrangement deemed equally beneficial to the commerce of both countries may be concluded; but I have already stated that if their endeavors in that respect should fail, they will be under an indispensable necessity of restoring, by a new modification of their discriminating duties, the equality to which their navigation is entitled.

I request your excellency, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

His Excellency BARON PASQUIER, Minister of Foreign Affairs, &c.

PARIS, January 20, 1820.

"I have now the honor to inclose the copy of Mr. Pasquier's long-promised answer on the subject of our commercial relations, which was not received till after I had closed my last despatch to you. I am confirmed in the opinion that nothing will be done here until we shall have done justice to ourselves by our own measures. The ministry is, I think, well disposed; but they will not act in opposition to the remonstrances of the shipping interest and of the Chambers of Commerce, which have been consulted. That of Paris is averse to our proposals. Indeed, Mr. Pasquier informed me that that of Bordeaux alone had given an opinion favorable to them."

The Baron Pasquier to Mr. Gallatin.

PARIS, January 14, 1820.

SIR: I have laid before his Majesty the proposal made by you in the name of your Government in the note which you addressed to my predecessor on the 25th October last, the object of which is the conclusion of a commercial convention founded on the principle of perfect equality and calculated to establish relations as comprehensive as may be found practicable, mutually advantageous to both nations.

His Majesty is disposed, sir, to adopt any arrangement which has for its basis a due reciprocity of advantages, and which, by reconciling the commercial interests of both people, may promote their mutual prosperity.

As soon, therefore, as the various points of information indispensably necessary to guide the decision of his Majesty's Government, as well in relation to the two stipulations proposed in your note as to the other clauses which it may be found expedient to insert in the intended convention, shall have been collected, I will lose no time in entering with you into more particular discussions, and I have every reason to believe that I may be enabled to do so speedily.

I beg you, sir, to accept the assurances, &c.,

PASQUIER.

[1ST SESSION.]

CLAIMS OF CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES ON ACCOUNT OF SPANISH SPOILIATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MAY 12, 1820.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State, with the document prepared in pursuance of a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 14th ultimo, on the subject of claims of citizens of the United States for Spanish spoliations upon their property and commerce.

RECAPITULATION.

In stating the preceding account it was found impossible to arrange the different items under distinct heads of expenditure, owing to there being, in many instances, a great variety of articles in the same vouchers applicable to different branches of expenses.

The following recapitulation, however, which has been made on a careful examination of the vouchers, will show the amount of expenses incurred under the respective heads there mentioned.

The Boundary Commission under the 6th and 7th articles of the treaty of Ghent,

REMARKS.

These accounts embrace every species of disbursement by the American Government on account of the commission for the period to which they relate, excepting the salary of the Commissioner and the salaries and subsistence of the agency.

They do not exhibit the equalized expenses of the two Governments, but the actual expenditures of the American Government. It is known, however, that the expenditures by the two parties have not differed essentially in amount, and at the close of the commission they will be brought together and equalized.

A few barrels of pork and some other provisions charged in this account have been delivered over to the British party when in need of them, and charged. They will be hereafter accounted for by them.

For the first year I made some charges for my travelling expenses, in conformity with the practice which I was informed by one of the Commissioners under the treaty of 1794 had been pursued by him and his colleague. But since the year 1817 I have made no charges of this nature.

S. HALE, Secretary.

WASHINGTON, May 17, 1820.

SIR: The following considerations have induced me to solicit that I might remain attached to the commission under the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty of Ghent:

As the office of the agent under these articles has been vacated, some embarrassments may arise that give me the more confidence in submitting the annexed suggestions.

That I be permitted to repair to the above described boundary commission—

To represent the United States, (during the absence of an agent more fully authorized,) under the direction of the Government or of the American Commissioner, so far as it may be necessary.

To meet any proceedings on the part of the British agent.

To continue the minutes and journal of the agency; keep a record of the proceedings and notes of the evidence upon which decisions are had.

To report to the Government the proceedings of the Board and other occurrences of moment.

To transact all such things as the American Commissioner should deem to require the interference of an agent on the part of his Government.

To avoid the allegation on the part of the British Government that the United States had not met the agent of his Britannic Majesty by a corresponding officer or person acting in such capacity.

To supply the American Commissioner with another officer, so that he might be enabled to retire from the personal superintendence of the survey and party of surveyors whenever it might seem to him proper and requisite for the furtherance of the proceedings of the Board.

To enable the Board to proceed to the consideration of cases that in their opinion require the appearance of the respective Governments by officers representing them. It may be proper here to add that such material is now matured for consideration by the Board, not perhaps involving questions of doubt or difficulty, and that whenever the Board shall conclude to act upon such cases, an embarrassment might arise from the non-appearance of an officer corresponding to the British agent.

To take charge of the public property left on the line by the American agent, and dispose of so much thereof as is liable to waste and not needed by the commission.

To submit the accounts of the late agent of the United States to the Board for their sanction, or to the American Commissioner.

It is not believed nor desired that this appointment should increase in any material manner the expenses of the commission. No additional establishment would be requisite. The travelling expenses to and from the line and such compensation as might be allowed would only accrue, and the appropriation for the present year, from my knowledge of the disbursements of the commission, it is believed would cover this expense.

It is not intended to convey the impression that all the above enumerated duties are considered indispensable; but it is believed that, should this appointment be made, considerable embarrassments will be avoided, and I feel it right to state my convictions that it would be agreeable to the views and wishes of the American Commissioner.

Permit me to conclude that I have continued with the commission from the commencement of its labors to the present time, and that a strong desire to make myself useful to the advancement of the interests of my country (so far as in my power lies) urges me to seek for instructions upon the subject proposed.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

JOSEPH DELAFIELD.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 19, 1820.

Sir: Having laid before the President of the United States your letter of the 17th instant, I am directed by him to authorize your attendance upon the commission under the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty of Ghent for the purposes mentioned in your letter, and subject to the consent of the Commissioner, General Porter, whose directions in relation to the objects of your attention in this employment you will be pleased to take and observe. Your compensation will continue as heretofore, with such further allowance for necessary expenses as the Commissioner shall approve and may be allowed within the existing appropriation.

I am, &c.,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, May 19, 1820.

Sir: I have had the honor to receive your communication, bearing date this day, authorizing my attendance upon the boundary line commission under the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty of Ghent for the purposes therein described. In pursuance of such authority I shall repair forthwith to the boundary commission and confer with General Porter, whose directions upon all subjects where my services may be required shall be observed.

I beg leave to assure you that it will be my greatest pride to deserve the trust confided to me, and to render myself useful to the commission.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

JOSEPH DELAFIELD.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

RIVER ST. CLAIR, October 13, 1820.

Sir: I had the honor of addressing you on the 24th day of June last from the Detroit river, giving information of the intended departure of the surveyors employed by the Board under the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty of Ghent from that river to the upper end of Lake Huron.

The survey having been conducted to the head of the river Detroit, I sailed with the surveyors in a light schooner that had been employed for our service on the 21st day of July, and on the 3d day of August we commenced a section of survey at the north end of Lake Huron.

The British party had already begun their work at the head of the lake. We consequently took a section some distance below them, embracing the island known as Drummond's island, where the British forces now have a garrison, several channels hitherto unexplored, the commencement of the great Manatoulin islands, and a great number of lesser islands.

I regret that it is not in my power, without the aid of maps, to give a satisfactory description of that country, nor do I know of any that have been published that give a true knowledge of that end of Lake Huron.

That end of the lake from the river St. Marie to the Great Manatoulin is included in the surveys of the two parties and is completed. I conceive that the survey effected this season upon Lake Huron will embrace by far the most essential parts of that lake to be surveyed, so far as it relates to the duties of this commission. Drummond's island and Isle St. Joseph are of the most considerable interest, as well on account of their position as of territory, and more particularly Drummond's island. To this island, now in possession of the British, the United States have reasons to maintain a claim.

The season having advanced so far as to become boisterous and inclement, which rendered the conduct of the survey uncertain, and also having concluded the survey commenced, we left Lake Huron and arrived on the river St. Clair on the 6th instant. The party is at present employed upon this river, but will soon be under the necessity of returning to Black Rock on account of the inclemency of the weather. The British party left Lake Huron a few days before us and proceeded direct to Black Rock.

I have, &c.,

JOSEPH DELAFIELD.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

NEW YORK, November 1, 1820.

SIR: Upon the return of the boundary line party of surveyors from the north end of Lake Huron to the river St. Clair I had the honor to forward a letter, under date of October 13, 1820, describing the progress we had made during the past season. That letter having been ordered to the charge of the postmaster at Detroit, and supposing its receipt may be prolonged, I have thought it right to inclose a duplicate of the same.

For the reasons stated in my letter of the 13th ultimo we were then engaged in bringing the active labors of the survey for the season to a close; accordingly, when that duty was performed, we sailed from the St. Clair river and arrived at Black Rock on the 20th of the same month. At the latter place the surveyors and draughtsmen will be employed for some time in the preparation of their notes of observation, and in the composition of their maps for exchange and records, agreeably to the regulations of the Board.

I take great satisfaction in stating that our operations during the summer have been, in all respects, prosecuted with industry and success, and that they have been sanctioned by the concurrence and assent of the Commissioner, General Porter.

Our surveys have extended from the mouth of the Detroit river to the north end of Lake Huron, and have embraced that district, excepting the small Lake St. Clair and river St. Clair, and those parts of Lake Huron that are not essential to the duties of this commission.

Upon a full exposition to General Porter of the surveys effected and that which remains to be effected within the limits just mentioned, I have also the satisfaction to state that he concurs with me in opinion that but little remains to be done to bring to a close the performance of the sixth article of the treaty under which we act; and from the arrangements that are anticipated I do not doubt but what all the surveys that are necessary from the parallel of forty-five degrees north latitude, on the St. Lawrence river, through the lakes, to the north extremity of Lake Huron, will, in the coming season, be completed; nor do I at present foresee any obstacles that may present a protraction of the boundary lines for that extent by the decisions of the Board immediately thereafter. In furtherance of this view of the progress of our duties, General Porter has been pleased to confide to me the preliminaries he would establish to regulate such decisions; and their application to the various questions that suggest themselves, regardful of the best interests of the United States, is now a subject of study and investigation.

The difficulty that occurred to prevent a settlement of the accounts of the late agent of the United States, Colonel Hawkins, to wit, that they had not been acted upon by the Board, was submitted by me to the Commissioner of the United States in conformity to my instructions. In order to present a just understanding of what has transpired relative to these accounts, I have reduced the same to a correspondence with General Porter. His promised reply in a few days will enable me to lay the result before the Department of State.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, &c.,

JOSEPH DELAFIELD.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

NEW YORK, November 25, 1820.

SIR: Perceiving by the newspapers that the House of Representatives of the United States has requested of the President certain information relative to the proceedings and accounts of the Commissioners and agents under the treaty of Ghent, I am induced to write you briefly on the subject.

It having appeared to me that no settlement of accounts was contemplated by the treaty or expected by the Government until the final settlement at the close of the commission, it has been considered at least unnecessary to render any accounts; but being at all times not only willing but anxious to satisfy any branch of the Government as to my public conduct or accounts, I herewith forward you an abstract of my accounts, except as to the expenses of the commission for the present year. This is made out from papers which I have with me, but the vouchers are not here. I will, on my return home, arrange and forward them to your office. The amount of expenditures during the present year cannot be ascertained until all the accounts on both sides are settled and brought together, which it has not yet been possible to do.

The agent left this city a few days ago on his return home. He has proper vouchers to show that the money which has been received by him has been expended for the purposes of the commission.

I have, in the accompanying statement, put my salary at $4,444 44, as that is generally supposed to be the amount. But the Commissioners of his Britannic Majesty under the treaty of Ghent receive 1,200*l.* sterling, equal to $5,333 28; and it is believed to be not only just but in accordance with the treaty that the Commissioners appointed on the part of the United States should receive the same salary. This principle has been most conclusively recognized by the United States in the case of the agents, whose salaries were raised from $3,000 to $4,444 44 per annum, to make them equal to the pay of the agents on the part of Great Britain. The propriety of an equality of compensation to the Commissioners is certainly, to say the least, equally strong, as they are the joint officers of the two Governments.

I have never claimed on my personal account anything over my salary, whatever that may be, and such I know is the fact as to the agent.

The Commissioners under the fifth article of the treaty have held two sessions the present year. With respect to the progress which has been made by the commission, I understand the agent has already given to the Government all the information which it would be in my power to communicate.

If any statement of the moneys drawn by me from the Treasury shall have been laid before the House of Representatives previous to the receipt of this communication, I beg leave respectfully to request that copies of my letter and statement may be also transmitted to that body.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

C. P. VAN NESS.

NEW YORK, November 27, 1820.

Sir: In addition to my previous communications respecting the progress of the boundary line commission under the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty of Ghent, I have the honor to submit some facts that it did not heretofore occur to me were material at this time to communicate, and which will hereafter be presented more in detail when the accounts of the past season are in readiness to exhibit. I allude more particularly to the names of persons now employed by the Commissioner or agent, the purposes for which employed, their terms of service and compensation.

In order that the Department of State may be entirely possessed of such information as I have upon these points, I have the honor to inclose a list containing the names, the services, and salaries, and compensation of all persons employed during this season by the Commissioner of the United States under the above articles of the treaty of Ghent.

This list is collected, so far as it respects the principal persons employed, from the proceedings of the Board, and is otherwise expressed with as much certainty as can be ascertained until the accounts of the last season are rendered by the Commissioner. To those accounts I must beg leave to refer for the most exact and detailed information that may be desired.

My own duties have not required the employ of either additional boatmen or extra establishment of any kind, as I constantly remained present with the party of surveyors.

And I take pleasure in stating that the agency with which I have the honor to be charged has not essentially increased the expenses of this commission. Upon this subject I beg leave to add that if it should seem fit to place the compensation of the agent upon a footing with other officers of the Board the extra expenses incurred would be amply covered by such compensation—a course that would be the more gratifying because it would enable me to dispense with an account for contingent or extra expenditures, and thus conform to a system that I believe to be the wish of this Board to adopt, which is to confine its extra expenditures exclusively to disbursements necessarily accruing whilst the party is actually employed upon the boundary line in the prosecution of the surveys.

I have been unwillingly led to make any observations upon the subject of my own compensation, but the state of the appropriation for the agent, and the tenor of my appointment recognizing extra expenses to be allowed, have induced me to this explanation.

When I parted with the Commissioner at Black Rock it was his intention to forward the accounts of the past season to me that I might present them at the proper Auditor's office, and they were in preparation for that purpose. I am in daily hope of the receipt of these accounts, and shall hasten to lay them before the Department.

I have, &c.,

JOSEPH DELAFIELD.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Names of persons forming the Board of Commission under the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty of Ghent, on the part of the United States, and of persons employed by them, their services and salaries, for the year 1820.

Peter B. Porter, Commissioner, salary .....	$4,444
Joseph Delafield, acting agent.....
Persons employed by the Commissioners:
Donald Frazer, secretary.....	2,200
William Bird, principal surveyor.....	2,000
James Ferguson, trigonometrical surveyor .....	1,000
L. G. De Russy, trigonometrical surveyor and draughtsman .....	1,000
J. Best, assistant surveyor, three dollars per diem whilst employed, say six months.

Thomas Clinton, steward, charged with purchase and issue of supplies and care of public property. His compensation appears in Commissioner's accounts.

Captain Gillett, master of a light vessel, with a crew of three men, employed for the transportation of the party and stores upon the upper lakes. The crew acting as boatmen when not employed navigating the vessel. Employed about three months.

Nine boatmen, employed in the service of the surveyors and constantly on duty with them. One of the number being the cook for the vessel and the party. These men were engaged by the month, mostly at the rate of thirteen dollars per month, and were employed from the 1st of May to the 20th of October, 1820.

For the wages of the master of the vessel, reference is made to the accounts of the Commissioner.

Persons employed by the acting agent under sixth and seventh articles of the treaty of Ghent, 1820, none.

BLACK ROCK, December 2, 1820.

SIR: The surveying parties under the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty of Ghent returned from Lake Huron to this place the latter part of October, and are now engaged, as has been customary during the winter, in calculating, platting, and arranging the work of the summer. We availed ourselves of the best part of this season to survey the islands (which are numerous and many of them large) in Lake Huron and in the straits of St. Mary's, which unite that lake with Superior. The only surveys that now remain to be executed under the sixth article are on the river and small lake St. Clair, which we calculate to complete in time to make a final decision and report upon the sixth article in the course of the next season.

The execution of the sixth article will have consumed considerable time and expense; but I flatter myself that the maps and surveys which will accompany our report will show that we have not been idle, and that, besides exhibiting a clear and distinct demarcation of the boundary, they will furnish the Government with a mass of the most useful information in respect to a very considerable line of navigation, which is daily and rapidly growing into importance, and for the direction of which there are not at present any charts the accuracy of which can be in the least relied on.

The seventh article relates to a country which is, comparatively, of little importance; and a system of operations is proposed to be adopted for designating the boundary which will greatly reduce both the time and expense of its execution.

I have been gratified in having, during the last season, the assistance of Major Delafield, whose intelligence, habits of business, and correct deportment have rendered him very useful. I hope that he may accompany us again the next season to assist in arranging and preparing the various points for adjudication, and in making out the necessary reports and documents for the respective Governments. The knowledge which, by his former situation, he has acquired of the various subjects connected with the sixth article would probably enable him to be more useful than any other person. It would be my wish, also, should he continue with us, that he should take a general management and superintendence of the operations and expenses of the surveying parties, &c. This was not done by the late agent for reasons which are already known to you.

Major Delafield has expressed a wish, suggested, no doubt, by my presumed knowledge of the duties which he has to perform, that I would give an opinion as to what would be a reasonable compensation for his services. This, however, is a subject on which I do not feel authorized to express an opinion further than to say that I believe the Board of which I am a member has heretofore considered that neither considerations of justice nor of national etiquette required that the compensation of the two agents should be the same. On the contrary, they have been inclined to consider the agents rather as officers of the respective Governments than of the Board, and that their labors, as well as their compensations, might be essentially different, depending upon the instructions they might severally receive, and the arrangements they might make with their respective Governments. I may, perhaps, be permitted to add, that while I presume that Major Delafield has no expectation of receiving the amount of salary allowed to the former agent, yet that the sum of a thousand dollars a year, which he has heretofore received, seems quite too small, when compared with the nature and extent of his services, and when it is considered, too, that six or eight months in the year must be spent in camp in an uninhabited and inhospitable country.

On the subject of the accounts of the late agent (Colonel Hawkins,) Major Delafield, as his agent, has requested that they should be audited and adjusted by the Board, and has intimated that such was the wish of the Government. I informed him, in reply, that the reason for not having originally included the expenses of the agents amongst the common expenses of the Board arose from the circumstance that no British agent was appointed until after the close of the first year of our operations; that doubts were then entertained by the British Commissioner whether one would be appointed, and a consequent unwillingness on his part to share in the payment for services which were rendered exclusively to the American Government. The British Government has, however, since employed an agent, and I have assured Major Delafield that on the final settlement of the accounts next season I will use my endeavors, should it still be the wish of the Government, to have the agents' accounts included, and entertain no doubt but that they may be adjusted in a manner that will be satisfactory and at the same time do justice to the two Governments.

I inclose herewith for Mr. Pleasanton, the Auditor of your Department, transcripts of the accounts of our expenditures for the last three years. The vouchers to which they refer are on file with the secretary of the Board, and will be transmitted to Washington on the closing of the sixth article.

I have, &c.,

PETER B. PORTER.

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 5, 1821.

I communicate to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State which, with the papers accompanying it, contains all the information in possession of the Executive, requested by a resolution of the House of the 4th of December, on the subject of the African slave trade.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, January 4, 1821.. DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 4, 1821.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th ultimo requesting the communication to that House of any correspondence that the President does not deem it inexpedient to disclose, which may have existed between the Executive of the United States and the Government of any of the maritime powers of Europe in relation to the African slave trade, has the honor of submitting copies of the papers requested by the resolution. With the exception of a note from the late Spanish minister, Onis, communicating a copy of the treaty between Spain and Great Britain on this subject, the only Government of Europe with whom there has been such correspondence is that of Great Britain, and these papers contain all that has passed between them on the subject in writing. Since the arrival of Mr. Canning various informal conferences between him and the Secretary of State have been held, in which the proposals on the part of Great Britain have been fully discussed, without effecting a removal of the objections upon which the President had in the first instance found himself under the necessity of declining them. They have not yet terminated, nor have any written communications passed on the subject, with the exception of the note from Mr. Canning and the answer to it herewith submitted, both of a date subsequent to that of the resolution of the House.

SIR: The introduction of negro slaves into America was one of the earliest measures adopted by the august ancestors of the King, my master, for the improvement and prosperity of those vast dominions, very shortly after their discovery. The total inaptitude of the Indians to various useful but painful labors, the result of their ignorance of all the conveniences of life, and the imperfect progress in civil society, made it necessary to have recourse to strong and active laborers for breaking up and cultivating the earth. With the double view of stimulating them to active exertion and of promoting the population of those countries a measure was resorted to by Spain which, although repugnant to her feelings, is not to be considered as having originated the system of slavery, but as having materially alleviated the evils of that which already existed in consequence of the barbarous practice of the Africans upon saving the lives of a considerable portion of the captives in war, whom they formerly put to death. By the introduction of this system the negroes, far from suffering additional evils or being subjected while in a state of slavery to a more painful life than when possessed of freedom in their own country, obtained the inestimable advantage of a knowledge of the true God and of all the benefits attendant on civilization.

The benevolent feelings of the sovereigns of Spain did not, however, at any time permit their subjects to carry on this trade but by special license; and in the years 1789, 1798, and on the 22d of April, 1804, certain limited periods were fixed for the importation of slaves. Although the last term had not expired when his Majesty our lord Don Ferdinand the Seventh was restored to the throne of which a perfidious usurper had attempted to deprive him, his Majesty, on resuming the reins of government, soon perceived that those remote countries had become a prey to civil feuds; and in reflecting on the most effectual means of restoring order and affording them all the encouragement of which they were susceptible, his Majesty discovered that the numbers of the native and free negroes had prodigiously increased under the mild regimen of the Government and the humane treatment of the Spanish slave owners; that the white population had also greatly increased; that the climate is not so noxious to them as it was before the lands were cleared; and, finally, that the advantages resulting to the inhabitants of Africa in being transported to cultivated countries are no longer so decided and exclusive since England and the United States have engaged in the noble undertaking of civilizing them in their native country.

All these considerations combining with the desire entertained by his Majesty of co-operating with the powers of Europe in putting an end to this traffic, which, if indefinitely continued, might involve them all in the most serious evils, have determined his Majesty to conclude a treaty with the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland by which the abolition of the slave trade is stipulated and agreed on, under certain regulations, and I have received his commands to deliver to the President a copy of the same, his Majesty feeling confident that a measure so completely in harmony with the sentiments of this Government and of all the inhabitants of this republic cannot fail to be agreeable to him.

In the discharge of this satisfactory duty I now transmit to you the aforesaid copy of the treaty, which I request you will be pleased to lay before the President, and I have the honor to renew the assurances of my distinguished respect.

God preserve you many years!

LUIS DE ONIS.

WASHINGTON, May 14, 1818.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Rush to the Secretary of State, dated

"You will probably have perceived, by the proceedings in the House of Commons, that treaties have been formed between this Government and both Spain and Portugal securing, as far as may be done by treaty, the final abolition, after a specified time, not very remote, of the slave trade. Thus is a last hand to be put to the work of America, whose legislators led the way, with Europe against them, in this transcendent moral reform. But it is a triumph which as little the courts as the public of Europe seem willing, in any shape, to acknowledge. The palm is claimed by others. America is even placed in fault. In his speech on the Spanish treaty, delivered in the House of Commons on the 8th instant, Lord Castlereagh observed that it was in vain for Britain alone to shut the door of her colonies against the slave trade; for that, unless there was a concert of exclusion, the other islands of the West Indies 'and the southern provinces of the United States would become the asylum and depot of it.' I gladly caught the opportunity of this accidental meeting* to say what could not have been otherwise than acceptable to the zeal for abolition. I stated the nature of our laws. I said I felt sure that he would hear from me with pleasure that it was upwards of nine years since the traffic had been abolished throughout the Union, and that so far had our acts of Congress carried the prohibition that to import even a single slave into any of the States had, during the same period, been denounced as an offence and subjected to unusually rigorous penalties of fine and imprisonment. His lordship admitted the prohibitions, but intimated fears lest we could not enforce them, alluding to the recent state of things at Amelia. In the end he invited me to look into all their conventions with other powers upon this subject, with a view to future conversation, adding that he was well disposed himself to a proper concert of action between our two Governments for the more effectual extirpation of the traffic.

"I shall look into the conventions accordingly, and wait the renewal of the topic. Whether policy would dictate any concert is a point upon which, not being instructed, I will not presume to give any opinion. But I hope I do not misjudge in thinking that, for the present, I am merely bound to listen to, without seeking, any further conversation. I will take care punctually to communicate for the President's information whatever may be said to me, in like manner as my duty devolves it upon me to transmit this first sentiment so cursorily thrown out by Lord Castlereagh. It will be understood that in adverting to our municipal prohibitions I intended no advance to the point of national co-operation. It was barely for the sake of an incidental and gratuitous vindication after a public remark, which, to say no more, was susceptible of unjust interpretations. On his allusion to Amelia island I reminded him that it was the very anxiety to prevent the illicit introduction of slaves that had formed a ruling motive with the President for breaking up, with the public force itself, the establishment at that place."

APRIL 15, 1818

"He (Lord Castlereagh) next spoke of the slave trade. The Government of Great Britain felt, he said, an increasing desire that the Government of the United States should lend itself to the measures of regulation going forward in Europe for its complete extirpation. These measures mean, in effect, a reciprocal submission to the right of search. He explained, by saying that only to a limited number of the armed vessels of each of the maritime States would a power to search be deputed, while the exercise of it would be strictly forbidden to all others. It was contemplated, he continued, to form out of an association of these armed vessels a species of naval police, to be stationed chiefly in the African seas, and from whose harmonious co-operating efforts the best results were anticipated. He added that no peculiar structure or previous appearances in the vessel searched, no presence of irons or other presumptions of criminal intention, nothing but the actual finding of slaves on board was ever to authorize a seizure or detention. He said that they had lately pressed France upon the subject, and that there was no doubt of her eventual agreement. The recent vote in both her Chambers on the broad principle of abolition he regarded as a full pledge of her ulterior steps.

"I replied that I was sure that the President would listen with an ear the most liberal to whatever distinct proposals were made, more especially as the United States had been long awake as well to the moral guilt as to the political and social evils of the traffic, and had, as was known, aimed against it the denunciations of their own laws. The distinct propositions, his lordship gave me reason to think, would be made known before long through Mr. Bagot."

LONDON, June 24, 1818.

"In two former despatches I have mentioned what Lord Castlereagh has said to me relative to the slave trade. In my interview with him on the eleventh of this month he spoke of it in a manner more formal and definitive.

"He first alluded to the late treaties concluded between Great Britain and several of the powers of Europe upon this subject. Entering into conversation upon their particular nature and provisions, he said that the period had arrived when it was the wish of the British Government to invite the Government of the United States to join in the measures which Europe was so generally adopting for the more perfect abolition of this traffic, and that it was now his design to submit through me proposals to this effect. It will be perceived by my despatch, No. 14,* that at that period it had been contemplated to make them through the channel of the English mission at Washington. What may have led to a change in this respect his lordship did not state, nor did I deem it material to inquire.

"It had occurred to him, he said, to make the proposals by sending me, accompanied by an official note, entire copies of all the treaties in question. They would best unfold the grounds and principles upon which a concert of action had already been settled by the States that were parties to them, and it was his intention to ask the accession of the United States upon grounds and principles that were similar. He added, that he would willingly receive my suggestions as to any other course that might strike me as better adapted to the object. I replied that none appeared to me more eligible, and that whenever he would inclose me the treaties I would lose no time in transmitting them for the consideration of the President.

"It naturally occurred to me during our conversation that the detached and distant situation of the United States, if not other causes, might call for a modification in some parts of these instruments, admitting that the broad principle of concert met approbation. His lordship upon this point was full in assurances that the British Government would be happy to listen to whatever modifications the Government of the United States might think fit to propose. Its anxious and only desire, he said, was to see a convention formed that would prove free from all objection, and be conducive to the single and grand object to which both sides looked. He ended by expressing the belief which was felt that the maritime co-operation of the United States would usefully contribute to the advancement of this great work of humanity.

"Nothing further passed necessary to the full understanding of the overture beyond what the documents themselves and his lordship's note are calculated to afford. To these I have therefore the honor to refer, as disclosing in the most authentic and detailed manner the whole views of the British Government upon this interesting subject."

FOREIGN OFFICE, June 20, 1818.

SIR: The distinguished share which the Government of the United States has from the earliest period borne in advancing the cause of abolition, makes the British Government desirous of submitting to their favorable consideration whatever may appear to them calculated to bring about the final accomplishment of this great work of humanity.

The laudable anxiety with which you personally interest yourself in whatever is passing upon this important subject will have led you to perceive that, with the exception of the crown of Portugal, all European States have now either actually prohibited the traffic in slaves to their subjects, or fixed an early period for its cessation, whilst Portugal has also renounced it to the north of the equator. From May, 1820, there will not be a flag which can legally cover this detested traffic to the north of the line, and there is reason to hope that the Portuguese may also ere long be prepared to abandon it to the south of the equator; but so long as some effectual concert is not established amongst the principal maritime powers for preventing their respective flags from being made a cover for an illicit trade, there is too much reason to fear (whatever be the state of the law upon this subject) that the evil will continue to exist, and, in proportion as it assumes a contraband form, that it will be carried on under the most aggravating circumstances of cruelty and desolation.

It is from a deep conviction of this truth, founded upon experience, that the British Government in all its negotiations upon this subject has endeavored to combine a system of alliance for the suppression of this most abusive practice with the engagements which it has succeeded in lately contracting with the Governments of Spain and Portugal for the total or partial abolition of the slave trade. I have now the honor to inclose to you copies of the treaties which have been happily concluded with those powers, together with the acts which have recently passed the Legislature for carrying the same into execution.

I have also the satisfaction to transmit to you a copy of a treaty which has been recently concluded with the King of the Netherlands for the like purpose, though at too late a period in the session to admit of its provisions receiving the sanction of Parliament. I am induced the more particularly to call your attention to this convention, as it contains certain provisions which are calculated to limit in some respects the powers mutually conceded by the former treaties in a manner which, without essentially weakening their force, may render them more acceptable to the contracting parties.

The intimate knowledge which you possess of this whole subject renders it unnecessary for me, in requesting you to bring these documents to the observation of your Government, to accompany them with any more detailed explanation. What I have earnestly to beg of you is to bring them under the serious consideration of the President; intimating to him the strong wish of the British Government that the exertions of the two States may be combined upon a somewhat similar principle, in order to put down this great moral disobedience, wherever it may be committed, to the laws of both countries. I am confident this cannot effectually be done except by mutually conceding to each other's ships-of-war a qualified right of search, with a power of detaining the vessels of either State with slaves actually on board.

You will perceive in these conventions a studious and, I trust, a successful attempt to narrow and limit this power within due bounds and to guard it against perversion. If the American Government is disposed to enter into a similar concert, and can suggest any further regulations the better to obviate abuse, this Government will be most ready to listen to any suggestion of this nature, their only object being to contribute by every effort in their power to put an end to this disgraceful traffic.

I have the honor to be, with great truth, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

CASTLEREAGH.

---

LONDON, June 23, 1818.

MY LORD: I have been honored with your lordship's note of the twentieth of this month, inclosing copies of treaties recently concluded between this Government and the Governments of Portugal, Spain, and the Netherlands, respectively, in relation to the slave trade, and designed to draw the attention of the Government of the United States to this subject, with a view to its co-operation upon principles similar to those held out in these treaties, in measures that may tend to the more complete and universal abolition of the traffic.

The United States, from an early day of their history, have regarded with deep and uniform abhorrence the existence of a traffic attended by such complications of misery and guilt. Its transcendent evils roused throughout all ranks a corresponding zeal for their extirpation. One step followed another until humanity triumphed; and against its continuance under any shape, by its own citizens, the most absolute prohibitions of their code have, for a period of more than ten years, been rigorously and, it is hoped, beneficially levelled. Your lordship will pardon me this allusion to the earnest efforts of the United States to put down the traffic within their own limits, falling in, as it merely does, with the tribute which you have been pleased to pay to their early exertions in helping to dry up this prolific source of human woe.

Whether any causes may throw obstacles in the way of their uniting in that concert of external measures in which Europe generally and this nation in particular are now so happily engaged the more effectually to banish from the world this great enormity, I dare not, in the total absence of all instructions, presume to intimate, much less have I any opinion of my own to offer upon a subject so full of delicacy and interest. But it is still left to me to say that I shall perform a duty peculiarly gratifying in transmitting, by the earliest opportunities, copies of your lordship's note, with the documents which accompanied it, to my Government, and I sufficiently know the permanent sensibility which pervades all its councils upon this subject to promise that the overture which the former embraces will receive from the President the full and anxious consideration due to its importance, and, above all, to the enlarged philanthropy on the part of this Government by which it has been dictated.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, your lordship's obedient faithful servant,
RICHARD RUSH.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Messrs. Gallatin and Rush, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 2, 1818.

“The President desires that you would make known to the British Government his sensibility to the friendly spirit of confidence with which the treaties lately contracted by Great Britain with Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands, and the legislative measures of Parliament founded upon them, have been communicated to this Government, and the invitation to the United States to join in the same or similar arrangements, has been given. He wishes you also to give the strongest assurances that the solicitude of the United States for the accomplishment of the common object, the total and final abolition of that odious traffic, continues with all the earnestness which has so long and so steadily distinguished the course of their policy in relation to it. As an evidence of this earnestness, he requests you to communicate to them a copy of the act of Congress of the last session, in addition to the act of 1807, to prohibit the importation of slaves into the United States, (acts of the last session, chapter 86, page 81,) and to declare the readiness of this Government, within their constitutional powers, to adopt any further measures which experience may prove to be necessary for the purpose of obtaining so desirable an end.

“But you will observe that, in examining the provisions of the treaties communicated by Lord Castlereagh, all their essential articles appear to be of a character not adaptable to the institutions or to the circumstances of the United States.

“The power agreed to be reciprocally given to the officers of the ships-of-war of either party to enter, search, capture, and carry into port for adjudication, the merchant vessels of the other, however qualified and restricted, is most essentially connected with the institution by each treaty of two mixed courts, one of which to reside in the external or colonial possessions of each of the two parties, respectively. This part of the system is indispensable to give it that character of reciprocity without which the right granted to the armed ships of one nation to search the merchant vessels of another would be rather a mark of vassalage than of independence. But to this part of the system the United States, having no colonies either on the coast of Africa or in the West Indies, cannot give effect.

"You will add, that by the Constitution of the United States it is provided the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in a Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. It provides that the judges of these courts shall hold their offices during good behavior, and that they shall be removable by impeachment and conviction of crimes or misdemeanors. There may be some doubt whether the power of the Government of the United States is competent to institute a court for carrying into execution their penal statutes beyond the territories of the United States—a court consisting partly of foreign judges not amenable to impeachment for corruption, and deciding upon the statutes of the United States without appeal.

"That the disposal of the negroes found on board the slave-trading vessels which might be condemned by the sentence of these mixed courts cannot be carried into effect by the United States; for if the slaves of a vessel condemned by the mixed court should be delivered over to the Government of the United States as freemen, they could not but by their own consent be employed as servants or free laborers. The condition of the blacks being in this Union regulated by the municipal laws of the separate States, the Government of the United States can neither guaranty their liberty in the States where they could only be received as slaves, nor control them in the States where they would be recognized as free.

"That the admission of a right in the officers of foreign ships-of-war to enter and search the vessels of the United States in time of peace, under any circumstances whatever, would meet with universal repugnance in the public opinion of this country; that there would be no prospect of a ratification, by advice and consent of the Senate, to any stipulation of that nature; that the search by foreign officers, even in time of war, is so obnoxious to the feelings and recollections of this country, that nothing could reconcile them to the extension of it, however qualified or restricted, to a time of peace; and that it would be viewed in a still more aggravated light if, as in the treaty with the Netherlands, connected with a formal admission that even vessels under convoy of ships-of-war of their own nation should be liable to search by the ships-of-war of another.

"You will therefore express the regret of the President that the stipulations in the treaties communicated by Lord Castlereagh are of a character to which the peculiar situation and institutions of the United States do not permit them to accede. The constitutional objection may be the more readily understood by the British cabinet if they are reminded that it was an obstacle proceeding from the same principle which prevented Great Britain from becoming, formally, a party to the Holy Alliance. Neither can they be at a loss to perceive the embarrassment under which we should be placed by receiving cargoes of African negroes and be bound at once to guaranty their liberty and to employ them as servants. Whether they will be as ready to enter into our feelings with regard to the search by foreign navy lieutenants of vessels under convoy of our own navy commanders is, perhaps, of no material importance. The other reasons are presumed to be amply sufficient to convince them that the motives for declining this overture are compatible with an earnest wish that the measures concerted by these treaties may prove successful in extirpating that root of numberless evils, the traffic in human blood, and with the determination to co-operate to the utmost extent of our powers in this great vindication of the sacred rights of humanity."

LONDON, December 21, 1818.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States, has the honor to present his compliments to Lord Castlereagh.

In the note of the 23d of June, which the undersigned had the honor to address to his lordship in answer to his lordship's communication of the twentieth of the same month relative to the slave trade, the undersigned had great pleasure in giving the assurance that he would transmit a copy of that communication to his Government, together with the documents which accompanied it, being copies of treaties entered into on the part of Great Britain with Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands, for the more complete abolition of the odious traffic in slaves. He accordingly lost no time in fulfilling that duty, and has now the honor to inform his lordship of the instructions with which he has been furnished by his Government in reply.

He has been distinctly commanded, in the first place, to make known the sensibility of the President to the friendly spirit of confidence in which these treaties and the legislative measures of Parliament founded upon them have been communicated to the United States, and to the invitation which has been given that they would join in the same or similar arrangements the more effectually to accomplish the beneficent object to which they look. He is further commanded to give the strongest assurances that the solicitude of the United States for the universal extirpation of this traffic continues with all the earnestness which has so long and steadily distinguished the course of their policy in relation to it. Of their general prohibitory law of 1807 it is unnecessary that the undersigned should speak, his lordship being already apprized of its provisions, amongst which the authority to employ the national force as auxiliary to its execution will not have escaped attention. But he has it in charge to make known, as a new pledge of their unremitting and active desire in the cause of abolition, that so lately as the month of April last another act of Congress was passed, by which not only are the citizens and vessels of the United States interdicted from carrying on or being in any way engaged in the trade, but in which also the best precautions that legislative enactments can devise or their penalties enforce are raised up against the introduction into their territories of slaves from abroad, under whatever pretext attempted, and especially from dominions which lie more immediately in their neighborhood. A copy of this act is herewith inclosed for the more particular information of his lordship. That peculiarity in the eighth section which throws upon a defendant the labor of proof as the condition of acquittal, the undersigned persuades himself will be regarded as signally manifesting an anxiety to suppress the hateful offence, departing, as it does, from the analogy of criminal jurisprudence, which so generally requires the independent and positive establishment of guilt as the first step in every public prosecution. To measures of such a character, thus early adopted and sedulously pursued, the undersigned is further commanded to say that the Government of the United States, acting within the pale of its constitutional powers, will always be ready to superadd any others that experience may prove to be necessary for attaining the desirable end in view.

But on examining the provisions of the treaties which your lordship honored the undersigned by communicating, it has appeared to the President that their essential articles are of a character not adapted to the circumstances or to the institutions of the United States.

The powers agreed to be given to the ships-of-war of either party to search, capture, and carry into port for adjudication the merchant vessels of the other, however qualified, is connected with the establishment, by each treaty, of two mixed courts, one of which is to have its seat in the colonial possessions of the parties, respectively. The institution of such tribunals is necessarily regarded as fundamental to the whole arrangement, whilst their peculiar structure is doubtless intended, and would seem to be indispensable towards imparting to it a just reciprocity. But to this part of the system the United States, having no colonies upon the coast of Africa, in the West Indies, or elsewhere, cannot give effect.

Moreover, the powers of government in the United States, whilst they can only be exercised within the grants, are also subject to the restriction of the Federal Constitution. By the latter instrument all judicial power is to be vested in a supreme court and in such other inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. It further provides that the judges of these courts shall hold their offices during good behavior, and be removable on impeachment and conviction of crimes and misdemeanors. There are serious doubts whether, obeying the spirit of these injunctions, the Government of the United States would be competent to appear as party to the institution of a court for carrying into execution their penal statutes in places out of their own territory—a court consisting partly of foreign judges, not liable to impeachment under the authority of the United States, and deciding upon their statutes without appeal.

Again. Obstacles would exist towards giving validity to the disposal of the negroes found on board the slave-trading vessels condemned by the sentence of the mixed courts. If they should be delivered over to the government of the United States as freemen, they could not but by their own consent be employed as servants or free laborers. The condition of negroes and other people of color in the United States being regulated by the municipal laws of the separate States, the Government of the former could neither guaranty their liberty in the States where they could only be received as slaves, nor control them in the States where they would be recognized as free. The provisions of the fifth section of the act of Congress, which the undersigned has the honor to inclose, will be seen to point to this obstacle, and may be taken as still further explanatory of its nature.

These are some of the principal reasons which arrest the assent of the President to the very frank and friendly overture contained in your lordship's communication. Having their foundation in constitutional impediments, the Government of his Britannic Majesty will know how to appreciate their force. It will be seen how compatible they are with the most earnest wishes on the part of the United States that the measures concerted by these treaties may bring about the total downfall of the traffic in human blood, and with their determination to co-operate, to the utmost extent of their constitutional power, towards this great consummation, so imperiously due at the hands of all nations to the past wrongs and sufferings of Africa.

The undersigned prays Lord Castlereagh to accept the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

RICHARD RUSH.

Mr. Rush to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, March 5, 1819.

"Lord Castlereagh sent me, a few days ago, the inclosed printed parliamentary document. It will be found to comprise a variety of interesting papers relating to the slave trade, exhibiting all that has lately been done by the powers of Europe upon the subject, and the actual and precise footing upon which it now stands. Its receipt was the first notice that I had in any shape of the fact of the publication or of there being any intention to publish my notes to this Government of the twenty-third of June and twenty-first of December. It will be seen from one of the papers how unequivocal and animated has been the refusal of France to allow her vessels to be boarded and searched at sea for slaves. Now, there is nothing more evident, as may be collected from my despatch of the fifteenth of last April, than that this is a result which, at that period, Lord Castlereagh did not anticipate. Nevertheless, it would seem, from a passage in his lordship's letter to Lord Bathurst, from Paris, dated the 10th of December, the last paper in the collection, and written subsequently to all the conferences and declarations at Aix la Chapelle, that he still indulges a sanguine expectation that 'the French Government may be brought, at no distant period, to unite their naval exertions with those of the other allied powers for the suppression of the trade.' Some of the evidence furnished by the African Society in London and from Sierra Leone as to the extent in which the trade continues to be unlawfully carried on may probably command attention in the United States.

"What communications may, at any former periods, have been made to the Government of the United States by the Governments of France, Russia, or Prussia, through any channel, either in Europe or at Washington, of their intentions in regard to this naval combination for putting down the traffic, I am not informed. It is impossible to refrain from remarking that to me they remained utterly unknown until I saw them recorded in these pages of a document given to the world by England."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Rush to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, November 10, 1819.

"On the seventh of this month I received a note from Lord Castlereagh, requesting that I would call upon him at his house on the ninth. I waited upon him at the hour appointed.

"His object, he stated, was to say to me that the Government of Great Britain had lost none of its anxiety to see produced among nations a more universal and effective co-operation than had yet been witnessed for the total abolition of the slave trade. It was still carried on, he observed, to an extent that was afflicting. In some respects, as the evidence collected by the African Institution and from other sources would show, the voyages were marked by more than all their original outrages upon humanity. It was the intention of the Prince Regent again to invite the United States to negotiate upon the subject, in the hope, notwithstanding what had heretofore passed, that some practicable mode might still be adopted by which they could consent to become, party to the association for finally extirpating the traffic. That I was aware of the addresses which had been presented to his royal highness by both Houses of Parliament at the close of the last session, for the renewal of negotiations with the Governments both of the United States and France to effectuate this most desirable end; that it was his lordship's design to inclose to me, at an early day, copies of these addresses as a foundation upon which to build in the new endeavor which this Government was now prepared to make. In doing so, his object, however, merely would be that of bespeaking my interposition towards making known to the President the measure contemplated, since it was intended that all further negotiation should be carried on at Washington. This he thought indispensable, after the past failure, as it could not be supposed that I was prepared with any new authority or instructions to resume it upon this side of the water; that the new minister, Mr. Canning, who, his Lordship now informed me, was to sail as early in the spring as practicable, would accordingly have the whole subject in charge, and be prepared to enter upon it on his arrival, under ardent hopes for an auspicious termination to his labors.

"I replied that I would, in the same spirit as before, make known the communication to my Government. I adverted again to the obstacles which the Constitution of the United States interposed to the project, and also to the peculiar and extreme caution with which the momentous question of search mingled with it would be looked at throughout every part of the country. I said that these reasons superadded themselves to that derived from the failure of the attempt already made here to give great propriety, as it struck me, to a change of the scene of negotiation; that if anything could be done, it could be done only, or at all events be done best at Washington. That the President, I was sure, continued to possess all his original sensibility to the importance of the subject, and would entertain any proposals, differently modified, that were submitted, with the same anxious dispositions as ever for a favorable result to their objects.

"The conversation went off by a reference on my part to the Holy League. I remarked that, as the Government of Great Britain had declared that the principles of that league had its entire approbation, although it had not formally become a party to it, so the United States, acting within their constitutional limits, had long and earnestly striven, and would, it might be confidently affirmed, though restrained from going hand in hand with Europe, always continue their efforts in the same beneficent spirit for putting down totally the slave trade. It is well known that the Earl of Liverpool, not longer ago than last February, described in the House of Peers the character of this league, as well as the insurmountable impediment which held back this country from signing it. He distinctly declared that, as the signatures were all in the autograph of the respective sovereigns, England, in point of form, could never accede to it, for it was not consistent with her constitution that the Prince Regent should himself sign such an instrument without the intervention of a responsible minister. Upon my reminding Lord Castlereagh of this declaration, which I was the more ready to do since it was your wish that the illustration should be brought into view, he candidly admitted that we, too, doubtless had our constitutional embarrassments, but he nevertheless hoped that such and all others might, by proper modifications of the plan, be overcome."

Mr. Canning to the Secretary of State.

The undersigned, his Britannic Majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, took an early opportunity, after his arrival in the city of Washington, to inform Mr. Adams that, in pursuance of Lord Castlereagh's note, dated the 11th November, 1819, communicating to Mr. Rush an address of both Houses of Parliament relating to the African slave trade, he was instructed to bring that important question again under the consideration of the American government, in the hope of it being found practicable so to combine the preventive measures of the two countries as materially to accelerate the total extinction of an evil which both have long united in condemning and opposing.

Mr. Adams will find no difficulty in recollecting the several conversations which have passed between him and the undersigned on this subject; he will remember that the last of those conversations, which took place towards the close of October, was terminated with an assurance on his part that the proposals of the English Government would be taken into full deliberation as soon after the meeting of Congress as the state of public business would allow, with a sincere disposition to remove any impediments which appeared at first sight to stand in the way of their acceptance.

An interval of considerable length having elapsed since that period, the undersigned is persuaded that Mr. Adams will shortly be at liberty to communicate the definitive sentiments of his Government on a subject which is of too deep and too general an importance not to engage the attention and benevolent feelings of the United States.

In this persuasion the undersigned conceived it unnecessary on the present occasion to go over the various grounds which formed the matter of his late conversations with Mr. Adams.

Notwithstanding all that has been done on both sides of the Atlantic for the suppression of the African slave trade, it is notorious that an illicit commerce, attended with aggravated sufferings to its unhappy victims, is still carried on, and it is generally acknowledged that a combined system of maritime police can alone afford the means of putting it down with effect.

That concurrence of principle in the condemnation and prohibition of the slave trade which has so honorably distinguished the Parliament of Great Britain and the Congress of the United States seems naturally and unavoidably to lead to a concert of measures between the two Governments the moment that such co-operation is recognized as necessary for the accomplishment of their mutual purpose. It cannot be anticipated that either of the parties, discouraged by such difficulties as are inseparable from all human transactions of any magnitude, will be contented to acquiesce in the continuance of a practice so flagrantly immoral, especially at the present favorable period, when the slave trade is completely abolished to the north of the equator, and countenanced by Portugal alone to the south of that line.

Mr. Adams is fully acquainted with the particular measures recommended by his Majesty's ministers as best calculated, in their opinion, to attain the object which both parties have in view; but he need not be reminded that the English Government is too sincere in the pursuit of that common object to press the adoption of its own proposals, however satisfactory in themselves, to the exclusion of any suggestions equally conducive to the same end, and more agreeable to the institutions or prevailing opinion of other nations.

The undersigned embraces this opportunity to offer Mr. Adams the assurance of his high consideration.
STRATFORD CANNING.

WASHINGTON, December 20, 1820.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Canning.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 30, 1820.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your note of the 20th instant, in reply to which I am directed by the President of the United States to inform you that, conformably to the assurances given you in the conversation to which you refer, the proposals made by your Government to the United States inviting their accession to the arrangements contained in certain treaties with Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands, to which Great Britain is the reciprocal contracting party, have again been taken into the most serious deliberation of the President, with an anxious desire of contributing to the utmost extent of the powers within the competency of this Government, and, by means compatible with its duties to the rights of its own citizens and with the principles of its national independence, to the effectual and final suppression of the African slave trade.

At an earlier period of the communications between the two Governments upon this subject, the President, in manifesting his sensibility to the amicable spirit of confidence with which the measures concerted between Great Britain and some of her European allies had been made known to the United States, and to the free and candid offer of admitting the United States to a participation in these measures, had instructed the minister of the United States residing near your Government to represent the difficulties, resulting as well from certain principles of international law of the deepest and most painful interest to these United States as from limitations of authority prescribed by the people of the United States to the legislative and executive depositaries of the national power, which placed him under the necessity of declining the proposal. It had been stated that a compact giving the power to the naval officers of one nation to search the merchant vessels of another for offenders and offences against the laws of the latter, backed by a further power to seize and carry into a foreign port and there subject to the decision of a tribunal composed of at least one-half foreigners, irresponsible to the supreme corrective tribunal of this Union and not amenable to the control of impeachment for official misdemeanor, was an investment of power over the persons, property, and reputation of the citizens of this country not only unwarranted by any delegation of sovereign power to the national Government, but so adverse to the elementary principles and indispensable securities of individual rights interwoven in all the political institutions of this country, that not even the most unqualified approbation of the ends to which this organization of authority was adapted, nor the most sincere and earnest wish to concur in every suitable expedient for their accomplishment, could reconcile it to the sentiments or the principles of which, in the estimation of the people and Government of the United States, no consideration whatever could justify the transgression.

In the several conferences which, since your arrival here, I have had the honor of holding with you, and in which this subject has been fully and freely discussed between us, the incompetency of the power of this Government to become a party to the institution of tribunals organized like those stipulated in the conventions above noticed, and the incompatibility of such tribunals with the essential character of the constitutional rights guaranteed to every citizen of the Union, has been shown by direct references to the fundamental principles of our Government, in which the supreme unlimited sovereign power is considered as inherent in the whole body of its people, while its delegations are limited and restricted by the terms of the instruments sanctioned by them, under which the powers of legislation, judgment, and execution are administered, and by special indications of the articles in the Constitution of the United States, which expressly prohibit their constituted authorities from erecting any judicial courts by the forms of process belonging to which American citizens should be called to answer for any penal offence without the intervention of a grand jury to accuse and of a jury of trial to decide upon the charge.

But while regretting that the character of the organized means of co-operation for the suppression of the African slave trade proposed by Great Britain did not admit of our concurrence in the adoption of them, the President has been far from the disposition to reject or discountenance the general proposition of concerted co-operation with Great Britain to the accomplishment of the common end, the suppression of the trade. For this purpose armed cruisers of the United States have been for some time kept stationed on the coast which is the scene of this odious traffic, a measure which it is in the contemplation of this Government to continue without intermission. As there are armed British vessels charged with the same duty constantly kept cruising on the same coast, I am directed by the President to propose that instructions, to be concerted between the two Governments with a view to mutual assistance, should be given to the commanders of the vessels respectively assigned to that service; that they may be ordered, whenever the occasion may render it convenient, to cruise in company together, to communicate mutually to each other all information obtained by the one and which may be useful to the execution of the duties of the other, and to give each other every assistance which may be compatible with the performance of their own service and adapted to the end which is the common aim of both parties.

These measures, congenial to the spirit which has so long and so steadily marked the policy of the United States in the vindication of the rights of humanity, will, it is hoped, prove effectual to the purposes for which this co-operation is desired by your Government, and to which this Union will continue to direct its most strenuous and persevering exertions.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

FOREIGN VESSELS ENGAGED IN SMUGGLING THROUGH FLORIDA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 13, 1821.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 11, 1821.

SIR: In obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 20th ultimo, instructing the Secretary of the Treasury "to state to the House, so far as he has information, the number and tonnage of the French ships which have arrived and are expected to arrive in the course of the present year in the river St. Mary's since the 1st of July last; whether their cargoes are intended for the consumption of the United States and to be introduced within the territories of the same in evasion of the laws; and what further provision he deems necessary to be made by law for the more effectual collection of the revenue on the southern frontier," I have the honor to state that two vessels under the French flag have arrived in the river St. Mary's since the 1st day of July, 1820, and that several others were daily expected at the date of the last communications from that port. The tonnage of those vessels has not been ascertained. Their cargoes consist principally of wine and fruit; and no doubt is entertained that they were intended for the consumption of the United States, and to be introduced into their Territories in evasion of the revenue laws.

Information has been recently received, entitled to the highest credit, that it is contemplated by mercantile adventurers of other nations to establish depositories of West India articles and of slaves, especially of those who for the commission of crimes may be sentenced in those islands to transportation, on the rivers St. John's and Apalachicola and other positions upon the coast of East and West Florida, for the purpose of illicitly introducing them into the United States, and of drawing from thence all articles necessary to the support and convenience of the West India colonists.

The uncertainty of the final result of the negotiations which have been carried on for the acquisition of the Floridas is understood to be the sole cause why those establishments have not already been made. Should the convention for the cession of those provinces to the United States be ratified by the King of Spain the intended scene of operation will be changed, without changing or in any degree weakening the motives which originally suggested the idea of such establishments.

The supply of the West India islands from the United States with articles of indispensable necessity without the intervention of American navigation will continue to be the object of unceasing exertion. In the event of the occupation of the Floridas by the United States, the depositories necessary to effect that object will probably be transferred to the uninhabited shores of the Gulf of Mexico west of the boundary of the United States. In that position the object of an establishment of that nature will be more manifest, whilst the facilities it will afford of evading the laws will be less than those now contemplated. It is for the wisdom of Congress to determine how far a permission on the part of a foreign government to make such establishments within its territories for the manifest purpose of evading the laws of the Union and of corrupting its inhabitants, will justify the adoption of measures necessary to repress the evil, but which at the same time may be considered an invasion of the rights of jurisdiction and territory of such nation. It is probable that the establishment of a depot of foreign articles on the uninhabited shores of the Gulf of Mexico, within the territories of Spain, would become the habitual resort of smugglers and pirates, from whence a contraband trade of the worst description would be attempted to be carried on with the United States. The establishment of two or more military posts on the Sabine and on the Red River, and the active and vigilant exertions of the revenue cutters employed in the Gulf of Mexico might, in a great degree, repress the efforts which would be made to introduce from such depot every species of merchandise into the United States, in evasion of the revenue laws. Should such an establishment be attempted, and no extraordinary measure of repression be authorized, it will be indispensably necessary to establish a new collection district, comprehending the rivers, bays, and shores of the western part of Louisiana, and secure by a liberal salary the services of a man of integrity and enterprise to superintend and enforce the execution of the revenue laws within the district.

I remain, with respect, your most obedient servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING THE SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 15, 1821.

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State with the inclosed documents relating to the negotiation for the suppression of the slave trade, which should have accompanied a message on that subject communicated to the House some time since, but which were accidentally omitted.

LONDON, November 19, 1819.

"I received on the 14th instant a note from Lord Castlereagh, dated the 11th, on the subject of the slave trade. The addresses from the House of Commons and House of Lords to the Prince Regent came with it. As the whole purport of this communication has been detailed, beforehand, in my last despatch, I am not aware that any further explanations from me are now requisite.

"The distinct testimony which is borne in both these addresses to the United States, having been first in point of time among the nations of the world to abolish the trade, will be perceived with satisfaction. It is, so far as I know, the first occasion upon which the acknowledgment has been made in any official or authentic manner by any State in Europe.

"It appeared to me prudent to frame an answer of entire conciliation to Lord Castlereagh's note; and I hope that the spirit which it breathes may meet the President's approbation. It bears date on the 16th, and is among the inclosures transmitted herewith."

FOREIGN OFFICE, November 11, 1819.

The undersigned, his Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has the honor to transmit to Mr. Rush, by command of the Prince Regent, copy of addresses which were presented by both Houses of Parliament at the close of the last session to his royal highness, which his royal highness has to request Mr. Rush will lay before the President with an intimation that it is the Prince Regent's earnest desire to enter without delay into discussion with the Government of the United States upon the important subject to which those addresses refer, and in the successful accomplishment of which the common feelings and reputation of both States are equally and deeply involved.

It has occurred to the Prince Regent's Government that the difficulties which have hitherto operated to prevent a common system of concert and prevention as directed against the illicit slave trade between the two Governments could be most satisfactorily examined by selecting Washington for the seat of deliberation. Under this impression the undersigned has delayed to transmit to Mr. Rush the addresses in question till he could accompany them with some proposition to be conveyed to the Government of the United States for giving practical effect to the views of Parliament.

The undersigned having lately had the honor of acquainting Mr. Rush that Mr. Stratford Canning had been selected by the Prince Regent to replace Mr. Bagot as his envoy and minister plenipotentiary in America, and as that gentleman will proceed to his mission early in the spring and will carry with him full instructions on this subject, the undersigned has to request Mr. Rush will invite his Government, on the part of the Prince Regent, to enter, as soon as may be after Mr. Canning's arrival, upon the proposed discussions.

Upon a subject so deeply interesting to humanity the Government of the United States can never require any other impulse than that of its moral principles to awaken it to exertion; but whatever of aid good offices can contribute to smooth the way for an amicable and advantageous proceeding on such a matter the undersigned is convinced will be supplied by Mr. Rush's zeal and enlightened attachment to the success of the great cause which this inquiry involves; and in this view the communication is specially recommended to his personal support and protection.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to renew to Mr. Rush the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

CASTLEREAGH.

MERCURIE, 7 die Julie, 1819.

Resolved, "That an humble address be presented to his royal highness the Prince Regent to assure his royal highness that we acknowledge with becoming thankfulness the zealous and persevering efforts which, in conformity with former addresses of this House, his royal highness has made for accomplishing the total annihilation of the African slave trade by all the foreign powers whose subjects have hitherto been engaged in it.

"That we also congratulate his royal highness on the success with which his efforts have been already attended; that guilty traffic having been declared by the concurrent voice of all the great powers of Europe, assembled in congress, to be repugnant to the principles of humanity and of universal morality.

"That consequently, on this declaration, all the States whose subjects were formerly concerned in this criminal traffic have since prohibited it, the greater part absolutely and entirely; some for a time, particularly on that part of the coast of Africa only which is to the north of the line; of the two States which still tolerate the traffic, one will soon cease to be thus distinguished, the period which Spain has solemnly fixed for the total abolition of the trade being near at hand; one power alone has hitherto forborne to specify any period when the traffic shall be absolutely abandoned.

"That the United States of America were honorably distinguished as the first which pronounced the condemnation of this guilty traffic, and that they have since successively passed various laws for carrying their prohibition into effect; that, nevertheless, we cannot but hear with feelings of deep regret that, notwithstanding the strong condemnation of the crime by all the great powers of Europe and by the United States of America, there is reason to fear that the measures which have been hitherto adopted for actually suppressing these crimes are not yet adequate to their purpose.

"That we never, however, can admit the persuasion that so great and generous a people as that of France, which has condemned this guilty commerce in the strongest terms, will be less earnest than ourselves to wipe away so foul a blot on the character of a Christian people.

"That we are, if possible, still less willing to admit such a supposition in the instance of the United States, a people derived originally from the same common stock with ourselves, and favored, like ourselves, in a degree hitherto perhaps unequalled in the history of the world, with the enjoyment of religious and civil liberty and all their attendant blessings.

"That the consciousness that the Government of this country was originally instrumental in leading the Americans into this criminal course must naturally prompt us to call on them the more importunately to join us in endeavoring to put an end to the evils of which it is productive.

"That we also conceive that the establishment of some concert and co-operation in the measures to be taken by the different powers for the execution of their common purpose may, in various respects, be of great practical utility, and that, under the impression of this persuasion, several of the European States have already entered into conventional arrangements for seizing vessels engaged in the criminal traffic, and for bringing to punishment those who shall still be guilty of these nefarious practices.

"That we therefore supplicate his royal highness to renew his beneficent endeavors, more especially with the Governments of France and of the United States of America, for the effectual attainment of an object which we all profess equally to have in view; and we cannot but indulge the confident hope that these efforts may yet ere long produce their desired effect; may insure the practical enforcement of principles universally acknowledged to be undeniably just and true, and may obtain for the long afflicted people of Africa the actual termination of their wrongs and miseries, and may destroy forever that fatal barrier which, by obstructing the ordinary course of civilization and social improvement, has so long kept a large portion of the globe in darkness and barbarism, and rendered its connexion with the civilized and Christian nations of the earth a fruitful source only of wretchedness and desolation."

Ordered, "That the said address be presented to his royal highness the Prince Regent by such members of the House as are of his Majesty's most honorable privy council."

"G. DYSON.

"U. D. Dom. Com."

An address precisely similar was voted about the same time and presented, in due course, by the House of Lords.

DIE VENERIS, Julie 9, 1819.

Ordered, Nemine Dissistente, by the lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament assembled, That an humble address, &c.

Resolved, That an humble address be presented to his royal highness the Prince Regent to assure his royal highness that we acknowledge, with becoming thankfulness, the zealous and persevering efforts which, in conformity with former addresses of this House, his royal highness has made for accomplishing the total annihilation of the African slave trade by all the foreign powers whose subjects had hitherto been engaged in it.

That we also congratulate his royal highness on the success with which his efforts have been already attended; that guilty traffic having been declared by the concurrent voice of all the great powers of Europe, assembled in congress, to be repugnant to the principles of humanity and of universal morality.

That consequently, in this declaration, all the States whose subjects were formerly concerned in this criminal traffic have since prohibited it, the greater part absolutely and entirely; some for a time, partially, on that part of the coast of Africa only which is to the north of the line. Of the two States which still tolerate the traffic, one will soon cease to be thus distinguished, the period which Spain has solemnly fixed for the total abolition of the trade being near at hand. One power alone has hitherto forborne to specify any period when the traffic shall be absolutely abandoned.

That the United States of America were honorably distinguished as the first which pronounced the condemnation of this guilty traffic, and that they have since successively passed various laws for carrying their prohibition into effect. That, nevertheless, we cannot but hear with feelings of deep regret that, notwithstanding the strong condemnation of the crime by all the great powers of Europe and by the United States of America, there is reason to fear that the measures which have been hitherto adopted for actually suppressing these crimes are not adequate to their purpose.

That we never, however, can admit the persuasion that so great and generous a people as that of France, which has condemned this guilty commerce in the strongest terms, will be less earnest than ourselves to wipe away so foul a blot in the character of a Christian people.

That we are, if possible, still less willing to admit such a supposition in the instance of the United States, a people derived originally from the same common stock with ourselves, and favored, like ourselves, in a degree hitherto perhaps unequalled in the history of the world, with the enjoyment of civil and religious liberty and all their attendant blessings.

That the consciousness that the Government of this country was originally instrumental in leading the Americans into this criminal course must naturally prompt us to call on them the more importunately to join us in endeavoring to put an entire end to the evils of which it is productive.

That we also conceive that the establishment of some concert and co-operation in the measures to be taken by the different powers for the execution of their common purpose may, in various respects, be of great practical utility; and that, under the impression of this persuasion, several of the European States have already entered into conventional arrangements for seizing vessels engaged in the criminal traffic, and for bringing to punishment those who shall still be guilty of these nefarious practices.

That we therefore supplicate his royal highness to renew his beneficent endeavors, more especially with the Governments of France and of the United States of America, for the effectual attainment of an object which we all profess equally to have in view; and we cannot but indulge the confident hope that these efforts may yet ere long produce their desired effect; may insure the practical enforcement of principles universally acknowledged to be undeniably just and true, and may destroy forever that fatal barrier which, by obstructing the ordinary course of civilization and social improvement, has so long kept a large portion of the globe in darkness and barbarism, and rendered its connexion with the civilized and Christian nations of the earth a fruitful source only of wretchedness and desolation.

Ordered, That the said address be presented to his royal highness the Prince Regent by the lords with white staves.

LONDON, November 16, 1819.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States, has the honor to present his compliments to Lord Castlereagh and to acknowledge the receipt of his note of the 11th of this month.

The copies of the addresses to his royal highness the Prince Regent from both Houses of Parliament, at the close of the last session, respecting the slave trade, which, by command of his royal highness, came inclosed in his lordship's note, with a request that they might be laid before the President, the undersigned will lose no time in transmitting to the Secretary of State with that view. The intimation of its being the earnest desire of the Prince Regent to enter without delay into discussions with the United States upon the important subject to which these addresses refer, and in the successful accomplishment of which the two nations have a common interest, will, the undersigned is persuaded, be met by his Government in the same spirit of elevated benevolence which has given birth to the desire in the mind of his royal highness.

The undersigned cannot avoid expressing his acquiescence in the opinion that the difficulties which have hitherto operated to prevent a system of concert against the illicit slave trade between the two Governments are most likely to be satisfactorily examined by selecting Washington as the seat of deliberation. If, happily, they are of a nature to be removed, it is by such a transfer of the scene of a new endeavor that the best hopes may be formed; and it is hence with a peculiar satisfaction that the undersigned learns that Mr. Canning, when proceeding on his mission to the United States, will carry with him such full instructions upon the whole subject as may prepare him for entering upon the interesting duty of giving effect to the views of Parliament. The undersigned will not fail to make known this intention to his Government by the earliest opportunity that he can command.

Upon a subject so universally interesting to humanity Lord Castlereagh has justly inferred that the Government of the United States can never require any other incentive than that of its own moral impulse to awaken it to exertion. But if upon the present occasion it needed any other, the undersigned must be permitted to say that it would be abundantly found in the friendly and enlarged spirit of this renewed overture from the Government of the Prince Regent, and in the liberal justice rendered to the early and steadfast efforts of the United States in the cause of abolition by the addresses in question from both Houses of the Parliament of this realm. Following up their uniform policy in this great cause, never tired of adopting new expedients of prohibition where new evasions have pointed to their necessity, the undersigned feels happy in being able to state, feeling sure that the information cannot be otherwise than acceptable to the unwearied and useful zeal of his lordship in the same cause, that, besides the law of April, 1818, of which the undersigned had the honor to speak in his note of the twenty-first of December of that year, a subsequent act of Congress, of date so recent as last March, has raised up additional means for the extirpation of the baleful traffic. By this act the President is specially authorized to employ armed vessels of the United States to cruise upon the coasts of Africa, and other new provisions are introduced for intercepting and punishing such delinquent citizens as may be found forgetful of the denunciations of their Government, no less than of their own moral duties, abandoning themselves to the enormity of this transgression. It is well known that the sentiments of the President are in full and active harmony with those of Congress in the beneficent desire of putting a stop to this deep-rooted and afflicting evil. With such pledges before the world, the undersigned cannot err in confidently anticipating that the fresh proposals of the Government of his royal highness will be promptly taken up at Washington under the deepest convictions of their importance, and with every anxious desire for a favorable result that can be made compatible with the Constitution and other interests of the republic.

The undersigned is happy to embrace this occasion of renewing to Lord Castlereagh the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

No. 345.

[2D SESSION.]

BRITISH WEST INDIA AND NORTH AMERICAN COLONIAL TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE FEBRUARY 7, 1821.

[Confidential.]

To the Senate of the United States:

I herewith transmit, in confidence, to the Senate reports from the Secretaries of State and of the Treasury, with the papers containing the correspondence and the information in possession of the Government, the communication of which was requested by the resolution of the Senate of the twenty-third of last month. It is desired that the original letters may, when the Senate shall have no further use for them, be returned.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, February 5, 1821.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 3, 1821.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the Senate of the 23d of January last, requesting a confidential communication of correspondence with the British Government relating to the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British American colonies, and other information in the possession of the Government relative to any infraction of the laws imposing restrictions on those relations, &c., has the honor of submitting to the President sundry papers received at this Department and at the Treasury embraced within the objects of the resolution. The correspondence with the British Government preceding the last session of Congress having been then printed by order of the House of Representatives, a copy of that document is among the papers herewith submitted. Among the manuscript papers are several original letters which it is desirable should be returned when the Senate shall have no further occasion for them.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 30, 1821.

The Secretary of the Treasury, to whom has been referred the resolution of the Senate of the 23d instant, requesting from the President of the United States information relative to the commercial relations between the United States and the British colonies in the West Indies and on the continent of North America, has the honor to submit three letters from Jehu Hollingsworth, now and at the date of those letters a resident of the Island of St. Eustatius.

JUNE 15, 1819.

The schooner Eliza, Captain Lincoln, entered two hundred and fifty chests of tea at the custom-house, from Boston, and cleared out in two or three days for Lubeck with the same cargo on board without landing, save a few chests. She entered at Boston about the 26th or 27th July from St. Eustatius, via St. Andrews; the names of the shippers are unknown to the writer, as well as the port she belongs, but may be discovered at the port she loaded, where her landing certificate must be deposited.

It is impossible smuggling can be done to any extent without the knowledge of the captain or mate, or both. The master of every vessel has to take an oath or affirmation to his citizenship, his chief mate does not; if they were both obliged to do this, and also to swear they would not suffer any smuggling on board or from on board, directly or indirectly, during their command, under the pain of never commanding an American vessel afterwards, besides the penalty of perjury, it would certainly have a tendency to check it. They seldom sail more than two or three voyages together before they quarrel; and if an accomplice in smuggling be pardoned and to receive a share as informer, there would be few masters and mates willing to put themselves in the power of each other.

Something in this way may be worth trying in revising the collection law you speak of. Smuggling will always be done with facility whilst the trade to Bermuda and those places so contiguous to our borders are open to our vessels—Lubeck, Halifax, and Campabello on one side, Bermuda and the southward on the other, where arrangements are made for that purpose and put in practice in a few hours at one place, and in six or eight days from the other.

The writer of this is certainly placed in a very delicate situation in the character of a merchant to give any particular information relative to the mode and noted places for smuggling, and regrets he is so, because he is well aware of the great disadvantage it is both to the fair trader and the Treasury.

Having had a good deal of conversation with several captains and supercargoes on the subject of smuggling rum, they all say the price in the States is so low if they had to pay the present duty they would be ruined, and that Congress promised to reduce the double duties laid on in the war at the old rates after peace, which they have not done on rum.

You are particularly requested to destroy this paper after you have taken such notes from it as may answer your purpose.

Jehu Hollingsworth to Secretary of the Treasury. (b.)

ST. EUSTATIUS, October 11, 1819.

SIR: Your favor of the 31st July has been duly received and contents noted. I beg you will excuse the liberty I take in offering a few remarks relative to the trade between the United States, the British and French islands, and the four free ports of St. Bart's, St. Eustatius, St. Thomas and Curaçoa, trusting they may be acceptable to you.

I have been thirty-seven years in the West India trade, five of that time I resided in this island, to which place I returned in December last, after an absence of twenty-nine years. I have had a fair opportunity in the course of all this time to observe the various unsuccessful attempts on the part of the United States and the British and French Governments to regulate the trade to their islands in American vessels. Since my arrival here I have three times visited St. Kitt's, Nevis, and Antigua, for the double purpose of information and business; the result is, I am satisfied that it is quite in the power of Congress to put the struggle at rest in a summary way, perfectly satisfactory to our merchants and more profitable to the Treasury, by placing the British and French islands exactly on a footing; they are both in the habit of opening their ports to our vessels to suit their own convenience for such supplies as they may be in want of, and pay for the same in such articles as they see fit. It is impossible they can be made to feel the want of our trade whilst our vessels are only allowed to go there under such circumstances. I am confident that something like the following will fix a settled trade for American vessels to the four free ports above mentioned, which would be to stop the intercourse of American vessels and all vessels belonging to such islands and ports to which the Americans are not allowed to trade exactly on the same terms with their own, at the time of passing this act, unless special permission be given by the President in case any ports should be opened or other unforeseen occurrences in his judgment to make it necessary.

Should Bermuda, Halifax, &c., &c., be closed, the British Government would be obliged to open New Providence for the supply of Jamaica; the American vessels will then have the carrying trade of all her produce to their very doors and theirs back in return.

Whilst I was in Antigua, in February last, a circular came out, dated December 3, 1818, to the collectors of the British islands, ordering them to stop the exportation of all their produce to any foreign free port, save rum; this was done to foster their own carrying trade to Bermuda, Halifax, &c. The consequence is, that the American traders to those free ports can get nothing in return but rum, which has had a tendency to introduce so much of that article into the States that heavy losses are sustained.

As it respects the French islands, they prohibit, in American vessels, the importation of everything except lumber and codfish, and allow them to take away nothing but molasses, whilst their European and island vessels are permitted to bring out to them every other supply from the United States. I am told that an act was passed in Martinique, on the 9th of November, 1818, that in six months after date all foreigners should cease business, and not even be allowed to wind up their own concerns.

I have just received the inclosed proclamation, opening St. Kitt's and Nevis for six months, and am informed that they are apprehensive that Congress will stop our vessels from going there; I should not regret to see that one of the first acts; they cannot suffer for the want of supplies, as they are to be had in abundance at the free ports, this island being only nine miles from St. Kitt's and thirty from Nevis.

With a tender of my services when I can be useful, I am, respectfully, your humble servant,

JEHU HOLLINGSWORTH.

HON. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

Same to same. (c.)

ST. EUSTATIUS, November 4, 1819.

I did myself this pleasure on the 11th ultimo, to which I beg leave to refer.

Since then there has been another hurricane at Barbadoes, with a slight touch at St. Vincent's, Grenada, and Tobago, where I am informed it has destroyed much of their ground provisions. Within a few days the British man-of-war brig Fly came down to St. Kitt's, where she met an American schooner laying off and on, flour laden, with a few barrels of herrings. The captain of the Fly gave the American captain liberty to go to Barbadoes with the flour, to which place he proceeded after throwing overboard his herrings.

You may rely upon it those islanders never can be made to feel the want of our trade whilst our vessels are allowed to supply them under any circumstances whatever [save] on equal terms with their own, throughout the whole West India islands. The French European and island vessels bring out more of those articles from America than our vessels are not allowed to take there than they can consume, and have been here and at several other islands with their surplus flour. The Spanish islands lay on a duty of near $10 per barrel on flour, whilst their own vessels pay but $2.

I am certain if Bermuda, Halifax, &c., were closed against our own vessels it would revive our commerce beyond anything our Government can conceive. Some of the British West India ships proceed from Europe to Halifax, St. John's, Quebec, &c., with as many passengers as they can stow, from whence the passengers have to pay a second passage to the States, the expense of which they are kept ignorant of, and by that means land on our shores penniless; the said ships return from these places to the West Indies laden with flour, corn, corn meal, peas, &c., (which our coasters are allowed to take there for them,) and fill up with lumber, codfish, and all sorts of pickled fish, and from the West Indies home, which gives them three freights.

Our vessels are limited to only one passenger to five tons. I presume nothing can in the reach of our Government so effectually foil them in all this as that of making a sweeping law; stop them from coming and our vessels from going to and from all ports and places that are not open to our trade exactly on the same terms with their own. None of them can in justice complain; they will be then all on the same footing, and perhaps there never was a more favorable time for this measure than the present. I am well aware this measure would make a great noise to the eastward, particularly in the coasting interest, because it will spoil some of their sport in that quarter; but if the President sees fit to recommend the measure it will go down in Congress, and will be one of the best commercial arrangements for our country that has been adopted for some time. You will perceive the stopping of our trade along shore will completely break up their treble freighting from Europe and the carrying trade for their West India islands; it will give our European vessels a better chance and our small vessels the carrying trade to the present four free ports. This measure may and probably will have a tendency to open New Providence for the supply of Jamaica, or resort to Curaçoa.

Should you think well of this measure, Mr. Horsey, Mr. McLean, and Mr. Seargent, members of Congress, I believe, have some knowledge of the character of the writer, to whom you are respectfully referred.

I am, with much esteem, yours very truly,

JEHU HOLLINGSWORTH.

HON. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of the Treasury.

Same to same (d.)

ST. EUSTATIUS, May 24, 1820.

SIR: I did myself this pleasure on the 11th of October and the 4th of November last. Since then I have not heard from you; but seeing a bill reported to Congress by the Committee on Commerce relative to the trade between the United States and the West Indies, I am encouraged to address you again on the subject. I observed to you in my letter of the 11th of October, 1819, that I was satisfied it was quite in the power of Congress to put the struggle at rest perfectly satisfactorily to our merchants and more profitably to the Treasury. Should that bill pass, and it be agreeable to you, I will give you my ideas of the measures necessary to be adopted by our Government in the West Indies, which I think will effectually put a stop to smuggling along our coast and outports without any extra expense to them, though this certainly could be better done by a personal interview, and I would willingly make a sacrifice of six or seven weeks of my time could I meet with a comfortable vessel going to your neighborhood that would return here again about that time. If I thought such a visit would promote the views of Government and our trade I should not regret the expense and trouble. The bill is well as far as it goes; but from the experience I have had since my residence here (not being an idle spectator) I am certain it is time the United States should take her stand in relation to her trade in this quarter; no half-way measures will answer this purpose.

I know you are aware of much smuggling and abuse in trade from the West Indies, and I know of but one way to stop it, and the sooner this is done the better, because it is the fair traders that support Government, and Government is bound to support them. Let any unprincipled men taste the sweets of smuggling forty or fifty hogsheads of rum at a saving of from forty-five to fifty dollars the passage, and you will find it difficult to stop them in the States; it can only be done here. It was to this measure I alluded in my letter of the 11th of October, 1819.

ST. EUSTATIUS, May 30, 1820.

SIR: The foregoing is a copy of my respects of the 24th instant, per brig Two Brothers, Captain Laws, via Philadelphia, all of which I now confirm.

In that letter I stated my willingness to go to Washington for the purpose of having a personal interview with you relative to the trade with those islands. If you deem such a measure necessary, I foresee a visit to St. Bartholomew, St. Thomas, and Curaçoa will be indispensable, as I wish to bring with me all the information I can get to enable me to lay before you the ideas I have in view with more certainty, because, if the bill reported to Congress should become a law, our trade in this quarter will be limited and require immediate attention. It will be the interest as well as sound policy on the part of the United States to be on the best possible terms with the Governors of the four free ports, and I am certain measures may be introduced to answer the purpose of our Government and the Treasury, congenial to both parties, with facility, if well managed here.

I trust you will excuse this liberty; the anxiety I feel in this business will, I hope, be my apology. I cannot help taking deep interest in its fate, as I anticipate great advantage will result to the commerce of our country. Should it be deemed necessary to call me home for a few days, I must beg leave to suggest the propriety of your dropping my sons, Samuel & Thomas G. Hollingsworth, a few lines to that effect, (in confidence, if you choose, as they never require help to keep their secrets.) They have themselves a heavy stake in my hands, as well as others. I am altogether in the commission line. It will be requisite they should send out a suitable person to take charge of my concerns in my absence; there are but few here equal to the trust. I could in that case be off in four or five days—sooner if necessary—with an easy mind.

I am, with much respect, your obedient servant,

JEHU HOLLINGSWORTH.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 27, 1820.

"I have the honor of transmitting herewith a copy of the laws passed at the session of Congress which closed on the 15th instant, among which you will find one (page 116) entitled 'An act supplementary to an act concerning navigation,' which has an important bearing upon our commercial relations with Great Britain.

"The subject to which that act relates has so recently and so fully been discussed between the two Governments that it may be superfluous, though it cannot be unreasonable, to assure the British cabinet, as you are authorized to do, that it was adopted with a spirit in nowise unfriendly to Great Britain; and that if, at any time, the disposition should be felt there to meet this country by arrangements founded on principles of reciprocity, it will be met on the part of the United States with an earnest wish to substitute a system of the most liberal intercourse instead of that of counter-prohibitions, which this act has only rendered complete."

Extract of a letter from Richard Rush, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States at London, to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, July 14, 1820.

"SIR: On the day after receiving your number twenty-four, acknowledged in my last, I addressed a note to Lord Castlereagh requesting an interview, in order that I might proceed to express forthwith the sentiments which the President still continued to cherish in regard to the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British West India islands and North American colonies. He appointed yesterday for me to call upon him.

"I said to him that, after the ample but unfortunately abortive discussions that had taken place between the two Governments upon this subject, it might seem superfluous to recur to it again; but that, nevertheless, I had the instructions of my Government to do so.

"It was merely to reiterate assurances that the supplementary act of Congress, passed on the 15th of May last, for the purpose of rendering more complete the prohibitions which the United States had found it necessary to impose on this intercourse, had been adopted in no unfriendly spirit, but solely with a view to secure to themselves that equal share in the navigation called for by this trade which a just reciprocity was thought to dictate; and that whenever a disposition was manifested here to allow this object to be secured to us by a commercial arrangement between the two countries, it would be met by the President with a sincere and earnest wish to substitute a system of the most liberal intercourse in place of the positive interdictions by statute to which we now finally and with reluctance had resorted.

"His lordship replied that no unfriendly temper was inferred by this Government from the measure in question; far from it. It was considered simply as a commercial regulation of our own, adopted to meet theirs, and not incompatible with the relations of harmony existing between the two nations, and which he hoped to see long continue."

LONDON, August 12, 1820.

SIR: To what is stated in my number one hundred and thirty, of the Military Academy at Woolwich, I have it now in my power to add, from information acquired since, that the cadets leave that institution at the age of eighteen; that one hundred and fifty is the greatest number that can be educated at it at one time; that it is the only seminary of military instruction in the kingdom for the artillery and engineers, and that it is found adequate for the supply of officers of this branch of the service in the British army, not only for peace, but when the army is upon its full war establishment.

I mentioned in a former despatch (that of the 15th of June) the peculiar situation of the Queen. All attempts at a compromise have as yet utterly failed, and her case has been transferred from the House of Commons to the House of Lords. Before the latter body it is expected to be definitively brought on the 17th of this month. There has been no abatement in the heats which it has produced. The proceedings have taken the shape of a bill of pains and penalties which a committee of the Lords reported against her, and it is under the allegations of this bill that she is to be put upon her trial. Its provisions go to deprive her of all her titles, rights, and prerogatives as Queen Consort of the realm, and to dissolve the marriage between herself and the King. The specific charge laid against her, as worthy to draw down this doom, is the having carried on, while out of the kingdom, an adulterous intercourse with one Bartholomew Bergami, an Italian whom she took into her service and advanced to a high station in her household.

Whatever may have been the degree of criminality in the Queen, the nature of the proceedings against her has been strongly objected to. A fundamental rule of British jurisprudence dictates in theory, and for the most part it is so in fact, a complete separation of the legislative and judicial powers. They are wholly confounded in bills of pains and penalties in like manner as in acts of attainder and confiscation, and the recollections of past history in this country make known that they have usually been the concomitants of fierce and arbitrary times. Thus there are those who, while professing to believe that the conduct of the Queen will prove, on investigation, to have been marked by serious aberrations, protest zealously against the course adopted by her accusers. They say that it is unjust in itself, that it oversteps all the ordinary barriers of the law, and is wounding to the constitution. No subject can obtain a divorce for the cause mentioned in this bill without allowing to the wife the privilege of recrimination, if she choose to avail herself of such a defence. The Queen is cut off from it. She has been refused a list of the witnesses to be produced against her, as well as any specification of the place or places where or of the time when the imputed offence was committed. All parts of continental Europe which she has visited, and that during a space of six years, are left open to her prosecutors on both these material heads of accusation. These things are thought to wear an aspect of harshness. On the other hand, after the trial has actually commenced it is understood that it is not to be unduly hurried to her disadvantage; and that when the testimony against her is closed, she is to be allowed such interval of time as may be deemed reasonable to take her measures for repelling it.

When the bill was reported in the House of Peers Earl Grey declared that their lordships, in consenting to act upon it, had placed themselves, for all that concerned the Queen's hopes of justice and their own responsibilities, in the three-fold and awful situation of legislators, prosecutors, and judges. The debates which were had upon it in the House of Commons were marked by peculiar point and animation. Not to be prolix in recapitulating them, the quotation of a single passage may serve as a sample of their character and also of the boldness of speech which prevails in this body. One of the members, Mr. Bennet, alluding to what had been called, in the course of the debate, the "vindictive feelings" of his Majesty towards the Queen, and to the former having lent himself to an accommodation respecting her alleged adulteries, said, in explicit words, that no sovereign had ever been so publicly degraded. The same member cautioned ministers against going on with a proceeding at the consequences of which the boldest mind might shudder.

Upon the whole, whilst I think that it belongs to the genius of this people to exaggerate the incidents of political evil as they do those of political good, yet this question relative to the Queen is, without doubt, one of great difficulty, and, according to present appearances, perhaps also of some peril. Should she be degraded and the King embrace the option that will then be open to him of another marriage, and issue spring from that marriage, there are not wanting those who carry their apprehensions so far as to imagine that the very succession to the monarchy may become ultimately endangered; for succeeding Parliaments have often been known to undo the acts of prior Parliaments passed in violation of the received and popular notions of constitutional right, and because not only the immediate brothers of the King but those who are to descend from them will have the great stake of a throne in the inculcation of this doctrine.

The session of Parliament may be considered as at an end. It has stood adjourned since the middle of last month, and although to meet again on the seventeenth of this, it is not supposed that any further business will be done beyond that which relates to the Queen. Her case, up to the present period, has occupied so much of the time of both Houses that all other proceedings have been diminished in amount and abridged in their general interest. The coronation itself has been postponed, not avowedly but obviously, upon this ground. Nevertheless, there is parliamentary matter, whether in the shape of official acts or authentic discussions, still left for notice. Upon some portion of this, sheltering myself under a practice heretofore not disapproved of in me, I shall again presume to touch, selecting such heads as may serve to denote the current condition of this country in a few of the more prominent features of its industry, power, or wealth, or be at all capable of bearing upon any interests or institutions of our own.

Commerce and shipping seem first to attract attention. There is nothing that can divert Great Britain from these momentous branches of her policy. It was one of the maxims of Sir Walter Raleigh, to which Hume has added his sanction by quoting it, that "whosoever commands the sea, commands the trade of the world; whosoever commands the trade of the world, commands the riches of the world, and, consequently, the world itself." England never for one single instant loses sight of this maxim. Notwithstanding all the causes that have been operating since the peace of Europe to depress foreign and domestic commerce, it appears that the tonnage of the United Kingdom keeps up at above two millions six hundred thousand. This enormous amount is distributed throughout twenty-five thousand vessels, the navigation of which calls for one hundred and seventy thousand seamen.

A committee of the House of Lords, charged with an examination into the business of foreign trade, stated, among other things, in their report, that it had been ascertained from sufficient sources that British vessels were able to enter successfully at the present time into competition as carriers with those of any other nation; that is, in other words, that they are now navigated upon terms more cheap and advantageous than those of any other nation. Upon this position the only comment I will offer is, that, as regards the United States, I imagine that it is not warranted by the fact. I know, from recent correspondence with our consuls, that so far as the direct trade between the United States and Britain is concerned, our vessels continue to have the decided preference inwards and outwards. If I were to say in the proportion of ten to one, I do not think that it would go beyond the truth. It being known that the duties upon the vessels of the two countries are equal, this would seem sufficiently to demonstrate the continuance of our superiority as carriers.

It may be worth while to pause a moment upon the very large proportion of British shipping which it appeared was last year engaged in the trade to her North American colonies. It amounted to fifteen hundred and twenty-five ships, making more than three hundred and forty thousand tons, and giving employ to nearly eighteen thousand seamen. This trade, now become so important to the maritime interests of Britain, and which is confined almost exclusively to the carrying of timber, has doubled itself within the last three years. The tonnage employed between Britain and her West India islands is computed at full two hundred and twenty-six thousand. Thus the extraordinary and awakening fact is set before us that nearly one-fourth part of the whole tonnage of this empire, and much more than a fourth of its foreign tonnage, is employed in sailing over the American seas.

Besides the importance which these colonies of Britain have assumed as auxiliary to her maritime power, it is known that they are also mainly looked to for the support of her West Indies; and it is the latter, in turn, which keep alive in its most beneficial branches her trade with South America. The rapid increase of the trade with the North American colonies is solely owing to the heavy duty with which timber coming from all other places is burdened. It may be proper to mention that Lord Liverpool declared, in debate, that the merchants engaged in this trade would have no claim to the exclusive indulgences which they enjoyed (those arising out of a comparative exemption from duty) longer than 1821, there having been a former understanding with the Board of Trade to that effect. But he did not go so far as to assert positively that they would not be renewed. An act was passed, in July, for authorizing the importation of timber from these colonies for naval purposes entirely free of all duty whatever.

The trade of China and the East Indies did not escape attention in the inquiries into commercial subjects. The footing of our flag in those seas has long attracted the zealous notice of the merchants of this nation. There are constantly new proofs occurring that a trade fettered by monopolies can hold no way with a trade that is free. Great Britain has received a lesson upon this point, in reference to her trade with the East Indies, which adds new force to those which we have taught her. It is a fact that the importations into this country from those regions during the last year by her free traders transcended in amount the transportations by her East India Company. It was only in 1815 that the former commenced their competition, and already it has reached this result. They are styled free traders, moreover, only as descriptive of their partial exemption from restraints; for, as yet, successful as have been their endeavors, they have maintained them under the disadvantage of being limited to ships of a particular size as well as to certain defined ports. From the trade to China it is known that the English free traders are still altogether excluded. An American ship can sail without impediment from the river Thames as well as from the Delaware or Hudson for Canton, and return again, not indeed to London, but to Amsterdam, for instance, and there sell her cargo. No private English ship is yet permitted to embark in such a voyage.

I have in former communications dwelt upon the evident anxiety of this country to check our progress in this growing trade, and especially as it has of late been carried on by us among the Asiatic islands and along the path of the Pacific ocean. I have, during my residence in this capital, witnessed the progress of opinion upon this subject, and now we are upon the eve of seeing opinion followed up by counteracting measures. Lord Liverpool declared in the House of Lords that it was in contemplation by ministers to open a direct trade for the benefit of British merchants between India and any part of Europe, Asia, Africa, or America, without the intervention of the company. Malta, he said, had formerly been a sort of depot for this purpose; but under the altered circumstances of this commerce (meaning the success of the Americans, as the English have no other rivals in it) he had now no scruple in saying that any articles that could be imported from India in British ships ought not to be conveyed either through Malta or Great Britain, but be carried directly to any other place. Thus is likely to fall to pieces at last the monopoly to India, which began so far back that I cannot recollect when; I believe in the time of Elizabeth. The monopoly to China, it may be confidently affirmed, will be the next in order to fall.

His lordship declared on this same occasion, whilst discussing the transit trade generally, that he saw no objections to goods coming through this country duty free, or at an impost so low as to be only nominal, with a view of making England henceforth a still greater emporium than she has been of the trade of the world.

I cannot here forbear the remark that the doctrine is rapidly gaining ground among this people that commerce and trade of every description will ultimately flourish best when unshackled. At the moment when a portion of the most enlightened and patriotic citizens of our own country are holding up for our imitation the example of restrictions in this, it seems fit to bring into view that the advocates of restriction here are swerving from their tenets; are beginning to say that England has, in the long run, prospered, not in consequence but in spite of such a system; and that a career of much greater opulence and power is likely to open to her, under its abandonment, provided she can struggle through the dangers with which, as many now begin to say, her very restrictive system itself has at last yoked her. The high duties upon foreign articles imported for use or consumption in the kingdom are, it is true, still kept up; but perhaps less, as is now frequently avowed, with the motive of fostering those made at home than to answer the imperious calls of a revenue made necessary by an overwhelming debt and an extravagant expenditure. That her system of positive prohibition will, at a period not very remote, be abolished, seems to the last degree probable. It will be understood that I rather aim at the duty of transmitting facts and opinions as I find them prevailing, not universally, but more and more in this meridian, than at obtruding any theories of my own on a disputed point of national policy. Perhaps I may add, in further allusion to this subject, that a law has passed removing all restraints upon the exportation from England of gold and silver coin. It will not escape attention that this is at a time when the Government stands pledged to the nation for the early renewal of specie payments.

The imports into the United Kingdom for the last year, calculated at the official rates of valuation, amounted to a fraction more than thirty millions of pounds sterling. The exports for the same period, according to the real and declared value, which stands always at a lower rate than the official value, to a fraction above thirty-five millions. Of this amount the produce and manufactures of the country was in the proportion of four-fifths of the whole. The cotton goods exported amounted to more than sixteen millions, being of about the same value as those manufactured for home use. The cotton manufactures, in 1818, rose as high as forty millions, of which twenty millions were exported. It appeared that the falling off in the exports to the United States for the last three years has been, upon the average, more than three millions sterling each year. Nevertheless, the great and existing importance of our market to the industry of this country may be inferred from the following fact: that of her woolen manufactures for 1819, which were under seven millions sterling, the United States took nearly two millions. The East Indies and China, standing next upon the list, took less than one million; and Germany, which holds the third place, took but half a million.

The finances.—As far as I have been able to follow and can condense, in a word, the statements, to most minds so dark as well as complicated, upon this subject, they exhibit the following result: The whole productive revenue of the three kingdoms amounted during the last year to fifty-four millions of pounds sterling. Great as this sum is, it appears to have been insufficient to meet all the expenses of the Government and keep down the interest upon the debt. Accordingly, a sum of from five to seven millions has been borrowed from contractors; and, as I further understand, the fixed debt has received an addition of seven millions by the recent funding of exchequer bills to that amount. Mr. Wilberforce, talking of the finances, expressed to me once the consolation which he felt from recollecting that the property tax always remained as a resource for Great Britain in a day of extremity. "We have borne it," said he, "heretofore, and can again; and we know that we have in it a clear addition of fifteen millions to our income whenever the chancellor of the exchequer chooses to call it up."

The navy.—This is a subject to which England is ever awake. To other nations, however thoughtless they may now be under it, it is surely also a fearful subject. Let the following declaration of a whig member of Parliament, and a constant advocate of economy and retrenchment, be taken in support of this remark: Mr. Hume, while urging upon the floor of the House of Commons the necessity of a reduction of the naval force, observed that he did not wish any hasty reduction. He only wished a reduction to that point which would leave England in possession of twice as many ships-of-war as could be sent forth by the combined efforts of the whole world!

This is an opinion in unison with that of every individual in the country, of whatever party he may be. It is also in unison with the present fact. It appeared from the statements that the navy of Britain consists of six hundred ships, of which number more than ninety are at sea or otherwise employed. The appropriations for building and repairing for the year 1820 amounted to one million five hundred and ninety-four thousand four hundred and eighty pounds. I mention this sum the rather because it exceeds the appropriation of any former year, either of peace or war, in the whole annals of the country, so far as I can hunt up the information. In 1798, when the nation was in the midst of her belligerent exertions upon the ocean, and fighting, as she used to say, for her existence, though it is plain that she was even then fighting for the annihilation of all the other navies of the world, it was but about one-fifth of this sum. Twenty-three thousand seamen were voted for 1820, inclusive of eight thousand marines. Upwards of six millions sterling was the appropriation to cover the entire naval expenditure of the year. Notwithstanding the number of ships, it was stated by the Earl of Darnley, in the House of Peers, that there are none answering to the description of the frigates of the United States of the first class, all being too large or too light to cope with them. The best sort of ship, he said, was that which bore the largest force in the smallest compass. Lord Melville, in reply, did not controvert the statement. He said that a motive of wise economy had restrained them from building ships of the class to which there had been allusion, it having been found cheaper, as well as in all respects more expedient, to repair in an efficient and durable manner ships already built than to build new ones. Yet, in point of fact, they have built new frigates, and are now building some, not of the exact size, but larger than ours. Should the day of conflict between us again come about, and these ships (being single deckers like our own) be matched against ours, England, who has a thousand tongues to our one, would insist upon it, if successful, that we had been vanquished in equal combat. I may be excused the single digression of remarking that the English historians themselves, in describing the great sea fights with the Dutch in the time of Cromwell and Charles the Second, admit the superiority in size and strength of their own ships over those of the Dutch. The coolness of history may make these admissions, but the gratified enthusiasm of the day will not. We here see that a part of the lasting renown in arms of this nation, where the ocean was the field, hinged, after all, (when we recollect the obstinacy and bloody character of those battles,) upon the size and construction of her ships as compared with those of her enemies; a fact of history that may bear being adverted to by a nation looking to great maritime destinies, and now engaged in the important work of fixing the foundations of her marine.

I understand that at present every vessel of the British navy is built or repaired under cover. I also understand it to be agreed that exposure to atmospheric air is the true remedy for dry rot. Hence their vessels, when laid up in ordinary, are now aired by means of removing the planks. I have myself observed them lying in the Thames, off Deptford, with a couple of the planks stripped off from stem to stern, immediately above the water line, in order to expose them as much as possible to the action of this remedy. The opinion here is, that ships laid up in ordinary under this kind of exposure grow better instead of worse; the excellence and durability of the hulls increasing, as far as the experiments have yet gone, in proportion to the time they remain. I will leave this head, upon which I fear that I may have been tedious, by stating as a fact, to show the anxiety with which this Government prosecutes improvements in its marine, that, besides the emoluments of a profitable office conferred upon him, Sir Robert Seppings has received a grant of five thousand pounds sterling from the House of Commons for the supposed improvements of which he has, within the last few years, been the author.

The army.—The appropriations for the support of the army were between six and seven millions, or about the same as for the navy. "How does it happen," said the chancellor of the exchequer to me one day, "that your army in the United States, which does not exceed ten thousand men, should cost annually the same sum in dollars that ours, which consists of very nearly an hundred thousand men, does in pounds sterling?" whilst the British, as he added, was by far the most expensive army in all Europe; fully six times more so than the Russian, which was the cheapest, and twice as much so as the Dutch, which, next to the British, was the dearest. Two answers were given. The one he supplied himself, viz: the greater proportion of artillery which our army contained, being about three thousand, whilst that for the whole British army in time of peace did not exceed seven thousand. The other was the more familiar one of the comparative dearness of all labor in the United States, and consequently of military labor. He thought that these causes would go some length towards the explanation, but that they would not account for the whole disparity. I was not well enough acquainted with the organization of our army, and all the disbursements that grow out of it, to assign, at the moment, any other causes. When he spoke of our navy being more expensive than theirs, though in a far less degree, I mentioned, as one of the reasons, the more complete equipment of our ships. This he did not gainsay, but admitted that heretofore it had certainly been the case.

There was nothing done by Parliament towards the further extirpation of the slave trade. But an incident occurred in connexion with this subject which may deserve a transient notice. It goes to manifest the sensibility of the British public at any proposal for the liberation of their slaves under circumstances that might interfere with the private rights of individuals to this unhappy species of property. On the 5th of July Sir James Macintosh gave notice in the House of Commons that he would, in the course of the next session, move an address to the throne relative to the manumission of slaves in all parts of the British dominions where slavery still existed. The bare notice of such a motion excited the greatest alarm out of doors. To such an extent did it go that Sir James felt himself obliged to rise on the following day for the purpose of entering into a distinct explanation. He said that it was no general manumission he had contemplated. This would be "a great and dangerous mistake" as to his object. He had only contemplated some alteration in those laws prevailing in the colonies by which the owners of slaves were restricted in the right of voluntary manumission. The public inquietude generally, and especially that in the neighborhood of the West India docks, was, by this explanation, pacified.

The Catholic question, the consideration of the poor laws, the establishment of an extensive system of national education, taken in hand by Mr. Brougham, the state of the criminal jurisprudence, with many other subjects of like general importance, went off until another session, on the express ground of the paramount interest of the discussions respecting the Queen. Contenting myself, therefore, with the summary notices taken of the proceedings, and which I have done in redemption of the promise in my number 123, I find it time to draw to a conclusion.

Regarding the internal condition of the country, I may report that, up to the moment of my writing, it remains relatively tranquil. The taxed and starving manufacturers have for a while lost sight of their own sufferings in their sympathies for the Queen. Her case seems to have given a new direction to the popular uneasiness; stifling for the time being, though not curing, much of other complaints. What more formidable exasperations it may be feeding time must determine.

Abroad the political elements seem to be all gathering. The revolution of Naples has alarmed Austria. We have the most authentic, may I add the most appalling, evidence that that of Spain has drawn down the decided exprobration of Alexander. Whether the European alliance, with Russia leading the way, meditate a crusade against the freedom of nations is becoming an anxious problem. I have no lights to shed upon it. The part that England may intend to act it will be my duty to watch. If the counsels of her cabinet do not become known to me, it will not be for the want of sedulously improving all the opportunities I can command for ascertaining them. I need not add that my earliest information will always be communicated to the Government.

With the greatest respect, I have the honor to remain your obedient servant,

RICHARD RUSH.

HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

Copy of a letter dated St. Bartholomew's, September 30, 1820.

Your esteemed favor of the 20th ultimo has been received, and I have endeavored to meet your wishes, but in the attempt to execute this task am satisfied that I shall completely disappoint the favorable opinion you have been pleased to entertain of my capacity. It is an axiom in politics that all Governments possess the right of making such municipal regulations as may appear most conducive to their interests, without taking into account the inconvenience or even injury they might produce to others; but in exercising this power great circumspection and political sagacity will be found necessary, for as the same weapon may be wielded on the part of others, they may, by countervailing measures, more than counterbalance the benefits that were expected to result from the operation of our own. The late act, however, of the United States Government as applied to the British colonial possessions, particularly their insulated ones, is so plain in its character that there can be but one opinion as to its probable efficacy, for the fact has been substantially verified, not by abstract reasoning or vague supposition, but by fair experiment, founded almost in mathematical demonstration, that they cannot exist without having their wants supplied from the United States either by direct or indirect means. If, therefore, this law shall be vigilantly enforced, and this only for a short period, the British Government must be driven into the necessity of abandoning them, or compelled to invite a commercial treaty with the Government of America on grounds of reciprocity, and have no doubt on my mind that this object was in view when the measure now in force was contemplated. There are some, from want of local information, but more from national prejudice, who think the British islands are partially dependent on the United States; that many articles of present consumption may be dispensed with, or can be readily obtained from Europe or their possessions in Canada and Nova Scotia; and, on the whole, that the United States Government may be laughed at in any attempt to make them subservient to her views. The effects of the embargo acts and that of the non-intercourse law have, however, plainly evidenced that these suppositions are founded in error and have nothing of truth to support them; for notwithstanding the scandalous violation on the part of American individuals of these salutary and justifiable measures, and the shameful cupidity used by them to afford supplies to our enemy, the most severe distress and want were experienced in all their islands, the greater number in this neighborhood being at times but one remove from starvation; flour, breadstuff generally, rice, corn, lumber, tobacco, and other objects of West India consumption, were only to be had in the smallest quantities and at most extravagant prices. The standing prices were, in all the British Windward islands, for a length of time rarely under the following quotations, (which I know from operations at the time,) but not infrequently, as greater scarcity prevailed, these prices were considerably augmented: Flour, $30; corn, $3 per bushel; rice, $12; tobacco,* $50; white pine lumber, $100; red oak staves, $80 to $100; white oak staves,* $120; shingles, the common cypress, $16; and every other item at the same high rates, bearing so dreadfully against their estates that no returns from them could meet their contingencies, and complete destruction must have been the consequence of these acts had they not been abused and violated by our own countrymen. Salted fish from Newfoundland, with beef, pork, and butter from Ireland, were the only articles that were or could be furnished by themselves, and they in no abundant quantity and at very exorbitant rates. These facts prove that the very existence of these islands, French as well as English, is in the hands of the United States, and that whenever our Government pleases it can dictate its own terms in regard to its trade with them, either by insisting on a free, unrestrained intercourse, or punishing the refusal of this favor by measures of retaliation like the one before us. In the operation of this act some imagine that the United States will lose more than what is likely they can gain. Not so in my opinion. On the contrary, it is in every way fraught with public and individual benefit; and this I am satisfied will be substantially proved if it continues any time in force, for the rum and molasses made by the English as well as the French planter must find its way to the United States and be eventually lodged there to the benefit of its revenue. These articles cannot be locked up or sent elsewhere, for the United States is the only mart for them, and either through this or other islands not shackled by restraints they will force a passage to their ultimate end and consumption. These articles also form the only resource by which the planter can find the means of immediate subsistence for himself and slaves and provide for the contingent wants of his estate, for the sugar is under such restraints that it must all be shipped to Europe, and none can be had but what is clandestinely obtained.

I have said that Great Britain, under the present restrictive measure, will either have to abandon her islands or have to surrender to the United States a portion of that political pride of which she is so tenacious. Here, however, I find myself, on reflection, at fault, for as long as these islands (I allude to those belonging to Sweden, Holland, and Denmark) can be used as a medium of intercourse with her own, she will quietly look on, seeing that through them her wants can be supplied, although shackled with additional expenses, particularly as by their means her rum and molasses can be realized in their exchange for objects of supply brought in this indirect way from the United States. In this she will find a most essential accommodation, and without it the consequences I have already pointed out would follow. But in this interchange of commercial matter the United States will enjoy a most decided advantage, for American vessels will be the sole carriers of, in bringing to us and placing in depot here, the produce of its soil, say rice, flour, corn, peas, lumber generally, and a number of other items of West India consumption, to be exchanged for colonial returns, say rum, molasses, sugars,* coffee,* &c., of which again they will be the carriers back, thereby finding double employment and furnishing very handsome means of revenue to their country.

This, according to the sailor phrase, is plain sailing, and must be readily seen by all. I have heard it observed by several that the qualified manner in which this act applies to Bermuda will counteract all that was intended by our Government as bearing on things this way. I think otherwise, for although American vessels are permitted to proceed there with cargoes, they can only bring in return specie or articles the growth and produce of its soil. Now we know that Bermuda produces nothing to be named as objects of exportation, and therefore the spirit of the act extends with as much force against them as against any of their possessions in this neighborhood.

Reasoning from analogy, that is, from the effects of the embargo and non-intercourse acts, and these materially weakened by the cupidity I have mentioned, we can readily calculate on the probable results of this new experiment. I do not for myself believe that any countervailing measures will be adopted by the British Government, but that the islands, already most dreadfully oppressed by their own restraints will be left to work their own salvation. The consequences on this ground will be innocent to both parties, neither having the right to be offended; but, for the plain reasons I have stated, the United States will be the more substantial gainers.

For this poor island†—God put His blessings on it—we may here reap some benefit out of this political collision, for here must be the great storehouse of depot, provided our Governor plays his cards with judgment. Of this we can have no doubt, for he is known to be warmly interested in the success of our commercial operations and will be ready to adopt such measures as will bear against our rivals and be the means of turning matters into this channel. As a motive of policy to effect this end, the custom-house fees‡ should be reduced as low as possible and every encouragement held out to invite the visits of strangers, particularly those engaged in trade. This island enjoys many local advantages which neither Statia nor St. Thomas possess, and with the fostering kindness of its chief, whose virtues are known to all, these advantages may be improved and turned to general benefit. I am satisfied, by a little dexterous management on the part of the Government here, we may secure all the business from windward, that is, in receiving their produce, for it must come here or go to St. Thomas and Statia, and furnishing them with American supplies. This would be giving employment to many now idling time for the want of something to occupy their industry. But I forbear further observations, for you must be sufficiently fatigued with what has been already intruded on you. My only motive for using this freedom was to show you that I was not under the influence of affected modesty, though in fixing this point I have run the hazard of being questioned for my arrogance. I know you will judge me fairly on either of these points. Like yourself, I take a warm interest in the rising honor of our common country, and that its star-spangled banner may wave for ages over it and extend its benign blessings to the remotest parts of the world is the fervent prayer of, dear sir, your most obedient and humble servant.

Extracts of a letter dated St. Bartholomew's, October 14, 1820.

“The probability of this island becoming the depot for the supplies of the adjacent British colonies, and the prospect of commercial advantages which will be derived therefrom, have induced me to establish myself here, and I embraced the first opportunity and leisure moment to communicate to the Hon. Secretary of State all the information I have acquired and, in my opinion, may deserve his notice.”

“The Swedes and Danes will, in some measure, become the carriers of provisions, &c., for the supply of the aforesaid colonies; for since my arrival here more than thirty British vessels have assumed the Swedish flag, and, no doubt, in St. Thomas to a greater extent.

“Most of the British merchants and planters with whom I have conversed assure me that there are immense supplies of provisions accumulated in Bermuda, sufficient to serve them for some time. They also calculate on being supplied by the circuitous route of the mother country, and have attempted to prove to me that the expenses that way will not exceed a direct freight from the United States. That they will receive considerable in that manner cannot be doubted, but by no means to the extent they calculate on. Their necessities now must be great, as the article of flour in Antigua is selling at $12, and corn meal at $40. You may therefore form some idea what will be the situation of the planters three or four months hence.”

ST. MARY'S, September 15, 1820.

DEAR SIR: It may interest you to know that we have a port of entry established on the immediate frontier of East Florida, and at a very eligible situation. The French ship Apollon, Captain Eow, from Havre de Grace, is now moored there, and regularly entered. Not having had a designating name we call it Port St. Joseph, and we expect this name to be approved of by our Governor.

It lies on the west side of Bell's river, (an arm of St. Mary's river,) at Low's plantation on the main, situated about midway between the town of Fernandina and St. Mary's, and a more safe and commodious harbor than either of them; entrance by St. Mary's bar; a good depth of water up Bell's river by the way of the harbor of Fernandina, and up Jolly's river by the way of St. Mary's river as far as Point Peter; very convenient for supplies of fresh provisions from the back country; wood and water, and the latter excellent.

Duties on imports and exports not the growth of the province low, and those laid on very low rates of valuation, and the cargoes admitted by the captain's manifest; products of the province are free of duties; port charges reasonable.

As I promised you in my last letter by mail, I have delivered Captain Hollbrook, of brig Harmony, a large letter for you on the topography of East Florida. It is, I suppose, a fortnight since he has it, and that he has been kept and is still awaiting a termination of the very threatening state of the weather.

I will inform you from time to time how we progress with Port St. Joseph, (it is under my charge,) for if we shall realize our commercial anticipations it may be worth your while to take a stand among us. We have reason for considerable expectations in the French trade, but much more in that of the West Indies. Merchants of Jamaica who are here say that the British restriction on their trade with the Spanish North American colonies can be easily removed or got over once there is an opening this way. They can get hard wood from other places, but yellow pine only from Florida. Nor have we any reason to apprehend the acts of Uncle Sam, for the treaty is the rock we build on, and which supported us during the strong measures of Mr. Jefferson's embargo and non-intercourse and the war with Great Britain. This is but a continuation of the arrangement under which we acted to a vast extent from 1803 to 1815, a long practice and strong precedent.

You must excuse my hurried mode of writing, or I will write you less and take more pains.

Yours, sincerely.

At the moment of closing this letter I was informed that the brig Harmony was in a bad way; as her departure from hence, or her reaching New York, if she sailed, was very questionable, from leakage, I immediately went and got your letter from on board, and have this moment returned from delivering it into the care of Captain E. Ellingswood, of ship Dryade, waiting for a wind. I shall, notwithstanding the new arrangement, hold a residence here as Spanish vice consul.

ST. MARY'S, September 17, 1820.

DEAR SIR: Since putting my other letter to you into this mail it has occurred to me to mention that you might render us much good service by getting into some of your public prints—suppose the "Evening Post"—an extract of some part of my letter, without mentioning names, or such observations on the subject as your better judgment may suggest. Our Government is averse to our meddling openly in the public prints of the United States, but the sooner it is known that we have a port of entry hereabouts the better. I have officially communicated to the collector of this place information of our establishment, in order to prevent embarrassment in the beginning that might grow out of instructions that may have been founded on our not having a port of entry, a copy of which he informs me will go to headquarters by this mail. The sooner this information circulates in the United States the sooner it will get to France, where it may have a great tendency to delay the negotiations on an adjustment of this tonnage quarrel, for I believe that French vessels can now get their cargoes in Florida under these new regulations on better terms than they did in the United States before the one hundred franc act was levied on them. This I say to you, who I consider as more than half a Floridian, and who, I hope, will be ere long participating fully in the privileges of a Spanish citizen. If a cession of Florida should be arranged in the next meeting of Congress, which, by the by, is very questionable, very well; and if not, let us have something else to go on. While we hope for the best let us prepare for the worst.

Yours, sincerely.

16TH CONGRESS.]

No. 346.

[2D SESSION.

SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE—CONFERENCE OF FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS ON THE SUBJECT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES FEBRUARY 9, 1821.

Mr. HEMPHILL, from the Committee to which is referred so much of the President's message as relates to the slave trade, and to which are referred the two messages of the President transmitting, in pursuance of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th of December, a report of the Secretary of State, and inclosed documents, relating to the negotiation for the suppression of the slave trade, reported:

That the committee have deemed it advisable, previous to entering into a consideration of the proposed co-operation to exterminate the slave trade, to take a summary review of the Constitution and laws of the United States relating to this subject. It will disclose the earnestness and zeal with which this nation has been actuated, and the laudable ambition that has animated her councils to take a lead in the reformation of a disgraceful practice, and one which is productive of so much human misery; it will, by displaying the constant anxiety of this nation to suppress the African slave trade, afford ample testimony that she will be the last to persevere in measures wisely digested to effectuate this great and most desirable object, whenever such measures can be adopted in consistency with the leading principles of her local institutions.

In consequence of the existence of slavery in many of the States when British colonies, the habits and means of carrying on industry could not be suddenly changed; and the Constitution of the United States yielded to the provision that the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808.

But long antecedent to this period Congress legislated on the subject wherever its power extended, and endeavored, by a system of rigorous penalties, to suppress this unnatural trade.

The act of Congress of the 22d of March, 1794, contains provisions that no citizen or citizens of the United States, or foreigner, or any other person coming into or residing within the same, shall, for himself or any other person whatsoever, either as master, factor, or owner, build, fit, equip, load, or otherwise prepare any ship or vessel within any port or place of the United States, nor shall cause any ship or vessel to sail from any port or place within the same for the purpose of carrying on any trade or traffic in slaves to any foreign country; or for the purpose of procuring from any foreign kingdom, place, or country the inhabitants of such kingdom, place, or country, to be transported to any foreign country, port, or place whatever, to be sold or disposed of as slaves, under the penalty of the forfeiture of any such vessel, and of the payment of large sums of money by the persons offending against the directions of the act.

By an act of the third of April, 1798, in relation to the Mississippi Territory, to which the constitutional provision did not extend, the introduction of slaves, under severe penalties, was forbidden, and every slave imported contrary to the act was to be entitled to freedom.

By an act of the 10th of May, 1800, the citizens or residents of this country were prohibited from holding any right or property in vessels employed in transporting slaves from one foreign country to another on pain of forfeiting their right of property, and also double the value of that right in money, and double the value of their interest in the slaves; nor were they allowed to serve on board of vessels of the United States employed in the transportation of slaves from one country to another under the punishment of fines and imprisonment, nor were they permitted to serve on board of foreign ships employed in the slave trade. By this act, also, the commissioned vessels of the United States were authorized to seize vessels and crews employed contrary to the act.

By an act of the 28th of February, 1803, masters of vessels were not allowed to bring into any port (where the laws of the State prohibited the importation) any negro, mulatto, or other person of color, not being a native, a citizen, or registered seaman of the United States, under the pain of penalties; and no vessel having on board persons of the above description was to be admitted to an entry, and if any such person should be landed from on board of any vessel the same was to be forfeited.

By an act of the 2d of March, 1807, the importation of slaves into any port of the United States was to be prohibited after the first of January, 1808, the time prescribed by the constitutional provision. This act contains many severe provisions against any interference or participation in the slave trade, such as heavy fines, long imprisonments, and the forfeitures of vessels; the President was also authorized to employ armed vessels to cruise on any part of the coast where he might judge attempts would be made to violate the act, and to instruct the commanders of armed vessels to seize and bring in vessels found on the high seas contravening the provisions of the law.

By an act of the 20th of April, 1818, the laws in prohibition of the slave trade were further improved. This act is characterized with a peculiarity of legislative precaution, especially in the eighth section, which throws the labor of proof upon the defendant that the colored persons brought into the United States by him had not been brought in contrary to the laws.

By an act of the 3d of March, 1819, the power is continued in the President to employ the armed ships of the United States to seize and bring into port any vessel engaged in the slave trade by citizens or residents of the United States, and such vessels, together with the goods and effects on board, are to be forfeited and sold and the proceeds to be distributed in like manner as is provided by law for the distribution of prizes taken from an enemy, and the officers and crew are to undergo the punishments inflicted by previous acts. The President, by this act, is authorized to make such regulations and arrangements as he may deem expedient for the safe keeping, support, and removal beyond the limits of the United States of all such negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color as may have been brought within its jurisdiction, and to appoint a proper person or persons residing on the coast of Africa as agent or agents for receiving the negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color delivered from on board of vessels seized in the prosecution of the slave trade.

And, in addition to all the aforesaid laws, the present Congress, on the 15th of May, 1820, believing that the then existing provisions would not be sufficiently available, enacted that if any citizen of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign ship or vessel engaged in the slave trade, or any person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any ship or vessel owned in the whole or in part, or navigated for or in behalf of any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall land from any such ship or vessel, and on foreign shore seize any negro or mulatto not held to service or labor by the laws of either of the States or Territories of the United States with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall decoy or forcibly bring or carry, or shall receive such negro or mulatto on board any such ship or vessel with intent as aforesaid, such citizen or person shall be adjudged a pirate, and on conviction shall suffer death.

The immoral and pernicious practice of the slave trade has attracted much public attention in Europe within the last few years, and in a congress at Vienna, on the 8th of February, 1815, five of the principal powers made a solemn engagement, in the face of mankind, that this traffic should be made to cease, in pursuance of which these powers have enacted municipal laws to suppress the trade. Spain, although not a party to the original engagement, did soon after, in her treaty with England, stipulate for the immediate abolition of the Spanish slave trade to the north of the equator, and for its final and universal abolition on the 30th of May, 1820.

Portugal likewise, in her treaty in 1817, stipulated that the Portuguese slave trade on the coast of Africa should entirely cease to the northward of the equator, and engaged that it should be unlawful for her subjects to purchase or trade in slaves, except to the southward of the line. The precise period at which the entire abolition is to take place in Portugal does not appear to be finally fixed; but the Portuguese ambassador, in the presence of the congress at Vienna, declared that Portugal, faithful to her principles, would not refuse to adopt the term of eight years, which term will expire in the year 1823.

At this time, among the European States, there is not a flag which can legally cover this inhuman traffic north of the line; nevertheless, experience has proved the inefficacy of the various and rigorous laws which have been made in Europe and in this country, it being a lamentable fact that the disgraceful practice is even now carried on to a surprising extent. During the last year Captain Trenchard, the commander of the United States sloop-of-war Cyane, found that part of the coast of Africa which he visited lined with vessels engaged, as it is presumed, in this forbidden traffic; of these he examined many, and five, which appeared to be fitted out on American account, he sent into the jurisdiction of the United States for adjudication; each of them, it is believed, has been condemned, and the commanders of two of them have been sentenced to the punishment prescribed by the laws of the United States.

The testimony recently published, with the opinion of the presiding judge of the United States court of the southern district in the State of New York, in the case of the schooner Plattsburg, lays open a scene of the grossest fraud that could be practiced to deceive the officers of Government and conceal the unlawful transaction.

The extension of the trade for the last twenty-five or thirty years must, in a degree, be conjectural; but the best information that can be obtained on the subject furnishes good foundation to believe that during that period the number of slaves withdrawn from western Africa amounts to upwards of a million and a half; the annual average would be a mean somewhere between fifty and eighty thousand.

The trade appears to be lucrative in proportion to its heinousness; and, as it is generally inhibited, the unfeeling slave dealers, in order to elude the laws, increase its horrors; the innocent Africans, who are mercilessly forced from their native homes in irons, are crowded in vessels and situations which are not adapted for the transportation of human beings, and this cruelty is frequently succeeded, during the voyage of their destination, with dreadful mortality. Further information on this subject will appear in a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, inclosing two other letters, marked 1 and 2, and also by the extract of a letter from an officer of the Cyane, dated April 10, 1820, which are annexed to this report. While the slave trade exists there can be no prospect of civilization in Africa.

However well disposed the European powers may be to effect a practical abolition of the trade, it seems generally acknowledged that, for the attainment of this object, it is necessary to agree upon some concerted plan of co-operation; but, unhappily, no arrangement has as yet obtained universal consent.

England has recently engaged in treaties with Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands, in which the mutual right of visitation and search is exchanged; this right is of a special and limited character, as well in relation to the number and description of vessels as to space, and to avoid possible inconveniences no suspicious circumstances are to warrant the detention of a vessel; this right is restricted to the simple fact of slaves being on board.

These treaties contemplate the establishment of mixed courts formed of an equal number of individuals of the two contracting nations, the one to reside in a possession belonging to his Britannic Majesty, the other within the territory of the other respective power. When a vessel is visited and detained it is to be taken to the nearest court, and, if condemned, the vessel is to be declared a lawful prize, as well as the cargo, and are to be sold for the profit of the two nations; the slaves are to receive a certificate of emancipation and to be delivered over to the Government on whose territory the court is which passes sentence, to be employed as servants or free laborers. Each of the Governments binds itself to guaranty the liberty of such portion of these individuals as may be respectively assigned to it. Particular provisions are made for remuneration in case vessels are not condemned after trial, and special instructions are stipulated to be furnished to commanders of vessels possessing the qualified right of visitation and search.

These powers entertain the opinion that nothing short of the concession of a qualified right of visitation and search can practically suppress the slave trade. An association of armed ships is contemplated, to form a species of naval police to be stationed principally in the African seas, where the commanders of the ships will be enabled to co-operate in harmony and concert.

The United States has been earnestly invited by the principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of the British Government to join in the same or similar arrangements, and this invitation has been sanctioned and enforced by a unanimous vote of the Houses of Lords and Commons in a manner that precludes all doubts as to the sincerity and benevolence of their designs.

In answer to this invitation the President of the United States has expressed his regret that the stipulations in the treaties communicated are of a character to which the peculiar situation and institutions of the United States do not permit them to accede.

The objections made are contained in an extract of a letter from the Secretary of State under date of November 2, 1818, in which it is observed that, "in examining the provisions of the treaties communicated by Lord Castlereagh, all the essential articles appear to be of a character not adaptable to the institutions or to the circumstances of the United States. The powers agreed to be reciprocally given to the officers of the ships-of-war of either party to enter, search, capture, and carry into port for adjudication the merchant vessels of the other, however qualified and restricted, is most essentially connected with the institution by each treaty of two mixed courts, one of which to reside in the external or colonial possession of each of the two parties, respectively. This part of the system is indispensable to give it that character of reciprocity, without which the right granted to the armed ships of one nation to search the merchant vessels of another would be rather a mark of vassalage than of independence. But to this part of the system the United States, having no colonies either on the coast of Africa or in the West Indies, cannot give effect. That by the Constitution of the United States it is provided that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in a Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. It provides that the judges of these courts shall hold their offices during good behavior, and that they shall be removable by impeachment, on conviction of crimes and misdemeanors. There may be doubts whether the power of the Government of the United States is competent to institute a court for carrying into execution their penal statutes beyond the territories of the United States, a court consisting partly of foreign judges not amenable to impeachment for corruption, and deciding upon statutes of the United States without appeal.

"That the disposal of the negroes found on board of the slave trading vessels which might be condemned by the sentence of these mixed courts cannot be carried into effect by the United States; for if the slaves of vessels condemned by the mixed courts should be delivered over to the Government of the United States as freemen, they could not, but by their own consent, be employed as servants or free laborers. The condition of the blacks being in this Union regulated by the municipal laws of the separate States, the Government of the United States can neither guaranty their liberty in the States where they could only be received as slaves, nor control them in the States where they would be recognized as free. That the admission of a right in the officers of foreign ships-of-war to enter and search the vessels of the United States in time of peace, under any circumstances whatever, would meet with universal repugnance in the public opinion of this country; that there would be no prospect of a ratification by advice and consent of the Senate to any stipulation of that nature; that the search by foreign officers even in time of war is so obnoxious to the feelings and recollections of this country that nothing could reconcile them to the extension of it, however qualified or restricted, to a time of peace; and that it would be viewed in a still more aggravated light if, as in the treaty with the Netherlands, connected with a formal admission that even vessels under convoy of ships-of-war of their own nation should be liable to search by the ships-of-war of another."

The committee will observe, in the first instance, that a mutual right of search appears to be indispensable to the great object of abolition; for while flags remain as a cover for this traffic against the right of search by any vessel except of the same nation the chance of detection will be much less than it would be if the right of search was extended to vessels of other powers; and as soon as any one nation should cease to be vigilant in the discovery of infractions practiced on its own code, the slave dealers would avail themselves of a system of obtaining fraudulent papers and concealing the real ownership under the cover of such flags, which would be carried on with such address as to render it easy for the citizens or subjects of one State to evade their own municipal laws; but if a concerted system existed, and a qualified right of mutual search was granted, the apprehension of these piratical offenders would be reduced to a much greater certainty, and the very knowledge of the existence of an active and vigorous system of co-operation would divert many from this traffic, as the unlawful trade would become too hazardous for profitable speculation.

In relation to any inconveniences that might result from such an arrangement, the commerce of the United States is so limited on the African coast that it could not be much affected by it; and as it regards economy, the expense of stationing a few vessels on that coast would not be much greater than to maintain them at any other place.

The committee have briefly noticed the practical results of a reciprocal right of search as it bears on the slave trade, but the objection as to the propriety of ceding this right remains. It is with deference that the committee undertake to make any remarks upon it. They bear in recollection the opinions entertained in this country on the practice of searching neutral vessels in time of war, but they cannot perceive that the right under discussion is, in principle, allied in any degree to the general question of search; it can involve no commitment, nor is it susceptible of any unfavorable inference on that subject; and even if there were any affinity between the cases, the necessity of a special agreement would be inconsistent with the idea of existing rights; the proposal itself, in the manner made, is a total abandonment on the part of England of any claim to visit and search vessels in a time of peace, and this question has been unequivocally decided in the negative by her admiralty courts.

Although it is not among the objections that the desired arrangement would give any color to a claim or right of search in time of peace, yet, lest the case in this respect may be prejudiced in the minds of any, the committee will observe that the right of search in time of peace is one that is not claimed by any power as a part of the law of nations; no nation pretends that it can exercise the right of visitation and search upon the common and unappropriated parts of the sea except upon the belligerent claim. A recent decision in the British admiralty court in the case of the French slave ship Le Louis is clear and decisive on this point. The case is annexed to this report.

In regard, then, to the reciprocal right wished to be ceded, it is reduced to the simple inquiry whether, in practice, it will be beneficial to the two contracting nations. Its exercise, so far as it relates to the detention of vessels, as it is confined to the fact of slaves being actually on board, precludes almost the possibility of accident or much inconvenience.

In relation also to the disposal of the vessels and slaves detained, an arrangement perhaps could be effected so as to deliver them up to the vessels of the nation to which the detained vessel should belong. Under such an understanding the vessels and slaves delivered to the jurisdiction of the United States might be disposed of in conformity with the provisions of our own act of the 3d of March, 1819, and an arrangement of this kind would be free from any of the other objections.

An exchange of the right of search, limited in duration or to continue at pleasure for the sake of experiment, might, it is anxiously hoped, be so restricted to vessels and seas and with such civil and harmonious stipulations as not to be unacceptable.

The feelings of this country on the general question of search have often been roused to a degree of excitement that evinces their unchangeable character; but the American people will readily see the distinction between the cases. The one in its exercise to the extent claimed will ever produce irritation and excite a patriotic spirit of resistance; the other is amicable and charitable; the justness and nobleness of the undertaking are worthy of the combined concern of Christian nations.

The detestable crime of kidnapping the unoffending inhabitants of one country and chaining them to slavery in another is marked with all the atrociousness of piracy, and as such it is stigmatized and punishable by our own laws.

To efface this reproachful stain from the character of civilized mankind would be the proudest triumph that could be achieved in the cause of humanity. On this subject the United States, having led the way, owe it to themselves to give their influence and cordial co-operation to any measure that will accomplish the great and good purpose; but this happy result, experience has demonstrated, cannot be realized by any system except a concession by the maritime powers to each other's ships-of-war of a qualified right of search. If this object was generally attained, it is confidently believed that the active exertions of even a few nations would be sufficient entirely to suppress the slave trade.

The slave dealers could be successfully assailed on the coast upon which the trade originates, as they must necessarily consume more time in the collection and embarkation of their cargoes than in the subsequent distribution in the markets for which they are destined. This renders that coast the most advantageous position for their apprehension; and, besides, the African coast frequented by the slave ships is indented with so few commodious or accessible harbors, that, notwithstanding its great extent, it could be guarded by the vigilance of a small number of cruisers; but if the slave ships are permitted to escape from the African coast and to be dispersed to different parts of the world their capture would be rendered uncertain and hopeless.

The committee, after much reflection, offer the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested to enter into such arrangements as he may deem suitable and proper, with one or more of the maritime powers of Europe, for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, February 7, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you such information as this Department affords upon the subject of the slave trade, in answer to your letter of the 30th of January last.

The inclosed copy, No. 1, of a circular to the United States district attorneys and marshals has been answered, generally, that no slaves have been brought into their respective districts, with the exception of Maryland, South Carolina, and Georgia; answers have not been received from Louisiana.

There appears to have been partial captures made upon the coast and in the neighborhood of Georgia by the public vessels of the United States; the slaves in some cases have been bonded out to individuals until adjudication.

The slave trade has been checked by our cruisers upon the southern coasts of the United States, and no great attempts appear to have been made to introduce slaves through illicit channels.

There are now in charge of the marshal of Georgia two hundred and forty-eight Africans, taken out of a South American privateer, the General Ramirez, whose crew mutinied and brought the vessel into St. Mary's, Georgia; sixty more are in the custody of the marshal, detained and maintained in the vicinity of Savannah; forty or fifty more have been sent out of that State; under what orders it is not known.

The ships cruising on the coast of Africa during the last year captured the following vessels engaged in the slave trade, but having no slaves on board at the time, viz: Schooners Endymion, Plattsburgh, Science, Esperanza, and brig Alexander.

These vessels have been condemned in the district courts of New York and Massachusetts, and their commanders sentenced to fine and imprisonment under the acts of Congress.*

The most detailed information that has been communicated to this Department in relation to the slave trade will be found in the inclosed copy, No. 2, from the late United States agent, then resident in Africa, but since deceased.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

SMITH THOMPSON.

HON. JOSEPH HEMPHILL,

NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 13, 1821.

SIR: I duly received your letter of 25th November last, an answer to which has been delayed by the urgency of public business.

I request you will be pleased to inform me what disposition has been made of the two hundred and fifty-eight Africans mentioned in your letter, and what expense, if any, has been incurred for their safe keeping. It is very desirable to save further expenses by an early decision of their case.

I wish also to be informed upon the cases of all others within your jurisdiction and coming within the execution of the laws for prohibiting and suppressing the slave trade.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

SMITH THOMPSON.

*Extract of a letter from the Rev. Samuel Bacon to the Secretary of the Navy.*CAMPELAR, (SHERBRO ISLAND,) March 21, 1820.

"The slave trade is carried on briskly in this neighborhood; had I authority so to do, I could take a vessel lying within the floating of one tide, say 25 miles from us, in the Shebar, under American colors, taking in a cargo of slaves. Their policy is to come with a cargo of goods suited to the market, deliver it to a slave factor on shore, and contract for slaves. They then lay at anchor in the river or stand out to sea for a specified number of days, till the slaves are all procured and brought to the beach and placed under a hovel or shed prepared for the purpose, all chained two and two. At the appointed time, or on a concerted signal, the vessel comes in and takes her slaves on board, and is off in an hour. This is rendered necessary, as they cannot be seized unless they have slaves on board, and they are watched by the cruisers so as to be taken when they have slaves with them. The Augusta (the schooner I purchased) is a vessel of 104 tons, a swift sailer, and was intended to take a cargo of 100; she has a camboose fitted to boil rice in large quantities. Slaves receive one pint each per day."

UNITED STATES SHIP GYANE, off Sierra Leone, April 10, 1820.

During our stay at Sierra Leone, the European gentlemen who were residents at the place treated us with the utmost respect, striving who should be most forward in attention and hospitality. A party was formed by those gentlemen to show our officers the interior settlements, and from their report on their return I learned the extent of the colony and the benevolent philanthropy of the British nation in alleviating the miseries of the oppressed and ignorant Africans. Not less than six thousand captured Africans have been landed at this settlement by the British ships-of-war. On their arrival, those of a proper age are named and sent to the adjacent villages. A house and lot is appointed to each family, and they are supported one year by government, at the expiration of which they are obliged to look out for themselves. The captured children are also sent to the villages, where they are kept at school till married, which is always at an early age. At the head of each village is a missionary, who receives his annual support from the Government, and who acts in the double capacity of minister and schoolmaster.

Lieutenant Cooper and myself walked through the villages situated to the westward of Sierra Leone. We landed at King Town, the former residence of King Tom. The house in which the king resided is in ruins, and almost hidden from view by shrubbery. From thence we proceeded to Krow Town, a small village inhabited by about five hundred Krowmen. The British ships-of-war on this station have each from twenty-five to seventy of these men on their books.

The trade of this place is considerable. Several vessels entered and sailed during our short stay; many of them were loaded with ship timber, which is somewhat like our white oak. The other articles of trade are ivory, camwood, wax, and palm oil. We sent a boat from Sierra Leone for Mr. Bacon, who came up and remained with us two days. He has already settled himself with his followers (until after the rains) on Sherbro island. I fear this island will not answer his wishes; it is low, unhealthy, difficult of access for ships, and is not very fertile. There are many places to leeward possessing greater advantages, one of which I hope he will select for a permanent settlement.

After remaining nine days at Sierra Leone we sailed for the Gallinas, a place of resort for slave vessels, since which we have made ten captures, some by fair sailing, others by boats and stratagem. Although they are evidently owned by Americans, they are so completely covered by Spanish papers that it is impossible to condemn them. Two schooners, the Endymion and Esperanza, we sent home. We shall leave the coast in the course of three or four days for Port Praya, from whence we shall proceed to Teneriffe for provisions.

The slave trade is carried on to a very great extent. There are probably not less than three hundred vessels on the coast engaged in that traffic, each having two or three sets of papers. I sincerely hope Government has revised the law giving us more authority. You have no idea how cruelly these poor creatures are treated by the monsters engaged in taking them from the coast.

Case of the French slave ship Le Louis, extracted from the 12th annual report of the African Institution, printed in 1818.

This vessel sailed from Martinique on the 30th of January, 1816, on a slave trading voyage to the coast of Africa, and was captured near Cape Mesurado by the Sierra Leone colonial vessel-of-war Queen Charlotte, after a severe engagement, which followed an attempt to escape, in which eight men were killed and twelve wounded of the British; and, proceedings having been instituted against Le Louis in the vice admiralty court of Sierra Leone, as belonging to French subjects and as fitted out, manned, and navigated for the purpose of carrying on the slave trade after the trade had been abolished both by the internal laws of France and by the treaty between that country and Great Britain, the ship and cargo were condemned as forfeited to his Majesty.

From this sentence an appeal having been made to the high court of admiralty, the cause came on for hearing, when the court reversed the judgment of the inferior court and ordered the restitution of the property to the claimants.

The judgment of Sir William Scott was given at great length. The directors will advert to such points of it as are immediately connected with their present subject. "No doubt," he said, "could exist that this was a French ship intentionally engaged in the slave trade." But as these were facts which were ascertained in consequence of its seizure before the seizer could avail himself of this discovery, it was necessary to inquire whether he possessed any right of visitation and search; because, if the discovery was unlawfully produced, he could not be allowed to take advantage of the consequences of his own wrong.

The learned judge then discussed at considerable length the question whether the right of search exists in time of peace? And he decided it without hesitation in the negative. "I can find," he says, "no authority that gives the right of interruption to the navigation of States in amity upon the high seas, excepting that which the rights of war give to both belligerents against neutrals. No nation can exercise a right of visitation and search upon the common and unappropriated parts of the sea, save only on the belligerent claim." He admits, indeed, and with just concern, that if this right be not conceded in time of peace, it will be extremely difficult to suppress the traffic in slaves.

"The great object, therefore, ought to be to obtain the concurrence of other nations by application, by remonstrance, by example, by every peaceable instrument which men can employ to attract the consent of men. But a nation is not justified in assuming rights that do not belong to her merely because she means to apply them to a laudable purpose."

"If this right," he adds, "is imported into a state of peace, it must be done by convention; and it will then be for the prudence of States to regulate by such convention the exercise of the right with all the softening of which it is susceptible."

The judgment of Sir William Scott would have been equally conclusive against the legality of this seizure, even if it could have been established in evidence that France had previously prohibited the slave trade by her municipal laws. For the sake of argument, however, he assumes that the view he has taken of the subject might in such a case be controverted. He proceeds, therefore, to inquire how far the French law had actually abolished the slave trade at the time of this adventure. The actual state of the matter, as collected from the documents before the court, he observes, is this:

"On the 27th of July, 1815, the British minister at Paris writes a note to Prince Talleyrand, then minister to the King of France, expressing a desire on the part of his court to be informed whether, under the law of France as it then stood, it was prohibited to French subjects to carry on the slave trade. The French minister informs him in answer, on the 30th July, that the law of the Usurper on that subject was null and void, (as were all his decrees,) but that his Most Christian Majesty had issued directions that, on the part of France, 'the traffic should cease from the present time everywhere and forever.'

"In what form these directions were issued or to whom addressed does not appear, but upon such authority it must be presumed that they were actually issued. It is, however, no violation of the respect due to that authority to inquire what was the result or effect of those directions so given; what followed in obedience to them in any public and binding form? And I fear, I am compelled to say, that nothing of the kind followed, and that the directions must have slept in the portfolio of the office to which they were addressed; for it is, I think, impossible that if any public and authoritative ordinance had followed, it could have escaped the sleepless attention of many persons in our own country to all public foreign proceedings upon this interesting subject. Still less would it have escaped the notice of the British resident minister, who, at the distance of a year and a half, is compelled, on the part of his own court, to express a curiosity to know what laws, ordinances, instructions, and other public and ostensible acts, had passed for the abolition of the slave trade.

"On the 30th of November, in the same year, (1815,) the additional article of the definitive treaty, a very solemn instrument, most undoubtedly, is formally and publicly executed, and it is in these terms: 'The high contracting parties, sincerely desiring to give effect to the measures on which they deliberated at the Congress of Vienna for the complete and universal abolition of the slave trade, and having each, in their respective dominions, prohibited, without restriction, their colonies and subjects from taking any part whatever in this traffic, engage to renew conjointly their efforts with a view to insure final success to the principle which they proclaimed in the declaration of the 8th of February, 1815, and to concert without loss of time, by their ministers at the court of London, the most effectual measures for the entire and definitive abolition of the traffic, so odious and so highly reprov'd by the laws of religion and nature.'

"Now, what are the effects of this treaty? According to the view I take of it, they are two, and two only: one declaratory of a fact, the other promissory of future measures. It is to be observed that the treaty itself does not abolish the slave trade; it does not inform the subjects that that trade is hereby abolished, and that by virtue of the prohibitions therein contained its subjects shall not in future carry on the trade; but the contracting parties mutually inform each other of the fact that they have in their respective dominions abolished the slave trade, without stating at all the mode in which that abolition had taken place."

"It next engages to take future measures for the universal abolition.

"That with respect to both the declaratory and promissory parts, Great Britain has acted with the optima fides is known to the whole world, which has witnessed its domestic laws as well as its foreign negotiations.

"I am very far from intimating that the Government of this country did not act with perfect propriety in accepting the assurance that the French Government had actually abolished the slave trade as a sufficient proof of the fact; but the fact is now denied by a person who has a right to deny it, for, though a French subject, he is not bound to acknowledge the existence of any law which has not publicly appeared; and, the other party having taken upon himself the burden of proving it in the course of a legal inquiry, the court is compelled to demand and expect the ordinary evidence of such a disputed fact. It was not till the 15th of January, in the present year, (1817,) that the British resident minister applies for the communication I have described of all laws, instructions, ordinances, and so on; he receives in return what is delivered by the French minister as the ordinance, bearing date only one week before the requested communication, namely, the 8th of January. It has been asserted in argument that no such ordinance has yet up to this very hour even appeared in any printed or public form, however much it might import both French subjects and the subjects of foreign States so to receive it.

"How the fact may be I cannot say; but I observe it appears before me in a manuscript form; and by inquiry at the Secretary of State's office I find it exists there in no other plight or condition.

"In transmitting this to the British Government, the British minister observes it is not the document he had reason to expect, and certainly with much propriety; for how does the document answer his requisition? His requisition is for all laws, ordinances, instructions, and so forth. How does this, a simple ordinance professing to have passed only a week before, realize the assurance given on the 30th of July, 1815, that the traffic 'should cease from the present time everywhere and forever;' or how does this realize the promise made in November that measures should be taken without loss of time to prohibit not only French colonists, but French subjects likewise, from taking any part whatever in this traffic? What is this regulation in substance? Why, it is a mere prospective colonial regulation prohibiting the importation of slaves into the French colonies from the 8th of January, 1817.

"Consistently with this declaration, even if it does exist in the form and with the force of a law, French subjects may be yet the common carriers of slaves to any foreign settlement that will admit them, and may devote their capital and their industry unmolested by law to the supply of any such markets.

"Supposing, however, the regulations to contain the fullest and most entire fulfilment of the engagement of France, both in time and in substance, what possible application can a prospective regulation of January, 1817, have to a transaction of March, 1816?

"Nobody is now to be told that a modern edict which does not appear cannot be presumed, and that no penal law of any State can bind the conduct of its subjects unless it is conveyed to their attention in a way which excludes the possibility of honest ignorance. The very production of a law professing to be enacted in the beginning of 1817 is a satisfactory proof that no such law existed in 1816, the year of this transaction. In short, the seizer has entirely failed in the task he has undertaken, in proving the existence of a prohibitory law enacted by the legal government of France which can be applied to the present transaction."

Papers relating to the Slave Trade, presented to both Houses of Parliament, by command of the Prince Regent, February, 1819.

Extract of the protocol of the conference between the plenipotentiaries of Austria, France, Great Britain, Prussia, and Russia, held at London on the 14th December, 1817.

Present: Lord Castlereagh, plenipotentiary of Great Britain; Count Lieven, plenipotentiary of Russia; Baron Humboldt, plenipotentiary of Prussia; Prince Esterhazy, plenipotentiary of Austria; Count Caraman, chargé des affaires of France.

The plenipotentiaries of Great Britain, Russia, Prussia, and Austria, and the chargé des affaires of France, having agreed to meet together for the purpose of resuming the conferences relative to the abolition of the slave trade, Lord Castlereagh presents two conventions which his government has concluded during the present year: the one with Portugal, and the other with Spain, on the subject of the abolition of the slave trade; his excellency requests to defer to another day the consideration of these two transactions, with reference to the further measures which may, under the present circumstances, be to be taken respecting this question. The two said documents are annexed to this protocol, sub litt. A and B.

A note, dated the 19th February, 1817, addressed by the Portuguese minister to the plenipotentiaries, on the question of the abolition of the slave trade, is read; their excellencies agree to take into consideration the contents thereof, as soon as the subject shall again be proceeded in by them, and they order that it may in the meantime be inserted in the protocol, to which it is annexed, sub litt. C.

After which the sitting was adjourned.

Note of the Count de Palmella to the plenipotentiaries of the five powers.

LONDON, February 19, 1817.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of his most faithful Majesty, having received from his court the instructions requested by his predecessor, M. de Freire, upon the subject of the invitation addressed to him by the plenipotentiaries of the powers who signed the additional article of the treaty of Paris of the 20th November, 1815, considers it his duty to make their excellencies acquainted with the tenor thereof, being persuaded that they will find therein satisfactory proof of the plain and candid line of conduct which the King his master has adopted from the beginning of this negotiation.

His Majesty the King of Portugal, not having signed the additional article of the treaty of Paris of the 20th November, 1815, does not consider himself bound to take a part in the conferences established in London by virtue of that article, and the less so as, at the time when the said conferences were proposed at the Congress at Vienna, the Portuguese plenipotentiaries positively refused to concur therein.

His Majesty being, nevertheless, desirous of giving this further proof of his wish to co-operate with the high powers who signed the additional article, in the accomplishment of the object proclaimed in the declaration of the Congress of Vienna of the 8th February, 1815, has authorized the undersigned, notwithstanding the efforts and the sacrifices which it has already and must still cost the Brazils to accomplish it, to accept the invitation of the plenipotentiaries of those powers who signed the above mentioned additional article, and to take part in their conferences whenever their excellencies shall have given him the assurance that the negotiation in question will be grounded upon the following principles:

1. That, in conformity to the solemn declaration of the Congress of Vienna, due regard shall be had in proceeding to the abolition of the slave trade to the interests, the customs, and even the prejudices of the subjects of those powers which still permit this traffic.

2. That each of the said powers having the right to enact the final abolition at the period which it may judge most expedient, that period shall be fixed upon between the powers by means of negotiation.

3. That the general negotiation which may ensue shall in no way prejudice the stipulation of the 4th article of the treaty of the 22d January, 1815, between his most faithful Majesty and his Britannic Majesty, wherein it is stated that the period when the said traffic is universally to cease and be prohibited in the Portuguese dominions shall be fixed by a separate treaty between the two high contracting parties.

The principles thus laid down appear to the undersigned to be so clear and so conformable to everything which the plenipotentiaries to whom he has the honor of addressing himself have themselves communicated to him, that he doubts not they will explicitly acknowledge them in the answer which he has been desired by the King his master to request they will favor him with, and in consequence of which he will consider himself duly authorized to accept the invitation addressed by their excellencies to his predecessor, and to take part in the negotiation proposed at the sitting of the Congress at Vienna, held on the 20th January, 1815.

The undersigned most readily avails himself of this opportunity to request their excellencies to accept the assurance of his highest consideration.

LE COMTE DE PALMELLA.

who signed the additional article of the treaty of Paris of the 20th November, 1815.

Protocol of the conference between the plenipotentiaries of the five powers of the 4th of February, 1818.

Present: Prince Esterhazy, Marquis D'Osmond, Baron de Humboldt, Count Lieven, Lord Castlereagh.

Lord Castlereagh reads a note verbale, containing a proposition on the part of his Government, the object of which is to make a convention between the powers represented by the plenipotentiaries assembled for the purpose of abolishing illicit slave trade; and he accordingly invites his colleagues to request forthwith instructions on this subject from their respective courts, in the event of their not being provided with sufficient authority to negotiate such a convention.

Lord Castlereagh then reads several reports derived from different societies occupied in the abolition of the slave trade, relative to the extent and nature of this traffic on the coasts of Africa, and requests the insertion in the protocol of the proposition above stated, together with the said reports as annexes thereunto. All these documents are inserted, sub litt. A, B, C, D.

The plenipotentiaries agree to invite, verbally, Count Palmella, minister of Portugal, to assist at the ensuing conference on the abolition of the slave trade, and adjourn for the present the further consideration of the subject.

Annex A to the protocol of the conference of the 4th of February, 1818.

Memorandum of Viscount Castlereagh.

In laying before the conference the reports received from the African societies in London, in answer to the queries addressed to them by his Majesty's Government upon the present state of the slave trade, as connected with the improvement and civilization of Africa, Lord Castlereagh (the reports being read) called the attention of his colleagues to the following prominent facts:

That a considerable revival of the slave trade had taken place, especially on the coast of Africa north of the line, since the restoration of peace, and that the principal part of this traffic being now of an illicit description, the parties engaged in it had adopted the practice of carrying it on in armed and fast-sailing vessels.

That the ships engaged in this armed traffic not only threatened resistance to all legal attempts to repress the same, but by their piratical practices menaced the legitimate commerce of all nations on the coast with destruction.

That the traffic thus carried on was marked with increased horrors, from the inhuman manner in which these desperate adventurers were in the habit of crowding the slaves on board vessels better adapted to escape from the interruption of cruisers than to serve for the transport of human beings.

That as the improvement of Africa, especially in a commercial point of view, has advanced in proportion as the slave trade had been suppressed, so, with its revival, every prospect of industry and of amendment appears to decline.

That the British Government has made considerable exertions to check the growing evil; that during the war, and whilst in possession of the French and Dutch settlements on that coast, their endeavors had been attended with very considerable success, but that since the restoration of those possessions, and more especially since the return of peace had rendered it illegal for British cruisers to visit vessels sailing under foreign flags, the trade in slaves had greatly increased.

That the British Government in the performance of this act of moral duty had invariably wished, as far as possible, to avoid giving umbrage to the rights of any friendly power; that with this view, as early as July, 1816, the accompanying circular order had been issued to all British cruisers, requiring them to advert to the fact that the right of search (being a belligerent right) had ceased with the war, and directing them to abstain from exercising the same.

That the difficulty of distinguishing in all cases the fraudulent from the licit slave traders, of the former of whom a large proportion were notoriously British subjects, feloniously carrying on this traffic in defiance of the laws of their own country, had given occasion to the detention of a number of vessels upon grounds which the Prince Regent's Government could not sanction; and in reparation for which seizures, due compensation had been assigned in the late convention with Spain and Portugal.

That it was, however, proved beyond the possibility of a doubt, that, unless the right to visit vessels engaged in this illicit traffic should be established, by the same being mutually conceded between the maritime States, the illicit slave trade must, in time of peace, not only continue to subsist, but to increase.

That the system of obtaining fraudulent papers and concealing the real ownership was now carried on with such address as to render it easy for the subjects of all States to carry on the traffic, whilst the trade in slaves remained legal for the subjects of any one State.

That even were the traffic abolished by all States, whilst the flag of one State shall preclude the visit of all other States, the illicit slave trader will always have the means of concealing himself under the disguise of the nation whose cruiser there is the least chance of his meeting on the coast. Thus, the Portuguese slave trader, since the abolition north of the line took effect, has been found to conceal himself under the Spanish flag; the American and even the British dealer has in like manner assumed a foreign disguise. Many instances have occurred of British subjects evading the laws of their country either by establishing houses at the Havana or obtaining false papers. If such has been the case in time of war, when neutral flags were legally subjected to the visit of the belligerent cruiser, the evil must tenfold increase when peace has extinguished this right, and when even British ships, by fraudulently assuming a foreign flag, may, with every prospect of impunity, carry on the traffic.

The obvious necessity of combining the repression of the illicit slave trade with the measure of abolition, in order to render the latter in any degree effectual, has been admitted both by the Spanish and Portuguese Governments, and in furtherance of this principle the late conventions have been negotiated; but whilst the system therein established is confined to the three powers, and whilst the flags of other maritime States, and more especially those of France, Holland, and the United States, are not included therein, the effect must be to vary the ostensible character of the fraud, rather than in any material degree to suppress the mischief.

The great powers of Europe, assembled in Congress at Vienna, having taken a solemn engagement in the face of mankind that this traffic should be made to cease, and it clearly appearing that the law of abolition is nothing in itself unless the contraband slave trade shall be suppressed by a combined system, it is submitted that they owe it to themselves to unite their endeavors without delay for that purpose, and as the best means it is proposed that the five powers now assembled in conference under the third additional article of the treaty of Paris should conclude a treaty with each other upon such enlarged and at the same time simple principles as might become a conventional regulation, to which all other maritime States should be invited to give their accession. This convention might embrace the following general provisions:

1st. An engagement by effectual enactments to render not only the import of slaves into their respective dominions illegal, but to constitute the trafficking in slaves on the part of any of their subjects a criminal act, to be punished in such suitable manner as their respective codes of law may ordain.

2d. That the right of visit be mutually conceded to their respective ships-of-war, furnished with the proper instructions, ad hoc; that the visit be made under the inspection of a commissioned officer, and no vessel be detained unless slaves shall be found actually on board.

3d. The minor regulations to be such as are established in the conventions with Spain and Portugal, under such further modifications as may appear calculated to obviate abuse and to render the system, if possible, more unobjectionable as a general law amongst the high contracting parties applicable to this particular evil.

After the abolition shall have become general, in a course of years, the laws of each particular State may, perhaps, be made in a great measure effectual to exclude import. The measure to be taken on the coast of Africa will then become comparatively unimportant; but so long as the partial nature of the abolition and the facility to contraband import throughout the extensive possessions to which slaves are carried from the coast of Africa shall afford to the illicit slave trader irresistible temptation to pursue this abominable but lucrative traffic, so long nothing but the vigilant superintendence of an armed and international police on the coast of Africa can be expected successfully to cope with such practices.

To render such a police either legal or effectual to its object, it must be established under the sanction and by the authority of all civilized States concurring in the humane policy of abolition; the force necessary to repress the same may be supplied as circumstances of convenience may suggest by the powers having possessions on the coast of Africa, or local interests which may induce them to station ships-of-war in that quarter of the globe; but the endeavors of these powers must be ineffectual unless backed by a general alliance framed for this especial purpose. The rights of all nations must be brought to co-operate to the end in view by at least ceasing to be the cover under which the object which all aim at accomplishing is to be defeated.

At the outset some difficulty may occur in the execution of a common system, and especially whilst the trade remains legal within certain limits to the subjects both of the crowns of Spain and Portugal; but if the principal powers frequenting the coast of Africa evince a determination to combine their means against the illicit slave trader as a common enemy, and if they are supported in doing so by other States denying to such illicit slave traders the cover of their flag, the traffic will soon be rendered too hazardous for profitable speculation. The evil must thus cease, and the efforts of Africa be directed to those habits of peaceful commerce and industry in which all nations will find their best reward for the exertions they shall have devoted to the suppression of this great moral evil.

Lord Castlereagh, upon these grounds, invited his colleagues, in the name of the Prince Regent, should the powers under which they at present act not enable them to proceed to negotiate a convention upon the grounds above stated, to solicit, without delay, from their respective sovereigns the authority necessary to this effect; his royal highness confidently trusting that the enlarged and enlightened principles which guided the councils of these illustrious persons at Vienna, and which have now happily advanced the cause of abolition so nearly to its completion, will determine them perseveringly to conduct the measure to that successful close which nothing but their combined wisdom and continued exertions can effectuate.

Lord Castlereagh concluded by calling the attention of his colleagues to the indisputable proofs afforded both by the present state of the colony of Sierra Leone and by the increase of African commerce in latter years, of the faculties of that continent, both in its soil and population, for becoming civilized and industrious, the only impediment to which undoubtedly was the pernicious practice of slave trading, which, wherever it prevailed, at once turned aside the attention of the natives from the more slow and laborious means of barter which industry presented to that of seizing upon and selling each other.

It was therefore through the total extinction of this traffic that Africa could alone be expected to make its natural advances in civilization, a result which it was the declared object of these conferences by all possible means to accelerate and to promote.

NOTE.—The proposition made by Viscount Castlereagh in the preceding memorandum was immediately transmitted by the several plenipotentiaries for the consideration of their courts, but no answer was received from the respective governments previous to the meeting of the conferences at Aix-la-Chapelle, in September, 1818.

Annex B to the protocol of the conference of the 4th of February, 1818.

Queries proposed by Viscount Castlereagh to and answers of the African Society in London, December, 1816:

Query 1. What number of slaves are supposed at present to be annually carried from the western coast of Africa across the Atlantic?

Answer 1. It would be impossible to give any other than a conjectural answer to this question. It has been calculated, but certainly on loose and uncertain data, that the number of slaves at present carried from the western coast of Africa across the Atlantic amounts to upwards of 60,000.

Query 2. State as far as you can the comparative numbers annually withdrawn for the last twenty-five years, either by giving the probable number withdrawn in each year or upon an average of years?

Answer 2. The number of slaves withdrawn from western Africa during the last twenty-five years is also necessarily involved in considerable uncertainty. It has probably amounted to upwards of a million and a half. During many of the early years of that period the number annually withdrawn is stated, on credible authority, to have amounted to near 80,000.

This agrees with the result of the evidence taken before the privy council in 1787 and 1788. Even this enormous amount, however, is more likely to fall below the real export than to exceed it; for, in the specification contained in the privy council report, the Portuguese are supposed to have carried off only 15,000 annually, whereas there is reason to believe that their export was much more considerable. The number carried off by ships of the United States is also, it is apprehended, rated too low.

The abolition of the British slave trade in 1808 must, of course, have materially lessened the extent of the slave trade.

The diminution in the price of slaves on the coast, however, which followed that measure, appears in no long time to have had the effect of tempting other nations to enlarge their purchases and to crowd their ships, and British capital also gradually found its way into this branch of trade through the medium of foreign houses. On the whole, it is supposed that the average export of the last eight years may have somewhat exceeded the rate of 50,000 annually.

Query 3. From what parts of the coast have these supplies been drawn? State, as far as may be, the approximated distribution of these numbers with respect to different parts of the coast of Africa.

Answer 3. Previously to the year 1810 these supplies were drawn from all parts of the African coast, without distinction.

About a fourth part of the whole, it is supposed, was drawn from that part of the coast extending from the river Senegal to the eastern extremity of the Gold Coast. Of the remaining three-fourths, one half is supposed to have been drawn from Whydow, the Bight of Benin, the rivers Bonny, Calabar, Gaboon, and the intermediate districts north of the equator; and the other half from Congo, Angola, Benguela, and other parts of the south of the equator.

Subsequently to the year 1793 the slave trade between the Senegal and the eastern extremity of the Gold Coast was divided almost exclusively between the English and the Americans, probably more than three-fourths of it being engrossed by the former. The contemporaneous abolition of the slave trade, therefore, by these two nations, tended greatly to diminish the export of slaves from that line of coast. The Portuguese had previously confined their slave trade almost entirely to the Bight of Benin and the coast to the southward of it; but, in consequence of the reduction in the price of slaves on the windward and Gold Coasts which followed the abolition of the British and American slave trade, they were frequently drawn thither. Before, however, their expeditions to this part of the coast had become very frequent they were checked by the promulgation of the treaty of amity between Great Britain and Portugal of February, 1810, confining the Portuguese slave trade to places under the dominion of the crown of Portugal. The windward, and also the Gold Coast, were thus preserved for some years from suffering so severely by the ravages of the slave trade, as would otherwise probably be the case. Considerable cargoes, it is true, were occasionally carried away from these districts during the years in question, especially when it could be ascertained that there were no British cruisers in the way to obstruct their progress.

But still, from the year 1808 to the year 1815, the slaves carried from western Africa were principally taken from Whydow, the Bight of Benin, and the coast southward of it, and the coast north of that line was comparatively exempt from the ravages of this traffic.

Query 4. By what nations and in what proportions is it understood that the gross annual supply has been purchased and carried away?

Answer 4. Previous to the Revolutionary war the number carried away in British ships was estimated at 38,000 annually. About 40,000 or 42,000 more were supposed to be carried away by the Portuguese, French, Dutch, Danes, and Americans.

This estimate, however, probably falls below the truth, as there is reason to believe that the annual export of the Portuguese alone usually amounted to 25,000, and the number of slaves introduced into St. Domingo by the French, for some time before the revolution in that island, is known to have been very large.

For about two years after the breaking out of the maritime war of 1793 the slave trade on the west coast of Africa suffered a considerable interruption.

The French and Dutch were entirely driven from it, and the captures made from the English greatly discouraged their trade on that open and unprotected coast. Our maritime successes, and the capture of Dutch Guiana, combined to revive it, and the English share of the slave trade rose to the enormous amount of 55,000 slaves in a single year. The only other nations that during this period, and down to the year 1810, were engaged in the slave trade of western Africa were the Portuguese and Americans.

The number carried off by the Portuguese has been estimated at from 20,000 to 25,000 annually, and by the Americans about 15,000. Notwithstanding the prohibitory act of America, which was passed in 1807, ships bearing the American flag continued to trade for slaves until 1809, when, in consequence of a decision in the English prize appeal courts which rendered American slave ships liable to capture and condemnation, that flag suddenly disappeared from the coast. Its place was almost instantaneously supplied by the Spanish flag, which, with one or two exceptions, was now seen for the first time on the African coast engaged in covering the slave trade.

This sudden substitution of the Spanish for the American flag seemed to confirm what was established in a variety of instances by more direct testimony, that the slave trade, which now for the first time assumed a Spanish dress, was in reality only the trade of other nations in disguise.

Query 5. To what parts of the continent of North or South America, or the islands in the West Indies, have these slaves been carried?

Answer 5. The slaves formerly taken from the coast by the French, Dutch, and Danes, were almost exclusively for the supply of their own colonies.

Until the abolition of the British and American slave trade, the Portuguese carried the slaves taken by them from the coast, with scarcely any exceptions, to the Brazils.

Subsequently to that event the Portuguese flag was for some years employed in carrying cargoes of slaves to the Spanish colonies.

This practice, however, was greatly checked at least, if not wholly suppressed, in consequence of instructions issued to British cruisers, authorizing them to bring in for adjudication such Portuguese ships as might be found carrying slaves to places not subject to the crown of Portugal.

For the last two or three years, therefore, the Portuguese flag has been almost exclusively used in carrying slaves to the Brazils.

Before the abolition of the American slave trade, a considerable number of slaves were constantly introduced into South Carolina and Louisiana. The chief part, however, of the American slave trade before that event, and nearly the whole of it afterwards, was carried on for the supply of the Spanish colonies.

From the year 1810, as has been already noticed, whatever slave trade may have been carried on by an American capital has been under the disguise of either the Portuguese or Spanish flag, but chiefly of the latter.

The English for many years were in the habit of supplying the colonies of Spain with a considerable number of slaves. The remainder of the slaves they carried from the coast was distributed throughout their own colonies. Between the years 1795 and 1805, the largest share of their slave trade was carried on for the supply of Dutch Guiana, then in the possession of Great Britain, Trinidad, and the conquered colonies. Cuba also continued to receive a considerable supply of slaves from the English.

In 1805 Great Britain prohibited the slave trade for the supply of the colonies she had captured during the war, and in the following year prohibited that for the supply of the colonies of any foreign power whatever. The whole of the slaves, therefore, taken from Africa by the English, in the year 1806 and 1807, excepting what may have been smuggled, must have been distributed among her old colonies, and in the prospect of the approaching abolition of the British slave trade, that number was very considerable.

Query 6. What is the present extent and nature of the contraband trade in slaves?

Query 7. By what description of persons, under what flag, upon what part of the coast, and for the supply of what market, is this illicit trade carried on?

Answer 6, 7. It would be impossible by any probable estimate to distinguish at the present moment the contraband slave trade from that which may be considered as legal. The whole of the slave trade, whether legal or contraband, which is now carried on from western Africa, passes, with a very few exceptions, under the Spanish and Portuguese flags; the former being seen chiefly to the north of the equator, and the latter to the south of it. The flag, however, affords but a very slight presumption of the real national character of the adventure. In the case of a very great majority of the vessels detained by our cruisers, it has proved a disguise assumed by the contraband trader in order to escape detention. Of the slaves exported from the western coast of Africa, at the present time, estimated, as has been already said, at upwards of 50,000, probably a half is carried off under the Spanish and the other half under the Portuguese flag. During the last months of 1814 and the first months of 1815 several ships bearing the French flag appeared on the African coast and carried off cargoes of slaves. Within the last twelve months, also, several vessels bearing the American flag have come upon the coast, professedly for the purpose of carrying on its innocent and legitimate commerce; meeting, however, as they conceived, with a convenient opportunity of carrying off a cargo of slaves for the Havana market, they have not scrupled to take them on board. Two vessels, under these circumstances, sailed from the Rio Nunez full of slaves, in January, 1816, and it is supposed reached the place of their destination in safety. Another vessel of the same description was captured in the Rio Pongas, in April, 1816, while employed in taking the slaves on board.

With these exceptions, the whole slave trade of western Africa, for the last six or seven years, has been carried on, it is believed, under the flags of Spain and Portugal.

The Spanish flag, however, is probably, in almost every case, a mere disguise, and covers not bona fide Spanish property, but the property of unlawful traders, whether English, American, or others.

It is a well known fact that until the year 1809 or 1810 the Spanish flag had not for a long time been engaged in the African slave trade, except in one or two instances. Its sudden and extensive appearance subsequently to that period furnishes, as has already been remarked, a very strong presumption of the fraudulent character of the adventurers which it is employed to protect.

The ordinary course of proceeding is this: the ship belonging to the unlawful trader calls at the Havana or Teneriffe, for the most part at the former port. A nominal sale of ship and cargo is there effected to some Spanish house, and regular Spanish papers and a nominal Spanish captain having been obtained, and her real captain having taken the character either of supercargo or passenger, she sails on her slave trading expedition as a Spanish ship.

Since the Portuguese have been restricted by treaty from trading for slaves on certain parts of the African coast, they have resorted to similar expedients for protecting their slave trading expeditions to places within the prohibited district. And at the present moment there is little doubt that a considerable part of the apparently Spanish slave trade which is carrying on to the north of the equator, where the Portuguese are forbidden to buy slaves, is really a Portuguese trade.

A further use is now found for the Spanish flag in protecting the French slave traders; and it is affirmed that the French ships fitted out in France for the slave trade call at Corunna for the purpose of effecting a nominal transfer of the property engaged in the illegal voyage to some Spanish house, and thus obtaining the requisite evidence of Spanish ownership.

In consequence of these uses to which the Spanish flag has been applied, a great increase of the apparently Spanish slave trade has taken place of late. And as the flag of that nation is permitted to range over the whole extent of the African coast, it seems to keep alive the slave trade in places from which it would otherwise have been shut out; and it has of late revived that trade in situations where it had been previously almost wholly extinguished.

The Portuguese flag is now chiefly seen to the south of the equator, although sometimes the Portuguese traders do not hesitate still to resort to the rivers between Whydow and the equator, even without a Spanish disguise. The only two cruisers which have recently visited that part of the coast found several ships under the Portuguese flag openly trading for slaves in Lago and the Bight of Benin.

In a great variety of cases the Portuguese flag has been found to cover the property of British or American slave traders. It will doubtless be now employed to protect also the slave traders of other nations by which the trade is prohibited. The limitation of that flag to parts south of the line renders it less desirable for a general voyage to the unlawful trader than the Spanish flag, which is under no local restriction.

The extraordinary facility with which a change may be effected in the national character of a ship and cargo intended to be employed in the slave trade has been judicially established in a great variety of instances. The Brazils and the island of Cuba form the great marts of the sale of the slaves carried from the western coast of Africa, exclusive of those smuggled into the British and restored French and Dutch colonies.

Query 8. Has this trade been lately carried on to a considerable extent on the coasts north of the equator?

Answer 8. The slave trade, under the circumstances stated in the answer to the last question, has certainly been carried on during the last two years to a great extent on the African coast north of the equator.

Query 9. By what description of persons and under what flag?

Answer 9. This question has been already answered.

Query 10. Have those fraudulent slave traders come in armed vessels, and have they employed force in order to effectuate their purposes?

Answer 10. During the last two years many slave ships have come to the coast armed, and have employed force to effectuate their purposes.

Query 11. When interrupted, have they threatened to return with armed ships of a larger class?

Answer 11. They have, and in some instances have executed their threats.

Query 12. From whence are these armed contrabandists chiefly fitted out?

Answer 12. A few of these armed ships have come from the Brazils, and one or two from Martinique; but for the most part they have come from the United States, having first obtained a Spanish disguise at the Havana. They have consisted chiefly of vessels which had been employed as American privateers during the war, and which sail uncommonly fast. In more than one instance they have come in small squadrons of two or three vessels, for the purpose of attacking and carrying any armed vessel which might obstruct their proceedings.

Query 13. What has been the effect produced by their depredations on the coast north of the line?

Answer 13. The effects of these proceedings have been highly detrimental. Exclusive of all the evils which are inseparable from a slave trade, under any circumstances, they have discouraged and in some cases crushed the first efforts to extend agriculture and legitimate commerce which had been produced in this quarter by the cessation for a time of the slave trade. Even the innocent commerce of Sierra Leone with the surrounding districts, which had tended more than anything else to give a steady impulse to the industry of the neighboring natives, has been subject to outrage and spoliation, attended in some cases with the loss of life. They operate most fatally in another point of view. The native chiefs and traders who began at length to be convinced, by the evidence of facts, that the abolition was likely to be permanently maintained, and that it was therefore absolutely necessary to engage heartily in schemes of cultivation, if they would preserve their influence, have learnt from recent events to distrust all such assurances. Notwithstanding all that had been said and done, they now see the slave traders again sweeping the whole range of coast without molestation; nay, with the air of triumph and defiance. It will be long, therefore, before they are likely to yield to the same conviction respecting the purposes of the European powers to abolish the slave trade which they had been led to admit. Even if effectual means should now be adopted for totally and finally abolishing this traffic, years will probably elapse before they will be induced to forego the expectation of its revival. It would be difficult fully to appreciate the deep and lasting injury inflicted on northern Africa by the transactions of the last two or three years. And this injury will be the greater on this account, that in the interior of that country, at least, they do not discriminate with any accuracy between the different nations of Europe. They only know in general that the white men who had ceased to trade in slaves, and who they understood were to trade no more in that commodity except as smugglers, liable to be seized and punished, have now resumed the open, avowed, and uncontrolled practice of that traffic.

Query 14. What system do you conceive best calculated to repress this evil?

Answer 14. I do not apprehend that the evil can be repressed, or even very materially alleviated, unless the abolition be made total and universal; and even then unless the slave trade be pronounced to be felonious and punished as such. At present no check whatever exists, not even that very inadequate one which in time of war arises from the right of search exercised by belligerents. It may be expected, therefore, that the slave trade, instead of being diminished, will increase from day to day. More prohibitory acts, even should they be adopted by all the powers of Europe, would be eluded unless regulations adapted to the very peculiar circumstances of the case were devised for confirming them.

Query 15. What progress had there been made during the war to exclude the trade in slaves from the coast of Africa north of the line?

Answer 15. The progress had been very considerable, as has been shown above, and was shown more largely by authentic documents communicated to Lord Castlereagh and the Duke of Wellington in 1814. The restoration of peace in Europe has been attended with very disastrous effects to this part of Africa.

Query 16. What effects can be traced to have arisen from such exclusion upon the interior civilization of industry, or upon the external commerce of this part of the coast, compared with what existed twenty years before.

Answer 16. In some remarks drawn up in August, 1814, on the subject of the legitimate commerce of Africa, it was very clearly shown that at that period a very considerable effect had been produced by the exclusion of the slave trade from northern Africa, imperfect as that exclusion was, on the external commerce, and consequently on the industry of that part of the coast, as compared with what existed twenty years before. Since 1814 the slave trade in northern Africa has unhappily experienced a very considerable revival, and it is to be apprehended that a corresponding check may have been given to the progress of industry and legitimate commerce.

It is obviously only when the slave trade has been eradicated that any marked progress in civilization can be expected. The existence of that trade is necessarily a bar to improvement. Supposing, however, that it should be effectually abolished, we are already in possession of very satisfactory evidence to show that there is nothing in the local circumstances of Africa, and as little in the character of her inhabitants, which would prevent, in their case at least, as rapid an advance in the arts of civilized life, and in the acquisition of moral and religious habits, as the world has witnessed in any other similar instance. A part of this evidence is derived from the colony of Sierra Leone. The population of that colony in 1809 did not exceed 1,500 souls, chiefly Africans. Since that time it has swelled to upwards of 10,000. This large increase consists almost entirely of persons who, having been rescued at different periods during the last seven years from the holds of slave ships, may be supposed, at the time of their introduction, to have stood at the lowest point of mental and moral depression.

The population of Sierra Leone, therefore, at this time exhibits all the varying shades of civilization, (varying partly according to the time that has elapsed since their introduction into the colony, and partly according to the character and opportunities of each individual,) from the enterprising trader, skilful mechanic, or industrious farmer, supporting himself and his family in comfort, and performing respectably his social and even religious duties, to the almost brutish state of the recently liberated captive.

Of these 10,000 Africans, all, excepting those who may yet be too young to labor, or who may have been too recently introduced into the colony to be able as yet to reap the fruits of their labors, maintain themselves by their own industry, chiefly in the cultivation of farms of their own. Making due allowance for previous habits and the difficulties arising from difference of language, they are found to be as susceptible of moral and intellectual culture as any people whatever.

In the month of October last the schools in the colony contained 1,237 scholars, whose advancement in knowledge was satisfactory to their instructors and to the Government; and it is said that a great eagerness existed among them to avail themselves of the means of instruction within their reach. The general conduct of the liberated captives has been such as to merit the approbation and confidence of their governors, and not a few have already so far improved their advantages as to be capable of discharging such subordinate judicial functions as jurors, constables, &c.

From the foundation of the colony, indeed, these functions have been almost exclusively discharged by Africans; and Sierra Leone exhibits the important example of a community of black men, living as freemen, enjoying the benefits of the British constitution, maintaining themselves by the ordinary pursuits of commerce, agriculture, or some mechanical art, fulfilling their various social and civil relations by the means only of such sanctions as the administration of British law and the precepts of charity impose upon them, and gradually improving, by means of schools and other institutions, in knowledge and civilization.

"A population of 10,000 freemen," observes Dr. Hogan, the chief judge of the colony, in a letter dated in October, 1816, "collected upon one spot, so favorably situated, and guided and governed with a view to such noble and ennobling objects, forms too grand a stride in the moral march of human affairs not to fix the attention of an enlightened observer. I take this colony, then, as it is, and, looking steadily to the great objects which it was from its first settlement intended to promote, am well content." He afterwards adds that, with so much to deplore as there necessarily must be in a population such as has been described, he distinctly perceives "all the principal elements of social order and effectual civilization in existence and vigor, requiring only the care of a skilful hand to mould them into form, and to collect from them the early fruits of a successful and rapid cultivation."

The case of Sierra Leone has been adduced chiefly for the purpose of showing that the African character is susceptible of improvement and civilization in a degree perhaps not inferior to any other. It was in that part of the coast adjoining to Sierra Leone that the slave trade was for a time most effectually extinguished; and the consequence of that suspension of the slave trade was a very considerable increase of innocent commerce, and particularly of the export of rice; of that article considerable quantities were carried, during the peninsular war, to Portugal and Spain, and many cargoes have also been carried to Madeira, Teneriffe, and the West Indies. The trade in rice was one which might have been indefinitely extended, provided the slave trade had not revived. There is reason to fear that its revival may destroy in the bud this promising branch of commerce.

Query 17. State what measures are now in progress for the improvement of Africa, and how they are likely to be affected by the continuance or discontinuance of this trade, partially or generally?

Answer 17. This question has received a partial answer above.

Sierra Leone and its immediate neighborhood may be considered as the only part of the African coast where plans of improvement can be pursued without immediately encountering the malignant influence of the slave trade. It is almost necessary, therefore, to confine within that sphere, at least for the present, the direct efforts made for the civilization and improvement of Africa. Even the establishment formed in the Rio Pongas for the instruction of the natives, it is feared, must be withdrawn in consequence of the revival of the slave trade.

At Sierra Leone between 1,200 and 1,300 African youths of both sexes, most of them rescued from the holds of slave ships, are now under instruction. These have been brought to Sierra Leone from all parts of Africa, from Senegal to Benzuela, so that there is scarcely a language spoken in that extensive range of coast which is not spoken by some of the Sierra Leone colonists.

In instructing these liberated captives, the views of their benefactors are by no means confined to the benefits which they themselves may derive from the instruction afforded them, but extend to the possibility that individuals may hereafter arise from among them who may convey to their own native regions that light which they have acquired at Sierra Leone.

Query 18. Is there any reason to apprehend that the contraband trade may become extensive in time of peace, even on the coast north of the line, where so considerable a progress had been made to suppress the slave trade generally, if some decisive measures are not adopted by the powers conjointly to repress the same?

Answer 18. There is the strongest reason to apprehend this consequence. Indeed, the event here only supposed possible is actually at this moment matter of history.

Query 19, 20. Has it not been found that the trade is conducted with peculiar inhumanity and waste of life by these illicit traders? State the instances that have latterly occurred to illustrate the fact.

Answer 19, 20. Undoubtedly. The slave ships are now crowded to excess, and the mortality is dreadful. The following are some of the instances which have come to our knowledge:

1. The Venus Havannera, under Spanish colors, of the burden of about 180 tons, carried off from the river Bonny 530 slaves. When captured on her passage to the Havana and carried into Tortola, the mortality was found to have amounted to 120.

2. La Manella, a ship of the burden of 272 tons, sailed under the Spanish flag and took on board in the river Bonny 642 slaves. The deaths on the passage to the West Indies, previous to her capture, amounted to 140.

3. The Gertrudes, a ship sailing under the Spanish flag, took on board upwards of 600 slaves. This ship was taken while yet on the African coast and brought to Sierra Leone for adjudication. But notwithstanding the short time that had elapsed since the slaves were taken on board, such was the dreadful state of crowding, that about 200 died before the ship was brought in, or within a short time after her arrival; many even of those who survived were so much debilitated by their sufferings as never to be likely to enjoy sound health.

4. Nueva Constitucion, a vessel under the Spanish flag, of only 30 tons burden, had on board 81 slaves; but having been brought in within a few days after the slaves had been taken on board, the bad effects which must have followed such a state of crowding on a very long passage were prevented.

5. The Maria Primeira, a ship under Portuguese colors, took on board upwards of 500 slaves. This number was reduced to 403, in consequence of extreme crowding, before she was brought into Sierra Leone; and nearly 100 more died soon after in consequence of the diseases contracted on board.

6. Portuguese brig San Antonio, of 120 tons, took on board 600 slaves; when captured, although she had only sailed 80 leagues, 30 slaves had already died and many more were found to be in a dying state, and died soon after. The capturing officer took 150 of the slaves on board his own ship to prevent the almost universal mortality he apprehended. When he first went on board the slave ship he found a dead body in a state of absolute putridity lying among the sick.

7. The Spanish ship Carlos, under 200 tons burden, took on board 512 negroes, in addition to a crew consisting of 84. About 80 slaves had died, previous to her capture, and the rest were in a most deplorable state. Many more instances might be added, but these may be considered as exhibiting the ordinary rate of mortality on board the ships engaged in the illicit slave trade.

Query 21. What has been the general influence observable on the interior of Africa by the successive acts of abolition on the part of different States?

Answer 21. Very little is known of the interior of Africa, or of the moral or political changes which take place there. Our knowledge is almost entirely confined to the banks of navigable rivers and to the line of the seacoast. There, indeed, the influence has been very observable of all the variations in the policy of European nations in respect to the slave trade, and perhaps some corresponding effect may be assumed to be produced in the interior regions which are removed from observation. Many proofs might be given of the evil effects produced on the coast of Africa by the vacillation and uncertainty which has attended the measure of abolition. And if any truth be more than another fully demonstrated by experience with respect to Africa, it is this: that without an effective abolition of the slave trade by all the powers of Europe it will be in vain to expect the development of the immense agricultural and commercial facilities of that continent; or that, except in very partial instances, the many millions of men by whom it is peopled should rise a single step in the scale of civilization above their present degraded level.

Query 22. What do you conceive would be the particular effect of an abolition of the slave trade on the part of Spain?

Answer 22. An abolition on the part of Spain would at once deliver the whole of northern Africa from the slave trade, provided effectual measures were taken to seize and punish illicit traders. The Spanish flag being now the only flag that can show itself in northern Africa engaged in the slave trade, the beneficial effects of such an arrangement may be inferred from what has been already said.

Another effect would be this: no slave trade would be lawful but what was found moving in the line between southern Africa and the Brazils, and no slave trader, therefore, could navigate any part of the Atlantic north of the equator; so that the risk of smuggling into the West India islands would be greatly lessened.

By the prolongation of the Spanish slave trade, on the contrary, not only is the whole of northern Africa, which would otherwise be exempt, given up to the ravages of that traffic, and the progress already made in improvement sacrificed, but facilities are afforded of smuggling into every island of the West Indies, which could not otherwise exist, and which, while slave ships may lawfully pass from Africa to Cuba and Porto Rico, it would perhaps be impossible to prevent.

Query 23. What amount of slaves do the Portuguese import annually into the kingdom of Brazil?

Answer 23. The number has been estimated at from 20,000 to 30,000 annually.

DECEMBER, 1816.

[Third inclosure in No. 2.]

Annex C to the protocol of the conference of the 4th of February, 1818.

Answers from Sierra Leone to the queries of Viscount Castlereagh, dated April, 1817.

Query 6. What is the present extent and nature of the contraband trade in slaves?

Answer 6. For some time past, especially after the settlement was formed in the Gambia, and previous to the recent transfer of Senegal and Goree to France, the contraband slave trade was confined to the part of the coast southward of the river Sherbró in latitude seven degrees north, with the exception of a few vessels which now and then took off slaves from Bissao and the trade carried on in the Rio Pongas.

The expedition of 1814 crushed the trade in the Rio Pongas for two years, but as many of the Rio Pongas traders have settled in the Havana, they have, since their recovery from that shock, returned to it with more eagerness and rapacity than ever.

From Sherbró and the Gallinas to Cape Appolonia a most extensive and by far the most abominable slave trade is carried on; in this district the practice of kidnapping the natives who go off in canoes is chiefly pursued; the vessels employed for this part of the coast are generally under the Spanish flag, but connected with former and present slave factors on that part of the coast.

It is supposed that very little, if any, slave trade is carried on between Cape Appolonia and Popo, where the Portuguese factories commence, and from which place to their most southern settlements a very extensive trade is carried on.

It is generally carried on in large schooners and brigs, well armed and manned, and from the circumstance of slaves being cheaper on the coast than whilst the slave trade was permitted by Great Britain and America, and from the risks run in each voyage, they crowd their vessels to an inhuman and destructive degree.

The vessels are chosen for their force and swiftness, without the least regard to the accommodation or the comforts of the slaves; and the persons chosen to man and command these vessels are certainly far more celebrated for their ferocity and daring spirit than for their humanity.

There can be no doubt but that a very great proportion of the slaves carried from the coast are fairly purchased from the factories by the slave captains, however unjustly they may have come into the possession of the factors, still it is equally notorious that the Havana traders do, whenever there is an opportunity, kidnap and carry off the free natives.

Query 7 By what description of persons, under what flags, upon what part of the coast, and for the supply of what market, is this illicit trade carried on?

Answer 7. The greatest part of, indeed nearly the entire slave trade on the windward coast is carried on by vessel fitted out from the Havana and other ports in the island of Cuba, though many vessels come for slaves from Old Spain and Teneriffe, but their ulterior destination is ostensibly for the Havana.

Several vessels have been fitted out from France, as the "Rodeur," from Nantes, and from the French West India islands, as the "Louis."

Though the settlements of Senegal and Goree have been delivered up so very lately to France, yet there is a very active and extensive slave trade already carrying on from those places and the adjacent countries; some of the vessels are from France, some from Teneriffe; and there can be no doubt but that this last mentioned place, from its vicinity to these settlements, will, in a very short time, become the depot for vessels intended to be employed in this trade on the windward coast.

From experience in the trade, it has now become the practice to have their vessels manned, &c., as much as possible with Spanish subjects, and the voyage under the control of a Spaniard. But this is far from being universally the case. It has been clearly proved in many instances that the property was not Spanish: for instance, the Dolores proved to be English; the Paz, English and American; the Theresa, English and French; the Triomphante, Portuguese, &c., with many others, besides the vessels sent out by several English subjects resident in the Havana.

The Alexander and Triumverata were both under the command of American subjects, and came directly from North America to the coast, though documented with Spanish papers from the Spanish consuls residing in ports from whence they sailed.

The exertions of Captain Irby and Captain Scobell induced the Portuguese traders to confine themselves to their own factories in the Bight of Benin, or rather to those parts of the Bight which are considered as Portuguese.

With the exception of those places, where I fancy little but Portuguese slave trading is carried on, the greatest part of that trade from Sherbró to Cape Appolonia and among the rivers on the coast, as well as at Cape Formosa and Gaboon, is under the Spanish flag; and there is every reason to believe that three-fourths of the slaves carried from the coast north of the line (except by the Portuguese in the Bight of the Benin) are procured in the extensive rivers of Calabar, Cameroons, Bonny, Gaboon, &c.

A very extensive Portuguese slave trade is carried on in the Bight of Benin and Biafra, especially about Popo, Whydaw, and the Cameroons, and those vessels wishing to trade in slaves from the Gaboons and the places adjoining lie at Cape Lopez, in about one south, and send their large launches to those places to trade, and small craft are, also, constantly employed in carrying slaves from those places to St. Thomas, from whence they are shipped across the Atlantic; these facts have been repeatedly proved in the court of vice admiralty here, for instance, in the case of the Ceres, Joanna, Caroline, Dos Amigos, &c.

The islands of Cuba and Porto Rico are held out by the vessels under the Spanish flag as their ports of destination though there can be very little doubt but that many are intended for, and actually do unload at, the French West India islands. What becomes of the slaves after their arrival at the island of Cuba is no part of this question.

The Portuguese carry the greatest part of their slaves to Brazil, though many vessels, as the General Silveria and the Temerario, were intended for the Havana. It clearly appears, from the cases of the Intrepida and others, that a very considerable trade in slaves is carried on between the Brazils and that place. It may also be proper to remark that, from the open confessions of all the masters and super-cargoes of slave vessels brought in here, a most extensive slave trade is carried on at every part of the coast distant from a British settlement. So eager are the slave traders to carry on this trade, that after the cession of Goree and Senegal to France, but before the British troops had all left the former place, 200 slaves were actually exported from it. The Moorish princes are already ravaging the negro towns within their reach.

Query 8. Has this trade been lately carried on to a considerable extent on the coast north of the equator?

Answer 8. The preceding observations apply chiefly to the trade carried on north of the line; few of our cruisers go to the south of it, consequently very few vessels from that part of the coast are detained or sent in here. On this account it is difficult to form any opinion at this place on the trade carried on there, although no doubt can be entertained that it is still more extensive than that carried on to the north. Nearly all these observations are therefore intended for the trade north of the line; the extent and misery of which, though dreadful, are not one-half of what is entailed on the western coast of this continent.

Query 9. By what description of persons and under what flag?

Answer 9. It is impossible, from the art with which experience has taught them to cover their vessels, to say how much of the slave trade carried on is bona fide the property of the nation whose flag it bears; but from the proportion of vessels amongst those sent to this port for adjudication, which have been clearly proved to be fraudulently disguised, there is no doubt but that much English but more American property is engaged in it. The captain and supercargo are generally also Spanish subjects, though many instances have occurred to the contrary, and during the war the sailors were often of that nation. Since the war, however, this practice is altered. The large American privateers have been completely fitted out in America, with the exception, perhaps, of the gratings, and have come to the Havana fully manned, where a sale, or pretended sale having taken place, a Spanish subject or two are put on board, whilst the American mate and sailors remain, engage for a new voyage, and come upon the coasts; and there is too much reason to believe at present that many English sailors are also engaged in these vessels. With the exception of the Portuguese flag in the Bight of Benin and Biafra and the rivers near the line, the trade carried on to the north is chiefly under the Spanish flag; though a few vessels, like the Louis, (French,) Rebecca, (American,) and two schooners (French) now said to be trading in slaves in the Gaboon, do now and then appear under their own flag. Some vessels, as the Catalina, have been also fitted out from Jamaica.

Query 10. Have these fraudulent slave traders come in armed vessels, and have they employed force to effectuate their purpose?

Answer 10. The fact is so notorious that the best answer to this query may be an enumeration of some cases concerning which we have certain information.

1. The schooner, name unknown, which destroyed the brig Kitty, of Liverpool, murdered the master, (Roach,) and carried the black people, two of whom were captured negroes of Sierra Leone, as slaves to the Havana.

2. The Camperdown, a brig of sixteen guns, and a large complement of men, commanded by the same person as the preceding. She destroyed the sloops Rambler and Trial, belonging to this port, and carried the blacks off as slaves. It is supposed that she carried off at least two hundred free blacks in her different voyages, as she made slaves of all the people going off in canoes. She had several skirmishes with the Princess Charlotte, and was once chased by the Creole and Astrea.

3. The Laura Anna, taken in the Rio Nunez, where they were obliged to promise the sailors their wages to prevent an action.

4. The Venganza, which fought the party sent to the Gambia after her, and at last blew up whilst engaging.

5. The Moulatto, a large black schooner from the Havana, which made two or three voyages to the coast, carried off a great number of free negroes, and beat the Princess Charlotte off.

6. A large black schooner, her companion, which also beat the Princess Charlotte off.

7. The Paz, which, under the American flag, beat off the Princess Charlotte and killed several of her men.

8. The Leal, Portuguese, a large brig under Portuguese colors, with twelve or fourteen guns, fought the Princess Charlotte off Lagos for a long time, but was taken.

9. The Rosa, formerly the American privateer Commodore Perry, fitted out in America and manned with Americans, but supposed to be the property of an Englishman, who was an old slave trader and partner of Boostock at Mesurado, fought the boats of his Majesty's ship Bann and the commissioned sloop Mary for some time, but was at length captured.

10. The schooner Guadaloupe, taken by the Young Princess Charlotte. Besides their regular charge of two round shot, ten guns were each of them loaded with bags of five hundred musket balls. She was taken by boarding.

11. Brig Temerario, from Brazil. She was built on purpose for this forced trade, has eighteen guns, which were cast on purpose with her name on them. She made one voyage to the coast, when she was chased by the Princess Charlotte, but escaped. On her second voyage she was taken, after an action of two hours, by his Majesty's ship Bann. She had a complement of eighty men.

12. Schooner Dolores, formerly American schooner Commodore M'Donough, said to belong to an English house in the Havana, taken after a severe action by his Majesty's ship Forrest.

13. Brig Nueva Paz, formerly the American privateer Argus, fitted from America, though supposed in part to be British property, and manned with Americans and English. She took and plundered the schooner Apollo, of this port, and made an attack on the Prince Regent, but was captured by boarding after a short but severe action.

14. Schooner Carmen, from Brazils, taken for slave trading to the north of the line.

15. Schooner Triumphante, from Havana, late the American privateer Criterion, of sixteen guns, commanded by a Portuguese subject, taken by the boats of the Prince Regent, after a severe action, in the river Cameroons.

16. American schooner Dorset, from Baltimore direct, called the Spanish schooner Triumvirate, with an American supercargo, a Spanish captain, and American, French, English, and Spanish crew, taken after a smart action in the Rio Pongas, last January, by a vessel from this place.

17. A large schooner, name unknown, supposed from the Havana, took and plundered the brig Industry, of this port, last November, and carried the greatest part of the crew off as slaves.

18. Saucy Jack, an American privateer, which carried off a cargo of slaves in 1814, and, I believe, convoyed several vessels to and from the coast. He boarded, but did not molest, a sloop from this place to Goree, with rice.

These are specific instances, which have all been proved before some court of justice, and it is notorious that these are not one-eighth part of the vessels of this description which come on the coast for the purpose of carrying on this trade.

It has also lately become the practice of these vessels to sail in company. Captain Lawson, of the ship Diana, wished last year to seize one in the river Bonny, (or Calabar,) but durst not, and Captain Hogan, during his last cruise in the Prince Regent, looked into their rivers, but durst not go in, though he had a crew of one hundred and twenty men.

Query 11. When interrupted, have they threatened to return with armed ships of a larger class?

Answer 11. Yes, almost uniformly; although, from the universality of the trade, it is difficult to remember every particular instance.

The Nueva Paz was one where the threat was put in execution; and one of the most violent of the slave traders has very lately returned to the Gallinas and sent up a message by an American that he was waiting for the Prince Regent. Unfortunately, she was unrigged and repairing at Bance Island, which gave an opportunity to the trader of carrying off a cargo of slaves. The Dolores and Temerario were avowedly fitted out for the destruction of the colonial brig, and there can be no doubt but that very violent and powerful attempts will be made for that purpose, as, from the great annoyance she has been to the slave traders, the constant terror which has existed of her being found between Cape Verd and Cape Palmas—a circumstance which has prevented many vessels from carrying on the slave trade in these limits—and from the number of vessels she has captured, she is the greatest object of hatred and detestation to the slave merchants.

Query 12. From whence are these armed contrabandists chiefly fitted out?

Answer 12. The Havana is the port from which the majority of these vessels are fitted out, though many of them, as the old American privateers, are fitted out in America, and only go to the Havana for papers; and whilst some, like the Triumvirata, also Dorset, have the papers carried from the Havana to America, a few, like the Louis, are fitted out from the French islands; and the Portuguese come from the Brazil.

Query 13. What has been the effect produced by their depredations on the north coast of the line?

Answer 13. The worst consequence of this contraband trade, as far as respects the civilization of the coast and the turning of the natives from this inhuman and destructive trade to the arts of social life and the pursuits of an innocent commerce, is, that the natives will never believe that the abolition is really to take place; and as long as one slave ship is allowed to visit the coast the natives will always be looking forward to more, and will never believe it to be for their interest to change their present pursuits.

There can be no doubt but that the natives, immediately after the English abolition act took place, were more inclined to believe in the probability of an universal abolition of the trade than they are now. A stop was put to the trade for some time, and it was nearly two years before the slave traders took to other flags, and in this interim the natives began to look forward to some other means of procuring the luxuries and necessaries of life; a few vessels, with American and English men and papers and a foreign flag, began at last to appear, and the hopes of the slave factors for a renewal of this trade to revive; and it has now increased to such an extent that the slave traders who frequent the part of the coast near Sierra Leone destroy every vessel they meet, unless of very considerable force, and these they drive away. This at first had merely the effect of injuring the owners of these vessels, but the practice being continued, and the slave traders having declared their determination to persist in it, whatever might be the consequence, no English vessel, especially if connected with this place, dare show itself on the neighboring coasts; the result of which is clear: the innocent coasting trade is completely destroyed, nothing but a large English vessel dare go, these go but seldom, and the natives, thus deprived of every other means of acquiring what to them have by habit become necessaries of life, must engage in the slave trade.

Query 14. What system do you conceive best calculated to repair this evil?

Answer 14. This certainly is a question which requires the greatest consideration and which will be very difficult to solve; as, however, we have the advantage of some experience to guide us, we may be more able to decide it now with the prospect of success than any person could have done in 1807.

The following points must be firmly established before any adequate success can be expected to follow the greatest efforts:

1. That the prohibition be positive and universal, and that all persons agree in the same regulations for its extinction.

2. That the penalties inflicted on persons and property engaged in it be severe and certain.

3. That power be given to all the contracting parties to enforce these regulations; that the force employed for this purpose be adequate to the object for which it is intended, and that the remuneration offered to the persons employed in this service be certain and easily obtained.

It must be clear and evident that whilst any one power is allowed to carry on the trade the subjects of the other powers (wishing to be engaged in it) will cover themselves under the flag of the permitting power, and, from the experience these men have had in the art of fraudulent disguise, will cover themselves beyond the possibility of detection. We need look no further for a proof of this than to the difference between the Spanish slave trade before the war, in the years 1808, 1809, and now.

It is also clear, that to make this a common cause, and not the cause of each State entering into the agreement, the regulations, provisions, and penalties attached to it should be the same in all; and that it should not only be agreed upon between the States, but that every individual State should make a positive internal law upon the subject, embracing all the regulations, &c. And this is the more necessary to prevent any future collisions or jealousies in enforcing the penalties, for if the parties are honest in the cause, and the penalties to be inflicted by all the parties are equal, no difficulties can arise; but if they are unequal, a very great ground is laid for complaints, reproaches, and disputes, which would at once destroy everything which had previously been done.

As this may be a matter of much dispute, the following plan is proposed as less liable to objection:

That all property found engaged in the trade, either in the inception, the prosecution, or the conclusion, be confiscated to the seizer's use, either by the courts of his own country or by a tribunal to be specially appointed for that purpose.

That the sentence of inferior courts be final and conclusive whenever slaves are found on board.

That an appeal be allowed if no slaves are on board. That some further punishment should be inflicted on the parties engaged, which, in case of resistance, should be much severer than when none was made; and that this punishment should be inflicted as agreed on between the contracting parties.

That death should be inflicted by the courts of the party's own country on the officers of any ship where free natives had been kidnapped or any persons killed by their piratical resistance.

Neither agreements, regulations, nor penalties will be of any use, unless the contracting parties are determined, one and all, to enforce them upon every person found engaged in the trade, and also to use every means of detecting them. This is an object which cannot be obtained with a small force.

A large one must at first be employed; but there is every reason to believe that this force, if actively and properly employed, would soon render it safe to reduce it.

The whole coast of Africa will be frequented by the smugglers, and smugglers there will be, unless some very energetic measures are adopted to prevent the importation of slaves into the trans-Atlantic world; and it is not to be supposed for a moment that the coast of Africa can be guarded by one ship.

Query 15. What progress had there been made during the war to exclude the trade in slaves from the coast of Africa north of the line?

Answer 15. Whatever exclusion has taken place during the last war must be attributed chiefly to the war itself and the activity of the officers employed. Generally one, sometimes two, and now and then three ships-of-war were on the coast. After the settlement was formed in the Gambia the slave trade was completely excluded to the northward of Bissao; the trade between that place and Popo was reduced from a most extensive and open trade to a comparatively small and smuggling one. It was entirely suppressed for a considerable distance round the British settlements.

Query 16. What effect can be traced to have arisen from such exclusion upon the interior civilization and industry, or upon the external commerce of this part of the coast, compared with what existed twenty years before?

Answer 16. The civilization, to a certain degree, of the natives, for some distance around the British settlements, and in those places where the trade was entirely excluded, is the effect of the partial abolition; the natives have also become more peaceable and quiet, and have turned their attention to the arts of a civilized life, and have left off those practices whose only object was to procure slaves. In places where the exclusion of the trade has only been partial these advantages have not arisen. Wars, kidnappings, and false trials have not been so frequent, because the demand for slaves was small; still they existed, and the natives, with minds unchanged, continued to have recourse to them when slaves were wanted. No doubt can exist but that these circumstances have affected the very interior of the continent, and that though not more civilized, yet they have been more peaceable and quiet since the abolition than before, for the slaves procured are not more in number than answer the present comparatively small demand. The effects upon the external commerce of the coast has been astonishing; compare the imports into England at present with what they were twenty years ago. Let it also be considered that not one third, perhaps not one quarter, of the trade goes to England, and then some ideas may be formed of the capabilities of the coast of Africa to carry on an immense traffic in innocent articles. A complete exclusion would do more to promote this object in five years than a partial one in fifty.

Query 17. State what measures are now in progress for the improvement of Africa, and how they are likely to be affected by the continuance of the trade, partially or generally?

Answer 17. Little can be here said upon the measures in progress for the civilization of Africa which is not known already. Since Senegal and Goree have been transferred, those measures are nearly confined to Sierra Leone. Here the greatest improvements have been and are still making, and hence must the civilization of Africa proceed. With common attention a large number of persons may be educated, anxious and capable of spreading the blessings they have received throughout their native continent. But where the slave trade is allowed no improvements can come; its pestiferous breath blasts at once the hopes of the philanthropist and the missionary, and a train of desolation, barbarity, and misery follows close on the steps of the slave trader.

Query 18. Is there any reason to apprehend that the contraband trade may become extensive in time of peace, even on the coast north of the line, where so considerable a progress had been made to suppress the slave trade generally, if some decisive measures are not adopted by the powers conjointly to suppress the same?

Answer 18. Of this not a doubt can exist. It will be carried on more extensively and more ferociously than ever. It is since the conclusion of the war that the large armed vessels have increased so very considerably. Whilst the war existed, and condemnation followed resistance, those persons who thought their property secure if taken before courts of justice sent out unarmed and heavy sailing vessels; now that there is no penalty attached to it, every person engaging in the trade will send to the coast vessels well armed and manned, with orders to fight their way through every obstacle. The wages they give are enormous, from seven to ten pounds per month; and, in consequence, their vessels will be soon manned with entire crews of American and English sailors. The greatest enormities will be perpetrated, and, unless not only the right of search, with condemnation for resistance, be allowed, but also very vigorous measures be adopted to enforce it, these crimes must all pass unpunished.

SIERRA LEONE, April, 1817.

Annex D to the protocol of the conference of the 4th of February, 1818.

Letter of Z. Macaulay, Esq., to Viscount Castlereagh, dated

LONDON, December 20, 1817.

MY LORD: I have been honored with your lordship's note of the 13th instant, acknowledging the receipt of the answers made on the 26th December, 1816, to the queries which your lordship had proposed relative to the then state of the African slave trade, and requesting the communication of such further intelligence as I might have since obtained. The answers to the same queries which I delivered last week to Mr. Planta were written on the coast of Africa in the month of April last, and therefore apply to a period six months later than that to which my answers refer. Since that time I have not received from Africa any detailed communications on this subject. Such as I have received I will now lay before your lordship.

Colonel Mac Carthy, the Governor of Sierra Leone, in a letter dated April 20, 1817, observes, "I am grieved to say that there is nothing favorable to state with respect to the slave trade, which has not only been renewed in those places from which it had been driven, but actually extended three times as far as at any period during the late war." This representation has been fully confirmed to me, and it is added, "that the slave trade is now openly and undisguisedly carried on both at Senegal and Goree."

Governor Mac Carthy, in a subsequent letter, dated June 10, 1817, says: "The slave trade is carried on most vigorously by the Spaniards, Portuguese, Americans, and French. I have had it affirmed from several quarters, and do believe it to be a fact, that there is a greater number of vessels employed in that traffic than at any former period." To the same effect are the letters I have received from Sierra Leone, which, under date of 28th June, 1817, state as follows: "The coast is crowded with slave ships, and no trade can be done where they are. We could get rice to leeward, but dare not go there, as we are certain of being plundered by them. I saw it mentioned in a London newspaper, that a Carthaginian pirate had been plundering our vessels. It was a Havana slave ship, and all the Spaniards who come on the coast swear to do the same whenever they have it in their power. If this should be suffered, we must give up all the trade, and leave the African coast to the slave dealers."

On the 20th of July, 1817, it is further stated as follows: "The slave trade is raging dreadfully on the coast. Goree has become quite an emporium of this traffic. Our merchants are losing the whole trade of the coast. The whole benefit of it accrues to the slave dealers. No other trade can be carried on where the slave trade prevails."

This view of the subject is confirmed in a report recently published by the Church Missionary Society in Africa and the east. The committee of that society, in communicating to its subscribers the substance of the information recently received from their missionaries on the windward coast of Africa, observes as follows: "The natives saw the missionaries sit down in the midst of them while the slave trade was yet a traffic, sanctioned by the laws of this country and of the civilized world. They utterly disbelieved at first the professions of the missionaries; and, when at length brought by their patient and consistent conduct to believe them, yet so debased were their minds by that traffic which our nation in particular had so long maintained among them, that they had no other value for the education offered to their children than as they conceived it would make them more cunning than their neighbors. But the missionaries gladly became the teachers of their children, in the hope that they should outlive the difficulties which then opposed their mission. The act of abolition seemed to open a bright prospect to the friends of Africa. The numerous slave factories which crowded the Rio Pongas vanished, and Christian churches began to spring up in their room. The country was gradually opening itself to the instruction of the missionaries, when the revival of the slave trade by some of the European powers proved a temptation too great to be resisted. At the moment when the natives began to assemble to hear the missionaries preach, and even to erect houses for the worship of God, at this moment their ancient enemy comes in like a flood, and, it is to be feared, will drive away our missionaries for a time. So great is the demoralizing effect of the slave trade, and so inveterate the evil habits which it generates, that it is not improbable it may be necessary to withdraw wholly, for the present, the society's settlements formed beyond the precincts of the colony of Sierra Leone." Subsequent accounts render it probable that this anticipation has been actually realized.

In addition to the facts already adduced to show the prevalence of French slave trade, a letter from Dominica, dated January 7, 1817, states, "that in the month of November, 1816, a Portuguese brig, the Elenora, of Lisbon, with 265 Africans, from Gaboon, arrived off St. Pierre's, in Martinique, and on the 25th of the same month landed them at Carlet, between St. Pierre's and Fort Royal, the brig afterwards returning to the former port." It was also known that two vessels had been fitted out and despatched from St. Pierre's to the coast of Africa for slaves, and that at the same time a fast-sailing schooner was about to depart for a similar purpose. "The impunity," it is added, "which these infractions of treaties meet with in the French colonies will no doubt increase the repetition of them to an unbounded degree." In a subsequent letter, dated Dominica, September 4, 1817, it is observed: "A few weeks ago a large ship arrived from the coast of Africa, and landed at Martinique more than five hundred slaves; they were disembarked some little distance from St. Pierre's, and marched in by twenties."

In addition to these instances of slave trading, I have to state that a gentleman who returned about a fortnight since from a voyage to the coast of Africa informed me that while he was lying (about three or four months ago) in the river Gambia two French vessels navigating under the white flag carried off openly from that river 350 slaves.

The following extract of a letter from Cape Coast Castle, March 5, 1817, shows that the Dutch functionaries in that quarter, notwithstanding the decrees of their Government, are actively engaged in the slave trade. "We deem it our duty to inform you of the conduct of the Governor of Elmina; we are well aware that a particular feature in the Dutch Government at this time is the desire of preventing the slave trade, which their representative in this country takes every opportunity of aiding and abetting. Portuguese vessels are furnished with canoes, and Spaniards supplied with water. The beginning of last month a Spanish ship was four days at anchor in Elmina, receiving water and bartering dollars for such goods as were suited for the purchase of slaves. This vessel proceeded a short distance to leeward, and came to anchor off Opam, a place about eight miles to the eastward of Tantum, where the master purchased to the number of 400 slaves, and carried them off to the coast; a Spanish schooner also took slaves off from the same neighborhood about three months ago."

I have the honor to be, &c.,

Z. MACAULEY.

Protocol of the conference between the plenipotentiaries of the five powers of February 7, 1818.

Present: Baron De Humboldt, Lord Castlereagh, Count Lieven, Marquis D'Osmond, and Prince Esterhazy.

The protocol of the last conference being read, the plenipotentiaries approved and signed it.

Count Palmella having accepted the verbal invitation which, in conformity to what had been agreed upon at the conference of the 4th of February last, was made to him by the plenipotentiaries, Lord Castlereagh communicates to him the convention concluded between his Government and that of Spain on the 23d September, 1817, relative to the abolition of the slave trade, and invites him, in concert with the plenipotentiaries his colleagues, to add his efforts to theirs for the attainment of an object so interesting to humanity, and which can only be completed when his most faithful Majesty shall have adopted similar measures.

Count Palmella replied, that in accepting, by his note of the 17th February, 1817, the invitation which had been addressed to his predecessor to take part in the conferences held in pursuance of the additional article of the treaty of Paris of the 20th of November, 1815, he had, by order of his court, declared the conditions upon which he was authorized to assist at these conferences, and that he did not doubt, from the renewed invitation he had just received from the plenipotentiaries, but that those "bases" had been accepted, the more so as they were entirely grounded upon the most just principles.

Count Palmella added, that he would lose no time in transmitting to his court the communication of the treaty just concluded between the British and Spanish Governments for the abolition of the slave trade on the part of the subjects of his Catholic Majesty; and that his most faithful Majesty, according to the known principles professed by him individually, would doubtless behold with the most perfect satisfaction the advantages which would thereby result to the cause of humanity; which principles his plenipotentiaries had solemnly declared at the Congress of Vienna, and to which Count Palmella entirely referred himself, as also to the explanations given at the same period respecting the circumstances particularly affecting the Brazils.

Upon which the sitting was adjourned.

Protocol of the conference between the plenipotentiaries of the five powers of February 11, 1818.

Present: Lord Castlereagh, Count Lieven, Baron De Humboldt, Marquis D'Osmont, and Prince Esterhazy.

The protocol of the last conference of the 7th February being read, was approved and signed.

Count Palmella having declared himself, at the conference of the 7th of February, ready to receive and transmit to his court the communication of the convention concluded between Great Britain and Spain, under date of the 23d of September, 1817, the plenipotentiaries agree to inclose the same to him in a note, which is annexed to this protocol, sub. lit. A.

The plenipotentiaries do not consider themselves called upon to enter at present into discussion on the subject of the conditions stated in Count Palmella's official note of the 17th of February, 1817, and to which he alluded at the last conference, thinking it sufficient to refer, as to the principal object of their present proceeding, entirely to what is to be found in the protocols of the conferences held on this subject at the Congress of Vienna, as also to the solemn declaration of the powers, dated on the 8th of February, 1815, made at the said Congress.

Annex A to the protocol of the conference of the 11th of February, 1818.

Note of the plenipotentiaries of the five powers to Count Palmella.

LONDON, December 11, 1817.

The undersigned, in reference to the communication made to Count Palmella at the conference of the 7th instant, lose no time in having the honor of transmitting herewith inclosed to his excellency the treaty concluded between his Britannic Majesty and his Catholic Majesty, which stipulates on the part of Spain the final abolition of the slave trade, and thus offers a very satisfactory result to the solicitude which their respective courts evince for the fulfilment of the engagements they have contracted by the additional article of the treaty of Paris of the 20th of November, 1815. The complete attainment of this interesting object, now solely depending on the abandonment by the court of Portugal of that part of the slave trade which she has still reserved to herself south of the line, the undersigned have the honor to invite Count Palmella to solicit from his court full powers to enable him to act in concert with them towards the accomplishment of so desirable an object.

They have at the same time the honor to add herewith extracts from the protocols of the two last conferences on this subject for his excellency's information, and they avail themselves of this opportunity to offer him the assurances of their distinguished consideration.

Extract of the protocol of the sitting of the 14th of February, 1818.

Present: The Marquis D'Osmond, Lord Castlereagh, Baron De Humboldt, Prince Esterhazy, and Count De Lieven.

The plenipotentiaries having approved the protocol of the last conference of the 11th of February, it is signed.

The answer of the Count de Palmella to the note which the plenipotentiaries addressed to him on the 11th of February is read and placed upon the present protocol, sub. lit. A.

[Inclosure in No. 5.]

Annex A to the protocol of the 14th of February, 1818.

LONDON, February 12, 1818.

The undersigned has received the note which the plenipotentiaries of those courts who signed the additional article of the treaty of Paris of the 20th of November, 1815, have done him the honor to address to him under the date of yesterday.

He will take the earliest opportunity of conveying to the knowledge of his court the treaty concluded between his Britannic Majesty and his Catholic Majesty, which their excellencies have been pleased to communicate to him officially, together with the extracts of the protocols of their two last conferences on this subject.

The undersigned, being already furnished with the full powers and instructions necessary to enable him to assist at the conferences held by their excellencies, and to discuss in concert with them the means of attaining the desirable objects in question, does not think himself entitled to ask for new full powers unless the question should positively change its nature by a refusal (which the undersigned cannot possibly expect from the plenipotentiaries) to admit on their part the principles put forth in the first note which he had the honor to address to them. Whenever their excellencies shall think themselves called upon to enter into the discussion of those principles, they will see that they all evidently and immediately spring from the declaration of the Congress of Vienna of the 8th February, 1815, and from the treaty concluded at the period of the said Congress between his most faithful Majesty and his Britannic Majesty for the extinction of the slave trade to the north of the line.

The undersigned takes this opportunity of offering to their excellencies the assurance of his high consideration.

THE COUNT DE PALMELLA.

Memorandum.—The plenipotentiaries, having reason to understand that the instructions under which Count Palmella acted were not of a nature which would enable him to conclude any convention assigning any fixed period for the abolition on the part of Portugal without reference to his Government, did not think it expedient to enter, under such circumstances, into further discussions with Count Palmella, inasmuch as they conceived that such discussions could not have led to any satisfactory result.

UNITED STATES.

No. VI.

Letter from Viscount Castlereagh to Richard Rush, Esq., American minister in London, dated

FOREIGN OFFICE, June 20, 1818.

SIR: The distinguished share which the Government of the United States has, from the earliest period, borne in advancing the cause of the abolition of the slave trade, makes the British Government desirous of submitting to their favorable consideration whatever may appear to them calculated to bring about the final accomplishment of this great work of humanity. The laudable anxiety with which you personally interest yourself in whatever is passing upon this important subject will have led you to perceive that, with the exception of the crown of Portugal, all States have now either actually prohibited the traffic in slaves to their subjects or fixed an early period for its cessation, whilst Portugal has also renounced it to the north of the equator. From May, 1820, there will not be a flag which can legally cover this detested traffic to the north of the line, and there is reason to hope that the Portuguese may ere long be also prepared to abandon it to the south of the equator; but so long as some effectual concert is not established amongst the principal maritime powers for preventing their respective flags from being made a cover for any illicit slave trade, there is but too much reason to fear, whatever may be the state of the law on this subject, that the evil will continue to exist, and, in proportion as it assumes a contraband form, that it will be carried on under the most aggravated circumstances of cruelty and desolation. It is from a deep conviction of this truth, founded upon experience, that the British Government, in all its late negotiations upon this subject, has endeavored to combine a system of alliance for the suppression of this most abusive practice, with the engagements which it has succeeded in contracting with the Governments of Spain and Portugal for the total or partial abolition of the slave trade. I have now the honor to inclose to you copies of the treaties which have been happily concluded with those powers, together with the acts which have recently passed the legislature for carrying the same into execution.

I have also the satisfaction to transmit to you copies of a treaty which has been recently concluded with the King of the Netherlands for the like purpose, though at too late a period in the session to admit of its provisions receiving the sanction of Parliament. I am induced to call your attention more particularly to this convention, as it contains certain provisions which were calculated to limit in some respects the powers mutually conceded by the former treaties in a manner which, without essentially weakening their force, may render them acceptable to the contracting parties.

The intimate knowledge which you possess of this whole subject renders it unnecessary for me, in requesting you to bring these documents to the observation of your Government, to accompany them with any more detailed explanations. What I have earnestly to beg of you is, to bring them under the serious consideration of the President, intimating to him the earnest wish of the British Government, that the exertions of the two States may be combined upon a somewhat similar principle to put down this great moral disobedience wherever it may be committed to the laws of both countries. I am confident this cannot effectually be done except by mutually conceding to each other's ships-of-war a qualified right of search, with a power of detaining the vessels of either State with slaves actually on board. You will perceive in these conventions a studious and, I trust, a successful attempt to narrow and limit this power within due bounds, and to guard it against perversion.

If the American Government is disposed to enter into a similar concert, and can suggest any further regulations the better to obviate abuse, this Government will be most ready to listen to any suggestion of this nature; their only object being to contribute, by every effort in their power, to put an end to this disgraceful traffic.

I am, &c.,

CASTLEREAGH.

RICHARD RUSH, Esq., &c.

No. VII.

Letter from Richard Rush, Esq., to Viscount Castlereagh, dated

LONDON, June 23, 1818.

MY LORD: I have been honored with your lordship's note of the 20th of this month, inclosing copies of treaties recently concluded between this Government and the Governments of Portugal, Spain, and the Netherlands, respectively, in relation to the slave trade, and designed to draw the attention of the Government of the United States to this subject, with a view to its co-operation, upon principles similar to those held out in these treaties, in measures that may tend to the more complete and universal abolition of the traffic.

The United States, from an early day of their history, have regarded with deep and uniform abhorrence the existence of a traffic attended by such complications of misery and guilt. Its transcendent evils roused throughout all ranks a corresponding zeal for their extirpation; one step followed another until humanity triumphed; and against its continuance, under any shape, by their own citizens, the most absolute prohibitions of their code have, for a period of more than ten years, been rigorously and, it is hoped, beneficially levelled. Your lordship will pardon me this allusion to the earnest efforts of the United States to put down the trade within their own limits; falling in, as it merely does, with the tribute which you have been pleased to pay to their early exertions in helping to dry up this prolific source of human woe.

Whether any causes may throw obstacles in the way of their uniting in that concert of external measures, in which Europe generally, and this nation in particular, are now so happily engaged, the more effectually to banish from the world this great enormity, I dare not, in the total absence of all instructions, presume to intimate, much less have I any opinion of my own to offer upon a subject so full of delicacy and interest; but it is still left for me to say, that I shall perform a duty peculiarly gratifying, in transmitting, by the earliest opportunities, copies of your lordship's note, with the documents which accompanied it, to my Government; and I sufficiently know the permanent sensibility which pervades all its councils upon this subject to promise that the overture which the former embraces will receive from the President the full and anxious consideration due to its importance, and, above all, to the enlarged philanthropy, on the part of this Government, by which it has been dictated.

I have, &c.,

RICHARD RUSH.

Viscount CASTLEREAGH, K. G., &c.

No. VIII.

Note from Richard Rush, Esq., to Viscount Castlereagh, dated

LONDON, December 21, 1818.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States, has the honor to present his compliments to Lord Castlereagh.

In the note of the 23d of June, which the undersigned had the honor to address to his lordship, in answer to his lordship's communication of the 20th of the same month, relative to the slave trade, the undersigned had great pleasure in giving the assurance that he would transmit a copy of that communication to his Government, together with the documents which accompanied it, being copies of treaties entered into on the part of Great Britain with Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands, for the more complete abolition of the odious traffic in slaves. He accordingly lost no time in fulfilling that duty, and has now the honor to inform his lordship of the instructions with which he has been furnished by his Government in reply.

He has been distinctly commanded, in the first place, to make known the sensibility of the President to the friendly spirit of confidence in which these treaties and the legislative measures of Parliament founded upon them, have been communicated to the United States; and to the invitation which has been given, that they would join in the same or similar arrangements, the more effectually to accomplish the beneficial objects to which they look. He is further commanded to give the strongest assurances that the solicitude of the United States for the universal extirpation of this traffic continues with all the earnestness which has so long and steadily distinguished the course of their policy in relation to it.

Of their general prohibitory law of 1807 it is unnecessary that the undersigned should speak, his lordship being already apprised of its provisions; amongst which the authority to employ the national force, as auxiliary to its execution, will not have escaped attention. But he has it in charge to make known, as a new pledge of their unremitting and active desire in the cause of abolition, that so lately as the month of April last another act of Congress was passed, by which not only are the citizens and vessels of the United States interdicted from carrying on or being in any way engaged in the trade, but in which also the best precautions that legislative enactments can devise, or their penalties enforce, are raised up against the introduction into their territories of slaves from abroad, under whatever pretext attempted, and especially from dominions which lie more immediately in their neighborhood. A copy of this act is herewith inclosed for the more particular information of his lordship.

That peculiarity in the eighth section which throws upon a defendant the labor of proof as the condition of acquittal, the undersigned persuades himself will be regarded as signally manifesting an anxiety to suppress the hateful offence, departing as it does from the analogy of criminal jurisprudence, which so generally requires the independent and positive establishment of guilt as the first step in every public prosecution. To measures of such a character, thus early adopted and sedulously pursued, the undersigned is further commanded to say that the Government of the United States, acting within the pale of its constitutional powers, will always be ready to superadd any others that experience may prove to be necessary for attaining the desirable end in view.

But on examining the provisions of the treaties which your lordship honored the undersigned by communicating, it has appeared to the President that their essential articles are of a character not adapted to the circumstances or to the institutions of the United States.

The powers agreed to be given to the ships-of-war of either party to search, capture, and carry into port for adjudication, the merchant vessels of the other, however qualified, is connected with the establishment, by each treaty, of two mixed courts, one of which is to have its seat in the colonial possessions of the parties, respectively. The institution of such tribunals is necessarily regarded as fundamental to the whole arrangement, whilst their peculiar structure is doubtless intended, and would seem to be indispensable, towards imparting to it a just reciprocity. But to this part of the system the United States, having no colonies upon the coast of Africa, in the West Indies, or elsewhere, cannot give effect.

Moreover, the powers of government in the United States, whilst they can only be exercised within the grants, are also subject to the restrictions of the Federal Constitution. By the latter instrument all judicial power is to be vested in a Supreme Court, and in such other inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. It further provides that the judges of these courts shall hold their offices during good behavior, and be removable on impeachment and conviction of crimes and misdemeanors. There are serious doubts whether, obeying the spirit of these injunctions, the Government of the United States would be competent to appear as party to the institution of a court for carrying into execution their penal statutes in places out of their own territory; a court consisting partly of foreign judges, not liable to impeachment under the authority of the United States, and deciding upon their statutes without appeal.

Again, obstacles would exist towards giving validity to the disposal of the negroes found on board the slave trading vessels condemned by the sentence of the mixed courts. If they should be delivered over to the Government of the United States as freemen, they could not, but by their own consent, be employed as servants or free laborers. The condition of negroes, and other people of color, in the United States being regulated by the municipal laws of the separate States, the Government of the former could neither guaranty their liberty in the States where they could only be received as slaves, nor control them in the States where they would be recognized as free. The provisions of the fifth section of the act of Congress which the undersigned has the honor to inclose will be seen to point to this obstacle, and may be taken as still further explanatory of its nature.

These are some of the principal reasons which arrest the assent of the President to the very frank and friendly overture contained in your lordship's communication. Having their foundation in constitutional impediments the Government of his Britannic Majesty will know how to appreciate their force. It will be seen how compatible they are with the most earnest wishes, on the part of the United States, that the measures concerted by these treaties may bring about the total downfall of the traffic in human blood, and with their determination to co-operate, to the utmost extent of their constitutional power, towards this great consummation, so imperiously due at the hands of all nations to the past wrongs and sufferings of Africa.

The undersigned prays Lord Castlereagh to accept the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

CONFERENCES AT AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

No. IX.

Despatch from Viscount Castlereagh to Earl Bathurst, dated

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE, November 2, 1818.

MY LORD: In the conference of the 24th October I opened to the plenipotentiaries the existing state of the trade in slaves and the progress made by the plenipotentiaries in London in proposing further measures for accomplishing its final abolition.

As the further examination of this question required that the ministers should have time to peruse the voluminous documents connected with it, I gave notice that I should, on a future day, submit to them two propositions:

The first, for addressing a direct appeal on the part of the five courts to the King of Portugal, founded upon the declaration made in his Majesty's name by his plenipotentiary at Vienna, and urging his Majesty to give effect to that declaration at the period fixed by Spain for final abolition, viz, on the 20th May, 1820.

The second would be, that the powers there represented should accept the principle of a qualified right of mutual visit as adopted by the courts of Great Britain, Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands, and should apply the same to the case of their respective flags as circumstances should point out.

It was impossible not to perceive in the short discussion which ensued that there was considerable hesitation, especially in the French plenipotentiary, with regard to the principle of the latter measure. Under these circumstances I thought it better to avoid a prolongation of the conversation. I had an interview with the Duke de Richelieu on the following day for the purpose of urging his excellency to a more favorable view of this important question. This led to a very full examination of the measure in all its bearings; and though I cannot say that I succeeded in shaking his grace's opinion, I flatter myself I reduced the weight and number of his objections, and that I brought his mind to feel the extreme inconvenience as well as moral objection to leaving the question where it is.

It is due to the Duke de Richelieu that I should state that I have found his excellency uniformly anxious to render the measures of his own Government effectual to its object; and that he has been cordially disposed to receive and follow up every information which I have laid before him concerning the malpractices of the subjects of France in this traffic; but he seems, as yet, under great apprehension of the effect in France of any concession of the nature above suggested.

The Duke, however, gave me every assurance of its being fully considered, and as a means of doing so, his excellency desired me to furnish him with a memorandum stating the substance of those explanations which I had given him of the question. I now have to transmit to your lordship a copy of this paper, and to assure you that I shall lose no opportunity, in conjunction with the Duke of Wellington, of following up with zeal and perseverance this important part of my instructions.

I have the honor, &c.,

CASTLEREAGH.

Earl BATHURST, &c., &c., &c.

Protocol of the conference between the five powers held at Aix-la-Chapelle October 24, 1818.

Lord Castlereagh makes known to the conference the result hitherto obtained by the measures adopted for the general abolition of the trade in slaves and of the actual state of things in regard to this interesting question, distinguishing between the legal and the illegal trade. His excellency observed, that since the convention of the 23d of September, 1817, by which Spain fixed the year 1820 for the final termination of this traffic, Portugal was the only power which had not explained itself as to the period of abolition. Lord Castlereagh added, that whilst there was a State whose laws authorized the trade, if it were but partially, and a flag which could protect it, it would scarcely be possible to prevent the continuation of this commerce by contraband means, the increase of which had been very considerable of late years; and that even when the slave trade should be prohibited by the laws of all civilized countries, an active and permanent surveillance could alone guaranty the execution of those laws.

After this representation, Lord Castlereagh communicated several papers relative to the question, referring to the details already submitted to the ministers assembled in London. He at the same time explained his ideas:

1st. Upon the means of prosecuting the application of the principle of the legal abolition of the trade.

2d. Upon the means of insuring the execution of the laws and conventions relating to it.

Relative to the first object, Lord Castlereagh proposed that a measure should be agreed upon to be taken with respect to the court of Rio de Janeiro, in order to induce it to explain itself as to the period it intended to fix for the final abolition of the trade.

Relative to the second object, his excellency proposed to adopt generally and in an obligatory form the measures decreed by the last treaties between Great Britain, Spain, Portugal, and the kingdom of the Netherlands.

These propositions were taken ad referendum, and it was agreed to resume the deliberation in a subsequent sitting.

Note from Viscount Castlereagh to the Duke de Richelieu, dated

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE, October 27, 1818.

Lord Castlereagh has the honor to inclose to the Duke de Richelieu the memorandum which he yesterday promised to submit to his excellency's consideration.

Lord Castlereagh will be most happy to reply, without loss of time, to any queries which the Duke de Richelieu will have the goodness to put to him on this subject, or to procure for his excellency any information which may appear to him material, and which Lord Castlereagh may not have the means of immediately himself supplying.

Lord Castlereagh requests the Duke de Richelieu to accept the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

MEMORANDUM. (A)

1. As to Right of Visit.

None of the three conventions signed by Great Britain with Spain, Portugal, and Holland, gives this right to King's ships indiscriminately. In all it is confined to King's ships having the express instructions and authority, as specified in the treaty.

The provision is, in all cases, reciprocal, but the treaty with the Netherlands restricts the exercise of this right to a specified number of ships of each power, not exceeding twelve in the whole. Each power, as soon as it grants these instructions to any of its ships-of-war, is bound to notify to the other the name of the vessel so authorized to visit.

2. Right of Detention.

No visit or detention can take place except by a commissioned officer having the instructions above referred to as his special authority for the same; nor can he detain and carry into port any vessel so visited except on the single and simple fact of slaves found on board. There is a saving clause to distinguish domestic slaves acting as servants or sailors from those strictly appertaining to the traffic. The powers mutually engage to make the officer personally responsible for any abusive exercise of authority, independent of the pecuniary indemnity to be paid, as hereafter stated, to the owner for the improper detention of his vessel.

3. Adjudication.

The visiting officer finding slaves on board, as he conceives, contrary to law, may carry the vessel into whichever of the two ports is the nearest where the mixed commission belonging to the capturing and captured vessels shall reside; but by doing so, he not only renders himself personally responsible to his own Government for the discretion of the act, but he also makes his Government answerable to the Government of the State to whom the vessel so detained belongs for the full compensation, in pecuniary damage, which the mixed commission may award to the owners for the detention, if unjustifiably made.

The mixed commission has no jurisdiction of a criminal character, and consequently can neither detain nor punish the persons found on board ships so detained for any offences they may, by such slave trading, have committed against the laws of their particular State. The mixed commission has no other authority than summarily to decide whether the ship has been properly detained or not for having slaves illicitly on board. If this is decided in the affirmative, the ship and cargo (if any on board) are forfeited, the proceeds to be equally divided between the two States; the slaves to be provided for by the State in whose territory the condemnation takes place.

If the mixed commission orders the vessel to be released, it is required at the same moment to award such pecuniary compensation to the owners for the detention as appears to them reasonable.

A table of demurrage is given in the treaties, and the Government of the detaining officer is bound to discharge the same so awarded, without appeal, within twelve months.

The mixed commission is composed of a commissary judge and a commissary arbitrator, of each nation, as provided in the convention signed between Great Britain and France, in 1815, for adjudicating the private claims.

4. The Sphere of Operation.

In the Spanish and Portuguese conventions there is no other restriction as to the limits within which detention as above may take place than what arose naturally out of the state of the laws, viz: That so long as either power might lawfully trade in slaves to the south of the equator, no detention should take place within those limits.

In the convention with Holland a line is drawn from the Straits of Gibraltar to a point in the United States, so as to except out of the operation what may be called the European seas.

In all these conventions the whole range of voyage from the coast of Africa to the opposite shores of both Americas, including the West Indies, is subjected to the regulated surveillance thus established.

Observations.

Upon the first head, it does not occur that any further restrictions than those provided in the Netherlands convention can be required; but this is always open to negotiation.

The same observation appears applicable to the second head.

The same observation applies also to the third head, with this distinction, that a State, such as Austria, for example, agreeing to the measure, but having little or no trade on that coast, instead of immediately going to the expense of constituting commissions, might reserve the power of doing so whenever she thought fit; or might be enabled, if she prefer it, to authorize the Commissioners of any other State to take cognizance in her name of any cases in which the property of Austrian subjects might be concerned.

The fourth head seems most susceptible of comment, as it admits the possibility of search over the whole surface of the Atlantic and in the West Indian seas, where the trading vessels of commercial States are more numerous than on the coast of Africa.

Great Britain was herself so fully satisfied that under the checks established abuse is so little to be presumed, that she did not hesitate to expose her own commerce in those seas, however extended, to this, as she conceives, imaginary inconvenience; considering that so urgent a claim upon her humanity would not only justify but impose upon her as a moral duty even a greater sacrifice.

But notwithstanding what Great Britain has already done in her treaties with the three powers with whom she has contracted, and is ready to do with all other civilized States, namely, to run some risk of inconvenience for so noble a purpose, there is a distinction which may reasonably be taken between giving effect to this system upon the coast of Africa, and for a certain distance, say two hundred leagues from that particular coast, and the extending the same over the entire of the Atlantic and West Indian seas. The latter, as the most effectual measure, Great Britain has preferred, with whatever of inconvenience it may be connected in its operation; but she would not be the less disposed to attach value to the more limited application of the principle.

It may be stated that so long as the laws of any one State shall permit a trade in slaves, or that any flag shall exist in the world which is not comprehended in this system of maritime police against the contraband slave trader, the evil will continue to exist. This reasoning, although plausible, should not discourage a common effort against the abuse committed, and upon close examination it will be found fallacious.

1st. The whole of the African coast north of the line is, at this moment, emancipated from the traffic by the laws of all the States having colonies.

2d. By the 20th May, 1820, no flag of any such State will be enabled legally to carry on the traffic anywhere to the north of the line on either side of the Atlantic, nor any flag other than the Portuguese be authorized to trade south of the line.

Supposing, for a moment, that Portugal should not abolish to the south of the line till the expiration of the eight years complete from the declaration of Vienna, viz, 1823, what an immense sphere, nevertheless, of salutary operation would not this conservative alliance have in the interval?

The other branch of the objection is not more solid. It is true that the ship and flag of the smallest power might, in legal theory, cover these transactions; but where the property is not belonging to a subject of that power, but of a State that has abolished, the flag of that power, so used in fraud, would be no cover, and the property thus masked would be condemned, whilst the sovereign whose flag was thus prostituted neither could nor would complain.

But so long as any of the great powers, such as France, having a considerable extent of commerce on those coasts, shall refuse to adopt these systems, not only their example will discourage other States whose interest is merely nominal from taking a part, but it will furnish the illicit slave trader with a flag, not only so much to be respected in itself, but so presumable to be found on the coast for purposes of innocent commerce, that no commissioned officer will run the risk of looking into such a vessel at the hazard of involving himself and his Government in a question with a foreign power. The practical as well as the moral effects of the principal maritime States making common cause upon this subject is incalculable. In fact, it must be decisive; without it their flags must be made the instrument of reciprocally withdrawing the subject from the authority of the sovereign when committing this offence.

This latter point will appear clear when we consider the working of the system under the two alternatives. If all the great maritime States adopt the principle, their cruisers form but one squadron against the illicit slave traders, and none of their flags can be made to cover the fraudulent transaction; the immediate effect of which would be considerably to multiply the number of the cruisers, consequently the chance of captures, whilst it would reduce the number of the flags which the illicit slave traders could assume. Whereas, if France acts alone, the danger to the French illicit trade is reduced to the chance of what her own cruisers may be enabled to effect along the immensity of that coast; and even where a French armed ship falls in with a French slave trader, by hoisting English, Spanish, Portuguese, or Dutch colors, the French officer, supposing him anxious to do his duty, will be very cautious in hazarding a visit where there is so reasonable a presumption that the vessel may be what the flag announces.

But take the other supposition, that all the principal maritime powers shall act in concert, and that the vessel suspected of having slaves on board hoists the flag of any other State, suppose the Hanseatic flag, the presumption is so conclusive against a Hamburg vessel trading in slaves on her own account, that no officer would hesitate to search the vessel in order to detect the fraud.

It may be further confidently asserted, that if the powers having a real and local interest come to an understanding and act together, the other States will cheerfully come into the measure, so far as not to suffer their flags to be so monstrously perverted and abused. The omission of France is, above all others, important, from its station in Europe, and from its possessions in Africa; its separation from the common effort, more especially if imitated by Russia, Austria, and Prussia, will not only disappoint all the hopes which the world has been taught to form with respect to the labors of the conference established in London, under the third additional article of the treaty of November, 1815, but will introduce schism and murmur into the ranks of the friends of abolition. The States having abolished will no longer form one compact and unanimous body, laboring to affiliate the State which has yet to abolish to a common system, and to render their own acts efficacious; but they will compose two sects, one of States that have made the possible inconvenience of a restricted visit to their merchant ships bend to the greater claims of humanity, the other of States considering their former objection as so far paramount as not to admit of any qualification, even for the indisputable advantage of a cause to the importance of which they have at Vienna given a not less solemn sanction. This must materially retard the ultimate success of the measure, and it may in the interval keep alive an inconvenient degree of controversy and agitation upon a subject which has contributed above all others seriously to excite the moral and religious sentiments of all nations, but especially of the British people, by whom the question has long been regarded as one of the deepest interest.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE, November 12, 1818.

MY LORD: I have the honor to inclose to your lordship the protocol of the conferences of the allied ministers of the 4th instant.

This protocol details the further proceedings upon the slave trade, and has annexed to it the memorandum drawn up by me on the same subject, which was communicated to your lordship in my despatch of the 2d instant.

[Inclosure in No. 10 ]

Protocol of the conferences between the plenipotentiaries of the five powers held at Aix-la-Chapelle the 4th of November, 1818.

In reference to the communications made to the conference on the 24th of October, Lord Castlereagh this day developed his propositions relative to the abolition of the slave trade; propositions the object of which is, on the one hand, to complete and extend the measures already adopted for the attainment of the definite extinction of this traffic, and on the other hand to insert the execution and the efficacy of those measures. As to the first object, Lord Castlereagh proposed that some measure should be adopted towards his Majesty the King of Portugal and Brazil, and that a letter should be written in the name of the sovereigns, in the most pressing and at the same time the most affectionate terms, in order to engage his most faithful Majesty, reminding him of the part he had taken in the declaration of Vienna of the 8th of February, 1815, to fix without further delay the period for the definitive abolition of the slave trade throughout his possessions, a period which, after the engagements entered into by the plenipotentiaries of his said Majesty at Vienna, and inserted in the protocol of the 20th of November, 1815, should not extend beyond the year 1823, but which the allied sovereigns desire, from the interest they take in this great cause, to see coincide with that which his Majesty the King of Spain has adopted in fixing the 30th of May, 1820, as the final term of that traffic. This proposition was unanimously received.

Lord Castlereagh, in calling the attention of the conference to the declaration of the plenipotentiaries of his most faithful Majesty, made at Vienna on the 6th of February, 1815, "that they were forced to require, as an indispensable condition for the final abolition, that his Britannic Majesty should on his side consent to the changes which they had proposed in the commercial system between Portugal and Great Britain," renewed the assurance that his Majesty the King of Great Britain was ready to accede to all the reasonable modifications which should be proposed in the existing treaties of commerce with Portugal; which assurance he had repeatedly given to the Portuguese minister in London. Lord Castlereagh, above all, desired to call the attention of the conference to the expression reasonable modifications, which he made use of, because he could not suppose that the Portuguese ministers intended to demand, on the part of a single power, sacrifices which one State could not well expect of another as indispensable conditions of a general measure, having for its object the good of humanity alone.

As to the second object, Lord Castlereagh communicated a memorandum (A) containing explanations of the treaties concluded in 1817 between Great Britain, Spain, and Portugal, and the kingdom of the Netherlands, establishing the right of visit against the vessels evidently suspected of being engaged in the trade in direct contravention of the laws already existing or hereafter to be made by the different States. Persuaded that, after the explanations given and the modifications proposed in the said memorandum, such a measure might be adopted without any serious inconvenience, Lord Castlereagh invited the plenipotentiaries to take it into their consideration in the sense the most favorable to the success of the abolition, and to agree to it; or, if not, at least to substitute some counter projet effectually to prevent the abuse which the illicit trader will not fail to make of the flag of the powers who should refuse to concur in the above mentioned general measure. The memorandum of Lord Castlereagh was annexed to the protocol, sub. lit. A.

Lord Castlereagh added to these propositions that, according to the opinion of several persons whose authority was of great weight on this question, it would be useful and perhaps necessary to consider the trade in slaves as a crime against the law of nations, and to this effect to assimilate it to piracy as soon as, by the accession of Portugal, the abolition of the traffic shall have become an universal measure. He requested the plenipotentiaries to take this opinion into consideration without making at present a formal proposition upon it.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE, November 23, 1818.

My LORD: I have the honor to transmit to your lordship the notes of the Russian, French, Austrian, and Prussian plenipotentiaries upon the two propositions which were brought forward by the British plenipotentiaries and earnestly pressed upon their attention, as stated in the protocol of the 24th ultimo.

The result of these notes being extremely discouraging to our hopes, it was determined to review the objections brought forward to the measure of mutually conceding the right of visit, especially by the plenipotentiary of France.

After presenting this review to the consideration of the conference in the memorandum B, (of which a copy is inclosed,) and in an audience with which I was honored by the Emperor of Russia, I took occasion to represent to his Imperial Majesty, in the strongest terms, the necessity of taking some effective measure of this nature without delay, and without waiting for the decree of final abolition on the part of Portugal.

His Imperial Majesty listened with his accustomed interest to my representations on this subject, and promised me to give directions to his ministers to propose that the consideration of the question should be reopened in London under fresh instructions.

The modification which I have finally urged of this measure, and I trust with considerable hope of success, is, that, in addition to the limitation of the right of visit to the coast of Africa and to a specific number of ships of each power, the duration of the convention should be for a limited number of years—say seven; at the end of which period the several powers would again have it in their power to review their decision, after some experience of its convenience or inconvenience of its efficacy to the object, and of the necessity of its being renewed, regard being had to the then state of the illicit slave trade. This arrangement would sufficiently meet our most pressing wants, whilst it would go less permanently to disturb the acknowledged principles of maritime law as regulating the right of visit. By the aid of this latter expedient, I flatter myself that I have made a considerable impression in removing the strong repugnance which was at first felt to the measure.

A projet of the letters to be addressed by the sovereigns to the King of Portugal on this subject is also forwarded in this despatch; and I have to request that your lordship will receive the Prince Regent's pleasure as to making a similar appeal to his most faithful Majesty, on his royal highness' part, taking measures for forwarding the whole to the Brazils by the first packet.

I have, &c.,

Earl BATHURST, &c.

CASTLEREAGH.

[First inclosure in No. 11.]

Opinion of the Russian Cabinet upon the Slave Trade.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE, November 7, 1818.

The Russian cabinet has laid before the Emperor, and taken, in pursuance of his orders, into mature consideration, the different communications made to the conferences of Aix-la-Chapelle by the plenipotentiaries of his Britannic Majesty on the subject of the slave trade.

There is no object in which his Imperial Majesty takes a more lively interest, and which he has more at heart, than that the decision upon this question may be conformable to the precepts of the Christian religion, to the wishes of humanity, and to the rights and real interests of all the powers invited to assist therein.

Although it cannot be dissembled that the measures in which these indispensable conditions are to be united are attended with difficulty, his Imperial Majesty hopes, nevertheless, that the obstacles will not be insurmountable.

His Imperial Majesty entirely concurs in the proposition of the British cabinet to make an amicable representation to the court of Brazil for the purpose of engaging it to fix a final and early termination to the power which it has reserved to itself to exercise the trade. The force of the motives upon which the wishes of the allied sovereigns rest, and that of the example which they have already given, will doubtless be sufficient to influence the free determination which Portugal is invited to make. The cabinet of Russia has hastened to draw out, upon the invitation of the British plenipotentiaries, the project of a letter which may be addressed with this view to the King of Portugal. This projet is hereunto annexed.

The Emperor views with satisfaction the probable success of a measure which will complete the accession of all the Christian States to the entire and perpetual abolition of the trade.

It is only when this abolition shall have been thus solemnly declared in all countries, and without reserve, that the powers will be able to pronounce, without being checked by distressing and contradictory exceptions, the general principle which shall characterize the trade and place it in the rank of the deepest crimes.

Then, and taking this principle for a basis, may be put in practice the measures which shall serve for its application.

The cabinet of his Britannic Majesty has communicated those by which it has already begun to give effect to the principle of abolition—that is to say, the conventions with Portugal, Spain, and the Netherlands.

It is proposed to adopt generally among the maritime powers the rules laid down in these three conventions, and more particularly to establish, as a general principle, the reciprocal right of visit to be exercised by the respective cruisers.

The cabinet of Russia, in doing homage to the intentions which have dictated these dispositions, stipulated between the British Government and the three courts above mentioned, and, in appreciating their real efficacy on the supposition that they were universally adopted, has only to express its hopes that the special and most urgent interests which each of the maritime States must consult will not oppose the attainment of a general coalition. For inasmuch as it is true that the universal establishment of the reciprocal right of visit would contribute to this end, so it is equally incontestable that the measures in question must necessarily become illusory if a single maritime State only, of whatever rank it may be, finds it impossible to adhere to them. It is, therefore, with a view to produce this universal consent that the allied powers should use their efforts, having once agreed among themselves upon the principle of the right of visit, to obtain the free adherence of all the others to the same basis.

The ministers of his Majesty the Emperor of Russia regret not to be able to contemplate an accession so unanimous. It appears to them beyond a doubt that there are some States whom no consideration would induce to submit their navigation to a principle of such high importance. It cannot, then, be disguised that it is not in this principle that the solution of the difficulty is to be sought.

It has been asked if some other mode, equally sure in its effects, could not be proposed, and of which the general admission on the part of all the States might be more easily foreseen.

Without prejudging the result of the overture of the British cabinet, a mode is here submitted which, in the event of that not being adopted, is without exception in respect to the right of visit, and which will, perhaps, obtain the suffrage of all States, equally desirous of accomplishing a sacred duty, in putting an end to the horrors of the slave trade.

This expedient would consist in a special association between all the States, having for its end the destruction of the traffic in slaves.

It would pronounce, as a fundamental principle, a law characterizing this odious traffic as a description of piracy, and rendering it punishable as such.

It appears evident that the general promulgation of such a law could not take place until the abolition was universally pronounced—that is to say, until Portugal had totally and everywhere renounced the trade.

The execution of the law should be confided to an institution, the seat of which should be in a central point on the coast of Africa, and in the formation of which all the Christian States should take a part.

Declared forever neutral, to be estranged from all political and local interests, like the fraternal and Christian alliance, of which it would be a practical manifestation, this institution would follow the single object of strictly maintaining the execution of the law. It would consist of a maritime force, composed of a sufficient number of ships-of-war, appropriated to the service assigned to them.

Of a judicial power, which should judge all crimes relating to the trade, according to a legislation established upon the subject by the common law.

Of a supreme council, in which would reside the authority of the institution; which would regulate the operations of the maritime force, would revise the sentences of the tribunals, would put them in execution, would inspect all the details, and would render an account of its administration to the future European conferences.

The right of visit and of detention would be granted to this institution as the means of fulfilling its end; and perhaps no maritime nation would refuse to submit its flag to this police, exercised in a limited and clearly defined manner, and by a power too feeble to allow of vexations, too disinterested on all maritime and commercial questions, and above all, too widely combined in its elements not to observe a severe but impartial justice towards all.

Would it not be possible to compose this institution of such different elements as to give it no other tendency, as long as it remained united, but that of doing its duty?

The expense which it would occasion, divided amongst all the Christian States, could not be very burdensome, and its duration would be regulated according to the time required for the development of African civilization, which it would protect, and it might also bring about a happy change in the system of cultivation in the colonies.

In submitting these views to the wisdom of the allied cabinets, that of Russia reserves to itself the power, in case they desire to search into and examine them, of entering into more ample explanations upon the subject.

Memoir of the French Government on the Slave Trade.

France has proved, in the most evident manner, that she desires to concur effectually in the complete abolition of the slave trade. Engaged by the declaration to which she has subscribed, of the 8th of February, 1815, at Vienna, with the powers who signed the treaty of the 30th of May, to employ for this purpose “all the means at her disposal, and to act in the employment of these means with all the zeal and perseverance due to such a great and noble cause,” she flatters herself that she has complied with this engagement; and, in a few months after the declaration of Vienna, she renounced the stipulation of 1814, which had given her a delay of five years for effecting the cessation of the trade. She declared, the 30th of July, 1815, that from that day the trade should cease on her part everywhere and forever. The acts of her administration have been conformable to this declaration. The instructions given in the ports of France and in the colonies have preceded a special ordinance of the King prohibiting the trade.

This ordinance has been since confirmed by a law enacted in March, 1818, which pronounces against the violators of the dispositions agreed upon the most severe punishments which the laws of France can inflict.

Measures of surveillance have also been prescribed with a view to secure the execution of the law; and the King has ordered a naval force to cruise on the western coast of Africa, and visit all vessels which should be suspected of continuing a trade which has been prohibited.

Such are the acts of the French Government; they clearly prove that they have used “the means which they had at their disposal” to repress the trade.

They have displayed their zeal in creating the means which were wanting and in the adoption of a formal law.

Nevertheless, the Government of his Britannic Majesty, who, to secure the actual abolition of the trade, evince an ardor which cannot but add to the glory which the English nation have acquired in fostering whatever has for its object the good of humanity, have been informed that the end of their efforts and of those of the other powers is not yet attained; and that, in spite of the measures taken to prevent it, many slaves are still carried away from the coast of Africa by a contraband trade. And they have conceived that these violations of the laws evince the insufficiency of the dispositions to insure the execution of them. They believe that a system of measures combined between the principal powers already engaged, by a clause in the treaty of the 20th November, 1815, to concert means for this object, might finally eradicate the evil. They have proposed, among other measures, to visit rigorously the vessels which shall navigate upon the western coast of Africa; and, in order that this visit should have due effect, they have judged that it would be proper that each of the powers should grant to the others the right of exercising it upon all the ships carrying its flag. The creation of mixed commissions, charged to pronounce upon the legitimacy of the expeditions suspected of fraud, forms the second part of the English projet.

It would be impossible not to acknowledge that in proposing such a measure the Government of his Britannic Majesty have done all that depended on them to accompany it with precautions to prevent its abuse.

With this view, the limitation of the number of ships-of-war authorized to visit, and of the places where the visit may be exercised, the rank of the officers who alone can perform this service, give assurance of their respect for the rights of each of the contracting parties.

Three powers, Spain, Portugal, and the kingdom of the Netherlands, have subscribed to these propositions.

The Government of his most Christian Majesty would eagerly follow such an example if, carrying their views exclusively to the object, they did not perceive in the means indicated for its attainment dangers which attach, perhaps, to their particular position, but which it is their duty to prevent.

It would be useless to discuss here, in regard to right, the question of visit at sea in profound peace. The English Government have done homage to the principle which insures in this respect the independence of all flags, and it is only in limitation of the principle, not in denial of its existence, that they propose to grant to each power, respectively, the faculty of detaining ships carrying the flag of others, and of ascertaining the legality of the trade in which they are engaged.

But upon this first point the Government of his most Christian Majesty feel an invincible obstacle to the proposition of England.

France, by the reverses and misfortunes which she has lately experienced, and which, if they have not effaced, have at least obscured the glory which she had acquired, is bound to evince more jealousy of her own dignity than if fortune had not betrayed her. The nation, happy to be again under the rule of its legitimate sovereign, does not regret vain conquests, but she is more than ever alive to the feeling of national honor.

Without doubt a concession, accompanied by the necessary precautions, and with that clause of reciprocity which would save the dignity of each party, might be proposed without fear of wounding the vanity of any one. But it would still be a concession; and the opinion of a nation habituated to judge of the acts of her Government under the influence of a lively imagination would be alarmed to see them abandon, even with every possible modification, what she regards as one of her most precious rights. She would conceive that the honor of her flag was thereby endangered—a point of the utmost delicacy, and on which she has ever shown a quick susceptibility. She would see in the abandonment of this right a new sacrifice attached, as it were, as an indispensable condition of the evacuation of her territory and as a monument of the state of dependence in which she was for a moment placed. There is no doubt that in giving a generous example in submitting to the reciprocal right of visit which she regards as proper to attain the end proposed, England proves to the world that the visit is not incompatible with the honor of the flag. But placed in different circumstances, supported by the opinion of the English nation, which for twenty-five years has called for the abolition of the trade, Great Britain secures all her advantages even in appearing to abandon the absolute exercise of them, and she cannot fear that the idea of a compulsory sacrifice might attach to the concession.

But even should the Government of his most Christian Majesty feel themselves authorized to overlook such powerful considerations, and to adopt, notwithstanding the dangers which they perceive in theory, the projet relative to the visit, they would still see in its application serious cause of uneasiness.

It cannot be denied that there exists between the subjects of Great Britain and France, and, as it were, blended with the esteem which they mutually inspire, a sentiment of rivalry, which, heightened by numerous and unfortunate circumstances, has often assumed the character of animosity. It is unfortunately too probable that the mutual exercise of the right of visit at sea would furnish it with new excitements. Whatever precautions may be taken, however mildly it be exercised, the visit must necessarily be a source of disquiet and vexation. Can it be thought that the vessel which believes she can elude it will not seek to do so by every means? It will then be necessary that the visiting vessel exert force. This force may produce resistance. On the high seas, far from all control, the subjects of the two powers might be tempted to believe themselves no longer bound by the orders of their own sovereigns, and listening to the voice of a false point of honor, might take up arms in their defence. The most prudent enactments will be illusory. Will the captain of a ship-of-war charged with the visit consent to show his commission to the inconsiderable trader? If not, how is he to be constrained to do so, and what guaranty shall the detained vessel have that the visit is not an arbitrary act? How prevent, also, the possible infractions of the regulations agreed upon for rendering the visit less vexatious? The trader may, indeed, complain and demand punishment; but it is known by experience how difficult is the decision of these abuses. Will not the oppressed be often without the means of knowing what officer shall have abused in his case the right reserved to the cruisers, or shall have unduly arrogated it to himself? What proof do the incidents bring which pass far from all witnesses, and which each of the parties may represent under a different light? The English Government know that, when they have themselves wished to punish abuses committed by their ships upon the coast of France, or within the limits of her territorial jurisdiction, they have been prevented by the impossibility of procuring documents sufficiently positive to ascertain the guilty.

These inconveniences, which it would be imprudent to lose sight of, receive an additional importance from the probability that they would lead to mutual exasperation; and it is too well known that such sentiments among the people have often disturbed the peace of nations.

If such a misfortune were to follow, would not Europe have a right to demand of the powers a strict account of those measures which, concerted for the good of humanity, should have compromised the public tranquillity?

There is another consideration which would induce the Government of his most Christian Majesty to pause, even if they did not see the impossibility of admitting the proposition of the visit. This is in reference to the mixed commissions which would be empowered to adjudge the questions of prize in the spirit of the regulations for restricting the trade.

The immediate consequence of such an institution would be to withdraw the subjects of his Majesty from their natural judges, and his conscience will not permit him to believe that he has the right to do so. Jurisdiction is, of all the rights of sovereignty, that which is the most essentially destined to the defence of the subject, and it may be said that it is the only one exclusively for the interest of the latter. There are circumstances in which the common law of Europe admits that the jurisdiction of the sovereign ceases of right, because he cannot in fact exercise it. It is when a subject commits upon a foreign territory a crime against the laws of the country upon which this territory depends. He is then liable to the application of those laws, and his sovereign, who cannot oppose, tolerates it.

But, except in these circumstances, the sovereign could not consent that his subject should pass under a foreign jurisdiction. In vain would it be alleged that the mixed commission does not exercise its jurisdiction in a criminal manner, and that it only pronounces "upon the legality of the seizure of the vessel having slaves illicitly on board."

To pronounce upon the legality of the seizure is to judge the question as much as it is possible to do it; it is to decide that the captured has or has not incurred the penalties attached to the crime which he has committed. His fate is thenceforward fixed.

It matters little that the penalties which he has or has not incurred be determined by the code of his country, or by that of another. When he has undergone the examination of the commission, it only remains to apply this code or to set him at liberty; he is then in reality judged, and that not by his natural judges. His most Christian Majesty, it is repeated, does not believe himself, in conscience, to have the right to sanction such a change in the legislation of his kingdom; and, should he think that this right might belong to him, it is out of all probability that the powers whose co-operation would be necessary to him in order to admit of this change would acknowledge it.

It results, from the preceding observations, that France has done all that depended upon her to bring about the complete abolition of the slave trade; that she perceives in the projet proposed by England for suppressing all possible continuation of this odious commerce dangers which will not permit her to admit it; that, in a word, it appears to her that to attain one desirable end for the interest of a portion of mankind, the risk is run of compromising interests still more precious, since they relate to the maintenance of the peace and the repose of Europe.

She has given her opinion upon this subject with the more freedom in proportion to her anxiety to attain the objects to which her acts of legislation and administration have been directed. She has no separate views inconsistent with her declarations. The reports, indeed, which announce that the trade is still actively continued on the French territory are anterior to the establishment of a naval force upon the coast, and to the new instructions sent to Senegal for putting an end to all fraudulent trade. This is perhaps the place to remark, that implicit faith should not be given to the reports brought forward against the authorities of Senegal. The reports, which implicate them so seriously that the accusers ought to be called upon for their proofs, are in part prepared by persons who conceived themselves to have other grounds of complaint against these authorities.

France, moreover, would not feel that she had sufficiently proved her desire to co-operate in the measures of repression against the trade if she did not indicate, in her turn, new means of effecting it. Hitherto the dispositions made in this respect have been directed against the transport of slaves, since it is principally upon the manner of detaining at sea the vessels employed in this commerce that they have been concerted. The principle is good, since the length of the passage offers great probability that the illicit traffic may be intercepted. But, on the other hand, the uncertainty of the sea, and consequently the hope of escaping observation, as well as the enormous benefits it holds out, offer chances and an attraction sufficiently powerful for the slave merchants not to be totally discouraged. The measures which would tend to check the commerce of slaves, not in its middle passage, but at its birth and at its termination, that is to say, upon the points where the purchase and sale of the negroes are effected, might effectually contribute, when combined with the other arrangements, to accomplish the salutary work which is intended.

It is proposed, then, to establish in the comptoirs where the purchase of slaves is habitually made commissioners charged to notify the same to the Government, and empowered to prosecute the offending parties in the public tribunals. There might also be introduced into all colonies, where the proprietors are interested in recruiting slaves, regulations like those of the registry bill, to fix the number of blacks existing upon each plantation, and to ascertain, by periodical computations, that the law has not been eluded. The confiscation of the negroes upon each plantation, beyond the number previously declared, (saving those born on the spot,) and a heavy fine for each slave clandestinely introduced, might be the punishment inflicted upon the delinquents. These measures, which enter into the interior administration of each Government, might, however, be concerted between all; and, instead of mixed commissions, charged with pronouncing upon the culpability of the individuals who import the negroes, committees might be established, charged with the duty of watching the individuals who purchase them, and to make known to the superior authorities of the country the infractions which the inferior agents might show reluctance in prosecuting. These arrangements are in the nature of those which the Government of his most Christian Majesty might take, without fear to wound the rights of his subjects, and he is ready to come to an understanding in this respect with the powers who unite their efforts for bringing about the entire abolition of a trade odious in itself, and which has been stigmatized with general condemnation.

Since the abolition of the slave trade has been the object of the common deliberations of the powers of Europe, the cabinet of Austria has not ceased to devote to this question all the interest which it merits in its great relation with the good of humanity, as well as with the precepts of sound morality and religion. Faithful to the principles solemnly proclaimed in this respect at the period of the Congress of Vienna, and to the successive engagements founded upon those bases, Austria, although not able, from her geographical position, to co-operate directly for the success of so meritorious and noble an enterprise, has not less eagerly concurred in all which might advance and perfect it; and it has been with these unalterable sentiments that the minister of Austria has examined with the most serious attention the propositions made by the plenipotentiaries of his Britannic Majesty to the present conferences for completing and extending the system hitherto pursued for attaining the final extinction of the trade, and for insuring the execution and the efficacy of this system.

His Majesty the Emperor is ready to take part in the measures which the allied sovereigns are about to adopt with the cabinet of Rio de Janeiro, to engage it to fix as soon as possible the period of definitive abolition.

His Majesty cannot but feel that the sovereign of Brazil may meet in this transaction difficulties more real, perhaps, and stronger than any other power has had to surmount who has consented to this salutary measure. But he reckons too much upon the loyalty of this sovereign to admit that any obstacles whatever would prevent him from fulfilling a sacred engagement, such as that which he has contracted in the face of the world by the declaration of the 8th of February, 1815.

With respect to the measures proposed by the British plenipotentiaries to put an end to the illicit trade, as it appears admitted on all parts that a system of permanent surveillance cannot be effectually established until the abolition of the trade shall have been generally and definitively pronounced by all the powers, the Austrian cabinet is of opinion that, in adjourning to that period the ulterior discussion of the measures to be adopted for this purpose, the intermediate time might be usefully employed in reconciling and conciliating all opinions, persuaded, as it is, that provided the fundamental principle, that of arriving at the universal and effectual abolition of the trade, be never lost sight of, and that each power continues to second with its utmost efforts those which the British Government have hitherto used in so honorable a cause, they will ultimately agree upon the most effectual means for securing its full and complete accomplishment.

The Austrian cabinet also desire that the ministerial conference established in London for the consideration of this question may continue its work in the sense most conformable to the principles by which it has hitherto been guided.

Opinion of the Prussian Cabinet on the Slave Trade question.

Invariably attached to the principles of morality and humanity, which for a long time have demanded the abolition of the slave trade, and faithful to the engagements which they have made to this effect, the Prussian Government is constantly ready to concur in everything that may contribute to the definitive accomplishment of this noble end.

In consequence, they do not hesitate to accede to the proposition of a combined representation to the court of Brazil in order to engage it to accelerate, as much as the circumstances and the necessities of its situation may permit, the entire abolition of the trade.

As to the measures of general police that may be adopted to prevent or put a stop to the illicit trade, the Prussian Government cannot dissemble the inseparable inconveniences of the concession of a right of visit exercised on the high seas; a concession which will become but too easily a source of abuse and misunderstanding, and which would subject peaceable and innocent traders to molestations of which the idea alone will indispose them perhaps still more than the real mischief.

The Prussian Government, in consequence, believe it to be their duty to give the preference to every measure of precaution and of surveillance which, being confined to the point of departure and to the point of arrival, that is, to the coast of Africa and the colonies interested in favoring these illicit enterprises, will admit of an execution more rigorous and more decisive.

Memorandum. (B.)

The plenipotentiaries of Great Britain, after attentively perusing the votes given by the several cabinets on the measures brought forward on the part of the Prince Regent for effectuating the abolition of the slave trade, cannot dissemble their deep regret that the deliberations of the august assembly which is now about to terminate are not destined to be marked in the page of history by some more decisive interposition than is likely to take place in relief of the sufferings of Africa.

They had persuaded themselves that it was reserved for the plenipotentiaries assembled at Aix-la-Chapelle to have completed at once the work of peace in Europe, and to have laid a broad and lasting foundation on which the deliverance of another great quarter of the globe from a scourge far more severe than European warfare, in its most aggravated forms, might have been effectuated, by establishing an alliance which should forever deny to the fraudulent slave trader, of whatever nation, the cover of their respective flags for the purposes of his iniquitous traffic. Although disappointed in this hope, they will not despair of ultimately arriving at their object, whilst they have so powerful a cause to advocate, and whilst they can address themselves not less to the understandings than to the hearts of those sovereigns who, when assembled in Congress at Vienna, solemnly pronounced upon this question, and devoted their future exertions to the consummation of this work of peace.

They derive additional consolation from the perusal of the documents above referred to; for although they fail them for the present in their conclusion, they nevertheless bear in all their reasonings such homage to the principle, and in some of their details so fully evince the strong sense of duty which animates the august sovereigns in the prosecution of this measure, as to be regarded rather as the precursors of some decided effort for putting an end to this great moral evil, than as indicating on their part any abandonment of a cause which, in the face of mankind, they have taken under their especial protection. It has been the fate of this question, in every stage of its progress, to have difficulties represented as insurmountable, which in a little time have yielded to the perseverance and to the more matured impulses of humanity.

The language in every country has been at times discouraging, and yet the principles of truth and of justice have ultimately triumphed, so as to have left only one great blot in the civilized world at this day unremoved. Every nation, one only excepted, has secured itself from this pollution, and his most faithful Majesty has taken steps sufficiently decisive in the same direction to afford the most encouraging prospect of his determination to deliver his people, without loss of time, from a practice which must degrade them in the scale of enlightened policy, so long as it shall continue to be tolerated among them. It is against the fraudulent slave trader, for the welfare of Africa, that more decisive measures are urgently called for; were it not for his pestilential influence, more than half of that great continent would at this day have been consigned to peaceful habits and to the pursuits of industry and of innocent commerce. But they are his piratical practices on the coast of Africa, in breach of the laws of every civilized Government, which not only vex that extended portion of the globe but which have undone the work of many years of slow, but successful improvement.

It was the fraudulent slave trader who introduced anew on those coasts the traffic, with all its desolating influence on the interior of the country, and which, if not soon checked by measures of a decisive character, will banish not only every trace of improvement, but all commerce other than that of slaves.

On the eve of the departure of the illustrious sovereigns from this place, and after the ample deliberations which have already taken place on this subject, the British plenipotentiaries cannot flatter themselves with the hope of obtaining at this time a more favorable decision; but they could not satisfy their own sense of duty were they not to record their observations upon the objections which have been brought forward to the measures which they were directed to propose, humbly but confidently submitting them on the part of their court to the more matured consideration of the different cabinets. And as it is the species of measure best calculated to suppress this evil, upon which they are alone divided in sentiments, as all are agreed in the enormity of the offence, and all equally animated with a determination effectually to suppress it, they indulge the confident expectation that the subject may be resumed at no distant period in the conferences in London, and prosecuted under more favorable auspices to some decisive result.

And first, with respect to the memoir presented by the plenipotentiaries of Russia. The plenipotentiaries of Great Britain do homage to the sentiments of enlightened benevolence which on this, as on every other occasion, distinguish the elevated views of the august sovereign of Russia.

They only lament that the Russian cabinet, in the contemplation of other measures to be hereafter taken, should have been discouraged with respect to the great good which lay within their reach; and that his Imperial Majesty should thus have abstained for the present to throw into the scale of the proposed measure his illustrious and powerful example.

It appears that the Russian Government looks forward to the moment when Portugal shall have finally abolished the trade for founding a system upon the coast of Africa, which shall be authorized not merely to pronounce upon the property of the slave trader, but which shall be competent to proceed criminally against him as a pirate, and which, in addition to those high functions, shall have a naval force at its disposition, and be invested with a general right of visit of all flags, at least upon those coasts. That this institution should be composed of elements drawn from all civilized States; that it should have a directing council and a judicial system; in short, that it should form a body politic, neutral in its character, but exercising these high authorities over all States. The British Government will, no doubt, be most anxious to receive from the Russian cabinet the further development of this plan which is promised; but as the prospect of some institution of this nature may form a serious obstacle to the adoption of what appears to them the more pressing measure, the British plenipotentiaries cannot delay to express their doubts as to the practicability of founding, or preserving in activity, so novel and so complicated a system.

If the moment should have arrived when the traffic in slaves shall have been universally prohibited, and if, under those circumstances, the mode shall have been devised by which this offence shall be raised in the criminal code of all civilized nations to the standard of piracy, they conceive that this species of piracy, like any other act falling within the same legal principle, will, by the law of nations, be amenable to the ordinary tribunals of any or every particular State.

That the individuals charged with the piracy can plead no national character in bar of such jurisdiction, whether taken on the high seas or on the African coast.

If they be pirates, they are "hostes humani generis." They are under the protection of no flag, and the verification of the fact of piracy by sufficient evidence brings them at once within the reach of the first criminal tribunal of competent authority before whom they may be brought.

It seems equally unnecessary to have recourse to so new a system for arriving at a qualified and guarded right of visit.

In this, as in the former instance, the simplest means will be found the best, and the simplest will generally be found to consist in some modification of what the established practice of nations has for ages sanctioned.

Right of visit is known and submitted to by all nations in time of war.

The belligerent is authorized to visit the neutral, and even to detain upon adequate cause.

If the right to visit be to exist at all, and that it must exist, at least upon the coast of Africa, in some shape or to some extent, seems to be fully admitted by the Russian memoir, it is infinitely better it should exist in the form of a conventional but mitigated regulation of the established practice of nations, for the due administration of which every Government is responsible, than that it should be confided to a new institution which, to be neutral, must be irresponsible, and whose very composition would place it wholly beyond the reach of control.

These observations apply to the period when all nations shall have abolished the trade; but why should the Russian, Austrian, and Prussian Governments unnecessarily postpone the taking some measure of this nature for an indefinite period, and until Portugal shall have universally abolished?

Have they not more than two-thirds of the whole coast of Africa, upon which it might at once operate, and as beneficially as if that much wished for era was arrived?

Has not Portugal herself given unanswerable proofs upon this point by conceding the right of visit north of the equator, where the abolition has been completed, as well by her as now by Spain and all other powers?

Perhaps it is because no instance can be quoted that any slave trader, under either the Russian, Austrian, or Prussian flags, has yet appeared on the coast of Africa, that these powers, from a sentiment of delicacy towards States more directly interested both in the local and maritime question, have felt some reluctance to take a lead in giving their sanction to this principle.

The Russian memoir seems expressly to withhold, or rather to delay its adherence until there is reason to presume that a general concurrence is attainable; but surely in all such cases the most certain mode of obtaining a general concurrence is to augment the ranks of the concurring parties.

The United States and France are probably alluded to as the dissenting powers; but even in those States how much might not the chances of success have been improved had the three powers in question followed the example of those that have already adopted this system; and how narrowed would have been the chance of fraud had the sphere of the alliance been thus extended by their accession? It is still to be hoped that their present doubts will yield to more mature reflection upon the nature of the proposition. The first instance in which any of their flags should be made the cover of abuse the British plenipotentiaries are satisfied would be the signal for their vindicating its character, by taking an immediate and decisive step on this subject; but, without waiting for such a stimulus, they trust that the minds of those illustrious sovereigns remain still open to every suggestion on this subject which can improve the chances of general success; and that the opinion hitherto given on the part of their respective cabinets will form no obstacle to the adoption on their part of that measure, whatever it may be, which, under all the circumstances of the case, shall appear to them most effectual to the suppression of the mischief.

In adverting to the memoir which has been presented to the conference by the plenipotentiaries of France, the British plenipotentiaries are ready to bear their testimony to the spirit of fairness with which the subject has been met, and to the auspicious protection which the cause of abolition has progressively received from his most Christian Majesty.

The French plenipotentiary has candidly conceded, 1. That the proposed measure cannot be considered as any infraction of the law of nations. That it confirms, on the contrary, that law, inasmuch as it seeks to obtain a new power as a conventional exception from the admitted principles of the general law.

2. That it can be regarded as no exclusive surrender of the maritime rights of any particular State, as its provisions are strictly reciprocal, and for an object in which all feel and avow that they have a common interest.

3. That the principle of reciprocity may be still further guarded by confining the right of visit, as in the treaty with Holland, to an equal and limited number of ships-of-war of each State.

4. That every endeavor has been made strictly to limit the exercise of the power to the immediate purpose for which it is granted, and by suitable regulations to guard it against abuse.

5. That in order still further to distinguish this system from the ordinary right of visit, which every belligerent is entitled to exercise in time of war, it has been proposed to confine its operations, if desired, to the coasts of Africa, and to a limited distance from those coasts.

The objections on the part of France are of a more general description, and such as, it is hoped, time will in itself serve to remove; and, first, as to the objection which seems to weigh so strongly, viz: that the measure, if now taken, might be falsely regarded by the French nation as a concession imposed upon their Government by the powers of Europe as the price of the evacuation of their territory. It is impossible to contend in argument against such a delusion; but it may be observed that, had the other powers been pressed to adopt the arrangement in concert with France, it does not seem possible that such an invidious interpretation could have been given to so general and so benevolent a measure; but this happily is one of those objections which a short time must serve to remove.

The second objection is, that there is, as it were, some moral incompetency in the French nation to conform themselves to this measure; that what is felt by the crowns of Spain and Portugal, and of the Netherlands, to be no disparagement of the honor of their flag, nor any inconvenient surrender of the commercial rights and interests of their people, would in France work nothing but a sense of humiliation and discontent.

With great deference to the authority upon which this conclusion is stated, the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain cannot refrain from indulging the hope that although in France there may at first sight exist prejudices against this measure when received in an exaggerated shape, and without the necessary explanations; that although there may be also a feeling with respect to possible inconveniences which, notwithstanding every exertion on the part of the respective governments, might occasionally attend it in the execution, yet they confidently persuade themselves that a people so enlightened would not fail cordially to answer to an appeal made by their Government to the generosity of their feelings upon such a point, and that the French nation would never shrink from a competition with the British or any other nation in promoting whatever might conduce to an end in which the great interests of humanity are involved. It is true that Great Britain and France have been regarded as rivals as well as neighboring nations; but if they have had occasionally the misfortune to contend against each other in arms, nothing has arisen in the result of those contests which should create a sense of inferiority on either side. Both nations have well sustained their national honor, and both have learned to respect each other. Why, then, should the French people feel that as derogatory to their dignity which is viewed by the British nation in so different a light? Let us rather hope that, after their long and common sufferings in war, both nations will feel the strong interest they have in drawing closer those ties of friendship which now happily unite them, and in cultivating those relations in peace which may render their intercourse useful to each other and to the world. What object more worthy of their common councils and efforts than to give peace to Africa; and could their rivalry take a more ennobling and auspicious character?

Should a doubt or murmur, at the first aspect, arise among the people of France, they may be told that four of the most considerable of the maritime powers of the world have cheerfully united their exertions in this system for the deliverance of Africa; they will learn that the British people, so sensitively alive as they are known to be to every circumstance that might impede their commercial pursuits or expose the national flag to an unusual interference, have betrayed no apprehension in the instance before us; not a single remonstrance has been heard either in Parliament or from any commercial body in the empire, not even from any individual merchant or navigator. If the doubt should turn upon the prejudice which such a measure might occasion to the French commercial interests on the coast of Africa, they will, on inquiry, find that if France wishes to preserve and to improve her legitimate commerce on that coast she cannot pursue a more effectual course than by uniting her efforts to those of other powers for putting down the illicit slave trader, who is now become an armed freebooter, combining the plunder of merchant vessels of whatever nation with his illegal speculations in slaves.

If the idea should occur that French merchant ships frequenting that coast may experience interruption and delays by such visits; that officers may possibly abuse their trust, and that disputes may occur between their subjects and those of foreign powers, let them reduce this objection calmly to its true value; let them estimate it according to the extent of trade on that coast, and the chances of such accidents occurring. Notwithstanding every precaution taken by the respective Governments, let them set this evil, taken at the highest computation, in competition with the great moral question whether a whole continent, in order to avoid these minor inconveniences, shall be suffered to groan under all the aggravated horrors of an illicit slave trade; and let the Government of his most Christian Majesty judge whether it is possible that the French Government would hesitate in the decision to which it would wish to come upon such an alternative.

If any instance of abuse should occur for a moment to occasion regret, it will be remembered that this is the price, and how inconsiderable a price, which an humane and enlightened people are deliberately willing to pay for the attainment of such an object; it will be looked at in contrast with the African villages that would have been plundered; with the wars that would have been waged in the interior of that unhappy continent; with the number of human victims that would have been sacrificed to the cupidity of the slave trader, if civilized nations had not combined their exertions for their protection.

The French memoir argues against the principle of subjecting the property of French subjects to any other jurisdiction than that of their own tribunals; but it will appear that this practice is by no means unusual in time of war, and for the security of the belligerent this is constantly the case.

The neutral is, in all cases, amenable for the alleged infractions of the rights of the belligerent in matters of blockade, contraband of war, &c., to the tribunals of the belligerent, not to his own or to any mixed tribunal.

If it is said that this is not a case of war, but a regulation introduced in peace, and for the first time, the obvious answer is, does the case warrant the innovation?

If it does, the novelty of the practice ought to form no decisive objection to its adoption; but it is by no means true that this is the first instance in time of peace where the property of the subject has been brought under a jurisdiction other than the ordinary tribunals of his own State. Claims both of a private and public nature have frequently, by conventional laws, been made the object of such a proceeding, which is made to operate as a species of arbitration. Can we quote a more decisive example than the two conventions which, in November, 1815, referred the private claims upon the French Government, immense as they were in amount, to the decision of a mixed commission similarly constituted?

It is also to be observed that the subject gains a singular advantage by having his case disposed of before such a commission, which he would not obtain were he to have to proceed either in his own courts or in that of the capturing power for the restitution of his property: namely, that the commission, in deciding upon his cause, not only has the power of pronouncing upon his wrongs, but can give him, by its decision, ample damages, for the discharge of which the State of the capturing ship is made answerable; whereas, in an ordinary case of capture, he would have a dilatory and expensive suit to carry on against, perhaps, an insolvent captor.

Having noticed the principal objections brought forward in the French memoir, which they venture to persuade themselves are not insurmountable, the British plenipotentiaries have observed with satisfaction the exertions which the French Government have made, and are still prepared to make, for combatting this evil, at least as far as it can be alleged to subsist within their own limits, and to be carried on by French subjects; but they feel persuaded that the Government of his most Christian Majesty will take a more enlarged view of their power of doing good, and that they will be disposed to extend the sphere of their activity to the suppression of the mischief wherever it can be reached by their exertions.

The British Government also does full justice to the manner in which the French Government has on all occasions sought from them such information as might enable them the better to enforce the law of abolition. They bear testimony with pleasure not only to the sincerity of their exertions but to the arrangements lately made by stationing a naval force on the coast of Africa for the more effectual suppression of the slave trade, so far as it is carried on by French ships and subjects. They also view, with the highest satisfaction, the determination now announced of introducing into all the French colonies a registry of slaves; all these beneficent arrangements may be expected to operate powerfully so far as the mischief has decidedly a French character, but until all the principal powers can agree to have, as against the illicit slave trader, at least on the coast of Africa, but one common flag and co-operating force, they will not have gone to the full extent of their means to effectuate their purpose in conformity to their declarations at Vienna. With these observations the British plenipotentiaries will conclude their statement, submitting it to the candid examination of the several cabinets.

It would be a great satisfaction to them to be assured that the representations which they have felt it their duty to make were likely to receive their earliest consideration, and that the ministers of the several powers in London might expect to receive such further instructions as might enable them, without loss of time, to resume their labors with effect. It being humbly submitted that the final act, which the sovereigns are about to solicit from his Majesty the King of Portugal, is not an indispensable preliminary towards establishing by common consent on the coast of Africa, at least north of the equator, some efficient system for the suppression of the illicit traffic in slaves, which is at this moment carried on to the most alarming extent and under the most aggravating circumstances, such as loudly to call for the special and authoritative interference of the illustrious sovereigns to whom these remarks are respectfully submitted.

Projet of a letter to his Most Faithful Majesty.

SIR, MY BROTHER: At the period of the Congress of Vienna, the voice of religion and the groans of suffering humanity obtained the most consoling triumph. The world contemplated the near prospect of the termination of a scourge which has long desolated Africa; and your Majesty has justly acquired the right to the eternal gratitude of nations in proclaiming, in concert with your allies, the principle of universal abolition of the trade in slaves. Since then the acts concluded at Paris in 1815, and the happy issue of the several negotiations devoted to the progressive execution of this measure, have strengthened the generous hopes of the age, and have predicted the full accomplishment of the transaction which they have solemnly sanctioned.

If the result of the conference of Aix-la-Chapelle, which consummate the pacification and guaranty the prosperity of Europe, still leave a wish, it is that of seeing insured the final triumph of the declaration of the 8th of February, 1815, by means of an act decreeing the abolition of the slave trade in all parts and forever; that my allies and myself be not permitted to separate without turning our confident regards towards the powers to whom the Supreme Arbiter of the destinies of the earth has reserved the glory of putting an end to the afflictions of an unfortunate population.

This definitive success will be without doubt the fruit of your Majesty's intimate relations with the Government of Great Britain, because a concurrence of conciliating intentions and of reciprocal sacrifices, is alone of a nature to prosper a work equally meritorious before God and in the eyes of men.

It is only at the close of this negotiation that the measures of mutual inspection, decreed for the strict execution of a law become general, will crown the noble efforts of all the powers called to govern the different parts of the globe by the same sentiments of fraternity, of justice, and of religion.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE, November 24, 1818.

MY LORD: I have the honor to transmit to your lordship the inclosed protocol of the conferences of the allied ministers of the 11th and 19th instant, containing the votes of the different powers on the subject of the slave trade, which I have already forwarded to your lordship.

I have the honor, &c.,

Protocol of the conference between the plenipotentiaries of the five powers held at Aix-la-Chapelle November 11, 1818.

The Duke de Richelieu read his observations upon the means proposed by the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain for inspecting and repressing the illicit slave trade. The observations of the Duke de Richelieu, as well as the opinion of the Austrian cabinet and that which the Prussian cabinet made known in a preceding sitting are annexed to the protocol.

Protocol of the conference between the plenipotentiaries of the five powers held at Aix-la-Chapelle November 19, 1818.

To resume the discussion of the ulterior measures to be adopted against the slave trade, Lord Castlereagh read a memorandum, in which he observed upon the different propositions which have occupied the preceding conferences, and expressed his sincere regret that the present reunion had not brought about a more decisive result for the final success of the abolition, nor, above all, some resolution directly applicable to the repression of the cruel abuses by which the fraudulent commerce has hitherto eluded and frustrated the measures already agreed upon, and the laws and regulations already in force in various States.

After having analyzed and discussed in detail the objections brought forward to combat the system of reciprocal visit of ships suspected of being engaged in the illicit trade, and especially those which were developed in the vote of the plenipotentiaries of France, as well as the means of execution proposed by the plenipotentiaries of Russia, Lord Castlereagh, in again calling the most serious attention of the powers to a cause so deserving of their interest, desired that the ministers of the courts taking part in the conferences in London should be enjoined to continue their deliberations upon this question without waiting the effect which the formal measure adopted towards his Majesty the King of Portugal and the Brazils might produce; particularly as the result of this step was not an indispensable preliminary to the resolutions to be adopted with common consent for effectually suppressing the illicit traffic on the coasts to the north of the line.

The memorandum of Lord Castlereagh was annexed to the protocol, and the plenipotentiaries agreed to instruct the ministers of the courts in London in the sense of this last proposition.

On the reading of this protocol, the plenipotentiaries of Russia added that, independent of the instruction agreed upon between the courts, the ambassador of his Majesty the Emperor, in London, would be informed of the desire of his Imperial Majesty to see the ministerial conference in London occupied not only with the general question relative to the basis of the system to be adopted against the illicit trade, but at the same time the practical question of the amount of force necessary to be provided for the execution of the general measures, his Majesty the Emperor of Russia being ready to furnish his contingent as soon as the regulations to be established for this purpose shall be agreed upon.

Despatch from Viscount Castlereagh to Earl Bathurst, dated Paris, December 10, 1818.

MY LORD: Since I arrived here I have deemed it my duty to renew with the Duke de Richelieu the subject of the abolition, in order that I might be better enabled to judge as to the course it would be most advisable to pursue for resuming in London, under the protocol signed at Aix-la-Chapelle on the 19th November, the deliberations on this question.

In conference with his excellency, it was agreed that I should have an interview with the minister of the marine and colonies, the Count de Molé, and with the Count de Laisné, the minister of the interior, as the two departments in the Government the most competent to advise the King upon the propriety as well as upon the effect which those regulations might be expected to produce upon the public mind in France, which I had been directed, in conjunction with the Duke of Wellington, to press at Aix-la-Chapelle.

I had, accordingly, a conference with these ministers of nearly three hours, in which I was enabled to go through with them, in the utmost detail, the whole of this important subject; to all the bearings of which they appeared to me to give their utmost attention, and with a desire that the difficulties which they conceived, at least for the present, to stand in the way of their adopting the measure, might be found in the end not to be insurmountable.

It is unnecessary that I should attempt to report to your lordship the particulars of this extended conversation, as they would not vary in any essential point from the arguments brought forward by the Duke de Richelieu, and which are already so fully before the Prince Regent's Government; I have no reason to draw any more unfavorable inference from the manner in which these minister treated the subject, and they assured me of their disposition to render public in France every information which might tend to throw light on this interesting question and to strengthen it in the public favor.

Upon the whole, my lord, whilst I cannot give you hopes of any immediate progress, I venture, nevertheless, to indulge a sanguine expectation that if the object be pursued with the same persevering and conciliating temper on the part of Great Britain which has already achieved so much for the cause of abolition, the French Government may be brought, at no distant period, to unite their naval exertions with those of the other allied powers for the suppression of the illicit slave trade under the modified regulations submitted for this purpose to the plenipotentiaries assembled at Aix-la-Chapelle.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

[2D SESSION.]

TREATY WITH SPAIN OF FEBRUARY 22, 1819, AS FINALLY RATIFIED.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES FEBRUARY 23, 1821.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, between the United States and Spain, signed on the 22d of February, 1819, having been ratified by the contracting parties, and the ratifications having been exchanged, it is herewith communicated to Congress that such legislative measures may be taken as they shall judge proper for carrying the same into execution.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, February 22, 1821.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas a treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, between the United States of America and his Catholic Majesty, was concluded and signed between their plenipotentiaries, in this city, on the twenty-second day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, which treaty, word for word, is as follows:

TREATY

TRATADO

Of amity, settlement, and limits, between the United States of America and his Catholic Majesty.

De Amistad, arreglo de diferencias, y Limites, entre S. M. Ca. y los Estados Unidos de America.

The United States of America and his Catholic Majesty, desiring to consolidate, on a permanent basis, the friendship and good correspondence which happily prevails between the two parties, have determined to settle and terminate all their differences and pretensions by a treaty, which shall Deseando S. M. Católica y los Estados Unidos de America, consolidar de un modo permanente, la buena correspondencia y amistad que felizmente reyna entre ambas partes, han resuelto transigir y terminar todas sus diferencias y pretensiones por medio de un Tratado, que fixe con precision, los limites de designate, with precision, the limits of their respective bordering territories in North America.

With this intention, the President of the United States has furnished with their full powers John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State of the United States, and his Catholic Majesty has appointed the most excellent Lord Don Luis De Onis, Gonzalez, Lopez y Vara, Lord of the town of Rayaces, perpetual Regidor of the corporation of the City of Salamanca, Knight Grand-Cross of the Royal American Order of Isabella the Catholic, decorated with the Lys of La Vendee, Knight Pensioner of the Royal and distinguished Spanish Order of Charles III, member of the Supreme Assembly of the said Royal Order, of the council of his Catholic Majesty, his Secretary, with Exercise of Decrees, and his Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary near the United States of America.

And the said plenipotentiaries, after having exchanged their powers, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a firm and inviolable peace and sincere friendship between the United States and their citizens and his Catholic Majesty, his successors and subjects, without exception of persons or places.

ARTICLE 2. His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States, in full property and sovereignty, all the territories which belong to him situated to the eastward of the Mississippi, known by the name of East and West Florida. The adjacent islands dependent on said provinces, all public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings, which are not private property, archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of said provinces, are included in this article. The said archives and documents shall be left in possession of the commissaries or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them.

ARTICLE 3. The boundary line between the two countries west of the Mississippi shall begin on the Gulf of Mexico, at the mouth of the river Sabine, in the sea, continuing north, along the western bank of that river, to the 32d degree of latitude; thence, by a line due north, to the degree of latitude where it strikes the Rio Roxo of Natchitoches, or Red River; then, following the course of the Rio Roxo westward, to the degree of longitude 100 west from London, and 23 from Washington; then, crossing the said Red river, and running thence, by a line due north, to the river Arkansas; thence, following the course of the southern bank of the Arkansas, to its source, in latitude 42 north; and thence, by that parallel of latitude, to the South Sea—the whole being as laid down in Melish's map of the United States, published at Philadelphia, improved to the 1st of January, 1818. But if the source of the Arkansas river shall be found to fall north or south of latitude 42, then the line shall run from the said source due south or north, as the case may be, till it meets the said parallel of latitude 42, and thence, along the said parallel, to the South Sea—all the islands in the Sabine, and the said Red and Arkansas rivers, throughout the course thus described, to belong to the United States; but the use of the waters and the navigation of the Sabine to the sea, and of the said rivers Roxo and Arkansas, throughout the extent of the said boundary, on their respective banks, shall be common to the respective inhabitants of both nations.

The two high contracting parties agree to cede and renounce all their rights, claims, and pretensions, to the territories described by the said line: that is to say, "the United States hereby cede to his Catholic Majesty, and renounce forever, all their rights, claims, and pretensions to the territories lying west and south of the above described line; and, in like manner, his Catholic Majesty cedes to the said United States all his rights, claims, and sus respectivos y confinantes territorios en la America septentrional.

Con esta mira han nombrado, Sa M. Ca. al Exmo. Sor. Dn. Luis De Onis, Gonzalez, Lopez y Vara, Señor de la Villa de Rayaces, Regidor perpetuo del ayuntamiento de la Ciudad de Salamanca, Caballero Gran Cruz de la Real orden; Americana de Isabel la Católica, y de la decoracion del Lis de la Vendéa, Caballero Pensionista de la Real y distinguida orden Española de Carlos III, Ministro Vocal de la Suprema Asamblea de dicha Rl. orden, de su consejo, su Secretário con ejercicio de Decretos y su Enviado Extraordinario y Ministro Plenipotenciario cerca de los Estados Unidos de America: Y el Presidente de los Estados Unidos, a Don Juan Quincy Adams, Secretario de Estado de los mismos Estados Unidos.

Y ambos Plenipotenciarios, despues de haver cagado sus Poderes, han ajustado y firmado los Articulos siguientes:

ARTICULO 1. Habrá una paz solida e inviolable, y una amistad sincera entre S. M. Ca. sus sucesores y subditos y los Estados Unidos y sus ciudadanos sin exception de personas ni lugares.

ARTICULO 2. S. M. Ca. cede a los Estados Unidos, en toda propiedad y soberania, todos los territorios que le pertenecen, situados al Este del Misisipi, conocidos bajo el nombre de Florida Occidental y Florida Oriental. Son comprehendidos en este articulo las yslas adyacentes dependientes de dichas dos provincias, los sitios, plazas publicas, terrenos valdios, edificios publicos, fortificaciones, casernas y otros edificios que no sean propiedad de algun individuo particular, los archivos y documentos directamente relativos a la propiedad y soberania de las mismas dos provincias. Dichos archivos y documentos se entregarán a los comisarios ú oficiales de los Estados Unidos debidamente autorizados para recibirlos.

ARTICULO 3. La Línea divisoria entre los dos países al Occidente del Misisipi arrancará del Seno Mexicano en la embocadura del Rio Sabina en el Mar, seguirá al Norte por la Orilla Occidental de este Rio hasta el grado 32 de latitud; desde allí por una línea recta al Norte hasta el grado de latitud en que entra en el Rio Roxo de Natchitoches (Red river), y continuará por el curso del Rio Roxo al Oeste hasta el grado 100 de longitud Occidental de Londres y 23 de Washington, en que cortará este Rio, y Seguirá por una línea recta al Norte por el mismo grado hasta el Rio Arkansas, cuya Orilla Meridional Seguirá hasta su nacimiento en el grado 42 de latitud Septentrional; y desde dicho punto se terará una línea recta por el mismo paralelo de latitud hasta el Mar del Sur. Todo segun el Mapa de los Estados Unidos de Melish, publicado en Philadelphia y perfeccionado en 1818. Pero si el nacimiento del Rio Arkansas se hallase al Norte ó Sur de dicho grado 42 de latitud, seguirá la línea desde el origen de dicho Rio recta al Sur ó Norte, segun fuese necesario hasta que encuentre el expresado grado 42, de latitud, y desde allí por el mismo paralelo hasta el Mar del Sur. Pertenecerán a los Estados Unidos todas las Yslas de los Rios Sabina, Roxo de Natchitoches, y Arkansas, en la extension de todo el curso descrito; pero el uso de las aguas y la navegacion del Sabina hasta el Mar y de los expresados Rios Roxo y Arkansas en toda la extension de sus mencionados limites en sus respectivas Orillas, sera comun a los habitantes de las dos naciones.

Las dos altas partes contratantes convienen en ceder y renunciar todos sus derechos, reclamaciones, y pretensiones sobre los territorios que se describen en esta línea; a saber, S. M. Ca. renuncia y cede para siempre por si, y a nombre de sus herederos y sucesores todos los derechos que tiene sobre los territorios al Esté y al Norte de dicha línea; y los Estados Unidos en igual forma ceden a S. M. Ca. y renuncian para siempre todos sus derechos, reclamaciones y pre-pretensions to any territories east and north of the said line, and for himself, his heirs, and successors, renounces all claim to the said territories forever.

ARTICLE 4. To fix this line with more precision, and to place the landmarks which shall designate exactly the limits of both nations, each of the contracting parties shall appoint a commissioner and a surveyor, who shall meet before the termination of one year from the date of the ratification of this treaty, at Natchitoches, on the Red river, and proceed to run and mark the said line from the mouth of the Sabine to the Red river, and from the Red river to the river Arkansas, and to ascertain the latitude of the source of the said river Arkansas in conformity to what is above agreed upon and stipulated, and the line of latitude 42 degrees to the South Sea; they shall make out plans and keep journals of their proceedings, and the result agreed upon by them shall be considered as part of this treaty, and shall have the same force as if it were inserted therein. The two Governments will amicably agree respecting the necessary articles to be furnished to those persons, and also as to their respective escorts, should such be deemed necessary.

ARTICLE 5. The inhabitants of the ceded territories shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion without any restriction, and all those who may desire to remove to the Spanish dominions shall be permitted to sell or export their effects at any time whatever, without being subject in either case to duties.

ARTICLE 6. The inhabitants of the territories which his Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States by this treaty shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution and admitted to the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States.

ARTICLE 7. The officers and troops of his Catholic Majesty in the territories hereby ceded by him to the United States shall be withdrawn, and possession of the places occupied by them shall be given within six months after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, or sooner, if possible, by the officers of his Catholic Majesty to the Commissioners or officers of the United States duly appointed to receive them, and the United States shall furnish the transports and escort necessary to convey the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana.

ARTICLE 8. All the grants of land made before the 24th of January, 1818, by his Catholic Majesty or by his lawful authorities in the said territories ceded by his Majesty to the United States shall be ratified and confirmed to the persons in possession of the lands to the same extent that the same grants would be valid if the territories had remained under the dominion of his Catholic Majesty; but the owners in possession of such lands who, by reason of the recent circumstances of the Spanish nation and the revolutions in Europe, have been prevented from fulfilling all the conditions of their grants shall complete them within the terms limited in the same, respectively, from the date of this treaty, in default of which the said grants shall be null and void. All grants made since the said 24th of January, 1818, when the first proposal on the part of his Catholic Majesty for the cession of the Floridas was made, are hereby declared and agreed to be null and void.

ARTICLE 9. The two high contracting parties, animated with the most earnest desire of conciliation, and with the object of putting an end to all the differences which have existed between them, and of confirming the good understanding which they wish to be forever maintained between them, reciprocally renounce all claim for damages or injuries which they themselves as well as their respective citizens and subjects may have suffered until the time of signing this treaty.

tensiones á qualesquiera territorios situados al Oeste y al Sur de la misma linea arriba descrita.

ARTICULO 4. Para fixar está linea con mas precision y establecer los Mojones que señalen con exactitud los limites de ambas naciones, nombrará cada una de ellas un comisario y un geómetra que se junterán antes del termino de un año, contado desde la fecha de la ratificacion de este tratado, en Natchitoches, en las Orillas del Río Roxo, y procederán á señalar y demarcar dicha linea, desde la embocadura del Sabina hasta el Río Roxo, y de este hasta el Río Arkansas, y á averiguar con certidumbre, el origen del expresado Río Arkansas, y fixar segun queda estipulado y convenido en este Tratado, la linea que debe seguir, desde el grado 42, de latitud hasta el Mar Pacifico. Llevarán diarios y levantarán planos de sus operaciones, y el resultado convenido por ellos se tendrá por parte de este Tratado, y tendrá la misma fuerza que si estuviese inserto en él; deviendo convenir amistosamente los dos Gobiernos en el arreglo de quanto necesiten estos individuos, y en la escolta respectiva que deban llevar, siempre que se crea necesario.

ARTICULO 5. A los habitantes de todos los territorios cedidos se les conservará el ejercicio libre de su religion, sin restriccion alguna, y á todos los que quisieren trasladarse á los dominios Españoles se les permitirá la venta ó extraccion de sus efectos en qualquiera tiempo, sin que pueda exigirseles en uno ni otro casa derecho alguno.

ARTICULO 6. Los habitantes de los territorios que S. M. Ca. cede por este Tratado á los Estados Unidos seran incorporados en la Union de los mismos Estados, lo mas presto posible, segun los principios de la Constitucion Federal, y admitidos al goce de todos los privilegios, derechos é inmunidades de que disfrutan los ciudadanos de los demas Estados.

ARTICULO 7. Los oficiales y tropas de S. M. Ca. evacuarán los territorios cedidos á los Estados Unidos seis meses despues del cange de la ratificacion de este tratado, ó antes si fuese posible, y darán posesion de ellos á los oficiales, ó comisarios de los Estados Unidos debidamente autorizados para recibirlos: Y los Estados Unidos proveerán los transportes y escolta necesarios para llevar á la Habana los oficiales y tropas Españolas y sus equipages.

ARTICULO 8. Todas las concesiones de terrenos hechas por S. M. Ca. ó por sus legitimas autoridades antes del 24 de Enero, de 1818, en los expresados territorios que S. M. cede á los Estados Unidos, quedarán ratificadas y reconocidas á las personas que esten en posesion de ellas, del mismo modo que lo serian si S. M. hubiese continuado en el dominio de estos territorios; pero los propietarios que por un efecto de las circunstancias en que se ha hallado la Nacion Española y por las revoluciones de Europa, no hubiesen podido llenar todas las obligaciones de las concesiones, seran obligados á cumplirlas segun las condiciones de sus respectivas concesiones desde la fecha de este tratado, en defecto de lo qual seran nulas y de ningun valor. Todas las concesiones posteriores al 24 de Enero, de 1818, en que fueron hechas las primeras proposiciones de parte de S. M. Ca. para la cesion de las dos Floridas, convienen y declaren las dos altas partes contratantes que quedan anuladas y de ningun valor.

ARTICULO 9. Las dos altas partes contratantes animadas de los mas vivos deseos de conciliacion y con el objeto de cortar de raiz todas las discusiones que han existido entre ellas y afianzar la buena armonia que desean mantener perpetuamente, renuncian una y otra reciprocamente á todas las reclamaciones de daños y perjuicios que asi ellas como sus respectivos subditos y ciudadanos hayan experimentado hasta el dia en que se firme este tratado.

The renunciation of the United States will extend to all the injuries mentioned in the convention of the 11th of August, 1802.

2. To all claims on account of prizes made by French privateers, and condemned by French consuls, within the territory and jurisdiction of Spain.

3. To all claims of indemnities on account of the suspension of the right of deposit at New Orleans in 1802.

4. To all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Government of Spain, arising from the unlawful seizures at sea, and in the ports and territories of Spain, or the Spanish colonies.

5. To all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Spanish Government, statements of which, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, have been presented to the Department of State, or to the minister of the United States in Spain, since the date of the convention of 1802, and until the signature of this treaty.

The renunciation of his Catholic Majesty extends :

1. To all the injuries mentioned in the convention of the 11th of August, 1802.

2. To the sums which his Catholic Majesty advanced for the return of Captain Pike from the provincias internas.

3. To all injuries caused by the expedition of Miranda, that was fitted out and equipped at New York.

4. To all claims of Spanish subjects upon the Government of the United States, arising from unlawful seizures at sea, or within the ports and territorial jurisdiction of the United States.

Finally, to all the claims of subjects of his Catholic Majesty upon the Government of the United States, in which the interposition of his Catholic Majesty's Government has been solicited before the date of this treaty, and since the date of the convention of 1802, or which may have been made to the Department of Foreign Affairs of his Majesty, or to his minister in the United States.

And the high contracting parties, respectively, renounce all claim to indemnities for any of the recent events or transactions of their respective commanders and officers in the Floridas.

The United States will cause satisfaction to be made for the injuries, if any, which, by process of law, shall be established to have been suffered by the Spanish officers, and individual Spanish inhabitants, by the late operations of the American army in Florida.

ARTICLE 10. The convention entered into between the two Governments on the 11th of August, 1802, the ratifications of which were exchanged the 21st December, 1818, is annulled.

ARTICLE 11. The United States, exonerating Spain from all demands in future, on account of the claims of their citizens to which the renunciations herein contained extend, and considering them entirely cancelled, undertake to make satisfaction for the same to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars. To ascertain the full amount and validity of those claims, a commission, to consist of three Commissioners, citizens of the United States, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, which commission shall meet at the city of Washington and, within the space of three years from the time of their first meeting, shall receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of all the claims included within the descriptions above mentioned. The said Commissioners shall take an oath or affirmation, to be entered on the record of their proceedings, for the faithful and diligent discharge of their duties; and, in case of the death, sickness, or necessary absence of any such Commissioner, his place may be supplied by the appointment as aforesaid, or by the President of the United States, during the recess of La renuncia de los Estados Unidos se extiende á todos los perjuicios mencionados en el Convenio de 11 de Agosto de 1802.

2. A todas las reclamaciones de presas hechas por los corsarios Franceses, y condenadas por los consules Franceses dentro del territorio y jurisdiccion de España.

3. A todas las reclamaciones de indemnizaciones por la suspension del derecho de deposito en Nueva Orleans en 1802.

4. A todos las reclamaciones de los ciudadanos de los Estados Unidos contra el Gobierno Español procedentes de presas y confiscaciones injustas asi en la Mar como en los puertos y territorios de S. M. en España y sus colonias.

5. A todas las reclamaciones de los ciudadanos de los Estados Unidos contra el Gobierno de España, en que se haya reclamado la interposicion del Gobierno de los Estados Unidos antes de la fecha de este tratado, y desde la fecha del convenio de 1802, ó presentadas al Departamento de Estado de esta Republica, ó Ministro de los Estados Unidos en España.

La renuncia de S. M. Ca. se extiende :

1. A todos los perjuicios mencionados en el convenio de 11 de Agosto, 1802.

2. A las cantidades que suplió, para la vuelta del Captain Pike, de las provincias internas.

3. A los perjuicios causados por la expedicion de Miranda, armada y equipada en Nueva York.

4. A todas las reclamaciones de los subditos de S. M. Ca. contra el Gobierno de los Estados Unidos procedentes de presas y confiscaciones injustas asi en la mar como en los puertos y territorios de los Estados Unidos.

5. A todas las reclamaciones de los subditos de S. M. Ca. contra el Gobierno de los Estados Unidos, en que se haya reclamado la interposicion del Gobierno de España antes de la fecha de este tratado, y desde la fecha del convenio de 1802, ó que hayan sido presentadas al Departamento de Estado de S. M. ó á su Ministro en los Estados Unidos.

Las altas partes contratantes renuncian reciprocamente todos sus derechos á indemnizaciones por qualquiera de los ultimos; a contencimientos y transacciones de sus respectivos comandantes y oficiales en las Floridas.

Y los Estados Unidos satisfaran los perjuicios, si los hubiese habido, que los habitantes y oficiales Españoles justifiquen legalmente haber sufrido por las operaciones de Exercita Americano en ellas.

ARTICULO 10. Queda anulado el convenio hecho entre los dos Gobiernos en 11 de Agosto, de 1802, cuyas ratificaciones fueron cangeadas en 21 de Diciembre de 1818.

ARTICULO 11. Los Estados Unidos descargando á la España para lo sucesivo de todas las reclamaciones de sus ciudadanos á que se extienden las renuncias hechas en este tratado, y dan dolas por enteramente canceladas, toman sobre si la satisfaccion ó pago de todas ellas hasta la cantidad de cinco millones de pesos fuertes. El Sor. Presidente nombrará, con consentimiento y aprobacion del Senado, una Comision compuesta de tres Comisionados, ciudadanos de los Estados Unidos, para ave riguar con certidumbre el importe total y justificacion de estas reclamaciones; la qual se reunirá en la ciudad de Washington, y en el espacio de tres años, desde su reunion primera, recibirá, examinará, y decidirá sobre el importe y justificacion de todas las reclamaciones arriba expresadas y descritas. Los dichos comisionados prestarán juramento, que se onatará en los quadernos de sus operaciones, para el desempeño fiel y eficaz de sus deberes, y en caso de muerte, enfermedad ó ausencia precisa de alguno de ellos, será reemplazado del mismo modo, ó por el Sor. Presidente de los Estados Unidos, en ausencia del Senado. Los dichos comisionados se hallaran autorizados para oír the Senate, of another Commissioner in his stead. The said Commissioners shall be authorized to hear and examine, on oath, every question relative to the said claims, and to receive all suitable authentic testimony concerning the same. And the Spanish Government shall furnish all such documents and elucidations as may be in their possession, for the adjustment of the said claims according to the principles of justice, the laws of nations, and the stipulations of the treaty between the two parties of 27th October, 1795; the said documents to be specified when demanded at the instance of the said Commissioners.

The payment of such claims as may be admitted and adjusted by the said Commissioners, or the major part of them, to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars, shall be made by the United States, either immediately at their Treasury or by the creation of stock bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, payable from the proceeds of sales of public lands within the territories hereby ceded to the United States, or in such other manner as the Congress of the United States may prescribe by law.

The records of the proceedings of the said Commissioners, together with the vouchers and documents produced before them, relative to the claims to be adjusted and decided upon by them, shall, after the close of their transactions, be deposited in the Department of State of the United States, and copies of them, or any part of them, shall be furnished to the Spanish Government, if required, at the demand of the Spanish minister in the United States.

ARTICULO 12. The treaty of limits and navigation of 1795 remains confirmed in all and each one of its articles, excepting the 2d, 3d, 4th, 21st, and the second clause of the 22d article, which, having been altered by this treaty, or having received their entire execution, are no longer valid.

With respect to the 15th article of the same treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation, of 1795, in which it is stipulated that the flag shall cover the property, the two high contracting parties agree that this shall be so understood with respect to those powers who recognize this principle; but if either of the two contracting parties shall be at war with a third party, and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral shall cover the property of enemies whose Government acknowledge this principle, and not of others.

ARTICULO 13. Both contracting parties, wishing to favor their mutual commerce by affording in their ports every necessary assistance to their respective merchant vessels, have agreed that the sailors who shall desert from their vessels in the ports of the other shall be arrested and delivered up, at the instance of the consul, who shall prove, nevertheless, that the deserters belonged to the vessels that claim them, exhibiting the document that is customary in their nation; that is to say, the American consul in a Spanish port shall exhibit the document known by the name of articles, and the Spanish consul in American ports, the roll of the vessel; and if the name of the deserter or deserters who are claimed shall appear in the one or the other, they shall be arrested, held in custody, and delivered to the vessel to which they shall belong.

ARTICULO 14. The United States hereby certify that they have not received any compensation from France for the injuries they suffered from her privateers, consuls, and tribunals, on the coasts and in the ports of Spain, for the satisfaction of which provision is made by this treaty; and they will present an authentic statement of the prizes made, and of their true value, that Spain may avail herself of the same in such manner as she may deem just and proper.

ARTICULO 15. The United States, to give to his Catholic Majesty a proof of their desire to cement the relations of amity subsisting between the two nations, and to favor the commerce of the subjects of his Catholic Majesty, agree that Spanish vessels, coming laden only with productions of Spanish growth y examinar bajo juramento qualquiera demanda relativa á dichas reclamaciones, y para recibir los testimonios autenticos y convenientes relativos á ellas. El Gobierno Español subministrará á todos aquellos documentos y aclaraciones que esten en su poder para el ajuste las expresadas reclamaciones, segun los principios de justicia, el derecho de gentes, y las estipulaciones del tratado entre las dos partes de 27 de Octubre de 1795, cuyos documentos se especificaran quando se pidan á instancia de dichos comisionados.

Los Estados Unidos pagarán aquellas reclamaciones que sean admitidas y ajustadas por los dichos comisionados, ó por la mayor parte de ellos, hasta la cantidad de cinco millones de pesos fuertes, sea in mediatemente en su Tesoreria, ó por medio de uno creación de fondos con el interés de un seis por ciento al año, pagaderos de los productos de las ventas de los terrenos valdios en los territorios aqui cedidos á los Estados Unidos, ó de qualquiera otra manera que el Congreso de los Estados Unidos ordene por ley.

Se depositarán, despues de concluidas sus transacciones, en el Departamento de Estado de los Estados Unidos, los quadernos de las operaciones de los dichos Comisionados, juntamente con los documentos que se les presenten relativos á las reclamaciones que de ben a justar y decidir; y se entregarán copias de ellos ó de parte de ellos al Gobierno Español, y á peticion de su Ministro en los Estados Unidos, si lo solicitase

ARTICULO 12. El tratado de limites y navegacion de 1795, queda confirmado en todos y cada uno de sus articulos, excepto los articulos 2, 3, 4, 21, y la segunda clausula del 22, que habiendo sido alterados por este tratado, ó cumplidos enteramente no pueden tener valor alguno.

Con respecto al articulo 15 del mismo tratado de amistad, limites y navegacion de 1795, en que se estipula, que la bandera cubre la propiedad, han convenido las dos altas partes contratantes en que esto se entienda asi con respecto á aquellas potencias que reconozcan este principio; pero que si una de las dos partes contratantes estuviere en guerra con una tercera, y la otra neutral, la bandera de esta neutral cubrirá la propiedad de los enemigos, cuyo gobierno reconozca este principio, y no de otros.

ARTICULO 13. Deseando ambas potencias contratantes favorecer el comercio reciproco prestando cada una en sus puertos todos los auxilios convenientes á sus respectivos buques mercantes, han acordado en hacer prender y entregar los marineros que desiertan de sus buques en los puertos de la otra, á instancia del consul; quien sin embargo deberá probar que los desertores pertenecen á los buques que los reclaman, manifestando el documento de costumbre en su nacion; esto es, que el consul Español en puerto Americano exhibirá el rol del buque, y el consul Americano en puerto Español, el documento conocido bajo el nombre de articles; y constando en uno ú otro el nombre ó nombres del deserter ó desertores que se reclaman, se procederá al arresto, custodia y entrega al buque á que correspondan.

ARTICULO 14. Los Estados Unidos certifican por el presente que no han recibido compensacion alguna de la Francia por los perjuicios que sufrieron de sus corsarios, consules y tribunales en las costas y puertos de España para cuya satisfaccion se provee en este tratado, y presentarán una relacion justificada de las presas hechas, y de su verdadero valor, para que la España pueda servirse de ella en la manera que mas juzgue justo y conveniente.

ARTICULO 15. Los Estados Unidos para dar á S. M. Ca. una prueba de sus deseos de cimentar las reclamaciones de amistad que existen entre las dos naciones, y de favorecer el comercio de los subditos de S. M. Ca. convienen en que, los buques Españoles que vengán solo cargados de productos de sus or manufactures, directly from the ports of Spain or of her colonies, shall be admitted, for the term of twelve years, to the ports of Pensacola and St. Augustine, in the Floridas, without paying other or higher duties on their cargoes or of tonnage than will be paid by the vessels of the United States. During the said term no other nation shall enjoy the same privileges within the ceded territories. The twelve years shall commence three months after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty.

ARTICLE 16. The present treaty shall be ratified in due form by the contracting parties, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in six months from this time, or sooner, if possible.

In witness whereof, we, the underwritten plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and of his Catholic Majesty, have signed, by virtue of our powers, the present treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, and have thereunto affixed our seals respectively.

Done at Washington, this twenty-second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen.

frutos ó manufacturas directamente de los puertos de España ó de sus colonias, sean admitidos por el espacio de doce años en los puertos de Panzacola y San Augustin de las Floridas, sin pagar mas derechos por sus cargamentos, ni mayor derechos de tonelaje, que el que paguen los buques de los Estados Unidos. Durante este tiempo ninguna nacion tendrá derecho á los mismos privilegios en los territorios cedidos. Los doce años empezaran á contarse tres meses despues de haberse cambiado las ratificaciones de este tratado.

ARTICULO 16. El presente tratado será ratificado en debida forma por las partes contratantes, y las ratificaciones se cangearán en el espacio de seis meses desde esta fecha; ó mas pronto si es posible.

En fé de lo qual nosotros los infrascritos plenipotenciarios de S. M. Ca., y de los Estados Unidos de America, hemos firmado en virtud de nuestros poderes el presente tratado de amistad, arreglo de diferencias y limites, y le hemos puesto nuestros sellos respectivos.

“Ferdinand the Seventh, by the grace of God, and by the constitution of the Spanish monarchy, King of the Spains.

Whereas, on the twenty-second day of February, of the year one thousand eight hundred and nineteen last past, a treaty was concluded and signed in the city of Washington between Don Luis de Onis, my envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, and John Quincy Adams, esquire, Secretary of State of the United States of America, competently authorized by both parties, consisting of sixteen articles, which had for their object the arrangement of differences and of limits between both Governments and their respective territories; which are of the following form and literal tenor:”

Por cuanto en el dia veinte y dos de Febrero, del año proximo pasado de mil ochocientos diez y nueve, se concluyo y firmo en la ciudad de Washington entre Dn. Luis de Onis mi enviado extraordinario y ministro plenipotenciaria, y Dn. Juan Quincy Adams, Secretario de Estado de los Estados Unidos de America, autorizados competentemente por ambas partes, un tratado compuesto de diez y seis articulos, que tiene por objeto el arreglo de diferencias y de limites entre ambos Gobiernos y sus respectivos Territorios; cuya forma y tenor literal es el siguiente.”

“Therefore, having seen and examined the sixteen articles aforesaid, and having first obtained the consent and authority of the General Cortes of the nation with respect to the cession mentioned and stipulated in the 2d and 3d articles, I approve and ratify all and every one of the articles referred to and the clauses which are contained in them; and in virtue of these presents I approve and ratify them; promising, on the faith and word of a King, to execute and observe them and cause them to be executed and observed entirely as if I myself had signed them; and that the circumstance of having exceeded the term of six months, fixed for the exchange of the ratifications in the 16th article may afford no obstacle in any manner, it is my deliberate will that the present ratification be as valid and firm and produce the same effects as if it had been done within the determined period. Desirous at the same time of avoiding any doubt or ambiguity concerning the meaning of the 8th article of the said treaty in respect to the date which is pointed out in it as the period for the confirmation of the grants of lands in the Floridas, made by me, or by the competent authorities in my royal name, which point of date was fixed in the positive understanding of the three grants of land made in favor of the Duke of Alagon, the Count of Punonrostro, and Don Pedro de Vargas, being annulled by its tenor, I think proper to declare that the said three grants have remained and do remain entirely annulled and invalid, and that neither the three individuals mentioned nor

"IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, February 19, 1821."

"Resolved, two-thirds of the senators present concurring therein, That the Senate, having examined the treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, between the United States of America and his Catholic Majesty, made and concluded on the twenty-second of February, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, and seen and considered the ratification thereof made by his said Catholic Majesty on the twenty-fourth day of October, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, do consent to, and advise the President of the United States to ratify the same."

And whereas, in pursuance of the said advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, I have ratified and confirmed the said treaty, in the words following, viz:

"Now, therefore, I, James Monroe, President of the United States of America, having seen and considered the treaty above recited, together with the ratification of his Catholic Majesty thereof, do, in pursuance of the aforesaid advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, by these presents, accept, ratify, and confirm the said treaty, and every clause and article thereof, as the same are hereinbefore set forth.

"In faith whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be hereto affixed.

"JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
"Secretary of State."

And whereas the said ratifications, on the part of the United States and of his Catholic Majesty, have been this day duly exchanged, at Washington, by John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State of the United States, and by General Don Francisco Dionisio Vives, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of his Catholic Majesty: Now, therefore, to the end that the said treaty may be observed and performed with good faith on the part of the United States, I have caused the premises to be made public; and I do hereby enjoin and require all persons bearing office, civil or military, within the United States, and all others, citizens or inhabitants thereof, or being within the same, faithfully to observe and fulfil the said treaty, and every clause and article thereof.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand.

TREATY WITH ALGIERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE JANUARY 7, 1822.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a treaty of peace and amity concluded between the United States and the Dey and Regency of Algiers on the 23d of December, 1816.

This treaty is, in all respects, the same in its provisions with that which had been concluded on the 30th of June, 1815, and was ratified, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, on the 26th of December of that year, with the exception of one additional and explanatory article.

The circumstances which have occasioned the delay in laying the present treaty before the Senate, for their advice and consent to its ratification, are, that having been received in the spring of the year 1817, during the recess of the Senate, in the interval between the time when the Department of State was vacated by its late Secretary and the entrance of his successor upon the duties of the office, and when a change also occurred of the chief clerk of the Department, it was not recollected by the officers of the Department that it remained without the constitutional sanction of the Senate until shortly before the commencement of the present session. The documents explanatory of the additional articles are likewise herewith transmitted.

JAMES MONROE.

DECEMBER 30, 1821.

Treaty of peace and amity concluded between the United States of America and the Dey and Regency of Algiers.

The President of the United States and the Dey of Algiers, being desirous to restore and maintain upon a stable and permanent footing the relations of peace and good understanding between the two powers, and for this purpose to renew the treaty of peace and amity which was concluded between the two States by William Shaler and Commodore Stephen Decatur, as Commissioners Plenipotentiary on the part of the United States, and his Highness Omar Pashaw, Dey of Algiers, on the 30th day of June, 1815.

The President of the United States having subsequently nominated and appointed by commission the above named William Shaler, and Isaac Chauncey, commodore and commander-in-chief of all the naval forces of the United States in the Mediterranean, Commissioners Plenipotentiary, to treat with his Highness the Dey of Algiers, for the renewal of the treaty aforesaid; and they have concluded, settled, and signed, the following articles:

ARTICLE I. There shall be, from the conclusion of this treaty, a firm, perpetual, inviolable, and universal peace and friendship between the President and citizens of the United States of America on the one part, and the Dey and subjects of the Regency of Algiers, in Barbary, on the other, made by the free consent of both parties, and on the terms of the most favored nations; and if either party shall hereafter grant to any other nation any particular favor or privilege in navigation or commerce it shall immediately become common to the other party, freely, when freely it is granted to such other nations; but when the grant is conditional, it shall be at the option of the contracting parties to accept, alter, or reject, such conditions in such manner as shall be most conducive to their respective interests.

ARTICLE II. It is distinctly understood between the contracting parties that no tribute, either as biennial presents, or under any other form or name whatever, shall be required by the Dey and Regency of Algiers from the United States of America, on any pretext whatever.

ARTICLE III. Relates to the mutual restitution of prisoners and subjects, and has been duly executed.

ARTICLE IV. Relates to the delivery into the hands of the consul general of a quantity of bales of cotton, &c., and has been duly executed.

ARTICLE V. If any goods belonging to any nation with which either of the parties are at war should be loaded on board vessels belonging to the other party, they shall pass free and unmolested, and no attempt shall be made to take or detain them.

ARTICLE VI. If any citizens or subjects belonging to either party shall be found on board a prize vessel taken from an enemy by the other party, such citizens or subjects shall be liberated immediately; and in no case, or on any pretence whatever, shall any American citizen be kept in captivity or confinement, or the property of any American citizen, found on board of any vessel belonging to any nation with which Algiers may be at war, be detained from its lawful owners after the exhibition of sufficient proofs of American citizenship and American property by the consul of the United States residing at Algiers.

ARTICLE VII. Proper passports shall immediately be given to the vessels of both the contracting parties, on condition that the vessels-of-war belonging to the Regency of Algiers, on meeting with merchant vessels belonging to the citizens of the United States of America, shall not be permitted to visit them with more than two persons besides the rowers; these only shall be permitted to go on board without first obtaining leave from the commander of said vessel, who shall compare the passports and immediately permit said vessel to proceed on her voyage; and should any of the subjects of Algiers insult or molest the commander, or any other person on board a vessel so visited, or plunder any of the property contained in her, on complaint being made to the consul of the United States residing in Algiers, and on his producing sufficient proofs to substantiate the fact, the commander or rais of said Algerine ship or vessel-of-war, as well as the offenders, shall be punished in the most exemplary manner.

All vessels-of-war belonging to the United States of America, on meeting a cruiser belonging to the Regency of Algiers, on having seen her passports and certificates from the consul of the United States residing in Algiers, shall permit her to proceed on her cruise unmolested and without detention.

No passport shall be granted by either party to any vessels but such as are absolutely the property of citizens or subjects of the said contracting parties, on any pretence whatever.

ARTICLE VIII. A citizen or subject of either of the contracting parties having bought a prize vessel condemned by the other party, or by any other nation, the certificates of condemnation and bill of sale shall be a sufficient passport for such vessel for six months, which, considering the distance between the two countries, is no more than a reasonable time for her to procure passports.

ARTICLE IX. Vessels of either of the contracting parties putting into the ports of the other, and having need of provisions or other supplies, shall be furnished at the market price; and if any such vessel should so put in from a disaster at sea and have occasion to repair, she shall be at liberty to land and re-embark her cargo without paying any customs or duties whatever; but in no case shall be compelled to land her cargo.

ARTICLE X. Should a vessel of either of the contracting parties be cast on shore within the territories of the other, all proper assistance shall be given to her and her crew; no pillage shall be allowed. The property shall remain at the disposal of the owners, and if reshipped on board of any vessel for exportation no customs or duties whatever shall be required to be paid thereon, and the crew shall be protected and succored until they can be sent to their own country.

ARTICLE XI. If a vessel of either of the contracting parties shall be attacked by an enemy within cannon shot of the forts of the other, she shall be protected as much as is possible. If she be in port she shall not be seized or attacked when it is in the power of the other party to protect her; and when she proceeds to sea no enemy shall be permitted to pursue her from the same port within twenty-four hours after her departure.

ARTICLE XII. The commerce between the United States of America and the Regency of Algiers; the protections to be given to merchants, masters of vessels, and seamen; the reciprocal rights of establishing consuls in each country; the privileges, immunities, and jurisdictions to be enjoyed by such consuls, are declared to be on the same footing, in every respect, with the most favored nations, respectively.

ARTICLE XIII. The consul of the United States of America shall not be responsible for the debts contracted by the citizens of his own country unless he gives previously written obligations so to do.

ARTICLE XIV. On a vessel or vessels-of-war belonging to the United States anchoring before the city of Algiers the consul is to inform the Dey of her arrival, when she shall receive the salutes which are by treaty or custom given to the ships-of-war of the most favored nations on similar occasions, and which shall be returned gun for gun. And if after such arrival, so announced, any Christians whatever, captives in Algiers, make their escape and take refuge on board any of the said ships-of-war, they shall not be required back again, nor shall the consul of the United States, or commander of the said ship, be required to pay anything for the said Christians.

ARTICLE XV. As the Government of the United States has, in itself, no character of enmity against the laws, religion, or tranquillity of any nation, and as the said States have never entered into any voluntary war or act of hostility, except in defence of their just rights on the high seas, it is declared by the contracting parties that no pretext arising from religious opinions shall ever produce an interruption of the harmony between the two nations; and the consuls and agents of both nations shall have liberty to celebrate the rights of their respective religions in their own houses.

The consuls, respectively, shall have liberty and personal security given them to travel within the territories of each other, by land and sea, and shall not be prevented from going on board any vessel they may think proper to visit; they shall likewise have the liberty to appoint their own dragoman and broker.

ARTICLE XVI. In case of any dispute arising from the violation of any of the articles of this treaty, no appeal shall be made to arms, nor shall war be declared on any pretext whatever; but if the consul residing at the place where the dispute shall happen shall not be able to settle the same, the Government of that country shall state their grievance in writing, and transmit the same to the Government of the other, and the period of three months shall be allowed for answers to be returned, during which time no acts of hostility shall be permitted by either party; and in case the grievances are not redressed and a war should be the event, the consuls and citizens and subjects of both parties, respectively, shall be permitted to embark with their effects, unmolested, on board of what vessel or vessels they shall think proper, reasonable time being allowed for that purpose.

ARTICLE XVII. If, in the course of events, a war should break out between the two nations, the prisoners captured by either party shall not be made slaves; they shall not be forced to hard labor or other confinement than such as may be necessary to secure their safe keeping, and shall be exchanged rank for rank; and it is agreed that prisoners shall be exchanged in twelve months after their capture, and the exchange may be effected by any private individual legally authorized by either of the parties.

ARTICLE XVIII. If any of the Barbary Powers, or other States at war with the United States, shall capture any American vessel and send her into any port of the Regency of Algiers, they shall not be permitted to sell her, but shall be forced to depart the port on procuring the requisite supplies of provisions; but the vessels-of-war of the United States, with any prizes they may capture from their enemies, shall have liberty to frequent the ports of Algiers for refreshment of any kind, and to sell such prizes in the said ports, without paying any other customs or duties than such as are customary on ordinary commercial importations.

ARTICLE XIX. If any of the citizens of the United States, or any persons under their protection, shall have any disputes with each other, the consul shall decide between the parties; and whenever the consul shall require any aid or assistance from the Government of Algiers to enforce his decisions it shall be immediately granted to him. And if any disputes shall arise between any citizens of the United States and the citizens or subjects of any other nations having a consul or agent in Algiers, such disputes shall be settled by the consuls or agents of the respective nations; and any disputes or suits at law that may take place between any citizens of the United States and the subjects of the Regency of Algiers shall be decided by the Dey in person, and no other.

ARTICLE XX. If a citizen of the United States should kill, wound, or strike, a subject of Algiers, or, on the contrary, a subject of Algiers should kill, wound, or strike, a citizen of the United States, the law of the country shall take place and equal justice shall be rendered, the consul assisting at the trial; but the sentence of punishment against an American citizen shall not be greater or more severe than it would be against a Turk in the same predicament; and if any delinquent should make his escape, the consul shall not be responsible for him in any manner whatever.

ARTICLE XXI. The consul of the United States of America shall not be required to pay any customs or duties whatever on anything he imports from a foreign country for the use of his house and family.

ARTICLE XXII. Should any of the citizens of the United States of America die within the Regency of Algiers, the Dey and his subjects shall not interfere with the property of the deceased, but it shall be under the immediate direction of the consul, unless otherwise disposed of by will. Should there be no consul, the effects shall be deposited in the hands of some person worthy of trust until the party shall appear who has a right to demand them, when they shall render an account of the property; neither shall the Dey nor his subjects give hindrance in the execution of any will that may appear.

ARTICLE ADDITIONAL AND EXPLANATORY. The United States of America, in order to give to the Dey of Algiers a proof of their desire to maintain the relations of peace and amity between the two powers, upon a footing the most liberal, and in order to withdraw any obstacle which might embarrass him in his relations with other States, agree to annul so much of the eighteenth article of the foregoing treaty as gives to the United States any advantage in the ports of Algiers over the most favored nations having treaties with the Regency.

Done at the palace of the Government in Algiers, on the 22d day of December, 1816, which corresponds to the 3d of the Moon Safar, year of the Hegira, 1232.

Whereas, the undersigned William Shaler, a citizen of the State of New York, and Isaac Chauncey, commander-in-chief of the naval forces of the United States stationed in the Mediterranean, being duly appointed Commissioners, by letters patent, under the signature of the President and seal of the United States of America, bearing date at the City of Washington, the twenty-fourth day of August, A. D. 1816, for negotiating and concluding the renewal of a treaty of peace between the United States of America and the Dey and subjects of the Regency of Algiers:

We, therefore, William Shaler and Isaac Chauncey, Commissioners as aforesaid, do conclude the foregoing treaty, and every article and clause therein contained, reserving the same, nevertheless, for the final ratification of the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

Done in the chancery of the Consulate General of the United States, in the city of Algiers, on the 23d day of December, in the year 1816, and of the Independence of the United States the forty-first.

No. 349.

[1ST SESSION.]

CLAIM ON THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT BY A. MACTIER, G. W. DASHIELL, AND A. STEWART, OF BALTIMORE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 31, 1822.

Mr. RUSSELL, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Alexander Mactier, George W. Dashiell, and Archibald Stewart, of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, asking indemnity of the Government of the United States, as responsible for acts of injustice and violence committed by the Government of France, having duly considered the same, reported:

That during the first session of the seventh Congress a select committee made a report (see printed reports of that session) on the memorials and petitions of sundry citizens of the United States, complaining of the spoliations and depredations which, in the then late European war, their lawful commerce had sustained from French armed vessels, and praying for compensation from this Government; that this report fully set forth all the public acts of the French Government and of the Government of the United States, from the year 1778 to the year 1801, inclusive, which can affect the case of the ship Triumph, one of the subjects of the petition now under consideration. To that report, therefore, the committee take leave to refer in relation to the ship Triumph just mentioned, and to request that it may be taken and considered as a part of the present report.

Your committee, after the most serious deliberation, are of opinion that if the Government of the United States, in expunging the second article of our convention with France of the 30th September, 1800, and in consenting to renounce the respective pretensions which were the object of that article, impaired the just power of the petitioners to resort to the Government of France for redress, still, by so doing, the American Government could be rightfully considered as becoming liable for such redress to the same extent only as it would otherwise have actually been obtained from France. The American Government has incurred the obligation only to save the petitioners from injury, and to see that they did not specially suffer by an act of policy adopted with a view to the general good. The petitioners, therefore, can in equity ask only of the American Government a compensation or indemnity precisely commensurate with the injury thus sustained, or, in other words, that their claim should be entertained and treated precisely in the same manner by the American Government that it would have been entertained and treated by the Government of France in case the same article aforesaid had been duly ratified by the contracting parties. The manner in which this claim had been entertained and treated by the French Government from the year 1795, the time of the capture of the Triumph, to the year 1801, the time of the rejection of the second article of the convention aforesaid, could not have reasonably been considered by the petitioners themselves as authorizing a well-founded expectation of its being thereafter liquidated and allowed by that Government. The second article aforesaid—the rejection of which by the American Government is now made the basis of this claim on this Government—promised no such liquidation or allowance; but, on the contrary, after stating that the two parties had not been able to agree on the indemnities mutually due, merely added, “the parties will negotiate further on these subjects at a convenient time.”

Your committee are of opinion that the assent of the American Government to such an article was the result of a thorough conviction only that the claims which it embraced on the Government of France were, owing to the character and conduct of that Government, entirely hopeless, and that an empty promise to negotiate further on them, when it might suit the convenience of that Government, was, in effect, an indefinite postponement even of negotiation, and, according to the construction uniformly given in such cases by the usage of nations, equivalent to a virtual renunciation of those claims. The difference, in effect, between such a renunciation and the renunciation complained of by the petitioners your committee do not feel themselves qualified to estimate; nor can they appreciate, with precision, the degree of injury which would have been sustained by the extinction of a claim which the petitioners had already, with the sanction and support of their own Government, prosecuted in vain, and without the faintest expectation of success, against the Government of France for the long period of six years.

Your committee are not aware that a single claim of American citizens on the Government of France for indemnity for its violence and injustice has, during the last thirty years, ever been liquidated or allowed by that Government, saving those claims only which were approved and paid by the Commissioners appointed under the convention between the two Governments of the 30th April, 1803, and in conformity to the provisions of that convention. Without that convention, not a single claim of the description of the one now in question would, it is believed, have ever been admitted and settled by the French Government; and thence the act of the American Government complained of by the petitioners could have in no way impaired their interests. But whatever might have been the injury inflicted on the petitioners by the act just mentioned, it could have existed only in the suspension of their claim for the brief period of two years, to wit: from its renunciation aforesaid, in 1801, to its revival, under the convention, in 1803; for the petitioners expressly acknowledge, not the revival only of this claim under that convention, but that it actually passed the Board of American Commissioners aforesaid at Paris. Your committee are, therefore, of opinion, that however just the claim of the petitioners might have been on the Government of France, the act of renouncing that claim, in 1801, could have rendered this Government responsible to the petitioners for a compensation only for the chance which they thereby lost in recovering it during the two years aforesaid of the Government of France—a chance which, under the then existing circumstances, promised an advantage too small for computation, and the loss of which has been more than indemnified by the opportunity so soon after afforded by another act of the American Government, which authorized the petitioners to prove and to obtain this claim, if just, under the convention of 1803, however they may have neglected to avail themselves of that opportunity. But had the American Government, in the present case, taken private property for public use and exercised its power for the general good, to the special injury of the petitioners, and thereby became liable to them for a just compensation, to be measured, not by the justice of the French Government, which was thus released, nor by the probable extent of the injury actually sustained from this release by the petitioners, but by the merits of the claim itself, your committee are of opinion that no compensation can be rightfully demanded of this Government.

If, as the petitioners allege, there was a recent order of the French Government, which does not appear, "that free ships made free goods," or if they relied on the stipulation to that effect in the treaty between the two Governments of 1778, still it appears by the act of adjudication that the ship Triumph had not only forfeited the power of imparting this impunity to her cargo, but became herself liable to confiscation by being navigated contrary to the ordinances of France then in full force.

This act of adjudication states "that according to rigorous principles only, the demand of the restoration of the vessel ought not to be received."

"The regulation of 1778, and many much anterior to it, pronounce the confiscation of foreign vessels on board which there shall be a supercargo, merchant, clerk, or superior officers of an enemy's country, and the crew of which shall be composed, beyond one-third, of sailors the subjects of the States of an enemy, or which shall not have on board a roll of equipage, attested by the public officers of the neutral places whence the vessel shall have departed."

"The captain, in a different case, ought to justify that he has been obliged to take the superior officers and sailors in the ports where he may have touched to replace those of the neutral country who may have died during the voyage."

"If for a cargo taken in a neutral country one is obliged to conform to this law, how much stronger is the reason that he ought to be subject to it when the cargo is taken in the country of an enemy and for account of an enemy."

"The Triumph departed from New England for Amsterdam with a roll of equipage of American sailors; he has affirmed in his answers that they had all deserted, and that he was obliged to take such as could be procured."

"The mate and the three sailors, who have been heard, speak the Dutch language only. They have said, but they have not proved, that they were, the one from Hamburgh and the others from Bergre or Bremen, countries which have preserved their neutrality in the present war. All the sailors, whom we have not believed it necessary to interrogate, speak the Dutch language only. We could, therefore, without fear of committing any injustice, reject the claim of the captain of the ship Triumph for the restoration of the ship."

"We might add, in support of our opinion, that there have been found on board near a quintal of gunpowder and a certain quantity of barrels of tar and pitch, but being unwilling to depart from the considerations which have governed us in our former judgments upon captures made of American vessels leaving Amsterdam for Surinam, we will still give a proof, on this occasion, that the French Republican pronounces against his allies only when the condemned himself can form no doubt of the justice of the judgment. We adhere with so much the more reason to this mode of thinking, that it may not even be suspected that the burning of the ship Triumph may have contributed to her condemnation, and therefore we do not pronounce it."

Thus it appears by the act of adjudication that notwithstanding the ship had become, by the act of the captain, liable to be condemned under the French regulations therein referred to, she was not so condemned; but had she not been accidentally burned, which catastrophe is imputed by the said act of adjudication mainly to the negligence of the captain, she would have been restored in relaxation of the rigor of the law; and her sails, which were saved from the fire, were actually so restored by the decree of the court.

The principal item of the claim of the petitioners is the charge (of $13,333 33) for this ship, thus exposed to capture and condemnation by the act of her captain, and thus destroyed by his imputed negligence. Besides, the articles of contraband which appear by the act of adjudication to have been on board were sufficient to justify the detention of that ship, under the treaty of 1778, had she in no other respect impaired, as she had done, her national, neutral, or conventional privileges.

The next article in amount of the claim of the petitioners on this Government is the charge (of $12,800) for a return freight from Surinam at Amsterdam. This appears to have been the gross amount of the freight said to have been stipulated at Amsterdam, but never earned, deducting port charges and seamen's wages only, but not deducting insurance, provisions, or any other charge or expense whatever. There is no proof exhibited to your committee of such a contract, nor any evidence that such a claim has been preferred to the Government of France. It appears, indeed, by the act of adjudication already cited, that there had been a demand made at Cayenne for damages and interest on account of the detention of the ship, but the ship having been liable to condemnation, and actually destroyed, from the causes and in the manner already stated, this demand was rejected as the necessary consequence of these facts.

Mention is nowhere made in the documents submitted to your committee of a specific demand for compensation for the loss of the benefit of this stipulated return freight being preferred to the Government of France, either before or since the rejection of the second article of the convention of 1800, or that it existed in a shape to be affected by that rejection.

Your committee are of opinion that in no event such a demand, without first being so preferred, could be rightfully exacted of the Government of the United States. Notwithstanding the assertion in the petition, "free ships make free goods," it does not appear that such a plea was ever urged before the French tribunals; but the act of adjudication, already cited, expressly states "that the captain did not deny in his answers that the cargo was good prize," and if the cargo was good prize, it appears necessarily to follow that the capture and detention of the ship were legal, and that no injury, either immediate or consequential, proceeding from such capture and detention, could form a legitimate claim for compensation. If, then, for the loss of the ship herself there could be no just claim for indemnity, there could be no such claim for the merely contingent or possible consequences of that loss in the benefit of an unearned freight.

The third item of the claim of the petitioners consists in a charge (of $4,848 89) for freight and primage, stipulated for the transportation of the cargo actually on board, from Amsterdam to Surinam.

Notwithstanding all the circumstances of the case, the act of adjudication of the French tribunal at Cayenne decreed, according to the specification in the bills of lading, the sum of twenty-one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six francs, to be paid to the captain in liquidation of this very item of freight and primage, not in a depreciated currency alone, as is asserted, but "either in bills of the Treasury at Cayenne, (bons de caisse,) the only money of that colony, or in letters of exchange on the Treasury of France, at the election of the captain."

This offer, as appears by the documents submitted to your committee, was refused by that captain, not because the mode of payment was insufficient or unsatisfactory, but because he avowed his determination "to receive nothing unless the ship was paid for; and it is in consequence of this refusal and determination of the captain, and not of any act of the American Government, that this item is now claimed of this Government.

The last item of the claim in question is a charge (of $265 11) on account of the captain for his stores lost in the ship. Neither this claim nor any other, on the personal account of the captain, was, as appears by the act of adjudication already mentioned, presented to the French tribunal at Cayenne, nor has it ever, as far as your committee are informed, been since presented to the Government of France. In relation to this claim it may also be observed, that if the loss of the ship, as already stated, was occasioned to the owners by the misconduct of the captain, and thence not a subject for indemnity, the consequential loss of his private stores on his own account cannot well be entitled to be treated as such a subject.

The other claim for indemnity in this petition is founded on a contract made with the French constituted authorities of St. Domingo.

On this claim the rejection of the second article of the treaty of 1800, and the mutual renunciation by the contracting parties of the pretensions therein contained, could have had no effect, it being in no way connected with, or dependent on, that article. No act of the American Government, within the knowledge of your committee, has ever been exercised to the prejudice of this claim on the Government of France. On the contrary, notwithstanding there was nothing in the nature of this claim to take it from the exclusive jurisdiction of France and to bring it under the operation of international law, nor to impose on the Government of the United States any obligation to interfere for its recovery, yet has this Government, not only through its agents employed indirectly its good offices, but it has, directly, by the 5th article of the treaty of 1800, which article was duly ratified by the contracting parties, and again by the convention of 1803, stipulated with the Government of France in favor of this claim, and thus, as far as was in its power, provided for its liquidation. To demand, under these circumstances, compensation of the Government of the United States for the non-performance by the Government of France of the contract which constitutes the subject of this claim betrays, on the part of the petitioners, not only a strange misapprehension of their rights, but an ungracious forgetfulness of their obligations.

No citizen of the United States who voluntarily gives a credit to a foreign Government has a right to consider his own Government as bound to guaranty a debt, in contracting which it was neither concerned nor consulted, or become the gratuitous insurer of the creditor against the insolvency or bad faith of his debtor.

Upon mature deliberation, therefore, on the whole subject submitted to them, your committee are of opinion that it is inexpedient to grant the prayer of the petitioners, and recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the claims of Alexander Mactier, George W. Dashiell, and Archibald Stewart, ought not to be allowed.

BOUNDARY LINE UNDER FIFTH ARTICLE TREATY OF GHENT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES FEBRUARY 7, 1822.

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State on the subject required by the resolution of that House of the 22d ultimo, with the documents which accompanied that report.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, February 6, 1822.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 5, 1822.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives requesting of the President of the United States such information as he may possess in relation to the progress made by the Commissioners under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent in ascertaining and establishing that part of the boundary line between the United States and the British provinces which extends "from the source of the river St. Croix to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river;" how much of the above mentioned line has been actually surveyed; whether a map, duly certified, has been returned of any survey made, and whether the Commissioners of the two Governments have had any meetings within a year past, has the honor of reporting to the President that those Commissioners have, in the course of the year, had meetings at New York from the 14th of May to the 9th of June; from the 1st to the 14th of August, and from the 20th of September to the 4th of October, at which last meeting a difference of opinion upon two points having occurred between the Commissioners they adjourned to meet again on the first Monday of April next.

Copies of the journals of the Board at their meetings and a part of the arguments of the agents of the two Governments on the questions submitted to the Commissioners have been received and are at this Department. No authenticated map has been returned, the reason of which is shown in a letter from the agent of the United States of the 14th of October last, and a letter from the Commissioner of 20th November, copies of which are herewith submitted, and which exhibit the progress of the commission until the time of their last adjournment.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Mr. Bradley, agent of the United States under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, to the Secretary of State.

WESTMINSTER, October 14, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a copy of the journal of the proceedings of the Commissioners under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent at their meeting, which I recently received from the secretary of the Board. I have also the honor to forward by mail the last argument of the British agent, in reply to my answer to his first argument, which completes the arguments growing out of the British claim.

The copy of the claim and first argument on the part of the United States has been heretofore forwarded. The answer of the British agent and my reply thereto are so voluminous that the secretary has not yet been able to furnish copies. The delay, however, is principally occasioned by the absolute necessity of making copies for the Commissioners, by whom they are required for the purpose of framing their opinions and reports as directed by the treaty.

Permit me to observe, that the copies which have been furnished to the Department of State are intended merely for the purposes of earlier information. The difference of opinion which has taken place between the Commissioners in respect to the northwest angle of Nova Scotia and the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river has rendered necessary fair duplicate copies of all the proceedings, arguments, and documents, and these are now making for each Government in a shape proper to be submitted to a foreign power. This is, of course, a work of much labor, as there are, in addition to the reports, proofs, and arguments, nearly forty maps made by the surveyors who have been employed under the commission, but they will be completed before the close of the session of Congress, and when delivered, together with the opinions of the Commissioners, to the respective agents agreeably to the eighth article of the treaty, I shall have the honor to place in your possession those belonging to the Government of the United States.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, sir, your very obedient humble servant,

WILLIAM C. BRADLEY.

HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

BURLINGTON, November 20, 1821.

SIR: The Commissioners under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent have disagreed in opinion on the principal points submitted to them, and will make their separate reports to the two Governments, conformably to the provisions of the treaty. The documents, consisting of the reports and maps of the surveyors and the arguments of the agents, besides various other papers, copies of which are to accompany the reports of the Commissioners, are very voluminous, but the necessary copies are preparing with all practicable despatch, and will probably be ready in the month of March next.

The reports of the Commissioners, with the accompanying papers and documents, therefore, will be received at Washington about the 1st of April next, but at any rate during the approaching session of Congress. The agent of the United States, I presume, has furnished you with a more detailed statement of the situation of the business of the Commissioners.

I intend to proceed to Washington myself in April next for the purpose of closing my accounts, which cannot very well be done without my personal attendance, and which cannot be finally done until the papers are completed.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. P. VAN NESS.

HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES APRIL 12, 1822.

Mr. GORHAM, from the Committee on the Suppression of the Slave Trade, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th of January last, instructing them to inquire whether the laws of the United States prohibiting that traffic have been duly executed; also, into the general operation thereof; and if any defects exist in those laws, to suggest adequate remedies therefor; and to whom many memorials have been referred touching the same subject, having, according to order, had the said resolution and memorials under consideration, reported:

That under the just and liberal construction put by the Executive on the act of Congress of March 3, 1819, and that of the 15th May, 1820, inflicting the punishment of piracy on the American slave trade, a foundation has been laid for the most systematic and vigorous application of the power of the United States to the suppression of that iniquitous traffic. Its unhappy subjects, when captured, are restored to their country, agents are there appointed to receive them, and a colony, the offspring of private charity, is rising on its shores, in which such as cannot reach their native tribes will find the means of alleviating the calamities they may have endured before their liberation.

When these humane provisions are contrasted with the system which they superseded, there can be but one sentiment in favor of a steady adherence to its support. The document accompanying this report, and marked A, states the number of Africans seized or taken within or without the limits of the United States and brought there, and their present condition.

It does not appear to your committee that such of the naval force of the country as has been hitherto employed in the execution of the laws against this traffic could have been more effectually used for the interest and honor of the nation. The document marked B is a statement of the names of the vessels, and their commanders, ordered upon this service, with the dates of their departure, &c. The first vessel destined for this service arrived upon the coast of Africa in March, 1820, and in the few weeks she remained there sent in for adjudication four American vessels, all of which were condemned. The four which have been since employed in this service have made five visits, (the Alligator having made two cruises in the past summer,) the whole of which amounted to a service of about ten months, by a single vessel, within a period of near two years; and since the middle of last November, the commencement of the healthy season on that coast, no vessel has been nor, as your committee is informed, is under orders for that service.

The committee are thus particular on this branch of their inquiry, because unfounded rumors have been in circulation that other branches of the public service have suffered from the destination given to the inconsiderable force above stated, which, small as it has been, has in every instance been directed, both in its outward and homeward voyage, to cruise in the West India seas.

Before they quit this part of their inquiry, your committee feel it their duty to state that the loss of several of the prizes made in this service is imputable to the size of the ships engaged in it. The efficacy of this force, as well as the health and discipline of the officers and crews, conspire to recommend the employment of no smaller vessel than a corvette or sloop-of-war, to which it would be expedient to allow the largest possible complement of men, and, if possible, she should be accompanied by a tender, or vessel drawing less water. The vessels engaged in this service should be frequently relieved, but the coast should at no time be left without a vessel to watch and protect its shores.

Your committee find it impossible to measure with precision the effect produced upon the American branch of the slave trade by the laws above mentioned and the seizures under them. They are unable to state whether those American merchants, the American capital and seamen which heretofore aided in this traffic, have abandoned it altogether, or have sought shelter under the flags of other nations. It is ascertained, however, that the American flag, which heretofore covered so large a portion of the slave trade, has wholly disappeared from the coasts of Africa. The trade, notwithstanding, increases annually, under the flags of other nations. France has incurred the reproach of being the greatest adventurer in this traffic, prohibited by her laws; but it is to be presumed that this results not so much from the avidity of her subjects for this iniquitous gain, as from the safety which, in the absence of all hazard of capture, her flag affords to the greedy and unprincipled adventurers of all nations. It is neither candid nor just to impute to a gallant and high-minded people the exclusive commission of crimes, which the abandoned of all nations are alike capable of perpetrating, with the additional wrong to France herself of using her flag to cover and protect them. If the vigor of the American Navy has saved its banner from like reproach, it has done much to preserve, unsullied, its high reputation, and amply repaid the expense charged upon the public revenue by a system of laws to which it has given such honorable effect.

But the conclusion to which your committee has arrived, after consulting all the evidence within their reach, is, that the African slave trade now prevails to a great extent, and that its total suppression can never be effected by the separate and disunited efforts of one or more States; and as the resolution to which this report refers requires the suggestion of some remedy for the defects, if any exist, in the system of laws for the suppression of this traffic, your committee beg leave to call the attention of the House to the report and accompanying documents submitted to the last Congress by the Committee on the Slave Trade, and to make the same a part of this report. That report proposes, as a remedy for the existing evils of the system, the concurrence of the United States with one or all the maritime powers of Europe in a modified and reciprocal right of search on the African coast, with a view to the total suppression of the slave trade.

It is with great delicacy that the committee have approached this subject, because they are aware that the remedy which they have presumed to recommend to the consideration of the House requires the exercise of the power of another Department of this Government, and that objections to the exercise of this power, in the mode here proposed, have hitherto existed in that Department.

Your committee are confident, however, that these objections apply rather to a particular proposition for the exchange of the right of search than to that modification of it which presents itself to your committee. They contemplate the trial and condemnation of such American citizens as may be found engaged in this forbidden trade, not by mixed tribunals sitting in a foreign country, but by existing courts, of competent jurisdiction, in the United States; they propose the same disposition of the captured Africans now authorized by law, and least of all their detention in America.

They contemplate an exchange of this right, which shall be in all respects reciprocal; an exchange which, deriving its sole authority from treaty, would exclude the pretension, which no nation, however, has presumed to set up, that this right can be derived from the law of nations; and, further, they have limited it, in their conception of its application, not only to certain latitudes, and to a certain distance from the coast of Africa, but to a small number of vessels to be employed by each power, and to be previously designated. The visit and search thus restricted, it is believed, would insure the co-operation of one great maritime power in the proposed exchange, and guard it from the danger of abuse.

Your committee cannot doubt that the people of America have the intelligence to distinguish between the right of searching a neutral on the high seas, in time of war, claimed by some belligerents, and that mutual, restricted, and peaceful concession by treaty, suggested by your committee, and which is demanded in the name of suffering humanity.

In closing the report, they recommend to the House the adoption of the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to enter into such arrangements as he may deem suitable and proper, with one or more of the maritime powers of Europe, for the effectual abolition of the slave trade.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE SECOND SESSION OF THE SEVENTEENTH CONGRESS—PROCLAMATION OF TREATY WITH FRANCE OF JUNE 24, 1822—PROCLAMATION OF THE OPENING OF THE TRADE TO THE BRITISH WEST INDIA COLONIES, AUGUST 24, 1822.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE DECEMBER 3, 1822.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

Many causes unite to make your present meeting peculiarly interesting to our constituents. The operation of our laws on the various subjects to which they apply, with the amendments which they occasionally require, imposes, annually, an important duty on the representatives of a free people. Our system has happily advanced to such maturity that I am not aware that your cares, in that respect, will be augmented. Other causes exist which are highly interesting to the whole civilized world, and to no portion of it more so, in certain views, than to the United States. Of these causes, and of their bearing on the interests of our Union, I shall communicate the sentiments which I have formed with that freedom which a sense of duty dictates. It is proper, however, to invite your attention, in the first instance, to those concerns respecting which legislative provision is thought to be particularly urgent.

On the 24th of June last, a convention of navigation and commerce was concluded, in this city, between the United States and France, by ministers duly authorized for the purpose. The sanction of the Executive having been given to this convention under a conviction that, taking all its stipulations into view, it rested essentially on a basis of reciprocal and equal advantage, I deemed it my duty, in compliance with the authority vested in the Executive by the second section of the act of the last session, of the 6th May, concerning navigation, to suspend, by proclamation, until the end of the next session of Congress, the operation of the act entitled "An act to impose a new tonnage duty on French ships and vessels, and for other purposes," and to suspend, likewise, all other duties on French vessels, or the goods imported in them, which exceeded the duties on American vessels, and on similar goods imported in them. I shall submit this convention forthwith to the Senate for its advice and consent as to the ratification.

Since your last session the prohibition which had been imposed on the commerce between the United States and the British colonies in the West Indies and on this continent has likewise been removed. Satisfactory evidence having been adduced that the ports of those colonies had been opened to the vessels of the United States by an act of the British Parliament, bearing date on the 24th of June last, on the conditions specified therein, I deemed it proper, in compliance with the provisions of the first section of the act of the last session above recited, to declare, by proclamation, bearing date on the 24th of August last, that the ports of the United States should thenceforward, and until the end of the next session of Congress, be open to the vessels of Great Britain employed in that trade, under the limitation specified in that proclamation.

A doubt was entertained whether the act of Congress applied to the British colonies on this continent as well as to those in the West Indies; but, as the act of Parliament opened the intercourse equally with both, and it was the manifest intention of Congress, as well as the obvious policy of the United States, that the provisions of the act of Parliament should be met, in equal extent, on the part of the United States, and as also the act of Congress was supposed to vest in the President some discretion in the execution of it, I thought it advisable to give it a corresponding construction.

Should the constitutional sanction of the Senate be given to the ratification of the convention with France, legislative provision will be necessary to carry it fully into effect, as it likewise will be to continue in force, on such conditions as may be deemed just and proper, the intercourse which has been opened between the United States and the British colonies. Every light in the possession of the Executive will in due time be communicated on both subjects.

Resting essentially on a basis of reciprocal and equal advantage, it has been the object of the Executive, in transactions with other powers, to meet the propositions of each with a liberal spirit, believing that thereby the interest of our country would be most effectually promoted. This course has been systematically pursued in the late occurrences with France and Great Britain, and in strict accord with the views of the Legislature. A confident hope is entertained that, by the arrangement thus commenced with each, all differences respecting navigation and commerce with the dominions in question will be adjusted, and a solid foundation be laid for an active and permanent intercourse, which will prove equally advantageous to both parties.

The decision of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia, on the question submitted to him by the United States and Great Britain, concerning the construction of the first article of the treaty of Ghent, has been received. A convention has since been concluded between the parties, under the mediation of his Imperial Majesty, to prescribe the mode by which that article shall be carried into effect, in conformity with that decision. I shall submit this convention to the Senate for its advice and consent as to the ratification, and, if obtained, shall immediately bring the subject before Congress for such provisions as may require the interposition of the Legislature.

In compliance with an act of the last session, a Territorial Government has been established in Florida, on the principles of our system. By this act the inhabitants are secured in the full enjoyment of their rights and liberties, and to admission into the Union, with equal participation in the Government with the original States, on the conditions heretofore prescribed to other Territories. By a clause in the ninth article of the treaty with Spain, by which that territory was ceded to the United States, it is stipulated that satisfaction shall be made for the injuries, if any, which, by process of law, shall be established to have been suffered, by the Spanish officers and individual Spanish inhabitants, by the late operations of our troops in Florida. No provision having yet been made to carry that stipulation into effect, it is submitted to the consideration of Congress, whether it will not be proper to vest the competent power in the District Court at Pensacola, or in some tribunal to be specially organized for that purpose.

The fiscal operations of the year have been more successful than had been anticipated at the commencement of the last session of Congress.

The receipts into the Treasury during the first three quarters of the year have exceeded the sum of fourteen millions seven hundred and forty-five thousand dollars. The payments made at the Treasury during the same period have exceeded twelve millions two hundred and seventy-nine thousand dollars; leaving in the Treasury on the 30th day of September last (including one million one hundred and sixty-eight thousand five hundred and ninety-two dollars and twenty-four cents which were in the Treasury on the first day of January last) a sum exceeding four millions one hundred and twenty-eight thousand dollars.

Besides discharging all demands for the current service of the year, including the interest and reimbursement of the public debt, the six per cent. stock of 1796, amounting to eighty thousand dollars, has been redeemed. It is estimated that, after defraying the current expenses of the present quarter, and redeeming the two millions of six per cent. stock of 1820, there will remain in the Treasury, on the first day of January next, nearly three millions of dollars. It is estimated that the gross amount of duties which have been secured, from the first of January to the 30th of September last, has exceeded nineteen millions five hundred thousand dollars, and the amount for the whole year will probably not fall short of twenty-three millions of dollars.

Of the actual force in service under the present military establishment, the posts at which it is stationed, and the condition of each post, a report from the Secretary of War, which is now communicated, will give a distinct idea. By like reports the state of the Academy at West Point will be seen, as will be the progress which has been made on the fortifications along the coast and at the public armories and arsenals.

The position on the Red river, and that at the Sault of St. Marie, are the only new posts that have been taken. These posts, with those already occupied in the interior, are thought to be well adapted to the protection of our frontiers. All the force not placed in the garrisons and along the coasts and in the ordnance depots, and indispensably necessary there, is placed on the frontiers.

The organization of the several corps composing the Army is such as to admit its expansion to a great extent in case of emergency, the officers carrying with them all the light which they possess to the new corps to which they might be appointed.

With the organization of the staff there is equal cause to be satisfied. By the concentration of every branch, with its chief in this city, in the presence of the Department, and with a grade in the chief military station to keep alive and cherish a military spirit, the greatest promptitude in the execution of orders, with the greatest economy and efficiency, are secured. The same view is taken of the Military Academy. Good order is preserved in it, and the youths are well instructed in every science connected with the great objects of the institution. They are also well trained and disciplined in the practical parts of the profession. It has always been found difficult to control the ardor inseparable from that early age in such a manner as to give it a proper direction. The rights of manhood are too often claimed prematurely, in pressing which too far, the respect which is due to age and the obedience necessary to a course of study and instruction in every such institution are lost sight of. The great object to be accomplished is the restraint of that ardor by such wise regulations and government as, by directing all the energies of the youthful mind to the attainment of useful knowledge, will keep it within a just subordination, and at the same time elevate it to the highest purposes. This object seems to be essentially obtained in this institution, and with great advantage to the Union.

The Military Academy forms the basis, in regard to science, on which the military establishment rests. It furnishes annually, after due examination, and on the report of the academic staff, many well-informed youths to fill the vacancies which occur in the several corps of the Army, while others, who retire to private life, carry with them such attainments as, under the right reserved to the several States to appoint the officers and to train the militia, will enable them, by affording a wider field for selection, to promote the great object of the power vested in Congress, of providing for the organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia. Thus, by the mutual and harmonious co-operation of the two governments in the execution of a power divided between them, an object always to be cherished, the attainment of a great result, on which our liberties may depend, cannot fail to be secured. I have to add that, in proportion as our regular force is small, should the instruction and discipline of the militia, the great resources on which we rely, be pushed to the utmost extent that circumstances will admit.

A report from the Secretary of the Navy will communicate the progress which has been made in the construction of vessels-of-war, with other interesting details respecting the actual state of the affairs of that Department. It has been found necessary, for the protection of our commerce, to maintain the usual squadrons on the Mediterranean, the Pacific, and along the Atlantic coast, extending the cruises of the latter into the West Indies, where piracy, organized into a system, has preyed on the commerce of every country trading thither. A cruise has also been maintained on the coast of Africa, when the season would permit, for the suppression of the slave trade; and orders have been given to the commanders of all our public ships to seize our own vessels, should they find any engaged in that trade, and to bring them in for adjudication.

In the West Indies piracy is of recent date, which may explain the cause why other powers have not combined against it. By the documents communicated it will be seen that the efforts of the United States to suppress it have had a very salutary effect. The benevolent provision of the act, under which the protection has been extended alike to the commerce of other nations, cannot fail to be duly appreciated by them.

In compliance with the act of the last session entitled "An act to abolish the United States trading establishments," agents were immediately appointed and instructed, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to close the business of the trading houses among the Indian tribes, and to settle the accounts of the factors and sub-factors engaged in that trade, and to execute in all other respects the injunctions of that act in the mode prescribed therein. A final report of their proceedings shall be communicated to Congress as soon as it is received.

It is with great regret I have to state that a serious malady has deprived us of many valuable citizens at Pensacola and checked the progress of some of those arrangements which are important to the Territory. This effect has been sensibly felt in respect to the Indians who inhabit that Territory, consisting of the remnants of several tribes who occupy the middle ground between St. Augustine and Pensacola, with extensive claims, but undefined boundaries. Although peace is preserved with those Indians, yet their positions and claims tend essentially to interrupt the intercourse between the eastern and western parts of the Territory, on which our inhabitant, are principally settled. It is essential to the growth and prosperity of the Territory, as well as to the interests of the Union, that these Indians should be removed, by special compact with them, to some other position, or concentrated within narrower limits where they are. With the limited means in the power of the Executive, instructions were given to the Governor to accomplish this object, so far as it might be practicable, which was prevented by the distressing malady referred to. To carry it fully into effect in either mode, additional funds will be necessary, to the provision of which the powers of Congress alone are competent. With a view to such provision as may be deemed proper, the subject is submitted to your consideration, and, in the interim, further proceedings are suspended.

It appearing that so much of the act entitled "An act regulating the staff of the Army," which passed on the 14th April, 1818, as relates to the commissariat, will expire in April next, and the practical operation of that Department having evinced its great utility, the propriety of its renewal is submitted to your consideration.

The view which has been taken of the probable productiveness of the lead mines, connected with the importance of the material to the public defence, makes it expedient that they should be managed with peculiar care. It is therefore suggested whether it will not comport with the public interest to provide by law for the appointment of an agent skilled in mineralogy, to superintend them, under the direction of the proper Department.

It is understood that the Cumberland road, which was constructed at a great expense, has already suffered from the want of that regular superintendence and of those repairs which are indispensable to the preservation of such a work. This road is of incalculable advantage in facilitating the intercourse between the Western and the Atlantic States. Through it, the whole country from the northern extremity of Lake Erie to the Mississippi, and from all the waters which empty into each, finds an easy and direct communication to the seat of Government, and thence to the Atlantic. The facility which it affords to all military and commercial operations, and also to those of the Post Office Department, cannot be estimated too highly. This great work is likewise an ornament and an honor to the nation. Believing that a competent power to adopt and execute a system of internal improvement has not been granted to Congress, but that such a power, confined to great national purposes, and with proper limitations, would be productive of eminent advantage to our Union, I have thought it advisable that an amendment of the Constitution to that effect should be recommended to the several States. A bill which assumed the right to adopt and execute such a system having been presented for my signature at the last session, I was compelled, from the view which I had taken of the powers of the General Government, to negative it, on which occasion I thought it proper to communicate the sentiments which I had formed, on mature consideration, on the whole subject. To that communication, in all the views in which the great interest to which it relates may be supposed to merit your attention, I have now to refer. Should Congress, however, deem it improper to recommend such an amendment, they have, according to my judgment, the right to keep the road in repair, by providing for the superintendence of it, and appropriating the money necessary for repairs. Surely, if they had the right to appropriate money to make the road, they have a right to appropriate it to preserve the road from ruin. From the exercise of this power no danger is to be apprehended. Under our happy system, the people are the sole and exclusive fountain of power. Each Government originates from them, and to them alone, each to its proper constituents, are they respectively and solely responsible for the faithful discharge of their duty, within their constitutional limits. And that the people will confine their public agents, of every station, to the strict line of their constitutional duties, there is no cause to doubt. Having, however, communicated my sentiments to Congress, at the last session, fully in the document to which I have referred, respecting the right of appropriation, as distinct from the right of jurisdiction and sovereignty over the Territory in question, I deem it improper to enlarge on the subject here.

From the best information that I have been able to obtain, it appears that our manufactures, though depressed immediately after the peace, have considerably increased, and are still increasing, under the encouragement given them by the tariff of 1816 and by subsequent laws. Satisfied I am, whatever may be the abstract doctrine in favor of unrestricted commerce, provided all nations would concur in it, and it was not liable to be interrupted by war, which has never occurred, and cannot be expected, that there are other strong reasons applicable to our situation and relations with other countries, which impose on us the obligation to cherish and sustain our manufactures; satisfied, however, I likewise am that the interest of every part of our Union, even of those most benefitted by manufactures, requires that this subject should be touched with the greatest caution, and a critical knowledge of the effect to be produced by the slightest change, on full consideration of the subject, in all its relations, I am persuaded that a further augmentation may now be made of the duties on certain foreign articles in favor of our own, and without affecting injuriously any other interest. For more precise details I refer you to the communications which were made to Congress during the last session.

So great was the amount of accounts for moneys advanced during the late war, in addition to others of a previous date, which, in the regular operations of the Government, necessarily remained unsettled, that it required a considerable length of time for their adjustment. By a report from the First Comptroller of the Treasury it appears that on the 4th of March, 1817, the accounts then unsettled amounted to one hundred and three millions sixty-eight thousand eight hundred and seventy-six dollars and forty-one cents, of which, on the 30th of September of the present year, ninety-three millions one hundred and seventy-five thousand three hundred and ninety-six dollars and fifty-six cents had been settled; leaving on that day a balance unsettled of nine millions eight hundred and ninety-three thousand four hundred and seventy-nine dollars and eighty-five cents. That there have been drawn from the Treasury, in paying the public debt and sustaining the Government in all its operations and disbursements, since the 4th of March, 1817, one hundred and fifty-seven millions one hundred and ninety-nine thousand three hundred and eighty dollars and ninety-six cents, the accounts for which have been settled to the amount of one hundred and thirty-seven millions five hundred and one thousand four hundred and fifty-one dollars and twelve cents; leaving a balance unsettled of nineteen millions six hundred and ninety-seven thousand nine hundred and twenty-nine dollars and eighty-four cents. For precise details respecting each of these balances, I refer to the report of the Comptroller and the documents which accompany it.

From this view it appears that our commercial differences with France and Great Britain have been placed in a train of amicable arrangement, on conditions fair and honorable, in both instances, to each party; that our finances are in a very productive state, our revenue being at present fully competent to all the demands upon it; that our military force is well organized in all its branches, and capable of rendering the most important service, in case of emergency, that its number will admit of; that due progress has been made, under existing appropriations, in the construction of fortifications, and in the operations of the ordnance department; that due progress has in like manner been made in the construction of ships-of-war; that our Navy is in the best condition, felt and respected in every sea in which it is employed for the protection of our commerce; that our manufactures have augmented in amount and improved in quality; that great progress has been made in the settlement of accounts and in the recovery of the balances due by individuals; and that the utmost economy is secured and observed in every department of the administration.

Other objects will likewise claim your attention; because, from the station which the United States hold, as a member of the great community of nations, they have rights to maintain, duties to perform, and dangers to encounter.

A strong hope was entertained that peace would, ere this, have been concluded between Spain and the independent Governments south of the United States in this hemisphere. Long experience having evinced the competency of those Governments to maintain the independence which they had declared, it was presumed that the considerations which induced their recognition by the United States would have had equal weight with other powers, and that Spain herself, yielding to those magnanimous feelings of which her history furnishes so many examples, would have terminated, on that basis, a controversy so unavailing and at the same time so destructive. We still cherish the hope that this result will not long be postponed.

Sustaining our neutral position, and allowing to each party, while the war continues, equal rights, it is incumbent on the United States to claim of each, with equal rigor, the faithful observance of our rights according to the well-known law of nations. From each, therefore, a like co-operation is expected in the suppression of the piratical practice which has grown out of this war, and of blockades of extensive coasts on both seas, which, considering the small force employed to sustain them, have not the slightest foundation to rest on.

Europe is still unsettled, and, although the war long menaced between Russia and Turkey has not broken out, there is no certainty that the differences between those powers will be amicably adjusted. It is impossible to look to the oppressions of the country, respecting which those differences arose, without being deeply affected. The mention of Greece fills the mind with the most exalted sentiments and arouses in our bosoms the best feelings of which our nature is susceptible. Superior skill and refinement in the arts, heroic gallantry in action, disinterested patriotism, enthusiastic zeal and devotion in favor of public and personal liberty, are associated with our recollections of ancient Greece. That such a country should have been overwhelmed, and so long hidden, as it were, from the world under a gloomy despotism, has been a cause of unceasing and deep regret to generous minds for ages past. It was natural, therefore, that the re-appearance of those people in their original character, contending in favor of their liberties, should produce that great excitement and sympathy in their favor which have been so signally displayed throughout the United States. A strong hope is entertained that these people will recover their independence and resume their equal station among the nations of the earth.

A great effort has been made in Spain and Portugal to improve the condition of the people, and it must be very consoling to all benevolent minds to see the extraordinary moderation with which it has been conducted. That it may promote the happiness of both nations is the ardent wish of this whole people, to the expression of which we confine ourselves; for, whatever may be the feelings or sentiments which every individual under our Government has a right to indulge and express, it is nevertheless a sacred maxim, equally with the Government and people, that the destiny of every independent nation, in what relates to such improvements, of right belongs, and ought to be left, exclusively to themselves.

Whether we reason from the late wars or from those menacing symptoms which now appear in Europe, it is manifest that if a convulsion should take place in any of those countries, it will proceed from causes which have no existence and are utterly unknown in these States, in which there is but one order, that of the people, to whom the sovereignty exclusively belongs. Should war break out in any of those countries, who can foretell the extent to which it may be carried, or the desolation which it may spread? Exempt as we are from these causes, our internal tranquillity is secure; and distant as we are from the troubled scene, and faithful to just principles, in regard to other powers, we might reasonably presume that we should not be molested by them. This, however, ought not to be calculated on as certain. Unprovoked injuries are often inflicted, and even the peculiar felicity of our situation might, with some, be a cause for excitement and aggression. The history of the late wars in Europe furnishes a complete demonstration that no system of conduct, however correct in principle, can protect neutral powers from injury from any party; that a defenceless position and distinguished love of peace are the surest invitations to war; and that there is no way to avoid it other than by being always prepared and willing, for just cause, to meet it. If there be a people on earth whose more especial duty it is to be at all times prepared to defend the rights with which they are blessed, and to surpass all others in sustaining the necessary burdens, and in submitting to sacrifices to make such preparations, it is undoubtedly the people of these States.

When we see that a civil war of the most frightful character rages from the Adriatic to the Black Sea; that strong symptoms of war appear in other parts, proceeding from causes which, should it break out, may become general, and be of long duration; that the war still continues between Spain and the independent Governments, her late provinces, in this hemisphere; that it is likewise menaced between Portugal and Brazil, in consequence of the attempt of the latter to dismember itself from the former; and that a system of piracy, of great extent, is maintained in the neighboring seas, which will require equal vigilance and decision to suppress it, the reasons for sustaining the attitude which we now hold, and for pushing forward all our measures of defence with the utmost vigor, appear to me to acquire new force.

The United States owe to the world a great example, and, by means thereof, to the cause of liberty and humanity a generous support. They have so far succeeded to the satisfaction of the virtuous and enlightened of every country. There is no reason to doubt that their whole movement will be regulated by a sacred regard to principle, all our institutions being founded on that basis. The ability to support our own cause, under any trial to which it may be exposed, is the great point on which the public solicitude rests. It has been often charged against free Governments that they have neither the foresight nor the virtue to provide, at the proper season, for great emergencies; that their course is improvident and expensive; that war will always find them unprepared, and whatever may be its calamities, that its terrible warnings will be disregarded and forgotten as soon as peace returns. I have full confidence that this charge, so far as relates to the United States, will be shown to be utterly destitute of truth.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, December 3, 1822.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, by the second section of an act of Congress of the 6th of May last, entitled "An act in addition to the act concerning navigation, and also to authorize the appointment of deputy collectors," it is provided, that, in the event of the signature of any treaty or convention concerning the navigation or commerce between the United States and France, the President of the United States, if he should deem the same expedient, may suspend by proclamation, until the end of the next session of Congress, the operation of the act entitled "An act to impose a new tonnage duty on French ships and vessels, and for other purposes;" and also to suspend, as aforesaid, all other duties on French vessels, or the goods imported in the same, which may exceed the duties on American vessels, and on similar goods imported in the same; and whereas a convention of navigation and commerce between the United States of America and his Majesty the King of France and Navarre has this day been duly signed by John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State, on the part of the United States, and by the Baron Hyde de Neuville, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from France, on the part of his most Christian Majesty, which convention is in the words following:

Sa Majesté le Roi de France et de Navarre et les Etats Unis d'Amerique, desirant régler les relations de navigation et de commerce entre leur nations respectives par un convention temporaire reciproquement avantageuse et satisfaisante, et arriver aussi a un arrangement plus etendu et durable, ont respectivement donne leur pleins-pouvoirs, savoir. Et pour tous les articles non spécifiés et qui se présentent, 2,240 lbs. avoir du poids ou 1,016 kilogrammes.

ARTICLE 5. Les droits de tonnage, de phare, de pilotage, droits de port, courtage et tous autres droits sur la navigation étrangère en sus de ceux payés respectivement par la navigation nationale dans les deux pays, autre que ceux spécifiés dans les articles 1 et 2 de la presente convention, n'excéderont pas, en France, pour les batimens des Etats Unis, cinq francs par tonneau d'apres le registre

Convention of Navigation and Commerce between the United States of America and his Majesty the King of France and Navarre.

The United States of America and his Majesty the King of France and Navarre, being desirous of settling the relations of navigation and commerce between their respective nations by a temporary convention reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory, and thereby of leading to a more permanent and comprehensive arrangement, have respectfully furnished their full powers in manner following, that is to say: The President of the United States to John Quincy Adams, their Secretary of State, and his most Christian Majesty to the Baron Hyde de Neuville, Knight of the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, Commander of the Legion of Honor, Grand Cross of the Royal American Order of Isabella the Catholic, his Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary near the United States, who, after exchanging their full powers, have agreed on the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. Articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, imported into France in vessels of the United States, shall pay an additional duty, not exceeding twenty francs per ton of merchandise over and above the duties paid on the like articles, also of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, when imported in French vessels.

ARTICLE 2. Articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of France, imported into the United States in French vessels, shall pay an additional duty, not exceeding three dollars and seventy-five cents per ton of merchandise over and above the duties collected upon the like articles, also of the growth, produce, or manufacture of France, when imported in vessels of the United States.

ARTICLE 3. No discriminating duty shall be levied upon the productions of the soil or industry of France, imported in French bottoms into the ports of the United States for transit or re-exportation; nor shall any such duties be levied upon the productions of the soil or industry of the United States, imported in vessels of the United States into the ports of France for transit or re-exportation.

ARTICLE 4. The following quantities shall be considered as forming the ton of merchandise for each of the articles hereinafter specified:

Wines: Four 61 gallon hogsheads, or 244 gallons of 231 cubic inches, American measure.

Brandies, and all other liquids: 244 gallons.

Silks and all other dry goods, and all other articles usually subject to measurement: forty-two cubic feet, French, in France, and fifty cubic feet American measure, in the United States.

Cotton: 804 lbs. avoirdupois, or 365 kilogrammes.

Tobacco: 1,600 lbs. avoirdupois, or 725 kilogrammes.

Ashes, pot and pearl: 2,240 lbs. avoirdupois, or 1,016 kilogrammes.

Rice: 1,600 lbs. avoirdupois, or 725 kilogrammes; and for all weighable articles, not specified, 2,240 lbs. avoirdupois, or 1,016 kilogrammes.

ARTICLE 5. The duties of tonnage, light-money, pilotage, port charges, brokerage, and all other duties upon foreign shipping, over and above those paid by the national shipping in the two countries, respectively, other than those specified in articles 1 and 2 of the present convention, shall not exceed in France, for vessels of the United States, five francs per ton of the vessel's American register; nor Américain du bâtiment, ni pour les batimens Français aux Etats Unis, quatre vingt quatorze cents par tonneau d'après le passeport Français du bâtiment.

ARTICLE 6. Le parties contractantes desirant favoriser mutuellement leur commerce, en donnant dans leur ports toute assistance nécessaire a leurs batimens respectifs, sont convenues que les consuls et vice consuls pourront faire arrêter les matelôts faisant partie des équipages des batimens de leurs nations respectives qui auraient déserté des dits batimens pour les renvoyer et faire transporter hors du pays. Auquel effet les dits consuls et vice consuls s'adresseront aux tribunaux, juges et officiers compétens, et leur feront, par écrit, la demande des dits déserteurs, en justifiant par l'exhibition des registres du bâtiment ou rôle d'équipage ou autres documens officiels que ces hommes faisaient partie des dits equipages. Et sur cette demande ainsi justifiée, sauf toutefois la preuve contraire, l'extradition ne pourra être refusée, et il sera donné toute aide et assistance aux dits consuls et vice consuls pour la recherche, saisie et arrestation des susdits déserteurs, lesquels seront même détenus et gardés dans les prisons du pays à leur réquisition, et à leurs frais, jusqu'à ce qu'ils aient trouvé occasion de les renvoyer; mais s'ils n'étaient renvoyé dans le delai de trois mois à compter du jour de leur arrêt, ils seront élargis et ne pourront plus être arretés pour la même cause.

ARTICLE 7. La présente convention temporaire aura son plein effet pendant deux ans à partir du 1er. Octobre prochain, et même après l'expiration de ce terme, elle sera maintenue jusqu'à la conclusion d'un traité définitif, ou jusqu'à ce que l'une des parties ait déclaré à l'autre son intention d'y renoncer, laquelle déclaration devra être faite au moins six mois d'avance.

Et dans le cas où la presente convention viendrait à continuer, sans cette declaration par l'une ou l'autre partie, les droits extraordinaires spécifiés dans les 1 et 2 articles, seront, a l'expiration des dites deux années, diminués de part et d'autre d'un quart de leur montant, et successivement d'un quart du dit montat d'année en année, aussi longtems qu'aucune des parties n'aura déclaré son intention d'y renoncer, ainsi qu'il est dit ci-dessus.

ARTICLE 8. La présente convention sera ratifiée de part et d'autre, et les ratifications. seront échangées dans l'espace d'une année à compter de ce jour, ou plutôt si faire se peut; mais l'exécution de la dite convention commencera dans le deux pays le premiere Octobre prochain, et aura son effet, dans le cas même de non-ratification, pour tous batimens partis bona fide pour les ports de l'une ou l'autre nation, dans la confiance qu'elle était en vigueur.

En foi de quoi, les plenipotentiaires respectifs ont signé la presente convention, et y ont apposé leur sceaux, en la ville de Washington, ce 24me jour de Juin, de l'an de notre seigneur, 1822.

ARTICLE SÉPARÉ. Les droits extraordinaires levés de part et d'autre jusqu'à ce jour, en vertu de l'acte du Congrès du 15 Mai, 1820, et de l'ordonnance du 26 Juillet de la même année et autres la confirmant, qui n'ont point déjà été remboursés, seront restitués. Signé et scellé comme ci-dessus ce 24me jour de Juin, 1822.

ARTICLE SÉPARÉ. Il est convenu que les droits extraordinaires spécifiés dans les 1 et 2 articles de cette convention, ne seront levés que sur l'excédant de la valeur de la marchandise importée, sur la valeur de la marchandise exportée par le même bâtiment dans le même voyage; en sorte que si la valeur des articles exportés égale ou surpasse celle for vessels of France in the United States, ninety-four cents per ton of the vessel's French passport.

ARTICLE 6. The contracting parties, wishing to favor their mutual commerce by affording in their ports every necessary assistance to their respective vessels, have agreed that the consuls and vice consuls may cause to be arrested the sailors, being part of the crews of the vessels of their respective nations, who shall have deserted from the said vessels, in order to send them back and transport them out of the country. For which purpose the said consuls and vice consuls shall address themselves to the courts, judges, and officers competent, and shall demand the said deserters in writing, proving, by an exhibition of the registers of the vessel, or ship's roll, or other official documents, that those men were part of said crews; and on this demand so proved, (saving, however, where the contrary is proved,) the delivery shall not be refused; and there shall be given all aid and assistance to the said consuls and vice consuls for the search, seizure, and arrest of said deserters, who shall even be detained and kept in the prisons of the country, at their request and expense, until they shall have found an opportunity of sending them back. But if they be not sent back within three months, to be counted from the day of their arrest, they shall be set at liberty, and shall be no more arrested for the same cause.

ARTICLE 7. The present temporary convention shall be in force for two years from the first day of October next, and even after the expiration of that term, until the conclusion of a definitive treaty or until one of the parties shall have declared its intention to renounce it, which declaration shall be made at least six months beforehand.

And in case the present arrangement should remain without such declaration of its discontinuance by either party, the extra duties specified in the first and second articles shall, from the expiration of the said two years, be on both sides diminished by one-fourth of their whole amount, and afterwards by one-fourth of the said amount from year to year, so long as neither party shall have declared the intention of renouncing it as above stated.

ARTICLE 8. The present convention shall be ratified on both sides, and the ratifications shall be exchanged within one year from the date hereof, or sooner, if possible; but the execution of the said convention shall commence in both countries on the 1st of October next, and shall be effective, even in case of non-ratification, for all such vessels as may have sailed bona fide for the ports of either nation in the confidence of its being in force.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention, and have thereto affixed their seals, at the city of Washington, this 24th day of June, A. D. 1822.

SEPARATE ARTICLE. The extra duties levied on either side before the present day, by virtue of the act of Congress of the 15th May, 1820, and of the ordonnance of 26th July of the same year, and others confirmative thereof, and which have not already been paid back, shall be refunded.

Signed and sealed as above, this 24th day of June, 1822.

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE. [L. s.]

SEPARATE ARTICLE. It is agreed that the extra duties specified in the first and second articles of this convention shall be levied only upon the excess of value of the merchandise imported over the value of the merchandise exported in the same vessel upon the same voyage; so that if the value of the articles exported shall equal or exceed that of the articles des articles importés par le même bâtiment (exceptant toutefois les articles importés pour transit ou re-exportation) aucun droit extraordinaire ne sera levé; et si les articles exportés sont inférieurs en valeur à ceux importés, les droits extraordinaires ne seront levés que sur le montant de la différence de leur valeur. Cet article toutefois n'aura d'effet que dans le cas de ratification de part et d'autre, et seulement deux mois après l'échange des ratifications; mais le refus de ratifier cet article d'une ou d'autre part, n'affectera et n'affaiblira en rien la ratification ou la validité des articles précédents de cette convention.

imported in the same vessel (not including, however, articles imported for transit or re-exportation) no such extra duties shall be levied; and if the articles exported are less in value than those imported, the extra duties shall be levied only upon the amount of the difference of their value. This article, however, shall take effect only in case of ratification on both sides, and not until two months after the exchange of the ratifications; but the refusal to ratify this article, on either side, shall in nowise affect or impair the ratification or the validity of the preceding articles of this convention.

Signed and sealed as above, this 24th day of June, 1822.

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE. [L. s.]

Now, therefore, be it known that I, James Monroe, President of the United States, in pursuance of the authority aforesaid, do hereby suspend, from and after the first day of October next, until the end of the next session of Congress, the operation of the act aforesaid, entitled "An act to impose a new tonnage duty on French ships and vessels, and for other purposes; and also, all other duties on French vessels, and the goods, being the growth, produce, and manufacture of France, imported in the same, which may exceed the duties on American vessels, and on similar goods imported in the same, saving only discriminating duties payable on French vessels, and on articles of the growth, produce, and manufacture of France, imported in the same, stipulated by the said convention to be paid.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand. Done at Washington, the twenty-fourth day of June, in the year of [L. s.] our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, and of the Independence of the United States the forty-sixth.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President:

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, by an act of the Congress of the United States, passed on the 6th day of May last, it was provided that, on satisfactory evidence being given to the President of the United States that the ports in the islands or colonies in the West Indies, under the dominion of Great Britain, have been opened to the vessels of the United States, the President should be, and thereby was, authorized to issue his proclamation, declaring that the ports of the United States should thereafter be opened to the vessels of Great Britain employed in the trade and intercourse between the United States and such islands or colonies, subject to such reciprocal rules and restrictions as the President of the United States might, by such proclamation, make and publish, anything in the laws entitled "An act concerning navigation," or an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act concerning navigation," to the contrary notwithstanding; and whereas satisfactory evidence has been given to the President of the United States that the ports hereinafter mentioned in the islands or colonies in the West Indies, under the dominion of Great Britain, have been opened to the vessels of the United States, that is to say:

The ports of Kingston, Savannah La Mar, Montego bay, Santa Lucia, Antonio, Saint Ann, Falmouth, Maria, and Morant bay, in Jamaica;	Any port where there is a custom-house, Bahamas; Bridgetown, Barbadoes;
Saint George, Grenada;	St. John's, St. Andrew's, New Brunswick;
Roseau, Dominica;	Halifax, Nova Scotia;
Saint John's, Antigua;	Quebec, Canada;
San Josef, Trinidad;	St. John's, Newfoundland;
Scarborough, Tobago;	Georgetown, Demarara;
Road Harbor, Tortola;	New Amsterdam, Berbice;
Nassau, New Providence;	Castres, St. Lucia;
Pittstown, Crooked Island;	Basseterre, St. Kitts;
Kingston, St. Vincent;	Charlestown, Nevis;
Port St. George and Port Hamilton, Bermuda;	And Plymouth, Montserrat.

Now, therefore, I, James Monroe, President of the United States of America, do hereby declare and proclaim that the ports of the United States shall hereafter, and until the end of the next session of the Congress of the United States, be open to the vessels of Great Britain employed in the trade and intercourse between the United States and the islands and colonies hereinbefore named, anything in the laws entitled "An act concerning navigation," or an act supplementary to an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act concerning navigation," to the contrary notwithstanding, under the following reciprocal rules and restrictions, namely:

To vessels of Great Britain, bona fide British built, owned, and the master and three-fourths of the mariners of which at least shall belong to Great Britain, or any United States built ship or vessel which has been sold to, and become the property of, British subjects, such ship or vessel being also navigated with a master, and three-fourths of the mariners at least belonging to Great Britain; and provided always, that no articles shall be imported into the United States in any such British ship or vessel other than articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the British islands and colonies in the West Indies, when imported in British vessels coming from any such island or colony; and articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the British colonies in North America, or of the island of Newfoundland, in vessels coming from the port of St. John's, in that island, or from any of the aforesaid ports of the British colonies in North America.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, this twenty-fourth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, and in the forty-seventh year of the Independence of the United States.

[2D SESSION.

NEGOTIATIONS AND TREATY WITH FRANCE OF JUNE 24, 1822.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, IN EXECUTIVE SESSION, DECEMBER 10, 1822, AND THE INJUNCTION OF SECRECY SINCE REMOVED.

To the Senate of the United States:

The convention between the United States and France, concluded at Washington, on the 24th day of June last, is now transmitted to the Senate for their advice and consent with regard to its ratification, together with the documents relating to the negotiation, which may serve to elucidate the deliberations of the Senate concerning its objects and the purposes to which it was adapted.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, December 4, 1822.

Convention de Navigation et de Commerce entre sa Majesté le Roi de France et de Navarre et les Etats Unis d'Amerique.

Convention of Navigation and Commerce between the United States of America and his Majesty the King of France and Navarre.

Sa Majesté le Roi de France et de Navarre et les Etats Unis d'Amerique, desirant régler les relations de navigation et de commerce entre leur nations respectives par un convention temporaire reciproquement avantageuse et satisfaisante, et arriver aussi a un arrangement plus etendu et durable, ont respectivement donne leur pleins-pouvoirs, savoir. Sa Majesté Très Chretienne au Baron Hyde de Neuville, Chevalier de l'ordre Royal et Militaire de St. Louis, Commandeur de la Legion d'Honneur, Grand Croix de l'ordre Royal Americain d'Isabelle la Catholique, son Envoyé Extraordinaire et Ministre Plenipotenciaire près les Etats Unis; et le President des Etats Unis, à John Quincy Adams, leur Secrétaire d'Etat; lesquels, apres avoir échangé leur pleins-pouvoirs, sont convenus des articles suivans :

The United States of America and his Majesty the King of France and Navarre, being desirous of settling the relations of navigation and commerce between their respective nations, by a temporary convention reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory, and thereby of leading to a more permanent and comprehensive arrangement, have respectively furnished their full powers in manner following, that is to say: The President of the United States to John Quincy Adams, their Secretary of State; and his most Christian Majesty, to the Baron Hyde de Neuville, Knight of the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, Commander of the Legion of Honor, Grand Cross of the Royal American Order of Isabella the Catholic, his Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary near the United States; who, after exchanging their full powers, have agreed on the following articles :

ARTICLE 1. Les produits naturels ou manufacturés des Etats Unis importés en France sur batimens des Etats Unis payeront un droit additionel qui n'excédera point vingt francs par tonneau de marchandize, en sus droits payés sur les memes produits naturels ou manufacturés des Etats Unis quad ils sont importés par navires Français.

ARTICLE 1. Articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, imported into France in vessels of the United States, shall pay an additional duty, not exceeding twenty francs per ton of merchandise over and above the duties paid on the like articles, also of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, when imported in French vessels.

ARTICLE 2. Les produits naturels ou manufacturés de France importés aux Etats Unis sur batimens Français payeront un droit additionel qui n'excédera point trois dollars, soixante-quinze cents par tonneau de marchandise, en sus des droits payés sur les memes produits naturels ou manufacturés de France quand ils sont importés par navires des Etats Unis.

ARTICLE 2. Articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of France, imported into the United States in French vessels, shall pay an additional duty, not exceeding three dollars and seventy-five cents per ton of merchandise over and above the duties collected upon the like articles, also of the growth, produce, or manufacture of France, when imported in vessels of the United States.

ARTICLE 3. Aucun droit differentiel ne sera levé sur les produits du sol et de l'industrie de France qui seront importés par navires Français dans les ports des Etats Unis pour transit ou re-exportation; il en sera de meme dans les ports de France pour les produits du sol et de l'industrie de l'Union qui

ARTICLE 3. No discriminating duty shall be levied upon the productions of the soil or industry of France, imported in French bottoms into the ports of the United States for transit or re-exportation; nor shall any such duties be levied upon the productions of the soil or industry of the United States, seront importés pour transit ou re-exportation par navires des Etats Unis.

ARTICLE 4. Les quantités suivantes seront considérées comme formant le tonneau de marchandise pour chacun des articles ci-apres spécifiés:

Vins—quatre barriques de 61 gallons chaque, ou 244 gallons de 231 pouces cubes (mesure Americaine.)

Eaux de vie, et tous autres liquides, 244 gallons. Soieries et toutes autres marchandises séchées ainsi que tous autres articles généralement soumis au mesurage quarante deux pieds cubes, mesure Français en France; et cinquante pieds cubes, mesure Americaine, aux Etats Unis.

Cotons—804 lbs. avoir du poids ou 365 kilogrammes.

Tabacs—1600 lbs. avoir du poids ou 725 kilogrammes.

Potasse et perlasse 2240 lb. avoir du poids ou 1016 kilogrammes.

Riz—1600 lbs. avoir du poids ou 725 kil. Et pour tous les articles non spécifiés et qui se pèsent 2240 lbs. avoir du poids ou 1016 kilogrammes.

ARTICLE 5. Les droits de tonnage, de phare, de pilotage, droits de port, courtage et tous autres droits sur la navigation étrangère en sus de ceux payés respectivement par la navigation nationale dans les deux Pays, autre que ceux spécifiés dans les articles 1 et 2 de la presente convention, n'excéderont pas, en France, pour les batimens des Etats Unis, cinq francs par tonneau d'apres le registre Américain du batiment, ni pour les batimens Français aux Etats Unis, quatre vingt quatorze cents par tonneau d'apres le passeport Français du batiment.

ARTICLE 6. Le parties contractantes désirant favoriser mutuellement leur commerce, en donnant dans leur ports toute assistance nécessaire a leurs batimens respectifs, sont convenues que les consuls et vice consuls pourront faire arrêter les matelôts faisant partie des équipages des batimens de leurs nations respectives qui auraient déserté des dits batimens pour les renvoyer et faire transporter hors du pays. Auquel effet les dits consuls et vice consuls s'adresseront aux tribunaux, juges et officiers compétens, et leur feront, par écrit, la demande des dits déserteurs, en justifiant par l'exhibition des registres du batiment ou rôle d'équipage ou autres documens officiels que ces hommes faisaient partie des dits equipages. Et sur cette demande ainsi justifiée, sauf toutefois la preuve contraire, l'extradition ne pourra être refusée, et il sera donné toute aide et assistance aux dits consuls et vice consuls pour la recherche, saisie et arrestation des susdits deserteurs, lesquels seront même détenus et gardés dans les prisons du pays à leur réquisition, et à leurs frais, jusqu'à ce qu'ils aient trouvé occasion de les renvoyer; mais s'ils n'étaient renvoyé dans le delai de trois mois à compter du jour de leur arrêt, ils seront élargis et ne pourront plus être arrêtés pour la même cause.

ARTICLE 7. La présente convention temporaire aura son plein effet pendant deux ans à partir du 1er. Octobre prochain, et même après l'expiration de ce terme, elle sera maintenue jusqu'à la conclusion d'un traité définitif, ou jusqu'à ce que l'une des parties ait déclaré à l'autre son intention d'y renoncer, laquelle déclaration devra être faite au moins six mois d'avance.

Et dans le cas où la presente convention viendrait à continuer, sans cette declaration par l'une ou l'autre partie, les droits extraordinaires spécifiés dans les 1 et 2 articles, seront, a l'expiration des dites deux années, diminués de part et d'autre d'un quart de leur montant, et successivement d'un quart du dit montant d'année en année, aussi longtems qu'aucune des parties n'aura déclaré son intention d'y renoncer, ainsi qu'il est dit ci-dessus.

ARTICLE 8. La présente convention sera ratifiée de part et d'autre, et les ratifications seront échangées dans l'espace d'une année à compter de ce jour, ou imported in vessels of the United States into the ports of France for transit or re-exportation.

ARTICLE 4. The following quantities shall be considered as forming the ton of merchandise for each of the articles hereinafter specified:

Wines: Four 61 gallon hogsheds, or 244 gallons of 231 cubic inches, American measure.

Brandies, and all other liquids: 244 gallons.

Silks and all other dry goods, and all other articles usually subject to measurement: forty-two cubic feet, French, in France, and fifty cubic feet American measure, in the United States.

Cotton: 804 lbs. avoirdupois, or 365 kilogrammes.

Tobacco: 1,600 pounds avoirdupois, or 725 kilogrammes.

Ashes, pot and pearl: 2,240 lbs. avoirdupois, or 1,016 kilogrammes.

Rice: 1,600 lbs. avoirdupois, or 725 kilogrammes, and for all weighable articles not specified 2,240 lbs. avoirdupois, or 1,016 kilogrammes.

ARTICLE 5. The duties of tonnage, light-money, pilotage, port charges, brokerage, and all other duties upon foreign shipping, over and above those paid by the national shipping in the two countries respectively, other than those specified in articles 1 and 2 of the present convention, shall not exceed in France, for vessels of the United States, five francs per ton of the vessel's American register; nor for vessels of France in the United States ninety-four cents per ton of the vessel's French passport.

ARTICLE 6. The contracting parties, wishing to favor their mutual commerce by affording in their ports every necessary assistance to their respective vessels, have agreed that the consuls and vice consuls may cause to be arrested the sailors, being part of the crews of the vessels of their respective nations, who shall have deserted from the said vessels, in order to send them back and transport them out of the country; for which purpose the said consuls and vice consuls shall address themselves to the courts, judges, and officers competent, and shall demand the said deserters in writing, proving, by an exhibition of the registers of the vessel or ship's roll, or other official documents, that those men were part of said crews, and on this demand, so proved, (saving, however, where the contrary is proved,) the delivery shall not be refused; and there shall be given all aid and assistance to the said consuls and vice consuls for the search, seizure, and arrest of said deserters, who shall even be detained and kept in the prisons of the country, at their request and expense, until they shall have found an opportunity of sending them back. But if they be not sent back within three months, to be counted from the day of their arrest, they shall be set at liberty, and shall be no more arrested for the same cause.

ARTICLE 7. The present temporary convention shall be in force for two years from the first day of October next, and even after the expiration of that term, until the conclusion of a definitive treaty, or until one of the parties shall have declared its intention to renounce it, which declaration shall be made at least six months beforehand.

And in case the present arrangement should remain without such declaration of its discontinuance by either party, the extra duties specified in the 1st and 2d articles shall, from the expiration of the said two years, be on both sides diminished by one-fourth of their whole amount, and afterwards by one-fourth of the said amount from year to year, so long as neither party shall have declared the intention of renouncing it as above stated.

ARTICLE 8. The present convention shall be ratified on both sides, and the ratifications shall be exchanged within one year from the date hereof, or plutôt si faire se peut. Mais l'exécution de la dite convention commencera dans le deux pays le première Octobre prochain, et aura son effet, dans le cas même de non-ratification, pour tous batimens partis bonâ fide pour les ports de l'une ou l'autre nation, dans la confiance qu'elle était en vigueur.

En foi de quoi, les plenipotentiaires respectifs ont signé la présente convention, et y ont apposé leur sceaux, en la ville de Washington, ce 24me jour de Juin, de l'an de notre seigneur, 1822.

ARTICLE SÉPARÉ. Les droits extraordinaires levés de part et d'autre jusqu'à ce jour, en vertu de l'acte du Congrès du 15 Mai, 1820, et de l'ordonnance du 26 Juillet de la même année et autres la confirmant, qui n'ont point déjà été remboursés, seront restitués. Signé et scellé comme ci-dessus ce 24me jour de Juin, 1822.

ARTICLE SÉPARÉ. Il est convenu que les droits extraordinaires spécifiés dans les 1 et 2 articles de cette convention, ne seront levés que sur l'excédant de la valeur de la marchandise importée, sur la valeur de la marchandise exportée par le même bâtiment dans le même voyage: en sorte que si la valeur des articles exportés égale ou surpasse celle des articles importés par le même bâtiment (exceptant toutefois les articles importés pour transit ou re-exportation) aucun droit extraordinaire ne sera levé; et, si les articles exportés sont inférieurs en valeur à ceux importés, les droits extraordinaires ne seront levés que sur le montant de la différence de leur valeur. Cet article toutefois n'aura d'effet que dans le cas de ratification de part et d'autre; et seulement deux mois après l'échange des ratifications. Mais le refus de ratifier cet article d'une ou d'autre part, n'affectera et n'affaiblira en rien la ratification ou la validité des articles précédens de cette convention.

Signé et scellé come ci dessus ce 24me jour de Juin, 1822.

sooner, if possible. But the execution of the said convention shall commence in both countries on the 1st of October next, and shall be effective, even in case of non-ratification, for all such vessels as may have sailed bona fide for the ports of either nation in the confidence of its being in force.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention, and have thereto affixed their seals, at the city of Washington, this 24th day of June, A. D. 1822.

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE. [L. s.]

SEPARATE ARTICLE. The extra duties levied on either side before the present day, by virtue of the act of Congress of 15th May, 1820, and of the ordonnance of 26th July, of the same year, and others confirmative thereof, and which have not already been paid back, shall be refunded. Signed and sealed as above, this 24th day of June, 1822.

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE. [L. s.]

SEPARATE ARTICLE. It is agreed that the extra duties specified in the first and second articles of this convention shall be levied only upon the excess of value of the merchandise imported over the value of the merchandise exported in the same vessel upon the same voyage; so that if the value of the articles exported shall equal or exceed that of the articles imported in the same vessel (not including, however, articles imported for transit or re-exportation) no such extra duties shall be levied; and if the articles exported are less in value than those imported, the extra duties shall be levied only upon the amount of the difference of their value. This article, however, shall take effect only in case of ratification on both sides, and not until two months after the exchange of the ratifications. But the refusal to ratify this article, on either side, shall in nowise affect or impair the ratification or the validity of the preceding articles of this convention.

Signed and sealed as above, this 24th day of June, 1822.

WASHINGTON, December 15, 1817.

SIR: The Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of his most Christian Majesty has received reiterated orders to ascertain the truth of the statement made by several masters of merchant ships, affirming that French vessels are not treated, in the ports of Louisiana, upon the footing of the most favored nations.

Upon investigation, it not only appears that such is actually the case, but the undersigned has even found that several protests had been lodged in vain with the local authorities against this manifest infraction of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty.

He is well assured that this must have been the mere consequence of error or of incorrect interpretation, given on the spot, to a clause which is absolute and unconditional by its own terms, and which can neither be limited nor modified, being the essential unlimited condition of a contract of cession, can neither be subject to limitation nor to any modification whatever. The minister of H. M. C. M. persuades himself that it will suffice thus to call the attention of the Federal Government to this affair, in order to obtain from its justice the reparation of an injury so very prejudicial to French commerce.

He therefore requests of the Secretary of State that this, his representation, made by order of his court, be submitted, as soon as possible, to the President, in order that his Excellency may be pleased to issue orders to such effect that in future the 8th article of the treaty of 1803, between France and the United States, receive its entire execution, and the advantages granted to great Britain in all ports of the United States be secured to France in those of Louisiana.

The principle of justice here claimed cannot be denied, and must necessarily insure the reimbursement of the duties which have been unjustifiably levied upon French vessels in New Orleans.

The undersigned minister expects, with entire confidence, the decision of the President, of which he requests the Secretary of State will enable him to inform his court as soon as possible. The Government of his Majesty desires, as soon as possible, to quiet the commerce of France with regard to proceedings so contrary to its interests and the true spirit of the Louisiana treaty.

The undersigned has the honor, &c., &c.,

HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 23, 1817.

The undersigned, Secretary of State, has received and laid before the President the note which he had the honor of receiving from the Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of France, complaining that French vessels are not, conformably to the eighth article of the treaty of cession of Louisiana, treated in the ports of that State upon the footing of the most favored nation, and claiming as a right, deducible from the same article, that French vessels should in future enjoy, in the ports of Louisiana, all the advantages granted to the English nation in all the ports of the Union.

The undersigned is instructed to say that the vessels of France are treated, in the ports of Louisiana, upon the footing of the most favored nation, and that neither the English nor any other foreign nation enjoys any gratuitous advantage there which is not equally enjoyed by France. But English vessels, by virtue of a conditional compact, are admitted into the ports of the United States, including those of Louisiana, upon payment of the same duties as the vessels of the United States. The condition upon which they enjoy this advantage is, that the vessels of the United States shall be admitted into the ports of Great Britain upon payment of the same duties as are there paid by British vessels.

The eighth article of the treaty of cession stipulates that the ships of France shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports of the ceded Territory; but it does not say, and cannot be understood to mean, that France should enjoy as a free gift that which is conceded to other nations for a full equivalent.

It is obvious that if French vessels should be admitted into ports of Louisiana upon the payment of the same duties as the vessels of the United States, they would be treated, not upon the footing of the most favored nation, according to the article in question, but upon a footing more favored than any other nation; since other nations, with the exception of England, pay higher tonnage duties, and the exemption of English vessels is not a free gift, but a purchase, at a fair and equal price.

It is true that the terms of the 8th article are positive and unconditional; but it will readily be perceived that the condition, though not expressed in the article, is inherent in the advantage claimed under it. If British vessels enjoyed, in the ports of Louisiana, any gratuitous favor, undoubtedly French vessels would, by the terms of the article, be entitled to the same.

A more extensive construction cannot be given to the article consistently with the Constitution of the United States, which declares, that "all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States; and that no preference shall be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another."

It would be incompatible with other articles of the treaty of cession itself, one of which cedes the territory to the United States "in full sovereignty;" and another declares that its "inhabitants shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted, as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the United States." If France could claim, forever, advantages in the ports of Louisiana, which could be denied to her in the other ports of the United States, she would have ceded to the United States, not the full, but an imperfect, sovereignty; and if France could claim admission for her vessels, forever, into the ports of Louisiana, upon the payment of duties not uniform with those which they must pay in the other ports of the United States, it would have been impossible to have admitted the inhabitants of Louisiana, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States.

The undersigned is happy to be authorized, in concluding this note, to add that the Government of the United States is willing to extend to France, not only in the ports of Louisiana, but in those of all the United States, every advantage enjoyed by the vessels of Great Britain, upon the fair and just equivalent of reciprocity; and that, in the meantime, the vessels of France shall be treated, in all the ports of the United States, including Louisiana, on the footing of the most favored nation, enjoying, gratuitously, every favor indulged, gratuitously, to others, and every conditional favor, upon the reciprocation of the same to the vessels of the United States in France.

He prays the minister of France to accept the assurance of his very distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

M. HYDE DE NEUVILLE,

WASHINGTON, June 16, 1818.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your note in answer to mine of the 15th December last, concerning the non-execution of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty.

I took care duly to communicate the proposal made by the Federal Government to extend to France, not only in the ports of Louisiana, but even in all those of the United States, the advantages therein enjoyed by British vessels, on a footing of absolute reciprocity.

H. M. is ever disposed not to neglect anything that can tend to rivet the bonds of friendship of the two countries and to improve their commercial intercourse, and will, no doubt, examine this proposal with very particular attention.

In the meantime, as it would be neither just nor proper that the execution of the clauses of a contract already made and completely concluded should be dependent on an arrangement which, as yet, is only in contemplation, and as the enjoyment of a perpetual unconditional right should never, in any case, be blended with reciprocal advantages or concessions which time annuls, and which accidental causes may modify or destroy; as France claims nothing but what she knows is due to her, and as she is well persuaded that the Federal Government will never deny what it is conscious of owing, there is much reason to hope that the following observations will suffice to establish our right, and thus remove every obstacle to its free enjoyment.

I will add, that fresh orders from his Majesty make it my duty to neglect no means of obtaining, as soon as possible, this act, whose accomplishment must be expected, from mature deliberation on the question, and is warranted by the acknowledged equity of the Federal Government.

You have stated, sir, that French vessels are treated in the ports of Louisiana upon the footing of the most favored nation, and that no foreign nation enjoys there any gratuitous advantage which is not equally enjoyed by France. You add, sir, that if British vessels are allowed in the ports of the United States certain advantages which American vessels likewise enjoy in the ports of Great Britain, it is by virtue of a conditional compact founded on reciprocity of advantages.

Finally, after recalling the 8th article, which stipulates expressly that in future, and forever, French vessels shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports of the ceded territory, you observe, that the article does not say, and that it could not be understood to mean, that France should enjoy, as a free gift, that which is conceded to other nations for a full equivalent.

I shall, in the first place, have the honor to observe, that France asks not for a free gift. She claims the enjoyment of a right which it is not even necessary for her to acquire, since it proceeds from herself, being a right which, when she consented to dispose of Louisiana, she had power to reserve for the interest of her trade, and the actual reservation of which is established, not impliedly, but in the most precise and formal terms by the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty.

France, I repeat it, asks no free gift, since the territory ceded is the equivalent already paid by her for all the clauses, charges, and conditions, executed, or which remain to be fulfilled by the United States, and which principally consist in the 7th and 8th articles of the treaty, and 1st of the convention.

If the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty had no other object but that of securing to France a conditional advantage in the ports of Louisiana, if such had been the true spirit of this clause, and, finally, if the American negotiators had been firmly convinced that this reservation of the French Government was not absolute, but was merely one of those customary reciprocal concessions which occur in almost all treaties of amity and commerce, it is likely that no pains would have been taken to frame the article so as absolutely to contradict the intention of the contracting parties; and it stands to reason that, if such had been their views, the terms usually employed in other treaties would have been employed here also, instead of so precise a stipulation of an unconditional and perpetual advantage in favor of France.

In all the treaties between France and the United States the condition of reciprocity is positively mentioned. They all expressly say that the contracting parties shall reciprocally enjoy such favors as shall be conceded to other nations, freely, if freely granted to other nations, or upon granting the same condition, if conditionally granted.

How shall we account for the strange and unusual construction here adopted? Who would admit the possibility or likelihood of an omission on the part of negotiators, the object of whose mission was not to stipulate doubtful clauses, subject to discussion, but, on the contrary, as it is expressly stated in the treaty, "to remove all source of misunderstanding relative to objects of discussion, and to strengthen the union and friendship which, at the time of the said convention, was happily re-established between the two nations?"

And, furthermore, how shall we reconcile the silence observed by the Senate, in 1803, respecting this unconditional and unlimited favor secured to France with the positive refusal of the same House, in 1801, to ratify a convention founded on reciprocity of advantage, unless on the express condition that it should be limited to eight years?

The natural inference, the only explanation of all this, is, that in 1801 the question was on a convention or treaty of amity and commerce, while in 1803 it was on a contract of sale or cession; which instruments are of so different a nature as not to admit the application of similar principles and consequences, nor can it be supposed that the negotiators of the treaty of 1801 had forgotten to mention that the citizens of the two nations should reciprocally be treated each, in the ports of the other, upon the footing of the most favored nations, since this principle of reciprocity was not only the general basis, but was even, in almost every instance, the sine qua non of preceding commercial conventions.

But the negotiators of the treaty of 1803 knew full well that they were not commissioned to settle the commercial or navigating interests of the two countries, and were merely authorized to make a contract of sale or cession; which, however important from the value of the object ceded, was not the less subject, like every conveyance between individuals, to certain and invariable rules of construction and interpretation.

A contract of sale admits of no implication, (sous-entendu;) it is a plain, simple transaction, by which one party is bound to deliver a certain property, and the other party to receive it on certain charges and conditions, more or less rigorous

Those clauses and conditions cannot be interpreted otherwise than according to the terms in which they are expressed in the contract; nor can they be annulled or modified, except by the consent of both parties. Their entire execution is, indeed, so rigorously binding that it, alone, may be said finally to seal the transaction. But the article would appear to you, sir, to be in this, its only natural construction, inconsistent with the Constitution, which declares that all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States.

It would seem to me that this clause of the Constitution has no other reference than to the interior administration of the country, and that it cannot be proper to consider in the light of a mere tax or impost that which is an express condition of the sale or cession of a territory, and is one of the clauses of a treaty which, itself, becomes a law of the United States.

You express an opinion, sir, that the eighth article, if interpreted according to its grammatical and literal sense, would be incompatible with another article of the same treaty, which cedes the territory to the United States in full sovereignty; arguing that if France could claim forever advantages in the ports of Louisiana which could be denied to her in the other ports of the United States, she would have ceded to the United States not the full, but an imperfect sovereignty.

Allow me to observe that this last point of the argument is answered by your own decision, admitting that if British vessels enjoyed in the ports of Louisiana any gratuitous favor, undoubtedly French vessels would, by the terms of the treaty, be entitled to the same.

This admits the possibility of an imperfect sovereignty, and supposes an instance in which France might be entitled to claim in the ports of Louisiana a favor which could be denied her in the other ports of the United States.

Moreover, if the United States have, by the Constitution, a right to grant to other nations gratuitous favors in their ports, it follows, from your own interpretation of the perpetual reservation made by France, that, in order to deprive her of the right so reserved, and to avoid rendering thereby the sovereignty of this republic imperfect, the Federal Government must not grant to other nations any gratuitous concessions in the territory ceded by France, though it should be found expedient so to do, and advantageous to their commercial interest and policy. In other words, the Federal Government, by consenting to the eighth article, would have deprived itself of a real right of sovereignty.

In the preceding hypothesis the difficulty is merely eluded and not removed. The right is not the less unqualified and consented to forever.

But will it be said the Constitution allows no preferences among the different States? They are all, by the federal compact, subject to the same charges, and are to enjoy the same privileges. It would appear to me, sir, that this perfect uniformity is applicable only to a State when it has once become a State. The regulations made for the family cannot be meant to extend beyond its circle; and the law which establishes such regulations never can have blended the circumstances pre-existent to the admission of a new member (much less the very conditions of admission) with the rights, charges, and privileges which are the consequence springing therefrom. Thus did Congress judge. To them it appeared that the instrument of sale or cession of Louisiana had no analogy to a commercial regulation or to a distribution of taxes, and they admitted without discussion the seventh and eighth articles of the treaty, because, if the Constitution does not allow that a territory, when once admitted into this Union, be marked by any distinctive charges or advantages, it does not, on that account, prevent the fulfilment of clauses exacted and consented to as conditions of its admission. In all this there is neither exception nor preference; it is the mere and simple execution of a contract freely and lawfully entered into.

But the third article says that the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated into the Union, and admitted as soon as possible to the enjoyment of all the advantages and immunities of citizens of the United States.

This is true, and such, no doubt, was the intention of the contracting parties. They expressly agreed that this admission should take place as soon as possible, but most assuredly it was meant that this should be done in conformity with the clauses and conditions mentioned in the treaty; and if the 8th article could have been considered as an obstacle to the execution of the 3d article, it would equally have been so thought of the 7th. This article was, however, never contested. It even received, during the twelve years of its duration, or should have received, its full and entire operation, by virtue of the regulating act of Congress of the 24th of February, 1804.

France and Spain still enjoyed, in 1815, in Louisiana, the rights and privileges secured by the 7th article, which rights, by the very terms of the treaty, never can be granted to any other nation.

France and Spain were in the full enjoyment of these exclusive rights and privileges in 1815, and yet in 1812 the stipulation of the 3d article was fulfilled, the Territory of Louisiana was admitted as a State into the federal body, and this new State was received, without restriction, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever.

If, therefore, there were at this day any contradiction between the 3d and 8th articles, how could Congress, in 1812, surmount the objection arising from the much stronger inconsistency which, on this supposition, must have existed between the 3d and 7th articles?

When Congress made Louisiana a member of the Union, before the expiration of the twelve years it was judged that such a compliance with the conditions of a treaty was by no means incompatible with the exercise of the full and entire rights of sovereignty. Perhaps it may be answered that the 7th article granted only temporary privileges, and that the 8th article had no term fixed to it. To me it appears that the words forever change nothing but the duration of the privilege, without, in the least degree, altering the nature of the question. Under a constitutional system, nothing can be done, ordered, or consented to, that would infringe, even but for a limited term, the established laws of the country. All the transactions of Governments must be legal. If, therefore, the provisions of the constitution which regulate the existence of a State after its admission were applicable to the conditions on which it is to be admitted, it would, in such case, have been no less impossible in 1812 than at the present day to grant to the inhabitants of Louisiana the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens of the United States. Since, on that supposition, they must, in common with the other States, have had a right to make France and Spain pay, in their ports, higher tonnage duties than those paid by the citizens of the United States; and since the Federal Government had no right at that time to grant, in the ports of the ceded territory, to other nations the privileges therein secured to France and Spain. France did intend to cede the Territory of Louisiana to the United States forever, and in full sovereignty; but sovereignty does not exist in the enjoyment of every right and privilege: it lies in the pre-eminent important authority to enforce their observance.

When the French Government ceded Louisiana it ceased to be the sovereign of the country, but it did not cease to hold property therein, since it reserved a right or privilege; for a privilege, acquired or reserved, is property as sacred as an annuity, as a rent charge, or any other.

France, therefore, claims only the enjoyment of what is her property. Giving her possession of this lawful right, far from rendering the sovereignty of the United States imperfect, would seem, in a measure, only to make it more complete, since it is certain that the right claimed by France is one of the essential conditions of the cession made by her of that sovereignty.

It may, perhaps, be answered that there is some difference between the contracts of nations with other nations and a sale made by one individual to another. I see very little, I confess, on the score of equity, the rules of interpretation being, in all cases, alike applicable to every human transaction.

By the law of nations it is an invariable rule that treaties or contracts, of whatsoever nature, should be understood according to the force and meaning of their expressions, and nothing, surely, can be more unconditional, or more clearly expressed, than the following clause:

"In future, and forever, after the expiration of the twelve years, French vessels shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports of the said Territory."

In future and forever, are expressions free from all ambiguity.

After the expiration of the twelve years: these words prove that the treatment or privilege secured by the eighth article is to follow, without condition or limitation of time, that of the seventh article.

French vessels shall be treated, does not mean may be treated, but that they shall undoubtedly and positively be treated upon the footing of the most favored nation.

And it makes no difference whether that treatment be the consequence of a gratuitous or of a conditional concession, the article has no restriction; it expressly states, French vessels shall be treated upon the footing of the favored nations. The consequence is, that French vessels are, without condition, to be treated in the ports of Louisiana upon the footing of the vessels of Great Britain, which is at this time the most favored nation.

I think I have proved, sir, that to demand an equivalent of France because England has given one would, in a measure, be requiring her to purchase what is already her own property, and obliging her to pay twice for the same thing.

I think I have also proved that the sovereignty of the United States is, and will still remain, entire and perfect, such as it was ceded by the treaty of 1803, although France be put into possession of that right which is secured to her in future and forever.

I could cite many examples of analogous privileges which never were considered as impairing the sovereignty of nations. But, it appears to me, that the best of all arguments that can be addressed to the equity and honest feelings of the American Government is, that France claims only her lawful due and right; that the title establishing it is worded in terms of such force and precision as must suffice to remove every doubt, and absolutely to solve the question. The claim which I have the honor to address to you, sir, being entirely dependent on the Executive authority, I cannot but hope I shall soon have to inform my court that the President has been pleased to issue such orders as will secure, in future, the execution of the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty, and the immediate reimbursement of the duties which have been unjustifiably levied to this day.

I have the honor to be, &c., &c.,

HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

Mr. De Neuville to the Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

WASHINGTON, March 29, 1819.

MR. SECRETARY OF STATE: The reclamations of the Chambers of Commerce, the repeated representations of the Minister of Marine, the just complaints of all the consular agents of his Majesty, in fine, the intolerable abuses which ensue from the present legislation of the States of the Union as to the desertion of foreign sailors, have induced my court to send me more positive orders than ever to make this state of things the object of strong and repeated remonstrances.

It is not to be doubted, sir, but that what passes daily in the United States must tend to nothing less than the entire exclusion of our navigation from their ports, if such abuse be not put a stop to.

But although the evil is great it may be remedied; and the amity and justice of the Federal Government assure me that it will eagerly adopt a remedy.

I shall not anew enter here, sir, into the recital of the disadvantages; they are too grievous not to be easily felt. I shall only repeat (which cannot be disputed) that the consuls of the United States enjoy in France all the rights of their office, and that their minister does not neglect carefully to demand them.

I know the institutions of the Union, and I accurately reckon upon the difficulties which they sometimes may oppose to the good will and even to the wish of the Executive.

Therefore, without discussing here the law of nations, or the principle of reciprocity, or other considerations, which are no less forcible in the United States than in Europe, I shall go, sir, straight to the point.

The abuse exists here, and does not exist in France. Here, as in France, they wish it remedied. In France, the laws and custom prevent its being practiced; here, the want of a law or political convention prevents its being equally repressed in all the States.

A law for that purpose was proposed to the last Congress. It was postponed. One of the principal causes of its postponement was, to know if the European States would offer a reciprocity to the United States.

The answer of my Government is, that it offers it, it guarantees it, and, to remove every difficulty, it is ready to conclude a convention upon this point.

I have the honor of acquainting you that I have received from my court sufficient authority as to this convention.

I therefore beg leave to request that you will be pleased to submit the preceding observations to the President as soon as possible. I have no doubt but that he, as well as you, sir, will appreciate the utility and the urgency of any measure repressive of a state of things as pernicious to the commerce as to the morality of nations.

Accept, Mr. Secretary of State, the renewed assurances of the high consideration with which I have the honor to be, &c.,

HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

Inclosure in M. De Neuville's letter of March 29, 1819.

[Translation.]

The convention should specify:

1. That the consuls and vice consuls should be enabled to procure the arrest of the captains, officers, mariners, sailors, and all other persons making part of the crews of vessels-of-war and of commerce of their respective nations, who may have deserted from said vessels.

2. The said consuls and vice consuls should be bound, in order to obtain the surrender, to prove that these men make a part of the above mentioned crews.

They should prove it by the exhibition of the register of said vessels, or rolls d'equipage.

The consuls or vice consuls should apply, for obtaining the surrender of deserters, to competent judges, and every aid and assistance should be given to them for arresting the above mentioned deserters, who should be carefully detained and guarded in the prisons of the country, at the expense of their Governments, till the consuls may find an opportunity of shipping them.

Nevertheless, a period should be fixed, after which the said detained deserter should be of right enlarged, and be afterwards free from arrest for the same cause.

The treatment which they should be allowed during their detention should be equally fixed, it being well understood that, in default of payment in advance, the deserter should be enlarged, and should enjoy the advantage above expressed.

Several formalities might be agreed upon as to the rolls d'equipage, which, without being troublesome to navigation and commerce, might become powerful and sufficient security for individual liberty.

What the Government of his Majesty desires is, that the abuse cease; but his Majesty wishes likewise that his subjects should be free, and that they should not, in any case, nor under any pretext, be oppressed. He wishes that the laws of his kingdom should be, in everything and every place, the protection of the weak against the strong; but to oblige a citizen to fulfil his contract is not, will never be, to oppress or to enslave. True liberty rests in all countries and under all Governments upon good faith, probity, and patriotism.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 31, 1819.

SIR: The proposal contained in your letter of the 29th instant of concluding a consular convention between the United States and France, for the purpose of stipulating the mutual restoration of seamen deserting from the armed or merchant vessels of either nation in the ports of the other, has been submitted to the President of the United States, by whose direction I have the honor of informing you that he thinks a partial arrangement of one particular subject of interest in the commercial relations between the two countries would be liable to inconvenience, and less satisfactory, than a general review of those relations with the view of coming to arrangements concerning them, which may be calculated to promote the interests of both, and to strengthen and perpetuate the friendship and good understanding subsisting between them.

Before your contemplated visit to France, I shall be happy to confer with you upon this subject, and of concerting with you some general preparatory ideas which that incident may furnish the means of maturing to the mutual satisfaction of both our Governments. In the meantime, it may contribute to the facility of removing, in another form, the inconvenience which you observe to be suffered by the French commerce in consequence of the desertion of seamen from French vessels in our ports, if you will have the goodness to direct that authentic statements of every particular case of that nature which may occur should be transmitted by your consuls to your legation, and through that to this Department.

I take this opportunity to acknowledge, also, the receipt of your note of the 20th instant, announcing your intention to avail yourself of a leave of absence from your sovereign to pay the visit to your country to which I have referred. I am directed by the President to assure you of the great satisfaction which he takes in bearing testimony to the propriety and friendliness of your conduct and deportment since you have resided here as the representative of France, and of his peculiar sensibility to the interest which, as the organ of your Government, you have taken in promoting a conciliatory adjustment of the long standing and complicated differences between the United States and Spain. The minister of the United States in France has been instructed to make known to your Government these sentiments of the President, to which I beg leave to add the assurance of my best wishes that your excursion may be prosperous and agreeable to you, and that at no distant day, if it suits your own views and those of your Government, we may again welcome your return to your station at this place.

I pray you, sir, to be assured of the sentiments of my very distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

MR. HYDE DE NEUVILLE,

MR. SECRETARY OF STATE: In your letter of the 31st March last, in answer to mine of the 29th, by which I had the honor of informing you that I was authorized by my court to sign a convention relative to deserting sailors, you did me the honor to tell me that the President was of opinion that a partial arrangement would present several inconveniences, and that it would be more beneficial to adjust, by a general convention, all the points which could affect the commercial interests of the two countries. His Majesty the King, my master, will always receive with extreme pleasure all communications which may tend more and more to cement the harmony which happily subsists between the two nations and as no one has it more in his power than you, sir, to point out whatever may be useful or advisable for the best interest of the people of both nations, I presume to request that you will have the goodness, before my departure, which cannot fail to be soon, to communicate to me all your ideas. Here, sir, you have mine as to the consular convention. This communication, on my part, has and can have nothing official. It is a simple sketch which I thought fit to lay before you, and I shall be led to believe that my observations may be of some utility, if they shall receive, in whole or in part, your approbation.

It will afford me pleasure to be able, before leaving Washington, to lay with you, sir, the principal bases of the indissoluble union of our two countries; and, I confess, it would be with great alacrity that I would receive, on returning to the United States, the honor of a concurrence in consolidating them.

Accept, Mr. Secretary of State, the renewed assurances of my high consideration.

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE,

Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of H. M. C. M. to the United States.

Mr. De Neuville's observations on the Consular Convention of —

[Translation.]

ARTICLE I. In general, the expressions of exequatur are a great deal too vague. A convention may and ought to be precise, and the attributes of the treaty which may follow ought to be expressed in a manner the most clear; but ought not these attributes to be equally defined when there exists no consular convention?

For example, what does the Executive mean by these words?

"I do therefore recognize him, and declare him free to exercise and enjoy such functions, powers, and privileges as are allowed to the consuls of all friendly powers between whom and the United States there is no particular agreement for the regulation of the consular functions."

What is the real status rerum?

Does it rest upon the most equitable principle of the law of nations, reciprocity, or upon the common law, the usage of each State or of each place, or, in fine, is it left to the more or less arbitrary interpretation of the municipal authorities?

It will be perceived how important it would be, especially to the United States, that the status rerum be well defined. His Majesty's consuls are really thereby impeded in every step of the exercise of their functions. They are ignorant how far they can go, and, to speak the truth, having only to content themselves with the kindness of the local authorities as to what can regard them personally, they very generally receive from them only refusals, in the circumstances which most interest our commerce and our navigation. And yet their just remonstrances rest always upon the principle of reciprocity.

What, then, are the real privileges "of all friendly powers with whom there is no particular agreement for the regulation of the consular functions?"

The exequatur ought, perhaps, to mention the consular district, in order to avoid all mistakes.

ARTICLE 2. Although the immunities of consular agents cannot be so extended as those of diplomatic agents, it would be, perhaps, useful to the two countries for avoiding certain incidents which might, without the knowledge and contrary to the will of the Executive power, produce real difficulties, or, at least, cause some slight suspicions to arise, which it is prudent in two friendly nations to prevent, it might, I say, be perhaps useful, that the privileges of consuls should be a little less restricted. For example, would it not be advisable that the immunity which they enjoy for their chanceries and their papers were extended to their persons, and that they should be independent of the criminal justice of the place where they reside, atrocious crimes excepted.

Would it not be equally wise, that in all cases where they may be subjected to the laws of the country as inhabitants, no action should be commenced against them but with the approbation of the Executive, who should not fail to inform the minister of the friendly power, and to concert with him the proper means of averting judiciary processes, without offending against justice? It will be perceived how this amicable method would be advantageous, and the abuses which it could produce do not appear many.

Could not the exemption also be extended to all duties on those objects or articles which the consular agents may import for their own use, as well as upon those which they bring with them to the country? This favor, thus limited, would not, I believe, present any inconvenience, and might add to the consideration of the consular agents in the place of their residence, which enters essentially into the interest of the two nations.

In place of "they shall place upon the outer door," &c., it would appear better to say: "They shall have the right of placing," &c.

It may be added to the preceding reflections that foreign consuls enjoy in France personal immunity in the extent above mentioned. The regulations of his Majesty say: "They shall enjoy personal immunity except in the case of atrocious crime, and without prejudice to the actions which may be commenced against them for an act of commerce."

ARTICLE 3. The word merchants (negocians) ought to be suppressed. The consuls and vice consuls of his Majesty are not authorized to engage in commerce; it appears, therefore, advisable to leave them free to choose their agents without distinction amongst the merchants and other individuals, national or foreign.

The article may be terminated thus: They shall confine themselves, respectively, to render to their respective national and commercial navigators and vessels all possible services, and to inform the consul or vice consul of their district, or, in case of urgency, any other agent of his Majesty nearer to them, of the wants of said national commercial navigators and vessels. The said agents shall have it in their power, also, if they are specially authorized by their commission, to terminate all differences, process, and discussions between those of their nation, and that, conformably to the 12th article of the present convention, without their being authorized otherwise to participate in the immunities and privileges granted to consuls and vice consuls, and without their having authority, upon any pretext whatever, to exact other duties than those which shall be received in the chanceries of the nation.

The motives which induce the proposal of granting, in case of need, to the agents of the consuls the privileges mentioned in the 12th article will be shown hereafter, (see article 12.)

ARTICLES 4 and 5. (After the words to pass, it is proposed to add and to deposit.)

This observation is so much more useful, as the consuls of France are not authorized to receive testaments but only to be depositaries of holograph wills.

(At the words "they shall proceed in it with the assistance," &c.)

It would be for the interest of the two nations that this right of the consuls should be extended to inventories of such of their fellow-citizens who, being naturalized in the country, should be found, like the first, to have neither testamentary executors, nor trustees or legitimate heirs upon the spot.

However, as this regulation might appear and be in fact an infringement of the rights of a citizen, defined and secured by the constitutional law of each State, it will be limited to a proposed addition to this article:

"That, in case of the decease of a naturalized Frenchman or American, and dying intestate, without heirs, or whose heirs are not all upon the spot, the authority which shall be competent to grant letters of administration shall be bound to inform the nearest consul of the nation by sending him a copy of all the deeds, titles, and papers, necessary to show the nature and value of the inheritance. It might even be stipulated, I believe, that in cases where all the heirs should be found foreigners, the administration of the estate should be granted to the consul unless where there was a real impediment, such as his distance, &c. The Federal Government can have no difficulty in granting the right of administration to consular agents on the estates of those of their nation, since the law of Congress of the 14th April, 1792, gives it to American consuls, if the power where they reside is willing to admit them to it.

This question of inheritance is so much more important, as in some States, such as that of Georgia, foreigners find themselves subjected even to the law of escheat, (droit d'aubaine.) The law of that State places in the hand of a trustee vacant estates, the property of deceased Frenchmen, without permitting any Frenchman having the right of succession, be it the known heir or creditor, to be capable of becoming administrator by giving security, which takes place among those of their nation. The consul has not the right of taking cognizance of the inheritance, nor of interfering, even for the purposes of preservation. It is only to the State that the executor named owes an account of his administration.

Civilization has demonstrated how far this law (right) of escheat (droit d'aubaine) which allows a foreigner to live free, but die a slave, is contrary to the principles of amity and of justice which ought to animate all nations. This scandalous abuse has been entirely removed by the French Legislature. It is to be hoped that it will be so in all nations. The knowledge and liberality of the American people will be a guaranty that, among them at least, it will be easily abolished, if it yet exist in any of the States. This right is so generally regarded as a monstrous exaction, which, in many countries where it still exists in principle, has nevertheless ceased to be exercised; I know not if I am mistaken, but I believe that it is thus in all the States of the Union.

ARTICLE 6. The law of Congress above cited confers upon American consuls the rights mentioned in this article; and they may enjoy it fully in France.

ARTICLE 7. This article cannot, I believe, cause the least objection; the observation annexed to the preceding article being applicable to this.

ARTICLE 8. (At the end.) It will be a matter of absolute necessity that it be inserted in the 8th or in the 9th article, or that this clause be made an additional article, that—

The sailors making part of the crews of their respective nations shall not be in any case, nor upon any pretext, arrested for debt.

The abuse which may take and has taken place, of withholding deserters and even criminals from justice by this means, shows the utility and even the high importance of this addition. It is not long since a wretch wished to use in one of the ports of the Union this method for saving a being of his species who had become guilty of crime, not only of insubordination, but of insurrection, on board a French vessel. And, truly, he would have completely succeeded if the judge of the place, indignant, and even shocked at the audacious effrontery of the pretended creditor, had not taken upon him to accept security for the debt, which afterwards, upon trial, was declared a fraud, and to deliver the guilty to the consul, who had it in his power to send him to France.

ARTICLE 9. (After roll d'equipage.) The registers or roll d'equipage ought always to follow the vessel; it is therefore proposed to add, in order to render the measure truly useful, (the deserters not having been seized before the departure of the vessel,) these words: or upon a copy of said register or roll d'equipage, certified by the consul.

Could not this part of the article, in order to reconcile at the same time justice, humanity, and the interest of navigation, be thus expressed?

But if they should not be sent back in the course of five months, reckoned from the day of their arrest, they shall be set at liberty, and shall not be liable to a second arrest for the same cause. This detention shall not exceed two months, if a vessel of their nation is going directly back from the port where they are found to be detained, except that from the physician of the prison it appear that they cannot be embarked on account of sickness.

It may further be added, that liberation shall equally take place in full right, in case the prisoner shall not receive very exactly the treatment allowed during his detention, and which may be agreed upon, that nothing may be left in the power of despotism.

In fine, the article should be so expressed as to insure protection to the weak against the strong. It is and ought to be the wish of every country, that every man, rich or poor, scrupulously fulfil his contract, when he has agreed to it freely, and when it is for the interest of society that he do so.

ARTICLE 10. A foreigner (especially a poor one) is more exposed than all others to suspicion and to calumny. Too much cannot, therefore, be done to insure to him protection and support in misfortune. The article, too, does not seem to be expressed as it ought to be: as long as a man is only amenable, there can be nothing against him but presumption. It ought not, therefore, to be said: In the case where the respective subjects or citizens shall have committed; but, shall be accused or arraigned; this remark will perhaps appear finical, the word amenable (justiciable) expressing sufficiently what is intended. But still it is better to express clearly what one wishes to say, especially when the liberty and the reputation of the citizens are in question.

It is proposed to terminate the article thus: They shall be amenable to the judges of the country, who shall, however, give notice of the suits to the consul or vice consul of the district, in order that he may appear personally, or by his attorney, if he judge it proper, as the protector or defender of the accused, &c., &c.

One of the first duties of consular agents is to defend those of their nation before foreign authorities, when either natural justice or treaties are violated in their regard; when either the dispositions, or the forms established by the law of the country, are deviated from to their detriment, in the case where they are subjected to this law; it is, in fine, their duty to protect and defend them, whenever they are or may become the victims of calumny or of error. It will therefore be supposed that it is useful, and even indispensable, that no criminal procedure should be pursued against them, unless the agent of their nation be at least informed of it. Foreigners, especially poor foreigners, ought always to be considered, in the eye of the law, as minors; the consul as their father; he ought, therefore, to be called to their aid, as being in some sort their official tutor.

ARTICLE 11. It is proposed to add to the 11th article:

The some interference shall take place, as often as an intimation ought to be made, on board the said vessels, and that for any cause whatever.

This addition appears necessary, the authority of the place being able to go, in the case of a surrender on board of a foreign vessel, for other causes than those mentioned in the opposite article. For, avoiding all refusals or difficulties on the part of captains or commanders, it might even be added, that, if the consul or vice consul judge that he ought not to go on board, he shall be bound immediately to give his declaration about it to the bearer of the order of the territorial judges, in order that this agent of the King may not be able, on any pretext, to plead ignorance.

A good many troublesome examples sufficiently prove the utility of this last precaution. The harmony between two powers ought not to be allowed to depend upon the humor or vulgarity of a captain, who, under the pretext of not knowing the soldiers, the constables, or the marshals, goes sometimes so far as to give himself up to fits of passion, which may become, between two Governments, serious subjects of discussion. To prevent, in order not to punish, ought to be the first care of all heads of families.

ARTICLE 12. Every convention, in order to be truly useful, ought to be easy, and, above all, susceptible of execution.

Now, it cannot be dissembled that the distances, especially in the United States, do not permit that the disputes and suits between those of the same nation there should all be terminated by the consuls or vice consuls. How, for example, could it be required that the French settled in Ohio or in the State of Illinois should be bound to present themselves before the consul of Philadelphia, and that the inhabitants of Tennessee should go to Charleston. Yet the bad faith of a Frenchman established in these countries might make him oppose to his fellow-countryman the article of the convention, and authorize him to refuse to appear otherwise than before the consul of the district. This consideration alone will make it perceivable how useful it is to grant to the agents of consuls and vice consuls the right demanded for them in the third article. This agent would be, in some sort, wherever there might be a certain number of French families established, a justice of the peace, or a conciliator. His Majesty's minister should be careful that no one be chosen in an inconsiderate manner, and the consequence of this latitude granted to the consular administration would be, that no part of those of his nation would find themselves abandoned and precluded from rights which might be secured to them by the convention. It ought not to be dissembled, that foreigners who possess nationality, who know that the eye and the benevolence of an esteemed fellow-countryman watches over them, are possessed of the more self-respect. They do not think themselves lost in the crowd; they conduct themselves with more prudence; and if they fall into misfortune, or if death is ready to inflict the mortal wound, they at least find near them a protector, a defender, a man who speaks their language, and who will convey their last words and last wishes to their families.

In order to render the article truly advantageous, and to prevent the benefit which is real to those of their nation who live near the consuls, from having, as to the others, the effect, in some sort, of a denial of justice, it should be provided—

1st. That the same facilities be granted, as explained in article 3, to the agents of consuls and vice consuls.

2d. That the distance of the consul or of his agent from those of his nation be determined, and that to the extent of that distance those of his nation be bound to present themselves before the territorial judges with all their suits and disputes; or, in case of the refusal of one of the parties, that party be obliged previously to give security, before the competent authority of the place, for all the costs and damages which the removal and the distance alone may occasion; and, as, in the two countries, a good many contracts, not only commercial, but of every other nature, between foreigners, may be attached to interests purely local, it might be enacted, that, in all cases and in every place, the parties should have the power, notwithstanding the twelfth article of the convention, to carry, by common consent, all the disputes in which they may find themselves interested before the territorial judges, who should not refuse to take cognizance of them.

It cannot be dissembled that the principle, generally enough acknowledged, actor sequitur forum rei, can only be productive, especially when persons beyond seas are in question, of grievous inconveniences. But it will be evident that the exceptions proposed, and which are found to be chiefly necessary between two nations very distant, and both sincerely friends, ought to be clearly explained; otherwise it would happen that, in spite of being bound by the letter of the convention, every territorial officer would refuse, in both countries, to take cognizance of an affair which might appear to be essentially the business of the consul. Both Governments are interested, that their respective citizens may be, everywhere, under the protection of a justice easy to be obtained.

ARTICLE 13. The Congress having determined by law in what manner commercial affairs between foreigners and citizens of the United States shall be determined, it is proposed to word the article thus:

ARTICLE 13. The subjects of his Majesty settled in the United States and the citizens of the United States settled in France shall be judged reciprocally for all the commercial disputes which may arise upon the spot between them and the inhabitants of the country or the citizens of another country residing there, by the tribunals instituted or appointed ad hoc, and according to the particular forms ordained by the law of the country. Solely, and with a view to facilitate as much as possible the commercial transactions between the two nations, and to prevent the delays often very pernicious to the interests of the foreigner, the two Governments agree that all commercial affairs between the trading citizens of France and those of the United States, and vice versa, shall be always taken up in preference to those of ordinary plaintiffs in courts of justice or tribunals of commerce of the two countries.

No one is ignorant with what celerity the affairs of commerce are terminated in France. No one is ignorant how very prejudicial a delay may be to a foreigner, whom important affairs may call elsewhere, and who is, notwithstanding, detained by the idea that he will leave behind him, if he go to a distance, only lawyers, who, according to the candid expression of one of our great and ancient jurists, know, in every country, only to extend their practice and spin out the cause. One may be persuaded, therefore, after this consideration, that the advantage proposed in favor of the foreigner is very wise and very liberal. After all, the more foreign industry is protected in a country, the more it is extended, and the more are the ties which unite the two nations strengthened.

ARTICLE 14. For avoiding all discussion, and all abuse, it is not believed that this article should be so general. A stranger ought actually to be exempt from all personal service. At all times when the ordinary duties of a citizen are to be performed, he ought to be exempt from those to which the municipal law of all countries compel those of their nation; but there are obligations which hospitality imposes in all places, and it is not always sufficient. As I have been eager to agree, by letter of the 2d January, 1818, to the Secretary of State, for a stranger to live submissive to the law which protects him, he ought, on certain occasions, provided for by the general law of nations, to partake of the danger to which the citizens of the place where he lives may find themselves exposed.

"From a sense of gratitude for the protection granted him, and the other advantages he enjoys, the stranger ought not to confine himself to the respect due to the laws of the country; he ought to assist it upon occasion, and to contribute to its defence, &c., &c., &c. Nothing hinders his defending it against pirates or robbers; against the ravages of an inundation or the devastation of fire. Can he pretend to live under the protection of a State, and to participate in a multitude of advantages, without doing anything for its defence, and to be a tranquil spectator of the dangers to which the citizens are exposed?"

On this principle, which I admit as essentially moral, and as entering into the order of human societies, I will go so far as to avow, that if a stranger settled, or a proprietor, on the frontiers of the United States, has the right of retiring in an offensive or defensive war against the Indians, he cannot argue this privilege, if, without any declaration of war, some hordes of savages make an irruption into the country, this attack is only a wilful murder; and, in similar circumstances, every man is, and ought to be, a citizen. I should not then be far from thinking that it would be advisable even in granting to a stranger the rights which he ought to enjoy, to prevent, by a very explicit provision, all the shameful comments of selfishness. Good conventions between nations, as between individuals, are those which are founded, not upon general speculative ideas, but upon all local circumstances and necessities, as well as upon the possibilities from which they may be derived. I will add, that many examples, in time past, concur in demonstrating the utility of the preceding observations. Not to put them in execution would be perhaps for the advantage of the cause which I ought to defend; but no treaty is or can be solid, except it rest upon equity, conciliate all interests, foresee and prevent all difficulties.

ARTICLE 15. (After the words, "in the terms stipulated.")

In the terms stipulated, &c., &c. This end of the article to be suppressed, as being now useless.

ARTICLE 16. This period appears proper and sufficient. Nothing will hinder it from being supplied by additional articles; what may be judged necessary, and for the interest of the two countries, during the time of the convention.

NOTE.—Complaints appear to have been made (at least by the American consul at Havre) that the entry of vessels which arrive from the United States in our ports cannot be made but by the intervention of brokers. It has been demanded that the consuls of the nation should enjoy, jointly with the brokers of the port, this advantage. I know that the American consul does enjoy it. I see by the newspapers that they complain of having been a little after deprived of it; and I also see that, in consequence of the letter of the Minister of the Interior, which put a stop to the privilege, there has been held in Havre itself “a meeting of the masters of vessels, and that such meeting resulted in the adoption of a letter to Mr. Beasley, the American consul, remonstrating, in strong and dignified terms, against the unjust regulation.”

Without examining here the irregularity of this kind of representations, which ought only to come through the ordinary channel of diplomatic agents; and without attending to the noise which the consul of the United States at Havre already has made, or been the means of making, at several times, through the medium of newspapers, I shall observe, that the letter of the Minister of the Interior says, “if foreign consuls should consider themselves injured by this regulation, it must become the subject of diplomatic arrangement.” I think, therefore, that the difficulty which presents itself may be easily removed, if the American Government thinks it still of consequence to secure this privilege to their consular agents.

As to the duties of tonnage and of light-houses, it has been pretended, and very improperly, that they were higher in France than in the United States; it is quite contrary, and in that regard His Majesty's Government would be justified, I believe, in making some representations; but this question is unconnected with the subject of which I treat, I therefore do not wish to stop for it.

These observations are my own. I am only authorized by my court to sign a convention relative to deserting sailors; but if it should appear that all the bases, which I have only pointed out, ought to be agreed to, as I am persuaded that a similar convention could not but be advantageous to the two countries, and produce other arrangements no less useful, I shall make it my duty to insist with my court, as soon as I shall have obtained, confidentially or officially, some data a little more certain as to the dispositions of the Federal Government.

In submitting these observations to the Secretary of State, I seize this opportunity of requesting him to accept the renewed assurances of my high consideration.

MR. SECRETARY OF STATE: I have the honor to address to you a copy of the powers with which the King my master has been pleased to honor me. From what you have done me the honor to tell me, I presume that those of the President will be very soon drawn up; I shall, therefore, be ready, sir, to enter upon a conference on the day and at the hour which you shall think proper to point out.

You are not ignorant, sir, of the amicable views which have induced his Majesty the King my master to transfer the negotiation to Washington. He was of opinion that it would be the means of accelerating the conclusion of the affair, and, in that regard, the opinion of the minister of the United States has been in accordance with that of his Majesty.

I dare hope, sir, that it will be easy for us, when all the indispensable explanations have been given and received, to obviate the difficulties which may have arisen between our two countries. No real cause of collision exists between them; but I perceive several of perfect and lasting harmony. I cannot, therefore, doubt of the happy result of a negotiation which can only have a tendency to conciliate mutual interests, and put a speedy termination to a state of affairs equally pernicious to the two nations.

I request you to accept, sir, of the renewed assurances of the high consideration with which I have the honor to be your most humble and obedient servant,

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

Louis, by the grace of God, King of France and of Navarre, to all who shall see these present letters—health. Desirous to fix and regulate, in a manner respectively advantageous, the relations of commerce and navigation between France and the United States, for these causes we, having entire confidence in the capacity, prudence, and experience of our very dear and well beloved the Sieur Baron Hyde de Neuville, Knight of our Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, Officer of the Legion of Honor, Grand Cross of the Royal Order of Isabella the Catholic, and our Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington, have named and appointed him, and by these presents signed with our hand, we name and appoint him our plenipotentiary, giving him full and absolute power, that, by uniting himself with the plenipotentiary or plenipotentiaries of the United States, equally furnished with full powers in proper form, he may negotiate, conclude, and sign in our name, with the same authority as we ourselves would or could do, such articles, conventions, and other acts, as he may judge fit for attaining the important end which we propose. Promising, on the faith and word of a King, to agree to, accomplish, and execute punctually, all that our said plenipotentiary shall have stipulated, promised, and signed in our name, and in virtue of these present full powers, without ever contravening, or permitting it to be contravened, directly or indirectly, for any cause or under any pretext whatsoever ; likewise, to give our letters of ratification in proper form, and to have them delivered, for exchange, within the periods which shall be agreed upon. In faith whereof, we have caused our seal to be put to these presents. Given at the Palace of the Tuilleries the twentieth day of the month of October, in the year of grace one thousand eight hundred and twenty, and in the twenty-sixth of our reign.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 19, 1821.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of this day, with the copy of your full power. In inclosing to you a copy of that by which I am authorized to treat with you concerning the commercial relations between the United States and France, I add with pleasure the assurance of the President's earnest desire that this negotiation may terminate in the settlement of those relations upon a basis of entire reciprocity, satisfactory to both parties, and promotive of the most cordial harmony between them. It will give me pleasure to confer with you at 3 o'clock to-morrow, at the office of this Department.

I pray you, sir, to accept the tender of my most distinguished consideration.
JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.
His Excellency the Baron HYDE DE NEUVILLE,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from France.

Inclosure in Mr. Adams' letter of February 19, 1821.

JAMES MONROE, President of the United States of America, to all whom these presents shall concern, greeting:

Know ye that I have given and granted, and do hereby give and grant, to John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State of the United States, full power and authority, and also general and special command, to meet and confer with the Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of his most Christian Majesty the King of France and Navarre, residing in the United States, being furnished with the like full powers, of and concerning all matters relating to the commerce and navigation between the said United States and France, and to conclude a treaty or convention, touching the premises, for the final ratification of the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, if such advice and consent be given.

[L. s.] In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the 19th day of February, A. D. 1821, and of the Independence of the United States the forty-fifth.

WASHINGTON, February 23, 1821.

SIR: As I am solicitous to accelerate, as much as possible, the progress of the negotiation, I now take the liberty to request an answer to the letter which I had the honor of addressing to your Government on the 16th of June, 1818, relative to the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty.

Should the Federal Government admit the interpretation given to this article, on the part of France, it would be unnecessary to discuss the subject any further ; but if, after thorough investigation, it should still adhere to a contrary opinion, you will think with me, sir, that it is material to both parties to know how far they disagree on this very important article of the treaty.

Both Governments having the same honest intentions, every point in dispute between them ought to be easily and promptly settled.

What, I would ask, sir, even in its most limited sense, is the right secured to France by the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty, and in what cases is our navigation to obtain its enjoyment?

It would appear to me that the negotiators, on either part, had but one and the same object in inserting the 7th and 8th articles ; their express intention was, to secure forever to French vessels, in the ports of the ceded territory, a real advantage over those of all other nations ; and, in my opinion, the very expressions of the article established, in the most positive terms, that intention of the negotiators.

There are two other affairs which must, of necessity, be settled before those which only affect our commercial interests. I shall, however, refrain from discussing, or even examining, them at present, and consider that in this I am giving an additional proof of my conciliatory disposition.

It is possible they may not be of as serious a nature as they seem (from newspaper reports) to have been considered in France; or, at all events, I persist in the opinion that nothing can prevent an accommodation when the respective parties are prepared to make such concessions as their mutual interest and friendly dispositions may require, and are willing to satisfy every consideration of propriety.

Accept, &c., &c.,

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

The SECRETARY OF STATE.

The Secretary of State to Baron de Neuville.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 29, 1821.

SIR: By the seventh article of the treaty of April 30, 1803, by which Louisiana was ceded to the United States, certain special privileges, within the ports of the ceded territory, were stipulated in favor of the ships of France and Spain for the term of twelve years, and, by the eighth article of the same treaty, it is further provided that, "in future, and forever, after the expiration of the twelve years, the ships of France shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports above mentioned."

In your note of the 15th of December, 1817, you demanded, upon the allegation of this article, that the advantages conceded to the English nation, in all the ports of the Union, should be secured to France in those of Louisiana. The citation of the words of the article would, of itself, be an answer to the claim. The stipulation of the eighth article is, in its terms, limited to grants of favors in the ports of Louisiana. The seventh article had secured to French and Spanish vessels in those ports peculiar privileges, to the exclusion of the vessels of other nations; and the object of the eighth article was evidently to provide that, after the expiration of those twelve years, no such peculiar privileges should be granted, in the same ports, to the vessels of any other nation, to the exclusion of those of France. The whole scope of both the articles is, by their letter and spirit, limited to special favors and privileges granted in those particular ports.

The claim of France, therefore, is not, and cannot be, by any construction of the 8th article, to enjoy, in the ports of Louisiana, the advantages conceded to any other nation, in all the ports of the Union, but only that the ships of France should be entitled to the special advantages conceded to the ships of other nations in the ports of Louisiana.

Were it then even true that the English, or any other nation, enjoyed, by virtue of general stipulations of treaties, advantages in all the ports of this Union over other nations, inasmuch they would not be favors specially limited to the ports of Louisiana, granted with any special reference to them, they would, neither by the letter nor the spirit of the Louisiana treaty, give to France any just claim to the special participation, in those particular ports, of advantages there enjoyed only by general arrangements co-extensive with the whole Union.

But in the answer from this Department, of December 23, 1817, to the note of Mr. De Neuville, of the 15th of that month, it was averred, and is now repeated, that the ships of France are, and, since the expiration of the twelve years stipulated by the seventh article of the treaty, uniformly have been, treated upon the footing of the most favored nation in the ports of Louisiana. That they will continue to be so, France may be assured, not only from that sacred regard for the obligation of treaties, which is the undeviating principle of the American government, but from a maxim founded in that justice which is at once the highest glory and the soundest policy of nations—that every favor granted to one, ought equally to be extended to all.

It is no exception, but an exemplification of this principle, that the vessels of England, Prussia, the Netherlands, and the Hanseatic cities, pay in the ports of this Union, including those of Louisiana, no other or higher duties than the vessels of the United States. This is not a favor, but a bargain. It was offered to all nations by an act of Congress of March 3, 1815. Its only condition was reciprocity. It was always, and yet is, in the power of France to secure this advantage to her vessels. It always depended upon her will alone to abolish every discriminating duty operating against her ships in the United States. Great Britain, Prussia, the Netherlands, the Hanseatic cities, accepted the proffer and granted the equivalent. Had France seen fit also to accept it, the American Government would have hailed the acceptance, not as a favor, but as equal justice. They were far from anticipating that, instead of this, France would found, upon equal reciprocity, offered to all mankind, a claim to special privileges never granted to any. Special, indeed, would be the favor which should yield to a claim of free gift to one, of that which had been sold at a fair price to another. English vessels, therefore, enjoy, in the ports of Louisiana, no favors which are not equally enjoyed by the vessels of France; nor do they enjoy any reduction of duties which French vessels might not, at the option of their own Government, have enjoyed at any time since the 3d of March, 1815. That France did not think proper to accept the offer, is not mentioned with a view to reproach. France consulted what she thought her own interest, and instead of reciprocity, aggravated discriminating duties to prohibition. She exercised her rights. But if, in levying those prohibitory duties, there was no disfavor to the United States, surely as little can it be alleged that the extension of reciprocal advantages to all is a grant to any one of a favor.

It is observed in the reply of Mr. De Neuville, dated the 18th of June, 1818, to the letter from this Department of the 23d of December preceding, that France, by claiming forever, in the ports of Louisiana, the full enjoyment of every advantage enjoyed by any other nation in all the ports of the Union, as the price of equivalent advantages secured to the United States, still claims nothing gratuitous, inasmuch as the equivalent for this special advantage to France was already paid in the cession of Louisiana itself. This idea is not only contradicted by the whole tenor of the Louisiana treaty, and by the special and obvious purport of the seventh and eighth articles, but I hesitate not to aver, that if the American Government had believed those articles to be susceptible of such a construction, and had those articles alone been presented to them as the whole price for the cession of Louisiana, they never would have accepted it upon such terms; for such terms would not only have destroyed the effect of the cession of the province in full sovereignty; they would not only have been in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States, but they would have been a surrender of one of the highest attributes of the sovereignty of this whole nation; they would have disabled this nation forever from contracting with any power on earth but France for any advantage in navigation, however great, and however amply compensated; it would have been little short of a stipulation never to conclude a commercial treaty with any other nation than France; for what else are commercial treaties than the mutual concession of advantages for equivalents? And if every advantage obtained from others for equivalents were, by a retrospective obligation of this article, to be secured, as already paid for by France, they would have been secured to her, not only in the ports of Louisiana, but in those of the whole Union; such a treaty, far from being an acquisition of the full sovereignty of Louisiana, would have been, on the part of the United States, a formal abdication of their own.

From the obvious purport of the seventh and eighth articles, it is apparent that neither of them was considered in any respect as forming a part of the equivalent for the cession of Louisiana. The cession of Louisiana, and the equivalents paid for it, were not even included in the same treaty; the cession was in one treaty, and the equivalents in two separate conventions of the same date. The seventh and eighth articles referred to are in the treaty of cession, and not in the conventions of equivalents. The three instruments are, indeed, explicitly declared to be parts of one and the same transaction; but the very form of the arrangements adopted by the parties shows their common intention to regulate the cession by one compact, and the equivalent given for it by others.

Nor is the proof that these articles formed no part in the estimation of either of the parties of the equivalents for the cession confined to this tacit evidence in the forms of the negotiation. The seventh article bears upon its face the avowal of the motives by which it was dictated. Its introductory words, "as it is reciprocally advantageous to the commerce of France and the United States to encourage the communication of both nations, for a limited time, in the country ceded by the present treaty, until general arrangements relative to the commerce of both nations may be agreed on." This is the motive specially assigned, by the article itself, for its subsequent stipulations; the reciprocal advantage to the commerce of France and the United States was the end; the encouragement of their communications, for a limited time, in the country ceded were the means; and the eighth article, following as a corollary from the seventh, merely stipulated that, after the twelve years of special and exclusive privilege, the ships of France should be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations. In neither of the articles can a single word be found importing that they were understood by either party as forming any portion of the equivalent for the cession.

In the note of Mr. Hyde de Neuville, of the 16th of June, 1818, this claim of France to enjoy, for nothing and forever, in the ports of Louisiana, every advantage which the United States may concede, for a full equivalent to any other nation, in all the ports of the Union, is supported by a supposed peculiarity in the phraseology of the article by virtue of which it is claimed. To support this pretension, it is asserted that "in all the treaties between France and the United States the condition of reciprocity is mentioned in the most formal manner; that they all expressly say that the two contracting parties shall reciprocally enjoy the favor granted to another nation, gratuitously, if the concession is gratuitous, or by granting the same compensation if the concession is conditional."

The mutual stipulation of being treated as the most favored nation is not, in all the treaties between France and the United States, accompanied by the express declaration that the favor granted to a third party shall be extended to France or the United States gratuitously if the grant is gratuitous, and upon granting the same compensation if it be conditional. This explanatory clause is expressed in terms only in one treaty between the United States and France, and that was the first treaty ever contracted between them, namely: the treaty of amity and commerce of February 6, 1778, in its second article. It has never been repeated in any of the subsequent treaties between the parties. It was alluded to, adopted and applied to consular pre-eminences, powers, authority, and privileges, by the 15th article of the consular convention of 14th November, 1788. But in vain will any such clause be sought for in the convention of 30th September, 1800, the words of the 6th article of which are as follows: "commerce between the parties shall be free; the vessels of the two nations, and their privateers, as well as their prizes, shall be treated in their respective ports as those of the nation the most favored; and, in general, the two parties shall enjoy, in the ports of each other, in regard to commerce and navigation, the privileges of the most favored nations." There is not a word in this article, nor in the whole convention, saying that these favors shall be enjoyed freely, if freely granted to others, or upon granting the same condition, if conditionally granted; yet who can doubt that this was implied in the article, though not expressed?

The fact, then, with regard to this argument, being directly the reverse of the statement in the note of Mr. de Neuville, of June 16, 1818, it cannot escape his attention how forcibly the argument recoils itself. If, from the uniform use of the explanatory clause in all the preceding treaties, stated in the note as a fact, its omission in the Louisiana treaty could have warranted the inference that no such qualification was intended by it, with much stronger reason may it be concluded that, as the parties had before repeatedly contracted the same engagements, at one time with, and at another time without, the explanatory clause, but always intending the same thing, this variety in the modes of expression was considered by them as altogether immaterial, and that, whether expressed or not, no claims to a favor enjoyed by others could justly be advanced by virtue of any such stipulation without granting the same equivalent with which the advantage had been purchased.

There is, therefore, no necessity for supposing any forgetfulness on the part of the negotiators of the treaty of cession, nor of recurring to any supposed distinctions between the construction applicable to a convention of commerce and to a treaty of sale. It has been proved that neither the 7th nor 8th article was ever understood by either party as forming any part of the equivalent for the cession. That the reciprocity of the 7th article is expressed upon its face, and that the 8th, as a consequence from it, only stipulated that after the period of special privilege, in those special ports, should have expired, no such privilege in those particular ports should be granted to other nations without being made common to the vessels of France. If it be admitted that, in a contract of sale, nothing can be understood by implication, (sous entendu,) this principle would be no less fatal to the claim of France than every other admissible reason; for what implication could be more violent and unnatural than, by a stipulation to treat the ships of France on the footing of those of the most favored nation in the ports of Louisiana, the United States had disabled themselves forever from purchasing a commercial advantage from any other nation without granting it particularly to France?

That the Senate, in 1803, did not formally object to the stipulations of these seventh and eighth articles must be ascribed to its never having entered into the imagination or conception of that body that such a claim as that now attempted to be raised from it by France was either expressed in or to be implied from them. Whether the special privileges granted for twelve years to the ships of France and Spain in those ports were compatible with the Constitution of the United States, or with the other article of the treaty by which the inhabitants of the ceded territory were to be incorporated into the Union, and admitted, according to the principles of that Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, might be and was a question to the Senate in deliberating upon the treaty. It was a question of construction upon a clause of the Constitution, and that construction prevailed with which the terms of the treaty were reconcilable to it and to themselves; but whether the claim now advanced by France is reconcilable with the Constitution of the United States is no question of construction or of implication. It is directly repugnant to the express provision that the regulations of commerce and revenue in the ports of all the States of the Union shall be the same.

The admission of the State of Louisiana, in the year 1812, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, does not impair the force of this reasoning; although the admission of French and Spanish vessels into their ports for a short remnant of time upon different regulations of commerce and revenue from those prescribed in the ports of all the other States in the Union, gave them a preference not sanctioned by the Constitution, and upon which the other States might, had they thought fit, have delayed the act of admission until the expiration of the twelve years; yet as this was a condition of which the other States might waive the benefit for the sake of admitting Louisiana, sooner even than rigorous obligation would have required, to the full enjoyment of all the rights of American citizens, this consent of the only interested party to anticipate the maturity of the adopted child of the Union can be considered in no other light than a friendly grant in advance of that which, in the lapse of three short years, might have been claimed as of undeniable right.

The Government of the United States have fulfilled, and will fulfil, the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty, according to its plain and obvious meaning. The ships of France are and will be treated in the ports of Louisiana on the footing of the most favored nation. The ships of no nation enjoy any special favor in the ports of Louisiana. The ships of all nations are, in the ports of Louisiana, on the same footing as in the ports of all the other States of the Union. The ships of all nations, in all the ports of the Union, enjoy the same advantages which the nation to which they belong concedes to the vessels of the United States in return. The favor, and the only favor they enjoy, is reciprocity. That favor the American Government extend to French vessels, and ask no better of France than to accept. But the American Government cannot grant as a gratuitous favor to France that which they have conceded for a valuable consideration to others; no such stipulation is expressed in the Louisiana treaty; no such stipulation can, from all or any of its articles, be justly inferred. In this, as in all their commercial relations with France, their most friendly cherished hope is mutual friendship; their most earnest desire, equal reciprocity.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

His Excellency the Baron DE NEUVILLE, Envoy Extraordinary, &c.

WASHINGTON, March 30, 1821.

SIR: I have received your letter, dated yesterday, in answer to mine of June 16, 1818, and 23d ultimo. I shall have the honor to reply, and believe it will not be difficult for me to show that all my citations are correct. Not only all the treaties between France and this country, (those, it is well understood, which could admit of such a clause,) but even all the treaties and conventions between the United States and European Governments, or nearly all, express in positive or in equivalent terms what I have stated.

I will add, that the force of my argument would not be impaired even admitting the sense attributed by you to the paragraph which seems to have more particularly fixed your attention.

I shall return, in a future note, to the point of the discussion as well as to all the others, and shall draw my best arguments from the very acts of the Federal Government, and from the opinions of the most enlightened men in the country. A better source could not be resorted to.

Allow me, sir, in the mean time to make an observation suggested by the following passage of your letter:

"The Government of the United States have fulfilled, and will fulfil, the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty, according to its plain meaning. The ships of France are and will be treated in the ports of Louisiana on the footing of the most favored nation."

You had stated in your note of December, 1817: "It is true that the terms of the eighth article are positive and unconditional; but it will be readily perceived that the condition, though not expressed in the article, is inherent in the advantage claimed under it. If British vessels enjoyed in the ports of Louisiana any gratuitous favor, undoubtedly French vessels would, by the terms of the article, be entitled to the same."

In your letter of yesterday you say that, "from a maxim founded in that justice which is at once the highest glory and the soundest policy of nations, that every favor granted to one ought equally to be extended to all."

"It is no exception, but an exemplification of this principle, that the vessels of England, Prussia, the Netherlands, and the Hanseatic towns, pay in the ports of this Union, including those of Louisiana, no other or higher duties than the vessels of the United States. This is not a favor, but a bargain."

I cannot, I must confess, view those matters in the same light, nor especially can admit your conclusion. But even admitting that, in reality, the four instances above mentioned are mere excepted cases; allowing that England, Prussia, the Netherlands, and the Hanseatic towns enjoy no gratuitous privilege or right in the United States; that they are not favored nations, and that, as you assert, sir, this is not a favor, but a bargain;

Admitting even your doctrine that gratuitous concessions alone constitute what is called favor, whereby a nation becomes in the ports of another either a favored nation or the most favored nation;

Allowing all this, still how would it be possible to reconcile the interpretations which the difference between the duties now paid in the ports of Louisiana by French vessels, and those paid in the same ports by the vessels of such nations as have neither convention nor treaty, nor have made any bargain with this republic?

I am not apprised that Russians, Spaniards, Portuguese, or other nations having none but such like relations with this country, have been made to pay a duty of eighteen dollars per ton in the ports of Louisiana; and yet this duty is frequently required of the vessels of that nation which, by virtue of an authentic instrument and of a positive contract, is entitled to be treated in future and forever in the said ports upon the footing of the most favored nation. Although nothing can be more clear or better established than the right of France, "this is not a favor, but a bargain."

It was not without nature that the chargé d'affaires of his Majesty took care to observe, in his letter of 18th July last, that this was not the case of a favor refused, but that of a charge imposed by one party on the other.

Such a state of things, whatever may be the interpretation given to the eighth article, is so injurious to the rights of France, and so very contrary to the equity and honesty of the Federal Government, that I cannot but flatter myself that the answer now solicited to this letter and to that of Mr. Roth of the 18th of July will be such as to give full satisfaction on this point.

And if France should not be made to enjoy immediately the right which I claim, most assuredly she cannot be denied in the mean time the enjoyment of that which is acknowledged.

I have the honor, &c.,

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

P. S. March 31.—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 30th, with the accompanying documents.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Hyde de Neuville.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 6, 1821.

SIR: I have submitted to the consideration of the President the confidential communication which I had the honor of receiving from you last evening, dated the 4th instant.

I am directed by him to assure you that, in the same confidential spirit with which it was made by you, he has given to its contents the most deliberate attention. As the result of this has been no variation of the sentiments which I have had the honor of expressing to you in my letter of the 30th of last month, it is submitted to your discretion to determine whether a further discussion between us at present of the particular point to which it relates would tend to that harmony and conciliation between our countries which is the avowed object and earnest desire of both.

He directs me, at the same time, to repeat to you the assurance given you in my letter of the 30th ultimo, that any proposals which you are authorized by your Government to make in relation to the commercial intercourse between the United States and France will be received, whenever you may think proper to make them, with immediate and the most friendly attention.

Be pleased to accept the renewed assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Discriminating Duties on Tonnage.

[Translation.]

1. The duties of entry upon the wines of France shall be reduced so as to pay no more to the United States (proportionally) than the wines of other countries.

[The calculation of it has been made, I believe, at the Treasury; it is, at all events, a point upon which exact data will be easily procured.]

2. There shall be upon the silks of India and of China an augmentation of _____ or a reduction of _____ in the duties of entry of our silks.

3. There shall be a consular convention between the two countries, based upon that of 1788.

4. The discriminating duties actually imposed on a foreign flag shall be reduced _____ in favor of French vessels laden with the natural productions and manufactures of France.

5. There shall be, in the same manner, a reduction of _____ in France upon cottons, potash, rice, and tobacco, coming from the United States, and imported by American vessels.

6. The duties of tonnage which the vessels of the two nations shall be bound to pay in their respective ports will be very easily understood, but it will be necessary to know, first, what the Federal Government may desire in that regard.

If all the points in litigation can be agreed upon, the convention may be definitive; otherwise, it can only be provisional, and, as one may say, an experiment.

The provisional arrangement should not cease before the term of _____, and even at the expiration of this period it should be continued till one of the two parties shall have declared to the other its intention of renouncing it; which declaration ought to be made at least _____ beforehand.

NOTE.—These preliminaries being agreed upon, there shall be no further question but of discussing, more or less, the reductions or augmentations.

APRIL 18, 1821.

1. The duties upon French wines shall be reduced to the extent proposed by the Baron de Neuville, to ten cents a gallon in casks, and twenty cents in bottles.

2. The duties upon silks imported from beyond the Cape of Good Hope shall be raised to thirty per cent.

3. A consular convention, upon the basis of that of 1788, shall be made with certain necessary alterations. If it should be found that the parties cannot agree upon these, an article shall be stipulated for the mutual restoration of seamen, deserters from their vessels.

4. The sale of tobacco from the United States shall be released from the monopoly of the administration and be made common, as all French articles are in the United States and all other American articles are in France.

5. All discriminating duties and surcharges, whether upon the tonnage of vessels or upon articles of merchandise, the produce or manufacture of either country, imported into the other, shall cease on both sides.

This article to be the same, in principle and substance, as the second article of the convention of July 3, 1815, between the United States and Great Britain.

The convention may be concluded to commence from and after the passage of an act of Congress for the stipulated increase and reduction of the duties.

Baron de Neuville to the Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

WASHINGTON, April 21, 1821.

Commercial concessions are only of secondary consideration, and may therefore be set aside, at least for the present.

The principal question is that which relates to the discriminating duties.

In my first interview with the Secretary of State, I stated the basis on which alone I was authorized to treat; I shall now repeat it, adding some remarks which have appeared important.

If the present state of things continue, matters must become worse.

If both parties sincerely wish to put a period to it, nothing appears to me more easy.

On my part, I shall comply with everything that can tend to reconcile, upon honorable terms, the views of the two countries; but for that purpose the two Governments must necessarily determine not to insist further upon such principles as are too absolute.

The friendship which has always prevailed between the two nations, their real interest and sound policy, appear to me to point out what should be done. Both parties ought to make advances so as to meet halfway.

His most Christian Majesty's Government does not hesitate to propose it, and to make a first advance. Should any one be pleased to estimate correctly to the present period the consequences of the law of the 15th of May and of the ordonnances of the 26th of July, he will readily be convinced that the French Government is less taken up with its commercial interest, than actuated by a constant desire of following the policy of Louis the XVI. towards the United States.

With this view, if it should be agreed upon to discuss first the question relative to the discriminating duties, I shall propose the adoption of the following bases:

1st. Those duties shall be reduced on both sides.

2d. They shall, for the future, be made sufficiently moderate to enable the shipping of both nations to be employed for importation, as well as exportation, in both countries.

If this principle be definitively adopted, it will only be necessary to come to an understanding upon the calculations proper to insure a desirable result, and upon the most simple and efficacious means of execution.

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 26, 1821.

In the commercial regulations established merely by law, the basis upon which every nation proceeds is its own interest, without reference to that of other nations. But commerce being an interchange of commodities, in the disposal of which both parties are interested, it is just in itself, and conformable to the practice of nations, that the regulation of it should be by arrangements to which both parties consent, and in which due regard is paid to the interests of both.

The first principle, therefore, of all negotiation upon such interests is reciprocity; and wherever a collision of interests exists, it is apparent that they can be conciliated only by reciprocal concession.

In the subject upon which a collision of interest between the United States and France has arisen, the two parties have heretofore enacted, respectively, each with exclusive reference to its own interest, certain regulations, securing, so far as its power extended, certain advantages to its own shipping, by certain special charges within its jurisdiction, direct or indirect, upon the shipping of the other; the result of which counteracting legislation, on both sides, has been in a great measure the exclusion of the shipping of both parties from the carriage of the commerce between them.

This result is injurious to the interests of both parties; and the effort now made by both is to agree upon some arrangement, by which the conflicting interests of both parties may be conciliated. It is further to be observed that no concession, the effect of which would be to sacrifice the interest of either party more, or as much as it is sacrificed by the existing state of things, could either be durable or satisfactory to both parties.

The difference between the parties having originated altogether from the surcharges upon shipping, the natural and obvious principle of reciprocity, applicable to the case, would be that of repealing all discriminating duties and surcharges on both sides; and this is what has been repeatedly offered and urged on the part of the United States.

It is represented, on the part of France, that this principle is inadmissible; but for this refusal no reason has been assigned. No objection to it on the ground of natural justice or general policy has been or it is believed can be alleged. It has been assumed, without proof, that the effect of it would be to throw the whole commerce into the channel of American shipping, although it is notorious that all the outfits of navigation, and the wages of seamen, are much cheaper in France than in the United States.

Whatever disadvantages French navigation may labor under in competition with that of the United States are believed to be within the control of France to remove. Nevertheless, the opinion of the French Government of the subject being stated by the Baron de Neuville to be irrevocably fixed, the President has been willing to meet any supposed disadvantage to France in such an arrangement, by advantages, thought to be fully equivalent for them, to the agriculture, commerce, and manufactures of France. In the minutes of a projet first presented by the Baron de Neuville, the President welcomed what he thought countenanced the hope of such a compromise. The Baron suggested special accommodations to the principal exports from France to the United States, and other benefits to French interests, all which were assented to by the President to the extent proposed by the Baron himself. In return for these concessions, he had reason to expect some concession on the part of France; in which, however, he has as yet been disappointed. He thought that with such great advantages granted to the commerce and manufactures of France, the least that could be required in return was that reciprocity which should discard all discriminating duties upon the mere carriage of the trade.

In the second projet received from the Baron de Neuville, he proposes to set aside all questions of commercial advantage, as merely secondary objects, and to take that of the shipping interests alone. He proposes a reduction of the discriminating duties on both sides, on the basis of calculations which may be adapted to secure a share of the carriage of the trade to each party. To the admission of this principle the Government of the United States have constantly objected, upon the most substantial and cogent reasons. The President is not yet aware of any form in which it can be satisfactorily admitted. Nevertheless, in the earnestness of his desire to terminate the commercial conflict between the two countries, he will receive and consider with the utmost attention any specific proposals which the Baron de Neuville may be authorized to make for the accomplishment of this desirable object. To abridge the negotiation, perhaps it may be most convenient that the Baron de Neuville should present his proposals in the form of an article for a convention.

The Baron de Neuville to the Secretary of State.

APRIL 28, 1821.

France, in all her political and commercial relations with this Union, has always aimed at the conciliation of the interests of the two countries. She will never deviate from this rule. She wishes that reciprocity which, if well calculated, can alone be durable, viz., the reciprocity of advantages.

The Government of the King is, nevertheless, far from rejecting absolutely the proposals of the United States. It is more than probable that one day it may be enabled to accept it, even without any modification; it will then, as well as at this time, evince the spirit of moderation with which it is animated; for its object is not the triumph of any particular doctrine, and it is especially not with a friendly nation, that it would wish to render its commercial system exclusive; but it has calculated with attention the interests of its navigation, and with its usual good faith has made known that it could not for the present treat upon a basis of merely nominal reciprocity.

His Majesty's Government thinks that each nation is the best judge of what is favorable or unfavorable to itself; and, without examining too closely what motives could have excited the complaints of this republic, it is disposed to believe that there was some foundation for her remonstrances against a state of things considered as unfavorable to her navigation. If, however, both parties should come to assign their reasons, it would appear more easy to justify, in present circumstances, the pretensions of France than those of the United States.

In this regard facts speak. Dr. Seybert says:

"The extra duties imposed by the act of the 20th of July, 1790, constitute what are called discriminating duties. All foreign nations were affected by the system we had adopted. It seemed to operate like magic in favor of the ship owners of the United States.

"In the course of twenty years we raised our tonnage so as to be equal to that of Great Britain one century after they had passed the navigation act," &c., &c., &c.

Here now is a statement which cannot be disputed, and which proves that the encouragement given to our navigation is still far from operating like magic in its favor.

Statement showing the amount of American and French tonnage arriving in the ports of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Charleston, Savannah, and New Orleans, from France and her dependencies, during the years 1817, 1818, and 1819.

	American tonnage.	French tonnage.
From the 1st January to the 31st December, 1817.....	71,738	15,105
From the 1st January to the 31st December, 1818.....	62,081	23,108
From the 1st January to the 31st December, 1819.....	54,277	25,945
Total tonnage.....	188,096	64,158

The comparison above is not made by way of reproach, neither is it meant to open a discussion, which it is thought would be of no use to either party. Both are sincere, each may hold more or less to its opinion, but they have an equal desire of arriving speedily at an amicable adjustment. This is the important point to be aimed at, but it was thought proper to answer the following passage of the note of the 26th instant:

"It is represented on the part of France that this principle is inadmissible, but for this refusal no reason has been assigned."

The reasons are facts, before which all speculations, even the most seducing, must disappear.

His Majesty's Government is prepared, however, to make a sacrifice in order to give this Union a new evidence of its sincere friendship.

I say it is ready to make a sacrifice, because every reduction upon its discriminating duties will prove a loss, perhaps, more considerable than will have been calculated.

I have demanded some commercial concessions, and these are a consideration, and most assuredly will be received as such; but they cannot be a compensation in the present state of French navigation. Had they been asked as such, it would not have been sufficient to require such slight advantages.

In order to abridge the negotiation as much as possible, I shall, at the request of the Secretary of State, proceed to present, in general terms, some articles and considerations which may form part of the provisional convention.

The two contracting parties, equally animated with a desire of terminating a state of things as pernicious to the interests of the two countries as contrary to the ties of sincere friendship, which have not ceased to unite them; and until better informed about their individual interests, and about the connexion of those interests, (that they may agree upon a definitive arrangement of navigation and commerce,) have thought fit to adopt the following provisional articles:

ARTICLE I. The law of the 15th May and the ordonnance of 26th July, &c., are revoked.

ARTICLE II. The extraordinary duties collected in consequence of the two acts mentioned in the preceding article, from vessels both of France and America, shall be restored by the two parties.

ARTICLE III.—1. The extra duties actually imposed upon a foreign flag in the United States shall be reduced one-third in favor of French vessels laden with the natural or manufactured productions of France.

The duties upon the wines of France shall be reduced in the proportion mentioned in the note of Mr. Adams of the 18th instant.

ARTICLE III.—2. The extra duties actually imposed upon a foreign flag in the United States shall be reduced one-half in favor of French vessels laden with the natural or manufactured productions of France.

ARTICLE IV. The extra duties actually existing in France upon cotton, potash, rice, and tobacco, shall be reduced one-third for the said articles when the growth of the United States, and imported by American vessels.

ARTICLE V. The duties of tonnage and other collections, made by public authority upon the vessels in their respective ports, shall be regulated upon the footing of a perfect reciprocity, so that French vessels in America, and American vessels in France, do not pay more than — per ton, (what shall be agreed upon.)

Other indispensable articles will be added, as also the consular convention, which shall be made with modifications which the Federal Government appears to judge necessary. If any difficulties should arise, the said consular convention may be postponed till the definitive arrangement between the two parties, and they may, for the present, only insert an article relative to deserting seamen, as the Secretary of State has proposed.

The Federal Government will have the choice of the two articles No. 3.

The first counterbalances, by a commercial concession and a smaller reduction of the discriminating duties, the advantage granted (Art. iv) by France. The second (Art. iii) is the pure and simple reduction of the discriminating duties, but in a higher proportion.

It will be easy to explain why mention has been made in the fourth article only of cotton, rice, potash, and tobacco, and why it proposes an unequal reduction of the discriminating duties in case no commercial concession should be allowed.

France, in treating with this republic, in making to it some very substantial concessions, should not expose herself to certain — which it is easy to foresee, and which she must at least guard against. Any one who will please to calculate with attention what she offers and what she demands, will remain convinced of her desire of conciliating, to the utmost of her power, the views and interests of the two countries.

There are other points in dispute, about which M. de N. believes an understanding may be equally had, but it is proper first to settle the question of which the present note treats.

As to the affair of the Apollon, it shall remain in suspense, as the Federal Government appears to desire; M. de Neuville presumes, nevertheless, to repeat that he sees with pain that all the difficulties will not be accommodated at the same time. In the mean time he sends to France all the papers concerning the Eugene and the Apollon collected by him, or which have been communicated to him by Mr. Adams, and earnestly wishes that the explanation already made, or which Mr. Gallatin shall make, may banish every serious subject from the discussions of the two countries.

M. de Neuville will be happy to have it in his power to transmit to his court intelligence sufficient to prove that there is greater reciprocity than ever in the dispositions of the two Governments.

His messenger will set out on Wednesday evening or Thursday morning, unless the despatches which Mr. Adams may have to entrust him with should not be ready. In such case, he shall await the orders of the Secretary of State.

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 11, 1821.

In the communication from the Baron de Neuville, received on the 14th of April, an abstract was presented of six proposed articles for arranging by a convention the commercial intercourse between the United States and France.

Of these articles, the first, second, and third were adapted to secure, by concession on the part of the United States, important advantages to the commerce and navigation of France. They were articles, not of mutual operation, equally, or, at least, reciprocally beneficial to both parties, but of which the whole benefit would be for France, and the whole sacrifice or concessions on the part of the United States.

The fourth article was also exclusively for the benefit of France. It was a reduction of the discriminating duties of the United States in favor of French vessels laden with French productions or manufactures generally and without exception.

The fifth article offered a reduction indefinite of the discriminating duties imposed in France upon four specific articles, and no more, of American produce, when imported from the United States into France in American vessels.

The sixth article proposed to settle the tonnage duties on both sides on principles of reciprocity.

This project, therefore, consisted of one article of reciprocal benefit, one article of partial equivalent to the United States for a corresponding article of general benefit to France, and three articles exclusively for the advantage of France without any equivalent whatever.

In the memorandum transmitted on the 18th of April to the Baron de Neuville, as an answer to the above proposals, the offer was made to agree to the three articles, the operation of which would be exclusively favorable to France; the only equivalent asked for which was, that the sale of American tobacco in France should be released from the shackles of a monopoly and placed on the footing of all other articles of the traffic between the two countries.

And it was proposed that all discriminating duties and surcharges, whether of tonnage upon vessels or upon the articles of the traffic, should be abolished on both sides, and the principles of perfect reciprocity be substituted for them.

In the reply of the Baron de Neuville, dated the 21st of April, he observes that commercial concessions, being only of secondary consideration, may, for the present, be altogether set aside, and proposes to adjust the navigating question alone.

To which purpose he proposes a basis founded upon two principles; one, that the discriminating duties on both sides should be reduced; the other, that the reduction should be so modified that the vessels of both countries might share in the conveyance of the articles of trade between them.

However reluctant the American Government must naturally feel at acceding to a basis, the avowed object of which was to burden the shipping of the United States for the benefit of the shipping of France, at consenting to deprive, by unequal incumbrances, their own navigation of advantages which it possessed, yet even this basis was not rejected. And in the note from this Department of 26th April, the Baron de Neuville was requested to specify, in the form of an article, what reduction of the discriminating duties on both sides he would consider as suitable to the views of France, and likely, upon the principle of mutual concession, to be just to the interests and satisfactory to the feelings of both countries.

It has not been without surprise and concern that, in the reply to this note, the President has seen, not the specification desired of a single article setting aside, as proposed by the Baron de Neuville himself, the commercial concessions as secondary, nor even a return to the project first presented, but a third project in five articles, not only blending again together the navigating and commercial concessions, but advancing new and additional claims of articles exclusively favorable to France, and suggesting that other indispensable articles must follow, without even an intimation of what the purport of those articles would be or to what they relate.

The objects of discussion, and suitable for adjustment between the two countries, are various and encumbered with difficulties in various degrees. But there is one which, in the present state of things, bears with peculiar hardship upon the interests of both countries, and must continue so to bear so long as it shall remain unadjusted. It is in the power of the two Governments, by an immediate agreement, to remove this altogether, and to restore the commercial intercourse between them, through the medium of their own navigation. Every day of delay to this adjustment adds to the injuries suffered from the present state of things by both parties. Not only commercial concessions, as remarked by the Baron de Neuville, but all the other subjects of negotiation between the two Governments, are secondary to this. It was, therefore, with much satisfaction that, in the Baron de Neuville's note of 21st April, the President perceived a proposal to arrange this interest first of all, and separately from all others. Pursuing this idea, I am authorized to propose that the discriminating duties, as at present existing, as well upon vessels as their cargoes, shall cease on both sides; that in their stead the tonnage duties and all charges upon the vessels shall be equalized, as proposed by the Baron de Neuville, and that the discriminating duties on articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, imported in American vessels into France, or of the growth, produce, or manufacture of France, imported in French vessels into the United States, shall be respectively charged with an additional duty of — per cent. on the value of the article at the place of lading, beyond the duty levied upon the same articles when imported in the vessels of the importing nation respectively.

Should the Baron de Neuville accept this basis of arrangement, it will only remain to agree upon the precise amount per centum on the value of all articles which shall constitute the surcharge; and it is believed there can be little difficulty in ascertaining an amount which, in its operation, will secure to the vessels of both nations a competent participation in the carriage of the trade.

The President believes that an agreement on this point, once concluded, would greatly facilitate a mutual good understanding upon every other. He is, nevertheless, willing to consider all the others suggested by the Baron de Neuville in concurrence with it. It is only to be remarked that reason and justice equally dictate the necessity of proceeding upon a basis of reciprocity. That either the commercial concessions must be set aside, as proposed in the Baron's note of 21st April, for after and separate consideration, or, if taken into the account, being all in favor of France, they must be compensated either by commercial concessions to the United States, or by entire reciprocity in the article relative to navigation.

With regard to the last claim of the Baron de Neuville, founded upon the 8th article of the Louisiana cession treaty, as set forth in his note of 30th March, and with regard to the cases of the Apollon and Eugene, as referred to in the Baron's notes of 4th and 23d April, with Captain Edou's report, distinct and explicit answers will at a suitable time be given. It may suffice, at present, to say, that after a deliberate reconsideration of the claim under the convention, this Government adheres to the opinion that the article has no more bearing upon the tonnage duty of eighteen dollars, than upon the previous discriminating duties, and that French vessels have, under the treaty and the existing laws of the Union, no claim to any privilege in the ports of Louisiana which they have not in all other ports of the United States.

As to the cases of the Apollon and Eugene, after repeating the remark heretofore made, that the tribunals of the nation are open to all persons interested in them, to obtain redress for any wrong sustained by them in property or person, if any has been sustained, it is only necessary now to add, that, if they are to be treated diplomatically with a view to arrangement by convention, it will be equally just and indispensable that the claims of citizens of the United States upon the Government of France should also be included in the negotiation.

WASHINGTON, May 15, 1821.

SIR: I have now the honor to answer your letter of the 29th of March last.

The terms of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty are as follows:

"In future and forever, after the expiration of the twelve years, the ships of France shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports above mentioned;" meaning the ports of the territory ceded by France, Louisiana.

It evidently results, from the terms of this article, that the French nation is to be treated, in future, and forever after, upon the footing of the most favored nations, not in all the ports of the United States, but in those of Louisiana.

But what is meant, what can be understood, by the terms, being treated upon the footing of the most favored nations?

Is there but one way of obtaining the right to be so treated? or may it be held by more than one title?

Upon consulting the various treaties made between different nations, and particularly those which the United States have entered into with European powers, I find in almost all of them a definition of what is meant by being treated upon the footing of the most favored nations, and these definitions are so precise that I do not see how any controversy can arise on that point. In most cases relating to the rights and privileges of the most favored nations, the parties even go on to explain that the favor shall be free, if freely granted to another nation, or, upon granting the same compensation, if the concession be conditional; from which I conclude that the right to be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations may be enjoyed in two ways, either gratuitously or conditionally.

You, moreover, appear to me, sir, to admit this very material point; you even declare (and in this opinion I may readily acquiesce; I have, at least, no interest in opposing it,) that it is not necessary that the terms gratuitously or conditionally be expressed in the agreement; meaning, I suppose, where the condition of reciprocity is stipulated.

Alluding to the convention of the 30th of September, 1800, you say: "There is not a word in the whole convention saying that these favors shall be enjoyed freely, if freely granted, or upon granting the same condition, if conditionally granted; yet, who can doubt that this was implied in the article, though not expressed."

The article does, in my opinion, contain what I attributed to it, if not in express, at least in equivalent terms; but let us examine what you have stated in your answer.

In the article it is expressly said that the two parties shall reciprocally enjoy, each, in the ports of the other, as far as regards commerce and navigation, the privileges of the most favored nations.

It goes no further; it gives no explanation as to gratuitous or conditional favors, and perhaps it was unnecessary here. Yet, do you add, who can doubt that this was implied in the article, though not expressed? This admission determines the first point, viz: that there are two modes of being treated upon the footing of the most favored nations, and that the rights resulting therefrom may be enjoyed either freely, if freely granted, or conditionally, if granted upon condition to other nations.

We shall soon have to examine whether France has, or has not, from the very nature of the contract of 1803, a right to be treated, in the ports of Louisiana, upon the footing of the most favored nations, unconditionally, and without further compensation on her part.

This second question is of no less importance, but I think it right to detach it from that which here engages my attention, and the solution of which, must precede all further discussion.

Permit me, sir, here to suggest an observation which has struck me as being very forcible. If France, by virtue of the treaty of 1800, which secured her the rights and privileges of the most favored nation, has had a right to enjoy every favor freely, if freely granted to other nations, or upon granting the same condition, if conditionally granted, upon what principle, after the treaty of 1803, which secures the same treatment in a still more solemn manner, should she be reduced to the enjoyment of only such favors as are granted freely to other nations?

"If British vessels enjoyed in the ports of Louisiana any gratuitous favor, undoubtedly French vessels would, by the terms of the article, be entitled to the same."

It appears to me that, after your explanation just above cited, it would be equally allowable to say: "If British vessels enjoyed in the ports of Louisiana any conditional favor, undoubtedly French vessels would, by the terms of the article, be entitled to the same."

Thus, sir, I hope you will admit, with me, the first question to be sufficiently settled.

France is to enjoy, in future and forever, in the ports of the territory ceded by her, the privileges of the most favored nations; and as the treatment or favor which a nation may receive is either free or conditional, it follows that France has a right to be treated in Louisiana upon the footing of the most favored nation, either freely or conditionally, unless it be proved that her contract is to form an exception; that she has already paid for the privilege which she claims, and has, therefore, a right to be treated, without further compensation, upon the footing of the most favored nation. This, sir, is what I think I can easily prove.

In the mean time it is evident, not only that French vessels do not enjoy in the ports of Louisiana the privileges reserved by France, but that they are even deprived of those which cannot be disputed.

I have already shown that, far from being treated upon the footing of the most favored nations, France, at this time, is, of all nations, that which is most unfavorably treated in Louisiana, which forms a striking contrast with the precise stipulations of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty.

But what nations are (comparatively with France) treated upon the most favored footing in the ports of Louisiana?

All those, I answer, which enjoy in the said ports, whether freely or conditionally, by virtue of treaties or without stipulation to that effect, any rights, favors, or privileges denied to France. Hence, as it so happens, at this time, that the vessels of four different nations pay, in the ports of Louisiana, no other or higher duties than those paid by American vessels, I have surely a right to claim the same advantage for our navigation, by virtue of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty.

You will observe, sir, that I do not speak of all the ports of the United States. Finding this last phrase repeated several times, and underlined, in your letter of the 29th, I have some fear not to have been rightly understood, or, rather, not to have used expressions sufficiently distinct.

France has nothing to ask; she claims nothing in all the ports of the United States; she has not to examine whether any or several nations indiscriminately enjoy, in these, any rights or privileges, nor on what condition such rights or privileges may have been granted; but as the ports of Louisiana are of the number of all the ports of the United States, and as France has a right to be treated in those upon the footing of the most favored nation, she claims that right as soon as it is found that the vessels of any other nation are treated there more favorably than hers.

But I find, sir, in your letter: "Were it even true that the English or any other nation enjoyed, by virtue of general stipulations of treaties, advantages in all the ports of this Union over other nations, inasmuch as they would not be favors specially limited to the ports of Louisiana, or granted with any special reference to them, they could neither by the letter nor the spirit of the Louisiana treaty give to France any just claim to the special participation, in those particular ports, of advantages there enjoyed only by general arrangements, co-extensive with the whole Union."

It seems to me that it would have been useless, and even perfectly idle, to make any special mention of the ports of Louisiana in the treaties and conventions, by which certain rights, favors, or privileges are granted in all the ports of the United States, since they are comprised within the denomination of the ports of the United States. Giving the whole is giving every component part, and in such cases the general term necessarily embraces every particular denomination: let us suppose a case. You make over to me conditionally the privilege of hunting on one of your estates, situated in a certain district; I am to enjoy this privilege if you grant it to others; soon after you sell or make over to one of my neighbors the privilege of hunting on all your estates you hold in the same district—it is clear that my right does not on that account extend to all your estates, but it certainly does include that which is specified in my contract or conveyance; the favor is general for my neighbor, but, as it regards me, is only special; for the general term, I repeat it, necessarily embraces every particular denomination.

Such matters it is not thought necessary to explain, because it is not expected that they can ever be subject to discussion.

But suppose, further, that the right which I so justly claim was not even granted by you; that I held it only in my own right; suppose it to be an express reservation which I had thought it proper to make on disposing, in your favor, of that estate which I had consented to sell merely to oblige you, and to suit your convenience. If I yielded to your instant and pressing solicitations; if, in order to persuade me to sell this estate, you had gone so far as to offer me not a mere conditional right of chase, but that privilege free from all charges or conditions, to enjoy it with you to the same extent as yourself, and forever; if I can prove this last assertion by your own documents, you will surely admit, sir, that this is an indisputable sacred right, rather in the nature of property vested in me, than a mere privilege over yours—this is not a favor, but a bargain

What may now appear a mere assertion shall hereafter be proved.

You do me the honor to state: "The stipulation of the eighth article is, in its terms, limited to grants of favors in the ports of Louisiana. The seventh article has secured to French and Spanish vessels, in those ports, peculiar privileges, to the exclusion of vessels of other nations; and the object of the eighth article was evidently to provide that, after the expiration of those twelve years, no such peculiar privilege should be granted, in the same ports, to the vessels of any other nation, to the exclusion of those of France. The whole scope of both articles is, by their letter and spirit, limited to special favors and privileges granted in those particular ports."

I must confess, sir, that, so often as I have read the eighth article, I cannot discover that it evidently states that, after the expiration of those twelve years, no such peculiar privilege should be granted in the same ports to the vessels of any other nation, to the exclusion of those of France. The article states, nothing can be more clear, in future and forever after the expiration of the twelve years, the ships of France shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports above mentioned. Nothing whatever is said about peculiar favors granted in the same ports to the vessels of any other nation; why, then, should we attribute to the article what it does not contain—I will add, what it could not express? and this I shall now proceed to prove. When France disposed of Louisiana she certainly was entitled to reserve any rights whatever in that province, whether special, gratuitous, limited, or unconditional. She sold her own property and had a right to fix its price, as the other party was free to accept or to decline the offer. The express reservation made by her, in the first place for twelve years, and then, on condition of certain events, forever after, was no more than a part of the price of the territory ceded, and by no means a favor granted by one party and received by the other.

"This stipulation was a part of the price of the territory; it was a condition which the party ceding had a right to require and to which we had a right to assent. The right to acquire involved the right to give the equivalent demanded."

I shall have occasion to revert to this opinion of one of the most distinguished men of this country, and which is so much in point.

But to proceed with my argument. It is easy to conceive that France was entitled, when disposing of her property, to reserve such rights as she pleased, with or without reciprocity, for a limited time or forever. "This was a part of the price of the territory." But if, as you observe, sir, there is an express provision in the Constitution that the regulations of commerce and revenue in the ports of all the States of the Union shall be the same, it evidently follows that no nation can acquire, by treaty or commercial convention, in the ports of Louisiana alone, the advantage which France enjoys there by a special title, by virtue of a bargain and sale; which instrument is singular from its very nature and cannot be repealed in favor of any nation, whatever may be its connexion or commercial interests with the United States, at least so far as respects the territory ceded by France. If, therefore, no other nation can acquire, in ports of Louisiana alone, whether gratuitously or conditionally, the special favor, or, to speak more correctly, the right which France has thought proper to reserve in those ports "in future and forever after," surely I am authorized to maintain not only that the eighth article does not but even that it could not admit of the meaning which is attributed to it. Can it be supposed that the American negotiators had proposed to France to reserve an advantage or privilege which, according to the Federal Constitution, could never be realized? To give such an interpretation to this article would not be doing justice to their honesty. It surely must have some other meaning. Why not, then, adopt that which is most natural? "We do not presume," says Vattel, "that sensible persons had nothing in view in treating together, or in forming any other serious agreement. The interpretation which renders a treaty null and without effect cannot then be admitted."*

"Every clause should be interpreted in such a manner as that it may have its effect, and not be found vain and illusive."*

Let us then leave to the eighth article its true sense. Its expressions are clear and distinct; and it is admitted that in the interpretation of treaties, pacts, and promises, we ought not to deviate from the common use of the language; † we also know that the first general maxim is, that it is not allowable to interpret what has no need of interpretation; ‡ and you allow, sir, in your letter of the 23d of December, 1817, that the terms of the eighth article are positive and unconditional.

It being admitted that the terms are positive and unconditional, and since, in order to ascertain the true sense of a contract, attention ought to be paid principally to the words of him who promises; § and since on every occasion when a person has and ought to have shown his intention we take for true against him what he has sufficiently declared; || what motive can there be for denying France a right established in positive and unconditional terms, more especially when the intention of the American negotiators, of those who promised, is sufficiently declared and perfectly manifest. On this subject it will soon be shown that the eighth article, which in itself is so precise as to require no corroboration, has withal, by way of corollary, a document calculated to remove every possible doubt, if any could still remain.

But, sir, you seem to think that the seventh and eighth articles have never been (in any respect) considered "as forming part of the equivalents for the cession of Louisiana, and that the cession was in one treaty and the equivalents in two separate conventions of the same date;" and finally, while admitting that the three instruments form but one whole, as it is expressly declared, you add, "but the very form of the arrangements adopted by the parties shows their common intention to regulate the cession by one compact, and the equivalents given for it by others." If we are ever to deal in conjectures, why should we not say, for there would seem to be more ground for the assertion, that the seventh and eighth articles of the convention are the equivalents, and the two subsequent instruments merely accessory and the complement of the bargain? We shall soon find that it is quite allowable to consider as a mere accessory what you, sir, regard not only as the principal part, but even as the whole of the compensation.

But let us set every commentary aside. The convention of 1803 cannot give rise to any mistake. The seventh and eighth articles establish, without the least ambiguity, the nature and conditions of the rights reserved by France. The ninth article coming next, because what is most important should be settled before points of minor consequence, sufficiently shows that the two supplementary instruments are only matters of execution. They, in fact, contain calculations of banking and exchange, and details of liquidation, which could not well have been comprised in the convention; and it is even, moreover, fully explained that those two instruments, signed on the same day, "are to have their execution in the same manner as if they had been inserted in the principal treaty; that they be ratified in the same form, and in the same time, and jointly."

The question, it appears to me, may be viewed in two different lights, and will still, in either case, equally resolve itself in favor of the claims of France.

In the first place, France may be considered as having reserved certain rights of property on disposing of her sovereignty in Louisiana, and this would appear the more correct view of the case; for, strictly speaking, the seventh and eighth articles are not the equivalents of the cession, according to the true sense of the treaty, as understood in 1803.

In the other supposition, considering the seventh and eighth articles as part of the equivalents, the rights and privileges therein secured to France will form, with the $15,000,000, the full and entire compensation for the territory ceded by her.

The privileges secured by the seventh and eighth articles are still, in either case, a right of property of the most sacred nature.

"This is not a favor, but a bargain." "This is not a free gift, but the fair price of that which has been sold."

But suffer me, sir, to observe, that it is entirely erroneous to suppose that neither the seventh nor eighth article was ever understood by either party as forming a part of the equivalent for the cession. Not only was it understood they did, and was so meant by the negotiators, but one of them, Mr. Livingston, while offering to the French Government the express reservation of the rights and privileges in question, as I shall hereafter prove, went so far as to say that, by those means, France would enjoy all the advantages of the colony without incurring the expense of maintaining it.

Let us now add to Mr. Livingston's expressions the formal opinion of Mr. Randolph, and it will be no longer possible to maintain that neither the seventh nor eighth article was ever considered as forming part of the equivalent for the territory ceded by France.

"I regard this stipulation only as a part of the price of the territory. It was a condition which the party ceding had a right to require, and to which we had a right to assent. The right to acquire involved the right to give the equivalent demanded."**

In your letter of the 29th of March last, as well as in your note of the 23d of December, 1817, you advance that, if France could claim forever, in the ports of Louisiana, a privilege which could be denied to her in the other ports of the United States, France would, in such case, have transferred only an imperfect sovereignty to this republic.

I have already endeavored to establish (letter of June 16, 1818) that sovereignty should ever be distinguished from property; in support of which I could cite many instances of transfers of a full and entire sovereignty, with the reservation of certain rights or privileges, in the nature of that which France holds in the ports of Louisiana. But the very terms of the article make it perfectly useless to discuss this point. The expression forever is sufficiently explicit. In the ports of the territory ceded, surely implies that France is entitled to the privilege claimed by her in Louisiana only; and it may, therefore, at all times, be denied her in the other ports of the United States, unless some other treaty or convention should intervene.

You persist, also, in believing that the right claimed by France is in contradiction with the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States, and that no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another." I could add several very plausible arguments to those which I have already made against that supposed inconsistency. I might, perhaps, also contend, with some advantage, against the manner in which you explain the admission of the State of Louisiana on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, in spite of the privilege which France and Spain still enjoyed in its ports. I think I should have some right to observe, that, in all constitutional questions, no modification is admissible, and nothing is to be assumed except according to the forms required by the Constitution itself; that representative governments scarcely admit of acts of mere courtesy; that they have the law alone in view; and that it is, therefore, to be presumed that Congress would not have emancipated, before its maturity, the adopted child of the Union, nor have given him a preference not sanctioned by the Constitution.* if, in fact, the measure could have been considered as illegal. But, sir, my Government has nothing to do with the question of constitutionality. It is therefore proper for me to decline discussing it; and I shall be satisfied with recalling some very respectable opinions which militate in favor of my positions or against what is objected to them, and destroy all idea of inconsistency between the seventh and eighth articles of the Louisiana treaty and the Federal Constitution.

† "Mr. RODNEY. It is contended that the United States have no right to purchase territory; that they have no right to admit the people of Louisiana to a participation of the rights derived from an admission into the Union; and that a peculiar favor is about being granted to the ports of New Orleans, in violation of the Constitution.

"In view of the Constitution, the Union was composed of two corporate bodies, of States and Territories. A recurrence to the Constitution will show that it is predicated on the principle of the United States acquiring territory either by war, treaty, or purchase. There was one part of that instrument, within whose capacious grasp all these modes of acquisition were embraced. By the Constitution, Congress have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States."

"To provide for the general welfare: the import of these terms is very comprehensive indeed. If this general delegation of authority be not at variance with other particular powers specially granted, nor restricted by them; if it be not in any degree comprehended in those subsequently delegated, I cannot, said Mr. Rodney, perceive why, within the fair meaning of this general provision, is not included the power of increasing our territory, if necessary, for the general welfare or common defence. Suppose, for instance, that Great Britain should propose to cede to us the island of New Providence, so long the seat of pirates preying upon our commerce, and the hive from which they have swarmed, will any gentleman say that we ought not to embrace the opportunity presented as a defence against further depredations. Suppose the Cape of Good Hope, where our East Indiamen so generally stop, were offered to be ceded to us by the nation to which it belongs, and that nation should say, on our possessing it, you shall declare it a free port! Is there any member who hears me that would contend that we were not authorized to receive it, notwithstanding the great advantages it would insure to us?"

"There is another sound answer to the objection of gentlemen. This is property ceded to us, by the power ceding it, with a particular reservation."

‡ Mr. SMILE. "If the prevailing opinion shall be that the inhabitants of the ceded territory cannot be admitted under the Constitution as it now stands, the people of the United States can, if they see fit, apply a remedy by amending the Constitution so as to authorize their admission."

§ Mr. CROWNSHIELD. "It surely cannot be unconstitutional to receive the ships of France or Spain in the ports of the new territory upon any terms whatever; it is a mere condition of the purchase, and this House may or may not agree to it. Being a mere commercial regulation, we have the power to give our assent or dissent to the article in question; for I hold it to be correct doctrine, that this House, by the Constitution, have the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, as well as with the Indian tribes, and that whenever the President and Senate make a treaty involving any commercial point, our consent is absolutely necessary to carry the treaty into effect.

"By giving our assent we do not injure the rights of the other ports in the Atlantic States, as the privilege is extended only to ports in the ceded territory. I consider the eastern or carrying States as particularly and deeply interested in the acquisition of Louisiana; it is true, their ships already visit almost every part, but under many restrictions, and I wish to see them sailing on the Mississippi without molestation or restraint.

"I am in favor of adopting these treaties, and they shall have my hearty support."

|| Mr. RANDOLPH. "The unconstitutionality of this treaty is attempted to be shown by the following quotation from that instrument: 'No preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another State,' &c., &c.

"New Orleans, therefore, will enjoy an exemption. She is therefore a favored port, in contradiction to the express letter of the Constitution."

"To me, it appears that this argument has much more of ingenuity than of force in it—more of subtlety than of substance. Let us suppose that the treaty, instead of admitting French and Spanish vessels on the terms proposed, merely covenanted to admit American vessels on equal terms with those of France and Spain. If we acquire this right, divested of the country, it would have been considered, and justly, as an important privilege. Annex the territory to it and you cannot accept it! You may, indeed, acquire either the commercial privilege or the territory without violating the Constitution, but take them both, and that instrument is infringed!"

"I regard this stipulation only as a part of the price of the territory. It was a condition which the party ceding had a right to require, and to which we had a right to assent. The right to acquire involved the right to give the equivalent demanded.

"Mr. Randolph said, that he expected to hear it said, in the course of the debate, that the treaty in question might clash with the treaty of London in this particular. He would, therefore, take this opportunity of remarking, that the privilege granted to French and Spanish bottoms being a part of the consideration for which we had obtained the country, and the court of London being officially apprised of the transaction and acquiescing in the arrangement, it would ill become any member of that House to bring forward such an objection."

*Mr. ADAMS. "But it has been argued that the bill ought not to pass, because the bill itself is an unconstitutional, or, to use the words of the gentleman from Connecticut, an extra-constitutional act. It is, therefore, say they, a nullity. We cannot fulfil our part of its conditions, and, on our failure in the performance of any one stipulation, France may consider herself as absolved from the obligations of the whole treaty on hers. I do not conceive it necessary to enter into the merits of the treaty at this time. The proper occasion for that discussion is past. But, allowing even that this is a case for which the Constitution has not provided, it does not, in my mind, follow that the treaty is a nullity, or that its obligations, either on us or on France, must necessarily be cancelled. France never can have the right to come and say: I am discharged from the obligations of this treaty, because your President and Senate, in ratifying it, exceeded their powers; for this would be interfering in the internal arrangements of our Government. It would be intermeddling in questions with which she has no concern, and which must be settled entirely by ourselves. The only question for France is, whether she has contracted with the Department of our Government authorized to make treaties, and, this being clear, her only right is to require that the conditions stipulated in our name be punctually performed. I trust they will be so performed, and will cheerfully lend my hand to every act necessary for the purpose; for I consider the object as of the highest advantage to us."

The opinions I have just cited have so much weight, that I shall not attempt to support them by further authority, and shall consider it as sufficiently established—

1st. That the rights reserved by France are, in fact, property vested in her, or, in other words, that the territory of Louisiana is a property ceded with particular reservation.

2d. That if, in 1803, the Louisiana treaty was deemed unconstitutional by some of the distinguished characters of the United States, the great majority of Congress declared itself in favor of a contrary doctrine.

3d. That the question of constitutionality is, and should be, foreign to France, and that her only right is to require that the conditions stipulated be punctually and faithfully performed. The French Government desires no more, and has, therefore, I think, a right to expect that a claim so well founded will cease to be disputed.

I read in your letter: "Nor is the proof that these articles formed no part, in the estimation of either of the parties, of the equivalents for the cession, confined to this tacit evidence in the forms of the negotiation. The seventh article bears upon its face the avowal of the motives by which it was dictated. Its introductory words are: "As it is reciprocally advantageous to the commerce of France and the United States to encourage the communication of both nations for a limited time in the country ceded," &c. The reciprocal advantages to the commerce of France and the United States was the end; the encouragement of their communications for a limited time, in the country ceded, was the means. And the eighth article, following as a corollary from the seventh," &c.

I think I have already sufficiently shown that the two parties in the contract had but one and the same mode of understanding the seventh and eighth articles; but, even if I had not, in support of my opinion, those already cited, and that of Mr. Livingston, which I shall soon have occasion to produce, still would my position be incontrovertibly proved by the very terms of those articles.

You cite, sir, the introductory expressions of the seventh article. Allow me to invite you to examine its conclusion, which appears to me more explicit, and leaves no doubt as to the true intention of the negotiators. But, perhaps, it would be still better to cite the whole article. It speaks for itself, and sufficiently explains what induced the negotiators to fix the duration of the privilege conveyed by the seventh article, and to assign no limitation to the right of property secured by the eighth.

"As it is reciprocally advantageous to the commerce of France and the United States to encourage the communication of both nations for a limited time, in the country ceded by the present treaty, until general arrangements relative to the commerce of both nations may be agreed on, it has been agreed between the contracting parties that the French ships, coming directly from France, or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce or manufactures of France, or her said colonies, and the ships of Spain, coming directly from Spain, or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce or manufactures of Spain, or her colonies, shall be admitted, during the space of twelve years, in the ports of New Orleans and in all other legal ports of entry within the ceded territory, in the same manner as the ships of the United States coming directly from France or Spain, or any of their colonies, without being subject to any other or greater duty on merchandise, or other or greater tonnage, than those paid by the citizens of the United States.

"During the space of time above mentioned, no other nation shall have a right to the same privileges in the ports of the ceded territory. The twelve years shall commence three months after the exchange of ratifications, if it shall take place in France, or three months after it shall have been notified at Paris to the French Government, if it shall take place in the United States. It is, however, well understood that the object of the above article is to favor the manufactures, commerce, freight, and navigation of France and of Spain, so far as relates to the importations that the French and Spanish shall make into the said ports of the United States without in any sort affecting the regulations that the United States may make concerning the exportation of the produce and merchandise of the United States, or any right they may have to make such regulations."

What appears most clearly deducible from the terms of this article is, that it was thought advantageous to the commerce of France and of the United States to encourage, in a very special manner, the communications of the two nations in the ports of the territory ceded; that the principal object was to favor the manufactures, the commerce, and the shipping of France and Spain. I can see no other advantage resulting from the seventh article for the United States, and it must be admitted that its stipulations are, in fact, advantageous only to France and to Spain. No reciprocity is granted to the United States either in the ports of France or in those of Spain. Their communications with France will, it is true, be more frequent, but only in the ports of the ceded territory.

Perhaps the article might have been worded with more care; but, after all, it expresses no more than I have stated. If the avowed object of the article was to favor, in a special manner, not only the commerce and navigation of France, but likewise the commerce and navigation of Spain, without any reciprocal stipulation for the United States, it is easy to discern what induced the American negotiators to demand that the privilege which France was not alone to enjoy in Louisiana should be limited in its duration; more especially as, during that time, no other nation could be admitted to enjoy the same favor. But where the privilege ceased to be common to Spain, the French Government, while consenting to modify it as by the eighth article, stipulated for the perpetual and unconditional enjoyment of the right of property thus reserved.

The eighth article does not, as did the seventh, stipulate that other nations shall not be treated as favorably as those of France in the ports of the territory ceded by her; such a condition could be imposed but for a limited time. But it was natural that, when yielding to the solicitations of the American negotiators, the French Government consented to cede Louisiana, it should secure to France the right never to be treated more unfavorably than any other nation in the ports of her former colony, whether those favors be purchased or not by such nations. That the transaction which, on the part of France, was at once a great sacrifice, and a striking proof of her friendship for these United States, should not, in the end, turn to her detriment, but should, at least, secure some lasting advantage to her commerce and navigation.

All this is not mere conjecture of my own. The facts are positive and clear, and every doubt must cease after attending to the following sentiments, not of the French negotiators, but of Mr. Livingston himself.

In the memorial addressed by him to the French Government on this question, "Is it advantageous for France to take possession of Louisiana?" he does not confine himself to proposing that France should reserve forever, and without reciprocity for the United States, the right stipulated in the eighth article, but even that which she subsequently held by the seventh article for twelve years only.

"Does France wish," says Mr. Livingston, "to introduce more easily her productions into the western country? Does she desire to accustom its inhabitants to her wines and manufactures, and to conquer the prejudices which the Americans entertain in favor of English goods?" &c.

"All this can be accomplished only by the cession of New Orleans to the United States, with the reserve of the right of entry, at all times, for the ships and merchandise of France, free from all other duties than those paid by American vessels. By those means American merchants established in New Orleans will be interested in her trade. Their capital, instead of being sent to England, will go to France, who will thus enjoy all the advantages of the colony without incurring the expense requisite to support it, and the specie which England, not enjoying the same advantages, and paying higher duties, could not furnish them at the same price."

This passage of the memorial of the minister from the United States is sufficiently clear, and we shall see that he furthermore takes care to corroborate its evident intention. Let us continue to follow the course of his argument.

"The possession of Louisiana," does he say, "is very important for France, if she draws from it the only advantage which sound policy would seem to indicate. I speak of Louisiana only, not including Florida, because I do not consider it as forming part of the territory ceded, as she may, by means of the cession, have a free trade on the Mississippi, if she knows how to avail herself of the circumstance by an understanding with the United States. She will find a market for a great variety of goods when she shall have accustomed the inhabitants of the western country to prefer them to English goods, which she can only accomplish by giving them at a lower price, and this she can obtain only by giving American merchants an interest in selling them, in employing there their capital, and by inducing the American Government to give them the preference. All this can only be accomplished by the cession of New Orleans to the United States, reserving the right of entry at all times free from all other duties than those paid by American vessels, together with the free navigation of the Mississippi.

"This will give her vessels the advantage over those of all other nations, and will not only retain, but increase the capital of the city of New Orleans; and hence, provisions for the islands will be purchased there at a lower rate, and French manufactures will be more easily introduced into the western country, which the United States will have no interest in preventing, every cause of rivalry between the two nations being completely removed.

"Thus will France command respect, without inspiring fear to the two nations whose friendship is most important to her commerce, and to the preservation of her colonies; and all these advantages will be secured without incurring the expense of establishments which ruin the public treasure and divert its capital from its true object."

What! Mr. Livingston, in order to induce France to cede the territory of Louisiana, offers her more from benevolent motives, established in the very treaty itself! She subsequently consents to accept or to reserve less, and even this shall be contested! and the article which secures this to her shall be said to have no meaning, and be supposed to have expressed a mere impossibility! I will here dwell upon an idea tending to explain how such doubts could have arisen. Mr. Livingston's memorial must have been lost sight of.

I shall now proceed to discuss, as briefly as possible, the error which you think you have discovered in the citation of my note of June 16, 1818.

On this subject I have already observed, in my letter of the 30th March last, that if even such an error had been committed, the strength of my argument would not thereby have been impaired.

But let us examine if, in fact, there be any such mistake:

There are but eight treaties, or contracts, between France and the United States; four of these are of such a nature as not to admit the clause in question; in two others it is formally expressed; in another it is mentioned in equivalent terms; the last, which is the Louisiana treaty, is alone silent in that respect; and this silence furnishes of itself an irresistible argument. I was, therefore, right in saying, that all the treaties, which could admit of that clause, mention expressly the condition of reciprocity. It is of no consequence that one of them should not positively use the words, freely, if freely granted, or upon granting the same condition, if conditionally granted. These words are mere accessory, irrelevant to the question, in the examination of which, you have alleged my quotation to be erroneous.

This question I shall now establish in its simplest form, and shall give it some extension, so as better to explain my opinion.

I say, that in all the treaties of the United States, not only with France, but with the other European nations, when mention is made therein of being treated upon the footing of the most favored nations, this condition of reciprocity is expressed, stipulating that the contracting parties shall enjoy the same privileges and advantages, each, in the ports of the other. One instrument, alone, is drawn in very different terms: it states, in future, and forever after, the French nation shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports of the territory ceded by her. The clause stops here. What are we to conclude? that, in fact, there was nothing omitted, nothing implied, by the negotiators, (sous entendu;) reciprocity was not due; and thus, therefore, no mention is made of it. It was not due, because the convention of 1803 had no analogy with mere commercial treaties or regulations; it was a sale, a bargain; the seventh and eighth articles are reservations of rights of property made by the vendor: a mere condition of the purchase, (Mr. Crowninshield,) a part of the price of the territory, (Mr. Randolph;) finally, because the territory of Louisiana is a property ceded with a particular reservation, (Mr. Rodney.)

Were it even a commercial treaty, still, since the condition of reciprocity is not mentioned, France would have a right to maintain that she owes it not, and she could allege in her favor a very respectable opinion in the following words of Mr. Madison:—(Speech on the British treaty.)

“The fifteenth article has another extraordinary feature, which I should imagine must strike every observer. In other treaties, which profess to put the parties on the footing of the most favored nations, it is stipulated that where new favors are granted to a particular nation, in return for favors received, the party claiming the new favor shall pay the price of it. This is just and proper where the footing of the most favored nation is established at all. But this article gives to Great Britain the full benefit of all privileges that may be granted to any other nation, without requiring from her the same or equivalent privileges with those granted by such nation. Hence it would happen that, if Spain, Portugal, or France, should open their colonial ports to the United States, in consideration of certain privileges in our trade, the same privileges would result gratis and ipso facto to Great Britain.”

But we have not even to examine this question; that which occupies our attention is quite different, since it relates to a sale, a bargain; not a favor, but a bargain.

I think, sir, I have sufficiently proved, 1st, that there are two modes of being treated upon the footing of the most favored nations, either gratuitously or conditionally.

2d. That the ships of four nations enjoy at this time in the United States, and of course in the ports of Louisiana, the rights and privileges of the most favored nations.

3d. That France, according to the terms of the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty, has a right to be put in possession of the same privileges in these said ports, being part of those of the United States.

4th. That she owes, and can owe, no reciprocity, not only because no such condition is stipulated in the contract, but also because the privilege in question is a right of property reserved, or, if you prefer it so, is one of the equivalents of the bargain.

5th. That the intention of the negotiators cannot be doubtful, since the article, which in itself requires no explanation, has, as a corollary, an authentic document, which would irresistibly prove, by the very circumstances of the case, what was meant and intended if the treaty itself had not expressed it in the most explicit terms.

I therefore hope, sir, that after the preceding explanations the President will be pleased to order that in future, and forever, (unless in case of subsequent arrangements to the contrary between France and the United States,) the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty receive its full and entire execution, and that, by consequence, French vessels be immediately made to enjoy, in the ports of the ceded territory, all the rights, advantages, and privileges, granted to Great Britain and to other nations, by virtue of treaties, or in any other manner.

I have the honor, &c., &c., &c.,

H. DE NEUVILLE,

Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary from H. M. C. M.

NOTE.—Is it likely that France can have intended to cede, for the mere consideration of a sum of fifteen millions of dollars, property which, even before the cession, was considered as having an incalculable value? which a distinguished member of Congress valued (debate October 25, 1803) at more than fifty millions, and which, in a well written article in the National Intelligencer of the 10th of October, 1803, was esteemed to be worth six hundred millions of dollars?

And it must not be said that France was ignorant of its value, since, before the cession, the American public prints took continual pains to inform her of it.

I shall here cite one of these articles, signed Columbus—National Intelligencer, September 2, 1803.

The writer complains that several of the public prints strive to take from the merit of Mr. Livingston's memorial; he expresses a fear that they should persuade France that it is contrary to her interests to cede Louisiana to this Republic. He cites the following passage of a paper published in Fredericktown, which would go to prove to the French minister in Washington that the First Consul would commit an act of great folly in consenting to abandon so vast a territory.

“The democrats cannot think the First Consul Bonaparte such a simpleton as to part with that country for any compensation we can make him.”

Thus, adds Columbus, it is represented that nothing in our command is enough for those objects (Louisiana and New Orleans.)

Most certainly Bonaparte will never be regarded as a simpleton, nor will it be alleged that he had such affection for the inhabitants of these United States as to have had, in the cession of Louisiana, no other object but that of rendering them a service; surely he must, at the same time, have thought of his own country, and have intended, by reserving certain rights and privileges in favor of France, to secure, at least, a sort of compensation for the great sacrifice to which he was subjecting her.

In whatever light this subject is viewed, the cession of Louisiana must certainly be considered as one of the most inconsiderate and fatal measures of the usurper; but still, it is not allowable to suppose that he could, on this occasion, have entirely lost sight of the interests of France, and have consented to give up, for the mere consideration of fifteen millions of dollars, an immense territory, which will be a never-failing source of riches and prosperity to these United States, and which, to France, would have been worth all the colonies which she now possesses, or has possessed, in the two hemispheres.

The following opinion is such authority that I cannot better conclude than with citing it:

“I consider the object as of the highest advantage to us, and the gentleman from Kentucky, himself, who has displayed with so much eloquence the immense importance to this Union of the possession of the ceded country, cannot carry his ideas further on that subject than I do.”*

Baron de Neuville to the Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

WASHINGTON, May 28, 1821.

All the relations of France with the United States, from the origin of the Republic, have been based upon a true and disinterested friendship the most complete.

This policy, so full of benevolence, is essentially that of his Majesty's Government, and the present negotiation attests it.

In the various propositions which Mr. de Neuville has had the honor of making to the Secretary of State, he has constantly aimed at the reconciliation of the views of the two Governments. He has endeavored to come, as near as possible, to an equilibrium, without, however, dissembling that, whatever arrangement may be made, the scale would always incline, more or less, to the side of the Union.

All that Mr. de Neuville advances above can be demonstrated by means of simple calculation and facts.

Mr. de Neuville has agreed to discuss at present only the question concerning the discriminating duties, but he does not mean to leave entirely the other points in question.

Mr. Adams' note of the 11th, treating of these different points, Mr. de Neuville thinks that he ought also to approach, in order that there may be no misunderstanding in the negotiation which ensues.

As to the 8th article, Mr. de Neuville will confine himself to saying that he flatters himself that his letter of the 15th May will have a more happy result than that of the 30th March. He therefore awaits with confidence the answer of the Secretary of State to that last communication, persuaded that it cannot fail of having an advantageous influence upon the combination of the definitive or provisional arrangement between the two countries.

The discussion relative to the Apollo and the Eugene has been suspended by common consent, and it has been agreed to await the result of the explanations which Mr. Gallatin has been instructed to give to the King's Government.

A despatch of February 22, which Mr. de Neuville has just received, orders him to reclaim against the acts of violence of which two French ships, the Eugene and the Neptune, have had to complain—violence committed without the jurisdiction of the United States by the armed vessels of the Republic.

In this same letter of the February 22, the Minister of Foreign Affairs refers to the instructions previously addressed to Mr. de Neuville concerning the Apollo.

These instructions have not yet reached the minister of France. He therefore requests the Secretary of State to be pleased to let him know if, posterior to the 22d February, the explanations have been made at Paris, and if they have had the consequence which Mr. Adams has always appeared to expect.

These documents are requested by Mr. de Neuville, in consequence of the extreme desire which he has and always will have of avoiding every discussion which might tend to involve the difficulties uselessly.

Let the question relative to navigation rest.

Mr. Adams has thought that he saw in all the propositions of Mr. de Neuville advantages for France without sufficient reciprocity for the Union. Mr. de Neuville judges otherwise, and he hopes that fresh calculations will prove to the Secretary of State that the Government of the King knows how to go as far as possible in the case of conciliation and concessions. As to the rest, Mr. de Neuville will make it hereafter appear that he is not afraid of taking a good deal upon himself in order to smooth the difficulties which ought never to have arisen between the two nations.

Ought they, at all events, to interrupt their relations even for one instant?

France had much to suffer in 1790 from the additional duty laid by the Union upon foreign vessels. This act was not only contrary to the interests of her navigation, but she considered it as a manifest violation of the treaty then existing between her and the United States.

Without recurring to this old question, let us stop at the following fact. It is, that from 1790 to 1791 the French tonnage was reduced to little more than half; yet what did the French Government in a similar occurrence? He will confine himself to some representations. What had it done formerly, on the occasion of certain extraordinary duties imposed by the northern States upon the French navigation? It had remonstrated to Congress against this violation of the treaty of 1778.

What has been its conduct during more than twenty-five years as to wines and other products of France, subjected to duties out of all proportion to their value? It has remonstrated and only remonstrated. What course has she pursued or does she pursue against a state of things as destructive to her navigation as to public morals—the desertion of her sailors? In short, to what means has she had recourse in other cases equally important and to this day uselessly repeated? She remonstrates, she discusses, she waits.

Mr. de Neuville is very far from wishing by the preceding recital to offer the slightest reproach, but he wishes to point out that the French nation knows how to be patient with her friends, and that she is always very repugnant to do herself justice by her own hand.

Mr. de Neuville will now examine the different propositions of Mr. Adams. He is convinced that the Secretary of State is no less desirous than he of the re-establishment of the direct relations between the two nations. It is therefore with frankness and confidence that, in this confidential note, he submits the observations which to him appear proper to produce this happy consequence.

For some commercial concessions, unimportant, and pointed out by Mr. de Neuville only as a sort of compensation for the sacrifice which France will make in consenting to any diminution whatever of her discriminating duties, the Secretary of State demands (memorandum of 18th April:)

1. That the discriminating duties be abolished on both sides.

2. That the law relative to the management of tobacco be repealed in favor of the Union.

The first of these two propositions, if it were acceded to, would be equivalent (at least for the present) to the total ruin of the French navigation.

The second would destroy all the economy of an interior administration; and can a foreign Government demand advantages which the Legislature of the country is obliged to deny even to its inhabitants?

By his last note (that of the 11th) Mr. Adams proposes to lay the additional duties upon the value of the merchandise, and consequently to abolish the surcharges which at present exist on both sides.

This proposition, which has never been made either at Paris or at Washington, could not be foreseen by the Government of the King. The instructions of Mr. de Neuville are therefore silent as to this basis.*

* Mr. de Neuville has had the honor to make known, verbally and by writing, the principal basis according to which he was authorized to treat.—(See the note sent on the 21st April.)

Nevertheless, as he would not hesitate to take upon himself to accept of everything which could evidently conduce to the same end, he has calculated and caused calculations to be carefully made of all the possible results of the proposition of the Secretary of State.

The results are such as induce Mr. de Neuville to believe that the error is on his side; otherwise, the proposition of Mr. Adams would evidently tend only to secure all the freight of importation and of exportation to the American navigation, and that without any advantage, even commercial, for France.

Mr. de Neuville must therefore be mistaken in his calculations; yet he doubts if in any case the proposition of Mr. Adams could produce the desirable effect, which is to establish as much as possible the equality of chances for the two flags in the participation of the commerce of freight. If, however, after a new examination of the projet, the Secretary of State wishes to pursue the discussion, Mr. de Neuville requests that he will be pleased to communicate to him the calculations and the proportion according to which the mean ulteriorly proposed could have been judged preferable to that, the basis of which appeared to be adopted by both parties, and the execution of which is in all respects the most easy, (the reduction of the existing surcharges in both countries.)

Besides, Mr. de Neuville is far from rejecting a proposition which submits to some modifications; as, for example, the laying the duty only on certain articles of importation and of exportation might perhaps produce sufficient combinations; but he believes he ought, nevertheless, to observe, that if it is decided on to abandon the first basis, it must be for one that presents itself more naturally than that which Mr. Adams points out. The question turns entirely on navigation. Now, would it not be more simple to make an additional duty, which might have only for its aim, to maintain a sort of equilibrium in the commerce of freight, fall upon the tonnage of the merchandise rather than its value.

But Mr. de Neuville thinks that, everything being seen and considered, the two Governments will find it better to abide by the first basis, and to apply the remedy to the present state of things, especially by an arrangement which ought to be but provisional. Mr. de Neuville says that the arrangement ought to be but provisional, since it appears to him almost demonstrated that sufficient data are wanting for establishing the individual interest of each State, and, especially, the connexion of their interests. In this case is it not prudence in the two Governments to commence by re-establishing between them, by an amicable mean, (mezzo termine amical,) the direct relations, safe to pursue the negotiation with the desire which both sides have, and ought to have, of attaining, by reason, by good faith, by the irresistible force of facts, the definitive arrangements of all the points in question?

A bargain too advantageous cannot be pretended on both sides without imprudence; here at least it would be bad policy. What ought to be wished, what ought to be desired, is, that the transaction be such as the prudent in both countries may applaud and wish to be lasting. What must be done for this purpose? The equality of chances must be established by prudent combinations; in a word, the conventions must be made to approach as much as possible to the only solid basis—the reciprocity of advantages.

Now, it must be agreed, there is here a point difficult enough to seize; it is that which experience alone can point out with precision.

Mr. de N. admits then this question is only a trial; only a provisional transaction, which will give time to both countries to develop their respective rights and wants; which will put it in their power to collect indispensable documents; (for after all, the very exact statements of the custom-houses, in one year alone, will resolve the question a great deal better than all the speculative calculations which could be made on both sides could do in ten.)

In fine, Mr. de N. admits that, without wishing to hold to an absolute principle, that without intending to sacrifice any rule or opinion too easily, each Government is still disposed amicably to subscribe to a sort of commercial armistice, in order to set bounds to a state of things which cannot be prolonged without grievous inconveniences to both nations; without, in some degree, relaxing the bonds of reciprocal amity and benevolence.

Therefore Mr. de N. will take upon himself—although it were easy for him to prove* evidently that already his propositions of 28th April are of advantage to the Union—to modify the third and fourth articles; in consequence, he will consent to render equal on both sides the reduction of the discriminating duties.

Mr. de N. had proposed that the reduction should be only brought to bear on the four articles which compose nearly all the productions of the United States, and to render the measure general for the products of France. This difference in the two terms of the stipulation would not injure the interest of the Republic. Mr. de N. could confine himself to the support of a pretension so just, to give weight to a very wise argument of Mr. Jefferson, in a case nearly similar—an argument which he will have occasion perhaps to produce hereafter. But Mr. de N. will still shorten the present difficulty by consenting to what the reduction bears indiscriminately upon the natural and manufactured products of the two countries.

Thus the propositions of Mr. de N. contained in his note of 28th April will rest upon a perfect reciprocity in the concessions. Will this reciprocity exist in the advantages? He is very far from believing it. But, in fine, his Majesty's Government will not be stopped by too rigid mercantile calculations, when the question is of a trial, the results of which will be perhaps eminently useful to both countries.

Now, what shall be the reduction of the extra duties? Every proposition of Mr. de N. could only be based upon the idea which he has, that, notwithstanding the encouragement granted to the French navigation, the balance has already been in favor of the Union.

The Secretary of State appears to be of a contrary opinion; it becomes useful, therefore, to verify this important point of the discussion; for, the reduction having for its object the establishment or maintenance for the equilibrium in the navigation of the two nations, it is but just that both sides should take into great, even very great consideration, the state of affairs before the 15th May.

Mr. de Neuville considers as a fact, without doubt, that in the year 1819, and the first six months of 1820, the navigation of France has participated in the freight of the importations and exportations still less than that of the United States. If it has been otherwise, if certain documents† can be produced in support of the assertion of the Secretary of State, Mr. de Neuville will be eager to prove that all that the Government of the King wishes is a perfect equality in the advantages or at least in the chances; Mr. de Neuville will, therefore, then consent to a more considerable reduction than he could at present accept, after the preceding considerations.

* It is a fact, demonstrable by the most simple calculation, that the least reduction will be a real advantage for the Union; that even a considerable reduction will be pretty nearly of the same effect for France.

† If these documents exist, Mr. Adams will much oblige Mr. de Neuville by communicating them to him.

Mr. de Neuville requests then that Mr. Adams will be pleased, if he adopt the last basis proposed, to point out the reduction of the discriminating duties which may appear to him advisable.

The answer of Mr. de N. will make known definitively if the two Governments can be reconciled. Mr. de N. earnestly desires it, and he believes he proves it by all the concessions which he takes upon himself to make.

Mr. Adams to the Baron de Neuville.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 15, 1821.

SIR: In replying to the two letters which I have had the honor of receiving from you, the one bearing date the 29th of March last and the other the 15th of May, I find it necessary to restate, in its simplest terms, the question in discussion between us.

The seventh and eighth articles of the treaty by which Louisiana was ceded to the United States contain two distinct but obviously connected stipulations; that of the seventh article by which certain special privileges in the ports of the ceded territory are secured, for the term of twelve years, to the vessels of France and Spain, to the exclusion of the vessels of all other nations; and that of the eighth article, that after the expiration of this special privilege thus limited to the ports of the ceded territory, French vessels should be forever, in the ports of the ceded territory, on the footing of the most favoured nation in the same ports.

Upon the terms of this article, by your note of the 15th December, 1817, you demanded, in the name and by order of your Government, and as in fulfilment of this article, that all the advantages yielded, for ample equivalent, to British vessels in all the ports of this Union, should be yielded, without any equivalent, to French vessels in the ports of Louisiana.

The answer which immediately presented itself on the first disclosure of this demand was, that the claim was, in two important particulars, broader than the stipulation upon which it was raised; first, inasmuch as upon the mere right to equal favor it required, gratuitously, that which was conceded to another for a just equivalent; and secondly, inasmuch as, upon a stipulation limited in all its parts to the ports of Louisiana, it required concessions yielded to others in all the ports of the Union.

As the claim was thus without support from the letter of the article, it was also apparently contradictory to its spirit and motives, as well as to the whole purpose of the treaty; and expressly incompatible with other articles of the treaty and with the Constitution of the United States. Such was the substance of the answer which, on the 23d of December, 1817, I had the honor of addressing to you in reference to this claim.

By your note of June 16, 1818, you replied with the allegation that France was entitled by this article to enjoy, unconditionally, in the ports of Louisiana, any advantage granted upon conditions to others in all the ports of the Union, because France was to be considered as having already given the equivalent by the cession of the territory; and especially, because you alleged that in all the other treaties between France and the United States it was expressly said that the two contracting parties should enjoy, reciprocally, any favor granted to others gratuitously, if the concession to others should be gratuitous, or by granting the same compensation if the concession should be conditional: and as no such distinction between conditional and gratuitous favor was formally expressed in the eighth article of the Louisiana cession treaty, you insisted, with great earnestness, that this variation in the phraseology of the article from that which had been universally used in all the preceding treaties between the parties, led irresistibly to the conclusion that no such distinction was intended, but the United States were bound forever to give to the vessels of France, in Louisiana, every advantage which, to the end of time, they might sell for a price to the vessels of other nations throughout the Union.

The great stress with which your note of the 16th June, 1818, dwelt upon this supposed departure from the universal language of the prior treaties made it necessary to observe that its only basis was an error in point of fact; that no such concurrence, in the form of language used in relation to the same principle, existed in the prior treaties; that the alternative reciprocity of conditional or gratuitous favor, far from being expressed in all the treaties between the parties, had in terms been expressed only in one, and that the first treaty ever made between them; and particularly that a treaty concluded with the same Government, as the Louisiana cession, and only three years before, contained such an article, stipulating mutually the advantages of the most favored nation, without any notice whatsoever of distinction between favors gratuitous and favors conditional; and that this variation of the phraseology in the prior treaties of stipulations, obviously intending the same thing, not only swept away the argument which you had drawn from the supposed universal coincidence of the former treaties, but made it recoil upon itself, and proved that the gratuitous or the conditional nature of equal favor was inherent in the terms themselves, and had only been expressly developed in the treaty of February 6, 1778, from the abundant caution of contracting parties new to each other, and above all, anxious to leave no possible question of their meaning thereafter to arise.

Your reply of 30th March last to my note of the preceding day insists that "all your citations in your preceding letters had been perfectly exact; that not only all the treaties between France and this Republic, (meaning the conventions which could be judged susceptible of the clause in question,) but also all, or nearly all the treaties or conventions between the United States and European Governments, say, in terms formal or equivalent, what you had understood, what you had read, what you had been bound to say."

Permit me to observe, that the simple question between us was, whether all the treaties between the United States and France, excepting only the Louisiana treaty, in stipulating the advantages of the most favored nation, had expressly added that the favor should be free, if freely granted to others, and upon the same condition, if conditionally granted. Your letter of June 16, 1818, in the most unqualified terms, asserted that they had; and from this position, connected with the omission of the same explanatory clause, in the stipulation of the Louisiana treaty, you had deduced and most earnestly pressed an argument, that this supposed solitary change in the reduction necessarily imported a different construction, and entitled France to enjoy, in the ports of Louisiana, unconditionally, every favor granted to others, whether with condition or without.

The demand upon a stipulation of equal favor to enjoy, without equivalent or condition, that which was conceded to others only for an equivalent or upon condition, was, in itself, so extraordinary, that it assuredly required something stronger than inferences and implications and equivalent terms for its support. The main argument upon which Mr. de Neuville's letter of June 16, 1818, had relied for this unexampled claim, was the omission, in the Louisiana cession treaty, of the express explanatory words alleged to be in all the others. But the fact being otherwise, the conclusion was more clearly the reverse.

It may now be added, that the only possible sense in which a stipulation for equal favor can be carried into effect, is by granting it freely, or for the equivalent, according as it is granted to others. For, if the same advantage should be granted to France, without return, which is conceded to others only for the return, who does not see that France, instead of being upon equal footing with the most favored nation, would herself be upon a footing more favored than any other?

In the latter part of your letter of March 30, without abandoning this demand of exclusive favor, built upon a simple engagement of equal favor, you seem to admit that the diminution of duties conceded to the vessels of several nations in the ports of this Union is not a favor, but a bargain; and you allege that, even upon this principle, French vessels should be exempted from the additional tonnage duty of the act of the 15th May, 1820, in the ports of Louisiana, because the vessels of Russia, Spain, Portugal, and other nations with whom the United States have no treaty, are not subject to it; and, repeating a remark which had been made by the chargé d'affaires of France, in August last, you say this is not merely a favor refused, but a burden imposed.

The vessels of nations with whom the United States have no treaties enjoy no favors in the ports of Louisiana. In the ports of Louisiana, the vessels of all nations are on the same footing as in those of all the other ports of the United States. There is no most favored nation in the ports of Louisiana, nor in any other port of the United States. During the twelve years while the vessels of France and Spain were admitted into the ports of Louisiana alone, upon terms more favorable than into the ports of the United States, and from which the vessels of other nations were excluded, they were the most favored nations in the ports of Louisiana. But the favors were confined both to the vessels of those nations and to the ports of Louisiana. They enjoyed this favor by virtue of the seventh article of the treaty; and the object and purport of the next article was to stipulate that, when this special and limited period of favor should expire, no such special and exclusive favor should be granted to any other nation in the same ports. Such is the engagement of the United States, and as such it has been and will continue to be fulfilled. No favor is now granted to any nation in the ports of Louisiana; and the eighth article of the treaty has no more application to the general commercial laws of the United States, operating alike in every part of the Union, than it has to the special bargains by which the vessels of some nations enjoy a reduction from the duties imposed by those general laws, on the condition of equivalent advantages to the vessels of the United States, in the countries to which they belong.

To the demand, therefore, that the vessels of France should pay no higher duties in the ports of Louisiana than the vessels of Russia, Spain, Denmark, or Portugal, pay in all the ports of the Union, the answer is the same as that given to your demand in terms by your letter of December 15, 1817, that the vessels of France should pay, in the ports of Louisiana, no higher duties than those paid by British vessels in all the ports of the Union. The claim is broader than the stipulation upon which it is founded. The stipulation is, both by its letter and spirit, confined to special favors in special ports. The claim is either to general favors, applied to special ports, or to unrequited favors, for conditional obligations. In every such case, and by either of the constructions for which you contend, the United States could not assent to your claim without favoring France, in the ports of Louisiana, more than any other nation. Instead of being upon the same footing as the most favored nation, she would herself be the most favored nation, and enjoy advantages conceded to none others. This is not the stipulation of the treaty.

In your letter of the 15th ultimo you remark, that the exemption of the vessels of other nations from the extraordinary tonnage duties levied upon those of France, inasmuch as it is enjoyed in all the ports of the Union, is enjoyed, also, in the ports of Louisiana, as a part of the Union, and, being enjoyed there, France has, by the engagement of the treaty, a right to claim the same exemption in those ports, although she is not entitled to claim it in the other ports of the Union. But it is this very generality, by virtue of which the vessels of other nations enjoy the exemption, which takes away from it all application of the eighth article of the treaty. Their exemption is not a favor in the ports of Louisiana, even when they enjoy the benefit of it in those ports. They enjoy no special favor there, and it is to such special favor only that the stipulation could give France an equal claim.

In your letter of the 15th ultimo it is observed that the question is, "What must be understood by being treated upon the footing of the most favored nation?" But this is not the question, because it does not cite the whole stipulation. The omission of the words "in the ports above mentioned," changes the state of the question from its special to a general character. The stipulation is, that "the ships of France shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports above mentioned." The qualifying and special terms "in the ports above mentioned" apply both to the most favored nations and to the treatment of the ships of France; nor can France claim any favor in the ports of Louisiana, by this stipulation, without first showing that some other nation enjoys the same favor, as a special favor exclusively in those ports. There is no such favored nation in the ports of Louisiana. In the omission of those words, it is believed that their great importance to the question in discussion had escaped attention. Their restoration to the statement of the question will immediately show their leading to a different conclusion.

You observe, indeed, in another part of your letter, that you claim this favor in favor of France only in the ports of Louisiana, and you express your apprehension that I had misunderstood the purport of the demands in your preceding letters, because I had specially underscored the terms in all the ports of the Union when referring to the duties collected upon the vessels of other nations. I am well aware that you have demanded the special favor for France only in the ports of Louisiana; but you demand the special favor in the special ports, not as the stipulation of the article would warrant, if the case existed, because other nations enjoy the same special favor in the special ports, but because, by general laws applicable to the vessels of those foreign nations in all the ports of the Union, they pay in the ports of Louisiana less for tonnage duty than the vessels of France.

You observe that it would have been superfluous and even idle to make special mention of the ports of Louisiana in treaties granting certain rights, favors, or privileges, in all the ports of the Union, because in the ports of the Union are included those of Louisiana: that to give the whole is to give a part, as in such cases the generality necessarily includes the specialty. This observation, as applicable to treaties between the United States and other nations, is correct; but the inference to be drawn from the principle asserted is conclusive against the claim of France in the present case. For it is not to any such concession of a general nature, and which is enjoyed by others in the ports of Louisiana only because they are ports of the Union, that the stipulation of the eighth article of the Louisiana cession treaty applies. That stipulation, both in letter and spirit, is in all its parts special and not general. The whole transaction refers specially to Louisiana as distinct from and not as a part of this Union. The seventh article stipulates for special favors in its ports for a term of years, to the exclusion of other nations, and the eighth provides against the concession of similar special favors, after the expiration of the twelve years, to other nations, to the exclusion of those of France.

It is not, therefore, sufficient for France to say that the vessels of four other nations pay only one dollar a ton in the ports of Louisiana, while those of France are required to pay eighteen. For those vessels pay that dollar only, not because they are more favored than other nations in those ports, but because they pay the same in all the ports of the Union; because those nations have passed no laws excluding the vessels of the United States from carrying to their ports the productions of their own soil, by the excessive aggravations of surcharges.

There is no difference of opinion between us with regard to the principles which ought to apply in the construction of compacts, promises, and treaties. Admitting the correctness of all your citations from Vattel, I would specially invite your attention to that which forbids all constructive interpretation of that which speaks for itself. But I ask that, in stating the question upon the stipulation, none of its essential words should be omitted; that it should not be stated as a general question of "what is meant by being treated on the footing of the most favored nation," but as a special question of what is meant by being treated as the most favored nation in the ports of Louisiana. For when, upon a stipulation in these words, you raise a claim to be treated, in Louisiana, on the footing of the most favored nations in the ports of the United States, and when, to support this claim to special favor, in special places, resort is had to the argument that the whole includes all its parts, and that the generality embraces the specialty, what is this but interpreting that which has no need of interpretation? To us it appears not only so, but an interpretation as contrary to the manifest intention of the article, inferrible from its connexion with the article immediately preceding, as to its letter, which is special in all its parts.

Of the numerous extracts which you have taken the trouble of introducing in your letter of the 15th ultimo from the speeches of individual members of Congress, reported in the National Intelligencer as having been delivered at the debates on the passage of the laws for carrying the Louisiana treaties into execution, I regret not to have been able to discover one which has any bearing whatever upon the question between us, which is of the true import of the eighth article of the treaty. They all have reference to the seventh article; to the exclusive privileges which made France and Spain, for a limited term of twelve years, the most favored nations in the ports above mentioned; and the objection was strongly urged that this stipulation was incompatible with the provision in the Constitution which forbids any preference to be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another. To this objection, the speeches from which you have cited passages were the answers; and they all distinctly assume the principle that the prohibitive injunction of the Constitution was not incompatible with the stipulation of the treaty, because Louisiana was acquired, not as a State, but as a Territory; so that, while she continued in the territorial or colonial condition, regulations of commerce different from those prescribed for the States of the Union might be established in her ports without contravening the Constitution. And there was not in any of those speeches the intimation of a doubt but that, when Louisiana should be admitted as a State into the Union, the regulations in her ports must be the same as in the ports of all her sister States.

But the third article of the treaty stipulated that "the inhabitants of the ceded territory should be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States." And as this article could be carried into execution only by their admission into the Union as a State or States, so, by their admission in that capacity, their ports became subject to that provision of the Constitution which interdicts all preference to the ports of one State over those of another. If the admission of a part of those inhabitants did in fact, by a short time, precede the termination of the period subject to the exclusive privileges of French and Spanish vessels in their ports, although the sentiment cited by the Baron de Neuville be perfectly correct, that the Constitution ought not to be violated for a single day; as no question appears to have arisen at the time of the admission of the State upon the application of this article, and as the privilege of French and Spanish vessels was never, in fact, denied them during the term for which they were entitled by the article to claim it; whatever transient and inadvertent departure, in favor of the inhabitants of Louisiana, from the principles of the Constitution, may have occurred, is, as the Baron de Neuville observes, a question of internal administration in this Government, from which France has received no wrong, and of which, therefore, she can have no motive to complain.

For the term of twelve years, therefore, from the time specified in the treaty, France and Spain enjoyed, by virtue of the seventh article, special favors and privileges in the ports of Louisiana. But it was not certain at the time when the treaty was concluded that the inhabitants could, within twelve, or twenty, or even fifty years, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, be entitled to claim admission into the Union as a State. After the expiration of the twelve years there might be an indefinite interval of time, during which the special favors conceded to France and Spain, in the seventh article, might be transferred to other nations; and the eighth article was obviously intended to avert that contingency by stipulating that, after the twelve years of special favor in the ports of Louisiana, the vessels of France should be on the footing of the most favored nation in the ports aforementioned; importing, by the proper meaning of the terms, and without any ambiguous inferences of specialties from generalities, or, as the Baron de Neuville's reasoning would require, of generalities from specialties, that no such special favor in the ports of Louisiana should, after the twelve years, ever be conceded to any other nation, to the exclusion of France. This is the plain and obvious meaning of the article; the only meaning deducible from its letter; the only meaning traceable to the intention of the parties, by its immediate connexion with the special and exclusive privilege of the article immediately preceding it, and of which it is the natural complement.

If the opinions cited by the Baron de Neuville from the speeches of individual members of Congress, after the conclusion of the treaty, have, as is now maintained, no bearing whatever upon the meaning of the article now in discussion, much less can it be expected that the proposals in a memoir addressed by Mr. Livingston to the French Government nine months before the negotiation of the treaty, and intended to show that it was not the interest of France to take possession of Louisiana at all, should have any reference to a treaty founded upon totally different principles.

The object of this memoir was to convince the French Government that it was for the interest of France, instead of taking possession of Louisiana, to put the island of New Orleans into the hands of the United States, reserving to herself the right of a free port there, paying no higher duties than American vessels, and securing also to France the navigation of the Mississippi. The memoir was written at a time when the project of establishing a military colony at New Orleans was contemplated by France; but even the treaty by which Louisiana was ceded to France by Spain had not then been concluded. There is an error in the citation from this memoir in the letter of the Baron de Neuville, (page 32,) of the 15th ultimo, where it is quoted as saying that "the possession of Louisiana was very important to France;" while in the memoir itself the expressions are, that "the cession of Louisiana is very important to France." The substitution of the term possession for that of cession is only noticed because it might give an erroneous idea of the whole scope of the memoir, which was to prove that the possession of Louisiana by France would be in a very high degree detrimental to the interest of France; but that she might render the cession useful to her by putting New Orleans in the possession of the United States, securing to herself the privilege in it of a free port, together with the navigation of the Mississippi. The memoir did not even propose that Louisiana should be ceded to the United States, but merely that New Orleans should be put in their possession, to be held by them, not as an independent and sovereign State of the Union, but on the same colonial condition as it was then held by Spain, and as it would have been held by France had she taken and retained possession of the province. Under such a project, embracing no other purpose of a change in the political condition of the inhabitants, the parties were competent to stipulate conditions like these without violating the Constitution of the United States, even though without limitation of time. But the compact actually made was of a totally different character. By the compact actually made, not only the island of New Orleans but the whole province of Louisiana was ceded in full sovereignty to the United States for a valuable consideration in money; an equivalent far more valuable to France than any benefit she would ever have derived from the possession of the province forever. The nature of that compact, however, made it necessary to provide for the future condition of the inhabitants of the country. Justice to them required that when thus ceded in full sovereignty to the United States, they should in due time be released from all the shackles of colonial bondage and assume their station as a free and equal portion of the Republic to which they were annexed. With this wise and just condition France could no longer claim to stipulate for the navigation of the Mississippi. She could no longer ask without limitation the privilege for her ships of exclusive favors in the ceded ports; both these conditions, perfectly compatible with a treaty upon the basis which had been proposed by the memoir of Mr. Livingston, in August, 1802, became quite inadmissible in a treaty founded on the basis finally adopted; the comparison, therefore, of the proposals in the memoir of Mr. Livingston, cited in the letter of the Baron de Neuville, with the actual stipulations in the third, seventh, and eighth articles of the treaty, affords itself a very conclusive argument against the present claim of France. The proposals are, that France should merely give possession to the United States of New Orleans, reserving to her own ships, without limitation of time, the privileges of paying there no higher duties than American vessels, and the navigation of the Mississippi. But not a word was said in them of a stipulation that the vessels of France should be upon the footing of the most favored nations in the same ports. The treaty is a cession in full and entire sovereignty of the whole province, but with no right reserved for navigating the Mississippi, and with the right of admission for French and Spanish vessels upon the same footing as American vessels limited to twelve years. Why these great and remarkable variations from the offers of the memorial? Why, but because they necessarily flowed from the principle of a cession in full sovereignty, and because all the rights and privileges of the Constitution of the United States were, by a new stipulation, secured to the inhabitants of the province? The cause and the effect are both palpable from every point of departure in the actual treaty from the proposals of the memoir. The limitation in the article of that which the proposals offered unbounded is the proof of its own necessity; and the substitute, in the eighth article, of equal favor with the most favored of those ports, after the expiration of the limitation, instead of the perpetuity of the special privilege, is illustrated both in its meaning and extent by the exposition of the unlimited offer in the memorial, of which it supplied the place.

Of the numerous citations in the letter of the Baron de Neuville, of the opinions of individual members of Congress, and even of anonymous publications in the American newspapers, one purpose appeared to be, to dwell with great earnestness on the supposed advantages of the Louisiana cession to the United States. Without referring to the estimates of nameless authorities, it is not necessary to inquire whether those of the members referred to were exaggerated or otherwise. It is, however, to be observed, first, that all those estimates were formed under impressions that the extent of the Louisiana cession was vastly more comprehensive than the subsequent declarations and efforts of the French government would have made it; and secondly, that probably all those persons, to whose anticipations the Baron de Neuville appeared with so much confidence, agreed as they were in the importance and value of Louisiana to the United States, would also have agreed in the opinion so forcibly urged in the memoir of Mr. Livingston, that the possession of the same country would have been worse than useless, highly detrimental and pernicious to France. Of this opinion, one at least of the individuals, whose sentiments the Baron de Neuville has been pleased to quote with very flattering deference, then was, and still is. He has no doubt that, in the possession of France, Louisiana would have continued to be, as it always has been, a burden, and not a benefit; and at the time when the cession was made, the only practical question to France was, whether Louisiana should pass into the hands of a friend, for ample compensation, or into the grasp of an enemy, for no compensation at all. Louisiana then was of great value to the United States, and of much less than no value to France; and the cession of it by France to the United States was one of those treaties which are the best and most useful of transactions between nations, a compact highly advantageous to both the contracting parties.

But, whether advantageous or otherwise, and whether to both or to neither of the parties, has no more bearing upon the present question between the two Governments than the speculative forecast of individual members of Congress or the lucubrations of newspaper party writers. The question is upon the true meaning of the eighth article of the treaty. That meaning is expressed in the words of the article. It is confirmed to demonstration by its immediate connexion with the preceding article. It is illustrated by its variation from the proposals in Mr. Livingston's memoir, cited by the Baron de Neuville himself. Nor has it been possible for the Baron, at any stage of the discussion, to state the present claim of France, in any shape, without essentially departing both from the words and from the spirit of the article upon which it would rely. When first advanced, he expressly demanded, upon a promise of equal favor in the ports of Louisiana with the most favored in the ports of Louisiana, a performance of equal favor in Louisiana with the most favored in all the ports in the Union. Upon a promise of equal favor, he demanded a grant, without equivalent, of that which had been conceded to others for an equivalent. In his letter of the 15th of May, he states the question to be what is understood by being treated on the footing of the most favored nation? omitting the words "in the ports above mentioned;" which words are part of the stipulation in the article, but the very insertion of which, in the statement of the question, would have been fatal to the present claim.

After the fullest consideration of the question in controversy, and the most deliberate examination of the arguments adduced by the Baron de Neuville in his several letters on this subject, I am instructed to say that this Government adheres to the opinion that the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty does in no respect authorize the present claim of France, inasmuch as, since the expiration of the twelve years specified in the seventh article, there has been no one nation more favored than another in the ports of Louisiana.

I avail myself with pleasure of this occasion of renewing to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Mr. Adams to the Baron de Neuville.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 27, 1821.

In the notes which have been received at this Department from the Baron de Neuville on the navigation question, the great and important point upon which the unequivocal interest of both countries seems most urgently to recommend to both an immediate adjustment, much is said of the friendly dispositions and conciliatory views of France towards the United States. To all general observations of this character the Government of the United States offers a return of the most cordial reciprocity. With this disposition thus mutually entertained the Government of the United States has been desirous of avoiding as much as possible all retrospection to acts on either part which, if not incompatible with it, have at least nothing of that friendly spirit in their effects. Yet, when such references are made, it becomes indispensably necessary to meet them by demonstrating either that the statement of them has resulted from erroneous impressions, or that they were the counterparts to measures of like character on the other side.

In the note from this Department of the 26th of April it was observed that, in declining the offer repeatedly made to France, by the United States, to abolish on both sides all discriminating duties upon the tonnage and upon the merchandise of the produce or manufacture of either nation in the traffic with the other, France had assigned no reason for the refusal. This circumstance was considered the more remarkable because it was of public notoriety that, in the competition for the carriage of the trade between the shipping of France and that of the United States, that of the former would have the decisive advantages of cheaper outfits and a lower rate of seamen's wages. When, therefore, it was proposed that the navigators of each nation should be put, in the ports of both, upon the same footing with the natives, the whole benefit of that arrangement, so far as it was the act of the two Governments, was in favor of the French shipping. It was, of all possible arrangements, that which, in its own nature, carried most into effect the demonstration of that mutually friendly disposition so earnestly professed by both Governments. Its tendency was to promote the same spirit of friendship between the individuals and especially between the navigators of the two countries; for all experience proves that as generous spirits are always willing to start in the race of active enterprise and industry upon equal terms with their competitors, so nothing has so direct and unavoidable a tendency to produce discontent, irritation, and ill will, as exclusive privileges and partial favors to one of the competitors on the same field to the disadvantage of the other.

To the remark above alluded to, the Baron de Neuville, in his note of April 29, has replied by an extract from Dr. Seybert's statistical work, commenting upon the effect of the discriminating duties established by the laws of the United States in the year 1790, and by a statement of the American and French tonnage which arrived in the principal ports of the United States in the years 1817, 1818, and 1819; the former showing that the discriminating duties of 1790 had operated greatly to the advantage of American shipping, and the latter, that while, in the year 1817, the proportion of the American to the French tonnage arrived in the ports of the United States was nearly as five to one, it had, in the year 1819, diminished to little more than the double; still, however, exhibiting that proportion of superiority in the American tonnage.

It is not perceived that either this extract from Seybert or this comparative statement of French and American tonnage furnish a just or amicable reason for France to decline the fair and friendly proposal of the American Government to abolish the discriminating duties on both sides. The legitimate inference to be drawn from these facts could at most only be that, by the operation of a moderate discriminating duty in favor of the shipping of the United States, it had engrossed five-sixths of the tonnage employed in the trade between the two countries, and that by the counteracting effect of a very heavy discriminating duty imposed by France, her shipping had, in the space of two years, not recovered, even so, one-half of the carriage of the trade in her ships. But neither of these facts, nor yet both of them together, can lead to a correct conclusion of the effect which would arise from the extinction of all the discriminating duties.

In the Baron de Neuville's note of the 28th ultimo there is a recurrence again to the discriminating tonnage duties imposed by the act of Congress of July, 1790; to certain tonnage duties imposed by the northern States even before the existence of the Constitution of the United States; to duties formerly, but no longer, levied upon French wines; and even to the desertion of French seamen from their vessels. It is indeed observed that this exposé is not intended by way of reproach, but to show how patient, during the last thirty years, the French nation has been with its friends, and how unwilling to do itself justice by its own hands.

If the view of the treatment experienced during the last thirty years by the United States from the French nation, acting by their Government, the only action in which the friendship of the nation could have been usefully manifested, were calculated to elucidate the justice or the friendliness of her now rejecting the proposal to abolish on both sides all discriminating duties, it would readily be undertaken. It is believed, however, that, as well from the situation of France and of the commerce between the two countries during the far greater portion of that period as from other considerations, this review would have no tendency to bring the parties to a more accordant view of the present subjects of discussion between them. It will, therefore, be waived; but with regard to the tonnage duties levied by the act of July, 1790, it is to be observed that they were imposed by Congress neither in a disposition unfriendly to France, nor from any interested propensity favorable to the principle of discriminating surcharges. These were reluctantly resorted to by Congress as a defensive measure necessary to counteract the operation of similar discriminations, as well of France as of other European powers. The principles of the American Government at that time are consigned in a report of the then Secretary of State, Mr. Jefferson, upon a message referred to him by the House of Representatives, "with instructions to report to Congress the nature and extent of the privileges and restrictions of the commercial intercourse of the United States with foreign nations, and the measures which he should think proper to be adopted for the improvement of the commerce and navigation of the same."

The following is an extract from that report:

"Were the ocean, which is the common property of all, open to the industry of all, so that every person and vessel should be free to take employment wherever it could be found, the United States would certainly not set the example of appropriating to themselves exclusively any portion of the common stock of occupation. They would rely on the enterprise and activity of their citizens for a due participation of the benefits of the sea-faring business, and for keeping the marine class of citizens equal to their object. But if particular nations grasp at undue shares, and more especially if they seize on the means of the United States to convert them into alimant for their own strength, and withdraw them entirely from the support of those to whom they belong, defensive and protecting measures become necessary on the part of the nation whose marine resources are thus invaded, or it will be disarmed of its defence; its productions will be at the mercy of the nation which has possessed itself exclusively of the means of carrying them, and its politics may be influenced by those who command its commerce."

In the same report a view is taken of the regulations of France as they operated on the commerce and navigation of the United States, in which it is said:

"During their former Government our tobacco was under a monopoly, but paid no duties, and our ships were freely sold in their ports and converted into national bottoms. The first national assembly took from our ships this privilege. They emancipated tobacco from its monopoly, but subjected it to duties of eighteen livres fifteen sous the quintal carried in their own vessels, and twenty-five livres carried in ours; a difference more than equal to the freight of the articles."

At that time, cotton not being an article of exportation from the United States, the most important of their exports to France was tobacco. It is unnecessary to remind the Baron de Neuville that, in the present state of things, the monopoly of tobacco, which the first national assembly had abolished, has been restored, and yet that the discriminating duty between its importation in French or in American vessels is more than equal to the freight.

Such, then, were the discriminating duties imposed by the act of Congress of 1790. They were merely defensive; and even then the policy which the United States would have preferred would have been that of fair and equal competition. Such as it was, however, it is well known to the Baron de Neuville that their system could, but for a very short time, have any operation at all upon the navigation of France, since, from the year 1792 until 1815, if France had any commercial shipping at all, it was confined to a precarious and perilous coasting trade. And on the 3d of March, 1815, passed that act of Congress which offered to France, as well as all other nations, the abolition of all discriminating duties on the tonnage and merchandise of either country employed in the commerce with the other. There has been, therefore, no time since the establishment of the Constitution of the United States, no, not for a moment, when the United States would not have given a welcome assent to the proposal of putting their shipping upon a footing of the most perfect reciprocity, and of equal favor with that of the natives in both countries.

These observations were indispensable in reply to the statements in the two notes of the Baron de Neuville, from which, however intended, it could not but be inferred that the discriminating system had been begun by the United States, and that France had only counteracted it after a long endurance of its ill effects. The facts, as will be seen by this plain exposition, are directly the reverse.

With regard to the French and American tonnage, which, by the statement of the Baron de Neuville's note, entered the principal ports of the United States in the years 1817, 1818, and 1819, even that of the first of those years, that which appears in the comparison most disadvantageous to the shipping of France, exhibits a proportion of French tonnage employed in the trade three times greater than the proportional bulk of the articles of export from France, compared with that of the articles of import. By which it is meant to say, that if each nation had exclusively carried its own articles to the other the amount of French tonnage would have been three times less and that of the American tonnage would have been as much more than it appears to have been even in the year 1817. But it was in that year that the grievous discriminating duties upon American articles imported in American vessels in the ports of France were laid. This measure was taken, not only without notice given, but at the very moment when the American Government, at the instance of the Baron de Neuville, and as an earnest of their kindly disposition towards France, were reducing the duties which had existed upon French wines. It was a measure which operated upon the shipping interest of the United States in the most injurious manner possible. The American ship owners were taken by surprise. Going from the ports of the United States to France upon freights apparently equal to those of French vessels departing from the same American ports, they found, upon their arrival in France, the whole of that freight absorbed, and the adventure brought in debt by the surcharge of duty upon the cargo; while the French shipper upon a like adventure, from and to the same ports, upon the same freight, was making a most profitable voyage. The diminution of the American and increase of French tonnage, during the years 1818 and 1819, was accordingly gradual and permanent; but this was not the consequence the most unfavorable to the United States. The most pernicious mischief to them was, not the privation of profit to those of their merchants who withdrew from the trade, but the positive and heavy losses of those who persisted in it. A shipwreck was less fatal to an American shipper, under these circumstances, than a safe arrival; for against shipwreck he could be protected by insurance, but against these consuming duties there was neither defence nor remedy.

This perseverance in a ruinous trade was the cause why, during the years 1818 and 1819, the diminution of the American and the corresponding increase of the French tonnage employed in the commerce between the two countries was so slow and gradual. It would have been far less injurious to the United States and their navigating interest if, from the establishment of these heavy surcharges in France, the whole trade had been carried in French vessels, for it would have saved the Americans from so much positive loss. How indeed could it be otherwise? The Baron de Neuville states, from Seybert, that a discriminating duty of only 44 cents per ton and an advance of only 10 per cent. on the amount of duties levied upon the articles of importation had, in 1790, been sufficient to turn the balance, before altogether on the side of France, entirely in favor of the American shipping. If so very slight an additional burden operated like magic upon the relative amount of shipping of the two countries engaged in the trade, how overwhelming must those duties have been which, upon every considerable article of the exports from the United States, amounting to more than a full freight, and which, by calculations exhibited last summer to the French Government by Mr. Gallatin, were proved by the lowest estimates to be equivalent to a surcharge upon the average of at least twelve dollars a ton. No shipping could possibly stand under it, and so enormous is the surcharge that any proposition to reduce it by one-third, or even by one-half, would have no effect whatever. It would still leave a prohibitory duty upon American navigation to the French ports. A duty of twelve or of twelve hundred dollars a ton could do no more.

By a statement, from the same source with those cited by the Baron de Neuville, of the comparative amount of French and American tonnage arrived in the principal ports of the United States in the first half year of 1820, it appears that the French exceeded in amount the American tonnage. This difference, compared with the statement of the preceding years, proves that the American shipping was in the last stage of evanescence, and that in the compass of another half year it would have been completely rooted out of the trade. For this and for other reasons, which it is not necessary now to enumerate, the result of the discussion has been to convince the President definitively that there is no prospect of an approximation to agreement between the parties upon any basis of reducing the duties on both sides as they now exist, and he thinks it would be useless to pursue the discussion upon that basis any further. It was proposed, in a late note from this Department, that a discriminating duty upon the value of the article at the place of exportation should be laid on both sides; and as the duty would be of the same per centum on both sides, its operation would, on the whole amount of tonnage employed, be advantageous to the shipping of France in proportion as the value of her imports from exceeds that of her exports to the United States. The Baron de Neuville, without rejecting this proposition, thinks that, from the result of all his calculations, its effect would be to deprive the French shipping of all share in the carriage of the trade. He proposes, therefore, that if the basis of mutual reduction should be departed from, that of a reciprocal duty upon the tonnage of the articles, rather than upon their value, should be assumed. This basis will, of course, be as much more favorable to France and disadvantageous to the United States than that which had been proposed from this Department, as the proportional bulk of the respective articles of export and import exceeds their proportional value. Nevertheless, from a disposition to make every possible effort to restore the direct commercial intercourse between the two countries, and with a view to a mere provisional arrangement, the effect of which may be experimentally tried by both, this basis is accepted, and the Baron de Neuville is invited to state the amount of the surcharge which he would propose on the tonnage of the articles.

WASHINGTON, June 30, 1821.

SIR: I have received the letter which you have done me the honor to write to me, dated the 15th of this month.

In my turn, I shall endeavor to re-establish the question which occupies our attention, and by removing some errors which it behooves me to rectify, I shall answer the new arguments which you have opposed to those advanced by me in the commencement of the discussion; from these I cannot depart, since nothing appears to me to weaken their force.

You do me the honor to state that "the eighth article stipulates that French ships shall be forever, in the ports of the ceded territory, upon the footing of the most favored nation in the same ports."

Further, you add, "the qualifying and special terms in the ports above mentioned apply both to the most favored nation and to the treatment of the most favored nation."

Finally, you say, sir, that I have founded on the eighth article, which you cite, my remonstrance of the 15th December, 1817, tending to obtain for French vessels in the ports of Louisiana the advantages granted to the English nation in all the ports of the Union."

I founded my demand upon the eighth article, such as it is in the treaty of cession.

I will here observe that, in my opinion, even though the article were expressed as you present it, my cause would still be no less founded. But it is prudent to make no concessions to so formidable an adversary. I shall, therefore, attack your principal argument in its basis, and shall endeavor to prove that it is erroneous, even in the point whereby you seek to establish that there is no question but of special favors to be granted specially and exclusively in the ports of the territory ceded by France.

Allow me, sir, in the first place, to make the following observation:

My claim is entirely grounded upon the article, such as it is in the treaty, as it should be understood in the common usage of language; and, in fact, it is always by modifying it, or, to speak with more propriety, by making it anew, that an attempt is made to oppose my arguments.

This eighth article, according to your note of the 29th of March, means, evidently, that, after the expiration of the twelve years, no such peculiar privileges should be granted in the same ports to the vessels of any other nation to the exclusion of those of France.

But the article appears to me, evidently, to stipulate quite the reverse. It has no relation to the special right which France reserved by the seventh article for Spain and for herself for the space of twelve years, but to all the rights, privileges, immunities, favors, which, after the twelve years, might be granted to other nations under any title whatever.

France is to be treated in future and forever upon the footing of the most favored nation. This is the whole question. If what you understand to be its import had really been meant, would it not have been more natural to have entirely suppressed the eighth article, and after the following clause of the seventh ("during the space of time above mentioned no other nation shall be entitled to the same privileges in the ports of the ceded territory") to have added: "after the expiration of the twelve years aforesaid, if the same privileges are granted to any other nation in the same ports, they shall become common to France also?" But even these expressions, I perceive it, sir, would not come perfectly up to your idea, nor effectually overrule my opinion.

Why, then, was not the article worded in the following terms? they would naturally have occurred to the negotiators, if they had thought at that time of what you now conjecture:

"In future and forever France shall enjoy gratuitously, in the ports of the territory ceded by her, all the rights or privileges which may be granted gratuitously and specialy in the said ports to any other nation."

The clause would then have been clear and precise, and I should, in such case, have perfectly conceived what you do me the honor to state in your note of the 23d of December, 1817.

"If British vessels enjoyed in the ports of Louisiana any gratuitous favor, undoubtedly French vessels would, by the terms of the article, be entitled to the same."

But, to be candid, how can it be asserted now that France is to enjoy only such favors as may be granted gratuitously to other nations, when we read in the eighth article:

"In future and forever, after the expiration of the twelve years, the ships of France shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports above mentioned?"

I therefore had reason to advance that it was essentially necessary first to define correctly what must be understood by the terms most favored nations. It makes but little difference whether we say the most favored nation in the ports of Louisiana, or only the most favored nation; since we have only to determine this first point of the difficulty, why should France enjoy in the said ports only such favors as should be conceded gratuitously, and not such as might be granted conditionally.

The eighth article says no such thing; why, therefore, by what law, by what rule, can it be positively established that "if British vessels enjoyed in the ports of Louisiana any gratuitous favor, undoubtedly French vessels would, by the terms of the article, be entitled to the same?"

Is there, then, but one mode of becoming, in any country whatever, the most favored nation? or, if the conventional law of nations admits, particularly in the United States, that this treatment may be obtained not only gratuitously but conditionally; if the Federal Government has been ever careful to have the clause inserted in its different treaties; if I find it in the conventions of 1778, 1783, 1785; if I find it again in the treaty with Prussia, negotiated by Mr. Adams himself, in 1799, how can the Secretary of State say now that "if British vessels enjoyed in the ports of Louisiana any gratuitous favor, undoubtedly French vessels would, by the terms of the treaty, be entitled to the same?"

France, I repeat it, has a right to enjoy in the ports of Louisiana the treatment of the most favored nation, whether this nation be favored gratuitously or conditionally; she has a right to enjoy it, inasmuch as the eighth article stipulates expressly that "in future and forever French ships shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nation in the ports of the territory ceded by France."

To pretend that she is to obtain this treatment in case only that it shall be conceded gratuitously to another nation, is subjecting the eighth article to an arbitrary interpretation; it is going in the face of a doctrine generally received; it is interpreting what requires no interpretation; it amounts, in fine, to the creation of a new conventional law of nations peculiar to the ports of Louisiana.

I now pass, sir, to the entirely new interpretation which you give in your letter of the 15th of this month to this same article. You make it express that, after the expiration of this special privilege, (that of the seventh article,) thus limited to the ports of the ceded territory, French vessels should be forever in the ports of the ceded territory on the footing of the most favored nation in the same ports.

If the question were only to new mould the article, nothing could be more easy, as I have already made appear, than to give it the sense which is now attempted to be ascribed to it; but we must adhere to its letter if we mean ever to come to an understanding.

It is certain that French vessels are to be treated upon the footing of the most favored nation: but where are they to be so treated? I answer, in the ports of the territory ceded by France, and this ipso facto, gratis, whatever be the title under which the most favored nations may enjoy the same treatment. Has it been meant by the article to say the nation most favored in the said ports—exclusively in the said ports? Finally, are we to read, as you now for the first time propose, the most favored nation in the ports of the ceded territory? Doubtless no. The last member of the period has no reference to the most favored nation; it can have no relation except to the treatment of French vessels: "In future and forever French vessels shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nation." Here the sense is complete with regard to the words most favored nation. All instruments found in public law clearly show what is meant by the most favored nation. There can therefore be no misconception in this respect. But this is not the case with the other member of the sentence. It is not sufficient to stipulate that French vessels shall, in future and forever, be treated upon the footing of the most favored nation. It is necessary, moreover, to specify where they shall be so treated; for otherwise the sense would be incomplete, and the article would have no meaning at all.

I shall avoid all grammatical discussion; but if the sense of the article did not evidently bear me out, and if I were under the necessity of showing by its construction that it cannot have the meaning which you attribute to it, I would cite, in favor of my assertion, several phrases of your last note, and would prove by their correctness that the eighth article, such as it has been drawn and worded in the treaty, cannot admit the argument made by you on the concluding words of the sentence.

It concerns not France to examine if any nation enjoys in the ports of the territory ceded by her any right or privilege as a special favor exclusively in those ports. She has only to inquire whether any nation is there treated upon the footing of the most favored nation, or, in other words, if the treatment she receives is more favorable than that of French vessels in the said ports. It is matter of small importance to her to know whether such nation, being the most favored in Louisiana, is at the same time the most favored in Baltimore, New York, or Boston, or to know by what title such favor is granted in the ports of Louisiana. The fact alone, when ascertained, is of itself sufficient ground for claiming, as her due, the fulfilment of the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty, which stipulates that in future and forever, after the expiration of the twelve years, French vessels shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nation in the ports above mentioned.

Which, without gloss or comment, expressly means, "In future and forever, after the expiration of the twelve years aforesaid, French vessels shall be treated in the ports above mentioned (that is, in the ports of Louisiana territory ceded by France) upon the footing of the most favored nations."

It would be needless to add anything to this explanation, since the sense is complete; and it would be vain to seek, even in a forced wording (redaction) of the article, the special favor exclusively in those ports. The article neither expresses nor could express any such thing.

It does not express it, as has been just proved. It could not express it.

This, sir, you would constantly prove by objecting that, "according to the Constitution, no preference shall be given by any regulations of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another."

From this it clearly follows, in your own opinion, sir, that no nation can receive a special favor in a special port, and exclusively in that port.

What is not allowable at this time could not surely be done in 1803; and how can it be conceived that the only end of the American negotiators was to grant to France nothing but an illusive advantage, a privilege which she could never be put in possession of consistently with the Constitution?

How could the French negotiators have claimed or accepted such a favor? How is it possible to reconcile the idea of a clause which would amount to a mere mockery with expressions so solemn as these, in future and forever? It cannot, I repeat it, be presumed that discreet and sensible men, making a treaty and a solemn conveyance, have intended to make a mere nullity.

Let us examine what is likely to have taken place, what certainly did occur during the negotiation, and we shall find that it is not at all necessary to torture the expressions of the article in order to establish its true and positive meaning.

France was about to cede a vast territory in order to render an important service to a friendly nation; that territory was her property; she therefore had a right to settle the clauses and conditions of the contract.

This was not the case of a favor granted nor of a commercial regulation to be made by the United States; but, on the contrary, of a favor to be received, of a very important acquisition to be made by them.

This bargain could not but be very advantageous, in every respect, to the United States. France was not to gain as much by it. This she knew. But, although she willingly consented to make so great a sacrifice, was she entirely to neglect her own interests?

The French Government knew, at the same time, that difficulties had arisen already between the two countries; and the convention of 1800 testified that the parties had not been able to come to an understanding on the treaties of 1778. The provisional convention of 1800 was to remain in force only five years more; it might possibly be renewed; the parties might come to an understanding on the various points in dispute; but, at the same time, it was also possible that other discussions should produce injurious measures, impolitic steps, and lead to a state of things equally injurious to both nations.

Experience seems to have proved how prudent it was in them to foresee, and how wise to act in prevention.

Such being the state of things, how was it proper for France to act? I will answer, just as she did act; and this course was too obvious not to have been pursued.

She was about to cede an immense colony, the inhabitants of which spoke the French language, and were not likely to lose the French tastes or to abandon French fashions. It particularly behooved her to secure forever such a market for her productions.* Mr. Livingston told her so; policy and common sense told her to do so. It was, therefore, that the French Government, while ceding Louisiana, in order to give the United States a remarkable proof of friendship, and to do away every cause of rivalry between the two nations, reserved in the ports of the territory ceded a right or privilege, the full and entire enjoyment of which should be independent of all general arrangements of commerce or navigation existing at that time, or which might subsequently be made by the two nations. That the privilege should secure to French merchants the advantage of being forever treated in Louisiana upon the footing of the most favored nation, whatever might be the footing upon which they should be received in the other ports of the United States; therefore did France demand that, after the expiration of the twelve years, during which both Spain and herself were to enjoy an equal privilege, she, France, should have alone, in future and forever, a right to be treated, in the ports of Louisiana, upon the footing of the most favored nation; not of the nation most favored exclusively in the said ports, (which most assuredly the eighth article does not say,) but of the most favored nation, by whatever title, (which the article may be said to stipulate expressly, since no condition is annexed to the favor.)

It cannot, at all events, be asserted that this is a forced interpretation, since it agrees so perfectly with the text and letter of the article, which is, moreover, abundantly explained by antecedent facts, by the circumstances of the case, and by subsequent events.

It appeared to me, sir, that, in my letter of the 15th of May, I had clearly replaced upon its proper footing the question relating to a supposed error in that of the 16th of June, 1818. I thought it was proved that, whether there were or were not such an error in my letter, there would still remain the same force in the argument, which alone it was material to attack. But since you have thought it proper, sir, again to return to this citation, which, I repeat it, even if erroneous, would not alter my argument in the least, let us again examine, with minute attention, if there really be any mistake on my part.

There are eight treaties, compacts, or conventions between France and the United States; four of these are of such a nature as not to admit the clause in question; the four others, being such as to allow its insertion, are:

The treaty of amity and commerce, of September, 1778.

The consular convention, of 9th November, 1778.

The commercial convention, of 1800.

And last, the Louisiana treaty, of 1803.

In the treaty of 1778, stipulating that both countries shall enjoy, each, in the ports of the other, the treatment of the most favored nation, the very same expression which I have used will be found in the 2d, 3d, and 4th articles.

The convention of 9th November refers to the 2d, 3d, and 4th articles of the said preceding treaty.

Two, therefore, out of these four treaties state precisely what I have attributed to them, viz: that each nation shall enjoy, in the ports of the other, the treatment of the most favored nation; freely, if freely granted, or conditionally, if the concession be conditional.

The third treaty (of 1800) stipulates expressly that the two nations shall reciprocally enjoy the treatment of the most favored nation, both as regards the rights and privileges of consular agents, (article 10,) and with respect to all privileges, immunities, liberties, and exemptions in trade, navigation, and commerce, and as to duties or imposts, of what nature soever they may be, or by what name soever called.

An attentive examination of these two articles will surely suffice to produce an absolute conviction that, when the condition of reciprocity is thus expressed, nations are reciprocally to enjoy the treatment of the most favored nations upon the conditions generally understood.

Thus, the convention of 1800 does state in equivalent terms what is stipulated expressly in the treaties of 1778. I, therefore, concur in your opinion, sir, on one point. In truth, who can doubt that this was implied in the article? But I cannot go on to say with you, though not expressed, since it does not appear to me possible to express anything more clearly in equivalent terms.

Last, remains the Louisiana treaty; and it is precisely because the treatment of the most favored nation is secured to France, without reciprocity on her part, that a discussion has arisen on these points. Where, then, have I committed any error? Perhaps it would have been more rigorously exact to have said the treaties, instead of all the treaties, since the reference was but to four treaties. But I would ask, sir, if that single word, all, was of such moment as to fix so repeatedly your attention?

Yes, I repeat it, all the treaties between France and the United States, (those, it is understood, which could admit of such a clause,) all the treaties between the United States and European nations, wherein the treatment of the most favored nation is mentioned, stipulate that it shall be reciprocal. And on examining the other compacts between nations, I find the same stipulation of reciprocal advantages in every case, except where, as in the Louisiana treaty, there is some charge imposed by one party on the other, or a privilege reserved.

Whence is it that one treaty, that of 1803, should alone mention, without reciprocity, the treatment of the most favored nation? The reason becomes obvious if we consider that it is the only treaty of the United States, sui generis, which does not relate to commercial arrangements. A commercial convention, grounded on expected contingencies, and stipulating mutual services and advantages which do not require any advances, has no sort of analogy with a contract of sale, a mere bargain. In this last case the vendor conveys his property to the vendee, who binds himself for the stipulated consideration, consisting in the other clauses, charges, and conditions of the bargain, as well as in the funds to be paid at hand, or by instalments. The right of the vendor, his only right, as you observed, sir, in 1803, is to require that the conditions stipulated be punctually and faithfully performed. This is all France desires. She has enjoyed, or might have enjoyed, during the space of twelve years, the right secured to her by the 7th article; and she now demands the fulfilment of the 8th article, which, as well as the 7th, is "a part of the price of the territory, a mere condition of the purchase."

In your letter of the 15th you say:

"Of the numerous extracts which you have taken the trouble of introducing in your letter of the 15th ultimo from the speeches of individual members of Congress, reported in the National Intelligencer as having been delivered at the debates on the passage of the laws for carrying the Louisiana treaties into execution, I regret not to have been able to discover one, which has any bearing whatever upon the question between us, which is of the true import of the eighth article of the treaty; they all have reference to the seventh."

Suffer me, sir, to observe, that in thus taking the trouble to cite these very respectable opinions, my principal object was to answer the following passage of your letter of the 15th of March:

"From the obvious purport of the 7th and 8th articles, it is apparent that neither of them was considered, in any respect, as forming a part of the equivalent for the cession of Louisiana."

I was, therefore, right in not separating them, when my object was to prove that neither of them was considered, in any respect, as forming a part of the equivalents for the cession of Louisiana. And although the question of constitutionality cannot, in any case, concern France, it was proper that I should establish its having been completely settled in 1803, and that I was not alone of opinion that Louisiana was properly ceded, "with particular reservation, with a condition which the party ceding had a right to require, and to which the United States had a right to assent." It makes but little difference what particular article of the treaty gave rise to the speeches cited, if they had a full bearing on the whole convention, and if every argument adduced on the seventh article is, a fortiori, applicable to the eighth.

The 7th and 8th articles are both a part of the equivalents for the cession, or, rather, they are reservations of rights of property.

France owed no reciprocity, and therefore it is that no reciprocity was stipulated on her part; it was no error or omission of the negotiators.

I read, sir, in your letter of the 15th: "In the latter part of your letter of the 30th of March, without abandoning this demand of exclusive favor, you seem to admit that the diminution of duties conceded to the vessels of several nations, in the ports of this Union, is not a favor, but a bargain." Now, sir, I admit nothing of the kind in my letter of the 30th; far from seeming to admit, my expressions in the very phrase cited by you, sir, are, Je ne saurois admettre, I cannot admit.

As to the question treated of in that letter, I shall confine myself to expressing again my surprise that France should be denied, in the ports of the territory ceded by her, even those advantages which are granted to nations having no treaty or convention with the United States. Those nations, you say, sir, have passed no laws excluding the vessels of the United States from carrying to their ports the productions of their own soil by the excessive aggravation of surcharges. To this I shall answer, that France has done no such thing, and that her discriminating duties are far from having* operated like magic in favor of the ship owners of France, and have not even secured to her navigation a due share in the carrying trade. And, after all, where is it stipulated that France shall be treated, in Louisiana, upon the footing of the most favored nations, (as by the 8th article,) only in case she shall make no regulations on navigation injurious to the interest of the United States, or which might be supposed contrary thereto? Is not every nation free to regulate her own commerce and navigation as she sees fit? If her laws amount to prohibitions, if they appear unjust, if they are deemed injurious, it is, no doubt, allowable to adopt similar countervailing measures. But such measures on her part cannot make it justifiable to lose sight of the respect due to a sacred right of property which is absolute in its nature, and is independent of all regulations of commerce and navigation.

*These extra charges were sufficient to drive from our ports the greatest proportion of the foreign tonnage; all foreign nations were affected by the system we had adopted; it seemed to operate like magic in favor of the ship owners of the United States.—Dr. Sybert on the American discriminating duties.

Observe, moreover, sir, that French vessels are not treated in the ports of Louisiana either *upon the footing of the most favored nations, nor upon that of nations having no treaty or convention with the United States,* nor even upon the footing of those in whose ports the vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to go and trade.* This requires no comment.

You have stated, sir, that all the speeches cited by me tend to prove that there was no inconsistency between the Federal Constitution and certain conditions of the treaty of cession, "because Louisiana was acquired not as a State, but as a Territory; so that while she continued in the territorial or colonial condition, regulations of commerce different from those prescribed for the States of the Union might be established in their ports without contravening the Constitution."

I have already answered this argument by stating the fact that the seventh article which, in your opinion, was judged to be compatible with the Constitution so long only as Louisiana should continue to be a colony, received its full execution during three years after Louisiana had become a State.

To this you reply, that in this there was in truth a violation of the Constitution, "from which France has received no wrong, and of which she can have no motive to complain;" but if we have adopted in Europe, as a monarchical principle, that the King can do no wrong, we also expressly admit, with Mr. Griswold, that the Legislature cannot violate the Constitution even for a day. I look upon it as certain and indubitable that Congress had not the desire, as it had not the power, to violate intentionally the Constitution for a day, nor even for an hour. Besides, how can it be considered as a transient, inadvertent departure from the Constitution, that the unconstitutional execution of the seventh article should have place, not for a day, but for three years, while all the discussion which the speeches referred to had tended only to establish that in such case there would, in fact, be a violation of the Constitution?

You add, sir, "there was not, in any one of those speeches, the intimation of a doubt but that when Louisiana should be admitted as a State into the Union, the regulations in her ports must be the same as in the ports of all her sister States."

And, in another part of your letter, you again repeat "that, by the admission of Louisiana into the Union, her ports became subject to that provision of the Constitution which interdicts all preference to the ports of one State over those of another."

I think I have shown that this article of the Constitution is not in any case applicable to the express stipulations of a sale and conveyance of property, and that it did not belong to France to examine the question. I could, perhaps, prove also that the two last assertions are not, in every point, rigorously correct. You will find, sir, that in those very speeches it has been questioned whether all the ports of the United States were, at that time, subject to the same commercial regulations.

"But, turning to our statute books, (says Mr. Randolph,) it will be perceived that at present there are some ports entitled to benefits which other ports do not enjoy." He shows, in another place, referring to a treaty between the United States and Great Britain, "that several ports of the State of New York have a system of customs and duties peculiar to themselves, and in this, (he says,) gentlemen could not avail themselves of the distinction taken between a Territory and State, even if they were so disposed, since the ports in question were ports of a State." †

We see, besides, that Mr. Rodney's principal argument is grounded, not on the article of the Constitution mentioned by you, but on that which gives to Congress the power to provide for the general welfare.

Let us conclude, from the various instances, that the question of constitutionality is foreign to that which we now discuss; that it is of little moment to know whether a State may or may not modify its administration of customs and duties; that even this point was discussed in 1803; that, whether questioned or not, the right of France remains still the same, because it is a right of property, not a favor, but a bargain; and, finally, that the least doubtful point in all human transactions is the necessity of fulfilling, punctually and faithfully, all their conditions and stipulations.

As to the memoir of Mr. Livingston, its object, in your opinion, sir, was to convince the French Government that it was its interest, instead of taking possession of Louisiana, to put New Orleans into the hands of the United States.

In the first place, I shall ask, what would then have become of the territory? and whether, in such case, Mr. Livingston's object, which was to prevent every collision, to remove every motive of rivalry between the two nations, would have been fully accomplished? But every discussion on that subject would, I think, be quite useless, the perusal of the memoir being sufficient alone to remove every doubt.

Its very basis is this question: "Is it the interest of France to take possession of Louisiana?"

It runs from beginning to end on that subject, and no other.

If in one paragraph it proposes to put the United States in possession of New Orleans, it is palpable from that very paragraph, and from the following, that the memoir refers not to New Orleans alone, but to the whole of Louisiana.

Let us cite some passages:

"Who then will be willing to cultivate Louisiana with slaves?"

"Louisiana is surrounded by an immense wilderness."

"What advantage can France derive from settling that colony?"

"The productions of Louisiana being the same with those of the Antilles, &c., &c., it grows to evidence that, with respect to commerce, the settling (colonization) of Louisiana, would be prejudicial to France, since it would deprive her other colonies of capitals which might be more usefully employed there."

"The possession of Louisiana is, however, very important to France if she applies it to the only use which sound policy would seem to approve. I speak of Louisiana only, and in this I do not mean to comprehend the Floridas, because I think they are no part of the cession; as she can acquire by this cession the right to carry on the Mississippi a free trade, &c., &c."

Further, after having taken pains to explain all the advantages which France is to derive from the cession of Louisiana to the United States, Mr. Livingston adds:

† Mr. Randolph said he did not mean to affirm that this exemption made by the treaty of London was constitutional. To solve that question was not his object. He would, however, observe, that France had a view, in signing the treaty, to ascertain whether all its articles were constitutional or not, since here, as well as elsewhere, the most enlightened men frequently disagree on certain points of legislation.

"All this can take place only by the cession of New Orleans to the United States, with the reserve of the right of entry at all times, free from all other duties than those paid by American vessels, together with the right of navigation on the Mississippi."

It becomes evident that he means the cession of the whole of Louisiana, since he advises France to secure to herself the navigation on the Mississippi; for how could this stipulation have been necessary if she were to have retained possession of the western shore?

In what case does Mr. Livingston mention New Orleans only? It is to her he speaks of a free port, and of securing a free access to French vessels and merchandise. And in these particulars it is plain that he could not express himself otherwise, New Orleans being at that time the only port in Louisiana.

But what is the object of all the arguments of the minister of the United States?

To dissuade France from taking possession of Louisiana; to prove that under her government, Louisiana never would, nor ever could flourish; that not only in relation to commerce, but also with respect to policy, the settling of Louisiana could not be profitable to her; that she would find greater advantages in securing to herself the solid friendship of the United States, than in the acquisition of a Territory which would become a source of rivalship; that she ought not to change a natural ally from a warm friend into a suspicious and jealous neighbor, &c.

What is Mr. Livingston's conclusion? That, by adopting this opinion, France would easily be able to introduce into the western country the products of her manufactures, which the United States would have no interest to prevent, every cause of rivalship between the two nations being thus removed.

What more, I ask, can be wanting to prove that the memoir relates not to the cession of New Orleans alone, but to that of the whole Territory of Louisiana?

You observe that Mr. Livingston proposes to France to cede New Orleans to the United States, to be taken possession of by them, not as an independent and sovereign State, but merely on the same colonial condition it was held in by Spain, and as it would have been held by France, had she taken and retained possession of the province.

To this I can make no other answer than that I have not been able, even on the closest examination, to discover any such thing expressed in the memoir; the word merely is not to be seen there any more than the word exclusively in the eighth article of the treaty. There is nothing in the memorial that could suggest the idea of Louisiana continuing under the colonial condition, when belonging to the United States.

You do me the honor to state, sir, that Mr. Livingston's memoir was presented to the French Government in August, 1802; and yet I read in another part of your letter that it was written at a time when even the treaty ceding Louisiana to France was not concluded. In this there is error of date, since the treaty of St. Ildephonso, by which Spain ceded the colony or province of Louisiana to France, was signed on the 1st of October, 1800, as is stated in the convention of 1803, and in all the other documents of that period, which gives it a date more than twenty months anterior to Mr. Livingston's memoir.

The error which you think you have found in the citation of page 32 of my letter of the 15th May does not exist. I have now the honor to send you a copy of the original memoir, addressed, in Mr. Livingston's own handwriting, to the French Government; you will there find the word possession, and not cession of Louisiana, in the paragraph alluded to.

In my letter of the 15th of May I called to mind what, even at the time of the cession, was the acknowledged value of the territory ceded by France, and cited not only the opinions of various writers, but also those of several distinguished members of Congress. To this you reply that, "all those estimates were formed under impressions that the extent of the Louisiana cession was vastly more comprehensive than the subsequent declarations and efforts of the French Government would have made it."

I do not know to what subsequent declarations you allude.

In the first article of the treaty it is expressly stated that the French Government cedes Louisiana, "in order to give the United States a remarkable proof of friendship." In all their subsequent declarations I find expressions of the same good will and friendly dispositions, combined with a sense of justice, from which even friendship should never depart. As to the efforts of the French Government, as you do not specify them nor indicate of what description they were, I wish to persuade myself, sir, that you thereby allude to those efforts which, on more than one important occasion within the last forty-three years, France has taken a pleasure in making to promote the prosperity of these United States.

What were the real motives which induced the French Government not to retain Louisiana? I see no other, nor can discover any, but those expressed in the treaty, and, therefore, shall not discuss this point. I can, however, assert that France has, at all times, proved that she could do much for her friends, and had little fear of her enemies. For this reason, "the opinion so forcibly urged in the memoir of Mr. Livingston" has made but little impression on my mind; and if such a question were not irrelevant to the present subject of discussion, I believe that I could easily show that France could have retained her Territory of Louisiana, as well in war as in peace.

I cannot conclude better than by citing, in support of my cause, the words of a celebrated statesman, whose opinions I have already had occasion to quote, and must be received as authority everywhere and on every occasion.

Opinion of Mr. Madison in 1794.

"The fifteenth article, Mr. Chairman, has another extraordinary feature, which, I should imagine, must strike every observer. In the treaties which profess to put us on the footing of the most favored nation, it is stipulated that, where new favors are granted to a particular nation, in return for favors received, the party claiming the new favor shall pay the price of it. This is just and proper, where the footing of the most favored nation is established at all. But this article gives to Great Britain the full benefit of all privileges that may be granted to any other nation, without requiring from her the same equivalent privileges with those granted by such nation. Hence it would happen, that, if Spain, Portugal, or France, should open their colonial ports to the United States, in consideration of certain privileges in our trade, the same privileges would result gratis and ipso facto to Great Britain."*

The present claim of France is the same, or, rather, it is better, since it grows not out of a commercial convention, but out of a contract of sale; and since France has, in fact, already paid for her privilege, while England, in the instance cited, would have given no consideration. Still, however, Mr. Madison says that England must, by the terms of the article, obtain, gratis and ipso facto, every right or privilege granted to any other nation, whether gratuitously or for an equivalent; from all which I conclude, sir, that France has a right to enjoy gratis and ipso facto the privilege reserved to her by the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty.

When so able an advocate as Mr. Madison has taken up my defence, I need say no more.

I have the honor, &c., &c.,

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

N. B. Mr. de Neuville is far from desiring to protract the discussion to an indefinite length. In case, therefore, Mr. Adams should persist in the opinion expressed in the conclusion of his letter, (15th of May,) and it should be possible to come to an understanding on the other points in dispute, Mr. de Neuville would propose a provisional arrangement to the following effect:

The right accruing to France from the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty shall be settled in a special negotiation, which the two Governments shall enter into without delay.

[Translation.]

WASHINGTON, July 3, 1821.

M. de Neuville has received Mr. Adams' note of the 27th June, and will have the honor to answer it hereafter; at present he thinks it proper merely to observe, that he has never proposed but one and the same basis, namely: the reduction of the discriminating duties.

Besides, without accepting, without rejecting any proposition, and well convinced of its being, in more than one respect, urgent to close the discussion, Mr. de Neuville is prepared to make or to receive a definitive proposal. He will willingly make the offer if the Federal Government desire it. He will state, upon every point, how far his Government is willing to go; and it will thus be known at once, by both parties, if there be any chance of conciliation, or of coming to an understanding. Mr. de Neuville, still believes it to be not only possible, but easy. Both loyalty and a sense of duty require of him, however, from the nature of his late instructions, to request Mr. Adams, as a previous step, to inform him of the President's decision in relation to the ships Apollon, Eugene, and Neptune.

From what Mr. Adams stated to Mr. de Neuville on the 30th of May, he has every reason to believe that the accommodation of these three matters will not be attended with any difficulty, and that it will be as honorable to the two countries as satisfactory to his Majesty's Government; but he cannot any longer defer informing his court of the determination of the Federal Government upon this subject. Mr. Roth, secretary of his Majesty's legation, will take his departure for France in ten or twelve days. Mr. de Neuville still flatters himself that it will be in his power to announce to his court, that all the difficulties which have arisen between the two nations have been removed, definitively or provisionally.

Mr. de Neuville sees nothing, absolutely nothing, that can form a serious obstacle, and flatters himself with the idea that he is not alone of this opinion.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 5, 1821.

The Secretary of State has submitted to the consideration of the President of the United States the note which he had the honor of receiving from the Baron de Neuville, dated the 3d instant; and, by direction of the President, he informs the Baron de Neuville that he is ready to receive any proposition which his excellency may think proper to make, as well with regard to the commercial negotiation as to the cases of the Apollon, the Neptune, and the Eugene. He is happy to add the assurance that, whatever the propositions may be, they will be received with the most earnest and anxious desire that they may lead to an adjustment honorable and satisfactory to both parties.

---

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, August 13, 1821.

SIR: Your letter of the 3d instant has been laid before the President of the United States, and has received his most deliberate consideration. He thinks the present state of the commerce and navigation between the United States and France a subject of importance to both countries; so important, especially to the United States, that he not only believes its adjustment will be most easily effected by separating it from the consideration of all others, but that the settlement of any other interest will best be promoted by postponing it to that.

I am, therefore, directed to waive, for the present, any reply to your note of 30th June last, relating to the claim under the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty, with the assurance that, although the opinion maintained on the part of the United States concerning it remains unshaken, yet the discussion will hereafter be resumed, and a reply given to the above mentioned note of 30th June last, whenever it may be desired by you or your Government.

I am also directed to abstain from any present reply to your remarks on the note which I had the honor of addressing to you on the 28th of last month, relating to the case of the Apollon. If, after the explanations already given in the correspondence with you, and those which it appears, by a despatch from Mr. Gallatin of 23d June, the substance of which I had the honor of communicating to you, he was preparing to make directly to your Government, it shall hereafter be judged necessary to resume the discussion, I shall ever be ready to give any further explanations which the subject may require.

In the mean time I am instructed to say, with reference to your proposal on the question of navigation, that the opinion heretofore expressed, of the inefficacy of any proportional reduction of the discriminating duties imposed in France and in the United States, respectively, upon merchandise imported into one of those countries, in the vessels of the other, is yet retained. It is believed that a duty of 1½ per cent. on the value of the article at the place of exportation, to be levied in the United States upon articles imported from France, additional to the duties upon the same article when imported in vessels of the United States; and in France, upon importations from the United States, in American vessels, beyond those collected upon the same articles when imported in French vessels, would, in its operation, place the vessels of the two nations in fair and equal competition for the carriage of the trade.

Or, if you prefer it, I am ready to agree to a similar discriminating duty upon the bulk of the article, and propose that the additional duty be of $1 50 upon every American ton measure of French articles imported here in French vessels; and of nine francs upon every ton, French measure, of American merchandise, imported into France in American vessels; and no other discriminating duty or surcharge to be allowed on either side. Should you agree to either of these proposals, and will have the goodness to signify it to me, I will immediately communicate to you the draught of an article of a convention for carrying it into effect. An article for the restoration of deserting seamen would also be consented to. If these offers meet your approbation, I should be happy to sign with you, in the course of this present week, a convention to be confined to these two articles, and to the term of two years. This arrangement, experimental on both sides, would restore the direct commercial intercourse between the two countries, now unhappily interrupted, and would give time to both to mature, before the expiration of the term, a system which may be satisfactory to both.

I have the honor of inclosing a copy of the document from the Treasury, referred to in one of my former notes, and request you, sir, to accept the renewed assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

His Excellency Mr. HYDE DE NEUVILLE,
Envoy Extraordinary, &c.

Baron de Neuville to the Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

WASHINGTON, August 15, 1821.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 13th instant, and now hasten to answer it.

From the nature of my instructions I cannot conclude any commercial arrangement without having previously settled the three affairs in which our national honor is interested.

Being, however, informed that the principal question (relative to the Apollon) is under treaty in Paris, I consider myself as justified in taking upon myself to lay it aside for the moment.

This course is prescribed by my respect for this Government and for my own, and it accords with the spirit of conciliation which has never ceased to influence me in the course of the negotiation which his Majesty has been pleased to commit to my charge. I am therefore prepared, as already stated in my letter of the 3d instant, to settle, conditionally, the commercial question.

My instructions do not allow me to detach entirely the Louisiana question from that which relates to commerce and navigation. At the same time my Government, with its usual spirit of propriety and justice, has considered that, in case the two negotiators should not come to an understanding on the Louisiana question, it would be the interest of both countries not to make this an insurmountable obstacle in the general course of the negotiation.

It is believed that in such case neither party can have a right to claim the exclusive privilege of interpreting the clause in question, whence it becomes proper to leave the settlement of this difficulty to a future negotiation to be established for that express purpose.

This is the only footing upon which I can admit the separation of the two aforementioned affairs.

It is not in my power, sir, to accept your proposal; my instructions positively forbid it, and I do not hesitate to assure you that either arrangement would prove the utter ruin of French shipping, so far, at least, as regards its relations with this country. I am persuaded the Federal Government desires no such thing, and therefore flatter myself that, after a thorough investigation of the business, it will remain satisfied that his Majesty's Government cannot negotiate upon such terms without abandoning all hope of reviving the shipping of France. Both the King and the nation design to re-establish it upon a proper footing, nor can this Government have a contrary desire.

France, in all this, does no more than what has been done by England, at all times, and by the United States from the 20th of July, 1789. She strives to encourage her navigation, and to revive her shipping, which had sustained great losses in the last thirty years; but, far from pretending to attain this desirable end at the expense of other nations, she offers to them all a reciprocity of advantages. Can anything more be expected?

To conclude, I shall now, without further discussion, propose the substance of a temporary arrangement which I would undertake to sign, under the express reservation mentioned in my letter of the 3d instant.

In case it should not be accepted, I shall consider myself bound to await further instructions from my Government.

1. The law of the 15th of May, and the royal ordonnance of the 26th of July, shall be revoked.
2. The Louisiana question shall be the subject of a future negotiation, to be established for that express purpose.
3. The consuls of both nations shall be invested with proper authority over deserting seamen.
4. The duties of tonnage, and all other collections made by public authority upon vessels in the respective ports, shall be regulated upon the footing of a perfect reciprocity.
5. The extra duties imposed at present upon a foreign flag shall, in both countries, suffer the following reduction, viz: Of one-third, if the convention remain in force from two to five years; of one- half, if the arrangement be only temporary, and last only for eighteen months or two years, at the option of the Federal Government.

6. The extraordinary duties collected in consequence of the law of the 15th of May, and of the ordinance of July 26, shall be returned.*

Having stated above what I should take upon myself, I now deem it necessary (even for my own responsibility) to add the following explanation:

If I considered nothing but the commercial interests of France, I certainly should not consent to a reduction of more than a third part of the duties; for I am convinced that, in the present state of our shipping, such a reduction would be more than sufficient to maintain an equal balance and a reciprocity of advantages; but I am influenced in this business by other considerations important to both countries. It is my opinion, that, if the arrangement should not be concluded at once, it must, of necessity, be postponed to the next year, and perhaps much longer; and it is to be feared that difficulties will increase, and both countries must suffer a great loss from a state of things from which other nations would reap great profits, without any ultimate advantage either to France or to the United States.

For this reason I have made up my mind to assume much upon my own responsibility, and to propose an experiment, from which the shipping of France will not, in all probability, derive any advantage. I should, however, be happy to have proposed it, if it should lead the two Governments to a general accommodation upon all points, and if it should bring them to a mutual understanding concerning their respective interests, whether considered separately or connectedly.

Accept, sir, &c., &c., &c.,

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

P. S. It would be laying me under obligation to inform me, as soon as possible, of the decision of the President.

Mr. Adams to the Baron de Neuville.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, August 20, 1821.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 15th instant, which has been submitted to the consideration of the President of the United States, and to which, by his directions, I now reply.

With regard to the cases of the Apollon, the Neptune, and the Eugene, I shall be ready to resume the discussion by further explanations, in reply to your last note on the subject, should you deem it desirable, after receiving the further instructions of your Government.

The same observation is made with reference to the claim to special privileges in Louisiana. Although the opinion of this Government has been fully made up upon this subject, on great consideration, and has remained unchanged, notwithstanding the frequent examinations which have been given of it, yet I shall always receive any communications which your Government may think proper to make on it, and to bestow on them all the attention which has been invariably shown and is due to the friendly relations existing between our countries.

The first, third, and fourth, of your propositions will be readily agreed to, and also the sixth, if you persist in desiring it. Not, however, with a view to the advantage of the United States, as we should prefer the convention without it.

To the fifth we cannot accede. The extreme of the reduction which you propose, a reduction of the discriminating duties on both sides by one half, would leave a surcharge upon the vessels of the United States of from six to ten dollars a ton, according to the various articles with which they might be laden. This would be a prohibitory duty, as effectual as that which now exists, or would lead the shippers of the United States, under the appearance of an equal compact, into the same ruinous expeditions which occasioned the necessity of the act of Congress of 15th May, 1820.

It is deeply regretted that the view which your Government takes of this subject is so widely different from that which is entertained by the Government of the United States. In the communication of this view we have acted with the utmost sincerity and candor. In the whole correspondence between us, as well as in that of Mr. Gallatin, which had preceded it, ours have been unfolded in a very explicit manner. The calculations of Mr. Gallatin, particularly, which accompanied his letter and note of 7th and 8th of July, 1820, to Baron Pasquier, and the accuracy of which has not been questioned, show to demonstration that a diminution of one half the surcharges on American vessels in France would still leave a discrimination against them nearly equal to the entire freight.

I infer, from the communication which you have made me of the nature of your powers, that it will be necessary for you to wait further instructions from your Government before we can make any arrangement of these important interests. I mention this to assure you that, should such recurrence to your Government be necessary, I shall be happy to resume the discussion whenever it may suit your convenience.

I pray you to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Mr. HYDE DE NEUVILLE,

Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from France.

Baron de Neuville to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, October 15, 1821.

SIR: I have received fresh instructions from my Government, requiring me to insist upon the execution of the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty, or to demand, at least, that in the mean time our shipping be made to enjoy, in the ports of the territory ceded by France, all the privileges and advantages which are granted in the same ports to such nations as have no treaty or convention with the United States.

* This last article may be omitted if desired, but it would seem, in all respects, to be very proper, and, on one account it would be more advantageous to this Government than to France.

On this subject I must again refer to my letter of the 30th of March last.

Considering, however, that at the date of these instructions my Government was not informed of the present state of the negotiation, and being solicitous to make all possible exertions for the removal of every difficulty to the negotiation, I have the honor again to propose, (in case you should persist in your opinion on the Louisiana question, as I adhere to mine,) that we enter into the agreement suggested in my letters of June 30 and August 3.

Accept, &c.,

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

Baron de Neuville to the Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

WASHINGTON, March 11, 1822.

SIR: I have the honor of inclosing some observations which I must request you will have the goodness of submitting to the consideration of the President.

If that exposé shall be found to be incorrect, I shall thankfully accept the communication of whatever can contribute to rectify any mistake I may have fallen into; for truth is my only object, and my sole desire is to conciliate the interests of the two countries.

But if my calculations be correct; if I can adduce in support of them the most authentic documents and past experience, may I not hope that undeniable facts will have more weight than mere conjectures, especially in regard to an experiment—a merely temporary arrangement between the two countries?

"I hope still," said Mr. Gallatin in his letter to Baron Pasquier, October 15, "that a compromise, at least a provisional one, will be acceded to."

And I also shall repeat, (what I have never ceased to say,) let us come at least to a provisional compromise; our two nations should be united.

I have the honor, sir, to inform you that, in pursuance of the instructions of my court, I am ready to resume the negotiation as soon as the President shall deem it proper. I believe that it may be concluded, upon all points, both speedily and upon proper terms. It is also my opinion that it must soon come, in one way or other, to a conclusion.

I earnestly and very sincerely desire that the present state of things may be put an end to before the close of the present session, were it even necessary therefor that France should make real sacrifices, for it has already lasted too long. I shall only take the liberty of repeating that even a temporary arrangement must, in order to lead to a more lasting settlement, approximate as much as possible to an equality of advantages.

Accept, &c.,

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

FACTS.

FACTS.

1. In the years 1789 and 1790 the Government of the United States thought proper to establish discriminating duties for the purpose of encouraging their rising navigation. (a)

(a) On the discrimination between the duty on the tonnage of foreign and American bottoms a great degree of sensibility was discovered, there not being a sufficient number of vessels owned by the citizens of the United States to export all the produce of the country. It was said that the increased tonnage on foreign bottoms operated as a tax on agriculture and a premium to navigation. This discrimination, it was therefore contended, ought to be very small.—(Marshall's Life of Washington.)

In answer to these arguments Mr. Madison said: If it is expedient for America to have vessels employed in commerce at all, it will be proper that she have enough to answer all the purposes intended; to form a school for seamen; to lay the foundation of a Navy, &c. I consider an acquisition of maritime strength essential to this country; granting a preference to our own navigation will insensibly bring it forward to that perfection so essential to American safety.—(Madison's Speech on Discriminating Duties.)

Congress, very soon after the organization of the present Government, adopted measures to secure for the citizens of the United States the advantages which would arise from a monopoly of the tonnage required for their commerce.—(Seybert, page 292.)

The acts of the American Government alarmed the shipping interest in Great Britain. In 1791 the merchants and ship owners in Glasgow predicted that the discriminations adopted in the United States would, in time, give a decided superiority to the American shipping. In a few years it was demonstrated that their anticipations were well founded.—(Seybert, page 293.)

Before the discriminating duties the American tonnage was not sufficient for the conveyance of the produce of the United States. In a short time it proved more than adequate for that purpose.—(Marshall's Life of Washington.)

1. In 1816 France judged it expedient to follow this example in order to repair the losses sustained by her navigation during twenty-five years of revolution. (a)

(a) Whilst the late political storms were almost desolating the civilized world, the vessels belonging to France, Holland, and Spain were except from the ocean; in proportion as the tonnage of these nations diminished, that of other States was augmented, and none in a greater degree than our own. Foreign nations will make every effort to regain the navigation that the last wars had taken from them. We must anticipate a reduction on our part.—(Seybert, page 305.)

Here it is proper to observe that our discriminating duties were consequential to the system first established by the United States and which was not adopted by France until many years after.—(Extract—General Council of Commerce, Paris, November 23, 1819.)

France, therefore, was not influenced by any hostile views; she did no more than follow the example first set by the United States, and she could not do otherwise without abandoning completely the interests of her navigation.

The present state of the shipping of France is attributable to the long continued interruption of her maritime operations and to the losses sustained in consequence thereof, both in men and in all the materials necessary to the building and equipment of vessels.—(Extract from the Memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Nantes.) The commercial shipping of several nations had obtained a prodigious increase, while that of France was prostrate. It became, therefore, the indispensable duty of her Government, on the re-establishment of peace, to protect its weakness by granting every proper encouragement.

It is proper to observe here, with respect to the United States of America, that in all this France did no more than what had been long before practiced in that country to the injury of the shipping of France.

2. In the year 1789, out of 224 vessels sent from the United States to France, there were 43 English, 163 Americans, and but 13 French.

In 1790 the statements drawn from custom-house accounts were nearly to the same effect.

In 1791, in consequence of the discriminating duties established by Congress, France had lost, in the course of a single year, one-half of their proportion of the tonnage employed in the trade with the United States. (a)

3. In 1789 and 1790 the United States enjoyed several gratuitous advantages (b) granted to this Republic by his Majesty Louis XVI; there could not, therefore, be any call for defensive measures, so far, at least, as regarded France. (c)

4. On the 20th July, 1789, Congress established an extra duty upon all foreign bottoms entering into the ports of the United States.

On the 20th July, 1790, that duty was doubled.

On the 10th of August, 1790, an extra duty of 10 per cent. additional on all the rates of duty imposed on merchandises imported in American vessels was imposed on foreign vessels. (Those acts constitute what are usually called the discriminating duties of the United States.)

It is, therefore, clear that in 1789 and 1790 the United States set the example of imposing dis-

2. In 1816, before our law of the 28th April was enacted, the tonnage of France employed in the trade between the two countries was reduced nearly to nothing.

In 1820, after our surtax had been four years established, the tonnage of the United States employed in the trade was still superior to ours. (a)

3. In 1816, and preceding years, France was not only without any gratuitous favor from the United States, but she moreover had paid, during nearly twenty-six years, very heavy duties upon the productions of her soil and industry, besides a surtax which had almost entirely excluded her shipping from the carriage of her principal articles. (b)

4. In 1789 and 1790, and the following years, the Government of France made representations (as will be seen hereafter) against the acts of Congress of July 20, 1789, and July 20, 1790, as being contrary to the text, the spirit, and the very object of the treaty of the 6th of February, 1788.

France might, from that time, have followed the example of the United States; and perhaps she ought to have done so for the protection of her commercial shipping.

The merchants of France repeatedly desired it to be done. The agents of the King, in the United

All foreign nations were affected by the system we had adopted; it seemed to operate like magic in favor of the ship owners in the United States.—(Seybert, page 294.)

Mr. Randolph said, on the subject of the Louisiana treaty, that that province might, in the end, obtain the enjoyment of the advantages secured to the other States by the discriminating duties.—(Debate of October 25, 1803.)

"We now have the sovereignty of it, and only stipulate that for twelve years France and Spain should be admitted, not on an equal footing with us, but that their vessels, laden with their own produce, not otherwise, should pay no higher duties than our own. At the expiration of that period we can give a decided preponderance to our own trade by discriminating duties."

Mr. R. Griswold says, on the same day:

"If, however, it is really intended in this sideway manner to bring about a repeal of the discriminating duties, I hope it may, at this time, be so understood. The commerce of this country, and particularly that of the northern States, has long flourished under these protecting duties, and it would be extraordinary, indeed, if a treaty should be formed laying the Government under an obligation to repeal laws so essential to our commercial prosperity."

It is, therefore, obvious that the discriminating duties were ever considered in the United States as the best means of encouraging navigation. It is true that those discriminating duties did not alone raise the shipping of the United States to that extraordinary degree of prosperity which it has at this day attained. Events fatal to humanity, and which might have been foreseen in 1790, must have contributed to that state of things which is really out of all proportion; but, even with the revolution in France, what would have been the condition of the navigation of the United States without the aid of the discriminating duties established in 1790?

(a) From 13,435 tons, the tonnage of France employed in the trade fell down to 7,523.

The tonnage duties collected upon foreign bottoms from September to the 31st of December of the last year had risen to $50,000, while those levied upon American vessels did not amount to more than $11,000. Even this proportion, from five to one, did not appear sufficient to the merchants and shippers of the northern States; those of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, made a memorial asking Congress to double the existing duty of fifty cents per ton upon foreign bottoms.—(Extract from a note of Mr. Olo, dated May 20, 1790.)

It is well known that, notwithstanding this great difference of five to one, the duty was, in fact, doubled on the 20th of July following.

(b) Vide the treaties and conventions of 1778, 1782; letter from Mr. de Calonne to Marquis La Fayette, January 9, 1784; the same to Mr. Jefferson, October 22, 1786; decree of the council, 1788.

These various documents prove how much his Majesty was disposed to favor the commerce and navigation of the United States.

(c) It has been stated that the discriminating duties had been established by Congress as a mere defensive measure, necessary to counteract the operation of similar discrimina-

Odrier, Outequin, Duvergier de Hauranne, Simon de la Roche, Pilliet, Will, Dellessert, Perrier, Balguerrie, Stutenberg, Cottier, Terneaux, Rosseau, Guirard, Leillieres, Lefebvre. A particular statement of the arrival of cotton at Havre, from the United States, in American and French bottoms, during the years 1818, 1819, and the first five months of 1820, shows a much greater number of American than of French arrivals: and that the quantity of cotton by them brought is also much greater than that imported in French bottoms; and although the proportions of French arrivals had increased in 1819 and 1820, yet the difference (with respect to the number of bales imported) had still remained in favor of American vessels. Besides those cottons, the Americans have imported a considerable quantity of sugar, mankeens, coffee, tea, pepper, potash, &c., while the cargoes of the French vessels, whose tonnage is in general much less, consisted principally in cotton. We have, therefore, ground to conclude that our system of duties on foreign shipping does not operate as much to the disadvantage of the United States, as has by them been asserted, as a justification of their last measures.

JOSEPH NOURSE.

(b) The following is an extract from a note written by a merchant in this country experienced in such matters:

"The additional tenth collected upon foreign bottoms amounts to a prohibition in the United States in regard to the principal articles; for brandies pay, per gallon, 4 cts. 80-100.

"The customary freight is from $12 to $15 per ton, which, per gallon, gives, say at most 6.

"A French vessel could not, therefore, obtain any share in the carriage except for a freight equal to the difference, amounting only to, per gallon, 1 ct. 20-100.

"On silks and other articles of our manufacture the case is still worse; for setting the duty upon the average at 20 per cent. of their value, the additional tenth would amount to 2 per cent.

"And in order to make this difference equal, at this rate, to the usual freight of $15 per ton, each ton of such manufactured goods must be valued only at $750, including the tenth generally added; whereas, it would be absurd to give so low a value even to the more bulky of those articles, such as crapes, fancy goods," &c., &c. criminating duties for the encouragement of their shipping.

These discriminating duties, which in the course of twenty years raised the tonnage of the Union so as to be equal to that of Great Britain, (a) one century after they had passed the navigation act, were supported in 1789 and 1790 by the most enlightened and influential men in the United States; no one pretended, at that time, to deny the right of every nation to encourage its navigation and commerce by discriminating duties, provided they apply to all nations.

"We shall not think it unfriendly in you to lay a like duty on coasters, because it will be no more than we have done ourselves. You are free, also, to lay that or any other duty on vessels coming from foreign ports, provided they apply to all other nations, even the most favored. We are free to do the same under the same restriction."—(Extract of a letter from Mr. Jefferson, Secretary of State, to Mr. Otto, Chargé d'Affaires of France, dated March 29, 1791.)

5. The 1st of July, 1812, an additional duty, amounting to one dollar and fifty cents per ton, was laid by Congress upon all foreign vessels entered in the ports of the United States.

6. The 3d of July, 1815, Congress repealed "so much of the acts heretofore passed imposing a discriminating duty on goods imported, and on tonnage in favor of vessels of the United States, so far as the same respects the produce or manufacture of the nation to which such foreign vessels may belong. Such repeal to take effect in favor of any nation whenever the President shall be satisfied that the discriminating or countervailing duties of such foreign nation, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States, have been abolished."—(Extract from a note on the subject, from Mr. Gallatin, July, 7, 1820.)

The United States have concluded treaties upon this principle with Great Britain and Sweden, and have made arrangements of the same nature with the Netherlands, Prussia, and the Hanseatic towns, in consequence of the mutual repeal of all surtaxes.

The trade of the United States with Russia, Spain, Portugal, and Italy, being entirely passive tions, as well of France as of other powers.—(Vide Mr. Adams' note of June 27, 1821.)

This is manifestly an error, at least with regard to France. All the documents of that period, and the speeches delivered in Congress in 1790, preclude all doubt on the subject.

It was repeatedly proposed to exempt France from the surtax, and motives of justice and gratitude were alleged in support of the proposition; it was opposed on the principles of the general interests of the State—of those in particular of its navigation—and the difficulty of raising a sufficient revenue. But no one made even the most distant allusion to defensive measures.

"We feel every disposition on our part to make considerable sacrifices where they could result to the sole benefit of your nation, but where they would excite from other nations corresponding claims it becomes necessary to proceed with caution."—(Extract from a letter of Mr. Jefferson, March 29, 1791.)

It remains evident that in 1790 there was no idea of resorting to defensive measures against France.

Two acts of the National Assembly of France have been cited as injurious to the interests of this Republic.

These two laws, relating, the one to tobacco, the other to the sale of foreign vessels in France, had no particular relation to the United States and nothing that could excite complaint. At all events, it will be observed that they were not enacted until March, 1791, and therefore could not have been taken into consideration by Congress in 1789 and 1790.

See likewise Mr. Jefferson's letter to Mr. Otto, dated December 29, 1790.

(a) In 1788 the tonnage of Great Britain and Ireland amounted to 1,359,752 tons. In 1809 the tonnage of the United States amounted to 1,350,281 tons.—(See Mr. Pherson's Annals of Commerce, vol. 4.) (See Seybert, page 294.)

States, proposed it; and complaints against the discriminating duties imposed by the United States were, from all parts, addressed to the French Government. (a)

The interests of the country called for such a measure. (b) His Majesty's Government consulted, however, and would consider nothing but the situation of a friendly power requiring her to encourage her navigation. It refused to enact any countervailing measures, and the United States continued to enjoy in our ports the same favors and privileges before granted to them by his Majesty.

5. Thus France paid, in the ports of the United States, an extra duty of $1 50, besides the ordinary duties, and she did not on that account increase hers.

The tonnage duty paid by American vessels on their arrival in France did not amount (before the law of May 15 and July 26, 1820) to more than 3f. 75c. and with the additional decime 4f. 12½c. ($0 77.)

6. To the opposite paragraph France will answer: Every nation acts, and should act, with a view to its particular local or accidental situation.

Some have no Navy, or do not care to have any; others, whose Navy is in a settled state of prosperity, may, for the purpose of securing a great commercial advantage, submit, in point of navigation, to a sacrifice unimportant to them. Such countries must have very different views on the subject from a nation which feels the want of a naval force and which has the intention and the means of creating one corresponding with the extent of her power.

If, as Mr. Madison observes, "it is expedient for her to have vessels employed in commerce at all, it will be proper that she have enough to answer all the purposes intended to form a school for seamen," &c. &c.

To which it may be added, in the words of Mr. Jefferson:

"This nation is free to lay any duty on vessels

(a) See Mr. Otto's letter to Mr. Jefferson, January 8, 1791.

(b) A senator admitted (in July, 1790) that if France exacted, by way of reprisals, the same duty from American bottoms, these would have to pay six times more than French vessels did to the United States; but added, that he did not doubt but France would take into consideration the motives of urgent necessity which called for the measure.

as regards those different countries, the United States were not interested in taking measures to obtain the same object from them. France remained the only nation with which it was important to have such an understanding.

7. In 1790 France expostulated against the extra duty imposed in the United States upon foreign bottoms, and which was by her considered as contrary to the very object of her treaty with this Republic. Since that time she has not ceased complaining of the enormous duties collected upon the productions of her soil and industry; but after all, France has at all times done nothing more than remonstrate.(a)

8. On the 15th of May, 1820, Congress opposed the French law of April, 1816, (which was common to all nations,) by an extra tonnage duty imposed upon French vessels alone.

"Each party remains free to lower or raise its tonnage, provided the change operates on all nations." (Mr. Jefferson's note to Mr. Otto, March 29, 1791.)

The law of the 15th May excludes (such at least is its consequence) French bottoms from the ports of the United States.

The law of the 15th of May was accompanied by a retroactive provision both unjust and ruinous to those who had sailed bona fide from France.(b)

(a) Extract of a letter written on the 10th of July, 1790, by Mr. de Montmorin, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, to Mr. Otto, Chargé d'Affaires in the United States:

"It results from these remarks, that the United States had no right to impose any duty on freights upon our vessels. Such a treatment would justify us in treating them in the same manner; but the King has judged it more consistent with propriety, and more in accordance with the relations existing between his Majesty and the United States, to remonstrate with Congress and to ask the repeal of those regulations so far as they operate against us. You will therefore please, sir, to take all necessary steps to accomplish the King's intentions. His Majesty does not doubt but Congress will acknowledge the justice of his reclamation."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Otto, dated March 29, 1791:

"Sir: The note of December 13, which you did me the honor to address to me on the acts of Congress of the 20th of July, 1789 and 1790, fixing the tonnage payable by foreign vessels arriving from a foreign port, without excepting those of France, has been submitted to the Government of the United States. They consider the conduct of his most Christian Majesty in making this the subject of fair discussion and explanation as a new proof of his justice and friendship, and they have entered on the consideration with all the respect due to whatever comes from his Majesty or his ministers."

NOTE.—It is not my intention here to bring into view the justice of the reclamation from the French Government made in 1790, and I recall what took place at that period for the sole purpose of completely justifying what was done in 1816. It will be seen that France remonstrated against the surtax imposed in 1790, not merely because she exempted American vessels from such a duty; not because she had, by several regulations very favorable to the shipping of the United States, given a greater extension to the advantages secured to the United States by the treaty of 1778, but because she considered herself as of right excepted, by the provisions of that very treaty, from the surtax imposed by Congress in July, 1789, upon foreign bottoms, and renewed on the 20th of July following, 1790. France had, therefore, more than one motive to remonstrate, and yet she was content with making amicable representations.

(b) Such vessels as were compelled to enter into the ports of the United States have been subjected to the full rigor of the law and forced to pay in cash the entire duty of $18 per ton, and were thereby under the necessity of borrowing at a very high interest. Others steered off from the coast, not knowing whither to carry their cargoes; three or four went to Florida. It is well known that they were prevented from anchoring in the territory of Spain. It is also known what has been the fate of the ship Apollon, which had anchored in the river Bell.

coming from foreign ports provided they apply to all nations," and France has never done more.

Great Britain acted according to what she thought her interest when she accepted under modifications the offer of the Federal Government; she no doubt had foreseen what would be the consequence.(a)

France also calculates what would inevitably happen if she accepted a nominal reciprocity as the basis of a treaty of commerce with the United States; she knows that such a treaty would operate to the entire exclusion of her shipping from the trade with the United States. She therefore proposes a reciprocity of advantages, which equity and, it may be added, both sound policy and reason seem obviously to point out as the only basis calculated to give a durable existence to conventions between nations.

7. In 1820 France was about to consent (this may be asserted) to a reduction of her discriminating duties, although she considered the claim of the American merchants as being unfounded, or at least premature, when intelligence was received in Paris of the act of May 15, attended with circumstances not calculated, it may be well said, to mitigate the real or apparent harshness of that measure.(b)

8. On the 26th of July, 1820, his most Christian Majesty, without, however, using his right of reprisals to a full extent, ordained measures which the act of Congress had rendered necessary, and an extra tonnage duty was therefore established upon American bottoms equal to that which had been imposed in the United States upon French vessels.

The ordinance of the 26th July exempts from the extraordinary duty such American vessels as come in ballast into the ports of France.

The ordinance of the 26th of July did not operate until the Government of his Majesty had acquired a certainty that the law of the 15th of May could not fail to be known in all the ports of the United States.

It appeared to the Government of his Majesty that, as soon as the citizens would be informed of the measure taken by their Government, it would readily occur to them that their vessels would be treated in like manner in our ports, and it was therefore decided that a rigorous measure, intended merely as defensive, and adopted with regret, should not affect such vessels as had sailed bona fide from the United States.(c)

(a) It is well known that the United States have at this day the seven-eighths of the tonnage employed in their trade with Great Britain. (See the last general statement showing the quantity of American and foreign tonnage presented to Congress by the Treasury Department.)

(b) Extract of a letter from Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State, dated Paris, January 20, 1820:

"I have now the honor to inclose the copy of Mr. Pasquier's long promised answer on the subject of our commercial relations, which was not received till after I had closed my last despatch to you. I am confirmed in the opinion that nothing will be done here until we shall have done justice to ourselves by our own measures."

Extract of the above mentioned letter from Mr. Pasquier to Mr. Gallatin, January 14, 1820:

"As soon, therefore, as the various points of information indispensably necessary to guide the decision of his Majesty's Government, as well in relation to the two stipulations proposed in your note as to the other clauses which it may be found expedient to insert in the intended convention, shall have been collected, I will lose no time in entering with you into more particular discussions, and I have every reason to believe that I may be enabled to do so speedily.

(c) The ordinance was modified in favor of such vessels as had entered bona fide; they were admitted to give bonds of security; such as left the coast of France found many neighboring countries to which they could carry and sell their cargoes; such as placed themselves on the very limits of our law were not molested, and to this day we still receive the productions of the United States through Nice and other places very near to France, from which the ordinance of July operates very differently from the act of 15th of May.

France and the United States considered in their relations of navigation and commerce since the law of France of April 28, 1816, until the passage of the act of Congress of May 15, 1820.

9. In the United States the discriminating duties were of one-tenth paid by French vessels over and above the duties paid by American vessels upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, without distinction. That duty is paid in the United States since the 10th of August, 1790.

10. The discriminating duties established by Congress in 1790 have never ceased to secure to the vessels of the United States an almost exclusive preference with respect to all cargoes shipped from France to the United States, so that French vessels were always obliged, before the act of the 15th of May, to come in ballast to the United States.

11. The Americans enjoyed in France the resources derived from the transit, and as, in such cases, they paid no discriminating duty and could load their vessels for a lower freight, they were always preferred, even by French merchants, for the carriage of goods destined to be sent to Switzerland and Germany.

The Americans brought freely to France the productions of the East and West Indies, and those of several other countries. They could likewise re-export, free of duty, the foreign productions brought into the deposits (entrepôts established in France.)

12. Freight.—It has been asserted that the Americans ruined themselves in taking cotton to France at a freight of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  cent per pound, while French shippers received  $2\frac{1}{2}$  and 3 cents per pound.

It is added that, in one year more, French vessels would have obtained an entire monopoly of that branch of trade.—(Mr. Gallatin's note of the 7th July, 1820.)

13. Tonnage Duty.—It has been stated that the tonnage duty, brokers' fees, and other local charges paid in France by foreign vessels might be valued at about eight francs per ton, ($1 50,) and that therefore exceeded by three francs (56 cents) the extra tonnage duty paid by French vessels in the United States before the act of the 15th of May.<sup>(a)</sup>

14. It has been stated that the law of the 15th of May was enacted for the purpose of re-establishing a just balance, or at least to prevent an inequality which could not fail to take place.

Because it is said if the state of things existing before had continued, the shippers, who were ruined by their trade with France, would soon have been left with only one-fifth of the carrying trade.—(Mr. Gallatin's note of the 7th of July, 1820.)

<sup>(a)</sup> The United States consuls have made much ado, even in the newspapers, in order to obtain the right of brokerage.

The consuls of France, who are not allowed to trade, have been content with addressing their complaints, accompanied with statements, to their Government.

The consequence is, that credit has been given here to the clamors of the first, while the silence of the last has been misconstrued.

9. In France the discriminating duties are fixed, individually, for each article, and are calculated according to the bulk, the value, and the importance of each; so that if some articles pay more, others pay less, and others pay no discriminating duty at all. It must be admitted that the duty could not rest upon a better basis, nor one more consistent with the true principles of a good system of the revenue.

The discriminating duties were first established in France on the 28th of April, 1816.

10. The discriminating duties established in France on the 28th of April, 1816, had not availed to secure to French vessels even one-half of the freights from the United States to France.

Before the act of the 15th of May, American vessels always came to France with full cargoes.

11. The commerce and navigation of France enjoyed nothing in the United States to compensate the very important advantages granted to the Americans in France, as mentioned in the opposite paragraph.

"It is well known that there is no allowance of the drawback of duties for the amount of the additional duties on goods imported in foreign bottoms."

12. Freight.—The difference was, in fact, of only one cent, and it may be said there was really none, except on freights for cotton.

If there was any difference as to tobacco, it never exceeded one half cent. This it is easy to prove; and even though the shippers of France had taken no freight at all on the exportation of the productions of its soil and industry, the monopoly in that branch of trade would have still remained to the Americans.<sup>(a)</sup>

Besides, if one year more would have sufficed to justify the measure adopted by the United States on the 15th of May, 1820, why did they not wait? France had given, for a long time, the example of moderation and patience.

13. Tonnage Duty.—The statement cited in the opposite paragraph is manifestly erroneous.<sup>(b)</sup>

The various duties there mentioned have constantly been higher in the United States than in France, and the difference in their different ports has often been exorbitant.

After all, by way of removing all difficulty on this point, France has proposed to fix the tonnage duty in both countries, including all local charges, at a particular sum.

It is also offered to fix such specific duty (including all charges) on the American basis, and not on that of France—id est, the average of what foreign bottoms pay in the United States.

14. To this it is answered, as before stated, that the injury was only anticipated, and that there was therefore no harm in waiting.

It may be added, even admitting that French shipping would, in the end, have obtained an advantage in the carrying trade from the United States to France, it is not perceived how such an advantage could give it the four-fifths of the carrying trade between the two countries. Most as-

15. It is, however, admitted that the act of the 15th of May was not sufficiently matured; that, though the principle upon which it was enacted be indisputable, there were some errors in the calculations then made that the duty of $18 per ton, superadded to the former surtax of an additional tenth upon all articles imported in French ships, amounts to more than the surtax collected in France upon American vessels.

It is calculated that the balance in France against American shipping amounted, before the 15th of May, 1820, to 46 francs 50 centimes per ton, French measure. It is allowed that the act of the 15th of May raises the balance in the United States against French vessels to 40 francs 8 centimes per ton, American measure, or 37 francs per ton, French measure; and, finally, it is added:

Although French merchants have been justly alarmed at the consequence of the act of the 15th of May, and although the Government of his Majesty has had cause to regret that since the United States only contended for reciprocity, they had not been satisfied with equalizing the duties, still, however, there is nothing offensive or hostile to be found in that measure.—(Mr. Gallatin's note of the 7th July, 1820.)

surely, the shippers of the United States would still have continued to engross all the freights between France and the United States, and, also, that of such foreign productions as they were at liberty to import into France.

This last and immense advantage was not, perhaps, sufficiently appreciated when the act of May 15 was passed.

15. It results, at least, from the calculations cited in the opposite paragraph, that the merchants of France may have been justly alarmed, and that the Government of the King has had cause of complaint against the act of the 15th of May.

To which it is added, that, even admitting the difference of freights to have been (before the act of the 15th of May, 1820,) of 46f. against American vessels, it is not perceived upon what principle it can have appeared proper to place the first ally and constant friend of the United States upon a worse footing than such nations as go so far as to exclude the vessels of the United States from their ports.

Extract from "the act supplementary to an act to regulate the duties of import and tonnage:"

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That on all foreign ships or vessels which shall be entered in the United States before the 30th day of June next from any foreign port or place to and with which vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to go and trade, there shall be paid a duty at the rate of $2 per ton."—January 14, 1819.

It will, furthermore, be asked, for what reason, when the extra duty of $18 per ton was laid upon French vessels, it was not provided, at least, that they should be exempted therefrom in all the ports of the territory ceded by France, (Louisiana?)

It is known that, according to the terms of the treaty of cession, the vessels of France are, in future and forever, to be treated in Louisiana upon the footing of the most favored nation, and, a fortiori, they must never be there upon the footing of the nation least favored or treated worse.

But, after all, his Majesty's Government has perceived nothing hostile in the measure of the 15th of May; it has caused both surprise and regret, and, if measures of reprisals have been taken, they are extremely moderate, and France has not discontinued to evince, as before, her friendly dispositions and her sincere desire of coming to an arrangement upon the basis of a perfect reciprocity of advantages.

Calculations will now be opposed to those of the opposite paragraph.

But what are calculations compared with facts? (a)

(a) The following statement is from a merchant of New York. It is submitted without alteration, as coming from one who is experienced in such matters, who is friendly to both countries, and understands perfectly well their commercial relations. It is, however, believed that the question might be presented in a light more favorable to the interests of France:

"As it is very probable that the actual state of our commercial relations with France will be one of the first subjects of discussion in Congress, it is doubtless desirable that the basis of the controversy should be well understood by the public at large.

This appears to me so much the more important, as I have not seen anywhere the calculations that may have led that respectable body to pass the law imposing a duty of eighteen dollars per ton on all French vessels entering the ports of these States, and in trying myself to discover the grounds on which that law might have been enacted, I find a very different result.

From a number of statements made in France, it appears that an American vessel will upon an average carry—

750 pounds French weight per measurement ton.
Deduct 45 pounds French tare allowed by the custom-house, at 6 per cent.

705 pounds net, paying duty per American vessel, at the rate of 19 francs, 25 cents, including the additional tenth, per 100 half kilogrammes, is	francs. 135 71
On per French vessel, at francs 11.....do.	77 55

The difference for each measurement ton is, therefore, on cotton ----- francs. 58 16

And as, by a late comparison of the present American and French gold and silver coins, the average relative value of the American dollar is found to be francs 5 449-1000, we will say, francs 58 16 is ----- $10 67

Pot ashes pay, in French bottoms, 66 francs per ton less than in American vessels, and, supposing the ton in weight being equal to the measurement ton, is $12 11.

Tobacco, by French vessels, is free of duty, and pays by American vessels 11 francs per 100 kilogrammes.

If we value, therefore, the measurement ton at 1,200 half kilogrammes, the duty is $12 11 per ton.

Both these articles pay more duty than cotton; but it is well known that the quantity of American tobacco imported from this country direct, which is sold for consumption in France, is very inconsiderable; and the consumption of pot ashes has also, within a few years, been considerably reduced by the use of artificial salts.

Against this must be set off the immense quantity of produce of the East and West Indies, and other foreign produce, imported into France in American vessels, and sold there for exportation, free of duty.

This quantity we may safely set down at one-fourth of the whole quantity of goods imported into France; and of the other three-fourths it may not be unreasonable to calculate that cotton constitutes the nine-tenths and tobacco and pot ashes one-tenth—then,

25 parts of a ton pay.....	0 00
67½ parts of a ton pay, in cotton, at $10 67 per ton...	$7 20
7½ parts of a ton pay, in tobacco and pot ashes, at $12 11 per ton.....	0 91

The whole difference is, therefore, per ton, equal to... 8 11

THE DUTIES.

Considered, first, with respect to commerce; second, with regard to navigation.

Every nation has a right to raise or lower its duties as it may deem expedient for its revenue or for the encouragement of its national industry; for the same reason every nation has a right to favor its own navigation, and to impose, for that purpose, an extra or discriminating duty upon foreign navigation, provided the charge operate on all nations. But if the United States had any right to complain of the discriminating duties imposed by France in 1816, when theirs, laid in 1790, were so injurious to the navigation of France, it is at least allowable to compare the duties respectively imposed by either party upon the productions of the soil and industry of the other. We shall therefore proceed to state the principal articles of exportation of both countries, (excluding the discriminating duties,) and, to be more distinct, in the simplest form.

This question is easy to solve.

If an American planter or merchant send to France, in a French vessel, $2,000 worth of cotton and tobacco, he will have to pay for the $1,000 worth of cotton from $95 to $100—say $100.

For the $1,000 worth of tobacco—nothing.

If a French grower or merchant send to the United States, in an American vessel, $2,000 worth of brandies and wines, he will pay for the $1,000 worth of brandies from $800 to $850—say $800; for the $1,000 worth of wines from $500 to $600—say $550; $1,350.

Likewise, if a French merchant send to the United States, in an American vessel, an equal proportion, say $2,000 worth of silk and fancy goods, the duties thereon will amount, in the United States, to 15 per cent. on silks, 30 per cent. on the fancy goods—say $450.

We have given, in this statement, the principal articles of exportation and importation, and will observe—

1st. Pot ashes and rice are but of secondary importance in the amount of exports from the United States to France, though next in rank after cotton and tobacco.

2d. Rice pays but a low duty when imported in French bottoms, and “has seldom been subject to this duty; but, on the contrary, the shippers (as it has been already stated) have received several times from the Government a bounty for importing it, even in American bottoms.”

3d. The Americans have the markets of all Europe for the sale of their productions, since they are allowed in France (without paying any duty) either to re-export them or to send them to Germany and Switzerland.

4th. The French, on the contrary, are under the necessity of selling in the United States, at any price, the articles which they send there, because they cannot re-export them without paying the drawback duty, and have, besides, no ports at hand to send them to.

5th. The different articles exported by France for the United States (fancy goods for example) pay such heavy duties, and are so liable to damages and to fluctuations in value, that those who deal in them frequently suffer considerable losses, and are ruined, in the end, by the trade.

6th. There is, therefore, no possible comparison between the positive advantages resulting to the American and to the French merchants from the commercial relations of the two countries.

Navigation.

The discriminating duties have originated in both countries from the same motive, the interest of navigation.

I make no mention of rice or flour, because since the French tariff is in execution they have seldom been subject to the duty, and several times, on the contrary, the shippers have received from the Government a bounty for importing them in American bottoms. And if we reflect that a certain proportion of the cotton and ashes imported in French ports, particularly those of Bordeaux and Marseilles, sell there in bonds, we may overlook the difference of duty on the small quantity of other articles that may sell for consumption.

From this calculation it would, therefore, appear that a tonnage duty of eight dollars on French vessels would have been amply sufficient to compensate for the extra duty paid in France on goods imported in American vessels; but, at the same time, the law which imposes an additional tenth on the duties paid by goods of all kinds imported in French vessels ought to have been repealed; for that tenth being about equal to the price of freight of almost all articles imported from France, French vessels can never come to the United States with a cargo, and are therefore deprived of a very great advantage enjoyed solely by American vessels.

NOTE FROM THE SAME.

“I stated, in consequence of my first calculation, that the favor secured in France to French bottoms was equal to $8 per ton.

I shall now proceed, on the other hand, to state the advantages enjoyed by the Americans:

1. The freights on return cargoes.—Suppose they employ one-fourth of the tonnage in the trade, and estimating the amount of freight to be $12, or less, this would still give to the Americans an advantage equal to $3 per ton.

2. The importation of goods for the transit—It would be necessary, in order to calculate this advantage, to have a statement of the productions of the United States, and of those of other countries, imported by them into France, and then reported. It has not been in my power to obtain it.

From this it is clear that if a duty of $5 per ton were imposed in the United States upon French bottoms, the Americans would still have over French vessels the benefit of the transit, as well as other advantages easy to discover.

Supposing, after all, that matters should remain as they were before the discussion began, French vessels could not enter into competition unless they paid less than that duty of $5 per ton, or, what comes to the same thing, unless the difference between the duties paid by the Americans at Havre upon the productions brought by them should be equivalent to the duty of $5 per ton, and moreover to the benefit of the transit and other advantages not enumerated here.”

NOTE.—To the above calculations the following remarks are made:

1. That the return cargoes from France employed more than one-fourth of the whole American tonnage in the trade.

2. That the freight upon exports from France to the United States is generally above $12.

3. That the foreign productions carried by the Americans to France amounted to more than one-fourth of their exports to that country.

4. That the right of transit and of re-exporting free of duty such goods as are carried into the (entrepôts) deposits established in France were very considerable advantages to the Americans.

From which the difference against the Americans was reduced to much less than stated in the above note. The merchant of New York probably meant to be liberal in his calculations, in order to give more weight to his opinions and conclusions.

They cannot, therefore, be considered in any other light, since it is evident that the merchants or owners may, on both sides, avoid them by employing for the carriage of their goods or productions the vessels of the country for which they are destined.

In point of equity and reciprocity, it must be allowed that the United States have no right to complain, since France did no more in 1816 than follow the example which they themselves had set in 1790.

Let us now examine whether France has done more for the encouragement of her navigation than the United States had done for theirs.

It would appear necessary, first, to come to an understanding respecting the quantity of pounds or kilogrammes which form a ton of each species of goods. The Chambers of Commerce of France, England, and of the United States differ on this point, and so do the merchants of those different countries; even when residents of the same town they generally disagree.

It will be observed, by the way, that this difficulty, which has been the cause of so much misunderstanding, might be easily raised by fixing a precise quantity of pounds and of kilogrammes for the ton of each of the principal articles of the trade of the two countries.

The same might be done for the measurement of vessels; for much complaint has been made, as well in France as in the United States, against the arbitrary manner in which vessels are gauged in either country. Nothing can be easier than to come to some agreement on this point.

Taking, however, the average of the different calculations collected from different quarters on this question, we find the ton of cotton in France to be from 351 to 352 kilogrammes, net weight.(a.)

We say net weight on account of the deduction of six per cent. allowed at the custom-house, viz: three per cent. for tar, and three per cent. for "boussoids" or "tombre de balance."

The surtax on cotton imported in foreign vessels (including the additional decime) amounts to 16f. 50c. per hundred kilogrammes, making 58f. 8c. or $10 89 per ton.

Brandies (4th proof) which are imported in greatest quantity from France into the United States, pay 4 8-10 cents per gallon. The ton, containing from 240 to 250 gallons, pays upon an average $11 78.

From this it results that France has, for a long time, paid upon the principal article of exportation into the United States (when brought in her own vessels) a surtax much more considerable than that which is paid by the United States, (and only since the year 1816,) upon the principal article of their importations into France in their vessels.

Tobacco is, after cotton, the most important article of exportation of the United States. The surtax paid in France upon this article is 11f. per hundred kilogrammes, making 66f. or $12 37 per ton.

But it must be observed that this surtax of $12 37 cents was merely nominal with regard to the navigation of the United States; for the difference of freights received by French vessels over those received by American vessels never amounted to more than $6 per ton; most generally it has been much less, and owing to the privileges of transit and re-exportation there was often no difference at all.

We shall, however, state this difference at six dollars. Mercantile men well know that even this is too high.

The surtax upon French wines has, indeed, been diminished by the act of March, 1818; but can that be considered as an advantage conceded to France which was a mere act of justice, obtained after a lapse of many years, after repeated remonstrances, and which, besides, is still inadequate?

As to the other productions of the soil and industry of France, it is obvious that the surtax in the United States is tantamount to a sort of prohibition against French vessels, while there was none of the productions of the United States which could not be imported, and was not, in fact, imported into France in American bottoms before the ordinance of the 26th of July.

It must, moreover, be observed that several of the productions which the Americans are at liberty to carry to France (as staves, for example,) pay no discriminating duty at all.

From all the information which has been obtained from France, and in the various seaports of the United States, the following facts may be asserted as beyond all doubt:

1st. Since 1816 there has never been any material difference between the freights received by American vessels and those given to French vessels for the carriage of rice and pot ashes.

2d. On tobacco, this difference has not exceeded six dollars per ton, and has often been as small as three dollars per ton.

3d. On cotton, it cannot be valued at more than eight dollars per ton.

4th. The produce of the East and West Indies, and of other foreign countries, imported into France in American vessels, and sold there for exportation, free of duty, composed more than one-quarter of the whole quantity of goods imported by them into France.

5th. The return cargoes employed at least one-third of the tonnage engaged in the trade with France.

Upon these data, and estimating the importations of foreign productions only for two-sevenths of all the articles imported into France in American bottoms, we shall say:

Two-sevenths of a ton pay.....	$0 00
One-seventh of tobacco, at $6 per ton.....	86
Four-sevenths of cotton, &c., at $8 per ton.....	4 57

The whole difference of these calculations would therefore be..... 5 43

And supposing that the return cargoes, which we think compose one-third of the American tonnage employed in the trade, should in fact be only one-fourth, and estimating at $12 the freights from the United States to France, (while in fact they have always been from $12 to $15,) we shall have to deduct from the above $5 43..... 3 00

The balance against the Americans will only be $2 43, and they will still have the privilege of transit and other advantages already enumerated..... 2 43

It is therefore evident that calculations may easily be opposed to calculations, but it is not so easy to do away the positive results of conclusive facts, and the fact is—

(a) The ton of cotton is generally valued at from 375 to 400 kilogrammes; at 400 kilogrammes gross, it would be 376 kilogrammes net weight. But, in our opinion, that is too high an estimation, and it has appeared more correct to take the average of the different opinions obtained on the subject. The same has been done in regard to tobacco. But, at all events, nothing can be easier than to fix a standard for both countries as proposed above, which would resolve all difficulties on that score.

That France has done no more than follow the example first set by the United States; that in doing this she observed much moderation.

That, in spite of the discriminating duties, the United States had still, before the act of the 15th of May, more than half of the tonnage employed in the trade between the United States and France.

And, that the navigation of France has no share whatever in the freights of the exports from France to the United States.

To sum up, we shall say:

1st. That the tonnage of foreign nations, employed in their trade with the United States, stood thus in 1821—

Tonnage entered into the United States.....	81,226
Tonnage departing from the United States.....	83,073
Total foreign tonnage in 1821.....	164,299

2dly. And the tonnage of the United States in 1821—

Tonnage entered into the United States.....	765,098
Tonnage departing from the United States.....	804,947
Total amount of tonnage in 1821.....	1,570,045

The United States ought to be satisfied with the unparalleled progress of their navigation, and the evident effects of their discriminating duties, since their entire tonnage, of every description, only amounted, in 1789, to 201,562.

France is far from expecting the same happy results; all she wishes is to re-establish her mercantile shipping, so as to be able to place her Navy upon its proper respectable footing. France cannot, therefore, without sacrificing her navigation, consent to what is proposed by the United States. She cannot revoke her discriminating duties; she offers to reduce them, this is all she can do.

If that offer, which has been assented to by the Federal Government, should again be adopted as a basis, it would be possible to conclude an arrangement between the two countries. Such are the conciliatory dispositions which the Government of his Majesty has never ceased to evince, that it is not perceived what obstacle could prevent it from being concluded as soon as the points in which the national honor is interested shall be settled in a proper manner.

There remain, therefore, three courses to be pursued:

1st. The mutual repeal of the acts in consequence of which the direct commercial relations of the two countries have been interrupted.

2d. The mutual reduction of their respective discriminating duties in a proportion of, say —, or a surtax upon every ton of merchandise, equal in both countries.

3d. To break off the negotiation, and wait until that of the two parties which may be in error shall have been informed through the salutary influence of time and experience.

The first is the most simple and, it may be added, the most consistent with the friendly dispositions of the two nations; it would give their Governments leisure to come to a better understanding on what is required by their interests, whether viewed separately or in their reciprocal connexion.

The second would be a sort of mezzo termine—a provisional arrangement—or rather an experiment which would probably lead to the same result, but by a course which, it must be allowed, would not be as eligible as the first; for in all transactions, as well between nations as between private individuals, liberality and courtesy always prove most satisfactory in the end.

The third might possibly lead to an unhappy state of things; France would probably be under the necessity of completing the ordinance of the 26th of July to the full extent of the principle of reprisals; the United States would, in all probability, reciprocate measures of the same nature, which would lead to an almost entire interruption of their commercial relations: even indirect trade would find a different channel.

Those who calculated amiss, whether designedly or through ignorance, (and it must be allowed that in both countries there are men who are ill informed, and some who have no great inclination to promote the union of the two countries,) such men would unite to foment ill will, to awake feelings of national pride, and would seek to prove that such a state of things affected but slightly the commercial interests of the parties; they might perhaps, by their clamors and false representations, contrive to make the Governments persevere in the most injudicious and unwise course of policy they could possibly adopt; for after all, if neither party can sacrifice the interests of its navigation, they both have a real, and, it may be well said, paramount interest in being united. With this opinion the enlightened and prudent men of both nations are fully impressed. Let them, therefore, unite their efforts to remove difficulties which, in fact, must be considered as having but a secondary importance when weighed in the scale of great political interests.

NOTE.—Much has been said about certain regulations, supposed to be injurious to the progress of French navigators.

To this it might be answered, that complaints are constantly made in the United States against the imprudence of American seamen, as it appears from several articles inserted in the public prints, and particularly in the National Intelligencer.

It might be, moreover, observed, that every nation has a right to establish such regulations as it may think proper for its navigation, and to adopt such measures of safety and precaution as it may deem necessary.

Admitting, however, that, everything well calculated, it might, perhaps, be better to leave individuals to act for themselves whenever they alone are to be exposed, we would observe that even though the regulations established in France should, in their nature, be injurious to navigation, they cannot, in fact, have had any such effect, since the greater part of them are not enforced; and the Baron Portal, their Minister of the Navy, completely defeated this great objection in our presence, before several members of the general council of commerce.

The English, who are so knowing in navigation, have probably established bad maritime regulations, at least since their commercial treaty with the United States; for it appears by the public documents of this year that the United States have more than seven-eighths of the tonnage employed in the trade of the two nations.*

The English must have become very bad seamen, or it must be admitted that several real causes, which are quite independent of the art of navigation, combine to give to the American the immense advantages they have obtained over the English in the carrying trade of the two countries.

England, we must again repeat it, has calculated that if she lost on one point she would secure a profit on another; and what would France gain by consenting to the entire sacrifice of her share of the carrying trade with the United States?

Let the Americans deal with France as she does with them; she takes much of their bulky articles; let them take a corresponding quantity of wines and brandies; and there will be then something like a reciprocity in the mutual relations of the two countries.

But how, in the present state of their commercial relations, can it be expected that France will consent to adopt the basis of a nominal reciprocity?

It is certain that, under the influence of her discriminating duties, France had already succeeded in reviving in some degree her commercial shipping. It is even probable that, before two or three years, she might have obtained one-half of the carrying trade between the two countries if matters had remained in the same state as before the act of the 15th of May, 1820.

France, although she had not yet one-half of the carrying trade between the two countries has, however, from a disposition to conciliate, thought proper to propose an equal reduction by both parties of their respective discriminating duties, taken as they existed in the United States since 1790, and in France since 1816.

Without examining here the proper proportion of such reduction, we may state, without fearing to be mistaken, that if the reduction be of one-quarter, the navigation of France may (in the course of time) obtain nearly an equal share in the carrying trade.

If it be of one-third, France will have hardly one-third of the carrying trade.

And if the reduction be of one-half, France will scarcely obtain one-fourth.

Leaving it to more experienced speculators to present, if they can, the question under a more favorable aspect, we give the solution as we apprehend it, and conclude by again stating that no convention is good but such as can be lasting.

There still remains another question; it is of a delicate nature, but we shall treat it with candor, esteeming it ever best so to do.

Are the cottons of the United States (for in these lie all the difficulties) indispensable to France?

Have the Americans a right to expect that, by adhering to their basis of a nominal reciprocity, they will bring his Majesty's Government to consent to it in the end?

France wants the different productions of this Republic, but she cares much more for bonds of friendship which should keep the two countries ever united.

No union can be permanent between nations except when consistent with the interests of both parties, and especially with their national independence. One of the interests of France is the prosperity of her navigation.

Her independence requires that those of her wants which she cannot satisfy with the production of her own soil should never become indispensably necessary.

If, therefore, any foreign production, and more especially the growth of a country beyond the seas, should happen to be deemed indispensable to France, it is probable, we shall say it is indubitable, that, so soon as this is perceived, patriotism and good sense will unite to make her citizens break off such anti-national habits. A great and powerful nation should never place any branch of its national industry under the absolute dependence of a foreign power, and still less under that of uncertain events.

But this is not the case with France; and we are well persuaded that sensible and well informed men in the United States judge perfectly well her situation, her resources, and the means she possesses of securing the prosperity of her manufactures, without sacrificing her navigation.

Nothing can be indispensable to France; and, we still like to repeat it, what she principally desires of the United States is their friendship.

The union of the two countries will ever be more valuable to them than a mere nominal reciprocity; they will find in this wise policy what is their real interest: "A reciprocity of advantages."

WASHINGTON, April 5, 1822.

SIR: I have just received the report of the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives.

As that document did not come to me through any official channel, I shall refrain from noticing some grave errors relating to France; and without discussing or commenting upon the principal fact stated by the committee, viz: "That, before the act of the 15th of May, 1820, the discriminating duties paid in our ports by American vessels amounted to eighteen dollars per ton of merchandise." I have now the honor to propose, taking that statement for a basis, to reduce the surtax of France, not to one-half, nor to one-third, but even to one-fourth of that sum, and to apply that discriminating duty indistinctly to all the productions of the United States imported into France in American bottoms.

I propose this arrangement, sir, for the space of eighteen months; and in case no treaty of commerce has been concluded between the two countries before the expiration of that period, I even consent, for the following year, to retrench one-eighth from the surtax already reduced to one-fourth. As also, that the same reduction be made, from year to year, so long as neither of the two Governments shall have declared, at least six months beforehand, that it cannot continue upon the same footing.

It is, of course, understood, as a fair reciprocity, that no higher duties shall be imposed in the United * Tonnage entered into the United States from England and dependencies, in 1821: American, 387,110 tons; tonnage departed from the United States: American, 305,418 tons; total, 692,528 tons.

† Tonnage entered into the United States from England and dependencies, in 1821: English, 49,781 tons; tonnage departed from the United States: English, 31,136 tons; total, 80,917 tons.

States upon the productions of France, imported in French vessels, and that an equal reduction shall likewise be made thereon from year to year.

I have not received from the Viscount de Montmorency the instructions announced by Mr. Gallatin in his despatches, of which you were pleased to give me communication; and my opinion still remains unaltered as to the reduction which it would have been expedient to adopt for the real interest of both countries; and I therefore yield at this time to a consideration which must outweigh all others in the eye of a sincere friend to both countries, I mean the urgency for them both of re-establishing, immediately, their direct commercial relations.

In the course of one year, or of eighteen months, Mr. Sanford's law will accomplish the rest; it will establish incontrovertible facts, and thus put an end to all conjectural calculations.

I make no mention, sir, of the other points that remain to be settled, so much do I like to persuade myself that we shall readily come to an understanding upon them all.

As I mean to despatch Count d'Apremont on the 10th of this month, I must request, sir, that you will be pleased to inform me as soon as possible of the decision of the President.

Accept, &c., &c.,

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, &c., &c., &c.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 9, 1822.

SIR: Your letters of the 11th of March and of the 5th instant, together with the statement of facts received with the former, have been submitted to the consideration of the President of the United States.

He has thought that a further discussion of the principal topics embraced by the statement of facts not being likely to result in the object most desirable to the two countries—the restoration of the direct commercial intercourse between them—might with propriety be postponed for the present. The right of France and of the United States, respectively, to enact laws for the advantage of their own shipping interests has not been contested by us; and as the proposal and desire of the United States have been to establish the future intercourse between the two nations upon the most entire and perfect reciprocity; as this disposition was manifested by the act of Congress of March 3, 1815, more than a year before the heavy discriminating duties with which France charged the principal articles of the produce and manufacture of the United States imported in American vessels, it is useless to inquire whether, twenty-five years before, France or the United States had been the first to pass laws for the advantage of their own navigation, or what the effect of those laws had been during the long protracted convulsions of the intervening period.

I come, therefore, immediately to the proposal in your letter of the 5th instant, which is understood to be, that, in lieu of all the discriminating duties now existing in France upon American vessels and the produce of the United States imported in them, a duty of surcharge of $4 50 upon the American ton of laden merchandise shall be levied upon condition that, reciprocally, no higher duties of discrimination shall be levied in the United States upon the productions of France imported in French vessels in the United States; and that this surcharge shall, at the end of eighteen months, be yet further reduced by one-eighth every year until notice shall be given by either party to the other.

In my letter of the 18th of August last, I had the honor of proposing a duty of nine francs surcharge upon the tonnage of importations of American vessels into France. As far as an estimate can be formed, your proposal is of a similar duty, from 25 to 30 francs per French ton, with a reciprocal duty of about six dollars here on the American ton of French merchandise imported in French vessels.

I am authorized to state that, with a view to meet this offer as nearly as possible, I am prepared to agree to an article of the following purport:

That all other discriminating duties, as well of tonnage as of surcharge, upon merchandise and port charges be repealed, and in lieu thereof, on American productions imported into France, there shall be paid on the French ton space of merchandise 12 francs; and that, on all French importations into the United States, a similar duty of $2 50 per ton, of American measurement, shall be levied; this extra tonnage to be reduced by one-eighth on both sides every year after the expiration of eighteen months till either party shall give six months' notice to the other that it cannot continue on the same footing.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

His Excellency the Baron HYDE DE NEUVILLE,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from France.

Mr. de Neuville to the Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

WASHINGTON, April 11, 1822.

SIR: Yesterday evening I had the honor of receiving your letter of the 9th, which I now answer.

I esteem it of no use to discuss facts. Yet still I ought to set those in a proper point of view which have been misunderstood.

I confess, sir, I do not see how a surcharge of only four dollars and fifty cents a ton can be equivalent to a duty of from twenty-five to thirty francs on one side and of about six dollars on the other.

I confess, also, that I cannot conceive how our discriminating duties previous to the act of May 15 were equal to a surcharge of $18 a ton, according to Mr. Newton, whilst, according to the calculation of Mr. Gallatin, (see his note of 7th July, 1820,) the difference against the American tonnage was 46 francs 55 centimes a ton, United States measure, or about 42 francs a ton, French measure, $7 87; and by the second calculation of the same, (see errors corrected in the note of July 7, 1820,) of 50 francs 90 centimes a ton, United States measure, or about 46 francs 50 centimes a ton, French measure, was $8 72.

It is evident that between the calculation of Mr. Newton..... $18 00
And the corrected one of Mr. Gallatin..... 8 72

There is a difference of..... 9 28

This difference is enormous, it must be allowed. Now, it is at least allowable to conclude, from the discordance of the two able calculators, that figures are not always facts, and that facts can be clearly proved without figures.

I am also obliged to confess that I cannot conceive how (in case of our agreeing) you now propose to me, sir, 12 francs for $2 50, when your offer of the month of August was 9 francs for $1 50.

Permit me to remark to you that there is a loss to me of 20 per cent. in your proposition of the day before yesterday, and, that it may correspond with the other, it ought to be at least 15 francs for $2 50.

Let us add, sir, that I ought to be as much surprised to see that there is no question but of 12 francs, (and that when the business is of our coming nearer,) when one of your propositions in the month of August last (I lay aside the calculation of the Baron Pasquier, and only speak of that of Mr. Gallatin) is found to be equivalent to 13 francs a ton.

I will, moreover, sir, endeavor to explain better, if I can, my proposition of the fifth instant. It is simple and its execution easy.

My proposition is:

1. To substitute a surcharge of — upon each ton of merchandise, in lieu of the discriminating duties which existed in the two countries previous to the act of the 15th of May.

2. To apply it in the two countries, so as that in France no more shall be paid upon the products of the soil and of the industry of the Union imported in vessels of the Republic, of other duties than those which shall be paid in the United States upon the products of the soil and of the industry of France imported in French ships. It is of no moment whether this surcharge be regulated in dollars or in francs.

The proportion of the two moneys is known. At all events, the ratio can be fixed for the whole duration of the convention.

The difficulty which might result from the difference between the French and the American pound may be also obviated, nothing being more easy, as I had the honor of proposing to you, sir, verbally and by writing, than to agree (at least with regard to the principal articles of commerce between the two countries) upon the quantities which, with respect to the different species of merchandise, shall be considered as forming the ton.

Two merchants will arrange these details in less than an hour, if my data are found to be a little different from yours; but, really, I believe that in this respect we will easily come to an understanding.

Thus, then, I have proposed (taking the calculation of the Committee of Commerce of the House) to reduce by three-fourths the discriminating duties which existed in France upon the products of the Union, in general, previous to the act of the 15th of May.

There would remain, consequently, $4 50, and nothing but $4 50, which would be equivalent to 23 to 24 francs, say 23 francs, cutting off by half the existing difference, according to Mr. Gallatin, between our respective propositions of the month of August last.*

Now, sir, the arrangement which I proposed in my letter of the 5th is evidently equivalent to the reduction on the part of France of its discriminating duties, viz: of three-fourths according to the calculation of Mr. Newton, and thirteen-twentieths according to that of Mr. Gallatin.

In conscience, sir, animated as the Government of his Majesty is with the spirit of conciliation, determined as it is to make a real and even considerable sacrifice that it may thereby come to a trial, to a temporary arrangement, can it think of going further?

Ought it even, in the well calculated interest of its navigation, to go so far? I think it ought not; and I confess I will abide firmly by my opinion as long as nothing shall demonstrate to me that my observations, which, as to myself and many others, are facts, are only mistakes or hypotheses.

The observations added to my letter of March 11 prove, sir, that my personal opinion is that, in the present state of her navigation, France ought hardly to go so far in the reduction as one-half.

But Mr. Gallatin's letter of the 15th of October to the Baron Pasquier seems to announce that, in order to close it, the Government of the King is disposed to overcome this obstruction.

I have not yet received the instructions of the Viscount Montmorency.

The Congress draws to a close.

The question is only about a temporary arrangement.

This arrangement would re-establish the direct relations between the two countries.

I am acquainted with the Sanford law.

I am convinced that in eighteen months or two years the data will be such on both sides that it will be finally possible to build upon solid foundations and to arrive at a proper and lasting arrangement.

I am therefore ready, sir, and shall be so, as long as I shall not receive instructions to the contrary, to agree (with respect to the point of which I have just been treating) to the foregoing clauses and conditions, referring myself, as to other points, to my letter of the 15th of August last, and to that of the 5th instant.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my high consideration.

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE,
Envoy Extraordinary, &c., &c.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, &c., &c.

* Extract of Mr. Gallatin's letter to the Baron Pasquier of October 15, 1821:

"I understood that your excellency considered the substitution of a duty of 1½ per cent. on the value, in lieu of the existing discriminating duties, as equivalent to a surcharge of 16 francs 50 centimes per ton on cotton, or nearly to one-fourth part of its present rate. The difference between the two Governments is, according to that calculation, about equal to that between one-half and one-fourth of the French surcharge, and equivalent to about 15 or 17 francs per ton, as it applies to cotton alone, or to all the American products. But I believe that Mr. Adams' proposal is less unfavorable to the United States; that, in the calculation made here, the prime cost of cotton in America has been rated too high; and that, according to the average prices at this moment, the rate of duty proposed by my Government is not equivalent to more than 13 francs per ton. I consider, therefore, the difference between the proposals respectively made to be equal to that between one-half and one-fifth of the French discriminating duty, and equivalent to about 18 or 20 francs per ton; and I think this difference to be the true point at issue between the two Governments."

Mr. Adams to the Baron de Newville.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 24, 1822.

SIR: Your letter of the 11th instant has been submitted to the consideration of the President of the United States.

The proposition made in my letter of the 9th was offered with a view to avoid a continuance of long and fruitless discussions. It was distinct and specific, without reference to calculations of various persons, all founded upon estimates composed of different elements. It was not deemed necessary to account for the difference between these estimates, as calculated by Mr. Gallatin, and as presented by a committee of the House of Representatives, nor to inquire upon what principle, after having stated, among the facts of your memoir of February 15, that the discriminating duties against American tonnage in France, before the act of Congress of May 15, 1820, were equivalent only to two dollars and forty-three cents, you now proposed, as a reduction of that amount, a discriminating tonnage duty of four and a half dollars.

If protracted discussion is to be substituted for specific proposal, with a view to the arrangement of the commercial intercourse between our countries, there are many things in your memoir of the 15th of February which will require examination. In the mean time, I must observe, that the propositions in my letter to you of (13th) August last, were specific, and that neither the estimates of Mr. Gallatin nor of Baron Pasquier, of what they were equivalent to, can be assumed as foundations for making them other than what they were.

One of them was a duty of nine francs per ton of merchandise, and the other a duty of one and a half per cent. on the value of merchandise. The latter is that which Baron Pasquier appears to have estimated as equivalent (applied only to the article of cotton) to a duty of sixteen and a half francs per ton, and Mr. Gallatin, as equivalent to thirteen francs. It is sufficient to say that when offered here it was considered as equivalent to the alternative proposal made at the same time with it, and that, in offering now to agree to a duty of twelve francs in its stead, we propose an increase of one-third to the advantage of France upon the former proposal.

Assuming, however, the estimate of Baron Pasquier as correct, and that one and a half per cent. on the value of merchandise was equivalent to a discriminating duty of 16.50 francs, in favor of France, I am now authorized to extend the offer to a reciprocal discriminating duty of two per cent. on the value of the merchandise, which, according to the calculation of Baron Pasquier, is equivalent to a tonnage duty of 22 francs, and, by your own calculation, within one franc of that which you propose.

This proposal has a double advantage of a reciprocity, not dependent upon the proportions of value between dollars and francs, or those of bulk between the French and American ton. But, if an arrangement, subject to these proportions, is to be made, and this Government consents to increase the duty against American merchandise in France, from nine to twelve francs a French ton, it will be necessary to restore the reciprocity of value in the amount of duties to be levied upon French merchandise, in the United States, by increasing the duty from  $1\frac{1}{2}$  to  $2\frac{1}{2}$  dollars on the American ton. It is true that this increase will be rather more on the merchandise of France in the United States than upon that of the United States in France; but the difference will only be sufficient to restore the equality of the duty on both sides. In offering to admit a duty of nine francs upon the French ton, for  $1\frac{1}{2}$  dollar on the American ton, even the principle of a reciprocal duty of the same value, upon the same bulk of merchandise, was in some degree impaired, and in the small amount of the difference was found the only motive for the admission of the principle. If, therefore, the amount is to be increased, the balance must be restored.

The proposal in your note of the 5th instant was, that the discriminating duties of France, existing before the act of Congress of May 15, 1820, should be reduced to one-fourth. Assuming as correct the report of the Committee on Commerce, that they had been equivalent to eighteen dollars the ton, but as the duty will, of course, in France be levied in francs, and upon the French ton, in my letter of the 9th instant it was estimated that a duty of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  dollars upon the American ton of merchandise would, when applied to the French measure and the French currency, range from 25 to 30 francs upon the French ton. By the convention of the 30th of April, 1803, the relative value of the moneys of the two countries was of  $5\frac{1}{3}$  francs to the dollar, by which  $4\frac{1}{2}$  dollars are equal to 24 francs. The difference between the French and American ton, arising from different rules of admeasurement, is more or less, as applied to different vessels. In double decked vessels, such as must be all those navigating between the two countries, the American ton exceeds in capacity that of France, from one-tenth to one-fourth; that is, a vessel of 300 tons cleared out from the United States would be required in France to pay for from 330 to 360 tons; and if a duty of 24 francs per ton should be levied upon her cargo, arriving at Havre or Marseilles, it would be equivalent to a duty of between five and six dollars the American ton. Suppose, then, a French vessel of 350 tons, French measure, arriving in the United States, she pays a duty of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  dollars a ton; measuring only 300 tons by the American measure, she pays 1,350 dollars surcharge. But an American vessel of the same capacity, paying 24 francs a ton upon 350 tons, will pay 8,400 francs or 1,575 dollars surcharge. She pays, therefore, 225 dollars more of surcharge in France than a French vessel of the same capacity will have paid in the United States, and the discriminating duty of 24 francs a ton, French measurement, will be equal to a duty of about six dollars a ton, levied upon the same vessel in the United States, and according to the American measure.

The offer that a surcharge of 12 francs on the French ton levied in France shall countervail a similar duty of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  dollars on the American ton in the United States, assumes that the average difference between the two measurements is of one-tenth, or ten per cent. Thus, a French vessel of 300 tons, fully laden, would pay, in the United States, an extra duty of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  dollars a ton upon 270 tons, or 675 dollars. An American vessel of the same capacity would pay in France 12 francs a ton upon 300 tons, or 3,600 francs, equal to the same sum of 675 dollars. This average agrees with the calculation of Mr. Gallatin, in the note B to his letter of July 7, 1820, to Baron Pasquier; a calculation very precisely founded upon a mean proportional between the French and the American rules of gauging for merchant vessels. It is more advantageous to France than the average drawn in his note of the next day, from the two American vessels, the Phoenix and the Solon, which were of  $754\frac{1}{2}$  tons American, but paid in France, for 907 tons French tonnage, a difference of five to six.

A duty of two per cent. on the value of the merchandise, with more simplicity, would avoid the necessity of all these calculations.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

[Translation.]

WASHINGTON, April 28, 1822.

SIR: I now have the honor of replying to your letter of the 24th instant.

All my propositions are likewise offered with a view to avoid the continuance of long and fruitless discussions; they are precise and distinct; and the various calculations referred to by me are rather corollaries than the basis of my propositions.

But, after all, it is of but little importance to determine whether the calculations of the committee of the House of Representatives, of those of Mr. Gallatin, of Mr. Pasquier, whether yours, sir, or mine, be rigorously correct or not.

I have proposed $4 50 cents on either side, which, according to the calculations of the committee of the House, would be reducing the discriminating duties by three-fourths.

I have said 23 francs, thus dividing the difference between one-half and one-fifth; difference, which, according to Mr. Gallatin, is the real point of difficulty between the two Governments. (Mr. Gallatin rates the fifth at 13 francs.)

It is obvious that, if Mr. Gallatin has calculated right, my proposition tends to reduce the discriminating duties by  $\frac{2}{3}$ ths. But whether the above calculations be correct or not, my propositions are not, on that account, less distinct, viz: \$4 50 cents in the first case; 23 francs in the second; both resulting upon the same principle, that, these various calculations being imperfect and uncertain, it is necessary to come to some positive point.

I accept, sir, the two per cent. on the value of merchandise, if that basis is to produce 22 francs per ton, or thereabouts; and, to avoid all misunderstanding on that score, all mistakes and errors, I propose to fix the maximum and minimum of the surtax, with regard to the principal articles of importation and exportation, and to agree that the discriminating duties be superseded on both sides by a duty of two per cent. on the value of merchandise, on condition, however, that this surtax shall never amount to less than 21 francs or more than 26 francs per ton on the articles hereafter specified.

Imported from the United States to France, cotton, tobacco, rice, pot ashes.

Imported from France to the United States, brandy, wine, silks, dry goods.

If you agree, sir, to this modification, which, in my opinion, is founded on a principle of justice, and which partly corresponds with Mr. Gallatin's views, (see his letter of the 15th October, 1821,) there will only remain for us to determine the respective quantities (pounds or kilogrammes) which, for the future, shall be considered as a ton, and to fix a rate of exchange for the continuation of the convention.

It cannot be necessary to observe, sir, that the minimum would be for France and the maximum for the United States; and that my proposition would not, by any means, be founded on a perfect reciprocity of advantages; but we have it now in view to make an experiment; and, to conclude, I am not afraid of being liberal, nay, even very liberal.

With this view, in case it should appear that the above arrangement is attended with difficulties, (and, I confess, sir, there seem to me to be many resulting from that mode of collection,) I again propose to resort to a discriminating duty on the ton of merchandise, which appears to me to be the easiest mode of coming to a temporary transaction.

I had spoken, sir, of 23 francs; you, sir, according to your last offer, calculate on 22; let us say 20, as a last word.

I will add, that in order to prove more clearly the sincerity of my propositions, and my candid desire of conciliating the real interests of the two countries, I am ready to sign the following clause:

"The discriminating duty of 20 francs per ton of merchandise shall be paid by each vessel in the respective ports, only upon the difference in value between its imported and exported cargo."

By reading again my observations of the 15th of February, and my subsequent letters, you will convince yourself, sir, that I never intended to reduce a duty of $4 50 to one only equivalent to $2 43. I did say, and I here repeat it, that, everything well considered, I only found a difference of $2 43 between the discriminating duties levied in the United States upon the productions of the soil and industry of France and the duties collected in France upon those of the United States; not taking even then to account certain advantages which the navigation of the United States has not ceased to enjoy in France, without any such being reciprocally granted to French shipping in the United States.

I did, therefore, propose, in lieu of the discriminating duties which exist in the United States since 1790, and of those imposed in France since 1790, which Mr. Gallatin considers as equivalent to 65 francs per ton, to substitute a surtax, which, being equal on both sides, would leave no room for disputes about reciprocity.

My propositions of this day are founded upon the same considerations.

Referring to my letters of the 5th and 11th of this month, as to the other points which remain to be settled,

I have the honor, &c.,

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS, &c.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 11, 1822.

SIR: In order to bring the discussion between us to a precise point, I have the honor of inclosing, herewith, a projet of a convention for your consideration; to the substance of which I am authorized by the President of the United States to agree.

In consenting to so heavy a discriminating duty as four dollars upon every ton of laden merchandise, for the first year of that arrangement, which is considered on both sides only as an experiment to restore the direct commercial intercourse between the two countries, so earnestly desired by the United States, a principal motive has been the suggestion, in some of your communications, of a gradual reduction, till the principle for which the United States have constantly and earnestly insisted—the principle of absolute reciprocity and mutual abandonment of all discriminating duties—shall be found, in the judgment of France herself, the system of intercourse most advantageous to her interests, as well as to those of the United States.

It is, therefore, proposed that the convention should be limited to four years' duration, and that, beginning with a discriminating duty of four dollars the laden ton in the United States, and of 20 francs the tonneau in France, it should be diminished by one-fourth every year on both sides.

I shall be happy to receive your observations on this projet, either in personal conference, or in writing, or by a counter-projet, as may be most agreeable and convenient to yourself.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

His Excellency HYDE DE NEUVILLE,
Envoy Extraordinary, &c.

Projet of a convention between the United States and France, communicated to the Baron Hyde de Neuville, with Mr. Adams' letter of May 11, 1822.

The United States of America and his most Christian Majesty, desirous, by a temporary agreement, to regulate the commerce and navigation between their respective Territories and people in such manner as to render the same reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory, and thereby lead to a more permanent and comprehensive arrangement, by treaty, of their commercial intercourse, have, respectively, furnished their full powers, in manner following—that is to say: the President of the United States, to John Quincy Adams, their Secretary of State; and his most Christian Majesty, to the Baron Hyde de Neuville, who after producing and showing to each other their said full powers, and exchanging copies of the same, have agreed on and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be no other or higher duties levied on the importation into the United States of any articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of France, when imported in French vessels, than when in the vessels of the United States, excepting as follows: Upon all such articles so imported in French vessels, unless for transit or re-exportation, there shall be levied an additional duty of four dollars for every ton of merchandise laden in the vessels, according to the measurement of the United States, over and above the duty which shall be levied on articles of the same kind and of the same growth, produce, or manufacture, when imported in the vessels of the United States.

ARTICLE 2. And, in like manner, there shall be levied upon articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, imported into France, (with the exception of articles imported for transit or re-exportation,) when in vessels of the United States, an additional duty of twenty francs for every ton of merchandise laden in the vessel, according to the measurement of French tonnage, over and above the duty which shall be levied on articles of the same kind and of the same growth, produce, or manufacture, when imported in French vessels.

ARTICLE 3. No other or higher duties of tonnage, light-money, port charges, pilotage, brokerage, or other charges upon shipping, shall be levied upon vessels of the United States, in the ports of France, than upon French vessels; nor upon French vessels, in the ports of the United States, than upon vessels of the United States.

ARTICLE 4. This convention shall be subject to the ratification of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and to that of his most Christian Majesty. But it shall take effect for all vessels of the United States which shall arrive in France, and for all French vessels which shall arrive in the United States, from and after the 30th day of June next. It shall be in force for the term of four years from that day; but the duty of discrimination or surcharge upon articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of France, imported into the United States in French vessels, shall be reduced one dollar for every laden ton each year during the said four years; and, in like manner, the duty of discrimination or surcharge upon articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, imported into France in vessels of the United States, shall be reduced five francs for every laden ton each year during the said four years; so that the duty of surcharge upon the lading of French vessels in the United States shall, from and after the 30th day of June, 1823, for one year, be three dollars; the succeeding year, two dollars; and the last year, one dollar, for each laden ton; and, in like manner, the surcharge upon merchandise imported into France in vessels of the United States shall, from and after the 30th day of June, 1823, be, for one year, fifteen francs; for the next year, ten francs; and for the last year, five francs, for each laden ton.

ARTICLE 5. The ratifications of this convention shall be exchanged at Washington within one year from the date hereof, or sooner, if possible.

In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands and seals, this convention being drawn up and executed as original, in our respective languages, at the city of Washington, this — day of May, in the year of our Lord 1822.

Baron Hyde de Neuville to the Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

WASHINGTON, May 15, 1822.

Mr. de Neuville requests Mr. Adams to excuse him for not waiting upon him at the Department of State, as he has been three days confined by indisposition. He has the honor to send to Mr. Adams the substance of a contre-projet. The articles are not duly arranged; but, in drawing up the convention, each clause shall be placed in order, and everything useless shall be expunged.

Mr. de Neuville is in hopes that the time desired by both countries has arrived, and prays Mr. Adams to accept the renewed assurances of his high consideration.

Hon. J. Q. ADAMS.

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

Substance of a temporary arrangement between France and the United States, communicated to Mr. Adams May 15, 1822.

ARTICLE 1. The law of the 15th of May, 1820, and the ordinance of the 26th of July, same year, shall be repealed.

2. The extra duties levied on either side in consequence of said law and ordinance shall be refunded.

(3.) Mr. de Neuville thinks that it would perhaps be better to sign immediately a consular convention on the basis of that of 1788, with such modifications as might be deemed necessary.

He will refer on this subject to his letters of 31st of March, and 23d of May, 1819.

3. The consuls and vice consuls may cause to be arrested the captains, officers, mariners, sailors, and all other persons, being part of the crews of the vessels of their respective nations, who shall have deserted from the said vessels, in order to send them back and transport them out of the country; for which purpose the said consuls and vice consuls shall address themselves to the courts, judges, and officers competent, and shall demand the said deserters in writing, proving, by an exhibition of the registers of the vessels, or ship's roll, or of a copy of said document, certified by them, that those men were part of the said crews, and on this demand so proved (saving, however, where the contrary is proved) the delivery shall not be refused; and there shall be given all aid and assistance to the said consuls and vice consuls for the search, seizure, and arrest of the said deserters, who shall even be detained and kept in the prisons of the country at their request and expense until they shall have found an opportunity of sending them back. But if they be not sent back within three months, to be counted from the day of arrest, they shall be set at liberty, and shall be no more arrested for the same cause.

(4.) The clause relating to transit and re-exportation offers no great advantage except to the United States. Mr. de Neuville is nevertheless willing to insert it, such as proposed by Mr. Adams, articles 1 and 2 of his projet.

4. The discriminating duties levied in France upon foreign vessels shall be reduced, with regard to vessels of the United States laden with the productions of the soil or industry of the United States, to 20 francs per ton of merchandise.

5. The same surtax of 20 francs, corresponding to three dollars and seventy-five cents, shall be imposed in the United States per ton of merchandise imported in French vessels laden with productions of the soil or industry of France.

(6.) As soon as the basis shall have been adopted, Mr. de Neuville will have the honor to propose a table of the quantities which, with respect to each of the various species of merchandise mentioned in the adjoining article, shall be considered as forming a ton.

6. In order that the amount of said duties be not left subject to the variation of arbitrary valuations, there shall be an understanding between the parties as to the amount per ton of each of the principal articles of imports and exports, viz:

Cotton, tobacco, rice, potash, wines, brandies, oil, silks, dry goods, &c.

There can, at all events, be no difficulty on this point, since the question is as to the average of the rates generally received in trade.

The articles not thus specified shall be subjected to an equal rule of calculation according to their weight or bulk.

It is proposed to adopt as the basis of this valuation—

1st. The American pound (avoirdupois.)

2d. The American ton weight (20 cwt.)

3d. The American measurement ton (40 American cubic feet.)

On the whole, it is hereby intended to propose an equal rule for both countries, so as to render the surtax perfectly equal.

(7.) Mr. Gallatin has asserted that these duties amounted to eight francs in France and did not exceed five francs in the United States. This second sum is proposed here for both countries. If any discussion should arise out of this proposal, Mr. de Neuville thinks it would be easy for him to prove that fixing the amount of these various duties would be the best means of preventing the future recurrence of those petty vexations of which foreigners have not ceased to complain in all countries, whether with or without sufficient ground. It must, moreover, be considered that, if France consents to so important a deviation from her general revenue laws, she cannot in any case consent to change to such an extent her port regulations.

(8.) The delay of two years is more than sufficient to answer the end proposed by the two Governments.

As their object is to make an experiment, it should be so established as not to press too heavily upon whichever of the two parties may, on experience, be found to have erred in the calculation.

Besides, the proposal of Mr. de Neuville is in perfect accordance with that made by Mr. Gallatin to his Majesty's Government, (vide letter of October 15, 1821.)

"Each of the two Governments," says Mr. Gallatin, "shall expressly reserve the right of annulling the arrangement whenever it shall please, by giving sufficient reasons to the other contracting party."

Most assuredly, if it be possible to make any further reduction after the two years; if, in three or four years, it should be possible to annul the entire surtax without injuring the navigation of the country, his Majesty's Government will cheerfully consent to do so. It desires only what is just, what is consistent with the real interest of both countries.

(10.) Example.—He that will import a cargo amounting to $10,000, and export to the amount of $6,000, will have a surtax of 20 francs, if in France, or three dollars and seventy-five cents, if in the United States, on such a number of tons of merchandise, selected at his option, upon his invoice, as will amount to the balance of $4,000.

If he exports a cargo equal or superior in value to his import cargo, he will have nothing to pay.

If the calculations of Mr. Gallatin on the gauging of vessels be correct, they only prove how necessary it is for both Governments to adopt, at least on the conclusion of a definitive convention, an equal rule of measurement; for Mr. de Neuville has found in the United States the same result that Mr. Gallatin found in France. He has before him at this time a statement relating to a French vessel from Havre (the Hirondella) which gauged in France from 182 to 183 tons, and paid in Savannah for 205 63-95 tons. He could produce many other statements of the same nature. This proves, at least, that the same inconveniences exist on both sides.

7. The tonnage duties and other collections levied upon vessels under public authority in the respective ports shall be regulated, as Mr. de Neuville has always proposed, upon a footing of perfect reciprocity, so that French vessels coming directly from France to the United States and American vessels coming directly from the United States to France shall not pay more than five francs per ton.

8. The present temporary arrangement shall be for two years; and even after the expiration of that term, it shall endure until the conclusion of a definitive convention, or until one of the parties shall have declared to the other its intention to abandon it; which declaration shall be made at least six months beforehand.

Mr. de Neuville would willingly agree, that if, after two years, the arrangement should continue without reclamation of either party, the surtax shall, in such case, be reciprocally reduced by one-eighth from year to year.

9. The present convention shall be ratified on either side, and the ratification shall be exchanged in the course of one year, or sooner if practicable. Nevertheless, its execution shall commence in the ports of both countries on the 25th of August next, and shall continue (in case the ratification shall not be had) for all such vessels as may have sailed bona fide from the ports of either nation.

Mr. de Neuville proposes to insert the following clause in this present temporary arrangement:

10. In order to favor commerce on both sides, it is agreed that the surtax imposed per ton of merchandise in the respective ports shall be levied only upon the difference in value between the imports and exports.

This clause shall take effect on the exchange of the ratifications, and either Government shall remain at liberty to retrench said clause if it should think proper so to do; which suppression shall not in any manner affect the validity of the other articles of the convention, which, in such case, shall continue to be executed as if said clause had never been inserted.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 27, 1822.

Observations on the "substance of a temporary arrangement between France and the United States," communicated by his Excellency the Baron Hyde de Neuville, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from France, May 15, 1822.

Articles 1 and 2 inadmissible. The arrangement will be most effectually made without retrospective reference to former acts on either side. It will, in effect, repeal the laws mentioned, and leave a formal repeal of them quite unnecessary. The duties levied within a reasonable time of notice of their existence have already been refunded by both countries. It is not necessary for either country to retrace its steps.

Article 3 belongs to a consular convention. We are willing to enter upon a negotiation for that purpose, but it will require much time to settle its details. For a temporary arrangement, we desire, first of all, to restore the direct intercourse between the two countries; that is, to adjust the discrimination duties alone. When this shall have been done, the parties will, on both sides, be more amicably disposed and better qualified to discuss the general questions interesting to their commercial relations.

The 4th and 5th articles proposed by the Baron de Neuville are not reciprocal either in form or substance. By the 4th it is proposed merely to reduce, in France, the existing extra duties on merchandise imported in vessels of the United States; while in the 5th it is proposed that new duties should be imposed on merchandise imported in French vessels into the United States. On the part of France, it offers a mere modification of existing laws; on that of the United States, a change of the basis of legislation itself is required. If the United States abandon the basis of their revenue legislation for this arrangement, France must do the same. To proceed upon the plan of reduction on both sides is impracticable, since even the reduction on the side of France, which the Baron proposes, must be met by increase of the duties in the United States. It is therefore desirable that the present arrangement should be made on a basis having no reference to the existing legislation of either country; saying that, instead of all extra duties heretofore levied on either side, there shall in future be levied so much upon importations in French vessels in the United States and upon importations in vessels of the United States into France.

Article 6. It is believed that a more accurate proportion than of 20 francs upon the French ton and of four dollars upon the American ton could not be devised, and that it would, in the result, be to the advantage of France. A new table of tonnage, fixing different quantities of each specific article to be taken as between the parties for a ton, would render more complex instead of simplifying the question of measurement, and create additional embarrassments to the navigators and merchants of both nations.

Article 7. This article may be admitted, but it must be made specific in form; that is, it must be explained what is meant by other collections levied upon vessels under public authority. It would be far more simple, and answer more effectually the object desired, of perfect reciprocity, to say of all such duties that they shall be levied no more on the vessels of either nation than upon those of the other in either country.

Article 8. Agreed to, with the reduction of the discriminating duties, after two years, by one-eighth from year to year.

Article 9. Agreed to, substituting the 1st of September for the 25th of August.

Article 10. Agreed to, with the proviso admitted by the Baron, that articles imported for transit or exportation are not to be charged with any extra duties.

The Secretary of State sent to the Baron de Neuville the draught of a convention in formal articles. He invites the Baron to discuss those articles by admission, proposed alteration, or rejection; or to send him a counter-projet, also in formal articles, to be discussed in that manner. This is obviously the mode of bringing the negotiation most speedily to a termination.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 14, 1822.

SIR: I have the honor of inclosing herewith the draught of a convention which I am authorized on the part of the United States to sign. It is in most respects conformable to the projet which I had the honor of last receiving from you. I shall be happy to confer with you upon the particulars in which it differs therefrom at 3 o'clock this day, or at the same hour to-morrow, should that better suit your convenience.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

His Excellency the BARON HYDE DE NEUVILLE,
Envoy Extraordinary, &c.

Convention of Navigation and Commerce between the United States of America and his Majesty the King of France and Navarre.

The United States of America and his Majesty the King of France and Navarre, being desirous of settling the relations of navigation and commerce between their respective nations by a temporary convention reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory, and thereby of leading to a more permanent and comprehensive arrangement, have, respectively, furnished their full powers in manner following—that is to say: The President of the United States, to John Quincy Adams, their Secretary of State; and his Most Christian Majesty the King of France and Navarre, to the Baron Hyde de Neuville, Knight of the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, Commander of the Legion of Honor, Grand Cross of the Royal American Order of Isabella the Catholic, his Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary near the United States, who, after exchanging their full powers, have agreed on the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. Articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, imported into France in vessels of the United States, shall pay an additional duty, not exceeding twenty francs per ton of merchandise, over and above the duties paid on the like articles, also of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, when imported in French vessels.

ARTICLE 2. Articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of France, imported into the United States in French vessels, shall pay an additional duty, not exceeding three dollars and seventy-five cents per ton of merchandise, over and above the duties collected upon the like articles, also of the growth, produce, or manufacture of France, when imported in vessels of the United States.

ARTICLE 3. The above extra duties shall not be levied, either in France or in the United States, upon articles imported for transit or re-exportation; but such articles, and the vessels importing them, of either nation, shall continue to enjoy, in the United States and in France, the same advantages of transit and re-exportation for all articles, as heretofore, and on the same terms.

ARTICLE 4. The following quantities shall be considered as forming the ton of merchandise for each of the articles hereinafter specified:

Wines, four 58 gallon hogsheads, or 232 gallons, of 231 cubic inches, American measure.

Brandies, and all other liquids, 232 gallons.

Silks, and all other dry goods, and all other articles usually subject to measurement, forty-two cubic feet, French, in France, and fifty cubic feet, American measure, in the United States.

Cotton, 882 lbs. avoirdupois weight, or 400 kilogrammes.

Tobacco, 1680 lbs. avoirdupois weight, or 762 kilogrammes.

Ashes, pot and pearl, 2240 lbs. avoirdupois, or 1016 kilogrammes.

Rice, 1792 lbs. gross avoirdupois, or 812 kilogrammes.

And for all weighable articles not specified, 2240 lbs. avoirdupois, or 1016 kilogrammes.

ARTICLE 5. The duties of tonnage, light-money, port-charges, brokerage, and other duties upon foreign shipping, over and above those paid by the national shipping in the two countries, respectively, other than those specified in articles 1 and 2 of the present convention, shall not exceed, in France, five francs per ton of the vessel's American register, nor 94 cents, in the United States, per ton, of the vessel's French passport, for vessels of the United States in France, nor for vessels of France in the United States.

ARTICLE 6. The contracting parties, wishing to favor their mutual commerce by affording in their ports every necessary assistance to their respective vessels, have agreed that the sailors, who shall desert from their vessels in the ports of the other, shall be arrested and delivered up at the demand, in writing, of the consul or vice consul, who shall nevertheless be held to prove that the deserters belonged to the vessels claiming them, and shall exhibit the shipping paper, roll of the equipage, or other document, officially showing the list of the crew; and if the name of the deserter or deserters claimed shall appear therein, and not be otherwise disproved, they shall be arrested, held in custody, and delivered to the vessel to which they belong.

ARTICLE 7. The present temporary convention shall be in force for two years, from the first day of September next, and after the expiration of that term until the conclusion of the definitive treaty, or until one of the parties shall have declared its intention to renounce it; which declaration shall be made at least six months beforehand. And in case the present arrangement should remain without such declaration of its discontinuance by either party, the extra duties specified in the first and second articles shall, from the expiration of the said two years, be on both sides diminished by one-fourth of their whole amount, and afterwards by one-fourth of the said amount from year to year, so long as neither party shall have declared the intention of renouncing it, as above stated.

ARTICLE 8. The present convention shall be ratified on both sides, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington, within one year from the date hereof, or sooner if possible; but the execution of the said convention shall commence in both countries on the first of September next, and shall be effective, even in case of non-ratification, for all such vessels as may have sailed bona fide for the ports of either nation in the confidence of its being in force.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention, original in both the languages of the United States and of France, and have thereto affixed their seals, at the city of Washington, this — day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two.

SEPARATE ARTICLES.

ARTICLE 1. It is agreed that the extra duties specified in the first and second articles of this convention shall be levied only upon the excess of value of the merchandise imported over the value of the merchandise exported in the same vessel upon the same voyage; so that if the value of the articles exported shall equal or exceed that of the articles imported in the same vessel, (not including, however, articles imported for transit or re-exportation,) no such extra duties shall be levied; and if the articles exported are less in value than those imported, the extra duties shall be levied only upon the amount of the difference of their value. This article, however, shall take effect only in case of ratification on both sides, and not until two months after the exchange of the ratifications; but the refusal to ratify this article on either side shall in nowise affect or impair the ratification or the validity of the preceding articles of this convention.

ARTICLE 2. The extra duties levied on either side, by virtue of the act of Congress of the 15th May, 1820, and of the ordinances of July 26, of the same year, and others confirmative thereof, and which have not already been paid back, shall be refunded.

Signed and sealed as above, this — day of June, 1822.

Extract of a letter from the Baron Hyde de Newville to the Secretary of State, dated at

WASHINGTON, June 22, 1822.

"We have agreed, sir, to leave for subsequent discussion the affairs which have not as yet been settled. I have, therefore, the honor to inform you that I shall attend at the Department of State at the hour appointed, on Monday next, for the purpose of signing the temporary convention of navigation and commerce, the various articles of which have been agreed upon."

17TH CONGRESS.]

No. 354.

[2D SESSION.]

CONVENTION WITH GREAT BRITAIN UNDER THE MEDIATION OF RUSSIA, EXPLANATORY OF THE FIRST ARTICLE OF THE TREATY OF GHENT, CONCERNING INDEMNITY FOR SLAVES CARRIED FROM THE UNITED STATES BY THE BRITISH FORCES IN 1812-'14.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 25, 1823.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States:

The convention concluded and signed at St. Petersburg, on the 12th day of July last, under the mediation of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, having been ratified by the three powers parties thereto, and the ratifications of the same having been duly exchanged, copies of it are now communicated to Congress, to the end that the measures for carrying it, on the part of the United States, into execution may obtain the co-operation of the Legislature necessary to the accomplishment of some of its provisions. A translation is subjoined of the three explanatory documents, in the French language, referred to in the fourth article of the convention, and annexed to it. The agreement executed at the exchange of the ratifications is likewise communicated.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, January 16, 1823.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas a convention between the United States of America and his Britannic Majesty was concluded and signed at St. Petersburg, under the mediation of the Emperor of all the Russias, on the twelfth day of July last, by the respective plenipotentiaries of the three powers: And whereas the said convention has been by them duly ratified, and the respective ratifications of the same were exchanged at Washington, on the tenth day of the present month, by John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State of the United States, the Right Honorable Stratford Canning, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majesty, and Mr. George Ellisen, Chargé d'Affaires of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, on the part of their several Governments: which convention is in the words following, to wit:

In the name of the most holy and indivisible Trinity.

The President of the United States of America and his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, having agreed, in pursuance of the fifth article of the convention concluded at London on the 20th day of October, 1818, to refer the differences which had arisen between the two Governments upon the true construction and meaning of the first article of the treaty of peace and amity, concluded at Ghent on the 24th day of December, 1814, to the friendly arbitration of His Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, mutually engaging to consider his decision as final and conclusive: And his said Imperial Majesty having, after due consideration, given his decision upon these differences in the following terms, to wit:

"That the United States of America are entitled to claim from Great Britain a just indemnification for all private property which the British forces may have carried away; and as the question relates to slaves more especially, for all the slaves that the British forces may have carried away from places and territories, of which the treaty stipulates the restitution, in quitting these same places and territories."

"That the United States are entitled to consider as having been so carried away all such slaves as may have been transferred from the above mentioned territories to British vessels within the waters of the said territories, and who for this reason may not have been restored."

"But that, if there should be any American slaves who were carried away from territories of which the first article of the treaty of Ghent has not stipulated the restitution to the United States, the United States are not entitled to claim an indemnification for the said slaves."

Now, for the purpose of carrying into effect this award of his Imperial Majesty, as arbitrator, his good offices have been further invoked to assist in framing such convention or articles of agreement between the United States of America and his Bri-

Au nom de la très-sainte et indivisible Trinité.

Le Président des Etats-Unis d'Amérique, et Sa Majesté le Roi du Royaume uni de la Grande Bretagne et de l'Irlande, ayant décidé d'un commun accord en conséquence de l'article V. de la convention conclue à Londres le 20 Octobre, 1818, que les différends qui se sont élevés entre les deux Gouvernements sur la construction et le vrai sens du 1<sup>r</sup> article du traité de paix et d'amitié, conclu à Gand le 24 Décembre, 1814, seraient déferés à l'arbitrage amical de Sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies; s'étant en outre engagés réciproquement à regarder sa décision comme finale et définitive: et sa Majesté Impériale après mûre considération, ayant émis cette décision dans les termes, suivans:

"Que les Etats-Unis d'Amérique sont en droit de réclamer de la Grand Bretagne une juste indemnité pour toutes les propriétés particulières que les forces Britanniques auroient emportées; et comme il s'agit plus spécialement d'esclaves, pour tous les esclaves que les forces Britanniques auroient emmenés des lieux et territoires dont le traité stipule la restitution, en quittant ces mêmes lieux et territoires."

"Que les Etats-Unis sont en droit de regarder comme emmenés tous ceux de ces esclaves qui, des territoires indiqués cidessus auroient été transportés à bord de vaisseaux Britanniques mouillés dans les eaux des dits territoires, et qui par ce motif n'auroient pas été restitués."

"Mais que s'il y a des esclaves Américains emmenés de territoires dont l'article 1<sup>r</sup> du traité de Gand n'a pas stipulé la restitution aux Etats Unis, les Etats Unis ne sont pas en droit de réclamer une indemnité pour les dits esclaves:"

Comme il s'agit à présent de mettre cette sentence arbitrale à exécution, les bons offices de Sa Majesté Impériale ont été encor invoqués, afin qu'une convention arrêtée entre les Etats-Unis et Sa Majesté Britannique stipulât les articles d'une accord propre tannic Majesty, as shall provide the mode of ascertaining and determining the value of slaves and of other private property which may have been carried away in contravention of the treaty of Ghent, and for which indemnification is to be made to the citizens of the United States, in virtue of His Imperial Majesty's said award, and shall secure compensation to the sufferers for their losses so ascertained and determined; and his Imperial Majesty has consented to lend his mediation for the above purpose, and has constituted and appointed CHARLES ROBERT COMTE NESSELRODE, his Imperial Majesty's Privy Counsellor, member of the Council of State, Secretary of State directing the Imperial Department of Foreign Affairs, Chamberlain, Knight of the order of Saint Alexander Nevsky, Grand Cross of the order of Saint Vladimir of the first class, Knight of that of the White Eagle of Poland, Grand Cross of the order of St. Stephen of Hungary, of the Black and of the Red Eagle of Prussia, of the Legion of Honor of France, of Charles III of Spain, of St. Ferdinand and of Merit of Naples, of the Annunciation of Sardinia, of the Polar Star of Sweden, of the Elephant of Denmark, of the Golden Eagle of Wirtemberg, of Fidelity of Baden, of St. Constantine of Parma, and of Guelph of Hanover; and JOHN COMTE CAPODISTRIAS, his Imperial Majesty's Privy Counsellor and Secretary of State, Knight of the order of St. Alexander Nevsky, Grand Cross of the order of Saint Vladimir of the first class, Knight of that of the White Eagle of Poland, Grand Cross of the order of St. Stephen of Hungary, of the Black and of the Red Eagle of Prussia, of the Legion of Honor of France, of Charles III of Spain, of St. Ferdinand and of Merit of Naples, of St. Maurice and of St. Lazarus of Sardinia, of the Elephant of Denmark, of Fidelity and of the Lion of Zähringen of Baden, Burgher of the canton of Vaud, and also of the canton and of the Republic of Geneva, as his plenipotentiaries to treat, adjust, and conclude such articles of agreement as may tend to the attainment of the above mentioned end with the plenipotentiaries of the United States and of his Britannic Majesty; that is to say, on the part of the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, HENRY MIDDLETON, a citizen of the said United States, and their Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias; and on the part of his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Right Honorable Sir CHARLES BAGOT, one of his Majesty's most honorable Privy Council, Knight Grand Cross of the most honorable order of the Bath, and his Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias; and the said plenipotentiaries, after a reciprocal communication of their respective full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles :

ARTICLE I. For the purpose of ascertaining and determining the amount of indemnification which may be due to citizens of the United States under the decision of his Imperial Majesty, two Commissioners and two arbitrators shall be appointed in the manner following, that is to say: one Commissioner and one arbitrator shall be nominated and appointed by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and one Commissioner and one arbitrator shall be appointed by his Britannic Majesty; and the two Commissioners and two arbitrators thus appointed shall meet and hold their sittings as a Board in the city of Washington. They shall have power to appoint a secretary, and before proceeding to the other business of the commission they shall, respectively, take the following oath (or affirmation) in the presence of each other; which oath or affirmation, being so taken and duly attested, shall be entered on the record of their proceedings, that is to à établir d'une part, le mode à suivre pour fixer et déterminer la valeur des esclaves ou autres propriétés privées qui auroient été emmenés en contravention au traité de Gand, et pour lesquels les citoyens des Etats-Unis auroient droit de réclamer une indemnité en vertu de la décision cidessus mentionnée de sa Majesté Impériale; de l'autre à assurer un dédommagement aux individus qui ont supporté les pertes qu'il s'agit de vérifier et d'évaluer. Sa Majesté Impériale a consenti à prêter sa médiation pour le dit objet, et a fondé et nommé le Sieur CHARLES ROBERT COMTE DE NESSELRODE, son Conseiller privé, membre du Conseil d'Etat, Secrétaire d'Etat dirigeant le Ministère des Affaires Etrangères, Chambellan actuel, Chevalier de l'ordre de St. Alexandre Nevsky, Grand Croix de l'ordre de St. Vladimir de la 1re classe, Chevalier de celui de l'Aigle Blanc de Pologne, Grand Croix de l'ordre de St. Etienne de Hongrie, de l'Aigle Noir et de l'Aigle Rouge de Prusse, de la Légion d'Honneur de France, de Charles III d'Espagne, de St. Ferdinand et du Mérite de Naples, de l'Annunciade de Sardaigne, de l'Etoile Polaire de Suède, de l'Eléphant de Danemarck, de l'Aigle d'or de Wirtemberg, de la Fidélité de Bade, de St. Constantin de Parme, et des Guelphes de Hanovre; et le Sieur JEAN COMTE DE CAPODISTRIAS, son Conseiller privé et Secrétaire d'Etat, Chevalier de l'ordre de St. Alexandre Nevsky, Grand Croix de l'ordre de St. Vladimir de la 1re classe, Chevalier de celui de l'Aigle Blanc de Pologne, Grand Croix de l'ordre de St. Etienne de Hongrie, de l'Aigle Noir et de l'Aigle Rouge de Prusse, de la Légion d'Honneur de France, de Charles III d'Espagne, de St. Ferdinand et du Mérite de Naples, des Sts. Maurice et Lazare de Sardaigne, de l'Eléphant de Danemarck, de la Fidélité et du Lion de Zähringen de Bade, Bourgeois du Canton de Vaud, ainsi que du Canton et de la République de Genève, pour ses plénipotentiaires à l'effet de négocier, régler et conclure tels articles d'un accord qui pourraient faire atteindre la fin indiquée plus haut, conjointement avec les plénipotentiaires des Etats-Unis et de sa Majesté Britannique, savoir de la part du Président des Etats Unis, de l'avis et du consentement de leur Sénat, le Sieur HENRY MIDDLETON, citoyen des dits Etats-Unis et leur Envoyé Extraordinaire et Ministre Plénipotentiaire près sa Majesté Impériale, et de la part de sa Majesté le Roi du Royaume Uni de la Grande Bretagne et de l'Irlande, le très honorable Sir CHARLES BAGOT, l'un des membres du très honorable Conseil privé de sa Majesté, Chevalier Grand Croix du très honorable ordre du Bain et son Ambassadeur Extraordinaire et Plénipotentiaire près sa Majesté Impériale; lesquels plénipotentiaires, après s'être réciproquement communiqué leurs pleinpouvoirs respectifs, trouvés en bonne et due forme, sont convenus des articles suivants :

ARTICLE I. Pour vérifier et déterminer le montant de l'indemnité qui pourra être due aux citoyens des Etats-Unis par suite de la décision de sa Majesté Impériale, deux commissaires et deux arbitres seront nommés de la manière suivante, savoir: un commissaire et un arbitre seront nommés et accrédités par le Président des Etats-Unis, de l'avis et du consentement de leur Sénat; l'autre commissaire et l'autre arbitre seront nommés par sa Majesté Britannique. Les deux commissaires et les deux arbitres ainsi nommés se réuniront en Conseil, et tiendront leurs séances dans la ville de Washington. Ils auront le pouvoir de choisir un secrétaire, et avant de procéder au travail de la commission, ils devront prêter respectivement et en présence les uns des autres, le serment ou l'affirmation qui suit, et ce serment ou affirmation prêté et formellement attesté fera partie du protocole de leurs actes et sera conçu ainsi qu'il suit: "Moi, A B, l'un des commissaires (ou arbitres, suivant le cas,) nommés en exécution de la convention conclue à St. Pe-say: "I, A B, one of the Commissioners (or arbitrators, as the case may be,) appointed in pursuance of the convention concluded at St. Petersburg on the 30th day of June, (12th July,) one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, between his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, the United States of America, and his Britannic Majesty, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will diligently, impartially, and carefully examine, and, to the best of my judgment, according to justice and equity, decide all matters submitted to me as Commissioner (or arbitrator, as the case may be,) under the said convention."

All vacancies occurring by death or otherwise shall be filled up in the manner of the original appointment, and the new Commissioners or arbitrators shall take the same oath or affirmation, and perform the same duties.

ARTICLE II. If, at the first meeting of this Board, the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain shall not have agreed upon an average value to be allowed as compensation for each slave for whom indemnification may be due, then, and in that case, the Commissioners and arbitrators shall conjointly proceed to examine the testimony which shall be produced under the authority of the President of the United States, together with such other competent testimony as they may see cause to require or allow, going to prove the true value of slaves at the period of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty of Ghent; and upon the evidence so obtained, they shall agree upon and fix the average value. But in case that a majority of the Board of Commissioners and arbitrators should not be able to agree respecting such average value, then, and in that case, recourse shall be had to the arbitration of the minister or other agent of the mediating power, accredited to the Government of the United States. A statement of the evidence produced, and of the proceedings of the Board thereupon, shall be communicated to the said minister or agent, and his decision, founded upon such evidence and proceedings, shall be final and conclusive. And the said average value, when fixed and determined by either of the three before mentioned methods, shall in all cases serve as a rule for the compensation to be awarded for each and every slave for whom it may afterwards be found that indemnification is due.

ARTICLE III. When the average value of slaves shall have been ascertained and fixed, the two Commissioners shall constitute a Board for the examination of the claims which are to be submitted to them, and they shall notify to the Secretary of State of the United States that they are ready to receive a definitive list of the slaves and other private property for which the citizens of the United States claim indemnification; it being understood and hereby agreed that the commission shall not take cognizance of, nor receive, and that his Britannic Majesty shall not be required to make compensation for any claims for private property under the first article of the treaty of Ghent not contained in the said list. And His Britannic Majesty hereby engages to cause to be produced before the commission, as material towards ascertaining facts, all the evidence of which His Majesty's Government may be in possession, by returns from His Majesty's officers or otherwise, of the number of slaves carried away. But the evidence so produced, or its defectiveness, shall not go in bar of any claim or claims which shall be otherwise satisfactorily authenticated.

ARTICLE IV. The two Commissioners are hereby empowered and required to go into an examination of all the claims submitted, through the above mentioned list, by the owners of slaves or other property, or by their lawful attorneys or representatives, and to determine the same, respectively, according to the merits of the several cases, under the rule of the imperial decision herein above recited, and having tersburg, le 30 Juin, (12 Juillet,) mil-huit-centvingt et deux, entre sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies, les Etats Unis d'Amérique, et sa Majesté Britannique jure ou affirme solennellement que j'examinerai avec diligence, impartialité et sollicitude, et que je déciderai d'après mon meilleur entendement et en toute justice et équité, toutes les réclamations qui me seront déférées en ma qualité de commissaire (ou d'arbitre, suivant le cas,) à la suite de la dite convention."

Les vacances causées par la mort ou autrement, seront remplies de la même manière qu'au moment de la nomination primitive, et les nouveaux commissaires ou arbitres devront prêter le même serment ou affirmation, et s'acquitter des mêmes devoirs.

ARTICLE II. Si lors de la première réunion de ce conseil, le Gouvernement des Etats-Unis et celui de la Grande Bretagne ne sont point parvenus à déterminer d'un commun accord la valeur moyenne qui devra étra assignée comme compensation pour chaque esclave, pour lequel il sera dû une indemnité, dans ce cas les commissaires et les arbitres procéderont conjointement à l'examen de tous les témoignages qui leur seront présentés par ordre du Président des Etats-Unis, ainsi que de tous les autres témoignages valables qu'ils croiront devoir requérir ou admettre dans la vue d'arrêter la véritable valeur des esclaves à l'époque de l'échange des ratifications du traité de Gand; et d'après les preuves qu'ils auront ainsi obtenues, ils établiront et fixeront la susdite valeur moyenne. Dans le cas où la majorité du conseil des commissaires et arbitres ne pourroit pas s'accorder sur cette valeur proportionnelle, alors on aura recours à l'arbitrage du ministre ou autre agent de la puissance médiatrice accrédité auprès du Gouvernement des Etats-Unis. Toutes les preuves produites et tous les actes des opérations du conseil à ce sujet, lui seront communiqués et la décision de ce ministre ou agent, basée, comme il vient d'être dit, sur ces preuves et sur les actes de ces opérations, sera regardée comme finale et définitive. C'est sur la valeur moyenne fixée par un des trois modes mentionnés ci-dessus, que devra étre réglée en tout état de cause la compensation qui sera accordée pour chaque esclave pour lequel on reconnoitra par la suite, qu'une indemnité est due.

ARTICLE III. Lorsque le prorata aura été ainsi arrêté, les deux commissaires se constitueront en conseil pour l'examen des réclamations qui leur seront soumises, et ils notifieront au Secrétaire d'Etat des Etats-Unis, qu'ils sont prêts à recevoir la liste définitive des esclaves et autres propriétés privées pour lesquels les citoyens des Etats-Unis réclament une indemnité. Il est entendu que les commissaires ne sauroient examiner ni recevoir, et que Sa Majesté Britannique ne sauroit, en vertu des clauses de l'article 1<sup>er</sup> du traité de Gand, bonifier aucune prétention, qui ne seroit pas portée sur la dite liste. Sa Majesté Britannique s'engage d'autre part à ordonner, que tous les témoignages que son Gouvernement peut avoir acquis par les rapports des officiers de sa dite Majesté ou par tout autre canal sur le nombre des esclaves emmenés, soyent mis sous les yeux des commissaires, afin de contribuer à la vérification des faits. Mais soit que ces témoignages viennent à étre produits, soit qu'ils manquent, cette circonstance ne pourra porter préjudice à une réclamation ou aux réclamations qui par une autre voie seront légitimées d'une manière satisfaisante.

ARTICLE IV. Les deux Commissaires sont autorisés et chargés d'entrer dans l'examen de toutes les réclamations qui leur seront soumises au moyen de la liste ci-dessus mentionnée, par les propriétaires d'esclaves ou les possesseurs d'autres propriétés, ou par les procureurs ou mandataires de ceux-ci, et à prononcer sur ces réclamations suivant le degré de leur mérite, la lettre de la décision Imperiale citée plus reference, if need there be, to the explanatory documents hereunto annexed, marked A and B. And, in considering such claims, the Commissioners are empowered and required to examine, on oath or affirmation, all such persons as shall come before them, touching the real number of the slaves, or value of other property, for which indemnity is claimed; and also to receive in evidence, according as they may think consistent with equity and justice, written depositions or papers; such depositions or papers being duly authenticated, either according to existing legal forms, or in such other manner as the said Commissioners shall see cause to require or allow.

ARTICLE V. In the event of the two Commissioners not agreeing in any particular case under examination, or of their disagreement upon any question which may result from the stipulations of this convention, then, and in that case, they shall draw by lot the name of one of the two arbitrators, who, after having given due consideration to the matter contested, shall consult with the Commissioners and a final decision shall be given, conformably to the opinion of the majority of the two Commissioners, and of the arbitrator so drawn by lot. And the arbitrator, when so acting with the two Commissioners, shall be bound in all respects by the rules of proceeding enjoined by the fourth article of this convention upon the Commissioners, and shall be vested with the same powers and be deemed, for that case, a Commissioner.

ARTICLE VI. The decision of the two Commissioners, or of the majority of the Board, as constituted by the preceding article, shall, in all cases, be final and conclusive, whether as to number, the value, or the ownership of the slaves, or other property, for which indemnification is to be made. And his Britannic Majesty engages to cause the sum awarded to each and every owner in lieu of his slave or slaves, or other property, to be paid in specie, without deduction, at such time or times, and at such place or places, as shall be awarded by the said Commissioners, and on condition of such releases or assignments to be given as they shall direct: provided, that no such payments shall be fixed to take place sooner than twelve months from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention.

ARTICLE VII. It is further agreed, that the Commissioners and arbitrators shall be respectively paid in such manner as shall be settled between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain at the time of the exchange of the ratification of this convention. And all other expenses attending the execution of the commission shall be defrayed jointly by the United States and his Britannic Majesty, the same being previously ascertained and allowed by the majority of the Board.

ARTICLE VIII. A certified copy of this convention, when duly ratified by his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of their Senate, and by his Britannic Majesty, shall be delivered by each of the contracting parties, respectively, to the minister or other agent of the mediating power, accredited to the Government of the United States, as soon as may be after the ratifications shall have been exchanged, which last shall be effected at Washington in six months from the date hereof, or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this convention, drawn up in two languages, and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in triplicate, at St. Petersburg, this thirtieth (twelfth) day of June, (July,) one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two.

haut, et en cas de besoin la teneur des documens ci-annexés et cotés A et B. En considérant les dites réclamations, les Commissaires sont autorisés à interpellier sous serment ou affirmation telle personne qui se présenterait à eux, concernant le véritable nombre des esclaves ou la valeur de toute autre propriété pour laquelle il serait réclamé une indemnité; ils sont autorisés de même à recevoir autant qu'ils le jugeront conforme à l'équité et à la justice, toutes les depositions écrites, qui seraient dûment légitimées soit d'après les formes existantes, voulues par la loi, soit dans tout autre mode que les dits Commissaires auraient lieu d'exiger ou d'admettre.

ARTICLE V. Si les deux Commissaires ne parviennent pas à s'accorder sur une des réclamations qui seront soumises à leur examen, ou s'ils diffèrent d'opinion sur une question résultant de la présente convention, alors ils tireront au sort le nom d'un des deux arbitres, lequel après avoir pris enmure délibération l'objet en litige, le discutera avec les Commissaires. La décision finale sera prise conformément à l'opinion de la majorité des deux Commissaires et de l'arbitre tiré au sort. Dans des cas semblables l'arbitre sera tenu de procéder à tous égards d'après les règles prescrites aux Commissaires par le 4me article de la présente convention. Il sera investi des mêmes pouvoirs et censé pour le moment faire les mêmes fonctions.

ARTICLE VI. La décision des deux Commissaires ou celle de la majorité du conseil formé ainsi qu'il a été dit en l'article précédent, sera dans tous les cas finale et définitive, soit relativement au nombre et à la valeur, soit pour la vérification de la propriété, des esclaves ou de tout autre bien meuble privé, pour lequel il sera réclamé une indemnité. Et Sa Majesté Britannique prend l'engagement que la somme adjugée à chaque propriétaire en place de son esclave ou de ses esclaves, ou de toute autre propriété, sera payée en espèces sans déduction, à tel tems ou à tels termes, et dans tel lieu ou tels endroits, que l'auroit prononcé les dits Commissaires et sous clause de telles exemptions ou assignments, qu'ils l'auront arrêté: pourvu seulement qu'il ne soit pas fixé pour ces payemens de terme plus rapproché que celui de douze mois à partir du jour de l'échange des ratifications de la présente convention.

ARTICLE VII. Il est convenu en outre, que les Commissaires et arbitres recevront de part et d'autre un traitement, dont les Gouvernemens des Etats-Unis et de Sa Majesté Britannique se réservent de déterminer le montant et le mode à l'époque de l'échange des ratifications de la présente convention. Toutes les autres dépenses qui accompagneront les travaux de la commission seront supportées conjointement par les Etats-Unis et par Sa Majesté Britannique. Ces dépenses devront d'ailleurs être au préalable vérifiées et admises par la majorité du conseil.

ARTICLE VIII. Lorsque la présente convention aura été dûment ratifiée par Sa Majesté Impériale, par le President des Etats-Unis de l'avis et du consentement de leur Sénat, et par Sa Majesté Britannique, une copie vidimée en sera délivrée par chacune des parties contractantes au ministre ou autre agent de la puissance médiatrice, accrédité près le Gouvernement des Etats-Unis, et cela le plutôt que faire se pourra, après que les ratifications auront été échangées: cette dernière formalité sera remplie à Washington, dans l'espace de six mois, de la date cidessous, ou plutôt s'il est possible.

En foi de quoi, les plenipotentiaires, respectifs ont signé la présente convention et y ont apposé respectivement le cachet de leurs armes.

Le Soussigné Secrétaire d'Etat Dirigeant le Ministère Impériale des affaires étrangères a l'honneur de communiquer à Monsieur de Middleton, Envoyé Extraordinaire et Ministre Plénipotentiaire des Etats Unis d'Amérique, l'opinion que l'Empereur, Son Maître, a cru devoir exprimer sur l'objet des différends qui se sont élevés entre les Etats-Unis et la Grande Bretagne, relativement à l'interprétation de l'Article premier du Traité de Gand.

Monsieur de Middleton est invité à considérer cette opinion comme la décision arbitrale demandée à l'Empereur par les deux Puissances.

Il se rappellera sans doute, qu'aussi bien que le Plénipotentiaire de S. M. Britannique, il a dans tous ses mémoires principalement insisté sur le sens grammatical de l'Art. I. du Traité de Gand, et que même dans sa note du 4 (16) Novembre, 1821, il a formellement déclaré que c'étoit sur la signification des mots dans le texte de l'article tel qu'il existe, que devoit se fonder la décision de Sa Majesté Impériale.

La même déclaration étant consignée dans la note du Plénipotentiaire Britannique en date du 8 (20) Octobre, 1821, L'Empereur n'a fait que se conformer aux vœux énoncés par les deux parties, en vouant toute son attention à l'examen de la question grammaticale.

L'opinion ci-dessus mentionnée fera connoître la manière dont Sa Majesté Impériale juge cette question, et afin que le cabinet de Washington connoisse également les motifs sur lesquels se fonde le jugement de L'Empereur, le Soussigné joint à la présente, un extrait de quelques observations, sur le sens littéral de l'Article premier du Traité de Gand.

Sous ce rapport, L'Empereur s'est borné à suivre les règles de la langue employée dans la rédaction de l'acte, par lequel les deux Puissances ont réclamé son arbitrage, et défini l'objet de leur différend.

C'est uniquement à l'autorité de ces règles, que Sa Majesté Impériale a cru devoir obéir et Son Avis ne pouvoit qu'en être la conséquence rigoureuse et nécessaire.

Le Soussigné saisit avec empressement cette occasion, pour réitérer à Monsieur de Middleton les assurances de sa considération très-distinguée.

St. PETERSBOURG, le 22 Avril, 1822.

Opinion de Sa Majesté Impériale.

Invité par les Etats-Unis d'Amérique et par la Grande Bretagne à émettre une opinion, comme arbitre dans les différends qui se sont élevés entre ces deux Puissances, au sujet de l'interprétation de l'article premier du Traité qu'elles ont conclu à Gand, le 24 Décembre, 1814, l'Empereur a pris connoissance de tous les actes, mémoires et notes où les plénipotentiaires respectifs ont exposé à son ministère des affaires étrangères, les argumens que chacune des parties en litige fait valoir à l'appui de l'interprétation qu'elle donne au dit article.

Après avoir murement pesé les observations développées de part et d'autre: considérant que le plénipotentiaire Américain et le plénipotentiaire Britannique ont demandé que la discussion fût close, considérant que le premier dans sa note du 4-16 Novembre, 1821, et le second dans sa note du 8-20 Octobre, de la même année, ont déclaré, que c'est sur la construction du texte de l'article, tel qu'il existe, que la décision arbitrale doit se fonder, et que l'un et l'autre n'ont invoqué que comme moyens subsidiaires les principes généraux de droit des gens et de droit maritime.

L'Empereur est d'avis, "que ce n'est que d'après le sens littéral et grammatical de l'article I, du traité de Gand que la question peut être décidée."

Quant au sens littéral et grammatical de l'article I, du traité de Gand.

Considérant que la période sur la signification de la quelle il s'élève des doutes, est construite ainsi qu'il suit.

"Tous les territoires, lieux et possessions quelconques, pris par l'une des parties sur l'autre, durant la guerre, ou qui pourroient être pris après la signature du présent traité, à l'exception seulement des isles ci-dessous mentionnées, seront rendus sans délai et sans faire détruire ou emporter aucune partie de l'artillerie ou autre propriété publique originellement prise dans les dits forts et lieux et qui s'y trouvera au moment de l'échange des ratifications du traité, ou aucuns esclaves ou autres propriétés privées. Et tous archives, registres, actes et papiers, soit d'une nature publique ou appartenans à des particulières, qui dans le cours de la guerre peuvent être tombés entre les mains des officiers de l'une ou de l'autre partie, seront de suite, en tant qu'il sera praticable, restitués et délivrés aux autorités propres et personnes auxquelles ils appartiennent respectivement; considérant que dans cette période, les mots: originellement prise et qui s'y trouvera au moment de l'échange des ratifications, forment une phrase incidente, laquelle ne peut se rapporter grammaticalement qu'aux substantifs ou sujets qui précèdent.

Qu'ainsi l'article I du traité de Gand, ne défend aux parties contractantes d'emporter des lieux dont il stipule la restitution, que les seules propriétés publiques qui y auroient été originellement prises et qui s'y trouveroient au moment de l'échange des ratifications, mais qu'il défend d'emporter de ces mêmes lieux, aucune propriété particulière quelconque.

Que d'un autre côté, ces deux défenses ne sont applicables qu'uniquement aux lieux dont l'article stipule la restitution.

L'Empereur est d'avis:

"Que les Etats-Unis d'Amérique, sont en droit de réclamer de la Grande Bretagne une juste indemnité, pour toutes les propriétés particulières que les forces Britanniques auroient emportées, et comme il s'agit plus spécialement d'esclaves, pour tous les esclaves que les forces Britanniques auroient emmenés des lieux et territoires dont le traité stipule la restitution, en quittant ces mêmes lieux et territoires.

"Que les Etats-Unis sont en droit de regarder comme emmenés, tous ceux de ces esclaves qui, des territoires indiqués cidessus, auroient été transportés à bord de vaisseaux Britanniques mouillés dans les eaux des dits territoires, et qui par ce motif n'auroient pas été restitués."

"Mais que s'il y a des esclaves Américains emmenés de territoires dont l'article 1, du traité de Gand n'a pas stipulé la restitution aux Etats-Unis, les Etats-Unis ne sont pas en droit de réclamer une indemnité, pour les dits esclaves."

L'Empereur déclare en outre, qu'il est prêt à exercer l'office de médiateur qui lui a été déferé d'avance, par les deux Etats, dans les negociations que doit amener entre eux, la décision arbitrale qu'ils ont demandée.

Fait à St. Pétersbourg, le 22 Avril, 1822.

B.

Le Soussigné Secrétaire d'Etat, dirigeant le Ministère Impérial des affaires étrangères, s'ets empressé de porter à la coïssance de l'Empereur son maître, les explications dans lesquelles Mr. l'Ambassadeur de S. M. Britannique est entré avec le Ministère Imperial, à la suite de la communication préalable et confidentielle qui a été faite à Monsieur de Middleton ainsi qu'à Mr. le Chevalier Bagot de l'opinion exprimée par l'Empereur, sur le vrai sens de l'art. 1er du Traité de Gand.

Mr. le Chevalier Bagot entend qu'en vertu de la décision de Sa Majesté Impériale, "S. M. Britannique n'est pas tenue à indemniser les Etats-Unis d'aucuns esclaves qui, venant des endroits qui n'ont jamais été occupés par ses troupes, se sont volontairement réunis aux forces Britanniques, ou en conséquence de l'encouragement que les officiers de S. M. leur avoit offert, ou se dérober au pouvoir de leur maître, ces esclaves n'ayant pas été emmenés des lieux ou territoires pris par S. M. Britannique durant la guerre, et conséquemment n'ayant pas été emmenés des lieux dont l'article stipule la restitution."

Eé réponse à cette observation, le soussigné est chargé par Sa Majesta Imperiale, de communiquer ce qui suit à Monsieur le ministre des Etats-Unis d'Amerique.

L'Empereur ayant, du consentement mutuel des deux plenipotentiaires, émis une opinion fondée uniquement sur le sens qui résulte du texte de l'article en litige, ne se croit appelé à décider ici aucune question relative à ce que les loix de la guerre permettent ou défendent aux parties belligérantes, mais toujours fidèle à l'interprétation grammaticale de l'art. 1er du traité de Gand, Sa Majesté Imperiale déclare une seconde fois qu'il lui semble, d'après cette interprétation.

"Qu'en quittant les lieux et territoires dont le traité de Gand stipule la restitution aux Etats-Unis, les forces de S. M. Britannique n'avoient le droit d'emmener de ces mêmes lieux et territoires, absolument aucun esclave, par quelque moyen qu'il fût tombe ou venu se remettre en leur pouvoir."

"Mais que si, durant la guerre, des esclaves Américains avoient été emmenés par les forces Anglaises, d'autres lieux que ceux dont le traité de Gand stipule la restitution, sur territoire ou à bord de vaisseaux Britanniques, la Grande Bretagne ne seroit pas tenue d'indemniser les Etats-Unis de la perte de ces esclaves, par quelque moyen qu'ils fussent tombés ou venus se remettre au pouvoir de ces officiers."

Quoique convaincu, par les explications préalables dont il a été question plus haut, que tel est aussi le sens que Mr. le Chevalier Bagot attache à son observation, le soussigné n'en a pas moins reçu de Sa Majesté Impériale, l'ordre d'adresser aux plenipotentiaires respectifs, la présente note, qui leur prouvera, que pour mieux répondre à la confiance des deux gouvernemens, l'Empereur n'a pas voulu qu'il pût s'élever le plus léger doute sur les conséquences de son opinion.

Le Soussigné saisit avec empressement cette occasion de réitérer à Monsieur de Middleton, l'assurance de sa considération très distinguée.

Now, therefore, be it known that I, James Monroe, President of the United States, have caused the said convention to be made public, to the end that the same, and every clause and article thereof, may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed. Count Nesselrode to Mr. Middleton.

[Translation.]

The undersigned Secretary of State, directing the Imperial administration of Foreign Affairs, has the honor to communicate to Mr. Middleton, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, the opinion which the Emperor, his master, has thought it his duty to express upon the object of the differences which have arisen between the United States and Great Britain, relative to the interpretation of the first article of the treaty of Ghent.

Mr. Middleton is requested to consider this opinion as the award required of the Emperor by the two powers.

He will doubtless recollect that he, as well as the plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majesty, in all his memorials has principally insisted on the grammatical sense of the first article of the treaty of Ghent, and that even in his note of November 4, [16,] 1821, he has formally declared that it was on the significa- tion of the words in the text of the article as it now is that the decision of his Imperial Majesty should be founded.

The same declaration being made in the note of the British plenipotentiary, dated October 8, [20,] 1821, the Emperor had only to conform to the wishes expressed by the two parties by devoting all his attention to the examination of the grammatical question.

The above mentioned opinion will show the manner in which his Imperial Majesty judges of this question; and in order that the cabinet of Washington may also know the motives upon which the Emperor's judgment is founded, the undersigned has hereto subjoined an extract of some observations upon the literal sense of the first article of the treaty of Ghent.

In this respect the Emperor has confined himself to following the rules of the language employed in drawing up the act, by which the two powers have required his arbitration and defined the object of their difference.

His Imperial Majesty has thought it his duty, exclusively, to obey the authority of these rules, and his opinion could not but be the rigorous and necessary consequence thereof.

The undersigned eagerly embraces this occasion to renew to Mr. Middleton the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

His Imperial Majesty's Award.

[Translation.]

Invited by the United States of America and by Great Britain to give an opinion as arbitrator in the differences which have arisen between these two powers on the subject of the interpretation of the first article of the treaty which they concluded at Ghent, on the 24th December, 1814, the Emperor has taken cognizance of all the acts, memorials, and notes, in which the respective plenipotentiaries have set forth to his administration of foreign affairs the arguments upon which each of the litigant parties depends in support of the interpretation given by it to the said article.

After having maturely weighed the observations exhibited on both sides:

Considering that the American plenipotentiary and the plenipotentiary of Britain have desired that the discussion should be closed;

Considering that the former, in his note of November 4, (16,) 1821, and the latter, in his note of October 8, (20,) of the same year, have declared that it is upon the construction of the text of the article as it stands that the arbitrator's decision should be founded, and that both have appealed only as subsidiary means to the general principles of the law of nations and of maritime law;

The Emperor is of opinion "that the question can only be decided according to the literal and grammatical sense of the first article of the treaty of Ghent."

As to the literal and grammatical sense of the first article of the treaty of Ghent:

Considering that the period upon the signification of which doubts have arisen is expressed as follows:

"All territory, places, and possessions, whatsoever, taken by either party from the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the islands hereinafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay and without causing any destruction or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, or any slaves or other private property; and all archives, records, deeds, and papers, either of a public nature or belonging to private persons, which, in the course of the war, may have fallen into the hands of the officers of either party, shall be, as far as may be practicable, forthwith restored and delivered to the proper authorities and persons to whom they respectively belong."

Considering that, in this period, the words originally captured, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications, form an incidental phrase which can have respect, grammatically, only to the substantives or subjects which precede;

That the first article of the treaty of Ghent thus prohibits the contracting parties from carrying away from the places of which it stipulates the restitution only the public property which might have been originally captured there, and which should remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications, but that it prohibits the carrying away from these same places any private property whatever;

That, on the other hand, these two prohibitions are solely applicable to the places of which the article stipulates the restitution:

The Emperor is of opinion:

"That the United States of America are entitled to a just indemnification from Great Britain for all private property carried away by the British forces; and, as the question regards slaves more especially, for all such slaves as were carried away by the British forces from the places and territories of which the restitution was stipulated by the treaty, in quitting the said places and territories.

"That the United States are entitled to consider as having been so carried away all such slaves as may have been transported from the above mentioned territories on board of the British vessels within the waters of the said territories, and who, for this reason, have not been restored.

"But that, if there should be any American slaves who were carried away from territories of which the first article of the treaty of Ghent has not stipulated the restitution to the United States, the United States are not to claim an indemnification for the said slaves."

The Emperor declares, besides, that he is ready to exercise the office of mediator, which has been conferred on him beforehand by the two States, in the negotiations which must ensue between them in consequence of the award which they have demanded.

Count Nesselrode to Mr. Middleton.

[Translation.]

The undersigned Secretary of State, directing the Imperial administration of foreign affairs, has, without delay, laid before the Emperor, his master, the explanations into which the ambassador of his Britannic Majesty has entered with the Imperial ministry, in consequence of the preceding and confidential communication which was made to Mr. Middleton, as well as to Sir Charles Bagot, of the opinion expressed by the Emperor upon the true sense of the 1st article of the treaty of Ghent.

Sir Charles Bagot understands, that, in virtue of the decision of his Imperial Majesty, "his Britannic Majesty is not bound to indemnify the United States for any slaves who, coming from places which have never been occupied by his troops, voluntarily joined the British forces, either in consequence of the encouragement which his Majesty's officers had offered to them, or to free themselves from the power of their master—these slaves not having been carried away from places or territories captured by his Britannic Majesty during the war, and, consequently, not having been carried away from places of which the article stipulated the restitution."

In answer to this observation, the undersigned is charged by his Imperial Majesty to communicate what follows to the minister of the United States of America.

The Emperor, having, by the mutual consent of the two plenipotentiaries, given an opinion, founded solely upon the sense which results from the text of the article in dispute, does not think himself called upon to decide here any question relative to what the laws of war permit or forbid to the belligerents; but, always faithful to the grammatical interpretation of the 1st article of the treaty of Ghent, his Imperial Majesty declares a second time that it appears to him according to this interpretation:

"That in quitting the places and territories of which the treaty of Ghent stipulates the restitution to the United States, his Britannic Majesty's forces had no right to carry away from these same places and territories absolutely any slave, by whatever means he had fallen or come into their power.

"But that if, during the war, American slaves had been carried away by the English forces from other places than those of which the treaty of Ghent stipulates the restitution upon the territory, or on board British vessels, Great Britain should not be bound to indemnify the United States for the loss of these slaves, by whatever means they might have fallen or come into the power of her officers."

Although convinced, by the previous explanation above mentioned, that such is also the sense which Sir Charles Bagot attached to his observation, the undersigned has nevertheless received from his Imperial Majesty orders to address the present note to the respective plenipotentiaries, which will prove to them that, in order the better to justify the confidence of the two Governments, the Emperor has been unwilling that the slightest doubt should arise regarding the consequences of his opinion.

The undersigned eagerly embraces this occasion of repeating to Mr. Middleton the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

NESELRODE.

St. PETERSBURG, April 22, 1822.

We, the undersigned, having this day met in the City of Washington to exchange the ratifications of the convention concluded and signed at St. Petersburg on the 30th day of June, (12th day of July,) 1822, by the respective plenipotentiaries of the United States of America, his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, do hereby certify that, at the time of exchanging the said ratifications, it was agreed by us, for our respective Governments, conformably to the seventh article of the above mentioned convention, that the salary or compensation of the Commissioners and arbitrators mentioned therein shall be at the rate of one thousand pounds sterling, or four thousand four hundred and forty-four dollars, to each Commissioner, and of seven hundred and fifty pounds sterling, or three thousand three hundred and thirty-three dollars, to each arbitrator, per annum, from the time of the first meeting of the Commissioners at Washington until the final dissolution of the Board, to be paid quarterly; with an additional allowance, to be paid with the first quarter's salary, of six hundred pounds sterling to the Commissioners, and of the same sum to the arbitrator, to be appointed on the part of his Britannic Majesty, in consideration of their being called upon to exercise their functions at a distance from their country, and of a sum of five hundred pounds sterling to each of them at the close of their commission for their return home.

It was also agreed by us that the compensation of the secretary of the said Board of Commissioners shall be at the rate of four hundred and fifty pounds sterling, or two thousand dollars, a year, to commence from the period of his appointment, until the final dissolution of the Board.

And it was lastly agreed by us that the said salaries and additional allowances shall, like the contingent expenses of the commission, be defrayed jointly by the United States and his Britannic Majesty, the said expenses to be laid before the Board at the end of each quarter, and, after being ascertained and allowed by a majority of the Board, to be divided, including salary and allowance, as above, into two moieties, for each of which the Commissioners on either side shall draw, respectively, on the proper departments of their own Governments.

In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands and affixed our seals, at Washington, this tenth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-three.

TREATY WITH FRANCE OF JUNE 24, 1822, AS RATIFIED.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES FEBRUARY 20, 1823.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States:

The Convention of Navigation and Commerce, between the United States of America and his Majesty the King of France and Navarre, concluded and signed at Washington on the 24th of June, 1822, with the first separate article thereto annexed, having been ratified by the two parties, and the ratifications of the same having been duly exchanged, copies of it, and of the separate articles referred to, are now communicated to the two Houses of Congress, to the end that the necessary measures for carrying it into execution, on the part of the United States, may be adopted by the Legislature.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, February 18, 1823.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas a Convention of Navigation and Commerce between the United States of America and his Majesty the King of France and Navarre, together with two separate articles annexed to the same, was concluded and signed at Washington, on the twenty-fourth day of June last past, by the respective plenipotentiaries of the two powers; and whereas the said convention, and the first separate article annexed to the same, have been duly and respectively ratified by me and by his Majesty the King of France and Navarre, and the ratifications of the same have this day been exchanged at the city of Washington, by John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State, and the Count Julius de Menou, Chargé d'Affaires of France; which convention and the first separate article annexed to the same are in the words following, to wit:

Convention de Navigation et de Commerce entre sa Majesté le Roi de France et de Navarre et les Etats Unis d'Amerique.

Sa Majesté le Roi de France et de Navarre et les Etats Unis d'Amerique, desirant regler les relations de navigation et de commerce entre leur nations respectives par une convention temporaire reciproquement avantageuse et satisfaisante, et arriver ainsi à un arrangement plus étendu et durable, ont respectivement donne leur pleine-pouvoirs, savoir. Sa Majesté Tres Chretienne au Baron Hyde de Neuville, Chevalier de l'ordre Royal et Militaire de St. Louis, Commandeur de la Legion d'Honneur, Grand Croix de l'ordre Royal Americain d'Isabelle la Catholique, son Envoye Extraordinaire et Ministre Plenipotentiaire près les Etats Unis; et le Président des Etats Unis, à John Quincy Adams, leur Secretaire d'Etat; lesquels, apres avoir echangé leur pleins-pouvoirs, sont convenus des articles suivans:

ARTICLE 1. Les produits naturels ou manufacturés des Etats Unis importés en France sur batimens des Etats Unis payeront un droit additionnel qui n'excédera point vingt francs par tonneau de marchandise, en sus des droits payés sur les mêmes produits naturels ou manufacturés des Etats Unis quand ils sont importés par navires Français.

ARTICLE 2. Les produits naturels ou manufacturés de France importés aux Etats Unis sur batimens Français payeront un droit additionnel qui n'excédera point trois dollars, soixante-quinze cents par tonneau de marchandise, en sus des droits payés sur les mêmes produits naturels ou manufacturés de France quand ils sont importés par navires des Etats Unis.

ARTICLE 3. Aucun droit differentiel ne sera levé sur les produits du sol et de l'industrie de France qui seront importés par navires Français dans les ports des Etats Unis pour transit ou re-exportation: il en sera de même dans les ports de France pour les produits du sol et de l'industrie de l'Union qui seront importés pour transit ou re-exportation par navires des Etats Unis.

Convention of Navigation and Commerce between the United States of America and his Majesty the King of France and Navarre.

The United States of America and his Majesty the King of France and Navarre, being desirous of settling the relations of navigation and commerce between their respective nations, by a temporary convention reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory, and thereby of leading to a more permanent and comprehensive arrangement, have respectively furnished their full powers in manner following, that is to say: The President of the United States to John Quincy Adams, their Secretary of State, and his most Christian Majesty to the Baron Hyde de Neuville, Knight of the Royal and Military Order of St. Louis, Commander of the Legion of Honor, Grand Cross of the Royal American Order of Isabella the Catholic, his Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary near the United States; who, after exchanging their full powers, have agreed on the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. Articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, imported into France in vessels of the United States, shall pay an additional duty not exceeding twenty francs per ton of merchandise over and above the duties paid on the like articles, also of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, when imported in French vessels.

ARTICLE 2. Articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of France, imported into the United States in French vessels, shall pay an additional duty not exceeding three dollars and seventy-five cents per ton of merchandise over and above the duties collected upon the like articles, also of the growth, produce, or manufacture of France, when imported in vessels of the United States.

ARTICLE 3. No discriminating duty shall be levied upon the productions of the soil or industry of France, imported in French bottoms into the ports of the United States for transit or re-exportation; nor shall any such duties be levied upon the productions of the soil or industry of the United States, imported in vessels of the United States into the ports of France for transit or re-exportation.

ARTICLE 4. Les quantités suivantes seront considérées comme formant le tonneau de marchandise pour chacun des articles ci-après spécifiés:

Vins—quatre barriques de 61 gallons chaque ou 244 gallons de 231 pouces cubes (mesure Américaine.)

Eaux de vie et tous autres liquides 244 gallons.

Soieries et toutes autres marchandises sèches ainsi que tous autres articles généralement soumis au mesurage quarante deux pieds cubes, mesure Française en France; et cinquante pieds cubes mesure Américaine, aux Etats Unis.

Cotons—804 lb. avoir du poids ou 365 kilogrammes.

Tabacs—1600 lb. avoir du poids ou 725 kilogrammes.

Riz—1600 lb. avoir du poids ou 725 kilog: Et pour tous les articles non spécifiés et qui se présentent 2240 lb. avoir du poids ou 1016 kilogrammes.

ARTICLE 5. Les droits de tonnage, de phare, de pilotage, droits de port, courtage et tous autres droits sur la navigation étrangère en sus de ceux payés respectivement par la navigation nationale dans les deux pays, autre que ceux spécifiés dans les articles 1 et 2 de la présente convention, n'excéderont pas, en France, pour les batimens des Etats Unis, cinq francs par tonneau d'après le registre Américain du bâtiment, ni pour les batimens Français aux Etats Unis, quatre vingt quatorze cents par tonneau d'après le passeport Français du bâtiment.

ARTICLE 6. Le parties contractantes désirant favoriser mutuellement leur commerce, en donnant dans leurs ports toute assistance nécessaire à leurs batimens respectifs, sont convenues que les consuls et vice consuls pourront faire arrêter les matelôts faisant partie des équipages des batimens de leurs nations respectives qui auraient déserté des dits batimens pour les renvoyer et faire transporter hors du pays. Auquel effet les dits consuls et vice consuls s'adresseront aux tribunaux, juges et officiers compétens, et leur feront, par écrit, la demande des dits déserteurs, en justifiant par l'exhibition des registres du bâtiment ou rôle d'équipage ou autres documens officiels que ces hommes faisaient partie des dits équipages. Et sur cette demande ainsi justifiée, sauf toute fois l'apreuve contraire, l'extradition ne pourra être refusée, et il sera donné toute aide et assistance aux dits consuls et vice consuls pour la recherche, saisie et arrestation des susdits déserteurs, lesquels seront même détenus et gardés dans les prisons du pays à leur réquisition, et à leurs frais, jusqu'à ce qu'ils aient trouvé occasion de les renvoyer; mais s'ils n'étaient renvoyés dans le délai de trois mois à compter du jour de leur arrêt, ils seront élargis et ne pourront plus être arrêtés pour la même cause.

ARTICLE 7. La présente convention temporaire aura son plein effet pendant deux ans à partir du 1er. Octobre prochain, et même après l'expiration de ce terme, elle sera maintenue jusqu'à la conclusion d'un traité définitif, ou jusqu'à ce que l'une des parties ait déclaré à l'autre son intention d'y renoncer, laquelle déclaration devra être faite au moins six mois d'avance.

Et dans le cas où la présente convention viendrait à continuer, sans cette déclaration par l'une ou l'autre parte, des droits extraordinaires spécifiés dans les 1 et 2 articles, seront, à l'expiration des dites deux années, diminués de part et d'autre d'un quart de leur montant, et successivement d'un quart du dit montant d'année en année, aussi longtems qu'aucune des parties n'aura déclaré son intention d'y renoncer, ainsi qu'il est dit ci dessus.

ARTICLE 8. La présente convention sera ratifiée de part et d'autre, et les ratifications seront échangées dans l'espace d'une année à compter de ce jour, ou plutot si faire se peut. Mais l'exécution de la dite

ARTICLE 4. The following quantities shall be considered as forming the ton of merchandise for each of the articles hereinafter specified:

Wines—four 61 gallon hogsheads, or 244 gallons of 231 cubic inches, American measure.

Brandies and all other liquids, 244 gallons.

Silks and all other dry goods, and all other articles usually subject to measurement, forty-two cubic feet, French, in France, and fifty cubic feet, American measure, in the United States.

Cotton—804 lbs. avoirdupois, or 365 kilogrammes.

Tobacco—1,600 pounds avoirdupois, or 725 kilogrammes.

Ashes, pot and pearl, 2,240 lbs. avoirdupois, or 1,016 kilogrammes.

Rice—1,600 lbs. avoirdupois, or 725 kilogrammes; and for all weighable articles not specified 2,240 lbs. avoirdupois, or 1,016 kilogrammes.

ARTICLE 5. The duties of tonnage, light-money, pilotage, port charges, brokerage, and all other duties upon foreign shipping, over and above those paid by the national shipping in the two countries respectively, other than those specified in articles 1 and 2 of the present convention, shall not exceed in France, for vessels of the United States, five francs per ton of the vessel's American register; nor for vessels of France in the United States ninety-four cents per ton of the vessel's French passport.

ARTICLE 6. The contracting parties, wishing to favor their mutual commerce by affording in their ports every necessary assistance to their respective vessels, have agreed that the consuls and vice consuls may cause to be arrested the sailors, being part of the crews of the vessels of their respective nations, who shall have deserted from the said vessels, in order to send them back and transport them out of the country; for which purpose the said consuls and vice consuls shall address themselves to the courts, judges, and officers competent, and shall demand the said deserters in writing, proving by an exhibition of the registers of the vessel or ship's roll, or other official documents, that those men were part of said crews, and on this demand so proved (saving, however, where the contrary is proved) the delivery shall not be refused; and there shall be given all aid and assistance to the said consuls and vice consuls for the search, seizure, and arrest of said deserters, who shall even be detained and kept in the prisons of the country, at their request and expense, until they shall have found an opportunity of sending them back. But if they be not sent back within three months, to be counted from the day of their arrest, shall be set at liberty, and shall be no more arrested for the same cause.

ARTICLE 7. The present temporary convention shall be in force for two years from the first day of October next, and even after the expiration of that term until the conclusion of a definitive treaty, or until one of the parties shall have declared its intention to renounce it, which declaration shall be made at least six months beforehand.

And in case the present arrangement should remain without such declaration of its discontinuance by either party, the extra duties specified in the first and second articles shall, from the expiration of the said two years, be, on both sides, diminished by one-fourth of their whole amount; and afterwards, by one-fourth of the said amount from year to year, so long as neither party shall have declared the intention of renouncing it, as above stated.

ARTICLE 8. The present convention shall be ratified on both sides, and the ratifications shall be exchanged within one year from the date hereof, or sooner, if possible. But the execution of the said convention commencera dans la deux pays le premiere Octobre prochain, et aura son effet, dans le cas même de non-ratification, pour tous batimens partis bonâ fide pour les ports de l'une ou l'autre nation, dans la confiance qu'elle était en vigueur.

En foi de quoi, les plenipotentiaries respectifs ont signé la presente convention, et y ont apposé leur sceaux, en la ville de Washington, ce 24me jour de Juin, de l'an de notre seigneur, 1822.

ARTICLE SÉPARÉ. Les droits extraordinaires levés de part et d'autre jusqu'à ce jour, en vertu de l'acte du Congrès du 15 Mai, 1820, et de l'ordonnance du 26 Juillet de la même année et autres la confirmant, qui n'ont point déjà été remboursés, seront restitués. Signé et scellé comme ci-dessus ce 24me jour de Juin, 1822.

Now, therefore, be it known that I, James Monroe, President of the United States, have caused the said convention and first separate article to be made public, to the end that the same, and every clause and article thereof, may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed. Done at the city of Washington, this twelfth day of February, in the year of our Lord [L. s.] one thousand eight hundred and twenty-three, and of the Independence of the United States the forty-seventh.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President:

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

convention shall commence in both countries on the 1st of October next, and shall be effective, even in case of non-ratification, for all such vessels as may have sailed bona fide for the ports of either nation, in the confidence of its being in force.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention, and have thereunto affixed their seals, at the city of Washington, this 24th day of June, A. D. 1822.

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE. [L. s.]

SEPARATE ARTICLE. The extra duties levied on either side before the present day, by virtue of the act of Congress of May 15, 1820, and of the ordinance of July 26 of the same year, and others confirmative thereof, and which have not already been paid back, shall be refunded.

Signed and sealed as above, this 24th day of June, 1822.

17TH CONGRESS.]

No. 356.

[2D SESSION.]

TRADE WITH THE BRITISH NORTH AMERICAN AND WEST INDIA COLONIES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 21, 1823.

Mr. RUSSELL, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred a resolution instructing them to inquire whether the provisions of an act of the Parliament of Great Britain passed the 5th of August, 1822, violate any of the rights of the United States or are detrimental to their interests, having, in pursuance of instructions, inquired into the several matters referred, reported:

That the provisions of the act of Parliament above mentioned are not, in their opinion, repugnant to rights secured to the citizens of the United States by existing treaties or to national law. That act of Parliament, so far as it regards the United States, permits to be imported therefrom, by land or water, to any port or place of entry in Upper or Lower Canada, at which there is, or may hereafter be, lawfully established, a custom-house, the goods, wares, and commodities, the growth, produce, and manufacture of the United States, enumerated in a schedule annexed to that act, marked A, on paying the duties specified in another schedule, also annexed to that act, marked B.

There is no provision of that act which imposes duties on the merchandise of citizens of the United States passing into Lower Canada or down the river St. Lawrence with a view to exportation, and whatever might, heretofore, have been our right to such a passage for such a purpose, it has not been impaired by any provision of that act, as no reference to it whatever is to be found therein. Your committee are not aware that the citizens of the United States ever enjoyed the right to export their merchandise in their own vessels from the Canadas, or that they were permitted to navigate the river St. Lawrence, with their vessels and merchandise, below the port of Quebec, until that port was placed, by the British act of Parliament of the 24th of June, 1822, among the ports thereby declared to be open to American commerce.

Although the British act of Parliament of the 5th of August, 1822, does not, in the opinion of your committee, violate any conventional or perfect national right of the United States, yet your committee cannot but regard that act as highly detrimental to the interests of that portion of our citizens which it immediately affects.

It was a measure, indeed, not only unexpected, but certainly inconsistent with that liberal spirit which has recently been avowed by both Governments in relation to their general commercial intercourse with each other, and repugnant to the course of conduct which both had tacitly pursued in relation to that particular commercial intercourse which this measure is intended specially to regulate.

Since the cessation of all treaty stipulations on the subject, and until the enactment of this statute, both Governments had allowed this particular intercourse between the United States and the Canadas to be as freely enjoyed by both parties, as it was, or of right could have been enjoyed, while those stipulations continued to be in force. The inhabitants of the United States have still been permitted to import into the two Canadas all goods and merchandise, the importation of which was not entirely prohibited, subject to the payment of no higher or other duties than would be payable by British subjects, on the importation of the same from Europe into the said territories. But now, by the act of Parliament under consideration, not only are our citizens, without any cause therefor being given on our part, prohibited from importing into those territories all goods and merchandise which are not the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, but many important articles which are the growth, produce, or manufacture of said States, and even the articles which are not so prohibited are subjected to the payment of a duty so exorbitant as, in some instances, to be equivalent to a prohibition.

As this act, while it thus seriously injures a portion of our citizens, is highly dissatisfactory to those British subjects on whom it immediately operates, your committee are of opinion that, before resorting to any legislative measure to redress ourselves or to counteract the evils to which our citizens are exposed under the act of Parliament aforesaid, an attempt should be made to obtain, by amicable negotiation, such an arrangement on this subject as shall accord with the friendly and liberal views professed by both Governments, and be perfectly satisfactory to the now suffering citizens or subjects of both.

Your committee, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the subject be referred to the President of the United States, and that he be requested to obtain, by negotiation with the Government of Great Britain, such modifications of the act of Parliament of the 5th of August, 1822, as may remove all just cause of complaint.

An act to regulate the trade of the provinces of Lower and Upper Canada, and for other purposes, relating to the said provinces.—[August 5, 1822.]

Whereas it is expedient to make further regulations respecting the trade of the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, in North America:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That, from and after the passing of this act, it shall be lawful to import, by land or inland navigation, in any British or American vessel or vessels, boat or boats, carriage or carriages, the goods, wares, and commodities, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States of America, enumerated in the schedule or table annexed to this act, marked (A,) from any port or place in the United States of America, into any port or place of entry at which a custom-house now is, or hereafter may be, lawfully established, in either of the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada: Provided always, nevertheless, That it shall and may be lawful for the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or person administering the Government of either of the said provinces, respectively, by and with the advice and consent of the Executive Council thereof, for the time being, from time to time, to diminish or increase, by proclamation, the number of ports or places which are, or hereafter may be, appointed in such province, for the entry of goods, wares, and commodities, imported from the United States of America.

II. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, there shall be raised, levied, collected, and paid unto his Majesty, his heirs and successors, for and upon such of the goods, wares, and commodities which shall be so imported as are enumerated in the schedule or table annexed to this act, marked (B,) the several duties of customs, as the same are respectively inserted or described and set forth, in figures, in the said schedule.

III. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That if, upon the importation of any article charged with duty by this act, the said article shall also be liable to the payment of duty under the authority of any colonial law, equal to, or exceeding in amount, the duty charged by this act, then, and in such case, the duty charged upon such article by this act shall not be demanded or paid upon the importation of such article: Provided, also, That if the duty payable under such colonial law shall be less in amount than the duty payable by this act, then, and in such case, the difference only between the amount of the duty payable by this act and the duty payable under the authority of such colonial laws shall be deemed to be the duty payable by this act; and the same shall be collected and paid in such and the like manner, and appropriated and applied to such and the like uses as the duties specified in the said schedule annexed to this act, marked (B,) are directed to be collected, paid, appropriated, and applied.

IV. And be it further enacted, That the same tonnage duties shall be paid upon all American vessels or boats importing any goods into either of the said provinces as are, or may be, for the time being, payable in the United States of America on British vessels or boats entering the harbors of the State from whence such goods shall have been imported.

V. And be it further enacted, That in all cases in which the duties imposed by this act upon the importation of articles into the said provinces, or either of them, are charged not according to the weight, gauge, or measure, but according to the value thereof, such value shall be ascertained in the mode prescribed by an act passed in this present session of Parliament, intituled "An act to regulate the trade between his Majesty's possessions in America and the West Indies and other places in America and the West Indies."

VI. And be it further enacted, That if the importer or proprietor of such articles shall refuse to pay the duties hereby imposed thereon, it shall and may be lawful for the collector, or other chief officer of the customs, where such articles shall be imported, and he is hereby respectively required to take and secure the same, with the casks or other package thereof, and to cause the same to be publicly sold within the space of twenty days, at the most, after such refusal made, and at such time and place as such officer shall, by four or more days' public notice, appoint for that purpose; which articles shall be sold to the highest bidder; and the money arising from the sale thereof shall be applied to the payment of the said duties, together with the charges which shall have been occasioned by the said sale; and the overplus (if any) shall be paid to such importer, or any other person authorized to receive the same.

VII. And whereas a certain act, made and passed in the twenty-eighth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, entitled "An act to allow the importation of rum and other spirits from his Majesty's colonies or plantations in the West Indies into the province of Quebec without payment of duty, under certain conditions and restrictions," has been repealed during the present session of Parliament; and whereas doubts may be entertained whether a certain act, passed in the forty-ninth year of his said late Majesty's reign, intituled "An act to allow the importation of rum and other spirits from the island of Bermuda into the province of Lower Canada without payment of duty, on the same terms and conditions as such importation may be made directly from his Majesty's sugar colonies in the West Indies," might not still remain in force, notwithstanding the repeal of the said first mentioned act: Be it therefore enacted and declared, That the said last mentioned act shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

VIII. And whereas it is expedient to afford protection to the trade between the said colonies and plantations and the province of Lower Canada, by imposing the same duty upon rum or other spirits, the produce or manufacture of the said colonies, imported from Great Britain into the said province, as is now payable upon the same articles when imported from his Majesty's said colonies or plantations in the West Indies: Be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, there shall be raised, levied, collected, and paid unto his Majesty, his heirs and successors, for and upon every gallon of rum or other spirits, the produce or manufacture of any of his Majesty's islands, colonies, or plantations in the West Indies, which shall be imported or brought into any port of the said province of Lower Canada from Great Britain or Ireland, or any of the British dominions in Europe, the sum of sixpence over and above all other duties now or hereafter to be made payable thereon in the said province.

IX. And be it further enacted, That the rates and duties chargeable by this act shall be deemed and are hereby declared to be sterling money of Great Britain, and shall be collected, recovered, and paid to the amount of the value which such nominal sums bear in Great Britain; and that such sums may be received and taken according to the proportion and value of five shillings and sixpence to the ounce in silver; and that the said duties hereinbefore granted shall be received, levied, collected, paid, and recovered in the same manner and form, and by such rules, ways, and means, and under such penalties and forfeitures, as any other duties payable to his Majesty upon goods imported into the said provinces of Upper Canada and Lower Canada, or into either of them, respectively, are or shall be raised, levied, collected, paid, and recovered by any act or acts of Parliament, as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes, as if the several clauses, powers, directions, penalties, and forfeitures relating thereto were particularly repealed and again enacted in the body of this act; and that all the moneys which shall arise by the said duties (except the necessary charges of raising, collecting, levying, recovering, answering, paying, and accounting for the same) shall be paid by the collector of his Majesty's customs into the hands of his Majesty's Receiver General in the said provinces, respectively, for the time being, and shall be applied to and for the use of the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, respectively, in such manner only as shall be directed by any law or laws which may be made by his Majesty, his heirs, or successors, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Council and Assembly of each of the said provinces, respectively.

X. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful to export in any British or American vessel or vessels, boat or boats, carriage or carriages, from any of the ports or places of entry now or hereafter to be established in the said provinces, to any port or place in the United States of America, any article of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any of his Majesty's dominions, or any other article legally imported into the said provinces: Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to permit or allow the exportation of any arms or naval stores, unless a license shall have been obtained for that purpose from his Majesty's Secretary of State; and in case any such articles shall be shipped or waterborne, for the purpose of being exported contrary to this act, the same shall be forfeited, and shall and may be seized and prosecuted as hereinafter directed.

XI. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to interfere with or repeal, as respects the inland navigation of the said provinces, any of the provisions contained in a certain act passed in the seventh and eighth years of the reign of King William, intituled "An act for preventing frauds and regulating abuses in the plantation trade," except in so far as the same are altered or repealed by this act.

XII. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures incurred in either of the said provinces under this act (except where it is otherwise provided) shall and may be sued for and prosecuted in any court having competent jurisdiction within such province, respectively; and the same shall and may be recovered, divided, and accounted for in the same manner and form, and by the same rules and regulations in all respects as other penalties and forfeitures for offences against the laws relating to the customs and trade of the said provinces, respectively, shall or may, by any act or acts of the Legislatures of such provinces, be directed to be sued for, prosecuted, recovered, divided, and accounted for within the same, respectively.

XIII. And whereas it is expedient to encourage the trade between Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward's Island, by enabling the merchants and traders of Newfoundland to export from thence into Canada rum and other spirits the produce of the British West India islands, or any of his Majesty's colonies on the continent of South America, free of any duty which may have been imposed upon its importation from any of the places last aforesaid, and for which purpose to allow, upon the export of such rum or other spirits, a drawback of the full duties paid upon the importation thereof: Be it therefore enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, there shall be paid and allowed, upon the exportation from any or either of the said colonies of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, or Prince Edward's Island, into Canada of rum or other spirits, being the produce of the British West India islands, or any of his Majesty's colonies on the continent of South America, a drawback of the full duties of customs which may have been paid upon the importation thereof from any of the places last aforesaid into any or either of the said colonies of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, or Prince Edward's Island, upon a certificate being produced, under the hands and seals of the collector and comptroller of his Majesty's customs at Quebec, certifying that the said rum or other spirits have been duly landed in Canada.

XIV. And be it further enacted, That no entry shall pass nor any drawback be paid or allowed upon the exportation of rum or other spirits from any or either of the said colonies of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, or Prince Edward's Island, into Canada, unless such entry may be made in the name of the real owner or owners, proprietor or proprietors, of the said goods; and that before such owner or owners, proprietor or proprietors, shall receive the said drawback so allowed as aforesaid, one or more of them shall verify upon oath, upon the debenture to be made out for the payment of such drawback, that he or they is or are the real owner or owners of the said goods; nor unless proof, on oath, shall be made to the satisfaction of the collector and comptroller of his Majesty's customs at the port from whence the said goods shall be so imported into Canada that the full duties due upon the importation of the said goods at the said port had been paid and discharged: Provided always, That, in case where the owners of the said goods are resident in any other part of the British dominions, it shall be lawful for their known and established agents in the colonies from whence the said goods shall be so imported into Canada to take the necessary oaths on behalf of the said owners.

XV. And be it further enacted, That the said drawbacks shall be paid by the collector of his Majesty's customs at the port from whence the said goods shall be so imported into Canada, with the consent of the comptroller there, out of any moneys in his hands arising from the duties of customs.

XVI. And be it further enacted, That no drawback shall be paid and allowed as aforesaid unless the said rum or other spirits shall be duly entered for exportation with the proper officers of the customs, and actually shipped on board the ship or vessel in which the said goods are intended to be exported, within the space of one year from the time such rum or other spirits were originally imported into the colony from whence it is intended to export them to Canada, nor unless such drawback shall be claimed within one year after the goods are so shipped for exportation.

XVII. And whereas, since the division of the province of Quebec into the provinces of Lower and Upper Canada, divers regulations have from time to time been made, by agreements concluded under the authority of acts passed by the Legislature of the said two provinces, respectively, concerning the imposing of duties upon articles imported into the province of Lower Canada and the payment of drawbacks of such duties to the province of Upper Canada, on account of the proportion of goods so imported into Lower Canada, and passing from thence into the said province of Upper Canada, and consumed therein; the last of which agreements expired on the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen: And whereas it appears, by the report of the Commissioners last appointed for the purposes aforesaid, that the province of Upper Canada claims certain arrearages from the province of Lower Canada on account of such drawbacks, which claims are not admitted on the part of the province of Lower Canada; and it further appears by the report of the said Commissioners, appointed on behalf of both provinces for the purpose aforesaid, that they have failed to establish any regulation for the period beyond the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, by reason that they could not agree upon the proportion of duties to be paid to Upper Canada by way of drawbacks: For remedy of the inconvenience occasioned by the suspension of the said agreement, and for the satisfactory investigation and adjustment of the said claims: Be it enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or person administering the Government of each of the said provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, so soon as conveniently may be after the passing of this act, to appoint, by commission under the great seal of his respective province, one arbitrator, and that the said arbitrator so appointed shall have power, by an instrument under their hands and seals, to appoint a third arbitrator; and, in case of their not agreeing in such appointment within one month from the date of the appointment of the arbitrators so directed to be made on the part of the respective provinces, or the last thereof, if the said appointments shall not be made on the same day, his Majesty, his heirs or successors, shall have power, by an instrument under his sign manual, to appoint such third arbitrator, who (if appointed in manner last mentioned) shall not be an inhabitant of either of the said provinces; and that the three arbitrators, so appointed as aforesaid, shall have power to hear and determine all claims of the province of Upper Canada upon the province of Lower Canada on account of drawbacks or proportion of duties under agreements made and ratified by the authority of the Legislatures of the said two provinces according to the fair understanding and construction of the said agreements; and also to hear any claim which may be advanced on the part of the province of Upper Canada to a proportion of duties heretofore levied in Lower Canada under British acts of Parliament, the division of which duties shall not have been embraced within the terms of any provincial agreement, and to report the particulars of any such claim, with the evidence thereupon, to the Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury for the time being; and if it shall appear to the Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury that any sum is justly due from the province of Lower Canada to the province of Upper Canada, on account of such last mentioned claim, they shall signify the same, together with the amount, to the Governor or person administering the Government of the province of Lower Canada for the time being, who shall thereupon issue his warrant upon the Receiver General of Lower Canada to pay such amount to the Receiver General of Upper Canada, in full discharge of any such claims.

XVIII. And be it further enacted, That the said arbitrators shall have power to send for and examine such persons, papers, and records as they shall judge necessary for their information in the matters referred to them; and that if any person or persons shall refuse or neglect to attend the said arbitrators, or to produce before them any papers or documents, having been duly served in either province with reasonable notice in writing for that purpose, he, she, or they, shall forfeit and pay the sum of fifty pounds, to be recovered by bill, plaint, or information, in any court having competent jurisdiction within the province in which such person usually resides, to be applied towards the support of the civil Government of the said province, and to be accounted for to his Majesty, through the Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury for the time being, in such manner and form as it shall please his Majesty to direct.

XIX. And be it further enacted, That the witnesses to be produced before the said arbitrators, if it is desired by either of the said arbitrators, shall and may be sworn before any of his Majesty's justices of the peace within either of the said provinces, or before any one of the said arbitrators, who are hereby empowered jointly or severally to administer such oath; and that if any person shall, in any such oath so taken as aforesaid, wilfully forswear himself, he shall be deemed guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury.

XX. And be it further enacted, That in case of the death, removal, or incapacity of either of the said arbitrators before making an award, or in case the third arbitrator, chosen or appointed as aforesaid, shall refuse to act, another shall be appointed in his stead, in the same manner as such arbitrator so dead, removed, or become incapable or refusing to act, as aforesaid, was originally appointed; and that in case a third arbitrator shall be appointed by his Majesty, as hereinbefore mentioned, it shall be lawful for the Governor-in-chief in and over the said provinces to determine the amount of remuneration to be paid to such arbitrator, which amount shall be defrayed in equal proportions by each province, and shall be paid by warrants to be issued for that purpose by the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or person administering the Government of each province, upon the Receiver General thereof, respectively.

XXI. And be it further enacted, That the award of the majority of the said arbitrators, so far as the same shall be authorized by this act, shall be final and conclusive as to all matters therein contained; and that if either of the arbitrators nominated by the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or persons administering the Government of either of the said provinces, shall refuse or neglect to attend, on due notice being given, the two remaining arbitrators may proceed to hear and determine the matters referred to them, in the same manner as if he were present.

XXII. And be it further enacted, That the said arbitrators, or a majority of them, as herein before mentioned, shall certify the award to be made by them in the premises, under their hands and seals, to the Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and to the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or person administering the Government of each of the said provinces; and that if any sum be directed by the said award to be paid to the province of Upper Canada by the province of Lower Canada, it shall and may be lawful for the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or person administering the Government of the said province of Lower Canada, and he is hereby required, to issue his warrant upon the Receiver General of the province of Lower Canada, in favor of the Receiver General of the province of Upper Canada, for the sum so awarded, which sum shall be accordingly paid by the Receiver General of Lower Canada in discharge of such warrant, and shall be accounted for by him to the Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury for the time being, in such manner and form as his Majesty, his heirs, and successors, shall be graciously pleased to direct.

XXIII. And be it further enacted, That the arbitrators to be appointed under this act shall have power to hear and determine any claim which may be advanced on the part of the province of Lower Canada upon the province of Upper Canada, being of the same description as those which, by this act, may be preferred to the same arbitrators on the part of Upper Canada; and that their award thereupon shall be final and conclusive, and shall be carried into effect, if the same be made in favor of the province of Lower Canada, in the same manner as is herein directed with respect to any award which may be made in favor of the province of Upper Canada.

XXIV. And be it further enacted, That, of all duties which have been levied in the province of Lower Canada since the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, under any act passed in the said province, upon any goods, wares, merchandise, or commodities imported by sea into the province of Lower Canada, and also of all duties which, after the passing of this act and before the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, shall be levied in the province of Lower Canada, under any act passed in the said province, upon any goods, wares, merchandise, or commodities imported by sea into the said province of Lower Canada, the province of Upper Canada shall be entitled to have and receive one-fifth part, as the proportion of duties arising and due to the said province of Upper Canada upon such importations; and that the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or person administering the Government of the province of Lower Canada, shall and may issue his warrant forthwith upon the Receiver General of Lower Canada, in favor of the Receiver General of the province of Upper Canada, for such proportion of the duties as shall have been received in the province of Lower Canada before the passing of this act, and shall and may, on the first day of January and the first day of July, in each and every year thereafter, issue his warrant upon the Receiver General of Lower Canada, in like manner, for the payment to the Receiver General of Upper Canada of such sum as may be then ascertained to be due on account of the said proportion, according to the provisions of this act.

XXV. And be it further enacted, That, immediately after the said first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, the proportion to be paid to Upper Canada, for the four years next succeeding, of duties levied in the province of Lower Canada, under the authority of any act or acts passed, or to be passed therein, upon goods, wares, and commodities imported therein by sea, shall and may be ascertained by the award of arbitrators, to be appointed in the same manner, and with the same powers, as hereinbefore provided, with respect to the arbitrators to whom the question of arrears is to be referred, and that arbitrators shall, in like manner, be appointed, and an award made once after every four years thereafter, for the purpose of establishing such proportion from time to time; and all and every the provisions contained in this act respecting the appointment, powers, and remuneration of the arbitrators to be first appointed after the passing thereof, and regarding the execution of their duty, shall apply and extend to the arbitrators to be appointed for the purposes last herein mentioned.

XXVI. And be it further enacted, That, after the said first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, and until a new proportion of duties to be paid to Upper Canada shall be established, as hereinbefore provided, and also, at all times hereafter, in default of any such proportion being appointed, the proportion of duties last assigned to be paid to Upper Canada, under the authority of this act, shall continue to be paid by the province of Lower Canada, and warrants shall issue for the payment of the same, in the same manner as for the period before the same first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four: Provided always, That it shall be in the power of the arbitrators, nevertheless, by their subsequent award, to alter such proportion from the period for which it was last established, if it shall appear to them just so to do.

XXVII. And whereas, by a certain act of the Parliament of Great Britain, passed in the fourteenth year of his late Majesty's reign, intituled "An act to establish a fund towards further defraying the charges of the administration of justice and support of the civil Government within the province of Quebec, in America," certain duties were imposed upon goods and commodities imported into the said province, which duties are, by the said act, directed to be applied, under the authority of the Lord High Treasurer, or Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury, in making a more certain and adequate provision towards defraying the expense of the administration of justice and the support of the civil Government of the said province of Quebec; and, since the division of the said province of Quebec into the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, it has been contended, on behalf of the said provinces, that the proceeds of such duties should be distributed between the said two provinces in proportion to the amount of expenses defrayed by each, respectively, towards the administration of justice and the support of its civil Government, and not in proportion to the estimated consumption within either province of the articles upon which such duties shall have been paid: Be it therefore enacted, That it shall be lawful for the arbitrators, to be appointed from time to time, for the purpose of establishing the proportion which shall be paid to Upper Canada of such duties as now are or hereafter may be imposed by acts passed in the province of Lower Canada, to receive the claims in behalf of each province, with respect to its proportion of duties levied under the said act, passed in the fourteenth year of his said late Majesty's reign, since the expiration of the last provisional agreement, heretofore ratified between the said two provinces, or which may hereafter be levied under the authority of the said act, upon goods and commodities imported into Lower Canada, and to report the same, with the evidence thereon, to the Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury for the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland for the time being, in order that they may make such order respecting the proportion in which the same shall be expended within each of the said provinces, respectively, for the purposes mentioned in the said act, as to them shall seem meet:

Provided always, nevertheless, That, until such order shall be made by the Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury, as aforesaid, the proceeds of such duties shall be distributed in the same proportion between the said two provinces as the duties levied under the provincial acts of the province of Lower Canada within the same period; subject, nevertheless, to be increased or diminished, as respects either of the said provinces, by any subsequent order of the said Lords Commissioners, extended to the period for which no such order had before been made.

XXVIII. And whereas the division of the province of Quebec into the two provinces of Upper and Lower Canada was intended for the common benefit of his Majesty's subjects residing within both of the newly constituted provinces, and not in any manner to obstruct the intercourse or prejudice the trade to be carried on by the inhabitants of any part of the said late province of Quebec with Great Britain, or with other countries; and it has accordingly been made a subject of mutual stipulation between the said two provinces, in the several agreements which have heretofore subsisted, that the province of Upper Canada should not impose any duties upon articles imported from Lower Canada, but would permit and allow the province of Lower Canada to impose such duties as they might think fit upon articles imported into the said province of Lower Canada, of which duties a certain proportion was by the said agreements appointed to be paid to the province of Upper Canada; and whereas, in consequence of the inconveniences arising from the cessation of such agreements as above recited, it has been found expedient to remedy the evils now experienced in the province of Upper Canada, and to guard against such as might in future arise from the exercise of an exclusive control, by the Legislature of Lower Canada, over the imports and exports into and out of the port of Quebec; and it is further expedient, in order to enable the said province of Upper Canada to meet the necessary charges upon its ordinary revenue and to provide with sufficient certainty for the support of its civil Government, to establish such control as may prevent the evils which have arisen or may arise, from the Legislature of Lower Canada suffering to expire unexpectedly, or repealing suddenly, and without affording to Upper Canada an opportunity of remonstrance, existing duties upon which the principal part of its revenue and the necessary maintenance of its Government may depend: Be it therefore enacted, That all and every the duties which, at the time of the expiration of the last agreement between the said provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, were payable, under any act or acts of the province of Lower Canada, on the importation of any goods, wares, or commodities, into the said province of Lower Canada, (except such as may have been imposed for the regulation of the trade by land or inland navigation, between the said province and the United States of America,) shall be payable and shall be levied according to the provisions contained in any such acts until any such act or acts for repealing or altering the said duties, or any part thereof, respectively, shall be passed by the Legislative Council and Assembly of the said province of Lower Canada, and until such act or acts, repealing or altering such duties, shall, after a copy thereof has been transmitted to the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or person administering the Government of the province of Upper Canada, be laid before both Houses of the Imperial Parliament, according to the forms and provisions contained in a certain act of the Parliament of Great Britain, passed in the thirty-first year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act to repeal certain parts of an act passed in the fourteenth year of his Majesty's reign, intituled 'An act for making more effectual provision for the Government of the province of Quebec, in North America,' and to make further provision for the Government of the said province," and the royal assent thereto proclaimed within the province of Lower Canada, according to the provisions of the said last mentioned act.

XXIX. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, no act of the Legislature of the province of Lower Canada whereby any additional or other duties shall or may be imposed on articles imported by sea into the said province of Lower Canada, and whereby the province of Upper Canada shall or may in any respect be directly or indirectly affected, shall have the force of law until the same shall have been laid before the Imperial Parliament, as provided in certain cases by the said act, passed in the thirty-first year of his said late Majesty's reign, and the royal assent thereto published by proclamation in the said province of Lower Canada, a copy of such act having, within one month from the time of presenting the same for the royal assent in the said province, been transmitted by the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or person administering the Government of the province of Lower Canada, to the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or person administering the Government of the province of Upper Canada: Provided always, nevertheless, That it shall not be necessary to transmit any such act to be laid before the Imperial Parliament, if, before the same shall have been presented for the royal assent within the said province of Lower Canada, the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of the said province of Upper Canada shall, by address to the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or person administering the Government of the said province of Upper Canada, pray that their concurrence in the imposition of the duties intended to be imposed by such act may be signified to the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or person administering the Government of the said province of Lower Canada.

XXX. And whereas it is expedient that the productions of the province of Upper Canada should be permitted to be exported, without being made subject by any act of the province of Lower Canada, either directly or indirectly, to duties or impositions on their arrival in that province, or in passing through the waters thereof: Be it enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, all and every the boats, scows, rafts, cribs, and other craft, belonging to any of his Majesty's subjects, and coming from the province of Upper Canada into the province of Lower Canada, not laden with the productions of any foreign country, shall be allowed freely to pass into and through the said province, and shall not be subject to any rate, tax, duty, or imposition, other than any charge which may now exist for pilotage, or which may now be established for toll at any lock or other work now actually erected on the navigable waters thereof, any law, statute, or usage, of the province of Lower Canada to the contrary notwithstanding; and that the expense of improving the navigation of the waters of the river St. Lawrence shall in future be defrayed by such measures and in such proportions as the arbitrators to be appointed under the provisions of this act shall determine, upon the prayer of either province: Provided always, That no such determination shall be carried into effect until sanctioned and enacted by the Legislatures of both the said provinces.

XXXI. And whereas doubts have been entertained whether the tenures of lands within the said provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, holden in fief and seignior, can legally be changed; and whereas it may materially tend to the improvement of such lands, and to the general advantage of the said provinces, that such tenures may henceforth be changed in the manner hereinafter mentioned: Be it therefore further enacted and declared, That if any person or persons holding any lands in the said provinces of Lower and Upper Canada, or either of them, in fief and seignior, and having legal power and authority to alienate the same, shall, at any time, from and after the commencement of this act, surrender the same into the hands of his Majesty, his heirs or successors, and shall, by petition to his Majesty, or to the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or person administering the Government of the province in which the lands so holden shall be situated, set forth that he, she, or they, is or are desirous of holding the same in free and common soccage, such Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or person administering the Government of such province as aforesaid, in pursuance of his Majesty's instructions, transmitted through his principal Secretary of State for Colonial Affairs, and by and with the advice and consent of the Executive Council of such province, shall cause a fresh grant to be made to such person or persons of such lands to be holden in free and common soccage, in like manner as lands are now holden in free and common soccage in that part of Great Britain called England; subject, nevertheless, to payment to his Majesty, by such grantee or grantees, of such sum or sums of money as for a commutation for the fines and other dues which would have been payable to his Majesty under the original tenures, and to such conditions as to his Majesty, or to the said Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or person administering the Government aforesaid, shall seem just and reasonable: Provided always, That, on any such fresh grant being made as aforesaid, no allotment or appropriation of lands for the support and maintenance of a Protestant clergy shall be necessary; but every such fresh grant shall be valid and effectual without any specification of lands for the purpose aforesaid, any law or statute to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding.

XXXII. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for his Majesty, his heirs and successors, to commute with any person holding lands at Cens et Rentcs in any censive or fief of his Majesty, within either of the said provinces, and such person may obtain a release from his Majesty of all feudal rights arising by reason of such tenure, and receive a grant from his Majesty, his heirs or successors, in free and common soccage, upon payment to his Majesty of such sum of money as his Majesty, his heirs or successors, may deem to be just and reasonable, by reason of the release and grant aforesaid; and all such sums of money as shall be paid upon any commutations made by virtue of this act shall be applied towards the administration of justice and the support of the civil Government of the said province.

XXXIII. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall be sued or prosecuted for anything done or to be done in pursuance of this act, such person or persons may plead the general issue, and give this act and the special matter in evidence; and if the plaintiff or plaintiffs, prosecutor or prosecutors, shall become nonsuit, or forbear the prosecution, or discontinue his, her, or their action, or if a verdict shall pass against him, her, or them, the defendants shall have treble costs, and shall have the like remedy for the same as in cases where costs are by law given to defendants.

An act to regulate the trade between his Majesty's possessions in America and the West Indies, and other places in America and the West Indies.—[June 24, 1822.]

Whereas divers acts of Parliament have been from time to time passed for regulating the importation and exportation of certain articles into and from certain territories, islands and ports, under the dominion of his Majesty in America and the West Indies, and it is expedient that the said several acts should be repealed and other provisions made in lieu thereof:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That, from and after the passing of this act, an act passed in the twenty-eighth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, intituled "An act for regulating the trade between the subjects of his Majesty's colonies and plantations in North America and in the West India islands and the countries belonging to the United States of America, and between his Majesty's said subjects and the foreign islands in the West Indies;" also, an act passed in the twenty-eighth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, intituled "An act to allow the importation of rum and other spirits from his Majesty's colonies or plantations in the West Indies into the province of Quebec without payment of duty, under certain conditions and restrictions;" also, an act passed in the twenty-ninth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act to enable his Majesty to authorize, in case of necessity, the importation of bread, flour, Indian corn, and live stock, from any of the territories belonging to the United States of America, into the province of Quebec and all the countries bordering on the Gulf of Saint Lawrence, and the islands within the said Gulf and to the coast of Labrador;" also, another act passed in the twenty-ninth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act for explaining and amending an act passed in the last session of Parliament, intituled 'An act to regulate the trade between the subjects of his Majesty's colonies and plantations in North America and in the West India islands and the countries belonging to the United States of America, and between his Majesty's said subjects and the foreign islands in the West Indies;'" also, an act passed in the thirtieth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act to amend two acts made in the twenty-eighth year of the reign of his present Majesty, the one intituled 'An act for regulating the trade between the subjects of his Majesty's colonies and plantations in North America and in the West India islands and the countries belonging to the United States of America, and between his Majesty's said subjects and the foreign islands in the West Indies,' and the other intituled 'An act to allow the importation of rum or other spirits from his Majesty's colonies or plantations in the West Indies into the province of Quebec, without payment of duty, under certain conditions and restrictions;'" also, an act passed in the thirty-first year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act to amend an act made in the twenty-eighth year of his present Majesty's reign for regulating the trade between the subjects of his Majesty's colonies and plantations in North America and in the West India islands and the countries belonging to the United States of America, and between his Majesty's said subjects and the foreign islands in the West Indies;" and also, an act made in the twenty-seventh year of his present Majesty's reign for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods, wares and merchandise, in the ports of Kingston, Savannah la Mar, Montego Bay, and Santa Lucia, in the island of Jamaica, in the port of Saint George, in the island of Grenada, in the port of Rosseau, in the island of Dominica, and in the port of Nassau, in the island of New Providence, one of the Bahama islands, under certain regulations and restrictions;" also, an act passed in the thirty-third year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act to amend an act passed in the twenty-seventh year of his present Majesty's reign, for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise, in foreign ships, into and from certain ports and places in the West Indies; and for amending so much of an act made in the thirty-second year of the reign of his present Majesty as relates to permitting the importation of sugar in the Bahama and Bermuda islands in foreign ships; and so much of two acts made in the twenty-eighth and thirty-first years of his present Majesty's reign as prohibits the importation of timber into any island under the dominion of his Majesty in the West Indies, from any foreign colony or plantation in the West Indies or South America; and so much of the said act made in the twenty-eighth year of his present Majesty's reign as prohibits the importation of pitch, tar, and turpentine, into Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, from any country belonging to the United States of America;" also, an act passed in the forty-fourth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act for permitting until the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and seven, the exportation of salt from the port of Nassau, in the island of New Providence, the port of Exuma, and the port of Crooked Island, in the Bahama islands, in ships belonging to the inhabitants of the United States of America and coming in ballast;" also, an act passed in the forty-fifth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act to consolidate and extend the several laws now in force for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods and merchandise into and from certain ports in the West Indies;" also, an act passed in the forty-sixth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act for enabling his Majesty to permit the importation and exportation of certain goods and commodities into and from the port of Road Harbor, in the island of Tortola;" also, an act passed in the forty-eighth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act to permit the importation of rice, flour, and grain, from any foreign colonies on the continent of America into certain ports in the West Indies, and to allow certain articles to be imported from the United States of America into the British provinces in North America for the purpose of exportation to the British islands in the West Indies;" also, an act passed in the forty-ninth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods and commodities into and from the port of Falmouth, in the island of Jamaica;" also, an act passed in the fifty-second year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act to allow British plantation sugar and coffee imported into Bermuda in British ships to be exported to the territories of the United States of America in foreign ships or vessels, and to permit articles the production of the said United States to be imported into the said island in foreign ships or vessels;" also, another act passed in the said fifty-second year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act for allowing certain articles to be imported into the Bahama islands, and exported therefrom in foreign vessels, and for encouraging the exportation of salt from the said islands;" also, an act passed in the fifty-third year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act to amend an act of the twenty-eighth year of his present Majesty, for allowing the importation of rum or other spirits from his Majesty's colonies or plantations in the West Indies into the province of Quebec without payment of duty;" also, another act passed in the fifty-third year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act for further allowing the importation and exportation of certain articles at the island of Bermuda;" also, an act passed in the fifty-fourth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act to revive and make perpetual certain acts for consolidating and extending the several laws in force for allowing the importation and exportation of certain articles into and from certain ports in the West Indies;" also, an act passed in the fifty-seventh year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act to extend the powers of two acts for allowing British plantation sugar and coffee and other articles imported into Bermuda in British ships to be exported to America in foreign vessels, and to permit articles the produce of America to be imported into the said island in foreign ships, to certain other articles;" also, another act passed in the said fifty-seventh year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act to extend several acts for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods and merchandise to Porta Maria, in the island of Jamaica, and to the port of Bridge Town, in the island of Barbadoes;" also, an act passed in the fifty-eighth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act to allow, for three years, and until six weeks after the commencement of the then next session of Parliament, the importation into ports specially appointed by his Majesty within the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick of the articles therein enumerated, and the re-exportation thereof from such ports;" also, an act passed in the said fifty-eighth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act to permit the importation of certain articles into his Majesty's colonies or plantations in the West Indies, or on the continent of South America, and also certain articles into certain ports in the West Indies;" also, an act passed in the fifty-ninth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act to make perpetual an act of the forty-fourth year of his present Majesty, for permitting the exportation of salt from the port of Nassau, in the island of New Providence, the port of Exuma, and the port of Crooked Island, in the Bahama islands, in American ships coming in ballast;" also, an act passed in the fifty-ninth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, intituled "An act to extend the provisions of three acts of the fifty-second, fifty-third, and fifty-seventh years of his present Majesty, for allowing British plantation sugar and coffee and other articles imported into Bermuda in British ships, to be exported to America in foreign vessels, and to permit articles the produce of America to be imported into Bermuda in foreign ships, to certain other articles;" also, an act passed in the first year of the reign of his present Majesty, intituled "An act to extend several acts for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods and merchandises to Morant Bay, in the island of Jamaica;" also, another act passed in the first year of his present Majesty's reign, intituled "An act to permit the importation of coffee from any foreign colony or plantation in America into the port of Bridge Town, in Barbadoes;" also, an act passed in the first and second years of the reign of his present Majesty, intituled "An act to make perpetual an act of the fifty-eighth year of his late Majesty, to allow the importation into certain ports in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick of certain enumerated articles, and the re-exportation thereof from such ports;" shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

II. Provided also, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be deemed or construed to extend, to release or discharge any seizure of goods, wares, or merchandise, or of any ship or vessel, or to release or discharge any forfeiture or penalty incurred on or before the passing of this act; but that the same may be prosecuted, sued for, recovered, and divided in such and the like manner as any such seizure, forfeiture, or penalty might have been prosecuted, sued for, recovered, and divided, if this act had not been made.

III. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, it shall be lawful to import into any of the ports enumerated in the schedule annexed to this act, marked (A,) from any foreign country on the continent of North or South America, or from any foreign island in the West Indies, whether such country or island, as aforesaid, shall be under the dominion of any foreign European sovereign or State, or otherwise, the articles enumerated in the schedule annexed to this act, marked (B,) either in British built ships, or vessels owned and navigated according to law, or in any ship or vessel bona fide the built of and owned by the inhabitants of any country or place belonging to or under the dominion of the sovereign or State of which the said articles are the growth, produce, or manufacture, such ship or vessel being navigated with a master and three-fourths of the mariners, at least, belonging to such country or place; or in any British built ship or vessel which has been sold to and become the property of the subjects of any such sovereign or State, such ship or vessel last mentioned being also navigated with a master and three-fourths of the mariners, at least, belonging to such country or place: Provided always, That no articles enumerated in the said schedule shall be imported in any foreign ship or vessel, or in any British built ship or vessel so sold as aforesaid, unless shipped and brought directly from the country or place of which they are the growth, produce, or manufacture.

IV. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful to export in any British built ship or vessel owned and navigated according to law, or in any foreign ship or vessel as aforesaid, or in any British built ship or vessel so sold as aforesaid, from any of the ports enumerated in the schedule annexed to this act, marked (A,) any article of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any of his Majesty's dominions, or any other article legally imported into the said ports, provided that the said articles, when exported in any such foreign ship or vessel, or in any British built ship or vessel so sold as aforesaid, shall be exported direct to the country or State in America or the West Indies to which such ship or vessel belongs as aforesaid; and before the shipment thereof security by bond shall be given to his Majesty, his heirs and successors, in a penalty equal to half the value of the said articles; such bond to be entered into by the master and exporter before the collector or other chief officer of the customs of such colony, plantation, or island, for the due landing of the said articles at the port or ports for which entered, and for producing a certificate thereof within twelve months from the date of such bond, under the hand and seal of the British consul or vice consul resident at the port or place where the said articles shall have been landed; but in case there shall not be any such consul or vice consul there resident, such certificate to be under the hand and seal of the chief magistrate, or under the hand and seal of two known British merchants residing at such port or place; but such bond may be discharged by proof, on oath, by credible persons, that the said articles were taken by enemies or perished in the seas: Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to permit or allow the exportation of any arms or naval stores unless a license shall have been obtained for that purpose from his Majesty's Secretary of State; and in case any such articles shall be shipped or waterborne for the purpose of being exported contrary to this act, the same shall be forfeited, and shall and may be seized and prosecuted as hereinafter directed.

V. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That for ten years after the passing of this act, nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to exclude from the trade allowed by this act any foreign ship or vessel which, previous to the passing of this act, may have been engaged in lawful trade with his Majesty's said colonies, islands, or plantations, on account of such ship or vessel not being of the build of the country to which such ship or vessel may belong.

VI. And be it further enacted, That in case any doubt shall arise whether any goods, wares, or merchandise, intended to be exported in any foreign ship or vessel under the authority of this act, had been legally imported into such port, the legality of such importation shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Collector or Comptroller, or other principal officer of the customs of such port, before such goods, wares, and merchandise shall be suffered to be shipped for exportation.

VII. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, there shall be raised, levied, collected, and paid unto his Majesty, his heirs and successors, upon the several articles enumerated or described in the said schedule marked (C,) imported or brought into any of the ports enumerated in the schedule marked (A) from any such foreign island, State, or country, under the authority of this act, the several duties or customs as the same are respectively inserted or described and set forth in figures in the said schedule annexed to this act, marked (C,) and the same shall be under the management of the Commissioners of the Customs in England, and shall be raised, levied, collected, paid, and recovered in such and the like manner and form, and by such and the like rules, ways, means, and methods, respectively, and under such penalties and forfeitures, as any duties now payable to his Majesty on goods imported into any of the islands, plantations, colonies, or territories belonging to, or under the dominion of his Majesty, in America or the West Indies, are or may be raised, levied, collected, paid, and recovered by any act or acts of Parliament now in force as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes, as if the several clauses, powers, directions, penalties, and forfeitures relating thereto were particularly repeated and again enacted in the body of this act; and the produce of such duties shall be paid by the Collector of the Customs to the Treasurer or Receiver General of the colony, province, or plantation in which the same shall be respectively levied, to be applied to such uses and purposes as may be directed by the authority of the respective general courts or general assemblies of such colonies, provinces, or plantations.

VIII. And be it further enacted, That in case there shall be no general courts or general assemblies in the colony, province, or plantation in which the said duties shall have been levied and collected under the authority of this act, the net proceeds of such duties shall then be applied and appropriated in such and the like manner, and to such uses as any other duties levied and collected in any of his Majesty's colonies, provinces, or plantations in America or the West Indies, not having general courts or general assemblies, may now, by any act or acts of Parliament passed in Great Britain or the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or by any order of his Majesty in council, or by any proclamation issued in his Majesty's name, be appropriated and applied.

IX. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where, by the schedule marked (C,) the duties imposed upon the importation of articles into his Majesty's colonies, plantations, or islands in America or the West Indies, are charged, not according to the weight, gauge, or measure, but according to the value thereof, such value shall be ascertained by the declaration of the importer or proprietor of such articles, or his known agent or factor, in manner and form following, that is to say:

"I, A B, do hereby declare that the articles mentioned in the entry, and contained in the packages, [here specifying the several packages, and describing the several marks and numbers, as the case may be,] are of the value of _____. Witness my hand the _____ day of _____, A B."

"The above declaration, signed the _____ day of _____, in the presence of C D, Collector, or other principal officer."

Which declaration shall be written on the warrant of entry of such articles, and shall be subscribed with the hand of the importer or proprietor thereof, or his known agent or factor, in the presence of the Collector or other principal officer of the customs at the port of importation: Provided, That if, upon view and examination of such articles by the proper officer of the customs, it shall appear to him that the said articles are not valued according to the true price or value thereof, and according to the true intent and meaning of this act, then and in such case the importer or proprietor, or his known agent or factor, shall be required to declare, on oath, before the Collector or chief officer of the customs at the port of importation (which oath he is hereby authorized and required to administer) what is the invoice price of such articles, and that he verily believes such invoice price is the current value of the articles at the place from whence the said articles were imported; and such invoice price, with the addition of ten pounds per centum thereon, shall be deemed and taken to be the value of the articles in such colony, plantation, or island, as aforesaid, in lieu of the value so declared by the importer or proprietor, or his known agent or factor, and upon which the duties specified in the said schedule shall be charged and paid: Provided, also, That if it shall appear to the Collector or other chief officer of the customs that such articles have been invoiced below the real and true value thereof at the place from whence the same were imported, or if the invoice price is not known, the articles shall, in such case, be examined by two competent persons, to be nominated and appointed by the Governor or commander-in-chief of the colony, plantation, or island into which the said articles are imported; and such persons shall declare, on oath, before the Collector or chief officer of the customs, what is the true and real value of such articles in such colony, plantation, or island; and the value so declared on the oaths of such persons shall be deemed to be the true and real value of such articles, and upon which the duties specified in the said schedule, marked (C,) shall be charged and paid.

X. And be it further enacted, That if the importer or proprietor of such articles shall refuse to pay the duties hereby imposed thereon, it shall and may be lawful for the Collector or other chief officer of the customs where such articles shall be imported, and he is hereby, respectively, required, to take and secure the same, with the casks or other package thereof, and to cause the same to be publicly sold, within the space of twenty days, at the most, after such refusal made, and at such time and place as such officer shall, by four or more days' public notice, appoint for that purpose, which articles shall be sold to the best bidder; and the money arising by the sale thereof shall be applied, in the first place, in payment of the said duties, together with the charges that shall have been occasioned by the said sale, and the overplus, if any, shall be paid to such importer or proprietor, or any other person authorized to receive the same.

XI. And be it further enacted, That whenever any foreign article is liable to duty by this act on the importation thereof into any of his Majesty's colonies, plantations, or islands in America or the West Indies, under the provisions of this act, the like duty shall be payable upon any such foreign article when imported into any such colonies, plantations, or islands direct from any part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; and such duty shall be raised, levied, collected, and paid in such and the like manner, and be appropriated and applied to such and the like uses as the duty payable upon the like article imported from any other place, under the provisions of this act, is, by this act, directed to be raised and applied.

XII. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That if, upon the importation of any article charged with duty by this act, the said articles shall also be liable to the payment of duty under the authority of any colonial law equal to or exceeding in amount the duty charged by this act, then, and in such case, the duty charged upon such article by this act shall not be demanded or paid upon the importation of such article: Provided, also, That if the duty payable under such colonial law shall be less in amount than the duty payable by this act, then, and in such case, the difference only in the amount of the duty payable by this act and the duty payable under the authority of such colonial law shall be deemed to be the duty payable by this act; and the same shall be collected and paid in such and the like manner, and appropriated and applied to such and the like uses, as the duties specified in the said schedule annexed to this act, marked (C,) are directed to be collected, paid, appropriated, and applied.

XIII. And be it further enacted, That all sums of money granted and imposed by this act as duties shall be deemed, and are hereby declared to be, sterling money of Great Britain, and shall be collected, recovered, and paid to the amount of the value which such nominal sums bear in Great Britain, and that such moneys may be received and taken according to the proportion and value of five shillings and sixpence the ounce in silver.

XIV. And be it further enacted, That any article enumerated in the schedule (B) legally imported, as aforesaid, under the authority of this act, shall be allowed to be exported in any British ship or vessel, owned and navigated according to law, to any other British island, colony, or plantation in America or the West Indies: Provided, That upon the importation thereof into any such other British island, colony, or plantation, proof shall be produced that the said duties due to his Majesty have been first paid in the colony or plantation into which the said articles shall have been first imported; and any article so imported in any ship or vessel as aforesaid shall be allowed to be exported to any part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland under the rules, regulations, restrictions, securities, penalties, and forfeitures, particularly mentioned and provided in an act of Parliament made in the twelfth year of the reign of King Charles the Second, intituled "An act for the encouraging and increasing of shipping and navigation;" and in another act of Parliament, made in the twenty-second and twenty-third years of the reign of King Charles the Second, intituled "An act to prevent the planting of tobacco in England, and for regulating the plantation trade;" and in another act of Parliament, made in the twentieth year of his late Majesty's reign, intituled "An act to allow the trade between Ireland and the British colonies in America and the West Indies, and the British settlements on the coast of Africa, to be carried on in like manner as it is now carried on between Great Britain and the said colonies and settlements," or in any of the said acts with respect to the goods, wares, or merchandise therein enumerated or described.

XV. And whereas it is the intention and meaning of this act that the privileges hereby granted to foreign ships and vessels shall be confined to the ships and vessels of such countries only as give the like privileges to British ships and vessels in their ports in America and the West Indies: Be it therefore enacted, That it shall be lawful for his Majesty, his heirs and successors, by order in council, from time to time, when and as often as the same shall be judged expedient, to prohibit trade and intercourse, under the authority of this act, with any country or island in America or the West Indies, if it shall appear to his Majesty that the privileges granted by this act to foreign ships and vessels are not allowed to British ships and vessels trading to and from any such country or island under the provisions of this act; and in case such order of his Majesty in council shall be issued, then, during the time that such order in council shall be in force, none of the provisions of this act, either as respects the laws herein repealed or to any other provisions of this act, shall apply, or be taken to apply, to any country or State the trade with which, under the provisions of this act, shall be prohibited by any such order of his Majesty in council; and if any goods whatever shall be imported from, or shipped for the purpose of being exported to, any such country or island in America or the West Indies, in any foreign ship or vessel, after trade and intercourse therewith shall have been prohibited by any such order of his Majesty in council, issued under the authority of this act, all such goods, together with the ship or vessel in which the same shall have been imported or in which the same shall have been shipped for the purpose of being exported as aforesaid, shall be forfeited, with all her guns, furniture, ammunition, tackle, and apparel; and in every such case the same shall and may be seized by any officer of his Majesty's customs or Navy authorized or empowered to make seizures in cases of forfeiture, and shall and may be prosecuted in manner as hereinafter directed.

XVI. And be it further enacted, That if his Majesty shall deem it expedient to extend the provisions of this act to any port or ports not enumerated in the schedule marked (A,) it shall be lawful for his Majesty, by order in council, to extend the provisions of this act to such port or ports, and from and after such order in council, all the privileges and advantages of this act and all the provisions, penalties, and forfeitures therein contained shall extend, and be deemed and construed to extend, to any such port or ports, respectively, as fully as if the same had been inserted and enumerated in the said schedule at the time of passing this act.

XVII. And be it further enacted, That no articles, except such as are enumerated in the schedule marked (B,) shall be imported in any such British built ship or vessel, or in any such foreign ship or vessel, or in any British built ship or vessel so sold as aforesaid, from any foreign country or State on the continent of America or island in the West Indies, into any of the ports enumerated in the schedule marked (A,) or into any port which may be added to the schedule marked (A) by virtue of any order in council, as aforesaid, on any pretence whatever, on pain of forfeiting such articles, together with the ship or vessel in which the same shall have been imported, and the guns, tackle, apparel, and furniture of such ship or vessel; and in every such case the same shall and may be seized by any officer or officers of his Majesty's customs or Navy who are or shall be authorized and empowered to make seizures in cases of forfeiture, and shall and may be prosecuted in such manner as hereinafter directed.

XVIII. And be it further enacted, That no articles whatever shall be imported or exported, either in a British built ship or vessel or in any such foreign ship or vessel as aforesaid, from or to any foreign country on the continent of North or South America, or from or to any foreign island in the West Indies, into or from any port of any British colony, plantation, or island in America or the West Indies, not enumerated in the schedule annexed to this act, marked (A,) on any pretence whatever, on forfeiture of such articles, as also the ship or vessel in which the same shall be imported, with all her guns, furniture, ammunition, tackle, and apparel.

XIX. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall affect, or be construed to affect, the right which British subjects or others may enjoy under any law in force at the passing of this act of exporting in British ships from ports not enumerated in the said schedule marked (A) the produce of the fisheries carried on from any of his Majesty's said colonies, plantations, or islands.

XX. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures imposed by this act shall and may be, respectively, prosecuted, sued for, and recovered, and divided in Great Britain, Guernsey, Jersey, or the Isle of Man, or in any of his Majesty's colonies or islands in America, in the same manner and form, and by the same rules and regulations, in all respects, in so far as the same are applicable, as any other penalties and forfeitures imposed by any act or acts of Parliament made for the security of the revenue of the customs, or for the regulation or improvement thereof, or for the regulation of trade or navigation, and which were in force immediately before the passing of this act, may be, respectively, prosecuted, sued for, recovered, and divided in Great Britain, Guernsey, Jersey, or the Isle of Man, or in any of his Majesty's colonies or islands in America.

An act to regulate the trade between his Majesty's possessions in America and the West Indies and other parts of the world.—[June 24, 1822.]

Whereas it is expedient to allow greater freedom of trade and intercourse between the colonies, plantations, and islands belonging to his Majesty in America and in the West Indies and other parts of the world, and to repeal certain acts now in force relating to the trade and intercourse hitherto allowed to be carried on between his Majesty's colonies, plantations, islands, and places in Europe, south of Cape Finisterre, and to make further provision for encouraging and extending the same:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That so much of an act passed in the twenty-fifth year of the reign of King Charles the Second entitled "An act for the encouragement of the Greenland and Eastland trades and for the better securing the plantation trade, as imposes a duty upon the exportation of sugar, tobacco, cotton wool, indigo, ginger, logwood, fustic, dyeing wood, and cocoa nuts, from any of his Majesty's plantations in America, Asia, or Africa," also, an act passed in the fifty-first year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third entitled "An act to regulate the trade between places in Europe, south of Cape Finisterre, and certain ports in the British colonies in North America;" also, an act passed in the fifty-second year of the reign of his said late Majesty entitled "An act to permit sugar, coffee, and cocoa to be exported from his Majesty's colonies and plantations to any port in Europe, to the south of Cape Finisterre, and corn to be imported from any such port, and from the coast of Africa into the said colonies and plantations, under licenses granted by the Collectors and Comptrollers of the Customs;" also, so much of an act passed in the fifty-fifth year of the reign of his said late Majesty entitled "An act to regulate the trade between Malta and its dependencies and his Majesty's colonies and plantations in America, and also, between Malta and the United Kingdom, as relates to the trade allowed to be carried on between the island of Malta and the dependencies thereof, and his Majesty's colonies and plantations in America;" also, an act passed in the fifth-seventh year of the reign of his said late Majesty entitled "An act to extend the privileges of trade of Malta to the port of Gibraltar;" also, another act passed in the fifty-seventh year of the reign of his said late Majesty entitled "An act to allow the importation of oranges and lemons from the Azores and the Madeiras into the British colonies in North America," shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed, save and except as to the recovery of any forfeiture or penalty incurred on or before the passing of this act: Provided, nevertheless, That all acts expressly repealed by any of the said acts shall be deemed and taken to be, and shall remain, repealed.

II. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful to export from any of his Majesty's said colonies, plantations and islands, in any British built ship or vessel, owned and navigated according to law, any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of any such colony, plantation, or island, and any articles which have been legally imported into any such colony, plantation, or island, direct to any foreign port in Europe, or in Africa, or to Gibraltar, the island of Malta, or the dependencies thereof, or the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Aldernay, or Sark, anything contained in an act made in England in the twelfth year of the reign of his Majesty King Charles the Second, entitled "An act for the encouraging and increasing of shipping and navigation," or of any other act or acts in force in the United Kingdom or in Great Britain or Ireland, respectively, to the contrary notwithstanding.

III. And be it further enacted, That before any such articles shall be laden or put on board any ship or vessel in the said colonies, plantations, or islands, the exporter shall make a regular entry thereof with the Collector and Comptroller of his Majesty's customs, on which entry shall be endorsed the marks and numbers of the packages with the proper denomination of the goods contained therein, and also the place, quay, or wharf where the goods are intended to be laden: Provided, That no goods shall be laden at any place, quay, or wharf which shall not be situate within the limits of a port where a custom-house is established, and at which place, quay, or wharf an officer shall be appointed to attend the lading and shipping of such goods, or at such place or places as shall be mentioned in a sufferance or warrant to be taken out from the Collector and Comptroller of the Customs for that purpose: Provided always, That nothing in this act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to alter the existing regulations for lading and shipping the produce of the fisheries of the said colonies, plantations, or islands.

IV. And be it further enacted, That if upon examination of any goods allowed to be exported from any of the said colonies, plantations, or islands under the authority of this act, either before or after the shipment, it shall be found that the weight or quantity thereof, or the number of the casks or packages, shall be greater than shall have been endorsed upon the entry, or if any articles are laden and put on board any ship or vessel for the purpose of being exported to any part of Europe or in Africa as aforesaid without entry thereof being made with the proper officer of the customs, or shall be brought to any place, quay, or wharf, or put into any hoy, boat, or other vessel for the purpose of being shipped on board any such ship or vessel for exportation to such foreign port of Europe or in Africa previous to such entry being made, or if any goods shall be put on board or attempted to be put on board any ship or vessel intending to proceed to any such port of Europe or Africa in any manner contrary to the directions of this act, all such goods in every such case shall be forfeited, together with the hoy, boat, or other vessel, or carriage whatever employed in shipping or attempting to ship such goods, and also the ship or vessel in which the same shall be laden; and all such goods, vessels, boats, and carriages, may be seized by any officer or officers of the customs, and the owner thereof shall forfeit double the value of such goods.

V. And be it further enacted, That in case any ship or vessel clearing out from the said colonies, plantations, or islands, under the authority of this act, shall take on board in any of the said colonies, plantations, or islands, any other articles than such as are allowed to be on board and exported by virtue of this act, all such articles so taken or laden on board such ship or vessel shall be forfeited and lost, and shall and may be seized by the commander or commanders of any of his Majesty's ships or vessels-of-war, or any commissioned, warrant, or petty officer specially authorized by him or them, or by any officer or officers of the customs; and the master and shipper of any such goods shall severally forfeit double the value of the goods so laden or taken on board contrary to the directions of this act.

VI. And be it further enacted, That the person exporting fish from any British colony or plantation in North America to any port or place, as aforesaid, under the authority of this act, shall make oath at the port of shipment before the chief officer of the customs at such port, or if there be no such chief officer of the customs then before a magistrate, or if there be no magistrate then before two respectable persons being at such port or ports, (which oath such officer of the customs, or magistrate, or such respectable persons as aforesaid are hereby authorized to administer,) that the said fish is the produce of the British fisheries, really and bona fide taken and cured by his Majesty's subjects carrying on the said fisheries from some of the British colonies or plantations in North America.

VII. And be it further enacted, That before the shipment of any pickled fish or dry fish for the purpose of exportation from Canada to any port or place, as aforesaid, under the authority of this act, the person in whose possession the same shall have continued, from the time of its being landed from the British fishing vessel employed in the taking it until the same shall be so shipped for exportation, shall make oath before the chief officer of the customs at Quebec (who is hereby authorized to administer such oath) that the same is the produce of the British American fisheries, really and bona fide taken and cured by his Majesty's subjects carrying on the said fisheries from some of the said colonies or plantations.

VIII. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful to export in any British ship or vessel owned and navigated according to law, from any foreign port in Europe or in Africa, or from Gibraltar, the island of Malta, or the dependencies thereof, or the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Aldernay, or Sark, to any of his Majesty's colonies, plantations, or islands in America or the West Indies, the articles enumerated or described in the schedule hereunto annexed, marked A, anything contained in an act made in England in the fifteenth year of the reign of his Majesty King Charles the Second, intitled "An act for the encouragement of trade," or any other act or acts in force in the United Kingdom or in Great Britain or Ireland, respectively, to the contrary notwithstanding.

IX. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passing of this act there shall be raised, levied, collected, and paid unto his Majesty, his heirs and successors, upon the importation of the several articles enumerated or described in the schedule hereunto annexed, marked B, into any of his Majesty's colonies, plantations, or islands in America or the West Indies, under the authority of this act, from any port or place in Europe or Africa as aforesaid, the several duties of customs as the same are respectively inserted or described and set forth in figures in the said schedule marked B; and the same shall be raised, levied, collected, paid, and received under the management of the Commissioners of the Customs in England in such and in like manner and form, and by such and the like rules, ways, means, and methods, respectively, and under such penalties and forfeitures as any other duties now payable to his Majesty on goods imported into any of the islands, plantations, colonies, or territories belonging to or under the dominion of his Majesty, in America or the West Indies, are or may be raised, levied, collected, paid, and recovered by any act or acts of Parliament now in force, as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes, as if the several clauses, powers, directions, penalties, and forfeitures relating thereto were particularly repeated and again enacted in the body of this act; and the produce of such duties shall be paid by the Collector of the Customs to the Treasurer or Receiver General of the colony, province, or plantation in which the same shall be respectively levied, to be applied to such uses and purposes as may be directed by the authority of the respective general courts or general assemblies of such colonies, provinces, or plantations.

X. And be it further enacted, That in case there shall be no general courts or general assemblies in the colonies, province, or plantation in which the said duties shall have been levied under the authority of this act, the net proceeds of such duties shall be applied and appropriated in such and the like manner, and to such uses, as any other duties levied and collected in any of his Majesty's colonies, provinces, or plantations in America or the West Indies, not having general courts or general assemblies, may now, by any act or acts of Parliament, passed in Great Britain or the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or by any order of his Majesty in council, or by any proclamation issued in his Majesty's name, be appropriated and applied.

XI. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where, by the schedule marked B, the duties imposed on the importation of articles into his Majesty's colonies, plantations, or islands in America or the West Indies, are charged, not according to the weight, gauge, tale or measure, but according to the value thereof, such value shall be ascertained by the declaration of the importer or proprietor of such articles, or his known agent or factor, in manner and form following, that is to say:

"I, A B, do hereby declare, that the articles mentioned in the entry and contained in the packages [here specifying the several packages and describing the several marks and numbers, as the case may be] are of the value of _____. Witness my hand the _____ day of _____, A. B.”

“The above declaration, signed the _____ day of _____, in the presence of _____, C. A. _____, Collector, or other principal officer.”

Which declaration shall be written on the warrant of entry of such articles, and shall be subscribed with the hand of the importer or proprietor thereof, or his known agent or factor, in the presence of the Collector or other principal officer of the customs at the port of importation: Provided, That if, upon view and examination of such articles by the proper officer of the customs, it shall appear to him that the said articles are not valued according to the price and value thereof, and according to the true intent and meaning of this act, then, and in such case, the importer or proprietor, or his known agent or factor, shall be required to declare on oath, before the Collector or chief officer of the customs at the port of importation, (which oath he is hereby authorized to administer,) what is the invoice price of such articles, and that he verily believes such invoice price is the current value of the articles at the place from whence the said articles were imported; and such invoice price, with the addition of ten pounds per centum thereon, shall be deemed and taken to be the value of such articles in such colony, plantation, or island, as aforesaid, in lieu of the value so declared by the importer or proprietor, or his agent or factor, and upon which the duties specified in the said table shall be charged and paid: Provided, also, That if it shall appear to the Collector or other chief officer of the customs that such articles have been invoiced below the real and true value thereof at the place from whence the same were imported, or if the invoice price is not known, the articles shall, in such case, be examined by two competent persons, to be nominated and appointed by the Governor or commander-in-chief of the colony, plantation, or island into which the said articles are imported; and such persons shall declare on oath, before the Collector or other chief officer of the customs, which oath such Collector or other chief officer of the customs is hereby authorized to administer, what is the true and real value of such articles in such colony, plantation, or island; and the value so declared on the oaths of such persons shall be deemed to be the true and real value of such articles, and upon which the duties specified in the said schedule, marked B, shall be charged and paid.

XII. And be it further enacted, That if the importer or proprietor of such articles shall refuse to pay the duties hereby imposed thereon, it shall and may be lawful for the Collector or other chief officer of the customs where such articles shall be imposed, and he is hereby, respectively, required, to take and secure the same, with the casks or other packages thereof, and to cause the same to be publicly sold, within the space of twenty days, at the most, after such refusal made, and at such time and place as such officer shall, by four or more days, public notice, appoint for that purpose, which articles shall be sold to the highest bidder; and the money arising from the sale thereof shall be applied to the payment of the said duties, together with the charges which shall have been occasioned by the said sale, and the overplus (if any) shall be paid to such importer, proprietor, or any other person authorized to receive the same.

XIII. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That if, upon the importation of any article charged with duty by this act, the said article shall also be liable to the payment of duty under the authority of any colonial law equal to or exceeding in amount the duty charged upon such article by this act, then, and in such case, the duty charged upon such article by this act shall not be demanded or paid upon the importation of such article: Provided, also, That if the duty payable under such colonial law shall be less in amount than the duty payable by this act, then, and in such case, the difference only in the amount of the duty payable by this act and the duty payable under the authority of such colonial law shall be deemed to be the duty payable by this act; and the same shall be collected and paid in such and the like manner, and appropriated and applied to such and the like uses as the duties specified in the said schedule annexed to this act, marked B, are directed to be collected, paid, appropriated, and applied.

XIV. And be it further enacted, That all sums of money granted and imposed by this act, either as duties, penalties, or forfeitures, shall be deemed, and are hereby declared to be, sterling money of Great Britain, and shall be collected, recovered, and paid to the amount of the value which such nominal sums bear in Great Britain; and that such moneys may be received and taken according to the proportion and value of five shillings and sixpence the ounce in silver.

XV. And be it further enacted, That all and every the goods or commodities, and all ships or vessels forfeited by this act, shall and may be seized by the commander or commanders of any of his Majesty's ships or vessels-of-war, or any commissioned, warrant, or petty officer specially authorized by him or them, or by any officer or officers of his Majesty's customs; and that every forfeiture and penalty incurred by this act shall and may respectively be sued for, prosecuted, and recovered, in such courts, and by such and the like ways, means and methods, and the produce thereof, respectively disposed of and applied in such and the like manner, and to such and the like uses and purposes, as any forfeiture or penalty incurred by any law respecting the revenue of the customs may now be sued for, prosecuted, or recovered, disposed of and applied, either in this kingdom, or in any of his Majesty's dominions in America or the West Indies, respectively, as the case may happen to be.

XVI. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall be sued or prosecuted for anything done or to be done in pursuance of this act, such person or persons may plead the general issue, and give this act and the special matter in evidence; and if the plaintiff or plaintiffs, prosecutor or prosecutors, shall become nonsuit or forbear the prosecution, or discontinue his, her, or their action, or if a verdict shall pass against him, her, or them, the defendant shall have treble costs, and shall have the like remedy for the same as in cases where costs are by law given to defendants.

POLITICAL CONDITION OF ST. DOMINGO.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE IN EXECUTIVE SESSION FEBRUARY 26, 1823, AND THE INJUNCTION OF SECRECY SINCE REMOVED.

To the Senate of the United States:

By a resolution of the 27th of December last the President of the United States was requested to communicate to the Senate such information as he might possess respecting the political state of the island of St. Domingo; whether the government thereof was claimed by any European nation; what our commercial relations with the Government of the island were, and whether any further commercial relations with that Government would be consistent with the interest and safety of the United States.

From the import of the resolution it is inferred that the Senate was fully aware of the delicate and interesting nature of the subject embraced by it in all its branches. The call supposes something peculiar in the nature of the Government of that island, and in the character of its population, to which attention is due. Impressed always with an anxious desire to meet every call of either House for information, I most willingly comply in this instance, and with a view to the particular circumstances alluded to.

In adverting to the political state of St. Domingo, I have to observe that the whole island is now united under one Government, under a constitution which retains the sovereignty in the hands of the people of color, and with provisions which prohibit the employment in the Government of all white persons who have emigrated there since 1816, or who may hereafter emigrate there, and which prohibit also the acquisition by such persons of the right of citizenship or to real estate in the island. In the exercise of this sovereignty the Government has not been molested by any European power. No invasion of the island has been made or attempted by any power. It is, however, understood that the relations between the Government of France and the island have not been adjusted; that its independence has not been recognized by France, nor has peace been formally established between the parties.

The establishment of a Government of people of color in the island, on the principles above stated, evinces distinctly the idea of a separate interest and a distrust of other nations. Had that jealousy been confined to the inhabitants of the parent country it would have been less an object of attention; but by extending it to the inhabitants of other countries, with whom no difference ever existed, the policy assumes a character which does not admit of a like explanation. To what extent that spirit may be indulged or to what purposes applied our experience has yet been too limited to enable us to form a just estimate. These are inquiries more peculiarly interesting to the neighboring islands. They nevertheless deserve the attention of the United States.

Between the United States and this island a commercial intercourse exists, and it will continue to be the object of this Government to promote it. Our commerce there has been subjected to higher duties than have been imposed on like articles from some other nations. It has, nevertheless, been extensive, proceeding from the wants of the respective parties and the enterprise of our citizens. Of this discrimination to our injury we had a right to complain and have complained. It is expected that our commercial intercourse with the island will be placed on the footing of the most favored nation. No preference is sought in our favor, nor ought any to be given to others. Regarding the high interest of our happy Union, and looking to every circumstance which may, by any possibility, affect the tranquillity of any part, however remotely, and guarding against such injury by suitable precautions, it is the duty of this Government to promote, by all the means in its power and by a fair and honorable policy, the best interest of every other part and thereby of the whole. Feeling profoundly the force of this obligation, I shall continue to exert, with unwearied zeal, my best faculties to give it effect.

ILLEGAL BLOCKADE OF THE PORTS OF THE SPANISH MAIN AND CAPTURES BY PRIVATEERS FROM PORTO RICO OF AMERICAN VESSELS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 1, 1823.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of this day, requesting information of the measures taken with regard to the illegal blockade of the ports of the Spanish Main and to deprivations of privateers fitted out from Porto Rico and other Spanish islands upon the commerce of the United States, I transmit to the House a report from the Secretary of State containing the information required by the resolution.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 1, 1823.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 1, 1823.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States, of this day, requesting the President of the United States to communicate to that House, as far as the public interest will permit, what measures have been taken to remove or annul the illegal and pretended blockade of the ports of the Spanish Main; to obtain restitution of vessels of the United States captured by privateers fitted out in Porto Rico and other Spanish islands under pretext of breach of the said blockade, and to prevent such illegal and unwarrantable captures hereafter, has the honor of reporting to the President that the measures taken for the purposes described in the resolution of the House have consisted, first, of instructions to the commanders of the armed vessels of the United States successively stationed in the West India seas, and, secondly, of instructions to the minister of the United States in Spain to make suitable representations on these subjects to the Spanish Government. The direct communications between the naval officers in command of the vessels of the United States employed in that service and the Governors of Cuba and Porto Rico have been frequent and successful in obtaining the restitution of some captured vessels. Some of the vessels notorious for outrages committed by them on the commerce of the United States have been captured and sent into the United States, and are now upon trial before the judicial tribunals. No answers have yet been received to the representations directly ordered to be made to the Government of Spain.

All which is respectfully submitted.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE COMMISSIONERS UNDER THE SIXTH AND SEVENTH ARTICLES OF THE TREATY OF GHENT WITH GREAT BRITAIN, AND MEASURES TAKEN UNDER THE FOURTH ARTICLE OF THE TREATY WITH SPAIN OF FEBRUARY 22, 1819, FOR FIXING BOUNDARY LINE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 1, 1823.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives, in pursuance of a resolution of that House, on the 30th of January last, a report from the Secretary of State containing the information required in relation to the transactions of the Commissioners under the 6th and 7th articles of the treaty of Ghent; and, also, as to the measures which have been taken under the 4th article of the treaty with Spain of February 22, 1819, for fixing the boundary line described in the third article of the last mentioned treaty.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, February 26, 1823.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 25, 1823.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred a resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States, of the 30th of January last, requesting the President of the United States to lay before the House information, not previously communicated to Congress, in relation to the transactions of the Commissioners under the 6th and 7th articles of the treaty of Ghent; and, also, to inform the House whether any, and what, measures have been taken under the 4th article of the treaty with Spain of the 22d February,

1819, for fixing the boundary line described in the 3d article of the last mentioned treaty, and whether any part of the said line has been fixed and designated, has the honor of reporting to the President—

That the Commissioners aforesaid, under the 6th and 7th articles of the treaty of Ghent, have had several meetings in the course of the last year, and that at a meeting held by them at Utica, in the State of New York, on the 18th of June last, they agreed upon and executed an instrument containing their decision of the questions submitted to them under the 6th article of the treaty of Ghent, a copy of which decision is herewith respectfully reported. And with the same decision there have been returned to this Department a series of twenty-three maps, upon which the boundary line is delineated in conformity with it.

That, at the same meeting, the secretary and assistant secretary were directed to furnish the agents and the principal surveyors, respectively, with a copy of instructions relative to the survey under the 7th article.

A copy of these instructions is herewith submitted, together with extracts of letters from the agent of the United States under this commission, dated the 24th of July and 24th of September last, showing the progress made by the commission in reference to the 7th article, and the prospects with regard to the time when the duties of said Commissioners may probably be completed.

With regard to the boundary line referred to in the 4th article of the treaty with Spain of 22d February, 1819, it was stipulated by the said article that Commissioners and surveyors should be appointed by the contracting parties, who should meet at Natchitoches, on the Red river, before the termination of one year from the date of the ratification of the treaty, and proceed to run and mark the line. The Spanish Government, although repeatedly pressed, on the part of the United States, to appoint those officers on their part, so that they might have met those of the United States within the limited time, postponed the appointment, so that notice of it was not given until after the year had elapsed.

Under a misapprehension that the difference of opinion between the two Houses of Congress at their last session, with regard to the appropriation for running this line, had resulted in the omission to make it, a communication to that effect was made to the minister of Spain, in this country, shortly after the close of the session. But the error having been a few days after discovered, he was informed, by a letter of 29th May last, from this Department, that the appropriation had been made, and that this Government was then ready to proceed to the execution of the article.

He was also requested to state at what time the Commissioner and surveyor on the part of Spain would be at Natchitoches, and was assured that the Commissioner and surveyor on the part of the United States would be instructed to meet them at that place, and at the time which he should designate as that when the Commissioner and surveyor of Spain would be there.

By a communication from Mr. Anduaga, dated the 1st of June last, he stated that, having immediately forwarded to his Government the previous notice received from this Department, he could not say at what time the Spanish Commissioners would repair to Natchitoches; but his Majesty the King of Spain would take the most speedy and efficacious measures for carrying into effect, on his part, the stipulations of the treaty.

The minister of the United States in Spain was shortly afterwards instructed that, if the Spanish Government should be desirous of postponing the meeting of the Commissioners to run the line, we should not be disposed to urge them to it; but that we should be ready to attend to it at their convenience. No further determination from the Spanish Government concerning it has since been received.

All which is respectfully submitted.

DECISION OF THE COMMISSIONERS.

The undersigned, Commissioners appointed, sworn, and authorized, in virtue of the sixth article of the treaty of peace and amity between his Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, concluded at Ghent on the 24th of December, 1814, impartially to examine and, by a report or declaration under their hands and seals, to designate that portion of the boundary of the United States "from the point where the 45th degree of north latitude strikes the river Iroquois, or Catarqui, along the middle of said river into Lake Ontario; through the middle of said lake until it strikes the communication by water between that lake and Lake Erie; thence along the middle of said communication into Lake Erie; through the middle of said lake until it arrives at the water communication into Lake Huron; thence through the middle of said water communication into Lake Huron; thence through the middle of said lake to the water communication between that lake and Lake Superior;" and to "decide to which of the two contracting parties the several islands lying within the said rivers, lakes, and water communications do respectively belong, in conformity with the true intent of the treaty of 1783," do decide and declare that the following described line (which is more clearly indicated on a series of maps accompanying this report, exhibiting correct surveys and delineations of all the rivers, lakes, water communications, and islands, embraced by the sixth article of the treaty of Ghent, by a black line, shaded on the British side with red and on the American side with blue, and each sheet of which series of maps is identified by a certificate subscribed by the Commissioners and by the two principal surveyors employed by them) is the true boundary intended by the two before mentioned treaties; that is to say:

Beginning at a stone monument erected by Andrew Ellicott, esq., in the year 1817, on the south bank or shore of the said river Iroquois, or Catarqui, (now called the St. Lawrence,) which monument bears south seventy-four degrees forty-five minutes west, and is eighteen hundred and forty yards distant from the stone church in the Indian village of St. Regis, and indicates the point at which the 45th parallel of north latitude strikes the said river; thence running north thirty-five degrees forty-five minutes west into the river, on a line at right angles with the southern shore, to a point one hundred yards south of the opposite island, called Cornwall island; thence turning westerly and passing around the southern and western sides of said island, keeping 100 yards distant therefrom, and following the curvatures of its shores, to a point opposite to the northwest corner or angle of said island; thence to and along the middle of the main river until it approaches the eastern extremity of Barnhart's island; thence northerly along the channel which divides the last mentioned island from the Canada shore, keeping one hundred yards distant from the island, until it approaches Sheik's island; thence along the middle of the strait which divides Barnhart's and Sheik's islands, to the channel called the Long Sault, which separates the two last mentioned islands from the lower Long Sault island; thence westerly (crossing the centre of the last mentioned channel) until it approaches within one hundred yards of the north shore of the Lower Sault island; thence up the north branch of the river, keeping to the north of and near the Lower Sault island, and also north of and near the Upper Sault (sometimes called Baxter's) island, and south of the two small islands, marked on the map A and B, to the western extremity of the Upper Sault, or Baxter's island; thence, passing between the two islands called the Cats, to the middle of the river above; thence along the middle of the river, keeping to the north of the small islands marked C and D, and north also of Chrystler's island, and of the small island next above it, marked E, until it approaches the northeast angle of Goose Neck island; thence along the passage which divides the last mentioned island from the Canada shore, keeping one hundred yards from the island, to the upper end of the same; thence south of and near the two small islands called the Nut islands; thence north of and near the island marked F, and also of the island called Dry, or Smuggler's island; thence, passing between the islands marked G and H, to the north of the island called Isle au Rapid Plat; thence along the north side of the last mentioned island, keeping one hundred yards from the shore, to the upper end thereof; thence along the middle of the river, keeping to the south of and near the islands called Cousson (or Tussiu) and Presque isle; thence up the river, keeping north of and near the several Gallop isles, numbered on the map 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, and also of Tick, Tibbet's, and Chimney islands, and south of and near the Gallop isles numbered 11, 12, and 13, and also of Duck, Drummond, and Sheep islands; thence along the middle of the river, passing north of island number 14, south of 15 and 16, north of 17, south of 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, and 28, and north of 26 and 27; thence along the middle of the river, north of Gull island and of the islands numbered 29, 32, 33, 34, 35, Bluff island, and numbers 39, 44, and 45, and to the south of numbers 30, 31, 36, Grenadier island, and numbers 37, 38, 40, 41, 42, 43, 46, 47, and 48, until it approaches the east end of Well's island; thence to the north of Well's island and along the strait which divides it from Rowe's island, keeping to the north of the small islands numbered 51, 52, 54, 58, 59, and 61, and to the south of the small islands numbered and marked 49, 50, 53, 55, 57, 60, and X, until it approaches the northeast point of Grindstone island; thence to the north of Grindstone island, and keeping to the north also of the small islands numbered 63, 65, 67, 68, 70, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, and 78, and to the south of numbers 62, 64, 66, 69, and 71, until it approaches the southern point of Hickory island; thence passing to the south of Hickory island and of the two small islands lying near its southern extremity, numbered 79 and 80; thence to the south of Grand or Long island, keeping near its southern shore, and passing to the north of Carlton island, until it arrives opposite to the southwestern point of said Grand island, in Lake Ontario; thence passing to the north of Grenadier, Fox, Stoney, and the Gallop islands, in Lake Ontario, and to the south of and near the islands called the Ducks, to the middle of said lake; thence westerly along the middle of said lake to a point opposite to the mouth of the Niagara river; thence, to and up the middle of the said river, to the Great Falls; thence up the falls, through the point of the Horse Shoe, keeping to the west of Iris or Goat island, and of the group of small islands at its head, and following the bends of the river so as to enter the strait between Navy and Grand islands; thence along the middle of said strait to the head of Navy island; thence to the west and south of and near to Grand and Beaver islands, and to the west of Strawberry, Squaw, and Bird islands, to Lake Erie; thence southerly and westerly along the middle of Lake Erie, in a direction to enter the passage immediately south of Middle island, being one of the easternmost of the group of islands lying in the western part of said lake; thence along the said passage, proceeding to the north of Cunningham's island, of the three Bass islands, and of the Western Sister, and to the south of the islands called the Hen and Chikens, and of the Eastern and Middle Sisters; thence to the middle of the mouth of the Detroit river, in a direction to enter the channel which divides Bois Blanc and Sugar islands; thence, up the said channel, to the west of Bois Blanc island, and to the east of Sugar, Fox, and Stoney islands, until it approaches Fighting or Great Turkey island; thence along the western side, and near the shore of said last mentioned island, to the middle of the river above the same; thence along the middle of said river, keeping to the southeast of and near Hog island, and to the northwest of and near the island called Isle a la Pêche, to Lake St. Clair; thence through the middle of said lake, in a direction to enter that mouth or channel of the river St. Clair which is usually denominated the old ship channel; thence along the middle of said channel, between Squirrel island, on the southeast, and Herson's island on the northwest, to the upper end of the last mentioned island, which is nearly opposite to Point aux Chénéson, on the American shore; thence along the middle of the river St. Clair, keeping to the west of and near the islands called Belle Riviere isle, and Isle aux Cerfs, to Lake Huron; thence through the middle of Lake Huron, in a direction to enter the strait or passage between Drummond's island on the west and the Little Manitou island on the east; thence through the middle of the passage which divides the two last mentioned islands; thence turning northerly and westerly around the eastern and northern shores of Drummond's island, and proceeding in a direction to enter the passage between the island of St. Joseph's and the American shore, passing to the north of the intermediate islands No. 61, 11, 10, 12, 9, 6, 4, and 2, and to the south of those numbered 15, 13, 5, and 1; thence up the said last mentioned passage, keeping near to the island of St. Joseph's, and passing to the north and east of the Isle a la Crosse, and of the small islands numbered 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20, and to the south and west of those numbered 21, 22, and 23, until it strikes a line (drawn on the map with black ink, and shaded on one side of the point of intersection with blue, and on the other with red) passing across the river at the head of St. Joseph's island, and at the foot of the Neebish Rapids, which line denotes the termination of the boundary directed to be run by the 6th article of the treaty of Ghent.

And the said Commissioners do further decide and declare that all the islands lying in the rivers, lakes, and water communications between the before described boundary line and the adjacent shores of Upper Canada do, and each of them does, belong to his Britannic Majesty; and that all the islands lying in the rivers, lakes, and water communications between the said boundary line and the adjacent shores of the United States, or their Territories, do, and each of them does, belong to the United States of America, in conformity with the true intent of the second article of the said treaty of 1783, and of the 6th article of the treaty of Ghent.

In faith whereof, we, the Commissioners aforesaid, have signed this declaration, and thereunto affixed our seals.

Done in quadruplicate, at Utica, in the State of New York, in the United States of America, this eighteenth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two.

PETER B. PORTER. [L. s.]
ANTH. BARCLAY. [L. s.]

Extract from the minutes of the proceedings of the Board of Commissioners, under the sixth article of the Treaty of Ghent, held at Utica, in the State of New York, on the 18th June, 1822.

The secretary and assistant secretary are directed to furnish the agents and the principal surveyors, respectively, with a copy of the following instructions relative to the survey under the 7th article, viz:

The Commissioners have deemed it proper to prepare the following written instructions for the guidance of the agents and principal surveyors in ascertaining the course of the boundary, &c., under the 7th article of the treaty, comporting with the verbal directions given to the surveyors at the commencement of the present season.

It is required that the direction which the true line intended by the treaty shall take be ascertained from the point where the boundary, under the 6th article, terminated, near the head of St. Joseph's island, below the Neebish Rapids, proceeding "through Lake Superior, northward of the Isles Royal and Philipeaux, to the Long lake; thence, through the middle of said Long lake and the water communication between it and the Lake of the Woods, to the Lake of the Woods; thence, through the said lake, to the most northwestern point thereof."

In your operations to effect this object, the Commissioners do not require you to commence at the nearest end of the contemplated line, nor to conduct your survey in continuity; but they confide in your discretion to proceed in such manner, relatively to the several parts thereof, as the convenience or necessities of the seasons and other causes may, in your judgment, render most proper.

In ascertaining the boundary under the 7th article, you are aware that it is not our intention to pursue the course of a trigonometrical survey, observed under the 6th. It will, however, be desirable that we have a survey of the shores and islands between the foot of the Neebish Rapids and Lake Superior. It will also be desirable to have the latitude and longitude of some point at the gorge of Lake Superior.

In proceeding through Lake Superior to the northward of the Isles Royal and Philipeaux, (if there be any of the last name,) examine whether any islands lie so near the boundary line described in the treaty as to render it doubtful on which side of the said line they may be situated; and if any such be found, ascertain, by the most easy and expeditious means, the shape and extent of them, as well as of the Isles Royal and Philipeaux, and also their geographical position, either by astronomical observations, or by triangles connecting them with the main shore or other islands, whose position is known.

After passing Lake Superior, ascertain the position of the Long lake, or (if no lake of that name is to be found) the chain of waters supposed to be referred to in the treaty by that designation. Should you discover (as you probably will) that these waters do not communicate with Lake Superior, ascertain what rivers or waters, divided by a height of land, and emptying, one into Lake Superior and the other into the Lake of the Woods, approximate most nearly. Fix the latitude and longitude of their points of approximation, and perambulate these waters downwards, observing their courses and distances, and also the islands in them, their situation and extent. Fix the latitudes and longitudes at which these rivers communicate with the respective lakes.

As to the Lake of the Woods, make such rapid surveys of its shores and islands as, upon examination thereof, you may deem necessary to a fair designation of the boundary. In fixing the latitude and longitude of "the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods," great care and accuracy must be observed. As regards the other geographical points mentioned in these instructions, you will determine them with ordinary certainty. You are desired to report to the Commissioners, severally, and from time to time, such matters as relate to your then past transactions, and such discoveries as you may have made, and which, in your opinion, may influence your future progress in the duties with which you are charged.

After perambulating and ascertaining the approximating waters between Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods, if any doubt should be entertained by you as to the direction which the boundary ought to take, we wish to be advised of it as early as practicable, in order that we may proceed, if necessary, to that place to determine such difficulty.

It is expected of the agents that they will be prompt and vigilant in supplying all the wants of the surveyors and of their parties, and that they will, at all times, whether present or absent, assist them with their advice.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Joseph Delafield, agent under the 6th and 7th articles of the treaty of Ghent, to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, July 24, 1822.

"In respect to the seventh article of the treaty, great pains has been taken by the Commissioners to effect its speedy execution. The American party now employed consists of a principal surveyor and one assistant, who is also the draughtsman, with a few batteau-men to conduct their boats and provisions.

"I accompanied our party to Lake Superior, in which neighborhood they had commenced their work, and before I left them every arrangement was made to subsist them during the present, and the summer of the next year, in the Northwest Territory. With the supplies afforded and contemplated, together with the provisional arrangements I was enabled to effect through the kindness of the agent of the American Fur Company (in case of accidents) at all their trading posts, I do not doubt the maintenance of this party in the Indian country for the time specified; and should the British surveyors render an equal service, and, together with our own, prove successful in the performance of the duty expected of them, there is a well founded belief that the surveys and all essential observations and information will be obtained previous to their return.

"The passage from Lake Superior to Long lake, mentioned in the treaty, (which probably means Rainy lake,) may demand more time and labor to explore than has been apprehended. The old Grand Portage route has of late been abandoned by the British traders, and a more northern route assumed. Whether the one or the other of these routes, or an intermediate one, is to be the boundary line, can only be ascertained by explorations of much hardship and labor, on account of the formation of the country which divides the waters that flow into lake Superior from those that flow toward and into the Lake of the Woods. The southern or Fond du Lac route does not seem to be in question, although it has, by some persons, been improvidently suggested. From the Rainy lake to the Lake of the Woods the water communication is said to be direct, and the greatest task to encounter there will be to produce, in a summary way, a chart of the latter lake sufficiently accurate to designate the line through the numerous islands it contains. The exact but laborious trigonometrical survey heretofore conducted it has been determined to abandon, and the surveyors are instructed to ascertain the desired information by a more rapid method (as described in the journal) with sufficient certainty for the just purposes of the commission. Besides these requisitions of the surveyors, there will be several points of latitude and longitude to be determined, and some of them with great care and accuracy, particularly that of the northwest point of the Lake of the Woods.

"I have mentioned these several objects to show that although there is a reasonable prospect that the work may be perfected in another season, yet that there may be obstacles which our imperfect knowledge of the country must keep concealed until our own investigations shall disclose them. From the line of trading posts, but little can be learned that is satisfactory of this part of the Northwest Territory; and as it will sometimes occur that the surveyors must explore a section that is unknown and even untrod but by the hunter, I think there has already been made the best prediction of the time it may consume."

Extract of a letter from Joseph Delafield, agent under the 6th and 7th articles of the Treaty of Ghent, to the Secretary of State, dated

"Boston, September 24, 1822.

"Since I had last the honor to address you, I have made known to the American Commissioner that the Long lake, mentioned in the treaty of 1783, (which lake is unknown at the present day by that name,) is a sheet of water or passage near the old Grand Portage from Lake Superior, and is so laid down and described upon the map used for the purposes of that treaty, as appears by the same in your office.

"I have also communicated this fact to our surveyor employed in the northwest.

"My last accounts from him state that he should be at Lac la Pline by the middle of August last, and that in his way there he should take the old Grand Portage route, which is the Long lake route, as now properly understood. The British party were to proceed by the same route. I am much gratified to have it in my power to give these particulars, because there is no longer any serious question open as to the general course that the line is intended to be run, and because it is now more certain that upon the return of the surveyors the next season the Board will be possessed of all necessary information to determine the doubts, under the 7th article of the treaty, and designate the line."

18TH CONGRESS.]

No. 360.

[1ST SESSION.]

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE FIRST SESSION OF THE EIGHTEENTH CONGRESS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE DECEMBER 2, 1823.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

Many important subjects will claim your attention during the present session, of which I shall endeavor to give, in aid of your deliberations, a just idea in this communication. I undertake this duty with diffidence, from the vast extent of the interests on which I have to treat, and of their great importance to every portion of our Union. I enter on it with zeal, from thorough conviction that there never was a period since the establishment of our Revolution when, regarding the condition of the civilized world and its bearing on us, there was greater necessity for devotion in the public servants to their respective duties, or for virtue, patriotism, and union in our constituents.

Meeting in you a new Congress, I deem it proper to present this view of public affairs in greater detail than might otherwise be necessary. I do it, however, with peculiar satisfaction, from a knowledge that in this respect I shall comply more fully with the sound principles of our Government. The people being with us exclusively the sovereign, it is indispensable that full information be laid before them on all important subjects to enable them to exercise that high power with complete effect. If kept in the dark, they must be incompetent to it. We are all liable to error, and those who are engaged in the management of public affairs are more subject to excitement, and to be led astray by their particular interests and passions than the great body of our constituents, who, being at home in the pursuit of their ordinary avocations, are calm but deeply interested spectators of events, and of the conduct of those who are parties to them. To the people, every department of the Government and every individual in each are responsible, and the more full their information the better they can judge of the wisdom of the policy pursued, and of the conduct of each in regard to it. From their dispassionate judgment much aid may always be obtained, while their approbation will form the greatest incentive and most gratifying reward for virtuous actions, and the dread of their censure the best security against the abuse of their confidence. Their interests in all vital questions are the same, and the bond by sentiment as well as by interest will be proportionably strengthened as they are better informed of the real state of public affairs, especially in difficult conjunctures. It is by such knowledge that local prejudices and jealousies are surmounted, and that a national policy, extending its fostering care and protection to all the great interests of our Union, is formed and steadily adhered to.

A precise knowledge of our relations with foreign powers, as respects our negotiations and transactions with each, is thought to be particularly necessary. Equally necessary is it that we should form a just estimate of our resources, revenue, and progress in every kind of improvement connected with the national prosperity and public defence. It is by rendering justice to other nations that we may expect it from them. It is by our ability to resent injuries and redress wrongs that we may avoid them.

The Commissioners under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, having disagreed in their opinions respecting that portion of the boundary between the Territories of the United States and of Great Britain, the establishment of which had been submitted to them, have made their respective reports, in compliance with that article, that the same might be referred to the decision of a friendly power. It being manifest, however, that it would be difficult, if not impossible, for any power to perform that office without great delay and much inconvenience to itself, a proposal has been made by this Government, and acceded to by that of Great Britain, to endeavor to establish that boundary by amicable negotiation. It appearing, from long experience, that no satisfactory arrangement could be formed of the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in this hemisphere by legislative acts, while each party pursued its own course without agreement or concert with the other, a proposal has been made to the British Government to regulate this commerce by treaty, as it has been to arrange in like manner the just claim of the citizens of the United States inhabiting the States and Territories bordering on the lakes and rivers which empty into the St. Lawrence to the navigation of that river to the ocean. For these and other objects of high importance to the interests of both parties, a negotiation has been opened with the British Government which, it is hoped, will have a satisfactory result.

The Commissioners under the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty of Ghent, having successfully closed their labors in relation to the sixth, have proceeded to the discharge of those relating to the seventh. Their progress in the extensive survey, required for the performance of their duties, justifies the presumption that it will be completed in the ensuing year.

The negotiation which had been long depending with the French Government on several important subjects, and particularly for a just indemnity for losses sustained in the late wars by the citizens of the United States, under unjustifiable seizures and confiscations of their property, has not as yet had the desired effect. As this claim rests on the same principle with others which have been admitted by the French Government, it is not perceived on what just grounds it can be rejected. A minister will be immediately appointed to proceed to France and resume the negotiation on this and other subjects which may arise between the two nations.

At the proposal of the Russian Imperial Government, made through the minister of the Emperor residing here, a full power and instructions have been transmitted to the minister of the United States at St. Petersburg, to arrange, by amicable negotiation, the respective rights and interests of the two nations on the northwest coast of this continent. A similar proposal has been made by his Imperial Majesty to the Government of Great Britain, which has likewise been acceded to. The Government of the United States has been desirous, by this friendly proceeding, of manifesting the great value which they have invariably attached to the friendship of the Emperor, and their solicitude to cultivate the best understanding with his Government. In the discussions to which this interest has given rise, and in the arrangements by which they may terminate, the occasion has been judged proper for asserting as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers.

Since the close of the last session of Congress, the Commissioners and arbitrators for ascertaining and determining the amount of indemnification which may be due to citizens of the United States under the decision of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia, in conformity to the convention concluded at St. Petersburg, on the twelfth of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, have assembled in this city and organized themselves as a Board for the performance of the duties assigned to them by that treaty. The commission constituted under the eleventh article of the treaty of twenty-second February, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, between the United States and Spain, is also in session here; and as the term of three years limited by the treaty for the execution of the trust will expire before the period of the next regular meeting of Congress, the attention of the Legislature will be drawn to the measures which may be necessary to accomplish the objects for which the commission was instituted.

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted at their last session, instructions have been given to all the ministers of the United States accredited to the powers of Europe and America to propose the proscription of the African slave trade by classing it under the denomination, and inflicting on its perpetrators the punishment, of piracy. Should this proposal be acceded to, it is not doubted that this odious and criminal practice will be promptly and entirely suppressed. It is earnestly hoped that it will be acceded to from a firm belief that it is the most effectual expedient that can be adopted for the purpose.

At the commencement of the recent war between France and Spain it was declared by the French Government that it would grant no commissions to privateers, and that neither the commerce of Spain herself nor of neutral nations should be molested by the naval force of France, except in the breach of a lawful blockade. This declaration, which appears to have been faithfully carried into effect, concurring with principles proclaimed and cherished by the United States from the first establishment of their independence, suggested the hope that the time had arrived when the proposal for adopting it as a permanent and invariable rule in all future maritime wars might meet the favorable consideration of the great European powers. Instructions have accordingly been given to our ministers with France, Russia, and Great Britain, to make those proposals to their respective Governments; and when the friends of humanity reflect on the essential amelioration to the condition of the human race which would result from the abolition of private war on the sea, and on the great facility by which it might be accomplished, requiring only the consent of a few sovereigns, an earnest hope is indulged that these overtures will meet with an attention animated by the spirit in which they were made, and that they will ultimately be successful.

The ministers who were appointed to the republics of Colombia and Buenos Ayres during the last session of Congress proceeded, shortly afterwards, to their destinations. Of their arrival there official intelligence has not yet been received. The minister appointed to the republic of Chili will sail in a few days. An early appointment will also be made to Mexico. A minister has been received from Colombia, and the other Governments have been informed that ministers, or diplomatic agents of inferior grade, would be received from each accordingly as they might prefer the one or the other.

The minister appointed to Spain proceeded, soon after his appointment, for Cadiz, the residence of the sovereign to whom he was accredited. In approaching that port, the frigate which conveyed him was warned off by the commander of the French squadron by which it was blockaded, and not permitted to enter, although apprised by the captain of the frigate of the public character of the person whom he had on board, the landing of whom was the sole object of his proposed entry. This act, being considered an infringement of the rights of ambassadors and of nations, will form a just cause of complaint to the Government of France against the officer by whom it was committed.

The actual condition of the public finances more than realizes the favorable anticipations that were entertained of it at the opening of the last session of Congress. On the first of January there was a balance in the Treasury of four millions two hundred and thirty-seven thousand four hundred and twenty-seven dollars and fifty-five cents. From that time to the thirtieth of September the receipts amounted to upwards of sixteen millions one hundred thousand dollars, and the expenditures to eleven millions four hundred thousand dollars. During the fourth quarter of the year it is estimated that the receipts will at least equal the expenditures, and that there will remain in the Treasury on the first day of January next a surplus of nearly nine millions of dollars.

On the first of January, eighteen hundred and twenty-five, a large amount of the war debt and a part of the revolutionary debt will become redeemable. Additional portions of the former will continue to become redeemable annually until the year eighteen hundred and thirty-five. It is believed, however, that, if the United States remain at peace, the whole of that debt may be redeemed by the ordinary revenue of those years, during that period, under the provision of the act of March third, eighteen hundred and seventeen, creating the sinking fund; and in that case, the only part of the debt that will remain after the year eighteen hundred and thirty-five will be the seven millions of five per cent. stock subscribed to the Bank of the United States, and the three per cent. revolutionary debt, amounting to thirteen millions two hundred and ninety-six thousand and ninety-nine dollars and six cents, both of which are redeemable at the pleasure of the Government.

The state of the Army and its organization and discipline has been gradually improving for several years, and has now attained a high degree of perfection. The military disbursements have been regularly made, and the accounts regularly and promptly rendered for settlement. The supplies of various descriptions have been of good quality, and regularly issued at all of the posts. A system of economy and accountability has been introduced into every branch of the service which admits of little additional improvement. This desirable state has been attained by the act reorganizing the staff of the Army, passed on the fourteenth of April, eighteen hundred and eighteen.

The moneys appropriated for fortifications have been regularly and economically applied, and all the works advanced as rapidly as the amount appropriated would admit. Three important works will be completed in the course of this year: that is, Fort Washington, Fort Delaware, and the fort at the Rigolets, in Louisiana.

The Board of Engineers and the Topographical Corps have been in constant and active service, in surveying the coast, and projecting the works necessary for its defence.

The Military Academy has attained a degree of perfection in its discipline and instruction equal, as is believed, to any institution of its kind in any country.

The money appropriated for the use of the Ordnance Department has been regularly and economically applied. The fabrication of arms at the national armories, and by contract with the Department, has been gradually improving in quality and cheapness. It is believed that their quality is now such as to admit of but little improvement.

The completion of the fortifications renders it necessary that there should be a suitable appropriation for the purpose of fabricating the cannon and carriages necessary for those works.

Under the appropriation of five thousand dollars for exploring the western waters for the location of a site for a western armory, a commission was constituted, consisting of Colonel McRee, Colonel Lee, and Captain Talcott, who have been engaged in exploring the country. They have not yet reported the result of their labors, but it is believed that they will be prepared to do it at an early part of the session of Congress.

During the month of June last, General Ashley and his party, who were trading under a license from the Government, were attacked by the Ricarees while peaceably trading with the Indians at their request. Several of the party were killed or wounded and their property taken or destroyed.

Colonel Leavenworth, who commanded Fort Atkinson, at the Council Bluffs, the most western post, apprehending that the hostile spirit of the Ricarees would extend to other tribes in that quarter, and that thereby the lives of the traders on the Missouri and the peace of the frontier would be endangered, took immediate measures to check the evil.

With a detachment of the regiment stationed at the Bluffs, he successfully attacked the Ricaree village, and it is hoped that such an impression has been made on them, as well as on the other tribes on the Missouri, as will prevent a recurrence of future hostility.

The report of the Secretary of War, which is herewith transmitted, will exhibit in greater detail the condition of the Department in its various branches, and the progress which has been made in its administration during the first three quarters of the year.

I transmit a return of the militia of the several States, according to the last reports which have been made by the proper officers in each to the Department of War. By reference to this return, it will be seen that it is not complete, although great exertions have been made to make it so. As the defence, and even the liberties of the country must depend, in times of imminent danger, on the militia, it is of the highest importance that it be well organized, armed, and disciplined, throughout the Union. The report of the Secretary of War shows the progress made during the first three quarters of the present year, by the application of the fund appropriated for arming the militia. Much difficulty is found in distributing the arms according to the act of Congress providing for it, from the failure of the proper Departments in many of the States to make regular returns. The act of May the twelfth, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, provides that the system of tactics and regulations of the various corps in the regular army shall be extended to the militia. This act has been very imperfectly executed, from the want of uniformity in the organization of the militia, proceeding from the defects of the system itself, and especially in its application to that main arm of the public defence. It is thought that this important subject, in all its branches, merits the attention of Congress.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy, which is now communicated, furnishes an account of the administration of that Department for the first three quarters of the present year, with the progress made in augmenting the Navy, and the manner in which the vessels in commission have been employed.

The usual force has been maintained in the Mediterranean Sea, the Pacific Ocean, and along the Atlantic coast, and has afforded the necessary protection to our commerce in those seas.

In the West Indies and the Gulf of Mexico our naval force has been augmented by the addition of several small vessels, provided for by the "act authorizing an additional naval force for the suppression of piracy," passed by Congress at their last session. That armament has been eminently successful in the accomplishment of its object. The piracies by which our commerce in the neighborhood of the island of Cuba had been afflicted have been repressed, and the confidence of our merchants, in a great measure, restored.

The patriotic zeal and enterprise of Commodore Porter, to whom the command of the expedition was confided, has been fully seconded by the officers and men under his command; and, in reflecting with high satisfaction on the honorable manner in which they have sustained the reputation of their country and its Navy, the sentiment is alloyed only by a concern that, in the fulfilment of that arduous service, the diseases incident to the season and to the climate in which it was discharged have deprived the nation of many useful lives, and among them of several officers of great promise.

In the month of August a very malignant fever made its appearance at Thompson's island, which threatened the destruction of our station there. Many perished, and the commanding officer was severely attacked. Uncertain as to his fate, and knowing that most of the medical officers had been rendered incapable of discharging their duties, it was thought expedient to send to that post an officer of rank and experience, with several skilful surgeons, to ascertain the origin of the fever, and the probability of its recurrence there in future seasons; to furnish every assistance to those who were suffering, and, if practicable, to avoid the necessity of abandoning so important a station. Commodore Rodgers, with a promptitude which did him honor, cheerfully accepted that trust, and has discharged it in the manner anticipated from his skill and patriotism. Before his arrival, Commodore Porter, with the greater part of the squadron, had removed from the island, and returned to the United States, in consequence of the prevailing sickness. Much useful information has, however, been obtained as to the state of the island, and great relief afforded to those who had been necessarily left there.

Although our expedition, co-operating with an invigorated administration of the Government of the island of Cuba, and with the corresponding active exertions of a British naval force in the same seas, have almost entirely destroyed the unlicensed piracies from that island, the success of our exertions has not been equally effectual to suppress the same crime, under other pretences and colors, in the neighboring island of Porto Rico. They have been committed there under the abusive issue of Spanish commissions. At an early period of the present year remonstrances were made to the Governor of that island by an agent, who was sent for the purpose, against those outrages on the peaceful commerce of the United States, of which many had occurred. That officer, professing his own want of authority to make satisfaction for our just complaints, answered only by a reference of them to the Government of Spain. The minister of the United States to that court was specially instructed to urge the necessity of the immediate and effectual interposition of that Government, directing restitution and indemnity for wrongs already committed, and interdicting the repetition of them. The minister, as has been seen, was debarred access to the Spanish Government, and, in the meantime, several new cases of flagrant outrage have occurred, and citizens of the United States in the island of Porto Rico have suffered, and others been threatened with assassination, for asserting their unquestionable rights, even before the lawful tribunals of the country.

The usual orders have been given to all our public ships to seize American vessels engaged in the slave trade, and bring them in for adjudication; and I have the gratification to state that not one so employed has been discovered, and there is good reason to believe that our flag is now seldom, if at all, disgraced by that traffic.

It is a source of great satisfaction that we are always enabled to recur to the conduct of our Navy with pride and commendation. As a means of national defence, it enjoys the public confidence, and is steadily assuming additional importance. It is submitted, whether a more efficient and equally economical organization of it might not, in several respects, be effected. It is supposed that higher grades than now exist by law would be useful. They would afford well merited rewards to those who have long and faithfully served their country; present the best incentives to good conduct, and the best means of insuring a proper discipline; destroy the inequality in that respect between the military and naval services, and relieve our officers from many inconveniences and mortifications which occur when our vessels meet those of other nations—ours being the only service in which such grades do not exist.

A report of the Postmaster General, which accompanies this communication, will show the present state of the Post Office Department, and its general operations for some years past.

There is established by law eighty-eight thousand six hundred miles of post roads, on which the mail is now transported eighty-five thousand seven hundred miles; and contracts have been made for its transportation on all the established routes, with one or two exceptions. There are five thousand two hundred and forty post offices in the Union, and as many postmasters. The gross amount of postage which accrued from the first of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, to the first of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-three, was one million one hundred and fourteen thousand three hundred and forty-five dollars and twelve cents. During the same period, the expenditures of the Post Office Department amounted to one million one hundred and sixty-nine thousand eight hundred and eighty-five dollars and fifty-one cents, and consisted of the following items: compensation to postmasters, three hundred and fifty three thousand nine hundred and ninety-five dollars and ninety-eight cents; incidental expenses, thirty thousand eight hundred and sixty-six dollars and thirty-seven cents; transportation of the mail, seven hundred and eighty-four thousand six hundred dollars and eight cents; payments into the Treasury, four hundred and twenty-three dollars and eight cents. On the first of July last there was due to the Department, from postmasters, one hundred and thirty-five thousand two hundred and forty-five dollars and twenty-eight cents; from late postmasters and contractors, two hundred and fifty-six thousand seven hundred and forty-nine dollars and thirty-one cents; making a total amount of balances due to the Department of three hundred and ninety-one thousand nine hundred and ninety-four dollars and fifty-nine cents. These balances embrace all delinquencies of postmasters and contractors which have taken place since the organization of the Department. There was due by the Department to contractors, on the first day of July last, twenty-six thousand five hundred and forty-eight dollars and sixty-four cents.

The transportation of the mail within five years past has been greatly extended, and the expenditures of the Department proportionably increased. Although the postage which has accrued within the last three years has fallen short of the expenditures two hundred and sixty-two thousand eight hundred and twenty-one dollars and forty-six cents, it appears that collections have been made from the outstanding balances to meet the principal part of the current demands.

It is estimated that not more than two hundred and fifty thousand dollars of the above balances can be collected, and that a considerable part of this sum can only be realized by a resort to legal process. Some improvements in the receipts for postage is expected. A prompt attention to the collection of moneys received by postmasters, it is believed, will enable the Department to continue its operations without aid from the Treasury, unless the expenditure shall be increased by the establishment of new mail-routes.

A revision of some parts of the post office law may be necessary; and it is submitted whether it would not be proper to provide for the appointment of postmasters, where the compensation exceeds a certain amount, by nomination to the Senate, as other officers of the General Government are appointed.

Having communicated my views to Congress at the commencement of the last session respecting the encouragement which ought to be given to our manufactures, and the principle on which it should be founded, I have only to add that those views remain unchanged, and that the present state of those countries with which we have the most immediate political relations and greatest commercial intercourse tends to confirm them. Under this impression, I recommend a review of the tariff, for the purpose of affording such additional protection to those articles which we are prepared to manufacture, or which are more immediately connected with the defence and independence of the country.

The actual state of the public accounts furnishes additional evidence of the efficiency of the present system of accountability in relation to the public expenditure. Of the money drawn from the Treasury since the fourth of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, the sum remaining unaccounted for on the thirtieth of September last is more than a million and a half of dollars less than on the thirtieth of September preceding; and during the same period a reduction of nearly a million of dollars has been made in the amount of the unsettled accounts for moneys advanced previously to the fourth of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen. It will be obvious that, in proportion as the mass of accounts of the latter description is diminished by settlement, the difficulty of settling the residue is increased from the consideration that, in many instances, it can be obtained only by legal process. For more precise details on this subject, I refer to a report from the First Comptroller of the Treasury.

The sum which was appropriated at the last session for the repair of the Cumberland road has been applied with good effect to that object. A final report has not yet been received from the agent who was appointed to superintend it. As soon as it is received, it shall be communicated to Congress.

Many patriotic and enlightened citizens, who have made the subject an object of particular investigation, have suggested an improvement of still greater importance. They are of opinion that the waters of the Chesapeake and Ohio may be connected together by one continued canal, and at an expense far short of the value and importance of the object to be obtained. If this could be accomplished, it is impossible to calculate the beneficial consequences which would result from it. A great portion of the produce of the very fertile country through which it would pass would find a market through that channel. Troops might be moved with great facility in war, with cannon, and every kind of munition, and in either direction. Connecting the Atlantic with the western country, in a line passing through the seat of the national Government, it would contribute essentially to strengthen the bond of Union itself. Believing, as I do, that Congress possess the right to appropriate money for such a national object, (the jurisdiction remaining to the States through which the canal would pass,) I submit it to your consideration whether it may not be advisable to authorize, by an adequate appropriation, the employment of a suitable number of the officers of the Corps of Engineers to examine the unexplored ground during the next season, and to report their opinion thereon. It will likewise be proper to extend their examination to the several routes through which the waters of the Ohio may be connected, by canal, with those of Lake Erie.

As the Cumberland road will require annual repair, and Congress have not thought it expedient to recommend to the States an amendment to the Constitution, for the purpose of vesting in the United States a power to adopt and execute a system of internal improvement, it is also submitted to your consideration whether it may not be expedient to authorize the Executive to enter into an arrangement with the several States through which the road passes to establish tolls each within its limits, for the purpose of defraying the expense of future repairs, and of providing also, by suitable penalties, for its protection against future injuries.

The act of Congress of the seventh of May, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, appropriated the sum of twenty-two thousand seven hundred dollars for the purpose of erecting two piers as a shelter for vessels from ice near Cape Henlopen, Delaware Bay. To effect the object of the act, the officers of the Board of Engineers, with Commodore Bainbridge, were directed to prepare plans and estimates of piers sufficient to answer the purpose intended by the act. It appears by their report, which accompanies the documents from the War Department, that the appropriation is not adequate to the purpose intended; and as the piers would be of great service, both to the navigation of the Delaware Bay and the protection of vessels on the adjacent parts of the coast, I submit for the consideration of Congress whether additional and sufficient appropriation should not be made.

The Board of Engineers were also directed to examine and survey the entrance of the harbor of the port of Presque Isle, Pennsylvania, in order to make an estimate of the expense of removing the obstructions to the entrance, with a plan of the best mode of effecting the same, under the appropriation for that purpose by act of Congress passed third March last. The report of the Board accompanies the papers from the War Department, and is submitted for the consideration of Congress.

A strong hope has been long entertained, founded on the heroic struggle of the Greeks, that they would succeed in their contest, and resume their equal station among the nations of the earth. It is believed that the whole civilized world takes a deep interest in their welfare. Although no power has declared in their favor, yet none, according to our information, has taken part against them. Their cause and their name have protected them from dangers which might ere this have overwhelmed any other people. The ordinary calculations of interest and of acquisition, with a view to aggrandisement, which mingle so much in the transactions of nations, seem to have had no effect in regard to them. From the facts which have come to our knowledge, there is good cause to believe that their enemy has lost forever all dominion over them; that Greece will become again an independent nation. That she may obtain that rank is the object of our most ardent wishes.

It was stated at the commencement of the last session that a great effort was then making in Spain and Portugal to improve the condition of the people of those countries, and that it appeared to be conducted with extraordinary moderation. It need scarcely be remarked that the result has been, so far, very different from what was then anticipated. Of events in that quarter of the globe with which we have so much intercourse, and from which we derive our origin, we have always been anxious and interested spectators. The citizens of the United States cherish sentiments the most friendly in favor of the liberty and happiness of their fellow-men on that side of the Atlantic. In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defence. With the movements in this hemisphere we are, of necessity, more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the allied powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective Governments. And to the defence of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor, and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the Governments who have declared their independence, and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States. In the war between these new Governments and Spain we declared our neutrality at the time of their recognition, and to this we have adhered and shall continue to adhere, provided no change shall occur which, in the judgment of the competent authorities of this Government, shall make a corresponding change on the part of the United States indispensable to their security.

The late events in Spain and Portugal show that Europe is still unsettled. Of this important fact no stronger proof can be adduced than that the allied powers should have thought it proper, on any principle satisfactory to themselves, to have interposed, by force, in the internal concerns of Spain. To what extent such interposition may be carried, on the same principle, is a question in which all independent powers whose Governments differ from theirs are interested, even those most remote, and surely none more so than the United States. Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is, not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the Government de facto as the legitimate Government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it, and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy, meeting, in all instances, the just claims of every power; submitting to injuries from none. But in regard to these continents, circumstances are eminently and conspicuously different. It is impossible that the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can any one believe that our southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition, in any form, with indifference. If we look to the comparative strength and resources of Spain and those new Governments, and their distance from each other, it must be obvious that she can never subdue them. It is still the true policy of the United States to leave the parties to themselves, in the hope that other powers will pursue the same course.

If we compare the present condition of our Union with its actual state at the close of our Revolution, the history of the world furnishes no example of a progress in improvement in all the important circumstances which constitute the happiness of a nation which bears any resemblance to it. At the first epoch our population did not exceed three millions. By the last census it amounted to about ten millions, and, what is more extraordinary, it is almost altogether native, for the emigration from other countries has been inconsiderable. At the first epoch half the territory within our acknowledged limits was uninhabited and a wilderness. Since then new territory has been acquired of vast extent, comprising within it many rivers, particularly the Mississippi, the navigation of which to the ocean was of the highest importance to the original States. Over this territory our population has expanded in every direction, and new States have been established almost equal in number to those which formed the first bond of our Union. This expansion of our population and accession of new States to our Union have had the happiest effect on all its highest interests. That it has eminently augmented our resources and added to our strength and respectability as a power is admitted by all. But it is not in these important circumstances only that this happy effect is felt. It is manifest that, by enlarging the basis of our system and increasing the number of States, the system itself has been greatly strengthened in both its branches. Consolidation and disunion have thereby been rendered equally impracticable. Each Government, confiding in its own strength, has less to apprehend from the other; and in consequence, each enjoying a greater freedom of action, is rendered more efficient for all the purposes for which it was instituted. It is unnecessary to treat here of the vast improvement made in the system itself by the adoption of this Constitution, and of its happy effect in elevating the character and in protecting the rights of the nation as well as of individuals. To what, then, do we owe these blessings? It is known to all that we derive them from the excellence of our institutions. Ought we not, then, to adopt every measure which may be necessary to perpetuate them?

SPOILIATIONS BY A SPANISH CRUISER.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE DECEMBER 18, 1823.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of William Gray and Henry Gray, praying the interposition of the Government of the United States in the case of the brig Otter, captured by a Spanish cruiser from Porto Rico, and carried into that island, and condemned by the judicial authorities thereof, reported:

That they have attended to the duty assigned them, and that it has appeared from the documents and testimony submitted to them that the brig Otter was an American vessel built at Somerset, in Massachusetts, in the year 1821; that she was owned by Henry Gray, and fitted on a trading voyage from the port of Boston, with a cargo of lawful merchandise for Laguira, by William Gray and Henry Gray, highly respectable merchants of said Boston, and that both the vessel and cargo were exclusively the property of the said Henry and William Gray, and were placed for their account under the sole charge and direction of Oliver Keating, of Boston, master of the said brig; that with the said cargo, and none other, the vessel sailed from Boston aforesaid on the said voyage on the 26th May, 1823; that on the 22d of June following, when within about eight leagues distance from the port of Laguira, she was forcibly taken possession of and captured by the Spanish Porto Rico privateer, or armed brig, Scipio, mounting fourteen guns, and commanded by Captain Romaine Torres, under a royal commission from Ferdinand the Seventh; that a prize crew were put on board the Otter, who, notwithstanding the exhibition of the regular and sufficient documentary papers from the custom-house at Boston, the innocent nature alike of the voyage and the cargo, and the reiterated protest and remonstrance of the master, carried the said brig into the port of Mayaguez, in Porto Rico, where pretences the most frivolous were set up, and practices the most iniquitous attempted, fraudulently to furnish ostensible causes in justification of the condemnation of the property, and which, notwithstanding such false and scandalous allegations were rebutted, was condemned by the courts of that island, an appeal granted, and a delivery of the property decreed to the captor, on condition that they should give bond with sufficient sureties to respond therefor; but, regardless of such condition, the said property was delivered to the captors, as the said master believes, without sufficient security, and was immediately thereafter publicly sold at a great sacrifice, and the proceeds received by the said captors, who are supposed to be irresponsible for the amount thereof; thus leaving the sufferers, as they contend, even in the event of a final judgment on an appeal in their favor, wholly without other redress than that to be derived from the Spanish Government, through the effective interposition of that of their own country. And seeing that remonstrances have been already made, and negotiations are now pending between the United States and Spain relative to wrongs and depredations of a similar character, the committee recommend that the petition aforesaid be referred to the Department of State, in order that such measures may be taken thereon as the rights of the citizens of the United States and the interests and dignity of the Government may to the Executive appear to require.

SYMPATHY FOR THE GREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DECEMBER 29, 1823.

To the Congress of the United States:

The memorial of the committee appointed at a numerous and respectable meeting of the citizens of New York, assembled to take into consideration the situation of the Greeks, respectfully sheweth:

That the citizens whom they represent have, in common with their fellow-citizens throughout the United States, witnessed with lively sensibility the heroic efforts of the Greeks to rescue themselves from Turkish bondage. It appeared to them that the Greek cause was not only entitled to the good wishes of this country, but, as far as might be done consistently with the views of Government, to every possible assistance. In the opinion of the meeting the independence of the Greek nation was a subject of the highest concern to the interests of the human race, and recommended itself to the approbation of every civilized people by the most powerful considerations that could possibly be addressed either to the judgment or to the sympathy of mankind.

Your memorialists have accordingly been instructed to apply to Congress with the request that the independence of the Greek nation might be recognized by the Government of this country. In undertaking to comply with this instruction, the committee conceive that they will have discharged their trust when they make known to Congress the anxious desire of the citizens of New York, either that the independence of the Greeks may be speedily and formally recognized, or such steps preparatory thereto taken as may, in the opinion of Government, be consistent with its interests, its policy, and its honor. The suitable time for the exercise of such a prerogative of the Government must always rest in its sound discretion, and your memorialists repose with entire confidence in the wisdom of the application of that discretion. They would, however, respectfully suggest that, in the opinion of their fellow-citizens, as far as they have hitherto thought proper to declare it, the Greeks have proved themselves competent to maintain their independence, and that by their union, their political system, their organization, their strength, their successes, their intelligence, and their determined spirit, they have sufficiently vindicated their title to assume a separate and equal station among the nations of the world.

How far the case of the South American Governments, whose national existence was admitted by the United States some time since, may be deemed analogous is respectfully submitted to the superior judgment of those to whom this application is addressed. It has, however, been supposed that there are peculiar circumstances connected with the cause of the Greeks which ought to awaken the most active concern for their welfare, and which require the application of every just precedent in support of their independence.

Your memorialists would deem it improper on this occasion to enlarge on this subject or to do more than merely allude to the consideration of the barbarous dominion of the Turks, equally fatal to liberty, learning and taste, and under which the Greeks have been most cruelly oppressed for ages; to the spirit of the Mahometan superstition, presenting an insurmountable obstacle to the progress of civilization; to the ingenious, enterprising, free and commercial character of the Greeks; to their language, their literature, their religion, and their eventful history, exciting the deepest interest in their favor and endearing them to the Christian world by recollections of their past sufferings and of their ancient glory.

And your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

PRESENT CONDITION AND FUTURE PROSPECTS OF THE GREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DECEMBER 31, 1823.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying documents, containing the information requested by the resolution of the House of the 19th instant relating to the condition and future prospects of the Greeks.

"The Greeks have an agent in this Peninsula, (Lurioty.) He was here a fortnight, asking aid of money, which he did not receive. Indeed, he left this, disgusted with the coldness with which he was treated by San Miguel. He has gone to Lisbon with sanguine hopes of meeting, if not aid, at least kinder treatment. I inclose to you copies Nos. 1 and 2 of an official statement, made for him in April last by his Government, of the state of their affairs, and of his letter to the Spanish Government. We have favorable news from the Greeks from various sources. The Albanians are now their allies; they have again been successful by sea against the Turks, and the best hopes of their ultimate and complete triumph are entertained."

Department of Foreign Affairs—No. 66 of the Protocol.

VIEW OF THE PRESENT STATE OF GREECE.

The most cruel of tyrannies, of exactions without number, induced the Greeks to a just revolt. Their first operations were attended with some successes, which were of very little consequence, owing to the want of union among themselves. Some particular Governments were established, but they did not answer the purpose which was intended. Then the deputies of the nation were called together at Epidamus for the purpose of establishing an organic law. This assembly, of which Prince Marrocordato was President, after a month of deliberations, fixed the mode of a provisional Government, the duration of which was to be one year.

After the dissolution of this assembly, the Government which had been formed in it was proclaimed and recognized in the islands, the Peloponnesus, and the continent. The people, being satisfied, submitted with joy to its decisions, and order and justice succeeded to violence and anarchy.

The authority of this Government acquires every day new strength, and it may be hoped that soon Greece, regenerated by the benefits of a wise and paternal administration, will show herself worthy of its independence.

By the efforts of its defenders, the Peloponnesus will be no more polluted by the presence of its oppressors. Four fortresses, Patras, Coron, Modon, Napoli de Romani, only remain in the power of the Turks, and the hour of their fall approaches. Napoli de Romani is about to follow the example of Corinth, which surrendered at discretion, and the other places are about to be entirely deprived of provisions and munitions by the flight of the Turkish fleet. This fleet, having left the Dardanelles in the month of February, was favored by the winds, which prevented their passage of the Archipelago from being disputed. But at Navarino the Greeks, seconded by the ability of General Lenormand and by the courage of some European officers who were shut up there, rendered the projects upon that place abortive; this doubtless compelled it to go against Patras, and there effect the landing of the troops which it had on board. It was after this operation that it was encountered by the naval forces of the Greeks. The Turkish fleet, beaten, pursued, and entirely dispersed, was obliged to seek refuge towards the coasts of Egypt, where it was surprised by a tempest, in which it lost four frigates and two brigs. All the crews of these ships and the commander of the squadron, Ismael Gibraltar, were drowned. It was also obliged to abandon, on our coasts, several transports loaded with provisions destined for the army which came to be landed.

This army, composed of four thousand men, weakened every day by the diseases and dissensions which have sway in it, takes refuge under the cannon of the fortress of Patras, into which entrance has been refused it. There, blockaded on one side by a Greek squadron, and on the other harassed night and day by the troops of General Colocotroni, it will prove, by its total annihilation, that every effort will always be vain against a people which wishes for its liberty, cost what it will.

In Attica the fortress of Athens alone is in the power of the Turks, and the bombardment of it, to which a fortunate issue is expected, commenced several days ago.

Bœotia, Phocis, and Locris have driven out the enemies of their beautiful provinces. The Government is very seriously occupied with the means of possessing itself of Zitonna, where there is still a body of the Turkish army, in order to enable it to cause the troops in Thessaly to advance simultaneously with the general movement of the inhabitants of Mount Olympus, a bold and warlike people, and render the position of the enemy more critical.

The defiles of Pindus being in our possession, all communication between the rest of Turkey and Thessaly, and all retreat for the enemy's army that shall then be in this province, will be immediately, from that time, impossible. All Etolia, Epirus, and almost all Arcania are in the power of the Government, with the exception of some places which are under a rigorous blockade.

I have now to speak of Albania. What will be its relations with us? The future alone can resolve this important question, and the well known character of this people does not permit the calculation of events from probabilities; sometimes neuter and sometimes partisans, by turns our allies and our enemies, which they have practised to the present time, passing in appearance from one party to another without really serving the interests of that which they had adopted. The death of Ali Pacha has produced little effect. The Turks, proud of this success, which they owe only to the treachery of the very soldiers of this Pacha, have appeared to take courage; but, being repulsed at Wonizza, they appeared to have almost abandoned their attempts. Such is the situation of affairs in the Peloponnesus and on the continent.

Almost all the islands, being free, have submitted to the Government, and cause the Greek flag to be respected in the Archipelago. At Chios six thousand Samiotes have landed to favor the independence of that island and have shut up the Turks in the fortress. Mitylene in a short time will have shaken off its yoke, and Candia still combats with advantage against superior forces; but the known valor of its inhabitants, and the justice of their cause, will make up for number.

At the moment I am writing the news of the victory obtained over the Turks at Riguassa comes to be communicated to the Government. Four hundred of the enemy remain upon the field of battle, and the rest of their army has been put to flight. The Suliotes, by their accustomed bravery, have covered themselves with glory.

More recent news comes to inform us of more new successes. Colonel Ulysses, with fifteen hundred men, landed on the first of April at Helisa. After an obstinate battle against forces superior in number he became master of that village, as also of the port of St. Marine, pursued the enemy to Zittoni, killed three hundred men and made some prisoners. General Niketa, commander of the Peloponnesian troops, joined his operations to those of Colonel Ulysses, and, from everything, it is believed they have already entered Zittoni. Colonels Mitzi, Kondojanni, and Skalzodini advance upon Patradjik, and have gained some advantages. Of the body of the Greek army, composed of ten thousand men, who act from this side to the centre, commanded by Colonel Panvurja, supported by Mieztis, the right wing is formed by the troops of General Eritika and of Colonel Ulysses, and its left wing by those of Colonels Kondojanni and Skalzodini.

A new fleet is just gone from Constantinople. It is composed of vessels of different sizes. It has attempted a landing on the island of Chios, but, repulsed with loss at that point, it has retired.

[Translation.]

Note of Mr. Luriottis, Agent of the Greeks at Madrid, to his Excellency Evaristo San Miguelo, Secretary of the Despatch of State of his Catholic Majesty.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY: If there is a time when the principles ought to be revived which an unfortunate but very celebrated philosopher of France published in 1793, "That the men of all countries are brothers, and the different nations ought mutually to assist each other according to their power, as citizens of the same State;

"That those who make war on a people for the purpose of arresting the progress of liberty and destroying the rights of man ought to be everywhere pursued, not as ordinary enemies, but as assassins and rebellious robbers;

"That tyrants, whoever they may be, are slaves revolted against mankind, the sovereign of the earth, and against nature, the legislator of the universe;"

And if there is a nation in whose favor these principles ought to be applied, it is, doubtless, Greece at the present time. It is not intended here to press the rights which the Greeks have to the being recognized by the civilized nations of Europe for the lights which their ancestors have given them in liberal sciences, arts, legislations, and in true models of men, illustrious for their love of country; and still less the most evident rights which they will now have to shake off the Mussulman yoke with which any of the despotisms against which the other nations of Europe contend could not be compared. It will be sufficient only to remark that Greece, victorious and free, is the most certain security of the liberties of the Spanish peninsula.

Because, from the certain liberty in Greece necessarily flows that of Italy, which is enslaved, if I may be allowed the expression, between the peninsula and the new Grecian States;

Because, the establishment of a free State, raised in Greece upon the ruins of the legitimate Ottoman power at the time when open war has been declared between the people and the despots, as between the principles of light and the principles of darkness, ought to result in the annihilation of this empire of the crescent, and, consequently, that of its accessories, Tunis, Tripoli, and Algiers; and, the Greeks being once masters of the Egean sea, these three pirates will be no more able to recruit their bands of assassins in Albania, at Smyrna, and at Constantinople; and they will there lose their forces, which have been always restless, and even now, Spain, and the increase of this moral fire, which the legitimates call pest, which ought to deliver Germany from despotism and encourage the French to resume their ancient post in the career of liberty; and because, in fine, this will only be after the accomplishment of these prophecies that this peninsula will be left sufficiently tranquil at home and abroad to be able to reckon upon the consolidation of its liberty, which has cost and does every day cost it so many sacrifices of every kind.

Spain has no real need of succor from any other nation for maintaining itself a State free and independent.

The courage, the heroism of her children are in every respect a proof; but the despotism, to succeed in its liberticidal projects, does not always please to excite, to irritate this valor. It is sure of its triumph, provided that it should succeed in keeping alive the fire of civil discord. Even the most courageous people feel themselves fatigued of so trifling yet continued a war, and often, after the torments of despotism, they have recourse to this as to a guardian angel, preferring the future, but little felt, evil to the present, and tranquillity, although cadaverous, to a struggle which leaves them no repose. At this very moment Spain makes trial of a part of this sad truth. The insulating, therefore, of a nation which wishes to be free is, in the times wherein we live, the most impolitic measure which she can adopt.

Despotism has formed and published its alliance, and has, if I may be allowed the expression, hurled a formal defiance at the nations that wish to maintain or to recover their liberties. It insults them all because it is conscious of its power to vanquish them, either by the force of hiring bayonets with which it inundates them, or by the silent manœuvres which organize civil war—the division and quarrels of parties with which it harasses them. It is therefore necessary to oppose to this alliance of tyrants that of the nations who have achieved their liberty.

If for a nation to be free the will of being so were sufficient; if what gives the disposition insured equally success; if, in fine, the valor of a people were a sure guaranty of success, Greece and the Greeks would not this day doubt of their triumph. The modern Greeks have already, in more than one engagement with the Turks, shown themselves worthy successors of the Greeks of Marathon, of Thermopylae, of Salamis, of Strimon, of Cnidus, &c., but they want men; for frightful despotism capriciously destroyed them, and of it population has never been an accompaniment. They want money, because it would have been the price of their head to have been rich. They want arms, powder, lead, because no despotism

Government leaves these at the mercy of slaves, and because the struggle which the Greeks have so long maintained has consumed the provisions which their bravery and the small succors brought by the foreigner had procured them. Yet they still continue, in more than one place, to fight and defend themselves against the Turks with inferior weapons.

They have abundance of lands and national property: for three-fifths of the territory belonged to the Mussulmans as the price of confiscations made after cutting off the heads of opulent Greeks; but these lands, this property, are nothing at the present moment, when the Greeks ought to handle the musket instead of the plough, when money is wanting, and when the public credit is not yet established.

The Greeks will never return under the Ottoman yoke; but in continuing a struggle so unequal, without other support, without other succor, they will all perish. What is the use of liberty in the tomb? What the advantages which Spain, Italy, and Europe, panting after liberty, can expect from a triumph over the Greeks?

The United States of America, after having sustained with equal courage and at equal sacrifices their cause of independence against a despotism much less dreadful, owed their triumph to the protection of a European power. Why should not Greece rely upon some protector among the free States of that same part of the world to which she belongs? By what fatality is she persecuted by the Government of England, which ought to be the father of free nations, and forgotten by those Governments which profess the same principles which she has just proclaimed?

The Greeks have till now been flattered by a number of private associations who came to their aid, but no Government has as yet partaken of this generous enthusiasm, and yet the succors, as well moral as physical, which are necessary for them cannot be afforded them but by Governments.

There is some reason to believe that the Government of Corinth has opened some negotiation with the said United States of America. May these States pay in favor of Greece the tribute of recognition which they owe to Europe for the liberty which they know so well how to enjoy.

The same Government, which leaves nothing untried which may conduce to the triumph of the holy cause which it directs, cannot forget to address itself to magnanimous Spain—to a nation which, more than every other, shows to the universe that she feels all the value of liberty and independence to a Government; which each day ought to be more persuaded that the allied despotism aims and will aim, more or less openly but always obstinately enough, at the consolidation of its present system. As to politics, the before cited Wigueford says that the infallible means of vanquishing one's rivals in diplomacy is to be frank, because he is sure of not meeting them in his way.

If, then, Spain can believe it to be to her advantage to recognize and to protect and to succor the Government of Corinth, what measure, what conduct, has she to pursue towards the other Governments which have never openly pronounced against the Hellenic revolution?

The undersigned is not authorized to speak upon this article. He is only commissioned in general to solicit every species of succor which the Spaniards can send to the Greeks, either in money or arms, powder, lead, men, ships, frigates, brigs, &c., of war.

But he knows how far, among the generous succors, the article of a like moral aid would preponderate. Interested for his country, he confines himself to the making the rough draught and to offer up prayers that the Spanish Government would be pleased to send some one to Greece to treat upon this important subject, and upon all the others which might be necessary and of great utility to Spain.

In the meantime, upon the point of physical succor, the undersigned has the honor to observe to your excellency that the question is not respecting a donation, but only respecting a loan, and that the responsibility of a free Government in Greece is beyond all the wants and those which it will have to fulfil to arrive at its consolidation.

That small succors are also useful to the Greeks in their present situation, because every little thing becomes a great deal to one who is pressed by want.

That the manner of carrying them into Greece and securing the reimbursement is left to the will of the Spanish Government.

That the greatest secrecy ought to be observed in all that Spain wishes to do as a Government in favor of the Greeks, in order that the diplomatic spies may not try to perplex it, and may not succeed in rendering it abortive.

That, finally, in the absence of the persons to whom the undersigned had letters to deliver here at Madrid, on the part of Prince Marrocordato, of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Negri, and of the Bishop Ignatius of Pisa, that they would be pleased to support their requests, as well before the Government as before the brave Spanish patriots, it was doubtless a happiness for the undersigned to have met here a ministry so eminently well affected, and a minister of foreign relations so liberal as your excellency, to whom he can directly address himself in the two-fold aim mentioned and in the accomplishment of his mission.

Your excellency's most obedient and most humble servant,

LURIOTTIS.

MADRID, November 21, 1822.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Rush to Mr. Adams, dated

LONDON, February 24, 1823.

"I received the day before yesterday a paper, of which a copy is inclosed, addressed to you by Andreas Luriottis, an agent or deputy from Corinth on behalf of the cause of the Greeks.

"It will be perceived that, after describing the general nature of the revolution now going on in Greece, the object of the paper is to solicit aid of the United States and the establishment of diplomatic connexions with them.

"This gentleman, who has recently arrived in London, brought me a letter of introduction from General Dearborn, at Lisbon, and I received him in a manner due to the interesting character which he bears. I assured him that the fortunes of his country were dear to the people of the United States, who, cherishing the freedom which they themselves inherited and enjoyed, looked with the warmest sympathy upon the struggle of the Greeks for their national liberties, and that the Government of the United States participated in this feeling. Of the latter, I considered the late mention of the subject by the President, in his message to Congress at the opening of the session, as the authentic proof.

"To the inquiries of Mr. Luriettis, whether my Government would open political or diplomatic relations with his at the present day, I replied that this formed a point on which I was wholly uninformed and could not undertake to give my opinion; that it involved considerations of expediency as applicable to the United States, as well as of advantage or otherwise as applicable to the Greek cause itself, that would be maturely weighed at Washington before any decision could be pronounced. All that I could say was to reiterate the assurance of the friendly interest that was felt amongst us for the success of the cause in which his country was embarked; and I adverted to the part which my Government had acted in relation to the South American struggle—a part so much in advance of that of any other Government—as a sure indication that it could feel no backwardness in welcoming, when the proper day arrived, the new-born freedom of Greece into the family of nations. In the end I informed him that I would gladly become the organ of transmitting to my Government whatever distinctive overtures or communication he might determine to make to it—a request which, in the course of our conversation, he had himself made of me. These overtures he has set forth in the paper inclosed.

"Mr. Luriettis dwelt with confidence upon the advances which his country has made in the career of her independence—advances the more solid and encouraging as they have been won amidst formidable difficulties by the mere unassisted efforts of her own valor and constancy. Since the capture of Napoli de Romania, the strongest fortress which the Turks had in the Morea, he seemed to consider that the cause of independence was placed upon a sure basis. The Greeks since this event have removed the seat of their Government from Corinth, where it was fixed at first, to Napoli."

Andreas Luriettis, Envoy of the Provisional Government of Greece, to the Honorable John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State to the United States of America.

SIR: I feel no slight emotion while, in behalf of Greece, my country struggling for independence and liberty, I address myself to the United States of America.

The independence for which we combat, you have achieved. The liberty to which we look with anxious solicitude, you have obtained and consolidated in peace and in glory.

Yet Greece, old Greece, the seat of early civilization and freedom, stretches out her hands imploringly to a land which sprung into being, as it were, ages after her own lustre had been extinguished; and ventures to hope that the young and most vigorous sons of liberty will regard with no common sympathy the efforts of the descendants of the heir and elder born, whose precepts and whose example have served, though insufficient hitherto for our complete regeneration, to regenerate half a world.

I know, sir, that the sympathies of the generous people of the United States have been extensively directed towards us; and since I have reached this country, an interview with their minister, Mr. Rush, has served to convince me more strongly how great their claim is on our gratitude and our affection. May I hope that some means may be found to communicate these our feelings of which I am so proud to be the organ? We still venture to rely on their friendship; we would look to their individual if not to their national co-operation. Every, the slightest, assistance under present circumstances will aid the progress of the great work of liberty; and if, standing, as we have stood, alone and unsupported, with everything opposed to us, and nothing to encourage us but patriotism, enthusiasm, and sometimes even despair; if thus we have gone forward, liberating our provinces, one after another, and subduing every force which has been directed against us, what may we not do with the assistance for which we venture to appeal to the generous and the free?

Precipitated by circumstances into that struggle for independence which, ever since the domination of our cruel and reckless tyrants, had never ceased to be the object of our vows and prayers, we have, by the blessing of God, freed a considerable part of Greece from the ruthless invaders. The Peloponnesus, Etolia, Carmania, Attica, Phocida, Bœotia, and the islands of the Archipelago and Candia, are nearly free. The armies and the fleets which have been sent against us have been subdued by the valor of our troops and our marine. Meanwhile, we have organized a Government founded upon popular suffrages; and you will probably have seen how closely our organic law assimilates to that Constitution under which your nation so happily and so securely lives.

I have been sent hither by the Government of Greece to obtain assistance in our determined enterprise, on which we, like you, have staked our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor; and I believe my journey has not been wholly without success. I should have been wanting to my duty had I not addressed you, supplicating the earliest display of your amicable purposes; entreating that diplomatic relations may be established between us; communicating the most earnest desire of my Government, that we may be allowed to call you allies as well as friends; and stating that we shall rejoice to enter upon discussions which may lead to immediate and advantageous treaties, and to receive as to expedite diplomatic agents without delay. Both at Madrid and at Lisbon I have been received with great kindness by the American representative, and am pleased to record the expression of my gratitude.

Though fortunately you are so far removed and raised so much above the narrow politics of Europe as to be little influenced by the vicissitudes, I venture to believe that Mr. Rush will explain to you the changes which have taken place, and are still in action around us, in our favor; and I conclude rejoicing in the hope that North America and Greece may be united in the bonds of long-enduring and unbroken concord, and have the honor to be,

With every sentiment of respect, your obedient humble servant,

AND. LURIOTTIS.

LONDON, February 20, 1823.

Mr. Adams to Mr. Rush.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, August 18, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor of inclosing herewith an answer to the letter from Mr. Luriottis, the agent of the Greeks, addressed to me, and a copy of which was transmitted with your despatch, No. 295.

If upon the receipt of this letter Mr. Luriottis should still be in London, it will be desirable that you should deliver it to him in person, accompanied with such remarks and explanations as may satisfy him and those whom he represents, that, in declining the proposal of giving active aid to the cause of Grecian emancipation, the Executive Government of the United States has been governed, not by its inclinations or a sentiment of indifference to the cause, but by its constitutional duties, clear and unequivocal.

The United States could give assistance to the Greeks only by the application of some portion of their public force or of their public revenue in their favor, and it would constitute them in a state of war with the Ottoman Porte, and perhaps with all the Barbary powers. To make this disposal either of force or treasure, you are aware, is, by our Constitution, not within the competency of the Executive. It could be determined only by an act of Congress, which would assuredly not be adopted, should it even be recommended by the Executive.

The policy of the United States with reference to foreign nations has always been founded upon the moral principle of natural law—peace with all mankind. From whatever cause war between other nations, whether foreign or domestic, has arisen, the unvarying law of the United States has been peace with both belligerents. From the first war of the French Revolution to the recent invasion of Spain, there has been a succession of wars, national and civil, in almost every one of which one of the parties was contending for liberty or independence. To the first revolutionary war a strong impulse of feeling urged the people of the United States to take side with the party which, at its commencement, was contending, apparently at least, for both. Had the policy of the United States not been essentially pacific, a stronger case to claim their interference could scarcely have been presented. They nevertheless declared themselves neutral, and the principle then deliberately settled has been invariably adhered to ever since.

With regard to the recognition of sovereign States, and the establishment with them of a diplomatic intercourse, the experience of the last thirty years has served also to ascertain the limits proper for the application of principles in which every nation must exercise some latitude of discretion. Precluded by their neutral position from interfering in the question of right, the United States have recognized the fact of foreign sovereignty only when it was undisputed, or disputed without any rational prospect of success. In this manner the successive changes of government in many of the European States, and the revolutionary Governments of South America, have been acknowledged. The condition of the Greeks is not yet such as will admit of the recognition upon these principles.

Yet as we cherish the most friendly feelings towards them, and are sincerely disposed to render them any service which may be compatible with our neutrality, it will give us pleasure to learn from time to time the actual state of their cause, political and military. Should Mr. Luriottis be enabled and disposed to furnish this information, it may always be communicated through you, and will be received with satisfaction here. The public accounts from that quarter have been of late very scanty, and we shall be glad to obtain any authentic particulars which may come to your knowledge from this or through any other channel.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

RICHARD RUSH, Envoy, &c., at London.

Mr. Adams to Mr. Luriottis.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, August 18, 1823.

SIR: A copy of the letter which you did me the honor of addressing to me on the 20th of February last has been transmitted to me by the minister of the United States at London, and has received the deliberate consideration of the President of the United States.

The sentiments with which he has witnessed the struggles of your countrymen for their national emancipation and independence had been made manifest to the world in a public message to the Congress of the United States. They are cordially felt by the people of this Union, who, sympathizing with the cause of freedom and independence wherever its standard is unfurled, behold with peculiar interest the display of Grecian energy in defence of Grecian liberties, and the association of heroic exertions at the present time with the proudest glories of former ages in the land of Epaminondas and of Philipœmen.

But, while cheering with their best wishes the cause of the Greeks, the United States are forbidden by the duties of their situation from taking part in the war, to which their relation is that of neutrality. At peace themselves with all the world, their established policy and the obligations of the laws of nations preclude them from becoming voluntary auxiliaries to a cause which would involve them in war.

If, in the progress of events, the Greeks should be enabled to establish and organize themselves as an independent nation, the United States will be among the first to welcome them in that capacity into the general family, to establish diplomatic and commercial relations with them suited to the mutual interests of the two countries, and to recognize with special satisfaction their constituted state in the character of a sister Republic.

I have the honor to be, with distinguished consideration, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

ANDREAS LURIOTTIS, Envoy of the Provisional Government of the Greeks, London.

Extract of a letter to the Secretary of State, dated

MARSEILLES, August 6, 1823.

"I have endeavored to obtain accurate information relative to the actual state of the struggle between the Greeks and the Ottomans. The following particulars, I think, may be relied on. The Porte is making great preparations by land to bring the war to a successful conclusion. The Turkish fleet has succeeded in provisioning for a year the garrisons of Carysto, in Negropont, Canée, the capital of Candia, (or Crete,) and also Coron, Modon, Patras, and Corinth, in the Morea. The two last places have been repeatedly and incorrectly represented in the American newspapers as having long since surrendered. The Porte has offered the Greeks, through the mediation of Lord Strangford, to place the Morea on the same footing as the provinces of Wallachia and Moldavia; that is, to place it under the government of a Greek prince, who should have the entire administration of the affairs of the province, and who should annually pay a certain portion of its revenues into the treasury of the Porte. The British ambassador, in order to induce the Greeks to accept these terms, has dispersed among them a declaration that they are not to expect aid from any of the European sovereigns. On the other hand, the Greeks do not seem as yet disposed to peace, but are making preparations to resist, as they may, the forces which are approaching them on all sides. Such was the state of things by the last advices."

Extract of a letter to the Secretary of State, dated,

MARSEILLES, August 27, 1823.

"There is no certain intelligence from Greece later than that contained in a letter I had the honor to forward to you a fortnight since. The Turkish admiral was, fifteen days ago, in the neighborhood of Patras, where he had landed five thousand men. The Smyrna Gazette reports that the main Turkish army, 60,000 strong, had obtained, after some hard fighting, possession of the defiles of Thermopylæ; but this, as yet, is not confirmed."

[Translation.]

Statistical table of Greece, according to the work of Mr. Pouqueville. Original received from Mr. Middleton, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at St. Petersburg.

Greece may be apportioned into three grand divisions: continental Greece,† the Isthmus of Peloponnesus,* and the Islands.

Continental Greece.—It contains seven provinces, which are: Epirus,† Macedonia,† Thessaly,† Acarnania,* Etolia,* Locris,* Phocis,* comprehending Lividia.†

Epirus† has an extent of 1,100 square leagues of 2,500 toises. The population is estimated at 373,000 souls. Its principal cities are Janina, Zagori, Conitza, Prémithy, Cleissoura, Condessi, Canina, Tebelin, Aulone, (a port,) Bérat, (a fortress,) Elbassan, Durazzo, (a fort,) Argyro Castron, Liboro, Delvino, (fortified,) Conispolis, Paramythia, Gomenitza, (a port,) Margariti, Parga, (a fort,) Regniassa, (a fort,)* Preres, (a port and fort,) Souli, (fort,)* Arta, (a fort and seaport,) Calarites,* Metzowo,* Syraco, &c.

The rivers which pass through Epirus in different ways are the Voioussa or Aotis, the Calamas or Thyamis, the Glykys or Acheron.

The country generally is mountainous, intersected with large valleys; its aspect is various, and may be said to present an abridgment of all the climates; it abounds in cattle and in rich pastures. The articles of exportation consist of grain, of sheep and goats, of building timber, cotton, wool, pitch, wax, tobacco; and some mountains of Epirus contain mines, which the Government neglect to explore, and which the Christian inhabitants dare not discover, fearful of being themselves buried in these mines to gratify the cupidity of their masters.)a)

The principal seaports of Epirus are: L'Arta, Aulone, Prevesa, Vonitza, Port Palarme, Porto Raguzo, Gomenitza, Durazzo. The value of wares and foreign productions imported by these ports was, in the year 1812, 6,590,902 piastres; and the exportation during the same year was 7,804,063 piastres. The Epirotes are, in general, warlike and of a robust constitution, impatient of the yoke and proud, in spite of the dependence in which they live; shepherds rather than agriculturists, they almost all carry arms, and prefer to inhabit the mountains and the situations most difficult of access. Divided into colonies, and long governed by the feudal administration of the Beys, they have seen, too late, all these partial tyrannies united into one only, and the most monstrous of all, that of Ali Pacha of Janina. In the midst of the chaos of the administration of this Vizier, it may be calculated that Epirus paid annually to the Grand Seigneur a tribute of two millions(b) of piastres, and that Ali received for himself ten other millions, without including the revenues of his sons, the advances and spoiliations of every kind to which this province was exposed.

Macedonia,† divided into Illyrian and Cisaxian, has an extent of 1,692 square leagues. Its population may approximate to 436,000 inhabitants. Its most remarkable cities and towns are: Bitolia or Monastir, Prilipé, Cojani, Delvendos, Flourina, Cailary, Castoria, Greveno, Lepsin, Bichlistas, Croupitcha, Piassa, Gheortelia, Staria, Prespa, Critchowa, Ochrida, Chiatista, Veria,* or Karaveria, Jenidgé, Salonica.

The rivers which water Macedonia are: the Vardar, or Axios, and the Bichlista, or Haliæmon. This province abounds in small cattle, corn, vines, cotton, and tobacco.

The Macedonians are agriculturists and merchants. The merchants of Bitolia, of Castoria, of Chatista, and of Salonica, have frequent correspondence with the commercial places of Europe; they send caravans to Bosnia and Hungary. The Macedonians, as well as the other nations of Greece, partake of their Hellenic origin; they are brave and considerate(c). Numerous Bulgarian and Albanian colonies are established in this province, actually divided into cantons, and subject to the destructive administration of the Pachas of Romelia and their subordinates.

Thessaly† contains, within an extent of 516 square leagues, 275,000 inhabitants; there are reckoned 962 villages and the following cities: Tricala, (the chief place, and residence of a Pacha,) Klinoro, Stagous, Pharsalia, Larissa, Alasson, Rapchana, Tournovo, Platamon, (a fort,) Caterin, Agia, Velestina, Dechani, Volo, (a port,) Armyros, Thaumaco. Thessaly, watered by the Peneus, and by several other rivers, tributaries of that river, is one of the most fertile countries of European Turkey; it produces corn, silk, cotton, tobacco, and, until the year 1810, the manufactories of Tournovo, of Ambelakia, and of Agia, sent abroad dyed cottons, stuffs, and woollens, to the amount of several millions;(a) the Greek merchants of these cities had factories in Germany. The seaport of Volo, situated on the gulf of the same name, favored the exportation of the grain which the sailors of Idra and of other islands came there to load. The natives of Thessaly vary in their character and their occupations according to the places which they inhabit; industrious and submissive in the cities, laborious and peaceful husbandmen in the country, intrepid sailors in the cantons situated near the sea, they are bold and independent in the mountainous regions. Numerous bands of these mountaineers go from Olympus, from Ossa, and from Mount Pelion, and having at their head enterprising chiefs, sometimes contend with the forces of the Pacha of Epirus and of Romelia;(b) they have even possessed themselves of several cities of Thessaly and defended them for years. Worn out with efforts, disappointed in their hopes, and deprived of their brave chiefs, they retired to their mountains, where they still form a population warlike and independent.

Acarmania* has an extent of 92 square leagues, and 8,635 inhabitants; the remains of a population formerly flourishing. There are still reckoned there sixteen cities and villages, the most remarkable of which are, Vonitza, Catona, Dragomestre, and Catochi, (a seaport.) This province, which made a part of the Government of Ali Pacha, and which has undergone all the torments of his administration, presents only ruins and solitude. It, nevertheless, carries on a feeble commerce with the Ionian islands and the Ambracian or Artan Gulf; its inhabitants keep up the fisheries in the same gulf, as well as on the numerous lakes in the interior of the country.

In this province, as in all the continent of Greece, there are found, in the declivities of mountains,(c) hamlets and villages inhabited by men who, flying from oppression, and striving to insulate themselves wherever they find a savage nature. Masters of the defiles which form the passage between Epirus and the southern provinces of Greece, the mountaineers of Acarnania can interrupt the communication between these two provinces, and oppose with success the movements of an army which might try to advance from this side towards Etolia and the Morea. Some cantons of this province are at this day entirely uncultivated and depeopled; others are covered with forests and barren grounds, which only want strength to be converted into productive lands.

Etolia,* separated from Acarnania by the river Aspropotamos or Achelôus, contains, in its present subdivisions, four cantons and 83,455 inhabitants, distributed among 236 towns and villages, the principal of which are: Vrachori, Carpenitze, Agrapha, Missolongi, (a port,) Lepante,‡ or Naupacte, (a fort, and residence of a Pacha.) This province produces grain, rice, oil, silk, and wine. These productions, added to the revenue of the fisheries and customs, give an annual produce of 3,293,700 piastres.(d)

The cantons of Etolia, annexed, according to the register of the Ottoman Government, to the Pachalik of Negropont, had been successively seized upon by Ali Pacha, who entrusted the administration of them to his lieutenants. The pure blood of the ancient Etolians, their carelessness, their contempt of death, is still found among the colonies of Agrapha and of Carpenitze.(e) Animated with the energy which the vital air of the mountains of these cantons gives them, they are always induced to repel the attacks of the tyranny. In this part of Etolia the league of the armatolis was formed. These bands, reinforced by all the discontented of Greece, have sometimes opposed force to force, fanaticism to fanaticism, and have caused the satraps of Thessaly and of Epirus to make satisfaction for the unjust enterprises formed against their liberty.

The country comprehending Locris,* Phocis,* Livadia,‡ and Attica, contains, by an approximating calculation, 450 square leagues, and a population of about 140,000 souls. Salone, Thebes, Livadia, and Athens,‡ are the principal cities of this country; the face and resources of which are, with some variations, nearly the same as in the countries which have been just above delineated in the table. It may be affirmed that, in all these provinces, forming continental Greece, the number of Christian inhabitants is to that of Mahometans in the proportion of five to one;(f) which would give to all this region a total of 1,316,080 inhabitants, of which there are more than a million of Christians, dispersed over an extent of country which could abundantly contain and support upwards of thrice that population.

Peloponnesus.

Peloponnesus,* or the Morea, has a surface of 840 square leagues. Its population is 240,000 Christian inhabitants, distributed in 1,421 villages, towns, and cities, the principal of which are: Corinth, (a fort,) Argos, Naupli, (a fort and port,)‡ St. Pierre, Mistra, or Sparta, Monembossie, (a fort,) Calamate, Androussa, Coron, (a fort and road for shipping,)‡ Modon, (a fort and road,)‡ Navarin, (a fort and port,) Arcadia, Gastonni, Lala, Patras, (a fort and port,)‡ Vostitza, Calavryta, Tripolitza, (a fort,) Cariténe, Leondari.

Its rivers are the Rofia, or the Alpheus, the Vossili-Potamos, or the Eurotas, and several others of a shorter course. The mountains of Arcadia, those of Lala, or the ancient Pholœe, Mount Olenos, and the Taygete, connect the country in different ways. Notwithstanding the catastrophes which the Peloponnesus has experienced, and notwithstanding the ruinous administration of the Pachas, this province still preserves immense resources, owing to its fertility as well as to its topographical situation; its agricultural productions are numerous and various, and, according to a calculation made upon the places, the different cantons of the Peloponnesus produce, one year with another, 820,000 kilos. of corn, (wheat,) which fetches 6,560,000 piastres, reckoning the kilo, at 8 piastres, the selling price upon the places; 1,169,000 kilos. of maize, barley, and dry vegetables, making 7,402,000 piastres, according to the ordinary sale price; 63,000 barrels of oil, making 2,790,200 piastres, reckoning the barrel at from 40 to 45 piastres; 227,550 pounds of silk, making 3,738,500 piastres; 278,000 quintals of cotton and raw wool, making 1,388,800 piastres. The other revenues of agriculture and of industry, such as wine, cheese, butter, cattle, currants, honey, cotton, thread, and stuffs of wool, produce, annually, in cash, the sum of 8,818,500 piastres, which gives a total of 30,698,000.(g) The different imposts and ground rents of the province amounted, in the year 1814, to 12,816,241 piastres, which left in favor of the managers a difference of 17,881,759 piastres. With this excess, of which the seventeenth went into the treasuries of the Beys, the Agas, and the great proprietors, the inhabitants pay their individual expenses, and the cantons buy in the markets of the province the provisions of the first necessity which they do not grow, and the articles coming from abroad.

In the above extract of revenues and of ground rents of the Peninsula the country of Magna,* or ancient Laconia, is not included. This canton, placed upon the declivities of Mount Taygete from the city Calamata to Cape Matapan, is divided into twelve captaincies, and forms a particular species of government, subject to the authority of a native Bey or Prince, held of the grand admiral of the Porte. The Magnates, poor, and naturally ferocious, know no other business but that of arms and piracy; in 1813 there were reckoned 10,000 men capable of bearing arms, in a population of 30,000 inhabitants, Christians and aborigines, who depended only nominally on the Ottoman Porte.

Islands of Greece. (a)

The islands of Greece, according to their geographical order from south to north, and from _____ are:

Candia, (†) or Crete. It is sixty leagues long and twenty broad. The ports are: the city of Candia, (‡) Rethymo, (*) Canca, (‡) Kissamos. Its population is two hundred and forty thousand inhabitants.

Milo, (*) or Melos, twelve leagues in circuit, and seven thousand inhabitants.

Santorin, (*) nine leagues in circuit; twelve thousand inhabitants.

Siphanto, or Syphnos, (*) nine leagues long and two broad; seven thousand inhabitants.

Nio, or Ios, (*) twelve leagues in circuit; two thousand seven hundred inhabitants. It has a good harbor.

Amargos, (*) twelve leagues in circuit; six thousand inhabitants, and a good harbor.

Paros, (*) four leagues long and three broad; two thousand inhabitants.

Naxos, (*) thirty leagues in circuit; ten thousand inhabitants.

Serpho, (*) four leagues long and two broad, with a good harbor and two thousand inhabitants.

Thermia, or Cythnos, (*) five leagues long and two broad, with a good harbor and four thousand inhabitants.

Engia, or Egyne, (*) near the Morea, five leagues long and three broad; five thousand inhabitants.

Coloury, or Salamine, (*) twenty leagues in circuit, with a good harbor and eight thousand inhabitants.

Zea, or Ceos, (*) six leagues long and three broad; six thousand inhabitants.

Syra, or Syros, (*) fifteen leagues in circuit, with a harbor and five thousand inhabitants.

Dili, or Delos, not inhabited.

Myconi, (*) twelve leagues in circuit, with a good harbor and four thousand inhabitants.

Tine, or Tenos, (*) seven leagues long and three broad, and nine thousand inhabitants.

Andros, (*) thirty leagues in circuit, a harbor, and twelve thousand inhabitants.

Negropont, or Eubea, (†) four leagues long and ten broad; twenty-five thousand inhabitants.

Skiros, six leagues long and three broad; six thousand inhabitants.

Scopelos, eight leagues long and four broad; seven thousand inhabitants.

Thassos, thirty leagues in circuit, with a good harbor and eight thousand inhabitants.

Samandraky, or Samothrace, eight leagues in circuit, and two thousand inhabitants.

Imbros, ten leagues in circuit, with a fortified harbor and three thousand inhabitants.

Stalimène, or Lemnos, (*) ten leagues long and eight broad, with a fortified harbor and twenty thousand inhabitants.

Tenedos, fifteen leagues in circuit, with a fortified harbor and five thousand inhabitants.

Mitylene or Lesbos, twenty leagues long and fifteen broad, with a fortified harbor and eighteen thousand inhabitants.

Chio, (†) fifteen leagues in circuit [long] and five broad, with a large and good harbor and sixty thousand inhabitants.

Samos, (*) twelve leagues long and six broad, with two harbors and twelve thousand inhabitants.

Nicari, or Icaria, (*) eight leagues long and three broad; two thousand inhabitants.

Patmos, (*) few inhabitants.

Leros, (*) with a large harbor and few inhabitants.

Calimne, or Claros, (*) six leagues in circuit, with a good harbor and three thousand inhabitants.

Stanco, or Cos, (*) ten leagues long and four broad, with a fortified harbor and five thousand inhabitants.

Stimpalie, or Astipaloe, (*) seven leagues long and three broad, with a good harbor, and six thousand inhabitants.

Carpathos, (*) twelve leagues in circuit, with a harbor and four thousand inhabitants.

Rhodes, twenty-five leagues long and twenty broad; one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants. The city of Rhodes is fortified; it has a large and good harbor.

Cyprus, one hundred and thirty leagues long and sixty at its greatest breadth; its population is eighty-three thousand. The cities are: Nicosia, Cerina, (a large harbor,) Paphos, Limassal, Famagouste, and Lamaca.

The islands of Idra, (*) Spetzia, (*) and Ipsara, (*) very important for their marine, reckon a population of fifty-eight thousand souls, or thereby.

The sum total of the population of the islands of Greece may be estimated at eight hundred and thirty thousand inhabitants, among which are included about one hundred and sixty thousand Mahometans, and seven hundred and seventy thousand Christians. Add two hundred and seventy thousand for the Morea, and one million for continental Greece, and there is two million and forty thousand for the Greek population of these countries.

The Greek inhabitants of Thrace, of Bulgaria, of Constantinople, of Smyrna, and of all Asia Minor, are not included in this number.

According to a detailed table, digested in the year 1813, the Greek marine of the islands and of different ports of Greece amounted to six hundred and fifteen merchant vessels, five thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight cannons, and seventeen thousand five hundred and twenty-six sailors; of which two hundred and forty vessels, four thousand three hundred and twenty cannons, and nine thousand nine hundred sailors belong to the three islands alone of Idra, Spetzia, and Ipsara.—(Vide Pouqueville, t. 5, page 68.)

SYMPATHY FOR THE GREEKS.

MEMORIAL.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, a committee appointed for this purpose by a large number of the citizens of Boston and its vicinity, convened by public notification on the 19th instant, beg leave most respectfully to represent:

That they feel a deep interest in the political situation of the people of Greece, and rejoice in the information recently communicated by the Chief Magistrate of the United States, "that there is good reason to believe Greece will become again an independent nation."

That the contest of an oppressed and enslaved people for the invaluable blessings of self-government, and of a Christian people for the enjoyment of religious liberty, has a claim to the best wishes of this nation for its eventual success, and to whatever aid and encouragement, consistently with the primary duty of self-preservation, it may have the ability to afford.

No one who has duly reflected upon the consequences which have resulted from our own successful struggle in the cause of civil liberty, not as respects the interests of our nation only, but as it has affected also the condition of the whole civilized world, can hesitate to admit that the question of the erection of a new independent Christian State is the most momentous that can occur in the progress of human affairs, and especially deserving the attention of the representatives of a free people.

Centuries, whose annals are filled with the common succession of wars and conquests, may pass away, without being attended with any important result to the great cause of civilization and humanity; but the emancipation from a barbarous despotism of a gallant and enterprising and intelligent people must be followed by the most propitious consequences, and cannot fail to add to the security of all free Governments, by increasing the number of those who are devoted to their common defence.

The extermination of the Turkish despotism on the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean sea has justly been regarded as a more worthy object of concert and coalition among civilized powers than any which ever engaged their united attention. The existence of that despotism has reduced to a state of desolation several of the most fertile countries on the globe, and annihilated the commerce that might otherwise have been maintained. It has been attended with the grossest insults and outrages on the dignity of States and the liberty of their citizens. The maintaining of a powerful marine force, expensive consular establishments, disgraceful tribute, slavery and war, have successively been among the evils to which this lawless domination has subjected the civilized world, and from which our own country has not been exempted.

It is, then, quite obvious that the erection of a new and free State in the Mediterranean, possessing not only the coasts of Southern Greece, but the islands, particularly of Candia and Cyprus, would form a powerful check upon the barbarous dependencies of the Porte in those seas, and give facility to that commercial enterprise which now finds its way only to one port of European or Asiatic Turkey.

Your memorialists would not presume to make any suggestion as to the course which it may become the American Government to pursue at this interesting crisis. They feel, in common with their fellow-citizens generally, the just weight and obligation of that policy which hitherto has prohibited an interference with the internal concerns of any of the powers of Europe, and content themselves, therefore, with expressing their assurance, that if the peculiar and unprecedented condition of the Greeks should, in the opinion of the Government of the United States, form a case of exception to that rule of policy, the measures which may be adopted shall receive their cordial support.

But your memorialists, at any rate, cannot refrain from the expression of their earnest wish that the indignation and abhorrence which they are satisfied is universal throughout the United States at the mode in which the Turkish Government is carrying on the war against Greece should be distinctly avowed in the face of the world, and that other civilized and Christian nations should be invited to join in a solemn remonstrance against such barbarous and inhuman depravity.

The sale of forty thousand Christian women and children, (after the massacre of their husbands and fathers,) in open market, in the presence of Christian Europe, and without one word of remonstrance from the surrounding nations, is a circumstance discreditable to the age in which we live. If older and nearer nations are silent on such a subject, there is the greater reason and the more honor in giving utterance to the feelings which are excited on this side the Atlantic, and of endeavoring to obtain the interference and combining the sentiment of all civilized nations to put an end to such horrible scenes.

The just indignation of the world has recently been manifested by a simultaneous effort to humble and restrain the Barbary powers. Every year has witnessed some new exertion among Christian nations to abolish the horrible traffic in African slaves; an amelioration of the ancient laws of war with regard to private property has recently been propounded as a subject worthy the consideration of the nations; and yet no remonstrance has been made in behalf of Christian brotherhood and suffering humanity.

Your memorialists do therefore most earnestly commend to the constitutional representatives of the American people an attentive consideration of the foregoing interesting and important subjects.

All which is most respectfully submitted, &c.

SPOLIATIONS BY A SPANISH PRIVATEER.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 12, 1824.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of Henry Cotheal, David Cotheal, and Abraham S. Hallet, reported:

That it appears by the documents accompanying the petition that the schooner Mosquito, Captain Teft, loaded with a cargo the property of the petitioners, citizens of the United States, was captured on a voyage from St. Andrew's to New York by the Spanish privateer Fortuna, Captain Antonio Peyro, of Porto Rico. The schooner was carried first into Aquadilla, a port of the island of Porto Rico, where a portion of the cargo was plundered by the prize crew, and from thence, with the residue of the cargo, she was carried to St. John's, in the same island, and there condemned as lawful prize to the captors. From this decision an appeal to the superior tribunal of the island of Cuba has been made.

The conduct of the captain and crew of the privateer seems to have been both wanton and fraudulent. The captain of the schooner was grossly ill-treated; compelled by threats to sign a declaration written on board the privateer in the Spanish language, of which he is ignorant, and without receiving such an explanation of its contents as enabled him to understand it. After his signature was fixed to this paper, of the contents of which he is still ignorant, the first occasion that offered was taken to separate him from the property under his care. He was put on board a vessel bound to Curaçoa.

The mate, who, in the captain's absence, was the guardian of the rights of the owners of the vessel and cargo, was detained on board the schooner from the 17th of August, the day she reached St. John's, until the 23d of the same month, and not permitted during that time to have communication with the shore.

The grounds upon which the vessel and cargo were condemned the committee cannot state accurately to the House, copies of the documents in the cause not having been furnished by the petitioners, as they allege, because copies could not be procured from the Spanish authorities in Porto Rico; but as far as they are informed there was no justifiable cause of condemnation. The condemnation is stated to have been founded upon two circumstances—that the schooner had no clearance from St. Andrew's, and had a gun on board not mentioned in her papers. The first was inevitable, as there is said to be no custom-house at St. Andrew's, and the second, admitting the fact, which is denied by the owners, was susceptible of satisfactory explanation: the gun was carried as a defence against the pirates infesting the seas she was navigating. As the expectation that the superior tribunal of Cuba will speedily do justice to the owners of the vessel and cargo may be rationally indulged, the committee are of opinion that it is not expedient to act further on the subject. They propose, therefore, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Henry Cotheal, David Cotheal, and Abraham S. Hallett, and that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition and the documents presented with it.

EUROPEAN SYMPATHY FOR SPAIN IN THE SUBJUGATION OF HER AMERICAN COLONIES

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 12, 1824.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of December 24, requesting the President of the United States to lay before the House such information as he may possess, and which may be disclosed without injury to the public good, relative to the determination of any sovereign, or combination of sovereigns, to assist Spain in the subjugation of her late colonies on the American continent, and whether any Government of Europe is disposed or determined to oppose any aid or assistance which such sovereign or combination of sovereigns may afford to Spain for the subjugation of her late colonies above mentioned, I have to state that I possess no information on that subject not known to Congress which can be disclosed without injury to the public good.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Forsyth, marked private, to Mr. Adams, dated Madrid, August 22, 1819.

"The duplicates of my despatches by the Hornet not having been forwarded before this, I deem it unnecessary to send you the extract of that part of my private journal, a copy of which was transmitted with my former letters. To the information contained in my official letter of this day's date I have little to add of much importance. The most interesting fact I am able to communicate is, that the affair of the grants is not the sole or the principal difficulty with this Government. After receiving Mr. Salmon's note of the 10th instant, and ascertaining from Duke Laval, that this Government expected me to insist on the King's agreeing to receive Mr. Onis' declaration, or to make one of his own, I gave information to the duke, with the expectation and belief that he would communicate to the Government and to the parties interested that this was a mistake. I had no instructions to insist upon either. We expected the King might offer it; but, if he did not, the treaty was already ratified by the United States, and the act could not be recalled. To produce a good effect, I said, also, that the mistake about the grants must be corrected, if the business should be (what was altogether improbable) settled amicably in the United States. The only hope of the grantees was, to have the exchange of ratifications made here. Relying upon the correctness of the information received here, of the date of Punon Rostro's and Alagon's grant, and the opinion that the cedula was the first valid act of the concession, and, of course, the date of the grant must be the date of the cedula, I intimated to Mr. Salmon that the difficulty in regard to the donations could be obviated here. His reply was, that there were other points upon which the King wished explanations. What these are, I have collected from other sources. The first and great object in view is to procure an assurance that we will not recognize Buenos Ayres, &c. The extreme pertinacity and anxiety on this subject has its origin in the disclosure made by Great Britain of the conversations between Mr. Rush and Lord Castlereagh, on the contemplated reception of a consul general, to reside officially in the United States, from the provinces of La Plata. This disclosure has done us no good. Sir Henry Wellesley, to whom, on his stating that he was endeavoring to promote our objects here, I remarked that I considered much of the difficulty of our affair was imputable to this cause, gave a very plausible answer; of its truth I am skeptical. He said the object was to show to Spain the absolute necessity of a settlement of our differences with her. Whatever was the motive, the effect has not been happy. The instructions to Onis were given before this disclosure was made; it was not useful in producing those instructions; and it is equally clear, from the conduct of Spain, that it has not had the effect of inducing her to ratify what her minister, under these instructions, promised in her name. Sir Henry Wellesley has at all times held very reasonable language, and friendly, in relation to this affair; and since the above conversation, he has certainly taken some pains to promote our wishes. He tells me that he sent a message, by a confidential agent, to the Duke of Infantado, who had urged the argument, that Great Britain ought not to be irritated by the cession of Florida to us; that he was entirely mistaken in supposing Great Britain adverse to the ratification of the convention, and that he had directions from the British ministry to press the ratification. He told Salmon that Spain would hazard much by refusing it, and that the object she had in view could be better accomplished by ratifying immediately. After the determination of this Government was known—and it was known immediately—he conversed with me, and wished me to believe that it was all imputable to the dispute about the grants. I said this could not be, as the Government must know that the King, having it in his power to accept or reject Onis' declaration, could throw upon us the burden refusing the exchange of ratifications. He then asked if the affair of the grants could be got over here. For the reasons stated in the first part of this letter for my disclosures to Laval and Salmon, and believing myself justified by my instructions, after the receipt of the letter of the 10th of August, I replied I was confident they could be. He proposed to me to permit him to engage Tatischeff, the Russian minister, whose influence and means of communicating with the Government are said to be superior to all the rest of the corps diplomatique, to have this suggestion communicated to the King. To this I consented; but as I thought it would be better, if Tatischeff did anything, to procure his good offices by an immediate application, I apprised him of this conversation. He was very friendly in his expressions, personally believed the ratification necessary and proper for Spain, and, certainly, the policy of Europe required it to be done. Sir Henry and Tatischeff had a similar conversation, and the suggestion was made. The next time I saw the Russian minister he said, if you can give assurances that there will be no recognition of the South American Governments the treaty will be ratified. I replied, if that is the case there will be no ratification. I had previously furnished Duke Laval with a memorandum on this topic, which, after keeping twenty-four hours, and, I have no doubt, showing it to Lozano Torres, who is supreme here, he returned it to me. The substance of it was, that the system of the Government was an impartial neutrality; it had been adhered to when we had, in our differences with Spain, the most powerful inducements to abandon it; that when these differences were settled there could be no inducement to change it. If Spain desired us to remain stationary in the dispute with her colonies, the first step to secure her object was to ratify our treaty, then to consult our wishes, and so to shape her policy as to inspire a sentiment of good will, powerful enough to counteract the prepossessions naturally entertained for the people of South America by the people of the United States. This was the rational mode and, in fact, the only mode of reaching her point. To refuse our treaty, and ask, as a condition of it, that we would not recognize, was the certain way to disappoint their wishes. The Government would not consider such a proposition. This memorandum I showed to Tatischeff. He said what it contained was true and just, but there was no reasoning with ignorance and presumption. I did not hold any of these conversations until after the note of the 10th was received; and I was careful to express the desire that these gentlemen should do what was done, not with a view to our interest, but to prevent Spain from injuring herself and endangering what is termed the pacific policy of Europe.

"On the whole, I am impressed with a belief that they will propose to exchange ratifications in Washington, with the insertion of a promise not to recognize the patriot Governments and to preserve the grants. The latter will be as a dernier resort, given up as the price of the first. Without this, or something equivalent, we may do ourselves justice; they will not."

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Forsyth, marked private, to Mr. Adams, dated January 28, 1820.

"General Vives left this place on the 25th for Paris, on his way to Washington. He went post to France, and I am informed is directed to remain as short a time as possible in Paris. He goes to England to embark for the United States. The alteration in his mode of travelling, and the directions he has received not to delay, give me some hope that he will arrive in America time enough to prevent the necessity of doing that without the consent of Spain which the American Government prefers to do with her consent."

"I send this by the way of Gibraltar, that the earliest notice may be had of General V.'s movements. In the course of the coming week I shall write officially, and inclose a copy of my answer to the Duke of S. Fernando's last note, written to inform me of General Vives's appointment."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Forsyth, (No. 12,) Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States in Spain, to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, dated Madrid, February 15, 1820.

"By the return of Lieutenant Weaver, who came to this place yesterday with a letter from Captain Stewart, I have a convenient opportunity of sending, inclosed, a copy of my last note to the Duke of San Fernando, No. 1, dated the day after General Vives left Madrid. It was written in conformity to what I believe, from the message at the opening of Congress, to be the wishes of the President. If in this I should unhappily be mistaken, the affair stands in such a state that I can at any moment correct the error. Having informed this Government that I only detain the remonstrance, I can at any moment present it, if directed so to do, or if I shall be satisfied that the King has not given such authority to General Vives as will render unnecessary a recurrence to this disgraceful business."

Mr. Forsyth to the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga, First Minister of State, January 27, 1820.

MADRID, January 27, 1820.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your excellency's officio of the 16th December, giving me notice of the appointment of the Marrisal de Campo Don Francisco Dionisio Vives as Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States. According to the request of your excellency I communicated, by the first convenient opportunity that occurred, a copy of your note to the American Government.

The appointment of the Minister Plenipotentiary has been so long delayed, his departure so much procrastinated, his route to the United States is so circuitous, and his movements are so deliberate, that I very much apprehend he will find on his arrival the determination before now taken by the American Government executed. His Catholic Majesty may be assured by your excellency that should this be the case the American Government will, nevertheless, governed by that temper of conciliation which has at all times marked its policy, give any explanations which may, in the spirit of amity, be asked in the name of the King.

Your excellency views it as superfluous to continue discussions here of the points of the transaction with which his Majesty's minister goes charged, and as likely to embarrass the course of the direct negotiation. As to the future, I have to inform your excellency that I have no directions to discuss any of those points; and certainly I have received here very slender encouragement voluntarily to encounter them. My duty in regard to the convention was terminated when I had the honor to send you the remonstrance of the 13th of October, which has given rise to an unpleasant question between us. From circumstances well known to your excellency, I understand that the observations quoted have reference, also, to that question. With this understanding, I give you the strongest proof in my power of my anxious desire to promote harmony between the two nations by taking upon myself the responsibility of having so long withheld the return of the remonstrance, and in determining still longer to retain it in my hands. I do this with the confident expectation that the justice of his Catholic Majesty has, in the powers given to General Vives, rendered a further recurrence to that unhappy affair altogether unnecessary. While I give to your excellency this proof of my wishes to conciliate, I must repeat that I hold it as unquestionably my right to have that paper, or any other I may deem it necessary to send, laid before your excellency's royal master for his perusal and consideration; holding myself responsible to my own Government only for the language in which it may be expressed or the sentiments it may contain.

I renew to your excellency the assurances of my profound consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

His Excellency the DUKE OF SAN FERNANDO AND QUIROGA, First Minister of State, &c.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Adams, (No. 15,) March 30, 1820.

"Soon after the change of Government was officially made known to me, I determined to see the Duke of San Fernando respecting our affairs, to learn if the powers given to Vives were such that no bad effect would be produced by the recent events upon the relations of Spain with the United States, and to endeavor to procure, in this season of generous feelings, the release of the Americans in confinement. Waiting a few days for the first bustle to be over, the Duke was removed from office and a further delay unexpectedly occurred. As the new Secretary was not expected for some time, on the 27th I asked by written note for an interview with Mr. Jabat, who had charge of the office. It was appointed for the 29th. I saw him at the time fixed, and had a very long conversation with him. I stated the objects I had in view. He answered with great frankness. The substance of what I learned from him is, that General Vives did not carry the treaty ratified by the United States; that the King, having taken the oath to observe the Constitution, could not now ratify; that instructions had been just prepared for General Vives to apprise him of the change that had taken place, and of the want of power in the King to act further in the business; the whole matter would be laid before the Cortes, and the minister had no doubt it would be arranged to the mutual satisfaction of the two Governments, as the Cortes would probably be composed of the most liberal and enlightened men of the nation; men who had the disposition, the ability, and the courage to give and to act upon good counsel. He spoke of the resemblance of the institutions of the two nations and of his anxious wish to see them on the best terms. Of the American prisoners he professed a desire to do what would be agreeable to us, and would bring the subject before the King. For this object, it was agreed upon between us that I should address him an official note. A copy of it, marked No. 6, is inclosed. It was prepared immediately after the interview and sent on the 30th. Mr. Jabat asked me, in turn, what would be the determination of our Government in this new state of things? I replied, that I was exceedingly disappointed to learn that General Vives had not the ratified treaty to exchange in the United States; that I apprehended his going without it would produce a very bad effect, and that I had no doubt there would be an immediate occupation of Florida, as recommended by the President to Congress; that we had always the strongest desire to be friendly with Spain, a desire which recent circumstances would increase. I was perfectly aware that the King had now no power to ratify, and trusted, with him, that everything would be arranged satisfactorily when the Cortes assembled. In the meantime I hoped that no unpropitious effect on the dispositions of this Government would be produced by the measures we should have been reluctantly compelled to take. I expressed the greatest satisfaction at the prospect of a favorable answer to the application in favor of the confined Americans, and assured him it would be considered as a conclusive proof on the part of Spain of a desire to do us justice and kindness in all things. The revolution will produce the best effects for us, if a judgment is to be formed from the language of the people in office and of those out of office. The Government of the United States is considered, with reason, more friendly to them than any other. The European Governments, without exception, see in the change which has been produced here a dangerous example to their people, and speculate with dread upon its probable effect. I had supposed that the influence of Great Britain would be very great under the new order of things. At present there is a very wholesome jealousy and prejudice against that Government existing among the people, and carefully cherished by the ruling men. It is to be traced, in part, to the conduct of the English on the return of the King from his captivity. They were supposed to have had some agency in preventing, at that time, the King's acceptance of the Constitution. The language used here is, there are but two free nations—the Spaniards and the people of the United States. The English were free, but have been recently enslaved by their ministry and Parliament. I hope that, before General Vives receives and communicates to the President the change in the Government, Florida will be occupied by us, or, at least, that Congress will have passed a law in such terms as to render it obligatory upon the President to take it. Delaying to take it until the news is received of the establishment of a free Government and liberal institutions here might be injurious. At present everybody here expects it will be seized, and the event will have no bad effect, unless it can, by misrepresentation, be made to appear the consequence of the recent events in Spain. It is important that Florida should be in our possession when the Cortes deliberate on the treaty. The defect of granted authority in that body to cede territory was not adverted to by Mr. Jabat, and has probably escaped notice. The general assertion that the sovereignty resides essentially in the nation, which is represented by the Cortes, would no doubt be considered sufficient when the territory was held by us; it might admit of dispute if it was not. You will perceive that two deputies from Cuba and the Floridas are to be in the Cortes. Before July I hope to receive from you particular and special instructions on this and all other subjects connected with our interests. During the Cortes would be the most favorable time for a commercial arrangement, if one is to be made here, and I indulge the belief that should, as is probable, the business of Florida be amicably arranged, an advantageous commercial treaty may be formed. I look with anxiety for directions from you, formed upon the determination Congress may have made."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Thomas L. L. Brent, acting as Chargé d'Affaires at Madrid, containing the substance of a conversation between him and Mr. Jabat, April 27, 1820, to Mr. Adams.

"He (Mr. Jabat) then adverted to the bill reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations to the House of Representatives, for the occupation of Florida, and asked me if I had received instructions to give any explanations on the subject. He intimated that if we did not extend our views further than its occupation every effort would be made to preserve amicable relations with the United States, every sacrifice consistent with a due self-respect; but that the United States ought not to expect Spain would go any further. Now that this had become a representative Government, they would be under the necessity of examining, with more scrupulous attention than ever, every act of theirs which could in any degree compromise the just pride and dignity of the nation. I told Mr. Jabat that I had no instructions on the subject. I only knew, I said, from the public papers, that such a bill was before Congress, and consequently did not feel authorized to give any explanations. That, as soon as I received, I would make them known to him. I begged him to tranquilize himself. I said I hoped that with such dispositions as were manifested by the new Government, and the corresponding sentiments of mine, that everything would finally be amicably arranged; and that matters might be so managed as that the steps which the United States may have thought it necessary to take for the assertion of their rights might be made reconcilable with the pride of his Government; steps which they will have been compelled to resort to, from the conduct of the former administration of his Government and the measures of the old system. It may be proper to notice that this minister was evidently under an apprehension that the United States might not limit themselves to the occupation of the territory of Florida alone. In the course of the conversation Mr. Jabat said that, as there would be opposition, blood might be spilt in the occupation of Florida; and the idea of it seemed to give him great pain. Mr. Jabat's manner during the whole of this interview was mild and friendly, and mine corresponded to his."

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Adams, (No. 18,) dated May 20, 1820.

"By the Gibraltar mail of the—instant I received the duplicate of your No. 11. You will herewith receive copies of Mr. Jabat's letter, giving notice of the birth and title of the son of the Infante Don Francisco de Paula, and my answer."

"On the 12th I paid the minister a visit at the office of state, and, as I expected, he inquired if I had any recent advices from America. I stated to him very frankly that I had received nothing but the permission from our Government to return to the United States, which, from a belief that it would be most agreeable to the President, I should not use until after the celebration of the Cortes. He professed to be much gratified by this determination, which he thought was calculated to promote that good understanding between our respective Governments, to secure which was the object of our mutual wishes. From this the conversation naturally turned to the unofficial notices from the United States, and particularly to the report of the committee on the affairs of Florida. He did not appear to apprehend that we should do more than occupy the territory; but he expressed a great deal of dread lest there should be blood shed in effecting that object and carrying into effect the act proposed by the committee. As I had been told, as stated in my No. 17, that some uneasiness was felt on the first point, I thought it prudent to show him that, with the dispositions now entertained in Spain, there was no reason to fear that we should be disposed to go beyond the limits of the treaty of February, 1819. He would recollect that the only motives we could have were to procure satisfaction for the injury sustained by the delay of Spain to ratify the treaty, and compensation for any deficiency in the fund for the payment of our citizens, occasioned by the mistake of Mr. Onis, about the date of the large grants. On the first, I was sure a reasonable explanation would be deemed sufficient; on the second, there could be no difficulty, as the abandonment of all pretension in favor of the grantees was more necessary to the character of Spain than it was important to the interests of the United States."

"I did not suppose there was much ground for the fears he seemed to entertain of a formidable resistance to the occupation of Florida; nevertheless, as he was seriously apprehensive, I suggested that the President would no doubt employ a force so powerful that resistance would be hopeless, and I presumed the good sense of the Spanish authorities would prevent them from making a useless sacrifice of the lives of the soldiers committed to their care. It was obvious, from the conversation of Mr. Jabat, that the seizure of the territory was anticipated, and that the only fear really entertained was that the mode of occupation would impose an obligation on the present rulers to make a noise about it. The interview terminated by a renewal of the assurances formerly given of the desire of the Government to establish a permanent friendship with us, and with the hope, reciprocally expressed, that nothing might occur to render it difficult. On the 15th I received a note from Mr. Jabat (copy inclosed) inviting me to see him the next day at eleven. I saw him at the hour appointed, and his first question was, Have you anything from Washington? To my reply in the negative, he said, then I shall have the pleasure of giving you very recent advices from that place. He showed me a despatch from Mr. Serna, of the 28th of March, inclosing copies of the President's message to the House of Representatives of the 27th, and of the documents accompanying it. Mr. Jabat was highly gratified; said nothing could have occurred more favorable to the future amity of the two nations; that he had shown these papers to the King, who was pleased both with the measure proposed and the reasons offered for it by the President. Mr. Jabat did not omit to suggest, what I knew perfectly well, that the accomplishment of the expectations of the President would have to be imputed to the recent revolution in Spain. He explained to me what I did not understand in our previous conversation—the foundation of his fears of a formidable resistance in Florida. It seems the ports of the territory had been reinforced from Cuba, and the Governor-General of that island had given official notice of it to the Secretary of State. Joining with the Spanish secretary in his expressions of satisfaction, I suggested the hope that General Vives would not arrive until after the adjournment of Congress, as it was impossible to foresee what might be the effect produced by his arrival without competent power to meet the just expectations of the American Government. I did not fear any ill consequences if news of the revolution in Spain should reach Washington before a determination was taken. I was confident that, irritating as this want of authority might be, the President would be disposed to give to the King of the Spains proofs of the moderation and good will which had distinguished the conduct of the United States to the King of Spain. Taking the time at which Congress has usually adjourned as the criterion, I supposed that General Vives would scarcely see Washington before the adjournment of the legislative body. I have since learned from our newspapers that Congress would have continued its session until the beginning of this month, and that General Vives reached New York on the 5th of April. I now hope that Mr. Hackley, who carried my despatches of the 9th of March, and who left the Straits of Gibraltar about the 27th of March, will be in the United States within a short time after the arrival of the Spanish minister. In the present state of things nothing could be more auspicious than the proposed delay of acting against Florida, although the President will have perceived, from your first communications with General Vives, that but for recent events we should have given another proof of useless forbearance, if the utility of forbearance was to be estimated by the good effect it would have produced on the Government of Spain. Mr. Jabat proposed to me to see the King at the circle that day—a ceremony I have not thought it necessary to observe since the postponement of the ratification of the treaty; always, however, replying politely to the notes sent on particular occasions, and once calling at the palace when the King was ill, I had resolved to renew these visits of ceremony immediately after the liberation of the Americans, prisoners in Spain, and therefore the more readily acceded to this proposal. I attended the circle with the diplomatic body, and was received, as I had been taught to expect, perfectly well, and as if there had been no interruption in my visits to it.”

Extract of a letter from the same to the same, (No. 19,) dated July 13, 1820.

“A few days after the arrival of the Minister of State, Perez de Castro, I called at his office to see him on our affairs. I stated that the time for the meeting of the Cortes was near at hand, and I was desirous to know what was proposed by this Government to be done. He declared himself to be unable to converse on the subject of the negotiation with the United States. He was not master of the correspondence, and that his numerous and pressing engagements had rendered it impossible for him as yet to become so. He was examining and hoped to speak advisedly on it in a short time. I gave him a translation of the remonstrance of the 18th of October, to apprise him of the state of the dispute in relation to the 8th article of the treaty, not officially, but as a document for his own examination, telling him that I did not conceive it necessary, from the disposition manifested since the revolution, to make an official representation on this subject. He received it very willingly. He had seen, as he stated, in the foreign newspapers that it was asserted by the American Government that the treaty was obligatory upon Spain, although not ratified; this position he could not consider as founded either in the opinion of the best authorities or in the usages of nations. I explained to him that we considered the treaty obligatory in justice and in honor as if ratified by Spain. As no satisfactory reason had been or, as we believed, could be given for the refusal to ratify, there could be no question as to our right to resort to any measure we deemed proper to obtain satisfaction. The least we could do was to execute the treaty; and when we gave to Spain all the advantages she could derive from it, we should take from her all just cause even to complain of the course pursued. He spoke a good deal at large of the charge of bad faith which was urged against Spain, and said she had no motive of avarice or ambition to gratify in her negotiation with us; and if her policy required her to procrastinate, this was no reason to charge her with ill faith. To all this I answered that the systematic procrastination, although at all times vexatious, had never been urged as a proof of bad faith; it was the non-compliance with engagements actually made by persons duly authorized and empowered by this Government. That, if the avarice or ambition of the Government was not known in the negotiation, that of individuals who had possessed influence in Spain was but too visible. I saw him again after ten days. He had run over the whole correspondence; talked of the treaty of 1802; the proposals of Mr. Pinckney; the guaranty of the Spanish American dominions, as an inducement to cede Florida; in short, of all that had passed prior to the convention of 1819; of the losses Spain had sustained, and of our gains. I listened patiently to all he had to advance; when he had finished, I replied that we had gained nothing from Spain; if her arrangement with another power was matter of regret, it was not our fault. What we had obtained was purchased and paid for. That I had no instructions from the President since August, 1819, and therefore could not speak certainly of what might be the wish of my Government; but that it appeared to me it would be better for Spain at the present juncture not to look beyond the treaty of 1819, but to consider what obligations were imposed upon her by it, and by her as yet unexplained refusal to ratify it. He did not seem unwilling to adopt this idea, and entered into a short examination of the conduct of the United States in the dispute between the colonies and Spain; the expeditions fitted out by Miranda, Mina, &c., &c.; of the patriot privateers, &c., &c. I replied that we had done all Spain had a right to expect from us; that, determining to be neutral between the contending parties, we had taken every means necessary to preserve that neutrality. If the law of the United States had been sometimes violated with impunity, it was what occurred, and would occur in all nations, by the escape of persons who had committed offences. That all reclamations founded upon them by causes of complaint were removed by the convention, &c. Previous to this conversation I had seen in the English newspapers the President's message to Congress, of the 9th of April, headed by a sort of abstract of your correspondence with General Vives, in which it was stated that this Government had not asked explanations of me relative to the treaty, because of my intemperate conduct. I remarked to the minister that this was not the fact. Explanations were not asked of me, because, anticipating what would be required, I had given the ministry to understand that, upon the subject of the dispute with the colonies I had no explanations to give, and that it was informally made known to me, before the 22d of August, that I could have the convention if I was authorized to promise that the Government of the United States would not recognize the independence of any of the patriot Governments. He said he had read the note I had given him, and those previously written, and that there were expressions stronger than he had ever met with in diplomatic correspondence, but he supposed they were written when I was a little warm. I questioned whether he had ever met with a similar case in the history of diplomacy, and that I was not a little warm, but indignant, at seeing the character of a great nation, and its peace, and that of my own country, put in jeopardy for the sake of and by the intrigues of selfish individuals. As the minister had not seen the message, I promised to procure and send it to him. He was not prepared to say what course would be recommended to the Cortes, upon whom everything depended. I pressed upon him the necessity of doing what was done promptly. He was satisfied of the importance of doing so, and promised to let me know the determination of the ministry as soon as it was made. At parting, he referred to the assistance received from Spain during our revolutionary war, which he said we ought not to forget. The reply was, we never forget when you permit us to remember it. I met the Secretary of State at dinner on the same day, at the English ambassador's. He told me he had received that morning from General Vives despatches, the President's message, and the correspondence sent with it to Congress. He had not yet had time to read them attentively, but appeared to be pleased with what he had seen in glancing over the papers. On the 4th of July, Mr. de Castro dined at my house, and brought with him a copy of the message and correspondence, which he left with me, to be returned, as he had but the one copy. On the 6th, the Cortes was installed; Espiga chosen President, a priest, but one of the most liberal; and Quiroga Vice President. I was in the tribune prepared for the diplomatic corps during the votation, and went from it to the office of Mr. de Castro to restore to him the documents he had loaned me. He was just going to the King, and had but a few moments to converse with me. In these few he said he thought that the President did not look beyond the ratification of the convention, the grants being set aside, and there could be no difficulty about them. It was his opinion that this should be done. I do not say, he continued, it will be done; that depends on another body; but it is my opinion that it will be. What say you, he asked; will this be satisfactory? I reminded him that I had no instructions; hoped to receive them. I could give him only an opinion in turn. Judging from the correspondence and message, I saw no sufficient reason to change the opinion already given to Mr. Jabat, that the ratification of the treaty, accompanied by satisfaction for the injury caused by the delay, would be accepted by the United States. I was present at the session of the Cortes on the 9th. The oath required by the Constitution was taken by the King, in due form, and an address made to him by the President. The King said a few words in reply, and then read his speech. Copies furnished by the Department of State are inclosed, as also copies of the answer of the Cortes prepared by a select committee appointed for that purpose. The answer to that part of the King's speech which refers to the dispute with the United States is marked by the introduction of a very emphatic word. The King says 'although the complication of various circumstances has not permitted as yet the adjustment of those differences (with the United States and Portugal) I hope that the justice and moderation of the principles which direct our diplomatic operations will produce a result decorous to the nation and agreeable to the pacific system, &c., of Europe.' The answer is, the 'Cortes only regret that there exists differences with the United States and his most faithful Majesty, but the principles of moderation that will direct now our diplomatic negotiations give hope to the Cortes that they will conclude in terms which, being a termination decorous to the nation, may not interrupt the pacific system, &c., of Europe.'

"On the 11th the Minister of State read his report to the Cortes and gave them an account of the state of the dispute with the United States. I was not present; a very imperfect account of it is published in the newspapers. I hope to procure it to send with this despatch; as also a very interesting report of the minister for the Government of the Peninsula, Augustin Arguelles."

"On the 22d I wrote to Mr. de Castro, to say to him that the President would accept the treaty of 1819, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate, if immediately ratified by Spain. Had the Secretary of State been in Madrid, after what has occurred in our conversations, I should only have stated to him verbally what I had been instructed to say; but as the time of his stay at Sacedon was uncertain, I thought it better to write than to ask an interview at that place, as the latter might be imputed to an anxiety on the subject I was instructed not to discover. His answer is of the 25th, and is perfectly satisfactory. He has the commands of the King 'to bring the business of the negotiation immediately before the Cortes, and is using all exertions to do so.' Mr. Jabat called on me the 27th to say that, in consequence of this correspondence, the King would shorten his stay at Sacedon, would come to Madrid on the 10th of August, and that the negotiation would be by the 12th before the Cortes. There is therefore every reason to hope that all will be finished by the 20th. As so little time is to elapse before I shall have it in my power to say what has been done, I write hastily, intending, immediately after the determination of the Cortes, to forward copies of the correspondence and a more formal statement of what has occurred and may occur."

"My hopes of seeing the business of the Florida treaty definitively arranged by the 20th of this month have been disappointed. The King did not come from Sacedon until the 12th. I was taught to expect an immediate movement in our affairs, but it was not made. Early last week I had an accidental interview with one of the ministers, Mr. Jabat, who told me the necessary papers were prepared and would be before the Cortes during the week. Yesterday morning, as nothing had been done, I called at the office of Mr. de Castro to know what was the motive for delaying to present the subject to the Cortes. Mr. de Castro imputed it entirely to the press of important matters at home. He had just sent to ask the Cortes to designate the day and hour when he could lay before them, in the name of the King, the business of the treaty for the cession of Florida. Before I left the office the Secretary of State was informed that the Cortes would receive him immediately. At one o'clock yesterday the Cortes had a secret session, and no doubt the proper communication was made. I still refrain, therefore, from sending you copies of the previous correspondence with this Government, believing that within a few days I shall be able to give you the result of the deliberations of the National Cortes.

"With the expectation of giving you in a very short time the final resolution of this Government on the affairs of the treaty, I am, dear sir, respectfully, your most obedient servant."

Extract of a letter from the same to the same, (No. 20,) September 21, 1820.

"In a postscript, dated July 20, to my despatch of No. 19, I had the honor to acknowledge your No. 12 of the 25th of May. On the 21st I wrote to Mr. de Castro, who was at Sacedon with the King, a note, (copy marked No. 1.) His answer, (copy marked No. 2,) dated the 25th, was received on the 26th of July. On the 27th I had a visit from Mr. Jabat, who called by the desire of Mr. de Castro. Mr. Jabat informed me that the King would shorten his stay at Sacedon; would be in Madrid on the 10th of August; that all the documents relating to the treaty of cession and the late correspondence would be presented by the 12th to the Cortes, and he hoped all would be despatched before the 20th. For the reasons explained in my private letter of the 27th of August, the necessary communication was not made to the Cortes until the 26th. The subject was referred to the Political Commission, who have not yet given to the Cortes the result of their examination of it. Mr. de Castro has uniformly assured me of his anxiety to have an immediate decision. He solicited a speedy decision when he presented the papers to the Cortes. Although I look daily for further information of the movements of that body, I am without the means to know certainly when they will be made."

MADRID, July 21, 1820.

SIR: In the several conversations I have had with your excellency on the relations of our respective Governments, arising from the convention of 1819, I have expressed my conviction that, notwithstanding what has occurred, a prompt ratification of that instrument by Spain, accompanied by satisfaction for the injuries sustained by the United States, in consequence of its being heretofore withheld, would be accepted by my Government. I have now the instructions of the President, and am authorized to assure you that the immediate ratification by Spain of the convention of February, 1819, will be accepted by the President, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

Relying implicitly upon the assurances received, of the desire of this Government to terminate at once, and in the most amicable manner, the dispute with the United States, I with pleasure avoid the unpleasant task of remarking upon the disagreeable occurrences connected with this subject, since my residence near the person of his Catholic Majesty, or upon the surprise and disappointment felt in the United States, on the discovery of the object of the mission of General Vives, and the limited power granted to him. Your excellency is already apprised that the Government of my country has been induced to delay acting decisively against Spain, by the extraordinary change in the Constitution of this monarchy; a revolution without example in the history of the world, the admiration of the present, as it will be of every future age. The expectation that all differences between Spain and the United States would be speedily and satisfactorily adjusted as soon as this Government was completely organized on the principles of the change which had taken place was the cause of this delay. The moment has arrived which will see this expectation realized or disappointed. His Catholic Majesty now sees in his capital the representatives of the people. The Cortes are in the full and tranquil exercise of the high and important duties confided to them by the Constitution of the Spanish monarchy. I refrain from indulging the free expression of my congratulation to the King and to the nation at the interesting events of which I have been the witness. Were I to use the only language I am accustomed to use, that which truly expresses my sentiments, my motives might be misunderstood, or I should be accused of substituting the effusions of enthusiasm for the offerings of diplomatic respect. I content myself, therefore, with the simple expression of my satisfaction at the situation in which this Government finds itself, as it affords the opportunity of bringing to its close the long protracted negotiation with my own country. The attention of the Cortes has been already called to this subject, and they have been informed by his Majesty that their intervention will be, under the present system, necessary to its final settlement. This intervention cannot be too prompt, considering either the effect to be produced on the future relations between the two countries, or the time which has elapsed, not only since the signature of the convention, but since the expiration of the period at which the ratifications of it were by express stipulation to have been exchanged. The only questions presented for decision are of a character that demand but little consideration. The principles which must regulate this decision are so well known as scarcely to admit a difference of opinion respecting them.

What are the obligations imposed upon Spain by the signature of the treaty and the subsequent failure to ratify it? The obligation to ratify is the inevitable result of the formation of a treaty, and can only be avoided by showing what in this case has never been asserted, that the negotiator who signed it stipulated in the name of his Government what he was not authorized to stipulate. Upon the principles universally recognized by the law of nations, it is beyond dispute that the faith of the nation, once pledged by its monarch having competent power, no change in the internal Government can release it.

The promise of the King once given to a foreign Government, no subsequent engagement with his own subjects or with other nations can impair its strength. If these principles are true, the obligations consequent upon the failure to ratify are unquestionable. The first of these is the prompt ratification of the instrument; the second, an explanation of the causes justifying the postponement to this time of the ratification, or an atonement for the injuries resulting from it. In urging an immediate decision, I am specially instructed to add, that it is not the intention of the President to avail himself of the incidents of this negotiation, and of the principles of the laws of nations applicable to them, to fasten a hard and unequal bargain upon Spain. He has always considered and still views the treaty as highly advantageous to Spain, and would not now desire its ratification if, in the just and reasonable estimation of Spain herself, it could be viewed in any other light.

The causes which have heretofore delayed this ratification here present themselves for examination; but for the reason already indicated, and from a desire to avoid all unpleasant and useless recollections, I shall not dwell upon them; it is enough that, however satisfactory they may have been made to appear to his Catholic Majesty, they do not justify, in the eyes of the United States, the course that has been pursued. But even these causes, so far as the judgment of his Majesty's minister in the United States can be relied upon, no longer present obstacles to the immediate and final decision of this affair. But, while the Government of the United States is far from considering the delay which has taken place as justifiable, I am not instructed by the President to insist upon or even to ask satisfaction for the injuries occasioned by it. That this satisfaction has not been claimed by the United States is to be imputed not to any doubt of their right to demand, or of the obligation of Spain to afford it, but has sprung from the desire to manifest more clearly the principles of forbearance and moderation that have governed their march in this negotiation.

That it is not asked now arises from sentiments towards the Spanish nation no one more truly than your excellency can understand and appreciate.

What follows will, I trust, be found to be altogether unnecessary; nevertheless, it is incumbent upon me to say to your excellency that if the determination of Spain to ratify the convention of February, 1819, is not immediate, the claim to further satisfaction will be no longer waived; that upon any future adjustment the United States will insist upon an indemnity; that an additional provision will be indispensable for the existing claims of their citizens upon the Spanish Government; and that the right of the United States to the western boundary of the Rio del Norte will be re-asserted and never again relinquished.

I renew to your excellency, whom may God preserve, the assurances of my perfect respect.

JOHN FORSYTH.

His Excellency DON EVARISTO PEREZ DE CASTRO,
Secretary of the Despatch of State, &c., &c.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Adams, marked private, September 21, 1820.

“Apprehensive that the decision of the Cortes on the business of Florida will not be made in time to enable me to give you notice of it before the meeting of Congress, I have thought it prudent to forward to you my despatch of this day's date. You will see the grounds I had for believing that a speedy decision would be made, and that the decision would be what was desired by the President. Although the delay is apparently without motive, I have no reason to doubt that the decision, when made, will be what we have a right to expect. I saw Martinez de la Rosa, appointed to the political commission in place of Count Toreno, who was elected President of the Cortes, three days since. He told me the Secretary of State had pressed them to make an early determination, and that the report of the commission would be soon prepared. He acknowledged at the same time that he did not know the state of the business. Mr. de Castro, on Tuesday, expressed the greatest anxiety to have the affair arranged before the meeting of Congress; had directed General Vives to give you every assurance of the wish of the Government to satisfy us. It is true that the change in the head of the political commission accounts for a portion of this delay, and that the Cortes have been occupied by the consideration of questions apparently more pressing, as they related to the affairs of the Peninsula and were connected with the public tranquillity; still, however, there has been ample time for the adjustment of this business.

“Mr. Onis has published a memoir on the negotiation between the United States and Spain, with a statistical notice of our country; a work that does little credit to his penetration or candor. He accuses us of ambition and avarice, and yet endeavors to show that the treaty of cession of Florida ought to be considered as a treaty of exchange of Florida for Texas—a country more extensive, fertile, and valuable. I send you an extract from that part of the work which relates to the correspondence on the subject of the grants after the treaty was signed. In another part of the work he imputes the refusal to ratify prior to August, 1819, to a belief that England would make use of the cession of Florida to us as a pretext to seize the island of Cuba, and to a belief that we would occupy the territory by force, and by this means secure the donations to Alagon, Punon-Rostro, and Vargas.”

Don Evaristo Perez de Castro to Mr. Forsyth.

[Translation.]

SIR: I have lost no time in laying before the King, my august master, the contents of your excellency's note of the 22d instant. His Majesty has received with the greatest interest and satisfaction the information contained in the communication which you were pleased to make to me concerning the instructions which you had received from your Government, and which are conformable to what has been communicated by the minister of Spain at Washington. You may be firmly persuaded that the desires of this cabinet to see a prompt termination of the business left pending by the non-ratification of the treaty of February, 1819, on the part of the King, are as lively and sincere as its will is decided; and it is full of hope that the decision of this subject will be satisfactory for both States, and apt to be found upon unalterable bases, the friendship which his Majesty is desirous of preserving with the United States.

It being indispensable to hear the Cortes of the Kingdom before the King, my master, can take the final step which the President desires, and with which his Majesty flatters himself to see the present dispute happily terminated, he has been pleased to command me to put this business in a state of being presented to the National Congress so speedily as that it may experience no more delay than may be absolutely indispensable to accomplish it. I have received this order with singular pleasure, as being so agreeable to my personal sentiments; and overcoming, by dint of activity, every impediment which might oppose the desired ready despatch of this important subject through my recent entrance into this ministry and the imperious necessity of my informing myself of its former and present state. I have the honor to assure you that I hasten, and, if I may be allowed the expression, count the moments, to present myself before the Cortes with this business; it being by solicitude to give every activity to its resolution and not to delay an instant the desired conclusion of the whole. In the mean time his Majesty has seen with satisfaction the sentiments which animate the President of the United States, an estimable proof that he has confidence in those of the King, my august master, and in the punctuality and good faith of the nation happily regenerated by the new institutions, which cannot fail to designate in the acts of the Government that firm and loyal march of which the noble Spanish character and the wisdom of their representatives are the guarantees.

I avail myself of this occasion to reiterate to you the demonstrations of my great consideration; and I pray God to preserve you many years.

Your most obedient servant,

EVARISTO PEREZ DE CASTRO.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Adams, marked private, October 5, 1820.

DEAR SIR: Three days since the political commission made a report to the Cortes, and this day, in secret session, that body advised the King to cede the Floridas to the United States. They have also declared null and void the cessions of land to Alagon, &c., although the treaty of February, 1819, should not be ratified. I presume I shall receive from the Minister of State early information of the King's ratification of the treaty.

I am, dear sir, sincerely and respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

---

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Adams, (No. 21,) dated Madrid, October 11, 1820.

SIR: On the 5th I had the honor to inform you that the Cortes had authorized the King to cede the Floridas to the United States, according to the convention of February 22, 1819. On the 6th I received from Mr. de Castro an official notice of the determination of the Cortes, and a request to be informed of the wishes of the American Government in regard to the 8th article, as I supposed, with a view to have the ratification of the King in such terms as to prevent the necessity of anything but the mere delivery of the treaty at Washington, when the ratifications are to be exchanged. A copy of his note is inclosed, marked No. 1. I replied on the 7th; a copy of my answer is marked No. 2. This answer I carried with me to the palace, it being court day. In the Secretary of State's office I received a message from Mr. de Castro, who was confined to his bed at home, requesting me to visit him. I went immediately, and carried with me my answer to his note. As he reads English with difficulty, he opened, but did not read it. His object appeared to be to ascertain if I was authorized to make any stipulations about the 8th article of the treaty; or if there was a probability of obtaining any stipulations in Washington, favorable to Spanish claimants, for injuries suffered from the United States. He said the Cortes had given the King authority to execute the treaty and to set aside the grants of Alagon and Punon-Rostro; that of Vargas was out of the question, being subsequent to the 24th of January, 1818. He spoke of the cession of Vargas as a fund for the payment of American claims on Spain; said the treaty was clearly in favor of Alagon and Punon-Rostro. The 24th of January was not assumed as an arbitrary date, but fixed upon on principle, by Mr. Onis, who, in his letter to Mr. Adams of the 10th of March, stated, after acknowledging he believed them to be posterior to the 24th of January, that he would have insisted on their being admitted as valid had he known them to be anterior. Mr. de Castro had no desire to procure anything for such people as Alagon and Punon-Rostro, but thought it equitable that the United States should set apart a portion of this fund, increased by Spain's abandoning the literal import of the treaty, for the benefit of Spanish subjects. To all this I answered what was contained in my letter: I had no authority to make any stipulations. So far as regarded the Government of the United States, the question was considered as settled. I begged him not to think of asking anything at Washington; it could not be granted; might do injury; could not produce any good result. I reminded him that the offer made in October, 1819, to the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga, the admission of the American declaration against the grant, was a condition upon which alone the ratification of the treaty by Spain could be admitted; and also of the declaration of General Vives, that upon the subject of the grants he was satisfied with the explanations given to, and received from, Mr. Adams, at Washington; and that these donations were never insurmountable obstacles to the ratification of the treaty on the part of Spain. He replied that this admission was on the supposition that the other explanations would be satisfactory. Satisfaction not having been received on the last and most important, the others might again be brought into view. He talked of the guaranty offered by Mr. Pinckney; of there being no provision in the treaty for Spanish claimants, as there was in that of 1802, and how desirable it would be if something could be procured for them on the adjustment of this difficulty in the convention, an adjustment in which Spain gave up what was clearly secured to some of her subjects. I remarked to him that the offer made by the instructions of the President, in July last, was made on the admission of General Vives that there would be no demur respecting the grants. If these were brought again into question, my Government was not bound by the offer then made. He said it appeared somewhat unequitable and hard to insist upon the alteration or modification of the treaty without any equivalent. To this I answered, that all he had urged might have been plausible if urged before the 22d of August, 1819, but after the delays which had occurred and the incidents of the negotiation, we thought we exercised a degree of unexampled moderation, agreeing to take the ratification on the terms originally agreed upon and understood between the two negotiators. We had some conversation on the mode of ratification by the King, to obviate all difficulty at Washington. I stated to him that this, of course, was a matter in which we would do whatever was agreeable to the Spanish Government. The American declaration of the force of the 8th article might be received by Spain; a declaration might be made by the King, declaring the sense in which his Majesty understood it, or a joint declaration might be made. He proposed seeing me again on the following day, at twelve, in company with a confidential person, at the office, if he was able to go out, or in his room, if he was not; to which I consented. At parting, I pointed out to him in the published documents relating to the treaty, which I carried for the purpose, the declaration I was directed to present by my first instructions; the instructions relating to it; the subsequent instructions modified, which came to me by the Hornet; and my offer to the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga, made in conformity with them. He said he would examine the papers; sketch something to show me in our next interview; would despatch everything with the greatest possible expedition, and send off a messenger to Washington.

On the 8th I saw him again, at his house, at twelve. He had with him the elder Heredia. The conversation was a repetition of that of yesterday. The only new idea expressed was, that it was important to the new Government to gain credit by procuring some advantage in arranging the business of the treaty, and a suggestion that Mr. Onís would not have made the treaty in any terms but those in which the 8th article is expressed. To the first I replied that the new Government would deserve and receive all praise for saving the country from the consequences of the impolitic steps of the old, and preserve the honor of the nation by abandoning pretensions which injured its character. To the last, that this suggestion was altogether at variance with the declaration of Mr. Pizarro, with Mr. Onís' expressed willingness to give up the donations, and to the remark made to me by Mr. Casa Yrujo, "that he regretted that the grants had not been executed by name." Heredia urged, in the conversation, that the United States had in the treaty admitted it to be necessary to the King's honor that the grants prior to the 24th January, 1818, should be preserved. This conclusion I positively denied: In allowing Mr. Onís to shape the 8th article, we did not become parties to the correctness or propriety of his opinions; on the contrary, in our opinion, the honor of the King was concerned to make void all donations made subsequent to the date of his full power to his negotiator to cede the Floridas. The conversation concluded by a formal request from Mr. de Castro to know what my impressions were on this point, and whether they could calculate on my good offices with my Government to procure some advantage to Spain, in consideration of its desire to gratify us in this business, and of the similarity of the institutions of the two Governments. I gave him my thoughts without reserve, "that the ground which must be taken was altogether untenable; that it would injure, could not benefit the Spanish Government; that the United States would receive any intimation on this point with surprise and regret. As for myself, with the strongest desire to do everything to gratify this Government, I could not say anything to my own in favor of pretensions I believed to be altogether unreasonable." Mr. de Castro said that, in presenting the subject, it would be done in such a way as to prevent any bad effect; turning to Heredia, he remarked that it must be attempted at Washington. He concluded by saying that he should pass to me a note embodying what had been urged in our conversation, which he hoped I would answer in the shortest convenient time, as he was anxious to send off a messenger to the United States. This I promised, stating to him, at the same time, the necessity of despatching his messenger at the earliest hour possible, as Congress would be in session before he could possibly arrive.

On recollection, I find I have omitted a remark made by both Heredia and de Castro, that, according to my first instructions, as contained in the printed documents, I was authorized to exchange the ratifications without insisting upon the declaration of the import of the 8th article being received, that this exchange would have secured the claimants the large grants which they might have recovered in the courts of the United States. To this I answered that such were my instructions; but they were founded upon the belief that the notice given to the Spanish Government, through Mr. Onís, rendered the declaration unimportant. That, certainly, if the treaty had been ratified by Spain, the question of the grants would have become a judicial, in place of a political one. But supposing, what I could not admit, that the tribunals of the United States could have decided in favor of the claimants, this decision would have been the foundation of a demand on Spain for an equivalent, or satisfaction. This conversation endured two hours. In this, as well as in that of the 7th, I am unable to give anything but the substance, without regarding the order of what was said. My impressions are, that, after making all exertions to obtain some advantage, and failing, they will proceed on the business as they ought to have done without having made any exertion. What is most unpleasant is, to perceive that the opinions of Mr. Onís, as expressed in his book, have weight with this Government, and that what is done is rather a sacrifice to policy than founded on a conviction of the justice and equity of our demands, or on a proper sense of our moderation and forbearance.

Late at night, on the 9th, I received Mr. de Castro's letter of that day's date, the copy of which is marked No. 3, to which I replied on the day succeeding. The copy of the answer is marked No. 4. This reference to the affair of the grants is disagreeable, and will be altogether unexpected. After what has occurred, I cannot suppose the Spanish ministry can hope to succeed in procuring anything more at our hands. Perhaps the sole object is, to enhance the value of the ratification on their part. I am endeavoring to procure accurate information of all that occurred in the Cortes. My private letter of the 5th is almost a literal translation of a note from one of the deputies; and I have been since informed that the Cortes would not hear a petition from Punon Rostro in relation to his claim, considering the whole affair at an end by their previous decision on the treaty.

Shortly after the publication of Mr. Onís' book, I conceived that some of its statements were so injurious to us as to require examination, and proposed to publish a review of it, to be distributed among the members of the Cortes. The affair of the treaty came so soon under the consideration of that body, after I procured a copy of the book, that it was impossible to do more than to make a few hasty remarks upon it, and to have distributed five or six copies of a translation of them among the principal members. A copy of this translation is sent to you, marked No. 5. No. 6 is the copy of an original paper received from _____, an extract from which, in cypher, was forwarded to you some time ago.

The Cortes have resolved, according to the constitutional provision, to continue their session until November.

At night.—At five this afternoon I received Mr. de Castro's letter, of this day's date, which I answered immediately. The copies of the letter and answer are marked Nos. 7 and 8.

This last letter confirms the conjecture I have made, that the object is to enhance the value of what will be called the concession of Spain to the American construction of the 8th article of the treaty. I regret extremely that anything has been said by the ministers of this Government on this topic, as it will have the effect of weakening, in some degree, the confidence, not so much as the uprightness of their intentions, as in the frankness of their mode of proceeding. No doubt something will be said by General Vives on this point, or at least he will formally communicate the letter of Mr. de Castro of the 9th. I shall send triplicates of this communication, one by Bordeaux, one by Gibraltar, and one by the Spanish courier who carries the ratified treaty to the Spanish minister at Washington.

As soon as he is fairly out of Madrid, I shall think of using the permission of the President to return to the United States. Before I leave this, however, I shall have occasion to write to you again.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your humble servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

Mr. de Castro, Minister of Foreign Despatch, to Mr. Forsyth, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America at Madrid, (October 6, 1820.)

[Translation.]

SIR: I have the honor to acquaint your excellency that the Cortes of the nation, in secret session, have authorized his Majesty's Government to ratify the cession of the territory situated east of the Mississippi, which is known by the name of East and West Florida, to the United States, and that consequently there is no inconvenience in proceeding, on the part of the King, to the ratification of the treaty concluded at Washington on the 22d day of February, 1819.

His Majesty would have immediately proceeded to command the ratification of the treaty to be extended, had it not been for the interference of the circumstance that your excellency's Government, after confirming and ratifying, on its part, the said instrument, as the plenipotentiaries duly authorized by the high contracting parties had extended it, manifested its desire to have some explanations or modifications in the text of the 8th article, which relates to the property of certain unoccupied and royal lands in both Floridas. This incident, or proposal of modification made by the Government of the United States, which has contributed in a great part to the delay and difficulties which have occurred, might have rendered improper, at that time, and an event little agreeable to the American Government, a ratification extended in the usual form, which, relapsing upon the said instrument, with all and each of its clauses and articles, would consequently embrace those of the 8th article, referred to in the form in which it had been conceived. This being the case, and his Majesty being desirous, conformably to the intention of the Cortes, that the ratification of the treaty should terminate at once all the differences which have for so many years existed between two Governments whose interest, in a reciprocal good understanding, had been increased by the nature of their political institutions, has thought it necessary that, for extending the ratification, an explanation should precede, limited and circumscribed to the point of the modifications which your excellency's Government requires to be in the text of the 8th article, since all the other articles present no difficulty, nor need any further explanation in order to be ratified on the part of his Majesty, according to their literal tenor. Your excellency's Government has indicated a desire of having a modification in the context of said article; and as for determining what ought to be, and what is, agreeable to the interest of both countries, it may be necessary to proceed, by common consent, I am desirous of knowing if your excellency is authorized to point out the modification and explanation, as I also am by his Majesty, for the same purpose. If your excellency be so, we might, in a very few days, have this point settled in a manner reciprocally satisfactory; and in case of your not being so, I could desire at least that we had a conference for the purpose of agreeing on the means by which this only obstacle may be removed, which might present itself to the exchange of the ratifications in Washington, if it should be remitted by his Majesty, extended in the usual form, embracing all and each of the clauses of the 16 articles of the treaty confirmed at Washington on the 22d of February of the past year, 1819.

I therefore renew to your excellency the assurances of my distinguished esteem, and pray God that you may live many years.

I am, your excellency's most obedient faithful servant,

EVARISTO PEREZ DE CASTRO.

SIR: I had the honor to receive yesterday your excellency's officio, announcing to me that the Cortes had authorized the Government of his Majesty to ratify the cession of the Floridas to the United States. In reply to the inquiry contained in it, I must refer your excellency to my letter of the 21st of July, in which I stated, by the instructions of the President, that under the Constitution of the United States it would be necessary that the advice and consent of the Senate should again be given before the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of the 22d February, 1819, could take place, inasmuch as the six months within which it should have been made had expired. I am not, therefore, authorized to do more than has already been done. Perfectly possessed, however, of the opinions and wishes of my Government in relation to the 8th article of the treaty, I can give your excellency all the information that can be desired to prevent the possibility of any difficulty in the exchange of ratifications at Washington. In my official communication of the 2d of October, 1819, to the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga, accompanied by the copy of a declaration to be delivered on the exchange of ratifications, should it be made, your excellency will probably find all that it may be important to know. If these should not be sufficient, it will give me pleasure to confer with your excellency at any hour it may be convenient for you to appoint. In expressing to your excellency the very great satisfaction I have received from the near prospect of a most friendly termination of the disputes which have so long unhappily agitated our respective Governments, I must take leave to add that the United States have never desired to change or modify any part of the treaty of 1819. Their sole object has been, and still is, to have it ratified upon the well known terms, and according to the acknowledged intentions, of the respective negotiators of it.

I renew to your excellency, whom may God preserve, the assurances of my most respectful consideration.

His Excellency DON PEREZ DE CASTRO,
Secretary of the Despatch of State, &c., &c., &c.

JOHN FORSYTH.

[Translation.]

M. de Castro, Minister of Foreign Despatch, to Mr. Forsyth, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, dated at

MADRID, October 9, 1820.

SIR: On the 6th current I had the honor to communicate to your excellency that the Cortes had authorized his Majesty's Government to cede the Floridas to the United States; and that, in consequence of that act, no other obstacle presented itself against proceeding, on the part of the King, to the ratification of the treaty confirmed at Washington, the 22d February, 1819, except that which arose from the modification or explanation of the 8th article of the same treaty, solicited by the American Government after the confirmation, and even the ratification on its part, of the said agreement; adding that, if your excellency were authorized, we could proceed to make the desired explanation with regard to the object of said 8th article in terms agreeable to the interest of both countries, that we could terminate this business very soon, and that, by all means, I was desirous of a conference between us, in order to the removal of this only obstacle which could oppose the exchange of the ratifications in Washington. Your excellency has had the goodness to reply to me, dated the 7th, complimenting me on the proximity of an order that went to terminate the differences that had existed for so long a time between the two Governments, but manifesting to me at the same time, that, in consequence of the period fixed for the ratification of the treaty by that instrument having been overrun, it ought again to be presented to the Senate of the United States, agreeably to the Constitution; by which circumstance your excellency had not powers to act in the negotiation further than you had done, although, being perfectly instructed in the intentions of your Government upon the said article of the treaty, you could furnish me with the necessary dates in regard to them in the conference which we might have, and which we actually had on that day.

Both yesterday and before, I had the honor to point out to your excellency the difficulties which opposed the explanation or modification demanded by the American Government of the context of the 8th article, since, according to the literal and very explicit tenor of it, every donation or grant of lands in the Floridas made by authority of his Majesty prior to the 24th January, 1818, was declared valid or firm at the same time that every grant made after the said 24th of January was annulled. It appeared, at the same time, that the determining of that date was not a casual occurrence, unpremeditated and directed solely to mark one day or epoch. Since then nothing could have been more obvious and natural than to have designated the first day of the same month of January, 1818, which was the beginning of the year; and it was distinctly considered that the intention of the plenipotentiaries was to establish a principle legal and justly expressed in the text of the same article, in continuance from the date which it was to give for a foundation, that his Majesty's plenipotentiaries on that day solemnly offered the cession of the Floridas to the United States, in order to denote that it was then, and not before, when his Majesty, by said offer, tied up his hands from making innovations in those Territories, and when, by the same offer, the indisputable right which, without that, enabled him to dispose the absolute property of any lands belonging to his crown was suspended. The tenor of this article was already not only admitted and confirmed by the plenipotentiaries, but also ratified by the American Government, jointly with all the other articles which the treaty embraced, when the Secretary of State, Mr. Adams, thought fit to ask of Mr. Onis an explanation about the grants of land made by his Majesty at the end of the year 1817, the validity of which appeared to have been recognized by the letter of the treaty, they being anterior to the 24th January, 1818, and upon which both plenipotentiaries were supposed to have proceeded with a certain equivocation of the fact, having believed them posterior to the epoch mentioned. Mr. Onis, notwithstanding that all his functions and powers upon the subject had expired with the conclusion and confirmation of the treaty, did not refuse to give a firm proof of the good faith of his Government, and of his own, by frankly confessing that, in fact, he had understood that the grants of land referred to were posterior to the 24th January, 1818; but added, at the same time, a circumstance worthy of notice and perfectly conformable to the tenor of the 8th article, and it was, that, as the fixing of that epoch had been founded upon the principle that the 24th of January, and not before, was the day on which, by means of the solemn offer of the Floridas, the indisputable power which his Majesty before had of disposing of those lands remained suspended, if he had known that all or any of said grants was anterior to the 24th of January he would have insisted upon the acknowledgment of such as were so, and would not have consented to their being annulled. Taking the first part of this declaration of Mr. Onis as a foundation, and feigning ignorance of the second, the American Government solicited, by means of your excellency, at this court, that, to the ratification of the treaty on the part of his Majesty, an explanation should be added, which was fundamentally a real revocation of the literal context of the 8th article. The scrupulous good faith of his Majesty's Government restrained it from entering upon a question about what wrong the equivocation or, to speak more properly, the want of exact knowledge of a fact authentic, solemn, and of more than a year's notoriety and publicity in a supreme council and chancery of the nation, could do to one who had had the means and, in a certain degree, the necessity of being informed of it with evidence; but two essential points did not cease to call the attention of his Majesty: 1st. That, if any equivocation could have happened about the date of the grants, in order to their being a pure deed, it never could have been, nor was it in the recognition of the principle which served as a basis and was the real foundation of the 8th article, that is, that the Spanish Government did not consider itself bound, nor did the American Government consider it bound, in the use of its right as absolute lord of the lands of Florida, unless by means of the offer made on the 24th of January, 1818, and only from that epoch. That an essential equivocation could have been in this date, it was necessary to prove that it was not that of the said solemn offer, since that was the module or symbol to which all the dates of the grants ought to be adjusted, and with which they ought to be compared, in order to decide upon their validity or nullity, and not to pretend, as had been pretended, to accommodate it to the others by altering that date inversely. 2d. That if the American Government availed itself of, and founded its desires of an explanation upon, the former part of Mr. Onís' declaration which in any way favored it, neither could it, in honor and good faith, reject the second part of that declaration, to constitute the whole one self-same act and a single document. If Mr. Onís confessed the equivocation about the date of the grants, he also confessed that he would not have, for his part, subscribed to annul that which had taken place anterior to the 24th of January. What will be inferred, then, in reality and sound logic, from that declaration, taken conjointly? Will it be an accident which had expressed the real or, at least, the intentional connivance of both the plenipotentiaries concerning the annulling of the grants referred to which were anterior to the 24th of January, as the American Government pretends. An interpretation like this is diametrically opposite, not only to the second part of the declaration of Mr. Onís, but even to the legal principle established in the same 8th article. All that can be inferred, at most, was, and is, that the error into which both parties had run about the substance of the 8th article had rendered it null, invalid, and baseless; and that it was necessary to remodel it and agree upon something to the point by a new mutual agreement, and not by the way of a declaration or explanation which its context did not admit.

The question accidentally presented in this humble view would not have been offered, nor given an opportunity for the many difficulties which have occurred. The grants made to Don Pedro de Vargas could have been immediately separated, and, as being posterior to the 24th January, 1818, might have been declared the property of the United States, according to the letter and spirit of the article; and with regard to the other two, anterior to the said day, upon which grants the equivocation had relapsed, the liberal medium might have been adopted, which is generally used in doubtful cases, by yielding to each one a part of his claims, in compliance with a good understanding. But as this was not solicited by your excellency, and if the text of the 8th article, whose letter and the principle which supported it favored Spain, might yet receive an interpretation diametrically opposite to the said letter, being founded for that purpose on a declaration of Mr. Onís, the second part of which evidently resisted a similar interpretation, difficulties seemed easily to arise from hence, which, with more or less foundation, might be likewise converted into suspicions concerning the stability of the other articles of the treaty, on seeing the readiness with which doubts had arisen also concerning one, the literal tenor of which seemed less ambiguous. This disposition of the thoughts brought to recollection the offer of a guarantee of the Spanish possessions in North America, made by his excellency Mr. Pinckney on the 7th of February, 1802, in the name of the United States, in case the Spanish Government would consent to cede the Floridas to the United States for a sum to be stipulated—a guarantee which was not asked by the Government of Spain, and yet offered in the name of that of the United States, but to which my Government gave so much importance that, if his offer had been renewed, it would have ceded, in compensation, any right over the grants of land which remained by the 8th article of the treaty. From these principles flowed, no doubt, the new mission of General Vives to the United States, and all the other incidents of which your excellency is informed.

The changes which happened a little afterwards in the Government of Spain, and the re-union of the national representation, have been the cause that the Government of his Majesty, complying with the provision of the Constitution of the State, should offer to the consideration of the Cortes all that has occurred in this long and complicated negotiation, for the purpose of obtaining their consent, as well as that the dismemberment of the Spanish territory in America might be discussed. It must have been a sensible grief to the representatives of the nation, in the first steps of their august functions, to be obliged to authorize a dismemberment of the territory. They have been solely guided by the consideration that this sacrifice may be conducive to cement, upon a solid basis, the relations of friendship and harmony between Spain and the United States, by avoiding the causes of future discords, and establishing a fixed and permanent dividing line, which prevents all ambiguity and indecision for the future. Besides the reciprocal interests which ought always to unite the Governments of both countries, the great analogy which now actually exists between their political institutions, after the change that has occurred in those of Spain, appears to have given greater weight to that interest, and to have increased the importance of a good understanding. These, at least, are the dispositions which have produced the resolution I have mentioned, of the representatives of the Spanish nation. May they be answered with similar and reciprocal dispositions on the part of the Government and people of the United States for the well-being of both nations! But at the same time that the Cortes and his Majesty's Government have rendered easy even the most serious difficulty which the subject could present, they could not but direct their attentions to the reflections made known to your excellency, which have been expressed above, on the explanation which the American Government desired to give to the 8th article diametrically opposite to its literal tenor, and to the principle or rule which is established in the same article. The Spanish Government does not pretend that it may not be firm and be executed as it is printed; its delicacy does not permit it to pretend ignorance of the equivocation committed, which the declaration of Mr. Onís lays open sufficiently in its first part; but this equivocation does not destroy the principle which serves as the basis for the formation of the article, to which the second part of the declaration of the same Mr. Onís is evidently referred. It cannot be agreeable to the honor and the good faith of the American Government to take advantage of that part of the declaration of the said minister, or of any act or instrument which it may find useful, in order to tie it down and quote it in its favor, and to pretend not to understand that which does not favor it in the same instrument. No impartial person who examines the 8th article, and the declarations of Mr. Adams and Mr. Onís, will see in the whole of it anything else but that, by the involuntary error which has intervened, there has not been a real contract or agreement upon the point of the waste lands; and that, if there is anything existing in the article, it is the rule or principle of leaving untouched what the King did when his hands were not bound by means of the offer of the 24th of January, 1818.

In this case, then, it appears that harmony, the desire of peace, the honor of both Governments, and the necessity of repairing an equivocation that had passed their plenipotentiaries, dictate that middle path which is proper in doubtful cases and questions of this nature. The grants made to Don Pedro de Vargas may remain immediately in favor of the United States, because inasmuch as they are posterior to the 24th of January, 1818, they are excluded by the letter and by the spirit of the 8th article; and those, respectively, to Alagon and Punon Rostro, which, as anterior to the 24th of January, 1818, constitute the real point of the doubt, may be divided by equal parts, or by the mode which may be agreed upon by the Spanish and American Governments. His Majesty, agreeably to the intention of the Cortes, is desirous of being able to make a better exchange of property by applying one part of this fund to the redress and indemnification of the Spaniards injured and comprehended in the agreement of 1802, whose indemnification was at the charge of the American Government even whilst the treaty was not ratified, and whose lot was entirely unattended to by the plenipotentiaries of 1819. The American Government and Congress, so jealous of the interests of their fellow-citizens, can do no less than applaud these correct intentions of the King and the representatives of the Spanish people towards their own people. On the other hand, it would appear very indecorous that the Cortes, in the commencement of their august functions, should not only have to authorize the dismemberment of the territory, but also to assent that a doubtful act, which was in favor of Spain, (the letter of the article and the foundation on which it is supported,) should be explained in a sense diametrically opposite to its tenor, and that upon the basis of a declaration of the Spanish minister, truncated and disregarded in its second part.

If the means hinted had not been thought admissible, there still remained another, equally conformable to the spirit and to the letter of the treaty. All the waste lands of the Floridas, including the three grants of Vargas, Alagon, and Punon Rostro, may be valued according to the prices of lands of their class in the bordering territories of the United States; the amount of five millions of dollars may be deducted from their value, in which the same treaty adjusts, and with which the American Government obliges itself to satisfy the amount of the claims; and the surplus may be declared to belong to Spain, because it can liquidate the indemnifications of its subjects, for which the United States are responsible, by the agreement of 1802, which continues in force whilst the treaty is not ratified. It may be objected that the claims exceed the sum agreed upon; but it ought also to be considered that, even to this day, an examination and liquidation of such claims has not taken place; and that, if the agreement of 1802, and the mixed tribunal established by it, had been carried into effect, perhaps the claims admitted and approved of by the mixed Spanish and American tribunal might not have amounted to said sum, especially if the fifth commissary chosen by lot had been of the nation which was bound to pay them; so that, on the whole, five millions of dollars being the sum which the treaty fixes, and there having been, even to this day, no examination or liquidation of individual claims, this sum, and no other, is that which legally represents the amount of said indemnifications.

Such have been the reflections and observations which I have had the honor of making to your excellency in our two conferences, by order of his Majesty, conformably to the intentions of the Cortes. By these, and by all besides, which I have had the honor to point out by word, your excellency will have come to the knowledge of his Majesty's resolution to terminate entirely the subjects pending, by means of a prompt exchange of the ratifications of the treaty. I have been very sensible that your excellency has not been authorized to agree to the explanation which the 8th article requires, but I am assured of the candor, good faith, and spirit of conciliation which animate your excellency, that you will present to your Government the observations referred to, in regard to the only point upon which an explanation is desired by both parties, that, at the time of Gen. Vives' presenting the ratification of the treaty on the part of his Majesty's Government, which it is about to send, an explanation may be presented and submitted, of the sense of the 8th article, in the terms of equity and reciprocal satisfaction which I have hinted, or others equivalent, such as the good faith and the honor of both Governments dictate. The King and the representatives of the Spanish nation see, in this honorable and impartial explanation, the beginning of a new order of political relations, which, by tightening the bonds of friendship between both nations, present the most secure guaranty of their union and prosperity in future.

I renew to your excellency the assurances of my most exalted and distinguished consideration, and pray God that your excellency may live many years.

Your obedient humble servant,

EVARISTO PEREZ DE CASTRO.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. de Castro.

MADRID, October 10, 1820.

SIR: I had the honor, late last night, to receive your excellency's officio of the 9th. From our two conversations, previously held, and from your letter, embodying the substance of what was suggested and urged in those conversations, I learned, with concern, that I had mistaken the object and intention of the note of the 6th instant. I supposed it intended merely to enable your excellency to determine on the most convenient mode for the ratification of the convention of February, 1819, by his Catholic Majesty, to prevent any discussion or delay preceding the exchange of the ratifications at Washington. It was with unfeigned surprise and great regret that I discovered that the object was to bring again into view what is considered by the Government of the United States as no longer a subject of discussion with that of his Majesty. In the verbal communications I have made in our two conversations, my intention was, solely, to prevent, if possible, any further attempts to discuss this matter, satisfied that no advantage could be derived from a reference to a topic of such an unpleasant character. As I have had the misfortune not to produce this desired effect, I do not think myself authorized to enter into any further investigation of the subject. I shall communicate to my Government the notes received from his Majesty, and such replies will be given to Gen. Vives as the case may require. But I cannot take leave of the subject without stating, explicitly, that the official communication made to your excellency on the 21st July was framed and bottomed upon the admission of Gen. Vives that he was satisfied with the explanations given at Washington on the subject of the 8th article of the treaty, and that it was the determination of his Government to assent to the total nullity of the large grants. If this admission was unauthorized, the offer of the President I had the honor to communicate to his Majesty, through your excellency, is not obligatory upon the United States; the whole ground of dispute is open for re-examination; and the original claims and pretensions of my Government will be re-asserted and maintained.

Although beyond my duty, I cannot forbear to remark to your excellency that a great error is committed in supposing the construction put on the 8th article by the United States is founded altogether upon the declaration given by Mr. Onis after the signature of the treaty. This construction is taken from the instrument itself, explained and elucidated, as all instruments must be, by the intention of the parties and the nature of the subject-matter of it. Mr. Onis' letter of the 10th October is no further of importance than as a simple evidence to all nations and to his Catholic Majesty of the act and intention of his minister to annul the large grants, and the express recognition by him of the correctness of the assertion of the American negotiator that the phrases supposed to be equivocal were admitted only upon the condition that the annulment of those grants was not affected by the use of those favorite phrases. The qualifying addition to Mr. Onis' frank declaration of what he believed and understood amounts to nothing more than an assertion that the treaty would not have been agreed to without a recognition of such of the large grants as were of a date prior to January 24, 1818, an assertion altogether at variance with the declarations of Mr. Pizarro to Mr. Erving, that these donations would not be obstacles to the treaty, contradicted by Mr. Onis' perfect readiness to annul them, and by the reasons he assigned for it, "that the essential conditions of them had not been complied with," and altogether irreconcilable to a remark made to me in person by the Marquis of Casa-Yrujo, when Minister of State ad interim, "that he regretted the large grants had not been particularly named in the treaty, and their annulment expressly stipulated."

From an anxious desire to see buried in oblivion all recollections unfavorable to the perfect harmony between Spain and the United States, in closing this note I would entreat his Majesty's Government to re-examine this whole subject before it is again pressed; to reflect that all that has occurred has arisen from a reliance on the information and good faith of the minister and confidence in the purity of the Government of Spain. The Duke of San Fernando stated that the American Government wished to change the 8th article by a declaration, a copy of which I had inclosed to him. Your excellency now tells me the wish of the American Government is diametrically opposed to the literal text of the treaty, inasmuch as Alagon's and Punon Rostro's grants are of a date prior to the date fixed in the 8th article. The Duke of San Fernando refused, as inconsistent with the honor of the King, to order me copies of those donations. What would your excellency think were I to say to you, "Sir, I do not know that your assertion is true; show me the donations!" If the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga thought his general assertion, that the declaration changed the treaty, was so full that further information could not be asked without reflecting upon his Majesty's honor, what would be the reply to a doubt of the correctness of your excellency's unqualified, deliberate, and explicit assertion? Yet, in relying upon the information and the word of Mr. Onis, the United States had the same reason to confide as they now have in the assertion made by your excellency, unless it should be supposed that there is a difference in the degree of confidence due to the representative of Spain at home and abroad. I feel, however, that I am treading upon the yet warm ashes of a previous unprofitable controversy, and exceeding the limits to which, at the outset, I proposed to confine myself.

I hasten, therefore, to assure your excellency that the United States wish nothing but what they believe to be just and equitable; what is equally honorable to Spain and to the United States; nothing inconsistent with the decorum and glory of his Catholic Majesty, or with the duties and obligations of the Cortes, by whose advice and authority the treaty of February, 1819, is to be ratified.

I renew to your excellency, whom may God preserve many years, the assurance of my perfect respect.

JOHN FORSYTH.

His Excellency DON EVARISTO PEREZ DE CASTRO, Secretary of the Despatch of State, &c.

Mr. de Castro, Minister of Foreign Despatch, to Mr. Forsyth, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, at Madrid, October 11, 1820.

[Translation.]

SIR: I have received your excellency's note of yesterday's date, in which you seem to agree with mine of the 9th. In said note I proposed to myself to recapitulate and send to you all the essentials of the controversies which we had on the two antecedent days, not with the view which your excellency appears to have apprehended, of commencing new discussions incompatible with the desire which animates his Majesty of seeing all the points which have been the object of the treaty speedily terminated, but with that of agreeing here with your excellency upon the proper terms of extending the explanation or declaration of the 8th article in a mode satisfactory, and such as that the exchange of the ratifications might not experience any obstacle or inconvenience at Washington.

On a view, therefore, of what your excellency had the goodness to express in the said conferences, and of what you manifested in your said note of yesterday, I confine myself to secure that which was contended for in the ratification on the part of this Government, which will be sent back to the United States in terms which will be, no doubt, satisfactory to the American Government, and which avoid the discussions which your excellency seems to fear, to ascertain that neither the tenor of our conferences nor that of my said note are intended for this object which inspires your fear.

If your excellency should please, in order to forward despatches to your Government, to avail yourself of the opportunity of a courier, who must be despatched as soon as possible, with the ratifications and packets for General Vives, you may begin to prepare them immediately, in expectation of which, I shall again give you information some hours before the departure of the courier.

I renew to your excellency the assurances of my high consideration, and pray God that you may live many years.

I am, your obedient and humble servant,

EVARISTO PEREZ DE CASTRO.

At the PALACE, October 11, 1820.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. de Castro.

MADRID, October 11, 1820.

SIR: I have received with great satisfaction your excellency's note of this day's date. If I have misapprehended the object in our conferences and the tenor of the note of the 9th, your excellency must do me the justice to impute it to my imperfect knowledge of the Spanish language and to my anxiety to comply with your excellency's request to give an immediate [answer] to the note.

I shall with pleasure use the occasion you have offered to me of sending despatches to my Government by the Spanish courier. A messenger will go from this legation to the United States the close of the present week; should your excellency have anything to send to General Vives, it will gratify me to forward it by this opportunity.

I renew to your excellency, whom may God preserve many years, the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

His Excellency DON EVARISTO PEREZ DE CASTRO,
Secretary of the Despatch of State, &c.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Adams, marked "private."

[Extract.]

MADRID, October 12, 1820.

DEAR SIR: "I have this moment learned that the Cortes, in authorizing, by an almost unanimous vote, the ratification of the treaty, and annulling the donations, at the same time recommended to the ministers to endeavor to procure some advantages to the nation on account of the difficulty about the 8th article. With this recommendation the ministers must comply, even although they may be satisfied the effort will be useless. The attempt once made, and failing, the affair will proceed to its proper conclusion without further trouble."

I am, dear sir, very sincerely, your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Washington.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Adams, marked "private," dated

MADRID, October 15, 1820.

DEAR SIR: In great haste I send you a rough copy of a note from Mr. de Castro to Count Bulgary, of this day's date. I believe the Count Bulgary has inclosed, in the accompanying letter to Mr. Poletica, a copy of the same paper.

I had on the 4th a short conversation with the Spanish minister, which served to confirm the opinion expressed in my private letter of the 12th instant.

I am, dear sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

HON. J. Q. ADAMS,
Secretary of State.

The Spanish Minister to the Chargé d'Affaires of Russia.

[Translation]

MADRID, October 15, 1820.

SIR: His Majesty's Government having given information to the Cortes of the nation concerning the existing differences with the United States of America, resulting from the treaty entered into between Spain and that power on the 22d of February, 1819, and not ratified by the King, in order that the legislative power might authorize his Majesty to cede the two Floridas, as is stipulated in one of the articles of said treaty, and grant power to proceed, consequently, to the ratification of it, which his Majesty has thought fit to do; and the Cortes having resolved to give to the Government the authority required, carries into effect the ratification.

His Catholic Majesty, to whom are evident the good offices of his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, at several stages of the negotiation with the American Government, proving his august and friendly solicitude in favor of Spain, discharges the grateful task of communicating to the cabinet of his Imperial Majesty the flattering state in which this affair is, and the resolution of his Majesty to ratify the treaty mentioned, which will produce the re-establishing of that perfect harmony between Spain and the United States, which it is of so great importance to both powers to maintain without the least shadow of discord.

With this motive, the King rejoices to repeat to his august friend, the Emperor of all the Russias, the esteem and gratitude with which, on all occasions, he has seen his Imperial Majesty take the most distinguished interest in the prosperity of his Majesty and that of his people, &c.

(Signed by the Spanish Minister and addressed to the Chargé d'Affaires of Russia.)

MADRID, October 24, 1820.

"The delay of the departure of the Spanish messenger enables me to give you copies of my correspondence with Mr. de Castro, subsequent to the decision of the Cortes on the cession of Florida, in regard to the execution of the convention of February 22, 1819. No. 1 is a copy of my note calling the attention of the Spanish minister to the provisions of the first and seventh articles of the treaty. I saw Mr. de Castro on Saturday. He had received my letter; the propriety of issuing the order suggested in my note had not escaped him, and he would send, as I requested, a copy of it as soon as it was made. To-day I received his answer, with a copy of the order to which it refers. Copies are marked Nos. 2 and 3."

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. de Castro.

MADRID, October 17, 1820.

SIR: By the seventh article of the convention of the 22d February, 1819, the ratification of which is preparing on the part of his Catholic Majesty to be sent to General Vives at Washington, it is stipulated that the officers and troops of his Majesty shall evacuate the Floridas within six months after the exchange of ratifications, or sooner if possible, and shall give possession of them to the officers or Commissioners of the United States who may be properly authorized to receive them. Calculating on a speedy exchange of ratifications, I would suggest, if it has not already occurred to your excellency, that it would be extremely convenient if the order of his Majesty for the evacuation and delivery of the territory, as also the archives and documents relating to the sovereignty and property of the same, should go to General Vives with the ratified treaty, to be forwarded to the property authority on the exchange of ratifications; as by these means the United States would have timely notice to prepare the escort and transports to carry the officers and troops of his Majesty, and their equipage to the Havana, in conformity with the obligation of the said article. I should be pleased to be enabled, by the politeness of your excellency, to furnish to my Government a copy of this order, if his Majesty's Government should send it to General Vives.

I seize with avidity every occasion to offer to your excellency, whom may God preserve, the assurance of my distinguished respect.

JOHN FORSYTH.

The Minister of Spain to Mr. Forsyth.

[Translation.]

SIR: I have received your esteemed note of the 17th current, in which you say that you have taken the liberty of suggesting to me, in case it should not have already occurred to his Majesty's Government, that it would be extremely convenient, if the order of his Majesty for the evacuation and delivery of the Floridas, and of the archives and documents relating to the sovereignty and property of those provinces, should go to General Vives with the ratification of the treaty, that it should be sent at the same time to the proper authorities, in order to be transmitted after the exchange of the ratifications; and that it would be very agreeable to your excellency to have it in your power to send a copy of said order to your Government, if his Majesty should transmit it to General Vives, and should find no inconvenience in granting it.

The idea had occurred to his Majesty's Government, as it could not fail to do, of transmitting General Vives the proper order for the delivery of the Floridas and whatever else is stipulated in the seventh article of the treaty of the 22d February, 1819, in order to be forwarded to the proper authorities after the exchange of the ratifications. Estimating, as it deserves, your excellency's suggestion, produced, no doubt, from desire of connecting more closely the relations of amity and good understanding between Spain and the United States by removing every obstacle or distant incident which might retard so desirable an object; and cheerfully acceding to the desire which your excellency has manifested to me of obtaining a copy of the order which may be sent to the proper authority for carrying into effect the seventh article of the treaty, I have the honor of enclosing to you a copy of that which is addressed to the Captain General of the island of Cuba, through the medium of General Vives, in order that he may make use of it immediately after the exchange of the ratifications has been certified.

In all to-morrow an extraordinary courier will go to convey the despatches of the Government to his Majesty's minister in the United States, and I have the satisfaction of giving your excellency this advice beforehand that you may, if you please, forward any packets to your Government by this opportunity, in which case I hope you will have the kindness to send me them by two in the afternoon of to-morrow, the 25th current.

I renew to your excellency the assurances of my distinguished consideration, and pray God that you may live many years.

Your most humble and obedient servant,

EVARISTO DE CASTRO.

PALACE, October 24, 1820.

Translation of the royal order of the King of Spain to the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba and of the Floridas.

OCTOBER 24, 1820.

Ferdinand the Seventh, by the grace of God and by the Constitution of the Spanish monarchy King of the Spains, to you the Captain General and Governor of the island of Cuba and of the Floridas: Know you, that by a treaty concluded in the city of Washington on the twenty-second of February of the last year, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, by plenipotentiaries duly authorized for the purpose of arranging the differences which have existed between the Government of Spain and that of the United States of America and the limits of their respective territories, there was stipulated on the part of Spain the cession to the United States of all the country situated east of the Mississippi, known by the name of East and West Florida, the adjacent islands dependent upon the two Floridas being comprehended in said cession, together with all public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings which are not private property, with the archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of said provinces, it being provided at the same time that the inhabitants of the territories so ceded shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion without any restriction, and that all those who may desire to remove to the Spanish dominions shall be permitted to sell or export their effects at any time whatever, in order that they may better effect their purpose, without being subject, in either case, to duties, and that those who prefer remaining in the Floridas shall be admitted, as soon as possible, to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, it being added by another article of the same treaty that the Spanish officers and troops shall evacuate the said territories ceded to the United States six months after the exchange of the ratification of the same treaty, or sooner if possible, and shall give possession of them to the officers or commissaries of the United States duly authorized to receive them, and that the United States shall provide the transports and escort necessary to convey the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana. And I, having considered and examined the tenor of the articles of the treaty, after having obtained the consent and authority of the general Cortes of the nation with respect to the said cession, have thought proper to approve and ratify the treaty referred to, the ratification of which must be exchanged at Washington with that which was formed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate of the same, after which exchange the said treaty will begin to be obligatory on both Governments and their respective citizens: therefore I command you and ordain that, after the information which shall be seasonably given you by my Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary at Washington of the ratifications having been exchanged, you proceed on your part to make the proper dispositions, in order that, at the end of six months, counting from the date of the exchange of the ratifications, or sooner if possible, the Spanish officers and troops may evacuate the territories of both Floridas, and that possession of them be given to the officers or commissaries of the United States duly authorized to receive them, in the understanding that the United States shall provide the transports and escort necessary to convey the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana. You shall arrange in proper time the delivery of the islands adjacent and dependent upon the Floridas, and the public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings which are not private property, as also the archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of the same two provinces by placing them at the disposal of the commissaries or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them, and all the other papers and the effects which belong to the nation and which have not been comprehended and mentioned in the expressed clauses of the cession you shall have conveyed and transported to another part of the Spanish possessions which may be most convenient for the public service; as, also, you shall take care that, previous to the delivery, it may be made known by edicts to all the present inhabitants of the Floridas that they have power to remove to the Spanish territories and dominions, the sale or exportation of their effects being permitted to them by the United States at any time whatever, without being subject to duties, and also the advantages stipulated in favor of those who shall prefer to remain in the Floridas, to whom I have wished to give this last proof of the protection and affection which they have always experienced under the Spanish Government. Of the delivery which you may make or may be made by your delegation, in the form which has been expressed, you shall make or cause to be made a corresponding receipt, duly authenticated, for your discharge; and in order that you may proceed with entire knowledge in the execution of this commission, there shall be likewise sent to you, by my Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington, an authentic copy of the treaty referred to of the twenty-second of February, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, with the insertion of the ratifications of both parties and of the certificate relative to the exchange of the same, of which documents and of this my royal order you shall send a copy, in authentic form, to the Governors of both the Floridas and to the person or persons who may have in your name the accomplishing of the delivery, if it have not been made by yourself.

All which you shall well and completely execute, in the form which I have prescribed to you, agreeably to the public service, advising me of your having executed it through my under-written Secretary of Despatch of State.

Given at Madrid, the twenty-fourth of October, one thousand eight hundred and twenty.

Mr. Adams to General Vives.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 28, 1821.

SIR: I have submitted to the consideration of the President of the United States the observations which, in conformity to the instructions of your Government, were verbally made by you in the conference which I had the honor of holding with you, when you notified me of your readiness to exchange the ratifications of the treaty of February 22, 1819, between the United States and Spain.

With regard to the omission, on the part of the Spanish negotiator of the treaty, to insist upon some provision of indemnity in behalf of Spanish claimants, to whom a pledge of such indemnity had been stipulated by the previously ratified convention of 1802, an omission stated by you to have been peculiarly dissatisfactory to the Cortes, I am directed to observe that, as in all other cases of the adjustment of differences between nations, this treaty must be considered as a compact of mutual concessions, in which each party abandoned to the other some of its pretensions. These concessions on the part of the United States were great; nor could it be expected by the Spanish nation that they would be obtained without equivalent. Probably the Spanish negotiator considered the claims of Spanish subjects embraced by that convention as so small in amount as scarcely to be worthy of inflexible adherence to them. He certainly considered the whole treaty as highly advantageous to Spain—a sentiment in which the Government of the United States always entirely participated and still concurs.

This also furnishes the reply which most readily presents itself to the proposition which you have also been instructed to make, that some compensation should be allowed by the United States for the benefit of the grantees of lands recognized by the treaty to have been null and void. While appreciating in all its force the sense of justice by which, after the maturest deliberation and the fullest examination, the Cortes have declared that those grants were, so as, at the signature of the treaty, they had been clearly, explicitly, and unequivocally understood to be by both the plenipotentiaries who signed it, the President deems it unnecessary to press the remark which must naturally present itself that, to grantees whose titles were in fact null and void, and by all parties to the negotiation were known to be null and void, no indemnity can be due, because no injury was done.

Nor can it be admitted that this is one of the cases of misunderstanding from which the grantees could be entitled to the benefit of a doubtful construction. The construction of the article was in nowise doubtful. For any construction which would have admitted the validity of the grants would have rendered impossible the fulfilment of other most important stipulations of the treaty.

The discussion of this subject, having already been a subject of correspondence between the Minister of Foreign Affairs of your Government and Mr. Forsyth, could now be continued to no profitable purpose. I take much more satisfaction in assuring you of the pleasure with which the President has accepted the ratification of the treaty, as an earnest of that cordial harmony which it is among his most ardent desires to cultivate between the United States and Spain. This disposition, he cherishes the hope, will be further promoted by the community of principle upon which the liberal institutions of both nations are founded, and by the justice, moderation, and love of order, which they combine with the love and the enjoyment of freedom.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

CORRESPONDENCE, &amp;c.

Extracts from the general instructions of Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, to Mr. Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to France, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 15, 1816.

"It has at all times since our Revolution been the sincere desire of this Government to cultivate a good intelligence with France. The changes which have taken place in her Government have never produced any change in this disposition. The United States have looked to the French nation, and to the existing Government as its proper organ, deeming it unjustifiable to interfere with its interior concerns. The existing Government has, in consequence, been invariably recognized here as soon as known. Should you find that unfounded prejudices are entertained on this subject, which a frank explanation may remove, you are authorized to make it.

"Cherishing these sentiments towards the French nation, under all the Governments which have existed there, it has not been less a cause of surprise than of regret that a corresponding disposition has not at all times been reciprocated by the French Government towards the United States. The history of the last ten years is replete with wrongs received from that Government, for which no justifiable pretext can be assigned. The property wrested in that space of time from our citizens is of great value, for which reparation has not been obtained. These injuries were received under the administration of the late Emperor of France, on whom the demand of indemnity was incessantly made while he remained in power. Under the sensibility thereby excited, and the failure to obtain justice, the relations of the two countries were much affected. The disorder which has of late existed in France has prevented a repetition of this demand; but now that the Government appears to be settled, it is due to our citizens who were so unjustly plundered to present their claim anew to the French Government."

"A gross sum will be received in satisfaction of the whole claim, if the liquidation and payment of every claim founded on just principles, to be established, cannot be obtained.

"The management of this important interest is committed to your discretion, as to the moment and manner of bringing it under consideration, in which the prospect of obtaining a satisfactory reparation will necessarily have its due weight. You will be furnished with a letter of instruction, authorizing you to provide for it by convention, should that mode be preferred."

*The Secretary of State to Mr. Gallatin.*DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 7, 1816.

SIR: On the presumption that his most Christian Majesty may be disposed to provide by special convention for the just claims of the citizens of the United States against France, as also for the like claims of French subjects against the United States, this letter is given to you, by direction of the President, as an authority and instruction to negotiate a convention for that purpose with such person or persons as may have a like authority from his most Christian Majesty.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

JAMES MONROE.

Extract of a letter, No. 10, from Mr. Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to France, to Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, November 11, 1816.

"I have the honor to inclose the copy of my note of the 9th instant to the Duke de Richelieu, on the subject of indemnities due to citizens of the United States, on account of the illegal and irregular sequestrations and condemnations made under the authority of the former Government of France. I had some difficulty in collecting, from scattered documents, the information necessary to present a correct view of the subject, and adapted to existing circumstances."

PARIS, November 9, 1816.

MONSIEUR LE DUC: I had already the honor, in some preliminary conversations, to present to your excellency a general view of the losses sustained by American citizens, under various illegal acts of the former Government of France, and for which the United States claim an indemnity from the justice of his most Christian Majesty.

The right to an indemnity being founded on the law of nations extends to all cases where there has been an evident infraction of that law, such as it is recognized by civilized nations.

Of the acts of the former French Government openly violating that law, those issued on the 21st November, 1806, at Berlin, and on the 17th December, 1807, at Milan, were promulgated in the shape of public decrees, applicable, at least, nominally, to other nations as well as the United States. Other acts were, exclusively, directed against America; appearing, also, sometimes under the form of decrees, as that of Bayonne, of April 17, 1808, and that of Rambouillet, of March 23, 1810; and at times being only special orders for seizing or selling certain American vessels and cargoes. To these various acts must be added the wanton destruction, at different times, of American vessels on the high seas.

That the Berlin and Milan decrees, so far as they declared liable to capture and condemnation neutral vessels pursuing an innocent commerce, and contravening no municipal laws, were an evident violation of the law of nations has not been and cannot be denied. The plea of retaliation, grounded on a supposed acquiescence of neutral powers in certain acts of Great Britain, and urged in justification of those decrees, was unjust in its principle and altogether inadmissible when affecting a neutral instead of an enemy. And even that pretence for plundering a friendly power was abandoned when the two belligerent Governments, whilst continuing to capture the vessels of the neutral trading with their respective enemy, permitted a direct commerce by means of licenses. But that plea was, in point of fact, destitute of foundation with respect to the United States. That they had uniformly opposed the aggressions of Great Britain on their neutral rights is notorious. It is not less true, and appears from all their public acts and from the tenor of their negotiations with both belligerents, that it was solely owing to the acts of France, to the Berlin and Milan decrees, that still more decisive measures of resistance were not early adopted against Great Britain. So long as France and England equally continued to violate the neutral rights of America she could not have selected either of those nations for an enemy without tamely submitting to the aggressions of the other, and without deviating from that impartial course which it was her constant endeavor to pursue. And when, at last, the French decrees had been revoked, so far as America was concerned, the perseverance of England in continuing her unlawful orders and in violating the rights of the United States produced a declaration of war, on their part, against that country.

Notwithstanding the intrinsic justice of the claim of the United States for losses sustained by their citizens under the Berlin and Milan decrees, it was intimated by your excellency that those decrees, having been of a general nature, other nations that had also experienced losses by their operation would have had an equal right to an indemnity, and that those acts not having been enumerated in the last treaties and conventions between France and other European powers amongst those for which a compensation should be made by France, the United States ought not to expect to be placed on a better footing than other nations.

It would be preposterous to suppose, and it cannot have been intended to suggest, that the United States can in any case be bound by treaties to which they were not parties, and in which no attention whatever could have been paid to their interest. Nor can, by any correct analogy, the principles therein adopted be applied to America.

The allied powers naturally sought to obtain indemnity in those cases in which they were most interested. Almost all, if not all, of them had been during the late European wars either at war or in alliance with France, whilst the United States had never stood in either of those relations towards her. Hence, it necessarily followed that the injuries sustained by the subjects of those powers differed essentially from those inflicted by France on American citizens. The Berlin and Milan decrees, so far as they extended beyond prohibitory municipal regulations, although nominally general, applied, in fact, almost exclusively to the United States. If there was any exception, it was in amount too small, and applied to nations whose weight was too inconsiderable, to be taken into consideration. Of the other powers, many had no interest that indemnities should be obtained on that account, whilst several of them, namely, England, Spain, Holland, Denmark, and Naples, had a direct interest that the principle should not be admitted. It will, of course, appear that, by the convention between France and Great Britain, compensation is to be made by France for all the property of English subjects confiscated or sequestered, not only during the last war, but also during that which preceded the treaty of Amiens, and including even the loss arising from the reduction of the public debt of France to one-third of its nominal amount, with the exception of the seizures and confiscations made in consequence of the laws of war, and of the prohibitory laws. And the exception precisely embraces the principal classes of injuries for which the United States are entitled to indemnity, since their grounds of complaint against France are the abuse on her part of belligerent rights and the unlawful extension of prohibitory laws beyond their legitimate sphere.

Not only were the Berlin and Milan decrees an evident and acknowledged violation of the law of nations; not only the plea of retaliation against England, and of a presumed acquiescence in her aggressions, was unfounded with respect to the United States; not only neither the treaties between France and the allied powers are binding on America, nor the principles adopted in those treaties applicable to the relations in which she stood towards France; but those decrees were also an open infraction of the treaties subsisting between the two countries, namely, of the 12th, 13th, and 14th articles of the convention of September 30, 1800, which did not expire till July 31, 1809. For it was therein stipulated that the citizens of either country might sail with their ships and merchandise (contraband goods excepted) from any port whatever to any port of the enemy of the other, and from a port of such enemy, either to a neutral port or to another port of the enemy, unless such port should be actually blockaded; that a vessel sailing for an enemy's port without knowing that the same was blockaded should be turned away, but neither be detained nor her cargo be confiscated; that implements and ammunition of war should alone be considered contraband of war; and that free ships should make free goods, extending that freedom even to an enemy's property, on board the ships belonging to the citizens of either country. The French decrees, in violation of those stipulations, after having declared the British islands and possessions in a state of blockade, although they were not pretended to be actually blockaded, made liable to capture and condemnation all American (as well as other neutral) vessels sailing on the high seas from or to an English port, even which might have been visited by an English vessel, as well as every species of merchandise belonging to English subjects or of English origin.

It is true that, in answer to the American minister who had applied for explanations respecting the construction intended to be given to the Berlin decree, assurances were at first given that it would produce no change in the previous regulations respecting neutral navigators, nor in the convention with the United States. This construction, which gave to that decree the character only of a prohibitory municipal law, was adhered to during the ten first months which followed its promulgation; and it was only in September, 1807, that merchandise found on board of neutral vessels at sea was declared liable to condemnation, merely on account of its being of British growth or manufacture. This fact is here stated for the purpose of observing that the assurances which had thus been given, and the practical construction thus first put on the Berlin decree, prevented the early opposition which otherwise the United States would have made to it; and that this supposed acquiescence on their part served as a pretence for the British orders in council of November, 1807, which were immediately followed by the French decree of Milan.

The decrees and orders of the French Government which applied exclusively to the United States will now be noticed.

Assailed by the simultaneous aggressions of the two belligerent powers, the first step of the American Government was to withdraw the commerce of the United States from the depredations to which it was everywhere exposed. An embargo was laid, in the latter end of the year 1807, on all their vessels, and notwithstanding the extraordinary privations and the great loss of revenue which were incurred, that measure was persevered in during fifteen months. In the meanwhile strong remonstrances were made to the French and English Governments on the subject of their unlawful acts. Not only was the appeal to their justice fruitless, but it appears that by an order said to have been issued at Bayonne on the 17th of April, 1808, all American vessels then in the ports of France, or which might thereafter come into them, were directed to be seized on the pretence that no vessel of the United States could then navigate without infringing a law of the United States, as if the infraction of a municipal law could be lawfully punished by a foreign power; as if it had not been notorious that a number of American vessels, which were abroad when the embargo became known to them, remained in foreign seas and countries in order to avoid the effect of that law.

The pressure of the embargo on the agriculture and commerce of the United States became such that Congress found it proper to modify that measure. By a law of the 1st March, 1809, the act laying an embargo was repealed with respect to all countries, England and France only excepted, and the vessels and merchandise of both countries were excluded from the United States after the 20th of May following; with the proviso, that, in case either France or Great Britain should so revoke or modify their edicts as that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the commercial intercourse of the United States should be renewed with the nation so doing. This law in its nature was entirely municipal and pacific; and its object was to avoid immediate hostilities and to give further time for negotiations; to withdraw, as far as practicable, the navigation of the United States from the operation of the unlawful acts of both France and England, and to give to both sufficient inducements for repealing their edicts, by the actual privation of the benefits derived from the American commerce, and by the prospect that, in case of such repeal by either nation, she would again enjoy those advantages of which her enemy would continue to be deprived.

The act was officially communicated on the 29th of April, 1809, by the American minister to the French Government; it was not at that time treated as hostile; and if it produced no favorable change, no remonstrance was made against it. But towards the end of the same year orders were given to seize all the American vessels in France or in the countries occupied by her arms; and after a great number had been thus seized, principally in Spain and in Holland, an imperial decree was, on the 23d March, 1810, issued at Rambouillet, ordering or rather confirming that seizure, extending it to all American vessels which had entered France or those countries since the 20th May, 1809, and directing that the product of the sales should be deposited in the caisse d'amortissement. The act of Congress of March 1, 1809, was alleged as the motive for that outrageous measure. In point of fact, it is not believed that any vessel the property of French subjects had been forfeited for a violation of that act. At least it is not recollected that any application was made for the remission of such forfeiture to the Treasury Department, which by the law was authorized to grant such remissions, and would certainly have done it in any case where the law might not have been within the knowledge of the parties. But it cannot be necessary seriously to discuss a plea which was evidently but a pretence for plunder. It will be sufficient to observe that the gross injustice of the Rambouillet decree consists in its retrospective operation; and that if the French Government had promulgated an order excluding American vessels from the ports of France and of the countries occupied by her arms, and pronouncing the penalty of confiscation after due notice of that order, American citizens who might have voluntarily and knowingly violated the provisions of what was only a municipal law would have been justly liable to its penalties.

The American property seized or captured by virtue either of those four general decrees, or of special orders, which are but partially known to the Government of the United States, may, in reference to its present situation, be classed under two general heads, viz: that which has never been condemned, and that which has been actually confiscated.

The first class embraces the vessels and cargoes burnt at sea and those which have been sequestered.

It is not necessary to make any observations on the destruction of vessels at sea, your excellency having already intimated that the Government of France was disposed to make compensation for acts of that nature.

The vessels and cargoes sequestered and not condemned consist principally of those seized at St. Sebastian and other places in the latter end of the year 1809 and in the beginning of 1810, and sold by virtue of the decree of Rambouillet. Fourteen vessels which, during that winter, had been driven into Holland, and which, by a particular agreement between the Government of that country and that of France, bearing date, it is said, the 16th of March, 1810, were put at the disposal of France, are of the same description. And, exclusively of other special orders of the same nature, which may not be known to me, the cargoes of seven vessels arrived at Antwerp in the beginning of the year 1807, and which were permitted to be landed there, were also sequestered and finally sold, by virtue of an order of Government, dated the 4th of May, 1810. In all these cases there has been no condemnation, no final decision. The vessels and cargoes were only seized and sold by order of Government, and the proceeds of sales deposited in the caisse d'amortissement, or in some other public chest.

The right to demand and obtain a decision on all those suspended cases is undeniable. Either the proceeds of sales will be restored to the lawful owners by virtue of that decision, or the present Government of France must go beyond what had been done by the former Government, and decree the final confiscation of property which even that Government had been unwilling to condemn. I will not permit myself for a moment to suppose that there can be any hesitation on that question.

With respect to property actually condemned, without intending to impair the indisputable right of the United States to an indemnity for every condemnation made by virtue of decrees, violating the acknowledged law of nations, I will beg leave to add some observations on the manner in which those decrees were executed, for the purpose of showing that an investigation and revision of those condemnations ought to take place, even if it was admitted that France had a right to issue the Berlin and Milan decrees, and to condemn vessels contravening their tenor. The time necessary to obtain information in that respect has occasioned the delay which has taken place in making this communication since the last conference I had the honor to hold with your excellency.

1. These condemnations have, as has already been stated, been made in contravention of an existing treaty; so far, at least, as relates to property seized or captured prior to the 31st of July, 1809.

2. Several of the condemnations, or rather acts of confiscation, were made by what has been called "imperial decisions," meaning thereby not those cases where an appeal may have been made from the council of prizes to the council of State, but those instances where the order of condemnation issued from that council, or from Napoleon himself, without any previous regular trial and condemnation by the council of prizes. Such proceedings must be considered as irregular and arbitrary acts, contravening the usages and law of nations. It is sufficiently hard for the neutral that his property should be tried exclusively by the tribunals of the belligerent, where a natural bias exists in favor of the captors. It is at least necessary that the decisions should be made by a regular and permanent tribunal, acting according to fixed rules, and affording every security of which such an institution is susceptible. But the United States have a right to demand that those imperial decisions should be annulled not only as contravening the usages and law of nations, but as violating also an existing treaty. It had been stipulated by the 22d article of the convention of the 30th of September, 1800, "that in all cases the established courts for prize causes in the country to which the prizes might be conducted should alone take cognizance of them." Of 27 vessels and cargoes, (captured or seized prior to the 1st of November, 1810,) which, as appears by a list now before me, were condemned by imperial decisions, eighteen had been seized or captured prior to the 31st of July, 1809, the day on which the convention expired.

3. I have been assured that upon investigation it will be found that some of the decisions of the council of prizes itself have taken place without observing the forms prescribed by law; without giving an opportunity to the parties of bringing their proofs; without an examination of the ship papers, and, in fact, in obedience to an imperial order. A decision of the council, dated September 10, 1811, and by which six ships and cargoes were at once condemned, is particularly mentioned.

4. The retrospective operation of the Rambouillet decree has already been mentioned. It will also be found that in several instances the Milan decree has received a similar construction, and that vessels have been condemned for having contravened that decree which could not have known its existence, having sailed from American ports either before or a short time after it had been issued, and the alleged infraction of the decree itself having at least in one instance taken place prior to its date.

5. It might have been expected that when the Berlin and Milan decrees were declared to be revoked from and after the 1st of November, 1810, no further condemnations would take place with respect to cases not yet decided at that time; notwithstanding which, it appears that forty-eight ships and cargoes, previously seized or captured, were condemned subsequent to that day, namely, by the council of prizes, eighteen before, and ten after the 28th of April, 1811; and by imperial decisions, eleven before, and nine after the last mentioned day. Yet the decree of that day (28th of April, 1811,) enacts and declares that the Berlin and Milan decrees are, from and after the 1st of November, 1810, definitively considered, as if they had not existed (comme non avenues) with respect to American vessels.

6. Several condemnations were made for frivolous pretences of vessels captured after the 1st of November, 1810, or in other cases which the general decrees could not reach, such as alleged irregularities in the certificates of origin or in other ship papers, presumed navigation under British convoy, mutiny on board, intention to remit the proceeds of sales through England.

It appears from the preceding statement that, independent of the illegality of the Berlin and Milan decrees, there is sufficient cause for the revision of the condemnations which have taken place. Nor is there anything novel in that course. A number of unlawful captures of American vessels having been made by Great Britain during the commencement of her war with France, particularly by virtue of certain British orders in council of the 6th November, 1793, it was agreed by the seventh article of the treaty of November, 1794, between the United States and England, that full and complete compensation should be made by the British Government for the losses and damage sustained by citizens of the United States by reason of irregular or illegal captures or condemnations of their vessels and other property under color of authority or commissions from his Britannic Majesty, and a sum exceeding twelve hundred thousand pounds sterling in specie was actually paid to American citizens by the decision of the joint commission appointed in conformity with the said treaty.

From this view of the subject, I have the honor to propose to your excellency an arrangement founded on the following basis, in which, without abandoning the just rights of the citizens of the United States, a positive stipulation is avoided, which would, at this time, bind the Government of France to make compensation generally for all the condemnations under the Berlin and Milan decrees.

First. That the Government of France will engage to make compensation to the citizens of the United States: 1. For all vessels and cargoes captured, seized, or sequestered, which have not been definitively condemned by the council of prizes and the proceeds of which were placed either in the public treasury, in the caisse d'amortissement, or in any other public chest, and also for all vessels and cargoes destroyed at sea and likewise not condemned by the council of prizes. 2. For the losses sustained by reason of such other irregular or unlawful seizures, captures, or condemnations as will be decreed by a joint commission to have been made contrary to public law and justice or in contravention of existing treaties.

Second. That a joint commission (or commissions) shall be established with power, 1. To liquidate the amount due for property either destroyed at sea or sequestered and not definitively condemned as aforesaid; 2. To decide in what other cases of irregular or unlawful seizures, captures, or condemnations the Government of France is justly bound to make also compensation, and to what amount.

The manner in which the commission or commissions should be appointed and organized may, it is presumed, be easily arranged, and every reasonable stipulation will be admitted which may be necessary to limit exclusively the right to compensation to cases of bona fide American property.

I cannot end this communication without saying that the present situation of France is known and felt by the Government of the United States. It is evidently the interest of America that France should be prosperous and powerful. It is the sincere wish of the Government of America that the present Government of France may soon be relieved from the difficulties which the lamentable event of March, 1815, has occasioned. It is, therefore, with reluctance and only in obedience to a sacred duty that a demand is made at this time which may have a tendency to increase those difficulties, and every disposition exists to accede to such time and mode of payment as, without being inconsistent with the just rights of the citizens of the United States, may be least inconvenient to France.

Permit me to request your excellency to take the subject into early consideration, and to communicate to me as soon as may be practicable the determination of his Majesty's Government.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, your excellency's most obedient servant,
ALBERT GALLATIN.

His Excellency the DUKE DE RICHELIEU,
Minister Secretary of State for the Department of Foreign Affairs, &c.

PARIS, January 20, 1817.

"Having received no answer from the Duke de Richelieu to my letter of the 9th of November last, I addressed to him, on the 26th of December, a short note, of which and of his answer, dated the 16th instant, copies are inclosed.

"In the interview which accordingly took place to-day, I requested that he would proceed to state what he had concluded to offer in answer to the basis proposed in my note of the 9th of November. He said that his offer would fall very short of our demands; that he would not go beyond an indemnity for vessels burnt at sea, and for those the proceeds of which had been only sequestered and deposited in the caisse d'amortissement. He added that he would make his proposal in writing, and that this would not be attended with much delay. I then said that I could not give any opinion on his proposal until I had received his note, but that I wished him to understand that if the Government of the United States thought it proper (which I could not at present promise) to accept an indemnity for certain classes only of our claims, this never would be purchased by a relinquishment of the other just demands of our citizens."

Mr. Gallatin to the Duke de Richelieu.

PARIS, December 26, 1816.

The undersigned, sensible of the important business which at the opening of the two Chambers, must have engrossed the attention of his most Christian Majesty's Government, has heretofore avoided to urge the consideration of the subject-matter of the letter which he had the honor to address, on the 9th of November last, to his excellency the Duke de Richelieu. It has, however, become necessary that he should be able to communicate to his own Government the result of his application. He therefore requests an interview as early as will suit the convenience of the Duke de Richelieu.

The undersigned embraces with pleasure this opportunity of presenting to his excellency the Duke de Richelieu the reiterated assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

The Duke de Richelieu to Mr. Gallatin.

[Translation.]

PARIS, January 16, 1817.

The Duke de Richelieu cannot but deeply regret that his weighty and multiplied avocations have compelled him to put off until this moment the time he had promised himself to receive Mr. Gallatin, and now fixes the time for Monday morning, the 20th of the present month, at noon, if that day meets his convenience.

He prays him to accept, meanwhile, the renewed assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

Extract of a letter, No. 27, from Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State, dated Paris, April 23, 1817.

"I had an interview on the 13th instant with the Duke de Richelieu, in which he announced to me that he had concluded not to give a written answer to my note of the 9th of November last, on the subject of American claims. The claims of the subjects of European powers which France was, by the convention of 1815, bound to pay, had been estimated at a sum not exceeding, at most, one hundred and fifty millions of francs, or an annuity of seven and a half millions. But it was now found that the terms thus imposed were much harsher than the French Government had expected or than the allies themselves had intended. The reclamations, under the convention with Great Britain, did not indeed exceed the sum of fifty millions, at which they had been estimated; but those of the subjects of continental powers, filed with the commission appointed for that purpose, exceeded twelve hundred millions, without including a portion of the Spanish claims, the time for presenting which had not yet expired. Many of those demands would undoubtedly be rejected or reduced by the commission. Still, the probable amount which might be declared justly due so far exceeded every previous calculation, and was so much beyond the ability of France to pay, that he (the Duke) was now employed in seeking some means of obtaining modifications which might bring the payments in some measure within the resources of the country. Under such circumstances, and whilst unable to face the engagements which superior force had imposed on them, it was, he said, utterly impossible for his Majesty's Government to contract voluntarily new obligations. They were not willing to reject absolutely and definitively our reclamations in toto; they could not at this time admit them. What he had now verbally communicated could not, for many reasons, become the ground of an official answer to my note. He had therefore concluded that a silent postponement of the subject was the least objectionable course, since, having now made our demand for indemnity in an official manner, the question would be left entire for discussion at some more favorable time, after France was in some degree disentangled from her present difficulties. He added, that if there was any apparent inconsistency between the language he had formerly held and what he was now compelled to say, it must be ascribed to the circumstances he had stated, to the extraordinary and frightful amount to which he had lately found other foreign claims to have swelled.

"After some remarks on the disappointment which, after what had passed in our first conversations, this unexpected determination must produce, I replied that the payment by France of exaggerated and doubtful claims to the subjects of every other foreign power did but increase the injustice of refusing to admit the moderate and unexceptionable demands of the American citizens. The present embarrassments of France, however, increased by the magnitude of those foreign private claims, could form no solid objection to the recognition and liquidation, although they might impede the immediate discharge of our reclamations. It was with this view of the subject that I had, from the first outset, expressed the disposition of the Government of the United States to accommodate that of France, as to the time and manner of making compensation to the claimants. I added, that his declining to answer my note in writing would, exclusively of other objections, leave no trace of the ground on which he placed the postponement of the subject.

"The Duke, without answering my observations in a direct way, gave me to understand that, after the great sacrifices to which the King's ministers had been compelled to give a reluctant assent, and the magnitude of which would soon be known, they would not dare to take the responsibility of acknowledging a new debt, although made payable at a distant period.

"On my mentioning that his Majesty's Government had voluntarily recognized all the engagements previously contracted with French subjects, and which constituted what was called the arriéré, and suggesting that the sequestrations of American property might be considered as coming under that description, which would prevent the necessity of asking a specific credit for that object from the legislative body, he answered that the law would not justify such a construction.

"Having exhausted every argument which the occasion suggested, I ended the conference, by saying, that as I could not compel him to give me a written answer, I would reflect on the course which it behooved me to pursue, and that probably I would refer the case to my Government. He said that he intended to write to Mr. de Neuville to make to you a communication similar to that which he now had made to me."

"I addressed to him yesterday the letter of which a copy is inclosed. Its principal object, as you will perceive, is to put on record the ground on which he had himself placed the postponement of the subject, and to leave the door open to further representations respecting cases of property not condemned, in case you should think it best not to urge further at present the demand for indemnity in all cases."

Mr. Gallatin to the Duke de Richelieu.

PARIS, April 22, 1817.

MONSIEUR LE DUC: In the interview which I had the honor to have with your excellency on the 13th instant, you intimated that the increased magnitude of the claims made upon France by subjects of European powers, under the conventions of the year 1815, rendered it necessary to postpone to a more favorable time the discussion of the American claims which were the subject of my note of the 9th of November last. Without repeating here the unavailing arguments which I urged against this indefinite and unexpected delay, I will only say that I am not authorized to accede to it, and that it cannot be viewed favorably by the Government of the United States, after the assurances which had been given of its disposition to concur in any reasonable arrangement which might be proposed, with respect to the time and manner of making compensation to the claimants.

I presume, however, that the postponement is intended to apply only to those claims which, though founded on strict justice, were found by his Majesty's Government in a situation that seemed to render a convention necessary for their proper adjustment. The demands for property burnt at sea, or seized and sequestered without having ever been condemned or even brought to a trial before any tribunal whatever, are not of that description. They are, to all intents and purposes, an arriéré, or unliquidated debt, for property seized, which, if not condemned, must be paid for, and the settlement of which does not require a specific convention. It cannot be supposed that, after his Majesty's Government has not only agreed to pay various foreign claims, of a different nature, but has recognized all those of French subjects arising from the acts of the former Governments of France, the citizens of the United States should alone be excepted from the operation of those measures dictated by justice and sound policy which, under most arduous circumstances, have so eminently contributed to surmount every difficulty and to restore public credit. If any distinction was, indeed, attempted to be made, it should be in favor of the citizens of a foreign nation at peace, whose property was forcibly arrested from them, rather than in favor of subjects who voluntarily advanced theirs, and in many instances with a view to an expected profit. But no such distinction is claimed; and I only trust that, whilst the communication made to me compels me to wait for further orders from my Government on the subject of American claims generally, those of the description last mentioned shall not remain suspended, and that orders shall be given to the proper authorities for their speedy liquidation and for discharging them in a manner as favorable, at least, as that which has been provided for the claims of French subjects known by the name of arriéré.

I request your excellency to accept the assurances of the distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Gallatin, (No. 37,) detailing the substance of a conversation with the Duke de Richelieu, to the Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, July 12, 1817.

"He (the Duke de Richelieu) then said that he wished it to be clearly understood that the postponement of our claims for spoiliations was not a rejection; that a portion of them was considered as founded in justice; that he was not authorized to commit his Majesty's Government by any positive promise; but that it was their intention to make an arrangement for the discharge of our just demands as soon as they were extricated from their present embarrassments. He still persisted, however, in his former ground, that they could not, at present, recognize the debt or adjust its amount."

---

Extract of a letter from the same, (No. 55,) to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, January 2, 1818.

"Fifteen millions are spoken of, which, with the five millions already paid, and the three allotted to British subjects, will make an aggregate of four hundred and sixty millions, in five per cent. stock, paid by France for European private claims. Ours, in the mean while, remain in the same situation; and I wait for an answer to my despatch, No. 27, (of the 23d of April last,) before I take any new steps on the subject."

---

Extract of a letter from the same, (No. 67,) to the same, dated

PARIS, April 27, 1818.

"I had, in my letter of the 2d of January last, mentioned that I would wait for an answer from your Department to my despatch of the 23d April, 1817, before I took any new steps on the subject of our own claims; and I had no expectation that a new application would at this moment prove successful. Yet it appeared that, to remain altogether silent, at the moment when an arrangement for the claims of the subjects of every other nation was on the eve of being concluded, might, in some degree, be injurious to the rights of our citizens. It was also apprehended that, in their public communications, the ministers of the King, wishing to render the new convention as palatable as possible, might announce to the nation, in general terms, that all the foreign claims of individuals were now satisfied. These considerations induced me to address to the Duke de Richelieu the note of the 3d instant, of which I have the honor to inclose a copy, as well as of that by which he acknowledged the receipt of mine. You will perceive that, in his communication to the Chambers, (which has been inserted correctly in no other newspaper than the Moniteur.) that he has expressed himself in the following terms: 'France (by this payment) is liberated, both as to principal and interest, from all the debts contracted towards the subjects of the other European powers, prior to the 20th November, 1815.' The consideration of our claims is not, therefore, barred by anything which has taken place; but there is not yet any disposition to take up the subject."

---

Mr. Gallatin to the Duke de Richelieu.

PARIS, April 3, 1818.

MONSIEUR LE DUC: I have not had the honor to address your excellency on the subject of American claims since my letter of the 22d of April last. The disposition of the Government of the United States never to abandon the just rights of their citizens, and, at the same time, to pay every due regard to the unfavorable circumstances under which France has been placed, is sufficiently known to your excellency. It is, however, notorious that negotiations are now carried on for the amicable liquidation of all the private claims of the subjects of European powers against France; and it is generally believed that the negotiations are on the eve of being terminated, and that the sum to be paid on that account will be definitively settled. The magnitude of those claims, and the uncertain result of the liquidations contemplated by the former conventions with the allied powers, had been alleged, in April last, as reasons which rendered it necessary to postpone, at that time, the consideration of American reclamations. It has therefore become my duty to bring these once more to your excellency's recollection.

It is not my intention to renew, at this moment, the discussion of the justice of our demands. In this stage of the business, I could only refer to the facts and observations contained in former notes, which still remain unanswered. But I must say that further delays in the adjustment of American claims, when those of the subjects of other nations are settled, could not be viewed favorably by the Government of the United States; whilst, on the other hand, a simultaneous and definitive arrangement of all foreign demands arising from the injustice of the former Government of France seems most consistent with sound policy, and could not fail to have a beneficial effect on public credit.

Whatever course may be pursued, I feel satisfied that the result of the late negotiations with the European powers will not be considered or announced by his Majesty's Government as a total liberation of all the foreign claims of individuals; for, however unsuccessful my endeavors may heretofore have been, I have uniformly ascribed that result to the untoward situation of France; and I know that my Government has never ceased to place a firm reliance on the spirit of justice and good faith which animates his Majesty's councils.

I request your excellency to accept the assurance of the distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be your excellency's most obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

[Translation.]

PARIS, April 7, 1818.

SIR: You have done me the honor to address to me, on the 3d of this month, some new observations on the American claims which I shall take care to lay before his Majesty.

Accept, sir, the assurances of the high consideration with which I have the honor to be your very humble and obedient servant,

RICHELIEU.

Extracts of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Gallatin, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 31, 1818.

"No communication from you since your return to France has yet been received; but it is hoped that since the foreign troops have been withdrawn from that country, and an adjustment has been made by the French Government of the claims of the subjects of European powers, there will be time and a disposition to make a suitable provision for those of citizens of the United States."

"Meanwhile, you have herewith inclosed a copy of a statement made to this Department of a claim of Archibald Gracie & Sons, which appears to stand upon grounds so peculiar and unexceptionable that we cannot but hope the French Government will give immediate satisfaction upon it, without waiting for the discussion or delay which may be thought necessary for others, and without prejudice or disparagement to them."

---

PARIS, February 11, 1819.

MONSIEUR LE MARQUIS: I have the honor to transmit to your excellency a memorial addressed by Mr. Parish, a citizen of the United States, to his excellency the Minister of Finance, on the subject of a claim which it appears has been laid before that Department.

Having been confined for the last three weeks by indisposition, I have been prevented from asking an interview of your excellency, with which I was desirous of being favored before I presented to you this memorial and renewed my application for the settlement of the American claims in general. But having recently received very special orders from my Government, accompanied by a particular recommendation of Mr. Parish's claim, I am no longer at liberty to defer the discussion of this interesting concern.

I have, therefore, to request your excellency to have the goodness to examine the official notes which I had the honor to address to the Duke of Richelieu upon the subject of these claims and to which I have yet received no answer. I shall not now enlarge upon the view presented in my note of November 9, 1816. By that of April 22, 1817, it will be seen that the negotiations on that subject were suspended solely in consideration of the trying situation in which France was then placed, and especially of the embarrassments of the administration by the enormous and unexpected mass of claims brought forward by the subjects of allied powers. These obstacles are now happily removed; every demand of all the European powers and their subjects has been amicably adjusted and settled. The rights, so legitimate, of the citizens of the United States alone remain unsatisfied. My Government, preserving an unshaken confidence in his Majesty, cannot doubt that the time has at length arrived when ample justice will be rendered to its claims.

With respect to that of Mr. Parish, it may be remarked that it is very simple and is susceptible of being adjusted without waiting the result of or in the least interfering with a general settlement. In fact, the cargoes in question were never condemned, but were only sold for the joint benefit of all, and the proceeds deposited provisionally in the Sinking Fund. It is further important to remark, that by an order of the French Government permission was granted to the consignees of cargoes sequestered at that period, at Antwerp, to take possession and dispose of them on their giving an obligation to become responsible for the amount to the public treasury, in the event of a decision pronouncing their confiscation. The house of Mr. Ridgway, consul of the United States, together with that of Mr. Parish, refused their assent to a condition which implied an admission of the legality of the seizure. The European consignees, with whom this consideration had no weight, received and sold their goods; and their obligations were subsequently returned to them. Thus, by refunding to the houses of Ridgway and Parish the proceeds of the cargoes consigned to them, the decision which was virtually carried into effect in the case of all others similarly situated will only receive its due application as it regards them.

I have to observe that, although the claims of both these houses are perfectly similar to each other, that of Mr. Parish is the only one which appears to have been taken into consideration by the Department of Finance.

In the hope that my health may soon permit me to confer personally with your excellency, I have the honor to be, &c., &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, July 3, 1819.

"I transmitted, in my despatch No. 100, the copy of the letter which I had addressed to Marquis Dessolle, on the 11th of February last, on the subject of American claims in general, and more particularly of that of Messrs. Gracie and Parish.

"On the 23d of March, in transmitting to the same minister a letter from Mr. Hyde de Neuville, in behalf of Mr. Gracie, I reminded him of my preceding note, and requested that a report which the Director General of the Douanes was shortly to make on the claim might be communicated to me before the Minister of Finances should decide upon it. This was the more important, as the Director was known to be decidedly hostile to the claim, and to the restitution of any sum which had, in any shape, found its way to the public treasury.

"My request was not complied with; but Mr. Parish still thought that the affair had taken a favorable turn, and, not expecting an immediate decision, left this city for Antwerp, and went thence on some business to England. From this last country he wrote to me a few days ago, and transmitted the inclosed copy of a letter addressed to him by the Minister of Finances, and by which he is informed that his claim is inadmissible.

"The minister's letter is not less incorrect as to facts than weak in argument. The order to sell and to pay into the treasury the proceeds of the sales of sequestered property is not and was not, by the then existing Government, considered as a condemnation. When the vessels in question arrived at Antwerp, the only penalty to which they were liable for having touched in England was to be refused admission, and the only question was whether this exclusion should be enforced, or whether the consignees should be permitted to sell the cargoes. It was not at all by giving a retrospective effect to the Milan decree that the cargoes were sold. The sale took place about the same time that the property seized at St. Sebastian was sold. It was done by virtue of an order from Government, distinct from the Rambouillet decree, and for which no motive was assigned. I have requested Mr. Parish's lawyer to procure copies of the order of sale, and of that by which the money was paid into the public treasury, instead of the caisse d'amortissement; for, although the substance of the orders is known, the text has not been communicated.

"But, however easy it might be to answer the minister's letter, there would be some inconvenience in pursuing that course, or in prosecuting further Mr. Parish's claim distinct from others of the same nature."

"The decision of the Minister of Finances, founded on the assumed principle that no redress remains when the money has been paid into the treasury and been expended, would apply with equal force to all the American claims. If it becomes necessary to combat seriously that doctrine, it will be better to do it generally, and in a direct correspondence with the Minister of Foreign Affairs, than by answering a letter which is not addressed to me, and applying my arguments to a single case."

"In the present state of things I will try, until I am positively instructed to keep the negotiation alive, but without urging a decision, unless I can ascertain that a favorable result will be thus obtained."

The Minister of Finance to Mr. Parish.

[Translation.]

PARIS, May 22, 1819.

SIR: You have applied, in behalf of Mr. Archibald Gracie, of New York, for the restitution of the value of the cargoes of three American ships—the Perseverance, the Hiram, and the Mary—sequestered by the Imperial Government in 1807, and the proceeds of which were afterwards confiscated by it.

Having had a detailed statement laid before me of the circumstances connected with this transaction, the documents exhibited established the following facts:

By a decree issued at Berlin, November 21, 1806, the British islands were placed in a state of blockade. By articles 7 and 8 of this decree, every vessel coming directly from England, or from the English colonies, or having been there since the publication of the said decree, was refused admission into any port; and every vessel attempting to contravene that clause, by means of a false declaration, was, together with the cargo, subject to seizure and confiscation, as if they were English property. It was while these legislative measures were in force that the three ships in question arrived at Antwerp, to your address. They had put into England—a circumstance which was, however, not considered by the custom-house as an irremissible cause of confiscation, there being reason to presume that it was through stress of weather.

In the interval of time previous to the decision which was to be made by the chief of the State, a proposal was made to you to dispose, conditionally, of the cargoes of these vessels, on your engaging to refund the proceeds, in the event of their final confiscation. You refused your assent to this offer, and, at a subsequent period, claimed its execution; but things had then changed, the legislative measures having become more rigorous.

By a decree of 23d November, 1807, it was declared:

“ARTICLE 1. That all vessels which, after touching in England, from any cause whatsoever, shall enter the ports of France, shall be seized and confiscated, together with their cargoes, without exception or distinction, of goods and merchandise.”

By a retrospective effect, which I am certainly very far from wishing to justify, but to which it is proper to advert, because it forms one of the striking features of the case, this decree of November 23 was enforced as to these three vessels. It was ineffectually that the Director General of the Customs represented to the head of the Government that the English had no interest whatever in these three vessels, and that they were solely and bona fide American property, an immediate sale of their cargoes having been ordered by the supreme authority on the 4th of May, 1810. This order was carried into execution on the 15th of June following, and the proceeds, at first deposited in the Sinking Fund, were subsequently withdrawn, in conformity, also, with the same superior orders, and placed in the public treasury, as having definitively become the property of the State.

I admit with you, sir, the iniquity of these measures, and with you I deplore their effects, but to repair them is not within the compass of my power. If the cargoes in question still existed in the custom-house stores, they should be immediately restored to you, but they were sold, and their proceeds no longer exist. The whole transaction was terminated, irrevocably terminated, four years prior to the restoration, and it is not within the power of his Majesty's Government to revive an obsolete claim, to renew a discussion on rights which are extinct, or to repair individual losses by an augmentation of the public burdens.

With the expression of my regrets, be pleased, sir, to accept the assurance of my perfect consideration.

BARON LOUIS,

The Minister of Finance and Secretary of State.

No. 140.

PARIS, March 16, 1820.

SIR: I had, on the 9th of June, 1818, addressed a letter to the Duke de Richelieu in relation to the American vessels “Dolly” and “Telegraph,” burnt at sea by two French frigates in the latter end of the year 1811. Mr. Lagrange, the lawyer of the owners, communicated to me, a short time ago, the decision of the Council of State in that case, copy of which, as well as of my letter to the Duke de Richelieu, is herewith inclosed. You will thereby perceive that the application for indemnity has been rejected principally on the ground that the French captains must have been ignorant of the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees, since the decree of April 28, 1811, was not published till the 8th of May, 1812.

It appeared to me essential not only to remonstrate against this flagrant injustice, but also to refute at large the doctrine thus attempted to be established in violation of the solemn engagements of the French Government. The effect the decision might have on our claims in general, and the ground which had been uniformly assumed by the Government of the United States in its discussions with that of Great Britain, and in all the public reports made on that subject, are considerations too obvious to require any comment on my part.

I have the honor to inclose a copy of the letter which I have addressed to Mr. Pasquier on the occasion, and am, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, *Secretary of State, Washington.*PARIS, June 9, 1818.

MONSIEUR LE DUC: I had heretofore abstained from addressing your excellency on the subject of special American claims for spoliations committed on our commerce by the French authorities. A general decision had appeared, and still seems to be, the most eligible mode of coming to a satisfactory arrangement. Being, however, informed that some cases are still pending before the Council of State, it becomes my duty to depart in these instances from the line of conduct I had adopted.

I have, therefore, the honor to transmit to your excellency a memoir, addressed to the King in council, in behalf of the owners of the ships and cargoes of the American vessels Dolly and Telegraph, burnt at sea in November and December, 1811, by the French frigates la Méduse and la Nymphe.

It is certainly preposterous to suppose that his Majesty's council will, at this time, condemn American vessels for any presumed contravention to the iniquitous decrees of Berlin and Milan. But a discussion of that point is not even necessary in these cases. It is evident that those vessels were destroyed several months, at least, after the solemn revocation of those decrees, so far as respected the United States. It is equally evident that neither the presumed fact that the captors were ignorant of that revocation nor the omission of formalities, to use no stronger language, on their part, can be plead against the American owners. It seems unnecessary, in a case so plain, to enforce those arguments or to anticipate objections. In simply recommending it to your excellency's attention, I feel a perfect confidence that the parties will obtain from his Majesty's council that decision in their favor which has been too long protracted and to which they are so justly entitled.

I pray your excellency to accept, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN

His Excellency the DUKE DE RICHELIEU,
Minister of Foreign Affairs, &c.

Louis, par la Grace de Dieu, Roi de France et de Navarre, sur le rapport du Comité du Contentieux.

Vû la requête à nous présenté au nom des propriétaires et chargeurs des navires Américains le Dolly, et le Télégraphe, capturés le 29 Novembre et 6 Décembre, 1811, par les frégates Françaises le Méduse et la Nymphe, et brutés en mer par les orders du Sieur Raoul, capitaine de la frégate la Méduse et commandant la dite division; la dite requête enregistrée au Secrétariat Général de notre Conseil d'Etat, le 11 Juin, 1818, et tendant à ce qu'il nous plaise—

1. Declarer les dites captures nulles et illecales;

2. Ordonner que les propriétaires des dits navires et de leur chargements seroient indemnisés des pertes et dommages que le brulement leur a occasionné;

3. Les renvoyer devant qui de droit pour la liquidation des dites indemnités, sous la reserve de tous moyens et exceptions, notamment d'agir et de conclure, ainsi qu'il appartiendra, contre les auteurs ou complices des soustractions qu'ils pretendent avoir été commises à bord des deux navires, et généralement sous toutes les réserves de droit;

Vû les procès-verbaux de la prise et du brulement des navires Américains le Dolly et le Télégraphe, rédigés en mer les 29 Novembre et 6 December, 1811, signés des capitaine, lieutenant, enseignes de vaisseau et agent comptable composant l'équipage de la frégate la Méduse;

Vû les actes de protest et déclaration faits par devant le consul des Etats-Unis à L'Orient, savoir par le Sieur Stephen Bayard, capitaine du navire le Télégraphe, le 11 Janvier, 1812, et par le Sr. Guillaume Friat, passager à bord du Dolly, et se disant propriétaire de diverses marchandises embarquées à bord du dit bâtiment, en date du 29 Décembre, 1811;

Vû les connaissements et actes d'affirmation annexés à ces déclaration;

Vû les conclusions, en date du 31 Octobre, 1814, du Procureur Général près le Conseil des Prises, à qui ces réclamations avoient été soumises;

Vû la décision prise par se conseil le même jour, 31 Octobre, 1814, par laquelle il étoit ordonné qu'avant faire droit, les personnes composant les équipages des frégates le Méduse et la Nymphe seroient interrogés sur les diverses circonstances des dites prises;

Vû les procès-verbaux des interrogatoires subis le 13 Janvier, 1815, par le Sr. Raoul, capitaine de la frégate la Méduse, et le Sr. Crom, alors contre maitre sur la même frégate desquels il resulte que ses prises et brulemens ont en lieu en suite de ses instructions, qui lui prescrivoient l'exécution des decrets de Berlin et de Milan;

Vû les decrets datés de Berlin, du 21 Novembre, 1806, et de Milan, des 23 Novembre et 17 Décembre, 1807;

Considérant qu'il est constant que le navire le Dolly, chargé de marchandises à la destination de la Havane sortoit de Liverpool, port de la domination Anglaise, et que le navire le Télégraphe, charge de farine à Philadelphia, étoit destiné pour Lisbonne, occupé à cette époque par les troupes Anglaises; et que dès lors ces batimens naviguoient en contravention aux decrets de Berlin et de Milan;

Considérant que la première notification publique qui ait été donnée du décret de révocation des dits decrets à l'égard des Américains, n'a lieu que les notes insérées dans le Moniteur du huit Mai, 1812, plusieurs mois après la prise des dits batimens, et que des lors des capitains de la Méduse et de la Nymphe ne pouvoient en avoir connoissance, et qu'il paroît même d'après la note en date du 12 Mars, 1812, attribuée par les requérans au ministre plénipotentiaire des Etats-Unis, qu'à cette époque ce ministre lui même ne la conpoissoit pas—

Notre Conseil d'Etat entendu, nous avons ordonné et ordonnons, ce qui suit:

ARR. 1er. La requête des propriétaires et chargeurs des navires le Télégraphe et le Dolly est rejetée, sans rien préjuger sur les réserves insérées dans leurs conclusions.

ARR. 2me. Notre Garde des Sceaux. Ministre le Secrétaire d'Etat au Département de la Justice, et notre Ministre Secrétaire d'Etat au Departement de la Marine et des Colonies, sont chargés, chacun en ce qui le concerne, de l'exécution de la présente ordonnance.

Approuvé le 29 Decembre, 1819.

COUNCIL OF STATE.

Extract from the Register of Deliberations, session of December 23, 1819.

Louis, by the grace of God King of France and Navarre, upon the report of the Board of Questions:

Having seen the petition presented to us in the name of the proprietors and owners of the American ships the Dolly and the Telegraph, captured on the 29th November and 6th December, 1811, by the French frigates the Meduse and the Nymphe, and burnt at sea by the orders of Mr. Raoul, captain of the frigate Meduse, and commander of said division, the said petition being registered at the Secretary General's Office of our Council of State the 11th June, 1818, and that it would be our pleasure—

1st. To declare the said captures null and illegal;

2d. To ordain that the proprietors of said ships, and of their lading, should be indemnified for the losses which the burning them has occasioned;

3d. To remit them to the legal tribunal for the liquidation of said indemnities, under the reservation of all means and exceptions; especially to proceed and conclude as shall be proper against the authors or accomplices of the abstractions which they pretend to have been committed on board of the two ships, and generally under all the reservations of right;

Having seen the procès-verbal of the capture and of the burning of the American ships Dolly and Telegraph, which occurred at sea on the 29th November and 6th December, 1811, signed by the captain, lieutenant, ensigns de vaisseau, (second lieutenants,) and purser, (agent comptable,) composing the crew of the frigate la Meduse;

Having seen the acts of protest and declaration made before the consul of the United States at L'Orient, to wit, by Mr. Stephen Bayard, captain of the ship Telegraph, on the 11th January, 1812, and by Mr. William Friat, passenger on board the Dolly, and calling himself proprietor of divers merchandise embarked on board of said vessel, dated 29th December, 1811;

Having seen the bills of lading and affidavits annexed to these declarations;

Having seen the conclusions, dated 31st October, 1814, of the Attorney General before the council of prizes, to whom these claims had been submitted;

Having seen the decision made by this council, on the same 31st October, 1814, by which it was ordained that, before a decree, the persons composing the crews of the frigates la Meduse and la Nymphe should be interrogated upon the different circumstances of said captures;

Having seen the procès-verbal of the interrogatories undergone on the 13th January, 1815, by Mr. Raoul, captain of the frigate la Meduse, and Mr. Crom, at that time boatswain's mate in the same frigate, from which it results that these captures and burnings took place in consequence of their instructions, which prescribed to them the execution of the Berlin and Milan decrees;

Having seen the decrees, dated, that of Berlin on the 21st November, 1806, and that of Milan on the 23d November and 17th December, 1807;

Considering that it is evident that the ship the Dolly, laden with merchandise for Havana, sailed from Liverpool, a port of the English dominion, and that the ship the Telegraph, laden with flour at Philadelphia, was destined for Lisbon, at that time occupied by the English troops, and that since that time these vessels sailed in contravention of the Berlin and Milan decrees;

Considering that the first public notification which was given of the revocation of said decrees, with respect to the Americans, took place only by the notes inserted in the Moniteur of the 8th of May, 1812, several months after the capture of said vessel, and that from that time the captains of the la Meduse and la Nymphe could not know it; and that it even appears, according to the note dated 12th March, 1812, imputed by the petitioners to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, that at that time this minister himself did not know it;

Having heard our Council of State, we have ordained and do ordain as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The petition of the proprietors and owners of the ships Telegraph and Dolly is rejected, without prejudging anything of the reservations inserted in their conclusions.

ARTICLE 2. Our Keeper of the Seals, Minister Secretary of State of the Department of Justice, and our Minister Secretary of State of the Department of the Marine and of the Colonies, are charged, each in what concerns him, with the execution of the present ordinance.

Approved the 29th December, 1819.

LOUIS.

By the King: The Keeper of the Seals, Minister of Justice,

H. DE SERRE.

Copy conform to the minute registered at Paris the 6th January, 1820, by Billard, who has received 29f. 50c., duty included.

The Secretary General of the Council of State,

HOCHET.

Mr. Gallatin to Baron Pasquier.

PARIS, March 15, 1820.

SIR: The American brig "Dolly," bound from Liverpool to Havana and New Orleans with a valuable cargo, was captured and burned at sea on the 29th of November, 1811, by the French frigates "Méduse" and "Nymphe." On the 6th of December following the same frigates also captured and burned the American ship "Telegraph," bound from New York to Lisbon with a cargo consisting principally of flour. Mr. Barlow, then minister of the United States at Paris, addressed, on the 12th of March, 1812, a strong remonstrance on the subject to the Duke of Bassano, then Minister of Exterior Relations. The death of the American consul, with whom the captains of the vessels destroyed had left their powers, and the interruption in the communications occasioned by the war which took place in 1812 between the United States and Great Britain, created a delay in the regular application of the parties, and prevented an immediate decision. The affair in the meanwhile took the usual course, and was transferred, in 1815, from the council of prizes to a committee of the Council of State. On the application of the parties, I had the honor, on the 9th of June, 1818, to transmit their memoire to his excellency the Duke de Richelieu, and added such short observations as the case seemed to require.

It was with equal astonishment and regret that I received, a few days ago, the information that the application of the parties for indemnity had been rejected by a decision of the Council of State of the 23d of December, 1819, on the following grounds:

“Considérant qu'il est constant que le navire le Dolly chargé de marchandises à la destination de la Havane, sortoit de Liverpool, port de la domination Anglaise, et que le navire le Télégraphe, chargé de farine à Philadelphie, étoit destiné pour Lisbonne, occupé à cette époque par les troupes Anglaises; et que, dès lors, ces batimens naviguoient en contravention aux décrets de Berlin et de Milan:

“Considérant que la première notification publique qui ait été donnée du décret de revocation des dits décrets à l'égard des Américains n'a eu lieu que par les notes insérés dans le Moniteur du huit Mai, 1812, plusieurs mois après la prise des dits batimens, et que, dès lors, les capitaines de la Méduse et de la Nymphe ne pourroient, en avoir connoissance, et qu'il paroît même, d'après la note en date du 12 Mars, 1812, attribuée par les réquérans au Ministre Plénipotentiaire des États Unis, qu'à cette époque lui-même ne la connoissoit pas.

I must, in the first place, enter my most solemn protest against this decision, so far as it seems to sanction the Berlin and Milan decrees. These acts were in flagrant violation of the law of nations and of common justice. The United States never acquiesced in them, and have never ceased to claim the indemnity justly due to American citizens for the injuries and losses they suffered by reason of those illegal enactments. But it is unnecessary on this occasion to discuss that question. The owners of the Dolly and Telegraph claimed indemnity solely on the ground of the previous revocation of the decrees so far as they applied to the American commerce; and it is to that point alone that I beg leave to call your excellency's attention.

I am at a loss to understand whether by the decision of the Council of State it was intended to assert that the ignorance on the part of the French captains of the revocation of the decrees deprives the parties of their right to an indemnity, or to suggest that the revocation was to take effect only from the date of its publication in the Moniteur. Both positions are equally untenable.

The Council of State seems to have been unacquainted with the circumstances which attended the revocation of the decrees, and to have supposed that that revocation depended only on the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, and to have considered this last decree not as the result of a solemn engagement but as a mere municipal law, or at least as a gratuitous concession to the United States. It is difficult, even on that supposition, to understand how they could omit altogether to take notice of the clause which gives to the decree a retrospective effect. But it is not on that decree as an insulated act that the United States found their demand for indemnity. A recapitulation of the facts connected with the revocation will place the question on its true ground. Permit me first to take notice of an error in the statement of the council.

This error consists in supposing that the minister of the United States, when writing his letter of the 12th of March, 1812, to the Duke of Bassano, was not aware of the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees. His ignorance in that respect, had it been real, would not have affected the rights of the claimants; but the supposition on the part of the Council of State that he was unacquainted with it, is an evident proof that their own decision is founded in error, and must be solely ascribed to the facts not having been properly laid before them. If, in his letter to the Minister of External Relations, Mr. Barlow did not mention by name the revocation of the illegal decrees, it was because he considered the burning at sea of two American vessels as a wanton outrage not at all connected with those decrees, which, indeed, did not authorize any such proceeding. It was, perhaps, also because the revocation was so well known both to him and to the Duke of Bassano that it had become unnecessary to refer to it on every occasion. That it was thus known is sufficiently proven by all the correspondence between them, as it stands in the archives of the department over which your excellency presides. It will be sufficient for me to quote Mr. Barlow's letter to the Duke of Bassano of the 6th of February, 1812, and written, therefore, about a month prior to the time at which he is supposed to have been ignorant of the revocation. In that letter (of the 6th of February, 1812) Mr. Barlow complains that the brig Belisarius, of New York, was about to be confiscated as liable to the decree of Milan, and then says: “I know positively that this American vessel left New York the 17th of June, 1811, seven months after the revocation of the decrees of Milan and Berlin.” He concludes by ascribing the decision to an error of date, by which the year 1810 may have been taken for the year 1811, and asking for a revision of the affair. The Duke of Bassano, in his answer dated the 16th of March, 1812, informs Mr. Barlow that the difficulty in that case arose from some irregularity in the ship papers respecting the ownership, which was a formal contravention of the rules of navigation generally adopted and established at all times; that the vessel and the part of the cargo of which the ownership (pour compte) was proven would be given up, and time allowed to establish the fact that the residue of the cargo was American property conformably to the ancient rules.

All the facts relative to the revocation of the decrees are, indeed, so perfectly known to the French Department of Foreign Affairs, that I thought it unnecessary, in my letter of the 9th of June, 1818, to his excellency the Duke de Richelieu, to say anything more on the subject, but barely to refer to it. I had presumed that every explanation on that point which the Council of State might require would be, of course, supplied by that Department; and the following statement of facts is intended for that body, and not for the purpose of giving any new information to your excellency.

It is well known that the Government of the United States attempted, by various successive measures of the most moderate and conciliatory nature, to avert the injuries inflicted on the commerce of their citizens by the unlawful decrees of France and Great Britain, to obtain redress for those injuries, and, above all, to induce both powers to rescind those decrees and to adopt a course consistent with justice and with the acknowledged law of nations.

An embargo of fifteen months' duration was succeeded by the act of Congress of the 1st of March, 1809, which prohibited the introduction of British and French merchandise into the United States, and interdicted their ports to vessels of both nations. To this temporary act, which expired on the 1st of May, 1810, another was substituted, of the same date, by which it was enacted: 1. That the ports of the United States should be interdicted to the armed vessels of France and Great Britain. 2. That if either of those two powers should, prior to the 3d of March, 1811, revoke its unlawful edicts, (which fact the President of the United States should declare by proclamation,) the interdiction thus imposed on armed vessels should cease in relation to such power. 3. That if the other nation should not, in that case, revoke her unlawful edicts within three months thereafter, the restrictions imposed by the act of the 1st of March, 1809, that is to say, the prohibition to import merchandise and the interdiction of all vessels, should, at the expiration of three months after the proclamation aforesaid, be revived, in relation to the nation thus refusing to revoke her edicts.

This last act of Congress of the 1st of May, 1810, having been communicated both to the French and to the British Government, the Duke de Cadore, then Minister of External Relations, addressed on the 5th of August, 1810, a letter to Mr. Armstrong, then minister of the United States, at Paris, in which, after having commented on the various acts of Congress, he says: "In this new state of things I am authorized to declare to you that the decrees of Berlin and Milan are revoked, and that after the first of November they will cease to have effect; it being understood that in consequence of this declaration the English shall revoke their orders in council and renounce the new principles of blockade which they have wished to establish, or that the United States, conformably to the act you have just communicated, shall cause their rights to be respected by the English."

The execution of this revocation depended then on the alternative of two conditions, one of which was not under the control of the United States; but the other was only that they should act conformably to what they had already announced to be their determination.

The President of the United States did accordingly, by his proclamation of the 2d of November, 1810, declare that the decrees of France, in question, had been revoked, so as to have ceased to have effect on the 1st day of that month, and that all the restrictions imposed by the act of Congress of the 1st of May, 1810, were henceforth to cease in relation to France.

On the same day, the 2d of November, 1810, the Secretary of the Treasury Department of the United States transmitted the President's proclamation to the several Collectors of Customs, and gave them instructions for the immediate admission of French armed vessels in the ports of the United States, and for the exclusion of all British vessels, and the prohibition of all British merchandise after the 2d of February, 1811, that is to say, three months after the date of the President's proclamation, in case they, the said Collectors, should not before that day be officially notified by the Treasury Department that Great Britain had revoked her unlawful edicts.

Although both those documents were at the time officially communicated to the French Government, copies are again herewith inclosed.

Great Britain not having revoked her edicts, the interdiction of her vessels and merchandise accordingly took place on the 2d of February, 1811. It received an additional sanction by the act of Congress of the 2d of March following, and continued in force till the month of June, 1812, when, in addition to that measure, Great Britain still persevering in her refusal, the United States found themselves at last obliged to declare war against her.

The United States having thus, with perfect good faith, fulfilled the engagement contracted by their act of the 1st of May, 1810, and on which the execution of the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees was made to depend, it follows that the right to demand the complete execution of that revocation from the 1st of November, 1810, and an indemnity in every case where injuries were sustained subsequent to that day by American citizens, under color of those decrees, is fully established as the result of a positive compact, and is altogether independent of any subsequent act of the French Government. That right would remain entire even if that Government had departed from their engagement and had attempted to revive the Berlin and Milan decrees with respect to the United States. This, however, was not the case.

On the 25th of December, 1810, two letters were addressed, one by the Duke of Massa, Minister of Justice, to the President of the Council of Prizes, the other by the Duke of Gaëte, Minister of Finance, to the Director General of the Customs. Both letters recapitulate the paragraph already quoted, of the Duke of Cadore's letter of the 5th of August, 1810, to Mr. Armstrong, and the substance of the proclamation of the President of the United States, and of the circular letter of the Secretary of their Treasury Department of the 2d of November, 1810. The Director General of the Customs is accordingly informed that the Berlin and Milan decrees must not be applied to any American vessels that have entered French ports since the 1st of November, or may enter in future. By the letter of the Grand Judge, Minister of Justice, it is ordered that "in consequence of the engagement entered into by the United States (the President's proclamation and the circular of the Secretary of the Treasury) all the causes that may be pending in the Council of Prizes of captures of American vessels, made after the 1st of November, and those that may in future be brought before it, shall not be judged according to the principles of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, but that they shall remain suspended; the vessels captured or seized to remain only in a state of sequestration, and the rights of the proprietors being reserved for them until the 2d of February next, the period at which, the United States having fulfilled the engagement to cause their rights to be respected, the said captures shall be declared null by the Council, and the American vessels restored, together with their cargoes, to their proprietors."

It is not irrelevant to observe that these two letters were immediately made public in France. They appeared even in a Bordeaux newspaper as early as the 30th of December.

Accordingly, as soon as the restrictions on British vessels and on British merchandise, as announced by the previous acts of the American Government, had actually been carried into effect, on the 2d of February, 1811, and an account of it had been received by the French Government, the American vessels were admitted to entry in the French ports, although they might have been in contravention to the Berlin and Milan decrees; and the vessels which had been captured subsequent to the 1st of November, 1810, by virtue of those decrees, were released in all cases where some other objection unconnected with those decrees, such as the question of ownership in the case of the Belisarius, did not occur.

It was with reference to all these circumstances that his excellency the Minister of Marine, in a letter of the 30th of November, 1818, to the Council of State, stated that the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees had been definitively pronounced only on the 2d of February, 1811. His expressions are, "que le Capitaine Raoul, commandant les deux frégates, parti de la rivière de Nantes le 28 Decembre, 1810, n'a pas pu avoir connoissance de la revocation des décrets de Berlin et de Milan, à l'égard des Américains, revocation qui n'a été définitivement prononcée que le 2 Fevrier suivant." Without admitting the correctness of that statement in all its parts, it is at least evident that the minister knew, and that the Council of State might have seen by that letter, that there was some other act besides, and previous to the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, by which the revocation had been already definitively pronounced.

The general admission of American vessels to entry was announced to Mr. Russel, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States, by a letter of the Duke of Bassano, of the 4th of May, 1811. To prove that no distinction was made with respect to vessels, in contravention to the Berlin and Milan decrees, it will be sufficient, in addition to the case of the Belisarius, to mention that of the New Orleans Packet.

That vessel arrived from Gibraltar at Bordeaux the 3d of December, 1810, and had, besides, been boarded by two public British vessels. She was immediately, for these express causes, seized by the Director of Customs, as having violated the Milan decree. On the representation of the American Chargé d'Affaires, and in conformity with the letter of the Minister of Finances, of the 25th of December, 1810, which has already been quoted, the vessel and cargo were restored to the consignees, on giving bond to pay the estimated value, should it definitively be so decided. And, according to orders given to that effect, the bond was cancelled shortly after the date of the Duke of Bassano's letter of the 4th of May, 1811.

With respect to vessels captured subsequent to the 1st of November, 1810, I can appeal to the records of the court of prizes for proof that not a single one was condemned for a contravention to the Berlin and Milan decrees. The archives of this legation, though necessarily defective in that respect, enable me to mention the following vessels, viz: the Two Brothers, Good Intent, Star, Neptune, and Acustus, all of which, having been captured and brought into port for having contravened those decrees, were acquitted and released in consequence of their revocation. Whether, besides the Dolly and the Telegraph, there might not be some other case which remained undecided in April, 1814, I cannot positively assert. There is none within my knowledge.

It is material to add, that all the vessels which I have mentioned were released before the 8th of May, 1812, the day on which the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, is stated by the Council of State to have been published in the Moniteur. And your excellency may have perceived that in the preceding statement of facts I have not alluded to that decree. Indeed, if the Council of State, instead of suggesting that the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees was unknown to the minister of the United States at the time when he wrote his letter of the 12th of March, 1812, had only said that he was unacquainted with the decree of the 28th April, 1811, I would, whilst showing, as I have done, that his ignorance in that respect was irrelevant to the question, have acknowledged the fact to be true. That decree was first communicated to him on the 10th of May, 1812, and did not reach the Government of the United States till the 13th of July following, that is to say, one month after war had been declared against England. It therefore had no effect on any of their acts, or any part of their conduct. The compact was complete without it, and rested on the official declarations of the Minister of Foreign Relations, and on the execution of the engagement on the part of the French Government. In what manner that Government chose to announce the revocation to its officers and subjects was immaterial to the United States. The only point in which they were concerned was, that that revocation should, according to the engagement, be faithfully carried into effect. And this is the reason why I thought it necessary to show in what manner it was executed in France. Why the publication of the decree of 28th April, 1811, was delayed is not known to the United States, and they have no interest in knowing it. The delay cannot affect them, since their rights, founded on compact, are independent of the decree, and would be precisely the same if it had never been enacted.

Had all these facts been brought within the view of the Council of State; had that body been aware that the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees had been the result of an engagement taken by the French Government, on a condition which had been faithfully fulfilled by that of the United States; had they been informed that it was thus considered by the former Government of France, and that every decision which had heretofore taken place in relation to American vessels was consistent with the principle that those decrees had ceased to have effect with respect to American commerce from the first of November, 1810, it is impossible to suppose that the presumed ignorance of that revocation on the part of the captains of two French frigates could have been alleged as a reason why the owners of the Dolly and Telegraph should not be indemnified for the destruction of their vessels and cargoes more than one year after that date.

The ignorance on the part of the captains may be accepted as a sufficient justification for every part of their conduct, so far as respects their responsibility towards their own Government, if that Government thinks it proper. That is a point in which the United States have no concern. But that circumstance cannot release the Government of France from their engagement with that of America, that the decrees should have no effect after the first of November, 1810, nor from the obligation of indemnifying the American citizens who may, in contravention of that engagement, have sustained losses by the erroneous application of those decrees subsequent to that day.

The Government of France, having once entered into that engagement, became responsible for its faithful and complete execution. The solemn promise was made on the 5th of August, 1810, and it became irrevocable, provided the condition attached to it was fulfilled. In postponing the execution till the first of November—an epoch fixed by the French Government itself—time was taken, sufficient in its own opinion, to give the necessary orders and to insure the performance of the promise. It became the duty of that Government to give instructions to that effect to their tribunals and officers; and they are bound to indemnify if, through neglect, or any other cause, some of their naval officers were not duly instructed, and American citizens have suffered any injury on that account. The condition annexed to the revocation, as announced on the 5th of August, 1810, was only that the United States should act in conformity with the act of Congress of the first of May preceding. As there was, of course, the strongest probability that that condition would be fulfilled, and that the revocation would, as in fact it did, take effect on the first of November following, orders ought to have been immediately issued to prevent, after that day, any act violating the engagement. It may be added, without attaching much importance to the fact, that the President's proclamation and the Treasury circular of the 2d of November, 1810, were communicated by Mr. Russel to the Duke of Cadore on the 17th of December following, that is to say, eleven days prior to the sailing of the Medusa.

In the case of the Dolly and Telegraph, there are two distinct acts committed by the captains of the French frigates—the capture of the American vessels, and afterwards their destruction. In all cases of capture the United States have a right to demand a trial by a competent tribunal. According to the present jurisprudence of France, that tribunal appears to be the Committee of the Council of State, known by the name of "Comité du Contentieux." The first question they had to decide was, whether the capture was legal or not? On that question there could not have been any hesitation. The series of the acts connected with the revocation, the decree itself, of the 28th of April, 1811, all the former precedents, all the decisions of the council of prizes, left not the smallest doubt that the Berlin and Milan decrees had ceased to have effect on the first of November, 1810, and that any subsequent capture, founded on those decrees, was illegal and null. Indeed, there would have been no difficulty if the captains of the frigates, ignorant of the revocation, had only captured the Dolly and Telegraph and sent them into port for adjudication. Those two vessels would have been acquitted and restored, as were all the other American vessels that were brought into French ports under similar circumstances. Instead of pursuing this course, the French captains plundered and burnt the ships. This act renders the restoration impracticable; but, the capture being illegal, it does not, at least, release the French Government from its responsibility.

A belligerent has a right to capture, and, at his discretion, to destroy, the vessels of the enemy. With respect to neutrals, he can only capture and send in for adjudication the vessels pursuing a trade contrary to the duties imposed on neutrals by the law of nations. It is already sufficiently hard on them that the decision should be made by a tribunal of the belligerent power. But the benefit of such a trial was never denied to them; not even by the Berlin and Milan decrees. Those decrees declared, in violation of the law of nations, neutral vessels liable to capture and condemnation for pursuing a legitimate commerce; but they did not change the course of proceedings with respect to the mode of decision. A trial and condemnation, by a competent tribunal, were still necessary. Navy officers, by the law of nations, never are, and even by those decrees were not, authorized, in any case, to burn at sea the vessels of a nation at peace. Such an act is a wanton outrage, wholly unjustifiable, and for which, if at any time committed, even under a plea of necessity, the nation is always responsible. The most aggravating circumstance of the whole case cannot, in any view of the subject, be adduced as a reason to defeat the right of the parties to an indemnity. That indemnity is equally due by the Government of France; that Government is equally responsible for the outrage committed by the officers of its Navy, whether the act be owing to neglect in not issuing in time the necessary orders, to improper or unauthorized conduct on the part of the officers, or to any other cause.

Having laid before your excellency what, I trust, will be considered a conclusive statement of facts, it grieves me to be compelled to say, that the decision of the Council of State of the 19th of December last is the first positive act by which the Government of France seems to have considered itself as released from the solemn obligation contracted with the United States, "That the Berlin and Milan decrees were to cease to have effect after the first of November, 1810." And it has afforded me great relief to find, on the face of that ordinance, irrefragable proofs that it must be ascribed to an unintentional error, arising from the council not having been put in possession of all the material facts connected with the case.

I apply, therefore, to your excellency, with perfect confidence in the justice of his Majesty's Government, and have the honor to request, first, that you will be pleased to lay the subject before his Majesty, in order that the ordinance of the 23d of December last may be rescinded and a revision of the affair ordered; secondly, that when brought again before the Council of State you will have the goodness to have all the facts relative to the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees fairly laid before that body, in order that the owners of the Dolly and Telegraph may receive the indemnity justly due to them for such a wanton and unjustifiable outrage as the destruction of their vessels and cargoes.

I request your excellency to accept the assurances, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

His Excellency BARON PASQUIER,
Minister of Foreign Affairs, &c., &c., &c.

"Mr. Pasquier has also informed me that he had referred to the Minister of Justice my remonstrance, of the 15th of March last, against the decision of the Council of State in the case of the Dolly and Telegraph. This is a very unusual course in an affair where our rights are founded on a positive agreement between the two countries—an agreement entirely political, and in which the Minister of Foreign Affairs was the organ of the French Government."

In duplicate of Mr. Gallatin's No. 147.

PARIS, May 9, 1820.

SIR: I had the honor, on the 11th of February, 1819, to transmit to his excellency General Dessolle a memorial of Mr. David Parish to his excellency the Minister of Finances, relative to certain American vessels and cargoes sequestered at Antwerp in the beginning of the year 1807; and I now beg leave to transmit a new application of that gentleman, addressed to your excellency. Permit me to add a few observations to those contained in those memorials and in my letter of the 11th of February, 1819, to General Dessolle.

The only extraordinary French decree in force when those vessels arrived at Antwerp was that of Berlin, dated the 21st of November, 1806. Some of its enactments were unjust and contrary to the law of nations; yet it made merchandise liable to confiscation only in case of its being British property, or of the manufacture or produce of Great Britain or her colonies. With respect to vessels coming from England, it was by that decree only declared that they should not be received in French ports; and such vessels were, with their cargoes, made liable to confiscation only in case they should have contravened that provision by means of a false declaration. It was not until the 17th of December, 1807, that, by the still more arbitrary decree of Milan, neutral vessels which might have been searched by an English ship or sent to England were declared to be denationalized and good prize.

The vessels in question were bound from the United States to France; but had on their passage been sent forcibly to England, and were afterwards released. They do not seem to have come in any shape within the purview of the Berlin decree. But even if considered as coming from England, within the meaning of the act, as they had not concealed the fact by any false declaration, the utmost penalty to which they were liable by that or any other existing decree was not to be received in a French port. Their being, nevertheless, admitted and sequestered, instead of being sent off, was the act of the French Government. They were detained, as will immediately be shown, only in order to ascertain whether there was not some other contravention of the decree; whether the cargo, or some part of it, was not British property. Unless this can be established, or that they had made a false declaration, the simple fact of their having arrived at Antwerp from an English port, did not make them liable to confiscation.

By an imperial decision of July 2, 1808, the cargoes, being of a perishable nature, were ordered to be sold and the proceeds to be placed as a deposit in the casse d'amortissement; and in inquiry was directed to be made in order to ascertain whether the property was not British. H. E. Baron Louis, to whom, as Minister of Finances, the memorial of Mr. Parish above mentioned had been addressed, wrote to him on the 22d of May, 1819, that the proceeds of the sales had been withdrawn by superior orders from the casse d'amortissement and paid into the public treasury; and he adds that they were thereby definitively acquired by the state. He has communicated neither the date nor the tenor of those orders. That he should have considered them as precluding him, on his own authority and without the sanction of Government, from ordering the money to be repaid to the American owners may be understood; and it is presumed that this was his meaning. He cannot have intended either to pronounce on the merits of the case or to maintain the untenable position that the transmission of the money from one public chest to another could have affected the rights of the parties. Its being expended for public purposes instead of remaining as a deposit is a proof of the wants of Bonaparte, but is not a decision on the case. A definitive confiscation, even under the imperial regime, could only take place with the usual forms, and by virtue of a direct and positive act to that effect. All that was done by that Government with respect to this property was the order of sale, the order to place the proceeds in some public chest, and the inquiry relative to the ownership. No final decision, no condemnation has ever taken place.

It happens even that, with the exception of these vessels and of four others consigned to Mr. Ridgeway, the American consul at Antwerp, all the other cargoes sequestered in that port under similar circumstances were delivered to the owners, and that the conditional bonds they had given were returned to them. The principle has thus been decided in favor of the claimants, and nothing remains but to apply it to their special case.

Having received special instructions from my Government in regard to this claim, it is in its name that I beg leave to call your excellency's attention to Mr. Parish's memorial, and that I ask for that decision which justice requires, and which has been but too long protracted.

Your Excellency will perceive that this decision does not depend on the question of the legality or illegality of the Berlin and Milan decree, and that I have argued as if those acts had been valid. Although they cannot certainly be admitted as such by the Government of the United States, it is a question unconnected with the present case and which is reserved for a future discussion.

I request your excellency to accept the assurances, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 31, 1821.

"Mr. Archibald Gracie has again solicited some special interposition of this Government to press that of France for the adjustment of his claim. He considered it as standing upon grounds so clear and incontrovertible, that the French Government cannot ultimately resist the equitable obligation of providing for it.

"The Government of the United States cannot undertake to discriminate between the comparative merits of the claims of their citizens upon the Government of France. It asks justice for them all; it asks no more than justice for any. More than two years since the claims of Mr. Gracie, and all the Antwerp cases, were recommended to your special attention, in the presumption that, standing on ground peculiarly imposing on the French Government, it would not be able to resist them, and that success in those cases would pave the way for it in all others. It is in this view, that is, by pressing this and the Antwerp cases generally, the other cases would not only not be injured but benefitted, that your attention to them is suggested. The force of example, added to the other powerful considerations in their favor, might do much. But that is left altogether to your judgment, aided as you are by all the lights belonging to the subject; and unless you shall be satisfied that the proposed pressure will have the good effect contemplated, it is expected that you will, of course, decline it."

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 29, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor of inclosing herewith a copy of a letter received at this Department, some time since, from Mr. Connel, as agent for sundry insurance companies in Philadelphia having claims upon the French Government, upon which I would refer you to the letter which I lately wrote you concerning the case of Mr. Gracie's claim. These gentlemen appear to have received recent information, upon which they place some reliance, indicating on the part of the French Government a disposition more favorable to claimants upon their justice than had been previously manifested. Should any prospect of that nature be perceived by you, your own disposition to make it available for the benefit of the sufferers will, itself, serve the purpose of a standing instruction.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,
JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Mr. Gallatin to Baron Pasquier.

[Translation.]

PARIS, October 31, 1821.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to your excellency, under this cover, a memorial addressed to the King, in his Council of State, for Richard Faxon, a citizen of the United States, who complains of a judgment of the Board of Finances, approved by his excellency the minister of the same department.

The question is of a seizure made by the French customs in 1812, at Santander, in the stores of Joachim Munios, of a quantity of sugars belonging to said Faxon. The Board of Finances seems to have dismissed his claim from supposed presumption that he was not the proprietor, and your excellency, by glancing over the memorial, will be convinced that there can be no doubt in this regard.

But the Board has, if I may be allowed the expression, reserved a subsidiary question, that of knowing if a citizen of the United States could pretend to any indemnity for having suffered, in this part of Spain, the application of the laws of France, which then aimed at colonial goods. Ignorant of what laws the Board speaks, I can only observe, generally, that none could ever give the right of seizing, without indemnity, upon the known property of a citizen of the United States deposited for three years, without having been there molested, in the stores of his correspondent.

As it is, however, possible that the laws in question may be no other than the Berlin and Milan decrees, and the different imperial or administrative decrees which have been the consequence of them, I pray your excellency to be pleased to lay before the Council of State the correspondence between the ministers of the Government, from that time, and those of the United States, as well as the other documents, which prove that these decrees had been repealed, in regard of the United States, long before the seizure of the sugars of Mr. Faxon.

I ought also to remind your excellency of another affair, more important for the principles which apply to it, but which depends, likewise, upon the date of the repeal of these two celebrated decrees. I had the honor to address to you, under date of March 15, 1820, a very long note on the subject of the decision of the Council of State, by which the claim of the proprietors of the vessels Dolly and Telegraph, burned on the open sea by two French frigates in November and December, 1811, was rejected. This decision could only have taken place because the documents proving the date of the repeal had not been laid before the Council. But it is supported by considerations which can only produce the most troublesome effects. I can assure your excellency that the revision is of high importance, and I hope that you will judge that a delay, which is already upwards of twenty months, ought to be no further prolonged.

I pray your excellency to accept the assurance, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

No. 200.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, January 14, 1822.

"I have the honor to inclose the copy of a note, which I wrote on the 10th instant to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, on the subject of the Antwerp claims."

PARIS, January 10, 1822.

SIR: I had the honor, on the 9th of May, 1820, to transmit to your excellency's predecessor a memorial of Mr. David Parish, relative to the American cargoes sequestered at Antwerp in the beginning of the year 1807, and to add some observations in support of the claim. Twenty months having since elapsed, a time amply sufficient to make every inquiry respecting the merits of the case, I have been instructed by my Government to renew the application, and to call, in the most forcible manner, the earnest attention of his Majesty's ministers to that subject.

In urging a decision on this reclamation, separately from others, there is not the most distant intention of abandoning the other claims of citizens of the United States for the indemnities so justly due to them. But it is time, after so many delays, to obtain at last a decisive answer, and to ascertain the determination of the Government of France in that respect. And this claim has been selected because it is altogether free of any of the objections, however unfounded these may be, which have been suggested in regard to other cases.

It is not, in the first place, necessary in this instance to discuss questions connected with the illegality of any of the decrees contravening the law of nations, which were issued by Bonaparte. The vessels in question had not violated any of those decrees; their cargoes were not liable to confiscation by virtue of any provision contained in any edict in force at the time of their seizure.

And, secondly, not only is the case entire, not only has there been no trial or condemnation of the cargoes, but the principal that they were not liable to confiscation has been settled by the decisions of Government in analogous cases, and even with respect to portions of the identical property for which indemnity is now claimed.

I trust that I will be able to establish both these positions to your excellency's satisfaction.

The only extraordinary decree of the French Government affecting the navigation of neutral nations, in force at the time of the arrival of the vessels alluded to in a French port, was that issued at Berlin, the 21st of November, 1806.

It was by that decree, amongst other provisions, declared: 1st, that merchandise belonging to a British subject, or being the produce or the manufactures of colonies of Great Britain, should be condemned as good prize, (Art. 5 and 6;) 2d, that no vessel coming directly from England or from her colonies, or going there (qui s'y rendra) after the known publication of the decree, should be permitted to enter any French port, (Art. 8;) 3d, that every vessel contravening the decree by a false declaration should be seized and her cargo confiscated as British property, (Art. 9.)

During the first months subsequent to that decree a number of American vessels arrived in France, coming from the United States, but having on their passage been compelled to stop in England, either by British cruisers or by stress of weather. The question arose whether it was intended by the 8th article of the decree to exclude only vessels which had gone voluntarily to an English port, or whether it included even those which had been compelled to do it by what is called relâche forcée. The words used in the article, venant directement and qui s'y rendra, seemed to favor the first construction; and it was clear that if the last was adopted, British cruisers had nothing to do but to stop for a few days every neutral vessel bound to France in order to destroy her external commerce. These, however, were questions for the French authorities exclusively to decide. It was altogether in their power to have decided that the vessels in question were embraced by the decree, and to have refused to admit them in any port. The Minister of Finances, impelled by what was evidently for the interest of the French commerce, allowed the cargoes to be provisionally landed and deposited in the public stores until the decision of Bonaparte on the question was known, and permitted, also, that they should be delivered to the consignees on their giving an obligation to pay to the custom-house the estimated value thereof if so ordered by that decision. It was, therefore, by the act of the French Government that the vessels landed their cargoes instead of being ordered off. And that provisional construction continued in force till the 4th of September, 1807, when the Director General of the Douanes announced, by a circular, "That the Emperor had decided that the 8th and 9th articles must have their full and entire execution, and that no vessel which had touched in England, or been conducted there, could be admitted." "Thus," added the Director, "the immediate retrogradation of those vessels shall be required, whatever be the alleged causes of superior force and the documents produced in proof thereof. Those which, by a false declaration, may conceal the fact of having touched in England and succeed in thus entering our ports, shall be seized, and the vessels and their cargoes shall be proceeded against in the form prescribed by the decree in relation to English property." In conformity with this decision, several American vessels bound to Antwerp were sent away, amongst which may be mentioned the "Dragon" and the "Two Brothers," and also the Orozimbo, belonging to one of the owners of the cargoes for which indemnity is now claimed, although her cargo had already been actually landed. It would have been fortunate for the owners of the merchandise, which is the object of this reclamation, that this decision should have been made from the first, or that when made it should have been applied to their property.

Amongst the American vessels arrived from the United States in French ports in the year 1807, prior to the decision of September 4, and which had been compelled to touch in England, seven came to Antwerp, consigned to two American houses, the Bordeaux Packet, Helena, North America, and Diamond, to that of Mr. Ridgway, and the Perseverance, Hiram, and Mary, to that of Mr. Parish. The consignees declined availing themselves of the option offered by the French authorities to receive the cargoes, on giving bond for their value, to abide by the final decision of Bonaparte. (a.) They preferred that the cargoes should remain in the custom-house stores subject to that decision. Their motive was obvious.

It was only by the subsequent decree of Milan of November 23, 1807, that it was enacted, "That all vessels which, after having touched at England, might, from any motive whatever, enter the ports of France, should be seized and confiscated as well as their cargoes, without exception or distinction of produce or merchandise." The only causes of confiscation by the Berlin decree were concealment of the fact of having touched in England, and the merchandise being either British property or the produce of England or of her colonies. It was known to the consignees, had already been acknowledged, and was further substantiated by a subsequent inquiry, that every part of the cargoes belonged to American citizens, and that no part was the produce of Great Britain or of her colonies. It was equally known, and has never been denied, that the captains of all the seven vessels had, on their first arrival, made no concealment; that they had all made true declarations of the compulsory touching in England, (relâche forcée.) The expected imperial decision could, therefore, only apply to the doubtful question whether the vessels and cargoes in that predicament were embraced or not by the article of the decree which forbade, in general terms, the admission of vessels that had touched in England, whether the cargoes in question should be admitted or sent away. In case the decision should be that the vessels were, notwithstanding the relâche forcée, included in the article of the decree, and that the cargoes were inadmissible, they might, by remaining in the public stores in their original state, be sent out of France, and the decision be strictly complied with. But if, instead of that, those cargoes were sold, (and the consignees could have had no object in receiving them but that of selling them,) the exportation could not have taken place in conformity with the decision; and the consignees, unable to comply with it, might have been compelled to pay the amount of the bond, which would have been tantamount to a confiscation of the property.

The decision of September 4, 1807, being made only prospective, the consignees at first hoped that the cargoes of the seven vessels previously arrived would be admitted to be sold for home consumption, and accordingly delivered to them. But when they found themselves disappointed in that respect, adhering to the same line of conduct which they had pursued, not to depart from the enactments of the Berlin decree, they applied on the 22d of March, 1808, to the Director General of the Douanes, and on the 7th of April ensuing renewed the application, both to him and to the Minister of Finances, stating that, the steps they had taken to obtain the definitive admission of that merchandise having been fruitless, and the goods, especially the potash, rice, brown sugar, and cochineal, becoming gradually damaged in the entrepôt, they now asked the permission to export the merchandise to a foreign country, and that in conformity with the decree of November 21, 1806.

In answer to that petition, Bonaparte ordered, by a decision of July 2, 1808, that the cargoes should be sold and the proceeds deposited in the caisse d'amortissement, and that an inquiry should be made on each of the vessels which had brought in the cargoes in order to ascertain whether the owners were not British. On this decision it is only necessary to observe that it corroborates what has already been stated, and was, indeed, evident, that no concealment having been made by the captains of their relâche forcée in England, no other cause or pretence for confiscation could be or was alleged than the apprehension that the property was British or of British origin.

To the sale of the cargoes for the purpose intended the consignees did of course object; and they succeeded in preventing it for two years. But to that part of the decision which ordered an inquiry they cheerfully submitted, and communicated all the documents, papers, and letters connected with the vessels and their cargoes. A severe scrutiny took place, the result of which was altogether favorable, it being proven in the clearest manner that the cargoes were exclusively owned by American citizens. Of their origin there does not appear to have ever existed any doubt.

The merchandise, notwithstanding the result of this inquiry, was not restored to the consignees. By a decree dated at Ebersdorf, May 29, 1809, 780 barrels of potash and pearlsh, making part of the cargoes of the Perseverance and Mary, were put at the disposal of the Minister of War, and the estimated value directed to be paid by him in the caisse d'amortissement. That portion of the cargoes was accordingly taken from the entrepôt and delivered to that department, having previously been valued at near 450,000 francs, notwithstanding a deduction made on account of the damages arising from the long detention in the public stores. Finally, the whole of the residue of the cargoes was sold in June, 1810, by virtue of an imperial decision of May 4, of that year. It is asserted that by virtue of an order subsequent to the sales, which has never been published nor communicated, the proceeds of those sales were ultimately paid, in whole or in part, into the public treasury.

Your excellency must agree with me that, from the preceding statement of facts, it evidently follows, 1st, That, as I had stated in the beginning of this letter, there has been in this case no violation of any existing decree that the cargoes were not liable to confiscation by virtue of any provision contained in any edict then in force; 2d, That the consignees uniformly took those decrees as the basis of their conduct, and committed no act which might impair the rights of the owners of the property; 3d, That, by allowing the cargoes to be deposited in the public stores until the decision of Bonaparte was known, whether the vessels were or were not embraced by the article of the decree which forbade the admission of those which had gone to England, a formal engagement had been contracted on the part of Government to permit the exportation of the merchandise in conformity with the decree, in case the decision was against its being admitted for home consumption; 4th, That, although nothing could be further from the views of the Minister of Finances, yet it was solely owing to the doubts he entertained respecting the construction of the Berlin decree that the cargoes fell in the possession of the custom-house; that it was the unforeseen consequence of his act, which was that of the proper French authority in that case, that, the above mentioned engagement not having been fulfilled, the owners have, by a flagrant injustice, been to this day deprived of the merchandise and of its proceeds.

The fact that there has been no trial or condemnation of the property is notorious, and I would at once proceed to the decisions made in analogous cases, was it not necessary to take, in the first place, notice of a most extraordinary and unfounded inference drawn from a fact immaterial in itself, and which, although not officially communicated, has been made known to me by the parties.

Among the several applications for indemnity made at different times and in various shapes by the consignees, a memorial had been addressed to the Minister of Finances by Mr. Parish, which, at his request, I transmitted on the 11th of February, 1819, to Marquis Dessolle. I wrote again to that minister on the same subject on the 23d of March following, and had requested that a report intended to be made by the direction of the Douanes to the Minister of Finances might be communicated to me. This was not done; but H. E. Baron Louis wrote to Mr. Parish on the 22d of May of the same year that the proceeds of the sales had been withdrawn by superior orders from the caisse d'amortissement, and paid into the public treasury; and he added that they were thereby definitively acquired by the State. This inference appeared so preposterous that, when alluding to it in my letter of the 9th of May, 1820, to H. E. Baron Pasquier, I said that I presumed the meaning of the Minister of Finances to have simply been that he considered the orders in question as precluding him on his own authority, and without the sanction of Government from ordering the money to be repaid to the American owners.

(a) To this there were two exceptions, the consignees having subscribed obligations, first, for a small quantity of potash, (about 15,000 francs in value,) received and sold by them on the first arrival of the vessel; secondly, for the value of some of those vessels, in order to enable them to leave the port. The others were permitted to depart without the bond being required.

The assertion having, however, been made in that broad way, I am compelled to refute it. But I beg your excellency to be persuaded that I do it only in a hypothetical way, and in discharge of my responsibility, and that I do not suppose or mean to insinuate that it ever has been or can be the intention of his Majesty's ministers seriously to resort to such an untenable pretence for the purpose of avoiding the payment of a just debt. I consider the objection as being the work of a subordinate agent, whose duty it may have been to collect whatever might be suggested against claims on the public treasury, and the communication to Mr. Parish as only intended to afford him the means of knowing and repelling every such suggestion. For that purpose the following observations will, it is hoped, be deemed conclusive:

1. It was agreed by the 22d article of the convention between France and the United States of the 30th September, 1800, (a) which was in full force when the vessels in question arrived at Antwerp, that the established courts for prize causes should alone take cognizance of them; that whenever such tribunal of either of the parties should pronounce judgment against any vessel, or goods, or property, claimed by the citizens of the other party, the sentence or decree should mention the reasons or motives on which the same should have been founded; and that an authenticated copy of the sentence or decree, and of all the proceedings in the case, should, if demanded, be delivered to the commander or agent of the said vessel. By the 10th article of the Berlin decree, the Council of Prizes at Paris was accordingly charged to decide on all cases arising under the said decree in the following words: "Notre Conseil des Prises à Paris est chargé de décider de toutes contestations qui pourront s'élever au sujet des prises qui en vertu du présent décret pourront être faites, tant dans notre empire que dans les pays occupés par nos troupes." There having never been any trial in the cases in question before the Council of Prizes, there can have been no condemnation of the property, in conformity either with the solemn obligations of the treaty or with the provisions of the only decree in force at the time, and applicable to those cases. (b)

2. Independent of any consideration drawn from treaty obligations, or from the provisions of the decree itself, it is equally repugnant to the principles of the law of nations, as generally recognized by the civilized world, and to those of the municipal laws of any civilized nation, to consider the order in question as implying the condemnation of the property of the parties, or as in the smallest degree affecting their rights. There was not in this case even the form of a trial—no hearing of the parties—no notice given to them of any alleged ground for condemnation, or even of any intention to bring them to a trial. Nor was the order alluded to communicated to them or made public either in the bulletin of laws or in any other manner. On those topics it is unnecessary to dwell; it is sufficient to have stated them. I will only observe that, without publicity in laws or decrees, there would be no guaranty for the rights of individuals; that publication has, therefore, by the laws of every well ordered country, of France as well as of every other, always been made a necessary ingredient of any judgment or decree affecting such rights; and that the fact of the order in this case not having been published, or at least communicated, is alone a conclusive proof that it was a mere administrative order binding on the public functionaries to whom it was directed, and in no shape impairing or affecting the ultimate rights of the parties.

3. The official reports and acts of Government, since the restoration, are in direct contradiction with the inference attempted to be drawn, that the payment (versement) into the treasury, or the application to public purposes of funds before deposited there, is tantamount to a definitive acquisition to the state of such funds, and releases it from the obligation of repaying the same. This will be fully demonstrated by the following quotations from the report of the Minister of Finances, (Baron Louis himself,) of July 4, 1814:

"La caisse d'amortissement avoit été instituée dépositaire des fonds des cautionnements . . . ; les consignations judiciaires et plusieurs dépôts particuliers lui avoient été confiés à la charge de les restituer. Tous ces fonds ont été depuis long tems, par les ordres du chef du Gouvernement, employés aux dépenses de l'État; les fonds déposés à la caisse d'amortissement sont les cautionnements, ils s'élèvent à la somme de . . . (dont elle) n'a actuellement reçu qu'une somme de . . . Le surplus a été versé et est resté au trésor pour 88,675,000 francs, &c. Les consignations judiciaires déposés à la caisse d'amortissement s'élèvent à 11,814,000. Les autres fonds en dépôt sont . . . total 7,358,000. Les remboursemens sur ces fonds ont été continués, &c.

"Les fonds déposés à la caisse de service montent à 43,000,000. Les remboursemens des fonds déposés ont été fidèlement continués, quoiqu'ils eussent été consommés, &c.

"La nécessité des anticipations les introduites dès le commencement de chaque exercice, et bientôt elles se sont étendues à tous les fonds que ce ministère (des finances) a pu atteindre, et elles ont décoré les fonds déposés, &c. . . L'arriéré du ministère des finances, au 1er Avril, se compose des dépôts consommés, &c."*

(a) The convention was to be in force for eight years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications, which took place at Paris on the 31st of July, 1801.

(b) This provision appears to have been omitted in the Milan decrees of the 23d of November and 17th of December, 1807. But even then condemnations took place only by virtue of special and positive imperial decisions to that effect, and were not inferred from an order to pay in the treasury. Thus, in the case of the Sally, condemned under those decrees, the Minister of Finances wrote on the 6th of November, 1810, to the Director General of the Douanes: "J'ai l'honneur de vous informer que par décision du 30 Octobre dernier, Sa Majesté a ordonné la confiscation du navire Américain la Sally, Cap. M. Brown, ainsi que de sa cargaison, pour cause de deux relaches en Angleterre."

* "The caisse d'amortissement was instituted as a depository of the funds of securities; the judiciary deposits and several individual deposits were entrusted to it on a provision of restitution. All these funds were, for a long time, by the orders of the chief of the Government, employed for the expenses of the State; —. The funds, deposited in the caisse d'amortissement, are the securities—they amount — to the sum of —, (of which it) has only actually received a sum of —. The surplus has been paid over and remains in the treasury, for 88,675,000 francs, &c. The judiciary deposits, placed in the caisse

I must here beg leave to observe that I do not mean to say that H. E. Baron Louis was inconsistent with himself with respect to the question relative to the proceeds of the Antwerp cargoes. The transaction was probably unknown to him, or not attended to at the date of the report alluded to; or he may, at that time, have already been told that they made no part of those deposits (dépôts consommés) which Government was bound to reimburse. All that concerns me is to refute the inference as made in his letter to Mr. Parish, that such deposits were acquired to the State merely because they had, by superior orders, been withdrawn from a certain caisse, and paid (versés) in the treasury. And it follows, irresistibly, from the quotations I have made, that it was the general habit of the head of the Government, at that time, to apply to the expenses of the State, whenever exigencies required it, every species of deposited funds without regard to their origin, or to the particular chest in which they were deposited; that the proceeds of the Antwerp cargoes would not have been any more respected had they been nominally left in the caisse d'amortissement instead of being transferred (versé) into the treasury; that the funds originally deposited, although withdrawn and expended, (consommés) continued to be faithfully reimbursed by Government, and especially that the payment (versement) in the treasury did not, as is clearly proven in the instance of the cautionnements, operate as a release from the obligation of reimbursing the funds thus diverted and expended. I will add that, although those cautionnements are not, from their nature, generally considered as a debt, the payment of which may be required, (cette exigible) yet a very considerable portion has actually been reimbursed to the functionaries or persons belonging to territories formerly annexed to France, which make no longer part of it.

4. The Council of State has decided, in an analogous case, that the payment in the treasury was not tantamount to a condemnation. In January, 1810, the American vessel Eagle had been captured, within five leagues of the shore, by a French privateer, and conducted to the port of Passage. The captured and captors made a compromise on the subject; but the vessel and cargo were seized, sequestered, sold, and the proceeds paid in the treasury by virtue of the decrees passed at that time by Bonaparte, under color of reprisals. The case was brought before the Council of State, who, on the 20th of April, 1820, ratified the compromise above mentioned, notwithstanding the opposition, both of the captured and of the general direction of the Douanes. The first reason assigned for this decision is in the following words: "Considérant qu'il n'existe dans l'espece aucun acte qui ait prononcé la confiscation du navire l'Aigle au profit du Gouvernement François." This case and that of the Antwerp vessels may differ in many other respects; but the Eagle was included in the general, arbitrary and unjustifiable seizures, known by the name of the St. Sebastian sequestration; and the vessels and cargoes, thus sequestered, are, so far as relates to the particular question now under discussion, precisely in the same predicament as the Antwerp cargoes. They were equally sold, nearly at the same time, and the proceeds were equally, by a similar order, paid in the treasury and applied to public purposes. Indeed, from the comparison of dates and other information obtained, I may assert, that the identical order by which the proceeds of the Antwerp cargoes were directed to be paid in the treasury included all the others which had been sequestered, and among them the St. Sebastian and Passage vessels and cargoes, including the Eagle. The fact, at all events, of the proceeds of sales in this last case having, like those of the Antwerp cargoes, been paid into the treasury, is not only notorious, but was within the full knowledge and view of the Council of State when the above decision was made. For, in the observations laid before it by the direction of the Douanes, in opposition to the claim of the captors, it is expressly stated, "que c'est en vertu d'ordres émanés de S. M. et ayant pour base le droit de représailles, que le sequestre avoit été mis, la vente effectuée, et le produit versé au trésor." In declaring, therefore, that there existed no act which had pronounced the confiscation of the vessel Eagle to the profit of the French Government, the Council of State has explicitly and directly decided, that an order issued from Bonaparte, directing the sale of a vessel and cargo, and that the proceeds should be paid in the treasury, was not an act pronouncing the confiscation of such vessel and cargo, or of their proceeds.

Your excellency will probably think that it was superfluous on my part to have accumulated such an overwhelming mass of proofs for the purpose of crushing a mere shadow, which may be dissipated without recurring to any extraneous consideration. In taking for granted the order alluded to by Baron Louis, it must be assumed such as he had stated it, that is to say, as simply directing the withdrawing of the proceeds of sales from a certain chest, and their being paid into the treasury. Indeed, had there been anything further affecting the question in that document, he would not have failed to mention it in support of the inference attempted to be drawn. Such a decree, from its nature, must be strictly construed; it cannot be extended beyond what appears on the face of it, beyond its positive enactments, and be made to say what is not contained in it. Had it been intended not only to make use of the property for immediate exigencies, but to pronounce its definitive condemnation, there could have been no motive, since the decree was not to be published, for not inserting in it a positive clause to that effect, as was done in the other cases where condemnation was the object. But whatever may have been the intention, the omission of such a clause is of itself and alone conclusive against the gratuitous and unjustifiable assertion that the order is tantamount to a condemnation. The order in question does not confiscate the property, because it contains no clause to that effect.

The acts and decisions of the Government directly supporting or recognizing the justice of the claim will now be stated.

All the vessels which arrived under similar circumstances with those whose cargoes were sequestered at Antwerp subsequent to the decision of the 4th of September, 1807, and prior to the Milan decree of the 23d of November ensuing, instead of being detained, were refused admittance and sent off. One of them, at least—the Orozimbo—was within the power of the Government, and her cargo, which, as has already been stated, was actually landed on account of repairs wanted by the vessel, might certainly have been seized. On the same principle on which she was suffered to depart with that cargo, those of the seven vessels previously detained should have been allowed to be exported. To admit that she was not liable to seizure was an acknowledgment that there was no right to sequester and sell those of the other vessels. But there are other cases still more in point.

d'amortissement, amount to 11,814,000. The other funds in deposit are ——— total 7,358,000. The reimbursements on these funds have been continued, &c.

"The funds deposited in the caisse de service amount ——— total 43,000,000. The reimbursements of the funds deposited have been faithfully continued, although they had been expended, &c.

"The necessity of anticipations introduced them from the commencement of each duty, and they have often been extended to all the funds which this minister (of finances) could obtain, and they have devoured the funds deposited, &c. The arrearage of the Minister of Finances, on the 1st of April, is composed of deposits expended, &c.

It was only in the instance of the seven vessels in question that it was agreed that the cargoes should be deposited in the public stores until the final decision respecting the construction of the Berlin decree was known. The consignees of all the other numerous vessels which arrived during the same period, and under the same circumstances, in the other ports of France, preferred to avail themselves of the option given by the Minister of Finances to receive the cargoes and to give bond for the estimated value thereof. The obligations (soumissions) subscribed by the consignees were in the following form:

Etat des marchandises venues en ce port par le navire —, que nous réclamons du sequestre de la Douane, où elles sont déposées par ordre, &c.

(Ici suit l'énumération et l'évaluation des marchandises.)

“Laquelle somme de —, nous nous soumettons, avec notre caution solidaire —, représenter au receveur des Douanes de —, si la décision de S. M. J. Pordonne, pour cause de la relâche forcée en Angleterre du dit navire —, nous réservant au besoin recours sur que de droit. Fait à —, le —.”

(Signé) “Les consignataires et leur caution.”*

The number of cases in which obligations of this kind were given is known to the French Government, though not to me, but it embraces, as already stated, all the vessels, the seven which came to Antwerp only excepted, which, having been compelled to touch in England, arrived in French ports from the publication of the Berlin decree in the latter end of 1806 until the decision of the 4th of September took place.

In no instance whatever has the payment of any one of these obligations been enforced. In every other instance but that of the Antwerp cargoes those of vessels precisely in the same predicament have been sold for the use of the owners, no steps taken to recover the estimated value for which the obligations were given, and, in some instances at least, those obligations have been positively annulled. Notwithstanding the difficulty of obtaining information on the last point, the parties interested in the Antwerp claims have been able to furnish me with the following extracts of two decisions:

“NAPOLÉON, &c.

“La soumission souscrite à la Douane de Marseille par M. M. Autran Bellier, pour répondre de la valeur de la cargaison du navire Américain l'Elisa, qui avoit été remise à leur disposition, est annulée.”

“Même decreete en faveur de M. Hottinguer, pour la cargaison du navire Américain l'Ann, arrivé à Cherbourg.”†

Whatever may have been the motive of Government for not enforcing the payment of those obligations, the omission of doing it in any case whatever is an absolute recognition on its part that there was no ground for confiscation, and the two instances quoted are sufficient to establish the fact of positive decisions in cases perfectly similar to that which is the object of the present reclamation.

The same principle has been applied even to a portion of the identical property sequestered at Antwerp, the payment of similar obligations which, as already stated, had been subscribed, not only for some of the vessels but also for a small part of the cargo of one of them, having never been enforced.

Finally, indemnity has actually been paid since the restoration for a considerable portion of one of the cargoes.

The house of Mr. Parish had, a short time after the arrival of the vessels, sold to Messrs. Fillietaz & Co., of Antwerp, 256 bales of cotton, part of the cargo of the ship Hiram. It being then confidently expected that the merchandise would be delivered to the parties, the sale was absolute and at the risk of Mr. Fillietaz. He paid the purchase-money, received a proper bill of sale, and became thus vested with all the rights of the original shipper, but without recourse against him or the consignees. He was disappointed in his expectation of receiving the merchandise thus purchased. His cotton shared the fate of the rest, and was sold in the same manner and at the same time for a sum exceeding 400,000 francs. The proceeds, undistinguished from those of the other cargoes, were, in the same manner and under the same order, paid in the treasury. He applied for indemnity, as a subject or resident of Belgium, to the mixed commission appointed under the treaties and conventions of Paris. His claim was allowed and placed in the first class, that of cautionnemens and deposits,‡ and he has received in payment an inscription of five per cent. consolidated French stock, amounting in principal to 495,760 francs, bearing interest from the 22d of March, 1819, together with 10,726 francs in specie for arrears of interest, after deducting the commission expenses or charges.

It has now been fully demonstrated, not only that the claim is founded in strict justice; not only that the property was never confiscated, and that there never was any decision to that effect, either in that or similar cases; not only that, on the contrary, there have been positive decisions recognizing the validity of the claim, but also that other foreigners, who had become owners of part of it, have been indemnified by virtue of the treaties concluded between his Majesty's Government and foreign powers. Permit me to add, that France has received and continues to enjoy the benefit of the money arising from the sales of the cargoes.

His application was rejected on correct grounds, because, although himself a subject of Belgium, his house was American, and because they were only consignees and not owners of the cargoes, the right to which, with the exception of the sale to Mr. Fillietaz, has remained the property of American citizens.”

That money was paid in the treasury and applied towards defraying the public expenses of the State. Had it been restored to the legitimate owners and not thus applied, those expenses would have been exactly the same. The only difference would have been that the large arriéré left unpaid by Bonaparte would have been still further increased precisely by the sum thus detained from the American citizens. With what good faith the whole of that arriéré, without even excepting the expenses of the hundred days, has been liquidated and paid by his Majesty's Government is well known. In fact, unless France sets up two measures, one for her own subjects and all other foreigners, and another for the citizens of the United States, it is impossible that she can refuse discharging this just debt.

I beg leave to apply, not only for that payment, but also for a speedy decision. The United States had, from the most friendly motives, yielded to the reluctance to take up the subject of American claims which was evinced in the year 1817. The objection arising from the state of the finances and from the enormous amount of the demands pressing at that time on the resources of France has now happily ceased to exist. Time amply sufficient has in the meanwhile been taken for every possible investigation of this claim. The parties have already experienced most grievous losses from the long detention of so large an amount of property. They should not be tortured by further vexatious delays. Justice, when too tardy, often fails in its object. When it is known, as in this case, that such is the nature of the claim that it will ultimately be paid, intriguing speculators are never wanting who will try to take advantage of the distance and of the necessities of the claimants to purchase their rights at a depreciated rate. Such attempts, which, even when not actually tainted, never can avoid the suspicion of corruption, it has been my duty to repel, and heretofore with success. I have told the parties to listen to no proposals, to reject every indirect interference, that their claim was indisputable and must necessarily be allowed. We employ, to attain that object, no other but direct means; no weapons but those of argument. I trust that they will not have been used in vain when the appeal is made to your known loyalty, to his Majesty's high sense of justice, to those principles of good faith in discharging the obligations of the State which in every instance but that of the American claims have uniformly distinguished his Government.

I request your excellency to accept the reiterated assurances of the distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be, &c., &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

His Excellency Viscount DE MONTMORENCY,
Minister of Foreign Affairs, &c., &c., &c.

No. 203.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to France, to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, January 28, 1822.

"I had yesterday a conference with the Minister of Foreign Affairs on the subject of the Antwerp claims. In the course of it I referred him to my letters to one of his predecessors of November 9, 1816, and of April 22, 1817; to the first, in order that he might have a general view of the nature and extent of our claims; to the other, for the purpose of showing both the cause of the delay which had taken place on that subject, and that we had always considered the reclamations for property sequestered and not condemned to be of such nature that the claims ought to be liquidated and paid in the ordinary course of business, and did not require any diplomatic transaction. I then stated, that although our commercial difficulties might have justly claimed the more immediate attention of the two Governments, yet there was this difference between the two subjects, that the last was only one of mutual convenience, each party being, after all, at liberty, though at the risk of encountering countervailing measures, to regulate his own commerce as he pleased; whilst the question of indemnity for injuries sustained was one of right. In this case we demanded justice, and I was sorry to be obliged to say, that, notwithstanding my repeated applications during a period of near six years, I had not been able to obtain redress in one single instance for my fellow-citizens; an observation which applied not only to cases which had arisen under the former Government of France, but also to wrongs sustained under that of his Majesty. Such result could not escape the notice of my Government, and had accordingly been complained of in the most pointed manner in the instructions I had from time to time received. There was, indeed, an aggravating and most extraordinary circumstance with respect to the applications relative to injuries sustained under Bonaparte's Government. Not only had I failed in obtaining redress, but I had not even been honored with an answer. It could not be concealed that such a course of proceeding on the part of France had a tendency to impair the friendly relations between the two countries, and might have an unfavorable effect even in the discussion of other subjects. I therefore earnestly requested that he would immediately attend to the reclamation now before him, and no longer delay the decision which we had a right to expect."

"Viscount Montmorency at once answered that he had read the papers relative to the Antwerp sequestrations, and that he was struck with the justice of the claim. He regretted, he added, that the settlement of this reclamation should have fallen on the present ministry; that a decision had not taken place in the year 1819; that such an objection as that complained of had at that time been raised by the Minister of Finances. This candid declaration was made, he said, in full confidence that I would understand it as an opinion formed on a first impression and as being only his individual opinion; he had not yet conferred on the subject with the Minister of Finances or his other colleagues, which he promised to do without delay, and to lay the subject before the King as soon as possible. Speaking of our claims generally, he alluded to the hardship that the King's Government should be made responsible for all the misdeeds of Bonaparte; an observation to which I did not think necessary to answer, as he spoke only of the hardship of the case, and did not assert that the obligation did not exist."

No. 208.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Adams, dated

PARIS, April 23, 1822.

"In several conversations I had with Viscount de Montmorency on the subject of the Antwerp cases he always evinced a sense of the justice of the claim and a disposition that indemnity should be made, but I have not yet been able to obtain an official answer; and finding that objections, which were not distinctly stated, were still made by the Department of Finances, I asked Mr. Montmorency's permission to confer on the subject with Mr. de Villèle, in order that I might clearly understand what prospect there was of obtaining justice. This was readily assented to, and I had accordingly an interview yesterday with that minister.

"I found that Mr. de Villèle had only a general knowledge of the subject, and had not read my note of 10th January last, to which I referred him, and which he promised to peruse with attention. It appeared, however, to me that, although he was cautious not to commit himself, he was already satisfied, from the inspection of the papers in his Department, and without having seen my argument, that the claim was just, and that the ground assumed by Baron Louis in his letter to Mr. Parish was untenable.

"His objections to a payment of the claim at this time, supposing that on a thorough investigation it proved to be just, were the following:

"1st. There were no funds at his disposal from which the payment could be made, and it was absolutely necessary that an application should be made to the Chambers for that purpose—a demand which would be very ill received, as it had been generally supposed that France was relieved from every foreign claim of that description.

"2d. Such was the amount of wrongs committed by Bonaparte, and the acknowledged impossibility that France could repair them all, that all the European powers, although with arms in their hands, and occupying a part of the country, had consented to receive, as a payment in full, a stipulated sum which fell very short of the amount of their claims. The payments thus made by France had, therefore, been, in every instance, the result of an agreement (d'une transaction) founded on equitable principles and on an abandonment on the part of the foreign powers of a considerable part of their claims. It appeared to him impossible that an application for funds could be made to the Chambers for the purpose of satisfying American claims, unless it was also the result of a transaction of a similar nature.

"3d. Even in that case, the engagement to pay any sum at this time for that object would, for the reasons already stated, and for many others arising from the change of Government, appear extremely hard. The only way to render it palatable was, that it should be accompanied by the grateful information that our commercial difficulties were arranged in a satisfactory manner. He regretted, therefore, extremely, that the discussion of the two subjects had been separated, one being treated in the United States and the other here, and he asked whether it was probable that the result of the negotiation at Washington would be known at Paris before the next session of the Chambers, which is to take place in June next.

"I must say that these observations did not appear to be made with an intention of throwing new obstacles in the way of an adjustment of our claims, but for the purpose of stating the difficulties which the Government would have to encounter in any attempt to effect that object. It was not the less necessary to reply to the suggestions thus made, and I observed, with respect to the delays which had taken place, that they were to be ascribed solely to the French Government. It was in consequence of the determination of the Duke of Richelieu, and I referred to my letter to him of the 22d of April, 1817; it was against my opinion, and notwithstanding my strong remonstrances, that the subject had been postponed, and that provision was not made for our claims at the same time as for those of subjects of the European powers. But I had taken care to remind the Duke of Richelieu, when the communication for the last object was made to the legislative body, that the American claims were not included in the settlement, and he had accordingly expressly stated in that communication that the sum to be voted would discharge France from all demands on the part of the subjects of the European powers. This was so well understood that a subsequent grant of seven millions had been voted for the purpose of discharging the Algerine claims. Ours alone remained unsettled, and the Chambers must have expected, and could not therefore be astonished, that an application for that object should also be made to them.

"As to the propriety of a convention for the general adjustment of the claims of American citizens, I informed Mr. de Villèle that this was precisely what the United States had asked, and I referred him to my note of the 9th of November, 1816, which to this day remained unanswered. The extraordinary silence of the French Government was at least a proof of its reluctance to adopt that mode of settlement, and there was an intrinsic difficulty in what he called a transaction. The United States could have no objection to a partial admission and reimbursement of the claims of their citizens, but they would not, in order to obtain that object, sacrifice other reclamations equally just, and give that general release which France was desirous to obtain in consideration of that partial payment. Under these circumstances, it was a natural, and perhaps the most practicable, course, to press a settlement of those claims which it might be presumed she intended ultimately to pay. To repel this, on a plea that a convention embracing the whole was a preferable mode, was an untenable position, so long as our overture having the last object in view remained unanswered.

"After having expressed my sincere wishes that an arrangement of our commercial difficulties might soon be effected, and having shown from a recapitulation of what had taken place at the time that the transfer of the negotiations for that object to Washington was owing to the French Government, I stated that there was no connexion whatever between that and the subject of our claims, and that even when discussed at the same place they had always been treated distinctly. Our reclamations were of much older date, and, not to speak of the former government of this country, they had, since the restoration, been pending near four years before any discussion of our commercial relations had commenced. I was ready to acknowledge that it would be at any time an unpleasant duty for his Majesty's ministers to be obliged to ask funds for the purpose of repairing the injuries sustained during a former period by the citizens of a foreign nation, and I was sensible that the task would be more easy after the settlement than during the existence of other difficulties. But justice and our perseverance, on which he might rely, required that the duty, however unpleasant, should at some time be performed; and I was the less disposed to acquiesce in new and vexatious delays on the ground alluded to, because the result of the negotiations was very uncertain. The delay in that respect was solely due to the French Government; they had thrown great obstacles in the way of an arrangement by blending other subjects with that immediately to be attended to; afterwards they became sensible, in the latter end of September last, that it was necessary to send new instructions to Mr. de Neuville. I had, in the month of October, made every representation and given all the explanations which could be necessary; yet the instructions to Mr. de Neuville were not, as I understood, sent till late in January, and had not yet, I believed, been received on the 12th of March. The success of the negotiations depended on the nature of those instructions, with which I was not acquainted. If they produced no favorable result, the consequence would only be, that the commerce between the two countries would be lessened, and flow through indirect channels; probably to our mutual loss, and to the profit of the British manufacturers and navigation. But, however this might be lamented, it was only a question of policy; each of the two nations had a right to regulate her commerce as in her opinion best suited her interest. But, with respect to our claims, it was a question of right, the consideration of which ought not and could not be abandoned or postponed, even if the commercial relations should continue to be less extensive and less advantageous than they had formerly been or might again become, in case a satisfactory arrangement respecting the discriminating duties was made; whether the result of the negotiation would be known here in June, it was, of course, impossible for me to say.

"Mr. de Villèle, having taken a memoranda, and promised to read the notes to which I had alluded, asked me whether there was any difference between Mr. Parish's claim (meaning the three vessels consigned to his house) and that for the four other Antwerp ships? to which I answered, most decidedly, in the negative. He then, having the decree of July 22, 1810, before him, inquired in what consisted the difference between the Antwerp claims and those for other property sequestered and embraced by the same decree, viz: the St. Sebastian seizures and the vessels given up by Holland. I answered, none, whatever, in substance, and that the reason why a specific application was made for the Antwerp claims alone, in my letter of the 10th January last, was, that, having already demanded indemnity for all the claims, particularly in my note of the 9th of November, 1816, the claimants, who relied on the exertions of their Government to obtain redress, had generally thought it unnecessary to make separate applications. Mr. Parish, however, being on the spot, had urged a special decision in his case; and my Government having, for the reasons already stated, acquiesced in that course, the Antwerp claims were, in that manner, first presented to the consideration of that of France. But I had expressly stated in my note that this was not in any way to be construed as an abandonment of their claims, equally just, although their features might not in every respect be precisely the same. Between the Antwerp and the other claims for property sequestered and not condemned, I knew none but merely nominal differences. The St. Sebastian vessels and cargoes had been seized and sold under an untenable and frivolous pretence—that of retaliation—to which a retrospective effect had been given. The Antwerp cargoes had been seized and sold without any pretence whatever being assigned for it. In neither cases had a condemnation taken place. In both cases we had always claimed restitution or trial before the ordinary competent tribunal. The right to ask for such trial was, in both cases, derived from the law of nations, and it was for the Antwerp cargoes, also founded on positive treaty stipulations."

PARIS, May 13, 1822.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose the copy of a letter I wrote on the 3d instant to Viscount Montmorency on the subject of the Antwerp claims. He has promised an answer; but as he spoke, though in vague terms, of objections which it would be better to prevent rather than to answer, I asked him an interview, which is to take place on Saturday next.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Mr. Gallatin to the Viscount Montmorency.

PARIS, May 3, 1822.

SIR: I had the honor on the 10th of January last to address to your excellency a note relative to the American cargoes sequestered at Antwerp. But, although the conversations I had since the honor to have with your excellency on that subject had led me to hope that there was a disposition to render a tardy justice to the claimants, the note still remains unanswered.

It is my duty to remind also your excellency that all the former notes which I had the honor to address to his Majesty's ministers, either with respect to that reclamation, or generally on the subject of the American claims, and particularly the note of the 9th November, 1816, have shared the same fate. That, on a subject so important, no official answer should for such length of time have been given to the earnest and repeated applications of a friendly power; that, where favors are not asked, but justice is demanded, there should have been such a tacit perseverance in avoiding even to discuss the question, must be allowed a most uncommon proceeding in the intercourse between independent nations.

To these considerations I beg leave to add, that two American citizens, with powers from the owners of the greater part of the Antwerp cargoes, have been here for a length of time, one of them a year, for the sole purpose of pursuing and liquidating that claim; and that they both unite in requesting that they may be no longer detained, and that, at all events, a decision may be made in that case.

Permit me, therefore, most earnestly to request from your excellency that no further delays may take place, and to ask that official answer, which, I have never doubted, would, when made, prove satisfactory to the just expectation of the parties interested.

I request your excellency to accept the renewed assurance of the distinguished consideration with which, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State, No. 216, dated

PARIS, June 13, 1822.

"The conference I had on the 18th ultimo with Viscount de Montmorency, on the subject of the American claims, turned principally on the difficulties which this Government would find in effecting an arrangement with us. The result of a free conversation on what was practicable seemed to be, that a definitive agreement was preferable to a partial payment, and that the choice must, in that respect, be between the two following modes: either the payment of a stipulated sum, in full discharge of the demands of the United States for spoliations, and to be distributed by their Government; or, the reference of the whole case to a joint commission, which, in case of disagreement, would refer the disputed points to a Sovereign chosen by the two Governments."

"Although Mr. de Montmorency appeared to continue to be personally well disposed, he did not conceal that there were objections in the Council of Ministers; and he stated, a few days after, that they were inclined to postpone the subject until the result of the negotiation at Washington was ascertained. I concluded, nevertheless, to insist for an answer to my last note, being satisfied that it would not amount to a rejection, which would have committed hereafter this Government, and that there would be some advantage in obtaining, at least, something more than verbal from them. The answer of the first instant, was accordingly received, copy of which is herewith inclosed. We had so many accounts of a near prospect of an arrangement being on the eve of being concluded between you and Mr. De Neuville, that I waited a few days before I made a reply; but having now heard of the adjournment of Congress, without any convention having been made, I this day have made the answer, of which I have the honor to inclose a copy."

[Translation.]

PARIS, June 1, 1822.

SIR: I have received the letter which you did me the honor to write me on the 3d of May, relative to the American cargoes sequestered in the port of Anvers, and to the other claims which you have already heretofore laid before the ministers of the King.

I could have wished, sir, to have been able to answer you sooner, and, especially, to have been able to welcome your demands; but I was under the necessity of first submitting them to the King, who is engaged in council; his Majesty having nothing more at heart than to see adjusted, in a proper and satisfactory manner, the affairs of mutual interest for both countries, and thus to multiply between them useful and amicable relations.

The object of your claims is, without doubt, interesting to a great number of individuals; and we have, also, individual claims to make, which are likewise of great interest to the subjects of the King, whom they concern. I would be the first to wish that the Government could be engaged with them; but you are not ignorant, sir, that there is at this moment at Washington a negotiation which embraces general interests of the highest importance to the navigation of France and of America.

The King's council has judged that it was better to put off the examination of the individual claims until the negotiation upon the general interests was concluded; and as soon as that shall take place, I shall hasten, sir, to move in the King's council the examination of the claims which form the object of your letter of the 3d of May.

I have the honor to renew to you, sir, the assurance of my high consideration,

MONTMORENCY.

PARIS, June 13, 1822.

SIR: I had the honor to receive your excellency's letter of the 1st instant, in answer to mine of the 3d of May, relative to the American reclamations.

It is satisfactory to find that the unfavorable suggestions heretofore made on that subject are no longer alluded to, and that the only reason assigned for its postponement is foreign to the merits of the claim. I had expected no less from the justice of his Majesty's Government. But this new delay is as vexatious as unexpected, and the grounds on which it is placed appear altogether untenable.

It will appear, by my letter of the 22d of April, 1817, to his excellency the Duke of Richelieu, that the magnitude of the claims made upon France by subjects of European powers was the reason alleged at that time for postponing to a more favorable moment the discussion of the American claims in question. The Government of the United States, from the most friendly motives, though with great reluctance, acquiesced so far in that delay as to have abstained from pressing again the subject until the European claims had been arranged in a satisfactory manner. I made at that time, as will appear by my letter to the Duke of Richelieu of the 3d of April, 1818, an unavailing effort to obtain a simultaneous and definitive arrangement of the American claims as most consistent both with common justice and sound policy. And now, when the original cause of the postponement has ceased to exist, when the prosperous situation of the finances of France leaves no ground for the primitive objection, a new cause for delay is sought in circumstances of a subsequent date, and which are wholly unconnected with the subject in question. The consideration of the American claims was adjourned on a presumed plea of temporary inability, or inconvenience, early in 1817; and the commercial difficulties, which it is the object of the negotiation pending at Washington to arrange, did not arise till the year 1819. That the question of indemnity ought not to be made to depend on the fate of that negotiation is equally evident.

An arrangement which will restore to the navigation of America and France those advantages now enjoyed, to the exclusion of both, by foreign vessels, and which will have a tendency to extend the commercial and friendly relations between the two countries, is undoubtedly a most desirable object and of the highest importance. But it is, after all, not of right, but policy. Either of the two Governments may, on that subject, take an erroneous determination; but each of them, should they not, unfortunately, be able to agree on that point, has ultimately the right to make its own commercial regulations, exposing itself, without doubt, to countervailing measures, but without giving thereby any just ground of complaint, or disturbing, in other respects, the harmony subsisting between the two nations. In fact, that state of things exists to a much greater extent between France and many European powers, particularly with Great Britain. The commerce between America and France, and which may be estimated to amount in value to about eighty millions of francs a year, may still be carried on in foreign vessels or through indirect channels. Neither country has prohibited the importation of the products of the soil and industry of the other. The only question under discussion, and on which they may happen not to agree, is that of the navigation, that is to say, of the freight of the articles of exchange, which may, in the whole, be worth about three millions a year. But, from the respective prohibitions existing in France and England, it is not merely the navigation, but the commerce itself, between the two countries, which is so nearly annihilated as not to exceed twelve or fifteen millions a year. It has certainly, in this case, never been suggested, that, because each Government follows, in that respect, its own views, the other questions of right or general policy should on that account be suspended; that because a treaty of commerce may appear injurious to either of them, the other would, for that reason, be justified in refusing to do justice in other respects. The question of the indemnity claimed by the United States from France is one not merely of policy, but of right. It will again revert, and with the same force, in case there should be no arrangement of the commercial difficulties. The foundation on which the demand rests cannot be affected by that result. France must still acknowledge or deny the justice of the claim. She is bound, in the first case, to grant the indemnity; in the other, to adduce satisfactory reasons for her denial.

I must beg leave to observe, that the object of these reclamations cannot be, and is not, considered by the Government of the United States as only affecting the interests of private individuals, but as an important subject of public concern. It is not for private contracts voluntarily entered into, or other claims of a similar nature: it is for numerous spoliations committed, not only contrary to every principle of common justice, but in violation of the acknowledged law of nations, and of positive treaty stipulations; it is for the most flagrant and continued infractions of their rights as a neutral and independent nation that the United States demand that at least a satisfactory indemnity should be made to her citizens for the losses thus suffered. The whole series of their public acts, at home and abroad, when those outrageous proceedings took place, and the peculiar circumstances, (arising from simultaneous aggressions on the part of England,) which alone prevented a resort to war, are facts of such notoriety as to render it difficult to conceive how the subject can be viewed as of an inferior importance and as only affecting private interests. If any further proof was required, in that respect, the 10th article of the treaty of the 16th of March, 1810, between France and Holland, might be quoted. Certain American cargoes, which make part of our reclamations, were, by that treaty, put at the disposal of France, "in order," according to the said article, "that the same may be dealt with according to circumstances, and to the political relations between France and the United States."

Not knowing to what reclamations by subjects of France against the United States your excellency alludes, I can only observe, that if there are any, respecting which a stipulation should be deemed necessary, it must, of course, be understood that every such stipulation will in every respect be reciprocal, and embrace, on both sides, all reclamations of a similar nature, and for the same period of time.

I request your excellency to accept the assurances, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

The second, on the 20th, contained my observations on the project of an ordinance necessary that the execution of the convention of June 24 may commence on the first of October next. "I had yesterday a conference with Mr. Villèle on the subject of our claims. He expressed his wish that a general arrangement might take place, embracing all the subjects of discussion between the two countries; stated those to be, the reclamations of the United States for spoliations on their trade, those of France on account of Beaumarchais's claim, and of the vessels captured on the coast of Africa, and the question arising under the Louisiana treaty; and asked whether I was prepared to negotiate upon all those points? I answered that I was ready to discuss them all, but that I must object to uniting the Louisiana question to that of claims for indemnity, as they were essentially distinct; and as I thought that after all that had passed, we had a right to expect that no further obstacle should be thrown in the discussion of our claims by connecting it with subjects foreign to them."

[Translation.]

PARIS, November 6, 1822.

SIR: The convention concluded at Washington on the 24th of June last has removed the obstacles which have, momentarily, impeded the relations of commerce between France and the United States. Although this convention is only temporary, it holds out the expectation of a treaty more extensive and more durable. It has left leisure proper for discussing and establishing this treaty upon bases the most conformable to the interest of the two States. Already the communications are re-opened, on both sides, on the most amicable footing; his Majesty has seen with satisfaction this happy effect of the arrangement concluded in his name and in that of the United States.

If any partial difficulties still remain to be removed, they will be easily arranged between two powers who sincerely wish to establish their relations upon the most perfect equity.

In this spirit of reciprocal justice I have received the claims which you have done me the honor to transmit to me, and without prejudging anything in their regard, I must, first of all, sir, remark to you, that France has also claims pending, or to be produced to the Government of the United States. It would appear agreeable to the interest of the two parties, and to the reciprocity of justice, and of protection, to which the subjects of the two States have equally a right, that these affairs should be examined and arranged, unanimously, by way of negotiation.

His Majesty's intention would be, that these claims and the other points in dispute, upon which the convention of June 24 has not been able to pronounce, should be the object of this negotiation, in order to terminate simultaneously, and in a definitive manner, every dispute between the two States, especially in what concerns the duties received in Louisiana on the French commerce, contrary to the tenor of the 8th article of the treaty of cession.

You will only perceive, sir, in this intention of his Majesty the most firm desire of leaving in future no cause or pretext of misunderstanding or of complaints between the two States, and on the part of their respective subjects.

If you are authorized, sir, to follow this march, I pray you let me know, and I will hasten to demand of the King the necessary powers to a negotiator charged with treating with you.

If you were also authorized to sign a consular convention, the same plenipotentiary would receive powers, ad hoc, for also pursuing the negotiation.

Accept, sir, the assurance of the high consideration, &c.

JH. DE VILLELE,

The Minister of Finance, charged, ad interim, with the Port Folio of Foreign Affairs.

PARIS, November 12, 1822.

SIR: I had the honor to receive your excellency's letter of the 6th instant.

I have special powers to negotiate a convention providing for the just claims of citizens of the United States against France; as also for the like claims of French subjects against the United States, with such person or persons as may have a like authority from his Most Christian Majesty.

As minister of the United States, I am authorized to discuss the question respecting the construction of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty, and to give and receive explanations on that subject. But the negotiation on that point having been transferred to Washington, no special powers in that respect have been transmitted to me. I had understood, in the course of the conference I had the honor to have with your excellency on the 23d of September, and had accordingly written to my Government, that it was not intended to insist that that subject should be blended with that of private claims. It is, indeed, obvious that it would be utterly unjust to make the admission of these to depend on the result of a negotiation on a subject with which they have no connexion whatever, and the difficulties respecting which are of a date posterior to that of the claims.

All the representations which his Majesty's Government has made to that of the United States, whether on private or on public subjects, have uniformly been taken into consideration, and received that attention to which they were so justly entitled. In no instance has the Government of the United States declined to open a discussion on any subject thus offered to their consideration by France, or made it a preliminary condition that the discussion should also embrace some other subject in which they might happen to take a greater interest. The question respecting the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty has, in particular, been the subject of a voluminous correspondence, in the course of which the arguments in support of the construction insisted on by each party, respectively, were made known to the other. I have, in the meanwhile, for six years, made unceasing applications to his Majesty's Government for the settlement of claims to a vast amount, affecting the interest of numerous individuals, and arising from flagrant violations of the law of nations and of the rights of the United States, without having ever been able to obtain to this day satisfaction in a single instance, or even that the subject should be taken into consideration and discussed. After so many vexatious delays, for which different causes have at different times been assigned, it cannot now be intended again to postpone the investigation of that subject by insisting that it should be treated in connexion with one foreign to it, and which has already been discussed. The United States have at least the right to ask that their demands should also be examined and discussed, and I trust that, since I am authorized to treat, as well concerning the claims of French subjects against the United States as respecting those of American citizens against France, a distinct negotiation to that effect will be opened without any further delay.

Permit me, at the same time, to renew to your excellency the assurances that the United States have the most earnest desire that every subject of difference between the two countries should be amicably arranged, and their commercial and political relations placed on the most friendly and solid footing. They will be ready to open again negotiations on the subject of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty, and on every other which remains to be adjusted, and will have no objection that the seat of those negotiations should be transferred from Washington to this place.

Although my powers to treat respecting every subject connected with the commerce of the two countries may embrace that of a consular convention, yet, as this had not been contemplated by my Government, I am not at this time prepared to conclude an arrangement for that purpose.

I request your excellency to accept the assurances, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

His Excellency Count DE VILLELE,
Charged with the Department of Foreign Affairs, &c.

No. 237.

Mr. Gallatin to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, November 19, 1822.

SIR: I received last night and have the honor to inclose a copy of Mr. de Villele's answer (dated 15th instant) to my letter of the 12th. You will perceive that, without taking any notice of the reasons I had urged why a distinct negotiation should be immediately opened on the subject of the claims against both Governments, he insists that this shall be treated in connexion with the question respecting the construction of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty. The object is too obvious to require any comments on my part, and this final decision leaves me no other course than to refer the whole to my Government.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Mr. de Villèle to Mr. Gallatin.

[Translation.]

PARIS, November 15, 1822.

SIR: You did me the honor to announce to me, on the 12th of this month, that you were authorized to negotiate a convention relative to the claims of Americans against France, and to those of France against the United States, but that you had no power to enter upon a negotiation concerning the interpretation of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty.

The discussions which have arisen upon this last point between your Government and the King's Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States having had no result, and this question being thus left undecided, it is both proper and just to resume the examination of it; it touches upon too great interests not to be treated of with renewed attention, or to be abandoned.

If a new arrangement takes place for the claims which are still in controversy, it ought to comprehend the whole, and the desire of the King's Government is not to leave any difficulty, any indecision remaining in the relations of the two countries.

It is for the same reason, sir, that I demanded, in the letter which I had the honor to address to you on the sixth of this month, that the negotiation to be opened on the respective claims should also include a consular convention.

If your powers for discussing these difficult points should not appear to you sufficiently extensive to make it the object of a negotiation, I think, sir, that you will deem it fit to ask of your Government supplementary authority to come at an arrangement which cannot be of the utility proposed by the two Governments, unless it shall embrace all the questions and the claims which are still in dispute.

I can only refer, sir, on this subject, to the communications which I had the honor to make to you on the 6th of this month, and with which you have doubtless acquainted your Government.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my high consideration,

JH. DE VILLELE,

The Minister of Finances, charged, ad interim, with the Port Folio of Foreign Affairs.

No. 250.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to France, to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, February 27, 1823.

"The more I have reflected upon the ground assumed by this Government on the subject of our claims, and on the attempt to connect their discussion with the question arising under the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty, the more I have felt satisfied that it was impossible that the United States should depart from the true construction of that article, and acquiesce in that contended for by France, and that a renewed discussion on that subject would be unprofitable, and lead to no result whatever. As a last, but, I believed, unavailing effort, I have concluded to express that conviction to the French Government, and have accordingly addressed, this day, to Mr. Chateaubriand, the letter of which I have the honor to inclose a copy."

PARIS, February 27, 1823.

SIR: I had the honor to receive his excellency Count de Villèle's letter of the 15th of November last, by which, notwithstanding the remonstrances contained in mine of the 12th, his excellency, being at that time charged with the Department of Foreign Affairs, still insisted that the discussion of the claims of individuals of both nations upon the two Governments, respectively, should not take place unless it was connected with a renewed negotiation on the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty.

A conversation I had the honor to have with his excellency the Duke de Montmorency, after his return from Verona, induced me to hope, although he did not encourage any expectations of a different result, that he would, however, again lay the subject before his Majesty's Council of Ministers. This circumstance, the subsequent change in the Department of Foreign Affairs, and the objects of primary importance which have heretofore necessarily engrossed your excellency's attention, have prevented an earlier official answer to his excellency Count de Villèle's letter.

It has, together with the others on the same subject, as he had naturally anticipated, been of course transmitted to my Government. But on a review of the correspondence of Mr. Adams with Mr. Hyde de Neuville, and with myself, I must express my perfect conviction that the subject having been maturely examined and thoroughly discussed, there cannot be the least expectation that the United States will alter their view of it, or acquiesce in the construction put by his Majesty's minister on the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty.

It is not my intention, at this moment, to renew a discussion which seems to have been already exhausted; but I will beg leave simply to state the question to your excellency.

It was agreed by the article above mentioned that the ships of France should forever be treated upon the footing of the most favored nation in the ports of Louisiana.

Vessels of certain foreign nations being now treated in the ports of the United States (including those of Louisiana) on the same footing with American vessels, in consideration of the American vessels being treated in the ports of those nations on the same footing with their own vessels, France has required that French vessels should, by virtue of the said article, be treated in the ports of Louisiana on the same footing with the vessels of those nations, without allowing on her part the consideration or reciprocal condition by virtue of which those vessels are thus treated.

The United States contend that the right to be treated upon the footing of the most favored nation, when not otherwise defined, and when expressed only in those words, is that, and can only be that, of being entitled to that treatment gratuitously, if such nation enjoys it gratuitously, and on paying the same equivalent, if it has been granted in consideration of an equivalent. Setting aside every collateral matter and subsidiary argument, they say that the article in question, expressed as it is, can have no other meaning, is susceptible of no other construction, for this plain and incontrovertible reason: that if the French vessels were allowed to receive gratuitously the same treatment which those of certain other nations receive only in consideration of an equivalent, they would not be treated as the most favored nation, but more favorably than any other nation. And, since the article must necessarily have the meaning contended for by the United States, and no other, the omission or insertion of words to define it is wholly immaterial, a definition being necessary only when the expressions used are of doubtful import, and the insertion of words to that effect in some other treaties, belonging to that class of explanatory but superfluous phrases, of which instances are to be found in so many treaties.

It might, indeed, have, perhaps, been sufficient to say, that, in point of fact, there was no most favored nation in the United States; the right enjoyed by the vessels of certain foreign nations to be treated in the ports of the United States as American vessels, in consideration of American vessels receiving a similar treatment in the ports of those nations, not being a favor, but a mere act of reciprocity.

Let me also observe, that the pretension of France would, if admitted, leave no alternative to the United States than either to suffer the whole commerce between France and Louisiana to be carried exclusively in French vessels, or to renounce the right of making arrangements with other nations deemed essential to our prosperity, and having for its object not to lay restrictions on commerce, but to remove them. If the meaning of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty was such, indeed, as has been contended for on the part of France, the United States, bound to fulfil their engagements, must submit to the consequences, whatever these might be; but this having been proven not to be the case, the observation is made only to show that the United States never can, either for the sake of obtaining indemnities for their citizens, or from their anxious desire to settle by conciliatory arrangements all their differences with France, be brought to acquiesce in the erroneous construction put upon the article in question.

The proposal made by his excellency Mr. de Villele in his letter of the 6th of November, and reiterated in that of the 15th, can, therefore, have no other effect than to produce unnecessary delays, and would, if persisted in, be tantamount to an indefinite postponement of the examination and settlement of the claims of the citizens of the United States. It will remain for his Majesty's Government to decide whether this determination be consistent with justice, whether the reclamations of private individuals should be thus adjourned, because the two Governments happen to differ in opinion on a subject altogether foreign to those claims. Having nothing to add to my reiterated and unavailing applications on that subject, my only object at this moment has been to show that I cannot expect any instructions from my Government that will alter the state of the question.

I request your excellency to accept the assurance, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

His Excellency Viscount DE CHATEAUBRIAND,
Minister of Foreign Affairs, &c., &c., &c.

SPOILIATIONS BY FRANCE FROM 1793 TO 1800.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 25, 1824.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom were referred the petitions of Hadrianus Van Noorden, William and Nathaniel Hooper, Daniel Henshaw, several merchants and underwriters of Salem, several merchants of Gloucester, several merchants and underwriters of Alexandria, District of Columbia, several merchants of Washington, North Carolina, Henry Clark and others, of Kennebunk, and several others, merchants, in Maine, reported:

That no evidence accompanies either of the petitions, all of which, except the first, are literally the same, having been apparently prepared by concert among the claimants to be presented to Congress. To discriminate between them is not practicable, if it were desirable. The committee are compelled to present, in general terms, the nature of these claims as set forth by the parties interested, and to examine as briefly as possible the grounds upon which relief is asked from the Government of the United States. The claims are founded upon spoliations committed by the private and public armed vessels of France between the years 1793 and 1800.

The petitioners allege that the French Government, to the date of the ratification of the treaty of 1800, always considered the recognition of their claims as due to its honor, and attached them as a charge upon its national character.

That the Government of the United States, which had volunteered its agency for the recovery of them from France, exercised its power and authority to prevent the petitioners from obtaining indemnity; that the Government of the United States received from France a full and fair equivalent for these claims, in the discharge from its liabilities under the treaties with France and the abrogation of these treaties.

Similar applications, if not by the same persons, have been frequently made to Congress, and reports upon them are to be found in the records of the House of Representatives and of the Senate; none of these applications have been successful. Without attempting even to enumerate the failures to obtain a sanction to their statements and to their claims, the committee refer the House to a detailed report of the various acts of the Government of the United States, and of France, from 1793 and 1800, made by a select committee on the 22d of April, 1802, to which applications like the present were referred. Governed by that report, the Committee on Foreign Relations are not satisfied that the French Government ever admitted the justice of the claims of the petitioners, or ever intended to pay them; that the Government of the United States used every effort, even to war itself, to rescue the property of American merchants from the lawless violence of France; that its efforts to procure payment for the spoiliations committed by the French cruisers were not discontinued until it was obvious that there was no hope of success. That this Government never received from France any equivalent for the claims of Americans upon France. The war of aggression was commenced by France, and every act of the United States was a just retaliation for previous injury. The treaties with France were annulled by an act of Congress in 1798, in consequence of the utter disregard of the stipulations of them by that power.

In short, to justify their claims upon the United States, the petitioners assume that France was right and their own Government wrong; that France was prepared to make a just reparation for the outrages committed under her own laws until released from her obligations by the United States, who were faithless to their trust in the first instance, and have been regardless of the obligations of justice ever since; assumptions not consistent with truth, nor creditable to the patriotism of those who make them. The committee recommend to the House to adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That petitions of the several persons who ask indemnity for spoiliations committed by French cruisers on their property, between the years 1793 and 1800, be rejected.

SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE IN EXECUTIVE SESSION APRIL 30, 1824, AND THE INJUNCTION OF SECRECY SINCE REMOVED.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate, for their constitutional advice with regard to its ratification, a convention for the suppression of the African slave trade, signed at London, on the 13th ultimo, by the minister of the United States, residing there, on their part, with the plenipotentiaries of the British Government, on the part of that nation, together with the correspondence relating thereto; part of which is included in a communication made to the House of Representatives on the 19th ultimo, a printed copy of which is among the documents herewith sent.

Motives of accommodation to the wishes of the British Government render it desirable that the Senate should act definitively upon this convention as speedily as may be found convenient.

JAMES MONROE.

No. 1.

LONDON, January 23, 1824.

SIR: I received, on the evening of the 20th instant, a note from Mr. Secretary Canning, requesting me to call on the following day at the Foreign Office, for the purpose of meeting there Mr. Huskisson and Mr. Stratford Canning, by which I at once understood that the negotiation which the President has confided to me was now about to have its regular commencement. I went at the time appointed, when, meeting these gentlemen, I was informed by them that their instructions, as well as full powers as the plenipotentiaries of this Government, were made out, and that all things were ready on their side for opening the negotiation. I replied that I, too, was ready on the part of the United States, upon which the 23d was fixed upon for our first meeting.

The negotiation has accordingly been opened this day, in due form, at the Office of the Board of Trade. At the wish of Mr. Secretary Canning, specially expressed at the Foreign Office the day before yesterday, the subject of the slave trade is that upon which we have first entered. Our introductory conferences upon it occupied a couple of hours, when an adjournment took place until Thursday next, the 29th instant. It was agreed that the same subject should then be resumed, and, without discussing others, proceeded with until it should be finished.

In making my reports to you of this negotiation, for the information of the President, my intention is not to make them from meeting to meeting, a course that might often prove unsatisfactory and unavailing, but to wait the issue of the whole, or, at any rate, the completion of some one subject, before I proceed to write about it. This was the plan pursued at the joint negotiation with this court in 1818, in which I bore a share, and I hope will be approved. I will take care to deviate from it whenever circumstances may seem to render a deviation necessary and proper. As, moreover, I must, simultaneously with this negotiation, attend to the business of the legation, it has occurred to me, that, as often as I may find it necessary to write to you respecting the latter, whilst the negotiation is in progress, I will go on with the regular series in numbering my despatches, treating those that I shall write on the negotiation as distinct, and so numbering them.

I cannot flatter myself with the expectation that the work of the negotiation will be very soon done. The subjects are many and complicated. The session of Parliament is at hand, and will, when it arrives, make heavy calls upon the time of one of the British plenipotentiaries; added to which, the daily interruptions to which my own time is liable—always the lot of the permanent incumbent of this mission—will be too liable to increase the unavoidable obstacles to frequent and rapid conferences. I can only repeat, that my best endeavors shall not be spared, and I presume to hope that my past conduct in this trust will be accepted as the pledge of my future diligence. Although there have been delays in bringing on the negotiation, all my preliminary correspondence in relation to it will, I trust, have not arisen through my instrumentality.

The standing of one of the British plenipotentiaries is so well known with us that I need not speak of it. The other, Mr. Huskisson, (first named in the commission,) is of the Cabinet, a distinguished member of the House of Commons, the president of the Board of Trade, and Treasurer of the Navy. Besides his reputation for talents, which is high, he seems to be no less generally regarded as a man of liberal principles and conciliating temper.

I have the honor to remain, with very great respect, your obedient servant,

RICHARD RUSH.

HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

No. 2.

LONDON, March 15, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I concluded and signed, on behalf of the United States, the day before yesterday, a convention with this Government for the suppression of the slave trade, which instrument I herewith transmit to your hands, to be laid before the President.

In my despatch, No. 355, written previously to the commencement of the negotiation, I mentioned that Mr. Secretary Canning had expressed a wish that the subject of the slave trade should be treated separately from all others on which I had received the instructions of my Government, and that I had not thought it necessary to object to this course. In pursuance of it, this subject was accordingly taken up separately, and was the first upon which we entered, as you have already been informed in my despatch, which announced the formal opening of the negotiation. The only deviation from the course indicated in my latter despatch has been, that other subjects have since been gone into, though none, as yet, finished, a mode of proceeding that was found eligible.

With the convention, I also transmit the protocols of the several conferences at which its provisions were discussed and settled; and, for the better understanding of the whole subject, I proceed to give you a more full account of the nature and progress of the discussions than can be afforded by the protocols.

I offered, in the first instance, to the British plenipotentiaries, and without any alteration, the projet that came inclosed to me in your despatch, No. 65, of the 24th of June, explaining and recommending its provisions by such considerations as were to be drawn from your despatch, and others that seemed apposite. They remarked, that they hoped it would be borne in mind that the plan offered was not of the choice of Great Britain, her preference having been distinctly made known to Europe, as well as to the United States, for a different plan; nor was it, they said, necessary towards the more effectual abolition of the traffic by her own subjects, her home statutes and prohibitions being already adequate to that end. As regarded the latter intimation, I replied, that the United States stood upon at least equal ground with Great Britain, their existing laws against the slave trade being marked by even a higher tone of severity, and the consequent exclusion of their citizens from all participation in the trade being, as was believed, so far as the virtue of municipal laws could avail, not less effectual. As to the preference of Great Britain for a different plan, I contented myself with alluding, without more of retrospect, to the uniform objections that had been made to it by the leading powers of Europe, especially by France and Russia, as well as by the United States; and with remarking, that my Government had charged me with the duty of presenting the projet in question, under the two-fold view of bringing forward, according to the wish of Great Britain, a substitute for the plan that had been rejected, and to carry into effect a resolution which had passed the House of Representatives of the United States upon this subject at the close of the last session of Congress. I added, that it was the sincere belief of my Government, rendering, at the same time, full justice to all the past efforts of Great Britain in the cause of abolition, that if she could see her way to the acceptance of the plan now offered, combining, as it did, the great principle of denouncing the slave trade as piracy, with a system of international co-operation for its suppression, the evil would be more effectually extirpated, and at a day not distant, than by any other modes that had heretofore been devised. The British plenipotentiaries replied, that they would give it a candid examination, esteeming themselves fortunate, considering the great moral interests at stake, and which both nations had alike at heart, if they could reconcile its acceptance with the opinions and convictions which had hitherto guided the conduct of their Government on this subject. They gave their unhesitating assent to the principle of denouncing the traffic as piracy by the laws of Great Britain, provided we could arrive at a common mind on all other parts of the plan proposed.

After they had had the plan a proper time under consideration, they expressed their fears that parts of it would prove ineffectual, unless with modifications and additions, which they would proceed to enumerate. These were principally as follows: They said that as soon as the two powers, by their mutual laws, had rendered all participation in the slave trade piracy, and, by a formal convention, agreed to unite their naval efforts for its suppression, it might be expected that the subjects and citizens of each who meditated a commission of the offence would no longer venture to assume the proper flag of either country, but seek to shroud their guilt under that of some third power not yet a party to the convention. British subjects or American citizens might, for example, readily charter a Danish, a Swedish, or a Russian vessel, and, under cover of either of these flags, with simulated papers and other fraudulent contrivances, pursue the traffic, whilst the true owner of the vessel remained in ignorance of the real and guilty transaction. Were such transgressors, the British plenipotentiaries asked, to be screened from all detection and punishment, though the vessel should be afterwards restored? I answered, that I presumed not, and that the words of the second article of the projet, or for the account of their subjects or citizens, were, as I supposed, intended to meet such a case, or other similar attempts to get rid, by evasive pretexts, of the penalties created by the convention. They agreed in ascribing to them this meaning, but thought that some more distinctive provision would be necessary to prevent such evasions. They further asked, suppose a British subject or an American citizen to be taken whilst engaged in the slave trade on board of a vessel not belonging to either power, or navigated on account of the subjects or citizens of either, and brought into Great Britain or her dominions, or into the United States, ought he not to be tried indiscriminately in either country, since the laws of each would alike brand him as a pirate? This inquiry, if answered in the affirmative, involving a conflict with one of the primary provisions of the plan, the British plenipotentiaries did not press, but, on the contrary, willingly withdrew it. They proposed, in lieu of it, that the subjects or citizens of either party, taken under such circumstances, should be sent home for trial before the tribunals of their own country; and to the proposition, as altered in this essential particular, I said that there would, probably, be no exception taken, for it might happen that British subjects thus offending would be found within the jurisdiction of the United States; and if their own citizens were ever justly captured whilst so offending, as a law of Congress already subjected them when in this predicament to the doom of pirates, I did not anticipate from my Government any objection to their being sent home for trial in our own courts, under whatever circumstances or by whatever country they might be lawfully seized.

Would not serious or fatal embarrassments, they also asked, arise in regard to evidence, under the criminal prosecution against the crew of the slave trading vessel for the act of piracy, as provided by the eighth article of the projet? If the libel against the vessel took place first, as was supposed would be the case, how could the captain or crew be examined on interrogatories, since the fact of the condemnation of the vessel would draw after it their own guilt? Their answers, consequently, might bring them into jeopardy. I replied, that the commander or boarding officer, and other persons belonging to the capturing vessel, being sent in as witnesses against the accused vessel, might, perhaps, under a convention of a character like the present, supersede, in some degree, the necessity of examining the crew, as was usual in admiralty causes; but that if this would not be proper as a general rule, it might hold good, to some extent, in cases where the interior arrangements and structure of the vessel, and, above all, the actual presence of slaves, combined to establish more unequivocally, to the very eye, the iniquity of the voyage. At all events, the objection, if valid, which was not admitted, could go no further than to except from the criminal prosecution those of the crew, supposed to be few in number, who might be selected as witnesses on the part of the State or Crown, leaving the rest open to all the penal inflictions of the convention. The British plenipotentiaries ultimately agreed that the objection was unfounded, on learning from their law officers that the right of a witness not to answer, where a confession of guilt might be involved, was merely a general shield thrown over him, to be used or not, according to circumstances and the opinion of the court, without otherwise affecting the action at law or public prosecution, in the course of which the right might be claimed. It was an independent right that stood upon its own basis, the existence and knowledge of which was not previously to foreclose the institution of this or any other prosecution any more than it would the institution of a suit in a court of chancery or before any other judicial tribunal.

They next drew my attention to the fifth article, which provides that no person shall be taken out of the captured vessel; a point that I had declared would be considered by my Government as indispensable. What, then, they asked, might sometimes be the lot of the slaves? Suppose an hundred of them, or even more, on board the captured vessel, and that vessel perhaps a small one; suppose them all crowded together under such circumstances of cruelty, that disease was among them, and death daily thinning their numbers; a supposition not exaggerated under all the recollections of this afflicting traffic, but too likely to be often realized as long as it was continued; what, in such a case, was to be done? I replied, that I did not, for myself, understand the word person as applicable in this sense to the slaves, but to the crew of the vessel. Nor did I regard the term cargo, against which a prohibition of removal alike indispensable existed, as descriptive, under this convention, of the slaves. Hence, when the removal of the latter, or of any portion of them, should be found obviously necessary from imperious motives of humanity, I saw no sufficient reason for questioning the propriety of allowing, under suitable regulations, such removal to take place.
