In producing the proofs of the absolute nullity of the Government, there can be no difficulty, except in the selection of them. Thus, the privateers that captured all vessels indifferently, notwithstanding the precautions and certificates of King Louis, were French. The cargoes which King Louis was forced to restore to the French privateers which had captured them within his ports, and despite the resistance of his gardes cotes, belonged to Holland. Finally, the cargoes whose sequestration King Louis dared not raise were reputed to be American, but belonged to Holland. He had been taught, by much censure, not to commit himself further; and, by a public knowledge of dependence, referred the claimants to the French Government.

This last example was considered, at the most, as ad rem.

The sense of the citation then presents itself naturally; and, indeed, the only interpretation that can be admitted is this:

"Among the many cargoes delivered to France, after the union, there were some which belonged to citizens of Holland, and which had been all included in the sequestration as the property of Americans;" that, although Louis had still the name of King, he retained so little of the power as not to dare the raising of his own sequestration, but was obliged to refer his subjects to the French Government.

The conviction of the inutility of addressing themselves to Louis appeared to be felt by the American owners also, (which was insinuated at the same place.) The presumptions of this have been strengthened by discoveries that may be used at a proper time and place.

Mr. Everett, lastly, recapitulates his citations, and concludes his note by requesting the undersigned to answer these two questions: 1st. Whether he does not admit that the cargoes of the Bacchus, the Baltimore, and the others placed in similar circumstances, and which were not conveyed to France till after the union, were not delivered in virtue of the treaty? 2d. Whether a certain part of these cargoes was not delivered to France before the union.

As the replies to these questions would be official, as coming from the undersigned, he must excuse himself from making them.

In relation to the first, it would be impossible for him to answer officially, for a presumptive reason. The cargoes of the Baltimore and the Bacchus (to which he will add the St. Michael, but he is not certain there were any more in the same condition) were not delivered to France till after the Government of Holland had ceased to exist.

At this period the official information ceased. All the information that was afterwards collected on the subject of these vessels was procured after that which the undersigned had transmitted. But to know how, and if, the French Government did avail itself, after the abolition of the Kingdom of Holland, of a treaty concluded with this Kingdom, is a question to which the French authorities alone, who made the confiscation, are prepared to answer.

As to the second, the undersigned will observe that his answer was given, as far as his object required, when he declared that the cargoes of the three named vessels were not delivered till after the union. But if the design of Mr. Everett were to acquire new information and further arguments on which to found other suits, it should not be required of the Government of the Netherlands to make any investigation of the subject. To do this, would be in direct opposition to the principle that the Government which is wished to be made responsible is estranged from the whole course of conduct pursued in regard to the matter in question.

The undersigned seizes this occasion to renew to Mr. Everett the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

Extract from a letter (No. 40) from Mr. Everett to the Secretary of State, dated

THE HAGUE, January 25, 1820.

"I mentioned in a late letter that I intended to address a note to the Minister of Foreign Affairs here, resuming the whole argument on the subject of the claims. On further reflection, I have thought it expedient to take a different course. From several phrases in both the last notes of Baron de Nagell, it appears to be the wish of this Government that the objection, founded on the fact that the greater part of the property was not delivered to the French till after the union, should be particularly submitted to the President's consideration. As there is no motive for pressing the correspondence with extraordinary rapidity, this circumstance has induced me to refrain from any further instances till I shall have the honor of receiving instructions from you respecting this point. I had prepared a considerable part of the note inclosed with the intention of presenting it at once, and I now transmit it to you as a report upon the present state of the correspondence, and an examination of the last communications from this Government.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs has contented himself with stating the simple fact, on which he founds the objection alluded to, without entering into the reasons which make it, in his opinion, a sufficient answer to the claim. The strongest form in which it can be presented seems to me to be the following: "The treaty of March, 1810, was an act extorted by force from the Government of Holland. It is, however, in form, the act of the Government, and the nation is, of course, responsible for its consequences, in fact. But it could not confer any rights on France; and as the Government of Holland had ceased to exist at the time when the French took possession of the property, they must be regarded as having exercised an act of direct violence upon it, for which they are directly responsible; whereas, had it been done before the union, in the form of a transfer from Holland, it would have been an act of indirect violence through the medium of Holland, for which Holland is immediately responsible, and France to her."

It may be urged, however, in answer to this, that if the property, by the operation of the treaty, was taken out of the course of judicial process and placed at the disposal of the French, the Government of Holland occasioned the loss, and is therefore the party responsible. The mere fact of sequester, though made in legal form, makes the Government accountable for the property. If it is lost, they must, at least, show that it was without their fault; and a mere detention, other than what would happen in the due course of law, would make them responsible.

The President will decide how far the objection is admissible. If considered sufficient, the effect of it would be to transfer the claim, for the part of the property affected by it, from Holland to France. In this case, it would probably be thought necessary for this Government to substantiate their assertion by such evidence as could be laid before the French Government. A claim would remain against the Netherlands for the part of the property not affected by this objection, and for all the property to which the existing decrees of sequester were illegally applied. Such, for example, was the case of the St. Michael. The law of nations does not permit the application of such decrees to vessels bound to a different country, and driven into port in distress. Many other cases would, probably, in different ways, be found to come within that predicament. An illegal sequester would, of course, make the Government responsible for the loss, however it may have happened.

Should the objection appear insufficient, the claim will still remain against this Government for all the property. In either case, the denial of the responsibility is a further and paramount objection. It does not appear to me to be maintained in the argument, but this Government is evidently resolved to persist in it, and it is, of course, conclusive against every part of the claim. The President will judge whether it is expedient to continue the correspondence any further on this point; whether, if it be continued, it might not be proper to accompany the next communication with a proposition similar to the one stated at the end of the inclosed note; and whether, if it be the intention of the Government to adopt ultimately any more vigorous measures for the recovery of the claim, on the failure of mere argument, it would be advantageous to give notice of them as an alternative at the same time that this proposition is presented.

No. 14 (a.)

Mr. Everett to the Baron de Nagell.

The undersigned, chargé d'affaires of the United States of America, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note addressed to him by his excellency Baron de Nagell, Minister of Foreign Affairs, on the 9th of December. The undersigned has already observed, in a former note, that the denial of the fact of confiscation was a preliminary objection in its nature to any other, and, if well founded, necessarily decisive. The assertion upon which this denial rests does not, however, extend to all the property confiscated. It is only stated by Baron de Nagell that the greater part of the property (presque totaleté), and not that the whole, was in the King's magazines at the time of the union. It was the principal object of the undersigned, in his last note, to point out this defect in the objection to Baron de Nagell, and to ascertain whether the Government of the Netherlands intended to admit, by making the assertion in this form, that a part of the property was delivered before the union, or whether, (as the general terms in which the objection founded on this assertion is conceived would seem to intimate,) they were ready to give such an explanation of it as would make it extend, in form, to all the property. In the latter case, it was the wish of the undersigned to avoid any further discussion of the principle of responsibility until the previous objection of fact could be removed. His views in making this request, which was clearly as much in the interest of one party as the other, seem to have been misunderstood by his excellency, and he declines to give any explanation upon the subject. The objection of fact remains, of course, insufficient in form as an answer to the whole claim; and the undersigned is compelled, in order to make a complete reply to the note of November, to resume again the whole discussion.

The system of defence adopted by the Government of the Netherlands consists of two parts: a denial of the fact that the property in question was confiscated by the Government of Holland, and a denial of the responsibility of the present Government for such confiscation, supposing it to be proved.

To establish the first of these points, it is asserted by M. de Nagell that the greater part of the property was in the King's warehouses at the time of the union of Holland to France, and was not delivered to the French until after that period.

The first remark, in answer to this objection, is obvious that it relates only to a part of the property, and cannot afford a foundation for a general answer in regard to the whole. The undersigned had the honor, in his last note, of pointing out this objection to M. de Nagell, and of requesting an explanation of his views respecting it, which his excellency, in his answer, declines to give. The objection, therefore, remains unanswered.

The second answer to this assertion is, that the property in question was ceded to the French Government by that of Holland several months before the union; that this cession deprived the owners of their property, and is the act upon which the claim is founded; and that the French, in taking possession of this property, only took possession of what belonged to them by a solemn treaty, ratified and executed in the usual forms. The undersigned had the honor of stating this answer, as well as the former one, in his last note, and supported it by passages from M. de Nagell's own notes, in which particular cargoes are said to have been delivered to the French by virtue of the treaty. M. de Nagell, without explaining these passages, observes, in his reply, that the Government have no official information upon this point. This accidental circumstance does not diminish the certainty of the fact, which is still confirmed by M. de Nagell's own testimony, and is too notorious to be called in question. The undersigned has in his possession several of the answers given at the time by the authorities of the country to the parties interested, in all of which it is directly implied, and in some explicitly stated, that the property was delivered to the French by virtue of the treaty; as in that of which he has the honor to transmit a copy annexed.

Thus the single assertion upon which the first part of the defence is founded is liable to two objections, either of which is sufficient to destroy its force, and neither of which has yet been attacked.

The second part of the defence maintains that the Government of this country is not responsible for the confiscation, supposing it to be proved. In this part of the argument, therefore, the fact of the confiscation is supposed, and this supposition is absolutely necessary, since, if the fact never happened, it is useless to reason upon its consequences. The undersigned will find occasion to recur to this preliminary observation in the course of his remarks, and will only add here that it was in this view, alone, that the discussion of the principle of responsibility was denominated unnecessary in his last note.

At the commencement of his argument on this principle, in his note of November, Baron de Nagell endeavors to prove that the King of Holland was not responsible for his own actions, on account of the dependence in which he was held by his brother Napoleon. He asserts that, in the opinion of Europe, the Government of France exercised at that time over that of Holland an influence inconsistent with national independence, and quotes, in support of this remark, as impartial expressions of the opinion of Europe, a passage from Mr. Schoell's abridged history of treaties, and a passage from a declaration of the British Government directed against that of the United States, in a time of war between the two countries. It is enough to mention the source from whence the latter of these passages is taken, to show that it is entirely inadmissible as authority on any subject against the United States. Mr. Schoell is certainly a respectable compiler, but has not been quoted by the undersigned as an authority in matters of opinion on the duties of nations, or as a sufficient organ of the sentiments of Europe. It is not necessary, however, to contest the remarks here cited from this writer, because it does not enter into the system of the American Government to deny that France exercised at this time a very great influence over Holland. The precise extent and character of this influence can, of course, be correctly known only to the Government of these two nations. But, in the view of the American Government, the existence of such an influence, however great it may have been, has no effect upon the claim, and the only operation of it would be to establish a corresponding claim of the Government of the Netherlands upon that of France. This idea has been already stated and developed several times in the notes of the undersigned, and he will not repeat here what he has before alleged in relation to it. He regrets that it has hitherto escaped the notice of M. de Nagell, because it is intended as an answer to one of the principal objections that have been urged against the claim.

With regard to the profit which Holland may be supposed to have derived from this transaction, the undersigned considers the remarks upon this point, in his note of July, as unaffected by those of Baron de Nagell in reply, and even as confirmed by the very forcible manner in which his excellency insists upon the friendly disposition of Louis towards the Americans. But this inquiry, like the one last considered, is immaterial, since a Government is not the less bound to make restitution of property acquired by violence, because it may have been in its turn deprived of the property so acquired by accident, as the greater violence of a stronger neighbor. An accidental remark of Mr. Eustis, that the proceeds of the property confiscated were ultimately deposited in the Imperial Treasury, has been repeatedly quoted by M. de Nagell, and seems to be regarded as an important admission. The undersigned does not see by what means this character can be attached to it. The fact upon which the claim is founded by the American Government is the cession of this property by Holland to France, and it is not surely very extraordinary that the proceeds of such a cession should be deposited in the French Treasury.

"But supposing King Louis to have been responsible for the seizure of the property, the responsibility does not devolve upon the present Government, because King Louis was a usurper."

How is this objection supported?

The undersigned has already stated, in regard to this point, a principle which appeared to him too clear to require proof, that established Governments are legitimate in the view of foreign nations. The Government of Louis was an established Government, in the fullest sense of the word. His title was never questioned in the Netherlands, from the time of his coronation to that of his abdication. The first posts of the administration were occupied in part by the same persons who now enjoy the confidence of his Majesty and are employed in the Government; and the citizens in general acquiesced in his authority in various ways, express and implied. According to Puffendorf, in the passage cited by M. de Nagell, the acquiescence of the citizens, either tacit or express, makes the Government of a usurper legitimate, that is, binding on the citizens themselves. Surely, then, foreign nations have a right to consider it legitimate, since they are not bound to be more delicate for the citizens than they are for themselves. If, to use the strong language of Baron de Nagell, citizens who would consider themselves dishonored by associating in private life with rogues and robbers think proper to acquiesce in the Government of usurpers and tyrants, it is not for other nations to question their taste any further than their own safety may make it necessary.

What principles are opposed by Baron de Nagell to these plain propositions? The doctrine of Martens, which establishes the exception founded on the principle of self-defence—that is, with nations, the principle of self-government. The exception, instead of contradicting the rule, as usual, proves it, because they are only different developments of the same principle. The authority of Martens is, therefore, as the undersigned remarked in a former note, in favor of the American Government. As applied to the present case, his principle is as follows: "The United States would have had a right to interfere in the Government of Holland, had it been necessary for their own safety." Does this prove that they had no right to consider the established Government legitimate, when it was not necessary for their safety to interfere? Does it not suppose, on the contrary, that they had not only the right, but were bound, in general, to regard established Governments as legitimate? In like manner, on the same principle, the Netherlands have a right to interfere in the election of the President of the United States, if it should be necessary for their safety. Does this prove that they have no right to consider as legitimate the Government established in the United States? Does it not suppose, on the contrary, that they have not only the right, but are bound, in general, to regard it as legitimate?

The exception established by Martens, which, as has been shown, supposes the principle maintained by the United States is the only authority cited by Baron de Nagell in opposition to this principle, nor does he advance any arguments against it. He observes, however, that it is incompatible with the practice of the present day. What says the Government of Austria, in the late Presidential address to the German Diet, an address which has received the adhesion of Mr. de Martens, the author preferred by M. de Nagell, and a member of the Diet, as well as of the representative of this Government in that assembly? They are careful not to intrench upon the right belonging to every State of the Confederacy to regulate its internal concerns according to its wants and its lights; and yet the States of the Confederacy enjoy only a qualified sovereignty. How much more, then, does this right belong to States completely independent! The invasion of France by the allies in 1815 is the most remarkable instance in modern history of the exercise of the right of interference. How was it justified by the allies? They published a special declaration, stating that they were obliged, on the principle of self-defence, to make a united attack upon Napoleon Bonaparte, but disclaiming the intention of imposing a Government upon France. To this alliance the Government of the Netherlands acceded, and this is, therefore, their own interpretation of the right of interference. And what is the principle of this legitimacy which Baron de Nagell seems to oppose to the doctrine of the American Government? Is it not the very principle upon which the claim is founded, pushed to a much greater extent than is necessary to support it? The legitimacy of the Bourbons, for example: does it consist in having derived an undoubted title to the French crown from the founder of their race, who was himself a usurper, without the shadow of a title, or in the length of the time for which their Government had been established, and the quiet acquiescence of the French nation in it for a series of centuries? Is it not the European principle, that established Governments are not only legitimate, but that they are the only legitimate ones? That they are legitimate to the exclusion of others that might seem more conformable to the theory of political justice? This, if the undersigned is not deceived, is the European doctrine of legitimacy. The United States have no occasion, in the present case, to assert the principle to this extent. They only acknowledge the duty, and claim the right of regarding as legitimate, for the purpose of its foreign relations, a Government which was quietly established, and had received the acquiescence of the people.

Had the Government of the United States, after the establishment of the present Constitution, refused to pay the public debt contracted in the Netherlands, during the American war, on the ground that the form of government had been changed; that the debt was contracted under the old confederation; that they could not be responsible for what had been done by former Governments; that the Government was at that time illegitimate, founded in rebellion and usurpation, and not sanctified till some years after, by the acknowledgment of the mother country; and that the contracts of an illegitimate Government were not binding: the Government of the Netherlands would, probably, have replied, with great justice, that whatever might have been the character of the Government, in the opinion of the mother country, it was acknowledged as legitimate at the time by the citizens of the United States of America and the Netherlands, then in alliance, and that it was too late now to urge, in exemption from an obligation then contracted, that the title of the Government was, in theory, defective. They would have said that nations have a right to regulate their own Governments, but that the Government that they may establish, or in which they may acquiesce, is their legal representative, and that they are bound by its acts in their intercourse with foreign nations.

On these principles the Government of King Louis was a legitimate Government for the purposes of foreign relations. But grant that King Louis was a usurper, that is, that his title was defective, though the nation acquiesced in it. The doubts and distinctions expressed by Grotius and Puffendorf as to the obligation of the acts of a usurper arise altogether from the variety of senses in which the term may be understood. A usurper, in the proper sense of the term, is a pretender to the Government, whose claims have not been acquiesced in by the people. He is considered by the publicists as at war with the nation; and the nation, by opposing and making war upon him, enters a perpetual protest against his authority. Still, he exercises the Government, and therefore, for certain purposes, in fact, represents the nation. Distinctions may, perhaps, in such a case, be reasonably taken in regard to the degree in which his acts are binding. The publicists are, evidently, much disposed, even under these circumstances, to make them obligatory. Puffendorf says that there is no doubt that all the public debts are binding; that the obligation of the other acts is less clear, but that, in his opinion, they are obligatory. He considers the precise case of the present claim a valid and legitimate transaction: of course, the nation is responsible. The remark of Grotius is less favorable to the obligation of these acts, but, if it were more developed, would probably amount to the same thing, as he expressly enjoins in the same sentence the duty of restitution—a duty which, it would seem almost needless to add, cannot be affected by any accident or violence that may have happened to the property to be restored. The case of the Emperor Napoleon, during the hundred days, is one of the strongest cases of usurpation that can be imagined. And yet the French nation, under another Government, is made responsible, not only for public debts, but for the remote consequences of his actions during these hundred days to the amount of seven hundred millions of francs. Such are the opinions of the publicists and the practice of Europe in regard to the obligation of the acts of a usurper, taking the term in a strict and proper sense. They are, evidently, not unfavorable to the claim. But taking the claim in the only sense in which it can be applied to King Louis, a sovereign whose title is defective, but has received the acquiescence of the nation, and there is not a passage in any of the publicists which throws the least doubt upon the obligation of all his acts. The whole tenor of their writings shows that they regard such a Government as legitimate, not only for its foreign relations, but for all purposes whatsoever; and Puffendorf states this doctrine expressly in the very passage cited by Baron de Nagell.

The undersigned does not think it necessary to engage in a general defence of the ancient publicists against the repeated attacks of Baron de Nagell. The defects in their manner belonged to the age in which they wrote. Their merits are sufficiently proved by the use which has constantly been made of them up to the present day in the parliamentary, diplomatic, and judicial discussions of Europe and America. The name of Grotius is regarded by foreigners as one of the titles of glory of which the Netherlands have to boast. Besides, the general principle of responsibility, in support of which they were quoted by the undersigned in his first note, is not denied by the Baron de Nagell. Consequently, the degree of weight which may properly be attached to their authority is, in this case, the less material. Notwithstanding these considerations, his excellency has employed a large part of his note of November in citing from Puffendorf the passage which relates to this subject, and accompanying it by a commentary. The undersigned, from a real respect for any reasoning that is sanctioned by the authority of his Majesty's Government, will take the passage as cited, although some parts of it favorable to the United States are omitted, and will examine in detail the commentary that accompanies it. After quoting the passage, M. de Nagell annexes the following remarks:

1. "This being the passage in question, and it is only an exemplification of a parallel passage in Grotius, we can now judge how far it favors the reply. It is said to prove that a nation is not affected by changes in its form of government, and can only be destroyed by the destruction of the body politic; while Puffendorf formally excepts the case in which a State becomes a simple province of another State, and this was precisely the case of Holland by its incorporation with France."

Answer. This remark denies the fact of the confiscation by the Government of Holland, which is here supposed. If the property was confiscated by the French after the union, the French are, of course, responsible. The question is here, whether the present Government is responsible, provided the property was confiscated before the union by King Louis; or in M. de Nagell's own language, "on the supposition that the confiscation may be fairly attributed to Louis." The remark of Puffendorf establishes the doctrine of the United States to a greater extent than is necessary to support this claim, and refutes all the reasoning of Baron de Nagell from the supposed supremacy exercised by France over Holland during the reign of Louis. Puffendorf states, that if one nation becomes a province of another in name and in reality, provided the province is governed in a separate form, the responsibility continues. It cannot be denied that Holland was separate in form and independent in name.

2. "The passage is said to prove that every Government which succeeds another, were the latter even founded in usurpation, is responsible for all the acts of the preceding Government; and Puffendorf confines the obligation expressly to the public debts contracted for the wants of the State, and contents himself with pointing out what appears to him not obligatory but reasonable with regard to the rest.

Answer. Puffendorf, as cited by M. de Nagell, declares, in general, that the treaties, contracts, and other acts of Governments, are binding on their successors. He adds, that, in the case of a usurper who had been dispossessed, and whose title has not been acquiesced in by the nation, (which is, of course, not the present case,) some have doubted whether any other engagements than public debts are binding, but that, in his opinion, it is reasonable to consider them all obligatory. The undersigned has repeatedly stated that, in the view of his Government, it is not necessary to examine, in this case, whether the acts of a usurper are binding on the successor; as far as he has considered this question, it has only been hypothetically.

3. "The passage is said to show that a people is bound to repair the injury done to foreigners; and the first case proposed by Puffendorf is, whether a people can keep what has been taken, bought, or given by a usurper."

Answer. The case proposed by Puffendorf is, whether a people ought to restore what has been taken by a foreign usurper from a third party, in time of war, and given or sold to them. The present case is, whether a people ought to restore what has been taken by itself, under a former Government, from a friendly power. It is easy to see that they are not the same.

4. "Finally, it is said to prove that a people is held to restore what it has plundered, although the plunder may have passed into other hands; and Puffendorf, without examining at all, in this second case, whether the duty of restitution is attached or not to the possession of the thing to be restored, decides that, according to general usage and the common opinion, if even citizens are not, as the reply vaguely translates the word, individuals, but oppressed citizens, have been unjustly plundered by a usurper, they have no right to reclaim their property."

Answer. Of whom does Puffendorf decide that they have no right to reclaim it? Of the usurper or his representatives? Just the contrary. They have no right to reclaim it of a third party, to whom the usurper has conveyed it—that is, in the present case, the Americans have no right to reclaim their property of France. This is the view taken of the subject by the American Government in bringing the claim against the Netherlands. As to the translation of the word citoyens, it is well known that the rights of friendly foreigners and citizens to the protection of Government are the same. To avoid an explanation, the undersigned translated the term at once by a word including the former.

5. "The only point, therefore, which the passage proves, is the distinction established by the undersigned (Baron de Nagell) between public debts, of which the acknowledgment and obligation cannot be contested, and engagements whose validity remains hypothetical."

Answer. It has been shown, in the answer to the second of these remarks, what foundation there is in Puffendorf for this distinction. Besides, the only difference between public debts and other engagements is, that the former are acknowledged in a particular form; and M. de Nagell admits, in his note of November, that this circumstance makes no difference in the obligation. Hence, the distinction, if really taken by Puffendorf, has been formally disavowed by his excellency. In general, any distinction that may be made between the degrees of obligation of various kinds of debts must be founded on different considerations from those of right. Policy may dictate a preference of public debts over other engagements, but in principle there is no medium between what is due and what is not due.

The undersigned perceives with pleasure that Baron de Nagell is disposed to regard with some attention the reasoning in favor of the claim from the parallel cases which occurred in France under the treaties of 1815. These examples are also considered by the American Government as among the strongest arguments in their behalf; and the more as they refute the objection of usurpation. The Government of Bonaparte, during the hundred days, independently of any supposed defects in his title, having no pretensions to the character of an established Government, may, perhaps, be fairly considered as strong an instance of usurpation as any on record; and yet, as has been already observed, it was for the result of the acts of the French nation during this period that they were made responsible under Louis XVIII.

M. de Nagell has accumulated, in his note of November, a considerable number of passages from Schoell and others, for the purpose of proving that the payments required of France were intended as an indemnity for the expense of the last preceding armaments. The undersigned never doubted this proposition, and if he had, the slightest inspection of the treaties, and of the tables of distribution of the money paid, would have satisfied him of his error; but he must beg leave to express his opinion that it does not destroy, in any degree, the application of the example. The acts of the French nation during the hundred days subjected the allies, in their opinion, to a great expense, and this expense the French nation, under the succeeding Government of Louis XVIII, is required to pay. "In these payments," says M. de Nagell, "the principle of responsibility had no part." All that the American Government demand of the Government of the Netherlands is to be indemnified for losses occasioned by the acts of the former Government. As the cases are evidently parallel, it is unnecessary to reason upon the propriety of words. The undersigned must, however, be permitted to observe that, in his opinion, to say that the French nation was required to indemnify the allies for expenses occasioned by the acts of Bonaparte, is only to say, in other terms, that the French nation was made responsible for the acts of Bonaparte.

It is true that M. de Nagell has cited a passage from Schoell, in which that writer seems to intimate, in rather a vague way, that the payments in question were to be considered, in part, as a contribution imposed by right of conquest; in other words, as an act of arbitrary violence independent of any principle. The undersigned has shown, in a former note, that the principle of indemnity or responsibility, which is the same thing, is recognized by the plenipotentiaries of both parties, in their official correspondence, as the foundation of these payments. This idea of Schoell, therefore, (if, as may be doubted, he intended to convey the idea,) falls of itself; and it is too injurious to the allies to be insisted on by M. de Nagell. But, to remove all doubt upon this point, it is sufficient to add, that the allies themselves, in the negotiations upon this subject, expressly disclaim any pretensions of this description. Their plenipotentiaries observe, in their note of September 22, 1815, "none of the propositions which have been made by order of the sovereigns, to regulate the present and future relations of Europe, have been founded on the right of conquest, and they have carefully avoided, in their communications, everything that could lead to a discussion of this right."

The remark of M. de Nagell, in his note of November, upon the case of the Bank of Hamburg, involves a denial of the fact of confiscation by King Louis which is here supposed by both parties. The principle maintained by the undersigned in a former note in regard to the confiscations in the Duchy of Berg was this: that nations are responsible for the acts of violence committed by their Governments, but not for all those committed upon their territory. Baron de Nagell will judge for himself whether this is the principle he wishes to establish, recollecting, as has just been observed, that the act of confiscation is here supposed by both parties to be the act of King Louis.

The undersigned will not enter in detail into the particulars of the three cases of the Baltimore, the Bacchus, and the St. Michael, which Baron de Nagell has again introduced at the commencement of his note of November. No essential error has been pointed out in the statement of the undersigned respecting them. M. de Nagell again attributes to the undersigned an opinion respecting the protection granted to the Baltimore which it was never his intention to express and which he formally disavowed in his note of July. The variation in the date of the arrival of this vessel might have been important had the claim been founded on the sequester; but, as it is founded on the confiscation of the property, it is evidently immaterial. Baron de Nagell charged Mr. Eustis with error in stating that the cargoes of the Baltimore and the Bacchus were confiscated by order of the Dutch Government, while, in the same note, he observed himself, of these two cargoes, that they were delivered to the French by virtue of the treaty of March, 1810, which was the act of confiscation intended by Mr. Eustis. This was the particular variation concerning which the undersigned took the liberty of observing that Baron de Nagell was himself in error by his own admission.

His excellency has thought proper to quote a second time certain expressions applied by the undersigned, in his note of February, to the confiscation of shipwrecked property, with the remark, that, by these expressions, "the claimants have committed their protectors." The sense of this remark is not apparent, and the undersigned is, therefore, unable to judge of its propriety. He can only observe that, in his opinion, the confiscation of the property of a friendly nation, thrown into the power of the Government by shipwreck and stress of weather, or invited by facilities held out by itself, is an act of violence which, whether it is to be attributed to France or Holland, is deserving of the strongest terms of disapprobation that language can afford. As the two Governments look at the facts from different points of view, it is not singular that they should form different judgments of the moral character of the proceedings of the Government of Holland, according as they attribute to it a more or less immediate agency in the confiscation, and each may be right on its own supposition of fact. The undersigned must, however, be allowed to add, that he finds it impossible to reconcile with the facts, even as viewed by the Government of the Netherlands, the assertion of Baron de Nagell in regard to the St. Michael. The St. Michael was a ship bound to a different port and driven into the Texel by stress of weather, seeking only the hospitality of the shore and leave to depart. By the admission of M. de Nagell her cargo was sequestered by the Government of Holland, and yet he adds that she was treated as she would be anywhere else. The undersigned is not acquainted with any civilized nation where it is the practice to sequester the property of citizens of a friendly power driven into port by stress of weather.

The undersigned has now examined the several parts of M. de Nagell's last notes, and replied to them in a manner which appears to him to be satisfactory. He is aware, however, that, from the different views of the two Governments with regard to this subject, many of the considerations here adduced will be thought less forcible by his excellency; and that, in general, the effect of a discussion so long protracted as this is rather to confirm the respective opinions of the parties than to change them. He is, therefore, compelled, though reluctantly, to anticipate the failure of this attempt, as well as of the others which he has already made, to bring this claim to the conclusion desired by his Government. In this event it would be unreasonable to calculate upon a favorable result from any further proceedings in the way of direct negotiation; and, as the United States are not less unwilling to abandon the claim than the Netherlands are to allow it, it will become necessary, on the failure of this method, to adopt some other way of bringing the controversy to an amicable conclusion. For this purpose the undersigned has the honor of submitting to the consideration of his excellency the following propositions as likely, if adopted, to produce a result which, in either event, shall be satisfactory to both parties.

1. It is proposed that an impartial commission should be instituted by the two Governments in concert, to make a preliminary examination of the facts, as far as they affect the question of responsibility, and agree upon a statement of them to be reported to the Governments.

2. If, upon this statement of facts, the two Governments should still differ upon the question of responsibility, it is proposed that this point should be referred to the decision of some friendly sovereign, to be agreed upon between them.

As the Government of the Netherlands appear to rest their defence, in a considerable degree, upon a denial of the facts which were supposed by the American Government, in the first instance, to be admitted, it seems absolutely necessary that this part of the subject should be submitted to an inquiry of the kind contemplated in the first of these propositions. The American Government is ready to substantiate by evidence the facts which they consider necessary to the establishment of the claim; and it is presumed that the Government of the Netherlands is also prepared to support, in the same way, those which they regard as contradictory to it. It is obvious that an examination of this kind cannot be conveniently conducted in the way of diplomatic correspondence, but must be referred to a commission constituted in such a way that both parties may be able to rely upon its decision.

The result of such an inquiry having defined with precision the basis of fact upon which the question of responsibility is raised, this question would, probably, be brought within much narrower limits; but, should the two Governments finally disagree respecting it, the mode of reference to a friendly sovereign seems to be an unexceptionable way of bringing it to a decision.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to Mr. Everett, Chargé d'Affaires at the Hague, May 26, 1820.

"Your despatches to No. 43, inclusive, dated March 13, have been received. Your discussion of the claims of our citizens upon the Government of the Netherlands has been entirely satisfactory to the President, who regrets that its just reasoning and forcible appeals to well established facts has not been attended with success in producing the conviction, on the part of the Government of the Netherlands, that it was in justice incumbent on them to make provision for indemnifying the sufferers interested in them. On taking leave, the Viscount de Quabeck, under instructions from his Government, intimated verbally to me their wish that this discussion should not be further pressed; and, although he was distinctly informed that the rights of our citizens to indemnity for injuries so unjustifiable and flagrant could not be abandoned, the President believes that it may be expedient to forbear renewing applications in their behalf for the present. Your last note, therefore, of which you have forwarded to me the draft, may be reserved until you hear further from this Department on the subject."

18TH CONGRESS.]

No. 403.

[2D SESSION.

SUPPRESSION OF THE AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES FEBRUARY 16, 1825.

Mr. GOVAN, from the Committee on the Suppression of the Slave Trade, to whom was referred so much of the President's message of the 7th of December last as relates to that subject, having, according to order, had the same under consideration, reported:

That, pursuant to the almost unanimous request of the House of Representatives, expressed by their resolution of February 28, 1823, the President of the United States concluded a convention with Great Britain on the 13th of March, in the following year, by which the African slave trade was denounced to be piracy under the laws of both countries; the United States having so declared it by their antecedent act of May 15, 1820, and it being understood between the contracting parties, as a preliminary to the ratification of the convention by the United States, that Great Britain should, by an act of her Parliament, concur in a similar declaration.

With great promptitude, and in accordance with this agreement, such an act was passed, declaring the African slave trade to be piracy, and annexing to it the penalty denounced against this crime by the common law of nations. A copy of this act was transmitted by the British Government to the Executive of the United States, and the convention submitted by the President to the Senate for their advice and consent.

The convention was approved by the Senate, with certain qualifications, to all of which, except one, Great Britain, sub modo, acceded; her Government having instructed its minister in Washington to tender to the acceptance of the United States a treaty agreeing in every particular, except one, with the terms approved by the Senate. This exception the message of the President to the House of Representatives presumes "not to be of sufficient magnitude to defeat an object so near to the heart of both nations" as the abolition of the African slave trade, "and so desirable to the friends of humanity throughout the world." But the President further adds, "that, as objections to the principle recommended by the House of Representatives, or at least to the consequences inseparable from it, and which are understood to apply to the law, have been raised, which may deserve a reconsideration of the whole subject, he has thought proper to suspend the conclusion of a new convention until the definitive sentiments of Congress can be ascertained."

Your committee are therefore required to review the grounds of the law of 1820 and the resolution of 1823, to which the rejected, or, as they rather hope, the suspended convention referred. The former was the joint act of both branches of Congress, approved by the President; the latter, although adopted with extraordinary unanimity, was the single act of the House of Representatives.

Upon the principle or intention of the act of Congress of 1820, making the slave trade punishable as piracy, the history of the act may reflect some light.

A bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to continue in force the act to protect the commerce of the United States and punish the crime of piracy, and also to make further provision to punish the crime of piracy," came to the House of Representatives on the 27th of April, 1820, and was, on the same day, referred to a Committee of the Whole, to which had been referred a bill of similar purport and title that had originated in the House of Representatives.

Upon the 8th of May following, the Committee on the Suppression of the Slave Trade reported an amendment of two additional sections to the Senate's bill; also, a bill to incorporate the American Society for Colonizing the Free People of Color of the United States, and three joint resolutions, two of which related to the objects of that society, but the first of which, in behalf of both Houses of Congress, requested the President to "consult and negotiate with all the Governments where ministers of the United States are or shall be accredited, on the means of effecting an entire and immediate abolition of the African slave trade." The amendatory sections denounced the guilt and penalty of piracy against any citizen of the United States, of the crew or company of any foreign vessel, and any person whatever of the crew or company of any American vessel who should be engaged in this traffic.

The amendments, bill, and resolutions, along with the explanatory report which accompanied them, were referred to the Committee of the Whole above mentioned, and on the 11th of the same month the House proceeded to consider them. After a discussion in the committee, the piracy bill and its amendments, having been adopted, were reported, and both were concurred in by the House. The following day the bill, as amended, being then on its passage, a motion was debated and negatived to recommit the bill to a select committee, with an instruction to strike out the last section of the amendment. The bill then passed, and was ordered to be returned, as amended, to the Senate.

On the same day a motion prevailed to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill and the resolutions which accompanied the report; and the particular resolution already recited being under consideration, to try the sense of the House on its merits, it was moved to lay it on the table. The yeas and nays having been ordered on this motion, it was rejected by a majority of seventy-eight to thirty-five members. It having been again proposed to postpone the resolution till the ensuing or second session of the same Congress, and this proposal being also determined in the negative, the resolution was engrossed, read the third time, passed, and ordered to be transmitted to the Senate on the same day with the piracy bill.

The amendments of this bill underwent like scrutiny and debate in the Senate, and were finally concurred in the day after they were received from the House of Representatives without any division apparent on the journal of that House.

The resolution, which had been received by the Senate at a different hour of the same day, was read a second time on the 15th of May, was further taken up and considered, as in Committee of the Whole, reported to the House without amendment, and ordered, after debate, to pass to a third reading. But, this being the last day of the session of Congress, and a single member objecting "that it was against one of the rules of the Senate to read it the third time on the same day, without unanimous consent," it remained on the table of that body, on its final adjournment, after an ineffectual effort to suspend one of their rules, against which many of the friends of the resolution felt themselves compelled, by their invariable usage, to vote, in union with its enemies.

One of the objections to the resolution in the Senate was founded upon the peculiar relation of that branch of the National Legislature to the Executive in the ratification of treaties, which seemed, in the opinion of those who urged this argument, to interdict their concurrence in a request of the President to institute any negotiation whatever.

A cotemporary exposition of the object of the amendments of the piracy bill and the resolution, which the House of Representatives adopted by so large a majority, will be found in the report, which accompanied them, from the Committee on the Suppression of the Slave Trade, and which is hereto annexed, (A.) Those objects, it will be seen, were in perfect accordance with each other. They were designed to introduce, by treaty, into the code of international law a principle deemed by the committee essential to the abolition of the African slave trade, that it should be denounced and treated as piracy by the civilized world.

The resolution being joint, and having failed in the Senate, for the reason already stated, the subject of it was revived in the House of Representatives at a very early period of the succeeding session of Congress, by a call for information from the Executive, which, being received, was referred to a committee of the same title with the last. Their report, after reviewing all the antecedent measures of the United States for the suppression of the slave trade, urgently recommended the co-operation of the American and British Navy against this traffic, under the guarded provisions of a common treaty authorizing the practice of a qualified and reciprocal right of search.

This report, which is also annexed, closed with a resolution requesting "the President of the United States to enter into such arrangements as he might deem suitable and proper, with one or more of the maritime powers of Europe, for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade." (B)

The United States had, by the treaty of Ghent, entered into a formal stipulation with Great Britain, "that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavors to accomplish the entire abolition of this traffic."

The failure of the only joint attempt which had been made by England and America, at the date of this report, to give effect to this provision being ascribable, in part, to a jealousy of the views of the former, corroborated by the language and conduct of one of the principal maritime powers of Europe in relation to the same topic, the committee referred to the decision of Sir William Scott in the case of the French ship Le Louis, to demonstrate that Great Britain claimed no right of search in peace but such as the consent of other nations should accord to her by treaty, and sought it by a fair exchange, in this tranquil mode, for the beneficent purpose of an enlarged humanity.

Certain facts disclosed by the diplomatic correspondence of France and England, during the pendency of that case in the British Court of Admiralty, were calculated to guard the sympathies of America from being misguided by the language of the former power.

The painful truth was elicited that France had evaded the execution of her promise at Vienna to Europe and mankind; that she had, long after the date of that promise, tolerated, if she had not cherished, several branches of a traffic which she had concurred in denouncing to be the opprobrium of Christendom, and which she had subsequently bound herself by the higher obligations of a solemn treaty to abolish, as inconsistent with the laws of God and Nature.

Succeeding events in the councils of the French nation have not impaired the force of this testimony. What authority can be accorded to the moral influence of a Government which insults the humanity of a generous and gallant people by pleading, in apology for the breach of its plighted faith, that its subjects required the indulgence of this guilty traffic?

The Emperor Napoleon, who re-established this commerce on the ruins of the French Republic, also abolished it again, when he sought to conciliate the people of France during that transient reign which immediately preceded his final overthrow.

Congress adjourned without acting on this report.

By an instruction to the Committee on the Suppression of the Slave Trade, of the 15th of January, 1822, the same subject was a third time brought directly before the House of Representatives. The instruction called the attention of the committee to the present condition of the African slave trade, to the defects of any of the existing laws for its suppression, and to their appropriate remedies. In the report made in obedience to this instruction, on the 12th of April, 1822, the committee state that, after having consulted all the evidence within their reach, they are brought to the mournful conclusion that the traffic prevailed to a greater extent than ever, and with increased malignity; that its total suppression, or even sensible diminution, cannot be expected from the separate and disunited efforts of one or more States, so long as a single flag remains to cover it from detection and punishment. They renew, therefore, as the only practicable and efficient remedy, the concurrence of the United States with the maritime powers of Europe in a modified and reciprocal exercise of the right of search.

In closing their report, the committee add, in effect, that they "cannot doubt that the people of America have the intelligence to distinguish between the right of searching a neutral on the high seas, in time of war, claimed by some belligerents, and that mutual, restricted, and peaceful concession, by treaty, suggested by the committee, and which is demanded in the name of suffering humanity." The committee had before intimated that the remedy which they recommended to the House of Representatives presupposed the exercise of the authority of another Department of the Government, and that objections to the exercise of this authority, in the mode which they had presumed to suggest, had hitherto existed in that Department. Their report, also annexed, closed with a resolution differing in no other respect from that of the preceding session than that it did not require the concurrence of the Senate, for the reason already suggested. (C.)

The report and resolution were referred to a Committee of the Whole, and never further considered.

After a delay till the 20th of the succeeding February a resolution was submitted to the House, which was evidently a part of the same system of measures, for the suppression of the slave trade, which had been begun by the act of the 3d of March, 1819, and followed up by the connected series of reports and resolutions which the committee have reviewed, and which breathe the same spirit.

This resolution, in proposing to make the slave trade piracy, by the consent of mankind, sought to supplant, by a measure of greater rigor, the qualified international exchange of the right of search for the apprehension of the African slave dealer, and the British system of mixed tribunals created for his trial and punishment; a system of which experience, and the recent extension of the traffic that it sought to limit, had disclosed the entire inefficacy.

The United States had already established the true denomination and grade of this offence by a municipal law. The resolution contemplated, as did the report which accompanied and expounded that law, the extension of its principle, by negotiation, to the code of all nations.

It denounced the authors of this stupendous iniquity as the enemies of the human race, and armed all men with authority to detect, pursue, arrest, and punish them.

Such a measure, to succeed to its fullest extent, must have a beginning somewhere. Commencing with the consent of any two States, to regard it as binding on themselves only, it would, by the gradual accession of others, enlarge the sphere of its operation until it embraced, as the resolution contemplated, all the maritime powers of the civilized world.

While it involved of necessity the visit and search of piratical vessels, as belligerent rights against the common enemies of man, it avoided all complexity, difficulty, and delay in the seizure, condemnation, and punishment of the pirate himself. It made no distinction in favor of those pirates who prey upon the property, against those who seize, torture, and kill, or consign to interminable and hereditary slavery, the persons of their enemies.

Your committee are at a loss for the foundation of any such discrimination. It is believed that the most ancient piracies consisted in converting innocent captives into slaves; and those were not attended with the destruction of one-third of their victims by loathsome confinement and mortal disease.

While the modern, therefore, accords with the ancient denomination of this crime, its punishment is not disproportionate to its guilt. It has robbery and murder for its mere accessories, and moistens one continent with blood and tears, in order to curse another by slow, consuming ruin, physical and moral.

One high consolation attends upon the new remedy for this frightful and prolific evil. If once successful, it will forever remain so, until, being unexerted, its very application will be found in history alone.

Can it be doubted that if ever legitimate commerce shall supplant the source of this evil in Africa, and a reliance on other supplies of labor its use elsewhere, a revival of the slave trade will be as impracticable as a reversion to barbarism? that after the lapse of a century from its extinction, except where the consequences of the crime shall survive, the stories of the African slave trade will become as improbable, among the unlearned, as the expeditions of the heroes of Homer?

The principle of the law of 1820, making the slave trade a statutory piracy, and of the resolution of the House of Representatives of May, 1823, which sought to render this denunciation of that offence universal, cannot, therefore, be misunderstood.

It was not misconceived by the House of Representatives, when ratified with almost unprecedented unanimity.

An unfounded suggestion has been heard that the abortive attempt to amend the resolution indicated that it was not considered as involving the right of search. The opposite conclusion is the more rational, if not, indeed, irresistible: that having, by the denomination of the crime, provided for the detection, trial, and punishment of the criminal, an amendment, designing to add what was already included in the main proposition, would be superfluous, if not absurd. But no such amendment was rejected. The House of Representatives, very near the close of the session of 1823, desirous of economizing time threatened to be consumed by a protracted debate, entertained the previous question while an amendment—the only one offered to the resolution—was depending. The effect of the previous question was to bring on an immediate decision upon the resolution itself, which was adopted by a vote of 131 members to 9.

It is alike untrue that the resolution was regarded with indifference. The House had been prepared to pass it without debate, by a series of measures having their origin in 1839, and steadily advancing to maturity.

Before the resolution did pass, two motions had been submitted—to lay it on the table, and to postpone it to a future day. The former was resisted by an ascertained majority of 104 to 25; the latter, without a division.

Is the House now ready to retrace its steps?

The committee believe not. Neither the people of America nor their representatives will sully the glory they have earned by their early labor and steady perseverance in sustaining by their Federal and State Governments the cause of humanity at home and abroad.

The calamity inflicted upon them by the introduction of slavery in a form and to an extent forbidding its hasty alleviation by intemperate zeal is imputable to a foreign cause, for which the past is responsible to the present age. They will not deny to themselves and to mankind a generous co-operation in the only efficient measure of retributive justice to an insulted and afflicted continent, and to an injured and degraded race.

In the independence of Spanish and Portuguese America the committee behold a speedy termination of the few remaining obstacles to the extension of the policy of the resolution of May, 1823.

Brazil cannot intend to resist the voice of the residue of the continent of America; and Portugal, deprived of her great market for slaves, will no longer have a motive to resist the common feelings of Europe. And yet, while from the Rio de la Plata to the Amazon and through the American archipelago the importation of slaves covertly continues, if it be not openly countenanced, the impolicy is obvious of denying to the American shore the protective vigilance of the only adequate check upon this traffic.

Your committee forbear to enter upon an investigation of the particular provisions of a depending negotiation, nor do they consider the message referred to them as inviting any such inquiry.

They will not regard a negotiation to be dissolved which has approached so near a consummation, nor a convention as absolutely void which has been executed by one party, and which the United States, having first tendered, should be the last to reject.

A.

Report of the Committee to whom was referred, at the commencement of the present session of Congress, so much of the President's message as relates to the slave trade, accompanied with a bill to incorporate the American Society for Colonizing the Free People of Color of the United States.

The Committee on the Slave Trade, to whom was referred the memorial of the President and Board of Managers of the American Society for Colonizing the Free People of Color of the United States, having, according to order, had under consideration the several subjects therein embraced, reported:

That the American Society was instituted in the city of Washington, on the 28th of December, 1816, for the benevolent purpose of affording to the free people of color of the United States the means of establishing one or more independent colonies on the western coast of Africa. After ascertaining, by a mission to that continent and other preliminary inquiries, that their object is practicable, the society request of the Congress of the United States a charter of incorporation and such other legislative aid as their enterprise may be thought to merit and require.

The memorialists anticipate from its success consequences the most beneficial to the free people of color themselves, to the several States in which they at present reside, and to that continent which is to be the seat of their future establishment. Passing by the foundation of these anticipations, which will be seen in the annual reports of the society and their former memorials, the attention of the committee has been particularly drawn to the connexion which the memorialists have traced between their purpose and the policy of the recent act of Congress for the more effectual abolition of the African slave trade.

Experience has demonstrated that this detestable traffic can be nowhere so successfully assailed as on the coast upon which it originates. Not only does the collection and embarkation of its unnatural cargoes consume more time than their subsequent distribution and sale in the market for which they are destined, but the African coast, frequented by the slave ships, is indented with so few commodious or accessible harbors that, notwithstanding its great extent, it could be guarded by the vigilance of a few active cruisers. If to these be added colonies of civilized blacks, planted in commanding situations along that coast, no slave ship could possibly escape detection; and thus the security as well as the enhanced profit which now cherishes this illicit trade would be effectually counteracted. Such colonies, by diffusing a taste for legitimate commerce among the native tribes of that fruitful continent, would gradually destroy among them, also, the only incentive of a traffic which has hitherto rendered all African labor insecure, and spread desolation over one of the most beautiful regions of the globe. The colonies and the armed vessels employed in watching the African coast, while they co-operated alike in the cause of humanity, would afford to each other mutual succor.

There is a single consideration, however, added to the preceding view of this subject, which appears to your committee, of itself, conclusive of the tendency of the views of the memorialists to further the operation of the act of the third of March, 1819. That act not only revokes the authority antecedently given to the several State and Territorial Governments to dispose, as they pleased, of those African captives who might be liberated by the tribunals of the United States, but authorizes and requires the President to restore them to their native country. The unavoidable consequence of this just and humane provision is, to require some preparation to be made for their temporary succor, on being relanded upon the African shore. And no preparation can prove so congenial to its own object, or so economical, as regards the Government charged with this charitable duty, as that which would be found in a colony of the free people of color of the United States. Sustained by the recommendations of numerous societies in every part of the United States, and the approving voice of the legislative assemblies of several States, without inquiring into any other tendency of the object of the memorialists, your committee do not hesitate to pronounce it deserving of the countenance and support of the General Government. The extent to which these shall be carried is a question not so easily determined.

The memorialists do not ask the Government to assume the jurisdiction of the Territory, or to become in any degree whatever responsible for the future safety or tranquillity of the contemplated colony. They have prudently thought that its external peace and security would be most effectually guarded by an appeal in its behalf to the philanthropy of the civilized world, and to that sentiment of retributive justice, with which all Christendom is at present animated towards a much injured continent.

Of the constitutional power of the General Government to grant the limited aid contemplated by the accompanying bill and resolutions your committee presume there can exist no shadow of doubt; and they leave it to a period of greater national prosperity to determine how far the authority of Congress, the resources of the National Government, and the welfare and happiness of the United States, will warrant or require its extension.

Your committee are solemnly enjoined by the peculiar object of their trust, and invited by the suggestion of the memorialists, to inquire into the defects of the existing laws against the African slave trade. So long as it is in the power of the United States to provide additional restraints upon this odious traffic they cannot be withheld, consistently with justice and the honor of the nation.

Congress has heretofore marked, with decided reprobation, the authors and abettors of this iniquitous commerce in every form which it assumes; from the inception of its unrighteous purpose in America, through all the subsequent stages of its progress to its final consummation; the outward voyage, the cruel seizure and forcible abduction of the unfortunate African from his native home, and the fraudulent transfer of the property thus acquired. It may, however, be questioned if a proper discrimination of their relative guilt has entered into the measure of punishment annexed to these criminal acts.

Your committee cannot perceive wherein the offence of kidnapping an offending inhabitant of a foreign country; of chaining him down for a series of days, weeks, and months, amidst the dying and the dead, to the pestilential hold of a slave ship; of consigning him, if he chance to live out the voyage, to perpetual slavery in a remote and unknown land, differs in malignity from piracy, or why a milder punishment should follow the one than the other crime.

On the other hand, the purchase of the unfortunate African, after his enlargement from the floating dungeon which wafts him to the foreign market, however criminal in itself, and yet more in its tendency to encourage this abominable traffic, yields in atrocity to the violent seizure of his person, his sudden and unprepared separation from his family, his kindred, his friends, and his country, followed by all the horrors of the middle passage. Are there not united in this offence all that is most iniquitous in theft, most daring in robbery, and cruel in murder? Its consequences to the victim, if he survives, to the country which receives him, and to that from which he is torn, are alike disastrous. If the internal wars of Africa, and their desolating effect, may be imputed to the slave trade, and that the greater part of them must cannot now be questioned, this crime, considered in its remote as well as its proximate consequences, is the very darkest in the whole catalogue of human iniquities; and its authors should be regarded as hostes humani generis.

In proposing to the House of Representatives to make such part of this offence as occurs upon the ocean piracy, your committee are animated, not by the desire of manifesting to the world the horror with which it is viewed by the American people, but by the confident expectation of promoting, by this example, its more certain punishment by all nations, and its absolute and final extinction.

May it not be believed that, when the whole civilized world shall have denounced the slave trade as piracy, it will become as unfrequent as any other species of that offence against the law of nations? Is it unreasonable to suppose that negotiation will, with greater facility, introduce into that law such a provision as is here proposed, when it shall have been already incorporated in the separate code of each State?

The maritime powers of the Christian world have at length concurred in pronouncing sentence of condemnation against this traffic. The United States, having led the way in forming this decree, owe it to themselves not to follow the rest of mankind in promoting its vigorous execution.

If it should be objected that the legislation of Congress would be partial, and its benefit, for a time at least, local, it may be replied that the constitutional power of the Government has already been exercised in defining the crime of piracy, in accordance with similar analogies to that which the committee have sought to trace between this general offence against the peace of nations and the slave trade.

In some of the foreign treaties, as well as in the laws of the United States, examples are to be found of piracies which are not cognizable as such by the tribunals of all nations. Such is the unavoidable consequence of any exercise of the authority of Congress to define and punish this crime. The definition and the punishment can bind the United States alone.

A bill from the Senate, making further provision for the exercise of this constitutional power, being now before the House of Representatives, your committee beg leave to offer such an amendment of its provisions as shall attain the last object which they have presumed to recommend.

B.

Report of the Committee to whom was referred so much of the President's message as relates to the slave trade.

The Committee to whom was referred so much of the President's message as relates to the slave trade, and to whom were referred the two messages of the President transmitting, in pursuance of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th of December, a report of the Secretary of State, and inclosed documents, relating to the negotiation for the suppression of the slave trade, reported:

That the committee have deemed it advisable, previous to entering into a consideration of the proposed co-operation to exterminate the slave trade, to take a summary review of the Constitution and laws of the United States relating to this subject. It will disclose the earnestness and zeal with which this nation has been actuated, and the laudable ambition that has animated her councils to take a lead in the reformation of a disgraceful practice, and one which is productive of so much human misery; it will, by displaying the constant anxiety of this nation to suppress the African slave trade, afford ample testimony that she will be the last to persevere in measures wisely digested to effectuate this great and most desirable object, whenever such measures can be adopted in consistency with the leading principles of her local institutions.

In consequence of the existence of slavery in many of the States, when British colonies, the habits and means of carrying on industry could not be suddenly changed; and the Constitution of the United States yielded to the provision that the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808.

But long antecedent to this period Congress legislated on the subject wherever its power extended, and endeavored, by a system of rigorous penalties, to suppress this unnatural trade.

The act of Congress of the 22d of March, 1794, contains provisions that no citizen or citizens of the United States, or foreigner, or any other person coming into or residing within the same, shall, for himself or any other person whatsoever, either as master, factor, or owner, build, fit, equip, load, or otherwise prepare, any ship or vessel within any port or place of the United States, nor shall cause any ship or vessel to sail from any port or place within the same, for the purpose of carrying on any trade or traffic in slaves to any foreign country; or for the purpose of procuring from any foreign Kingdom, place, or country, the inhabitants of such Kingdom, place, or country, to be transported to any foreign country, port, or place, whatever, to be sold or disposed of as slaves, under the penalty of the forfeiture of any such vessel, and of the payment of large sums of money by the persons offending against the directions of the act.

By an act of the 3d of April, 1798, in relation to the Mississippi Territory, to which the constitutional provision did not extend, the introduction of slaves, under severe penalties, was forbidden, and every slave imported contrary to the act was to be entitled to freedom.

By an act of the 10th of May, 1800, the citizens or residents of this country were prohibited from holding any right or property in vessels employed in transporting slaves from one foreign country to another, on pain of forfeiting their right of property, and also double the value of that right in money, and double the value of their interest in the slaves; nor were they allowed to serve on board of vessels of the United States employed in the transportation of slaves from one country to another, under the punishment of fine and imprisonment; nor were they permitted to serve on board foreign ships employed in the slave trade. By this act, also, the commissioned vessels of the United States were authorized to seize vessels and crews employed contrary to the act.

By an act of the 28th of February, 1803, masters of vessels were not allowed to bring into any port (where the laws of the State prohibited the importation) any negro, mulatto, or other person of color, not being a native, a citizen, or registered seaman of the United States, under severe penalties; and no vessel having on board persons of the above description was to be admitted to an entry; and if any such person should be landed from on board of any vessel, the same was to be forfeited.

By an act of the 2d of March, 1807, the importation of slaves into any port of the United States was to be prohibited after the first of January, 1808, the time prescribed by the constitutional provision. This act contains many severe provisions against any interference or participation in the slave trade, such as heavy fines, long imprisonments, and the forfeiture of vessels; the President was also authorized to employ armed vessels to cruise on any part of the coast where he might judge attempts would be made to violate the act, and to instruct the commanders of armed vessels to seize and bring in vessels found on the high seas contravening the provisions of the law.

By an act of the 20th of April, 1818, the laws in prohibition of the slave trade were further improved; this act is characterized with a peculiarity of legislative precaution, especially in the eighth section, which throws the labor of proof upon the defendant, that the colored persons brought into the United States by him had not been brought in contrary to the laws.

By an act of the 3d of March, 1819, the power is continued in the President to employ the armed ships of the United States to seize and bring into port any vessel engaged in the slave trade by citizens or residents of the United States, and such vessels, together with the goods and effects on board, are to be forfeited and sold, and the proceeds to be distributed, in like manner as is provided by law for the distribution of prizes taken from an enemy; and the officers and crew are to undergo the punishments inflicted by previous acts. The President by this act is authorized to make such regulations and arrangements as he may deem expedient for the safe keeping, support, and removal beyond the limits of the United States of all such negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, as may have been brought within its jurisdiction, and to appoint a proper person or persons residing on the coast of Africa as agent or agents for receiving the negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, delivered from on board of vessels seized in the prosecution of the slave trade.

And in addition to all the aforesaid laws, the present Congress, on the 15th of May, 1820, believing that the then existing provisions would not be sufficiently available, enacted, that, if any citizen of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign ship or vessel engaged in the slave trade, or any person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any ship or vessel owned in the whole or in part, or navigated for or in behalf of any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall land from any such ship or vessel, and on foreign shore seize any negro or mulatto, not held to service or labor by the laws either of the States or Territories of the United States, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall decoy, or forcibly bring or carry, or shall receive such negro or mulatto on board any such ship or vessel with intent as aforesaid, such citizen or person shall be adjudged a pirate, and on conviction shall suffer death.

The immoral and pernicious practice of the slave trade has attracted much public attention in Europe within the last few years, and in a Congress at Vienna, on the 8th of February, 1815, five of the principal powers made a solemn engagement in the face of mankind that this traffic should be made to cease; in pursuance of which, these powers have enacted municipal laws to suppress the trade. Spain, although not a party to the original engagement, did soon after, in her treaty with England, stipulate for the immediate abolition of the Spanish slave trade to the north of the equator, and for its final and universal abolition on the 30th of May, 1820.

Portugal likewise, in her treaty in 1817, stipulated that the Portuguese slave trade on the coast of Africa should entirely cease to the northward of the equator, and engaged that it should be unlawful for her subjects to purchase or trade in slaves except to the southward of the line; the precise period at which the entire abolition is to take place in Portugal does not appear to be finally fixed; but the Portuguese ambassador, in the presence of the congress at Vienna, declared that Portugal, faithful to her principles, would not refuse to adopt the term of eight years, which term will expire in the year 1823.

At this time, among the European States, there is not a flag which can legally cover this inhuman traffic to the north of the line; nevertheless, experience has proved the inefficacy of the various and rigorous laws which have been made in Europe and in this country; it being a lamentable fact that the disgraceful practice is even now carried on to a surprising extent. During the last year Captain Trenchard, the commander of the United States sloop-of-war the Cyane, found that part of the coast of Africa which he visited lined with vessels engaged, as it is presumed, in this forbidden traffic; of these he examined many, and five, which appeared to be fitted out on American account, he sent into the jurisdiction of the United States for adjudication; each of them, it is believed, has been condemned, and the commanders of two of them have been sentenced to the punishment prescribed by the laws of the United States.

The testimony recently published, with the opinion of the presiding judge of the United States court of the southern district in the State of New York, in the case of the schooner Plattsburg, lays open a scene of the grossest fraud that could be practiced to deceive the officers of Government and conceal the unlawful transaction.

The extension of the trade for the last twenty-five or thirty years must, in a degree, be conjectural, but the best information that can be obtained on the subject furnishes good foundation to believe that during that period the number of slaves withdrawn from western Africa amounted to upwards of a million and a half; the annual average would be a mean somewhere between fifty and eighty thousand.

The trade appears to be lucrative in proportion to its heinousness; and as it is generally inhibited, the unfeeling slave dealers, in order to elude the laws, increase its horrors; the innocent Africans, who are mercilessly forced from their native homes in irons, are crowded in vessels and situations which are not adapted for the transportation of human beings, and this cruelty is frequently succeeded during the voyage of their destination with dreadful mortality. Further information on this subject will appear in a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, inclosing two other letters, marked 1 and 2, and also by the extract of a letter from an officer of the Cyane, dated April 10, 1820, which are annexed to this report. While the slave trade exists, there can be no prospect of civilization in Africa.

However well disposed the European powers may be to effect a practical abolition of the trade, it seems generally acknowledged that, for the attainment of this object, it is necessary to agree upon some concerted plan of co-operation; but, unhappily, no arrangement has as yet obtained universal consent.

England has recently engaged in treaties with Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands, in which the mutual right of visitation and search is exchanged; this right is of a special and limited character, as well in relation to the number and description of vessels as to space; and, to avoid possible inconveniences, no suspicious circumstances are to warrant the detention of a vessel; this right is restricted to the simple fact of slaves being on board.

These treaties contemplate the establishment of mixed courts, formed of an equal number of individuals of the two contracting nations—the one to reside in a possession belonging to his Britannic Majesty, the other within the territory of the other respective power; when a vessel is visited and detained it is to be taken to the nearest court, and if condemned, the vessel is to be declared a lawful prize, as well as the cargo, and are to be sold for the profit of the two nations; the slaves are to receive a certificate of emancipation, and to be delivered over to the Government on whose territory the court is which passes the sentence, to be employed as servants or free laborers; each of the Governments binds itself to guaranty the liberty of such portion of these individuals as may be respectively assigned to it. Particular provisions are made for remuneration in case vessels are not condemned after trial, and special instructions are stipulated to be furnished to commanders of vessels possessing the qualified right of visitation and search.

These powers entertain the opinion that nothing short of the concession of a qualified right of visitation and search can practically suppress the slave trade; an association of armed ships is contemplated, to form a species of naval police, to be stationed principally in the African seas, where the commanders of the ships will be enabled to co-operate in harmony and concert.

The United States have been earnestly invited by the principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of the British Government to join in the same or similar arrangements, and this invitation has been sanctioned and enforced by a unanimous vote of the House of Lords and Commons in a manner that precludes all doubts as to the sincerity and benevolence of their design.

In answer to this invitation, the President of the United States has expressed his regret that the stipulations in the treaties communicated are of a character to which the peculiar situation and institutions of the United States do not permit them to accede.

The objections made are contained in an extract of a letter from the Secretary of State under date of the 2d of November, 1818, in which it is observed that, "in examining the provisions of the treaties communicated by Lord Castlereagh, all the essential articles appear to be of a character not adaptable to the institutions or to the circumstances of the United States. The powers agreed to be reciprocally given to the officers of the ships-of-war of either party to enter, search, capture, and carry into port for adjudication, the merchant vessels of the other, however qualified and restricted, is most essentially connected with the institution by each treaty of two mixed courts, one of which to reside in the external or colonial possession of each of the two parties respectively. This part of the system is indispensable to give it that character of reciprocity, without which the right granted to the armed ships of one nation to search the merchant vessels of another would be rather a mark of vassalage than of independence. But to this part of the system the United States, having no colonies either on the coast of Africa or in the West Indies, cannot give effect. That by the Constitution of the United States it is provided that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in a Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. It provides that judges of these courts shall hold their offices during good behavior, and that they shall be removable by impeachment, on conviction of crimes and misdemeanors. There may be doubts whether the power of the Government of the United States is competent to institute a court for carrying into execution their penal statutes beyond the territories of the United States—a court consisting partly of foreign judges, not amenable to impeachment for corruption, and deciding upon statutes of the United States without appeal.

"That the disposal of the negroes found on board of the slave trading vessels which might be condemned by the sentence of these mixed courts cannot be carried into effect by the United States; for if the slaves of vessels condemned by the mixed courts should be delivered over to the Government of the United States as freemen, they could not, but by their own consent, be employed as servants or free laborers. The condition of the blacks being, in this Union, regulated by the municipal laws of the separate States, the Government of the United States can neither guaranty their liberty in the States where they could only be received as slaves, nor control them in the States where they would be recognized as free. That the admission of a right in the officers of foreign ships-of-war to enter and search the vessels of the United States in time of peace, under any circumstances whatever, would meet with universal repugnance in the public opinion of this country, and that there would be no prospect of a ratification, by advice and consent of the Senate, to any stipulation of that nature; that the search by foreign officers, even in time of war, is so obnoxious to the feelings and recollections of this country that nothing could reconcile them to the extension of it, however qualified or restricted, to a time of peace; and that it would be viewed in a still more aggravated light if, as in the treaty with the Netherlands, connected with a formal admission that even vessels under convoy of ships-of-war of their own nation should be liable to search by the ships-of-war of another."

The committee will observe, in the first instance, that a mutual right of search appears to be indispensable to the great object of abolition; for, while flags remain as a cover for this traffic against the right of search by any vessels except of the same nation, the chance of detection will be much less than it would be if the right of search was extended to vessels of other powers; and as soon as any one nation should cease to be vigilant in the discovery of infractions practiced on its own code, the slave dealers would avail themselves of a system of obtaining fraudulent papers and concealing the real ownership under the cover of such flags, which would be carried on with such address as to render it easy for the citizens or subjects of one State to evade their own municipal laws; but if a concerted system existed, and a qualified right of mutual search was granted, the apprehension of these piratical offenders would be reduced to a much greater certainty; and the very knowledge of the existence of an active and vigorous system of co-operation would divert many from this traffic, as the unlawful trade would become too hazardous for profitable speculation.

In relation to any inconveniences that might result from such an arrangement, the commerce of the United States is so limited on the African coast that it could not be much affected by it; and as it regards economy, the expense of stationing a few vessels on that coast would not be much greater than to maintain them at any other place.

The committee have briefly noticed the practical results of a reciprocal right of search as it bears on the slave trade; but the objection as to the propriety of ceding this right remains. It is with deference that the committee undertake to make any remarks upon it. They bear in recollection the opinions entertained in this country on the practice of searching neutral vessels in time of war; but they cannot perceive that the right under discussion is, in principle, allied in any degree to the general question of search. It can involve no commitment, nor is it susceptible of any unfavorable inference on that subject; and even if there were any affinity between the cases, the necessity of a special agreement would be inconsistent with the idea of existing rights; the proposal itself, in the manner made, is a total abandonment on the part of England of any claim to visit and search vessels in a time of peace, and this question has been unequivocally decided in the negative in her admiralty courts.

Although it is not among the objections that the desired arrangement would give any color to a claim or right of search in time of peace, yet, lest the case in this respect may be prejudiced in the minds of any, the committee will observe that the right of search in time of peace is one that is not claimed by any power as a part of the law of nations. No nation pretends that it can exercise the right of visitation and search upon the common and unappropriated parts of the sea, except upon the belligerent claim. A recent decision in the British admiralty court, in the case of the French slave ship Le Louis, is clear and decisive on this point. The case is annexed to this report.

In regard, then, to the reciprocal right wished to be ceded, it is reduced to the simple inquiry whether, in practice, it will be beneficial to the contracting nations. Its exercise, so far as it relates to the detention of vessels, as it is confined to the fact of slaves being actually on board, precludes almost the possibility of accident or much inconvenience.

In relation also to the disposal of the vessels and slaves detained, an arrangement perhaps could be effected, so as to deliver them up to the vessels of the nation to which the detained vessel should belong. Under such an understanding, the vessels and slaves delivered to the jurisdiction of the United States might be disposed of in conformity with the provisions of our own act of the 3d of March, 1819, and an arrangement of this kind would be free from any of the other objections.

An exchange of the right of search, limited in duration, or to continue at pleasure, for the sake of experiment, might, it is anxiously hoped, be so restricted to vessels and seas, and with such civil and harmonious stipulations, as not to be unacceptable.

The feelings of this country on the general question of search have often been roused to a degree of excitement that evince their unchangeable character; but the American people will readily see the distinction between the cases; the one, in its exercise to the extent claimed, will ever produce irritation, and excite a patriotic spirit of resistance; the other is amicable and charitable. The justice and nobleness of the undertaking are worthy of the combined concern of Christian nations.

The detestable crime of kidnapping the unoffending inhabitants of one country, and chaining them to slavery in another, is marked with all the atrociousness of piracy, and, as such, it is stigmatized and punishable by our own laws.

To efface this reproachful stain from the character of civilized mankind would be the proudest triumph that could be achieved in the cause of humanity. On this subject the United States, having led the way, owe it to themselves to give their influence and cordial co-operation to any measure that will accomplish the great and good purpose; but this happy result, experience has demonstrated, cannot be realized by any system, except a concession by the maritime powers to each other's ships-of-war of a qualified right of search. If this object was generally attained, it is confidently believed that the active exertions of even a few nations would be sufficient entirely to suppress the slave trade.

The slave dealers could be successfully assailed on the coast upon which the trade originates, as they must necessarily consume more time in the collection and embarkation of their cargoes than in the subsequent distribution in the markets for which they are destined; this renders that coast the most advantageous position for their apprehension; and, besides, the African coast frequented by the slave ships is indented with so few commodious or accessible harbors, that notwithstanding its great extent, it could be guarded by the vigilance of a small number of cruisers. But if the slave ships are permitted to escape from the African coast, and to be dispersed to different parts of the world, their capture would be rendered uncertain and hopeless.

The committee, after much reflection, offer the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,
That the President of the United States be requested to enter into such arrangements as he may deem suitable and proper, with one or more of the maritime powers of Europe, for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade.

Case of the French slave ship Le Louis, extracted from the twelfth annual report of the African Institution, printed in 1818.

This vessel sailed from Martinique on the 30th of January, 1816, on a slave trading voyage to the coast of Africa, and was captured near Cape Mesurado by the Sierra Leone colonial vessel-of-war Queen Charlotte, after a severe engagement which followed an attempt to escape, in which eight men were killed and twelve wounded of the British; and proceedings having been instituted against Le Louis in the Vice Admiralty Court of Sierra Leone, as belonging to French subjects, and as fitted out, manned, and navigated for the purpose of carrying on the slave trade, after the trade had been abolished both by the internal laws of France and by the treaty between that country and Great Britain, the ship and cargo were condemned as forfeited to his Majesty.

From this sentence an appeal having been made to the High Court of Admiralty, the cause came on for hearing, when the court reversed the judgment of the inferior court, and ordered the restitution of the property to the claimants.

The judgment of Sir William Scott was given at great length. The directors will advert to such points of it as are immediately connected with their present subject. "No doubt," he said, "could exist that this was a French ship intentionally engaged in the slave trade." But as these were facts which were ascertained in consequence of its seizure, before the seizer could avail himself of this discovery, it was necessary to inquire whether he possessed any right of visitation and search; because, if the discovery was unlawfully produced, he could not be allowed to take advantage of the consequences of his own wrong.

The learned judge then discussed, at considerable length, the question, whether the right of search exists in time of peace? and he decided it without hesitation in the negative. "I can find," he says, "no authority that gives the right of interruption to the navigation of States in amity upon the high seas, excepting that which the rights of war give to both belligerents against neutrals. No nation can exercise a right of visitation and search upon the common and unappropriated parts of the sea, save only on the belligerent claim." He admits, indeed, and with just concern, that if this right be not conceded in time of peace, it will be extremely difficult to suppress the traffic in slaves.

"The great object, therefore, ought to be to obtain the concurrence of other nations by application, by remonstrance, by example, by every peaceable instrument which men can employ to attract the consent of men. But a nation is not justified in assuming rights that do not belong to her, merely because she means to apply them to a laudable purpose."

"If this right," he adds, "is imported into a state of peace, it must be done by convention; and it will then be for the prudence of States to regulate by such convention the exercise of the right, with all the softening of which it is susceptible."

The judgment of Sir William Scott would have been equally conclusive against the legality of this seizure, even if it could have been established in evidence that France had previously prohibited the slave trade by her municipal laws. For the sake of argument, however, he assumes that the view he has taken of the subject might in such a case be controverted. He proceeds, therefore, to inquire how far the French law had actually abolished the slave trade at the time of this adventure. The actual state of the matter, as collected from the documents before the court, he observes, is this:

"On the 27th of July, 1815, the British minister at Paris writes a note to Prince Talleyrand, then minister to the King of France, expressing a desire on the part of his court to be informed whether, under the law of France as it then stood, it was prohibited to French subjects to carry on the slave trade. The French minister informs him, in answer, on the 30th of July, that the law of the Usurper on that subject was null and void, (as were all his decrees,) but that his most Christian Majesty had issued directions that, on the part of France, "the traffic should cease from the present time everywhere and forever."

"In what form these directions were issued or to whom addressed does not appear, but upon such authority it must be presumed that they were actually issued. It is, however, no violation of the respect due to that authority to inquire what was the result or effect of those directions so given—what followed in obedience to them in any public and binding form? And I fear that I am compelled to say, that nothing of the kind followed, and that the directions must have slept in the portfolio of the office to which they were addressed; for it is, I think, impossible that, if any public and authoritative ordinance had followed, it could have escaped the sleepless attention of many persons in our own country to all public foreign proceedings upon this interesting subject. Still less would it have escaped the notice of the British resident minister, who, at the distance of a year and a half, is compelled, on the part of his own court, to express a curiosity to know what laws, ordinances, instructions, and other public and ostensible acts, had passed for the abolition of the slave trade.

"On the 30th of November, in the same year, (1815,) the additional article of the definitive treaty, a very solemn instrument, most undoubtedly, is formally and publicly executed, and it is in these terms: 'The high contracting parties, sincerely desiring to give effect to the measures on which they deliberated at the Congress of Vienna, for the complete and universal abolition of the slave trade, and having each, in their respective dominions, prohibited, without restriction, their colonies and subjects from taking any part whatever in this traffic, engage to renew, conjointly, their efforts, with a view to insure final success to the principle which they proclaimed in the declaration of the 8th of February, 1815, and to concert, without loss of time, by their ministers at the court of London, the most effectual measures for the entire and definitive abolition of the traffic so odious and so highly reprobated by the laws of religion and nature.'

"Now, what are the effects of this treaty? According to the view I take of it, they are two, and two only: one declaratory of a fact, the other promissory of future measures. It is to be observed that the treaty itself does not abolish the slave trade; it does not inform the subjects that that trade is hereby abolished, and that, by virtue of the prohibitions therein contained, its subjects shall not, in future, carry on the trade; but the contracting parties mutually inform each other of the fact that they have, in their respective dominions, abolished the slave trade, without stating at all the mode in which that abolition had taken place."

"It next engages to take future measures for the universal abolition.

"That, with respect to both the declaratory and promissory parts, Great Britain has acted with the optima fides, is known to the whole world, which has witnessed its domestic laws, as well as its foreign negotiations.

"I am very far from intimating that the Government of this country did not act with perfect propriety in accepting the assurance that the French Government had actually abolished the slave trade, as a sufficient proof of the fact; but the fact is now denied by a person who has a right to deny it; for, though a French subject, he is not bound to acknowledge the existence of any law which has not publicly appeared; and the other party having taken upon himself the burden of proving it in the course of a legal inquiry, the court is compelled to demand and expect the ordinary evidence of such a disputed fact. It was not till the 15th of January, in the present year, (1817,) that the British resident minister applies for the communication I have described, of all laws, instructions, ordinances, and so on; he receives in return what is delivered by the French minister as the ordinance, bearing date only one week before the requested communication, namely, the 8th of January. It has been asserted, in argument, that no such ordinance has yet, up to this very hour, even, appeared in any printed or public form, however much it might import both French subjects and the subjects of foreign States so to receive it.

"How the fact may be, I cannot say; but I observe it appears before me in a manuscript form; and by inquiry at the Secretary of State's office, I find it exists there in no other plight or condition.

"In transmitting this to the British Government, the British minister observes, it is not the document he had reason to expect, and, certainly, with much propriety; for how does the document answer his requisition? His requisition is for all laws, ordinances, instructions, and so forth. How does this, a simple ordinance, professing to have passed only a week before, realize the assurance given on the 30th of July, 1815, that the traffic 'should cease, from the present time, everywhere and forever?' or how does this realize the promise made in November, that measures should be taken, without loss of time, to prohibit not only French colonists but French subjects likewise from taking any part whatever in this traffic? What is this regulation in substance? Why, it is a mere prospective colonial regulation, prohibiting the importation of slaves into the French colonies from the 8th of January, 1817.

"Consistently with this declaration, even if it does exist in the form and with the force of a law, French subjects may be yet the common carriers of slaves to any foreign settlement that will admit them, and may devote their capital and their industry, unmolested by law, to the supply of any such markets.

"Supposing, however, the regulations to contain the fullest and most entire fulfilment of the engagement of France, both in time and in substance, what possible application can a prospective regulation of January, 1817, have to a transaction of March, 1816?"

"Nobody is now to be told that a modern edict which does not appear cannot be presumed, and that no penal law of any State can bind the conduct of its subjects, unless it is conveyed to their attention in a way which excludes the possibility of honest ignorance. The very production of a law professing to be enacted in the beginning of 1817 is a satisfactory proof that no such law existed in 1816, the year of this transaction. In short, the seizer has entirely failed in the task he has undertaken, in proving the existence of a prohibitory law, enacted by the legal Government of France, which can be applied to the present transaction."

C.

Report of the Committee on the Suppression of the Slave Trade, made in the House of Representatives April 12, 1822.

The Committee on the Suppression of the Slave Trade, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th of January last, instructing them to inquire whether the laws of the United States prohibiting that traffic have been duly executed; also, into the general operation thereof; and if any defects exist in those laws, to suggest adequate remedies therefor; and to whom many memorials have been referred touching the same subject, having, according to order, had the said resolution and memorials under consideration, reported:

That, under the just and liberal construction put by the Executive on the act of Congress of March 3, 1819, and that of May 15, 1820, inflicting the punishment of piracy on the African slave trade, a foundation has been laid for the most systematic and vigorous application of the power of the United States to the suppression of that iniquitous traffic. Its unhappy subjects, when captured, are restored to their country; agents are there appointed to receive them, and a colony, the offspring of private charity, is rising on its shores, in which such as cannot reach their native tribes will find the means of alleviating the calamities they may have endured before their liberation.

When these humane provisions are contrasted with the system which they supersede, there can be but one sentiment in favor of a steady adherence to their support. The document accompanying this report, and marked A, states the number of Africans seized or taken within or without the limits of the United States and brought there, and their present condition.

It does not appear to your committee that such part of the naval force of the country as has been hitherto employed in the execution of the laws against this traffic could have been more effectually used for the interest and honor of the nation. The document marked B is a statement of the names of the vessels and their commanders ordered upon this service, with the dates of their departure, &c. The first vessel destined for this service arrived upon the coast of Africa in March, 1820; and in the few weeks she remained there sent in for adjudication four American vessels, all of which were condemned. The four which have been since employed in this service have made five visits, (the Alligator having made two cruises in the past summer,) the whole of which have amounted to a service of about ten months by a single vessel within a period of near two years; and since the middle of last November, the commencement of the healthy season on that coast, no vessel has been, nor, as your committee is informed, is under orders for that service.

The committee are thus particular on this branch of their inquiry, because unfounded rumors have been in circulation that other branches of the public service have suffered from the destination given to the inconsiderable force above stated, which, small as it has been, has in every instance been directed, both in its outward and homeward voyage, to cruise in the West India seas.

Before they quit this part of their inquiry, your committee feel it their duty to state that the loss of several of the prizes made in this service is imputable to the size of the ships engaged in it. The efficacy of this force, as well as the health and discipline of the officers and crews, conspire to recommend the employment of no smaller vessel than a corvette or a sloop-of-war, to which it would be expedient to allow the largest possible complement of men; and, if possible, she should be accompanied by a tender, or vessel drawing less water. The vessels engaged in this service should be frequently relieved, but the coast should at no time be left without a vessel to watch and protect its shores.

Your committee find it impossible to measure with precision the effect produced upon the American branch of the slave trade by the laws above mentioned, and the seizures under them. They are unable to state whether those American merchants, the American capital and seamen, which heretofore aided in this traffic, have abandoned it altogether, or have sought shelter under the flags of other nations. It is ascertained, however, that the American flag, which heretofore covered so large a portion of the slave trade, has wholly disappeared from the coasts of Africa. The trade, notwithstanding, increases annually under the flags of other nations. France has incurred the reproach of being the greatest adventurer in this traffic prohibited by her laws; but it is to be presumed that this results not so much from the avidity of her subjects for this iniquitous gain, as from the safety which, in the absence of all hazard of capture, her flag affords to the greedy and unprincipled adventurers of all nations. It is neither candid nor just to impute to a gallant and high-minded people the exclusive commission of crimes which the abandoned of all nations are alike capable of perpetrating, with the additional wrong to France herself of using her flag to cover and protect them. If the vigor of the American Navy has saved its banner from like reproach, it has done much to preserve unsullied its high reputation, and amply repaid the expense charged upon the public revenue by a system of laws to which it has given such honorable effect.

But the conclusion to which your committee has arrived, after consulting all the evidence within their reach, is, that the African slave trade now prevails to a great extent, and that its total suppression can never be effected by the separate and disunited efforts of one or more States; and as the resolution to which this report refers requires the suggestion of some remedy for the defects, if any exist, in the system of laws for the suppression of this traffic, your committee beg leave to call the attention of the House to the report and accompanying documents submitted to the last Congress by the Committee on the Slave Trade, and to make the same a part of this report. That report proposes, as a remedy for the existing evils of the system, the concurrence of the United States with one or all the maritime powers of Europe in a modified and reciprocal right of search on the African coast, with a view to the total suppression of the slave trade.

It is with great delicacy that the committee have approached this subject, because they are aware that the remedy which they have presumed to recommend to the consideration of the House requires the exercise of the power of another Department of this Government, and that objections to the exercise of this power, in the mode here proposed, have hitherto existed in that Department.

Your committee are confident, however, that these objections apply rather to a particular proposition for the exchange of the right of search, than to that modification of it which presents itself to your committee. They contemplate the trial and condemnation of such American citizens as may be found engaged in this forbidden trade, not by mixed tribunals sitting in a foreign country, but by existing courts, of competent jurisdiction, in the United States; they propose the same disposition of the captured Africans now authorized by law; and least of all, their detention in America.

They contemplate an exchange of this right, which shall be in all respects reciprocal; an exchange which, deriving its sole authority from treaty, would exclude the pretension which no nation, however, has presumed to set up, that this right can be derived from the law of nations; and further, they have limited it, in their conception of its application, not only to certain latitudes and to a certain distance from the coast of Africa, but to a small number of vessels to be employed by each power, and to be previously designated. The visit and search, thus restricted, it is believed would insure the co-operation of one great maritime power in the proposed exchange, and guard it from the danger of abuse.

Your committee cannot doubt that the people of America have the intelligence to distinguish between the right of searching a neutral on the high seas in time of war, claimed by some belligerents, and that mutual, restricted, and peaceful concession by treaty suggested by your committee, and which is demanded in the name of suffering humanity.

In closing this report, they recommend to the House the adoption of the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to enter into such arrangements as he may deem suitable and proper with one or more of the maritime powers of Europe for the effectual abolition of the slave trade.

The following resolution was submitted to the House of Representatives on the 10th February, 1823, and adopted the 28th of the same month:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to enter upon and to prosecute, from time to time, such negotiations with the several maritime powers of Europe and America as he may deem expedient for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade, and its ultimate denunciation as piracy, under the law of nations, by the consent of the civilized world.

Mr. Hyde de Neuville to Mr. Adams, dated December 15, 1817.

[Translation.]

SIR: The Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of his most Christian Majesty has received reiterated orders to ascertain the truth of the statement made by several masters of merchant ships, affirming that French vessels are not treated, in the ports of Louisiana, upon the footing of the most favored nations. Upon investigation, it not only appears that such is actually the case, but the undersigned has even found that several protests had been lodged in vain with the local authorities against this manifest infraction of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty. He is well assured that this must have been the mere consequence of error, or of incorrect interpretation given on the spot to a clause which is absolute and unconditional by its own terms, and which can neither be limited nor modified; being the essential unlimited condition of a contract of cession, can neither be subject to limitation nor to any modification whatever. The minister of his most Christian Majesty persuades himself that it will suffice thus to call the attention of the Federal Government to this affair, in order to obtain from its justice the reparation of an injury so very prejudicial to French commerce. He, therefore, requests of the Secretary of State that this his representation, made by order of his court, be submitted as soon as possible to the President, in order that his excellency may be pleased to issue orders to such effect that in future the 8th article of the treaty of 1803, between France and the United States, receive its entire execution, and that the advantages granted to Great Britain in all the ports of the United States be secured to France in those of Louisiana. The principle of justice here claimed cannot be denied, and must necessarily insure the reimbursement of the duties which have been unjustifiably levied upon French vessels in New Orleans. The undersigned minister expects, with entire confidence, the decision of the President, of which he requests the Secretary of State will enable him to inform his court as soon as possible. The Government of His Majesty desires, as soon as possible, to quiet the commerce of France with regard to proceedings so contrary to its interests and to the true spirit of the Louisiana treaty.

The undersigned has the honor, &c.

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

No. 2.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 23, 1817.

The undersigned, Secretary of State, has received and laid before the President the note which he had the honor of receiving from the Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of France, complaining that French vessels are not, conformably to the 8th article of the treaty of cession of Louisiana, treated in the ports of that State upon the footing of the most favored nation; and claiming as a right, deducible from the same article, that French vessels should in future enjoy, in the ports of Louisiana, all the advantages granted to the English nation in all the ports of the Union.

The undersigned is instructed to say that the vessels of France are treated in the ports of Louisiana upon the footing of the most favored nation; and that neither the English nor any other foreign nation enjoys gratuitous advantage there which is not equally enjoyed by France. But English vessels, by virtue of a conditional compact, are admitted into the ports of the United States, including those of Louisiana, upon payment of the same duties as the vessels of the United States. The condition upon which they enjoy this advantage is, that the vessels of the United States shall be admitted into the ports of Great Britain upon payment of the same duties as are there paid by British vessels.

The 8th article of the treaty of cession stipulates that the ships of France shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports of the ceded territory; but it does not say, and cannot be understood to mean, that France should enjoy as a free gift that which is conceded to other nations for a full equivalent.

It is obvious, that, if French vessels should be admitted into the ports of Louisiana upon payment of the same duties as the vessels of the United States, they would be treated, not upon the footing of the most favored nation, according to the article in question, but upon a footing more favored than any other nation; since other nations, with the exception of England, pay higher tonnage duties, and the exemption of English vessels is not a free gift, but a purchase at a fair and equal price.

It is true that the terms of the 8th article are positive and unconditional; but it will readily be perceived that the condition, though not expressed in the article, is inherent in the advantage claimed under it. If British vessels enjoyed in the ports of Louisiana any gratuitous favor, undoubtedly French vessels would, by the terms of the article, be entitled to the same.

A more extensive construction cannot be given to the article, consistently with the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States; and that no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another."

It would be incompatible with other articles of the treaty of cession itself, one of which cedes the territory to the United States "in full sovereignty," and another declares that its "inhabitants shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and be admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States." If France could claim forever advantages in the ports of Louisiana which could be denied to her in the other ports of the United States, she would have ceded to the United States not the full, but an imperfect sovereignty; and if France could claim admission for her vessels forever into the ports of Louisiana, upon the payment of duties not uniform with those which they must pay in the other ports of the United States, it would have been impossible to have admitted the inhabitants of Louisiana, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States.

The undersigned is happy to be authorized, in concluding this note, to add, that the Government of the United States is willing to extend to France, not only in the ports of Louisiana, but in those of all the United States, every advantage enjoyed by the vessels of Great Britain, upon the fair and just equivalent of reciprocity; and that, in the meantime, the vessels of France shall be treated in all the ports of the United States, including Louisiana, on the footing of the most favored nation, enjoying gratuitously every favor indulged gratuitously to others, and every conditional favor, upon the reciprocation of the same to vessels of the United States in France.

He prays the minister of France to accept the assurances of his very distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, June 16, 1818.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your note, in answer to mine of the 15th December last, concerning the non-execution of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty.

I took care duly to communicate the proposal made by the Federal Government to extend to France, not only in the ports of Louisiana, but even in all those of the United States, the advantages therein enjoyed by British vessels on a footing of absolute reciprocity. His Majesty is ever disposed not to neglect anything that can tend to rivet the bonds of friendship of the two countries, and to improve their commercial intercourse, and will, no doubt, examine this proposal with very particular attention.

In the meantime, as it would be neither just nor proper that the execution of the clauses of a contract already made and completely concluded should be dependent on an arrangement which, as yet, is only in contemplation; and as the enjoyment of a perpetual unconditional right should never in any case be blended with reciprocal advantages or concessions which time annuls, and which accidental causes may modify or destroy; as France claims nothing but what she knows is due to her, and as she is well persuaded that the Federal Government will never deny what it is conscious of owing, there is much reason to hope that the following observations will suffice to establish our right, and thus remove every obstacle to its free enjoyment. I will add, that fresh orders from his Majesty make it my duty to neglect no means of obtaining, as soon as possible, this act, whose accomplishment must be expected from mature deliberation on the question, and is warranted by the acknowledged equity of the Federal Government.

You have stated, sir, that French vessels are treated in the ports of Louisiana upon the footing of the most favored nation, and that no foreign nation enjoys there any gratuitous advantage which is not equally enjoyed by France. You add, sir, that if British vessels are allowed in the ports of the United States certain advantages which American vessels likewise enjoy in the ports of Great Britain, it is by virtue of a conditional compact founded on reciprocity of advantages.

Finally, after recalling the 8th article, which stipulates expressly that, in future, and forever, French vessels shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nation in the ports of the ceded territory, you observe that the article does not say, and that it could not be understood to mean, that France should enjoy as a free gift that which is conceded to other nations for a full equivalent.

I shall, in the first place, have the honor to observe, that France asks not for a free gift; she claims the enjoyment of a right which it is not even necessary for her to acquire, since it proceeds from herself, being a right which, when she consented to dispose of Louisiana, she had power to reserve for the interest of her trade, and the actual reservation of which is established, not implicitly, but in the most precise and formal terms, by the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty.

France, I repeat it, asks no free gifts, since the territory ceded is the equivalent already paid by her for all the clauses, charges, and conditions, executed, or which remain to be fulfilled by the United States, and which principally consist in the 7th and 8th articles of the treaty, and 1st of the convention.

If the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty had no other object but that of securing to France a conditional advantage in the ports of Louisiana; if such had been the true spirit of this clause, and, finally, if the American negotiators had been firmly convinced that this reservation of the French Government was not absolute, but was merely one of those customary reciprocal concessions which occur in almost all treaties of amity and commerce, it is likely that no pains would have been taken to frame the article so as absolutely to contradict the intention of the contracting parties; and it stands to reason that, if such had been their views, the terms usually employed in other treaties would have been employed here also, instead of so precise a stipulation of an unconditional and perpetual advantage in favor of France. In all the treaties between France and the United States the condition of reciprocity is positively mentioned; they all expressly say that the contracting parties shall reciprocally enjoy such favors as shall be conceded to other nations, freely, if freely granted to other nations, or, upon granting the same condition, if conditionally granted. How shall we account for the strange and unusual construction here adopted? Who would admit the possibility or likelihood of an omission on the part of negotiators, the object of whose mission was not to stipulate doubtful clauses, subject to discussion, but, on the contrary, as it is expressly stated in the treaty, "to remove all sources of misunderstanding relative to objects of discussion, and to strengthen the union and friendship which, at the time of the said convention, was happily re-established between the two nations?"

And, furthermore, how shall we reconcile the silence observed by the Senate, in 1803, respecting this unconditional and unlimited favor secured to France, with the positive refusal of the same House, in 1801, to ratify a convention founded on reciprocity of advantage, unless on the express condition that it should be limited to eight years?

The natural inference, the only explanation of all this, is, that in 1801 the question was on a convention or treaty of amity and commerce, while in 1803 it was on a contract of sale or cession, which instruments are of so different a nature as not to admit the application of similar principles and consequences; nor can it be supposed that the negotiators of the treaty of 1801 had forgotten to mention that the citizens of the two nations should, reciprocally, be treated, each in the ports of the other, upon the footing of the most favored nations, since this principle of reciprocity was not only the general basis, but was even, in almost every instance, the sine qua non of preceding commercial conventions.

But the negotiators of the treaty of 1803 knew full well that they were not commissioned to settle the commercial or navigating interests of the two countries, and were merely authorized to make a contract of sale or cession, which, however important from the value of the object ceded, was not the less subject, like every conveyance between individuals, to certain and invariable rules of construction and interpretation. A contract of sale admits of no implication, (sous entendu;) it is a plain simple transaction, by which one party is bound to deliver a certain property, and the other party to receive it, on certain charges and conditions more or less rigorous.

Those clauses and conditions cannot be interpreted otherwise than according to the terms in which they are expressed in the contract, nor can they be annulled or modified except by the consent of both parties. Their entire execution is, indeed, so rigorously binding, that it alone may be said finally to seal the transaction. But the article would appear to you, sir, to be in this, its only natural construction, inconsistent with the Constitution, which declares that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

It would seem to me that this clause of the Constitution has no other reference than to the interior administration of the country, and that it cannot be proper to consider in the light of a mere tax or impost that which is an express condition of the sale or cession of a territory, and is one of the clauses of a treaty which itself becomes a law of the United States.

You express an opinion, sir, that the eighth article, if interpreted according to its grammatical and literal sense, would be incompatible with another article of the same treaty, which cedes the territory to the United States in full sovereignty, arguing that, if France could claim forever advantages in the ports of Louisiana which could be denied to her in the other ports of the United States, she would have ceded to the United States not the full, but an imperfect sovereignty.

Allow me to observe that this last point of the argument is answered by your own decision, admitting that, if British vessels enjoyed in the ports of Louisiana any gratuitous favor, undoubtedly French vessels would, by the terms of the treaty, be entitled to the same.

This admits the possibility of an imperfect sovereignty, and supposes an instance in which France might be entitled to claim, in the ports of Louisiana, a favor which could be denied her in the other ports of the United States.

Moreover, if the United States have, by the Constitution, a right to grant to other nations gratuitous favors in their ports, it follows, from your own interpretation of the perpetual reservation made by France, that, in order to deprive her of the right so reserved, and to avoid rendering thereby the sovereignty of this Republic imperfect, the Federal Government must not grant to other nations any gratuitous concessions in the territory ceded by France, though it should be found expedient so to do, and advantageous to their commercial interest and policy. In other words, the Federal Government, by consenting to the eighth article, would have deprived itself of a real right of sovereignty. In the preceding hypothesis the difficulty is merely eluded and not removed. The right is not the less unqualified and consented to forever.

But will it be said the Constitution allows no preferences among the different States; they are all, by the Federal compact, subject to the same charges and to enjoy the same privileges. It would appear to me, sir, that this perfect uniformity is applicable only to a State when it has once become a State. The regulations made for the family cannot be meant to extend beyond its circle; and the law which established such regulations never can have blended the circumstances pre-existent to the admission of a new member (much less the very conditions of admission) with the rights, charges, and privileges, which are the consequences springing therefrom. Thus did Congress judge; to them it appeared that the instrument of sale or cession of Louisiana had no analogy to a commercial regulation, or to a distribution of taxes; and they admitted, without discussion, the seventh and eighth articles of the treaty, because, if the Constitution does not allow that a Territory, when once admitted into this Union, be marked by any distinct charges or advantages, it does not, on that account, prevent the fulfilment of clauses exacted and consented to as conditions of its admission. In all this there is neither exception nor preference; it is the mere and simple execution of a contract freely and lawfully entered into. But the third article says that the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated into the Union, and admitted, as soon as possible, to the enjoyment of all the advantages and immunities of citizens of the United States.

This is true, and such, no doubt, was the intention of the contracting parties. They expressly agreed that this admission should take place as soon as possible; but most assuredly it was meant that this should be done in conformity with the clauses and conditions mentioned in the treaty; and if the eighth article could have been considered as an obstacle to the execution of the third article, it would equally have been so thought of the seventh; this article was, however, never contested; it even received during the twelve years of its duration, or should have received, its full and entire operation by virtue of the regulating act of Congress of the 24th of February, 1804.

France and Spain still enjoyed in 1815, in Louisiana, the rights and privileges secured by the seventh article, which rights, by the very terms of the treaty, never can be granted to any other nation. France and Spain were in the full enjoyment of these exclusive rights and privileges in 1815; and yet, in 1812, the stipulations of the third article were fulfilled, the Territory of Louisiana was admitted as a State into the Federal body, and this new State was received, without restriction, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever.

If, therefore, there were at this day any contradiction between the third and eighth articles, how could Congress, in 1812, surmount the objection arising from the much stronger inconsistency, which, on this supposition, must have existed between the third and seventh articles?

When Congress made Louisiana a member of the Union, before the expiration of the twelve years, it was judged that such a compliance with the conditions of a treaty was by no means incompatible with the exercise of the full and entire rights of sovereignty. Perhaps it may be answered that the seventh article granted only temporary privileges, and that the eighth article has no term fixed to it. To me, it appears that the word forever changes nothing but the duration of the privilege, without, in the least degree, altering the nature of the question. Under a constitutional system, nothing can be done, ordered, or consented to, that would infringe, even but for a limited term, the established laws of the country. All the transactions of Governments must be legal. If, therefore, the provisions of the Constitution which regulate the existence of a State after its admission were applicable to the conditions on which it is to be admitted, it would, in such case, have been no less impossible in 1812 than at the present day to grant to the inhabitants of Louisiana the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens of the United States, since, on that supposition, they must, in common with the other States, have had a right to make France and Spain pay in their ports higher tonnage duties than those paid by the citizens of the United States; and since the Federal Government had no right, at that time, to grant, in the ports of the ceded territory, to other nations the privileges therein secured to France and to Spain. France did intend to cede the territory of Louisiana to the United States forever, and in full sovereignty; but sovereignty does not consist in the enjoyment of every right and privilege: it lies in the pre-eminent important authority to enforce their observance. When the French Government ceded Louisiana, it ceased to be the sovereign of the country, but it did not cease to hold property therein, since it reserved a right or privilege; for a privilege acquired or reserved, is property as sacred as an annuity, as a rent charge, or any other.

France, therefore, claims only the enjoyment of what is her property; giving her possession of this lawful right, far from rendering the sovereignty of the United States imperfect, would seem, in a measure, only to make it more complete, since it is certain that the right claimed by France is one of the essential conditions of the cession made by her of that sovereignty. It may, perhaps, be answered that there is some difference between the contracts of nations with other nations and a sale made by one individual to another. I see very little, I confess, on the score of equity, the rules of interpretation being in all cases alike applicable to every human transaction. By the law of nations, it is an invariable rule that treaties or contracts, of whatsoever nature, should be understood according to the force and meaning of their expressions; and nothing surely can be more unconditional or more clearly expressed than the following clause: "In future, and forever, after the expiration of the twelve years, French vessels shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports of the said territory." In future and forever are expressions free from all ambiguity. After the expiration of the twelve years, these words prove that the treatment or privilege secured by the eighth article is to follow without condition or limitation of time. That of the seventh article, French vessels shall be treated, does not mean may be treated, but that they shall undoubtedly and positively be treated upon the footing of the most favored nation. And it makes no difference whether that treatment be the consequence of a gratuitous or of a conditional concession; the article has no restriction; it expressly states, French vessels shall be treated upon the footing of the [most] favored nations. The consequence is, that French vessels are, without condition, to be treated, in the ports of Louisiana, upon the footing of the vessels of Great Britain, which is at this time the most favored nation. I think I have proved, sir, that to demand an equivalent of France, because England has given one, would, in a measure, be requiring her to purchase what is already her own property, and obliging her to pay twice for the same thing.

I think I have also proved that the sovereignty of the United States is, and will still remain, entire and perfect, such as it was ceded by the treaty of 1803, although France be put into possession of that right which is secured to her in future and forever. I could cite many examples of analogous privileges, which never were considered as impairing the sovereignty of nations. But it appears to me that the best of all arguments that can be addressed to the equity and honest feelings of the American Government is, that France claims only her lawful due and right; that the title establishing it is worded in terms of such force and precision as must suffice to remove every doubt, and absolutely to solve the question.

The claim which I have the honor to address to you, sir, being entirely dependent on the Executive authority, I cannot but hope I shall soon have to inform my court that the President has been pleased to issue such orders as will secure in future the execution of the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty, and the immediate reimbursement of the duties which have been unjustifiably levied to this day.

I have the honor to be, &c.

LEGATION OF FRANCE TO THE UNITED STATES, Washington, July 19, 1820.

SIR: I learn by a letter from his Majesty's consul at New Orleans, dated June 13, the time when the law establishing a new duty of tonnage upon French ships came to be known in that city, that the officers of the custom-house there appeared to be of opinion that this law ought to be put into execution in Louisiana, as well as in the other parts of the Union, because it made no exception; and that these agents of the public revenue made their dispositions accordingly. The law of May 15, in question, does, in fact, point out no exception, and even has these words, "any act to the contrary notwithstanding."

But this disposition, implying an abrogation of anterior laws belonging to the duty of the State, cannot be applied to treaties and contracts of nation with nation, which are without the reach of interior legislation, and form another distinct law, which can only be modified by mutual consent by new treaties between the contracting parties.

This is predetermined and understood in all the private acts of nations.

The treaty of cession of Louisiana says, positively, article 8, "in future and forever, after the expiration of the twelve years, the ships of France shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports above mentioned."

Passing by the existing discussions upon this article, and in what manner the word favor is understood, there can be no doubt of the sense which it expresses for the present case.

The new duty of tonnage established on French ships, exclusively, places them in a state of grievous inequality in regard to the ships of other nations; even here there is no question of a favor refused, but of a charge imposed. What regards Louisiana is exactly contrary to what is guaranteed forever and ever by the 8th article.

Relative to this state of inequality, in which the law of May 15 has placed French navigation in the ports of Louisiana, I shall observe, in passing, that there is a grave error in the reasonings which have been employed in Congress, and in the printed correspondence of Mr. Gallatin, to justify this measure.

It is pretended that its aim is to counterbalance the discriminating duties established in France. But these duties are applied in common to all foreign nations, and do not place the navigation of the United States in our ports upon any footing of inferiority with regard to other nations; whilst the new duty of tonnage imposed in America solely upon French ships places the navigation of France, with regard to other nations, in such a state of inferiority, that it is equivalent, if the law continued, to a real exclusion of our ships from the ports of the United States. This is anything but a compensation based upon reciprocity. Another disposition of this law, which would give it a character difficult to conceive if it were not supposed to arise from inadvertence, is the short time assigned for its execution. In America, a law made on the 15th of May, against a power in Europe, cannot be put into execution on the 1st of July, that is only forty-five days from the date, without injuring the security granted to commerce; and it is not from a power eminently commercial that an example so dangerous, given with deliberation, ought to be apprehended. It must be believed that the peculiarity arises solely from the considerable lapse of time between the presenting of the bill and its adoption. But it is nevertheless a tort with which our commerce by sea is threatened, and I expect strong remonstrances on the next arrivals of French ships, unless instructions, agreeably to received usages in this regard, are given to the officers of the customs, for ships that have sailed before the promulgation of the law, in the place whence they have departed.

It is not my intention, sir, to pursue at present the observations already contained in the letter of his Majesty's minister, dated May 24, upon this question in general, nor upon the discussion previously raised concerning the treaty of cession of Louisiana. I shall await, upon these two subjects, for your answer, and such instructions as may be directly addressed to me by my Government. But, as to the particular subject which I have the honor of submitting to you, the execution of the law of tonnage in the ports of Louisiana, notwithstanding an express stipulation of a treaty which this law cannot touch, this makes a part of my natural duties, and wants no special instructions for requiring my interference. The new law had only arrived in Louisiana at the moment I was written to. I must think that there was a mistake, or a want of sufficient instructions in the opinion then expressed by the officers of the customs. Before answering his Majesty's consul upon the conduct which he ought to pursue, I have the honor of praying you to be pleased to inform me on a point of such importance in the relations and ties existing between France and the United States.

I have the honor to offer you, sir, the respectful assurance of my high consideration.

"An allusion was made, in the course of the conference, to the claim of the French, to be treated, without any equivalent, at New Orleans, in the same manner as the British now are. I did not know of this difficulty till it was occasionally mentioned in conversation by Mr. Pasquier. The pretension appears to me altogether untenable; but I would have wished to know what answer has been given at Washington to the reclamations of the French minister, and what are the President's intentions on that subject."

[Translation.]

"The letter which I had the honor of addressing to you on the 18th of last month was intended to represent that the law of May 15, 1820, which established upon French ships in the ports of the United States a tonnage duty different from that which is levied upon other foreign ships, could not be applicable to French vessels in the ports of Louisiana, agreeably to the 8th article of the treaty of cession, which runs thus :

"ARTICLE 8. In future, and forever, after the expiration of the twelve years, French ships shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nation in the ports above mentioned."

"I ought to confine myself to the citation of the text upon a condition so clearly, so positively expressed in a special clause of a treaty of cession, of which all the conditions together, and each of them in particular, are equally obligatory and necessary to the validity of a contract. I have not had the honor of being informed of the measures which the Federal Government has taken to enforce, in this point, the execution of the treaty of cession, agreeably to the obligations contracted by the treaty itself, notwithstanding every law to the contrary. This care of protection belongs to the power which has made the engagement. As regards the King's legation, I have done what was its duty, for the preservation of rights, by demanding that these measures should be taken, and by prescribing to his Majesty's consul at New Orleans, who expected an answer, to protest against every exaction which might be made by the custom-house from French vessels beyond what is received from ships belonging to the most favored nations; but not to go on, if his protest remain without effect, till it had been referred to the authority which signs and maintains the treaties. In this I have only conformed to the instructions formerly addressed in a similar case concerning the same 8th article of the treaty of cession of Louisiana."

"I have, in this letter, confined myself to that subject which, from the present situation of the commercial relations of the two countries, requires the most immediate attention. But I must at once state that, having no other knowledge of the difficulties in the execution of the 8th article of the Louisiana convention than what is derived from your excellency, and having received no communication whatever on that subject from my Government, it is not in my power to discuss it at this time."

Extract of a letter (No. 24) from Mr. Adams to Mr. Gallatin, dated August 24, 1820.

"I had the honor of receiving, yesterday, your despatches, Nos. 148, 149 and 150, with their inclosures. The preceding numbers had been received before. The last of your letters being dated the 6th of July, I am in hopes that Mr. Hyde de Neuville, who sailed from Annapolis on the 1st or 2d of June, must have arrived in France within a very few days afterwards. He was the bearer of my letter to you, (No. 20,) and, by his personal observation, was aware of the friendly disposition towards France with which the act of Congress of the 15th of May was passed. The President will much regret the circumstance if it should be viewed by the French Government with a different spirit. The duty of 100 francs per ton upon American vessels, if laid, will probably not have very extensive effects, shipments to France in American vessels having already in a great measure ceased.

"It is sincerely hoped by the President that this counteracting and countervailing system will give way to the disposition for an amicable arrangement, in a conciliatory spirit, and with a view to the interests of both parties.

"The temper which has been manifested in France, not only on this occasion, but in relation to all the just claims of citizens of the United States upon the French Government, could not possibly terminate without coming to a crisis; and, at the same time that a positive rejection of the most indisputable demands of our citizens for indemnity was returned for answer to every note which you presented in their behalf, upon the untenable pretence that the Government of the Bourbons cannot be responsible for the outrages of its immediate predecessors, claims equally untenable were advanced, and reiterated with the most tenacious perseverance, of privileges, contrary to our Constitution, in the ports of Louisiana, founded on an inadmissible construction of an article in the treaty for the cession of Louisiana.

"If the construction contended for of that article by France were even correct, how can the present Government claim any advantage from a compact made with Napoleon, after an explicit declaration that they hold themselves absolved from all obligations of indemnities due to the United States and their citizens for his acts? I mention this now, because Mr. Roth informs me that he has directed the French consul at New Orleans to protest against the execution of the act of the 15th of May, 1820, specially in the ports of Louisiana. There was a long and elaborate note from Mr. de Neuville on this subject, to which a distinct and explicit answer was given by me. That minister replied; but as there was nothing new in the shape of argument in his second note, a second answer from me was postponed merely for the purpose of avoiding altercation, where it could be no possible object to us to have the last word. The pretence is, that, by the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty, French vessels are to be forever treated in that province on the footing of the most favored nation; and, on the strength of this, they claim to be admitted there paying no higher duties than English vessels. Our answer is, that English vessels pay there no higher or other duties than our own; not by favor, but by bargain. England gives us an equivalent for this privilege; and a merchant might as well claim of another, on the score of equal favor, that he should give a bag of cotton or a hogshead of tobacco to him, because he had sold the same articles to a third, as France can claim as a gratuitous favor to her that which has been granted for valuable consideration to Great Britain. The claim to which we admit that France is entitled under that article is to the same privilege enjoyed by England, upon her allowing the same equivalent. That is completely and exclusively our treatment of the most favored nation, and to that we are not only willing but desirous of admitting France. But even to that she can have no pretence while she refuses to be responsible for the deeds of Napoleon. If she claims the benefit of his treaties, she must recognize the obligation of his duties and discharge them."

Extract of a letter (No. 161) from Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Adams, dated September 19, 1820.

"On the 12th instant Mr. Pasquier invited me to a conference for the same day, in which, to my great astonishment, he stated that the King's Government considered the discussion of the eighth article of the treaty of the 30th of April, 1803, as inseparable from that of the discriminating duties, since France claimed under that article an exemption in Louisiana from our new tonnage duty, and generally from all those to the payment of which any other nation was not liable. I expressed my surprise at this determination, which, since I was not instructed on that subject, must, for the present, put an end to the negotiation. I said that what rendered it more extraordinary that a question which had heretofore been treated apart from all others should now be made an obstacle to the adjustment of other difficulties affecting all the commercial relations of the two countries was the silence which had at first been preserved by France on that point. The first convention between the United States and Great Britain, made in pursuance of the act of Congress of March, 1815, and by which the discriminating duties were reciprocally abolished on both sides, would have expired in 1819. It was renewed for ten years in the year 1818, without our Government having had any notice of this claim on the part of France, although the first convention had then been in force for more than two years and a half. I added, that if, according to my former suggestion, the negotiation should be now transferred to Washington, I thought it my duty to express my conviction that the Government of the United States would certainly consider the construction of the article for which France contended as altogether inadmissible. Mr. Pasquier accounted for the delay in claiming the privileges to which France thought herself entitled, by the peculiar situation in which she was placed during the period to which I alluded, and which had prevented her Government from attending to any other than her internal affairs or her European concerns. As he intimated that the determination not to separate the discussion of the article in question from that of discriminating duties was taken, I requested him to communicate it in writing, by answering my letter of the 15th of August. This he promised to do, and I have the honor to inclose copies of the letter which he accordingly wrote to me on the 13th, and of my answer of the 15th instant. You will perceive that the object of this answer is to impress on his Government the necessity of desisting from this preposterous claim, if they intend to bring the negotiation to a favorable result, either here or at Washington.

"Mr. Hyde de Neuville called on me on the evening of the 15th, and expressed his regret that I had not succeeded in concluding, at least, a provisional arrangement, and the reluctance he felt to be obliged to leave France at this time. I told him that he must be sensible that the failure could not be ascribed to me. Whatever might be my view of the subject, however disposed to listen to the arguments which might be adduced by the French Government, it was evident that a discussion of the 8th article was useless, since it was evident that I could not, without special instructions, accede to the construction assumed by France. It was, therefore, equally fair, and calculated to avoid unnecessary delays, to have declared at once, what was the fact, that, not being instructed on the subject, I could not discuss it. I would add, that this was the only reason why I had avoided the discussion, that the pretension set up by his Government appeared to me altogether untenable, and that little more seemed necessary to repel it than merely to state the question. This led to a desultory conversation on the nature of that claim, of which I will attempt to give the substance, although I am aware that I may not have fully understood his reasoning, and that, having already discussed the question with him, it must be more familiar to you than to me.

"Mr. de Neuville's arguments appeared to me to be drawn less from the natural and obvious meaning of the article than from collateral circumstances. He appealed to the intentions of the negotiators of the treaty of 1803, which he considered as susceptible of proof, and said that the condition stipulated in the 8th article was the essential compensation made to France, and, in fact, the real price paid by the United States for Louisiana; and that the eighty millions of francs were but an accessory. He mentioned the insertion in some other treaty of expressions limiting a similar provision to the sense for which we contended, and insisted that their omission in the article in question was fatal to our construction of it. He alluded to a supposed inconsistency of the article with the Constitution of the United States, which, if it rendered it impossible for us to comply with that provision of the treaty, made it necessary that we should, in lieu of it, make some other concession or compensation acceptable to France.

"This last argument was not perfectly intelligible to me, and it might have been inferred from it that the claim was set up only for the purpose of obtaining concessions in other respects. I observed, that any difficulty arising from a supposed inconsistency between our Constitution and the Louisiana treaty was a concern of our own; that I did not perceive any, as the Constitution of the United States became applicable to Louisiana, subject to any exception to be found in the instrument by which we had acquired that territory; and that, in point of fact, the 7th article of the treaty had, during twelve years, been carried into effect without any difficulty, although it gave to France and Spain privileges at New Orleans which they enjoyed in no other port of the United States. We could not at this time make a new treaty to that effect. I saw nothing that prevented the execution of that of 1803, according to its strict construction, which the United States could not at present, even if they were so disposed, enlarge in favor of France.

"Being unacquainted with the facts from which Mr. Hyde de Neuville inferred the intentions of the negotiators, I could form no opinion on that point; but I insisted that, whatever they might have been, it was not by these that the treaty must be construed; and that the two nations were bound by the expressions, and only by the expressions, used in the several articles, such as they had been ratified by the supreme authorities on both sides. As to any explanatory words which might have been used in some other treaty, whatever their effect might be on that treaty, their omission could not alter the obvious meaning of the 8th article of that by which the United States had acquired Louisiana; and the only question was, what was that meaning? The article simply provided that French vessels should forever be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports of Louisiana. Now, there were not, properly speaking, any most favored nations in the United States.

"Congress had, by a general law, proposed to all the nations with whom they had any commerce a mutual repeal of the discriminating duties. Every nation might have accepted that proposal, and it was in the power of France to avail herself of it whenever she pleased.

"The plan had been carried into effect with several powers, either by treaty stipulations, as was the case with Great Britain and Sweden, or only by an understanding, or mere municipal regulations, as in the case of the Netherlands and of the free towns of Germany. In every case the repeal was mutual, and the consequence of the general offer made by the United States. In every case the vessels of the nation which France now considered as more favored than herself were put in all the ports of the United States, including those of Louisiana, on the same footing as American vessels, on the express and reciprocal condition that American vessels should, in the ports of that nation, be treated on the same footing as indigenous vessels. What France claimed was, to enjoy the privilege without fulfilling the condition on which it was granted; that her vessels should be treated in Louisiana on the same footing as American vessels, whilst American vessels coming from Louisiana should, in her ports, continue to be subject to any discriminating duties she might be pleased to impose. She asked, in fact, to be treated, not as favorably, but more favorably than the nations she called most favored. The stipulation to place a country on the footing of the most favored nations necessarily meant that if a privilege was granted to a third nation for an equivalent, that equivalent must be given by the country which claimed the same privilege by virtue of such stipulation. A different construction implied a contradiction with the terms of the stipulation.

"It was true, I allowed, that there were cases in which a difficulty might arise; that is to say, if a privilege was granted by the United States to a third nation, in exchange for some favor or equivalent of a different nature from the privilege granted, and which France could specifically give. But this was not the present case. Not only France could give the equivalent, but this equivalent was of the same nature with the privilege granted, and both were so intimately connected that one could not be separated from the other. The moment an American vessel should cease to be treated in the ports of Great Britain or of the Netherlands as a British or Dutch vessel, the British or Dutch vessels, as the case might be, would at once cease to be treated as American vessels in the ports of the United States. I have found, since my conversation with Mr. Hyde de Neuville, that the treaty to which he alluded was that of commerce between the United States and France of the 6th of February, 1778; by the second article of which, it is agreed that neither of the contracting parties shall grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect of commerce and navigation, which shall not become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same favor gratuitously if the concession was gratuitous, or on allowing the same compensation if the concession was conditional. These last words, inserted for greater caution, define what was meant by that stipulation; and if any inference was to be drawn from them, it would be, that the two nations had in their first treaty thought proper to state explicitly what they intended by the clause, of being placed on the footing of other (or most favored) nations; and that this explanation having once been given, the same construction must ever after be given to clauses of a similar nature, without its being necessary to repeat these explanatory words. And they have been accordingly omitted in every subsequent commercial arrangement between the two countries, as well in the 6th article of the convention of the 30th of September, 1800, as in the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty. But these words are mere surplusage. The clause would have precisely the same meaning without as with them; and their omission in an article of a subsequent treaty cannot, as I had observed to Mr. de Neuville, alter the only construction of which that article is susceptible.

"In answer to the objection that the article would, according to our construction, be of no value to France, I answered generally that it would fulfil its avowed object, which was to enable her to trade at all times to New Orleans on terms not more but as advantageous as any other nation. It might be our interest to agree to a mutual repeal of discriminating duties, or to any other mutual commercial privilege with England or some other nation, and not with France; but if we had made such an agreement, France had a right, on fulfilling the reciprocal condition, to claim the same privilege in Louisiana, however inconvenient that might be to us. We might be compelled, by an unsuccessful war, or induced by political considerations, to grant some gratuitous favor to a third nation; and France would, in that case, immediately participate gratuitously in Louisiana in the same favor, although we had no motive for granting it to her. The article did confer substantial and permanent advantages on her, without recurring to the construction for which she contended."

PARIS, September 13, 1820.

SIR: I have submitted to the King the letter which you did me the honor to write to me on the fifteenth of last month, in answer to my note of the thirty-first of the month preceding. I have since recounted to his Majesty the conference which I had with you upon the object of that correspondence. His Majesty being informed, sir, of the impossibility of your entering upon an explanation of the difficulty which exists in America relative to the execution of the eighth article of the treaty of the 30th of April, 1803, and judging that the settlement of that difficulty cannot be separated from the negotiation of an arrangement of the respective navigation of the two States, considering that the article above mentioned secures special advantages to the French flag in the ports of Louisiana, is resolved to send, with the greatest possible promptitude, to America, his minister, to be near the Federal Government. He has thought—and his opinion in that has been in accordance with your own—that it was a means of accelerating the negotiation; a thing the more desirable because the present state can only, by being prolonged, be injurious to the well known interests of both countries.

I regret, sir, that this circumstance deprives me of the advantage of pursuing, directly, with you, an affair of that importance in which I am happy to believe that your superior information and your spirit of conciliation would have afforded all desirable facilities.

Accept the assurances of the high consideration with which I have the honor to be, sir, your most humble and most obedient servant.

PARIS, September 15, 1820.

SIR: I had the honor to receive your excellency's letter of the 13th instant, by which you inform me that, since I am without instructions respecting the 8th article of the treaty of the 30th of April, 1803, it has been determined that his Majesty's minister to the United States should depart as soon as possible for America.

Although I believe that a transfer of the negotiation to America may, under existing circumstances, accelerate a definitive result, your excellency will be pleased to recollect that, so far from having in any manner countenanced an expectation that the Government of the United States would accede to the construction put by that of France on the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty, I have expressed a contrary opinion.

I have not been led to that conclusion merely because I consider that construction as altogether untenable. Your excellency has informed me that the subject had already been discussed, in writing, at Washington, between his Majesty's minister and the Secretary of State of the United States, who had argued against the construction contended for in France.

Notwithstanding this discussion, the Secretary of State has not even alluded to that subject in the instructions which he has subsequently given to me in relation to an arrangement of the commercial relations of the two countries, and to an adjustment of the difficulties which have arisen in that respect. I am thence irresistibly led to infer that, after a thorough investigation, the view taken of the article by the Government of the United States essentially differs from that in which it is considered by his Majesty's Government.

These observations were necessary, on account of my own responsibility; but I pray your excellency to ascribe them principally to my earnest desire that the negotiation in which I have not been fortunate enough to succeed may, at Washington, be attended with a favorable result.

I request your excellency to accept, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Extract of a letter (No. 163) from Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Adams, dated October 19, 1820.

"From conversations with him (Mr. de Neuville) and with the Duke of Richelieu, I am induced to believe that this Government refused to separate in the negotiation the question relative to the Louisiana treaty from that of discriminating duties, less with a view to insist on their construction of the treaty than from the hope that the United States would make concessions in some other respect, in order to obtain from France a relinquishment of her pretensions under the article in question."

Extract of a letter (No. 164) from Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Adams, dated October 23, 1820.

"I had the honor, on the 20th instant, to receive your despatch No. 24, and addressed, on the 22d, to Mr. Pasquier, the letter of which a copy is inclosed. Its object—Mr. Hyde de Neuville not having left Paris—was to induce this Government to give him rational instructions. I had, the same evening, a short conversation with Mr. Pasquier, in which he used conciliatory language, but said that it appeared absolutely necessary to have some explanation on the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty, and drew a distinction between our old discriminating and our new tonnage duty, with reference to the privileges granted to France by that article. I have thought, upon reflection, that there might have been some foundation for that distinction, so far at least as our new tonnage duty exceeded that which it was intended to countervail. But the objection was not at all made on the receipt of the act of Congress. It was thought more eligible to retaliate than to discuss; and France, after having laid her one hundred francs duty, has at least now no right to complain.

"Mr. de Neuville called on me since the receipt of your despatch. Nothing very interesting occurred in the course of the conversation. I discovered, however, that when he had spoken of the privileges granted to France by the Louisiana treaty as being inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, he alluded to an argument which you had used. I cannot help thinking that there has been in that respect some misconception on his part. It is very clear that the United States could not make, now that Louisiana is a State, a treaty containing conditions similar to those in question; but I do not perceive that the Constitution prevented them from acquiring on those terms Louisiana, when a foreign colony; still less that they could, without a compensation, be relieved from any obligation on the ground that the Constitution did not permit its performance. In your despatch to me you consider as contrary to our Constitution those privileges only claimed by France, which are founded on an inadmissible construction of the treaty. And the only argument which, it seems to me, can be drawn from the Constitution is, that the article must remain as it is, and that the Government of the United States cannot, even if so disposed, give to it a more extensive construction in favor of France than its literal and natural sense will admit."

PARIS, October 22, 1820.

SIR: I had the honor, in my letter of the 15th of September last, to state to your excellency the reasons which induced me to believe that the view taken by my Government of the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty essentially differed from that in which it seems to have been considered by his Majesty's Government. A despatch lately received from the Department of State at Washington leaves no doubt on that point.

The Secretary of State alludes in it to the correspondence between him and Mr. Hyde de Neuville—not for the purpose of giving me any instruction in that respect, for he does not seem to have presumed that this subject would be blended with that of the discriminating duties, or be discussed here—but in reference to a protest intended to be made by his Majesty's consul at New Orleans against the execution of the act of Congress of the 15th of May last. And he informs me, in the most explicit terms, that the construction put on the article in question by Mr. Hyde de Neuville is considered as inadmissible by the Government of the United States.

I have thought it my duty to make this communication to your excellency, because it thence appears extremely improbable that those difficulties which have produced a state of things so injurious to the commercial relations of the two countries can be adjusted at Washington, if his Majesty's Government shall insist on not separating that subject from the discussion of the article in question, and shall adhere to that construction of the article which had heretofore been contended for.

I request your excellency to accept, &c.

"You will have seen by my despatch (No. 164) that I had an opportunity, before Mr. de Neuville's final departure, to make use of your letters relating to the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty, and that this Government ought not to entertain any expectation of obtaining any concessions on our part in that respect."

Extract of a letter from Baron de Neuville to Mr. Adams, dated February 23, 1821.

"As I am solicitous to accelerate as much as possible the progress of the negotiation, I now take the liberty of requesting an answer to the letter which I had the honor of addressing to your Department on the 16th of June, 1818, relative to the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty. Should the Federal Government admit the interpretation given to this article on the part of France, it would be unnecessary to discuss the subject any further; but if, after a thorough investigation, it should still adhere to a contrary opinion, you will think with me, sir, that it is material to both parties to know how far they disagree on this very important article of the treaty. Both Governments having the same honest intentions, every point in dispute ought to be easily and speedily settled. What I ask, sir, even in its most limited sense, is the right secured to France by the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty, and in what cases is our navigation to obtain its enjoyment. It would appear to me that the negotiators on either part had but one and the same object in inserting the seventh and eighth articles, which express intention was to secure forever to French vessels in the ports of the ceded territory a real advantage over those of all other nations, and in my opinion the very expressions of the article establish in the most positive terms that intention of the negotiators."

"In a conversation with one of the ministers, whom I have reason to believe to be desirous that an arrangement should take place, he suggested a prolongation for a limited time of the privileges which had, by the Louisiana treaty, been secured during twelve years to the French commerce in that quarter, as a substitute to the provision which allows permanent advantages to it, and as a mode of conciliating the difference of opinion of the two Governments on that subject. Another person of great respectability, and very friendly to the United States, alluded to the necessity of some concession on our part, which might enable this Government to come to an arrangement without abandoning altogether the ground they had taken."

No. 15.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 29, 1821.

SIR: By the 7th article of the treaty of April 30, 1803, by which Louisiana was ceded to the United States, certain special privileges within the ports of the ceded territory were stipulated in favor of the ships of France and Spain for the term of twelve years; and by the eighth article of the same treaty it is further provided, that "in future and forever after the expiration of the twelve years, the ships of France shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports above mentioned."

In your note of December 15, 1817, you demanded, upon the allegation of this article, that the advantages conceded to the English nation in all the ports of the Union should be secured to France in those of Louisiana. The citation of the words of the article would of itself be an answer to the claim. The stipulation of the eighth article is in its terms limited to grants of favors in the ports of Louisiana. The seventh article had secured to French and Spanish vessels in those ports peculiar privileges, to the exclusion of the vessels of other nations; and the object of the eighth article was evidently to provide that, after the expiration of those twelve years, no such peculiar privileges should be granted in the same ports to the vessels of any other nation, to the exclusion of those of France. The whole scope of both the articles is, by their letter and spirit, limited to special favors and privileges granted in those particular ports.

The claim of France, therefore, is not, and cannot be, by any construction of the eighth article, to enjoy in the ports of Louisiana the advantages conceded to any other nation in all the ports of the Union, but only that the ships of France should be entitled to the special advantages conceded to the ships of other nations in the ports of Louisiana.

Were, it then, even true that the English or any other nation enjoyed, by virtue of general stipulations of treaties, advantages in all the ports of this Union over other nations, inasmuch as they would not be favors specially limited to the ports of Louisiana, or granted with any special reference to them, they could neither by the letter nor the spirit of the Louisiana treaty give to France any just claim to the special participation in those particular ports of advantages there enjoyed only by general arrangements co-extensive with the whole Union.

But in the answer from this Department of December 23, 1817, to the note of Mr. de Neuville, of the 15th of that month, it was averred, and it is now repeated, that the ships of France are, and, since the expiration of the twelve years stipulated by the seventh article of the treaty, uniformly have been, treated upon the same footing of the most favored nation in the ports of Louisiana. That they will continue to be so France may be assured, not only from that sacred regard for the obligation of treaties, which is the undeviating principle of the American Government, but from a maxim founded in that justice which is at once the highest glory and the soundest policy of nations, that every favor granted to one ought equally to be extended to all.

It is no exception, but an exemplification of this principle, that the vessels of England, Prussia, the Netherlands, and the Hanseatic cities, pay in the ports of this Union, including those of Louisiana, no other or higher duties than the vessels of the United States. This is not a favor, but a bargain. It was offered to all nations by an act of Congress of March 3, 1815. Its only condition was reciprocity. It was always, and yet is, in the power of France to secure this advantage to her vessels. It always depended upon her will alone to abolish every discriminating duty operating against her ships in the United States. Great Britain, Prussia, the Netherlands, the Hanseatic cities, accepted the proffer and granted the equivalent. Had France seen fit also to accept it, the American Government would have hailed the acceptance, not as a favor, but as equal justice. They were far from anticipating that, instead of this, France would found, upon equal reciprocity offered to all mankind, a claim to special privileges never granted to any. Special, indeed, would be the favor which should yield to a claim of free gift to one, of that which has been sold at a fair price to another.

English vessels, therefore, enjoy in the ports of Louisiana no favors which are not equally enjoyed by the vessels of France, nor do they enjoy any reduction of duties which French vessels might not, at the option of their own Government, have enjoyed at any time since the 3d of March, 1815. That France did not think proper to accept the offer is not mentioned with a view to reproach. France consulted what she thought to be her own interest, and, instead of reciprocity, aggravated discriminating duties to prohibition. She exercised her rights. But if, in levying those prohibitory duties, there was disfavor to the United States, surely as little can it be alleged that the extension of reciprocal advantages to all is a grant to any one of a favor.

It is observed in the reply of Mr. de Neuville, dated June 18, 1818, to the letter from this Department of the 23d of December preceding, that France, by claiming forever in the ports of Louisiana the full enjoyment of every advantage enjoyed by any other nation, in all the ports of the Union, as the price of equivalent advantages secured to the United States, still claims nothing gratuitous, inasmuch as the equivalent for this special advantage to France was already paid in the cession of Louisiana itself. This idea is not only contradicted by the whole tenor of the Louisiana treaty and by the special and obvious purport of the seventh and eighth articles, but I hesitate not to aver that if the American Government had believed those articles to be susceptible of such a construction, and had those articles alone been presented to them as the whole price of the cession of Louisiana, they never would have accepted it upon such terms. For such terms would not only have destroyed the effect of the cession of the province in full sovereignty; they would not only have been in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States, but they would have been a surrender of one of the highest attributes of the sovereignty of this whole nation. They would have disabled this nation forever from contracting with any power on earth but France for any advantage in navigation, however great, and however amply compensated. It would have been little short of a stipulation never to conclude a commercial treaty with any other nation than France. For what else are commercial treaties than the mutual concession of advantages for equivalents? And if every advantage obtained from others for equivalents were, by a retrospective obligation of this article, to be secured as already paid for by France, they would have been secured to her not only in the ports of Louisiana but in those of the whole Union. Such a treaty, far from being an acquisition of the full sovereignty of Louisiana, would have been on the part of the United States a formal abdication of their own.

From the obvious purport of the seventh and eighth articles, it is apparent that neither of them was considered in any respect as forming a part of the equivalent for the cession of Louisiana. The cession of Louisiana, and the equivalents paid for it, were not even included in the same treaty. The cession was in one treaty, and the equivalents in two separate conventions of the same date. The seventh and eighth articles referred to are in the treaty of cession, and not in the conventions of equivalents. The three instruments are, indeed, explicitly declared to be parts of one and the same transaction; but the very form of the arrangements adopted by the parties shows their common intention to regulate the cession by one compact, and the equivalents given for it by others.

Nor is the proof that these articles formed no part, in the estimation of either of the parties, of the equivalents for the cession confined to this tacit evidence in the forms of the negotiation. The seventh article bears upon its face the avowal of the motives by which it was dictated. Its introductory words are: "As it is reciprocally advantageous to the commerce of France and the United States to encourage the communication of both nations for a limited time in the country ceded by the present treaty until general arrangements relative to the commerce of both nations may be agreed on." This is the motive specially assigned by the article itself for its subsequent stipulations. The reciprocal advantage to the commerce of France and the United States was the end; the encouragement of their communications for a limited time in the country ceded were the means. And the eighth article, following as a corollary from the seventh, merely stipulated that, after the twelve years of special and exclusive privilege, the ships of France should be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations. In neither of the articles can a single word be found importing that they were understood by either party as forming any portion of the equivalent for the cession.

In the note of Mr. Hyde de Neuville, of the 16th of June, 1818, this claim of France to enjoy for nothing and forever, in the ports of Louisiana, every advantage which the United States may concede for a full equivalent to any other nation in all the ports of the Union is supported by a supposed peculiarity in the phraseology of the article by virtue of which it is claimed. To support this pretension, it is asserted that "in all the treaties between France and the United States the condition of reciprocity is mentioned in the most formal manner; that they all expressly say that the two contracting parties shall reciprocally enjoy the favor granted to another nation gratuitously, if the concession is gratuitous, or by granting the same compensation, if the concession is conditional."

The mutual stipulations of being treated as the most favored nation is not, in all the treaties between France and the United States, accompanied by the express declaration that the favor granted to a third party shall be extended to France or the United States gratuitously, if the grant is gratuitous, and upon granting the same compensation, if it be conditional. This explanatory clause is expressed in terms only in one treaty between the United States and France, and that was the first treaty ever contracted between them, namely, the treaty of amity and commerce of February 6, 1778, in its second article. It has never been repeated in any of the subsequent treaties between the parties. It was alluded to, adopted, and applied to consular pre-eminences, powers, authorities, and privileges, by the 15th article of the consular convention of November 14, 1788. But in vain will any such clause be sought for in the convention of September 30, 1800, the words of the 6th article of which are as follows: "Commerce between the parties shall be free. The vessels of the two nations, and their privateers as well as their prizes, shall be treated in their respective ports as those of the nation the most favored, and, in general, the two parties shall enjoy, in the ports of each other, in regard to commerce and navigation, the privileges of the most favored nation." There is not a word in this article, nor in the whole convention, saying that these favors shall be enjoyed freely, if freely granted to others, or upon granting the same condition, if conditionally granted; yet who can doubt that this was implied in the article, though not expressed?

The fact, then, in regard to this argument, being directly the reverse of the statement in the note of Mr. de Neuville, of June 16, 1818, it cannot escape his attention how forcibly the argument recoils upon itself. If, from the uniform use of the explanatory clause in all the preceding treaties stated in the note as a fact, its omission in the Louisiana treaty could have warranted the inference that no such qualification was intended by it, with much stronger reason may it be concluded that, as the parties had before repeatedly contracted the same engagement, at one time with, and at another without, the explanatory clause, but always intending the same thing, this variety in the modes of expression was considered by them as altogether immaterial, and that, whether expressed or not, no claim to a favor enjoyed by others could justly be advanced by virtue of any such stipulation, without granting the same equivalent with which the advantage had been purchased.

There is, therefore, no necessity for supposing any forgetfulness on the part of the negotiators of the treaty of cession, nor of recurring to any supposed distinction between the construction applicable to a convention of commerce and to a treaty of sale. It has been proved that neither the seventh nor eighth article was ever understood by either party as forming any part of the equivalent for the cession; that the reciprocity of the 7th article is expressed upon its face; and that the 8th, as a consequence from it, only stipulated that after the period of special privilege in those special ports should have expired, no such privilege in those particular ports should be granted to other nations without being made common to the vessels of France. If it be admitted that, in a contract of sale, nothing can be understood by implication, (sous entendu), this principle could be no less fatal to the claim of France than every other admissible rule of reason; for what implication could be more violent and unnatural than that, by a stipulation to treat the ships of France on the footing of those of the most favored nation in the ports of Louisiana, the United States had disabled themselves forever from purchasing a commercial advantage from any other nation, without granting it gratuitously to France?

That the Senate, in 1803, did not formally object to the stipulations of these 7th and 8th articles, must be ascribed to its never having entered into the imagination or conception of that body that such a claim as that now attempted to be raised from it by France was either expressed in or to be implied from them. Whether the special privileges granted for twelve years to the ships of France and Spain in those ports were compatible with the Constitution of the United States or with the other article of the treaty by which the inhabitants of the ceded territory were to be incorporated into the Union, and admitted, according to the principles of that Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, might be and was a question to the Senate in deliberating upon the treaty. It was a question of construction upon a clause of the Constitution; and that construction prevailed with which the terms of the treaty were reconcilable to it and to themselves. But whether the claim now advanced by France is reconcilable with the Constitution of the United States is no question of construction or of implication. It is directly repugnant to the express provision that the regulations of commerce and revenue in the ports of all the States of the Union shall be the same.

The admission of the State of Louisiana, in the year 1812, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever, does not impair the force of this reasoning. Although the admission of French and Spanish vessels into their ports, for a short remnant of time, upon different regulations of commerce and revenue from those prescribed in the ports of all the other States in the Union, gave them a preference not sanctioned by the Constitution, and upon which the other States might, had they thought fit, have delayed the act of admission until the expiration of the twelve years; yet, as this was a condition of which the other States might waive the benefit, for the sake of admitting Louisiana, sooner even than rigorous obligation would have required, to the full enjoyment of all the rights of American citizens, this consent of the only interested party to anticipate the maturity of the adopted child of the Union can be considered in no other light than a friendly grant in advance of that which, in the lapse of three short years, might have been claimed as of undeniable right.

The Government of the United States have fulfilled, and will fulfil, the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty according to its plain and obvious meaning. The ships of France are and will be treated, in the ports of Louisiana, on the footing of the most favored nation. The ships of no nation enjoy any special favor in the ports of Louisiana. The ships of all nations are in the ports of Louisiana on the same footing as in the ports of all the other States in the Union. The ships of all nations in all the ports of the Union enjoy the same advantages which the nations to which they belong concede to the vessels of the United States in return. The favor and the only favor they enjoy is reciprocity. That favor the American Government extends to French vessels, and asks no better of France than to accept. But the American Government cannot grant as a gratuitous favor to France that which it has conceded for a valuable consideration to others. No such stipulation is expressed in the Louisiana treaty; no such stipulation can from all or any of its articles be justly inferred. In this, as in all their commercial relations with France, their most fondly cherished hope is mutual friendship, their most earnest desire equal reciprocity.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

No. 16.

MARCH 30, 1821.

Sir: I have received your letter dated yesterday, in answer to mine of June 16, 1818, and 23d ultimo. I shall have the honor to reply, and believe it will not be difficult for me to show that all my citations are correct. Not only all the treaties between France and this country, (those, it is well understood, which could admit of such a clause,) but even all the treaties and conventions between the United States and European Governments, or nearly all, express in positive or in equivalent terms what I have stated.

I will add, that the force of my argument would not be impaired, even admitting the sense attributed by you to the paragraph which seems to have more particularly fixed your attention. I shall return in a future note to this point of the discussion, as well as to all the others, and shall draw my best arguments from the very acts of the Federal Government, and from the opinions of the most enlightened men in the country. A better source could not be resorted to.

Allow me, sir, in the meantime, to make an observation, suggested by the following passage of your letter: "The Government of the United States have fulfilled, and will fulfil, the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty according to its plain meaning. The ships of France are and will be treated, in the ports of Louisiana, on the footing of the most favored nation." You had stated in your note of December, 1817: "It is true that the terms of the eighth article are positive and unconditional; but it will be readily perceived that the condition, though not expressed in the article, is inherent in the advantage claimed under it. If British vessels enjoyed in the ports of Louisiana any gratuitous favor, undoubtedly French vessels would, by the terms of the article, be entitled to the same."

In your letter of yesterday you say that "from a maxim founded in that justice which is at once the highest glory and the soundest policy of nations, that every favor granted to one ought equally to be extended to all."

"It is no exception, but an exemplification of this principle, that the vessels of England, Prussia, the Netherlands, and the Hanseatic Towns pay in the ports of this Union, including those of Louisiana, no other or higher duties than the vessels of the United States. This is not a favor, but a bargain." I cannot, I must confess, view those matters in the same light, nor, especially, can admit your conclusion. But even admitting that, in reality, the four instances above mentioned are mere excepted cases; allowing that England, Prussia, the Netherlands, and the Hanseatic Towns enjoy no gratuitous privilege or right in the United States; that they are not favored nations, and that, as you assert, sir, this is not a favor, but a bargain; admitting even your doctrine that gratuitous concessions alone constitute what is called a favor, whereby a nation becomes, in the ports of another, either a favored nation, or the most favored nation; allowing all this, still, how would it be possible to reconcile the interpretation which the difference between the duties now paid in the ports of Louisiana by French vessels and those paid in the same ports by the vessels of such nations as have neither convention nor treaty, nor have made any bargain with this Republic?

I am not apprised that Russians, Spaniards, Portuguese, or other nations, having none but such like relations with this country, have been made to pay a duty of eighteen dollars per ton in the ports of Louisiana; and yet this duty is frequently required of the vessels of that nation which, by virtue of an authentic instrument and of a positive contract, is entitled to be treated in future and forever in the said ports upon the footing of the most favored nation. Although nothing can be more clear or better established than the right of France, "this is not a favor, but a bargain." It was not without motive that the chargé d'affaires of his Majesty took care to observe, in his letter of the 18th of July last, that this was not the case of a favor refused, but that of a charge imposed by one party on the other.

Such a state of things, whatever may be the interpretation given to the eighth article, is so injurious to the rights of France, and so very contrary to the equity and honesty of the Federal Government, that I cannot but flatter myself that the answer now solicited to this letter, and to that of Mr. Roth of the 18th of July, will be such as to give full satisfaction on this point. And if France should not be made to enjoy immediately the right which I claim, most assuredly she cannot be denied, in the meantime, the enjoyment of that which is acknowledged.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.,

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

No. 17.

Baron de Neuville to Mr. Adams, dated May 15, 1821.

Sir: I have now the honor to answer your letter of the 29th of March last.

The terms of the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty are as follows: "In future and forever, after the expiration of the twelve years, the ships of France shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports above mentioned;" meaning the ports of the territory ceded by France, Louisiana. It evidently results from the terms of this article that the French nation is to be treated, in future and forever after, upon the footing of the most favored nations, not in all the ports of the United States, but in those of Louisiana.

But what is meant, what can be understood, by the terms being treated upon the footing of the most favored nations?

Is there but one way of obtaining the right to be so treated? or, may it be held by more than one title? Upon consulting the various treaties made between different nations, and particularly those which the United States have entered into with European powers, I find in almost all of them a definition of what is meant by being treated upon the footing of the most favored nations, and these definitions are so precise that I do not see how any controversy can arise on that point. In most cases relating to the rights and privileges of the most favored nations, the parties even go on to explain that the favor shall be free, if freely granted to another nation; or upon granting the same compensation if the concession be conditional; from which I conclude that the right to be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations may be enjoyed in two ways, either gratuitously or conditionally.

You, moreover, appear to me, sir, to admit this very material point; you even declare (and in this opinion I may readily acquiesce, I have at least no interest in opposing it) that it is not necessary that the terms gratuitously or conditionally be expressed in the agreement; meaning, I suppose, where the condition of reciprocity is stipulated. Alluding to the convention of the 30th of September, 1800, you say: "There is not a word in the whole convention saying that these favors shall be enjoyed freely, if freely granted, or upon granting the same condition, if conditionally granted. Yet, who can doubt that this was implied in the article, though not expressed?" The article does, in my opinion, contain what I attributed to it, if not in express at least in equivalent terms; but let us examine what you have stated in your answer. In the article it is expressly said that the two parties shall reciprocally enjoy, each in the ports of the other, as far as regards commerce and navigation, the privileges of the most favored nations. It goes no further; it gives an explanation as to gratuitous or conditional favors, and perhaps it was unnecessary here. Yet, do you add, who can doubt that this was implied in the article, though not expressed? This admission determines the first point, viz: that there are two modes of being treated upon the footing of the most favored nations; and that the rights resulting therefrom may be enjoyed either freely, if freely granted, or conditionally, if granted upon condition to other nations.

We shall soon have to examine whether France has or has not, from the very nature of the contract of 1803, a right to be treated in the ports of Louisiana upon the footing of the most favored nations, unconditionally, and without further compensation on her part. This second question is of no less importance; but I think it right to detach it from that which now engages my attention, and the solution of which must precede all further discussion. Permit me, sir, here to suggest an observation which has struck me as being very forcible. If France, by virtue of the treaty of 1803, which secured her the rights and privileges of the most favored nations, has had a right to enjoy every favor freely, if freely granted to other nations, or upon granting the same condition, if conditionally granted, upon what principle, after the treaty of 1803, which secures the same treatment in a still more solemn manner, should she be reduced to the enjoyment of only such favors as are granted freely to other nations? If British vessels enjoyed in the ports of Louisiana any gratuitous favor, undoubtedly French vessels would, by the terms of the article, be entitled to the same." It appears to me that, after your explanation just above cited, it would be equally allowable to say, "if British vessels enjoyed in the ports of Louisiana any conditional favor, undoubtedly French vessels would, by the terms of the article, be entitled to the same."

Thus, sir, I hope you will admit, with me, the first question to be sufficiently settled. France is to enjoy, in future and forever, in the ports of the territory ceded by her, the privileges of the most favored nations; and as the treatment or favor which a nation may receive is either free or conditional, it follows that France has a right to be treated in Louisiana upon the footing of the most favored nation, either freely or conditionally, unless it be proved that her contract is to form an exception; that she has already paid for the privilege which she claims, and has, therefore, a right to be treated, without further compensation, upon the footing of the most favored nation. This, sir, is what I think I can easily prove.

In the meantime, it is evident not only that French vessels do not enjoy in the ports of Louisiana the privileges reserved by France, but that they are even deprived of those which cannot be disputed.

I have already shown that, far from being treated upon the footing of the most favored nations, France at this time is of all nations that which is most unfavorably treated in Louisiana, which forms a striking contrast with the precise stipulations of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty.

But what nations are (comparatively with France) treated upon the most favored footing in the ports of Louisiana? All those, I answer, which enjoy in the said ports, whether freely or conditionally, by virtue of treaties or without stipulation to that effect, any rights, favors, or privileges denied to France. Hence, as it so happens at this time that vessels of four different nations pay in the ports of Louisiana no other or higher duties than those paid by American vessels, I have surely a right to claim the same advantage for our navigation by virtue of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty.

You will observe, sir, that I do not speak of all the ports of the United States. Finding this last phrase repeated several times, and underlined in your letter of the 29th, I have some fear not to have been rightly understood, or rather not to have used expressions sufficiently distinct. France has nothing to ask, she claims nothing, in all the ports of the United States. She has not to examine whether any or several nations indiscriminately enjoy in these any rights or privileges, nor on what conditions such rights or privileges may have been granted. But as the ports of Louisiana are of the number of all the ports of the United States, and as France has a right to be treated in those upon the footing of the most favored nations, she claims that right as soon as it is found that the vessels of any other nation are treated there more favorably than hers. But I find, sir, in your letter: "Were it even true that the English or any other nation enjoyed, by virtue of general stipulations of treaties, advantages in all the ports of this Union over other nations, inasmuch as they would not be favors specially limited to the ports of Louisiana, or granted with any special reference to them, they could neither by the letter nor the spirit of the Louisiana treaty give to France any just claim to the special participation in those particular ports of advantages there enjoyed only by general arrangements co-extensive with the whole Union." It seems to me that it would have been useless and even perfectly idle to make any special mention of the ports of Louisiana, in the treaties and conventions, by which certain rights, favors, or privileges are granted in all the ports of the United States, since they are comprised within the denomination of the ports of the United States. Giving the whole is giving every component part; and in such cases the general term necessarily embraces every particular denomination. Let us suppose a case. You make over to me conditionally the privilege of hunting on one of your estates, situated in a certain district; I am to enjoy this privilege if you grant it to others. Soon after, you sell or make over to one of my neighbors the privilege of hunting on all your estates you hold in the same district. It is clear that my right does not on that account extend to all your estates, but it certainly does not include that which is specified in my contract or conveyance. The favor is general for my neighbors, but as it regards me is only special; for the general term, I repeat it, necessarily embraces every particular denomination. Such matters it is not thought necessary to explain, because it is not expected that they can ever be subject to discussion. But suppose, further, that the right which I so justly claim was not even granted by you; that I held it only in my own right; suppose it to be an express reservation which I had thought it proper to make on disposing in your favor of that estate, which I had consented to sell merely to oblige you and to suit your convenience; if I yielded to your instant and pressing solicitations, if, in order to persuade me to sell this estate, you had gone so far as to offer me, not a mere conditional right of chase, but that privilege, free from all charges or conditions, to enjoy it with you to the same extent as yourself and forever; if I can prove this last assertion by your own documents, you will surely admit, sir, that this is an indisputable, sacred right, rather in the nature of property vested in me than a mere privilege over yours. This is not a favor, but a bargain.

What may now appear a mere assertion shall hereafter be proved. "You do me the honor to state," "The stipulation of the eighth article is in its terms limited to grants of favors in the ports of Louisiana. The 7th article has secured to French and Spanish vessels in those ports peculiar privileges, to the exclusion of the vessels of other nations; and the object of the 8th article was evidently to provide that, after the expiration of those twelve years, no such peculiar privileges should be granted in the same ports to the vessels of any other nation, to the exclusion of those of France; the whole scope of both articles is by their letter and spirit limited to special favors and privileges granted in those particular ports." I must confess, sir, that, so often as I have read the 8th article, I cannot discover that it evidently states that, after the expiration of those twelve years, no such peculiar privileges should be granted in the same ports to the vessels of any other nation, to the exclusion of those of France. The article states—nothing can be more clear—in future and forever, after the expiration of the twelve years, the ships of France shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports above mentioned. Nothing whatever is said about peculiar favors granted in the same ports to the vessels of any other nation; why, then, should we attribute to the article what it does not contain—I will add, what it could not express? And this I shall now proceed to prove. When France disposed of Louisiana, she certainly was entitled to reserve any rights whatever in that province, whether special, gratuitous, limited, or unconditional; she sold her own property, and had a right to fix its price, as the other party was free to accept or to decline the offer. The express reservation made by her in the first place for twelve years, and then, on condition of certain events, forever after, was no more than a part of the price of the territory ceded; and by no means a favor granted by one party and received by the other.

"This stipulation was a part of the price of the territory; it was a condition which the party ceding had a right to require, and to which we had a right to assent; the right to acquire involved the right to give the equivalent demanded." I shall have occasion to revert to this opinion of one of the most distinguished men of the country, and which is so much in point. But to proceed with my argument: it is easy to conceive that France was entitled, when disposing of her property, to reserve such rights as she pleased, with or without reciprocity, for a limited time or forever; "this was a part of the price of the territory;" but if, as you observe, sir, there is an express provision in the Constitution that the regulations of commerce and revenue in the ports of all the States of the Union shall be the same, it evidently follows that no nation can acquire by treaty or commercial convention, in the ports of Louisiana alone, the advantage which France enjoys there by special title, by virtue of a bargain and sale; which instrument is singular from its very nature, and cannot be repeated in favor of any nation, whatever may be its connexion or commercial interests with the United States, at least so far as respects the territory ceded by France. If, therefore, no other nation can acquire in the ports of Louisiana alone, whether gratuitously or conditionally, the special favor, or, to speak more correctly, the right which France has thought proper to reserve in those ports "in future and forever after," surely I am authorized to maintain, not only that the 8th article does not, but even that it could not, admit of the meaning which is attributed to it. Can it be supposed that the American negotiators had proposed to France to reserve an advantage or privilege which, according to the Federal Constitution, could never be realized? To give such an interpretation to this article would not be doing justice to their honesty; it surely must have some other meaning; why not then adopt that which is most natural? **We do not presume*, says Vattel, that sensible persons had nothing in view in treating together, or in forming any other serious agreement. The interpretation which renders a treaty null and without effect cannot then be admitted.

"Every clause should be interpreted in such a manner as that it may have its effect, and not be found vain and illusive.*" Let us, then, leave to the eighth article its true sense; its expressions are clear and distinct; and it is admitted that, in the interpretation of treaties, pacts, and promises, we ought not to deviate from the common use of the language;† we also know that the first general maxim is, that it is not allowable to interpret what has no need of interpretation;‡ and you allow, sir, in your letter of the 23d of December, 1817, that the terms of the eighth article are positive and unconditional. It being admitted that the terms are positive and unconditional, and since, in order to ascertain the true sense of a contract, attention ought to be paid § principally to the words of him who promises; and since, on every occasion when a person has and ought to have shown his intention, we take for true against him what he has sufficiently declared,|| what motive can there be for denying France a right established in positive and unconditional terms, more especially when the intention of the American negotiators, of those who promised, is sufficiently declared and perfectly manifest? On this subject it will soon be shown that the eighth article, which, in itself, is so precise as to require no corroboration, has, withal, by way of corollary, a document calculated to remove every possible doubt, if any could still remain. But, sir, you seem to think that the seventh and eighth articles have never been, in any respect, considered "as forming part of the equivalents for the cession of Louisiana, and that the cession was in one treaty, and the equivalents in two separate conventions of the same date;" and finally, while admitting that the three instruments form but one whole, as it is expressly declared, you add, "but the very form of the arrangements adopted by the parties shows their common intention to regulate the cession by one compact, and the equivalents given for it by others." If we are ever to deal in conjectures, why should we not say, for there would seem to be more ground for the assertion, that the 7th and 8th articles of the convention are the equivalents, and the two subsequent instruments merely accessory, and the compliment of the bargain? We shall soon find that it is quite allowable to consider as a mere accessory what you, sir, regard not only as the principal part, but even as the whole of the compensation. But let us set every commentary aside, the convention of 1803 cannot give rise to any mistake. The 7th and 8th articles established, without the least ambiguity, the nature and conditions of the rights reserved by France; the 9th article coming next, because what is most important should be settled before points of minor consequence, sufficiently shows that the two supplementary instruments are only matters of execution. They, in fact, contain calculations of banking and exchange and details of liquidation which could not well have been comprised in the convention; and it is even, moreover, fully explained that those two instruments, signed on the same day, "are to have their execution in the same manner as if they had been inserted in the principal treaty; that they be ratified in the same form, and in the same time and jointly."

The question, it appears to me, may be viewed in two different lights, and will still, in either case, equally resolve itself in favor of the claims of France. In the first place, France may be considered as having reserved certain rights of property on disposing of her sovereignty in Louisiana, and this would appear the more correct view of the case; for, strictly speaking, the 7th and 8th articles are not the equivalents of the cession according to the true sense of the treaty as understood in 1803. In the other supposition, considering the 7th and 8th articles as part of the equivalents, the rights and privileges therein secured to France will form, with the fifteen million dollars, the full and entire compensation for the territory ceded by her. The privileges secured by the 7th and 8th articles are still, in either case, a right of property of the most sacred nature.

"This is not a favor, but a bargain. This is not a free gift, but the fair price of that which has been sold." But suffer me, sir, to observe that it is entirely erroneous to suppose that neither the seventh nor eighth article was ever understood as forming a part of the equivalent for the cession." Not only it was understood they did, and was so meant by the negotiators, but one of them, Mr. Livingston, while offering to the French Government the express reservation of the rights and privileges in question, as I shall hereafter prove, went so far as to say that, by those means, France would enjoy all the advantages of the colony, without incurring the expense of maintaining it. Let us now add to Mr. Livingston's expressions the formal opinion of Mr. Randolph, and it will be no longer possible to maintain that neither the 7th nor 8th article was ever considered as forming part of the equivalent for the territory ceded by France. "I regard this stipulation only as a part of the price of the territory; it was a condition which the party ceding had a right to require, and to which we had a right to assent. The right to acquire involved the right to give the equivalent demanded."* In your letter of the 29th of March last, as well as in your note of the 23d of December, 1817, you advance that, if France could claim forever in the ports of Louisiana a privilege which could be denied to her in other ports of the United States, France would, in such case, have transferred only an imperfect sovereignty to this Republic. I have already endeavored to establish (letter of June 16, 1818,) that sovereignty should ever be distinguished from property; in support of which, I could cite many instances of transfers of a full and entire sovereignty, with the reservation of certain rights or privileges, in the nature of that which France holds in the ports of Louisiana. But the very terms of the article make it perfectly useless to discuss this point. The expression forever is sufficiently explicit. In the ports of the territory ceded, surely implies that France is entitled to the privilege claimed by her in Louisiana only, and it may therefore, at all times, be denied her in the other ports of the United States, unless some other treaty or convention should intervene. You persist, also, in believing that the right claimed by France is in contradiction with the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States, and that no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another." I could add several very plausible arguments to those which I have already made against that supposed inconsistency; I might, perhaps, also contend with some advantage against the manner in which you explain the admission of the State of Louisiana on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, in spite of the privilege which France and Spain still enjoyed in its ports. I think I should have some right to observe that, in all constitutional questions no modification is admissible, and nothing is to be assumed, except according to the forms required by the Constitution itself; that representative Governments scarcely admit of acts of mere courtesy; that they have the law alone in view, and that it is therefore to be presumed that Congress would not have emancipated, before its maturity, the adopted child of the Union, nor have given him a preference not sanctioned by the Constitution,† if, in fact, the measure could have been considered as illegal. But, sir, my Government has nothing to do with the question of constitutionality; it is, therefore, proper for me to decline discussing it, and I shall be satisfied with recalling some very respectable opinions which militate in favor of my positions, or against what is objected to them, and destroy all idea of inconsistency between the 7th and 8th articles of the Louisiana treaty and the Federal Constitution.

‡ Mr. Rodney.—"It is contended that the United States have no right to purchase territory; that they have no right to admit the people of Louisiana to a participation of the rights derived from an admission into the Union; and that a peculiar favor is about being granted to the ports of New Orleans, in violation of the Constitution. In the view of the Constitution, the Union was composed of two corporate bodies, of States and Territories. A recurrence to the Constitution will show that it is predicated on the principles of the United States acquiring territory either by war, treaty, or purchase. There was one part of that instrument within whose capacious grasp all these modes of acquisition were embraced. By the Constitution, Congress has power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States. To provide for the general welfare; the import of these terms is very comprehensive indeed. If this general delegation of authority be not at variance with other particular powers specially granted, nor restricted by them; if it be not in any degree comprehended in those subsequently delegated, I cannot," said Mr. Rodney, "perceive why, within the fair meaning of this general provision, is not included the power of increasing our territory, if necessary, for the general welfare or common defence. Suppose, for instance, that Great Britain should propose to cede to us the island of New Providence, so long the seat of pirates preying upon our commerce, and the hive from which they have swarmed; will any gentlemen say that we ought not to embrace the opportunity presented as a defence against further depredations? Suppose the Cape of Good Hope, where our East Indiamen so generally stop, were offered to be ceded to us by the nation to which it belongs, and that nation should say, on our possessing it, you shall declare it a free port: is there any member who hears me that would contend that we were not authorized to receive it, notwithstanding the great advantages it would insure to us."

"There is another sound answer to the objection of gentlemen: this is property ceded to us by the power ceding it with a particular reservation."

‡ Debate, October 25, 1803, House of Representatives.

*Mr. Smilie.—“If the prevailing opinion shall be that the inhabitants of the ceded territory cannot be admitted under the Constitution, as it now stands, the people of the United States can, if they see fit, apply a remedy by amending the Constitution so as to authorize the admission.”

*Mr. Crowninshield.—“It surely cannot be unconstitutional to receive the ships of France or Spain in the ports of the new territory, upon any terms whatever. It is a mere condition of the purchase, and this House may or may not agree to it. Being a mere commercial regulation, we have the power to give our assent or dissent to the article in question; for I hold it to be a correct doctrine that this House, by the Constitution, has the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations as well as with the Indian tribes, and that, whenever the President and Senate make a treaty involving any commercial points, our consent is absolutely necessary to carry the treaty into effect. By giving our assent, we do not injure the right of the other ports in the Atlantic States, as the privilege is extended only to ports in the ceded territory. I consider the eastern or carrying States as particularly and deeply interested in the acquisition of Louisiana. It is true, their ships already visit almost every part, but under many restrictions, and I wish to see them sailing on the Mississippi without molestation or restraint.”

“I am in favor of adopting these treaties, and they shall have my hearty support.”

*Mr. Randolph.—“The unconstitutionality of this treaty is attempted to be shown by the following quotation from that instrument: ‘No preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another State,’ &c., &c. New Orleans, therefore, will enjoy an exemption. She is, therefore, a favored port, in contradiction to the express letter of the Constitution. To me it appears that this argument has much more of ingenuity than of force in it; more of subtlety than of substance. Let us suppose that the treaty, instead of admitting French and Spanish vessels on the terms proposed, merely covenanted to admit American vessels on equal terms with those of France and Spain. If we acquired this right, divested of the country, it would have been considered, and justly, as an important privilege. Annex the territory to it, and you cannot accept it! You may, indeed, acquire either the commercial privilege or the territory without violating the Constitution, but take them both and that instrument is infringed.”

“I regard this stipulation only as a part of the price of the territory. It was a condition which the party ceding had a right to require, and to which we had a right to assent. The right to acquire involved the right to give the equivalent demanded. Mr. Randolph said that he expected to hear it said in the course of the debate that the treaty in question might clash with the treaty of London in this particular; he would, therefore, take this opportunity in remarking that the privilege granted to French and Spanish bottoms being a part of the consideration for which we had obtained the country, and the Court of London being officially apprised of the transaction, and acquiescing in the arrangement, it would ill become any member of that House to bring forward such an objection.”

†Mr. Adams.—“But it has been argued that the bill ought not to pass, because the bill itself is an unconstitutional, or, to use the words of the gentleman from Connecticut, an extra constitutional act. It is, therefore, say they, a nullity. We cannot fulfil our part of its conditions, and, on our failure in the performance of any one stipulation, France may consider herself as absolved from the obligations of the whole treaty on hers. I do not conceive it necessary to enter into the merits of the treaty at this time. The proper occasion for that discussion is past; but, allowing even that this is a case for which the Constitution has not provided, it does not, in my mind, follow that the treaty is a nullity or that its obligations either on us or on France must necessarily be cancelled. France never can have the right to come and say, I am discharged from the obligations of this treaty because your President and Senate, in ratifying it, exceeded their powers; for this would be interfering in the internal arrangements of our Government. It would be intermeddling in questions with which she has no concern, and which must be settled entirely by ourselves. The only question for France is, whether she has contracted with the department of our Government authorized to make treaties; and this being clear, her only right is to require that the conditions stipulated in our name be punctually performed. I trust they will be so performed, and will cheerfully lend my hand to every act necessary for the purpose, for I consider the object as of the highest advantage to us.”

The opinions I have just cited have so much weight that I shall not attempt to support them by further authority, and shall consider it as sufficiently established—

1. That the rights reserved by France are, in fact, properly vested in her; or, in other words, that the territory of Louisiana is a property ceded with particular reservation.

2. That if, in 1803, the Louisiana treaty was deemed unconstitutional by some of the distinguished characters of the United States, the great majority of Congress declared itself in favor of a contrary doctrine.

3. That the question of constitutionality is, and should be, foreign to France, and that her only right is to require that the conditions stipulated be punctually and faithfully performed.

The French Government desires no more, and has, therefore, I think, a right to expect that a claim so well founded will cease to be disputed.

I read in your letter, “nor is the proof that these articles formed no part, in the estimation of either of the parties, of the equivalents for the cession, confined to this tacit evidence in the forms of the negotiation. The seventh article bears upon its face the avowal of the motives by which it was dictated. Its introductory words are: ‘As it is reciprocally advantageous to the commerce of France and the United States to encourage the communication of both nations, for a limited time, in the country ceded,’ &c., &c., &c. The reciprocal advantages to the commerce of France and the United States was the end; the encouragement of their communications for a limited time in the country ceded were the means; and the eighth article, following as a corollary from the seventh,” &c., &c., &c.

I think I have already sufficiently shown that the two parties in the contract had but one and the same mode of understanding the 7th and 8th articles; but even if I had not, in support of my opinion, those already cited, and that of Mr. Livingston, which I shall soon have occasion to produce, still would my position be incontrovertibly proved by the very terms of those articles.

You cite, sir, the introductory expressions of the seventh article. Allow me to invite you to examine its conclusion, which appears to me more explicit, and leaves no doubt as to the true intention of the negotiators.

But perhaps it would be still better to cite the whole article. It speaks for itself, and sufficiently explains what induced the negotiators to fix the duration of the privilege conveyed by the seventh article, and to assign no limitation to the right of property secured by the eighth.

"As it is reciprocally advantageous to the commerce of France and the United States to encourage the communication of both nations, for a limited time, in the country ceded by the present treaty, until general arrangements relative to the commerce of both nations may be agreed on, it has been agreed between the contracting parties that the French ships coming directly from France or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce or manufactures of France or her said colonies, and the ships of Spain, coming directly from Spain or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce or manufactures of Spain or her colonies, shall be admitted, during the space of twelve years, in the ports of New Orleans, and in all other legal ports of entry within the ceded territory, in the same manner as the ships of the United States coming directly from France or Spain or any of their colonies, without being subject to any other or greater duty on merchandise, or other or greater tonnage, than those paid by the citizens of the United States. During the space of time above mentioned no other nation shall have a right to the same privileges in the ports of the ceded territory. The twelve years shall commence three months after the exchange of ratifications, if it shall take place in France, or three months after it shall have been notified at Paris to the French Government, if it shall take place in the United States. It is, however, well understood that the object of the above article is to favor the manufactures, commerce, freight, and navigation, of France and of Spain, so far as relates to the importations that the French and Spanish shall make into the said ports of the United States, without in any sort affecting the regulations that the United States may make concerning the exportation of the produce and merchandise of the United States, or any right they may have to make such regulations."

What appears most clearly deducible from the terms of this article is, that it was thought advantageous to the commerce of France and of the United States to encourage, in a very special manner, the communications of the two nations in the ports of the territory ceded; that the principal object was to favor the manufactures, the commerce, and the shipping of France and Spain. I can see no other advantage resulting from the seventh article for the United States, and it must be admitted that its stipulations are, in fact, advantageous only to France and to Spain. No reciprocity is granted to the United States either in the ports of France or in those of Spain. Their communication with France will, it is true, be more frequent, but only in the ports of the ceded territory. Perhaps the article might have been worded with more care, but, after all, it expresses no more than I have stated. If the avowed object of the article was to favor, in a special manner, not only the commerce and navigation of France, but likewise the commerce and navigation of Spain, without any reciprocal stipulation for the United States, it is easy to discern what induced the American negotiators to demand that the privilege which France was not alone to enjoy in Louisiana should be limited in its duration; more especially as, during that time, no other nation could be admitted to enjoy the same favor. But where the privilege ceased to be common to Spain, the French Government, while consenting to modify it as by the eighth article stipulated for the perpetual and unconditional enjoyment of the right of property thus reserved, the eighth article does not, as did the seventh, stipulate that other nations shall not be treated as favorably as those of France in the ports of the territory ceded by her; such a condition could be imposed but for a limited time. But it was natural that, when yielding to the solicitations of the American negotiators the French Government consented to cede Louisiana, it should secure to France the right never to be treated more unfavorably than any other nation in the ports of her former colony, whether those favors be purchased or not by such nations; that the transaction which, on the part of France, was at once a great sacrifice and a striking proof of her friendship for these United States, should not, in the end, turn to her detriment, but should, at least, secure some lasting advantage to her commerce and navigation. All this is not mere conjecture of my own; the facts are positive and clear; and every doubt must cease after attending to the following sentiments, not of the French negotiators, but of Mr. Livingston himself in the memorial addressed by him to the French Government on this question: Is it advantageous for France to take possession of Louisiana? He does not confine himself to proposing that France should reserve forever, and without reciprocity for the United States, the right stipulated in the eighth article, but even that which she subsequently held by the seventh article for twelve years only. "Does France wish," says Mr. Livingston, "to introduce more easily her productions into the western country; does she desire to accustom its inhabitants to her wines and manufactures, and to conquer the prejudices which the Americans entertain in favor of English goods, &c., &c., &c. All this can be accomplished only by the cession of New Orleans to the United States, with the reserve of the right of entry, at all times, for the ships and merchandises of France, free from all other duties than those paid by American vessels. By those means American merchants established in New Orleans will be interested in her trade; their capital, instead of being sent to England, will go to France, who will thus enjoy all the advantages of the colony, without incurring the expense requisite to support it, and the money which America, by her industry, has drawn from Spain will be restored to France, which England, not enjoying the same advantages and paying higher duties, could not furnish them at the same price." This passage of the memorial of the minister from the United States is sufficiently clear, and we shall see that he, furthermore, takes care to corroborate its evident intention. Let us continue to follow the course of his argument. "The possession of Louisiana," does he say, "is very important for France, if she draws from it the only advantage which sound policy would seem to indicate. I speak of Louisiana only, not including Florida, because I do not consider it as forming part of the territory ceded, as she may, by means of the cession, have a free trade on the Mississippi, if she knows how to avail herself of the circumstance by an understanding with the United States. She will find a market for a great variety of goods when she shall have accustomed the inhabitants of the western country to prefer them to English goods, which she can only accomplish by giving them at a lower price, and this she can obtain only by giving American merchants an interest in selling them, in employing there their capital, and by inducing the American Government to give them the preference. All this can only be accomplished by the cession of New Orleans to the United States, reserving the right of entry at all times free from all other duties than those paid by American vessels, together with the free navigation of the Mississippi. This will give her vessels the advantage over those of all other nations, and will not only retain but increase the capital of the city of New Orleans, and hence provisions for the islands will be purchased there at a lower rate, and French manufactures will be more easily introduced into the western country, which the United States will have no interest in preventing, every cause of rivalry between the two nations being completely removed. Thus will France command respect without inspiring fear to the two nations whose friendship is most important to her commerce and to the preservation of her colonies; and all these advantages will be secured without incurring the expense of establishments which ruin the public treasure and divert its capital from its true object." What! Mr. Livingston, in order to induce France to cede the territory of Louisiana, offers her more! From benevolent motives, established in the very treaty itself, she subsequently consents to accept or to reserve less, and even this shall be contested! The article which secures this to her shall be said to have no meaning, and be supposed to have expressed a mere impossibility! I will here dwell upon an idea tending to explain how such doubts could have arisen. Mr. Livingston's memorial must have been lost sight of. I shall now proceed to discuss, as briefly as possible, the error which you think you have discovered in the citation of my note of June 16, 1818. On this subject I have already observed, in my letter of the 30th March last, that even if such an error had been committed, the strength of my argument would not thereby have been impaired. But let us examine if, in fact, there be any such mistake. There are but eight treaties or contracts between France and the United States. Four of these are of such a nature as not to admit of the clause in question; in two others it is formally expressed; in another it is mentioned in equivalent terms; the last, which is the Louisiana treaty, is alone silent in that respect, and this silence furnishes of itself an irresistible argument. I was therefore right in saying that all the treaties which could admit of that clause mention expressly the condition of reciprocity. It is of no consequence that one of them should not positively use the words freely, if freely granted, or upon granting the same condition, if conditionally granted. These words are a mere accessory, irrelevant to the question, in the examination of which you have alleged my quotation to be erroneous. This question I shall now establish in its simplest form, and shall give it some extension so as better to explain my opinion. I say that in all the treaties of the United States, not only with France but with the other European nations, when mention is made therein of being treated upon the footing of the most favored nations, this condition of reciprocity is expressed, stipulating that the contracting parties shall enjoy the same privileges and advantages each in the ports of the other. One instrument alone is drawn in very different terms; it states, in future and forever after, the French nation shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports of the territory ceded by her. The clause stops here. What are we to conclude? that, in fact, there was nothing omitted, nothing implied by the negotiators, (sous entendu;) reciprocity was not due, and therefore no mention is made of it. It was not due, because the convention of 1803 had no analogy with mere commercial treaties or regulations; it was a sale, a bargain. The seventh and eighth articles are reservations of rights of property made by the vendor; a mere condition of the purchase, (Mr. Crowninshield;) a part of the price of the territory, (Mr. Randolph;) finally, because the territory of Louisiana is a property ceded with a particular reservation, (Mr. Rodney.) Were it even a commercial treaty, still, since the condition of reciprocity is not mentioned, France would have a right to maintain that she owes it not, and she could allege in her favor a very respectable opinion in the following words of Mr. Madison, (speech on the British treaty:) "The fifteenth article has another extraordinary feature which, I should imagine, must strike every observer. In other treaties which profess to put the parties on the footing of the most favored nations it is stipulated that, where new favors are granted to a particular nation in return for favors received, the party claiming the new favor shall pay the price of it. This is just and proper where the footing of the most favored nation is established at all. But this article gives to Great Britain the full benefit of all privileges that may be granted to any other nation, without requiring from her the same or equivalent privileges with those granted by such nation; hence it would happen that, if Spain, Portugal, or France should open their colonial ports to the United States, in consideration of certain privileges in our trade, the same privileges would result gratis and ipso facto to Great Britain."

But we have not even to examine this question; that which occupies our attention is quite different, since it relates to a sale, a bargain; not a favor, but a bargain.

I think, sir, I have sufficiently proved—

1st. That there are two modes of being treated upon the footing of the most favored nations, either gratuitously or conditionally.

2dly. That the ships of four nations enjoy at this time, in the United States, and, of course in the ports of Louisiana, the rights and privileges of the most favored nations.

3dly. That France, according to the terms of the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty, has a right to be put in possession of the same privileges in these said ports, being part of those of the United States.

4thly. That she owes and can owe no reciprocity, not only because no such condition is stipulated in the contract, but also because the privilege in question is a right of property reserved, or, if you prefer it so, is one of the equivalents of the bargain.

5thly. That the intention of the negotiators cannot be doubtful, since the article, which in itself requires no explanation, has, as a corollary, an authentic document which would irresistibly prove, by the very circumstances of the case, what was meant and intended, if the treaty itself had not expressed it in the most explicit terms.

I therefore hope, sir, that, after the preceding explanation, the President will be pleased to order that, in future and forever, (unless in case of subsequent arrangements to the contrary between France and the United States,) the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty receive its full and entire execution, and that, by consequence, French vessels be immediately made to enjoy, in the ports of the ceded territory, all the rights, advantages, and privileges granted to Great Britain, and to other nations, by virtue of treaties, or in any other manner.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most humble and obedient servant,

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

NOTE.—Is it likely that France can have intended to cede, for the mere consideration of the sum of fifteen millions of dollars, property which, even before the cession, was considered as having an incalculable value, which a distinguished member of Congress valued (Deb. October 25, 1803,) at more than fifty millions, and which, in a well written article of the National Intelligencer, of October 10, 1803, was esteemed to be worth six hundred millions of dollars? And it must not be said that France was ignorant of its value, since, before the cession, the American public prints took continual pains to inform her of it. I shall here cite one of these articles, signed Columbus, (National Intelligencer, September 2, 1803.) The writer complains that several of the public prints strive to take from the merit of Mr. Livingston's memorial; he expresses a fear that they should persuade France that it is contrary to her interests to cede Louisiana to this Republic. He cites the following passage of a paper published in Fredericktown, which would go to prove to the French minister in Washington that the first consul would commit an act of great folly in consenting to abandon so vast a territory.

"The democrats cannot think the first consul, Bonaparte, such a simpleton as to part with that country for any compensation we can make him." Thus, adds Columbus, it is represented that nothing in our command is enough for those objects, (Louisiana and New Orleans.)

Most certainly Bonaparte will never be regarded as a simpleton; nor will it be alleged that he had such affection for the inhabitants of these United States as to have had, in the cession of Louisiana, no other object but that of rendering them a service. Surely he must, at the same time, have thought of his own country, and have intended, by reserving certain rights and privileges in favor of France, to secure, at least, a sort of compensation for the great sacrifice to which he was subjecting her.

In whatever light this subject is viewed, the cession of Louisiana must certainly be considered as one of the most inconsiderate and fatal measures of the Usurper; but still it is not allowable to suppose that he could on this occasion have entirely lost sight of the interests of France, and have consented to give up, for the mere consideration of fifteen millions of dollars, an immense territory, which will be a never-failing source of riches and prosperity to these United States, and which, to France, would have been worth all the colonies which she now possesses or has possessed in the two hemispheres.

The following opinion is such authority that I cannot better conclude than with citing it:

"I consider the object as of the highest advantage to us; and the gentleman from Kentucky himself, who has displayed with so much eloquence the immense importance to this Union of the possession of the ceded country, cannot carry his ideas further on that subject than I do."—(Senate debates, November 3, 1803.)

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 15, 1821.

SIR: In replying to the two letters which I have had the honor of receiving from you, the one bearing date the 29th of March last, and the other the 15th of May, I find it necessary to re-state, in its simplest terms, the question in discussion between us.

The seventh and eighth articles of the treaty by which Louisiana was ceded to the United States contain two distinct but obviously connected stipulations; that of the seventh article, by which certain special privileges in the ports of the ceded territory are secured, for the term of twelve years, to the vessels of France and Spain, to the exclusion of the vessels of all other nations; and that of the eighth article, that after the expiration of this special privilege, thus limited to the ports of the ceded territory, French vessels should be forever, in the ports of the ceded territory, on the footing of the most favored nation in the same ports.

Upon the terms of this article, by your note of the 15th of December, 1817, you demanded, in the name and by order of your Government, and as in fulfilment of this article, that all the advantages yielded for ample equivalent to British vessels, in all the ports of this Union, should be yielded, without any equivalent, to French vessels in the ports of Louisiana.

The answer which immediately presented itself, on the first disclosure of this demand, was, that the claim was, in two important particulars, broader than the stipulation upon which it was raised; first, inasmuch as, upon the mere right to equal favor, it required gratuitously that which was conceded to another for a just equivalent; and, secondly, inasmuch as, upon a stipulation limited in all its parts to the ports of Louisiana, it required concessions yielded to others in all the ports of the Union.

As the claim was thus without support from the letter of the article, it was also apparently contradictory to its spirit and motives, as well as to the whole purpose of the treaty, and expressly incompatible with other articles of the treaty and with the Constitution of the United States. Such was the substance of the answer which, on the 23d of December, 1817, I had the honor of addressing to you in reference to this claim.

By your note of June 16, 1818, you replied with the allegation that France was entitled by this article to enjoy, unconditionally, in the ports of Louisiana, any advantage granted upon conditions to others in all the ports of the Union, because France was to be considered as having already given the equivalent by the cession of the territory; and, especially, because you alleged that in all the other treaties between France and the United States it was expressly said that the two contracting parties should enjoy, reciprocally, any favor granted to others gratuitously, if the concession to others should be gratuitous, or by granting the same compensation if the concession should be conditional; and as no such distinction between conditional and gratuitous favor was formally expressed in the eighth article of the Louisiana cession treaty, you insisted with great earnestness that this variation in the phraseology of the article from that which had been universally used in all the preceding treaties between the parties, led, irresistibly, to the conclusion that no such distinction was intended; but that the United States were bound forever to give to the vessels of France, in Louisiana, every advantage which, to the end of time, they might sell for a price to the vessels of other nations throughout the Union.

The great stress with which your note of June 16, 1818, dwelt upon this supposed departure from the universal language of the prior treaties, made it necessary to observe that its only basis was an error in point of fact; that no such concurrence in the form of language used in relation to the same principle existed in the prior treaties; that the alternative reciprocity of conditional or gratuitous favor, far from being expressed in all the treaties between the parties, had in terms been expressed only in one, and that the first treaty ever made between them; and particularly that a treaty concluded with the same Government, as the Louisiana cession, and only three years before, contained such an article, stipulating, mutually, the advantages of the most favored nation, without any notice whatsoever of distinction between favors gratuitous and favors conditional; and that this variation of the phraseology in the prior treaties, of stipulations obviously intending the same thing, not only swept away the argument which you had drawn from the supposed universal coincidence of the former treaties, but made it recoil upon itself, and proved that gratuitous or the conditional nature of equal favor was inherent in the terms themselves, and had only been expressly developed in the treaty of the 6th February, 1778, from the abundant caution of contracting parties new to each other, and, above all, anxious to leave no possible question of their meaning thereafter to arise.

Your reply of the 30th of March last to my note of the preceding day insists that "all your citations in your preceding letters had been perfectly exact; that not only all the treaties between France and this Republic, (meaning the conventions which could be judged susceptible of the clause in question,) but also all, or nearly all, the treaties or conventions between the United States and European Governments, say, in terms formal or equivalent, what you had understood, what you had read, what you had been bound to say."

Permit me to observe that the simple question between us was, whether all the treaties between the United States and France, excepting only the Louisiana treaty, in stipulating the advantages of the most favored nation, had expressly added that the favor should be free, if freely granted to others, and upon the same condition, if conditionally granted. Your letter of the 16th of June, 1818, in the most unqualified terms asserted that they had; and from this position, connected with the omission of the same explanatory clause in the stipulation of the Louisiana treaty, you had deduced and most earnestly pressed an argument that this supposed solitary change in the reduction necessarily imported a different construction, and entitled France to enjoy in the ports of Louisiana, unconditionally, every favor granted to others, whether with condition or without.

The demand upon a stipulation of equal favor to enjoy, without equivalent or condition, that which was conceded to others only for an equivalent or upon condition, was in itself so extraordinary that it assuredly required something stronger than inferences and implications and equivalent terms for its support. The main argument upon which Mr. de Neuville's letter of the 16th of June, 1818, had relied for this unexampled claim was the omission in the Louisiana cession treaty of the express explanatory words alleged to be in all the others. But the fact being otherwise, the conclusion was more clearly the reverse.

It may now be added, that the only possible sense in which a stipulation for equal favor can be carried into effect is by granting it freely or for the equivalent, according as it is granted to others. For if the same advantage should be granted to France, without return, which is conceded to others only for the return, who does not see that France, instead of being upon equal footing with the most favored nation, would herself be upon a footing more favored than any other?

In the latter part of your letter of the 30th of March, without abandoning this demand of exclusive favor, built upon a simple engagement of equal favor, you seem to admit that the diminution of duties conceded to the vessels of several nations in the ports of this Union is not a favor, but a bargain; and you alleged that, even upon this principle, French vessels should be exempted from the additional tonnage duty of the act of the 15th of May, 1820, in the ports of Louisiana, because the vessels of Russia, Spain, Portugal, and other nations with whom the United States have no treaty, are not subject to it; and, repeating a remark which had been made by the chargé d'affaires of France in August last, you say this is not merely a favor refused, but a burden imposed.

The vessels of nations with whom the United States have no treaties enjoy no favors in the ports of Louisiana. In the ports of Louisiana the vessels of all nations are on the same footing as in those of all the other ports of the United States. There is no most favored nation in the ports of Louisiana, nor in any other port of the United States. During the twelve years while the vessels of France and Spain were admitted into the ports of Louisiana alone upon terms more favorable than into the ports of the United States, and from which the vessels of other nations were excluded, they were the most favored nations in the ports of Louisiana; but the favors were confined both to the vessels of those nations and to the ports of Louisiana. They enjoyed this favor by virtue of the seventh article of the treaty; and the object and purport of the next article was to stipulate that when this special and limited period of favor should expire no such special and exclusive favor should be granted to any other nation in the same ports. Such is the engagement of the United States; and as such it has been, and will continue to be, fulfilled. No favor is now granted to any nation in the ports of Louisiana, and the eighth article of the treaty has no more application to the general commercial laws of the United States, operating alike in every part of the Union, than it has to the special bargains by which the vessels of some nations enjoy a reduction from the duties imposed by those general laws on the condition of equivalent advantages to the vessels of the United States in the countries to which they belong.

To the demand, therefore, that the vessels of France should pay no higher duties in the ports of Louisiana than the vessels of Russia, Spain, Denmark, or Portugal pay in all the ports of the Union, the answer is the same as that given to your demand in terms by your letter of December 15, 1817, that the vessels of France should pay in the ports of Louisiana no higher duties than those paid by British vessels in all the ports of the Union. The claim is broader than the stipulation upon which it is founded. This stipulation is, both by its letter and spirit, confined to special favors in special ports. The claim is either to general favors applied to special ports, or to unrequited favors for conditional obligations. In every such case, and by either of the constructions for which you contend, the United States could not assent to your claim without favoring France in the ports of Louisiana more than any other nation. Instead of being upon the same footing of the most favored nation, she would herself be the most favored nation, and enjoy advantages conceded to no others. This is not the stipulation of the treaty.

In your letter of the 15th ultimo you remark that the exemption of the vessels of other nations from the extraordinary tonnage duties levied upon those of France, inasmuch as it is enjoyed in all the ports of the Union, is enjoyed, also, in the ports of Louisiana as a part of the Union; and being enjoyed there, France has, by the engagement of the treaty, a right to claim the same exemption in those ports, although she is not entitled to claim it in the other ports of the Union. But it is this very generality, by virtue of which the vessels of other nations enjoy the exemption, which takes away from it all application of the eighth article of the treaty. Their exemption is not a favor in the ports of Louisiana; even when they enjoy the benefit of it in those ports they enjoy no special favor there; and it is to such special favor only that the stipulation could give France an equal claim.

In your letter of the 15th ultimo it is observed that the question is "What must be understood by being treated upon the footing of the most favored nation?" But this is not the question, because it does not cite the whole stipulation; the omission of the words "in the ports above mentioned" changes the state of the question from its special to a general character. The stipulation is, that "the ships of France shall be treated on the footing of the most favored nations in the ports above mentioned." The qualifying and special terms "in the ports above mentioned" apply both to the most favored nations and to the treatment of the ships of France; nor can France claim any favor in the ports of Louisiana by this stipulation, without first showing that some other nation enjoys the same favor as a special favor exclusively in those ports. There is no such favored nation in the ports of Louisiana. In the omission of those words it is believed that their great importance to the question in discussion had escaped attention. Their restoration to the statement of the question will immediately show their leading to a different conclusion.

You observe, indeed, in another part of your letter, that you claim this favor in favor of France only in the ports of Louisiana; and you express your apprehension that I had misunderstood the purport of the demands in your preceding letters, because I had specially underscored the terms in all the ports of the Union when referring to the duties collected upon the vessels of other nations. I am well aware that you have demanded the special favor for France only in the ports of Louisiana; but you demand the special favor in the special ports, not as the stipulation of the article would warrant if the case existed, because other nations enjoy the same special favor in the special ports, but because, by general laws applicable to the vessels of those foreign nations in all the ports of the Union, they pay in the ports of Louisiana less for tonnage duty than the vessels of France.

You observe that it would have been superfluous and even idle to make special mention of the ports of Louisiana in treaties granting certain rights, favors, or privileges, in all the ports of the Union, because in the ports of the Union are included those of Louisiana; that to give the whole is to give a part; as in such cases the generality necessarily includes the specialty. This observation, as applicable to treaties between the United States and other nations, is correct; but the inference to be drawn from the principle asserted is conclusive against the claim of France in the present case. For it is not to any such concession of a general nature, and which is enjoyed by others in the ports of Louisiana only because they are ports of the Union, that the stipulation of the eighth article of the Louisiana cession treaty applies. That stipulation, both in letter and spirit, is, in all its parts, special and not general. The whole transaction refers specially to Louisiana as distinct from and not as a part of this Union. The seventh article stipulates for special favors in its ports for a term of years, to the exclusion of other nations; and the eighth provides against the concession of similar special favors after the expiration of twelve years to other nations, to the exclusion of those of France.

It is not, therefore, sufficient for France to say that the vessels of four other nations pay only one dollar a ton in the ports of Louisiana, while those of France are required to pay eighteen. For those vessels pay that dollar only, not because they are more favoured than other nations in those ports, but because they pay the same in all the ports of the Union; because those nations have passed no laws excluding the vessels of the United States from carrying to their ports the productions of their own soil by the excessive aggravations of surcharges.

There is no difference of opinion between us with regard to the principles which ought to apply in the construction of compacts, promises, and treaties. Admitting the correctness of all your citations from Vattel, I would specially invite your attention to that which forbids all constructive interpretation of that which speaks for itself. But I ask that, in stating the question upon the stipulation, none of its essential words should be omitted; that it should not be stated as a general question of "what is meant by being treated on the footing of the most favored nation," but as a special question of what is meant by being treated as the most favored nation in the ports of Louisiana; for when upon a stipulation in these words you raise a claim to be treated in Louisiana on the footing of the most favored nation in the ports of the United States, and when, to support this claim to special favor in special places, resort is had to the argument that the whole includes all its parts, and that the generality embraces the specialty, what is this but interpreting that which has no need of interpretation? To us it appears not only so, but an interpretation as contrary to the manifest intention of the article, inferrible from its connexion with the article immediately preceding it, as to its letter, which is special in all its parts.

Of the numerous extracts which you have taken the trouble of introducing in your letter of the 15th ultimo from the speeches of individual members of Congress, reported in the National Intelligencer, as having been delivered at the debates on the passage of the laws for carrying the Louisiana treaties into execution, I regret not to have been able to discover one which has any bearing whatever upon the question between us, which is of the true import of the eighth article of the treaty; they all have reference to the seventh article—to the exclusive privileges which made France and Spain, for a limited term of twelve years, the most favored nations in the ports above mentioned; and the objection was strongly urged that this stipulation was incompatible with the provision in the Constitution which forbids any preference to be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another. To this objection the speeches from which you have cited passages were the answers; and they all distinctly assume the principle that the prohibitive injunction of the Constitution was not incompatible with the stipulation of the treaty, because Louisiana was acquired, not as a State but as a Territory; so that while she continued in the territorial or colonial condition, regulations of commerce different from those prescribed for the States of the Union might be established in her ports without contravening the Constitution; and there was not in any one of those speeches the intimation of a doubt but that when Louisiana should be admitted as a State into the Union the regulations in her ports must be the same as in the ports of all her sister States. But the third article of the treaty stipulated that "the inhabitants of the ceded territory should be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the United States;" and, as this article could be carried into execution only by their admission into the Union as a State or States, so by their admission in that capacity their ports became subject to that provision of the Constitution which interdicts all preference to the ports of one State over those of another. If the admission of a part of those inhabitants did, in fact, by a short time, precede the termination of the period subject to the exclusive privileges of French and Spanish vessels in their ports, although the sentiment cited by the Baron de Neuville be perfectly correct that the Constitution ought not to be violated for a single day, as no question appears to have arisen at the time of the admission of the State, upon the application of this article, and as the privilege of the French and Spanish vessels was never, in fact, denied them during the term for which they were entitled by the article to claim it, whatever transient and inadvertent departure in favor of the inhabitants of Louisiana from the principle of the Constitution may have occurred is, as the Baron de Neuville observes, a question of internal administration in this Government, from which France has received no wrong, and of which, therefore, she can have no motive to complain.

For the term of twelve years, therefore, from the time specified in the treaty, France and Spain enjoyed, by virtue of the seventh article, special favors and privileges in the ports of Louisiana. But it was not certain at the time when the treaty was concluded that the inhabitants could, within twelve, or twenty, or even fifty years, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, be entitled to claim admission into the Union as a State. After the expiration of the twelve years, there might be an indefinite interval of time, during which the special favors conceded to France and Spain in the seventh article might be transferred to other nations; and the eighth article was obviously intended to avert that contingency by stipulating that, after the twelve years of special favor in the ports of Louisiana, the vessels of France should be on the footing of the most favored nations in the ports aforementioned—importing, by the proper meaning of the terms, and without any ambiguous inferences of specialities from generalities, or, as the Baron de Neuville's reasoning would require, of generalities from specialities, that no such special favor in the ports of Louisiana should, after the twelve years, ever be conceded to any other nation, to the exclusion of France. This is the plain and obvious meaning of the article—the only meaning deducible from its letter—the only meaning traceable to the intention of the parties, by its immediate connexion with the special and exclusive privilege of the article immediately preceding it, and of which it is the natural complement.

If the opinions cited by the Baron de Neuville from the speeches of individual members of Congress, after the conclusion of the treaty, have, as is now maintained, no bearing whatever upon the meaning of the article now in discussion, much less can it be expected that the proposals in a memoir addressed by Mr. Livingston to the French Government, nine months before the negotiation of the treaty, and intended to show that it was not the interest of France to take possession of Louisiana at all, should have any reference to a treaty founded upon totally different principles.

The object of this memoir was to convince the French Government that it was for the interest of France, instead of taking possession of Louisiana, to put the island of New Orleans into the hands of the United States, reserving to herself the right of a free port there, paying no higher duties than American vessels, and securing also to France the navigation of the Mississippi. The memoir was written at a time when the project of establishing a military colony at New Orleans was contemplated by France; but even the treaty by which Louisiana was ceded to France by Spain had not then been concluded. There is an error in the citation from this memoir in the letter to Baron de Neuville, (page 32,) of the 15th ultimo, where it is quoted as the saying, that "the possession of Louisiana was very important to France," while in the memoir itself the expressions are that "the cession of Louisiana is very important to France."

The substitution of the term possession for that of cession is only noticed because it might give an erroneous idea of the whole scope of the memoir, which was to prove that the possession of Louisiana by France would be in a very high degree detrimental to the interest of France, but that she might render the cession useful to her by putting New Orleans in the possession of the United States, securing to herself the privilege in it of a free port, together with the navigation of the Mississippi. The memoir did not even propose that Louisiana should be ceded to the United States, but merely that New Orleans should be put into their possession, to be held by them, not as an independent and sovereign State of the Union, but on the same colonial condition as it was then held by Spain, and as it would have been held by France had she taken and retained possession of the province. Under such a project, embracing no purpose of a change in the political condition of the inhabitants, the parties were competent to stipulate conditions like these without violating the Constitution of the United States, even though without limitation of time. But the compact actually made was of a totally different character. By the compact actually made, not only the island of New Orleans but the whole province of Louisiana was ceded in full sovereignty to the United States for a valuable consideration in money, an equivalent far more valuable to France than any benefit she would ever have derived from the possession of the province forever. The nature of that compact, however, made it necessary to provide for the future condition of the inhabitants of the country. Justice to them required that when thus ceded in full sovereignty to the United States they should in due time be released from all the shackles of colonial bondage, and assume their station as a free and equal portion of the Republic to which they were annexed. With this wise and just condition, France could no longer claim to stipulate for the navigation of the Mississippi; she could no longer ask, without limitation, the privilege for her ships of exclusive favors in the ceded ports. Both these conditions, perfectly compatible with a treaty upon the basis which had been proposed by the memoir of Mr. Livingston, in August, 1802, became quite inadmissible in a treaty founded on the basis finally adopted. The comparison, therefore, of the proposals in the memoir of Mr. Livingston, cited in the letter of the Baron de Neuville, with the actual stipulations in the 3d, 7th, and 8th articles of the treaty, affords itself a very conclusive argument against the present claim of France. The proposals are, that France should merely give possession to the United States of New Orleans, reserving to her own ships, without limitation of time, the privileges of paying there no higher duties than American vessels, and the navigation of the Mississippi. But not a word was said in them of a stipulation that the vessels of France should be upon the footing of the most favored nations in the same ports. The treaty is a cession in full and entire sovereignty of the whole province, but with no right reserved of navigating the Mississippi, and with the right of admission for French and Spanish vessels, upon the same footing as American vessels, limited to twelve years. Why these great and remarkable variations from the offers of the memorial? Why, but because they necessarily flowed from the principle of a cession in full sovereignty, and because all the rights and privileges of the Constitution of the United States were, by a new stipulation, secured to the inhabitants of the province! The cause and the effect are both palpable, from every point of departure in the actual treaty from the proposals of the memoir. The limitation in the article, of that which the proposal offered unbounded, is the proof of its own necessity; and the substitute in the 8th article, of equal favor with the most favored in those ports, after the expiration of the limitation, instead of the perpetuity of the special privilege, is illustrated both in its meaning and extent by the exposition of the unlimited offer in the memorial of which it supplied the place.

Of the numerous citations in the letter of the Baron de Neuville of the opinions of individual members of Congress, and even of anonymous publications in the American newspapers, one purpose appears to be to dwell with great earnestness on the supposed advantages of the Louisiana cession to the United States. Without referring to the estimates of nameless authorities, it is not necessary to inquire whether those of the members referred to were exaggerated or otherwise. It is however to be observed, first, that all those estimates were formed under impressions that the extent of the Louisiana cession was vastly more comprehensive than the subsequent declarations and efforts of the French Government would have made it; and secondly, that probably all those persons to whose anticipations the Baron de Neuville appeals with so much confidence, agreed as they were in the importance and value of Louisiana to the United States, would also have agreed in the opinion so forcibly urged in the memoir of Mr. Livingston, that the possession of the same country would have been worse than useless, highly detrimental, and pernicious to France. Of this opinion one at least of the individuals whose sentiments the Baron de Neuville has been pleased to quote with very flattering deference then was and still is. He has no doubt that in the possession of France Louisiana would have continued to be, as it always had been, a burden and not a benefit; and at the time when the cession was made the only practical question to France was, whether Louisiana should pass into the hands of a friend for ample compensation, or into the grasp of an enemy for no compensation at all. Louisiana then was of great value to the United States, and of much less than no value to France; and the cession of it by France to the United States was one of those treaties which are the best and most useful of transactions between nations, a compact highly advantageous to both the contracting parties.

But whether advantageous or otherwise, and whether to both or to neither of the parties, has no more bearing upon the present question between the two Governments than the speculative forecast of individual members of Congress, or the lucubrations of newspaper party writers. The question is upon the true meaning of the eighth article of the treaty; that meaning is expressed in the words of the article; it is confirmed to demonstration by its immediate connexion with the preceding article; it is illustrated by its variation from the proposals in Mr. Livingston's memoir, cited by the Baron de Neuville himself; nor has it been possible for the Baron, at any stage of the discussion, to state the present claim of France in any shape, without essentially departing both from the words and from the spirit of the article upon which it would rely. When first advanced, he expressly demanded, upon a promise of equal favor in the ports of Louisiana with the most favored in the ports of Louisiana, a performance of equal favor in Louisiana with the most favored in all the ports of the Union. Upon a promise of equal favor, he demanded a grant, without equivalent, of that which had been conceded to others for an equivalent. In his letters of the 15th of May he states the question to be, what is understood by being treated on the footing of the most favored nation? omitting the words "in the ports above mentioned," which words are part of the stipulation in the article, but the very insertion of which, in the statement of the question, would have been fatal to the present claim.

After the fullest consideration of the question in controversy, and the most deliberate examination of the arguments adduced by the Baron de Neuville in his several letters on this subject, I am instructed to say that this Government adheres to the opinion that the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty does in no respect authorize the present claim of France, inasmuch as, since the expiration of the twelve years specified in the seventh article, there has been no nation more favored than another in the ports of Louisiana.

I avail myself with pleasure of this occasion of renewing to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

No. 19.

Baron de Neuville to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, June 30, 1821.

SIR: I have received the letter which you have done me the honor to write to me, dated the 15th of this month.

In my turn I shall endeavor to re-establish the question which occupies our attention; and by removing some errors which it behooves me to rectify, I shall answer the new arguments which you have opposed to those advanced by me in the commencement of the discussion; from these I cannot depart, since nothing appears to me to weaken their force.

You do me the honor to state that "the eighth article stipulates that French ships shall be forever in the ports of the ceded territory upon the footing of the most favored nation in the same ports."

Further, you add, "the qualifying and special terms in the ports above mentioned apply both to the most favored nation and to the treatment of the most favored nations."

Finally, you say, sir, that I have founded on the 8th article, which you cite, my remonstrance of the 15th of December, 1817, tending "to obtain for French vessels in the ports of Louisiana the advantages granted to the English nation in all the ports of the Union."

I founded my demand upon the 8th article, such as it is in the treaty of cession.

I will here observe that, in my opinion, even though the article were expressed as you present it, my cause would still be no less founded; but it is prudent to make no concessions to so formidable an adversary. I shall, therefore, attack your principal argument in its basis, and shall endeavor to prove it is erroneous, even in the point whereby you seek to establish that there is no question but of special favors to be granted—specially and exclusively in the ports of the territory ceded by France. Allow me, sir, in the first place, to make the following observation: My claim is entirely grounded upon the article such as it is in the treaty, as it should be understood in the common usage of language; and, in fact, it is always by modifying it, or, to speak with more propriety, by making it anew, that an attempt is made to oppose my arguments.

This eighth article, according to your note of the 29th of March, means evidently that, after the expiration of the twelve years, no such peculiar privileges should be granted in the same ports to the vessels of any other nation to the exclusion of those of France.

But the article appears to me evidently to stipulate quite the reverse. It has no relation to the special right which France reserved by the seventh article for Spain and for herself for the space of twelve years, but all the rights, privileges, immunities, favors, which, after the twelve years, might be granted to other nations under any title whatever.

France is to be treated, in future and forever, upon the footing of the most favored nation. This is the whole question. If what you understand to be its import had really been meant, would it not have been more natural to have entirely suppressed the eighth article, and, after the following clause of the seventh, ("during the space of time above mentioned no other nation shall be entitled to the same privileges in the ports of the ceded territory,") to have added, "after the expiration of the twelve years aforesaid, if the same privileges are granted to any other nation in the same ports, they shall become common to France also."

But even these expressions, I perceive it, sir, would not come perfectly up to your idea, nor effectually overrule my opinion.

Why, then, was not the article worded in the following terms—they would naturally have occurred to the negotiators if they had thought at that time of what you now conjecture :

"In future and forever France shall enjoy gratuitously, in the ports of the territory ceded by her, all the rights or privileges which may be granted gratuitously and specially in the said ports to any other nation." The clause would then have been clear and precise, and I should, in such case, have perfectly conceived what you do me the honor to state in your note of the 23d December, 1817: "If British vessels enjoyed in the ports of Louisiana any gratuitous favor, undoubtedly French vessels would, by the terms of the article, be entitled to the same."

But, to be candid, how can it be asserted now that France is to enjoy only such favors as may be granted gratuitously to other nations, when we read in the 8th article, "In future and forever, after the expiration of the twelve years, the ships of France shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports above mentioned?" I, therefore, had reason to advance that it was essentially necessary first to define correctly what must be understood by the terms most favored nations. It makes but little difference whether we say the most favored nations in the ports of Louisiana, or only the most favored nation, since we have only to determine this first point of the difficulty.

Why should France enjoy in the said ports only such favors as should be conceded gratuitously, and not such as might be granted conditionally? The 8th article says no such thing; why, therefore—by what law, by what rule, can it be positively established, that "if British vessels enjoyed in the ports of Louisiana any gratuitous favor, undoubtedly French vessels would, by the terms of the article, be entitled to the same?" Is there, then, but one mode of becoming, in any country whatever, the most favored nation? Or, if the conventional law of nations admits, particularly in the United States, that this treatment may be obtained, not only gratuitously but conditionally; if the Federal Government has been ever careful to have this clause inserted in its different treaties; if I find it in the conventions of 1778, 1783, 1785; if I find it again in the treaty with Prussia, negotiated by Mr. Adams himself, in 1799, how can the Secretary of State say now that "if British vessels enjoyed in the ports of Louisiana any gratuitous favor, undoubtedly French vessels would, by the terms of the treaty, be entitled to the same?"

France, I repeat it, has a right to enjoy, in the ports of Louisiana, the treatment of the most favored nation, whether this nation be favored gratuitously or conditionally; she has a right to enjoy it, inasmuch as the 8th article stipulates expressly that "in future and forever French ships shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nation in the ports of the territory ceded by France." To pretend that she is to obtain this treatment in case only that it shall be conceded gratuitously to another nation, is subjecting the 8th article to an arbitrary interpretation; it is going in the face of a doctrine generally received; it is interpreting what requires no interpretation; it amounts, in fine, to the creation of a new conventional law of nations peculiar to the ports of Louisiana.

I now pass, sir, to the entirely new interpretation which you give in your letter of the 15th of this month to this same article. You make it express that, after the expiration of this special privilege, that, if the seventh article thus limited to the ports of the ceded territory, French vessels should be forever, in the ports of the ceded territory, on the footing of the most favored nation in the same ports.

If the question were only to new-mould the article, nothing could be more easy, as I have already made it appear, than to give it the sense which is now attempted to be ascribed to it; but we must adhere to its letter if we mean ever to come to an understanding.

It is certain that French vessels are to be treated upon the footing of the most favored nation; but where are they to be so treated? I answer, in the ports of the territory ceded by France; and this ipso facto, gratis, whatever be the title under which the most favored nations may enjoy the same treatment, has it been meant by the article to say, the nation most favored in the said ports, exclusively in the said ports? Finally, are we to read, as you now for the first time propose, the most favored nation in the ports of the ceded territory? Doubtless, no; the last member of the period has no reference to the most favored nation; it can have no relation except to the treatment of French vessels: "In future and forever French vessels shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nation." Here the sense is complete, with regard to the words most favored nation. All instruments found in public law clearly show what is meant by the most favored nation. There can, therefore, be no misconception in this respect. But this is not the case with the other member of the sentence. It is not sufficient to stipulate that French vessels shall, in future and forever, be treated upon the footing of the most favored nation; it is necessary, moreover, to specify where they shall be so treated; for, otherwise, the sense would be incomplete, and the article would have no meaning at all.

I shall avoid all grammatical discussion; but, if the sense of the article did not evidently bear me out, and if I were under the necessity of showing, by its construction, that it cannot have the meaning which you attribute to it, I could cite in favor of my assertion several phrases of your last note, and would prove, by their correctness, that the 8th article, such as it has been drawn and worded in the treaty, cannot admit the argument made by you in the concluding words of the sentence.

It concerns not France to examine if any nation enjoys, in the ports of the territory ceded by her, any right or privilege as a special favor exclusively in those ports; she has only to inquire whether any nation is there treated upon the footing of the most favored nation; or, in other words, if the treatment she receives is more favorable than that of French vessels in the said ports. It is matter of small importance to her to know whether such nation, being the most favored in Louisiana, is at the same time the most favored in Baltimore, New York, or Boston, or to know by what title such favor is granted in the ports of Louisiana. The fact alone, when ascertained, is of itself sufficient ground for claiming, as her due, the fulfilment of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty, which stipulates that, in future and forever, after the expiration of the twelve years, French vessels shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports above mentioned.

Which, without gloss or comment, expressly means "in future and forever, after the expiration of the twelve years aforesaid, French vessels shall be treated, in the ports above mentioned, (that is, in the ports of Louisiana territory ceded by France,) upon the footing of the most favored nations."

It would be needless to add anything to this explanation, since the sense is complete. And it would be vain to seek, even in a forced wording (redaction) of the article, the special favor exclusively in those ports. The article neither expresses nor could express any such thing. It does not express it, as has been just proved. It could not express it.

This, sir, you would constantly prove by objecting that, "according to the Constitution, no preference shall be given, by any regulations of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another." From this it clearly follows, in your own opinion, sir, that no nation can receive a special favor in a special port, and exclusively in that port. What is not allowable at this time could not surely be done in 1803; and how can it be conceived that the only end of the American negotiators was to grant to France nothing but an illusive advantage, a privilege which she could never be put into possession of consistently with the Constitution? How could the French negotiators have claimed or accepted such a favor? How is it possible to reconcile the idea of a claim, which would amount to a mere mockery, with expressions so solemn as these, in future and forever? It cannot, I repeat it, be presumed that discreet and sensible men, making a treaty and a solemn conveyance, have intended to make a mere nullity. Let us examine what is likely to have taken place, what certainly did occur, during the negotiation, and we shall find that it is not at all necessary to torture the expressions of the article, in order to establish its true and positive meaning.

France was about to cede a vast territory in order to render an important service to a friendly nation; that territory was her property; she, therefore, had a right to settle the clauses and conditions of the contract. This was not the case of a favor granted, nor of a commercial regulation to be made by the United States; but, on the contrary, of a favor to be received, of a very important acquisition to be made by them. This bargain could not but be very advantageous in every respect to the United States; France was not to gain as much by it; this she knew, but although she willingly consented to make so great a sacrifice, was she entirely to neglect her own interests? The French Government knew at the same time that difficulties had arisen already between the two countries, and the convention of 1800 testified that the parties had not been able to come to an understanding on the treaties of 1778; the provisional convention of 1800 was to remain in force only five years more; it might possibly be renewed; the parties might come to an understanding on the various points in dispute; but, at the same time, it was also possible that other discussions should produce injurious measures, impolitic steps, and lead to a state of things equally injurious to both nations.

Experience seems to have proved how prudent it was in them to foresee, and how wise to act in prevention. Such being the state of things, how was it proper for France to act? I will answer, just as she did act, and this course was too obvious not to have been pursued. She was about to cede an immense colony, the inhabitants of which spoke the French language, and were likely not to lose French tastes, or to abandon French fashions; it particularly behooved her to secure forever such a market for her productions;* Mr. Livingston told her so; policy and common sense led her to do so. It was, therefore, that the French Government, while ceding Louisiana, in order to give the United States a remarkable proof of friendship, and to do away every cause of rivalry between the two nations, reserved, in the ports of the territory ceded, a right or privilege, the full and entire enjoyment of which should be independent of all general arrangements of commerce or navigation existing at that time, or which might subsequently be made by the two nations; that the privilege should secure to French merchants the advantage of being forever treated in Louisiana upon the footing of the most favored nation, whatever might be the footing upon which they should be received in the other ports of the United States; therefore did France demand that, after the expiration of the twelve years, during which both Spain and herself were to enjoy an equal privilege, she, France, should have alone, in future and forever, a right to be treated in the ports of Louisiana upon the footing of the most favored nation; not of the nation most favored exclusively in the said ports, (which, most assuredly, the 8th article does not say,) but of the most favored nation by whatever title, which the article may be said to stipulate expressly, since no condition is annexed to the favor. It cannot, at all events, be asserted that this is a forced interpretation, since it agrees so perfectly with the text and letter of the article, which is, moreover, abundantly explained by antecedent facts, by the circumstances of the case, and by subsequent events. It appeared to me, sir, that, in my letter of May 15, I had clearly replaced, upon its proper footing, the question relating to a supposed error in that of June 16, 1818. I thought it was proved that, whether there were or were not such an error in my letter, there would still remain the same force in the argument which, alone, it was material to attack; but since you have thought it proper, sir, again to return to this citation, which, I repeat it, even if erroneous, would not alter my argument in the least, let us again examine, with minute attention, if there really be any mistake on my part.

There are eight treaties, compacts, or conventions between France and the United States; four of these are of such a nature as not to admit the clause in question. The four others, being such as to allow its insertion, are: the treaty of amity and commerce of September, 1778; the consular convention of November 9, 1778; the commercial convention of —, 1800; and, last, the Louisiana treaty of —, 1803. In the treaty of 1778, stipulating that both countries shall enjoy, each in the ports of the other, the treatment of the most favored nation, the very same expression which I have used will be found in the second, third, and fourth articles. The convention of 9th of November refers to the second, third, and fourth articles of the said preceding treaty. Two, therefore, out of these four treaties state precisely what I have attributed to them, viz: that each nation shall enjoy, in the ports of the other, the treatment of the most favored nation freely, if freely granted, or conditionally, if the concession be conditional.

The third treaty (of 1800) stipulates expressly that the two nations shall, reciprocally, enjoy the treatment of the most favored nation, both as regards the rights and privileges of consular agents (article 10), and with respect to all privileges, immunities, liberties, and exemptions in trade, navigation, and commerce, and as to duties or imposts, of what nature soever they may be, or by what name soever called. An attentive examination of these two articles will surely suffice to produce an absolute conviction that, when the condition of reciprocity is thus expressed, nations are reciprocally to enjoy the treatment of the most favored nations, upon the condition generally understood. Thus the convention of 1800 does state, in equivalent terms, what is stipulated expressly in the treaties of 1778. I therefore concur in your opinion, sir, on one point. In truth, who can doubt that this was implied in the article? but I cannot go on to say, with you, though not expressed, since it does not appear to me possible to express anything more clearly in equivalent terms. Last remains the Louisiana treaty, and it is precisely because the treatment of the most favored nation is secured to France, without reciprocity on her part, that a discussion has arisen on these points. Where, then, have I committed any error? Perhaps it would have been more rigorously exact to have said the treaties, instead of all the treaties, since the reference was but to four treaties. But I would ask, sir, if that single word all was of such moment as to fix so repeatedly your attention? Sir, I repeat it, all the treaties between France and the United States, (those, it is understood, which could admit of such a clause,) all the treaties between the United States and European nations, wherein the treatment of the most favored nation is mentioned, stipulate that it shall be reciprocal; and, on examining the other compacts between nations, I find the same stipulation of reciprocal advantages in every case, except where, as in the Louisiana treaty, there is some charge imposed by one party on the other, or a privilege reserved.

* See the end of Mr. Livingston's memorial.

Whence is it that one treaty, that of 1803, should alone mention, without reciprocity, the treatment of the most favored nation? The reason becomes obvious, if we consider that it is the only treaty of the United States, sui generis, which does not relate to commercial arrangements. A commercial convention, grounded on expected contingencies, and stipulating mutual services and advantages, which do not require any advances, has no sort of analogy with a contract of sale, a mere bargain. In this last case the vendor conveys his property to the vendee, who binds himself for the stipulated consideration, consisting in the other clauses, charges, and conditions of the bargain, as well as in the funds to be paid at hand or by instalments. The right of the vendor, his only right, as you observed, sir, in 1803, is to require that the conditions stipulated be punctually and faithfully performed. This is all France desires. She has enjoyed, or might have enjoyed, during the space of twelve years, the right secured to her by the seventh article, and she now demands the fulfilment of the eighth article; which, as well as the seventh, is "a part of the price of the territory, a mere condition of the purchase." In your letter of the 15th you say: "Of the numerous extracts which you have taken the trouble of introducing in your letter of the 15th ultimo from the speeches of individual members of Congress, reported in the National Intelligencer as having been delivered at the debates on the passage of the laws for carrying the Louisiana treaties into execution, I regret not to have been able to discover one which has any bearing whatever upon the question between us, which is of the true import of the eighth article of the treaty; they all have reference to the seventh."

Suffer me, sir, to observe that, in thus taking the trouble to cite these very respectable opinions, my principal object was to answer the following passage of your letter of the 15th of March: "From the obvious purport of the seventh and eighth articles, it is apparent that neither of them was considered in any respect as forming a part of the equivalent for the cession of Louisiana." I was, therefore, right in not separating them when my object was to prove that neither of them was considered in any respect as forming a part of the equivalents for the cession of Louisiana; and although the question of constitutionality cannot, in any case, concern France, it was proper that I should establish its having been completely settled in 1803; and that I was not alone of opinion that Louisiana was property ceded "with particular reservation, with a condition which the party ceding had a right to require, and to which the United States had a right to assent." It makes but little difference what particular article of the treaty gave rise to the speeches cited, if they had a full bearing on the whole convention, and if every argument adduced on the seventh article is, a fortiori, applicable to the eighth. The seventh and eighth articles are both a part of the equivalents for the cession, or, rather, they are reservations of rights of property. France owed no reciprocity, and therefore it is that no reciprocity was stipulated on her part; it was no error or omission of the negotiators.

I read, sir, in your letter of the 15th, "in the latter part of your letter of the 30th of March, without abandoning this demand of exclusive favor, you seem to admit that the diminution of duties, conceded to the vessels of several nations" in the ports of this Union, is not a favor, but a bargain. Now, sir, I admit nothing of the kind in my letter of the 30th; far from seeming to admit, my expressions in the very phrase cited by you, sir, are Je ne saurais admettre, I cannot admit.

As to the question treated of in that letter, I shall confine myself to expressing again my surprise that France should be denied, in the ports of the territory ceded by her, even those advantages which are granted to nations having no treaty or convention with the United States. Those nations you say, sir, have passed no laws excluding the vessels of the United States from carrying to their ports the productions of their own soil, by the excessive aggravation of surcharges. To this I shall answer, that France has done no such thing; and that her discriminating duties are far from having operated like magic in favor of the ship owners of France, and have not even secured to her navigation a due share in the carrying trade. And after all, where is it stipulated that France shall be treated in Louisiana upon the footing of the most favored nation, (as by the 8th article,) only in case she shall make no regulations on navigation, injurious to the interest of the United States, or which might be supposed contrary thereto? Is not every nation free to regulate her own commerce and navigation as she sees fit? If her laws amount to prohibitions, if they appear unjust, if they are deemed injurious, it is, no doubt, allowable to adopt similar countervailing measures; but such measures, on her part, cannot make it justifiable to lose sight of the respect due to a sacred right of property, which is absolute in its nature, and is independent of all regulations of commerce and navigation. Observe, moreover, sir, that French vessels are not treated in the ports of Louisiana either upon the footing of the most favored nations, nor upon that of nations having no treaty or convention with the United States;† nor even upon the footing of those in whose ports the vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to go and trade. This requires no comment. You have stated, sir, that all the speeches cited by me tend to prove that there was no inconsistency between the Federal Constitution and certain conditions of the treaty of cession, "because Louisiana was acquired, not as a State, but as a Territory; so that while she continued in the territorial or colonial condition regulations of commerce, different from those prescribed for the States of the Union, might be established in their ports without contravening the Constitution." I have already answered this argument by stating the fact that the 7th article, which, in your opinion, was judged to be compatible with the Constitution so long only as Louisiana should continue to be a colony, received its full execution during three years after Louisiana had become a State.

To this you reply, that in this there was, in truth, a violation of the Constitution, "from which France has received no wrong, and of which she can have no motive to complain." But if we have adopted in Europe, as a monarchical principle, that the King can do no wrong, we also expressly admit, with Mr. Griswold, that the legislature cannot violate the Constitution even for a day. I look upon it as certain and indubitable, that Congress had not the desire, as it had not the power, to violate, intentionally, the Constitution for a day, nor even for an hour. Besides, how can it be considered as a transient, inadvertent departure from the Constitution, that the unconstitutional execution of the 7th article should have place, not for a day, but for three years, while all the discussion which the speeches referred to had tended only to establish that in such case there would, in fact, be a violation of the Constitution? You add, sir, "there was not, in any one of those speeches, the intimation of a doubt but that, when Louisiana should be admitted as a State into the Union, the regulations in her ports must be the same as in the ports of all her sister States;" and in another part of your letter you again repeat, "that by the admission of ° These extra charges were sufficient to drive from our ports the greatest proportion of the foreign tonnage. All foreign nations were affected by the system we had adopted. It seemed to operate like magic in favor of the ship owners of the United States.—(Dr. Seybert on the American discriminating duties.)

† American tonnage law, article 1.

Louisiana into the Union, her ports became subject to that provision of the Constitution which interdicts all preference to the ports of one State over those of another."

I think I have shown that this article of the Constitution is not, in any case, applicable to the express stipulations of a sale and conveyance of property, and that it did not belong to France to examine that question. I could, perhaps, prove also that the last two assertions are not, in every point, rigorously correct. You will find, sir, that in those very speeches it has been questioned whether all the ports of the United States were at that time subject to the same commercial regulations. "By turning to our statute books, says Mr. Randolph, it will be perceived that at present there are some ports entitled to benefits which other ports do not enjoy." He shows in another place, referring to a treaty between the United States and Great Britain, that several ports of the State of New York have a system of custom and duties peculiar to themselves; and "in this he says gentlemen could not avail themselves of the distinction taken between a Territory and State, even if they were so disposed, since the ports in question were ports of a State."<sup>8</sup>

We see, besides, that Mr. Rodney's principal argument is grounded, not on the article of the Constitution mentioned by you, but on that which gives to Congress the power to provide for the general welfare.

Let us conclude from these various instances that the question of constitutionality is foreign to that which we now discuss; that it is of little moment to know whether a State may or may not modify its administration of customs and duties; that even this point was discussed in 1803; that, whether questioned or not, the right of France remains still the same, because it is a right of property, not a favor, but a bargain; and finally, that the least doubtful point in all human transactions is the necessity of fulfilling, punctually and faithfully, all their conditions and stipulations.

As to the memoir of Mr. Livingston, its object, in your opinion, sir, was to convince the French Government that it was its interest, instead of taking possession of Louisiana, to put New Orleans into the hands of the United States. In the first place, I shall ask, what would then have become of the territory, and whether in such case Mr. Livingston's object, which was to prevent every collision, to remove every motive of rivalry between the two nations, would have been fully accomplished? but every discussion on that subject would, I think, be quite useless, the perusal of the memoir being sufficient alone to remove every doubt. Its very basis is this question: "Is it the interest of France to take possession of Louisiana?"

It runs from beginning to end on that subject and no other. If in one paragraph it proposes to put the United States in possession of New Orleans, it is palpable from that very paragraph, and from the following, that the memoir refers not to New Orleans alone, but to the whole of Louisiana. Let us cite some passages. "Who, then, will be willing to cultivate Louisiana with slaves?" "Louisiana is surrounded by an immense wilderness." "What advantage can France derive from settling that colony?" "The productions of Louisiana being the same with those of the Antilles, &c., &c., it grows to evidence that, with respect to commerce, the settling (colonization) of Louisiana would be prejudicial to France, since it would deprive her other colonies of capitals which might be more usefully employed there."

"The possession of Louisiana is, however, very important to France, if she applies it to the only use which sound policy would seem to approve. I speak of Louisiana only, and in this I do not mean to comprehend the Floridas, because I think they are no part of the cession, as she can acquire by this cession the right to carry on the Mississippi a free trade," &c., &c.

Further, after having taken pains to explain all the advantages which France is to derive from the cession of Louisiana to the United States, Mr. Livingston adds: "All this can take place only by the cession of New Orleans to the United States, with the reserve of the right of entry at all times, free from all other duties than those paid by American vessels, together with the right of navigation on the Mississippi."

It becomes evident that he means the cession of the whole of Louisiana, since he advises France to secure to herself the navigation on the Mississippi; for how could this stipulation have been necessary if she were to have retained possession of the western shore? In which cases does Mr. Livingston mention New Orleans only? It is when he speaks of a free port, and of securing a free access to French vessels and merchandise. And in these particulars it is plain that he could not express himself otherwise, New Orleans being at that time the only port in Louisiana.

But what is the object of all the arguments of the minister of the United States? To dissuade France from taking possession of Louisiana; to prove that under her Government Louisiana never would nor ever could flourish; that not only in relation to commerce, but also with respect to policy, the settling of Louisiana could not be profitable to her; that she would find greater advantages in securing to herself the solid friendship of the United States than in the acquisition of a territory which would become a source of rivalship; that she ought not to change a natural ally from a warm friend into a suspicious and jealous neighbor, &c., &c. What is Mr. Livingston's conclusion? That, by adopting his opinion, France would easily be able to introduce into the western country the products of her manufactures, which the United States would have no interest to prevent, every cause of rivalship between the two nations being thus removed.

What more, I ask, can be wanting to prove that the memoir relates, not to the cession of New Orleans alone, but to that of the whole territory of Louisiana?

You observe that Mr. Livingston proposes to France to cede New Orleans to the United States, to be taken possession of by them, not as an independent and sovereign State, but merely on the same colonial condition it was held in by Spain, and as it would have been held by France had she taken and retained possession of the province.

To this I can make no other answer than that I have not been able, even on the closest examination, to discover any such thing expressed in the memoir. The word merely is not to be seen there any more than the word exclusively in the eighth article of the treaty. There is nothing in the memorial that could suggest the idea of Louisiana continuing under the colonial condition when belonging to the United States.

You do me honor to state, sir, that Mr. Livingston's memoir was presented to the French Government in August, 1802, and yet I read in another part of your letter that it was written at a time when even the treaty ceding Louisiana to France was not concluded. In this there is error of date, since the treaty of St. Ildephonso, by which Spain ceded the colony or province of Louisiana to France, was signed on the 1st of October, 1800, as is stated in the convention of 1803, and in all the other documents of that period, which give it a date more than twenty months anterior to Mr. Livingston's memoir.

<sup>8</sup>Mr. Randolph said that he did not mean to affirm that this exemption made by the treaty of London was constitutional; to solve that question was not his object; he would, however, observe that France had a view in signing the treaty to ascertain whether all its articles were constitutional or not; since here, as well as elsewhere, the most enlightened men frequently disagree on certain points of legislation.

The error which you think you have found in the citation of page 32 of my letter of the 15th of May does not exist. I have now the honor to send you a copy of the original memoir, addressed in Mr. Livingston's own handwriting to the French Government; you will there find the word possession, and not cession, of Louisiana, in the paragraph alluded to.

In my letter of the 15th of May I called to mind what, even at the time of the cession, was the acknowledged value of the territory ceded by France, and cited not only the opinions of various writers, but also those of several distinguished members of Congress. To this you reply that "all those estimates were formed under impressions that the extent of the Louisiana cession was vastly more comprehensive than the subsequent declarations and efforts of the French Government would have made it."

I do not know to what subsequent declaration you allude.

In the first article of the treaty it is expressly stated that the French Government cedes Louisiana "in order to give the United States a remarkable proof of friendship." In all these subsequent declarations I find expressions of the same good will and friendly dispositions, combined with a sense of justice, from which even friendship should never depart. As to the efforts of the French Government, as you do not specify them, nor indicate of what description they were, I wish to persuade myself, sir, that you thereby allude to those efforts which, on more than one important occasion within the last forty-three years, France has taken a pleasure in making to promote the prosperity of the United States.

What were the real motives which induced the French Government not to retain Louisiana? I see no other, nor can discover any but those expressed in the treaty, and, therefore, I shall not discuss this point. I can, however, safely assert that France has at all times proved that she could do much for her friends, and had little fear of her enemies. For this reason, "the opinion so forcibly urged" in the memoir of Mr. Livingston has made but little impression on my mind, and, if such a question were not irrelevant to the present subject of discussion, I believe that I could easily show that France could have retained her territory of Louisiana as well in war as in peace.

I cannot conclude better than by citing, in support of my cause, the words of a celebrated statesman, whose opinions I have already had occasion to quote, and must be received as authority everywhere, and on every occasion.

Opinion of Mr. Madison in 1794.

"The fifteenth article, Mr. Chairman, has another extraordinary feature which I should imagine must strike every observer. In the treaties which profess to put us on the footing of the most favored nation, it is stipulated that, where new favors are granted to a particular nation in return for favors received, the party claiming the new favors shall pay the price of it. This is just and proper where the footing of the most favored nation is established at all. But this article gives to Great Britain the full benefit of all privileges that may be granted to any other nation, without requiring from her the same equivalent privileges with those granted by such nation. Hence, it would happen that if Spain, Portugal, or France should open their colonial ports to the United States, in consideration of certain privileges in our trade, the same privileges would result gratis and ipso facto to Great Britain."*

The present claim of France is the same, or rather it is better, since it grows not out of a commercial convention, but out of a contract of sale, and since France has, in fact, already paid for her privilege, while England, in the instance cited, would have given no consideration; still, however, Mr. Madison says that England must, by the terms of the article, obtain gratis and ipso facto every right or privilege granted to any other nation, whether gratuitously or for an equivalent. From all which, I conclude, sir, that France has a right to enjoy gratis and ipso facto the privilege reserved to her by the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty.

When so able an advocate as Mr. Madison has taken up my defence I need say no more.

I have the honor to be, &c., &c.

WASHINGTON, October 15, 1821.

SIR: I have received fresh instructions from my Government requiring me to insist upon the execution of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty, or to demand, at least, that in the meantime our shipping be made to enjoy, in the ports of the territory ceded by France, all the privileges and advantages which are granted in the same ports to such nations as have no treaty or convention with the United States.

On this subject I must again refer to my letter of the 30th of March last. Considering, however, that, at the date of these instructions, my Government was not informed of the present state of the negotiation, and being solicitous to make all possible exertion for the removal of every difficulty to the negotiation, I have the honor again to propose (in case you should persist in your opinion on the Louisiana question, as I adhere to mine) that we enter into the agreement suggested in my letter of June 30 and of August 3.

Accept, &c., &c., &c.

Extract of a letter (No. 233) from Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Adams, dated September 24, 1822.

"I had yesterday a conference with Mr. de Villèle on the subject of our claims. He expressed his wish that a general arrangement might take place, embracing all the subjects of discussion between the two countries; stated those to be the reclamations of the United States for spoliations on their trade; those of France on account of Beaumarchais' claim, and of the vessels captured on the coast of Africa, and the question arising under the Louisiana treaty; and asked whether I was prepared to negotiate upon all these points. I answered that I was ready to discuss them all, but that I must object to uniting the Louisiana question to that of claims for indemnity, as they were essentially distinct, and as I thought that, after all that had passed, we had a right to expect that no further obstacle should be thrown in the discussion of our claims by connecting it with subjects foreign to them. Mr. de Villèle appeared to acquiesce in that observation."

No. 22.

Extract of a letter (No. 236) from Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Adams, dated November 13, 1822.

"I received, on the 8th instant, a letter of Mr. de Villèle of the 6th, a copy of which is inclosed, together with that of my answer of the 12th.

"There is no doubt that the attempt to blend the discussion respecting the claims with that concerning the construction of the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty, is intended to postpone if not to defeat the first object. It must have been presumed that I could not have powers on the Louisiana question; and that, in case I had, they could not be such as to authorize me to acquiesce in the construction contended for by France. From the tenor of the letter, as well as from other circumstances, I am inclined to think that Government will persevere in insisting that the two subjects should be united in the same negotiation. I had received a suggestion to that effect from a respectable quarter, and I beg leave, also, to refer to the semi-official article in the Journal des Débats, of the 8th instant, observing that that paper is considered as the organ of Mr. de Villèle's sentiments.

"It will now remain for the President to decide whether it is proper to send me powers on the subject of the Louisiana treaty; and, in that case, whether it is for the interest of the United States to purchase the annulment of the eighth article. That this Government means to make their claim under it an offset against the just demands of our citizens, is obvious to me. Yet, as I may be mistaken, and as a change of ministry or some unforeseen circumstances may, unexpectedly, give an opportunity of making an arrangement, I beg leave again to refer to the several letters in which I have applied for instructions on that subject."

PARIS, November 6, 1822.

SIR: The convention concluded at Washington on the 24th of June last has removed the obstacles which momentarily fettered the relations of commerce between France and the United States. Although this convention is only temporary, it produces the expectation of a treaty more extensive and more durable. It is intended to leave proper time for discussing and establishing this treaty upon bases the most conformable to the interests of the two States. The communications are already opened on both sides upon the most amicable footing. His Majesty has seen, with satisfaction, this happy effect of the arrangement concluded in his name and in the name of the United States.

If any partial difficulties still remain to be cleared, they will be easily settled between two powers that are sincerely desirous of establishing their relations on the most perfect equity.

It is in this spirit of reciprocal justice I have received the claims which you have done me the honor to transmit to me, and that, without prejudging anything in their regard, I ought, above all, sir, to remark to you that France has also claims pending, or to produce, against the Government of the United States. It would appear agreeable to the interests of the two parties, and to the reciprocity of justice and of protection to which the subjects of the two States have equally a right, that these affairs should be examined and arranged in concert by way of negotiation.

The intention of his Majesty would be, that these claims and the other points in question, on which the convention of the 24th of June has not pronounced, might be the object of that negotiation, in order to terminate, simultaneously and in a definitive manner, every dispute between the two States, especially that which concerns the duties received in Louisiana upon the French commerce, contrary to the tenor of the eighth article of the treaty of cession.

You will see, sir, in this intention of his Majesty only the most steadfast desire of leaving, in future, no cause or pretext of misunderstanding or of complaints between the two States, and on the part of their respective subjects.

If you are authorized, sir, to pursue this march, I pray you to let me know it, and I will hasten to demand of the King the powers necessary for a negotiator charged to treat of it with you.

If you are also authorized to sign a consular convention, the same plenipotentiary would receive the powers, ad hoc, for pursuing also the negotiation.

Accept, sir, the assurances of the high consideration, &c.

JH. DE VILLELE,

No. 22, (b.)

Mr. Gallatin to Mr. de Villèle.

PARIS, November 12, 1822.

SIR: I had the honor to receive your excellency's letter of the 6th instant.

I have special powers to negotiate a convention providing for the just claims of citizens of the United States against France, as also for the like claims of French subjects against the United States, with such person or persons as may have a like authority from his most Christian Majesty.

As minister of the United States, I am authorized to discuss the question respecting the construction of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty, and to give and receive explanations on that subject. But the negotiation on that point having been transferred to Washington, no special powers in that respect have been transmitted to me. I had understood, in the course of the conference I had the honor to have with your excellency on the 23d of September, and had accordingly written to my Government, that it was not intended to insist that that subject should be blended with that of private claims. It is, indeed, obvious that it would be utterly unjust to make the admission of these to depend on the result of a negotiation on a subject with which they have no connexion whatever, and the difficulties respecting which are of a date posterior to that of the claims.

All the representations which his Majesty's Government has made to that of the United States, whether on private or on public subjects, have uniformly been taken into consideration, and received that attention to which they were so justly entitled. In no instance has the Government of the United States declined to open a discussion on any subject thus offered to their consideration by France, or made it a preliminary condition that the discussion should also embrace some other subject in which they might happen to take a greater interest. The question respecting the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty has, in particular, been the subject of a voluminous correspondence, in the course of which, the arguments in support of the construction insisted on by each party, respectively, were made known to the other. I have, in the meanwhile, for six years, made unceasing application to his Majesty's Government for the settlement of claims to a vast amount, affecting the interest of numerous individuals, and arising from flagrant violations of the law of nations and of the rights of the United States, without having ever been able to obtain, to this day, satisfaction in a single instance, or even that the subject should be taken into consideration and discussed. After so many vexatious delays, for which different causes have, at different times been assigned, it cannot now be intended again to postpone the investigation of that subject, by insisting that it should be treated in connexion with one foreign to it, and which has already been discussed. The United States have, at least, the right to ask that their demands should also be examined and discussed, and I trust that, since I am authorized to treat as well concerning the claims of French subjects against the United States, as respecting those of American citizens against France, a distinct negotiation to that effect will be opened without any further delay.

Permit me, at the same time, to renew to your excellency the assurances that the United States have the most earnest desire that every subject of difference between the two countries should be amicably arranged, and their commercial and political relations placed on the most friendly and solid footing. They will be ready to open again negotiations on the subject of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty, and on every other which remains to be adjusted, and will have no objection that the seat of those negotiations should be transferred from Washington to this place.

Although my powers to treat respecting every subject connected with the commerce of the two countries may embrace that of a consular convention, yet, as this had not been contemplated by my Government, I am not, at this time, prepared to conclude an arrangement for that purpose.

I request your excellency to accept the assurance, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

PARIS, November 19, 1822.

SIR: I received last night, and have the honor to inclose, a copy of Mr. de Villèle's answer, (dated 15th instant,) to my letter of the 12th. You will perceive that, without taking any notice of the reasons I had urged why a distinct negotiation should be immediately opened on the subject of the claims against both Governments, he insists that this shall be treated in connexion with the question respecting the construction of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty. The object is too obvious to require any comments on my part, and this final decision leaves me no other course than to refer the whole to my Government.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

PARIS, November 15, 1822.

SIR: You have done me the honor to announce to me, on the 12th of this month, that you were authorized to negotiate a convention relative to the claims of American citizens against France, and to those of France against the United States, but that you have received no power to enter upon a negotiation concerning the interpretation of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty.

The discussions which have ensued upon this last point between your Government and the Minister Plenipotentiary of the King to the United States having come to nothing, and this question remaining thus undecided, it is as proper as it is just to renew the examination of it; it touches upon too great interests not to be treated with renewed attention and to be abandoned.

If a new arrangement takes place for the claims which are still in question, it ought to embrace them all, and the desire of the King's Government is to permit no difficulty to remain, and to leave nothing undecided in the relations of the two countries.

With this very motive, sir, I have demanded in the letter which I had the honor of addressing to you on the 6th of this month, that the negotiation to be opened upon the respective claims should likewise include a consular convention. If your powers for discussing these different points should not appear to you sufficiently extended for making them the object of a negotiation, I think, sir, that you will judge it proper to demand of your Government supplementary authority for coming to an arrangement which can only have the utility proposed by the two Governments, by its embracing all the questions and claims which are still in dispute.

I can only refer, sir, upon this subject, to the communications which I have had the honor of making to you on the 6th of this month, and with which you have doubtless made your Government acquainted.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my high consideration.

PARIS, January 5, 1823.

SIR: I had, after his return from Verona, a conversation with the Duke of Montmorency on our claims; I complained in strong terms of the decision taken by Mr. de Villèle, and said, that his insisting to connect that subject with the discussion respecting the construction of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty would be considered in the United States as an attempt to avoid altogether the payment of the indemnities due to our citizens. I then stated that the reluctance evinced by the Government of France to make a general arrangement on that subject had induced the President to authorize me to make a separate application for the Antwerp claims; that what had now taken place afforded an additional proof of the difficulties which stood in the way of a general transaction; and that, whilst this seemed indefinitely postponed, I hoped that the special application would at least be attended to, and receive a favorable decision.

The Duke, after some general observations on the earnest desire of France that all the subjects of difference between the two countries should be definitively arranged, and declaring that this was the only motive for insisting on a negotiation embracing all those points, said that to take up at this time any special claim appeared to him inconsistent with the official communication made to me by Mr. de Villèle, and that we must wait at least till I had received an answer from my Government, to whom I must of course have transmitted the correspondence. He promised, however, to lay my request before the King's council, but without giving me any expectation that it would be favorably received.

It is probable that even this has been prevented by the Duke's resignation, which took place a few days after our conversation; and I think it quite useless to renew, at this time, the application to his successor Mr. de Chateaubriand. I will therefore wait till I receive your instructions in answer to my several despatches on this subject.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

No. 25.

PARIS, February 27, 1823.

SIR: I had designedly abstained from answering Mr. de Villèle's last letter, of the 15th of November in order to be able to avail myself of any change in the ministry, or of any other favorable circumstance which might arise. The more I have reflected on the ground assumed by this Government on the subject of our claims, and on the attempt to connect their discussion with the question arising under the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty, the more I have felt satisfied that it was impossible that the United States should depart from the true construction of that article, and acquiesce in that contended for by France, and that a renewed discussion on that subject would be unprofitable, and lead to no result whatever. As a last but, I believe, unavailing effort, I have concluded to express that conviction to the French Government, and have, accordingly, addressed this day to Mr. de Chateaubriand the letter of which I have the honor to inclose a copy.

I have no doubt that there is not at this time any disposition to do us justice, and that if we were even to make some concessions, with respect to the article above mentioned, we could not succeed in making an arrangement on the subject of the claims satisfactory to the parties, or such as the Government of the United States would feel justified to accept. With that view of the subject, it appears to me evident that it is less disadvantageous to let the question rest for the present as it is than to entangle ourselves by consenting to blend it with the discussion of the Louisiana treaty; whilst, on the other hand, the communication of this determination, coming from me before any specific instructions can have been received from you, is less peremptory than if founded on these instructions, does not commit Government, and leaves the United States at liberty to resume, at a more favorable time, the negotiation on the ground which may then appear most eligible.

Independent of unforeseen circumstances which may alter the dispositions of this Government, I can perceive but one mode calculated to produce some effect. It is that the parties interested should petition Congress, and that there should be some marked expression of the sentiments of that body in their favor. The apathy of the great mass of the claimants, and the silence preserved in that respect during so many years in all our public discussions have, undoubtedly, produced here the impression that very little interest was felt on that subject, and, in some degree, contributed in rendering our efforts to obtain justice unavailing.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,
ALBERT GALLATIN.

No. 25, (a.)

Mr. Gallatin to Viscount de Chateaubriand.

PARIS, February 27, 1823.

SIR: I had the honor to receive his excellency Count de Villele's letter of the 15th of November last, by which, notwithstanding the remonstrances contained in mine of the 12th, his excellency being at that time charged with the Department of Foreign Affairs, still insisted that the discussion of the claims of individuals of both nations upon the two Governments, respectively, should not take place unless it was connected with a renewed negotiation on the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty.

A conversation I had the honor to have with his excellency the Duke de Montmorency, after his return from Verona, induced me to hope, although he did not encourage any expectation of a different result, that he would, however, again lay the subject before his Majesty's council of ministers. This circumstance, the subsequent change in the Department of Foreign Affairs, and the objects of primary importance which have heretofore necessarily engrossed your excellency's attention, have prevented an earlier official answer to his excellency Count de Villele's letter.

It has, together with the others on the same subject, as he had naturally anticipated, been of course transmitted to my Government. But, on a review of the correspondence of Mr. Adams with Mr. Hyde de Neuville and with myself, I must express my perfect conviction that the subject having been maturely examined and thoroughly discussed, there cannot be the least expectation that the United States will alter their view of it, or acquiesce in the construction put by his Majesty's minister on the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty.

It is not my intention at this moment to renew a discussion which seems to have been already exhausted, but I will beg leave simply to state the question to your excellency:

It was agreed by the article above mentioned that the ships of France should forever be treated upon the footing of the most favored nation in the ports of Louisiana.

Vessels of certain foreign nations being now treated in the ports of the United States (including those of Louisiana) on the same footing with American vessels, in consideration of the American vessels being treated in the ports of those nations on the same footing with their own vessels, France has required that French vessels should, by virtue of the said article, be treated in the ports of Louisiana on the same footing with the vessels of those nations, without allowing on her part the consideration or reciprocal condition by virtue of which those vessels are thus treated.

The United States contend that the right to be treated upon the footing of the most favored nation, when not otherwise defined, and when expressed only in those words, is that, and can only be that, of being entitled to that treatment gratuitously, if such nation enjoys it gratuitously, and on paying the same equivalent, if it has been granted in consideration of an equivalent. Setting aside every collateral matter and subsidiary argument, they say that the article in question, expressed as it is, can have no other meaning, is susceptible of no other construction, for this plain and incontrovertible reason: that, if the French vessels were allowed to receive gratuitously the same treatment which those of certain other nations receive only in consideration of an equivalent, they would not be treated as the most favored nation, but more favorably than any other nation. And since the article must necessarily have the meaning contended for by the United States, and no other, the omission or insertion of words to define it is wholly immaterial, a definition being necessary only when the expressions used are of doubtful import, and the insertion of words to that effect in some other treaties, belonging to that class of explanatory but superfluous phrases of which instances are to be found in so many treaties.

It might, indeed, have been sufficient to say that, in point of fact, there was no most favored nation in the United States; the right enjoyed by the vessels of certain foreign nations to be treated in the ports of the United States as American vessels, in consideration of American vessels receiving a similar treatment in the ports of those nations, not being a favor but a mere act of reciprocity.

Let me also observe that the pretension of France would, if admitted, leave no alternative to the United States than either to suffer the whole commerce between France and Louisiana to be carried exclusively in French vessels, or to renounce the right of making arrangements with other nations deemed essential to our prosperity, and having for object not to lay restrictions on commerce but to remove them. If the meaning of the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty was such indeed as has been contended for on the part of France, the United States, bound to fulfil their engagements, must submit to the consequences, whatever these might be. But this having been proven not to be the case, the observation is made only to show that the United States never can, either for the sake of obtaining indemnities for their citizens or from their anxious desire to settle, by conciliatory arrangements, all their differences with France, be brought to acquiesce in the erroneous construction put upon the article in question.

The proposal made by his excellency Mr. de Villèle in his letter of the 6th of November, and reiterated in that of the 15th, can, therefore, have no other effect than to produce unnecessary delays, and would, if persisted in, be tantamount to an indefinite postponement of the examination and settlement of the claims of the citizens of the United States. It will remain for his Majesty's Government to decide whether this determination be consistent with justice; whether the reclamations of private individuals should be thus adjourned because the two Governments happen to differ in opinion on a subject altogether foreign to those claims. Having nothing to add to my reiterated and unavailing applications on that subject, my only object at this moment has been to show that I cannot expect any instructions from my Government that will alter the state of the question.

I request your excellency to accept the assurance, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

PARIS, November 29, 1824.

SIR: Not having received any answer to the letter which, on the 22d ultimo, I addressed to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, I sent him a note, requesting that he would favor me with a conference at as early a day as his convenience would permit, and received his answer, appointing the 25th instant for that purpose.

I waited upon him at the appointed hour, and after an interchange of the customary salutations, I reminded him that I had signified to him my wish to converse freely with him on the subject of the claims of American citizens on the Government of France, and that the state of my health alone had prevented me from asking a conference on that topic prior to the transmission of my letter of the 22d ultimo. I then, in a concise manner, called his attention to the state of the negotiation, and expressed my hope that the French Government would no longer arrest the progress of the discussion by insisting on connecting it with the question arising out of the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty. The two subjects, I contended, were entirely dissimilar in their nature, and therefore could not, with any degree of propriety, be embraced in the same discussion. In the one case, American citizens ask indemnity for their property, which has been taken from them under the authority of the French Government and in opposition to the plainest principles of law and justice; in the other, the Governments of the United States and France disagree in their construction of an article in a treaty which has no relation to the question of claims. The justice of the claims of American citizens has never been denied by France, while the United States have not hitherto seen any reason to admit that France has any just claim under the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty. I asked him whether it was either just or reasonable that these claims should remain unsatisfied until the two Governments could agree in their interpretation of the treaty? Although the United States have been always ready to continue to discuss with France the question on the treaty, yet they cannot consent to connect it with claims for indemnity. I reminded him that in every instance in which France had presented a claim, either on behalf of the Government or her citizens, founded on any supposed injury done by the United States, the claim had been carefully considered, without entangling it with any other question, and, when well founded, had been admitted and settled; that the United States had a right to expect a corresponding course of fair conduct on the part of France, and, therefore, had seen with deep regret the ground assumed in the present instance and the delay consequent upon it. I concluded by expressing a hope that the negotiation for our claims, so long suspended, would be resumed, and repeated the offer already made, to embrace in the same negotiation any claims on the part of French subjects against the Government of the United States.

The Baron de Damas replied, that the time which had elapsed since he had been placed at the head of the Department of Foreign Affairs had been so short, and his immediate and indispensable duties so numerous, that he had not been able to make himself acquainted with the subject; that the correspondence was voluminous; and that, with the most earnest desire to answer my letter, he had not hitherto had the necessary time allowed him to give it even a cursory perusal; that, being unacquainted with the subject, he could not discuss it with me on equal ground, but that he hoped very shortly to give it a careful examination and to send me a definitive answer. I asked him if I could hope for it in time to send by the next vessel. He said that he could not promise to send me an answer the next week, nor could he precisely say at what time I might expect it, but that I should have it as soon as he could find time to prepare it. I assigned as a reason for wishing to be furnished with an early answer, the call made on the President by the House of Representatives at the last session. He said he was already informed of the proceedings of that branch of our legislature, and felt every disposition to bring the questions of difference between the two countries to a close as speedily as possible. The conference here terminated without the attainment of the object which induced me to ask it. I do not know at what precise time I may expect an answer to my letter, nor can I anticipate, from anything which passed at the interview, what will be the nature of the answer which I may receive.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient and very humble servant,
JAMES BROWN.

Mr. Brent to Mr. Addington, dated September 8, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you three memorials from sundry citizens of the United States, belonging to the State of Maine, accompanied by seven protests and affidavits, which exhibit the nature and extent of the facts referred to by the memorialists, complaining of the interruption which they have experienced during the present season in their accustomed and lawful employment of taking and curing fish in the Bay of Fundy and upon the Grand Banks, by the British armed brig Dotterel, commanded by Captain Hoar, and another vessel, a provincial cutter of New Brunswick, acting under the orders of that officer; and earnestly soliciting the interposition of this Government to procure for them suitable redress.

With this view I was charged by the Secretary, before his late departure from this city, to communicate to you the above papers, and to request your good offices towards obtaining for the sufferers the indemnity to which they appear to be so well entitled, not only from the peculiar nature and extent of the injuries and losses of which they complain, proved and illustrated as they are by the series of protests and depositions accompanying their memorials, but from the serious violation of the rights and liberties of the citizens of the United States which they involve, in the use of the same fisheries; and I have the honor, accordingly, to request that you will have the goodness to make such representations to the commanding officer of the naval forces of your Government on that station, or to the colonial Government of New Brunswick, as may be available, not only for the relief of the memorialists, but for the prevention of similar interruptions in future.

I have the honor to be, with distinguished consideration, sir, your obedient and very humble servant,
DANIEL BRENT.

Memorial of Aaron Hayden, Kilby, and others, July 27, 1824.

Memorial of J. G. Faxon.

Memorial of Aaron Hayden, John Burgin, and others.

To the Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State for the United States:

The memorial of the undersigned, merchants and ship owners, residing at Eastport, in the county of Washington and State of Maine, respectfully represents:

That your memorialists during the present year have invested a larger amount of property in vessels than they have heretofore done, for the purpose of carrying on the business of fishing; that the industry and enterprise of our seamen have been unusually directed to the employment of taking and curing fish, under the encouraging and beneficial laws of their country; and that, without interruption from a foreign power, their labors would have been crowned with success, and they would have enjoyed the fruits of their toil.

But your memorialists have to regret the necessity which compels them to state to the honorable Secretary their grievances, and requires of them to seek redress, through him, for the many acts of violence and injustice which have been committed by his Britannic Majesty's brig Dotterel, commanded by Captain Hoar, in total disregard and in violation of the subsisting treaty between the two Governments. Your memorialists, premising that the American fishermen in the Bay of Fundy, for these two or three years last past, have been interrupted and taken by British armed vessels, while fishing agreeably to the provisions of the treaty, beg leave respectfully to state that, during the present year, the British armed brig Dotterel has captured nine sail of fishing vessels and sent some of them into the province of New Brunswick for adjudication, while others have been converted into tenders, without trial, for the purpose of better molesting our fishermen. They have insulted and abused the crews, turned them on shore in a foreign country, entirely destitute and without the means of returning to their homes, and have said, repeatedly, that they would take American fishermen wherever they were to be found, and without regard to the treaty.

That the brig's barge has come into the wharf at Eastport, and taken and carried away two boats laden with flour.

That the American fishermen have been so molested on the fishing ground in the Bay of Fundy, common to both countries, that they dare not again attempt to avail themselves of the rights and privileges secured to them by treaty, and which are well defined and well understood by every fisherman; and inasmuch as they are debarred the privilege of making a harbor, for the purposes of shelter, and to purchase wood and procure water, it operates as a deprivation of a great and important benefit, which they feel that they have a right to enjoy without interruption.

That, unless something be done for the protection of our fishermen, your memorialists believe that many vessels of this and the neighboring States will be captured or thrown out of employ, with great injury to private interest, and not without an infringement of public rights.

Referring the honorable Secretary, therefore, to the annexed affidavits of the masters of three of the captured vessels, and holding ourselves responsible for the truth of the above allegations, your memorialists respectfully request that some prompt and efficient measures may be adopted by our Government to protect us in our rights and pursuits, and that our fishermen may not be molested, nor our shores invaded with impunity by the subjects of any foreign power.

EASTPORT, July 27, 1824.

I, Robert Small, master of the schooner Reindeer, of Lubec, do testify, declare, and say: That I sailed from Lubec, in the State of Maine, in the above schooner, on July 22, 1824, on a fishing voyage in the Bay of Fundy. On Sunday, July 25, finding our water very bad, went into a harbor in an uninhabited place called "Two Islands," near Grand Menan, for the purpose of procuring a fresh supply of wood and water. That we picked up about one cord of drift wood from off the beach of said island and filled two barrels of water from a spring or brook on said island. And on Monday morning following, about four o'clock, got under way and towed out of the harbor, it being calm; and when from one to two miles from the shore we were boarded by a barge from the British man-of-war brig Dotterel, containing nine men with arms, &c., commanded by an officer from said brig of the name of Jones, who took possession of my vessel and papers, and brought her to anchor, menacing myself and crew with violence, threatening our lives, &c. They then took out all our crew with the exception of myself, put them on board the schooner Friend, Coggins, of Lubec, which vessel they also captured and made a cartel of, as they termed it, manned my vessel and ordered her for St. Andrew's, New Brunswick.

While on our voyage we had caught no fish within from six to eighteen miles from shore. We had no goods or merchandise on board, nor did we go into a harbor for any other purpose than to procure wood and water.

EASTPORT, July 27, 1824.

I, Elisha Small, of Lubec, Maine, on oath declare and say: That on the 7th of July instant I left Lubec as master of the schooner Ruby, on a fishing voyage in the Bay of Fundy; and on the 25th of July, being nearly destitute of wood and water, we made for the outer islands lying near Grand Menan, and, finding the sea so heavy that we could not land, we went into the harbor of the "Two Islands," so called, to get a supply. We got in there between three and four o'clock p. m., when I sent my boat and seven hands to fill water and get wood. We got one boat load of drift wood and filled four barrels of water, when daylight shut in and we had not time to get more. The wind died away calm, and we could not get out of the harbor again that night. The next morning we got under way with a very light wind, and got out of the harbor, and it died away calm again. We were then boarded by a barge belonging to the British armed brig Dotterel, commanded by an officer of said brig by the name of Jones, and having on board nine men armed with guns, cutlasses, dirks, and pistols. Jones demanded my papers, which I delivered up, and ordered my crew forward; told his men to go down and search the vessel; they found nothing but fish, and salt, and fishing gear. He then told my crew to take their dunnage, ordered them on board the fishing schooner Diligent, which had previously been taken, and sent Captain Ficket of the Diligent to Lubec with the men. We had no merchandise on board the said schooner Ruby; had not caught a fish or attempted to catch one within five miles from the shore, nor had we been into any harbor until the one above named.

EASTPORT, July 27, 1824.

I, Elias Ficket, master of the schooner Diligent, of Harrington, Maine, do testify, declare, and say: That on the sixteenth of July, eighteen hundred and twenty-four, I left Eastport, Maine, in the above schooner, for a fishing voyage in the Bay of Fundy; that on Sunday, the twenty-fifth of July, being nearly destitute of water, we repaired to a place called "Two Islands," lying to the southward of Grand Menan about three-fourths of a mile, and on which there are no inhabitants, and procured two barrels of water from a spring or brook on said island. On Monday morning, got under way, and, the wind being light, towed out of the harbor, and when about one and a half mile from the shore, while attempting to get on the fishing ground (which is six to nine miles from any shore) we were boarded by a barge from the British man-of-war brig Dotterel, commanded by a sailing master whose name was Jones, and having on board nine men, taken possession of, and ordered to receive on board the crew of the schooner Ruby, of Lubec, which vessel they had previously captured, and to sail immediately to Lubec, as a cartel; thereby interrupting us in our lawful employment and destroying our fishery. I further declare that we had no goods or merchandise on board our schooner; that we did not go into a harbor for any other purpose than to obtain a supply of water.

We were not fishing where we were captured, nor had we attempted to catch fish within more than six miles from the shore while on our voyage. I further declare that we were badly used by the barge's officers, threatening to shoot us, &c., &c. And they said their orders were to capture all Americans they met with, right or wrong; that there was no treaty, and that Americans should not fish in British waters.

ELIAS FICKET.

Then personally appeared the said Elias Ficket, and made solemn oath that the foregoing statement by him subscribed was true. Before me,

To the Hon. JOHN Q. ADAMS, Secretary of State:

The undersigned, inhabitants of the county of Washington, in the State of Maine, interested in the fisheries in the Bay of Fundy, beg leave to represent:

That although till the present year the privileges reserved and confirmed to American fishermen by the convention of 1818 have been enjoyed with but few interruptions, they are now, in a great measure, cut off and prostrated by the piratical conduct of the commander of his Britannic Majesty's brig Dotterel and the officers under his command, aided by the provincial cutter attached to the port of St. Andrew's.

That the officer having the charge of the armed boats ordered to cruise round Grand Menan and Campo Bello has written instructions, which have been exhibited to our citizens, from the commander of the Dotterel, to seize and send into St. Andrew's all American fishermen found within three marine miles of said islands. That under these orders that officer, without any pretence other than such instructions, has seized the following vessels:

Schooner Pilgrim, of Lubec, Woodward master; schooner Hero, of Denneyville, Clark master; schooner Rebecca, of Addison, Wass master; schooner Galeon, of Lubec, Hunt master; schooner William, of Addison, Tabbut master; schooner Ruby, of Lubec, E. Small master; schooner Reindeer, of Lubec, R. Small master.

The Pilgrim and the Hero were captured while under sail, standing for Lubec in distress, and more than three miles from said Grand Menan. And, although this capture took place on the sixteenth day of June last, said schooner Hero has not been sent in for trial, but has been armed, and is still used as a tender to said brig Dotterel, the more easily to decoy other fishing vessels. The Rebecca went into Grand Menan in distress for wood and water, and, having obtained a supply, was preparing to return to the fishing ground, when she was taken. The Galeon, with seventy quintals of fish on board, went in for the same purpose, and, within a few minutes after she had accomplished her object, it being quite late in the evening, and the fog extremely dense, she was taken and sent to St. Andrew's. The William, with one hundred and twenty quintals of fish on board, left the fishing ground in distress for want of water, and had come to anchor near the shore of Grand Menan, her sails were not handed, nor was her boat launched from the deck to go on shore, when she was seized and taken to St. Andrew's. The Ruby and Reindeer went into Two Island harbor for wood and water, near Grand Menan, and were immediately seized.

We beg leave here to observe that American fishermen have no occasion nor inducement to violate the provisions of the aforesaid convention, nor have they, as we firmly believe, in any instance, given just cause for complaint.

The protest of the master and crew of the Galeon has already been forwarded you. Those of the Hero and Pilgrim will accompany this memorial, and will, we trust, establish the facts relative to the wanton detention of those vessels, as well as show the indignities cast upon the American flag and the insults offered the citizens of the United States by the British officers of the Dotterel and provincial cutter.

To claim these vessels in the Vice Admiralty courts in New Brunswick would be worse than a total loss; for, besides the fact that the claimant must give bonds to the amount of £60, currency of New Brunswick, to pay costs of libel, whether condemnation takes place or not, his vessel, should he prevail in a claim, (proverbially hopeless,) will come to his hands in a dismantled and ruinous state. No care is taken of American vessels seized for a pretended violation of British revenue laws; for, as they can never sail under British papers, but must be broken up or taken from the country, the seizing officer has no inducement to keep them in good repair, with the expectation of being remunerated for particular attention by a more advantageous sale. Certificate of reasonable cause of seizure, to prevent a suit for damages, is never refused by the Vice Admiralty judge of New Brunswick to a British naval officer, when the proper application is made. To appeal, therefore, to the provincial courts for redress would be worse than unavailing. It would only aggravate the damages already sustained.

To the successful advocate of the rights of American fishermen, it need not be urged that this state of things is peculiarly vexatious and ruinous. To the owners and crews of the vessels detained, and to their families, it is in many instances oppressive and distressing, and they are left without redress unless their own Government interpose. To that Government they appeal, and they do it with full confidence that their complaints will be heard and their wrongs redressed.

To the Hon. JOHN Q. ADAMS, Secretary of State of the United States:

The memorial of John Gardiner Faxon, merchant, of Lubec, in the State of Maine, humbly sheweth:

That the said John G. Faxon is sole owner of the schooner called the Galeon, of said Lubec. The said schooner, being on a fishing voyage in the Bay of Fundy, was seized and detained by part of the officers and crew of the British armed brig Dotterel, and is still detained in the British port of St. Andrew's, by the authority of the commander of said brig, under the circumstances set forth in the protest annexed, which seizure and detention is to the great damage of the said John G. Faxon; wherefore your memorialist humbly prays that the honorable Secretary will cause such proceedings relative to the said premises as he may think proper to relieve the said owner and crew of the said schooner Galeon. And your memorialist will ever pray, &c.

And your memorialist further states that the just value of the schooner Galeon, with her cargo and equipments, at the time of her capture and detention as aforesaid, was fifteen hundred dollars.

JOHN G. FAXON.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Maine, Washington, ss.

Be it known to all to whom these presents may come: That on this 22d day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, before me, Solomon Thayer, notary public, by legal authority duly commissioned and sworn, and dwelling at Lubec, county and State aforesaid, personally appeared Harding Clark, master of the pink-sterned schooner Hero, of Dennysville, Ephraim Clark, and William H. N. Brown, fishermen on board said schooner, who, being severally sworn, do depose, declare, and say: That on the 11th day of June, now last past, they sailed from Dennysville in said schooner Hero, fitted for a fishing cruise of six weeks, and arrived on Monday morning, being the 14th of said June, on the fishing ground called the Grand Menan Banks, from nine to twelve marine miles from land, and commenced fishing; that they continued to fish till Wednesday, the 16th day of said month, when the schooner struck adrift. It was then about 9 o'clock a. m. Got under way immediately and attempted to regain the fishing ground, but could not effect it by reason of a strong tide. Kept beating to windward towards the fishing ground, and, the tide slackening, got within about half a mile of it, and from six to nine miles from any land, when an armed boat, said to belong to the British armed brig Dotterel, fired two muskets, loaded with balls, across said schooner Hero. She was rounded to, and an officer came on board and took forcible possession of the vessel and her papers.

The declarants further depose and say, that they were kept sometimes on board said schooner, sometimes on board the Dotterel or some of her boats, from that time till the twenty-ninth day of said June, and were allowed for a part of this time only one meal per day. That they were every night in harbor and near home; but though they earnestly solicited to be set on shore, it was not granted them, but were forced, by threats and menaces that they would be cut in pieces in case of refusal, to do the same duty as the common British sailors. They were at last landed at St. John, a distance of eighty miles from Dennysville, and even subjected to great expense and distress in getting home.

The declarants further say, that said schooner Hero has been manned and armed, and is still made use of as a tender for said brig Dotterel, and has never been libelled or sent in for trial. And the said Harding Clark for himself saith, that when he was set on shore at St. John his pocket book and private papers were taken from him and detained.

Wherefore they do protest, and I, the said notary, in their behalf, do solemnly protest, against the winds, seas, tides, armed boats, pirates, the wanton and flagrant abuse of power, and whatsoever else that caused the seizure and detention of said schooner Hero, and for all damages, costs, and expenses sustained, and to be sustained, by reason of such illegal and wanton detention of said schooner as aforesaid; and I, the said notary, do aver that the same was caused, not by a breach of the revenue laws of Great Britain and the United States respecting the fisheries, done, made, or committed by said schooner Hero, but was wholly without any fault on the part of said schooner, or any person thereof, but an act of piracy committed on the high seas without a pretence of authority.

In faith whereof, I, the said notary, have hereunto set my hand and affixed my seal of office the day and year first above written.

HARDING CLARK.
WILLIAM H. N. BROWN.
EPHRAIM CLARK.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Maine, Washington, ss.

To all whom it may or doth concern: Know ye that on the twenty-third day of July, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and twenty-four, before me, Solomon Thayer, notary public, by legal authority duly appointed, commissioned, and sworn, and dwelling in Lubec, State and county aforesaid, personally appeared Charles Tabbut, master of the fishing schooner William, of Addison, and noted his protest; and now, on the twenty-third day of August, anno Domini eighteen hundred and twenty-four, he again appears to extend the same, and with him also appear Thomas Wright, Benjamin Reynolds, and Josiah W. Perry, fishermen belonging to said schooner William, who, being severally sworn, do declare and say: That, on the first day of July, now last past, they sailed in said schooner William on a fishing cruise in the Bay of Fundy, and anchored between what is called Mur-ground and the Grand Menan Banks, a distance from nine to fifteen miles from land; that they continued there at anchor and fishing till the fourteenth day of said July, when, having only fifteen gallons of water on board, and that unfit for use, it was thought prudent and necessary to run into Gull Cove, Grand Menan, and obtain a supply. Arrived at Gull Cove on the fifteenth of said July, at 2 p. m., and came to anchor, the fog being extremely dense. The sails of the William were not handed, as it was intended to obtain water with all possible despatch and return to the fishing ground. They had gone below and were taking dinner, and not more than ten minutes from the time of anchoring, the boat not having been launched from the deck to go on shore, when they were boarded by an armed launch, commanded by one Jones, an officer of the English gun brig Dotterel, who demanded their business, their papers, and took forcible possession of the vessel. Jones sent his men below to examine the water casks and ascertain what quantity of water there was on board the William. They reported there were three half casks of water below, one empty barrel, and one with the hoops off. Mr. Jones was then told by these declarants that the report of his men was incorrect, that one barrel only had any water in it, and that but fifteen gallons, completely unfit for use; that besides this there was a half barrel of molasses and a barrel with five or six gallons of beer. Mr. Jones ordered the William under way, took her in nearer the shore, moored her in a dangerous place and stripped her, and took the William's boat, carried it on shore, and gave out word that if any of the William's crew attempted to go on shore, or if any boat was called alongside, or if he heard any noise on board, he would shoot them. They were thus left till near sunset without a drop of water fit to drink; though they frequently hailed Mr. Jones as he passed and repassed, and stated to him their distress and begged for water, their prayer was wholly disregarded. About sunset a vessel from Campo Bello anchored alongside, and by permission of the captain thereof they obtained from the shore a two-gallon keg filled with water.

These declarants further say, that when Mr. Jones became satisfied there was no water fit for use on board the William, in a violent rage, he said "the American fishermen had been damned saucy to the inhabitants on Grand Menan." The master of the William, one of these declarants, replied that such an allegation did not apply to his vessel; that he had always used the inhabitants as he wished to be treated himself. Jones then said "it was damned well for him he had done so, for otherwise he should have confined him to the deck and cut him into ounce pieces." To this the master of the William replied he should not give himself any uneasiness on that account. Jones, with an oath, replied to this, "damn you, I will confine you to the deck and lash a pump brake across your mouth."

The declarants further say that, on the next day, the William was got under way, and taken to St. Andrew's and stripped; that she had over one hundred and twenty quintals of fish on board when she was captured. Wherefore, they do protest, and I, the said notary, in their behalf, do solemnly protest, against said Jones and the armed men under his command, against pirates and piratical seizures, and detentions of American fishermen, and whatsoever else caused the forcible detention of said schooner William, and for all expenses, costs, charges, and damages paid or sustained, or to be paid or sustained, by reason of said detention. And I, the said notary, do solemnly aver and declare that said detention was not by reason of any breach of the revenue laws of Great Britain, or of the province of New Brunswick, done or committed by said schooner William, or any one on board thereof, but an unauthorized, a wanton, a piratical act of the said Jones and his abettors.

In faith whereof, I have hereunto affixed my seal of office, this twenty-third day of August, anno Domini eighteen hundred and twenty-four.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Maine, Washington, ss.

Be it known to all to whom these presents may come: That on this twenty-fourth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, before me, Solomon Thayer, notary public, by legal authority duly commissioned and sworn, and residing at Lubec, State and county aforesaid, personally appeared Hubbard Hunt, junior, mate of the schooner Galeon, of Lubec, Nehemiah Small, Daniel Jay, junior, John Hunt, and Edwin Hunt, sharesmen, belonging to said schooner, who, being severally sworn, do depose and say: That on the first day of July, now current, they sailed in the said schooner from Lubec on a fishing cruise to the Grand Menan Banks. On their way thither, and while doubling round the southerly end of Grand Menan, distant about six miles, with their colors at masthead, they were fired into by the St. Andrew's cutter, McMaster commander, and ordered to come under said cutter's lee. Mr. Baxter, an officer of said cutter, came on board and demanded her papers, sent his men into the hold to search her, and went himself for the same purpose into the cabin. After detaining the Galeon about half an hour, she was permitted to proceed. Arrived on the Banks the same day and commenced fishing; on the fifteenth day of said month, having only five gallons of water on board and no wood, run in for Grand Menan to get a supply. Arrived at Beal's Passage about half-past 7 p. m.; fog quite thick; went on shore and got two barrels of water and a boat load of wood by permission of Charles Blumorten, the owner; it was then about 9 o'clock of the same evening. Having got supper, and intending to get under way as soon as the landmarks could be discerned to return to the Banks, they were boarded by an armed boat belonging to the English brig Dotterel, and their papers demanded and taken. The vessel was immediately got under way by order of Mr. Jones, the commander of the armed boat, and run into Gull Cove. The next day the Galeon was taken to St. Andrew's, stripped, and made fast in the King's dock.

The declarants further depose and say, that from the time they left Lubec, on the first day of said July, until they run in in distress for want of wood and water, on the evening of the fifteenth of said month, they had never been within three marine miles of Grand Menan, nor caught, or attempted to catch, any fish within from ten to twenty miles thereof. That after they were taken, the officer, Mr. Jones, positively promised them that he would release the Galeon as soon as she arrived at St. Andrew's; and it was their reliance on his promise, and the belief he could not be so wanton as to add insult to injury, but that he would redeem his word, that they have not protested before. She is still retained. Wherefore they now protest, and I, the said notary, in their behalf, do solemnly protest, against the flagrant abuse of law (and the right granted to American fishermen by treaty) by armed boats under the British flag, without a pretence of authority; against pirates, the winds, seas, and whatsoever else may have been the cause of the capture and detention of the Galeon; and I do aver that the capture and detention was not by reason of a violation of any revenue law of Great Britain, or an infraction of any privileges granted by the convention, done or committed by said Galeon or any of her crew, but was done without a pretence of right, and substantially an act of piracy.

To all to whom this public instrument of protest may come: Be it known, that on the 22d day of June, now last past, before me, Solomon Thayer, notary public, by legal authority duly commissioned and sworn, and dwelling at Lubec, county and State aforesaid, personally appeared James Woodward, master of the fishing schooner Pilgrim, of Lubec, and noted his protest; and now, on this 7th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, he again appears, and with him also appear Jacob Winslow and James Woodward, jr., fishermen, who, being severally sworn, do depose, declare, and say: That on the 8th day of June aforesaid they sailed from Lubec on a fishing voyage to the Grand Menan Bank, so called, but, owing to thick weather and head winds, did not get on the fishing ground till Monday, the 14th day of said June. They then came to anchor (the wind blowing quite fresh and a high sea) twelve miles from any land. At 4 p. m. of the same day they found the vessel drifting; hauled in the cable, and found the anchor broke close to the stock. Made sail and got on to another part of the fishing ground, nine miles from land, and then continued to fish till Wednesday, the 16th day of said June; but finding their only remaining anchor too light to hold the vessel in so strong a current, weighed it and stood for Lubec to obtain a new one. The same day, at about 3 p. m., were fired upon and brought to by an armed boat belonging to the English armed brig Dotterel, who took their papers, and ordered Jacob Winslow and Benjamin Scott, fishermen, on board the tender, putting one seaman and one marine on board the Pilgrim. This was done while the Pilgrim was under way, and from four to six miles from land. The seamen in the Pilgrim were ordered to follow the tender, which then steered east and still further from land, and took forcible possession of the American schooner Hero, Harding Clark master, also under sail and standing for Lubec. Both vessels were then taken into Flagg's Cove, Grand Menan, and anchored. On Thursday, the 17th of said June, asked permission to be set on shore, but were denied. On the 18th got under way and stood for the Wolf islands; at 6 p. m. both vessels were ordered to heave to, and the Pilgrim's boat to be sent on board the tender. The officer then compelled one of these declarants, James Woodward, jr., only seventeen years of age, to row the boat alone, cross-handed, a distance of not less than four miles, to board vessels lying at the easterly part of the Wolf islands, and then to row back again to the tender. On the officer's return to the tender he ordered the Pilgrim to stand in for the eastern Wolf island; and these declarants were compelled to row her (it being then a dead calm) for four miles to gain said place, where she was anchored for the night. On the 19th, at 8 a. m., got under way and stood to Beaver harbor, and came to anchor; were then forced to unbend the sails of the Pilgrim and stow them below. On the 20th, at 8 a. m., were ordered to bend the sails and get under way, which was done; and, after beating with the wind S.S.E. and a flood tide for three hours, were ordered back to Beaver harbor. On the 21st, at 6 a. m., were ordered to get under way; beat all day against a strong head wind, and at night anchored in Mason's Bay.

At 1 o'clock the next morning, these declarants, knowing that the Pilgrim had violated no law, nor any treaty or convention between the United States and Great Britain, and that they were detained without the pretence of authority on the part of the officer of the armed boat, got said Pilgrim under way without orders, and stood for Lubec, where they arrived on the said 22d day of June, with the loss of boat, papers, a fowling-piece, a pistol, and a great quantity of powder and shot, which were plundered from them by said armed boat.

Wherefore they do protest, and I, the said notary, in their behalf, do solemnly protest against said armed boat and the officer and men on board thereof; against pirates and unlawful captures on the high seas; against winds, tides, and whatsoever else caused the detention of said schooner Pilgrim and the loss of her papers, boat, &c.; and I, the said notary, do aver that it was not by reason of a violation of any revenue law of Great Britain, committed by said schooner Pilgrim, or any of her crew, but a wanton insult upon the American flag, on the high seas, without a shadow of excuse, by an officer of the British Navy.

Hon. JOHN Q. ADAMS, Secretary of the Department of State.

Charles Tabbutts, master of the schooner William, of Addison, on oath, deposeth and saith: That he sailed on board said schooner, on a fishing cruise, on the 1st day of July, 1824; anchored between what is called the Grand Menan Banks and the Mur-ground; continued at anchor and fishing till the 14th of July, when, having on board only fifteen gallons of water, and that unfit for use, it was determined best to run into Gull Cove and obtain a barrel of water; arrived there on the 15th, about 2 p. m., and came to anchor; the fog very thick; did not hand the sails, as we intended to get the water on board and go back. While below and taking dinner, and not more than ten minutes from the time of anchoring, our boat still on deck, we were boarded by a Mr. Jones, an officer of the Dotterel, our papers demanded and taken into his possession. He demanded our reasons for being there, and was told them. He sent his men below to see how much water we had; they reported that there were three and a half barrels of water below, one empty barrel, and one with the hoops off. Mr. Jones was then told by me that there was no cask but one that had any water in it, and that had only fifteen gallons, and so bad it could not be used; that there was one half barrel of molasses, and a barrel with five or six gallons of beer. Mr. Jones ordered the William under way, took her in towards the shore, moored her in a dangerous place, and stripped her; took the boat and carried her on shore, and gave orders that if any of the William's crew went on shore, or any boat was called alongside, or if he heard any noise on board, he would shoot us. We were thus left without a drop of water fit to drink till sunset; though we frequently hailed Mr. Jones, and stated our distress, as he passed us, we were wholly disregarded. About sunset a vessel from Campo Bello anchored alongside, and, by permission of the master, the deponent went on shore and got a two-gallon keg of water. On the 16th instant the William was got under way by Mr. Jones and taken to St. Andrew's.

The deponent further saith, that when Mr. Jones found there was no water on board fit for use, in a violent rage he told this deponent that the American fishermen had been damned saucy to the inhabitants. The deponent replied that he had not been saucy to the inhabitants, but had always used them as he wished to be used himself. Jones replied that it was damned well for me that I had been so, or he would otherwise confine me to the deck and cut me into ounce pieces. I told him that I should not give myself any uneasiness on that account. Then, with an oath, he said, damn you, I will confine you to the deck and lash a pump-brake across your mouth.

On this 23d day of July, 1824, personally appeared before me Charles Tabbuts, and made solemn oath to the truth of the foregoing statement by him subscribed.

Mr. Brent to Mr. Shepley, Attorney of United States for the District of Maine.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, October 8, 1824.

SIR: In the absence of the Secretary, I have the honor to transmit to you the inclosed copy of a letter from Mr. Addington, the British chargé d'affaires at this place, in answer to remonstrances from this Department, upon the complaints which were lately exhibited to it by sundry citizens of the United States, residing in the State of Maine, and engaged in the fisheries, against the commander of the British armed brig Dotterel, for interruptions and other injuries which they state to have experienced at the instance and under the orders of that officer, in the prosecution of their accustomed employment during the present season, and requesting his good offices towards obtaining for them the redress to which they may be entitled; and I beg leave, at the same time, to trouble you with copies of the letters and documents referred to, and inclosed in Mr. Addington's letter, which exhibit serious complaints on the part of the British authorities against all or very many of the same individuals, in reference to the subject-matter of their own complaints. I do this with the request that, as soon as convenient, you would have the goodness to institute an inquiry into the circumstances particularly complained of by the British chargé d'affaires, and communicate the result to this Department, that the Secretary may be enabled, with the advantage of the counter statement to be thus expected, as I doubt not he will, to give Mr. Addington satisfactory explanations in relation to the transactions complained of by him; or otherwise to direct such proceedings to be had as the circumstances of the whole case shall render advisable and proper.

I am, with great respect, sir, your obedient and humble servant,

DANIEL BRENT.

WASHINGTON, October 5, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of two letters, one dated the 8th and the other the 21st ultimo, which Mr. Brent addressed to me, in pursuance of instructions from you, relative to certain American fishing vessels averred to have been detained, in violation of the terms of the convention of 1818, by his Majesty's sloop Dotterel, in the Bay of Fundy, in the months of June and July last.

I shall not fail to communicate, without loss of time, the whole of the papers relative to this matter to the Admiral commanding his Majesty's naval forces at Halifax; and in so doing shall strongly recommend that a full and impartial investigation be made into the merits of the various cases therein reported, the result of which shall be forthwith imparted to you whenever it comes to my knowledge.

Meantime, sir, I must inform you that a report of those very occurrences, of a nature very different from that made by the individuals to you, has reached me from Rear-Admiral Lake, of whose letter, together with its inclosures, I have the honor to transmit to you copies herewith.

It is therein made to appear that the fishing vessels above mentioned were detained by the Dotterel solely on account of their having been detected in the commission of a direct infraction of the treaties existing between the two nations, having, in fact, been found pursuing their occupation without the boundaries assigned to them by the terms of the convention of 1818.

On this point, however, the parties are at issue, each stating his case according to his own view of it. Thus far, therefore, there is ground for a candid and impartial investigation on both sides. Such I have recommended to Admiral Lake, and such, I trust, you will also cause to be instituted here.

But there is another point, sir, on which I lament that there should be no ground for doubt or hesitation as to the course which I have to pursue.

By a perusal of the inclosed documents you will perceive that, after the detention of the Reindeer and Ruby by the master of the Dotterel, and while on their way to St. Andrew's, "an attack was made on those vessels by two schooners and an open boat, under American colors, full of armed men, with muskets and fixed bayonets, amounting to about one hundred, headed by a Mr. Howard, of Eastport, who is said to be a captain in the United States militia, in consequence of which the master thought it most prudent to surrender to such superior force."

This, sir, is an outrage of such a nature as to leave me no other alternative than to make a formal demand from the American Government for the infliction of punishment on the offenders.

Whether the vessels were legally detained or not, such an act of violence will bear no justification. If individuals are permitted to expound the stipulations of treaties for themselves, with arms in their hands, the preservation of harmony and good understanding between nations can no longer be hoped for.

I am disposed (no person can be more so) to act fairly and openly by the citizens of this Republic, wherever they have just ground of complaint against British authorities, and shall accordingly take every measure for ascertaining whether the detention of the vessels in question was legal or not.

If it was not legal, you have abundant proof, sir, in your own hands of the disposition of his Majesty's Government to afford the most prompt and equitable redress to the parties aggrieved. I allude to the case of the American schooner Charles, detained and employed as a tender last year by his Majesty's sloop Argus. That act, you will recollect, was condemned as illegal by his Majesty's ministers, and restitution ordered to be made to the parties who suffered through the exercise of it, although otherwise liable, by the illegality of their conduct, to the entire loss of their property.

But in the meantime, sir, it becomes my duty to demand reparation, by the punishment of the transgressors, for the act of violence perpetrated on persons bearing his Majesty's commission, while engaged in the discharge of their public duties.

I feel confident, sir, that you will view this outrage in the same light as myself, and consider such conduct equally dangerous to the peace and well being of the two countries; and I have no doubt that you will see the expediency of causing immediate proceedings to be instituted against the principal actors in this disgraceful scene.

I beg, sir, that you will accept the renewed assurances of my distinguished consideration,
H. U. ADDINGTON.

Rear-Admiral Lake to Mr. Addington.

HALIFAX, September 9, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you a copy of a letter, dated 26th ultimo, from Captain Hoare, of his Majesty's sloop Dotterel, with its inclosure from Mr. John Jones, master of that sloop; also copies of two letters from Captain Hoare, dated the 2d instant, one of them containing a copy of the affidavit therein mentioned.

By the first of these communications you will perceive that two American vessels, called the Reindeer and Ruby, were seized by the master of the Dotterel in Two Island harbor, Grand Menan, on the 26th of July, for a breach of the treaty between Great Britain and the United States; and that on the evening of the same day, when abreast of Harbor de Lute, proceeding to St. Andrew's, an attack was made on the vessels in question by two schooners and an open boat, under American colors, full of armed men, with muskets and fixed bayonets, amounting to about one hundred, having the appearance of militia men, and headed by a Mr. Howard, of Eastport, who is said to be a captain in the United States militia; in consequence of which, the master thought it most prudent to surrender to such superior force.

Captain Hoare's next letter mentions his having, on the 29th ultimo, on his passage to Halifax, fallen in with the American schooner Madison, (by her papers, Ansel Coggins master,) which he was informed was one of the vessels to which the men belonged who rescued the before mentioned vessels from his master; and that, finding on board this vessel a man, named Daniel Rumney, whom one of the marines of the Dotterel identified as one of the persons concerned in the rescue, Captain Hoare thought proper to detain the vessel, and take Rumney on board the Dotterel as a prisoner.

Captain Hoare's other letter refers to the Pilgrim, an American fishing vessel, seized by him at Grand Menan, in June last, for a breach of the treaty; which vessel was afterwards rescued by some of her crew, in conjunction with one of the men whom Captain Hoare had put in charge of her; and the said vessel having been fallen in with on the 29th ultimo, and a man named Winslow, who, Captain Hoare was informed, was one of those actively engaged in the forcible rescue of the said vessel, she was taken possession of, and the man (Winslow) put on board the Dotterel as a prisoner.

As in these transactions his Majesty's officers have been assaulted in the execution of their duty by armed subjects of the United States, and the property of which they had, in his Majesty's name, taken lawful possession, rescued from them, in violation of the treaty subsisting between Great Britain and the United States, I consider it necessary that the subject should be brought officially before the American Government, in order that steps may be taken to prevent the continuance of such proceedings, and therefore request you will be pleased to adopt such measures on the occasion as shall appear to you to be necessary.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

W. T. LAKE, Rear-Admiral and Commander-in-chief.

HIS MAJESTY'S SLOOP DOTTEREL, August 26, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose the copy of a letter from the master of his Majesty's sloop under my command, detailing the circumstances of his having been attacked off Campo Bello by two armed schooners under American colors, and that two American fishing vessels he had detained were taken from him and carried into Eastport.

I have the honor, &c.,

HIS MAJESTY'S SLOOP DOTTEREL'S BOAT, St. Andrew's, N. B., July 27, 1824.

SIR: I beg leave to represent that on the 25th instant, when cruising in the yawl, in pursuance of your orders, off the Grand Menan for the protection of our fisheries, I received information of several American fishing vessels being at anchor at Two Island harbor, and that two of them, namely, Reindeer and Ruby, of Lubec, were at White Island harbor on the 24th, where they got their wood and water, and that, on their anchoring, they fired their muskets, and told the inhabitants they were armed, and would not allow any man-of-war's boat to board them; and after they had their supplies they shifted to Two Island harbor, Grand Menan.

I made sail from Gull Cove, and at daylight, the 26th, observed four schooners at anchor at Two Island harbor, which vessels got under way on our appearing; when I got close to three of them they lashed alongside each other, and all hands, about thirty in number, went on board the middle one with their firearms and fish spears. I desired them to separate, which they refused to do until I threatened to fire on them. On boarding, they proved to be the Reindeer, master's name Small, and Ruby, master's name Small, (brothers,) of Lubec, two fishing vessels, and Friend's shallop, of the same place.

It being fine weather, and they not being in want of wood or water, I detained the Reindeer and Ruby, and put their crew, with the exception of their masters, on board the two Americans schooners, with provisions, for a passage to Lubec, and made sail in the Reindeer and Ruby for St. Andrew's, through East Quoddy. About 6 p. m., when abreast of Harbor de Lute, I observed two schooners and an open boat, full of armed men, muskets and fixed bayonets, hoisting American colors; one of them went alongside. Mr. Towneau, in the Ruby, boarded and took the arms from him and his three men; the one abreast of me was kept off for about a quarter of an hour, when they commenced firing into us. Though with great reluctance, I thought it most prudent to surrender to such superior force, having but four men, one musket, and three cutlasses. On delivering them up, I found there were in the two schooners about a hundred armed men, including the crews of the schooners, about thirty in number, the rest having the appearance of militia men, and headed by a Mr. Howard, of Eastport, said to be a captain in the United States militia.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

Captain Hoare to Rear-Admiral Lake.

HIS MAJESTY'S SLOOP DOTTEREL, Halifax Harbor, September 2, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, while running past the Outer Bank of the Grand Menan, on the 29th ultimo, on my passage to this place, I fell in with the Madison, American fishing schooner, (by her papers, Ansel Coggins master,) and as I was informed by Winslow, one of the crew of the Pilgrim, American fishing vessel, and who was then on board the Dotterel, that she was one of the schooners that attacked the master off Harbor de Lute on the 26th of July, and the master having affirmed that the name of the vessel that attacked him was the Madison, though he cannot swear to the vessel, as all that description of vessels are so much alike, but he believes her to be the same; and, on the crew coming on board the Dotterel, one of them, Daniel Rumney, was immediately recognized by William Vickery, one of the marines in the boat with the master, as being one of those who were in and took an active part in the vessel that attacked them, and on boarding the said Madison it was discovered the master had left her, and, as she had her boat out, I have no doubt he had gone on board one of the other fishing vessels to escape detection, as he would have been immediately recognized by the master; and as some dates on the back of the papers relative to her arrival and leaving Lubec at different periods prove her to have been at Lubec about the time of the master's having been attacked; these circumstances, together, left no doubt in my mind of her being the Madison, that, with another schooner, named the Diligence, attacked the master off Harbor de Lute on the 26th of July, and I therefore took possession of her, and ordered her to this port; as it appears to me, sir, that the circumstance of two armed schooners attacking and taking from a British officer and boat's crew two vessels he had legally detained is an act of piracy, and all those concerned therein ought to be punished.

I have, for the present, detained Daniel Rumney on board, and I have to request you will be pleased to solicit the advice of the Attorney General on this important subject, that I may be guided thereby in my proceedings relative to the said Daniel Rumney.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

Captain Hoare to Admiral Lake.

HIS MAJESTY'S SLOOP DOTTEREL, Halifax, September 2, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, while running past the Outer Bank of the Grand Menan, on the 29th ultimo, on my way to this port, I fell in with the Pilgrim, American fishing schooner, and as this vessel had been taken by one of my boats on the 16th of June, at Grand Menan, for infringing the treaty, but was retaken by the crew, aided by James Martin, one of the two men put in charge of her, I have taken possession of, and ordered her to this port.

Inclosed, sir, is the copy of an affidavit, made by William Paine (marine) and the other man in charge of the Pilgrim, on their arrival at Lubec, by which affidavit you will see, sir, that a man by the name of Winslow, one of the crew of the Pilgrim, was the most active person in retaking her, and that he forced the cutlass from William Paine and obliged him to go below. Under these circumstances, I felt I should be justified in considering him a prisoner, and, as such, he now remains on board the Dotterel. That he ought to be punished in some way that may deter others of his nation from committing the same offence under similar circumstances, I am sure, sir, you will think necessary.

I have, therefore, to request you will be pleased to solicit the advice of the Attorney General on this important point, that I may be governed thereby in my proceedings.

I have the honor to be, &c., &c.,

Admiral LAKE.

Copy of the inclosure in the foregoing letter.

William Paine, one of the marines belonging to his Britannic Majesty's brig the Dotterel, maketh oath and saith: That, on Wednesday last, the American fishing boat Pilgrim was seized for a violation of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, and the deponent, with James Martin, seaman, put on board to take charge of her; that on the night of the 21st instant, between the hours of 11 and 12, it being Martin's watch, he, this deponent, was awoke from sleep by the roll of the vessel; that he attempted to go on deck, but found the companion doors shut; this deponent then broke open the companion doors, armed himself, and went on deck, and ordered Captain Woodward, the master of the boat, then at the helm, to put the boat about; he refused; Martin was rowing; this deponent went forward and ordered him to drop the oar; but he would not, till this deponent threatened to cut his head off if he did not; while this deponent was thus endeavoring to get the vessel about, Winslow and Martin suddenly sprung upon him, and obliged him to go below. This deponent was then brought to this place in the said boat Pilgrim against his will, and against all the exertions in his power to make.

Benjamin Scott, one of the hands on board the Pilgrim, on oath, saith: That the foregoing statement of Mr. William Paine is, according to his best knowledge and belief, substantially true; that he was below when Mr. Paine armed himself and went on deck, and soon after he returned, and said he had been overpowered and his arms taken from him; that the Pilgrim was taken by Woodward and Winslow, aided by Martin, to Lubec. This deponent further saith that Woodward and Winslow both acknowledge that Mr. Paine discharged his duty to the utmost of his power; that superior force alone caused him to surrender his arms.

BENJAMIN SCOTT.

STATE OF MAINE, Washington, ss.

To all to whom these presents may come: Know ye, that on this twenty-second day of June, anno Domini 1824, before me, Solomon Thayer, notary public, by legal authority duly commissioned and sworn, and residing at Lubec, personally appeared the aforementioned William Paine and Benjamin Scott, and made solemn oath that the declarations by them personally made and signed were just and true.

In testimonium veritatis,

HALIFAX, September 2, 1824.

I, the undersigned, one of his Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county, residing in Campo Bello, do hereby certify that on the twenty-third day of June, 1824, William Paine, the person in the annexed instrument mentioned, appeared before me, and declared the facts therein contained, which appear to me to be correct. That Solomon Thayer is a notary public for the county of Washington, in the Province of Maine, United States, duly appointed, and that full faith and credit may be given to his attestation.

SACO, November 16, 1824.

SIR: Having been requested by letter from Mr. Brent, under date of the seventh of October last, to institute an inquiry into the circumstances particularly complained of by the British chargé d'affaires, and to communicate the result to the Department, I have now the honor to inform you that I repaired to and near to the places of residence of the parties to those transactions, called upon them and took their statements under oath, which are herewith inclosed, and by which you will be enabled to understand fully and correctly the whole history, not only of the circumstances complained of, but of all the proceedings of the captain of the British armed brig Dotterel in relation to our fishermen, and their proceedings to protect themselves, as they supposed, from the losses occasioned by the conduct of the captain of the Dotterel.

It may, I think, sir, with safety be affirmed that the inclosed documents (being the affidavits of twenty-seven individuals, and relating to thirteen schooners and boats and one small boat,) present a fair and faithful history of all the proceedings this season between our fishermen and the officers of that vessel.

I have been particularly cautious, in taking the testimony, to give it without coloring it by the feelings of excitement manifested by our citizens.

Inclosed, also, is a bill of services and expenses for attending to the business.

With the highest respect, I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

ETHER SHEPLEY, District Attorney.

I, Robert Small, master of the schooner Reindeer, of Lubec, on oath, testify and say: That it is my practice, in fitting out for the fisheries, to fill the barrels which I use for oil barrels with water, and, as I use the water and empty the barrels, to fill them with oil. I purchased the barrels while fitting out this cruise, and did not see them till after filled; there were eight filled with water. We left the harbor the twenty-sixth day of July, and proceeded on the fishing ground near Grand Menan Bank; continued to fish two or three days, and then discovered that the water in six of my barrels was salt, so that I could not use it, the barrels having been used for salting beef and pork. Finding my water all bad and expended, ran in to Two Island harbor for water, and went on shore and obtained my water; laid there till the next morning, becalmed; then made sail for the Banks; got out about a mile and a half or two miles, and the wind died away and left me becalmed again; soon discovered the barge of the British armed brig Dotterel, the Ruby, the Friend, and boat Diligence, lying in the same harbor, and near me; the barge came up and fired; ordered the anchor to be dropped, which was done; the master of the barge then ordered us to part—the Ruby and Reindeer being connected by a small line—which was obeyed; the vessels parted; he then ordered the Ruby to drop her anchor, which was done; he then came on board our vessel, the Reindeer, in a great rage; he demanded the papers, which were given him; they then threatened to carve us up like a turkey or a piece of beef, brandishing their cutlasses about our heads; took the crew all out and put them on board the schooner Friend; then took out the crew of the Ruby and put them on board of the schooner Diligence, and ordered the Friend and Diligence off; told them to go off and about their business; then got the Reindeer under way, bound for St. Andrew's, and ordered the Ruby to follow; passing up a little past Harbor de Lute, two other vessels hove down upon us; one, the schooner Madison, came down upon the Reindeer, there being about twenty men on her deck with muskets, but no bayonets upon them; Jones, the master of the barge, being on board of the Reindeer, ordered all hands and directed them to fire into the Madison; I then said to him, if you fire into that vessel, every man of you will be shot; he said, I believe it; he then said, what do they want, and who are they? I said to him, they are my neighbors; they want this vessel, and they will have her; he then laid down his sword and said, I surrender; unlocked his trunk, took out the papers of my vessel and the Ruby and gave them to me; Skipper Coggins then invited him on board the Madison; and upon my assuring him that he might go with perfect safety, he went on board, drank with us, shook hands, and parted with us; went on board his barge, and went off; the Reindeer and Ruby then went home; the vessel has been laid up since, as I did not dare to let her go out; and the crew has been upon charges also; the injury to the owner and crew has been fifteen hundred dollars. I was in no other British harbor, except at Buck's Rock, in Grand Menan, where I went in the night in a heavy blow, and went out again before morning. I saw no person; was not on shore; never fired any musket on the island, nor did I ever state that I was armed or intended to resist; had only one old musket on board; fishermen always carry one or two; the crews of the vessels Reindeer, Ruby, and Diligence, were not on board the middle one or any one of the vessels, nor was there any show of fire-arms or fish spears on board of either of the vessels; they were not lashed together for resistance. This is not only a common practice, but is necessary in this bay, where the tide is very strong and runs in different directions. There was not a gun fired into the Reindeer or at her while in Jones' possession, nor was there a gun fired at all till after Mr. Jones had gone on board the Madison, and then only as an expression of joy; nor was there any gun fired at the Ruby; nor did the Diligence or any person on board of her demand or take any arms from those on board the Ruby when she was retaken; they did ask for one of their own muskets which the barge had taken from them, and it was brought to them; this was after the Ruby had been surrendered. I have not fished any within five to six miles of the land this year. There is no fishing ground nearer the shore, nor any object in going near shore, except for wood and water.

Paul Johnson, jr., master of the schooner Sally, of Eastport, on oath, declares: That he sailed the 13th day of May last, fitted out for the fishery on the Labrador coast, and proceeded on the voyage; on the 4th of June, the wind being east and weather coming on thick, thought it prudent to make a harbor, and ran into Shelburne, on the south side of Nova Scotia, and anchored, and was boarded by a boat from the British armed brig Dotterel; was asked what business I had there? I told him I was bound to Labrador, and thought I had a right to make a harbor. The Sally was then ordered under way and carried alongside the brig, and an officer came on board and searched us; was told I had broken the treaty, and should be detained. The next morning my whole crew were taken out and put on board the Dotterel, and my vessel was manned from the Dotterel and sent on a cruise to Cape Negro harbor, about nine miles; there several small vessels were boarded from us; continued there two days, then got under way and proceeded back to Shelburne, and anchored alongside the Dotterel. The captain then sent for me to come on board the brig; went on board; was asked if I was master of the Sally; answered that I was. He said he did not know but my vessel would be condemned if he carried her in, but he should let me go; was told I must pay for my men's rations while they were on board the Dotterel, and I sent on board the Dotterel fifteen pounds of pork and eighteen pounds of bread, and then took my men on board again and proceeded on my voyage.

I, Heberd Hunt, skipper of the schooner Galeon, of Lubec, Daniel Joy, jr., Nehemiah Small, and John Hunt, hands on board, on oath, testify and say: That we sailed in said schooner from Lubec on the 1st day of July last, fitted out for the fisheries, and proceeded for the fishing ground near Grand Menan Bank; being on the passage, and six miles distant from the southwest head of the island of Great Menan, the provincial revenue cutter, Mr. McMasters master, came down upon us and fired upon us; ordered us under his lee. We hove to under his lee; he sent his boat aboard; demanded the papers, which were delivered; searched the vessel, and then dismissed us, saying we might proceed on to the Banks. We then proceeded to the Bank, and continued to fish fifteen days on and near the Bank, from fifteen to eighteen miles distant from the land; then, being in want of water, having lost part of our water by injury accidentally happening to one of the casks, and being also in want of wood, found it necessary to make a port to obtain wood and water; ran for the island of Grand Menan, and made it a little to the north of Woodward's Cove; obtained our water, and then proceeded to the mouth of Beale's Passage, to obtain wood, being unable to obtain it where we did our water, and there obtained a boat load of drift wood; towards night, being below, eating our only meal for the day, having neither wood nor water to cook before, were boarded from the barge of the British armed brig Dotterel; was asked where the vessel belonged; our papers were demanded and delivered, and the vessel was immediately ordered under way. The skipper stated to the master of the barge that he came only for wood and water; that he had not fished any near the land, and thought he had done nothing which he was not authorized to do by the treaty. The master of the barge said, what is the use of talking about the treaty—damn the treaty; I did not come here to learn my lesson—I learned it before I came. One of the hands, named Joy, was threatened to have his mouth gagged with the pump bolt for conversing with some of the crew of the barge, and was sent on shore on White Head island; the vessel and remainder of the crew were carried to St. Andrew's; the vessel was afterwards sold at St. Andrew's; the crew were turned out of the vessel and everything detained but our wearing apparel. The loss to the owners and crew has been as much as one thousand dollars. We have been on board of the schooner during all the time she was employed this season until taken, and do positively aver that we have not fished at any time within more than six miles of the land, and have not, at any other time, been within any British harbor.

We also testify that, about the middle of June last, being on the gravelly ground about nine miles southeast of the island of Grand Menan, Jacob Winslow came on board of us from the schooner Pilgrim to borrow an anchor, stating that they had lost their anchor; having broken one anchor, could not lend him one. The next day the Pilgrim, being at anchor about half a mile outside of us, and more than nine miles from the land, soon got under way to go home and obtain an anchor; and, having passed us nearly a mile toward the land, a tender to the Dotterel came down upon her, and fired upon her, and took possession of her, she then being eight miles to the southeast of Grand Menan. The same day, about an hour after, the tender took possession of the schooner Hero, of Dennisville, Clark master, she being at the time about a mile outside of us, and ten miles southeast of the island of Grand Menan.

John G. Faxon, of Lubec, on oath, declares: That he was the owner of the Galeon when she was captured by a barge of the brig Dotterel. On or about the seventeenth day of July last, the Galeon having been captured and lying in Snug Cove, in Campo Bello, I went on board of her to learn the reasons of her capture. The master, Jones, informed me that he had no other reason for the capture than finding her in a British harbor in Grand Menan. I then asked him if he was not aware that we had a right to go in for wood and water; he said he knew we had that right, but his orders were such that he was obliged to take all, whether in for that purpose or not. I asked if he had known or suspected my vessel had fished near the land. He said he never had. I then asked him if he had not reason to believe they were in want of wood and water when they went in. He said he had, for the wood and water was on deck, not stowed away, when he took them. I then asked him how long he supposed they had been lying at anchor. He said the men told him three-quarters of an hour, and he had no reason to believe otherwise. I then said, by your own statement you ought not to have taken her. He said he should not have taken the Galeon if he had not before taken the William, and should have let her go if he could have done it without excusing the William. He then said, as I have them thus far I must carry them to St. Andrew's, but I give you my word your vessel will not be detained two hours. I then rehearsed that part of the treaty to him authorizing our vessels to go in for wood and water. He said they were authorized to take all vessels within three miles of the land. I afterwards heard the orders given by the captain to Jones read; they directed him very nearly, and I believe exactly, as follows: "You will consider your cruising ground to be the Menan islands, Campo Bello, and the island of Lubec. You will take all American fishermen found within three miles of the land, except in extreme cases of distress, and carry them to St. Andrew's, there take an inventory of the articles on board and deliver the same to the custom-house."

I further state that I sent an attorney to St. Andrew's to ascertain the expediency of defending the vessel; that I learned through him that I must first give a bond of seventy pounds to pay costs. That the costs must be paid by me whether the defence was successful or not, and that there was little prospect of obtaining a decree of restoration without having an appeal entered; and that the expense attending the trial would probably exceed the value of the property, and therefore declined making any defence.

I, Jones Wass, of Addison, in the State of Maine, testify and say: That I was master of the schooner Rebecca, of Addison, of the burden of about twenty-seven tons; that I sailed from Addison on the first day of July, 1824, in the said schooner, fitted out for the fisheries; that I proceeded in said schooner and made the "Mur-ground," about fifteen miles southeast of the island of Grand Menan, the same day, and anchored the next morning; caught a few quintals of fish; it came on to blow fresh, and I went in and anchored about half a mile from land, under the island of Grand Menan; went on shore in a boat with a barrel and obtained a barrel of water, for which I went to the island; and having put the water on board, got under way, and, standing off to the fishing ground, perceived the barge of the British gun brig Dotterel giving chase, and continued to proceed on the same course, the barge still pursuing till evening, it being about 3 o'clock p. m. when we left the island, the barge firing a number of times; at dark we lost sight of the barge, being then near the Nova Scotia shore; then returned partly back to the fishing ground and hove to under the foresail, and the next morning came in and anchored at Gull Cove, in the island of Grand Menan, where were six other American vessels; got under way again an hour after sunrise and stood out to sea; the wind blew so fresh that we could not anchor on the fishing ground that day, and we returned and anchored again at Gull Cove. The next morning, being the fourth of July, got under way and proceeded to the fishing ground first mentioned, and on Monday, the fifth, continued on the Mur-ground, fishing; on Tuesday, the sixth of July, in the morning, the wind blowing fresh, we hove up and laid to under her foresail, and about 8 o'clock a. m., weather being thick, and nearly out of wood, went into or near Gull Cove. About 10 o'clock the barge came alongside, all hands being employed in dressing fish, and ordered us under way, and said he was going to carry us into St. John's; demanded my papers, which were given up. I declined navigating my vessel by order from the barge, and the master of the barge directed his own crew to get her under way, which was done. We were carried to St. John's in the Rebecca, and put ashore, and we made the best of our way home, leaving the vessel. She now lies at the wharf in St. John's. No libel or proceedings have ever been instituted against the Rebecca that I can learn; and have learned from the Collector of the port of St. Andrew's that a few days since she had not been libelled. The Rebecca was owned wholly in Addison by Wilmot Wass, Lemuel Wass, and myself. The place in Grand Menan called Gull Cove had been formerly pointed out by the British authorities, on the island as well as on the water, as the place where we should be permitted to anchor and throw the "gurry" overboard. The loss to the owners must be at least seven hundred dollars.

I, John Wright, on oath, declare: That I was mate on board of the Rebecca, and that all the facts above stated in the affidavit of Jones Wass, which has been read to me, are true.

ETHER SHEPLEY.

I, Charles Tabbut, on oath, declare: That I was master of the schooner William, of Addison; that I sailed on or about the 27th day of June, 1824, fitted out for the fisheries, and proceeded to the fishing ground, on and near Grand Menan Bank, and continued to fish, from fifteen to eighteen miles distant from Grand Menan, until the thirteenth day of July, and on the fourteenth, having lost some of our water, found ourselves in want of water, having only half a barrel on board, and that too bad for use; then ran into Grand Menan for water, that being the only place, as the weather then was, where we could obtain it, and on the fifteenth anchored at Gull Cove, in Grand Menan; had been at anchor about ten minutes, when we were boarded from the barge of the British armed brig Dotterel; the papers were demanded and delivered, and the men from the barge were ordered below to search for arms, (found two muskets;) took the arms and knives. I asked the master of the barge what he was going to do with us? He answered that we had been damned saucy to the inhabitants. To which I replied that I had never been ill used by the inhabitants, nor ill used them; I had never before been in to the land, and could not have used them ill. The master of the barge then threatened to cut me into ounce pieces, to lash me to the deck, and to gag me with the pump bolt or pump brake. The vessel was then got under way, carried near the shore and moored and stripped, the boat taken away, and we were left on board the vessel thus stripped, and deprived of the boat, and without water, and lying in a dangerous place. The master of the barge said if we called a boat, or landed, or made any noise, he would shoot us. He passed us several times, and I called to him and asked for water; he answered that he would come to our assistance, but did not. Despairing of obtaining any from the barge, I called to the master of an English vessel, who aided me with a boat to go on shore and obtain a little water; I went, and obtained a few gallons. The next morning the master of the barge came on board again, and carried the vessel to St. Andrew's, and reported to the Collector there that we were found in Grand Menan, in want of neither wood nor water. After endeavoring to obtain a release of the vessel, without success, was ordered to leave the vessel, and did leave her. I asked the master of the barge how he could detain my vessel contrary to the treaty? He damned the treaty, and them that made it. The vessel was owned by William Wass and William Nash. She was libelled, deemed forfeit, and sold, no person appearing to claim her; and the reason that no person claimed her was, that the costs and expenses attending it would be as much as the vessel was worth. The loss to the owners and crew must be near two thousand dollars.

I, Christopher Wass, on oath, declare: That I was managing master of the schooner Sea Flower, of Addison, my son being master, and sick on shore, and the vessel having, during the previous part of the season, been employed in the fisheries, and sailed on the twentieth of September, on the Grand Menan Bank, and continued there fishing on Tuesday and Wednesday; and about 8 o'clock p. m., Wednesday, blowing fresh from the west, hove up the anchor and laid to under the foresail. The wind during the night drew into the northwest and blew very heavy and split her foresail; reefed the sail above the rent and set it again, and laid till daylight; then stood to the northward and eastward, and made the southwest head of Grand Menan, bearing north by east; made the Mur Rocks and obliged to go between them, and fetched in to Kent's island, near Grand Menan, being Thursday morning. Friday and Saturday, blowing fresh and storming, could not mend our sail. Sunday, continuing to blow fresh, laid still. Monday went out on to the outer part of the rips, five or six miles from the land; caught a few fish, and, continuing to blow so that we could not anchor, came in and anchored again at Kent's island. Tuesday went out to the rips again, still blowing fresh and raining, and heavy sea from the eastward; could not anchor; caught only a few fish, and in running in carried away our fore-shrouds; hauled down the foresail and ran into the same harbor again. Wednesday morning was boarded from a tender to the British armed brig Dotterel; papers were demanded and delivered; asked what business we had there, and was answered that we were riding out the gale with both anchors ahead. The master of the tender, after much entreaty, consented to give up to us most of the fish and salt, and next morning set all hands on shore at Kent's island, and carried the vessel to St. Andrew's, where she now lies. No proceedings have been instituted against her that I can learn. She was owned wholly by me, and my loss will be as much as seven hundred dollars. I have never heard of any complaints against the vessel, other than that she was found in the harbor, and was accused of going in too frequently during the last few days.

I, Joel McKinsey, on oath, declare: That I was a hand on board the boat Rover, of Addison, fitted out for the fisheries; that we sailed the first part of the month of October, 1824, and proceeded as far as Little river, where we lay about nine days wind bound, and caught some herring; went out on Friday morning for the Seal islands, but, finding the wind unfavorable, concluded to proceed to the southwest head of Grand Menan, and laid to six or seven miles from the island, to the westward, fishing; while lying in this situation a tender to the British armed brig Dotterel passed between us and Grand Menan, eastward, and went round the point of the island out of sight; we continued fishing, and drifted nearer to the island, and the tender, about the middle of the day, returned and fired a gun towards us, we being then to the westward of the island, and distant from it four or five miles; the tender came up and spoke to the skipper of the boat, and asked him what business he had there; he answered that he had a right to fish there, for he was in our own waters; our papers were taken, and we were ordered to follow the tender, and followed her into Seal Cove, in the western end of Grand Menan, where we were sent on shore, and the boat started for St. Andrew's. The boat was owned by William Nash. The loss to the owner will be about two hundred and fifty dollars.

The next morning we were directed to leave the boat and go ashore, and did so; the boat started for St. Andrew's. The loss to the owner and crew must be two hundred and fifty dollars.

ETHER SHEPLEY

I, Jacob Winslow, of Dennysville, being a hand on board of the schooner Pilgrim, of Dennysville, James Woodward master, sailed from Lubec about the 11th day of June last, and proceeded on to the outer grounds of the island of Grand Menan, and began to fish the 14th, being then from 10 to 12 miles distant from the island, wind blowing fresh and tide strong; broke an anchor and struck adrift; got under way and dressed our fish. The next day went on board of the Galeon, Hunt, to borrow an anchor, and could not obtain one; next morning anchored on the ground called the Gravelly Bottom, near the schooners Galeon and Hero, and distant from 8 to 10 miles from the island; caught from 10 to 12 quintals of fish, and then struck adrift; then finding ourselves unable to work to advantage with one anchor, and that a light one, concluded to go home to get one; about half an hour after a vessel from the southeast came down upon us, and fired several times; came on board, and proved to be a tender to the British armed brig Dotterel; demanded and took our papers, and took out two of the hands, myself and Benjamin Scott, and put us on board the tender; asked us what we were doing there, and answered that we had been fishing; master of the tender said we had no business to fish there in British waters, and would make us smart for it this year; he asked me what land it was in sight? said he had never seen it before; was told it was the island of Grand Menan; asked if there was any harbor into which I could pilot him, and being informed there was, asked me to pilot him in, which I did; before he was carried in, the master of the tender asked what vessel was ahead of us: told him I did not know; he said he would know, and bore down upon her, directing the Pilgrim to follow; he ordered a marine to fire upon the vessel, and he fired several times; soon came up with her, and she proved to be the schooner Hero, and boarded her; inquired why they did not heave to at the first fire; master of the Hero answered him that no colors were shown, and he did not know that anything was wanted of him; the papers of the Hero were then demanded and delivered, and two men taken from her and put on board the tender, and two of the tender's men put on board the schooner; the tender was then piloted into a harbor by me, taking with her the Pilgrim and Hero; the master of the tender inquired if there was any custom-house officer of his Majesty on the island; being informed there was not, then asked if there was any other King's officer, and was told there was not except the pilot; then went ashore and examined till about 11 o'clock at night, when with difficulty he came on board again, and was very violent; laid there three days; then got under way and went up to the Wolves islands, and went ashore; tarried there a short time, then asked me to pilot him into Beaver harbor; there ordered all sails of his own and the two other vessels unbent and carried on shore; then asked him to permit me to go home, as I had done before, but he refused; told him I would give him a bill of sale of the boat if he would let me go, she being mine, but he declined; I complained of hard treatment, and he threatened to shoot me and to tie me; next morning directed sails brought on board and bent; got under way and beat out of the harbor, bound, as he said, to St. John's; saw a vessel, and inquired if I had seen an armed brig; being answered that I had seen her at St. John's, we returned to Beaver harbor and tarried that night, then started again for St. John's; beat up about halfway to St. John's, and anchored in a place called Mason's Bay in the evening; about 10 o'clock the coxswain came on board the Pilgrim, I having been previously sent on board of her to sleep, and brought a pint of rum, and ordered the men to keep a strict watch, and left us; as soon as the lights were out on board the tender, one of the men on board of us from the tender being below asleep, the other one proposed going away with the Pilgrim to the United States. We soon got the Pilgrim under way and started for Lubec. The man who was below asleep then came on deck and asked where we were going. I told him to Lubec. He told me as there was but little wind he thought we should be caught, and had better go back. I said we would keep out of their reach. He said, if taken, they would shoot him; and then went below, and soon came up with two cutlasses, and said he would split any man's brains out, in the King's name, that offered to resist him. This it was advised that he should do to clear him from harm in case we should be taken, he having agreed before we started to the adventure; and he ordered the man to desist who was rowing, then knocked off Captain Woodward's hat. I then went and took one of the swords from him, and the other he laid down and went below. We came on home to Lubec with the vessel, obtained an anchor, and in four or five days after sailed again on to the Bank of Grand Menan, fifteen miles or more distant from the island, and continued there fishing four or five days, one of the men who came from the Dotterel still continuing with us by his own desire. Was informed that the schooner Hero, an American vessel which had been captured, was fitting out and armed by the British to take me; saw the Hero soon after boarding several vessels, and got under way and went up to Mount Desert, and fished there four or five weeks, and then returned to Dennysville and washed out our fish, and eight days after sailed again, and went on to Marblehead Bank, so called, and began to fish, the island of Grand Menan bearing north-northeast, eighteen leagues distant, and continued to fish there six or eight days; then stood into Grand Menan Bank, being five or six leagues distant from the island, and anchored, and laid to, being Sunday, and all turned in. Soon the Brig Dotterel came upon us, and sent a boat with five men on board, with cutlasses drawn; inquired for Martin, the man who had come away with us, and continued to fish with us. I told him I did not know; believed he had gone to Boston; asked me, if I was skipper of the vessel, and answered I was in place of one; asked for the papers, and I declined delivering them; told him they had one set of her papers; was told to get into the boat and go on board the brig, and did so. They then got the Pilgrim under way; the captain of the Dotterel asked my name; was told it; said he had got a pretty good history of my character; told him I had not robbed anybody, or killed any one, or stole anything; he asked for Martin; was told I did not know; believed he had gone to Boston; then said to him, if you are going to keep the vessel, if you will put me on board one of these fishermen, that I may go home, I shall be much obliged to you. Home! said he; yes, if you want to go home, I will carry you home to Halifax, where I will have you tried and hung. I asked him to let me go on board the Pilgrim and get my clothes. He said no, damn you, you shan't have any clothes; asked again for my clothes, and was permitted to go and get them; asked him if he was to give me anything to eat; he said no; asked him if I should fetch some provisions from my own vessel, and how much; he said fetch a week's provision; went aboard the Pilgrim, and was putting up some provision, when Jones, who was on board, and had command of the Pilgrim, called me up; told him the captain told me to get some provision, but he would not permit me to get more than twelve or fourteen biscuit, and four or five pounds of pork; was ordered to get into the boat and go on board the brig. By this time they had searched in the hold of the vessel, and found Martin hid there, and put him in the boat. When we went on board the brig, found five or six marines, with muskets and fixed bayonets. They took Martin and carried him below. I was sent aft, and kept there, guarded by marines, till 8 or 9 o'clock in the evening. Soon after, was sent down the after hatchway, and shackles put upon my ankles, and a large bar of iron put through them and fastened to the deck, and an old sail, with the ropes in it, given me to lie on; and thus I was kept four days, then took out and carried me, under guard, upon the quarter deck, where I found the officers paraded. Captain charged me with threatening their men's lives, and threatening to throw them overboard; I told him I had done no such thing; he said Paine (who was the man on board the Pilgrim that came up with the swords) had told him so, and that I would have done so, unless I had been prevented by Scott, one of my own men. I told him I could not have used a brother better than I did Paine. Captain then said if I would tell him where the Ruby and Reindeer were he would let me go with my vessel. Told him I did not know, and if I did, would not tell him. We had now arrived at Halifax; asked the captain what he should do with me; he said I should be carried to St. John's and hanged. Asked him for something to eat, telling him my own provisions were all gone; he said I ought not to have anything to eat. The next day I asked him again for something to eat, having had nothing; said he had not yet seen the Admiral, and I could have nothing till he had seen him. I then told him I had robbed no one, was no pirate, but thought he was; for if I was to be put to death he should do it like a man, and not starve me to death; told him I wished to go ashore and be put in prison. On the fourth day after I made application for food, and had none for all this time; was taken on deck, and told I was to go to St. John's to be hung, and two-thirds of a sailor's allowance given me, and continued this way sixteen days, and then came out and came on to the Banks of Grand Menan, and the next morning made a harbor in New Brunswick; then went to St. John's, and captain went on shore and came back, and sent the pilot down to me, who told me to go to the captain and tell him that you will give him a bond for sixty dollars to bring the vessel to St. John's, and he will give you an order for her, and you take good care not to fetch her here. I went up, and captain said, I suppose you want to go home, don't you? I answered yes. I suppose if you went home you would give me a pretty name, would you? Told him I would give him no worse name than he deserved. Then asked if ever I was in jail there. Told him no. He said I should be before night. Told him I should prefer that to being on board. He then told me if I had any friends in St. John's that would give him a bond for forty dollars, I might go to Halifax and get my vessel, and bring her to St. John's. I went ashore in his boat, procured a bond, and brought it to him; he then told me I must not give him a bad name, but be thankful that he had let me go and given me my vessel; he took the bond for forty dollars to deliver the vessel there in thirty days, and gave me an order for my vessel; said, you will take care, I suppose, not to come with her. Told him thought I should. I then quit his vessel, and came directly home. The vessel is still at Halifax, I suppose; I have not been after her. The above is a true history of the whole proceedings of the Pilgrim this season. I have been in her all the time. She has never been in any British harbor except where mentioned, nor fished in any other place than is above stated. The loss of property is one thousand dollars.

William Howard, aged fourteen, on oath, declares: That he, with two other boys, aged seventeen and thirteen, last August took a small boat belonging to Mr. Thomas Brown, the boat having about fifteen feet keel, and went down the bay a fishing, and passed by the little island called the Thumb-Cap, about half a mile, and fished there about an hour and a half; then went towards Casco Bay island, and fished perhaps three-quarters of an hour, then started to come home; got up to Friar's Bay, in Campo Bello, and the Dotterel hailed us; we went up and on board the Dotterel, and they took our boat and moored her alongside, kept us until next morning, and then set us on shore on Campo Bello; they have detained the boat and used her, and still do, as a boat for the Dotterel. Have often seen the boat passing in the waters with the Dotterel's men. We went out for pleasure fishing, and to get a fresh fish for our own use. William Howard is an apprentice to a blacksmith.

Thomas Brown, on oath, declares: That he was the owner of a small boat which William Howard and two other boys took and went out to fish in. They came back without the boat, and said she was taken from them by the Dotterel. I went to St. Andrew's to find her, and asked one of the officers of the Dotterel to let me have the boat, but was told I could not have her. I then applied to Mr. Dunn, the Comptroller of the Customs at St. Andrew's, to get him to intercede with the captain of the Dotterel for the boat. He answered me that he could not; that no report of such a seizure had been made to him; that the captain was a bad fellow, and had the day before insulted the custom-house. I returned without the boat; have since observed her to be used by the Dotterel's men, and believe she is still in use as a boat to the Dotterel. She cost me about twenty-two or three dollars, with the apparatus.

I, Elisha Small, master of the schooner Ruby, of Lubec, on oath, testify and declare: That I sailed the eighth day of July, fitted out for the fisheries, and went on and near to the Grand Menan Bank, and continued there to fish sixteen or seventeen days; then ascertained that our wood and water were expended: the wind blew heavy from the north, and after attempting, without success, to gain the American shore, put in to Grand Menan, in Two Island harbor, to procure wood and water; this was the twenty-fifth day of July, in the afternoon, and laid there till the next morning, having obtained my wood and water; and by 5 o'clock next morning got under way to go out of the harbor; soon saw the barge of the Dotterel lying under the Green islands, and said to the others we should be taken; the wind died away; we were becalmed, and the barge came down upon us and took us. The Reindeer, the Friend, and the Diligence being near, small lines were passed from my vessel to the Reindeer and the Diligence, I being between them. When the barge came within, say one hundred rods, she fired over our heads, and then a second time near us, without speaking us; then came near and ordered the Reindeer to let go her anchor, and all to cast apart; the anchor was let go; then he went and boarded the Friend, which lay thirty or forty rods distant; then came again with their arms for action, and ordered us to cast apart, which was done; the reason we did not cast apart at first was, that we did not fully understand the order; then took possession of the Reindeer. I then went on board the Reindeer; he then came and took possession of the Ruby. I asked why he took me, and asked him if I was not allowed to go in for wood and water; he said I was, but it was time I was out; told him I had departed before I had obtained as much as I wanted. I mentioned to him that the treaty allowed us to go in for wood and water; he said he did not care a damn for the treaty; every vessel he caught within three miles of the land he would make a prize of; he took out the crews and put my crew on board the Diligence, and the Reindeer's crew on board the Friend, and told the Friend and Diligence they might go; put a midshipman and three men on board the Ruby, and directed them to follow him to St. Andrew's, he being on board the Reindeer. We beat up round East Quoddy, and got up opposite Indian island, when the Diligence and Madison came upon us. The Diligence came upon the Ruby, having her own crew and five of my crew and two men from Eastport, twelve in all, on board, armed with muskets, and hailed us and told us to give up the vessel. I told the midshipman I would go below; he asked me not to go; said he would give up the vessel; he gave up the vessel. The Diligence took possession of her, and the midshipman and his men went on board the barge. The Ruby was brought in. The crews of the three vessels, which were connected in Two Island harbor, were never collected on board of my vessel, she being the middle one, with muskets and fish spears; nor was there any such show of resistance made, or any such collection of men on board of either vessel. When the vessels were retaken, there was not a gun fired till after they were both retaken, and then only by way of rejoicing. They gave out that they would have the Reindeer and Ruby if they had to burn Moose island. I did not, therefore, think it prudent to trust her at sea again. The loss to the owner and crew will be five hundred dollars.

I, Benjamin Small, on oath, declare: That I was a hand on board the schooner Ruby when she was taken by the Dotterel; that the statement of facts signed by Elisha Small has been read to me, and I know all the facts to be true which are related to have taken place before I came away in the Diligence. We came in the Diligence direct to Eastport. I went to Elisha D. Green, of Eastport, and told him I wanted ten muskets—it having been agreed between the Ruby's crew and the Diligence crew that we would retake the Ruby; he and another gentleman obtained for us seven muskets, and the two clerks in Green's store, one named Howard and the other Fields, said they would go with us. They went on board with me; there being then twelve in all on board, having seven muskets and two pistols, and two bayonets only, and went down behind Indian island, waiting for them; laid there about half an hour, and saw the Madison coming down; she spoke us, and Fields and Howard went on board the Madison and then returned, having agreed that the Madison should attack the Reindeer, and the Diligence the Ruby. Then all went below but three men; ran down and passed the Reindeer, and the Madison approached the Reindeer, and we the Ruby; I hailed the Ruby and told her to heave to, being only three of us on deck; I hailed again, and they did not obey; then the crew came up; then the men on board the Ruby let go the jib sheets and fetched her up into the wind; then our crew, and the two clerks, and James Leighton, skipper of the Diligence, went on board the Ruby and took possession of her; the men belonging to the barge left her and went on board the barge; we then hoisted American colors, discharged our muskets, and ran into Eastport. No muskets were fired till after the vessels were retaken and the men belonging to the barge had left them.

NOVEMBER 6, 1824.

Benjamin W. Coggins, of Lubec, master of the schooner Friend, of Lubec, on oath, declares: That he sailed from Lubec the 20th of July last, and went on to the fishing ground, four or five leagues from Grand Menan. On the 25th, seeing Small, of the Reindeer, going in, and wind blowing fresh, and water short, followed him into Two Island harbor, and anchored there about 4 o'clock p. m.; went ashore and obtained what water I could, and got it on board about 9 same evening; wind had then died away; I could not get out. At 5 next morning a light breeze from northwest; got under way, and went out in company with the Reindeer, Ruby, and Diligence; wind died away, and vessel floated with the current. Barge of the Dotterel soon came upon us; the other three lay together, and barge fired over them; directed one to let go her anchor, and then came to me; asked me what business I had there. I told him I was becalmed, and could not get out. He said that is a damned pretty answer to give me, when the wind was blowing here a gale all day yesterday. I said yesterday I went to Two Island harbor to obtain water. He then directed my sails to be hauled down and my anchor to be let go, which was done. He then left me, and directed the other vessels to cast apart; they did so, and came to anchor; he boarded the Reindeer and took possession of her, and sent her crew on board of me, and they asked him, what if I would not take them? He told them to take my vessel then, and go to Lubec; and I then took my boat and went to see Jones, and asked him if he was going to send me to Lubec with the men? He said he was, and told me he would give me orders when I should get under way. In about half or three-quarters of an hour he gave me a signal to get under way. I did so, and, after getting out of sight, told the Reindeer's crew that if I could get up to Lubec before they got up, would get some assistance there, and go with the Friend and retake the Reindeer. Came up as fast as I could, and my vessel grounded before I got in; then hove out the boat, and Reindeer's crew got into the boat with me and one of my crew, and the Diligence towed us up to Lubec. Then went to the revenue cutter, Smith; told him the story, and asked him if he could not go and retake them as they came in by East Quoddy? He said he could not, but gave me a line to the Collector; the Collector refused to let the cutter go. Then went to the wharf and hailed my brother, who was master of the Madison, and asked him if he would let the Madison go and retake the Reindeer, if I could obtain a crew; he said he would. I called round to get men to go on board; got four, and two rifles, and two muskets, and two pistols, and powder and ball; took the men on board the Madison, and went to Eastport, then having seven men and four muskets, my brother having the command. When at Eastport, hailed the men on the wharves, and asked them to send us two more muskets; they did send us two, and a man came with them; then ran down and spoke the Diligence. Mr. Howard and Mr. Fields came on board, and it was agreed that they should board the Ruby, and me the Reindeer. We then ran down for the Reindeer, and they for the Ruby. We boarded the Reindeer first, my brother having charge, and being on deck with one man and one boy, the rest below. Brother hailed him, and told him to heave to. Mr. Jones called his men to quarters; brother told him he would give him five minutes to consider whether to give the vessel up before he compelled him to do so, and run his vessel so near that we could step from one vessel to the other. Jones said, the first man that steps his foot on this vessel shall be a dead man. Brother then called all hands from below, and we went up with our muskets, seven of us, there being only ten men on board, besides two or three boys. Jones then laid his sword down and said, the vessel is yours. We put four men on board, and told skipper Small to make his way to Eastport. Jones then went on board his barge with his men. Then brother hailed him; asked him to come on board the Madison and take something to drink, and he did. He then said we were good fellows for having retaken them; he took them according to his orders, but without any provocation, and was glad we had got them; he then went his way, and we ours. There was no gun fired till after the vessels were recaptured. Mr. Howard is a lad, 17 or 18 years old; has never been a captain of any company of militia. I have heard that he was captain of a company of boys, in Eastport, who trained with wooden guns and swords.

On the 29th of August last, being on Grand Menan Bank, saw the Dotterel take possession of the Pilgrim, she being then about nine leagues distant from the Grand Menan. The Madison was also captured at the same time and place.

The injury to me, by breaking up my fishing cruise, has been five hundred dollars.

I, Harding Clark, of Dennysville, master of the schooner Hero, of Dennysville, on oath, do testify and say: That I sailed on the thirteenth day of June last, fitted out for the fishery, and proceeded on to Grand Menan Bank, and continued to fish until the sixteenth; then struck adrift in the forepart of the day; made an attempt to regain our ground, but not succeeding, the barge of the brig Dotterel came upon us, fired and boarded us; demanded our papers, which were given up, and took possession of the vessel, she being then from six to nine miles distant from the land. Two of my men were taken out and two of his put on board my vessel, and I was directed to follow him. I did follow and wait his movements for fourteen days, during which time he was employed in boarding vessels. Was during the time in Beaver and other harbors. Often asked him to let me and my crew go home, there being opportunities, but was denied. One of the men being sick, was detained on board the barge, and did duty there as did the other. At the expiration of the fourteen days arrived at St John's; were all there put on board the Dotterel; were detained there two days with only one meal of victuals, and then put on shore and dismissed. Captain told me he had given the vessel up to the custom-house; went to the custom-house; was there told he had not. Asked if I could see the captain again, and he was sent for, and he came; asked him to give up the vessel, telling him I did not consider her liable to seizure; he said he would think of it; said he wanted her for about a fortnight's cruise, and did not know but he should give her up to me then. I returned home, and went there in a fortnight, as he desired me. The Hero came in from a cruise three days after I arrived there, having been out cruising thirteen days. She then took in supplies for another fortnight's cruise, and sailed again the same day, under the command of the pilot of the brig. Saw the Captain, and asked him if he would let me have the vessel, as he had agreed to; he said he had made a new arrangement, and should not let me have the vessel. I came home again and left her. When last at St. John's, I applied to Messrs. Crookshanks and Johnson, merchants of St. John's, to ascertain when she was libelled or proceeded against; and about three weeks ago received a letter from them stating that the Hero had not been libelled, but had been employed as a tender to the Dotterel. The vessel was owned by Manning Clark and myself. The loss is not less than nine hundred dollars. I have not been out before this season; this being the first and only cruise this season.

I, William Rumery, of Lubec, testify and say: That I was a hand on board the schooner Madison, of Lubec, fitted out for the fisheries; that we sailed about the 25th of August last, and went on to Grand Menan Bank, about twenty-one miles or more from land, and fished till the 29th of the same month; saw a brig bearing down upon us; soon hailed us; asked the name of the vessel; skipper not being then on board, I answered, the Madison; sent a boat aboard and ordered all the crew aboard the boat, and carried us on board the brig Dotterel; ordered the Madison under way for Halifax; ordered us under the fore-castle deck, among the goats and fowls, where we remained four days; gave bread and water to us once a day; arrived fourth day at Halifax, and set us all ashore but Robert Rumery; told us we must get a passage home as we could; we got a passage and came home, leaving the Madison at Halifax, where I suppose she is now. The fish and salt they sold out of her, in harbors on the way, before they arrived in Halifax. The injury and loss is about nine hundred dollars. I saw Winslow in irons at Halifax.

I, Robert Rumery, on oath, declare: That I have heard the statement signed by William Rumery read, and know that it is wholly true. I further state, that after the remainder of the Madison's crew left us, I continued on board the Dotterel sixteen days; my brother William left me a little provision; after that was gone, I had nothing for two days; then had two-thirds of a seaman's ration, except grog; then got under way and came to L'Etou harbor, Deer island; asked lieutenant what he was going to do with me; said I should be carried to St. John's and put in prison until my trial, and, no doubt, I should be hung; then got under way and went to St. John's; laid there four days, then was told I might go on shore; went ashore and thence home.

I was a hand on board the Madison when she was going out and met the Diligence and Friend bringing in the crews of the Reindeer and Ruby that had been captured. After learning the facts, we put about and ran into Lubec and anchored. Benjamin Small wanted us to go with them and help take the Reindeer and Ruby, as the Friend had got aground, and Captain Ansel Coggins, of the Madison, agreed to go, and all the crew but one, and took on board seven or eight others; there were not more than twelve or, at most, fifteen on board; had a number of muskets, but no bayonets; then went down upon the Reindeer; our skipper hailed them, and told them to heave to; Jones told his men to prepare for action; we hailed a second time, and Jones ordered the fore sheet cast off, and told Robert Small that he might take charge of his vessel and carry her to Eastport. Jones and his men went aboard the barge, having first come on board of us and drank some grog by invitation, and we went to Eastport. No guns were fired till after the Reindeer was retaken and Jones had left us and gone on board of his barge, and then only by way of rejoicing.

SIR: Inclosed is a regular protest in relation to the capture of the schooner Rebecca, which case, with others, it is hoped, will receive the attention of Government.

Respectfully your obedient servant,

STEPHEN EMERY.

HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

---

Be it known, that on the twelfth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, personally appeared before me, Solomon Thayer, notary public, by legal authority duly admitted and sworn, and dwelling at Lubec, State and county aforesaid, Jones Wass, master of the schooner Rebecca, of Addison, and noted his protest. And now, on this ninth day of September, anno Domini 1824, he again appears to extend the same; and with him also appears John Wright, fisherman, belonging to the said schooner, who, being severally sworn, do depose and say: That on the twenty-ninth day of June, now last past, they sailed in said schooner Rebecca from Addison on a fishing cruise on the Grand Menan Banks, and arrived there on Thursday, the first day of July, and commenced fishing at a distance of fifteen miles from land; continued to fish during that day. On the next night, the wind springing up quite fresh, were obliged to run into Grand Menan for a harbor. Arrived at Duck island, so called, and anchored at 2 o'clock Friday morning; went on shore and obtained a barrel of water, having a half barrel only on board. In about an hour from the time of anchoring saw an armed boat making towards us; up anchor and stood to sea. The armed boat gave chase, and continued it all the next day, frequently firing muskets at the schooner Rebecca. As soon as it came on dark she lost sight of us; we were then near the Nova Scotia shore. We then put back to Grand Menan, and arrived there the next morning. Immediately made for the fishing banks and continued to fish there that day. At night, the wind blowing quite fresh, run in for a harbor. The next day, being the fourth of July, and Sunday, went on to the Banks and anchored; the next morning commenced fishing, and caught twenty quintals. The following night, wind fresh, hove up and laid to under our foresail until morning; then run into Bucks Rock, so called, near Grand Menan, to procure wood and to dress our fish. In about half an hour after we arrived the same boat that had chased us on Friday came upon us, and took forcible possession of the Rebecca and her papers, ordered her under way, and took her to the city of St. John's and stripped her.

The declarants further say, that during said cruise they did not fish within from twelve to fifteen miles of Grand Menan, nor run in near the land, unless to get water, purchase wood, and from stress of weather.

The said Jones Wass, for himself, saith: That on the seventh day of September, now current, he left the city of St. John's, where he had been to solicit the liberation of the said schooner Rebecca, but that said schooner had not then been libelled for trial, and that he was told by Charles J. Peters, the judge of the Vice Admiralty courts for the province of New Brunswick, it was uncertain when she would be.

Wherefore, they do protest, and I, the said notary, in their behalf, do solemnly protest against said armed boat; against pirates, and the wanton abuse of power by armed boats on the high seas under pretence of authority; against being deprived of rights confirmed to American fishermen by the convention with Great Britain of 1818; and against winds, seas, and tides, and whatsoever else may have caused the capture and wanton detention of the said schooner Rebecca, of Addison.

JONES WASS.
JOHN WRIGHT.

In faith whereof, I have hereunto affixed my seal and subscribed my name, the ninth day of September, [SEAL.] ber, anno Domini eighteen hundred and twenty-four.

[2D SESSION.

GENERAL CONVENTION OF PEACE, AMITY, NAVIGATION AND COMMERCE WITH THE REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA, OF OCTOBER 3, 1824, WITH THE DOCUMENTS APPERTAINING TO THE NEGOTIATION OF THE SAME.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, IN EXECUTIVE SESSION, FEBRUARY 22, 1825, AND THE INJUNCTION OF SECRECY SINCE REMOVED.

To the President of the Senate, pro tempore:

I transmit to the Senate a convention of general peace, amity, navigation and commerce, signed by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and of the Republic of Colombia, at Bogota, on the 3d of October, 1824, together with the documents appertaining to the negotiation of the same, for the constitutional consideration of the Senate, with regard to its ratification.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, February 21, 1825.

General convention of peace, amity, navigation and commerce between the United States of America and the Republic of Colombia.

Convencion jeneral de paz, amistad, navegacion y comercio entre la Republica de Colombia y los Estados Unidos de America, Año de 1824.

IN THE NAME OF GOD, AUTHOR AND LEGISLATOR OF THE UNIVERSE.

EN EL NOMBRE DE DIOS, AUTOR Y LEJISLADOR DEL UNIVERSO.

The United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, desiring to make lasting and firm the friendship and good understanding which happily prevails between both nations, have resolved to fix, in a manner clear, distinct, and positive, the rules

La Republica de Colombia y los Estados-Unidos de America, deseando hacer duradera y firme la amistad y buena inteligencia que felizmente existe entre ambas potencias, han resuelto fijar de una manera clara, distinta y positiva las reglas que deben which shall in future be religiously observed between the one and the other, by means of a treaty or general convention of peace, friendship, commerce, and navigation

For this most desirable object, the President of the United States of America has conferred full powers on RICHARD CLOUGH ANDERSON, junior, a citizen of the said States, and their Minister Plenipotentiary to the said Republic; and the Vice President of the Republic of Colombia, charged with the Executive power, on PEDRO GAUL, Secretary of State and of Foreign Relations; who, after having exchanged their said full powers in due and proper form, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a perfect, firm, and inviolable peace and sincere friendship between the United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, in all the extent of their possessions and territories, and between their people and citizens, respectively, without distinction of persons or places.

ARTICLE 2. The United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, desiring to live in peace and harmony with all the other nations of the earth, by means of a policy frank and equally friendly with all, engage mutually not to grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect of commerce and navigation, which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same freely, if the concession was freely made, or on allowing the same compensation, if the concession was conditional.

ARTICLE 3. The citizens of the United States may frequent all the coasts and countries of the Republic of Colombia, and reside and trade there in all sorts of produce, manufactures, and merchandise, and shall pay no other or greater duties, charges, or fees whatsoever, than the most favored nation is or shall be obliged to pay; and they shall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and exemptions, in navigation and commerce which the most favored nation does or shall enjoy, submitting themselves, nevertheless, to the laws, decrees, and usages there established, and to which are submitted the subjects and citizens of the most favored nations.

In like manner the citizens of the Republic of Colombia may frequent all the coasts and countries of the United States, and reside and trade there in all sorts of produce, manufactures, and merchandise, and shall pay no other or greater duties, charges, or fees whatsoever, than the most favored nation is or shall be obliged to pay; and they shall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and exemptions in navigation and commerce which the most favored nation does or shall enjoy, submitting themselves, nevertheless, to the laws, decrees, and usages there established, and to which are submitted the subjects and citizens of the most favored nations.

ARTICLE 4. It is likewise agreed that it shall be wholly free for all merchants, commanders of ships, and other citizens of both countries, to manage themselves their own business in all the ports and places subject to the jurisdiction of each other, as well with respect to the consignment and sale of their goods and merchandise by wholesale or retail, as with respect to the loading, unloading, and sending off their ships; they being in all these cases to be treated as citizens of the country in which they reside, or at least to be placed on a footing with the subjects or citizens of the most favored nation.

ARTICLE 5. The citizens of neither of the contracting parties shall be liable to any embargo, nor be detained with their vessels, cargoes, merchandises, or effects, for any military expedition, nor for any public or private purpose whatever, without allowing to those interested a sufficient indemnification.

ARTICLE 6. Whenever the citizens of either of the contracting parties shall be forced to seek refuge or observar religiosamente en lo venidero, por medio de un tratado o convencion general de paz, amistad, comercio y navegacion.

Con este muy, deseable objeto, el Vice Presidente de la Republica de Colombia encargado del poder Ejecutivo, ha conferido plenos poderes á PEDRO GAUL, Secretario de Estado y del Despacho de Relaciones Exteriores de la misma, y el Presidente de los Estados Unidos de America, á RICARDO CLOUGH ANDERSON, el menor, ciudadano de dichos Estados, y su Ministro Plenipotenciario cerca de la dicha Republica; quienes despues de haber canjeado sus espresados plenos poderes en debida y buena forma, han convenido en los articulos siguientes.

ARTICULO 1. Habra una paz, perfecta, firme, é inviolable y amistad sincera entre la Republica de Colombia y los Estados Unidos de America, en toda la estencion de sus posesiones y territorios, y entre sus pueblos y ciudadanos respectivamente sin distincion de personas, ni lugares.

ARTICULO 2. La Republica de Colombia y los Estados Unidos de America, deseando vivir en paz y harmonia con las demas naciones de la tierra por medio de una politica franca, é igualmente amistosa con todas, se obligan mutuamente á no conceder favores particulares, á otras naciones, con respecto á comercio y navegacion, que no se hagan inmediatamente comun á una ú otra, quien gozara de los mismos libremente, si la concesion fuese hecha libremente ó prestando la misma compensacion, si la concesion fuere condicional.

ARTICULO 3. Los ciudadanos de la Republica de Colombia podrán frecuentar todas las costas y paises de los Estados Unidos de America, y residir, y traficar en ellos con toda suerte de producciones, manufacturas, y mercaderias, y no pagarán otros, ó mayores derechos, impuestos, ó emolumentos cualesquiera que los ques las naciones mas favorecidas están ó estuvieren obligadas á pagar; y gozarán todos los derechos, privilegios y esenciones, que gozan ó gozaren los de la nacion mas favorecida, con respecto á navegacion y comercio, sometiendose, no obstante, á las leyes, decretos, y usos establecidos, á los cuales estan sujetos los subditos ó ciudadanos de las naciones mas favorecidas. Del mismo modo los ciudadanos de los Estados Unidos de America podrán frecuentar todas las costas y paises de la Republica de Colombia, y residir y traficar en ellos con toda suerte de producciones, manufacturas, y mercaderias, y no pagarán otros ó mayores derechos, impuestos, ó emolumentos cualesquiera, que los que las naciones mas favorecidas, están ó estuvieren obligadas á pagar y gozarán de todos los derechos privilegios y esenciones, que gozan ó gozaren los de la nacion mas favorecida con respecto á navegacion y comercio, sometiendose, no obstante á las leyes, decretos y usos establecidos á los cuales estan sujetos los subditos ó ciudadanos de las naciones mas favorecidas.

ARTICULO 4. Se conviene ademas, que será enteramente libre y permitido, a los comerciantes, comandantes de buques, y otros ciudadanos de ambos paises el manejar sus negocios, por si mismos, en todos los puertos y lugares sujetos á la jurisdiccion de uno ú otro, asi respecto á las consignaciones y ventas por mayor y menor de sus efectos y mercaderias, como de la carga, descarga y despacho de sus buques, debiendo en todos estos casos, ser tratados como ciudadanos del pais en que residan, ó al menos puestos sobre un pie igual con los subditos ó ciudadanos de las naciones mas favorecidas.

ARTICULO 5. Los ciudadanos de una ú otra parte, no podrán ser embargados ni detenidos con sus embarcaciones, tripulaciones, mercaderias, y efectos comerciales de su pertenencia, para alguna espedicion militar, usos publicos, ó particulares cualesquiera que sean, sin conceder á los interesados una suficiente indemnizacion.

ARTICULO 6. Siempre que los ciudadanos de alguna de las partes contratantes se vieren precisados á asylum in the rivers, bays, ports, or dominions of the other, with their vessels, whether merchants or of war, public or private, through stress of weather, pursuit of pirates or enemies, they shall be received and treated with humanity, giving to them all favor and protection for repairing their ships, procuring provisions, and placing themselves in a situation to continue their voyage without obstacle or hindrance of any kind.

ARTICLE 7. All the ships, merchandise, and effects belonging to the citizens of one of the contracting parties, which may be captured by pirates, whether within the limits of its jurisdiction or on the high seas, and may be carried or found in the rivers, roads, bays, ports, or dominions of the other, shall be delivered up to the owners, they proving, in due and proper form, their rights before the competent tribunals; it being well understood that the claim should be made within the term of one year by the parties themselves, their attorneys, or agents of the respective Governments.

ARTICLE 8. When any vessel belonging to the citizens of either of the contracting parties shall be wrecked, foundered, or shall suffer any damage on the coasts, or within the dominions of the other, there shall be given to them all assistance and protection, in the same manner which is usual and customary with the vessels of the nation where the damage happens, permitting them to unload the said vessel, if necessary, of its merchandise and effects, without exacting for it any duty, impost, or contribution whatever, until they may be exported.

ARTICLE 9. The citizens of each of the contracting parties shall have power to dispose of their personal goods within the jurisdiction of the other, by sale, donation, testament, or otherwise; and their representatives, being citizens of the other party, shall succeed to their said personal goods, whether by testament or ab intestato, and they may take possession thereof, either by themselves or others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their will, paying such dues only as the inhabitants of the country wherein said goods are shall be subject to pay in like cases; and if, in the case of real estate, the said heirs would be prevented from entering into the possession of the inheritance on account of their character of aliens, there shall be granted to them the term of three years to dispose of the same as they may think proper, and to withdraw the proceeds without molestation, and exempt from all rights of detraction on the part of the Government of the respective States.

ARTICLE 10. Both the contracting parties promise and engage formally to give their special protection to the persons and property of the citizens of each other, of all occupations, who may be in the territories subject to the jurisdiction of the one or the other, transient or dwelling therein, leaving open and free to them the tribunals of justice for their judicial recourse, on the same terms which are usual and customary with the natives or citizens of the country in which they may be; for which they may employ, in defence of their rights, such advocates, solicitors, notaries, agents and factors, as they may judge proper in all their trials at law; and such citizens or agents shall have free opportunity to be present at the decisions and sentences of the tribunals in all cases which may concern them, and likewise at the taking of all examinations and evidence which may be exhibited in the said trials.

ARTICLE 11. It is likewise agreed that the most perfect and entire security of conscience shall be enjoyed by the citizens of both the contracting parties in the countries subject to the jurisdiction of the one and the other, without their being liable to be disturbed or molested on account of their religious belief, so long as they respect the laws and established usages of the country. Moreover, the bodies of the citizens of one of the contracting parties who may die in the territories of the other shall buscár refugio, ó asilo en los rios, bahias, puertos, ó dominios de la otra, con sus buques, ya sean mercantes, ó de guerra, publicos ó particulares, por mal tiempo, persecucion de piratas ó enemigos, serán recibidos y tratados con humanidad, dandoles todo favor y proteccion, para reparar sus buques, procurár viveres, y ponerse en situacion de continuar su viaje, sin obstaculo ó estorbo de ningun genero.

ARTICULO 7. Todos los buques, mercaderias y efectos pertenecientes a los ciudadanos de una de las partes contratantes, que sean apresados por piratas, bien sea dentro de los limites de su jurisdiccion, ó en alta mar, y fueren llevados, ó hallados en los rios, radas, bahias, puertos, ó dominios de la otra, serán entregados á sus dueños, probando estos en la forma propia y debida sus derechos ante los tribunales competentes; bien entendido que el reclama ha de hacerse dentro del termino de un año, por las mismas partes, sus apoderados ó agentes de los respectivos Gobiernos.

ARTICULO 8. Cuando algun buque perteneciente á los ciudadanos de alguna de las partes contratantes, naufrague, encalle, ó sufra alguna averia, en las costas, ó dentro de los dominios de la otra, se les dará toda ayuda y proteccion, del mismo modo que es uso y costumbre, con los buques de la nacion en donde suceda la averia; permitiendoles descargár el dicho buque (si fuere necesario) de sus mercaderias y efectos, sin cobrar por esto hasta que sean esportados, ningun derecho, impuesto ó contribucion.

ARTICULO 9. Los ciudadanos de cada una de las partes contratantes, tendrán pleno poder para disponer de sus bienes personales dentro de la jurisdiccion de la otra, por venta, donacion testamentaria, ó de otro modo; y sus representantes, siendo ciudadanos de la otra parte, sucederán á sus dichos bienes personales, ya sea por testamento ó ab intestato, y podran tomar posesion de ellos, ya sea por si mismos ó por otros, que obren por ellos, y disponer de los mismos, segun su voluntad, pagando aquellas cargas, solamente, que los habitantes del pais en donde estan los referidos bienes, estuvieren sujetos á pagar en iguales casos; y si en el caso de bienes raices, los dichos herederos fuesen impedidos de entrár en la posesion de la herencia por razon de su caracter de extranjeros, se les dará el termino de tres años, para disponer de ella como juzguen conveniente, y para extraer el producto sin molestia, y esentos de todo derecho de deduccion, por parte del Gobierno de los respectivos Estados.

ARTICULO 10. Ambas partes contratantes se comprometen y obligan formalmente á dar su proteccion especial á las personas y propiedades de los ciudadanos de cada una reciprocamente transeuntes ó habitantes de todas ocupaciones, en los territorios sujetos á la jurisdiccion de una y otra, dejandoles abiertos y libres los tribunales de justicia, para sus recursos judiciales, en los mismos terminos que son de uso y costumbre para los naturales ó ciudadanos del pais en que residan; para lo cual, podrán emplear en defensa de sus derechos aquellos abogados, procuradores, escribanos, agentes, ó factores que juzguen conveniente, en todos sus asuntos y litigios; y dichos ciudadanos ó agentes tendrán la libre facultad de estar presentes en las decisiones y sentencias de los tribunales, en todos los casos que les conciernan, como igualmente á tomar todos los exámenes y declaraciones que se ofrezcan en los dichos litigios.

ARTICULO 11. Se conviene igualmente en que los ciudadanos de ambas partes contratantes gozen la mas perfecta y entera seguridad de consciencia en los paises sujetos á la jurisdiccion de una ó otra, sin quedar por ello espuestos á ser inquietados ó molestados en razon de su creencia religiosa, mientras que respeten las leyes y usos establecidos. Ademas de esto, podrán sepultarse los cadaveres de los ciudadanos de una de las partes contratantes, que fallecieren en los territorios de la otra, en los cementerios be buried in the usual burying grounds, or in other decent and suitable places, and shall be protected from violation or disturbance.

ARTICLE 12. It shall be lawful for the citizens of the United States of America and of the Republic of Colombia to sail with their ships with all manner of liberty and security, no distinction being made who are the proprietors of the merchandises laden thereon, from any port to the places of those who are now, or hereafter shall be, at enmity with either of the contracting parties. It shall likewise be lawful for the citizens aforesaid to sail with the ships and merchandises before mentioned, and to trade with the same liberty and security from the places, ports, and havens of those who are enemies of both or either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatsoever, not only directly from the places of the enemy before mentioned to neutral places, but also from one place belonging to an enemy to another place belonging to an enemy, whether they be under the jurisdiction of one power or under several. And it is hereby stipulated that free ships shall also give freedom to goods, and that everything shall be deemed to be free and exempt which shall be found on board the ships belonging to the citizens of either of the contracting parties, although the whole lading, or any part thereof, should appertain to the enemies of either, contraband goods being always excepted. It is also agreed in like manner that the same liberty be extended to persons who are on board a free ship, with this effect, that, although they be enemies to both or either party, they are not to be taken out of that free ship unless they are officers and soldiers, and in the actual service of the enemies: Provided, however, and it is hereby agreed, That the stipulations in this article contained, declaring that the flag shall cover the property, shall be understood as applying to those powers only who recognize this principle; but if either of the two contracting parties shall be at war with a third, and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral shall cover the property of enemies whose Governments acknowledge this principle, and not of others.

ARTICLE 13. It is likewise agreed, that, in the case where the neutral flag of one of the contracting parties shall protect the property of the enemies of the other by virtue of the above stipulation, it shall always be understood that the neutral property found on board such enemy's vessels shall be held and considered as enemy's property, and as such shall be liable to detention and confiscation, except such property as was put on board such vessel before the declaration of war, or even afterwards, if it were done without the knowledge of it; but the contracting parties agree that two months having elapsed after the declaration, their citizens shall not plead ignorance thereof. On the contrary, if the flag of the neutral does not protect the enemy's property, in that case the goods and merchandises of the neutral embarked in such enemy's ships shall be free.

ARTICLE 14. This liberty of navigation and commerce shall extend to all kinds of merchandises, excepting those only which are distinguished by the name of contraband, and under this name of contraband or prohibited goods shall be comprehended—

1st. Cannons, mortars, howitzers, swivels, blunderbusses, muskets, fuzees, rifles, carbines, pistols, pikes, swords, sabres, lances, spears, halberds, and grenades, bombs, powder, matches, balls, and all other things belonging to the use of these arms.

2d. Bucklers, helmets, breast plates, coats of mail, infantry belts, and clothes made up in the form and for a military use.

3d. Cavalry belts and horses with their furniture.

4th. And generally all kinds of arms and instruments of iron, steel, brass, and copper, or of any acostumbrados, ó en otros lugares decentes, y adecuados, los cuales, serán protegidos contra toda violacion ó trastorno.

ARTICULO 12. Será lícito a los ciudadanos de la Republica de Colombia, y de los Estados Unidos de America, navegar con sus buques, con toda seguridad y libertad, de cualquiera puerto á las plazas ó lugares de los que son ó fueren en adelante enemigos de cualquiera de las dos partes contratantes, sin hacerse distincion de quienes son los dueños de las mercaderias cargadas en ellos. Será igualmente lícito á los referidos ciudadanos navegar con sus buques y mercaderias mencionadas y traficár con la misma libertad y seguridad, de los lugares, puertos y enseñadas de los enemigos de ambas partes, ó de alguna de ellas, sin ninguna oposicion, ó disturbio cualquiera, no solo directamente de los lugares de enemigo arriba mencionados á lugares neutros, sino tambien de un lugar perteneciente á un enemigo, á otro enemigo, ya sea que esten bajo la jurisdiccion de una potencia, ó bajo la de diversas. Y queda aqui estipulado, que los buques libres, dan tambien libertad á las mercaderias, y que se ha de considerar libre y esento todo lo que se hallare á bordo de los buques pertenecientes á los ciudadanos de cualquiera de las partes contratantes, aunque toda la carga ó parte de ella pertenezca á enemigos de una ú otra, eceptuando siempre los articulos de contrabando de guerra. Se conviene tambien del mismo modo, en que la misma libertad se estienda á las personas que se encuentren á bordo de buques libres, con el fin de que aunque dichas personas sean enemigos de ambas partes ó de alguna de ellas, no deban ser estraídos de los buques libres, à menos que sean oficiales ó soldados en actual servicio de los enemigos: á condicion no obstante, y se conviene aqui en esto, que las estipulaciones contenidas en el presente articulo, declarando que el pabellon cubre la propiedad, se entenderán aplicables solamente á aquellas potencias que reconocen este principio; pero si alguna de las dos partes contratantes, estuviere en guerra con una tercera, y la otra permaneciese neutral, la bandera de la neutral cubrirá la propiedad de los enemigos, cuyos Gobiernos reconozcan este principio y no de otros.

ARTICULO 13. So conviene igualmente que en el caso de que la bandera neutrál de una de las partes contratantes protega las propiedades de los enemigos de la otra en virtud de lo estipulado arriba, deberá siempre entenderse, que las propiedades neutrales encontradas á bordo de tales buques enemigos, han de tenerse y considerarse como propiedades enemigas, y como tales, estarán sujetas á detencion, y confiscacion; eseptuando solamente aquellas propiedades que hubiesen sido puestas á bordo de tales buques antes de la declaracion de la guerra, y aun despues, si hubiesen sido embarcadas en dichos buques, sin tener noticia de la guerra; y se conviene, que pasados dos meses despues de la declaracion, los ciudadanos de una y otra parte no podrán elegár que la ignoraban. Por el contrario, si la bandera neutral, no protegiere las propiedades enemigas, entonces serán libres los efectos y mercaderias de la parte neutrál embarcadas en buques enemigos.

ARTICULO 14. Esta libertad de navegacion y comercio se estenderá a todo genero de mercaderias, eceptuando aquellas solamente, que se distinguen con el nombre de contrabando, y bajo este nombre de contrabando ó efectos prohibidos se comprenderán:

1°. Cañones, morteros, obuces, pedreros, trabucos, mosquetes, fusiles, rifles, carabinas, pistolas, picas, espadas, sables, lanzas, chuzos, alabardas, y granadas, bombas, pólvora, mechas, balas, con las demas cosas correspondientes al uso de estas armas.

2°. Escudos, casquetes, corazas, cotas de malla, fornituras, y vestidos hechos en forma, y á usanza militar.

3°. Bandoleras, y caballos junto con sus armas y arneses.

4°. Y generalmente toda especie de armas, é instrumentos de hierro, acero, bronce, cobre, y otras other materials manufactured, prepared, and formed expressly to make war by sea or land.

ARTICLE 15. All other merchandises and things not comprehended in the articles of contraband explicitly enumerated and classified as above shall be held and considered as free, and subjects of free and lawful commerce, so that they may be carried and transported in the freest manner by both the contracting parties, even to places belonging to an enemy, excepting only those places which are at that time besieged or blockaded up; and to avoid all doubt in this particular, it is declared that those places only are besieged or blockaded which are actually attacked by a belligerent force capable of preventing the entry of the neutral.

ARTICLE 16. The articles of contraband before enumerated and classified, which may be found in a vessel bound for an enemy's port, shall be subject to detention and confiscation, leaving free the rest of the cargo and the ship, that the owners may dispose of them as they see proper. No vessel of either of the two nations shall be detained on the high seas on account of having on board articles of contraband, whenever the master, captain, or supercargo of said vessel will deliver up the articles of contraband to the captor, unless the quantity of such articles be so great and of so large a bulk that they cannot be received on board the capturing ship without great inconvenience; but, in this and in all other cases of just detention, the vessel detained shall be sent to the nearest convenient and safe port, for trial and judgment, according to law.

ARTICLE 17. And whereas it frequently happens that vessels sail for a port or place belonging to an enemy without knowing that the same is besieged, blockaded, or invested, it is agreed that every vessel so circumstanced may be turned away from such port or place, but shall not be detained, nor shall any part of her cargo, if not contraband, be confiscated, unless, after warning of such blockade or investment from the commanding officer of the blockading forces, she shall again attempt to enter; but she shall be permitted to go to any other port or place she shall think proper. Nor shall any vessel of either, that may have entered into such port before the same was actually besieged, blockaded, or invested by the other, be restrained from quitting such place with her cargo, nor, if found therein after the reduction and surrender, shall such vessel or her cargo be liable to confiscation, but they shall be restored to the owners thereof.

ARTICLE 18. In order to prevent all kind of disorder in the visiting and examination of the ships and cargoes of both the contracting parties on the high seas, they have agreed mutually, that whenever a vessel-of-war, public or private, shall meet with a neutral of the other contracting party, the first shall remain out of cannon shot, and may send its boat, with two or three men only, in order to execute the said examination of the papers concerning the ownership and cargo of the vessel, without causing the least extortion, violence, or ill treatment, for which the commanders of the said armed ships shall be responsible with their persons and property; for which purpose, the commanders of said private armed vessels shall, before receiving their commissions, give sufficient security to answer for all the damages they may commit. And it is expressly agreed that the neutral party shall in no case be required to go on board the examining vessel for the purpose of exhibiting her papers, or for any other purpose whatever.

ARTICLE 19. To avoid all kind of vexation and abuse in the examination of the papers relating to the ownership of the vessels belonging to the citizens of the two contracting parties, they have agreed, and materias cualesquiera, manufacturadas, preparadas, y formadas espresamente para hacer la guerra por mar, ó tierra.

ARTICULO 15. Todas las demas mercaderias, y efectos no comprendidos en los articulos de contrabando explicitamente enumerados, y clasificados en el articulo anterior, serán tenidos y reputados por libres, y de licito y libre comercio, de modo, que ellos puedan ser transportados, y llevados, de la manera mas libre, por los ciudadanos de ambas partes contratantes, aun á los lugares pertenecientes á un enemigo de una ú otra, eceptuando solamente aquellos lugares ó plazas, que están al mismo tiempo sitiadas ó bloqueadas; y para evitar toda duda en el particular, se declaran sitiadas ó bloqueadas aquellas plazas, que en la actualidad estuviesen atacadas por una fuerza de un beligerante capaz de impedir la entrada del neutral.

ARTICULO 16. Los articulos de contrabando antes enumerados y clasificados, que se hallen en un buque destinado á detencion y confiscacion; dejando libre el resto del cargamento y el buque, para que los dueños puedan disponer de ellos como lo crean conveniente. Ningun buque de cualquiera de las dos naciones, será detenido, por tener á bordo articulos de contrabando, siempre que elj maestre, capitán, ó sobrecargo de dicho buque quiera entregar los articulos de contrabando al apresador, á menos que la cantidad de estos articulos sea tan grande y de tanto volumen, que no puedan ser recibidos á bordo del buque apresador, sin grandes inconvenientes; pero en este, como en todos los otros casos de justa detencion, el buque detenido será enviado al puerto mas inmediato, comodo, y seguro, para ser juzgado y sentenciado conforme á las leyes.

ARTICULO 17. Y por cuanto frecuentemente sucede que los buques navegan para un puerto ó lugar perteneciente á un enemigo, sin saber que aquel esté sitiado, bloqueado ó investido, se conviene en que todo buque en estas circunstancias se pueda hacer volver de dicho puerto, ó lugar; pero no será detenido, ni confiscada parte alguna de su cargamento, no siendo contrabando; á menos que despues de la intimacion de semejante bloqueo ó ataque, por el comandante de las fuerzas bloqueadoras, intentase otra vez entrar; pero le será permitido ir á qualquiera otro puerto ó lugar que juzque conveniente. Ni ningun buque de una de las partes, que haya entrado en semejante puerto, ó lugar, antes que estuviere sitiado, bloqueado, ó investido por la otra, será impedido de dejar el tal lugar con su cargamento, ni si fuere hallado allí despues de la rendicion y entrega de semejante lugar, estará el tal buque ó su cargamento sujeto á confiscacion, sino que serán restituidos á sus dueños.

ARTICULO 18. Para evitar todo genero de desorden en la visita, y examen de los buques y cargamentos de ambas partes contratantes en alta mar, han convenido mutuamente, que siempre que un buque de guerra, publico ó particular se emontrase con un neutral de la otra parte contrante, el primero permanecerá fuera de tiro de cañon, y podrá mandar su bote, con dos ó tres hombres solamente, para ejecutar el dicho examen de los papeles concernientes á la propiedad y carga del buque, sin ocasionar la menor estorcion violencia ó mal tratamiento, por lo que los comandantes del dicho buque armado serán responsables, con sus personas y bienes; á cuyo efecto los comandantes de buques armados, por cuenta de particulares, estarán obligados antes de entregarse sus comisiones ó patentes, á dar fianza suficiente para responder de los perjuicios que causen. Y se ha convenido espresamente, que en ningun caso se exigira á la parte neutral, que vaya á bordo del buque examinador con el fin de exhibir sus papeles, ó para cualquiera otro objeto sea el que fuere.

ARTICULO 19. Para evitar toda clase de vejamen y abuso en el examen de los papeles relativos á la propiedad de los buques pertenecientes á los ciudadanos de las dos partes contratantes, han convenido do agree, that in case one of them should be engaged in war, the ships and vessels belonging to the citizens of the other must be furnished with sea letters, or passports, expressing the name, property, and bulk of the ship, as also the name and place of habitation of the master or commander of said vessel, in order that it may thereby appear that the ship really and truly belongs to the citizens of one of the parties; they have likewise agreed that, such ships being laden, besides the said sea letters or passports, shall also be provided with certificates, containing the several particulars of the cargo, and the place whence the ship sailed, so that it may be known whether any forbidden or contraband goods be on board the same; which certificates shall be made out by the officers of the place whence the ship sailed, in the accustomed form; without which requisites, said vessel may be detained, to be adjudged by the competent tribunal, and may be declared legal prize, unless the said defects shall be satisfied or supplied by testimony entirely equivalent.

ARTICLE 20. It is further agreed, that the stipulations above expressed, relative to the visiting and examination of vessels, shall apply only to those which sail without convoy; and when said vessels shall be under convoy, the verbal declaration of the commander of the convoy, on his word of honor, that the vessels under his protection belong to the nation whose flag he carries, and, when they are bound to an enemy's port, that they have no contraband goods on board, shall be sufficient.

ARTICLE 21. It is further agreed, that in all cases the established courts for the prize causes, in the country to which the prizes may be conducted, shall alone take cognizance of them. And whenever such tribunal of either party shall pronounce judgment against any vessel or goods or property claimed by the citizens of the other party, the sentence or decree shall mention the reasons or motives on which the same shall have been founded, and an authenticated copy of the sentence or decree, and of all the proceedings in the case, shall, if demanded, be delivered to the commander or agent of said vessel without any delay, he paying the legal fees for the same.

ARTICLE 22. Whenever one of the contracting parties shall be engaged in war with another State, no citizen of the other contracting party shall accept a commission, or letter of marque, for the purpose of assisting or co-operating hostilely with the said enemy against the said party so at war, under the pain of being treated as a pirate.

ARTICLE 23. If, by any fatality, which cannot be expected, and which God forbid, the two contracting parties should be engaged in war with each other, they have agreed, and do agree, now for then, that there shall be allowed the term of six months to the merchants residing on the coasts and in the ports of each other, and the term of one year to those who dwell in the interior, to arrange their business and transport their effects wherever they please, giving to them the safe conduct necessary for it, which may serve as a sufficient protection until they arrive at the designated port. The citizens of all other occupations, who may be established in the territories or dominions of the United States and of the Republic of Colombia, shall be respected and maintained in the full enjoyment of their personal liberty and property, unless their particular conduct shall cause them to forfeit this protection, which, in consideration of humanity, the contracting parties engage to give them.

ARTICLE 24. Neither the debts due from individuals of the one nation to the individuals of the other, nor shares nor moneys which they may have in public funds, nor in public or private banks, shall ever, in any event of war or of national difference, be sequestered or confiscated.

y convenien, que en caso de que una de ellas estuviere en guerra, los buques, y bajeles pertenecientes à los ciudadanos de la otra, seràn provistos con letras de mar, ó pasaportes, expresando el nombre, propiedad y tamaño del buque, como tambien el nombre y lugar de la residencia del maestre, ó comandante, à fin de que se vea que el buque, real y verdaderamente, pertenece à los ciudadanos de una de las partes; y han convenido igualmente, que estando cargados los espresados buques, ademas de las letras de mar, ó pasaportes, estaràn tambien provistos de certificados, que contengan los por menores del cargamento, y el lugar de donde salió el buque, para que asi pueda saberse, si hay à su bordo algunos efectos prohibidos ó de contrabando, cuyos certificados seràn hechos per los oficiales del lugar de la procedencia del buque, en la forma acostumbrada, sin cuyos requisitos el dicho buque puede ser detenido, para ser juzgado por el Tribunal competente, y puede ser declarado buena presa, à menos que satisfagan, ó suplan el defecto con testimonios enteramente equivalentes.

ARTICULO 20. Se ha convenido ademas, que las estipulaciones anteriores, relativas al examen y visita de buques, se aplicarán solamente à los que navegan sin conboy y que cuando los dichos buques estuvieren bajo de conboy, será bastante la declaración verbal del comandante del conboy, bajo su palabra de honor, de que los buques que están bajo su protección pertenecen à la nacion, cuya bandera llevan, y cuando se dirijen à un puerto enemigo, que los dichos buques no tienen à su bordo artículos de contrabando de guerra.

ARTICULO 21. Se ha convenido ademas, que en todos los casos que ocurran, solo los Tribunales establecidos para causas de presas, en el país à que las presas sean conducidas, tomarán conocimiento de ellas. Y siempre que semejante tribunal de cualquiera de las partes, pronunciase sentencia contra algun buque ó efectos, ó propiedad reclamada por los ciudadanos de la otra parte, la sentencia ó decreto hará mención de las razones ó motivos en que aquella se haya fundado, y se entregará sin demora alguna al comandante ó agente de dicho buque, si lo solicitase, un testimonio autentico de la sentencia, ó decreto, ó de todo el proceso, pagando por él los derechos legales.

ARTICULO 22. Siempre que una de las partes contratantes estuviere empeñada en guerra, con otro Estado, ningun ciudadano de la otra parte contratante aceptara una comision ó letra de marca para el objeto de ayudar ó co-operar hostilmente con el dicho enemigo, contra la dicha parte que esté asi en guerra, bajo la pena de ser tratado como pirata.

ARTICULO 23. Si por alguna fatalidad, que no puede esperarse, y que Dios no permita, las dos partes contratantes se viesen empeñadas en guerra una con otra, han convenido y convienen de ahora para entonces, que se concederá el termino de seis meses à los comerciantes residentes en las costas y en los puertos de entrambas, y el termino de un año à los que habitan en el interior, para arreglar sus negocios, y transportar sus efectos à donde quieran, dandoles el salvo conducto necesario para ello, que les sirva de suficiente protección hasta que lleguen al puerto que designen. Los ciudadanos de otras ocupaciones, que se hallen establecidos en los territorios ó dominios de la Republica de Colombia, ó los Estados Unidos de America, serán respetados, y mantenidos en el pleno goze de su libertad personal y propiedad, à menos que su conducta particular les haga perder esta protección, que en consideracion à la humanidad, las partes contratantes se comprometen à prestarles.

ARTICULO 24. Ni las deudas contraidas por los individuos de una nacion, con los individuos de la otra, ni las acciones ó dineros, que puedan tener en los fondos publicos, ó en los bancos publicos, ó privados, serán jamas secuestrados ó confiscados en ningun caso de guerra, ó diferencia nacional.

ARTICLE 25. Both the contracting parties, being desirous of avoiding all inequality in relation to their public communications and official intercourse, have agreed, and do agree, to grant to the envoys, ministers, and other public agents, the same favors, immunities, and exemptions which those of the most favored nation do or shall enjoy; it being understood that whatever favors, immunities, or privileges the United States of America or the Republic of Colombia may find it proper to give to the ministers and public agents of any other power, shall by the same act be extended to those of each of the contracting parties.

ARTICLE 26. To make more effectual the protection which the United States and the Republic of Colombia shall afford in future to the navigation and commerce of the citizens of each other, they agree to receive and admit consuls and vice consuls in all the ports open to foreign commerce, who shall enjoy in them all the rights, prerogatives, and immunities of the consuls and vice consuls of the most favored nation, each contracting party, however, remaining at liberty to except those ports and places in which the admission and residence of such consuls may not seem convenient.

ARTICLE 27. In order that the consuls and vice consuls of the two contracting parties may enjoy the rights, prerogatives, and immunities which belong to them by their public character, they shall, before entering on the exercise of their functions, exhibit their commission or patent in due form to the Government to which they are accredited, and having obtained their exequatur, they shall be held and considered as such by all the authorities, magistrates, and inhabitants in the consular district in which they reside.

ARTICLE 28. It is likewise agreed that the consuls, their secretaries, officers, and persons attached to the service of consuls, they not being citizens of the country in which the consul resides, shall be exempt from all public service, and also from all kind of taxes, imposts, and contributions, except those which they shall be obliged to pay on account of commerce or their property, to which the citizens and inhabitants, native and foreign, of the country in which they reside are subject, being in everything besides subject to the laws of the respective States. The archives and papers of the consulate shall be respected inviolably, and under no pretext whatever shall any magistrate seize or in any way interfere with them.

ARTICLE 29. The said consuls shall have power to require the assistance of the authorities of the country for the arrest, detention, and custody of deserters from the public and private vessels of their country; and for that purpose they shall address themselves to the courts, judges, and officers competent, and shall demand the said deserters in writing, proving, by an exhibition of the registers of the vessel's or ship's roll, or other public documents, that those men were part of the said crews; and on this demand, so proved, (saving, however, where the contrary is proved,) the delivery shall not be refused. Such deserters, when arrested, shall be put at the disposal of the said consuls, and may be put in the public prisons at the request and expense of those who reclaim them, to be sent to the ships to which they belonged, or to others of the same nation. But if they be not sent back within two months, to be counted from the day of their arrest, they shall be set at liberty, and shall be no more arrested for the same cause.

ARTICLE 30. For the purpose of more effectually protecting their commerce and navigation, the two contracting parties do hereby agree, as soon hereafter as circumstances will permit them, to form a consular convention, which shall declare specially ARTICULO 25. Deseando ambas partes contratantes, evitar toda diferencia, relativa á etiqueta en sus comunicaciones, y correspondencias diplomáticas han convenido así mismo, y convienen en conceder á sus enviados, ministros, y otros agentes diplomáticos, los mismos favores, inmunidades, y esenciones de que gozan, ó gozaren en lo venidero los de las naciones mas favorecidas, bien entendido que cualquier favor, inmunidad ó privilegio, que la Republica de Colombia ó los Estados Unidos de America, tengan por conveniente dispensar á los enviados, ministros, y agentes diplomaticos de otras potencias, se haga por el mismo hecho extensivo á los de una y otra de las partes contratantes.

ARTICULO 26. Para hacer mas efectiva la protección, que la Republica de Colombia, y los Estados Unidos de America, darán en adelante á la navegación y comercio de los ciudadanos de una y otra, se convienen en recibir y admitir consules, y vice consules en todos los puertos abiertos al comercio extranjero, quienes gozarán en ellos todos los derechos, prerrogativas é inmunidades de los consules, y vice consules de la nacion mas favorecida, quedando no obstante en libertad cada parte contratante, para exceptuar aquellos puertos y lugares en que la admision y residencia de semejantes consules, y vice consules no parezca conveniente.

ARTICULO 27. Para que los consules y vice consules de las dos parte contratantes, puedan gozar los derechos, prerrogativas, é inmunidades, que les corresponden por su caracter publico, antes de entrar en el ejercicio de sus funciones, presentarán su comision ó patente en la forma debida, al Gobierno con quien esten acreditados, y habiendo obtenido el exequatur, serán tenidos, y considerados como tales, por todas las autoridades, majistrados y habitantes del distrito consular en que residan.

ARTICULO 28. Se ha convenido igualmente, que los consules, sus secretarios, oficiales y personas agregadas al servicio de los consulados (no siendo estas personas ciudadanos del pais en que el consul reside) estarán esentos de todo servicio publico, y tambien de toda especie de pechos, impuestos, y contribuciones, exceptuando aquellas que esten obligados á pagar por razon de comercio, ó propiedad y á las cuales estan sujetos los ciudadanos, y habitantes naturales, y extranjeros del pais en que residen, quedando en todo lo demas, sujetos a las leyes de los respectivos Estados. Los archivos y papeles de los consulados serán respetados inviolablemente, y bajo ningun pretexto los ocupara magistrado alguno, ni tendrá en ellos ninguna intervencion.

ARTICULO 29. Los dichos consules tendrán poder de requerir el auxilio de las autoridades locales, para la prision, detencion y custodia de los desertores de buques publicos y particulares de su pais, y para este objeto se dirigirán á los tribunales, jueces, y oficiales competentes, y pedirán los dichos desertores por escrito, probando por una presentacion de los registros de los buques, rol del equipage, ú otros documentos publicos, que aquellos, hombres eran parte de las dichas tripulaciones, y á esta demanda así probada (menos no obstante cuando seprobare lo contrario) no se reusará la entrega. Semijantes desertores, luego que sean arrestados, se pondrán á disposicion de los dichos consules, y pueden ser depositados en las prisiones publicas, a solicitud y expensas de los que los reclamen, para ser enviados á los buques á que corresponden, ó á otros de la misma nacion. Pero si no fueren mandados dentro de dos meses contados des de el día de su arresto, serán puestos en libertad, y no volverán a ser presos por la misma causa.

ARTICULO 30. Para proteger mas efectivamente su comercio y navegación, las dos partes contratantes se convienen en formar luego que las circunstancias lo permitan, una convencion consular, que declare mas especialmente los poderes é inmunidades de los the powers and immunities of the consuls and vice consuls of the respective parties.

ARTICLE 31. The United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, desiring to make as durable as circumstances will permit the relations which are to be established between the two parties by virtue of this treaty or general convention of peace, amity, commerce, and navigation, have declared solemnly and do agree to the following points:

1st. The present treaty shall remain in full force and virtue for the term of twelve years, to be counted from the day of the exchange of the ratifications, in all the parts relating to commerce and navigation; and in all those parts which relate to peace and friendship, it shall be permanently and perpetually binding on both powers.

2d. If any one or more of the citizens of either party shall infringe any of the articles of this treaty, such citizen shall be held personally responsible for the same, and the harmony and good correspondence between the two nations shall not be interrupted thereby; each party engaging in no way to protect the offender or sanction such violation.

3d. If, (what, indeed, cannot be expected,) unfortunately, any of the articles contained in the present treaty shall be violated or infringed in any other way whatever, it is expressly stipulated that neither of the contracting parties will order or authorize any acts of reprisal, nor declare war against the other, on complaints of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended shall first have presented to the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verified by competent proof, and demanded justice and satisfaction, and the same shall have been either refused or unreasonably delayed.

4th. Nothing in this treaty contained shall, however, be construed or operate contrary to former and existing public treaties with other sovereigns or States.

The present treaty of peace, amity, commerce, and navigation, shall be approved and ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by the President of the Republic of Colombia, with the consent and approbation of the Congress of the same, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in the city of Washington, within eight months, to be counted from the date of the signature hereof, or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof, we, the plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and of the Republic of Colombia, have signed and sealed these presents.

Done in the city of Bogota, on the third day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, in the forty-ninth year of the Independence of the United States of America and the fourteenth of that of the Republic of Colombia.

consules y vice consules de las partes respectivas.

ARTICULO 31. La Republica de Colombia y los Estados Unidos de America, deseando hacer tan duraderas y firmes, como las circunstancias lo permitan las relaciones que han de establecerse entre las dos potencias, en virtud del presente tratado ó convencion general de paz, amistad, navegacion, y comercio, han declarado solemnemente y convienen en los puntos siguientes:

1°. El presente tratado permanecerá en su fuerza y vigor por el termino de doce años contados desde el dia del cange de las ratificaciones, en todos los puntos concernientes á comercio y navegacion, y en todos los demas puntos que se refieren á paz y amistad, será permanente, y perpetuamente obligatorio para ambas potencias.

2°. Si alguno, ó algunos de los ciudadanos de una ú otra parte infringiesen alguno de los articulos contenidos en el presente tratado, dichos ciudadanos serán personalmente responsables, sin que por esto se interrumpa la harmonia y buena correspondencia entre las dos naciones, comprometiendose cada una á no proteger de modo alguno al ofensor, ó sancionár semejante violacion.

3°. Si (lo que á la verdad no puede esperarse) desgraciadamente, alguno de los articulos contenidos en el presente tratado, fuesen en alguna otra manera violados, ó infringidos, se estipula espresamente que ninguna de las dos partes contratantes, ordenará, ó autorizará ningunos actos de represalia, ni declarará la guerra contra la otra por quejas de injurias, ó daños, hasta que la parte que se crea ofendida, haya antes presentado á la otra una esposicion de aquellas injurias, ó daños, verificada con pruebas y testimonios competentes, exigiendo justicia y satisfaccion, y esto haya sido negado, ó diferido sin razon.

4°. Nada de cuanto se contiene en el presente tratado, se construirá sin embargo, ni obrará, en contra de otros tratados publicos anteriores, y existentes con otros soberanos ó Estados.

El presente tratado de paz, amistad, navegacion, y comercio, será ratificado por el Presidente ó Vice Presidente de la Republica de Colombia, encargado del poder Ejecutivo, con consentimiento y aprobacion del Congreso de la misma, y por el Presidente de los Estados Unidos de America, con consejo, y consentimiento del Senado de los mismos; y las ratificaciones serán cangeadas en la ciudad de Washington dentro de ocho meses contados desde este dia, ó antes si fuese posible.

En fe de lo cual nosotros los plenipotenciarios de la Republica de Colombia, y de los Estados Unidos de America hemos firmado y sellado las presentes.

Dadas en la ciudad de Bogota el dia tres de Octubre del año del Señor mil ocho cientos veintecuatro, decimo cuarto de la Independencia de la Republica de Colombia y cuadragesimo nono de la de los Estados Unidos de America.

RICHARD C. ANDERSON, JR.

No. 14.

Bogota, August 20, 1824.

SIR: I now inclose to you copies of the several letters of the Secretary of Foreign Relations to me, on the subject of the negotiation pending between us, together with copies of my answers. In a separate letter of this date, No. 15, I will inclose to you copies of two other letters addressed by me to him, and the answers to them, on the subjects referred to in my letter of the 18th instant.*

His two notes of the 20th and 26th of May, you will see, were either merely introductory to the negotiation, or served only to accompany his projet, presented with the last.

* These letters and the above mentioned despatch, No. 15, related to other subjects than those included in the negotiations for the treaty.

The letter of the 1st of July presents his reasons for wishing to avoid in the convention the declaration of the principle that free ships should give freedom to goods, and, indeed, for wishing to insert, in form, the contrary declaration. My answer of the 7th of July urges and insists on the propriety and necessity of adopting the principle proposed by me. To this answer, which was transmitted immediately after its date, no official response has yet been made; but I understand, from a private conversation with the Secretary, that in a few days I shall either receive a communication or be invited to a conference on that and the subjects of the negotiation generally. He also said that the delay had been produced by having ascertained that it was impracticable to complete the negotiation during the late session of Congress, and that after the adjournment the necessity for any extraordinary despatch had ceased.

I am confirmed in the belief that this Government will not insist on the ground first assumed in relation to the saving character of a neutral ship; but in the conversation to which I have just alluded, the Secretary said that his Government had a difficulty of this kind to encounter; that it apprehended that Spain would not admit that any foreign flag could protect the goods of a citizen of this country against her rights; that, notwithstanding the language of the treaty between the United States and Spain, by which it was declared that "the flag should cover the property, with respect to those powers who recognize the principle," it was apprehended that the Spanish Government would not admit that Colombia was "a power," in the sense of the treaty, but was still her colony. He then said that, in such a case, the article which I proposed would be wholly inoperative, or operate against Colombia. During the conversation he expressed a wish that, in the event a treaty should be concluded on the principle urged by me, the United States should ascertain from Spain, at a very early day, in what way she regarded her own stipulation; and he asked what course the United States would adopt, if, after the conclusion of a treaty, a Spanish cruiser should capture Colombian property in one of her vessels? With all the reluctance which I must ever feel to answer, even informally, any question involving difficulty or importance, without proper consideration and authority, still, on this occasion, I did not hesitate to answer promptly, that the United States would resist such capture in the same way in which she would resist any other infraction of a treaty; that having recognized Colombia as a sovereign State, she would not admit that the property of Colombian citizens was not as effectually protected by her flag, even against Spanish capture, as the property of the subject of any other Government which had acceded to the principle. I infer from the manner and the language of the conversation that when the subject is again renewed some proposition for explanation or further assurance will be made.

You will observe in the letter of the Secretary of the 1st of July, reference is made to the provisional ordinance of this country, in which the principle that "free ships shall not make free goods" is declared, and that in my answer I notice it only in the following language: "You will see that I have restricted my observations to an examination of the expediency of adopting one of two proposed rules, without referring to the provisional ordinance of this country, to which you allude as being in force. I have abstained from any investigation of the legality of that ordinance, from a belief that the present discussion did not require it, and from an ardent hope that no future occurrence may take place which shall render such an examination necessary."

No occasion has yet occurred which produced the necessity of raising the question how far this Government was already bound by the stipulations of our treaty with Spain, made while Colombia was a component part of the monarchy. When I left the United States, it was supposed that the case had then occurred by the capture of the cargo of the Caravan, which required an immediate demand for the restitution of Spanish property taken on board an American vessel, and a portion of my instructions was devoted to an examination of the subject. The property had, by the court of admiralty, been declared "Spanish," and it was believed that the Caravan was a vessel of the United States; but before my arrival at Laguayra the definitive sentence of the court had condemned both vessel and cargo as Spanish property. From this sentence there has been no appeal; the citizens of the United States at Caraccas differed in their representations of the case. Some thought that it was an unjust condemnation, while others had no doubt that the vessel and cargo were really the property of the subjects of Spain. While the decision of the court was unreversed, and I had no authority to allege anything against it, I considered the original ground of demand for restitution, which existed in the event that the vessel was the property of citizens of the United States, as taken from me.

I have recently seen in the gazettes of the United States accounts of several captures of vessels having Spanish property on board, but I have as yet received no representation on which I could act, nor, indeed, have I any information of the fact except what the newspapers give.

I have not, of course, these certain means of knowing what will be the course of this Government on a demand for the restoration of property captured under such circumstances, which an official note would give; but from the reference in the late letter to me to the ordinance now said to be in force, and from observations made on different occasions since my residence in this country, I am satisfied that the restitution will be refused, or at least resisted with great pertinacity; and that the ground will be assumed that on the declaration of independence, or of the promulgation of their ordinance, (for I have heard both dates alluded to,) this country was absolved from all the engagements of the treaty between Spain and the United States. I have not failed, upon all such occasions, to intimate as strongly as the course of conversation with propriety admitted, and with a distinctness which could not be misunderstood, that the propriety of such conclusions was not admitted by the United States. I know very well the peril of speculating on the future course of a Government, but in this case the indications have been so strong that I have considered it proper to apprise you, by anticipation, of what I expect.

The projet and contre projet are not inclosed, on account of their bulk, and because it is believed that they were not necessary to the understanding of anything in this despatch. They will be sent by the next conveyance.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

R. C. ANDERSON, JR.

HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

P. S. The copies are not distributed between the packages in the manner intended, but all of them are in the one or the other.

BOGOTA, May 24, 1824.

SIR: Your note of the 20th instant has been received, informing me that the Executive had conferred on you full powers for negotiating and concluding a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation with the United States, and requesting to know at what time and place it would be agreeable to me to enter on the subject.

I cannot deny to myself the satisfaction of expressing the personal pleasure with which I received the information that the negotiation of a treaty on the part of this Republic had been confided to you; and in answer to your request, I beg leave to say that I shall be happy to commence our conferences on the subject to-morrow at 11 o'clock, at my office.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

R. C. ANDERSON, JR.

Hon. PEDRO GUAL, Secretary of Foreign Relations.

BOGOTA, June 2, 1824.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving from you a project of a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation between the United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, and having attentively and respectfully considered the same, have now the honor to submit to you a counter project, and to state to you that it will be very agreeable to me to enter on a discussion of the points involved in the project and counter project at any time it may suit your convenience.

I have the honor to be, with great respect and esteem, your obedient servant,

R. C. ANDERSON, JR.

Hon. PEDRO GUAL, Secretary of State and Foreign Relations.

BOGOTA, July 7, 1824.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 1st instant, and have given to the reasons therein urged, in vindication of the fourteenth article of the project of a treaty, submitted by you, the most attentive consideration.

That article contains a principle so important in its effects, and so repugnant to the rule which I wish to establish in the proposed convention, that I must be indulged in making some observations in support of the article by which it is desired to supersede it. It will not be my purpose at this time, nor indeed does the occasion in any way demand it, to enter into an examination of the question "Whether a neutral bottom does of right, where no compact exists, protect the goods of a belligerent power." If this examination were necessary, I should in my own feelings find abundant incentive to support the affirmative of the proposition, and to maintain that the rule, which humanity, peace, and the policy of commercial nations all prescribe as the true rule, was really and already a part of the public law. But the nature of the present negotiation does not impose that duty on me. We have now only to declare what shall be the rule for ourselves, without inquiring what has been the rule for others. It is, however, my purpose to show that our highest obligations to the pacific and commercial habits of our citizens, to the spirit of our political institutions, and to the physical situation of our country, do demand of us to declare in language unambiguous, and as energetic as our command of language will permit us, "that free ships shall make free goods."

Whatever may be the present usage of some of the maritime nations of the world, or however far belligerent usurpation may have suppressed neutral right, we should be inexcusable in voluntarily permitting the sanction of two independent nations to foster a usurpation, the origin of which was superior force, and the continuance of which depends only on the continuance of that force. To withdraw from neutral rights that moral aid which the force of our example in making this declaration would give, would render us accessory to future mischiefs and vexations, which, though enormous, can only be equal to those which neutral and commercial nations have already suffered from the effects of the opposite doctrine; it would be equivalent to the high offence of refusing to an honest party the benefit of our testimony in a just cause. Such a course would, in that great contest which has been waging for a series of years for the purpose of ascertaining with precision the true boundaries of belligerent and neutral rights, be placing our Governments on that side which their interests and the spirit of commerce alike reject; for in that contest the interests of all those whose policy is peace, and whose prosperity rests on the culture of the soil or the commerce of the ocean, must impel them to take that side which gives the most enlarged enjoyment to the rights of neutral navigation. Any course which would, however remotely or indirectly, give countenance to the existence of a principle so palpably hostile to neutral commerce, should be carefully avoided by those whose interests are inseparably connected with it; but the express and public declaration (as is now proposed) on the face of a treaty, that the vessels of a friend shall not protect the goods with which they are laden, would not only be, it is respectfully submitted, a flagrant surrender of the just immunities of neutrals, but would suppose a total blindness to all the lights of modern improvement.

It is impossible to see what motive can operate on us to become the voluntary auxiliaries of those who maintain this claim, and to lend, gratuitously, the weight of the American example to those whose interest it may be to enlarge the circle of belligerent pretensions, and, of course, to narrow the just rights of those whose practice as well as profession is peace. I do not propose to propagate this, the favorite doctrine of my country, by the sword, but I urge the propriety of propagating it by all those moral means which, upon enlightened and Christian nations, have an effect so much stronger than the sword; of giving our disinterested testimony in its behalf; of inviting all others to adopt and pursue it by the forcible argument of pursuing it ourselves.

The history of the last century declares to us that there is nothing within the range of international transactions more certainly calculated to create dissensions between nations otherwise friendly, than the exercise of the right of search for the various purposes and in the various ways in which it has been claimed; and it declares to us, too, that neutral and pacific nations have ever been the unoffending victims of that vexatious branch of it involved in the present discussion, and which would be legitimated by the article you propose. It has generally been maintained by those who had arms and, of course, the requisite ability in their hands to enforce it beyond right, and to that single cause must be ascribed the fact that the usage has become general enough to assume the name of law. It is not enough to say that it is a matter of strict right to annoy an enemy in every practicable way, to do everything which may impair his strength or reduce him to peace. It is not sufficient to say so, because it is not true. Although nothing may be lawful which does not conduce to end the war, still it is not true that everything is allowed which tends to that end. The same reasoning would justify you in poisoning an adversary or refusing quarter to a prisoner. These rights, if ever they existed, have long since been abandoned with other barbarisms of those ages which gave them birth, and it is no more than just now to abandon others which, if not of equal, are of kindred barbarity. And if this claim which has no foundation in reason, which is supported only by arms, and can be exercised only by invading the jurisdiction of a friend, is yet allowed by the public law among the family of nations, it is time that every civilized member of that family should simultaneously concur in erasing the page which sanctions it.

There is no maxim of the public law more firmly established, none to which the sense of mankind has more universally compelled all nations to submit, than that a belligerent cannot pursue or capture his enemy or seize his property in the jurisdiction of a neutral. That rule, if unqualified, would close the question without the necessity of a special compact, as the right in contest is always exercised by a trespass on that jurisdiction; and it is believed that a practice violatory of this general rule would never have been instituted or continued long enough to assume the name or semblance of a law if, as has been suggested, the belligerent had not always in his hands the means of enforcing his pretensions, while the neutral, defenceless and incapable of resistance, is obliged, for peace or temporary preservation, to submit to the usurpation and to yield, not from a sense of justice, but from a sense of imbecility. It is believed that an examination of the subject will lead to the conviction that this was the original and sole foundation, and that it is, (with the exception of Colombia,) continued and supported now by those only who, feeling power and forgetting right, think proper to enforce what others cannot resist. Upon no other ground can we account for this anomalous practice, wholly violating the general spirit of the law of nations, which in almost every other case so carefully guards the jurisdiction of a neutral; while by this usage a party at war assumes the power of stopping, searching, and unloading the vessel of a friend.

There are other considerations connected with this subject, all tending to show that magnanimous nations should willingly make the concession, if that can be denominated concession which is in truth but an assent to a plain principle of natural justice. The character of the property on which the right is exercised would seem, with all those who regard reason in the acquisition of gain, to forbid any extraordinary eagerness in seizing it; it is generally the property of private and unoffending individuals—of persons who have, probably, not at all participated in the original wrong which gave rise to the war. Such is the spirit of this age, that many philanthropic statesmen, and the chiefs of some nations also, among whom I take high satisfaction in naming the President of the United States, have urged the propriety of expunging from the catalogue of belligerent rights that of capturing private property, and of giving to such property on the ocean the same exemption which it has for ages enjoyed on the land. The nature of this discussion does not require of me to go so far, but it may be fairly inferred that the relinquishment of this branch of the pretension will be no longer resisted when it is remembered that the property which is the object of it belongs to individuals and not to the hostile Government; that it is in a course of lawful commerce, and that the vessels which bear it, and must be assailed in order to enforce the claim, belong to neutrals and friends. This consideration gives to the question various aspects, and under each aspect it does seem to me that its morality, as well as policy, is wholly incapable of vindication.

The interests of those who are engaged in the peaceful pursuits of civil life form the predominating interest which should control the councils of every well regulated Government. A regard for that interest forbids us from adding to the ordinary and unavoidable calamities of war any unnecessary aggravation, and requires of us so to regulate its rules as in every practicable way to diminish the number of individuals operated on by it, and who may thereby be permitted to pursue their ordinary and useful occupations. But the right now claimed is precisely of that character, the execution of which is certainly, perhaps, unavoidably attended by the greatest degree of harshness; the bare detention of a vessel on the high seas, pursuing its lawful commerce and protected by the flag of peace, in itself involves harshness; but when it is remembered that the detention is always under the menace of a superior and warlike force, and that the consequent seizure and search are too often executed in the vexatious spirit which that superiority of force inspires, the appeal to our feelings for the entire abrogation of the practice is too strong to be resisted. One most powerful objection to its continuance is, that it can be exercised only at a distance from all supervising authority, when it may well be believed, as all experience too fully justifies, that the licentious and violent manner of its execution will be but too certainly proportioned to the distance from the sovereign eye, and to the difficulty and uncertainty of redress on the part of the neutral. It is always executed on a theatre to which the vigilance of the high authorities of the country cannot reach, and frequently, from the nature of things, by those who have not that responsibility from character or station which is sufficient to restrain them from unnecessary violence and actual oppression. If this high power of stopping and searching a neutral vessel, and taking therefrom goods which the avidity of an interested party may lead him to think belongs to an enemy, was confined, in practice, to officers commanding the public ships of their Government, it would be less intolerable; but when it is confided to any one who can procure the commission of a privateer, it becomes a system of insufferable vexation and mischief; and it is no sufficient answer to declare that some of these mischiefs do also result from the undoubted right of searching a neutral vessel for contraband goods; such a reply bringing to my recollection that I could not exterminate all, would only animate me more strongly to urge the suppression of this most fruitful source of irritation and national animosity. A reference to one evil, however incurable, can never furnish an argument for tolerating another.

Under this view, it does seem to me that every nation which, in estimating the value of an abstract right, has any regard to the means by which it is to be enforced, is urged irresistibly to abandon on the altar of peace a claim which is doubtful in its existence and odious in its exercise, always executed in violence and sometimes in bloodshed, one which is of all others most highly calculated to disturb the harmony of nations, and to make foes of those whom an identity of feelings, interests, and political institutions invite to be friends.

But, apart from the general reasons which should invite all nations to accede to the benign rule which I propose, is there not, in the peculiar situation of our respective countries, something which should impel us joyfully to embrace it, and to seize this occasion of giving our aid to the creation of a system of international law, which, omitting all those barbarous features that the cupidity or violence of other nations may have retained, shall admit those only which the true interests of our fellow-man and the best feelings of his nature can sanction? This is the first occasion on which a negotiation has ever been opened between the United States and any of her sister Republics; it is probably the first time at which this subject has been canvassed between American parties, and probably, too, it is the very first time at which it has ever been mentioned by the representatives of two nations whose Governments were republican and free. Does not this consideration warn us to be particularly cautious in giving countenance to any doctrine so hostile to the general spirit of our republican institutions? While in the internal organization of our Governments the greatest care has been displayed to protect all the arts of peace, and to foster all the occupations to which war and its usages are so inimical, shall we, in our exterior arrangements, voluntarily engraft a principle so hostile to the spirit and the practice of peace. If the monarchies of the Old World shall pertinaciously adhere to a pretension founded on and sustained alone by superior power, let the Republics of America recognize only those rights which are founded on reason and humanity, and are consonant to the genius of their constitutions and the habits of their people. In all negotiations with European powers that system of policy must, I admit, be pursued on this as on all other subjects which each independent nation shall think will best promote its interests, or which the pressure of temporary and calamitous circumstances may impose on it; but when two Republics on this continent are, for the first time, creating the rules which shall govern the intercourse of their citizens, why should they, unshackled by the policy and unawed by the power of others, prescribe any rules but those which good sense and humanity dictate? And I consider the introduction of the principle for which I contend as eminently important, when it is remembered (and it may be done without incurring the imputation of much national vanity) that the stipulation now to be made between us will probably furnish a formula for all the free Governments of America in their negotiations on this subject. It may readily be believed that the rule now formed will be regarded in a manner which will almost certainly insure its adoption by them. Nothing, surely, could be more mortifying than the future reflection that, under the influence of our pernicious example, they had pursued an unwise policy, and had surrendered one of the favorite immunities of neutrality.

The usages of modern warfare, with few exceptions, tend to restrict the limits of its operation and to liberate from its calamities the non-combatant and neutral. If at this period of increasing liberality we reject a principle which it is believed almost every nation of Europe has at some one time admitted, we should be rejecting the light from our eyes; we should be throwing back our nations on the darkness of those ages when I might admit that this principle was unknown; but when you will remember that the principles that gave birth to our Governments were alike unknown, or if known, not admitted. And even if I were now contending that the position that "free ships made free goods" was a part of the admitted law of nations, it would not be regarded by me as a fair argument in opposition, to be told that many of the powerful Governments of the world deny this principle, when it is known that some of them deny the plainest principles of human rights; that they deny the principles upon which your Government and mine are founded, and without the establishment of which, under the auspices of Almighty God, neither you nor I would have the power of negotiating this day.

But it may be stated that all the maritime powers of Europe have, at some time, admitted the enormity of the adverse principle by making conventional stipulations against it. Even Great Britain has recognized, at long intervals of time, in her treaties with France, and also with Spain, and with the United Provinces, the doctrine that neutral ships shall cover the goods. And you well recollect that the excitement produced by the enormities committed in enforcing the contrary principle was a prominent reason for forming that celebrated association denominated the Armed Neutrality. Whether or not this confederacy of neutrals, by the resistance which they displayed to maritime usurpation, and by promulgating the rules by which alone they would abide, succeeded in creating or changing the law they surely succeeded in giving to the world the highest evidence that it should be changed. I take great pleasure in citing the course of the United States on this subject. Her policy has been unchanged. It has been invariably that of liberating free trade from all unnecessary shackles. She has eagerly sought every occasion which her negotiations with the maritime powers of the world would afford to give her testimony in behalf of the superior policy and benignity of the rule which imparts to the goods the saving character of the ship. At a very early period of her history she succeeded in establishing it in her treaties with France, the Netherlands, Sweden, and Prussia, and at a later period with Spain. If my country could, for a moment, have forgotten the claims of humanity and fair commerce, and have attended only to her interests in a state of war, recollecting the enterprise and gallantry of her officers and seamen, she might well have supposed that no nation could have inflicted greater or more essential injury on an enemy under the authority of the opposite doctrine; but she has never permitted herself to estimate an action by the amount of injury it would inflict on an enemy, when that injury must fall in a less degree but in a manner equally certain on a friend. While her course on this question is not cited by me to furnish a controlling example for the government of others, I refer to it to show that, after an experience of nearly half a century, she still bears evidence to the superior reasonableness and justice of the rule she has adopted.

The stipulation now proposed is perfectly equal and fair. If one nation surrenders the right of taking her enemy's goods from the ships of another, she gets the equivalent in the corresponding concession from that other. She procures an immunity for her own property at the slight expense of agreeing not to seize another's. Under this view, I cannot feel the weight of the consideration suggested by you, that this Republic, being at war with Spain, has an interest different from that she would have in peace, when it is remembered that the same compact which will save Spanish property from Colombian cruisers will protect the property of your citizens, similarly situated, against capture from your enemy. And surely the exemption of the property of your citizens, and the increased commerce of the Republic, together with the impulse thereby given to agriculture and all other kinds of industry, form most ample equivalents for the miserable pittance of Spanish property which your privateers might catch upon the ocean. So that, even in a state of war, there is no loss in the course proposed; even in pecuniary interest the balance is at least equal; but when the calls of humanity, peace, and the harmony of nations are heard, considerations which with you will ever have the greatest weight, there cannot be any longer ground for hesitation.

The accidental circumstance of being engaged in war cannot alter the justice of the principle, nor in any way affect its permanent policy. It is one which should be embraced by every nation whose permanent policy is peace, who does not fashion her internal institutions nor exterior arrangements for a system of continued and aggressive warfare. The contrary course should not be adopted even in the case that one of the contracting parties should, at the moment of negotiation, be engaged in war, as that situation must, of course, be temporary; and no wise or pacific nation would regulate her policy by the belief that war, instead of commerce, would be the trade of her citizens. Although the situation of the United States, to which you have been pleased to refer, is, at this time, most happily, one of universal peace, still her views of this subject have never varied; indeed, the policy of a nation on this subject must be permanent; it cannot be varied, from time to time, to suit all the changes which her political attitude with foreign nations may assume. If, in a state of war, she refuses to enter into wholesome regulations, evidently beneficial to her citizens in time of peace, the same course of reasoning would prevent her from adopting them on the return of peace, inasmuch as war might and probably would again come. The result would be, that, between the existence of an actual and the fear of a coming war, the stipulation now proposed might never be adopted.

While it would not become me to enter into an examination of the course which the peculiar interests of Colombia should direct her to pursue in relation to her commercial economy, still, under the suggestions of your letter, referring to the existing war in which she is engaged, I may be permitted to observe that surely the physical situation of no country more certainly directs the views of its Government and citizens to agriculture and commerce than this; the variety of its climates, the fertility of its ample territory, but, above all, the great extent of its seacoast, lying on two oceans, having the remaining parts of this and two other entire continents at accessible and convenient distances, all declare that the lasting prosperity of its citizens must rest on the arts of peace, and that the permanent policy of its Government should be such as to foster and sustain those arts, regarding the occasional occurrences of war as events in no way to affect the general system.

Under the qualifications which I propose to annex to the stipulation, it does seem to me that it will be one of unmixed good—one wholly unexceptionable. I propose that it shall be declared that a ship of one of the contracting parties, being neutral, shall protect the goods with which it is laden against the vessels of the other party, being belligerent, whenever such goods belong to a nation recognizing this principle. This is, in truth, the whole extent to which any nation can go without manifest injury to itself. Without such a modification, a belligerent nation, holding aloof from the recognition of the principle, would enjoy all its benefits without the corresponding concessions. The truth of this position and the propriety of the modification are easily illustrated by the present relative situation of Colombia and her enemy. If the treaty between Spain and the United States declared simply "that free ships should make free goods," omitting the proposed qualification, the result would have been that all goods belonging to citizens of this Republic found on board vessels of the United States would have been protected against Spanish cruisers, while the goods of Spanish subjects, in like situation, would be liable to capture by Colombian ships, supposing (for illustration) that the Government did not recognize the principle. But, under the language of the treaty, as recently modified, this consequence does not follow, as it is there declared that "if either of the two contracting parties shall be at war with a third party, and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral shall cover the property of enemies whose Government acknowledge this principle, and not of others." It is to this extent that I invite you most earnestly to go; to declare in the proposed convention that the vessels of our countries, respectively, shall convey, free from molestation, the goods of all nations who will assent to this salutary rule.

You will see that I have restricted my observations to an examination of the expediency of adopting one of two proposed rules, without referring to the provisional ordinance of this country, to which you allude as being now in force. I have abstained from any investigation of the legality of that ordinance, from a belief that the present discussion did not require it, and from an ardent hope that no future occurrence may take place which shall render such an examination necessary.

While I declare with unaffected sincerity my anxious wishes that you may concur with me in the views herein expressed, and that no occurrence may intervene to check the progress and happy completion of the negotiation between us, I will add that it would be a source of extreme and particular regret that the negotiation should be arrested by anything connected with the subject now involved in discussion, inasmuch as I should consider that any radical difference of opinion between two Republics of America on any important point of commercial or general policy would have at this time an unfavorable effect on the reputation and progress of all free Governments.

These considerations are submitted with the most profound respect for all those who entertain a different opinion, but with all the zeal which a most thorough conviction of their truth can inspire.

I have the honor to renew to you the assurances of my profound consideration and respect.

No. 16.

BOGOTÁ, September 17, 1824.

SIR: Copies of the projet and of the contre projet of a treaty of navigation and commerce, as interchanged between the plenipotentiary of Colombia and myself, referred to in my letter No. 14 of the 20th of August, are herewith inclosed.

Soon after the date of my last letter I was invited to a renewal of the negotiation by verbal conference; these conferences have been frequent, and I am happy to inform you that we have agreed on all the articles to form a treaty. These articles have not, however, been reduced to their destined order, and it is possible that some verbal alterations may yet take place. I know of nothing which will probably prevent its conclusion in a few days. At this time I can inform you that the first three articles of my contre projet, by which the situation of the most favored nation is assured to each party, are adopted without alteration; and that the tenth article, establishing the principle that the flag shall cover the property, under the qualification recommended in my instructions, has been agreed to, also without alteration. In other respects the form of the contre projet is a good deal altered, though in substance it is retained. In most of the changes I think there has been an improvement, and indeed several of them were made on my own suggestion. If the treaty should be agreed to and signed, I will immediately transmit to you a copy, together with the protocols of our conferences and such explanations as will put you in full possession of everything attending the negotiation. The treaty itself would be reserved for some safer conveyance than the casualties of the ordinary conveyances here afford. My letter numbered 8 gave you information that soon after my arrival in this capital I complied with your instructions by communicating to the Government of Colombia copies of the several acts of the Congress of the United States on the subject of the African slave trade. Although no indisposition has been manifested by this Government to adopt the most effectual measures for the suppression of that trade, and indeed every indication has been given in conversation of a perfect readiness to adopt, in co-operation with the United States, the most energetic measures for its extinction, still I have not yet made any specific proposition on the subject. With every anxiety to carry into effect what is understood to be the wishes of the President and the House of Representatives, and indeed to gratify my own and the feelings of my country, I have hitherto been prevented, solely by the difficulties I encountered, in framing articles for such a convention satisfactory to myself. Very recently I have seen the convention signed in London, and the proceedings of the Senate on it; and I intend, at an early day, to avail myself of the lights which these proceedings furnish to introduce the subject here. As the articles embracing the proper stipulations and restrictions will be more numerous than I had at first supposed necessary, I infer that the authority given in your instructions will be as properly executed by embodying those articles in a separate instrument, as by connecting them with a treaty of commerce.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

Project of a Treaty of Friendship, Commerce, and Navigation, between the Republic of Colombia and the United States of America.

[Translation.]

BOGOTA, May 18, 1824.

In the name of God, the Author and Lawgiver of the Universe: The Republic of Colombia and the United States of America, desirous of confirming and perpetuating the friendship and good understanding that happily subsist between the two powers, have determined to establish, in a clear, distinct, and positive manner, the regulations to be in future sacredly observed by both, by means of a treaty or convention of peace, friendship, commerce, and navigation.

For this desirable object, the Vice President of the Republic, charged with the executive power, by virtue of an article of the constitution of said Republic, has conferred on the honorable Pedro Gual, Secretary of State and of Foreign Relations, full powers; and the President of the United States of America has conferred them on the honorable Richard C. Anderson, Minister Plenipotentiary near the said Republic; who, having exchanged the said powers in good and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a perfect, lasting, and inviolable peace and true friendship between the Republic of Colombia and the United States of America, throughout the whole extent of their possessions and territories, and between their people, citizens and subjects, without distinction of persons or places.

ARTICLE 2. The Republic of Colombia and the United States, desirous of remaining in peace and friendship with all other civilized nations of the earth, by means of an open policy, equally friendly to all, bind themselves hereafter not to grant any special favor or particular and exclusive privileges to any nation of which each of the contracting parties shall not immediately participate.

ARTICLE 3. The citizens and subjects of the United States shall have liberty to frequent at pleasure, with their own vessels, the coasts and ports of the Republic of Colombia, and to trade therein with all manner of productions, goods, and merchandise whose importation and exportation shall not be absolutely prohibited, and of whom greater imposts, contributions, and duties shall not be exacted than those usually paid by the most favored nations. The citizens and subjects of the Republic of Colombia shall also enjoy the same liberty on the coasts and in the ports of the United States, without any distinction; it being understood that to enjoy this liberty of commerce, trade, and navigation, the citizens and subjects of both parties shall observe the laws and regulations to which the subjects and citizens of the most favored nations are subject.

ARTICLE 4. The citizens and subjects of both contracting parties, in the territories subject to their jurisdiction, shall have the free power to dispose of their personal, landed, movable, or moving property, by rents, donations, testaments, or in any other way. The property of the citizens and subjects of both parties, who shall die ab intestato in any of the countries subject to their respective jurisdictions, shall pass to their legitimate heirs, in conformity with the laws of the country in which they shall have died. And if said heirs shall be disqualified from entering upon the possession of their inheritance on account of their being foreigners, the term of three years shall be allowed for any arrangement that may best suit them.

ARTICLE 5. The Republic of Colombia and the United States promise and oblige themselves formally to afford their special protection to the persons and property of citizens and subjects, traders or professors of any liberal or mechanical art, whether residents or visitors, who may be found in their respective territories, opening and offering the courts of justice for their legal resort upon the same terms as to the native or naturalized citizens of the country in which they may be.

ARTICLE 6. The citizens and subjects of neither party shall be obstructed or detained with their vessels, crews, goods, and merchandise, belonging to them, under pretext of military expeditions, public or private uses of whatever kind, without granting to those interested a sufficient indemnification; but the citizens and subjects of other liberal or mechanical professions of the Republic of Colombia and the United States of America, who shall reside in the countries subject to the jurisdiction of one or the other State, shall remain subject to the same laws, charges, imposts, and contributions, to which the native and naturalized citizens are, of the country in which they reside.

ARTICLE 7. Whenever the citizens and subjects of either party are obliged to seek refuge and safety in its rivers, bays, roads, ports, and jurisdiction, with their vessels, whether merchantmen or ships-of-war, public or private, on account of the weather, or the pursuit of pirates or enemies, they shall be admitted and treated with humanity, affording them every favor and protection in repairing and refitting them, procuring provisions, and placing them in a condition to continue their voyage without any obstruction or hindrance.

ARTICLE 8. All the vessels, goods, and effects of the citizens and subjects of one of the contracting parties that shall be captured by pirates, whether within the limits of its jurisdiction or on the high sea, and shall be conducted to, or found in, the rivers, bays, roads, ports, and jurisdiction of the other, shall be returned to their owners, their claims being proved in due form before the proper tribunals; provided the claim be made within the precise term of one year by the owners themselves, their attorneys or agents of their respective nations.

ARTICLE 9. In case a vessel belonging to the citizens and subjects of one of the contracting parties be wrecked, stranded, or injured in any way, on the coasts and within the jurisdiction of the other, every assistance and protection shall be afforded her, as is usual towards vessels of the nation where the accident may have happened, permitting her to unload her goods and effects without exacting therefor any duty, impost, or contribution, until they be reshipped.

ARTICLE 10. The citizens and subjects of both contracting parties shall have perfect and absolute liberty of sailing, directly, with their vessels, goods, and merchandise, from one neutral port to another, and from a neutral port to an enemy's, although it may belong to one or many chiefs or States at war with either of the two nations, excepting, in these last two cases, the articles of contraband declared to be such in the following enumeration, viz: cannons, mortars, howitzers, swivels, blunderbusses, muskets, fusils, rifles, pistols, pikes, swords, sabres, lances, halberts, grenades, bombs, fusees, balls, and other articles belonging to the use of these or any other description of arms; powder, saltpetre, matches, lead in bars, shields, helmets, cuirasses, and other suitable armor for the equipment of soldiers; colors, horses and their trappings; and, in general, every kind of ready-made clothing, the equipments and appointments of troops, or apparatus for prosecuting war by land or sea.

ARTICLE 11. In all other goods and merchandise, articles of commerce whose importation and exportation shall not have been generally prohibited, the citizens and subjects of both parties shall enjoy the perfect liberty of trading, comprehending every description of provisions and articles of the first necessity for life, excepting only to those ports besieged and blockaded. And, to avoid all doubt, it is expressly declared that those ports alone are besieged or blockaded which are attacked by the forces of one or more belligerents capable of preventing the entrance and departure of neutrals.

ARTICLE 12. And forasmuch as it frequently happens that neutral vessels sail from their respective ports bound for an enemy's port, not knowing that said port has been declared to be in a state of blockade, and is actually besieged or blockaded, the contracting parties have agreed that if these neutral vessels, before their attempt to enter, be informed of the port being blockaded, and, after having received this intimation, should disregard it, or attempt to enter, these vessels and their cargoes, although not consisting of articles of contraband, shall be detained, sequestered, and confiscated. After the blockade shall be raised, the place surrendering to the blockading forces, all the neutral vessels and their cargoes found in the port captured shall also be detained, sequestered, and confiscated, if they shall have entered therein after the blockade had been declared and executed; but the neutrals that shall have entered the said port before the blockade, being ignorant of it, shall be respected.

ARTICLE 13. The articles of contraband above specified that shall be found on the high sea, or within the limits of the jurisdiction of one of the two nations, on board one of their vessels, bound for a country the enemy of one of them, shall be detained, sequestered, and confiscated, leaving the rest of the cargo and the vessel free for whatever disposition may suit the owners. No vessel of the two nations shall be detained on the high sea on account of contrabands, if the master, captain, or supercargo of said vessel shall place the articles of contraband at the disposition of the captain, unless such articles be so numerous and of such quantity as to render it impossible to transport them on board of the capturing vessel without serious inconveniences; but in this case, as well as in those of just detention, the vessels detained shall be sent to the nearest, safest, and most convenient port, for trial and corresponding adjudication, according to law.

ARTICLE 14. In like manner the goods and merchandise belonging to enemies of one of the contracting parties, and found on board of neutral vessels of the other, shall be detained, sequestered, and declared to be good prize, whatever may be their destination; and the goods and merchandise of the neutral party, found on board of enemies' vessels captured, shall be also free.

ARTICLE 15. To prevent all disorder in visiting and examining the vessels and cargoes of both contracting parties on the high sea, they have mutually agreed that whenever a public or private armed vessel shall fall in with a neutral, the first shall remain beyond cannon shot from the second, and order its boat, with two or three men, to make the visit and examination of the papers concerning the property and cargo of the vessel, without causing the least extortion, violence, or ill treatment, for which the commanders and officers of the said armed vessel shall be responsible.

ARTICLE 16. To avoid all grievance and abuse in the examination of the papers concerning the property of the vessels of the citizens and subjects of both powers, they have agreed that, one of them being at war, the vessels belonging to the citizens and subjects of the other shall be obliged to carry with them sea patents or passports, expressing the name, property, and burden of the vessel, as well as the name and residence of the owner and commandant of said vessel, so that it may in this manner appear whether she really and actually belongs to citizens or subjects of the other. They have agreed in like manner that the vessels above mentioned, in addition to their being provided with the sea patents or passports, shall also carry certificates containing the invoice of the cargo, the place whence the vessel has sailed, and a declaration of the goods on board the vessel, whether contraband or not, with a specification of the owner to whom they belong, without which requisite the said vessels shall be detained, to be tried by the competent tribunal, and declared good prize, unless they shall satisfy or repair the deficiency by testimony equivalent in every respect.

ARTICLE 17. Whenever either of the contracting parties shall be engaged in war with another State, no citizen or subject of Colombia, or of the United States, shall accept a commission, or privateering commission, to aid or co-operate with the enemies of one or the other contracting party in a hostile manner, under the penalty of being treated as a pirate.

ARTICLE 18. If, by accident, it should happen that both contracting parties should be engaged in war at the same time with a common enemy, the following regulations shall be mutually observed:

1. The vessels and cargoes of each, that may be captured by the private armed vessels-of-war of the other, shall be returned to their owners whenever they shall not have remained in the power of the enemy more than four and twenty hours, giving to the captors the third of their value. But if the four and twenty hours shall have been passed over, the vessel and her cargo shall belong entirely to the captor.

2. The vessels and cargoes recaptured by the vessels-of-war of both powers shall be restored to their owners, allowing to the captors the thirtieth part of their whole value, if the vessels captured have not remained in the power of the enemy more than four and twenty hours, and the tenth part if that time have passed by.

3. In these cases the restitution shall be made after the property has been properly proved, previously allowing to the captors the part belonging to them.

4. The public and private armed vessels of both nations shall be admitted, with their prizes, into the ports of the other; but these prizes shall not be unloaded or sold until the proper tribunal of the captor shall have decided upon their legality.

ARTICLE 19. If, by a fatality which cannot be expected, the two high contracting parties shall make war on each other, they have agreed, and do agree, now for then, that there shall be granted the term of six months to the merchants residing on the coasts and at the ports of each, and one year to those living in the interior, to settle their business and transport their merchandise where they may please, granting them for this purpose the necessary safe conduct as a sufficient protection until they reach the port they have designated.

The citizens and subjects of other professions that may be established in the territories and dominions of the Republic of Colombia and the United States shall be respected and secured in the full enjoyment of their personal liberty and of their property, unless their private conduct render them unworthy this protection, which, in regard for humanity, the two contracting parties oblige themselves to afford them.

ARTICLE 20. To make more effective the protection which the Republic of Colombia or the United States are to furnish in future to the navigation and commerce of their respective citizens and subjects, they agree to receive and admit consuls and vice consuls in the ports fitted for foreign commerce, of both contracting parties, who shall enjoy therein all the privileges, prerogatives, and immunities of the consuls and vice consuls of the most favored nations; each remaining at liberty to except those ports, stations, and places where the admission and residence of the said consuls and vice consuls may not be deemed convenient.

ARTICLE 21. That the consuls and vice consuls of both parties may enjoy the privileges, prerogatives, and immunities belonging to them from their public character, they shall receive, before entering upon their functions, their authority or diploma in due form from the Government, so that, being accredited, and the exequatur obtained, they may be esteemed and considered as such consuls by all the authorities, magistrates, and inhabitants of the consular district in which they reside, as soon as they affix the arms of their nation upon the door of the house in which their office may be kept.

ARTICLE 22. It has also been agreed that the consuls, their secretaries, officers, and persons attached to the service of the consulates, shall be exempted from all public service and from every description of taxes, imposts, and contributions, excepting what should be paid on account of commerce, lucrative profession, and landed property, and to which the inhabitants and natives or naturalized citizens of the country where they reside are subject; in every other respect they shall remain subject to the laws in force of the respective State. The archives and papers of the consulates shall be preserved inviolate, and under no pretext shall any magistrate enter to inspect them, by way of domiciliary visits, or on any other ground.

ARTICLE 23. The contracting parties have also agreed, for the better understanding of the 21st article, that the United States shall admit consuls or vice consuls of Colombia in those ports of their territories and dominions in which, until now, the consuls of the most favored nations have been admitted and received; and the Republic of Colombia will admit and receive consuls of the United States in the city of Santo Torras de Angostura, whose consular district shall extend to the ports fitted, or which shall be fitted, for foreign commerce on the river Orinoco; in the city of Cumana, whose consular district shall embrace the ports that are adapted, or which shall be, in the provinces of Cumana, Barcelona, and the island of Margarita; in Lagunayra or Puerto Cabello, whose consular district shall embrace the ports fitted, or which shall be fitted, for foreign commerce in the province of Caraccas; in the town of Maracaibo, whose consular district shall extend to the ports that are fitted, or which shall be, in the provinces of Coro and Maracaibo; in the town of Cartagena, whose consular district shall extend to the ports that are, or shall be fitted, in the provinces of Rio Hacha, Santa Marta, and Cartagena; in the town of Panama, whose consular district shall extend to the ports that are, or which shall be fitted, in the provinces of Porto Bello, Veraguas, Panama; in the town of Guayaquil, whose consular district shall embrace the ports that are, or which shall be fitted, on the coasts of the department of the same name, to the confines of Colombia and Peru. The Government of Colombia also agrees that the consuls of the United States may change their residence from the ports above mentioned to other proper ports of their consular district which they may think to be better adapted to the discharge of their offices, on account of their health, location, and mercantile relations, provided they shall previously obtain the consent and approbation of the said Government of Colombia.

ARTICLE 24. The consuls of both parties shall have power to appoint vice consuls or consular agents among the citizens, subjects or foreigners, resident in the other fit ports of their consular districts; but they shall not commence the exercise of their functions until the approbation of the Government of the Republic of Colombia and of the United States be obtained. The functions of said vice consuls or consular agents shall be limited to giving protection and aid to merchants, vessels, public and private property of both nations, with the obligation of giving account to the consuls of whom they shall have obtained their appointments of whatever may have required their intervention; and they shall remain beyond this, subject to the laws, charges, imposts and contributions, as the native and naturalized citizens or foreigners of the country where they may have settled.

ARTICLE 25. The citizens and subjects of both contracting parties shall have the power to make their testaments, codicils, contracts, obligations, protests, and other acts for death, or among the living, mutually obligatory upon themselves, before the consuls of the respective nations; and the testimonies of said acts inter vivos, or as last wills, being signed by the said consuls and authorized with their proper seals, shall have full faith and credit before the courts of the United States and those of the Republic of Colombia.

ARTICLE 26. It has also been agreed that the interposition of consuls in the successions and inheritances of the citizens and subjects of the one party who may have died intestate in the territory of the other, or the executors or legitimate heirs according to the testament, being found absent, shall be confined solely to appearing for the heirs, citizens, or subjects of their respective nation, before the courts of the country in everything proper for the security and preservation of the goods and property, movable and landed, which the deceased may have left; to the settlement of accounts, the payment of debts, and the collection of dues, until the succession or inheritance pass to the legitimate heirs, according to the laws.

ARTICLE 27. They moreover agree that the consuls of both parties may exercise sufficient power and jurisdiction on board of the merchant vessels of their respective nations to decide, in a summary manner, every dispute or altercation that may, in any way, destroy good order between the captains, masters, supercargoes, and crews; which acts the consul shall exercise on board the said vessels, without its being understood from this that the municipal regulations and ordinances of the respective ports are to cease to be observed, but which shall be observed and executed with all their force and effect.

ARTICLE 28. Beyond the vessels themselves, the power and jurisdiction of the consuls, in controverted matters, shall only reach to the cognizance and determination of the differences and disputes that may arise between the citizens and subjects of both contracting parties in relation to the pay of sailors and other persons belonging to the crews and complements, and as to the conditions of the contracts in their engagements, the settlement of pay and passages; the trial and decision of which, the consuls shall make without any expense to the parties, in case they do not wish to determine the matter by arbitration, which mode should be preferred to all others.

ARTICLE 29. The consuls shall moreover have power to demand the aid of the territorial authorities for the detention, custody, and arrest of the deserters of the public and private vessels of both nations; for which purpose they shall present to the said authorities the roll of equipage of the vessels to which they may belong, by which roll it may appear that the deserter or deserters whom they claim compose a part of their crews. As soon as these deserters shall have been taken, they shall be placed at the disposition of the respective consuls to be restored to the vessels to which they previously belonged, or to others of their nation; but the detention or arrest shall not continue for more than two months, after which they shall be set at liberty, and the claim shall not be renewed.

ARTICLE 30. The Republic of Colombia and the United States, desirous of making as durable as circumstances may permit the relations happily to be established between both powers by virtue of the present definitive treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation, have solemnly proposed and agreed to the following points:

1. The present treaty between the Republic of Colombia and the United States shall continue for the term of _____ years, in everything that concerns commerce and navigation, it being understood to be perpetually and lastingly obligatory as to what it contains in relation to the peace and friendship between the two nations.

2. If any citizen or citizens and subjects of either party shall infringe any of the articles of the present treaty, said citizens and subjects shall be personally responsible, and punished to the satisfaction of the party offended; but this shall not interrupt the good feeling and intercourse between the contracting parties.

3. If, which cannot be expected, any article or articles contained in the present treaty shall be infringed by either of the contracting parties, the rest shall remain in their full force and effect, and shall be observed religiously and inviolably, as if such infraction had not been committed; which shall be submitted to an amicable discussion by both parties; and if no decision can be had, it shall then be referred to a sovereign or Government friendly to the Republic of Colombia and the United States.

The present treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation, shall be approved and ratified by the Republic of Colombia, with the advice and consent of the Congress of the said Republic, within the term of _____, and by the United States within _____.

In faith of which, we, the plenipotentiaries of the Republic of Colombia and the United States of America, have signed and sealed the present.

Given, &c.

Contre Projet.

In the name of God, Author and Legislator of the Universe: The United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, desirous to make lasting and firm the friendship and good understanding which happily prevails between both nations, have resolved to fix in a manner clear, distinct, and positive, the rules which shall, in future, be religiously observed between the one and the other, by means of a treaty or general convention of peace, friendship, commerce, and navigation.

For this most desirable object, the President of the United States of America has conferred full powers on Richard Clough Anderson, junior, a citizen of the said States, and their Minister Plenipotentiary to the said Republic; and the Vice President of the Republic of Colombia, charged with the executive power, by virtue of the _____ article of the constitution, on the honorable Pedro Gual, Secretary of State and of Foreign Relations; who, having exchanged their said full powers in due and proper form, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a perfect, firm, and inviolable peace and sincere friendship between the United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, in all the extent of their possessions and territories, and between their people and citizens, respectively, without distinction of persons or places.

ARTICLE 2. The United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, desiring to live in peace with all the other nations of the earth, by means of a policy frank and equally friendly with all, engage mutually not to grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect of commerce and navigation, which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same freely, if the concession was freely made, or on allowing the same compensation, if the concession was conditional.

ARTICLE 3. The citizens of the United States may frequent all the coasts and countries of the Republic of Colombia, and reside and trade therein in all sorts of produce, manufactures, and merchandise, and shall pay no other or greater duties, charges, or fees whatsoever than the most favored nation is or shall be obliged to pay, and they shall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and exemptions in navigation and commerce which the most favored nation does or shall enjoy, submitting themselves, nevertheless, to the laws and usages there established, and to which are subjected the subjects or citizens of the most favored nations. In like manner the citizens of the Republic of Colombia may frequent all the coasts and countries of the United States, and reside and trade there in all sorts of produce, manufactures, and merchandise, and shall pay no other or greater duties, charges, or fees than the most favored nation is or shall be obliged to pay; and they shall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and exemptions in navigation and commerce which the most favored nation does or shall enjoy, submitting themselves, nevertheless, to the laws and usages there established, and to which are submitted the subjects and citizens of the most favored nations.

ARTICLE 4. The citizens of each of the contracting parties shall have full power to dispose of their personal goods within the jurisdiction of the other by sale, donation, testament, or otherwise, and their representatives, being citizens of the other party, shall succeed to their said personal goods, whether by testament or ab intestato, and they may take possession thereof, either by themselves or others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their will, paying such dues only as the inhabitants of the country, wherein the said goods are, shall be subject to pay in like cases. And if, in the case of real estate, the said heirs would be prevented from entering into the possession of the inheritance on account of their character of aliens, there shall be granted to them the term of three years to dispose of the same as they may think proper, and to withdraw the proceeds without molestation and exempt from all rights of defraction on the part of the Government of the respective States.

ARTICLE 5. The United States of America and the Republic of Colombia promise and engage, formally, to give their special protection to the persons and property of the citizens of each other, traders or professors of any liberal or mechanical art, who may be in their respective territories, commorant or transient, leaving open and free to them the tribunals of justice for their judicial recourse, on the same terms which are usual and customary with the natives or naturalized citizens of the country in which they may be. The most perfect freedom of conscience and of worship is granted to the citizens of either party within the jurisdiction of the other, without being liable to molestation in that respect for any cause other than an insult on the religion of others. Moreover, when the citizens of one party shall die within the jurisdiction of the other, their bodies shall be buried in the usual burying grounds or other decent and suitable place, and shall be protected from violation or disturbance.

ARTICLE 6. The citizens of neither of the contracting parties shall be liable to any embargo, nor be detained with their vessels, cargoes, merchandise, or effects, under pretext of any military expedition, nor for any public or private purpose whatever, without allowing to those interested a sufficient indemnification. But the citizens of all professions, liberal or mechanical, of one of the said contracting parties, who may be dwelling in the countries subject to the jurisdiction of the other, shall remain subject to the same laws, charges, contributions, and taxes, to which are subject the citizens, native and naturalized, of the country in which they reside.

ARTICLE 7. Whenever the citizens of either of the contracting parties shall be forced to seek refuge or asylum in the rivers, bays, roads, ports, or dominions of the other with their vessels, whether merchant or of war, public or private, through stress of weather, pursuit of pirates or enemies, they shall be received and treated with humanity, giving to them all favor and protection for repairing their vessels, procuring provisions, and placing themselves in a situation to continue their voyage, without obstacle or hindrance of any kind.

ARTICLE 8. All the ships, merchandise, and effects, belonging to the citizens of one of the contracting parties, which may be captured by pirates, whether within the limits of its jurisdiction or on the high seas, and may be carried or found in the rivers, roads, bays, ports, or dominions of the other, shall be delivered up to the owners, they proving, in due and proper form, their rights before the competent tribunals; it being well understood that the claim should be made within the term of one year, by the parties themselves, their attorneys or agents, of the respective Governments.

ARTICLE 9. When any vessel belonging to the citizens of either of the contracting parties shall be wrecked, foundered, or shall suffer damage, on the coasts or within the dominions of the other, there shall be given to them all assistance and protection, in the same manner which is usual and customary with the vessels of the nation where the damage happens, permitting them to unload the said vessel (if necessary) of its merchandise and effects without exacting for it any duty, impost, or contribution, until they may be exported.

ARTICLE 10. It shall be lawful for all and singular the citizens of the United States of America and of the Republic of Colombia to sail with their ships with all manner of liberty and security, no distinction being made, who are the proprietors of the merchandise laden thereon, from any port to the places of those who now or hereafter may be at enmity with the said United States or the said Republic of Colombia. It shall likewise be lawful for the citizens aforesaid to sail with the ships and merchandise aforementioned, and to trade with the same liberty and security, from the places, ports, and havens of those who are enemies of both or either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatsoever; not only directly from the places of the enemy aforementioned to neutral places, but also from one place belonging to an enemy to another place belonging to an enemy, whether they be under the jurisdiction of one State or under several. And it is hereby stipulated that free ships shall also give a freedom to goods, and that everything shall be deemed to be free and exempt which shall be found on board the ships belonging to the citizens of either of the contracting parties, although the whole or any part thereof should appertain to the enemies of either, contraband goods being always excepted. It is also agreed, in like manner, that the same liberty be extended to persons who are on board a free ship, with this effect, that although they be enemies of either party, they are not to be taken out of that free ship, unless they are soldiers, and in actual service of the enemies: Provided, however, and it is hereby agreed, That the stipulations herein contained, declaring that the flag shall cover the property, shall be understood as applying to those powers only who recognize this principle; but if either of the two contracting parties shall be at war with a third party, and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral shall cover the property of enemies whose Governments acknowledge this principle, and not of others.

ARTICLE 11. This liberty of navigation and commerce shall extend to all kinds of merchandise, excepting those only which are distinguished by the name of contraband; and under this name of contraband or prohibited goods shall be comprehended arms, great guns, bombs, with the fuseses and other things belonging to them, cannon ball, gunpowder, match pikes, swords, lances, spears, halberds, mortars, petards, grenades, muskets, musket ball, bucklers, helmets, breast plates, coats of mail, and the like kinds of arms proper for arming soldiers, musket vests, belts, and all other warlike instruments whatever. These merchandises which follow shall not be reckoned among contraband or prohibited goods: that is to say, all sorts of cloths, and all other manufactures woven of any wool, flax, silk, cotton, or any other materials whatever; all kinds of wearing apparel, together with the species whereof they are used to be made, gold and silver, as well coined as uncoined, tin, iron, latten, copper, brass, coals, as also wheat and barley, and any other kind of corn and pulse; tobacco, and likewise all manner of spices; salted and smoked flesh, salted fish, cheese and butter, beer, oils, wines, sugars, and all sorts of salts, and, in general, all provisions which serve for the nourishment of mankind and the sustenance of life; furthermore, all kinds of cotton, hemp, flax, tar, pitch, ropes, cables, sails, sail cloths, anchors, also ship masts, planks, boards and beams of what trees soever, and all other things proper either for building or repairing ships, and all other goods whatever which have not been worked into the form of any instrument or thing prepared for war, by land or by sea, shall not be reputed contraband, much less such as have been already wrought and made up for any other use; all which shall be wholly reckoned among free goods, as likewise all other merchandise and things which are not comprehended and particularly mentioned in the foregoing enumeration of contraband goods, so that they may be transported and carried in the freest manner by the citizens of both the contracting parties, even to places belonging to an enemy, such towns or places being only excepted as are at that time besieged, blocked up, or invested. And to avoid all doubt in this particular, it is declared that those places only shall be considered as besieged or blocked up which shall be attacked by a force of the belligerent capable of preventing the entry of the neutral.

ARTICLE 12. And whereas it frequently happens that vessels sail for a port or place belonging to an enemy without knowing that the same is either besieged, blockaded, or invested, it is agreed that every vessel so circumstanced may be turned away from such port or place, but she shall not be detained nor any part of her cargo, if not contraband, be confiscated, unless after notice of such blockade or investment she shall again attempt to enter; but she shall be permitted to go to any other port or place she shall think proper. Nor shall any vessel of either, that may have entered into such port or place before the same was actually besieged, blockaded or invested by the other, be restrained from quitting such place with her cargo, nor if found therein after the reduction and surrender of such place, shall such vessel or cargo be liable to confiscation, but they shall be restored to the owners thereof.

ARTICLE 13. The articles of contraband before enumerated, which may be found on the high seas in a vessel bound for an enemy's port, shall be subject to detention and confiscation, leaving free the rest of the cargo and the ship, that the owners may dispose of them as they see proper. No vessel of either of the two nations shall be detained on the high seas on account of having on board articles of contraband, whenever the master, commander, or supercargo of said vessel will deliver up the articles of contraband to the captor, unless the quantity of such articles be so great and of so large a bulk that they cannot be received on board of the capturing ship without great inconvenience; but in this and in all other cases of just detention, the vessels detained shall be sent to the nearest convenient and safe port, for trial and judgment according to law.

ARTICLE 14. In order to prevent all kind of disorder in the visiting and examination of the ships and cargoes of both the contracting parties on the high seas, they have agreed, mutually, that whenever a vessel-of-war, public or private, shall meet with a neutral of the other contracting party, the first shall remain out of cannon shot, and may send its boat with two or three men only, in order to execute the said examination of the papers concerning the ownership and cargo of the vessel, without causing the least extortion, violence or ill treatment, for which the commanders and officers of the said armed ship shall be responsible with their persons and property. And it is expressly agreed that the neutral party shall in no case be required to go on board the examining vessel for the purpose of exhibiting his papers, or for any other examination whatever.

ARTICLE 15. To avoid all kind of vexation and abuse in the examination of the papers relating to the ownership of the vessels belonging to the citizens of the two contracting parties, they have agreed, and do agree, that in case one of them should be engaged in war, the ships and vessels belonging to the citizens of the other must be furnished with sea letters or passports, expressing the name, property, and bulk of the ship, as also the name and place of habitation of the master or commander of said vessel, in order that it may thereby appear that the ship really and truly belongs to citizens of one of the parties; they have likewise agreed that such ships being laden, shall, besides the said sea letters or passports, also be provided with certificates containing the several particulars of the cargo, the place whence the ship sailed, so that it may be known whether any forbidden or contraband goods be on board the same, which certificate shall be made out by the officers of the place whence the ship sailed, in the accustomed form; and if any one shall think it fit or advisable to express in the said certificates the person to whom the goods on board belong, he may freely do so; without which requisites said vessels may be detained to be adjudged by the competent tribunal, and may be declared legal prize, unless they shall satisfy or supply the defect by testimony entirely equivalent.

ARTICLE 16. And it is further agreed, that in all cases the established courts for prize causes, in the country to which the prize may be conducted, shall alone take cognizance. And whenever such tribunal of either of the parties shall pronounce judgment against any vessel, or goods, or property claimed by the citizens of the other party, the sentence or decree shall mention the reasons or motives on which the same shall have been founded, and an authenticated copy of the sentence or decree, and of all the proceedings in the case, shall, if demanded, be delivered to the commander or agent of the said vessel without delay, he paying the legal fees for the same. The citizens of both parties shall be allowed to employ such advocates, solicitors, notaries, agents, and factors, as they may judge proper in all their affairs, and in all their trials at law, in which they may be concerned before the tribunals of the other party; and such agents shall have free access to be present at the proceedings in such cases, and at the taking of all examinations and evidences which may be exhibited in the said trials.

ARTICLE 17. Whenever one of the contracting parties shall be engaged in war with another State, no citizen of the other contracting party shall accept a commission or letter of marque for the purpose of assisting or co-operating hostilely with said enemy against the said party so at war, under the pain of being treated as a pirate.

ARTICLE 18. If, by any fatality which cannot be expected, and which God forbid, the two contracting parties should be engaged in war with each other, they have agreed, and do agree, now for then, that there shall be allowed the term of six months to the merchants resident on the coasts and in the ports of each other, and the term of one year to those who dwell in the interior, to arrange and transport their effects wherever they please, giving to them the safe conduct necessary for it, which may serve as a sufficient protection until they arrive at the designated port. The citizens of other professions, who may be established in the territories or dominions of the United States and of the Republic of Colombia, shall be respected and maintained in the full enjoyment of their personal liberty and property, unless their particular conduct shall cause them to forfeit this protection, which, in consideration of humanity, the contracting parties engage to give them.

ARTICLE 19. Neither the debts due from individuals of the one nation to individuals of the other, nor shares, nor moneys which they may have in public funds, or in the public or private banks, shall ever, in any event of war or of national difference, be sequestered or confiscated.

ARTICLE 20. To make more effectual the protection which the United States and the Republic of Colombia shall afford in future to the navigation and commerce of the citizens of each other, they agree to receive and admit consuls and vice consuls in all the ports open to foreign commerce, who shall enjoy in them all the rights, prerogatives, and immunities of the consuls and vice consuls of the most favored nation; each contracting party, however, remaining at liberty to except those ports and places in which the admission and residence of such consuls may not seem convenient.

ARTICLE 21. In order that the consuls and vice consuls of the two contracting parties may enjoy the rights, prerogatives, and immunities which belong to them by their public characters, they shall, before entering on the exercise of their functions, exhibit their commissions or patent in due form to the Government to which they are accredited, and, having obtained their exequatur, they shall be held and considered as such by all the authorities, magistrates, and inhabitants in the consular district in which they reside.

ARTICLE 22. It is likewise agreed that the consuls, their secretaries, officers, and persons attached to the service of consuls, such persons not being citizens of the country in which the consul resides, shall be exempt from all public service, and also from all kind of taxes, imposts, and contributions, except those which they shall be obliged to pay on account of commerce, some lucrative profession, or their property, to which the citizens and inhabitants, native and foreign, of the country in which they reside, are subject; being in everything besides subject to the laws of the respective States. The archives and papers of the consulates shall be respected inviolably, and under no pretext whatever shall any magistrate seize or in any way interfere with them.

ARTICLE 23. The said consuls shall have power to require the assistance of the territorial authorities for the arrest, detention, and custody of deserters from the public and private vessels of their country; and for that purpose they shall address themselves to the courts, judges, and officers competent, and shall demand the said deserters in writing, proving, by an exhibition of the registers of the vessels or ship's roll, that those men were part of the said crew; and on this demand, so proved, (saving, however, where the contrary is proved,) the delivery shall not be refused. Such deserters, as soon as they shall be arrested, shall be put at the disposition of the said consuls, to be sent to the ships to which they belonged, or to others of the same nation. But if they be not sent back within two months from the day of their arrest, they shall be set at liberty, and shall be no more arrested for the same cause.

ARTICLE 24. For the purpose of more effectually protecting their commerce and navigation, the two contracting parties do hereby agree, as soon hereafter as circumstances will permit them, to form a consular convention, which shall declare specially the powers and immunities of the consuls and vice consuls of the respective parties.

ARTICLE 25. The United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, desiring to make as durable as circumstances will permit the relations which are to be established between the two parties by virtue of this treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, have declared solemnly and do agree to the following points:

1. The present treaty between the said parties shall continue for the term of twelve years in all the parts relating to commerce and navigation, and in all those parts which relate to peace and friendship it shall be permanently and perpetually binding on the parties. It being, however, understood that nothing herein contained shall in any way violate or impugn the fifteenth article of a treaty between the United States and Spain, signed on the twenty-second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen.

2. If any one of the citizens of either of the contracting parties shall infringe or violate any of the articles of this treaty, such citizen shall be held personally responsible for the same, and the harmony and good correspondence between the contracting parties shall not be interrupted thereby, each party engaging in no way to protect the offender or sanction such violation.

3. If, (what, indeed, cannot be expected,) unfortunately, any of the articles contained in the present treaty should be in any way violated by either of the contracting parties, it is expressly stipulated that neither of the said contracting parties will order or authorize any acts of reprisal against the other, on complaint of injuries or damages, until the said party shall first have presented to the other a statement thereof, verified by competent proof and evidence, and demanded justice and satisfaction, and the same shall either have been refused or unreasonably delayed.

The present treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation shall be approved and ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by _____, of the Republic of Colombia; and the said ratifications shall be exchanged, in the city of Washington, within _____ months from the date hereof, or sooner, if possible.

In faith whereof, we, the plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and of the Republic of Colombia, have signed and sealed these presents.

Done at Bogota, this _____ day of _____, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four.

SIR: Having on this day signed a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation with the plenipotentiary of Colombia, a copy is herewith transmitted to you. I also transmit copies of his note of the 24th of August, inviting a continuance of the negotiation by verbal conference, and of the protocols of those conferences. I propose, in this letter, to make such observations on the progress of the negotiation as will, with the aid of the accompanying copies and those heretofore sent, present to you a correct and somewhat minute history of the several mutations which the propositions originally made have undergone during the discussion, and of the manner in which we arrived at the conclusion. In a separate letter, under the date of to-morrow, I will, by special reference to each article, give an explanation of them as they stand adopted, without any allusion to the previous discussion or mode by which we arrived at that adoption.

Immediately after the exchange of our respective full powers it was agreed that the Colombian Commissioner should present to me a projet embracing such articles and subjects as he wished might form the basis of a convention between the two countries, and that I should respond to his proposition, either by observations addressed to each article separately, with such additions as might be deemed proper, or should present a contre projet. The latter mode was adopted by me, and the one was presented, of which a copy was inclosed in my letter of the 17th September, and which you will be so good as to advert to, in connexion with this letter, for the correct understanding of it.

Although there were many points of difference on minor subjects between the two propositions respectively offered for consideration, the only one which seemed to excite much attention was that in relation to the protection which a neutral flag should give to the property it covered. To this subject the letter of the first of July, and my answer of the seventh, were directed. Several informal conversations were in the meantime held; but no official communication again took place until the conference of the 27th of August, held by virtue of the preceding invitation. The protocol of that conference will show to you that it was agreed to take up the contre projet, as presented by me, and to make it the text for our consideration and remarks, and that the preamble and first four articles were agreed to without alteration. In noticing the differences between articles on corresponding subjects in the two propositions, and between them and the convention as ultimately adopted, I will omit those merely verbal and those which were made solely with a view to attain greater distinctness of expression, and advert only to those which involve something of principle. The only difference worthy of particular remark here consists in the introduction by me of the words "commerce and navigation" in the second article, whereby the reciprocity of favors referred to was restricted to those subjects, according to the manner of all our former treaties; and also in the omission of the word "generally," in the third article, the insertion of which, it seemed to me, would have produced a principle essentially different from the one desired, inasmuch as, under such a stipulation, neither of the contracting parties would have been elevated entirely to the grade of the most favored nation; at least, the introduction of the word was objectionable, as it deprived the sentence of that precision which it was desirable that one of the most important articles of the treaty should have. The substance of the article was not otherwise changed by me, although, in form, it is altered and probably improved. You will readily know whence I borrowed the clause.

In the fourth article (always bearing in mind that the numbers, unless otherwise expressed, refer to the contre projet) no changes have occurred which it is thought require any explanation.

In the first member of the fifth article you will see that an immaterial alteration was made. In the second member of the article, in relation to the freedom of conscience and worship, an alteration was made, and one to which I did not assent without some regret. I had proposed the eleventh article of the treaty with Prussia, as containing everything which I thought desirable on the subject. The protocol of the second conference will show to you the objections made by the Colombian plenipotentiary. When I felt assured of the sincerity of his observations, and of the liberal sentiments of all the chief officers of the Executive Government on this subject, I could not resist the belief that an unaffected apprehension was entertained that the insertion of the article, in the proposed shape, might create unpleasant difficulties in the Congress. The only difference consists in the omission of all express reference to "worship," and it is believed that the article now concedes as much as any Catholic country has hitherto assented to in a public treaty. In the projet the subject was not introduced at all.

The first sentence of the sixth article, in relation to an embargo on vessels and persons, has undergone no alteration whatever in any stage of the negotiation. I refer you to my letter, No. 18, for an explanation of my views on this subject. The second clause was struck out at my own suggestion, everything that was valuable in it being contained in other parts of the convention, and in one respect it seemed a deviation from the general tenor of the treaty. While the other stipulations had a reference to the principle of the most favored nation, this adopted the rule of placing the parties, as to this single purpose, on the footing of the native citizen.

In the seventh, eighth, and ninth articles, all designed to secure the ordinary rights of humanity to unfortunate mariners and merchants of either party, no essential changes have been made from the form in which they were first proposed.

My observations on many of the subsequent articles cannot be addressed to them in strict numerical order, as the corresponding numbers do not always present corresponding subjects; but it is believed that all confusion will be avoided by grouping them in the manner here adopted.

Articles numbered 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14 of the projet embraced the following analogous subjects: an enumeration of the articles of contraband; a definition of blockade; a declaration of the necessity of warning a vessel of the existence of a blockade before she was rendered liable to capture; the liability of contraband articles to capture, saving the ship and the rest of the cargo the right to pursue the voyage on the surrender of the prohibited goods; a declaration of the principle that enemy's goods on board a neutral ship were liable to capture, and that neutral property in an enemy's ship was free. There were some other provisions, which, for the present purpose, need not be mentioned; they may form the subject of some future remarks. The numbers 10, 11, 12, 13 of the contre projet contained all which I thought necessary to introduce on these subjects, not in the order in which they have been mentioned, but in the order which it was supposed their proper connexion rendered most judicious for the true understanding of them. The tenth article contained a declaration of the principle that "free ships should give freedom to goods," expressed in the most approved language which a careful examination of all the treaties heretofore formed by the United States on the subject could furnish to me, but qualified, after the manner of the late treaty with Spain, by restricting the benefits of the rule to those who will submit to its privations. The correspondence heretofore transmitted, and the memoranda of the second and third conferences, will put you in full possession of everything which has taken place on this question. You will see that a readiness was expressed to abandon the first rule as proposed, and to adopt mine, if some explanation could pass in relation to the effect of the rule in the event that Spain should refuse to recognize in this Republic such a Government as would fill the idea of "a power" as expressed in the 12th article of her last treaty with the United States. In answer to the observations made, I stated that, in the event that Spain, disregarding the obligations of her treaty with the United States, or denying that Colombia was a power in the contemplation of that treaty, should attempt to take Colombian property from vessels of the United States, it was my clear understanding of the proposed convention that the United States would resist such attempts, and would be liable to the same responsibilities in relation to the property, whatever they might be, to which she would be liable if it were the property of the subjects of any other sovereign power who had acknowledged the principle, or, in other words, to the same responsibility to which Colombia would be subject if she, as a neutral, was carrying the property of the citizens of the United States when at war, and such property was taken from her vessels under like circumstances. In giving this opinion I did not design, as I declared, in any way to enlarge the operation of the article, but to express what was considered by me its true and only meaning. I carefully forbore, as was fully explained, to mention the nature or character of the responsibility which each nation incurred by entering into the stipulation, in the event that a third party, regardless of its treaties, should seize the property of the one in the vessels of the other. This point was not necessary for us to settle. If the case occurred, the nature of the liability would be adjusted by the proper principles. I only thought proper to say that Colombia would have the same advantage by assenting to the rule which any other nation would have, or which my country would have with her in like cases. The case appeared to me to be too plain to require any explanation, but, as a strong apprehension seemed to be entertained, and I believe is now, that Spain would not, in practice, admit that Colombia was a power in the contemplation of her treaty, I had no hesitation in expressing my understanding of the operation of the clause. The apprehension entertained is bottomed on the idea that Spain will still contend that the countries forming the Republic of Colombia are her colonies; or, varying the ground a little, she will contend that Colombia was not such a power as was contemplated, she not having been recognized by the United States at the date of the treaty. It is not proper for me to indulge in any conjecture as to the course Spain may pursue, but, after having invited Colombia to assent to the salutary and pacific rule contained in this article, it is impossible that the United States can regard her in any light different from that in which she would regard any other power which had assented to it.

The practical operation of the rule will, I hope, be very advantageous to the shipping interest of the United States, as the preparations which this Government is now making, under her recently acquired credit in the money market, towards the building and purchasing of ships to operate as cruisers, will soon produce the effect of giving to our vessels the transportation of all Spanish property. Indeed, under the ordinance of this country declaring that enemies' property is subject to capture in a neutral bottom, no foreign vessels, except those of the United States, will save property from her capture.

The form of the 11th article, embracing an enumeration of contraband goods, and now forming the 14th of the treaty, has been entirely changed, without, however, much altering the enumeration. I was anxious to exclude "lead, saltpetre, and horses, with their furniture," all which it had, as you will see, been proposed to comprehend. The article, as finally agreed to, excludes the two former and retains the last. The whole negotiation was conducted on both sides with a distinct understanding, as is fully expressed in the memorandum of the second and fourth conferences, that neither party had the remotest wish to embrace in the prohibited list articles of first necessity for the sustenance of life, materials for ship building, gold, silver, or any of those articles which have so frequently formed the topics of irritated discussions. The only anxiety was to give such precision to the language in which the enumeration was expressed as to draw around it a boundary too distinct to be mistaken. "Horses, with their furniture," is the only thing embraced of which the exclusion could with any propriety be urged; and when I ascertained that they were comprehended in every treaty hitherto formed by the United States, and particularly in her treaty with Spain, it was not thought judicious to insist on the omission. According to the form of many treaties, a long list of articles which should not be deemed contraband was at first inserted by me, but, on reflection, the idea of omitting it was readily approved and adopted. I considered that a partial enumeration of free articles, instead of giving any additional strength, might really impair the energy of the strong words of negation which were employed to exclude everything "not explicitly enumerated and classified." And, if anything extrinsic were necessary to explain or fortify the exclusion, which, however, it is believed is not the case, it will be found in the strong language used at the second conference, designed to disclaim all intention of embracing any article of a controverted character.

The definition of blockade has not been materially changed from the language in which it was first proposed. It will be the subject of some observations in my next letter.

The article declaring that a vessel shall not be liable to capture unless she shall again attempt to enter a blockaded port, after notice of the blockade, received several alterations in the course of the negotiation, and at each successive one, I think, received improvement. But a short time before the signature of the treaty, the word "warning" and the corresponding Castilian word "intimacion" were substituted for "notice" and "notitia," at my instance, and words were also introduced requiring that the warning should come from the commanding officer of the blockading forces.

Those provisions in the preceding articles which declare the vessel and the rest of the cargo, in cases where a portion of it was contraband, free, and those which prescribe rules for the government of officers examining vessels at sea, have undergone no material alteration.

The only difference of importance between the 15th article of the contre and the corresponding 16th of the original projet, which prescribe the papers that a neutral vessel shall bear, to show her character and give evidence of her ownership, is in this: that, in the latter, the clause was framed to form a constituent part of a treaty subjecting enemy's goods to capture in a neutral vessel, while the former was, according to my stipulation, framed to suit itself to the adverse principle, and, of course, that part requiring the exhibition of a certificate, showing to whom the property composing the cargo belonged, was omitted by me. This change has been adopted in consequence of the change in the principal article.

The 16th article contains a provision which was entirely omitted in the proposition of the Commissioner of this Government. The third conference will show that the first part of it, requiring that the established courts only should take cognizance of all cases of capture, and that, in cases of decisions adverse to the prizes, the reasons of the judgments should be expressed, and, moreover, requiring that an authenticated copy of the decree should be furnished on demand, was adopted without objection; it will also show that to the latter part of the article an objection was made which, at first, produced in me unaffected surprise, and would probably in any one who was familiar only with judicial forms as exhibited in courts of common law. The Commissioner of Colombia declared that the effect would be, to give to the citizens of the United States a privilege which a citizen of Colombia did not enjoy; that the forensic forms of this country did not give a litigant "free access to the proceedings" in the manner in which he apprehended that I understood the phrase. Finally, an alteration has been made by which the words "sentences and decisions" are substituted for "proceedings;" and the clause having been incorporated with another, which secures to the citizens of each, in the tribunals of justice, the same rights which the native citizen has, it is thought that everything desirable has been attained. The subject forms the 10th article of the treaty.

The 17th article, prohibiting the citizens of each of the contracting parties from accepting commissions or letters of marque from the enemies of the other, has been subjected to no change whatever.

The same observation is true with regard to the 18th, with an immaterial qualification.

The 19th, in relation to the security of debts due from the individuals of the one nation, or the nation to the individuals of the other, was a new one proposed by me, and agreed to without objection or observation.

The 20th article, providing for the mutual reception of consuls, merits no particular remark, as no alteration has been imposed on it; the same is nearly true with respect to the 21st, containing provisions on the same subject. The 22d, in relation to the clerks and others attached to the offices of consuls, is the same with the one first proposed, except in an alteration, proposed by me and since adopted, by which the exemptions therein given are denied to persons who are citizens of the country in which the consul resides; it not being thought proper to permit a citizen of the United States to release himself from militia and other personal duties by becoming the clerk of a consul.

The 23d article provides for the restoration of deserting seamen. The only material alteration made to this article was, in requiring the deserters to be secured in the prisons of the country until an opportunity occurs (not, however, beyond two months) of sending them off. This addition was made on my suggestion, and, indeed, the necessity for it arose from an inadvertent omission in my original draft.

The 24th article was proposed by me in substitution of the 23d, 24th, 25th, 26th, 27th and 28th of the projet of the Colombian plenipotentiary. The articles, collectively, formed a consular convention. Many of the provisions you will probably deem judicious, others would have required correction. However, I felt myself relieved from the necessity of examining them with much attention, by the language of your instructions to me, which, if not mandatory, very distinctly advised a postponement of the subject in the manner adopted. Indeed, there are such intrinsic difficulties in the way of forming a convention, prescribing the powers and immunities of consuls, which, while it shall secure to them any valuable privilege, shall not conflict with the municipal authorities of the country, that I willingly waived the subject. It is, however, one on which some solicitude is felt here, and the articles offered for my acceptance, and rejected, will serve to give you the view of the matter entertained by this Government, and what is considered by it as desirable on the subject.

The 25th article corresponds with the 30th as originally proposed, and with the last article of the treaty as adopted, and consists of three distinct clauses, in relation to the duration of the treaty and the modes which should be adopted to postpone or avert hostilities in case of violation. The blank in the projet for the duration of the commercial part of the convention indicated a disposition that the treaty should be temporary; this disposition was in entire accordance with my own views of the subject, which led me to think that the commercial and political situation of this country was too new for us to desire the creation of permanent stipulations at this time. Under this opinion I filled the blank with "twelve years," a term which I considered sufficiently long to insure all the advantages which a treaty can insure, and a term long enough to disclose to each party not only the alterations which they might beneficially make in these stipulations, but also to disclose to them new subjects for advantageous negotiation, developed by the new attitudes which this country might assume. It occurred to me that within the period of that time, under the progress which things have recently made, commerce might take channels so essentially different from those which now exist or can be foreseen, that stipulations might then be judicious which would now be thought wholly improper or not thought of at all.

A proviso was offered by me to this article, declaring that nothing in the treaty should be construed in any way to affect the 15th article of our late treaty with Spain, designing in this way to preserve inviolate the exclusive privileges given to that power in the ports of St. Augustine and Pensacola. You will see that at the second conference a wish was expressed to omit the proviso, under the suggestion that, as the provisions of the previous treaty were known to the parties, such an insertion was not necessary. I believe the controlling reason was an indisposition to refer in the body of the treaty, by name, to any foreign nation, but particularly to Spain. I immediately assented to the omission, and have since presented, in an official note, a copy of that article of the treaty. And still thinking it best to show to Spain, on the face of the treaty, that her rights were not forgotten, I have had inserted the clause which stands as the fourth paragraph in the last article of the treaty. This clause is nearly in the language of the one used by Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney,* in the treaty with England in 1806, on an occasion exactly similar, where it was to be provided that nothing therein should affect the exclusive rights of France in the ports of Louisiana.

The third paragraph of this article, as presented by me, omitted a principle contained in the projet, for retaining which a good deal of solicitude has been indicated. It had provided that all cases of differences, or alleged infractions of the instrument, should be submitted to the decision of a friendly power. I had some repugnance, certainly, to oppose anything which even seemed calculated to avert or postpone an angry or capricious resort to arms; still I thought it most prudent to propose, in lieu of it, a declaration that neither party should order or authorize acts of reprisal against the other, unless a statement of the alleged injuries had been previously presented, and justice had been denied or unreasonably delayed. This was a course sanctioned by precedent, and seemed in every way a safe and honorable one. During the conversation which arose on the subject, I stated that there was probably no nation with which such a stipulation was less necessary than with the United States; that her whole history had declared that there was no nation more slow to provoke hostility, none more patient in seeking redress by negotiation, nor more willing, when any difference actually occurred, to refer it to friendly decision; but that I did not deem it proper to bind our Governments, in anticipation, to submit to the sense of others unknown questions which might affect their honor or sovereignty. The clause, as proposed by me, was adopted on adding the words which forbid a declaration of war until satisfaction shall have been demanded and refused. To this addition, it was thought by me that there could be no objection, not only as the contrary course would probably never be pursued by the United States, but as the article had already interdicted reprisals until the pacific step referred to had been taken; that in itself seemed to exclude the idea of declaring war, the last and highest act of hostile intention, until the same effort towards the preservation of peace had been made. The preceding part of this letter has given to you a review of the negotiation connected with all the subjects presented in the counter projet. Several articles have since been offered and adopted, which have their appropriate places in the treaty. Most of them were introduced by the plenipotentiary of Colombia, and they form the Nos. 4, 13, and 25; one only, forming the 20th, and some corrections rendered necessary by previous alterations, were suggested by myself. To these articles some observations will be particularly directed in my letter of to-morrow; the design being now to state to you the time and circumstances under which they were introduced.

After we had arrived at a perfect agreement on the articles which should form the convention, many of them were transposed from their original situation, with the design of giving to them that order which a proper connexion of the several subjects indicated; so that there is now but little coincidence between the numbers of the articles in the treaty, and the numbers representing the same subjects in either of the original propositions.

On examining the projet of the Commissioner of this Government, you will observe that the 18th article proposed the adoption of rules in relation to captures at sea, made in the course of a war in which the two contracting parties might be engaged against a common enemy. This subject was entirely omitted by me, and nothing has been since said on it. Such a provision was considered by me as wholly unnecessary, because it supposed a case which I hoped would not soon occur, and if it did occur, the necessary regulations could be very promptly adopted. Moreover, I thought it might at this time have a menacing aspect, which, whatever may be our courage or determination, it is never judicious to assume.

You will also observe in the concluding part of the letter of Mr. Gual, of the first of July, that an allusion is made to the treaties heretofore concluded by this Government with the new State on the American continent, and to his intention of proposing some article on the subject. In mine, of the 7th of July, which was an answer to his letter of the 1st, I omitted all notice of this allusion; the subject was mentioned so indistinctly that I did not comprehend the effect which it was designed that the intimated addition should have, and I wished to ascertain with exactness the object in view before my official answer was given. With this intention, on a fit occasion which soon presented itself, I mentioned the subject, and stated that I did not entirely understand the effect intended, but that if the proposition was in any way to impair the effect of those clauses of the treaty which would place the United States on the footing of the most favored nation, the proposition would be wholly inadmissible. I understood him as saying that no such effect was intended, and the subject is now altogether unimportant, inasmuch as the alteration or addition suggested has never been proposed or mentioned again; and it is now referred to only from a wish that there may be nothing seen in the correspondence, however immaterial, that is not fully explained.

The memorial of the second conference will show you that a copy of the decree of this Government was furnished to me, prohibiting the introduction of the produce or manufactures of Spain into the ports of this country. This decree was issued in January, 1823, and is well known to all who have commercial connexion with the country. However, the communication of the decree was taken in good part by me, the prohibition contained in it being one which every nation has a right to enforce without giving cause of complaint to any one. You cannot have failed to observe that throughout the whole negotiation, as presented by the correspondence, all the propositions and suggestions of amendment made by me were marked by an inclination to give to neutral commerce its most enlarged enjoyment, and of course to restrict in all dubious cases the boundaries of belligerent claims. To this course I was impelled, not more by my own feelings than by the conviction that the rights of peace were those on which the interests of our country essentially depended, and that a nation at war has but rarely an occasion to invoke the aid of treaty stipulations to enforce its claims against one at peace, having always in its hands, from other sources, an ability fully equal to the extent of its rights. It would be unjust to intimate that any improper tardiness was displayed by this Government in acceding to this system. The original proposition of its representative will show that some of the articles most liberal and most beneficial to neutral commerce are to be found in it. It was probably not to be expected that a party at war, and with no immediate prospect of peace, would be as eager in seeking or as prompt in proposing stipulations solely designed for the protection of neutral rights as the party who had long enjoyed the prosperity of peace, and whose policy gave as strong a security for its continuance as human wisdom can give. It is hoped that the convention, taken in all its parts, will give evidence that both parties were animated by a sincere desire to foster those arts to which good men are devoted, in preference to those which are so hostile to peace and its employments.

I have the honor to be, with great respect and esteem, your obedient servant,

R. C. ANDERSON, JR.

HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

P. S. The copy of the treaty inclosed, although not so fair as I could have wished it, is perfectly correct, except that in the original the numbers of the articles are written at length, while in the copy they are designated by figures.

REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA.

OFFICE OF STATE OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Government Palace in the capital of Bogota, May 20, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, having submitted to the Executive your note of the 17th instant, in reply to mine of the 14th, he has been pleased to confer on me full power and authority to negotiate, arrange, conclude and confirm with you a treaty of friendship, navigation, and commerce.

For this object I hope you will have the goodness to make known to me the day, place, and hour, at which you may judge other preliminaries to these conferences convenient. With regard to myself, I have the pleasure to assure you that I highly esteem the honor the Executive has done me, and which offers me the occasion of confirming the sentiments of the perfect esteem and regard with which I am your very obedient servant,

P. GUAL.

HON. RICHARD C. ANDERSON, Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States of America.

BOGOTÁ, May 26, 1824.

SIR: Having had, yesterday, the pleasure to make (verificar) with you the exchange of our respective full powers by means of compared copies of both, it now remains for us to fix upon the mode by which the negotiation may most readily arrive at a happy and speedy termination.

The project of a treaty of friendship, navigation and commerce, which I have the honor herewith to send you, discloses the principles which, if they be adopted, will, in the opinion of my Government, place the relations of Colombia and the United States upon a footing of reciprocal utility and advantage.

Have the goodness, sir, to examine it and give me your opinions, that we may enter upon the discussion of the different points therein contained, whether by means of conferences, communications, verbal or written, as may best meet your convenience.

I remain, in the meantime, with the greatest consideration and regard, your very obedient and humble servant,

P. GUAL.

HON. RICHARD C. ANDERSON, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, &c.

BOGOTÁ, July 1, 1824.

SIR: The press of business which has lately occurred in the Department of State, under my charge, together with an affection of the eyes that has troubled me considerably, have prevented me from having the honor to reply to your note of the 2d of June, which was accompanied by a counter project of a treaty of friendship, commerce and navigation, between the Republic of Colombia and the United States of America. As my project and yours differ essentially in a point of great importance, namely, whether free vessels make the goods free or not, I proceed to lay down the reasons which have induced me to adopt the second opinion, which I believe to be more conformable to the established principles of the law of nations, and to the state of war in which this country is still unfortunately found.

When the Government of Colombia, in the 14th article of the provisional ordinance relative to privateers, which is at present in full force and operation, laid down the principle that free vessels do not make their goods free, this subject was examined with great deliberation. In the practice of all civilized nations, as well as among writers of the highest authority, this doctrine was found established in a manner clear and distinct. Neutrals have undoubtedly the right of carrying on their usual commerce with the enemy, and also to convey the property of an enemy without exposing their vessels or the neutral goods that may be found on board to confiscation. So, also, neutral goods remain free that are found on board a captured vessel of the enemy, notwithstanding the venerable Grotius has affirmed that whatever may be found on board an enemy's vessel should be considered as belonging to an enemy.

Vattel, whose opinions are respectable, asserts, Lib. III. sec. 15, that the property of an enemy found on board of a neutral is subject to confiscation by the law (derecho) of war. Burlamaqui, maintaining the opinion of Grotius, further asserts, sec. 4, chap. 7, 823, that friends' vessels are not good prize, even if they have enemy's goods on board, unless the said goods have been received by consent of the captain or master, in which case, he appears to have violated neutrality, and given just reasons to be treated as an enemy. And although Martens, in his Compendium of the Law of Nations, inclines to the contrary doctrine, he confounds the right of a neutral to his property existing in the territory under the jurisdiction of an enemy, with that which is now under consideration, and which, consequently, being on the high sea, cannot be considered under any sort of jurisdiction. Messrs. Pinckney, Marshall and Gerry so triumphantly demonstrated this truth to the French ministry in 1798, at the direction of the Government of the United States, that, trespassing no longer upon your attention with respect to the right, I will only refer to that important correspondence.

With regard to advantage, that is to say, to what interests Colombia in her present state of war, I hope you will agree with me in the necessity of our pursuing and annihilating Spanish commerce by all legal means within our power. It is commerce, certainly, that has enabled the Catholic King to wage against us a war so ruinous and protracted. It is commerce, exclusively, that supplied the means for the expedition of General Morillo and of whatever prior or subsequent expeditions sailed from Cadiz against America. It is, in fact, Spanish commerce, which, not having lost hope of recovering its former monopoly over these countries, is still, at this moment, disposed to continue its sacrifices to involve us in fresh calamities.

If, then, this be so, as I can assure you, it follows that the United States being in perfect peace with the whole world, and Colombia in war for her independence, the policy and the inclinations of the two countries cannot fail on this subject to be essentially different. The United States have an immense interest in freeing their extensive commerce from whatever obstructions may be conceived of; Colombia, in lessening the means of her obstinate enemy to make war upon her, and reducing him to a condition for soliciting peace. You will at once perceive, by this difference of situations, how dangerous it would be for us to open, at this time, our channels to the manufactures and productions of Spain. Left, as we are, to our own resources, our duty, on the contrary, is to close them as far as we may be able, until the power of the States, formerly her colonies, is caused to be felt.

Agreeing, however, in the humanity (humanidad) of the principle that free ships make the goods free, I could desire, if it be possible, that you would be pleased to determine to conclude the treaty according to what I proposed in article 14. As soon as Spain shall recognize the Republic of Colombia, the negotiation may be renewed, and the contrary principle acknowledged in the treaty which may be then made. The interests of both countries may thus be perfectly secured, without remaining longer exposed to the inconveniences and errors arising from indefinite and unsettled relations.

At the conclusion of this note, I believe I owe it to candor and sincerity to propose an important (substantial) addition to the 25th article of the counter project, namely, "that the present treaty shall not infringe or violate in any manner the treaties which the Republic of Colombia has concluded with the Republics of Peru and Chile, made at Lima on July 6, 1822, and at Santiago de Chile, on the 21st of October of the same year; nor those which it may make and conclude upon the same principles with the other States of formerly Spanish America.

The situation of all the States of America, formerly Spanish, has been so peculiar in past years, that it has been necessary to contract alliances, and to secure permanently the advantages of those mercantile relations to which they were accustomed, when all conjointly were equally subject to the same laws.

In relation to the points contained in the counter project, some slight alterations, I believe, are only required, upon which, I flatter myself, you and I will agree without great difficulty.

With sentiments of perfect esteem and respect, I have the honor to be your very respectful and obedient servant,

P. GUAL.

REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA.

OFFICE OF STATE FOR FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Government Palace in the capital of Bogota, July 23, 1824—14.

SIR: I had the honor to receive and submit to the Executive your communication of the 21st instant, relating to the deduction which had not been made by the custom-house at Santa Marta of the five per cent. of duties for the importation of the cargo of the American schooner Hibernia, according to the law of June 23, 1823; attentive to which, the said vessel was freighted at Baltimore for St. Domingo, but did not nevertheless touch her port,* and continued her voyage directly from Baltimore to Santa Marta with her complete original cargo.

I am pleased, sir, to inform you, in reply, that the case having been examined by the Executive from the documents that you had the goodness to submit, it has been determined that the cargo of the Hibernia should be embraced in the benefit of the law of the 23d of June, 1823. With this view, as well as on account of the cases of similar nature which may hereafter occur, orders have been directed to be circulated by the Treasury Department that every importation from the United States and Europe made in vessels which, although they may have been fitted out for some other port, shall arrive directly at the ports of Colombia with their complete original cargoes, shall be considered as direct. To-day this order will be issued to the Intendant of Magdalena, and particularly to the Governor of Santa Marta, that he may cause the extra duties exacted by that custom-house upon the cargo of the American schooner Hibernia to be returned.

I remain, in the meanwhile, with the utmost consideration and respect, your very obedient servant,

P. GUAL.

REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA.

OFFICE OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Government Palace in the capital of Bogota, August 3, 1824.

In reply to your note of the 20th of July last, in which you have the goodness to make known to me that the consuls of the United States at Laguayra and Santa Marta were not permitted to receive and keep registers of the American vessels arriving at those ports; and secondly, you advert to the consignments of foreign vessels which have heretofore been usually made to citizens of this country, claiming in both cases a reciprocity in favor of said consuls according to the practice of the United States, I have the pleasure herewith to send you the decrees of the 28th and 30th of the last month, which satisfy the desires and remarks you make in the above note to which I have the honor to reply. In the last document you will find that not only the consuls, but any other citizen of the United States established among us, may transact and conclude his mercantile business as the citizens of this country.

Permit me also to avail myself of this opportunity to send you the Colombian Gazettes, Nos. 93, 94, 14-, 143, in which are published the treaties concluded between the Republic of Colombia and those of Peru, Chile, Buenos Ayres, and Mexico, of which I had the honor, heretofore, to speak to you.

I remain, with every consideration, your very obedient and humble servant,

P. GUAL.

Bogota, October 4, 1824.

SIR: Having in my letter of yesterday given to you a history of the recent negotiation and of the several changes to which the various propositions were subjected before their final adoption, this letter will be devoted to the articles of the treaty as they are now adopted, on each of which I beg leave to make such observations as they seem to require, and such as it is hoped will be satisfactory to the President, omitting, however, those articles where the design and the language are so palpable as to require no explanation.

Preamble—Article 1. It is thought that the preamble and the first article require no particular observation.

Article 2. With the exception of the prefatory words, this article has been copied entirely from the second article of our treaty with France in 1778. The same language has been used in most of our subsequent treaties on this subject.

Article 3. This article is copied from the treaty with Prussia. It is believed that the language is as little susceptible of mistake or misinterpretation as any which could have been employed, and on this subject I was unwilling to venture so far as to use any language, however unexceptionable it might seem to be, which had not been submitted to previous trial and approbation.

Article 4. This article is very much like the 9th of our treaty with the Netherlands. It was not one which I thought of any importance, as everything valuable in it was expressed or implied in other provisions. But its insertion was requested in obedience to a late law of this Government, which, placing all citizens of friendly powers on the footing of natives with regard to the receiving of consignments and the transaction of internal commerce, directed the Executive by negotiation to seek reciprocal stipulations with foreign powers.

Article 5. On the subject of this article there has been shown such a contrariety of purpose by the United States at different times that I have felt some difficulty in ascertaining her present policy from her former negotiations. While she has, by legislative authority, more than once imposed an embargo* on foreign vessels within her ports, she has interdicted to herself this right in her first treaty with Prussia, and in her treaties with the Netherlands, Sweden, and Spain; the last two of which are now in force. With England and France all stipulation being omitted, it may be inferred that with them, and with all nations with whom there is no treaty, the right is retained. In the 16th article of the last treaty with Prussia the right is expressly reserved, in opposition to the provision of the first. The article now presented reserves the right, under the same qualification, of giving an indemnity to the parties interested. It was not thought judicious by me, without instruction, to interdict entirely to my Government this high act of sovereign power, nor did I wish, by omitting the article altogether, to leave its arbitrary exercise to another. The course adopted, while it restrains us from using without giving indemnity—a right which probably we shall not wish to exercise soon, secures our citizens from its capricious exercise by another, who, being at war, is much more likely to resort to it. A further difficulty in omitting it arose from the fact that, having by treaty agreed not to impose an embargo on Spanish vessels in our ports, Colombia could reasonably demand of us to make the same stipulation with her, or at least to qualify the right reserved in the manner adopted.

Article 6. It is thought that no explanation of the principle or of the language of this article is necessary.

Article 7. Nor of this, except that I have inserted one year, the time within which the demand for the restoration of the captured property shall be made, instead of “a reasonable time,” usually inserted in such cases. It is believed, in every case of the kind, if a period sufficiently long for the desired purpose is secured, that it is better to limit that period with precision than to leave it to the vagueness of that common expression.

Article 8. The design of this, like the two preceding articles, being altogether obvious and humane, it is submitted without remark.

Article 9. The principle of this article is found in almost every treaty negotiated by the United States. In language it corresponds, so far as it goes, with the eleventh article of our treaty of 1795 with Spain, except in the concluding sentence. In that treaty, “a reasonable time” is allowed for aliens, in the event that the municipal laws of the country do not permit them to hold real estate, to sell it, and to withdraw the proceeds; in the present treaty that time is limited to three years. This period was considered sufficiently long for the object, and upon this and all analogous subjects it was thought better to fix the time definitely than to leave it to the discretion of the parties. The laws of Colombia do not at present prevent an alien from holding lands; indeed, the existing policy of the Government seems to be to invite the purchase of land by foreigners, and neither naturalization nor removal to the country is made a condition of transmitting it by inheritance.

Article 10. As the citizens of all other countries are sure to enjoy the benefits of this article in the United States without any treaty, I thought that it could not be amiss to secure to our citizens in this way the enjoyment of like benefits.

Article 11. This article is not so ample in its concessions, nor indeed so good, as the corresponding article in our treaty with Prussia, which I wished to have inserted, but it is believed that it contains all that the Colombian Government can safely grant at this time.

Article 12. This article, with the exception of the necessary alterations in the style of the contracting parties, and of the introduction of the word “officers” in the sentence preceding the proviso, presents an exact copy of the twenty-third article of our first treaty with France, and of the fifteenth of our existing treaty with Spain, so far as those articles go. The qualification at the end of the article, to the extent of the principle declared in it, “that free ships should make free goods,” was subjoined by me conformably to your instructions.

Article 13. The principle contained in this article, that neutral goods shall be subject to capture in an enemy's vessel, seems in all our treaties (with the exception of the one with Spain) to be considered as the necessary consequence of the principle established in the preceding article, that neutral vessels shall save the goods of an enemy. The latter part of the article is designed to express what is considered to be the law of nations with regard to those who refuse to assent to that principle. No precedent of an article combining the alternatives is probably to be found, because the qualification inserted in our late treaty with Spain, and in the one now offered, declaring that the principle that “the flag shall cover the goods” shall be applicable to those powers only who assent to the principle; being only of recent introduction, the case has, of course, but recently arisen, in which it was necessary for a negotiating party to declare one state of the law with one nation, while a different one was declared with another. Possibly in this case there was no absolute necessity for this article, but it is believed that the first part only declares what is generally stipulated in like cases; and that the second member only expresses what is generally understood to be the law in the case therein embraced where there is no stipulation.

Article 14. It is believed that the enumeration of contraband goods here contained is as favorable, always considering the shortest list as the most favorable, as any which can be found in any treaty whatever. In language it does not exactly correspond with any which has been heretofore negotiated by the United States, but it is hoped that in accuracy of description it will be found without objection. “Salt-petre and sulphur” are both here omitted; the first of which is found even in our most favorable treaty, and the last in most of them. Indeed, I think there is no article embraced which is not one designed exclusively for war, unless it be "horses with their furniture;" and you will agree with me that I had but little ground to stand on in urging the exclusion of them, when not a single treaty could be found in which they were omitted.

The last paragraph was inserted in preference to the phrase, "and all other warlike instruments whatever," which is found in most of our treaties. Although there is certainly no material difference, whatever does exist is thought to be in favor of the one used.

Article 15. The first part of this is to be considered in connexion with the last article, as its only object is by strong words to negative the idea that anything not "explicitly enumerated and classified" therein can be considered as prohibited.

The latter part defines a blockaded port. I have ventured to adopt a definition which I have not seen in any treaty, but the policy of the United States on this subject has been so steady and well declared that I thought I could not err in limiting the idea of a blockaded place to one which was "actually attacked by a belligerent force capable of preventing the entry of the neutral." My object was in strict accordance with the uniform policy of pacific nations, to restrict as far as possible the number of cases in which a neutral vessel could subject itself to capture for violating a blockade, by giving to that blockade the most limited boundaries. Although it is probably impossible to guard in any case against determined prevarication, it is hoped that the language here used, fortified as it is by the seventeenth article, will be considered as very little liable to misinterpretation from a candid mind.

Article 16. This article contains several usual but valuable provisions, all calculated to liberate neutral commerce from unnecessary and vexatious restraints.

Article 17. This article was at first copied by me from the last clause of the twelfth article of our treaty with France, in the year 1800, but it has since received amendments which greatly improve it. It is now required that the "warning" should be given by the commanding officer of the blockading forces to the neutral vessel. This was thought important by me, not so much because any particular importance was attached to the individual from whom the "warning" should come, but because it supposes the actual existence and presence of a blockading force.

It is hoped that this article, taken in connexion with the former one, will place the subject nearly on as good a footing as it could be placed, and probably on a better one than any of our former negotiations have placed it.

Article 18. The rules prescribed in this article for the government of examining officers at sea are not unusual, and all of them, it is thought, will tend to save neutral vessels from vexation and insult.

Article 19. This is nearly, in language and substance, a copy of the seventeenth article of our treaty with Spain; the following case, however, presents an exception: In that treaty it was required that the passport or sea letter, which the neutral vessel should bear to declare her character, should be made out according to an annexed form. Here that requisition is omitted, in order that the papers might not be unnecessarily multiplied, and that those now in ordinary use might comply with the stipulation. Similar provisions are to be found in many of our treaties.

Article 20. This was another article designed by me solely to diminish the opportunities for vexatious examinations at sea, and to save the feelings of our naval officers from the mortification of being obliged to witness the detention and examination of vessels under their protection by those who would disregard their declaration, on honor, that the vessels belonged to the nation whose flag they bore. The principle, you know, is not a new one, even in our own treaties.

Article 21. This was thought by me to contain a valuable provision. It grants nothing which our laws and usages do not already assure to all foreigners, and seemed to me to be an important stipulation with all new countries which have but recently passed through the process of a revolution, and where it might be apprehended the prevailing notions on the subject of judicial proceedings had not become so correct and stable as time will render them.

Article 22. This article is the same, substantially, as the fourteenth of the first treaty with Spain, and being there and in force, the insertion of the same could not have been reasonably refused here, even if it had not been in our treaties with several other powers.

Article 23. This is only the usual expression of humanity in like cases.

Article 24. It is not believed that this article requires any explanation or vindication.

Article 25. This article was not considered at all necessary by me; but it is one of those so perfectly inoffensive, that if the insertion of them is urged with much earnestness, it would indicate some degree of incivility, and might create a suspicion that some secret objection existed which was not expressed to insist on their rejection. In this way the article was inserted. Its introduction in the treaty seemed to be desired, from an apprehension that some of the Governments of Europe might, in the establishment of their relations with this country, set up pretensions on this subject inconsistent with perfect equality, and this Republic wished, by the previous insertion of this article, to destroy all such expectations.

Article 26. This article contains an agreement for the mutual reception of consuls very much in the usual way.

Article 27. This requires no explanation.

Article 28. Under the qualifications which are imposed on this article, it gives very few exemptions to those attached to the offices of consuls. An exemption from militia duty and a capitation tax are probably all that the qualifications leave; and when those persons are citizens of the country in which the consul resides, even these are denied to them. The last clause, in relation to the security of the archives against all seizure or municipal interference, merited insertion, I thought, under the same suggestions which you will see applied in this letter to the 21st article.

Article 29. This article is not an exact copy of the one on the same subject in the late convention with France, which I should have preferred, but it is nearly so. There is no difference worthy of notice, except in the time during which a deserter may be detained in prison before he is sent out of the country; in that treaty the time is three and in this two months.

Article 30. This article, as was mentioned in my letter of yesterday, was inserted by me in substitution of several articles proposed by the Commissioner of Colombia, which declared with much explicitness and a good deal of detail the rights and duties of the consuls.

Article 31. Respecting this article I have nothing to add to what was contained in my letter No. 17, in which you will find whatever was thought necessary to explain its several parts.

Having addressed to each article distinctly the observations which it was thought they merited, I will confine myself to a single remark, which may be applicable to many of them. It may have occurred to you, as indeed it has to me, that several of them might have been omitted without much disadvantage to either of the contracting parties; that, as some of them merely stipulate for the exercise of common humanity, their enforcement might have been left to the spirit of the age in which we live; that others, which are exclusively declaratory of what is known to be the law among civilized nations, might safely have been left for their execution to those correct feelings which so generally prevail among enlightened societies. To this I will only reply, that all articles of this kind are so perfectly harmless in their nature, all contain truths so palpable, that when they are offered and urged by a friendly power it is difficult to find reasons to insist on their rejection. And it may be observed, too, that precise stipulations, however obvious may be the rule which they declare, can scarcely ever fail to be of service on some occasions.

With an anxious wish that the President may find in the result of my exertions something to promote and nothing to impair the interests of our country, I have the honor to be, with very great respect, your obedient servant,

R. C. ANDERSON, JR.

BOGOTA, October 8, 1824.

SIR: Copies of the following papers are herein inclosed, viz:

Of the full powers under which the plenipotentiary of this Republic acted in the late negotiation; of his note of the 24th August last, omitted in my inclosure of the 3d instant; of my note of the 26th September, containing a copy of the 15th article of our last treaty with Spain in relation to the reserved privileges in the ports of St. Augustine and Pensacola; and of the note of the 1st October acknowledging the receipt of it.

These last are transmitted under the idea that possibly it may be deemed proper, in the event of the ratification of the treaty, to subjoin them to it in the publication, as explanatory of its meaning.

I also transmit to you copies of the treaties heretofore concluded by this Republic and the States of Chile, Peru, Buenos Ayres, and Mexico. They are newspaper copies, and such as were furnished to me by the Department of Foreign Relations. They are necessary to enable you to determine the extent and operation of the treaty just concluded in those articles, which place each contracting party on the footing of the most favored nations, and to ascertain whether any legislative or other measures be necessarily consequent on the ratification of it.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

BOGOTA, September 26, 1824.

The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor of communicating to the plenipotentiary of Colombia a copy of the fifteenth article of a treaty concluded at Washington between the United States and Spain on the twenty-second day of February, in the year one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, which article is in the following words, to wit: "Article XV. The United States, to give his Catholic Majesty a proof of their desire to cement the relations of amity subsisting between the two nations, and to favor the commerce of the subjects of his Catholic Majesty, agree that Spanish vessels coming laden only with productions of Spanish growth or manufactures, directly from the ports of Spain or of her colonies, shall be admitted for the term of twelve years to the ports of Pensacola and St. Augustine, in the Floridas, without paying other or higher duties on their cargoes or of tonnage than will be paid by the vessels of the United States. During the said term no other nation shall enjoy the same privilege within the ceded territories. The twelve years shall commence three months after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty," and to inform him that the said ratifications were exchanged on the twenty-second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion of renewing to the plenipotentiary of Colombia the assurance of his high consideration.

Republic of Colombia: Francisco de Paula Santander, general of division of the armies of Colombia, of the liberators of Venezuela and Cundinamarca, decorated with the Cross of Boyaca, Vice President of the Republic, charged with the executive power, &c., &c.

To all those to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Whereas the Government of the United States of America has constituted and appointed the honorable Richard C. Anderson its minister plenipotentiary near that of the Republic of Colombia, giving him full power and authority to negotiate, arrange, conclude and sign, in this capital, a treaty or treaties of friendship, commerce, and navigation, that may clearly establish and permanently secure the relations of perfect friendship and intercourse which happily exist between both powers: Therefore, having entire confidence in the ability, zeal, and integrity of the honorable Pedro Gual, Secretary of State and of the Despatch of Foreign Affairs, I have conferred upon him, as by these presents I do confer on him, full power and authority to negotiate, arrange, conclude, and sign, with the aforesaid minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, the above treaty or treaties of friendship, commerce, and navigation, obliging myself to its or their ratification, with the previous consent and approbation of the Congress of the said Republic of Colombia.

In faith of which, I give and sign the present with my hand, sealed with the seal of the Republic of Colombia, and countersigned by the Secretary of State and of the Despatch of the Interior, in this city of Bogota, the 18th of May, of the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, fourteenth of independence.

Protocol of the first conference of the plenipotentiaries of the United States and of Colombia, held by verbal agreement at the office of Mr. Anderson, August 27, 1824.

Present: the plenipotentiaries.

It was agreed to take up and read, for discussion, by articles, the contre projet proposed by the plenipotentiary of the United States.

The preamble and first four articles were then read and agreed to, without alteration.

In the fifth article, it was agreed that the first member should be so altered as to embrace persons of "all occupations." In the second member of the article, the plenipotentiary of Colombia proposed an alteration relating to "the freedom of worship," and it was agreed that he should present an amendment for consideration.

In the sixth article, it was agreed that the last clause be stricken out.

The seventh, eighth, and ninth articles were read and agreed to, without alteration.

The principle of the tenth article was agreed to, but it was desired by the plenipotentiaries of Colombia that an addition or alteration be made, declaring more explicitly that the provisions of this article should not save the goods of any power which did not respect the goods of the United States and Colombia, respectively, in the vessels of the other, and particularly the merchandise of Spain, who, not having as yet acknowledged the Republic of Colombia, might not, perhaps, acknowledge the principle that "free ships make free goods," with respect to her; and it was agreed to postpone a proposition to that effect for consideration.

It was agreed to postpone the further consideration of the subject, and to meet again on the 28th instant, at the same place.

Protocol of the second conference of the plenipotentiaries of the United States and of Colombia, held on August 31, 1824, at the same place.

Present: the plenipotentiaries.

On the 28th, the conference was postponed until the 31st, on account of the indisposition of the plenipotentiary of Colombia.

On the 31st, the plenipotentiaries met, and the conference was renewed on the points which had remained pending at the former one. The plenipotentiary of Colombia said, in his opinion, the fifth article should be divided so as to form two, in order that the alteration of which he had spoken should appear more clearly, and he presented the following project of an article:

Separate article.—"There is granted to the citizens of Colombia and of the United States of America the most perfect and entire security of conscience in the countries subject to the jurisdiction of both powers, without being thereby subject to be disturbed or molested on account of their religious belief, so long as they shall respect the laws and established usages and customs. Likewise, the bodies of the citizens of one of the contracting parties, who may die in the territories of the other, shall be buried in public, decent, and adequate burying grounds, and their bodies shall be protected from all violation and disturbance."

He further said that this article was conformable to the laws of the Republic; that he felt, in truth, it was not so liberal as the clause proposed to him; he desired the alteration, as well from respect to the present laws, as because the present administration did not consider it judicious to take a premature step on a subject so delicate, which, far from being useful, might find some difficulties in its execution. The plenipotentiary of the United States agreed to take the article into consideration.

With regard to the tenth article, the plenipotentiary of Colombia said that he had the pleasure of repeating, as he had said before, that he no longer considered it improper to assent to the principle that "a neutral flag should protect the property," after having deliberated and respectfully considered the observations and explanations made by the plenipotentiary of the United States in his letter of July 7; but that it ought to be understood that this principle should not be obligatory on the Republic of Colombia after the conclusion and ratification of the treaty, until Spain had declared formally to the United States that she acknowledged this principle with regard to this Republic, or that the United States would declare that they were resolved to protect Colombian property on board her ships, and to answer for it against the depredations of Spain, in case of her refusing the declaration. He further observed that it was necessary to remember that, by a decree of this Government of January 20, 1823, it is not permitted to introduce into its ports, during the war, the manufactures and native productions of Spain and its colonies, and that, consequently, the citizens of the United States will not be authorized to introduce into this country said manufactures or productions on account of Spanish subjects, or even if they may have become by legal means the property of neutrals. After various observations, the plenipotentiary of the United States agreed to take into consideration the manner and terms in which he would make a declaration of the obligations which the parties were about to assume, saying that he did not deem it necessary to insert anything further in the treaty; that it would be equivalent to express, by a formal declaration, the obligations which the United States and Colombia were respectively about to contract. With regard to the decree of January, 1823, he did not consider it necessary to make any observation, as it was certainly a measure which every country had a right to adopt against its enemy.

The discussion being continued, the plenipotentiary of Colombia proposed that, in his opinion, the eleventh article should be divided, having in the first an enumeration, as minute as possible, of the articles called contraband of war, and in the second declaring, with respect to other goods not embraced in that enumeration, an absolute liberty of commerce and navigation, in the same terms in which it is expressed in the final clause of the counter projet, from the words "so that" to the end. He said this alteration appeared proper to him, because it would be very difficult to enumerate all the articles of commerce which were of an innocent nature, and because, if there could be any dispute on the subject, it would be with regard to gold, silver, articles of first necessity for the sustenance of life, and things proper for ship building, which, although some writers consider as contraband, he was disposed to exclude. The plenipotentiary of the United States offered to present a new article, it appearing to him that there were no objections to the suggestions. The plenipotentiary of Colombia also expressed a wish that "military clothing, made up," should be embraced in the articles of contraband, which had been omitted in the counter projet.

The articles numbers twelve, thirteen, fourteen, fifteen, and sixteen, were then successively read and agreed to, without alteration, except the last clause of the last member of the sixteenth article, which commences with the words, "The citizens of both parties," &c. "Would to God," said the plenipotentiary of Colombia, "that the legislation of this country was as perfect as that of the United States, in order to accede without hesitation to this article. But that advocates, proctors, agents, and factors should be present at all the proceedings of the tribunal in such cases, and at the taking of all the examinations and declarations in the suits, would not fail to offer some difficulties in the forensic practices of this country." He promised, however, to examine the subject anew, and to resume it at the next conference.

The seventeenth and eighteenth articles were then read, and it was agreed to suppress the words "other professions," and substitute "other occupations," in the last article.

The nineteenth, twentieth, twenty-first, and twenty-second articles were then read and agreed to, with the exception of the words "some lucrative profession," in the last, they being considered somewhat vague and susceptible of unpleasant interpretations; and, consequently, this part of the article was made to read: "Excepting those which they may be obliged to pay on account of commerce or their property."

The twenty-third article being read, it was agreed, for greater certainty, to insert, after the word "arrested," in the last clause, the words "in the public prisons, at the request and at the expense of those who reclaim them."

The twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth articles were then read, and the plenipotentiary of Colombia observed that, as to the first declaration of the last article, it seemed to him best to omit the second part of it, commencing with the words "It being understood," &c., to the end, because, in his opinion, (as he had heard the plenipotentiary of the United States also say,) the treaty they were then negotiating could not in any way affect any treaties previously concluded with other powers by the United States or Colombia, provided they were previously known to the parties.

The conference was then suspended, and it was agreed that the plenipotentiary of the United States should assign a day for the next, whenever he should think proper.

Protocol of the third conference, held by agreement at the same place, on September 3, by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and Colombia.

Present: the plenipotentiaries.

The proposition to divide the fifth article into two was agreed to; and the modification, as to the right of worship, was also agreed to, as proposed in the second conference. With regard to the article No. 10, and to the observations made by the plenipotentiary of Colombia at the last conference on the principle of said article, and on the necessity of a clear understanding of its effects, the plenipotentiary of the United States said that he was ready to declare, and now declares, that in the event that Spain, disregarding the obligations of her treaty with the United States, or denying that Colombia was such a "power" as was contemplated by the twelfth article of that treaty, should attempt to take Colombian property from vessels of the United States, it was his clear understanding of the proposed convention that the United States would resist such attempts, and would be subject to the same responsibilities to Colombia in relation to the property, whatever they might be, to which she would be liable if it were the property of the subjects of any other sovereign power who had acknowledged that principle; or, in other words, to the same responsibility to which Colombia would be subject if she, as a neutral, was carrying the property of citizens of the United States, when at war, and such property were taken from her vessels under similar circumstances.

The plenipotentiary of Colombia said, that all his Government desired was, that the obligations she was contracting and the rights she was acquiring should be clearly expressed, and said that the declaration he had just heard satisfied that desire.

The article in relation to contraband was then considered, and, after various observations, it was agreed to postpone its further consideration until the next meeting.

It was then agreed to modify the sixteenth article by omitting the words "the proceedings," and inserting "decisions and sentences."

In the twenty-fifth article it was agreed to strike out the words in the first declaration of this article, beginning with "It being understood," &c., to the end, as was proposed in the last conference.

The plenipotentiaries then read and agreed to the second declaration of that article; and the third declaration being read, the plenipotentiary of Colombia proposed that the third declaration of the thirtieth article of his original projet should be here inserted, which submitted to the arbitration of friendly powers the decision of any difference which might arise to produce hostilities between the parties. "The history of Europe," said he, "leaves on this subject lessons as terrible as they may be advantageous to America. Frequently simple caprice has caused those nations to prefer the calamities of war to the blessings of peace." America should always live in peace, and it appeared to him proper to apply henceforth suitable preventives against war, and none seemed to him so adequate as the proposed arbitration. The plenipotentiary of the United States observed, that it was a very delicate subject to submit the sovereign rights of a nation to the arbitration of others; that the past history of his country declared that there was no nation which, after she had received an injury, would show more forbearance in enforcing her rights, nor none which was more ready to submit differences to friendly decision; but he did not deem it judicious, in anticipation, to bind his Government to arbitrate questions which might involve her character and sovereignty; and further said, that the decision of the friendly power would either be obligatory or not; that in the first case the United States and Colombia would, by this act, have deprived themselves of exercising their judgments, (even in similar cases,) which it was to be supposed would always be guided by justice; that, if not binding, the reference would be useless. The plenipotentiary of Colombia answered, that, even if the decision of the friendly power was not obligatory, the proposed declaration would produce a very salutary moral effect on the peace of both nations; since, it being once decided that justice was on the one or the other side, it would require a great effort to make and justify a declaration of war against that decision. After various observations, it was determined not to insert the third declaration of the original projet; and the plenipotentiary of Colombia then proposed that, in case of adopting the declaration of the counter projet, the words "not declare war" should be inserted before the words "nor order reprisals." This addition was, in his opinion, of some importance towards the preservation of peace, because it would at least produce the necessity of a previous explanation upon the causes of the complaints or injuries existing, during which it was most probable that everything would be amicably adjusted.

No objection being seen to the proposed addition, it was inserted.

The conference was adjourned, and it was agreed to meet again on the 10th instant, at the same place.

Protocol of the fourth conference, held by agreement at the same place, September 10, 1824.

Present: the plenipotentiaries.

The plenipotentiary of the United States opened the conference by saying that it appeared to him proper to add a fourth declaration to the 25th article of the contre projet, the better to explain the observation made at the close of the second conference, which might be expressed in these words: "Nothing in this treaty contained shall, however, be construed or operate contrary to former and existing public treaties with other sovereigns or States." The plenipotentiary of Colombia assented to the adoption of it. With regard to the 11th article, which remained undetermined at the second and third conferences, the plenipotentiary of the United States observed that he would assent to the enumeration of articles of contraband contained in the tenth of the original project if general expressions were avoided which would give rise to vague interpretations, and if the words "saltpetre, lead, and horses, with their furniture," were omitted, including, however, "military clothing," as was proposed. The plenipotentiary of Colombia replied, that at present he had not much difficulty in omitting "saltpetre" and "lead," but that certainly "horses embarked with their military harness" was an article properly and exclusively for war; because, when horses are embarked as an object of innocent speculation, they do not go accompanied by their appropriate military furniture. Finally, he agreed to the impropriety of using vague and undefined expressions, in the enumeration of which they were treating, and added that it appeared to him, in the impossibility of detailing particularly all instruments destructive of mankind, in the invention of which men were unfortunately too ingenious, and in the determination in which both parties were to indulge in no unnecessary or confused latitude in making an enumeration of contraband articles, that the following clause might be adopted at the close of the article: "And generally all kinds of arms and instruments of iron, steel, brass, and copper, or any other materials manufactured, prepared, and formed expressly to make war by sea or land." After various observations on the subject, the two articles were reduced to the following form:

ARTICLE 11. This liberty of navigation and commerce shall extend to all kinds of merchandise, excepting those only which are distinguished by the name of contraband; and under this name, or of prohibited goods, shall be comprehended—

1st. Cannons, mortars, howitzers, swivels, blunderbusses, muskets, fuses, rifles, carbines, pistols, pikes, swords, sabres, lances, spears, halberds, and grenades, bombs, powder, matches, balls, with other things belonging to the use of those arms.

2d. Bucklers, helmets, breastplates, coats of mail, infantry belts, and clothes made up in the form and for a military use.

3d. Cavalry belts and horses with their furniture.

4th. And generally all kinds of arms and instruments of war, steel, brass, and copper, or any other materials manufactured, prepared, and formed expressly to make war by sea or land.

ARTICLE 12. All other merchandises and things not comprehended in the articles of contraband explicitly enumerated and classified as above, shall be held and considered as free and as subjects of free and lawful commerce, so that they may be transported and carried in the freest manner by the citizens of both the contracting parties, even to places belonging to an enemy, excepting only such towns or places as may be actually besieged or blockaded; and to avoid all doubt in this particular, it is declared that those places only are besieged or blockaded which are actually attacked by a force of the belligerent capable of preventing the entry of the neutral.

The conference was then suspended, the plenipotentiary of Colombia agreeing to introduce at the next, which should be held on the 13th instant, some additional articles. The plenipotentiary of the United States also declared his intention of proposing some others.

Protocol of the fifth conference of the plenipotentiaries of the United States and of Colombia, held by verbal agreement at the same place, September 13, 1824.

Present: the plenipotentiaries.

In conformity with what the plenipotentiary of Colombia had offered at the last conference, he presented three additional articles to be inserted in their appropriate places in the treaty. The first had for its object to declare two principles, which were consequent on the one which they had adopted, declaring "that the flag should protect the property;" the second related to a reciprocity with regard to consignments of goods and merchandises between the citizens of the two countries, according to the recommendation of the Congress of Colombia to the Executive, by the 2d article of the law of the 28th of July last; and the third was upon the privileges of the envoys, ministers, and other diplomatic agents of both powers.

The plenipotentiary of the United States proposed that two additions be made to the treaty: the first obliging the commanders of private armed vessels to give sufficient security to answer for any damages which they might commit; secondly, that vessels sailing under convoy might be exempt from all visits and examination of their papers; that full faith be given to the verbal declaration of the commanders of the convoy, under their word of honor, in such cases.

The plenipotentiaries made no objection to the insertion of these articles and additions respectively proposed.

The conference was suspended, the plenipotentiaries agreeing to make a transposition and correction of the articles agreeably to what had been determined.

Protocol of the sixth conference of the plenipotentiaries of the United States and Colombia, held by verbal agreement at the same place, on the 2d of October, 1824.

Present: The plenipotentiaries.

In compliance with what had been said at the close of the fifth conference, the two plenipotentiaries presented in English and Castilian, as previously agreed and corrected, the treaty or general convention of peace, amity, navigation, and commerce, in the terms in which it had been arranged, and having examined it carefully and compared the English with the Castilian copy, they found them correct and conformable to the alterations and additions which had been respectively proposed in the course of the negotiation; and thereupon they resolved to place their signatures and affix their seals the next day, that is to say, to two distinct originals, the one in the English, the other in the Castilian language, of which copies shall be interchanged mutually, certified and compared with the originals.

[2D SESSION.]

CONVENTION NEGOTIATED WITH THE REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF THE AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE, DECEMBER 10, 1824, BUT NOT RATIFIED.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, IN EXECUTIVE SESSION, FEBRUARY 22, 1825, AND THE INJUNCTION OF SECRECY SINCE REMOVED.

To the President of the Senate pro tempore:

I transmit to the Senate a convention signed by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and of the Republic of Colombia, at Bogota, on the 10th of December, 1824, together with the documents appertaining to the negotiation of the same, for the constitutional consideration of the Senate, with regard to its ratification.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, February 21, 1825.

Mr. Anderson to Don Pedro Gual.

BOGOTA, January 10, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor of communicating to you herewith a resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States, requesting the President to open such negotiations with the maritime powers of Europe and America as he may deem expedient for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade, and its ultimate denunciation as piracy, under the laws of nations, by the civilized world. I also transmit to you copies of the several acts of Congress on that subject, requesting your particular attention to the 4th and 5th sections of the act of May 15, 1820, by the provisions of which you will see that, so far as legislative enactments can go, the United States have done everything in their power for the suppression of that trade, by subjecting to the penalties of piracy every citizen of the United States who shall be guilty of active participation in it.

These documents are communicated in the certain belief that the Republic of Colombia will not permit herself to be behind any Government in the civilized world in the adoption of energetic measures for the suppression of this disgraceful traffic.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

RICHARD C. ANDERSON.

REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA.

OFFICE OF STATE AND OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Palace of the Government in the capital of Bogota, January 22, 1824—14.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving and laying before the Executive your communication of the tenth instant, with a copy of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States, requesting the President to enter upon negotiations with the maritime powers of Europe and America relative to the abolition of the slave trade, by denouncing it ultimately as piracy, under the law of civilized nations; and of the acts of the 3d of March, 1813, and of the 15th of May, 1820, particularly calling the attention of this Government to the 4th and 5th articles of this last act.

Nothing is so much for the interest of this country as the entire extirpation of the abominable traffic in Africans, by which Europe has caused incalculable evil to this continent. Influenced by these sentiments, the Congress of Colombia passed the law of the 19th of July, 1821, prohibiting, by article 7th, the introduction of slaves in any manner whatsoever. It should be highly gratifying to the friends of humanity to know that a measure like this has not met with the least opposition among the citizens of this country. But, very much to the contrary, all, without any distinction, have aided to execute it religiously, without there having occurred, to this moment, in the tribunals of justice, one single case of infraction.

Nevertheless, the Executive, desirous, on his part, of contributing to the promotion of the views and laudable policy of the United States on this subject, will with pleasure propose to the next Legislature additional measures analogous to those which have been adopted by your Government. Moreover, he is willing to open any negotiation whatsoever relative to the extermination of this traffic of human flesh. You may be assured that the Republic of Colombia will not be less zealous and active to accomplish it than any other power whatsoever, of Europe or America.

Be pleased, sir, to communicate this to the Government of the United States, and to accept, in the meantime, the assurances of perfect esteem and respect with which I have the honor to remain your very obedient servant,

PEDRO GUAL.

Bogota, November 9, 1824.

SIR: In my letter of the 8th of October I informed you of my intention of calling the notice of this Government to the subject of the African slave trade at some early day, and in conformity with that intention a note was prepared by me. However, before the design was executed, the Secretary of Foreign Relations gave me to understand, in the course of a conversation recently held with him, that he intended to address to me a letter on the subject, suggesting that it would be agreeable to this Government to receive from me a projet containing the principles on which the Government of the United States would be willing to conclude a convention. Accordingly, I have received from him a letter, in which he states that the Executive had recommended to the last Congress the passage of a law declaring the trade piratical, and that the pressure of urgent business only prevented the Congress from executing the recommendation; that the Government, under the presumption that such a law would pass at the next session, wished that a particular convention should, in the meanwhile, be concluded, determining the manner in which the two Governments should henceforward concur in their efforts to abolish that traffic. The letter, moreover, selected me to make known the principles on which such a convention would be acceptable to the Government of the United States.

In compliance with this request, I have offered to him, as a proposition containing provisions which would be desirable, a set of articles similar to those signed in London, in March last, modified according to the alterations proposed in the Senate. I thought I could not err in offering articles which had passed the various tests to which these had been subjected. On this subject, involving some considerations of delicacy and difficulty in which the guards and restrictions should be expressed in language well considered and accurately defined, I would not venture to make any alteration in the substance or language. As I shall feel but little disposition to assent to any change, unless it be one manifestly unimportant, it is probable that in a few days I shall be able to inform you definitively of the result. If there seems to be a probability of a convention being signed during this month, the messenger, to whom it is intended to entrust the conveyance of the treaty of commerce, will be detained by me until the end of it.

A copy of Doctor Gual's letter to me is herewith inclosed, with a translation, and also a copy of mine in answer thereto, accompanying the projet. You will see from my letter the intimation is distinctly made to him that the negotiation is conducted entirely on the idea that the laws of the United States declaring the slave trade piratical are to be met by corresponding enactments on the part of this country, and that the proposition presented by me is made on the faith of that understanding.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

H. C. ANDERSON, JR.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State, Washington.

REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,

Palace of the Government in the capital of Bogota, October 30, 1824—of independence 14.

SIR: On the 4th day of May last the Executive recommended to Congress again to take into consideration the law which prohibits the trade in African slaves, for the purpose of declaring the perpetrators therein guilty of the crime of piracy, in conformity with the documents which you had the goodness to transmit to me on the tenth of the preceding January, by order of your Government. The multiplicity of business which occupied the attention of Congress during its last sittings did not permit it to adopt measures equivalent to those which the United States have so laudably sanctioned in favor of humanity

As it is to be presumed that this will be done in the course of the next session, my Government thinks that in the meantime it would be convenient to fix, by means of a particular treaty, the manner and terms on which both powers shall concur, in future, in making more effectual the abolition of the said traffic. If, then, you have instructions on the subject, I would infinitely thank you to be so good as to inform me if you are disposed to enter into the negotiation, and under what principles it could be concluded.

I remain, with the greatest respect and consideration, your very obedient and very humble servant,
P. GUAL.

BOGOTA, November 4, 1824.

The undersigned, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has had the honor of receiving the letter of the Secretary of State and of Foreign Relations, of the 30th of October, referring to the communication of the undersigned of the 10th of January last, on the subject of the African slave trade, and giving to him the information that the Government of this Republic is desirous, by a particular convention, to declare the manner and terms by which the two Governments are disposed in future to concur in their efforts to abolish that disreputable and inhuman traffic. It is seen with very great pleasure that this Government has received the communication heretofore made, by order of the President of the United States, in the spirit in which it was designed, and one which gives the amplest assurances of a harmonious concurrence in the measures to be adopted. It is a subject on which the Government of the United States feels much solicitude, and to which its anxieties and exertions are directed in a manner that it is hoped will ultimately produce complete success by a universal acquiescence in the wisdom and humanity of its course. While all those directing its administration must ever have the enjoyment of the feelings which a recollection of these exertions will inspire, the undersigned cannot refuse to himself the satisfaction of expressing the pleasure with which he learns that the Executive of Colombia has united its efforts in the same humane cause, by recommending to the proper authorities the passage of a law affixing to this odious crime the name and the penalties of piracy.

In compliance with the request expressed in the note of the 30th ultimo, desiring that the principles on which a negotiation on this subject might be concluded should be presented, the undersigned has now the honor of transmitting a proposition at length containing those principles; this mode of acceding to the request is adopted under the belief that it is at once the most frank and the most despatchful. It is thought that the articles now offered contain provisions which will be eminently successful in attaining the desired end, while they do not impose any duty or privation on either party which it will not most willingly incur in a cause sanctioned and cheered by the approbation of all Christian men.

It will be immediately perceived that the negotiation is conducted on the predication that the trade to be affected by it is to be declared by the legislative enactments of both the contracting parties piratical, and subject to the ordinary penalties of that high offence; the articles now presented are expressed in language suited only to that state of the law, and would indeed have an application in no other case.

The undersigned will not close this communication without expressing his hope that the Government of Colombia will see in the convention now proposed those principles only which are strictly consistent with its honor, and such as may be considered well calculated to attain the great object in view.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to offer the assurances of his consideration and respect.

R. C. ANDERSON, JR.

HON. PEDRO GUAL, Secretary of State and of Foreign Relations.

No. 21.

BOGOTA, December 14, 1824.

SIR: On the 10th day of this month I concluded and signed, with the plenipotentiary of this Republic, a convention on the subject of the African slave trade.

Both parties being animated by a common and sincere desire to bring the negotiation to a prompt and happy conclusion, those wishes have been accomplished in a way which I hope may be satisfactory to the President of the United States.

In my letter (No. 20) you were informed that, under the invitation of the Secretary of Foreign Relations, I had presented, as a project containing principles which would be acceptable to the Government of the United States, a transcript of the articles signed at London in March last, modified according to the manner in which they had received the approbation of the Senate. In a few days afterwards I received a note informing me that the leading principles of the system were considered as unexceptionable, and desiring a conference for the further consideration of the subject. This conference was held, and at it a few alterations were proposed, discussed, and adjusted.

The convention, as signed, presents no difference between the proposition first offered by me and it, except in the following points, which, although they are not considered as material, are mentioned merely as they do constitute a difference. The first consists in a slight alteration of the language of the preamble, which, being obviously unimportant, requires no comment. The second point of difference is presented in the first article, and is one which, in language, though probably not at all in substance, goes to enlarge the operation of the convention. The original proposition, in designating the officers to whom the power of executing the provisions of the convention should be confided, gave that authority "to the commanders and commissioned officers of each of the two high contracting parties, duly authorized under the regulations and instructions of their Governments, to cruise on the coasts of Africa and the West Indies for the suppression of the slave trade." This language has been changed, you will observe, so as to extend the authority to those who are authorized "to cruise on the seas and coasts of Africa and of the West India islands." This was an alteration suggested by the Commissioner of Colombia, who urged the opinion that the word "coast," if used alone, might be considered as conveying a sense so narrow as to defeat, in a great degree, the object of the parties; and that, indeed, it might even be considered as embracing only so much of the ocean as was included within the jurisdiction of the power holding the adjacent lands; but that, in either case, the addition proposed would, when qualified by the words showing what seas were in contemplation, not enlarge the theatre of action beyond that which was in the intention of the parties.

Upon a careful consideration of the subject, and of the different articles of the convention, I could not think that there was any objection to the introduction of the proposed word. Although I might not assent to the opinion that the "coasts" embraced only that portion of the seas which was included within the jurisdiction of the contiguous territorial power, still, as it was considered by me not to be within the particular intention of the parties to exclude the seas of Africa and the West Indies, I did not think it objectionable to vary the language in any way which would still maintain the beneficent design of the parties. Indeed, it is seen that the design of the first part of this article is principally to designate the officers to whom the powers of executing the provisions of the convention shall be intrusted; but it is manifest, from the first member of the second article, that the theatre on which these powers are to be executed is not restricted to the "coasts" of Africa and the West Indies, nor to any coast in its narrow sense, as the case is there provided for in which "an officer of either of the two contracting parties shall, on the high seas, or anywhere not within the exclusive jurisdiction of either party, board, or cause to be boarded, any merchant vessel," &c. From this, I think, it will obviously appear that the consistency of the different parts of the instrument has not been at all disturbed by the alteration allowed.

In the same sentence the expression "West India islands" has been used in substitution of "West Indies," under the statement of the plenipotentiary of this Government, that, in the works of Spanish historians, and, indeed, throughout the Castilian language, the phrase "West Indies" is used in reference to the whole continent of America, and not to the islands exclusively. As it was desirable to employ no phrase which was in any way indefinite or ambiguous in either language, the change was readily adopted.

The only other alteration from the projet as first presented by me occurs in the eighth article. It is there provided that "copies of the laws of both countries which are or may be in force for the suppression of the slave trade shall be furnished to the commanders," &c. This mode of expression was substituted for that first proposed, by which it was declared that copies of the laws "actually in force" should be furnished, from an idea that the latter expression might possibly be considered as having reference to the time of signing the convention, in exclusion of all other periods of time; and as there was no law of this Government now in force on the subject, the expression might involve some inaccuracy of fact.

This explanation of the alterations which have been indulged in has been made, not from a belief that they do in any manner affect the sense of the treaty either by enlarging or restricting its operation, or that they are in any way essential, but from an inclination to present with the greatest precision the course and the result of the negotiation.

It is intended on the part of this Government to give the final ratification to the convention, (which, under the constitution of Colombia, is an act of the Congress,) and to pass the laws necessary to fulfil it simultaneously. A copy of those laws will accompany the instrument of ratification to the United States, to be ready for delivery, duly authenticated, on the exchange of the ratifications.

A copy of the convention is herewith inclosed, together with a copy of the letter of the Secretary of Foreign Relations to me, of December 3. The convention itself will be sent by the same messenger to whom will be intrusted the treaty of commerce and navigation, who will leave Bogota during the next week, and will, I hope, arrive in Washington nearly as soon as this despatch.

I have the honor to be, with very great respect, your obedient servant,

R. C. ANDERSON, Jr.

[Translation.]

BOGOTA, December 3, 1824.

The undersigned, Secretary of State and Foreign Relations, has the honor to inform the honorable Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States that the Vice President of the Republic of Colombia having very seriously considered the projet of a convention which was subjoined to your valuable note of 4th November last, upon the illicit trade of slaves of Africa, his Excellency has thought proper to confer upon the undersigned a full power (copy of which is herewith sent) to conclude and sign said convention in the name of this country.

The undersigned has the very great satisfaction of assuring the honorable Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States that the instructions which he has received with that power differ almost in nothing from the cardinal principles of the projet; he will, therefore, have much pleasure in agreeing to a conference with the honorable Minister Plenipotentiary the day and hour which he will have the goodness to appoint, fully expecting that then this important negotiation will be terminated to the satisfaction of both parties.

The undersigned renews to the honorable Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

P. GUAL.

Extract from a letter (No. 23) from R. C. Anderson, Jr., Esq., to the Secretary of State, dated

BOGOTA, December 27, 1824.

"Mr. L. Anderson, who will deliver this letter to you, is the bearer employed by me to convey to the United States the treaty of navigation and commerce signed in October last, and also the convention on the African slave trade, more recently concluded and signed with the plenipotentiary of this Government."

"The treaty signed in October would have been transmitted at an earlier day, but no suitable messenger could be found here, and the state of the mails, either by Caraccas or down the Magdalena, is such as to render the transmission of such documents by them entirely ineligible and unsafe."

"I have directed Mr. Anderson to proceed, without delay, to the coast, and thence to the United States by the earliest conveyance."

In the name of God, Author and Legislator of the Universe: The United States of America and the Republic of Colombia being desirous to co-operate for the complete suppression of the African slave trade, by making the law of piracy, as applied to that traffic under the statutes of their respective Legislatures, immediately and reciprocally operative on the vessels and citizens of each other, have, respectively, furnished to their plenipotentiaries the necessary and full powers to conclude a convention for that purpose: that is to say, the United States of America, to Richard Clough Anderson, Jr., a citizen of said States, and their Minister Plenipotentiary to the said Republic; and the Republic of Colombia, to Pedro Gual, Secretary of State and of Foreign Relations; who, after a reciprocal communication of their respective full powers, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE I. The commanders and commissioned officers of each of the two high contracting parties, duly authorized under the regulations and instructions of their respective Governments to cruise on the seas and coasts of Africa, and of the West India islands, for the suppression of the slave trade, shall be empowered, under the conditions, limitations and restrictions hereinafter specified, to detain, examine, capture and deliver over for trial and adjudication, by some competent tribunal of whichever of the two countries it shall be found on examination to belong to, any ship or vessel concerned in the illicit traffic of slaves, and carrying the flag of the other, or owned by any citizens of either of the two contracting parties, except when in the presence of a ship-of-war of its own nation; and it is further agreed that any ship or vessel so captured shall either be carried or sent by the capturing officer to some port of the country to which it belongs, and there given up to the competent authorities, or be delivered for the same purpose to any duly commissioned officer of the other party, it being the intention of the high contracting powers that any ship or vessel within the purview of this convention, and seized on that account, shall be tried and adjudged by the tribunals of the captured party, and not by the captor.

ARTICLE II. Whenever any naval commander or commissioned officer of either of the two contracting parties shall, on the high seas, or anywhere not within the exclusive jurisdiction of either party, board, or cause to be boarded, any merchant vessel bearing the flag of the other power, and visit the same as a slave trader, or on suspicion of her being concerned in the slave trade—in every such case, whether the vessel so visited shall or shall not be captured and delivered over, or sent into the ports of her own country for trial and adjudication, the boarding officer shall deliver to the master or commander of the visited vessel a certificate in writing, signed by the said boarding officer, and specifying his rank in the Navy of his country, together with the names of the commander by whose orders he is acting and of the national vessel commanded by him; and the said certificate shall further contain a declaration purporting that the only object of the visit is to ascertain whether the merchant vessel in question is engaged in the slave trade or not; and, if found to be so engaged, to take and deliver her to the officers and tribunals of her own country, being that of one of the two contracting parties, for trial and adjudication.

In all such cases the commander of the national vessel, whether belonging to the United States or to the Republic of Colombia, shall, when he makes delivery of his capture, either to the officers or to the tribunals of the other power, deliver all the papers found on board the captured vessel indicating her national character and the objects of her voyage, and, together with them, a certificate, as above, of the visit, signed with his name and specifying his rank in the Navy of his country, as well as the name of the vessel commanded by him, together with the name and professional rank of the boarding officer by whom the said visit has been made.

This certificate shall also contain a list of all the papers received from the master of the vessel detained or visited, as well as those found on board the said vessel; it shall also contain an exact description of the state in which the vessel was found when detained, and a statement of the changes, if any, which have taken place in it, and of the number of slaves, if any, found on board at the moment of the detention.

ARTICLE III. Whenever any merchant vessel of either nation shall be visited, under this convention, on suspicion of such vessel being engaged in the slave trade, no search shall, in any such case, be made on board the said vessel, except what is necessary for ascertaining, by due and sufficient proofs, whether she is or is not engaged in that illicit traffic. No person shall be taken out of the vessel so visited, though such reasonable restraints as may be indispensable for the detention and safe delivery of the vessel may be used against the crew by the commanding officer of the visiting vessel, or under his orders; nor shall any part of the cargo of the visited vessel be taken out of her till after her delivery to the officers or tribunals of her own nation, excepting only when a removal of all or a part of the slaves, if any, found on board the visited vessel shall be indispensable, either for the preservation of their lives or from any other urgent consideration of humanity, or for the safety of the person charged with the navigation of the said vessel after her capture. And any of the slaves so removed shall be duly accounted for to the Government of that country to which the visited vessel belongs, and shall be disposed of according to the laws of the country into which they are carried; the regular bounty or head-money allowed by law being in each instance secured to the captors, for their use and benefit, by the receiving Government.

ARTICLE IV. Whenever any merchant vessel of either nation shall be captured under this convention, it shall be the duty of the commander of any ship belonging to the public service of the other, charged with the instructions of his Government for carrying into execution the provisions of this convention, at the requisition of the commander of the capturing vessel, to receive into his custody the vessel so captured, and to carry or send the same for trial and adjudication into some port of his country or its dependencies. In every such case, at the time of the delivery of the vessel, an authentic declaration shall be drawn up, in triplicate, and signed by the commanders, both of the delivering and receiving vessels; one copy, signed by both, to be kept by each of them, stating the circumstances of the delivery, the condition of the captured vessel at the time of delivery, including the name of her master or commander, and of every other person not a slave on board at that time, and exhibiting the number of the slaves, if any, then on board her, and a list of all the papers received or found on board at the time of capture and delivered over with her. The third copy of the said declaration shall be left in the captured vessel, with the papers found on board, to be produced before the tribunal charged with the adjudication of the capture. And the commander of the capturing vessel shall be authorized to send any one of the officers under his command, and one or two of his crew, with the captured vessel, to appear before the competent tribunal as witnesses of the facts regarding her detention and capture; the reasonable expenses of such witnesses in proceeding to the place of trial, during their detention there, and for their return to their own country, or to their station in its service, shall be allowed by the court of adjudication and defrayed, in the event of the vessel being condemned, out of the proceeds of its sale. In case of the acquittal of the vessel, the expenses, as above specified, of these witnesses shall be defrayed by the Government of the capturing officer.

ARTICLE V. Whenever any capture shall be made under this convention by the officers of either of the contracting parties, and no national vessel of that country to which the captured vessel belongs is cruising on the same station where the capture takes place, the commander of the capturing vessel shall, in such case, either carry or send his prize to some convenient port of its own country, or of any of its dependencies, where a court of Vice Admiralty has jurisdiction, and there give it up to competent authorities for trial and adjudication. The captured vessel shall then be libelled according to the practice of the court taking cognizance of the case; and, if condemned, the proceeds of the sale thereof, and its cargo, if also condemned, shall be paid to the commander of the capturing vessel for the benefit of the captors, to be distributed among them according to the rules of their service respecting prize money.

ARTICLE VI. The commander and crew of any vessel captured under this convention, and sent in for trial, shall be proceeded against, conformably to the laws of the country whereinto they shall be brought, as pirates engaged in the African slave trade; but every witness belonging to the capturing vessel shall, upon the criminal trial for piracy, be liable to be challenged by the accused person, and set aside as incompetent, unless he shall release his claim to any part of the prize money, upon the condemnation of the vessel and cargo.

ARTICLE VII. The right reciprocally conceded by the two contracting parties of visiting, capturing, and delivering over for trial, the merchant vessels of the other, engaged in the traffic of slaves, shall be exercised only by such commissioned officers of their respective navies as shall be furnished with instructions for executing the laws of their respective countries against the slave trade.

For every vexatious and abusive exercise of this right the boarding officer and the commander of the capturing or searching vessel shall, in each case, be personally liable, in costs and damages, to the master and owners of any merchant vessel delivered over, detained or visited by them, under the provisions of this convention.

Whatever court of admiralty shall have cognizance of the cause, as regards the captured vessel, in each case the same court shall be competent to hear the complaint of the master or owners, or of any person or persons on board the said vessel, or interested in the property of her cargo at the time of her detention; and on due and sufficient proof being given to the court of any vexation and abuse having been practiced during the search or detention of the said vessel, contrary to the provisions and meaning of this convention, to award reasonable costs and damages to the sufferers, to be paid by the commanding or boarding officer convicted of such misconduct.

The Government of the party thus cast in damages and costs shall cause the amount of the same to be paid, in each instance, agreeably to the judgment of the court, within twelve months from the date thereof.

In case of any such vexation and abuse occurring in the detention or search of a vessel detained under this convention, and not afterwards delivered over for trial, the persons aggrieved, being such as are specified above, or any of them, shall be heard by any court of admiralty of the country of the captors before which they make complaint thereof; and the commander and boarding officer of the detaining vessel shall, in such instance, be liable, as above, in costs and damages to the complainants, according to the judgment of the court; and their Government shall equally cause payment of the same to be made within twelve months from the time when such judgment shall have been pronounced.

ARTICLE VIII. Copies of this convention and of the laws of both countries which are or may be in force for the prohibition and suppression of the African slave trade shall be furnished to every commander of the national vessels of either party charged with the execution of those laws; and in case any such commanding officer shall be accused by either of the two Governments of having deviated, in any respect, from the provisions of this convention and the instructions of his own Government in conformity thereto, the Government to which such complaint shall be addressed agrees hereby to make inquiry into the circumstances of the case, and to inflict on the officer complained of, in the event of his appearing to deserve it, a punishment adequate to his transgression.

ARTICLE IX. The high contracting parties declare that the right which, in the foregoing articles, they have each reciprocally conceded, of detaining, visiting, capturing and delivering over for trial, the merchant vessels of the other engaged in the African slave trade, is wholly and exclusively grounded on the consideration of their having made that traffic piracy by their respective laws; and further, that the reciprocal concession of the said right, as guarded, limited and regulated by this convention, shall not be construed so as to authorize the detention or search of the merchant vessels of either nation by the officers of the Navy of the other, except vessels engaged, or suspected to be engaged, in the African slave trade; or for any other purpose whatever than that of seizing and delivering up the persons and vessels concerned in that traffic for trial and adjudication by the tribunals and laws of their own country, nor to be taken to affect in any other way the existing rights of either of the high contracting parties. And they do also hereby agree and engage to use their influence, respectively, with other maritime and civilized powers, to the end that the African slave trade may be declared to be piracy under the law of nations.

ARTICLE X. It is further agreed by the contracting parties that it shall be allowed and free to either of them to renounce this convention, and all the rights and liabilities created by it, at any time, on giving six months' notice thereof to the other contracting party.

ARTICLE XI. The present convention, consisting of eleven articles, shall be ratified, and the ratifications exchanged in the city of Washington within the term of six months from the signature hereof, or sooner, if possible.

In witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the same, and affixed thereunto their seals.

Done at the city of Bogota, this tenth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, of the Independence of the United States of America the forty-ninth, and of the Independence of the Republic of Colombia the fourteenth.

SIR: On the 8th and 21st of September last I had the honor of receiving, from the Department of State, two letters, in which my good offices were requested in behalf of certain individuals, of the State of Maine, engaged in the fishing trade, who desired redress and reparation for injury done them by the seizure of their vessels, by his Majesty's sloop Dotterel, while employed in cruising on the coasts of his Majesty's North American possessions.

I informed you, sir, in reply to these communications, that I should forthwith address an application to the British naval commander-in-chief on the North American station, recommending that a full and impartial investigation should be instituted into the various cases which formed the grounds of complaint on the part of the American Government.

I have the honor to transmit to you, herewith, copies of a correspondence which took place, in consequence of my application, between Captain Hoare, commanding his Majesty's sloop Dotterel, and Rear Admiral Lake, in reference to the cases set forth in your letters above mentioned. The depositions of the officers and men concerned in the capture of the Rebecca, Ruby, Reindeer, William, Galeon, Pilgrim, and Hero—vessels therein enumerated—are also annexed.

By a perusal of these documents it will, I trust, sir, most conclusively appear to you that the complainants have no just ground of accusation against the officers of the Dotterel, nor are entitled to reparation for the loss they have sustained; that, on the contrary, they rendered themselves, by the wilful irregularity of their own conduct, justly obnoxious to the severity exercised against them, having been taken, some flagrante delicto, and others in such a position, and under such circumstances, as rendered it absolutely impossible that they could have had any other intention than that of pursuing their avocations as fishermen within the lines laid down by treaty as forming the boundaries within which such pursuit was interdicted to them.

With regard to the charge preferred against Captain Hoare, of his having converted detained American vessels, prior to their adjudication in the courts, into tenders for assisting him in his operations against the vessels of the same country, I have only to observe, that that officer broadly, and in the most explicit terms, denies ever having committed or authorized one such act; and in respect to the other accusation, adduced by the complainants, of maltreatment by the British officers of those persons whose vessels had been detained, I trust that a perusal of the inclosed papers will make it equally clear to you that that charge is entirely unfounded.

I cannot but apprehend, sir, that the acrimony with which the proceedings of Captain Hoare have been viewed by the citizens of the State of Maine, employed in the fishing trade on the British North American coasts, may be justly ascribed to the circumstance of the recent substitution of vigilance, on the part of British cruisers, for the laxity which appears to have prevailed heretofore, in guarding those coasts from the intrusions of foreign fishermen and smugglers; and I doubt not that, if those persons could be prevailed upon to confine themselves within the limits prescribed to them by treaty, no cause of dissension or complaint would ever arise between the individuals or vessels of the two nations.

It remains for me to observe, that, in one case, in which, by the ignorance of the midshipman employed in the service, the territory of the United States had been violated, by the pursuit and seizure of an American vessel within the American boundaries, Captain Hoare made all the reparation in his power for his officer's misconduct, by delivering up to the Americans the boat which had been detained and paying all the expenses incident to her detention.

I have the honor to be, with distinguished consideration, sir, your most obedient humble servant,
H. U. ADDINGTON.

Evidence of Mr. Touzeau, midshipman, and the crew of the yawl boat belonging to his Majesty's sloop Dotterel, relative to the detention of the American schooner Rebecca.

Mr. Touzeau, midshipman, examined relative to the detention of the American schooner Rebecca.

Question. Were you in the yawl when Mr. Jones detained the American schooner Rebecca?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you know Mr. Jones' reason for detaining her?

Answer. Mr. Jones went down to board an English schooner, and one of the men who was on board, by the name of Wright, as pilot, belonging to an American schooner, told Mr. Jones that his vessel came in for wood and water, at which Mr. Jones appeared to be satisfied; and, on leaving the schooner, saw the American schooner getting under way; ran down and fired several shot across her bows to bring her to; she not heaving to, chased her across the Bay of Fundy. About 8 p. m. of the same day lost sight of her. Some days after, observed the same schooner at anchor near Gull Cove, cleaning fish and heaving the gurry overboard. Mr. Jones detained her, and she was subsequently taken to St. John's.

Question. How was the weather?

Answer. Perfectly clear and fine weather, with a moderate breeze.

Question. Was it fair wind to the fishing ground?

Answer. Yes; we sailed in that direction.

Thomas Richardson examined.

Question. Do you remember the circumstances relative to the detention of the American schooner Rebecca?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate all you know about her.

Answer. When we first intended to board her she made sail from us; we then chased her over to the Nova Scotia shore, where we lost sight of her about 11 p. m. About three or four days after, we again saw her at the Grand Menan, lying about a mile from the shore, cleaning fish, throwing the gurry overboard. Mr. Jones then detained her, and carried her to St. John's.

Question. Where was she lying?

Answer. In some harbor at the Menan; but cannot recollect the name.

Question. What quantity of wood and water do you think she had on board?

Answer. About three or four forty-gallon casks, and about two cords of wood.

Question. How was the weather when you boarded her?

Answer. Fine weather and clear, with a moderate breeze.

Question. Do you know whether the wind was fair for the fishing ground?

Answer. Yes; the wind was fair.

Felix Shaw, private marine, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooner Rebecca?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate what you know about her.

Answer. She came to anchor with another schooner in a small harbor in the Grand Menan. While we were lying there, the foretopsail schooner got under way, and we boarded her. While on board of her, the other weighed and made sail. We then made sail after her, and chased her across the Bay of Fundy over to the Nova Scotia shore, where we lost her after dark. Some days after, we saw her again, at anchor within a mile of the shore, near Gull Cove, throwing the gurry overboard. Mr. Jones seized her and took her to St. John's.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had she on board?

Answer. I do not recollect.

Question. How was the weather when you detained her?

Answer. The weather was fine and clear, with a light breeze.

Question. Was the wind fair for the fishing ground?

Answer. I do not know the position of the fishing ground.

James Lloyd, private marine, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he seized the American schooner Rebecca?

Answer. Yes, I was.

Question. Relate what you know about the detention of her.

Answer. While lying at anchor in the harbor—I believe the Grand Menan—I saw the schooner come in and anchor. While Mr. Jones was boarding another vessel under English colors, observed the master and two men go off to the schooner, and immediately got under way. When they got round the point of land, lost sight of her.

Question. Where were you when you lost sight of her?

Answer. On shore, cooking the boat's crew's provisions.

Question. How do you know it was the master who went on board the vessel?

Answer. The people at the store told me so, and said he had been there frequently, and had asked them for water, which they had refused him. His reply was, if he could not have it by fair play, he would be damned if he would not have it by foul.

Question. When did you again see the schooner?

Answer. I never saw her again.

Question. When did you rejoin the yawl?

Answer. Next morning.

Question. Do you remember the schooner Rebecca being detained?

Answer. I was put on board a vessel, and, with the rest of the crew, carried her to St. John's. I believe her name was Rebecca, but am not certain.

Question. Do you remember when this vessel was detained?

Answer. I do not exactly recollect, but believe it to be a week or more after rejoining the yawl.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had she on board?

Answer. I believe there was then a half hogshead three parts full, and a considerable quantity of wood.

Question. How was the weather?

Answer. Quite fine and clear, with moderate breezes.

Question. Do you know the position of the fishing ground?

Answer. I do not.

John Cammish, (S.,) examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl when Mr. Jones detained the American schooner Rebecca?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate all you know about her.

Answer. The first time I saw her she was at anchor in a small harbor in the Grand Menan; and when we made after her, she got under way, and we chased her, keeping her in sight, till about 11 p. m., when we lost sight of her on the Nova Scotia shore.

Question. Did you see her again afterwards?

Answer. Yes, about three days afterwards.

Question. Relate where she was then, and what she was doing.

Answer. She was lying in a small harbor, about four or five miles from Gull Cove, cleaning her fish.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had she on board?

Answer. She had plenty of both when we detained her.

Question. Do you know the quantity in casks?

Answer. Two and a half hogsheads.

Question. How was the weather when you boarded her?

Answer. Fine weather, with a little breeze.

Question. Do you know how the wind was?

Answer. I am not positive, but believe it was from the northwest.

Question. Were you in the yawl when Mr. Jones seized the American schooner Rebecca?

Answer. Yes, I was.

Question. Relate the circumstances.

Answer. She came in and anchored while we were lying in the Grand Menan, when, going to board her, she got under way and made sail; we chased her across the Bay of Fundy, over to the Nova Scotia shore, where we lost sight of her about 11 p. m. Three days afterwards we again saw her at anchor near Beal's Passage, cleaning her fish and heaving the gurry overboard. We boarded her and took her to Gull Cove.

Question. What distance was she from the land when she was taken possession of?

Answer. About a quarter of a mile.

Question. Did you hear Mr. Jones ask what they were doing there?

Answer. Yes, and said they came in for water.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had they on board?

Answer. About two barrels and a half of water, and about a cord or a cord and a half of wood.

Question. How was the weather when you boarded her?

Answer. Fine, clear weather, with little breezes.

Question. Do you remember if it was a fair wind for the fishing ground?

Answer. Yes, it was.

William Vickery, marine, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl when Mr. Jones seized the American schooner Rebecca?

Answer. Yes, I was.

Question. Relate what you remember respecting her.

Answer. On boarding an English schooner, at or near Gull Cove, we saw another laying there; while going on board observed another getting under way, and made sail; we chased her across the Bay of Fundy, and lost sight of her between 9 and 10 o'clock p. m.

Question. When did you again see the schooner?

Answer. About three or four days afterwards, at anchor within Gull Cove, within half a mile of land, cleaning fish; Mr. Jones boarded her and took possession of her.

Question. Did Mr. Jones ask what they were doing there?

Answer. Yes, he did, and they said they came for wood and water.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had they on board?

Answer. I believe, about a barrel and a half of water, and about a cord and a half of wood.

Question. How did you know it was the Rebecca?

Answer. I was informed by one of the crew that it was the same vessel we chased across the bay, and that they would have hove to, but did not know we were in chase of them; and that the captain said had he not returned, but made the best of his way home, he should not have been taken.

Question. Did you fire at her to bring her to?

Answer. Yes; I was ordered by Mr. Jones to fire across her bows, and I fired several times.

Question. How was the weather when you detained her?

Answer. Fine weather, with a nice breeze.

Question. Do you know if it was a fair wind to the fishing ground?

Answer. No, I do not.

John Lloyd, (S.,) examined

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he seized the American schooner Rebecca?

Answer. Yes, I was.

Question. Relate what you know of the circumstances.

Answer. When lying in Gull Cove, I heard two or three men, who I believe were fishermen belonging to the island of Grand Menan, say that the schooner we had chased across the Bay of Fundy, two or three days before, was then at anchor between two islands, about a mile and a half around the point. We boarded her and detained her. She was then cleaning fish.

Question. Did you hear Mr. Jones ask what they were doing there?

Answer. Yes, they said they came in for wood, water, and to land their gurry.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had they on board?

Answer. They had as much wood as would last them for a fortnight, and a full cask of water on deck, and some below, but cannot say how much, besides beer.

Question. How was the weather when you detained her?

Answer. It was fine weather, with a moderate breeze.

John Cheese, (S.,) examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl when Mr. Jones detained the American schooner Rebecca?

Answer. Yes, I was.

Question. Relate what you recollect relative to the detention of her.

Answer. We were lying alongside a wharf in a harbour in the Menan, and observed two schooners at anchor under the land. We went out and boarded an English schooner, on board of which was a man belonging to the Rebecca, acting as pilot; while on board the schooner got under way and ran across the Bay of Fundy. We gave chase to her, and fired several shots across her bows to bring her to; at about half past 10 o'clock p. m. lost sight of her; on the fourth day afterwards we again fell in with her at anchor in a narrow passage in the Menan, boarded her and found them cleaning their fish, and throwing the gurry overboard. Mr. Jones asked what they were doing there; they said they had come in for wood and water.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had they on board?

Answer. Two quarter casks full on deck and some in the hold, but do not know the quantity, and had about a cord and a half of wood.

Question. How was the weather when you detained her?

Answer. Fine weather and a light breeze.

Question. Do you know if the wind was fair for going to the fishing ground?

Answer. Yes, it was.

We, the undersigned, have examined the aforesaid persons, belonging to his Majesty's sloop Dotterel, taking the minutes of their depositions respecting the detention of the American fishing schooner Rebecca; and we do declare that their evidence has been taken in a very impartial manner, and the persons aforesaid have not been biased in any way whatever.

JOHN COOKE,
Senior Lieutenant of his Majesty's sloop Dotterel.
JAMES AZZARD,
Purser of his Majesty's sloop Dotterel.

Evidence of Mr. Touzeau, midshipman, and the crew of the yawl boat belonging to his Majesty's sloop Dotterel, relative to the detention of the American fishing schooner "William."

Mr. Touzeau, midshipman, examined relative to the detention of the American schooner "William:"
Question. Were you in the yawl when Mr. Jones detained the American schooner "William?"

Answer. Yes.

Question. State the particulars.

Answer. Mr. Jones sent me with James Lloyd, marine, on a point of land to look out; we saw two or three vessels working up; observed one of them anchor in the Gull Cove. Mr. Jones went out in the small boat to board her; he hailed us to come alongside in the yawl, which we did, and found Mr. Jones had detained her. We then took their fish knives from them, having heard by some people, both on shore and on board some English vessels, that they would oppose us in boarding. We unbent her sails and took them with us in the yawl; also her boat.

Question. Do you know Mr. Jones' reason for taking her boat?

Answer. Yes; to prevent her crew going on shore to exchange fish for rum, knowing that another American fishing vessel had done the like with Mr. Fowler, at Gull Cove, the same day; also, to prevent their getting water, as the American fishermen generally make that a pretext for coming in.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had she on board?

Answer. I cannot say the exact quantity, but there was sufficient for her crew and ours to carry her to St. Andrew's, at which place we did not arrive till several days after her detention.

Question. How was the weather?

Answer. Very fine, with a moderate breeze; but after she anchored it came on foggy.

Thomas Richardson examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooner "William?"

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate all you know respecting her.

Answer. I went with Mr. Jones in the small boat to board her; went below and overhauled what quantity of wood and water she had on board.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had she?

Answer. About sixty gallons of water below and thirty on deck, and about a cord and a half of wood.

Question. How was the weather?

Answer. The weather was moderate and hazy, but after she anchored it came on foggy.

James Lloyd, marine, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl when Mr. Jones detained the American schooner "William?"

Answer. I cannot recollect the vessel's name, having detained several.

Felix Shaw, marine, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl when Mr. Jones detained the American schooner "William?"

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate the circumstances you know about her.

Answer. I cannot recollect any of the particulars, as we detained several.

John Cammish, seaman, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl when Mr. Jones detained the American schooner "William?"

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate what you know of the circumstances.

Answer. It is so long since I cannot recollect the particulars.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooner "William?"

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate what you know respecting her detention.

Answer. When we fell in with the "William" she was lying in Gull Cove. Mr. Jones asked what they were doing there. They said they came in for wood and water. Mr. Jones detained her, unbent her sails, and took them with us on shore in the yawl, and likewise took their small boat with us.

Question. Do you know the reason why Mr. Jones unbent her sails?

Answer. To prevent her, I believe, from going to sea during the night.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had she on board?

Answer. About three barrels of water and a cord of wood.

Question. How was the weather?

Answer. Fine weather, with a light breeze.

Question. Do you know the position of the fishing ground?

Answer. I do not know the bearing of it by compass, but I could see the vessels at anchor on the fishing ground.

Question. Was the wind fair for going on it?

Answer. Yes, it was.

Question. Were you in the small boat when Mr. Jones boarded her?

Answer. Yes, I was.

Question. Did you hear the master of the vessel assign any reason for coming in there?

Answer. He said they came in for wood and water.

William Vickery, marine, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl when Mr. Jones detained the American schooner William?

Answer. Yes, I was.

Question. Relate what you know respecting her detention.

Answer. I observed a schooner come in and anchor within a mile of the shore. Mr. Jones went out to board her, and brought her in the cove and anchored.

Question. Were you on board the schooner?

Answer. Yes.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had she on board?

Answer. I know there was two barrels, but cannot say whether there was any more; was not down in the hold, and cannot say what wood there was.

Question. How do you know it was the William?

Answer. I saw the "William, of Addison," on her stern.

John Lloyd, seaman, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl when Mr. Jones detained the American schooner William?

Answer. Yes, I was.

Question. Relate the particulars.

Answer. I was, with the greater part of the crew, encamped on a point of land; observed a schooner come in and anchor. She was boarded, but cannot recollect whether it was by Mr. Jones or Mr. Touzeau.

Question. Were you on board the schooner?

Answer. Yes, I was. I went off and assisted in unbending her sails.

Question. Do you remember what quantity of wood and water she had on board?

Answer. I do not perfectly recollect the quantity, but there was one cask handed up half full, which they said they were going to get filled on shore, but were prevented by Mr. Jones.

Question. Did you hear any of the crew say their reason for coming in?

Answer. Yes, for wood and water.

Question. How was the weather?

Answer. Fine weather and a fresh breeze.

John Cheese, seaman, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooner William?

Answer. Yes, I was.

Question. Relate all you know about her.

Answer. I was sick in a tent on shore, and do not know any of the particulars.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooner William?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate all you know of the particulars.

Answer. I went on board with Mr. Jones, in the small boat, to examine her. Mr. Jones detained her, unbent her sails and took them on shore.

Question. Do you know what wood and water she had on board?

Answer. I cannot say.

Question. Did you drink any of the water on board of her?

Answer. Yes, I did.

Question. How was the weather?

Answer. Fine, with a strong breeze.

We, the undersigned, have examined the aforesaid persons, belonging to his Majesty's sloop Dotterel, taken the minutes of their depositions respecting the detention of the American fishing schooner William; and we do declare that their evidence has been taken in a very impartial manner, and that the persons aforesaid have not been biased in any way whatsoever.

JOHN COOKE,

Senior Lieutenant of his Majesty's sloop Dotterel.

JAS. AZZARD,

Purser of his Majesty's sloop Dotterel.

Evidence of Mr. Touzeau, midshipman, and the crew of the yawl boat belonging to his Majesty's sloop Dotterel, relative to the detention of the American fishing schooner Galeon.

Question. Were you in the yawl when Mr. Jones detained the American schooner Galeon?

Answer. Yes, I was.

Question. Relate the particulars respecting her detention?

Answer. While at Gull Cove, Mr. Jones went out one evening in a small boat to cruise. About 11 p. m. Mr. Jones returned with an American schooner which he had detained. Next morning, about 8 o'clock, Mr. Jones sent me on board the Galeon to take charge of her; about 9 o'clock we got under way, and made sail for St. Andrew's.

Question. Do you know Mr. Jones' reason for detaining her?

Answer. I believe for their having broken the treaty; but do not know the particulars, as I was left on shore in charge of the yawl.

Question. How was the weather?

Answer. I believe it was a fine clear night.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had she on board?

Answer. I cannot state the quantity; but we used from it for some days after her detention.

Question. How was the wind?

Answer. From the northward, and I think north by west.

Thomas Richardson examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooner Galeon?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate what you know respecting her detention.

Answer. I went in a small boat with Mr. Jones, and pulled out of Gull Cove; boarded two English schooners, who informed us that an American schooner was lying under the land, which vessel we boarded, and found the crew below asleep. Mr. Jones asked them what they came in for; their reply was, for wood and water, and that they had got it that afternoon. Mr. Jones then asked them their reason for not going away; they said they were waiting for wind and tide. We then got her under way, and ran her to Gull Cove, which place lay between us and the fishing ground.

Question. Do you know the position of the fishing ground?

Answer. Yes; I could see it from Gull Cove.

Question. Was the wind fair for the Galeon to proceed to the banks?

Answer. Yes, it was.

Question. Do you know the passage from Gull Cove to the fishing banks?

Answer. Yes; a clear passage outside the Black Kedge towards the banks.

Question. What kind of weather was it?

Answer. Very fine and clear, with moderate breezes.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had the Galeon on board?

Answer. I do not know the quantity; but observed three or four casks, and a quantity of wood.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooner Galeon?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate the particulars respecting her detention.

Answer. I went with Mr. Jones in a small boat in the afternoon, (the day of the month I do not remember) and boarded an English schooner, where we were informed an American fishing schooner was lying under the land. We boarded her, and found the crew all below; Mr. Jones asked them their reason for being there; they replied, they came in for wood and water. He then asked them why they did not go away when they had got it. They said they were going at daylight. We detained the schooner, and took her to Gull Cove, and on the following morning got under way for St. Andrew's.

Question. Do you know the position of the fishing banks?

Answer. Yes; I could see the vessel on the banks.

Question. Was the wind fair for the Galeon to proceed to the banks?

Answer. Yes; for the banks lie nearly in a line with Gull Cove, from where we detained the Galeon.

Question. On what quarter was the wind when you ran towards Gull Cove?

Answer. Very near before the wind; we came close to the Cove, and then we hauled up into the Cove.

Question. How was the weather?

Answer. Fine, clear weather, and fresh breezes.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had the Galeon on board when detained?

Answer. She had two casks of water on deck, and a great quantity of wood.

Felix Shaw, marine, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooner Galeon?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate the particulars.

Answer. I was one of the crew of the small boat that went out with Mr. Jones in the afternoon, (the day of the month I do not recollect;) boarded an English schooner near Gull Cove, who said that we had better keep a good lookout, or we should get a good handspiking from the American schooner then lying in shore. We shortly after boarded the American schooner Galeon. Mr. Jones asked them what they were doing there. They said they came in for wood and water, and had got it that afternoon. Mr. Jones asked them if they had their wood and water, why they had not gone to sea. Their reply was, they did not think it worth while to go to sea that night, and the master requested Mr. Jones to let him go that time, and he would not come in again. We then got under way, and took her to Gull Cove for that night. One of the crew was very abusive. We afterwards carried her to St. Andrew's.

Question. Do you know the position of the fishing grounds?

Answer. No, I do not.

Question. How was the wind when you ran for Gull Cove?

Answer. A fair wind, and fine, clear weather.

John Lloyd, seaman, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooner Galeon?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate the particulars respecting her detention.

Answer. When at Gull Cove we observed a schooner run in and anchor. We boarded her in the small boat, which proved to be English. They told us that the Galeon, American fishing schooner, was lying at an anchorage then about three or four miles off. We then left the English schooner and boarded the Galeon. I was left as boat keeper, and cannot state what passed on board. Shortly after she was got under way and ran to Gull Cove. One of the crew of the Galeon was very abusive to us. She was afterwards taken to St. Andrew's by Mr. Jones.

Question. Do you know the position of the fishing ground?

Answer. No, I do not.

Question. How was the wind for Gull Cove?

Answer. A fair wind.

Question. How was the weather?

Answer. Fine, clear weather.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had the Galeon on board?

Answer. I do not know.

James Lloyd, marine, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooner Galeon?

Answer. I was in the yawl when he detained some American fishing schooners, but cannot recollect their names.

John Cammish, seaman, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooner Galeon?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate what you know respecting her.

Answer. It is so long since that I cannot recollect any particulars.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooner Galeon?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate what you know respecting her detention.

Answer. I was left in a tent on shore at Gull Cove, and recollect Mr. Jones going out in a small boat and bringing the Galeon into Gull Cove.

Question. How was the weather?

Answer. Fine weather, with a light breeze.

Question. Did you go in the Galeon to St. Andrew's?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you know what quantity of wood and water she had on board?

Answer. She had four casks of water, and about two cords of wood.

John Cheese, seaman, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooner Galeon?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate all you know respecting her detention.

Answer. I cannot state the particulars, as I was in a tent sick on shore.

William Vickery, marine, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooner Galeon?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate what you know respecting her detention.

Answer. I was left on shore in the tent; Mr. Jones went out in the small boat, and brought in the Galeon in the evening.

Question. How was the weather?

Answer. Fine weather.

Question. Were you one of the crew that took the Galeon to St. Andrew's?

Answer. Yes.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had she on board?

Answer. Two casks of water on deck and one in the hold, and plenty of wood.

We, the undersigned, have examined the aforesaid persons, belonging to his Majesty's sloop Dotterel, taking the minutes of their depositions respecting the detention of the American fishing schooner Galeon; and we do declare that their evidence has been taken in a very impartial manner, and that they have not been biased in any way whatever.

JOHN COOKE,
Senior Lieut. of his Majesty's sloop Dotterel.
JAS. AZZARD,
Purser of his Majesty's sloop Dotterel.
RICHARD HOARE, Commander.

Evidence of the crew of the Dotterel's tender, relative to the detention of the American fishing schooners Hero and Pilgrim.

Question. Were you in the Dotterel's tender with Mr. S. R. Protheroe when he detained the American fishing schooners Hero and Pilgrim?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate the particulars respecting their detention.

Answer. I first saw the Pilgrim about two miles from the land, fishing; made the best of our way to close her, and boarded her, having live fish on her deck. Mr. Protheroe asked them what business they had to fish in our waters. They replied they thought it was not in our waters. Mr. Protheroe then said, "I shall detain you and take you to St. John's." I was directed by Mr. Protheroe to take charge of the Pilgrim, with another seaman, and to follow him; I afterwards observed the tender board another schooner, which proved to be the Hero.

Question. What distance was the Hero from the land when Mr. Protheroe boarded her?

Answer. About two miles.

Question. State what followed after leaving the Menan.

Answer. We anchored in Beaver harbor with the Hero and tender, and afterwards proceeded the same day and anchored in Mason's Bay. Late one evening Mr. Protheroe sent us our evening's grog, and my having the middle watch I went below and laid down on the lockers to sleep. In the middle of the night I was awoke by the motion of the vessel and endeavored to get on deck, but could not, as the companion hatch was secured down against me. I then forced it open and went on deck, and found the vessel under way in the possession of the Americans. The seaman with me refusing his assistance, I was obliged to submit, and forcibly carried to Lubec, where they allowed me to go on shore. From thence I made the best of my way to St. John's and rejoined the Dotterel.

Question. Did you at any time hear Mr. Protheroe make use of any abusive language to the Americans?

Answer. No.

Question. Did you hear or know that Mr. Protheroe at any time compelled the Americans to assist in working the vessel?

Answer. No; but they did assist of their own free will.

John Donovan, seaman, examined.

Question. Were you in the Dotterel's tender with Mr. Protheroe when he detained the American schooners Hero and Pilgrim?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate all the particulars you know relative to their detention?

Answer. We fell in with the Pilgrim while running into the Menans. I think she was about a mile and a half from the land; saw them hauling up fish, and, on boarding her, found live fish on her deck. Mr. Protheroe said he should detain her for fishing in our waters. We sent two men on board her to take charge. We then made sail for another schooner, which proved to be the Hero. When we boarded her she was about a mile and a half from the land, with lines overboard, fishing, and had live fish in the hold. Mr. Protheroe asked them what they had been doing close in shore with their sails down. A man named Wilson said they had been cleaning fish on shore. I was sent on board the Hero, with another man, to take charge, and to follow the tender and Pilgrim, which we did, anchoring each night till our arrival in Mason's Bay, at which place the Pilgrim made her escape in the night. We afterwards proceeded, anchoring each night, till we arrived at St. John's.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had the Hero on board?

Answer. Two casks of water and some wood; the quantity I cannot say.

Question. Did you at any time hear Mr. Protheroe make use of any abusive language towards the Americans?

Answer. No, I did not.

Question. Did Mr. Protheroe compel any Americans to work?

Answer. No, not to my knowledge; but they continued assisting the working of the vessel with their own free will.

Thomas Cassidy, seaman, examined.

Question. Were you in the Dotterel's tender with Mr. Protheroe when he detained the American schooners Hero and Pilgrim?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate all the particulars?

Answer. We were running in for the Menan and boarded the Pilgrim, American schooner, about a mile or a mile and a quarter from the land, fishing. Mr. Protheroe asked what business they had fishing there, as they were within three miles of the land. The answer was, they did not know they were within the limits. Mr. Protheroe detained her, and put two men on board to take charge, and we proceeded to board another schooner, which proved to be the Hero, about two miles from the land.

Question. Did you hear Mr. Protheroe ask the master of the Hero if he could assign any reason for being so near the land with her sails down?

Answer. Yes, but did not hear the reply.

Question. What became of the Hero?

Answer. Mr. Protheroe sent two men on board her to take charge, and we proceeded to Mason's Bay, anchoring each night in the tender, with the Hero and Pilgrim in company, at which place the Pilgrim made her escape in the night. Afterwards we proceeded to St. John's in the tender, with the Hero, where she was delivered over to the customs.

Question. Did you at any time hear Mr. Protheroe use any abusive language to the Americans?

Answer. No, I did not.

Question. Did Mr. Protheroe compel the Americans in the tender to work?

Answer. No, he did not, but they sometimes voluntarily assisted in working the tender.

Question. Did you, at any time, know Mr. Protheroe to put the Americans on one meal a day, or know them to fare worse than the tender's crew?

Answer. No, we all messed alike, having the allowance of the British Navy, excepting spirits, for part of the time, which was all used, and I know Mr. Protheroe to have frequently given them rum from his own private stock.

Thomas Russel, seaman, examined.

Question. Were you in the Dotterel's tender with Mr. Protheroe when he detained the American schooners Hero and Pilgrim?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate the particulars.

Answer. In running from Grand Passage to Grand Menan, observed two schooners lying at anchor, one of which got under way and stood in shore. We made the best of our way to close her. I observed her with lines overboard, fishing. We then boarded her, which proved to be the Pilgrim, American fishing schooner. She had at the time live fish on her deck. Mr. Protheroe detained her, and put two hands on board to take charge, she then being within a mile of the shore. Observed another schooner make sail from in shore, from the northward; stood for her, fired, brought to, and boarded the American fishing schooner Hero. Mr. Protheroe then asked the master what they had been doing in shore; a man named Wilson said, we have been on shore cleaning fish. Mr. Protheroe detained her. On our way to St. John's anchored under the Eastern Wolves; as we were going in, observed two schooners about a mile off us. Mr. Protheroe hailed the Pilgrim for her boat, which was brought to us in the tender by a boy, who requested Mr. Protheroe to be allowed to pull him on board the aforesaid schooners. Mr. Protheroe, with a man and the boy, proceeded to board these vessels. We then, with the Hero and Pilgrim in company, proceeded for St. John's, anchoring each night till we arrived in Mason's Bay, where the Pilgrim effected her escape during the night. Afterwards we proceeded in the tender, Hero in company, to St. John's, where the Hero was delivered up to the custom-house.

Question. Did you, at any time, hear Mr. Protheroe make use of abusive language to the Americans?

Answer. No.

Question. Did you, at any time, hear Mr. Protheroe threaten to ill-use or maltreat the Americans on board the tender?

Answer. No, I did not.

Question. Did Mr. Protheroe compel the Americans to work in the tender?

Answer. No, but they did sometimes assist voluntarily.

Question. Did you, at any time, know Mr. Protheroe to put the Americans on one meal a day, or know them to fare worse than the tender's crew?

Answer. No. Mr. Protheroe never interfered about the prisoners, and we all messed alike, having the established allowance of the British Navy, excepting spirits for part of the time, which had been all used; and I know Mr. Protheroe to have frequently given them rum from his own private stock.

Samuel Goodanew, marine, examined.

Question. Were you in the Dotterel's tender with Mr. Protheroe when he detained the American schooners Hero and Pilgrim?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate all the particulars respecting their detention.

Answer. In standing over from Grand Passage to Grand Menan, observed two schooners at anchor, one of which got under way and stood in shore; made the best of our way and boarded the Pilgrim about two miles from the land, to the best of my judgment. I did not go on board of her, but she was detained by Mr. Protheroe, and two hands put on board to take charge. We then made sail and boarded the Hero, then about a mile and a half from the shore. Mr. Protheroe inquired what they had been doing in shore with their sails down. A man by the name of Wilson said, they had been on shore cleaning their fish. Mr. Protheroe detained her, and put two hands on board to take charge. Proceeded, anchoring each night, to the Eastern Wolves. In going in, observed two schooners about two miles from us; took the Pilgrim's small boat and boarded them. Mr. Protheroe, myself, and the American boy, who [we] brought on board the boat, who was allowed to go by his own request. We then proceeded to Mason's Bay, anchoring each night, with the Hero and Pilgrim in company, at which place the Pilgrim got away during the night. We afterwards proceeded to St. John's, with the Hero in company, which vessel was delivered to the custom-house at that place.

Question. Did you, at any time, hear Mr. Protheroe make use of any abusive language to the Americans?

Answer. No, I did not. I must have heard it had it taken place, as I never left the tender.

Question. Did Mr. Protheroe compel the Americans in the tender to work?

Answer. No, they sometimes assisted with their own consent.

Question. Did you, at any time, hear Mr. Protheroe threaten to ill-use or maltreat the Americans on board the tender?

Answer. No, I did not, but must have heard it had it happened.

Question. Did you, at any time, know Mr. Protheroe to put the Americans on one meal a day, or to fare worse than the tender's crew?

Answer. No. We messed all alike, having the established allowance of the British Navy, excepting spirits, which we drank during the bad weather. I know Mr. Protheroe to have given them spirits from his own stock. I was the person who attended Mr. Protheroe, and gave the spirits to them myself, by his direction.

John Wake, mariner, examined.

Question. Were you in the Dotterel's tender when Mr. Protheroe detained the American schooners Hero and Pilgrim?

Answer. Yes, I was.

Question. Relate all the particulars respecting their detention.

Answer. In running from Grand Passage to the Grand Menan, observed two schooners lying at anchor; one of which got under way and stood in shore, which vessel was chased; observed her fishing and hauling live fish in; boarded her, which proved to be the American schooner Pilgrim. She had, at the time, live fish on her deck. Mr. Protheroe detained her, and put on board two hands to take charge of her, she then being about two miles from the shore, to the best of my judgment. We then chased another schooner which had made sail in from shore; boarded her, then about a mile and a half from the land; proved to be the Hero, American fishing schooner. Mr. Protheroe asked them what they were doing in shore; a man by the name of Wilson said they had been on shore cleaning their fish. Mr. Protheroe detained her, and put two hands on board in charge of her. We then proceeded with the schooner to Mason's Bay, anchoring each night, when the Pilgrim made her escape in the night. We then proceeded to St. John's in the tender, with the Hero in company, at which place she was delivered over to the custom-house.

Question. Did you, at any time, hear Mr. Protheroe make use of any abusive language to the Americans on board the tender?

Answer. No, I did not.

Question. Did Mr. Protheroe compel the Americans in the tender to work?

Answer. No, he did not; they helped to work the tender by their own accord.

Question. Did you know Mr. Protheroe ill-use or maltreat the Americans on board the tender?

Answer. No.

Question. Did you know him put the Americans on one meal a day, or fare worse than the tender's crew?

Answer. No, they ate and drank with us. We had the established allowance of the British Navy, except spirits, part of the time, which had been used during the bad weather. I recollect, once, Mr. Protheroe giving them a part from his own private stock.

John Cole, seaman, examined.

Question. Were you in the Dotterel's tender with Mr. Protheroe when he detained the American schooners Hero and Pilgrim?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate all the particulars you know respecting their detention?

Answer. When running from Grand Passage to the Grand Menan, observed a schooner about two miles from the land, fishing. We boarded her, which proved to be the Pilgrim, American fishing schooner. I saw live fish on her deck. Mr. Protheroe detained her, and put two hands on board to take charge of her. We then made sail and boarded another schooner, the Hero. Mr. Protheroe detained her also.

Question. Do you know what Mr. Protheroe detained her for?

Answer. No, I do not. I did not hear any questions put, as I was getting my clothes to go on board the Hero. We then made sail, in company with the tender and Pilgrim, and proceeded to Mason's Bay, at which place the Pilgrim effected her escape during the night. We afterwards went to St. John's, with the tender and Hero in company, at which place the Hero was delivered over to the custom-house.

We, the undersigned, have examined the aforesaid persons, belonging to his Majesty's sloop Dotterel, taking the minutes of their depositions respecting the detention of the American fishing schooners "Hero" and "Pilgrim;" and we declare that their evidence has been taken in a very impartial manner, and the persons aforesaid have not been biased in any way whatever.

Evidence of Mr. Touzeau, midshipman, and the crew of the yawl boat belonging to his Majesty's sloop Dotterel, relative to the detention of the American fishing schooners "Reindeer" and "Ruby."

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooners Reindeer and Ruby?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate all the particulars relative to their detention?

Answer. I recollect, while in Gull Cove, of having received information, on a Sunday, from some men and a Mr. Franklin that several American fishing vessels were at anchor in Whitehead harbor, and that they anchored there the evening before; that, on their anchoring, one of them fired three muskets, and said they were armed and manned, and would oppose our boarding them. I acquainted Mr. Jones of the information I had received, who went immediately in the small boat to cruise, and returned in the evening. He told me that he had boarded an English fishing schooner (Industry) near Whitehead, who gave him information that several American schooners were at anchor at Two Island harbor, and that they got their wood and water at Whitehead; they fired several muskets on their anchoring, and told the crew of the Industry they would not allow a man-of-war's boat to board them; and, after they completed their wood and water, they shifted to Two Island harbor. We got under way the yawl about 9 o'clock in the evening, and went towards Two Island harbor, and anchored about 2 o'clock in the morning. At daylight we observed several vessels at anchor at Two Island harbor, and shortly after got under way, when we chased them; observed three of them lashed together, and all the crews collected on board the middle one. We ordered them to separate, which at first they refused to do, until Mr. Jones threatened to fire on them. They dropped clear of each other; we boarded them, and detained the American schooners Reindeer and Ruby. Mr. Jones asked the masters of the other two American shallops if they were willing to take the crews of the Reindeer and Ruby on board for a passage home. They answered they were willing to do so. Mr. Jones gave them as much provisions as they chose to take, and put them on board, with the exception of the masters. About 8 o'clock we made sail, Mr. Jones in the Reindeer and myself in the Ruby, for St. Andrew's. While beating up through East Quoddy, about 6 p. m., when abreast the harbor Delute, observed two schooners coming down towards us, full of armed men and wearing American colors, one of them making towards me, and the other to Mr. Jones. The one abreast of me ran alongside and boarded, with about forty-five men with pistols, swords, and muskets, and fixed bayonets. When they got on board they took possession of the Ruby, and took the arms from my crew. One of the men, with his musket and fixed bayonet, made a thrust at one of my men, named James Lloyd, (marine,) but Mr. Howard, leader of their party, parried the thrust off. The man again attempted to knock the marine down with the butt end of his musket, which Mr. Howard again parried off, and ordered him not to use violence against any of my men, as he had got possession of the vessel, and which was all they wanted. They then fired off all their muskets and pistols, which were loaded. I observed the other schooner fire off muskets likewise; then I asked for the arms of my crew, which they gave me. We then shoved off, and left them. After we had left, and rejoined the yawl, they fired several volleys of musketry on board both schooners all the way to Eastport.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had the Ruby on board?

Answer. There were two casks with water on deck; but cannot say whether there was any below, nor can I say what quantity of wood there was on board.

Question. How was the wind?

Answer. A moderate breeze from northwest.

Question. How was the weather?

Answer. Fine, clear weather till we had possession of the schooners, and then it came on foggy, and cleared off again in the afternoon.

Thomas Richardson, seaman, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooners Reindeer and Ruby?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate what you know respecting their detention.

Answer. I remember going in the small boat with Mr. Jones. After pulling some time we launched the boat over a bar, about half a mile broad, between two islands, and afterwards we boarded an English fishing schooner. The crew informed us that the schooners at anchor off Two Island harbor were American fishing vessels, and had, the night before, fired two guns and defied any man-of-war's boat boarding them, and advised us not to attempt to board them in the small boat we were then in. We then returned to Gull Cove, and that night, with the whole of the crew in the yawl, pulled during the whole of that night, and at daylight we were within three miles from four schooners, at anchor, a little more than a mile from shore. We observed them get under way, and three of them lashed alongside each other. Mr. Jones then desired them to separate, which they did not do for some time, when Mr. Jones threatened to fire on them. They then separated, and dropped astern of each other and anchored. We then boarded them, and took possession of the Reindeer and Ruby, and the crews, as I understood, with their own consent, went on board of two other vessels. We then got the Reindeer and Ruby under way, and made sail for St. Andrew's. When in East Quoddy, two schooners came towards us, fired a gun, and hoisted American colors; observed one of the schooners take possession of the Ruby, and the other came close to us and desired us to heave to. I was at the helm when they fired at us, and the shot came close to me and Mr. Jones. There was but one musket on board us, which Payne (a marine) wanted to fire, but Mr. Jones desired him not. I observed the American schooner's deck full of armed men, with muskets, pistols, and carbines. After they fired at us, Mr. Jones gave up the papers to the master of the Reindeer, who held them up in his hand to the Americans, and desired them not to fire, as he had possession of the vessel. We then went in the yawl for St. Andrew's. Some of the Americans would insist on taking the yawl with them. I observed them fire volleys of muskets till after they had anchored the Reindeer and Ruby in Eastport.

Question. How was the weather when Mr. Jones detained the Reindeer and Ruby?

Answer. It was clear weather till after they were detained, when it became foggy.

Question. Do you know what quantity of wood and water the Reindeer had on board?

Answer. The quantity I cannot recollect, but we used from both.

James Lloyd, marine, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooners Reindeer and Ruby?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate the particulars respecting their detention.

Answer. I remember a man, at Gull Cove, giving information of some schooners, (American;) the particulars I do not know. We got under way that evening in the yawl, and pulled all night; after daylight we got close to four schooners, and observed three of them lashed alongside of each other, and the crews of these vessels on board the large one in the centre. Mr. Jones ordered them to separate several times, and at length he said he would fire into them; they were very abusive to us; after a considerable time they separated and we boarded them. Mr. Jones then sent me below to see if there were any fire-arms on board the Reindeer; I found a musket, with a double charge and primed, and two powder horns full of powder, and about twelve or fourteen pistol balls. Mr. Jones detained two of them, with the consent of the masters of the other two vessels and the crew of the two detained; they were allowed to go on board and take what provisions they pleased; the masters of the vessels came on board and took green fish, pork, tea, and butter, molasses, flour, and bread. I was sent, with Mr. Touzeau, on board one of them, and got under way in company with the one Mr. Jones was on board of; and, in the afternoon of the same day, while beating up to St. Andrew's, abreast of Campo Bello, I observed three schooners and two boats; one of the schooners went towards Mr. Jones and fired several muskets; went below to get my dinner, when Mr. Touzeau called us up to our arms, and asked me if my musket was loaded; I told him it was and primed; he told me he thought they were American armed vessels coming to take us. I then asked Mr. Touzeau if I should fire; he said not till he gave me the orders. They came nearly alongside of us, and ordered us to heave to; they presented their muskets, with fixed bayonets, at us, and said, damn your eyes, if you don't heave to we will fire into you. They sung out to the man at the helm if he did not put the helm down and lower the peak they would shoot him dead on the spot. They then came alongside and boarded us, I think about forty men in number, all with muskets and fixed bayonets except one, for our deck was full of armed men. They told me to deliver up my arms or they would run me through; damn your eyes said one; and another said I will blow your brains out. I replied, I am a King's man, and will not deliver up my arms; their leader drew his sword and had a brace of pistols; desired the Americans not to hurt any of us; at that time a man made a thrust at me with fixed bayonet, which their leader parried off; the same man again made a blow at me with the butt end of his musket, which their leader again parried off; then their leader told me that I had better give up my arms, and he would be answerable for them, which I did; about this time they fired volleys of musketry. We then went on board of our boat and observed them continue to fire as they were returning to Eastport.

Question. What kind of weather was it when Mr. Jones detained the Reindeer and Ruby?

Answer. Fine weather, with a light breeze, but came foggy after.

Question. Do you know what quantity of wood and water was in the schooner you were on board of?

Answer. Two casks and a half of water and about a cord of wood.

John Cammish, seaman, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooners Reindeer and Ruby?

Answer. I was.

Question. Relate the particulars.

Answer. I recollect Mr. Jones going out from Gull Cove in the small boat and returned in the evening. I heard him say that he had information of some American schooners. We were ordered to get our things in the yawl from the tent, and went out that evening. We pulled the greater part of the night, and anchored for about an hour and a half. At daylight observed five vessels lying at anchor. When they saw us they got under way. When we came near them one of the vessels dropped her anchor, and two others lashed alongside her; and the crews of these vessels went on board the centre one with their fish spears. Mr. Jones desired them to separate, which they did not do for a considerable time, until Mr. Jones threatened several times to fire into them; they separated, and we boarded the Reindeer, where I remained. Mr. Jones detained her and another vessel. By the wish of the crews of these vessels, and by the consent of the masters of the other two vessels, they were sent on board, with as much provisions as they wished. The masters of the two vessels not detained came on board us in their own boats, and took the crews, with as much provision as they chose, on board. We then got under way; the Reindeer for St. Andrew's, the Ruby in company. In the afternoon of the same day observed two armed vessels. One of them came towards us and gave three cheers and hoisted American colors; they called to us to heave to, and threatened to fire into us. Her decks were full of armed men, with muskets and fixed bayonets; there was also in company a large armed boat. The schooner fired two musket balls across our deck, and then Mr. Jones gave up the papers to the master of the Reindeer, who held them up in his hand and called to the Americans not to fire, as he had possession of the vessel. The American schooner was then about half pistol shot from us. We were then ordered into the yawl by Mr. Jones, and observed them, in going to Eastport, fire volleys of musketry.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had the Reindeer?

Answer. Three barrels of water and a great deal of wood.

Question. What weather was it when the two vessels were detained?

Answer. Fine weather and light winds from northward and westward.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooners Reindeer and Ruby?

Answer. Yes, I was.

Question. Relate the particulars.

Answer. I recollect a man coming to Mr. Jones, at the tent at Gull Cove, and informing him that some American fishing schooners had come into an anchorage not far from us, and fired their muskets, and said they would not allow any man-of-war's boat to board them. They got their wood and water there, and got under way and ran to Two Island harbor; laid there one day and a night. I was left on shore in the tent, and remember Mr. Jones going out in a small boat with four hands, and returned the same afternoon. We got under way that evening in the yawl, and stood for Two Island harbor. The next morning we fell in with four American schooners and one English. When I first saw them they were at anchor, about half a mile from the land, in Two Island harbor. After they saw us they got under way. On our chasing them, we fired to bring them to; but instead of complying, three of them ran alongside each other and lashed together. When we came close to them, Mr. Jones desired them to separate and bring up. They refused to do so, and would not allow us to board, until Mr. Jones repeatedly threatened to fire into them; they dropped clear of each other; we then boarded the Reindeer, and Mr. Jones asked what they were doing there? They said they came in to land their gurry and offal of the fish, and get wood and water. Mr. Jones told them they had time enough to get their wood and water at White island. Mr. Jones detained the Reindeer, and then boarded the Ruby, which vessel he detained also; and I was sent below in the Ruby to search for arms; found none; but found a frying-pan full of hot lead and a spoon in it, and some musket balls quite warm. I asked the master of the Ruby where his arms were? He said he had none, except one fowling-piece. I then asked him where it was. His reply was, he could not say, unless his boy had lost it or stowed it away in the salt room. When I asked their reason for lashing together and running the musket balls, they said they intended to keep us off; with their five-and-thirty men and eight muskets they would easily have done so. I then asked them where their eight muskets were? They answered, they had eight muskets. The masters of the two schooners which were not detained came on board the Ruby and took their crew, with their clothes, and as much provisions as they wished for a passage to their home, by their own wish, and sanction of Mr. Jones. Afterwards we got under way in the Reindeer and Ruby for St. Andrew's; and the same afternoon, between Indian island and Campo Bello, two schooners came towards us full of armed men. The one abreast of the Ruby gave three cheers and hoisted American colors, bore down and ordered us to heave to, which we refused doing until they threatened to fire into us. They came alongside, and boarded with muskets and fixed bayonets, cutlasses and pistols. I do not know the number of men, but our decks were full. They took our arms from us and discharged their own. We then were ordered into our boat, and I observed them firing volleys of musketry going in, and after they had anchored at Eastport.

Question. Did you search the salt room of the Ruby for arms?

Answer. No; I had not time.

Question. How was the weather when the Reindeer and Ruby were detained?

Answer. Fine, clear weather, with a little breeze, but came on foggy afterwards for two hours.

Question. How was the wind?

Answer. I cannot recollect.

William Vickery, marine, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooners Reindeer and Ruby?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate all the particulars you know respecting their detention?

Answer. I recollect going out in the small boat from Gull Cove with Mr. Jones, and, after pulling for a short time, we launched the boat over a bar between two islands, and boarded an English fishing schooner. The crew informed us that two American schooners had anchored the night before, not far from where we laid, and that they fired their muskets and defied any man-of-war's boat to board them. The crew of the English schooner told us that we had better be well armed, as the Americans were prepared for us. We returned to Gull Cove, and in the evening went out with all the crew in the yawl; we pulled till about 4 o'clock in the morning. At daylight observed some schooners at anchor, which vessels, shortly afterwards, got under way; and as we went down towards them, I fired, by the direction of Mr. Jones, to bring them to. As we closed the vessels, three of them lashed alongside each other, and put their crews on board the middle one. Mr. Jones desired them to cast off from each other, which they refused to do for some time, until he threatened to fire into them, when they separated, and we boarded the Reindeer; and Lloyd, a marine, was sent down to search for arms; he found one musket, loaded. Mr. Jones asked the master where the arms were that he saw. He said he had none. Mr. Jones then detained the Reindeer and Ruby; and by the wish of the crews of the vessels, with the exception of the masters, they were put on board the other two Americans not detained, with the consent of the masters, taking with them as much provisions as they chose. We then got under way in the Reindeer, with the Ruby in company. In the afternoon of the same day, when abreast of Campo Bello, I saw two schooners, one of which came towards us, fired a gun, and hoisted American colors, and ordered us to heave to, which we refused to do; and after we tacked they fired across our deck. After this, Mr. Jones delivered up the papers to the master of the Reindeer, who held them up to the Americans, and desired them not to fire. We were then ordered by Mr. Jones into the yawl, and I observed them fire several muskets at a time, and the balls falling into the water, as they were going into Eastport.

Question. What arms had the Americans?

Answer. I observed some men with cross-belts, bright muskets, and fixed bayonets; others with muskets, swords, and pistols.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had the Reindeer on board?

Answer. A cask full below, some on deck, and plenty of wood.

Question. How was the weather when the Reindeer and Ruby were detained?

Answer. Fine weather, with fine breezes.

Question. How was the wind?

Answer. I do not recollect.

Question. Did you search the salt room on board the Reindeer for arms?

Answer. No, I did not.

John Lloyd, seaman, examined.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooners Reindeer and Ruby?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Relate the particulars.

Answer. I went out with Mr. Jones from Gull Cove in a small boat, and, after pulling for some time, we launched the boat over a bar about a quarter of a mile broad, between Two islands, and boarded an English schooner (Industry) of Grand Menan, and I heard the master inform Mr. Jones that some American fishing schooners had been in there on the last Saturday, and discharged three guns, and that several were now lying in a bay further on, when Mr. Jones proposed to go after them in the small boat. The master of the Industry advised not to do so, as they were well manned. We returned to Gull Cove the same day, and in the evening went out with all the arms in the yawl, and at daylight next morning observed five schooners getting under way; we ran down to them and fired; observed three of them made fast to each other, the largest of them in the middle, with the crews collected on board of her. Mr. Jones ordered them to separate, which they hesitated to do for some time, and they appeared to be consulting together. After Mr. Jones threatened to fire into them they separated. We boarded two of them, the Reindeer and Ruby, and the crews of these vessels, with the exception of the masters, went on board the two schooners not detained, with as much provisions as they pleased; after this we got under way in the Ruby, and Reindeer in company, for St. Andrew's. On the afternoon of the same day, when abreast of harbor Delute, observed two schooners coming down from Eastport, full of men; one of them came towards us, and all hands hailing us to heave to, or they would fire into us; they ran alongside and boarded us with about 30 or 40 men, with muskets and bayonets; as they were shearing up alongside, some of them sung out to fire at the officers, and fire at the man at the helm; they had their muskets levelled at us, when their leader, a young man, came among them and said, don't fire at all, and parried their muskets off. They took our arms from us and drove us forward. I saw a scuffle between James Lloyd, a marine, and one of the Americans who wanted to take his arms from him. Mr. Touzeau told us to get into our boat, and I observed them firing volleys of musketry and cheering on their way to Eastport; also observed firing on shore at Eastport.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had the Ruby on board when detained?

Answer. Two or three casks, with plenty of wood.

Question. How was the weather?

Answer. Very fine, with light breezes.

Question. Were you in the yawl with Mr. Jones when he detained the American schooners Reindeer and Ruby?

Answer. Yes, I was.

Question. Relate the particulars respecting her detention.

Answer. I recollect on Sunday going out from Gull Cove, with Mr. Jones, in a small boat, and, after pulling for some time, hauled the boat over a bar; shortly after boarded an English fishing schooner belonging to Grand Menan; the crew gave us information that some American schooners anchored there on Saturday night, fired their guns, and said that they did not care for any man-of-war's boat whatever, as they were as well armed as the men-of-war's boats. I saw the schooners at Two Island harbor, at anchor, when on board the Industry; and her crew said we had better not go to them in the small boat; that it was their determination to kill us. We then returned to Gull Cove, and in the evening of the same day got under way in the yawl, with all the crew, and proceeded to Two Island harbor. About daylight next morning observed them get under way; we closed them, and fired to bring them to. I then saw them closing together, and three of them lashed alongside each other; we ordered them to separate, which they seemed not willing to do. Mr. Jones threatened to fire into them; we had our muskets, two in number, pointed to the vessel; after being threatened several times, two of them, the Reindeer and Ruby, Mr. Jones asked them what brought them there; their answer was, they came for wood and water; Mr. Jones then said, when you had got it, what was their reason for not going away; their reply was, the breeze was so light they could not get out; the crews of their vessels, with the exception of the masters, by their own request, went on board the two other schooners not detained, and were allowed to take what quantity of provisions they thought proper. I then went below, with Thomas Richardson, to search for arms, by the direction of Mr. Jones; found a musket, loaded, in the cabin. Mr. Jones asked the master what became of their arms; he said they were below; we then went again below for the same purpose. Mr. Jones again asked the master of the Reindeer what became of the arms; his answer was, that they must have been hove overboard; he said we had got them yesterday killing ducks. Shortly after we got the Reindeer and Ruby under way, and proceeded for St. Andrew's; in the afternoon of the same day, when abreast of Campo Bello, saw a schooner coming down and ran close alongside the Ruby, hoisted American colors; observed another standing towards us in the Reindeer; they gave three cheers, hoisted American colors, and hailed us to drop the peak of the mainsail; the master of the Reindeer said to us, you had better not fire on them, as they will kill every man of you, and he ran below; they came near us, and Mr. Jones said, come alongside of us, which they were willing to do. I had my musket ready to fire, and asked Mr. Jones if I should do so, to which he objected, and said, let them come alongside first; they then fired, and a ball passed close to us. Mr. Jones gave the papers up to the master of the Reindeer, who held them up to those on board the American schooner, desired them not to fire, and said that we would quit the vessel as soon as possible. We then got into the yawl, and observed them firing different times going into Eastport.

Question. When the schooner with American colors flying came close, did you observe they were armed?

Answer. Yes, they were, and the deck full of men, armed with muskets and fixed bayonets, carbines, blunderbusses, pistols, and swords.

Question. How was the weather when the Reindeer and Ruby were detained?

Answer. Fine weather and a fine breeze.

Question. What quantity of wood and water had the Reindeer on board?

Answer. Two casks of water on deck and plenty of wood.

Question. Did you search the salt room and the hold for arms?

Answer. No; I did not search the salt room aft, but did forward.

John Cheese, seaman, examined.

Question. Were you with Mr. Jones, in the yawl, when he detained the American schooners Reindeer and Ruby?

Answer. No, I was not; I was one of his boat's crew, but was left behind at St. Andrew's.

We, the undersigned, have examined the aforesaid persons, belonging to his Majesty's sloop Dotterel, taking the minutes of their depositions respecting the detention of the American fishing schooners Reindeer and Ruby; and we do declare that their evidence has been taken in a very impartial manner, and that the persons aforesaid have not been biased in any way whatever.

HIS MAJESTY'S SLOOP DOTTEREL, Halifax, November 8, 1824.

SIR: I beg leave to represent, in obedience to your orders of this day's date, directing me to give a statement of the facts, and under what circumstances I detained the American fishing schooners at different anchorages at the Grand Menan, while cruising in the yawl, in pursuance of your orders, for the protection of our fisheries, that on the 2d day of July last, on boarding an English vessel, I found a man named Wright officiating as pilot, to carry her to Grand Harbor, who told me that he belonged to the American fishing schooner Rebecca, then at anchor at Woodward's Cove, and that they came there for water. Satisfied with his assertion, I continued cruising, and, shortly after, I observed the American vessel getting under way, leaving the said man (Wright) behind. I ran down towards her; they not heaving to after we fired several shots across their bow, I chased her over to the Nova Scotia shore, where I lost sight of her. On the 6th following, I found the said American schooner Rebecca at anchor, cleaning fish, and throwing the offals overboard, and the aforesaid man (Wright) on board. It being fine weather, and they having three barrels of water on board, with a sufficient quantity of wood, I detained her and took her to St. John's.

On the 15th of the same month I found the American fishing schooner William anchoring in Gull Cove; the weather was fine until after she got in, when it came on foggy with light breezes; and they having two barrels of water on board, which myself, Mr. Touzeau, and the boat's crew, subsequently used from, and plenty of wood, I detained her. Having found the American schooner Rover, of Addison, Crowley master, landing a great part of her cargo of green fish to a Mr. Fowler's, at Gull Cove, I made the William's boat fast to the yawl for the night, to prevent their crew from doing the same. As for their getting water about sunset, and a vessel to anchor alongside of them, Mr. Touzeau and I know it to be impossible, as I had a sentry planted on shore about two cables' length from them; and if they received any water after dark, it was done as a pretext, for the boat's crew were witnesses to the water I found on board when I first boarded her; and that I threatened to confine the master to the deck and lash a pump brake across his mouth, as stated in their protest, is false. On my first boarding her, with only three men in our small boat, they were very abusive to us, and one of them said, if they were all of his mind, they would heave that fellow overboard, pointing to me. I told him if he did not keep quiet I would lash him to the deck. At 3 p. m., same day, 15th, I received information from the fishermen at Gull Cove, as well as from the master and crew of the fishing schooner Minerva, of Grand Menan, that an American schooner was at anchor at Beal's Passage. I went out from Gull Cove and saw her there; at 9 o'clock in the evening I boarded her, which proved to be the American fishing schooner Galeon, and found all the crew asleep. On questioning the master the reason of his being there, he told me that he came to throw the gurry, offal of the fish, overboard. They not being in want of wood or water, and a fine fair wind for them, I detained her, got her under way and ran for Gull Cove, a direct course for their fishing ground. What the crew of the last mentioned vessel asserted in their protest is not true; I never said that I would release their vessel, but told them it was not in my power to do it, as they had decidedly violated the treaty of convention between England and the United States; but as they pleaded poverty, saying their vessel was their sole support, I told them I would recommend their case to Captain Hoare, of the Dotterel, my commanding officer. Both schooners, William and Galeon, I took to St. Andrew's the next day. On the 25th of the same month I received information from the master and crew of the fishing schooner Industry, of Grand Menan, that several American fishing schooners were at anchor at Two Island harbor, and that two of them, namely, Reindeer and Ruby, of Lubec, were at White Island harbor on the 24th, where they got their wood and water, and that, on their anchoring there, they told them and the inhabitants they were armed, and would not allow any man-of-war's boat to board them; and, after they had their supplies, they shifted to Two Island harbor. At daylight, the 26th, observed four schooners at anchor at Two Island harbor, which got under way on our appearance. When I got close, three of them they lashed alongside each other, and all hands, about thirty in number, went on board the middle one with fire-arms and fish spears. I desired them to separate, which they refused to do until I threatened to fire on them. On boarding them, they proved to be the Reindeer, Ruby, Friends, and Diligent, American fishing schooners. It being fine weather, and they not in want of wood or water, I detained the Reindeer and Ruby, and, by the sanction of the masters of the Diligent and Friends, I put the crews of the Reindeer and Ruby on board of them, with as much provisions as they wished to take, and on our passage to St. Andrew's the said schooners Reindeer and Ruby were forcibly taken from me by armed vessels, under American colors, as stated in my letter of the 27th of July last.

I have the honor to be, &c., &c.,

JOHN JONES,

HIS MAJESTY'S SLOOP DOTTEREL, November 9, 1824.

SIR: In obedience to your orders, I herewith add a statement of the Pilgrim and Hero, American fishing schooners.

On the 16th of June last I observed these schooners lying off the Grand Menan, and upon approaching them, one of the schooners got under way and stood in for the shore; 3.30 p. m. observed the schooner under way heave her lines overboard and haul in fish, the schooner then within one and a half mile of the island; 3.40, fired and brought to the schooner; 3.45, boarded the Pilgrim, then about one mile or one mile and a quarter from the shore. She had on board fish, alive; took possession of her for a breach of the treaty. I then stood to the N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  E. and boarded the Hero, who had made sail from in shore. Whilst I was on board the Pilgrim, and finding she was in want of nothing, I inquired what she had been doing so near the shore with her sails down, to which I was informed by one of the crew they had been cleaning their fish on shore; in consequence of which, and having seen her within one mile of the land, I took possession of her also; stood in, and anchored in Long Island harbor. Thursday, the 17th, being for the most part of the day calm, I remained at anchor. Friday, the 18th, at 7 a. m., weighed and stood for Beaver harbor; from 9 to 12, calm; 3 p. m. observed two schooners under the Eastern Wolf, then about one mile distant. It being calm at the time, I ordered the master of the Pilgrim to send me her small boat, not having one myself; upon receiving which, I ordered one of my seamen and one marine, armed, into her. The boy who brought the boat I told to remain on board until I returned; but on his expressing a wish to go, and knowing he was more acquainted with her than any of my men could be, I agreed that he should pull, and ordered my seaman on board; part of the way I pulled, and part of the way the marine pulled with the boy. When I returned, there being no appearance of wind, I ordered the schooners Pilgrim and Hero to follow me and anchor under the Eastern Wolf for the night. Saturday, the 19th, it being calm, did not weigh until 11 a. m., then a light breeze; stood for Beaver harbor, where I anchored at 3 p. m. with an intention of waiting for the Dotterel's arrival; therefore, unbent sails and caused the Pilgrim and Hero to do the same. Sunday, the 20th, 11 a. m., observed the Dotterel pass in the offing to the eastward; bent sails and desired the Pilgrim and Hero to do the same. 12.20 p. m. weighed, schooners in company, beat out of the harbor; but finding the Pilgrim and Hero could not, I bore up, stood in, and anchored, schooners in company. Monday, the 21st, at 7 a. m., weighed, with light airs, schooners in company; beat up and anchored in Mason's Bay at 8.30 p. m. Tuesday, the 22d, at 2.30 a. m., the sentry reported one of the schooners was gone. Wednesday, the 23d, fresh gales until 10 a. m., then light airs with heavy rain; still at anchor. Thursday, the 24th, at 9 a. m. weighed, with light airs, and stood for Point La Pro, Hero in company, but, falling calm, were obliged to put into Dipper harbor. Friday, the 25th, heavy rains, with strong breezes from the eastward; remained at anchor. Saturday, the 26th, weighed, but were obliged to put back again. Sunday, the 27th, weighed and ran up to St. John's.

I further beg leave to state that I did detain on board the crews of the Pilgrim and Hero, having no authority for acting otherwise; that Winslow, in Beaver harbor, said he was aware of having fished within the limits, and if I would allow him and crew to go home he would give up his schooner and never again ask for her. Part of the men were at times on board my boat and living the same as my boat's crew, who had the allowance of the British Navy, excepting spirits, which had been all used; to make up for which, I gave from my private stock to those of the schooners who were on board my boat. I never asked them to do any duty on board my boat; nor did I, at any time, make use of harsh or menacing language. The duty done by the persons taken out of one or either of the said schooners was a perfect voluntary act of their own. The arms spoken of were taken from the Pilgrim, through expressions made use of by Winslow, for safety. Powder, a quarter of a pound; shot, about one pound. The arms were delivered to the gunner. The papers of each schooner were delivered to the custom-house at St. John's.

S. R. PROTHEROE, Mate.

HIS MAJESTY'S SLOOP DOTTEREL, Halifax, November 25, 1824.

SIR: According to your direction, I have made the strictest investigation, and inclose the reports of Mr. Jones, master, and Mr. Protheroe, mate; also, the testimony of the several men belonging to their boats, relative to the several American fishing vessels they had seized, which I trust will be sufficient proof of the propriety of detaining those vessels; and, as the American fishermen do not keep any journal or log, there cannot be possibly any proof but the crews of the boats detaining them and the Americans; it is not to be supposed that the latter will acknowledge to have violated the treaty existing between the two Governments relative to the fisheries. I think you will perceive a consistency throughout the several reports of Messrs. Jones and Protheroe that will bear the stamp of truth. Why should they detain these vessels if they had not violated the laws? It could not be for their value, they had little or nothing in, and they knew if they were condemned and sold they would sell for a mere trifle, the best of them not more than forty dollars; there were many other American fishing vessels of much more value, which they might have seized, if it was merely to annoy them, or for the sake of what they might sell for; but it is known everywhere in the Bay of Fundy that the American fishermen have invariably made use of the several harbors in the Menan as if those islands formed a part of the United States; they come in and haul their nets, and there are many instances of their having cut away the nets of the islanders; and I was informed by the fishermen at the Menan, previous to leaving the Bay of Fundy, that they had taken treble the quantity of fish this year to that of any preceding year since the war, and they ascribed it entirely to the American fishermen having been kept without the distance prescribed by treaty (three marine miles) from the shore. The former cruisers in the Bay of Fundy (vide Captain Arabin's letter, dated his Majesty's sloop Argus, off Bermuda, December 17, 1822,) have not paid much attention to the fisheries off Menan, and consequently the American fishermen have gone into the harbors whenever they pleased, and being more numerous than the inhabitants have overawed them; but I have been informed by some of the fishermen resident there that more than once they have had it in contemplation to represent the conduct of, and the injury they have sustained from, the American fishermen, but their living remote from each other, and no educated persons among them, they have been at a loss how to draw up a petition, or who to apply to for redress.

As all the vessels alluded to in the papers sent by Mr. Addington were taken by the boats, I cannot, myself, make any observations on their capture, but shall confine myself to a few remarks on the protests of the American fishermen, and to answer the complaint you have called my particular attention to.

Why do not the crews or owners of the American fishing vessels, detained for violating the treaty, come forward when these vessels are adjudged in the Vice Admiralty court, and produce such evidence as would clear them? they say, to claim their vessels in the Vice Admiralty court of New Brunswick would be a total loss; the fact is, it would not answer their purpose so well; they are well aware that witnesses could be produced that would falsify their testimony; the fishermen at the Menan would immediately come forward to witness the facts of their being in their harbors, and drawing their nets, when not in want of an article of provisions or fuel; but the Americans are aware that when their protest comes before the commander-in-chief of this station, the vessel-of-war will have left the Bay of Fundy, and that there will remain but the testimony of the officer and boat's crew that detained them, which they will take care to outnumber. If the Vice Admiralty courts of New Brunswick are conducted illegally and wrong, should they not make a representation to the British Government, that they may be better conducted? How is the captain of a man-of-war, stationed in the Bay of Fundy, to act, if the proceedings in the Vice Admiralty court are to be considered illegal and void, merely from the protest of some American fishermen?

What are the Vice Admiralty courts instituted for, but to try causes, and decide whether the capture is just; and I should conceive that where they have passed judgment, the captain of the seizing vessel is released from further responsibility; sufficient time is allowed all parties to procure and produce evidence, and if they do not come forward, is it not a tacit acknowledgment of the badness of their cause—and such is the case with these American fishing vessels; they have asserted many things that are wholly false. It is said in the memorial A, "that nine sail of American fishermen had been captured and sent into the province of New Brunswick, while others had been converted into tenders, without trial, for the purpose of molesting our fishermen; they have insulted and abused the crews, turned them on shore in a foreign country, entirely destitute, and without the means of returning to their homes."

That any American fishing vessel detained by the Dotterel, or her boats, has been converted into a tender for the better molesting their fishermen, is wholly false; that the crews have, to my knowledge, been insulted and abused, must be a gross and wilful perjury; it had always been the custom, I understood, to allow the crews of the vessels detained to take their clothes and such provisions as they pleased, and find their way to the States. I have sometimes offered to carry them back, when I returned to Passamaquoddy; they have invariably been allowed to take away everything they could claim as their private property, and the whole of their provisions on board their vessel, with which they paid their passage back to their country.

And in the memorial C it is said "that the American fishermen have no occasion nor inducement to violate the provisions of the aforesaid convention, nor have they, as we firmly believe, given in any instance just cause of complaint."

It is a well known fact that the American fishermen leave their fishing ground every Saturday, (when there is not a man-of-war or her boats in the neighborhood,) and anchor in some of the harbors of the Menan until the Monday, bringing in the fish offal with them, and throwing it overboard on the inner banks, by which they drive the fish off those banks, and they haul their nets during the Sunday, and catch sufficient bait for the ensuing week. This they suppose is not known; for they are not ignorant that this is a violation of the provisions of the convention; the fact is, they want, by causing much trouble, to deter the man-of-war stationed in the Bay of Fundy from interfering with them at all.

That the brig's barge has come into the wharf at Eastport and taken and carried away two boats laden with flour, Lieutenant Driffield's letter on that subject will, I think, completely invalidate that charge.

That the Hero, American fishing vessel, captured on the 16th of June, has not been sent in for trial, but is armed, and is still used as a tender to the Dotterel, is entirely false. She was not used by me to annoy a single American vessel; and on her arrival at St. John's was delivered over to the Collector of the Customs, and ought long ere this to have been adjudged in the Vice Admiralty court. "That the officers having charge of the armed boats of the Dotterel, ordered to cruise round Grand Menan and Campo Bello, have written instructions, which have been exhibited, to seize and send into St. Andrew's all American fishing vessels found within three marine miles of the said island." My order to the officers of the boats has been, that any American vessels they may find within three marine miles of the shore, except in evident cases of distress or in want of wood or water, they are to detain and send or carry them to St. Andrew's.

I have the honor to be, &c., &c.,

CLAIM OF RICHARD W. MEADE ON THE SPANISH GOVERNMENT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE FEBRUARY 28, 1825.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 28, 1825.

The Secretary of State, to whom, by a resolution of the Senate of the 15th instant, the memorial of Richard W. Meade, with the accompanying documents, was referred to consider and report thereon, has the honor of reporting that the views taken by him of Mr. Meade's claims upon the Spanish Government, and the extent in which they were considered by him as embraced by the treaty of February 22, 1819, have been set forth in various papers heretofore submitted to the Senate, and particularly in the general instructions to the minister of the United States now residing in Spain, dated April 28, 1823, and in a letter of the succeeding day to the chargé d'affaires of Spain, Mr. Salmon; both which were communicated to the Senate among the documents referred to in the message of the President of the United States to both Houses of Congress at the opening of the present session.

To these papers he asks leave to refer, and prays that they may be taken as a part of this report. Since that time, however, the Commission instituted under the stipulations of the above mentioned treaty have closed their sessions, the claims of Mr. Meade having been excluded altogether from a participation of the indemnities awarded by the Commission conformably to the stipulations of the treaty. How far this exclusion was attributable to a definitive opinion of the Commissioners that the claims of Mr. Meade were not included in the provisions of the treaty at all, and how far to the inability of Mr. Meade to adduce the evidence essential to the establishment of his claims, the Secretary of State is not informed. If it rested altogether upon the deficiency of evidence, it is believed the facts are correctly stated in Mr. Meade's memorial, which deprived him of the means of obtaining from the Spanish Government the documents which they were bound to furnish in season to lay before the Commissioners previous to the closing of their sessions. If, as appears to be alleged by the memorialist, the Commissioners, upon the evidence produced by him, admitted the validity of his claim as embraced by the treaty, and rejected the whole only upon the deficiency of proof sufficiently specific and particular of the items and of the amount, it remains for Congress to determine how far this can constitute a claim for which the United States are under any obligation to provide an indemnity. As an appeal to the generosity of the nation, it must stand upon this ground alone, and will be, doubtless, decided upon principles equally applicable to all other claimants alike situated.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS OF JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

MADE ON THE 4TH OF MARCH, 1825.

The President of the United States, being attended by the ex-President of the United States, the Vice President, the Judges of the Supreme Court, the Senators, and the marshals of the day, then proceeded from the Senate Chamber to the Hall of the House of Representatives, where he addressed the audience as follows:

In compliance with a usage coeval with the existence of our Federal Constitution, and sanctioned by the example of my predecessors in the career upon which I am about to enter, I appear, my fellow-citizens, in your presence, and in that of Heaven, to bind myself by the solemnities of religious obligation to the faithful performance of the duties allotted to me in the station to which I have been called.

In unfolding to my countrymen the principles by which I shall be governed in the fulfilment of those duties, my first resort will be to that Constitution which I shall swear, to the best of my ability, to preserve, protect, and defend. That revered instrument enumerates the powers and prescribes the duties of the Executive Magistrate; and, in its first words, declares the purposes to which these and the whole action of the Government instituted by it should be invariably and sacredly devoted—to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to the people of this Union in their successive generations. Since the adoption of this social compact one of these generations has passed away. It is the work of our forefathers. Administered by some of the most eminent men who contributed to its formation, through a most eventful period in the annals of the world, and through all the vicissitudes of peace and war, incidental to the condition of associated man, it has not disappointed the hopes and aspirations of those illustrious benefactors of their age and nation. It has promoted the lasting welfare of that country so dear to us all; it has, to an extent far beyond the ordinary lot of humanity, secured the freedom and happiness of this people. We now receive it as a precious inheritance from those to whom we are indebted for its establishment; doubly bound by the examples which they have left us, and by the blessings which we have enjoyed as the fruits of their labors, to transmit the same, unimpaired, to the succeeding generation.

In the compass of thirty-six years since this great national covenant was instituted, a body of laws, enacted under its authority, and in conformity with its provisions, has unfolded its powers and carried into practical operation its effective energies. Subordinate departments have distributed the executive functions in their various relations to foreign affairs, to the revenue and expenditures, and to the military force of the Union by land and sea. A co-ordinate department of the Judiciary has expounded the Constitution and the laws; settling, in harmonious coincidence with the legislative will, numerous weighty questions of construction, which the imperfection of human language had rendered unavoidable. The year of jubilee since the first formation of our Union has just elapsed: that of the Declaration of our Independence is at hand. The consummation of both was effected by this Constitution.

Since that period, a population of four millions has multiplied to twelve; a territory bounded by the Mississippi has been extended from sea to sea; new States have been admitted to the Union, in numbers nearly equal to those of the first confederation; treaties of peace, amity, and commerce, have been concluded with the principal dominions of the earth; the people of other nations, inhabitants of regions acquired, not by conquest, but by compact, have been united with us in the participation of our rights and duties, of our burdens and blessings; the forest has fallen by the axe of our woodsmen; the soil has been made to teem by the tillage of our farmers; our commerce has whitened every ocean; the dominion of man over physical nature has been extended by the invention of our artists; liberty and law have marched hand in hand; all the purposes of human association have been accomplished as effectively as under any other Government on the globe, and at a cost little exceeding, in a whole generation, the expenditure of other nations in a single year.

Such is the unexaggerated picture of our condition, under a Constitution founded upon the republican principle of equal rights. To admit that this picture has its shades, is but to say it is still the condition of men upon earth. From evil, physical, moral, and political, it is not our claim to be exempt. We have suffered, sometimes by the visitation of Heaven, through disease; often by the wrongs and injustice of other nations, even to the extremities of war; and lastly, by dissensions among ourselves—dissensions, perhaps, inseparable from the enjoyment of freedom, but which have, more than once, appeared to threaten the dissolution of the Union, and with it, the overthrow of all the enjoyments of our present lot, and all our earthly hopes of the future. The causes of these dissensions have been various, founded upon differences of speculation in the theory of republican Government; upon conflicting views of policy in our relations with foreign nations; upon jealousies of partial and sectional interests, aggravated by prejudices and prepossessions which strangers to each other are ever apt to entertain.

It is a source of gratification and of encouragement to me to observe that the great result of this experiment upon the theory of human rights has, at the close of that generation by which it was formed, been crowned with success, equal to the most sanguine expectations of its founder. Union, justice, tranquillity, the common defence, the general welfare, and the blessings of liberty, all have been promoted by the Government under which we have lived. Standing at this point of time, looking back to that generation which has gone by, and forward to that which is advancing, we may at once indulge in grateful exultation and in cheering hope. From the experience of the past we derive instructive lessons for the future. Of the two great political parties which have divided the opinions and feelings of our country, the candid and the just will now admit that both have contributed splendid talents, spotless integrity, ardent patriotism, and disinterested sacrifices, to the formation and administration of this Government, and that both have required a liberal indulgence for a portion of human infirmity and error. The revolutionary wars of Europe, commencing precisely at the moment when the Government of the United States first went into operation under this Constitution, excited a collision of sentiments and of sympathies, which kindled all the passions, and embittered the conflict of parties, till the nation was involved in war, and the Union was shaken to its centre.

This time of trial embraced a period of five and twenty years, during which the policy of the Union in its relations with Europe constituted the principal basis of our political divisions, and the most arduous part of the action of our Federal Government. With the catastrophe in which the wars of the French revolution terminated, and our own subsequent peace with Great Britain, this baneful weed of party strife was uprooted. From that time no difference of principle connected either with the theory of Government or with our intercourse with foreign nations has existed, or been called forth, in force sufficient to sustain a continued combination of parties, or to give more than wholesome animation to public sentiment or legislative debate. Our political creed is without a dissenting voice that can be heard; that the will of the people is the source, and the happiness of the people the end, of all legitimate Government upon earth; that the best security for the beneficence, and the best guaranty against the abuse of power, consists in the freedom, the purity, and the frequency of popular elections; that the General Government of the Union and the separate Governments of the States are all sovereignties of limited powers—fellow servants of the same masters—uncontrolled within their respective spheres—uncontrollable by encroachments upon each other; that the firmest security of peace is the preparation, during peace, of the defences of war; that a rigorous economy and accountability of public expenditures should guard against the aggravation, and alleviate, when possible, the burden of taxation; that the military should be kept in strict subordination to the civil power; that the freedom of the press and of religious opinion should be inviolate; that the policy of our country is peace, and the ark of our salvation union, are articles of faith upon which we are all now agreed. If there have been those who doubted whether a confederated representative democracy were a Government competent to the wise and orderly management of the common concerns of a mighty nation, those doubts have been dispelled. If there have been projects of partial confederacies to be erected upon the ruins of the Union, they have been scattered to the winds. If there have been dangerous attachments to one foreign nation, and antipathies against another, they have been extinguished. Ten years of peace, at home and abroad, have assuaged the animosities of political contention, and blended into harmony the most discordant elements of public opinion. There still remains one effort of magnanimity, one sacrifice of prejudice and passion to be made by the individuals throughout the nation who have heretofore followed the standards of political party: it is that of discarding every remnant of rancor against each other; of embracing as countrymen and friends, and of yielding to talents and virtue alone that confidence which in times of contention for principle was bestowed only upon those who bore the badge of party communion.

The collisions of party spirit which originate in speculative opinions or in different views of administrative policy are, in their nature, transitory. Those which are founded on geographical divisions, adverse interests of soil, climate, and modes of domestic life, are more permanent, and therefore perhaps more dangerous. It is this which gives inestimable value to the character of our Government at once federal and national. It holds out to us a perpetual admonition to preserve alike, and with equal anxiety, the rights of each individual State in its own Government, and the rights of the whole nation in that of the Union. Whatsoever is of domestic concernment, unconnected with the other members of the Union, or with foreign lands, belongs exclusively to the administration of the State Governments. Whatsoever directly involves the rights and interests of the federative fraternity, or of foreign powers, is of the resort of this General Government. The duties of both are obvious in the general principle, though sometimes perplexed with difficulties in the detail. To respect the rights of the State Governments is the inviolable duty of that of the Union; the Government of every State will feel its own obligation to respect and preserve the rights of the whole. The prejudices, everywhere too commonly entertained against distant strangers, are worn away, and the jealousies of jarring interests are allayed by the composition and functions of the great national councils annually assembled from all quarters of the Union at this place. Here the distinguished men from every section of our country, while meeting to deliberate upon the great interests of those by whom they are deputed, learn to estimate the talents and do justice to the virtues of each other. The harmony of the nation is promoted, and the whole Union is knit together by the sentiments of mutual respect, the habits of social intercourse and the ties of personal friendship, formed between the representatives of its several parts, in the performance of their service at this metropolis.

Passing from this general review of the purposes and injunctions of the Federal Constitution, and their results as indicating the first traces of the path of duty in the discharge of my public trust, I turn to the administration of my immediate predecessor as the second. It has passed away in a period of profound peace; how much to the satisfaction of our country, and to the honor of our country's name, is known to you all. The great features of its policy in general concurrence with the will of the Legislature have been, to cherish peace while preparing for defensive war; to yield exact justice to other nations, and maintain the rights of our own; to cherish the principles of freedom and of equal rights wherever they were proclaimed; to discharge, with all possible promptitude, the national debt; to reduce, within the narrowest limits of efficiency, the military force; to improve the organization and discipline of the Army; to provide and sustain a school of military science; to extend equal protection to all the great interests of the nation; to promote the civilization of the Indian tribes, and to proceed in the great system of internal improvements within the limits of the constitutional power of the Union. Under the pledge of these promises, made by that eminent citizen at the time of his first induction to this office, in his career of eight years, the internal taxes have been repealed; sixty millions of the public debt have been discharged; provision has been made for the comfort and relief of the aged and indigent among the surviving warriors of the Revolution; the regular armed force has been reduced, and its constitution revised and perfected; the accountability for the expenditures of public moneys has been made more effective; the Floridas have been peaceably acquired; and our boundary has been extended to the Pacific Ocean; the independence of the southern nations of this hemisphere has been recognized and recommended by example and by counsel to the potentates of Europe; progress has been made in the defence of the country, by fortifications, and the increase of the Navy; towards the effectual suppression of the African traffic in slaves; in alluring the aboriginal hunters of our land to the cultivation of the soil and of the mind; in exploring the interior regions of the Union; and in preparing, by scientific researches and surveys, for the further application of our national resources to the internal improvement of our country.

In this brief outline of the promise and performance of my immediate predecessor the line of duty for his successor is clearly delineated. To pursue, to their consummation, those purposes of improvement in our common condition, instituted or recommended by him, will embrace the whole sphere of my obligations. To the topic of internal improvement, emphatically urged by him at his inauguration, I recur with peculiar satisfaction. It is that from which I am convinced that the unborn millions of our posterity who are, in future ages, to people this continent, will derive their most fervent gratitude to the founders of the Union; that, in which the beneficent action of its Government will be most deeply felt and acknowledged. The magnificence and splendor of their public works are among the imperishable glories of the ancient Republics. The roads and aqueducts of Rome have been the admiration of all after ages, and have survived thousands of years after all her conquests have been swallowed up in despotism or become the spoil of barbarians. Some diversity of opinion has prevailed with regard to the powers of Congress for legislation upon objects of this nature. The most respectful deference is due to doubts originating in pure patriotism and sustained by venerated authority. But nearly twenty years have passed since the construction of the first national road was commenced. The authority for its construction was then unquestioned. To how many thousands of our countrymen has it proved a benefit? To what single individual has it ever proved an injury? Repeated, liberal, and candid discussions in the Legislature have conciliated the sentiments and approximated the opinions of enlightened minds upon the question of constitutional power. I cannot but hope that, by the same process of friendly, patient, and persevering deliberation, all constitutional objections will ultimately be removed. The extent and limitation of the powers of the General Government, in relation to this transcendently important interest, will be settled and acknowledged to the common satisfaction of all, and every speculative scruple will be solved by a practical public blessing.

Fellow-citizens, you are acquainted with the peculiar circumstances of the recent election which have resulted in affording me the opportunity of addressing you at this time. You have heard the exposition of the principles which will direct me in the fulfilment of the high and solemn trust imposed upon me in this station. Less possessed of your confidence, in advance, than any of my predecessors, I am deeply conscious of the prospect that I shall stand more and oftener in need of your indulgence. Intentions upright and pure, a heart devoted to the welfare of our country, and the unceasing application of all the faculties allotted to me to her service, are all the pledges that I can give for the faithful performance of the arduous duties I am to undertake. To the guidance of the legislative councils; to the assistance of the Executive and subordinate Departments; to the friendly co-operation of the respective State Governments; to the candid and liberal support of the people, so far as it may be deserved by honest industry and zeal, I shall look for whatever success may attend my public service; and knowing that, except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain, with fervent supplications for His favor, to His overruling providence I commit, with humble but fearless confidence, my own fate, and the future destinies of my country.

After which the oath of office was administered to the President of the United States by the Chief Justice.

OPINION OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (W. WIRT) ON ALLOWANCES OF SALARIES AND OUTFITS TO PUBLIC MINISTERS OF THE UNITED STATES TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

THE INJUNCTION OF SECRECY REMOVED BY THE SENATE FROM ITS PROCEEDINGS ON THE NOMINATION OF HENRY CLAY AS SECRETARY OF STATE, MARCH 8, 1825.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES, October 1, 1821.

SIR: I have, according to your request, reconsidered the opinion expressed by me in March last, on the claim of Mr. Clay, and have the honor now to submit to you the result of this new and more deliberate examination of the subject.

Mr. Clay left the United States, in 1814, on two special missions: first, to treat of peace with Great Britain, and secondly, in the event of peace, to treat of commerce with the same nation. In execution of the first commission, he proceeded to Gottenburg, where it was supposed the negotiation would take place, and made arrangements there which he was soon compelled to relinquish on the transfer of the negotiations to Ghent. At this latter place the treaty of peace was formed, and Mr. Clay proceeded on his second commission to London, where he also assisted in forming the commercial convention.

On his return to this country his account was settled as it was presented by himself. He was allowed a full outfit of nine thousand dollars, his full salary at the rate of nine thousand dollars per annum, and one quarter's salary, as usual, to cover the expense of his return. He was also allowed the expense and losses sustained by him on changing the seat of negotiation from Gottenburg to Ghent, and his expenses from Ghent to London, his salary running on all the while, to the moment of his departure from the latter place, at the rate of nine thousand dollars per annum.

His account, as presented by himself, contains no charge of half outfit under his second commission—that to treat of commerce, at London—but believing himself entitled to make this charge, it is now presented; and it is this claim which you require me to examine.

The case presents a preliminary question: is he stopped from making the claim at this time by the account settled at the Treasury on his own statement? I do not think that a bare omission to present the claim constitutes a bar to it. Settlements are not conclusive, when it can be shown that a just charge has been erroneously omitted. A party may, for a valuable consideration, relinquish a just claim, but the fact of relinquishment must be proved; a mere omission to make the charge will not, per se, warrant the inference of relinquishment for valuable consideration; and the mere absence of the charge being all that is shown to me, I am of the opinion that if the claim was just at the time of the settlement, it is just still. Its justice, therefore, is fairly presented for your consideration.

If there be a real foundation for this claim, we must find it either in our laws or the usage under them; let us examine the claim under both these heads.

1. The first act of Congress on this subject is that of July 1, 1790, providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations; and by this act the provision was, "that exclusive of an outfit, which shall in no case exceed the amount of one full year's salary to the minister plenipotentiary or chargé d'affaires to whom the same may be allowed, the President shall not allow to any minister plenipotentiary a greater sum than at the rate of nine thousand dollars per annum as a compensation for all his personal services and other expenses, nor a greater sum for the same than four thousand five hundred dollars to a chargé d'affaires," &c. It will be observed that this act prescribes merely the maximum of the allowance under each head, leaving it to the absolute discretion of the President to disallow, either wholly, or to reduce the amount of either or both according to the particular circumstances of each case—a discretion which, it will be presently seen, the President has always exercised freely, without feeling himself absolutely concluded by past precedents, or requiring the authority of a precedent in a new case, which, from the strength of its circumstances, was itself entitled to become a precedent. That the latitude of discretion thus given to the President was advisedly and deliberately conferred, and for the express purpose of enabling him to accommodate both the outfit and salary to the just demands of each case, will be manifest by referring to the second debates on the bill before it became a law, and which will be found in the third volume of Lloyd's Debates, pp. 113, 172, 181. This act continued in force for twenty years, and among other usages under it several cases had occurred in which ministers who had received an outfit on their first appointment were transferred from one court of Europe to another, receiving on such transfer either a whole outfit, or, as was more common, half an outfit; and it is not improbable that it was with reference to this practice, and with a view of putting an end to it, that the act of May 1, 1810, "fixing the compensation of public ministers," &c., after declaring in the express terms of the original act "that the President of the United States shall not allow to any minister plenipotentiary a greater sum than at the rate of nine thousand dollars per annum as a compensation for all his personal services and expenses," has the following proviso on the subject of outfit: "Provided, That it shall be lawful for the President to allow to a minister plenipotentiary, on going from the United States to any foreign country, an outfit which shall in no case exceed one year's full salary of such minister," &c. If, however, it was the intention of this act to put an end to the practice of allowing outfit to a minister who should, while abroad, be transferred from one court to another, that intention has not been answered with sufficient distinctness to produce the effect, for the act, as it stands, is susceptible of the construction of looking to and providing, by its express terms, for the case only of a minister proceeding from the United States on a single mission to some one foreign court. But, since it cannot be considered as having been intended by Congress to constrain the President to adopt the more expensive course of sending a minister from the United States whenever diplomatic services might be required at a foreign court, while the cheaper expedient of making use of a minister at some neighboring court so readily presented itself, nor to restrict his choice to citizens in the United States while a preferable one might at the time be travelling abroad; nor, in the latter case at least, to require the citizen to accept the appointment without the usual emoluments; and since there are no prohibitory terms in the act to preclude the resort to either of these latter causes, the act may be fairly interpreted, and has been interpreted, as leaving them open to the adoption of the President, and as drawing with them, by an equitable construction, the provisions of the act as to outfit and salary. This construction was given to the act by the administration under which it passed. The question arose in 1815, in the case of Mr. J. Q. Adams, whom the Government was desirous of transferring from the court of St. Petersburg to that of London. It was doubted whether, under those restrictive terms of the act, as to outfit, "on going from the United States," outfit could be allowed on such a transfer. It was the subject of most deliberate consideration, as you will be reminded by the accompanying extract from the letter of the Secretary of State to that gentleman, dated November 19, 1815, (No. 1,) and it was finally decided that outfit might be allowed, and it was allowed. This construction, too, received the subsequent sanction of Congress in the case, who ratified the allowance of outfit by their appropriation, although they differed with the President as to the amount.

I. Under this construction, the act of Congress of 1810 leaves the whole subject of salary and outfit where it found it under the act of 1790; that is to say, completely in the power of the President, without any other restriction than the maximum prescribed by the act. And, as the act authorizes salary and outfit in the case of a single mission, so where there are several successive missions thrown upon the same individual, the President is left at liberty, by the law, to consider each mission as a separate one, and to allow for each as if it stood alone. I say he is at liberty, by the law, to do this, and there may be cases in which it would be proper to do it: as where a minister resident abroad is transferred, at considerable intervals of time, to several courts in succession. The whole outfit may be as necessary and proper in the last case as the first, and in the intermediate cases as in either of the former. The subject, therefore, is by the law properly referred to the discretion of the President, in the confidence that he will adapt the allowance to the particular case. There is nothing, therefore, I think, in the law to forbid this allowance to Mr. Clay, if the President shall think it reasonable on the circumstances of the case.

II. With regard to the usage, the President has at all times exercised very freely the discretion given to him by the law, both as to the salary and outfit.

1. As to salary. The bill, which finally became the act of 1790, as reported to the House, (Lloyd's Debates, qua supra,) contemplated three grades of diplomatic agents: the minister plenipotentiary, at a maximum of salary and outfit of $9,000; the minister resident, at a maximum of $5,000; and chargé d'affaires, at $3,000. The law, as passed, dropped the minister resident, and retained the other two, advancing the chargé d'affaires to a maximum of $4,500; yet the President, in the exercise of his discretion, virtually restored the minister resident to the law, and the greater part of the ministers employed under the first two Presidents were ministers resident, at the salary and outfit of chargé d'affaires, $4,500.

Another instance of the exercise of this discretion as to salary occurred in the case of Mr. Jay, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to London, 1794, who received nothing in the name of salary. His expenses were allowed, and they amounted to $12,000, (see his account in the Book A;) another in the case of G. W. Erving, appointed special minister to Sweden, in 1811, at a salary of $6,000.

2. As to outfit. We shall, perhaps, find a key to the practice under this head, by considering the reason of the allowance. It means preparatory equipment, and seems to have been intended to cover the extra expense which every one must necessarily encounter who goes as a minister to a foreign court. But the quantum of this expense would be very different in missions of different characters. A minister who goes to reside permanently near a foreign court must have a domestic establishment, and that whether he have a family or not, as we may see by the example of the ministers among us from the primary courts of Europe. A minister, on the contrary, who goes on a special and short-lived mission has no occasion for any such establishment; without degrading either himself or his country, he lives in a hotel, as Mr. Jay did in London, in 1794. Now, as outfit is pointed to this very expense, it is manifest that the allowance of equal outfit to ministers so differently circumstanced would be unnecessary, unequal, and consequently unjust; and the usage, so far as I can trace it, has conformed to this obvious and simple distinction.

I have examined critically all the accounts of our ministers since the period of the adoption of our Constitution, together with the printed State papers, and the correspondence in the Department of State and of the Treasury, so far as they could throw light on the practice, and the following appear to me to be the general rules which have been followed in the allowance of outfit.

I. All ministers who go to reside at a foreign court are, in the first instance, allowed the amount of a full year's salary as outfit. At whatever sum the President fixes the salary, the same sum is allowed as outfit.

Examples.

London, Thomas Pinkney, 1792—1796, salary and outfit, each $9,000.
 London, Rufus King, 1796—1803, same allowance.
 London, James Monroe, 1803—1807, same allowance.
 Paris, Gouverneur Morris, 1792—1794, same allowance.
 Paris, James Monroe, 1794—1796, same allowance.
 Paris, C. C. Pinkney, 1796—1798, same allowance.
 Paris, R. R. Livingston, 1801—1804, same allowance.
 Paris, J. Armstrong, 1804—1810, same allowance.
 Madrid, William Short, 1794—1796, minister resident, salary and outfit, each $4,500.
 Madrid, C. Pinkney, 1801—1805, minister resident, salary and outfit, each $9,000.
 Madrid, J. Bowdoin, 1805—1807, same allowance.
 Lisbon, D. Humphreys, 1791—1797, minister resident, salary and outfit, each $4,500.
 Lisbon, William Smith, 1797—1801, minister plenipotentiary, salary and outfit, each $9,000.
 Hague, J. Q. Adams, 1794—1797, minister resident, salary and outfit, each $4,500.
 Hague, William Vans Murray, 1797—1801, minister resident, same allowance.
 St. Petersburg, J. Q. Adams, 1813—1815, minister plenipotentiary, salary and outfit, each $9,000.
 St. Petersburg, William Pinkney, 1816, same allowance.

II. Ministers residing at one court, and transferred to reside at another, receive half an outfit; and if transferred to reside in a new and higher grade of character, they receive half the year's salary of the new and higher grade. The rule probably arose from the increased expense which would unavoidably attend the making a new establishment at the new court. The only written notice of this rule which I can find in the Department of State is in a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. J. Q. Adams, on his transfer from his residence at the Hague to be minister plenipotentiary at Lisbon and Berlin. The letter is dated February 17, 1797, and the following is the extract: "In estimating the sum necessary for maintaining the intercourse of the United States with foreign nations, it was considered that your appointment and that of Colonel Humphreys to the office of minister plenipotentiary not being original, and an outfit of $4,500 to each as minister resident having been already allowed, the principle on which the outfit is provided authorized the Executive to make to each of you the further allowance of $4,500 only to complete the outfit of the advanced grade; and the estimate and appropriation conformed to this idea." The only principle which I can understand as being here alluded to is, that the outfit shall equal the year's salary of the grade to which the minister is advanced; but that, in order to make up such outfit, the outfit which he had received in his former grade shall be taken into the account. But, according to this rule, it would seem to follow that if the minister is transferred in the same character which he had previously held, and on his former appointment had received his full outfit, he would not be entitled to outfit at all on his transfer. The rule, however, is that which I have stated.

Examples.

1797.—David Humphreys, minister resident at Lisbon, transferred as minister plenipotentiary to Madrid, half outfit, $4,500.
 1797.—J. Q. Adams, minister resident at the Hague, transferred to Lisbon and Berlin as minister plenipotentiary, same allowance.
 1815.—J. Q. Adams, minister plenipotentiary at St. Petersburg, transferred to London; Congress allowed half outfit, $4,500.—(See his account herewith.)
 So much for resident and stationary appointments.

III. A special mission is not entitled to outfit at all, whether it stands alone as a single original mission from the United States to a foreign court, or whether it be connected with another and a permanent mission; the rule as to special missions being, to allow only the actual expenses attending them.

Examples of single and original special missions.

1.—1793. Mr. Jay to London; no outfit allowed nor salary; his expenses were borne, (see ante.) This was probably the effect of arrangement before he went out; but so far as outfit is concerned, it accords with the rule as distinctly announced in other cases.
 2.—1808. Mr. Short to Prussia; no outfit allowed. Here we are not left to infer the rule from the mere fact of disallowance, because the correspondence shows that it was founded avowedly on the special character of the mission.—(See Mr. Short's letter to President Jefferson, No. 2.)
 3.—1811. Mr. George W. Erving to Denmark; no outfit. The Secretary of State says to him, in his letter of January 3, 1811, (No. 3:) "In conformity to the rule which has hitherto prevailed in cases of special missions, you will not have an outfit." Here we have the rule explicitly announced; but there are several exceptions to it.

Exceptions.

1708.—Messrs. Marshal, Gerry, and Pinkney to France; outfit allowed.
 1800.—Messrs. Ellsworth and Davie to the same court; same allowance.

If these cases are exceptions, a reason may be found for them in the superior splendor and expensiveness of the court to which these gentlemen were sent. If they are not to be regarded as exceptions to a rule, but as announcing in themselves a substantive rule, they only prove that the rule during the second Presidency was different from that which we have seen unequivocally announced during the third and fourth Presidencies.

According to this rule, the allowance which had been already made of an outfit to Mr. Clay and his associates, on their mission to Ghent, was improper, and can be justified only as an exception on the particular circumstances of the case.

Examples of the disallowance of outfit to a special mission, where it has been connected with a permanent one.

1. Where the minister has gone out from the United States with two missions in view, the one special, the other permanent.

1803.—Mr. Monroe, special envoy to Paris, with a permanent commission to London. I refer to this case for the purpose of showing that the rule in such a case was to allow only the actual expenses on the special mission. This rule is understood as having been announced to him before he left the country, and as having been opposed to his claim of outfit on this mission after his return; and it is understood as having been waived as to him, at last, only on the ground that the actual expenses of the special mission would have equalled, if not surpassed, the amount of outfit.

The substantial ground of the allowance, therefore, was the actual expenses. The case at once affords proof of the rule, and operates as an exception to it. 1814.—Mr. Russell was united with Mr. Clay and others to treat of peace at Ghent; and with this commission he had another as stationary minister to Sweden. In announcing these appointments to him, the Secretary of State, in his letter of the 7th of February, 1814, (No. 6,) says: "In blending the appointment of minister extraordinary to treat with Great Britain with that of minister plenipotentiary to the court of Sweden, no expense to the public, beyond the ordinary allowance of a minister plenipotentiary, was contemplated, and hence one outfit to cover the expense of both."

It is true Mr. Russell did not accept; but this does not invalidate the proof of the practice which this letter affords. The letter announces a principle which, if applied to the case of Mr. Clay, is certainly unfavorable, at least to any further demand of outfit. It will be observed that the letter attaches the outfit to the permanent mission to Sweden, that of minister plenipotentiary to the court of Sweden, to which the commission to treat of peace is merely an incidental annexation.

1816.—Mr. William Pinkney, appointed stationary minister to Russia, with an incidental and special mission at the same time to Naples, received only one outfit, which was attached to his stationary appointment; on the special mission to Naples he received his actual expenses to the amount of another outfit; not, however, in the name of outfit, which was positively refused, but as actual expenses; the measure of an outfit is assumed as a limit to the expenses of the special mission.

If the out-of-doors history of this mission be correct, (which you must, of course, know if it be so,) the case affords strong proof of the rule that outfit does not properly attach to a special mission, but that the appropriate compensation on such a mission, beyond the salary, is the actual expenses; for it is said that Mr. Pinkney made the allowance of outfit to Naples the sine qua non of his acceptance of the double mission, which was refused by the Government; but he was assured at the same time that the actual expenses of the special mission would be paid, provided they did not exceed the amount of an outfit.

Now, as there was no difference in the two propositions, except in name, (as the result showed,) it is not discerned why this difference in form was insisted on, unless upon the ground that the rule (as announced so distinctly to Mr. Erving) stood in the way of the allowance of outfit on a special mission, while at the same time it admitted of the allowance of actual expenses without limit. Examples of this disallowance of outfit on a special mission, under another form of connexion with a permanent mission, to wit: where a minister stationed at one court is sent on a special mission to another.

1792.—Mr. William Short, stationed as a chargé d'affaires at Paris, was sent on a special mission, as "commissioner plenipotentiary," to Madrid, to treat of the navigation of the Mississippi. The selection of a person already abroad was made to avoid the expense of an original mission from the United States, as I learn from the report made by Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, to the President, on the 11th of January, 1792.—(Vol. 10, State Papers, p. 102.) Mr. Jefferson, in announcing to him this new appointment in his letter of the 23d of the same month, (No. 4,) tells him: "The salary of your new grade being the same as of your former one," [i. e., as the President chose to make it so,] "and your services continued, though the scene of them is changed, there will be no intermission of salary." "For the same reason there can be but one allowance of outfit," &c. For what reason? Because his salary continued the same under both appointments, and because his services were continued, though the scene of them was changed. It is not necessary for me to apply this reasoning to the case of Mr. Clay; the exactness of the application is obvious.

Mr. Short was entitled to an outfit as chargé d'affaires at Paris; in the settlement of his accounts he received only this one outfit and his actual expenses on the special mission to Madrid.

Besides this special mission to Madrid, Mr. Short went on several others to Holland, as appears by the settlement of his accounts, never receiving any outfit but his expenses merely.—(See document No. 5.)

1794-'5.—Mr. J. Q. Adams, being minister resident at the Hague, proceeded on a special mission [to London, and was allowed no outfit but his actual expenses, amounting to $3,449 45.

1795-'6.—Mr. Thomas Pinkney, minister plenipotentiary at London, proceeded on a special mission to Madrid, where he made a treaty. He received no outfit, but was allowed his actual expenses, amounting to $7,737 49.

1803-'4.—Mr. James Monroe, minister at London, proceeded on a special mission to Spain, the circumstances attending which are detailed at large in the Book of Ministers' Accounts, marked "B, July 30, 1813, France." For this mission he received no outfit but his actual expenses, $10,593 28.

Exceptions.

1800.—Mr. William Vans Murray, minister resident at the Hague, at a salary and outfit of $4,500 each, was associated, as minister plenipotentiary, with Messrs. Ellsworth and Davie, in a special mission to Paris. The two latter gentlemen proceeded from the United States at a salary and outfit of $9,000 each. It was thought proper that Mr. Murray, going to meet these gentlemen, and appear with them in the same character, at the same court, (which is said to be one of uncommon splendor at that period,) should be put on a footing with them in point of emolument; and on this ground expressly (that is, to place him on a footing with his associates) the Auditor is directed, by a note from the Secretary of State, to allow him the full outfit which they had received, which was done accordingly.—(See the Secretary's note at the end of Mr. Murray's Account Book C.)

1812-13.—Mr. Adams, minister plenipotentiary, and stationed at St. Petersburg, was united with Mr. Clay and others to treat of peace with Great Britain, under the mediation of the Emperor of Russia. It was expected that the negotiation would be held at St. Petersburg, and that, in consequence of it, the stationary minister would be put to considerable increase of expense; for this reason the President allowed him the entire outfit which his associates had received. The negotiation was not held at Ghent; but this does not change the ground on which the allowance was made by the Executive. One-half of the outfit thus allowed has been appropriated by Congress.

I take the reason for this allowance, by the President, to Mr. Adams, from your recollection, sir. In turning to the letter addressed by the Secretary of State to Mr. Adams on the 26th of April, 1812, making the allowance, I find the reason no further developed than by the following sentence: "In the joint commissions, the character of envoy extraordinary has been adopted; and, as you will all be exposed to considerable expense, an outfit has been allowed to each."—(Document No. 1.) This letter presents to us two inferences: that the allowance was not a thing of course, but rather a departure from the common cause, or otherwise no reason would have been assigned for it, and that one outfit alone was then contemplated for both negotiators—that is, the treaty of peace at Ghent, and of commerce at London. The letter is such a one as would have been expected, where outfit was allowed in violation of a general rule, the case being supposed to form an exception to the rule, but is entirely unadapted to an allowance, which was a thing of course.

There remains only one other case to be noticed, which is of a character so anomalous that I have not been able to class it under either of the preceding heads.

While Mr. Monroe was minister plenipotentiary and stationed at London, on May 12, 1806, a joint commission issued to himself and Mr. Wm. Pinkney constituting them Commissioners Plenipotentiary and Extraordinary for the purpose of settling all matters of differences between the United States and Great Britain, relative to wrongs committed by the parties on the high seas and other waters, and for establishing the principles of navigation and commerce between them. By a separate commission of the same date Mr. Pinkney was appointed minister plenipotentiary to the court of London in the usual form. He received a full outfit on the first commission; and when, by Mr. Monroe's return, he was left to act alone on his separate commission, he received a half outfit. From the phraseology of the first commission (see the document No. 6) it is not very easy to distinguish whether it is to be considered as a general or special commission. If, as I suppose it must be considered, it was a special commission, the allowance of full outfit falls within the principle of the exception in Mr. Murray's case, for Mr. Pinkney, too, was going to join another minister who had received a full outfit, and to appear with him in the same character, at the same court, which is understood as being one of the most expensive in Europe.

Having received this outfit when Mr. Monroe's return left him to act alone, which it did in one year afterwards, and when he entered on the execution of his second and permanent commission, he conceived himself entitled to a full outfit on the ground that one outfit to the full amount of a year's salary has never been withheld from a permanent appointment; he still considers himself entitled to it, and the general rule is certainly in his favor, for this is the only permanent and stationary appointment which has been made since the adoption of our Constitution from which such an outfit has been separated. But as an exception had been recently made in his favor in attaching a full outfit to his special commission to the same court, I presume that the President considered himself justified in making an exception also against him, in regard to his permanent commission; still, however, so far respecting the general rule as to allow half an outfit in the latter instance. I cannot discover on what other ground at all consistent with the scheme of practice presented by the documents before me the last allowance could have been made. If it was made on the ground of the inadequacy of the compensation allowed by the law, and the desire of the President to compensate that inadequacy by the allowance of outfit whenever separate and successive commissions will permit it, the reason applies to Mr. Clay's case, in common with all others like it which may come before the President; and in every case of the kind he may, if he think fit, allow the full outfit, or any part of it.

Having had no experience myself in diplomatic life, and having never been in a situation to observe the practice as it relates to others, nor in one which required me to know it, the duty of exploring and endeavoring to learn the practice, as it is to be extracted from the mass of accounts and documents in the Department of State and of the Treasury, has, to me, been equally new and laborious. I have spared no labor in the analysis, yet it is very possible that I have mistaken some of the cases, and built up an uneven theory of rules on them. At first and for a long time these cases appeared to me to present a hopeless chaos, utterly unsusceptible of being reduced to order, and it is not improbable that my desire to disengage them from this confusion and discover something like plan or system in the practice may have betrayed me into the belief of a theory which has no foundation in fact.

But, if I am not mistaken, the tendency of the practice has always been to withhold outfit in the case of special missions, and to allow the expenses whether the special mission has stood alone or been connected with a permanent one.

It appears, also, where outfit has been allowed in special missions, it has been by way of exception to the general rule, and upon reasons which do not operate in the case of Mr. Clay, on the mission from Ghent to London.

That there has been no instance of double outfit in two special missions, on both of which the citizen leaves the United States at the same time; and that no rule, or exception to a rule, according to the practice which has heretofore obtained countenances such an allowance.

That it certainly was not contemplated in the particular case, as is already manifested by the letter to Messrs. Adams and Russell.

That it has not been received or asked by any of Mr. Clay's associates, so far as I am informed.

Yet, although such has been the general usage and such the facts of this particular case, if, by reason of the general inadequacy of the compensation, or for any reasons existing in the particular case, and satisfactory to your own mind, the allowance ought to be made, I have no doubt that it is within your legal discretion to make it, and that the law makes you the only and final judge on the subject.

I have the honor to remain, sir, very respectfully your obedient servant,

The President of the United States.

No. 412.

[1ST SESSION.]

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE SESSION—PROCLAMATION OF TREATY WITH THE REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA OF OCTOBER 3, 1824.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS DECEMBER 6, 1825.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

In taking a general survey of the concerns of our beloved country, with reference to subjects interesting to the common welfare, the first sentiment which impresses itself upon the mind is of gratitude to the Omnipotent Disposer of all Good for the continuance of the signal blessings of his Providence, and especially for that health which, to an unusual extent, has prevailed within our borders, and for that abundance which, in the vicissitudes of the seasons, has been scattered with profusion over our land. Nor ought we less to ascribe to Him the glory that we are permitted to enjoy the bounties of His hand in peace and tranquillity—in peace with all the other nations of the earth, in tranquillity among ourselves. There has, indeed, rarely been a period in the history of civilized man in which the general condition of the Christian nations has been marked so extensively by peace and prosperity.

Europe, with a few partial and unhappy exceptions, has enjoyed ten years of peace, during which all her Governments, whatever the theory of their constitutions may have been, are successively taught to feel that the end of their institution is the happiness of the people, and that the exercise of power among men can be justified only by the blessings it confers upon those over whom it is extended.

During the same period our intercourse with all those nations has been pacific and friendly; it so continues. Since the close of your last session no material variation has occurred in our relations with any one of them. In the commercial and navigation system of Great Britain important changes of municipal regulation have recently been sanctioned by acts of Parliament, the effect of which upon the interests of other nations, and particularly upon ours, has not yet been fully developed. In the recent renewal of the diplomatic missions, on both sides, between the two Governments, assurances have been given and received of the continuance and increase of the mutual confidence and cordiality by which the adjustment of many points of difference had already been effected, and which affords the surest pledge for the ultimate satisfactory adjustment of those which still remain open, or may hereafter arise.

The policy of the United States in their commercial intercourse with other nations has always been of the most liberal character. In the mutual exchange of their respective productions they have abstained altogether from prohibitions; they have interdicted themselves the power of laying taxes upon exports, and whenever they have favored their own shipping, by special preferences, or exclusive privileges in their own ports, it has been only with a view to countervail similar favors and exclusions granted by the nations with whom we have been engaged in traffic to their own people or shipping, and to the disadvantage of ours. Immediately after the close of the last war a proposal was fairly made by the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1815, to all the maritime nations to lay aside the system of retaliating restrictions and exclusions, and to place the shipping of both parties to the common trade on a footing of equality in respect to the duties of tonnage and impost. This offer was partially and successively accepted by Great Britain, Sweden, the Netherlands, the Hanseatic cities, Prussia, Sardinia, the Duke of Oldenburg, and Russia. It was also adopted, under certain modifications, in our late commercial convention with France. And by the act of Congress of the 8th of January, 1824, it has received a new confirmation with all the nations who had acceded to it, and has been offered again to all those who are, or who may hereafter be willing to abide in reciprocity by it. But all these regulations, whether established by treaty or by municipal enactments, are still subject to one important restriction.

The removal of discriminating duties of tonnage and of impost is limited to articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the country to which the vessel belongs, or to such articles as are most usually first shipped from her ports. It will deserve the serious consideration of Congress whether even this remnant of restriction may not be safely abandoned, and whether the general tender of equal competition made in the act of January, 1824, may not be extended to include all articles of merchandise not prohibited, of what country soever they may be the produce or manufacture. Propositions to this effect have already been made to us by more than one European Government, and it is probable that, if once established by legislation or compact with any distinguished maritime State, it would recommend itself, by the experience of its advantages, to the general accession of all.

The convention of commerce and navigation between the United States and France, concluded on the 24th of June, 1822, was, in the understanding and intent of both parties, as appears upon its face, only a temporary arrangement of the points of difference between them of the most immediate and pressing urgency. It was limited, in the first instance, to two years from the 1st of October, 1822, but with a proviso that it should further continue in force till the conclusion of a general and definitive treaty of commerce, unless terminated by a notice six months in advance of either of the parties to the other. Its operation, so far as it extended, has been mutually advantageous, and it still continues in force by common consent; but it left unadjusted several objects of great interest to the citizens and subjects of both countries, and particularly a mass of claims, to considerable amount, of citizens of the United States upon the Government of France, of indemnity for property taken or destroyed under circumstances of the most aggravated and outrageous character. In the long period during which continual and earnest appeals have been made to the equity and magnanimity of France, in behalf of these claims, their justice has not been, as it could not be, denied. It was hoped that the accession of a new sovereign to the throne would have afforded a favorable opportunity for presenting them to the consideration of his Government. They have been presented and urged hitherto without effect. The repeated and earnest representations of our minister at the court of France remain, as yet, even without an answer. Were the demands of nations upon the justice of each other susceptible of adjudication by the sentence of an impartial tribunal, those to which I now refer would long since have been settled, and adequate indemnity would have been obtained. There are large amounts of similar claims upon the Netherlands, Naples, and Denmark. For those upon Spain prior to one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, indemnity was, after many years of patient forbearance, obtained, and those upon Sweden have been lately compromised by a private settlement, in which the claimants themselves have acquiesced. The Governments of Denmark and of Naples have been recently reminded of those yet existing against them; nor will any of them be forgotten while a hope may be indulged of obtaining justice by the means within the constitutional power of the Executive, and without resorting to those measures of self-redress which, as well as the time, circumstances, and occasion which may require them, are within the exclusive competency of the Legislature.

It is with great satisfaction that I am enabled to bear witness to the liberal spirit with which the Republic of Colombia has made satisfaction for well established claims of a similar character. And among the documents now communicated to Congress will be distinguished a treaty of commerce and navigation with that Republic, the ratifications of which have been exchanged since the last recess of the Legislature. The negotiation of similar treaties with all the independent South American States has been contemplated, and may yet be accomplished. The basis of them all, as proposed by the United States, has been laid in two principles: the one, of entire and unqualified reciprocity; the other, the mutual obligation of the parties to place each other permanently upon the footing of the most favored nation. These principles are, indeed, indispensable to the effectual emancipation of the American hemisphere from the thralldom of colonizing monopolies and exclusions—an event rapidly realizing in the progress of human affairs, and which the resistance still opposed in certain parts of Europe to the acknowledgment of the Southern American Republics as independent States, will, it is believed, contribute more effectually to accomplish. The time has been, and that not remote, when some of those States might, in their anxious desire to obtain a nominal recognition, have accepted of a nominal independence, clogged with burdensome conditions, and exclusive commercial privileges granted to the nation from which they had separated, to the disadvantage of all others. They are now all aware that such concessions to any European nation would be incompatible with that independence which they have declared and maintained.

Among the measures which have been suggested to them by the new relations with one another, resulting from the recent changes in their condition, is that of assembling, at the Isthmus of Panama, a Congress, at which each of them should be represented, to deliberate upon objects important to the welfare of all. The Republics of Colombia, of Mexico, and of Central America, have already deputed plenipotentiaries to such a meeting, and they have invited the United States to be also represented there by their ministers. The invitation has been accepted, and ministers on the part of the United States will be commissioned to attend at those deliberations, and to take part in them, so far as may be compatible with that neutrality from which it is neither our intention nor the desire of the other American States that we should depart.

The Commissioners under the seventh article of the treaty of Ghent have so nearly completed their arduous labors, that, by the report recently received from the agent on the part of the United States, there is reason to expect that the Commission will be closed at their next session, appointed for the 22d of May of the ensuing year.

The other Commission, appointed to ascertain the indemnities due for slaves carried away from the United States after the close of the late war, have met with some difficulty, which has delayed their progress in the inquiry. A reference has been made to the British Government on the subject, which, it may be hoped, will tend to hasten the decision of the Commissioners, or serve as a substitute for it.

Among the powers specifically granted to Congress by the Constitution are those of establishing uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States, and of providing for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States. The magnitude and complexity of the interests affected by legislation upon these subjects may account for the fact that, long and often as both of them have occupied the attention and animated the debates of Congress, no systems have yet been devised for fulfilling, to the satisfaction of the community, the duties prescribed by these grants of power. To conciliate the claim of the individual citizen to the enjoyment of personal liberty, with the effective obligation of private contracts, is the difficult problem to be solved by a law of bankruptcy. These are objects of the deepest interest to society: affecting all that is precious in the existence of multitudes of persons, many of them in the classes essentially dependent and helpless; of the age requiring nurture, and of the sex entitled to protection, from the free agency of the parent and the husband. The organization of the militia is yet more indispensable to the liberties of the country. It is only by an effective militia that we can at once enjoy the repose of peace, and bid defiance to foreign aggression; it is by the militia that we are constituted an armed nation, standing in perpetual panoply of defence in the presence of all the other nations of the earth. To this end it would be necessary, if possible, so to shape its organization as to give it a more united and active energy. There are laws for establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States, and for arming and equipping its whole body. But it is a body of dislocated members, without the vigor of unity, and having little of uniformity but the name. To infuse into this most important institution the power of which it is susceptible, and to make it available for the defence of the Union at the shortest notice and at the smallest expense possible of time, of life, and of treasure, are among the benefits to be expected from the persevering deliberations of Congress.

Among the unequivocal indications of our national prosperity is the flourishing state of our finances. The revenues of the present year, from all their principal sources, will exceed the anticipations of the last. The balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January last was a little short of two million of dollars, exclusive of two million and a half, being the moiety of the loan of five million, authorized by the act of May 26, 1824. The receipts into the Treasury, from the 1st of January to the 30th of September, exclusive of the other moiety of the same loan, are estimated at sixteen million five hundred thousand dollars, and it is expected that those of the current quarter will exceed five million of dollars: forming an aggregate of receipts of nearly twenty-two million, independent of the loan. The expenditures of the year will not exceed that sum more than two million. By those expenditures nearly eight million of the principal of the public debt have been discharged. More than a million and a half has been devoted to the debt of gratitude to the warriors of the Revolution; a nearly equal sum to the construction of fortifications and the acquisition of ordnance, and other permanent preparations of national defence; half a million to the gradual increase of the Navy; an equal sum for purchases of territory from the Indians, and payment of annuities to them; and upwards of a million for objects of internal improvement, authorized by special acts of the last Congress. If we add to these four million of dollars for payment of interest upon the public debt, there remains a sum of about seven million, which have defrayed the whole expense of the administration of Government, in its Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary Departments, including the support of the Military and Naval Establishments, and all the occasional contingencies of a Government co-extensive with the Union.

The amount of duties secured on merchandise imported since the commencement of the year is about twenty-five million and a half, and that which will accrue during the current quarter is estimated at five million and a half; from these thirty-one million, deducting the drawbacks, estimated at less than seven million, a sum exceeding twenty-four million will constitute the revenue of the year, and will exceed the whole expenditures of the year. The entire amount of public debt remaining due on the 1st of January next will be short of eighty-one million of dollars.

By an act of Congress of the 3d of March last a loan of twelve million of dollars was authorized, at four and a half per cent., or an exchange of stock to that amount of four and a half per cent. for a stock of six per cent., to create a fund for extinguishing an equal amount of the public debt, bearing an interest of six per cent., redeemable in the year 1826. An account of the measures taken to give effect to this act will be laid before you by the Secretary of the Treasury. As the object which it had in view has been but partially accomplished, it will be for the consideration of Congress whether the power with which it clothed the Executive should not be renewed at an early day of the present session, and under what modifications.

The act of Congress of the 3d of March last, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe, in the name and for the use of the United States, for one thousand five hundred shares of the capital stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, has been executed by the actual subscription for the amount specified; and such other measures have been adopted by that officer, under the act, as the fulfilment of its intentions requires. The latest accounts received of this important undertaking authorize the belief that it is in successful progress.

The payments into the Treasury from proceeds of the sales of the public lands during the present year were estimated at one million of dollars. The actual receipts of the first two quarters have fallen very little short of that sum. It is not expected that the second half of the year will be equally productive; but the income of the year, from that source, may now be safely estimated at a million and a half. The act of Congress of May 18, 1824, to provide for the extinguishment of the debt due to the United States by the purchasers of public lands, was limited, in its operation of relief to the purchaser, to the 10th of April last. Its effect at the end of the quarter, during which it expired, was to reduce that debt from ten to seven million. By the operation of similar prior laws of relief, from and since that of March 2, 1821, the debt had been reduced from upwards of twenty-two million to ten. It is exceedingly desirable that it should be extinguished altogether; and, to facilitate that consummation, I recommend to Congress the revival, for one year more, of the act of May 18, 1824, with such provisional modification as may be necessary to guard the public interests against fraudulent practices in the resale of the relinquished land. The purchasers of public lands are among the most useful of our fellow-citizens; and, since the system of sales for cash alone has been introduced, great indulgence has been justly extended to those who had previously purchased upon credit. The debt which had been contracted under the credit sales had become unwieldy, and its extinction was alike advantageous to the purchaser and the public. Under the system of sales, matured, as it has been, by experience, and adapted to the exigencies of the times, the lands will continue, as they have become, an abundant source of revenue; and when the pledge of them to the public creditor shall have been redeemed, by the entire discharge of the national debt, the swelling tide of wealth, with which they replenish the common treasury, may be made to reflow in unfailing streams of improvement, from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean.

The condition of the various branches of the public service resorting from the Department of War, and their administration during the current year, will be exhibited in the report of the Secretary of War, and the accompanying documents, herewith communicated. The organization and discipline of the Army are effective and satisfactory. To counteract the prevalence of desertion among the troops, it has been suggested to withhold from the men a small portion of their monthly pay until the period of their discharge; and some expedient appears to be necessary to preserve and maintain among the officers so much of the art of horsemanship as could scarcely fail to be found wanting on the possible sudden eruption of a war, which should overtake us unprovided with a single corps of cavalry. The Military Academy at West Point, under the restrictions of a severe but paternal superintendence, recommends itself more and more to the patronage of the nation; and the number of meritorious officers which it forms and introduces to the public service furnishes the means of multiplying the undertakings of public improvements, to which their acquirements at that institution are peculiarly adapted. The school of artillery practice established at Fortress Monroe is well suited to the same purpose, and may need the aid of further legislative provision to the same end. The reports of the various officers at the head of the administrative branches of the military service, connected with the quartering; clothing; subsistence, health, and pay of the Army, exhibit the assiduous vigilance of those officers in the performance of their respective duties, and the faithful accountability which has pervaded every part of the system.

Our relations with the numerous tribes of aboriginal natives of this country, scattered over its extensive surface, and so dependent, even for their existence, upon our power, have been, during the present year, highly interesting. An act of Congress of May 25, 1824, made an appropriation to defray the expenses of making treaties of trade and friendship with the Indian tribes beyond the Mississippi. An act of March 3, 1825, authorized treaties to be made with the Indians for their consent to the making of a road from the frontier of Missouri to that of New Mexico; and another act, of the same date, provided for defraying the expenses of holding treaties with the Sioux, Chippewas, Menomonees, Sauks, Foxes, &c., for the purpose of establishing boundaries and promoting peace between said tribes. The first and the last objects of these acts have been accomplished, and the second is yet in a process of execution. The treaties which, since the last session of Congress, have been concluded with the several tribes will be laid before the Senate, for their consideration, conformably to the Constitution. They comprise large and valuable acquisitions of territory, and they secure an adjustment of boundaries and give pledges of permanent peace between several tribes which had been long waging bloody wars against each other.

On the 12th of February last a treaty was signed, at the Indian Springs, between Commissioners appointed on the part of the United States and certain chiefs and individuals of the Creek Nation of Indians, which was received at the seat of Government only a very few days before the close of the last session of Congress and of the late administration. The advice and consent of the Senate were given to it on the 3d of March, too late for it to receive the ratification of the then President of the United States. It was ratified on the 7th of March, under the unsuspecting impression that it had been negotiated in good faith, and in the confidence inspired by the recommendation of the Senate. The subsequent transactions in relation to this treaty will form the subject of a separate message.

The appropriations made by Congress for public works, as well in the construction of fortifications as for purposes of internal improvement, so far as they have been expended, have been faithfully applied.

Their progress has been delayed by the want of suitable officers for superintending them. An increase of both the Corps of Engineers, military and topographical, was recommended by my predecessor at the last session of Congress. The reasons upon which that recommendation was founded subsist in all their force, and have acquired additional urgency since that time. It may also be expedient to organize the Topographical Engineers into a corps similar to the present establishment of the Corps of Engineers. The Military Academy at West Point will furnish, from the cadets annually graduated there, officers well qualified for carrying this measure into effect.

The Board of Engineers for Internal Improvement, appointed for carrying into execution the act of Congress of April 30, 1824, "to procure the necessary surveys, plans and estimates on the subject of roads and canals," have been actively engaged in that service from the close of the last session of Congress. They have completed the surveys necessary for ascertaining the practicability of a canal from the Chesapeake bay to the Ohio river, and are preparing a full report on that subject, which, when completed, will be laid before you. The same observation is to be made with regard to the two other objects of national importance upon which the Board have been occupied, namely: the accomplishment of a national road from this city to New Orleans, and the practicability of uniting the waters of Lake Memphramagog with Connecticut river, and the improvement of the navigation of that river. The surveys have been made and are nearly completed. The report may be expected at an early period during the present session of Congress.

The acts of Congress of the last session relative to the surveying, marking, or laying out roads in the Territory of Florida, Arkansas, and Michigan, from Missouri to Mexico, and for the continuation of the Cumberland road, are, some of them, fully executed, and others in the process of execution. Those for completing or commencing fortifications have been delayed only so far as the Corps of Engineers has been inadequate to furnish officers for the necessary superintendence of the works. Under the act confirming the statutes of Virginia and Maryland, incorporating the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, three Commissioners, on the part of the United States, have been appointed for opening books and receiving subscriptions, in concert with a like number of Commissioners appointed on the part of each of those States. A meeting of the Commissioners has been postponed, to await the definitive report of the Board of Engineers. The light-houses and monuments for the safety of our commerce and mariners; the works for the security of Plymouth Beach, and for the preservation of the islands in Boston harbor, have received the attention required by the laws relating to those objects, respectively. The continuation of the Cumberland road, the most important of them all, after surmounting no inconsiderable difficulty in fixing upon the direction of the road, has commenced, under the most promising auspices, with the improvements of recent invention in the mode of construction, and with the advantage of a great reduction in the comparative cost of the work.

The operation of the laws relating to the revolutionary pensioners may deserve the renewed consideration of Congress. The act of the eighteenth of March, eighteen hundred and eighteen, while it made provision for many meritorious and indigent citizens who had served in the war of independence, opened a door to numerous abuses and impositions. To remedy this, the act of the first of May, eighteen hundred and twenty, exacted proofs of absolute indigence, which many really in want were unable, and all, susceptible of that delicacy which is allied to many virtues, must be deeply reluctant to give. The result has been, that some among the least deserving have been retained, and some in whom the requisites both of worth and want were combined have been stricken from the list. As the numbers of these venerable relics of an age gone by diminish; as the decays of body, mind, and estate, of those who survive, must, in the common course of nature, increase, should not a more liberal portion of indulgence be dealt out to them? May not the want, in most instances, be inferred from the demand, when the service can be duly proved; and may not the last days of human infirmity be spared the mortification of purchasing a pittance of relief only by the exposure of its own necessities? I submit to Congress the expediency of providing for individual cases of this description by special enactment, or of revising the act of the first of May, eighteen hundred and twenty, with a view to mitigate the rigor of its exclusions, in favor of persons to whom charity, now bestowed, can scarcely discharge the debt of justice.

The portion of the naval force of the Union in actual service has been chiefly employed on three stations: The Mediterranean, the coasts of South America bordering on the Pacific Ocean, and the West Indies. An occasional cruiser has been sent to range along the African shores most polluted by the traffic of slaves; one armed vessel has been stationed on the coast of our eastern boundary, to cruise along the fishing grounds in Hudson's Bay and on the coast of Labrador; and the first service of a new frigate has been performed in restoring to his native soil and domestic enjoyments the veteran hero whose youthful blood and treasure had freely flowed in the cause of our country's independence, and whose whole life had been a series of services and sacrifices to the improvement of his fellow-men. The visit of General Lafayette, alike honorable to himself and to our country, closed, as it had commenced, with the most affecting testimonials of devoted attachment on his part, and of unbounded gratitude of this people to him in return. It will form, hereafter, a pleasing incident in the annals of our Union, giving to real history the intense interest of romance, and signally marking the unpurchaseable tribute of a great nation's social affections to the disinterested champion of the liberties of human kind.

The constant maintenance of a small squadron in the Mediterranean is a necessary substitute for the humiliating alternative of paying tribute for the security of our commerce in that sea, and for a precarious peace, at the mercy of every caprice of four Barbary States, by whom it was liable to be violated. An additional motive for keeping a respectable force stationed there at this time is found in the maritime war raging between the Greeks and the Turks, and in which the neutral navigation of this Union is always in danger of outrage and depredation. A few instances have occurred of such depredations upon our merchant vessels by privateers or pirates wearing the Grecian flag, but without real authority from the Greek or any other Government. The heroic struggles of the Greeks themselves, in which our warmest sympathies as freemen and Christians have been engaged, have continued to be maintained with vicissitudes of success adverse and favorable.

Similar motives have rendered expedient the keeping of a like force on the coasts of Peru and Chile, on the Pacific. The irregular and convulsive character of the war upon the shores has been extended to the conflicts upon the ocean. An active warfare has been kept up for years, with alternate success, though generally to the advantage of the American Patriots. But their naval forces have not always been under the control of their own Governments. Blockades, unjustifiable upon any acknowledged principles of international law, have been proclaimed by officers in command; and though disavowed by the supreme authorities, the protection of our own commerce against them has been made cause of complaint and of erroneous imputations against some of the most gallant officers of our Navy. Complaints equally groundless have been made by the commanders of the Spanish royal forces in those seas; but the most effective protection to our commerce has been the flag, and the firmness of our own commanding officers. The cessation of the war, by the complete triumph of the Patriot cause, has removed, it is hoped, all cause of dissension with one party, and all vestige of force of the other. But an unsettled coast of many degrees of latitude, forming a part of our own territory, and a flourishing commerce and fishery, extending to the islands of the Pacific and to China, still require that the protecting power of the Union should be displayed under its flag, as well upon the ocean as upon the land.

The objects of the West India squadron have been to carry into execution the laws for the suppression of the African slave trade; for the protection of our commerce against vessels of piratical character, though bearing commissions from either of the belligerent parties; for its protection against open and unequivocal pirates. These objects, during the present year, have been accomplished more effectually than at any former period. The African slave trade has long been excluded from the use of our flag; and if some few citizens of our country have continued to set the laws of the Union, as well as those of nature and humanity, at defiance, by persevering in that abominable traffic, it has been only by sheltering themselves under the banners of other nations less earnest for the total extinction of the trade than ours. The irregular privateers have, within the last year, been, in a great measure, banished from those seas; and the pirates, for months past, appear to have been almost entirely swept away from the borders and the shores of the two Spanish islands in those regions. The active, persevering, and unremitting energy of Captain Warrington, and of the officers and men under his command, on that trying and perilous service, have been crowned with signal success, and are entitled to the approbation of their country. But experience has shown that not even a temporary suspension or relaxation from assiduity can be indulged on that station without reproducing piracy and murder in all their horrors; nor is it probable that for years to come our immensely valuable commerce in those seas can navigate in security without the steady continuance of an armed force devoted to its protection.

It were, indeed, a vain and dangerous illusion to believe that, in the present or probable condition of human society, a commerce so extensive and so rich as ours could exist and be pursued in safety without the continual support of a military marine, the only arm by which the power of this Confederacy can be estimated or felt by foreign nations, and the only standing military force which can never be dangerous to our own liberties at home. A permanent naval peace establishment, therefore, adapted to our present condition, and adaptable to that gigantic growth with which the nation is advancing in its career, is among the subjects which have already occupied the foresight of the last Congress, and which will deserve your serious deliberations. Our Navy, commenced at an early period of our present political organization upon a scale commensurate with the incipient energies, the scanty resources, and the comparative indigence of our infancy, was even then found adequate to cope with all the powers of Barbary, save the first, and with one of the principal maritime powers of Europe. At a period of further advancement, but with little accession of strength, it not only sustained with honor the most unequal of conflicts, but covered itself and our country with unfading glory. But it is only since the close of the late war that, by the number and force of the ships of which it was composed, it could deserve the name of a Navy. Yet it retains nearly the same organization as when it consisted of only five frigates. The rules and regulations by which it is governed earnestly call for revision; and the want of a naval school of instruction, corresponding with the Military Academy at West Point, for the formation of scientific and accomplished officers, is felt with daily increasing aggravation.

The act of Congress of 26th May, 1824, authorizing an examination and survey of the harbor of Charleston, in South Carolina, of St. Mary's, in Georgia, and of the coast of Florida, and for other purposes, has been executed, so far as the appropriation would admit. Those of the 3d of March last, authorizing the establishment of a navy yard and depot on the coast of Florida, in the Gulf of Mexico, and authorizing the building of ten sloops-of-war, and for other purposes, are in the course of execution; for the particulars of which, and other objects connected with this Department, I refer to the report of the Secretary of the Navy, herewith communicated.

A report from the Postmaster General is also submitted, exhibiting the present flourishing condition of that Department. For the first time for many years the receipts for the year ending on the first of July last exceeded the expenditures during the same period to the amount of more than forty-five thousand dollars. Other facts, equally creditable to the administration of this Department, are, that in two years from the first of July, 1823, an improvement of more than one hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars in its pecuniary affairs has been realized; that, in the same interval, the increase of the transportation of the mail has exceeded one million five hundred thousand miles, annually; and that one thousand and forty new post offices have been established. It hence appears that under judicious management the income from this establishment may be relied on as fully adequate to defray its expenses; and that by the discontinuance of post roads altogether unproductive, others of more useful character may be opened, till the circulation of the mail shall keep pace with the spread of our population, and the comforts of friendly correspondence, the exchanges of internal traffic, and the lights of the periodical press, shall be distributed to the remotest corners of the Union, at a charge scarcely perceptible to any individual, and without the cost of a dollar to the public treasury.

Upon this first occasion of addressing the Legislature of the Union, with which I have been honored, in presenting to their view the execution, so far as it has been effected, of the measures sanctioned by them for promoting the internal improvement of our country, I cannot close the communication without recommending to their calm and persevering consideration the general principle in a more enlarged extent. The great object of the institution of civil government is the improvement of the condition of those who are parties to the social compact. And no Government, in whatever form constituted, can accomplish the lawful ends of its institution but in proportion as it improves the condition of those over whom it is established. Roads and canals, by multiplying and facilitating the communications and intercourse between distant regions and multitudes of men, are among the most important means of improvement. But moral, political, intellectual improvement, are duties assigned by the Author of our existence to social, no less than to individual man. For the fulfilment of those duties Governments are invested with power; and to the attainment of the end, the progressive improvement of the condition of the governed, the exercise of delegated power is a duty as sacred and indispensable as the usurpation of power not granted is criminal and odious. Among the first, perhaps the very first instrument for the improvement of the condition of men, is knowledge; and to the acquisition of much of the knowledge adapted to the wants, the comforts, and enjoyments of human life, public institutions and seminaries of learning are essential. So convinced of this was the first of my predecessors in this office, now first in the memory, as, living, he was first in the hearts of our country, that once and again, in his addresses to the Congresses with whom he co-operated in the public service, he earnestly recommended the establishment of seminaries of learning, to prepare for all the emergencies of peace and war—a National University and a Military Academy. With respect to the latter, had he lived to the present day, in turning his eyes to the institution at West Point he would have enjoyed the gratification of his most earnest wishes. But in surveying the city which has been honored with his name, he would have seen the spot of earth which he had destined and bequeathed to the use and benefit of his country as the site for an university still bare and barren.

In assuming her station among the civilized nations of the earth, it would seem that our country had contracted the engagement to contribute her share of mind, of labor, and of expense, to the improvement of those parts of knowledge which lie beyond the reach of individual acquisition, and particularly to geographical and astronomical science. Looking back to the history only of the half century since the declaration of our independence, and observing the generous emulation with which the Governments of France, Great Britain, and Russia, have devoted the genius, the intelligence, the treasures of their respective nations to the common improvement of the species in these branches of science, is it not incumbent upon us to inquire whether we are not bound by obligations of a high and honorable character to contribute our portion of energy and exertion to the common stock? The voyages of discovery prosecuted in the course of that time at the expense of those nations have not only redounded to their glory, but to the improvement of human knowledge. We have been partakers of that improvement, and owe for it a sacred debt, not only of gratitude, but of equal or proportional exertion in the same common cause. Of the cost of these undertakings, if the mere expenditures of outfit, equipment, and completion of the expeditions were to be considered the only charges, it would be unworthy of a great and generous nation to take a second thought. One hundred expeditions of circumnavigation, like those of Cook and La Perouse, would not burden the exchequer of the nation fitting them out so much as the ways and means of defraying a single campaign in war. But if we take into the account the lives of those benefactors of mankind, of which their services in the cause of their species were the purchase, how shall the cost of those heroic enterprises be estimated? And what compensation can be made to them, or to their countries for them? Is it not by bearing them in affectionate remembrance? Is it not still more by imitating their example? by enabling countrymen of our own to pursue the same career, and to hazard their lives in the same cause?

In inviting the attention of Congress to the subject of internal improvements upon a view thus enlarged, it is not my design to recommend the equipment of an expedition for circumnavigating the globe for purposes of scientific research and inquiry. We have objects of useful investigation nearer home, and to which our cares may be more beneficially applied. The interior of our own territories has yet been very imperfectly explored. Our coasts, along many degrees of latitude upon the shores of the Pacific Ocean, though much frequented by our spirited commercial navigators, have been barely visited by our public ships. The river of the west, first fully discovered and navigated by a countryman of our own, still bears the name of the ship in which he ascended its waters, and claims the protection of our armed national flag at its mouth. With the establishment of a military post there, or at some other point of that coast, recommended by my predecessor, and already matured, in the deliberations of the last Congress, I would suggest the expediency of connecting the equipment of a public ship for the exploration of the whole northwest coast of this continent.

The establishment of a uniform standard of weights and measures was one of the specific objects contemplated in the formation of our Constitution, and to fix that standard was one of the powers delegated by express terms in that instrument to Congress. The Governments of Great Britain and France have scarcely ceased to be occupied with inquiries and speculations on the same subject since the existence of our Constitution; and with them it has expanded into profound, laborious, and expensive researches into the figure of the earth, and the comparative length of the pendulum vibrating seconds in various latitudes, from the equator to the pole. These researches have resulted in the composition and publication of several works highly interesting to the cause of science. The experiments are yet in the process of performance. Some of them have recently been made on our own shores, within the walls of one of our own colleges, and partly by one of our own fellow-citizens. It would be honorable to our country if the sequel of the same experiments should be countenanced by the patronage of our Government, as they have hitherto been by those of France and Britain.

Connected with the establishment of an university, or separate from it, might be undertaken the erection of an astronomical observatory, with provision for the support of an astronomer to be in constant attendance, of observations upon the phenomena of the heavens, and for the periodical publication of his observations. It is with no feeling of pride, as an American, that the remark may be made that on the comparatively small territorial surface of Europe there are existing upwards of one hundred and thirty of these light-houses of the skies, while throughout the whole American hemisphere there is not one. If we reflect a moment upon the discoveries which, in the last four centuries, have been made in the physical constitution of the universe by the means of these buildings, and of observers stationed in them, shall we doubt of their usefulness to every nation? And while scarcely a year passes over our head without bringing some new astronomical discovery to light, which we must fain receive at second hand from Europe, are we not cutting ourselves off from the means of returning light for light, while we have neither observatory nor observer upon our half of the globe, and the earth revolves in perpetual darkness to our unsearching eyes?

When, on October 25, 1791, the first President of the United States announced to Congress the result of the first enumeration of the inhabitants of this Union, he informed them that the returns gave the pleasing assurance that the population of the United States bordered on four millions of persons. At the distance of thirty years from that time, the last enumeration, five years since completed, presented a population bordering upon ten millions. Perhaps, of all the evidences of a prosperous and happy condition of human society, the rapidity of the increase of population is the most unequivocal. But the demonstration of our prosperity rests not alone upon this indication. Our commerce, our wealth, and the extent of our territories, have increased in corresponding proportions; and the number of independent communities associated in our Federal Union has since that time nearly doubled. The legislative representation of the States and people in the two Houses of Congress has grown with the growth of their constituent bodies. The House, which then consisted of sixty-five members, now numbers upwards of two hundred. The Senate, which consisted of twenty-six members, has now forty-eight. But the Executive, and still more the Judiciary Departments, are yet in a great measure confined to their primitive organization, and are now not adequate to the urgent wants of a still growing community.

The naval armaments, which at an early period forced themselves upon the necessities of the Union, soon led to the establishment of a Department of the Navy. But the Departments of Foreign Affairs and of the Interior, which early after the formation of the Government had been united in one, continue so united at this time, to the unquestionable detriment of the public service. The multiplication of our relations with the nations and Governments of the Old World has kept pace with that of our population and commerce, while, within the last ten years, a new family of nations in our own hemisphere has arisen among the inhabitants of the earth, with whom our intercourse, commercial and political, would of itself furnish occupation to an active and industrious Department. The constitution of the Judiciary, experimental and imperfect as it was even in the infancy of our existing Government, is yet more inadequate to the administration of national justice at our present maturity. Nine years have elapsed since a predecessor in this office, now not the last, the citizen who, perhaps, of all others throughout the Union, contributed most to the formation and establishment of our Constitution, in his valedictory address to Congress, immediately preceding his retirement from public life, urgently recommended the revision of the Judiciary and the establishment of an additional Executive Department. The exigencies of the public service, and its unavoidable deficiencies, as now in exercise, have added yearly cumulative weight to the considerations presented by him as persuasive to the measure; and in recommending it to your deliberations, I am happy to have the influence of his high authority in aid of the undoubting convictions of my own experience.

The laws relating to the administration of the Patent Office are deserving of much consideration, and, perhaps, susceptible of some improvement. The grant of power to regulate the action of Congress on this subject has specified both the end to be obtained and the means by which it is to be effected—"to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." If an honest pride might be indulged in the reflection that on the records of that office are already found inventions the usefulness of which has scarcely been transcended in the annals of human ingenuity, would not its exultation be allayed by the inquiry, whether the laws have effectually insured to the inventors the reward destined to them by the Constitution—even a limited term of exclusive right to their discoveries?

On December 24, 1799, it was resolved by Congress that a marble monument should be erected by the United States in the Capitol, at the city of Washington; that the family of General Washington should be requested to permit his body to be deposited under it; and that the monument be so designed as to commemorate the great events of his military and political life. In reminding Congress of this resolution, and that the monument contemplated by it remains yet without execution, I shall indulge only the remarks that the works at the Capitol are approaching to completion; that the consent of the family desired by the resolution was requested and obtained; that a monument has been recently erected in this city over the remains of another distinguished patriot of the Revolution; and that a spot has been reserved within the walls where you are deliberating for the benefit of this and future ages, in which the mortal remains may be deposited of him whose spirit hovers over you, and listens with delight to every act of the representatives of his nation which can tend to exalt and adorn his and their country.

The Constitution under which you are assembled is a charter of limited powers. After full and solemn deliberation upon all or any of the objects which, urged by an irresistible sense of my own duty, I have recommended to your attention, should you come to the conclusion that, however desirable in themselves, the enactment of laws for effecting them would transcend the powers committed to you by that venerable instrument which we are all bound to support, let no consideration induce you to assume the exercise of powers not granted to you by the people. But, if the power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over the District of Columbia; if the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; if the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes; to fix the standard of weights and measures; to establish post offices and post roads; to declare war; to raise and support armies; to provide and maintain a Navy; to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying these powers into execution: If these powers and others enumerated in the Constitution may be effectually brought into action by laws promoting the improvement of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, the cultivation and encouragement of the mechanic and of the elegant arts, the advancement of literature, and the progress of the sciences, ornamental and profound,—to refrain from exercising them for the benefit of the people themselves, would be to hide in the earth the talent committed to our charge—would be treachery to the most sacred of trusts.

The spirit of improvement is abroad upon the earth. It stimulates the heart and sharpens the faculties, not of our fellow-citizens alone, but of the nations of Europe and of their rulers. While dwelling with pleasing satisfaction upon the superior excellence of our political institutions, let us not be unmindful that liberty is power; that the nation blessed with the largest portion of liberty must, in proportion to its numbers, be the most powerful nation upon earth; and that the tenure of power by man is, in the moral purposes of his Creator, upon condition that it shall be exercised to ends of beneficence, to improve the condition of himself and his fellow-men. While foreign nations, less blessed with that freedom which is power than ourselves, are advancing with gigantic strides in the career of public improvement, were we to slumber in indolence, or fold up our arms and proclaim to the world that we are palsied by the will of our constituents, would it not be to cast away the bounties of Providence, and doom ourselves to perpetual inferiority? In the course of the year now drawing to its close we have beheld, under the auspices and at the expense of one State of this Union, a new university unfolding its portals to the sons of science, and holding up the torch of human improvement to eyes that seek the light. We have seen, under the persevering and enlightened enterprise of another State, the waters of our western lakes mingled with those of the ocean. If undertakings like these have been accomplished in the compass of a few years, by the authority of single members of our Confederation, can we, the representative authorities of the whole Union, fall behind our fellow-servants in the exercise of the trust committed to us for the benefit of our common sovereign, by the accomplishment of works important to the whole, and to which neither the authority nor the resources of any one State can be adequate?

Finally, fellow-citizens, I shall await with cheering hope and faithful co-operation the result of your deliberations; assured that, without encroaching upon the powers reserved to the authorities of the respective States or to the people, you will, with a due sense of your obligations to your country, and of the high responsibilities weighing upon yourselves, give efficacy to the means committed to you for the common good. And may He who searches the hearts of the children of men prosper your exertions to secure the blessings of peace and promote the highest welfare of our country.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, December 6, 1825.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS WITH THE MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT, AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE 1ST SESSION, 19TH CONGRESS, FROM THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas a general convention of peace, amity, navigation, and commerce, between the United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, was concluded and signed at Bogota, on the third day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four; which convention, being in the English and Spanish languages, is, word for word, as follows:

General convention of peace, amity, navigation, and commerce, between the United States of America and the Republic of Colombia.

IN THE NAME OF GOD, AUTHOR AND LEGISLATOR OF THE UNIVERSE.

EN EL NOMBRE DE DIOS, AUTOR Y LEISLADOR DEL UNIVERSO.

The United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, desiring to make lasting and firm the friendship and good understanding which happily prevail between both nations, have resolved to fix, in a manner clear, distinct, and positive, the rules which shall in future be religiously observed between the one and the other, by means of a treaty or general convention of peace, friendship, commerce, and navigation.

For this most desirable object, the President of the United States of America has conferred full powers on RICHARD CLOUGH ANDERSON, junior, a citizen of the said States, and their Minister Plenipotentiary to the said republic; and the Vice President of the Republic of Colombia, charged with the Executive power, on PEDRO GUAL, Secretary of State and of Foreign Relations; who, after having exchanged their said full powers in due and proper form, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a perfect, firm, and inviolable peace and sincere friendship between the United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, in all the extent of their possessions and territories, and between their people and citizens, respectively, without distinction of persons or places.

ARTICLE 2. The United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, desiring to live in peace and harmony with all the other nations of the earth, by means of a policy frank and equally friendly with all, engage mutually not to grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect of commerce and navigation, which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same freely, if the concession was freely made, or on allowing the same compensation, if the concession was conditional.

ARTICLE 3. The citizens of the United States may frequent all the coasts and countries of the Republic of Colombia, and reside and trade there in all sorts of produce, manufactures, and merchandise, and shall pay no other or greater duties, charges, or fees whatsoever, than the most favored nation is or shall be obliged to pay; and they shall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and exemptions, in navigation and commerce which the most favored nation does or shall enjoy, submitting themselves, nevertheless, to the laws, decrees, and usages there established, and to which are submitted the subjects and citizens of the most favored nations.

In like manner the citizens of the Republic of La Republica de Colombia, y los Estados Unidos de America, deseando hacer duradera y firme la amistad y buena inteligencia que felizmente existe entre ambas Potencias, han resuelto fijar de una manera clara, distinta y positiva las reglas que deben observar religiosamente en lo venidero, por medio de un tratado o convencion jeneral de paz, amistad, comercio, y navegacion.

Con este muy deseable objeto, el Vice-Presedente de la Republica de Colombia encargado del poder Ejecutivo, ha conferido plenos poderes á PEDRO GUAL, Secretario de Estado y del Despacho de Relaciones Exteriores de la misma, y el Presidente de los Estados Unidos de America, á RICARDO CLOUGH ANDERSON, el menor, ciudadano de dichos Estados, y su Ministro Plenipotenciario cerca de la dicha Republica; quienes despues de haber canjeado sus espresados plenos poderes en debida y buena forma, han convenido en los articulos siguientes.

ARTICULO 1. Habra una paz, perfecta, firme, é inviolable y amistad sincera entre la Republica de Colombia y los Estados Unidos de America, en toda la estension de sus posesiones y territorios, y entre sus pueblos y ciudadanos respectivamente sin distincion de personas, ni lugares.

ARTICULO 2. La Republica de Colombia y los Estados Unidos de America, deseando vivir en paz y harmonia con las demas naciones de la tierra por medio de una politica franca, é igualmente amistosa con todas, se obligan mutuamente á no conceder favores particulares, á otras naciones, con respecto á comercio y navegacion, que no se hagan inmediatamente comun á una ú otra, quien gozara de los mismos libremente, si la concesion fuese hecha libremente ó prestando la misma compensacion, si la concesion fuere condicional.

ARTICULO 3. Los ciudadanos de la Republica de Colombia podrán frecuentar todas las costas y paises de los Estados Unidos de America, y residir, y traficar en ellos con toda suerte de producciones, manufacturas, y mercaderias, y no pagarán otros, ó mayores derechos, impuestos, ó emolumentos cualesquiera que los que las naciones mas favorecidas están ó estuvieren obligadas á pagar; y gozarán todos los derechos, privilegios y esenciones, que gozan ó gozaren los de la nacion mas favorecida, con respecto á navegacion y comercio, sometendose, no obstante, á las leyes, decretos, y usos establecidos, á los cuales estan sujetos los subditos ó ciudadanos de las naciones mas favorecidas. Del mis-

Colombia may frequent all the coasts and countries of the United States, and reside and trade there in all sorts of produce, manufactures, and merchandise, and shall pay no other or greater duties, charges, or fees whatsoever, than the most favored nation is or shall be obliged to pay; and they shall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and exemptions in navigation and commerce which the most favored nation does or shall enjoy, submitting themselves, nevertheless, to the laws, decrees, and usages there established, and to which are submitted the subjects and citizens of the most favored nations.

ARTICLE 4. It is likewise agreed that it shall be wholly free for all merchants, commanders of ships, and other citizens of both countries, to manage themselves their own business in all the ports and places subject to the jurisdiction of each other, as well with respect to the consignment and sale of their goods and merchandise by wholesale or retail, as with respect to the loading, unloading, and sending off their ships; they being in all these cases to be treated as citizens of the country in which they reside, or at least to be placed on a footing with the subjects or citizens of the most favored nation.

ARTICLE 5. The citizens of neither of the contracting parties shall be liable to any embargo, nor be detained with their vessels, cargoes, merchandises, or effects, for any military expedition, nor for any public or private purpose whatever, without allowing to those interested a sufficient indemnification.

ARTICLE 6. Whenever the citizens of either of the contracting parties shall be forced to seek refuge or asylum in the rivers, bays, ports, or dominions of the other, with their vessels, whether merchants or of war, public or private, through stress of weather, pursuit of pirates or enemies, they shall be received and treated with humanity, giving to them all favor and protection for repairing their ships, procuring provisions, and placing themselves in a situation to continue their voyage without obstacle or hindrance of any kind.

ARTICLE 7. All the ships, merchandise, and effects belonging to the citizens of one of the contracting parties, which may be captured by pirates, whether within the limits of its jurisdiction or on the high seas, and may be carried or found in the rivers, roads, bays, ports, or dominions of the other, shall be delivered up to the owners, they proving, in due and proper form, their rights before the competent tribunals; it being well understood that the claim should be made within the term of one year by the parties themselves, their attorneys, or agents of the respective Governments.

ARTICLE 8. When any vessel belonging to the citizens of either of the contracting parties shall be wrecked, foundered, or shall suffer any damage on the coasts, or within the dominions of the other, there shall be given to them all assistance and protection, in the same manner which is usual and customary with the vessels of the nation where the damage happens, permitting them to unload the said vessel, if necessary, of its merchandise and effects, without exacting for it any duty, impost, or contribution whatever, until they may be exported.

ARTICLE 9. The citizens of each of the contracting parties shall have power to dispose of their personal goods within the jurisdiction of the other, by sale, donation, testament, or otherwise; and their representatives, being citizens of the other party, shall succeed to their said personal goods, whether by testament or ab intestato, and they may take possession thereof, either by themselves or others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their will, paying such dues only as the inhabitants of the country wherein said goods are shall be subject to pay in like cases; and if, in the case of real estate, the said heirs would be prevented from entering into the mo modo los ciudadanos de los Estados Unidos de America podrán frecuentar todas las costas y países de la Republica de Colombia, y residir y traficar en ellos con toda suerte de producciones, manufacturas, y mercaderias, y no pagarán otros ó mayores derechos, impuestos, ó emolumentos cualesquiera, que los que las naciones mas favorecidas, están ó estuvieren obligadas à pagar y gozarán de todos los derechos privilegios y esenciones, que gozan ó gozaren los de la nacion mas favorecida con respecto à navegacion y comercio, sometiendo, no obstante à las leyes, decretos y usos establecidos à los cuales estan sujetos los subditos ó ciudadanos de las naciones mas favorecidas.

ARTICULO 4. Se conviene ademas, que será enteramente libre y permitido, a los comerciantes, comandantes de buques, y otros ciudadanos de ambos países el manejar sus negocios, por sí mismos, en todos los puertos y lugares sujetos à la jurisdiccion de uno ù otro, así respecto à las consignaciones y ventas por mayor y menor de sus efectos y mercaderias, como de la carga, descarga, y despacho de sus buques, debiendo en todos estos casos, ser tratados como ciudadanos del país en que residan, ó al menos puestos sobre un pie igual con los subditos ó ciudadanos de las naciones mas favorecidas.

ARTICULO 5. Los ciudadanos de una ù otra parte, no podrán ser embargados ni detenidos con sus embarcaciones, tripulaciones, mercaderias, y efectos comerciales de su pertenencia, para alguna expedicion militar, usos publicos, ó particulares cualesquiera que sean, sin conceder à los interesados una suficiente indemnizacion.

ARTICULO 6. Siempre que los ciudadanos de alguna de las partes contratantes se vieren precisados à buscar refugio, ó asilo en los rios, bahias, puertos, ó dominios de la otra, con sus buques, ya sean mercantes, ó de guerra, publicos ó particulares, por mal tiempo, persecucion de piratas ó enemigos, serán recibidos y tratados con humanidad, dandoles todo favor y proteccion, para reparar sus buques, procurar viveres, y ponerse en situacion de continuar su viaje, sin obstaculo ó estorbo de ningun genero.

ARTICULO 7. Todos los buques, mercaderias y efectos pertenecientes a los ciudadanos de una de las partes contratantes, que sean apresados por piratas, bien sea dentro de los limites de su jurisdiccion, ó en alta mar, y fueren llevados, ó hallados en los rios, radas, bahias, puertos, ó dominios de la otra, serán entregados à sus dueños, probando estos en la forma propia y debida sus derechos ante los tribunales competentes; bien entendido que el reclama ha de hacerse dentro del termino de un año, por las mismas partes, sus apoderados ó agentes de los respectivos Gobiernos.

ARTICULO 8. Cuando algun buque perteneciente à los ciudadanos de alguna de las partes contratantes, naufrague, encalle, ó sufra alguna averia, en las costas, ó dentro de los dominios de la otra, se les dará toda ayuda y proteccion, del mismo modo que es uso y costumbre, con los buques de la nacion en donde suceda la averia; permitiendoles descargàr el dicho buque (si fuere necesario) de sus mercaderias y efectos, sin cobrar por esto hasta que sean exportados, ningun derecho, impuesto ó contribucion.

ARTICULO 9. Los ciudadanos de cada una de las partes contratantes, tendrán pleno poder para disponer de sus bienes personales dentro de la jurisdiccion de la otra, por venta, donacion testamento, ó de otro modo; y sus representantes, siendo ciudadanos de la otra parte, sucederán à sus dichos bienes personales, ya sea por testamento ó ab intestato, y podran tomar posesion de ellos, ya sea por sí mismos ó por otros, que obren por ellos, y disponer de los mismos, segun su voluntad, pagando aquellas cargas, solamente, que los habitantes del país en donde estan los referidos bienes, estuvieren sujetos à pagar en iguales casos; y si en el caso de bienes possession of the inheritance on account of their character of aliens, there shall be granted to them the term of three years to dispose of the same as they may think proper, and to withdraw the proceeds without molestation, and exempt from all rights of detraction on the part of the Government of the respective States.

ARTICLE 10. Both the contracting parties promise and engage formally to give their special protection to the persons and property of the citizens of each other, of all occupations, who may be in the territories subject to the jurisdiction of the one or the other, transient or dwelling therein, leaving open and free to them the tribunals of justice for their judicial recourse, on the same terms which are usual and customary with the natives or citizens of the country in which they may be; for which they may employ, in defence of their rights, such advocates, solicitors, notaries, agents and factors, as they may judge proper in all their trials at law; and such citizens or agents shall have free opportunity to be present at the decisions and sentences of the tribunals in all cases which may concern them, and likewise at the taking of all examinations and evidence which may be exhibited in the said trials.

ARTICLE 11. It is likewise agreed that the most perfect and entire security of conscience shall be enjoyed by the citizens of both the contracting parties in the countries subject to the jurisdiction of the one and the other, without their being liable to be disturbed or molested on account of their religious belief, so long as they respect the laws and established usages of the country. Moreover, the bodies of the citizens of one of the contracting parties who may die in the territories of the other shall be buried in the usual burying grounds, or in other decent and suitable places, and shall be protected from violation or disturbance.

ARTICLE 12. It shall be lawful for the citizens of the United States of America and of the Republic of Colombia to sail with their ships with all manner of liberty and security, no distinction being made who are the proprietors of the merchandises laden thereon, from any port to the places of those who are now, or hereafter shall be, at enmity with either of the contracting parties. It shall likewise be lawful for the citizens aforesaid to sail with the ships and merchandises before mentioned, and to trade with the same liberty and security from the places, ports, and havens of those who are enemies of both or either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatsoever, not only directly from the places of the enemy before mentioned to neutral places, but also from one place belonging to an enemy to another place belonging to an enemy, whether they be under the jurisdiction of one power or under several. And it is hereby stipulated that free ships shall also give freedom to goods, and that everything shall be deemed to be free and exempt which shall be found on board the ships belonging to the citizens of either of the contracting parties, although the whole lading, or any part thereof, should appertain to the enemies of either, contraband goods being always excepted. It is also agreed in like manner that the same liberty be extended to persons who are on board a free ship, with this effect, that, although they be enemies to both or either party, they are not to be taken out of that free ship unless they are officers and soldiers, and in the actual service of the enemies: Provided, however, and it is hereby agreed, That the stipulations in this article contained, declaring that the flag shall cover the property, shall be understood as applying to those powers only who recognize this principle; but if either of the two contracting parties shall be at war with a third, and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral shall cover the property of enemies whose Governments acknowledge this principle, and not of others.

raices, los dichos herederos fuesen impedidos de entrar en la posesion de la herencia por razon de su caracter de extranjeros, se les dará el termino de tres años, para disponer de ella como juzguen conveniente, y para extraer el producto sin molestia, y esentos de todo derecho de deducción, por parte del Gobierno de los respectivos Estados.

ARTICULO 10. Ambas partes contratantes se comprometen y obligan formalmente á dar su proteccion especial á las personas y propiedades de los ciudadanos de cada una reciprocamente transeuntes ó habitantes de todas ocupaciones, en los territorios sujetos á la jurisdiccion de una y otra, dejandoles abiertos y libres los tribunales de justicia, para sus recursos judiciales, en los mismos terminos que son de uso y costumbre para los naturales ó ciudadanos del país en que residan; para lo cual, podrán emplear en defensa de sus derechos aquellos abogados, procuradores, escribanos, agentes, ó factores que juzguen conveniente, en todos sus asuntos y litigios; y dichos ciudadanos ó agentes tendrán la libre facultad de estar presentes en las decisiones y sentencias de los tribunales, en todos los casos que les conciernan, como igualmente al tomar todos los exámenes y declaraciones que se ofrezcan en los dichos litigios.

ARTICULO 11. Se conviene igualmente en que los ciudadanos de ambas partes contratantes gozen la mas perfecta y entera seguridad de consciencia en los países sujetos á la jurisdiccion de una ú otra, sin quedar por ello espuestos á ser inquietados ó molestados en razon de su creencia religiosa, mientras que respeten las leyes y usos establecidos. Ademas de esto, podrán sepultarse los cadaveres de los ciudadanos de una de las partes contratantes, que fallecieren en los territorios de la otra, en los cementerios acostumbrados, ó en otros lugares decentes, y adecuados, los cuales, serán protejidos contra toda violacion ó trastorno.

ARTICULO 12. Será lícito a los ciudadanos de la Republica de Colombia, y de los Estados Unidos de America, navegár con sus buques, con toda seguridad y libertad, de cualquiera puerto á las plazas ó lugares de los que son ó fueren en adelante enemigos de cualquiera de las dos partes contratantes, sin hacerse distincion de quienes son los dueños de las mercaderias cargadas en ellos. Será igualmente lícito á los referidos ciudadanos navegár con sus buques y mercaderias mencionadas y traficár con la misma libertad y seguridad, de los lugares, puertos y enseñadas de los enemigos de ambas partes, ó de alguna de ellas, sin ninguna oposicion, ó disturbio cualquiera, no solo directamente de los lugares de enemigo arriba mencionados á lugares neutros, sino tambien de un lugar perteneciente á un enemigo, á otro enemigo, ya sea que esten bajo la jurisdiccion de una potencia, ó bajo la de diversas. Y queda aqui estipulado, que los buques libres, dan tambien libertad á las mercaderias, y que se ha de considerar libre y esento todo lo que se hallare á bordo de los buques pertenecientes á los ciudadanos de cualquiera de las partes contratantes, aunque toda la carga ó parte de ella pertenezca á enemigos de una ú otra, exceptuando siempre los articulos de contrabando de guerra. Se conviene tambien del mismo modo, en que la misma libertad se estienda á las personas que se encuentren á bordo de buques libres, con el fin de que aunque dichas personas sean enemigos de ambas partes ó de alguna de ellas, no deban ser extraidos de los buques libres, à menos que sean oficiales ó soldados en actual servicio de los enemigos: á condicion no obstante, y se conviene aqui en esto, que las estipulaciones contenidas en el presente articulo, declarando que el pabellon cubre la propiedad, se entenderán aplicables solamente á aquellas potencias que reconocen este principio; pero si alguna de las dos partes contratantes, estuviere en guerra con una tercera, y la otra permaneciese neutral, la bandera de la neutral cubrirá la propiedad de los enemigos, cuyos Gobiernos reconozcan este principio y no de otros.

ARTICLE 13. It is likewise agreed, that, in the case where the neutral flag of one of the contracting parties shall protect the property of the enemies of the other by virtue of the above stipulation, it shall always be understood that the neutral property found on board such enemy's vessels shall be held and considered as enemy's property, and as such shall be liable to detention and confiscation, except such property as was put on board such vessel before the declaration of war, or even afterwards, if it were done without the knowledge of it; but the contracting parties agree that two months having elapsed after the declaration, their citizens shall not plead ignorance thereof. On the contrary, if the flag of the neutral does not protect the enemy's property, in that case the goods and merchandises of the neutral embarked in such enemy's ships shall be free.

ARTICLE 14. This liberty of navigation and commerce shall extend to all kinds of merchandises, excepting those only which are distinguished by the name of contraband, and under this name of contraband or prohibited goods shall be comprehended—

1st. Cannons, mortars, howitzers, swivels, blunderbusses, muskets, fuzees, rifles, carbines, pistols, pikes, swords, sabres, lances, spears, halberds, and grenades, bombs, powder, matches, balls, and all other things belonging to the use of these arms.

2d. Bucklers, helmets, breast plates, coats of mail, infantry belts, and clothes made up in the form and for a military use.

3d. Cavalry belts and horses with their furniture.

4th. And generally all kinds of arms and instruments of iron, steel, brass, and copper, or of any other materials manufactured, prepared, and formed expressly to make war by sea or land.

ARTICLE 15. All other merchandises and things not comprehended in the articles of contraband explicitly enumerated and classified as above shall be held and considered as free, and subjects of free and lawful commerce, so that they may be carried and transported in the freest manner by both the contracting parties, even to places belonging to an enemy, excepting only those places which are at that time besieged or blockaded up; and to avoid all doubt in this particular, it is declared that those places only are besieged or blockaded which are actually attacked by a belligerent force capable of preventing the entry of the neutral.

ARTICLE 16. The articles of contraband before enumerated and classified, which may be found in a vessel bound for an enemy's port, shall be subject to detention and confiscation, leaving free the rest of the cargo and the ship, that the owners may dispose of them as they see proper. No vessel of either of the two nations shall be detained on the high seas on account of having on board articles of contraband, whenever the master, captain, or supercargo of said vessel will deliver up the articles of contraband to the captor, unless the quantity of such articles be so great and of so large a bulk that they cannot be received on board the capturing ship without great inconvenience; but, in this and in all other cases of just detention, the vessel detained shall be sent to the nearest convenient and safe port, for trial and judgment, according to law.

ARTICLE 17. And whereas it frequently happens that vessels sail for a port or place belonging to an enemy without knowing that the same is besieged, blockaded, or invested, it is agreed that every vessel so circumstanced may be turned away from such port or place, but shall not be detained, nor shall any part of her cargo, if not contraband, be confiscated, unless, after warning of such blockade or investment from the commanding officer of the blockading forces, she ARTICULO 13. So conviene igualmente que en el caso de que la bandera neutral de una de las partes contratantes proteja las propiedades de los enemigos de la otra en virtud de lo estipulado arriba, deberá siempre entenderse, que las propiedades neutrales encontradas á bordo de tales buques enemigos, han de tenerse y considerarse como propiedades enemigos, y como tales, estarán sujetas á detencion, y confiscacion; eseptuando solamente aquellas propiedades que hubiesen sido puestas á bordo de tales buques antes de la declaracion de la guerra, y aun despues, si hubiesen sido embarcadas en dichos buques, sin tener noticia de la guerra; y se conviene, que pasados dos meses despues de la declaracion, los ciudadanos de una y otra parte no podrán elegår que la ignoraban. Por el contrario, si la bandera neutral, no protegiese las propiedades enemigos, entonces seràn libres los efectos y mercaderias de la parte neutral embarcadas en buques enemigos.

ARTICULO 14. Esta libertad de navegacion y comercio se estenderà a todo genero de mercaderias, eceptuando aquellas solamente, que se distinguen con el nombre de contrabando, y bajo este nombre de contrabando ó efectos prohibidos se comprenderàn:

1º. Cañones, morteros, obuces, pedreros, trabucos, mosquetes, fusiles, rifles, carabinas, pistolas, picas, espadas, sables, lanzas, chuzos, alabardas, y granadas, bombas, polvora, mechas, balas, con las demas cosas correspondientes al uso de estas armas.

2º. Escudos, casquetes, corazas, cotas de malla, fornituras, y vestidos hechos en forma, y á usanza militar.

3º. Bandoleras, y caballos junto con sus armas y arneses.

ARTICULO 15. Todas las demas mercaderias, y efectos no comprendidos en los articulos de contrabando explicitamente enumerados, y clasificados en el articulo anterior, seràn tenidos y reputados por libres, y de licito y libre comercio, de modo, que ellos puedan sér transportados, y llevados, de la manera mas libre, por los ciudadanos de ambas partes contratantes, aun á los lugares pertenecientes á un enemigo de una ù otra, eceptuando solamente aquellos lugares ó plazas, que estàn al mismo tiempo sitiadas ó bloqueadas; y para evitar toda duda en el particular, se declaran sitiadas ó bloqueadas àquellas plazas, que en la actualidad estuviesen atacadas por una fuerza de un beligerante capaz de impedir la entrada del neutral.

ARTICULO 16. Los articulos de contrabando antes enumerados y clasificados, que se hallen en un buque destinado á detencion y confiscacion; dejando libre el resto del cargamento y el buque, para que los dueños puedan disponer de ellos como lo crean conveniente. Ningun buque de cualquiera de las dos naciones, será detenido, por tener á bordo articulos de contrabando, siempre que el maestre, capitan, ó sobrecargo de dicho buque quiera entregar los articulos de contrabando al apresador, à menos que la cantidad de estos articulos sea tan grande y de tanto volumen, que no puedan sér recibidos á bordo del buque apresador, sin grandes inconvenientes; pero en este, como en todos los otros casos de justa detencion, el buque detenido serà enviado al puerto mas inmediato, comodo, y seguro, para ser juzgado y sentenciado conforme à las leyes.

ARTICULO 17. Y por cuanto frecuentemente sucede que los buques navegan para un puerto ó lugar perteneciente à un enemigo, sin saber que aquel esté sitiado, bloqueado ó investido, se conviene en que todo buque en estas circunstancias se pueda hacer volver de dicho puerto, ó lugar; pero no serà detenido, ni confiscada parte alguna de su cargamento, no siendo contrabando; à menos que despues de la intimacion de semejante bloqueo ó ataque, por el comanshall again attempt to enter; but she shall be permitted to go to any other port or place she shall think proper. Nor shall any vessel of either, that may have entered into such port before the same was actually besieged, blockaded, or invested by the other, be restrained from quitting such place with her cargo, nor, if found therein after the reduction and surrender, shall such vessel or her cargo be liable to confiscation, but they shall be restored to the owners thereof.

ARTICLE 18 In order to prevent all kind of disorder in the visiting and examination of the ships and cargoes of both the contracting parties on the high seas, they have agreed mutually, that whenever a vessel-of-war, public or private, shall meet with a neutral of the other contracting party, the first shall remain out of cannon shot, and may send its boat, with two or three men only, in order to execute the said examination of the papers concerning the ownership and cargo of the vessel, without causing the least extortion, violence, or ill treatment, for which the commanders of the said armed ships shall be responsible with their persons and property; for which purpose, the commanders of said private armed vessels shall, before receiving their commissions, give sufficient security to answer for all the damages they may commit. And it is expressly agreed that the neutral party shall in no case be required to go on board the examining vessel for the purpose of exhibiting her papers, or for any other purpose whatever.

ARTICLE 19. To avoid all kind of vexation and abuse in the examination of the papers relating to the ownership of the vessels belonging to the citizens of the two contracting parties, they have agreed, and do agree, that in case one of them should be engaged in war, the ships and vessels belonging to the citizens of the other must be furnished with sea letters, or passports, expressing the name, property, and bulk of the ship, as also the name and place of habitation of the master or commander of said vessel, in order that it may thereby appear that the ship really and truly belongs to the citizens of one of the parties; they have likewise agreed that, such ships being laden, besides the said sea letters or passports, shall also be provided with certificates, containing the several particulars of the cargo, and the place whence the ship sailed, so that it may be known whether any forbidden or contraband goods be on board the same; which certificates shall be made out by the officers of the place whence the ship sailed, in the accustomed form; without which requisites, said vessel may be detained, to be adjudged by the competent tribunal, and may be declared legal prize, unless the said defects shall be satisfied or supplied by testimony entirely equivalent.

ARTICLE 20. It is further agreed, that the stipulations above expressed, relative to the visiting and examination of vessels, shall apply only to those which sail without convoy; and when said vessels shall be under convoy, the verbal declaration of the commander of the convoy, on his word of honor, that the vessels under his protection belong to the nation whose flag he carries, and, when they are bound to an enemy's port, that they have no contraband goods on board, shall be sufficient.

ARTICLE 21. It is further agreed, that in all cases the established courts for the prize causes, in the country to which the prizes may be conducted, shall alone take cognizance of them. And whenever such tribunal of either party shall pronounce judgment against any vessel or goods or property claimed by the citizens of the other party, the sentence or decree shall mention the reasons or motives on which the same shall have been founded, and an authenticated copy of the sentence or decree, and of all the proceedings in the case, shall, if demanded, dante de las fuerzas bloqueadoras, intentase otra vez entrar; pero le será permitido ir á qualquiera otro puerto ó lugar que juzque conveniente. Ni ningun buque de una de las partes, que haya entrado en semejante puerto, ó lugar, antes que estuviere sitiado, bloqueado, ó investido por la otra, sera impedido de dejar el tal lugar con su cargamento, ni si fuere hallado allí despues de la rendicion y entrega de semejante lugar, estará el tal buque ó su cargamento sujeto á confiscacion, sino que serán restituidos á sus dueños.

ARTICULO 18. Para evitar todo genero de desorden en la visita, y examen de los buques y cargamentos de ambas partes contratantes en alta mar, han convenido mutuamente, que siempre que un buque de guerra, publico ó particular se emontrase con un neutral de la otra parte contrante, el primero permanecerá fuera de tiro de cañon, y podrá mandar su bote, condos ó tres hombres solamente, para ejecutar el dicho examen de los papeles concernientes á la propiedad y carga del buque, sin ocasionar la menor estorcion violencia ó mal tratamiento, por lo que los comandantes del dicho buque armado serán responsables, con sus personas y bienes; á cuyo efecto los comandantes de buques armados, por cuenta de particulares, estarán obligados antes de entregarseles sus comisiones ó patentes, á dar fianza suficiente para responder de los perjuicios que causen. Y se ha convenido espresamente, que en ningun caso se exigira á la parte neutral, que vaya á bordo del buque examinador con el fin de exhibir sus papeles, ó para cualquiera otro objeto sea el que fuere.

ARTICULO 19. Para evitar toda clase de vejamen y abuso en el examen de los papeles relativos á la propiedad de los buques pertenecientes á los ciudadanos de las dos partes contratantes, han convenido y convenien, que en caso de que una de ellas estuviere en guerra, los buques, y bajeles pertenecientes á los ciudadanos de la otra, serán provistos con letras de mar, ó pasaportes, espresando el nombre, propiedad y tamaño del buque, como tambien el nombre y lugar de la residencia del maestre, ó comandante, á fin de que se vea que el buque, real y verdaderamente, pertenece á los ciudadanos de una de las partes; y han convenido igualmente, que estando cargados los espresados buques, ademas de las letras de mar, ó pasaportes, estarán tambien provistos de certificados, que contengan los por menores del cargamento, y el lugar de donde salió el buque, para que asi pueda saberse, si hay á su bordo algunos efectos prohibidos ó de contrabando, cuyos certificados serán hechos per los oficiales del lugar de la procedencia del buque, en la forma acostumbrada, sin cuyos requisitos el dicho buque puede ser detenido, para ser juzgado por el Tribunal competente, y puede ser declarado buena presa, á menos que satisfagan, ó suplan el defecto con testimonios enteramente equivalentes.

ARTICULO 20. Se ha convenido ademas, que las estipulaciones anteriores, relativas al examen y visita de buques, se aplicarán solamente á los que navegan sin conboy y que cuando los dichos buques estuvieren bajo de conboy, será bastante la declaracion verbal del comandante del conboy, bajo su palabra de honor, de que los buques que están bajo su proteccion pertenecen á la nacion, cuya bandera llevan, y cuando se dirijen á un puerto enemigo, que los dichos buques no tienen á su bordo articulos de contrabando de guerra.

ARTICULO 21. Se ha convenido ademas, que en todos los casos que ocurran, solo los Tribunales establecidos para causas de presas, en el país á que las presas sean conducidas, tomarán conocimiento de ellas. Y siempre que semejante tribunal de cualquiera de las partes, pronunciasse sentencia contra algun buque ó efectos, ó propiedad reclamada por los ciudadanos de la otra parte, la sentencia ó decreto hará mencion de las razones ó motivos en que aquella se haya fundado, y se entregará sin demora alguna al comandante ó agente de dicho

ARTICLE 22. Whenever one of the contracting parties shall be engaged in war with another State, no citizen of the other contracting party shall accept a commission, or letter of marque, for the purpose of assisting or co-operating hostilely with the said enemy against the said party so at war, under the pain of being treated as a pirate.

ARTICLE 23. If, by any fatality, which cannot be expected, and which God forbid, the two contracting parties should be engaged in war with each other, they have agreed, and do agree, now for then, that there shall be allowed the term of six months to the merchants residing on the coasts and in the ports of each other, and the term of one year to those who dwell in the interior, to arrange their business and transport their effects wherever they please, giving to them the safe conduct necessary for it, which may serve as a sufficient protection until they arrive at the designated port. The citizens of all other occupations, who may be established in the territories or dominions of the United States and of the Republic of Colombia, shall be respected and maintained in the full enjoyment of their personal liberty and property, unless their particular conduct shall cause them to forfeit this protection, which, in consideration of humanity, the contracting parties engage to give them.

ARTICLE 24. Neither the debts due from individuals of the one nation to the individuals of the other, nor shares nor moneys which they may have in public funds, nor in public or private banks, shall ever, in any event of war or of national difference, be sequestered or confiscated.

ARTICLE 25. Both the contracting parties, being desirous of avoiding all inequality in relation to their public communications and official intercourse, have agreed, and do agree, to grant to the envoys, ministers, and other public agents, the same favors, immunities, and exemptions which those of the most favored nation do or shall enjoy; it being understood that whatever favors, immunities, or privileges the United States of America or the Republic of Colombia may find it proper to give to the ministers and public agents of any other power, shall by the same act be extended to those of each of the contracting parties.

ARTICLE 26. To make more effectual the protection which the United States and the Republic of Colombia shall afford in future to the navigation and commerce of the citizens of each other, they agree to receive and admit consuls and vice consuls in all the ports open to foreign commerce, who shall enjoy in them all the rights, prerogatives, and immunities of the consuls and vice consuls of the most favored nation, each contracting party, however, remaining at liberty to except those ports and places in which the admission and residence of such consuls may not seem convenient.

ARTICLE 27. In order that the consuls and vice consuls of the two contracting parties may enjoy the rights, prerogatives, and immunities which belong to them by their public character, they shall, before entering on the exercise of their functions, exhibit their commission or patent in due form to the Government to which they are accredited, and having obtained their exequatur, they shall be held and considered as such by all the authorities, magistrates, and inhabitants in the consular district in which they reside.

ARTICLE 28. It is likewise agreed that the consuls, their secretaries, officers, and persons attached to the service of consuls, they not being citizens of the country in which the consul resides, shall be exempt from all public service, and also from all kind of taxes, imposts, and contributions, except those which buque, si lo solicitase, un testimonio autentico de la sentencia, ó decreto, ó de todo el proceso, pagando por él los derechos legales.

ARTICULO 22. Siempre que una de las partes contratantes estuviere empeñada en guerra, con otro Estado, ningun ciudadano de la otra parte contratante aceptara una comision ó letra de marca para el objeto de ayudar ó co-operar hostilmente con el dicho enemigo, contra la dicha parte que esté asi en guerra, bajo la pena de ser tratado como pirata.

ARTICULO 23. Si por alguna fatalidad, que no puede esperarse, y que Dios no permita, las dos partes contratantes se viesen empeñadas en guerra una con otra, han convenido y convienen de ahora para entonces, que se concederá el termino de seis meses á los comerciantes residentes en las costas y en los puertos de entrambas, y el termino de un año á los que habitan en el interior, para arreglar sus negocios, y transportar sus efectos á donde quieran, dandoles el salvo conducto necesario para ello, que les sirva de suficiente proteccion hasta que lleguen al puerto que designen. Los ciudadanos de otras ocupaciones, que se hallen establecidos en los territorios ó dominios de la Republica de Colombia, ó los Estados Unidos de America, serán respetados, y mantenidos en el pleno goze de su libertad personal y propiedad, á menos que su conducta particular les haga perder esta proteccion, que en consideracion á la humanidad, las partes contratantes se comprometen á prestarles.

ARTICULO 24. Ni las deudas contraidas por los individuos de una nacion, con los individuos de la otra, ni las acciones ó dineros, que puedan tener en los fondos publicos, ó en los bancos publicos, ó privados, serán jamas secuestrados ó confiscados en ningun caso de guerra, ó diferencia nacional.

ARTICULO 25. Deseando ambas partes contratantes, evitar toda diferencia, relativa á etiqueta en sus comunicaciones, y correspondencias diplomaticas han convenido asi mismo, y convienen en conceder á sus enviados, ministros, y otros agentes diplomaticos, los mismos favores, inmunidades, y esenciones de que gozan, ó gozaren en lo venidero los de las naciones mas favorecidas, bien entendido que cualquier favor, inmunidad ó privilegio, que la Republica de Colombia ó los Estados Unidos de America, tengan por conveniente dispensar á los enviados, ministros, y agentes diplomaticos de otras potencias, se haga por el mismo hecho extensivo á los de una y otra de las partes contratantes.

ARTICULO 26. Para hacer mas efectiva la proteccion, que la Republica de Colombia, y los Estados Unidos de America, daran en adelante á la navegacion y comercio de los ciudadanos de una y otra, se convienen en recibir y admitir consules, y vice consules en todos los puertos abiertos al comercio extranjero, quienes gozarán en ellos todos los derechos, prerogativas é inmunidades de los consules, y vice consules de la nacion mas favorecida, quedando no obstante en libertad cada parte contratante, para exceptuar aquellos puertos y lugares en que la admision y residencia de semejantes consules, y vice consules no parezca conveniente.

ARTICULO 27. Para que los consules y vice consules de las dos parte contratantes, puedan gozar los derechos, prerogativas, é inmunidades, que les corresponden por su caracter publico, antes de entrar en el ejercicio de sus funciones, presentarán su comision ó patente en la forma debida, al Gobierno con quien esten acreditados, y habiendo obtenido el exequatur, serán tenidos, y considerados como tales, por todas las autoridades, majistrados y habitantes del distrito consular en que residan.

ARTICULO 28. Se ha convenido igualmente, que los consules, sus secretarios, oficiales y personas agregadas al servicio de los consulados (no siendo estas personas ciudadanos del pais en que el consul reside) estarán esentos de todo servicio publico, y tambien de toda especie de pechos, impuestos, y contributhey shall be obliged to pay on account of commerce or their property, to which the citizens and inhabitants, native and foreign, of the country in which they reside are subject, being in everything besides subject to the laws of the respective States. The archives and papers of the consulate shall be respected inviolably, and under no pretext whatever shall any magistrate seize or in any way interfere with them.

ARTICLE 29. The said consuls shall have power to require the assistance of the authorities of the country for the arrest, detention, and custody of deserters from the public and private vessels of their country; and for that purpose they shall address themselves to the courts, judges, and officers competent, and shall demand the said deserters in writing, proving, by an exhibition of the registers of the vessel's or ship's roll, or other public documents, that those men were part of the said crews; and on this demand, so proved, (saving, however, where the contrary is proved,) the delivery shall not be refused. Such deserters, when arrested, shall be put at the disposal of the said consuls, and may be put in the public prisons at the request and expense of those who reclaim them, to be sent to the ships to which they belonged, or to others of the same nation. But if they be not sent back within two months, to be counted from the day of their arrest, they shall be set at liberty, and shall be no more arrested for the same cause.

ARTICLE 30. For the purpose of more effectually protecting their commerce and navigation, the two contracting parties do hereby agree, as soon hereafter as circumstances will permit them, to form a consular convention, which shall declare specially the powers and immunities of the consuls and vice consuls of the respective parties.

ARTICLE 31. The United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, desiring to make as durable as circumstances will permit the relations which are to be established between the two parties by virtue of this treaty or general convention of peace, amity, commerce, and navigation, have declared solemnly and do agree to the following points:

1st. The present treaty shall remain in full force and virtue for the term of twelve years, to be counted from the day of the exchange of the ratifications, in all the parts relating to commerce and navigation; and in all those parts which relate to peace and friendship, it shall be permanently and perpetually binding on both powers.

2d. If any one or more of the citizens of either party shall infringe any of the articles of this treaty, such citizen shall be held personally responsible for the same, and the harmony and good correspondence between the two nations shall not be interrupted thereby; each party engaging in no way to protect the offender or sanction such violation.

3d. If, (what, indeed, cannot be expected,) unfortunately, any of the articles contained in the present treaty shall be violated or infringed in any other way whatever, it is expressly stipulated that neither of the contracting parties will order or authorize any acts of reprisal, nor declare war against the other, on complaints of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended shall first have presented to the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verified by competent proof, and demanded justice and satisfaction, and the same shall have been either refused or unreasonably delayed.

4th. Nothing in this treaty contained shall, however, be construed or operate contrary to former and existing public treaties with other sovereigns or States.

The present treaty of peace, amity, commerce, and navigation, shall be approved and ratified by the President of the United States of America, by ciones, eceptuando aquellas que esten obligados á pagar por razon de comercio, o propiedad y á las cuales estan sujetos los ciudadanos, y habitantes naturales, y estrangeros del pais en que residen, quedando en todo lo demas, sujetos a las leyes de los respectivos Estados. Los archivos y papeles de los consulados serán respetados inviolablemente, y bajo ningun pretexto los ocupara magistrado alguno, ni tendrá en ellos ninguna intervencion.

ARTICULO 29. Los dichos consules tendrán poder de requerir el auxilio de las autoridades locales, para la prision, detencion y custodia de los desertores de buques publicos y particulares de su país, y para este objeto se dirigirán á los tribunales, jueces, y oficiales competentes, y pedirán los dichos desertores por escrito, probando por una presentacion de los registros de los buques, rol del equipage, ú otros documentos publicos, que aquellos, hombres eran parte de las dichas tripulaciones, y á esta demanda asi probada (menos no obstante cuando seprobare lo contrario) no se reusará la entrega. Semijantes desertores, luego que sean arrestados, se pondrán á disposicion de los dichos consules, y pueden ser depositados en las prisiones publicas, a solicitud y expensas de los que los reclamen, para ser enviados á los buques á que corresponden, ó á otros de la misma nacion. Pero si nó fueren mandados dentro de dos meses contados des de el dia de su arresto, serán puestos en libertad, y no volverán a ser presos por la misma causa.

ARTICULO 30. Para protegér mas efectivamente su comercio y navegacion, las dos partes contratantes se convienen en formar luego que las circunstancias lo permitan, una convencion consular, que declare mas especialmente los poderes é inmunidades de los consules y vice consules de las partes respectivas.

ARTICULO 31. La Republica de Colombia y los Estados Unidos de America, deseando hacer tan duraderas y firmes, como las circunstancias lo permitan las relaciones que han de establecerse entre las dos potencias, en virtud del presente tratado ó convencion general de paz, amistad, navegacion, y comercio, han declarado solemnemente y convienen en los puntos siguientes:

1º. El presente tratado permanecerá en su fuerza y vigor por el termino de doce años contados desde el dia del cange de las ratificaciones, en todos los puntos concernientes á comercio y navegacion, y en todos los demas puntos que se refieren á paz y amistad, será permanente, y perpetuamente obligatorio para ambas potencias.

2º. Si alguno, ó algunos de los ciudadanos de una ú otra parte infringiesen alguno de los articulos contenidos en el presente tratado, dichos ciudadanos serán personalmente responsables, sin que por esto se interrumpa la armonia y buena correspondencia entre las dos naciones, comprometiendose cada una á no protegér de modo alguno al ofensor, ó sancionár semejante violacion.

3º. Si (lo que á la verdad no puede esperarse) desgraciadamente, alguno de los articulos contenidos en el presente tratado, fuesen en alguna otra manera violados, ó infringidos, se estipula espresamente que ninguna de las dos partes contratantes, ordenará, ó autorizará ningunos actos de represalia, ni declarará la guerra contra la otra por quejas de injurias, ó daños, hasta que la parte que se crea ofendida, haya antes presentado á la otra una exposicion de aquellas injurias, ó daños, verificada con pruebas y testimonios competentes, exigiendo justicia y satisfaccion, y esto haya sido negado, ó diferido sin razon.

4º. Nada de cuanto se contiene en el presente tratado, se construirá sin embargo, ni obrará, en contra de otros tratados publicos anteriores, y existentes con otros soberanos ó Estados.

El presente tratado de paz, amistad, navegacion, y comercio, será ratificado por el Presidente ó Vice Presidente de la Republica de Colombia, encar-and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by the President of the Republic of Colombia, with the consent and approbation of the Congress of the same, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in the city of Washington, within eight months, to be counted from the date of the signature hereof, or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof, we, the plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and of the Republic of Colombia, have signed and sealed these presents.

Done in the city of Bogota, on the third day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, in the forty-ninth year of the Independence of the United States of America and the fourteenth of that of the Republic of Colombia.

[1ST SESSION.]

GENERAL CONVENTION OF PEACE, AMITY, COMMERCE, AND NAVIGATION, WITH THE FEDERATION OF THE CENTRE OF AMERICA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, IN EXECUTIVE SESSION, DECEMBER 15, 1825, AND THE INJUNCTION OF SECRECY SINCE REMOVED.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith to the Senate, for its consideration, in reference to its ratification, a general convention of peace, amity, commerce, and navigation, between the United States of America and the Federation of the Centre of America, signed at this place, on the fifth instant, by the Secretary of State and the Minister Plenipotentiary from the Republic of Central America to the United States.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, December 15, 1825.

Convencion general de paz, amistad, commercio, y navegacion, entre la Confederacion de Centro-America i los Estados Unidos de America.

The United States of America and the Federation of the Centre of America, desiring to make firm and permanent the peace and friendship which happily prevails between both nations, have resolved to fix, in a manner clear, distinct, and positive, the rules which shall in future be religiously observed between the one and the other, by means of a treaty or general convention of peace, friendship, commerce, and navigation.

For this most desirable object, the President of the United States of America has conferred full powers on HENRY CLAY, their Secretary of State; and the Executive Power of the Federation of the Centre of America, on ANTONIO JOSÉ CANAS, a Deputy of the Constituent National Assembly for the Province of San Salvador, and Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of that Republic near the United

La Federacion de Centro-America i los Estados Unidos de America, deseando hacer firme i permanente la paz i amistad que felizmente existe entre ambas potencias, han resuelto fijar, de una manera clara, distinta, y positiva, las reglas que deben observar religiosamente en lo venidero, per medio du un tratado ó convencion general de paz, amistad, comercio, y navegacion.

Con este muy deseable objeto, el Poder Ejecutivo de la Federacion de Centro-America ha conferidos plenos poderes à ANTONIO JOSÉ CANAS, Diputado de la Asamblea Nacional Constituyente por la Provincia de San Salvador, i Enviado Extraordinario i Ministro Plenipotenciario de la aquella Republica cerca de los Estados Unidos; y el Presidente de los Estados Unidos de America à HENRICO CLAY, su Secretario

States; who, after having exchanged their said full powers in due and proper form, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a perfect, firm, and inviolable peace and sincere friendship between the United States of America and the Federation of the Centre of America, in all the extent of their possessions and territories, and between their people and citizens, respectively, without distinction of persons or places.

ARTICLE 2. The United States of America and the Federation of the Centre of America, desiring to live in peace and harmony with all the other nations of the earth, by means of a policy frank and equally friendly with all, engage mutually not to grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect of commerce and navigation, which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same freely, if the concession was freely made, or on allowing the same compensation, if the concession was conditional.

ARTICLE 3. The two high contracting parties, being likewise desirous of placing the commerce and navigation of their respective countries on the liberal basis of perfect equality and reciprocity, mutually agree that the citizens of each may frequent all the coasts and countries of the other, and reside and trade there, in all kind of produce, manufactures, and merchandise; and they shall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and exemptions, in navigation and commerce, which native citizens do or shall enjoy, submitting themselves to the laws, decrees, and usages there established, to which native citizens are subjected. But it is understood that this article does not include the coasting trade of either country, the regulation of which is reserved by the parties, respectively, according to their own separate laws.

ARTICLE 4. They likewise agree that whatever kind of produce, manufacture, or merchandise, of any foreign country, can be, from time to time, lawfully imported into the United States, in their own vessels, may be also imported in vessels of the Federation of the Centre of America; and that no higher or other duties, upon the tonnage of the vessel, or her cargo, shall be levied and collected, whether the importation be made in vessels of the one country or of the other; and, in like manner, that whatever kind of produce, manufactures, or merchandise, of any foreign country, can be, from time to time, lawfully imported into the Central Republic, in its own vessels, may be also imported in vessels of the United States, and that no higher or other duties, upon the tonnage of the vessel, or her cargo, shall be levied and collected, whether the importation be made in vessels of the one country or of the other. And they further agree, that whatever may be lawfully exported or re-exported, from the one country, in its own vessels, to any foreign country, may, in like manner, be exported or re-exported in the vessels of the other country. And the same bounties, duties, and drawbacks shall be allowed and collected, whether such exportation or re-exportation be made in vessels of the United States or of the Central Republic.

ARTICLE 5. No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any articles the produce or manufactures of the Federation of the Centre of America, and no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the Federation of the Centre of America of any articles the produce or manufactures of the United States than are, or shall be, payable on the like articles, being the produce or manufactures of any other foreign country; nor shall any higher or other duties or charges be imposed, in either of the two countries, on the exportation of any articles to the United States or to the Federation of the Centre of America, respectively, than such as are payable on the exportation of the like articles to any other foreign de Estado, quienes, despues de haber canjeado sus expresados plenos poderes en debida y buena forma, han convenido en los articulos siguientes:

ARTICULO 1. Habra una paz, perfecta, firme, é inviolable, y amistad sincera entre la Federacion de Centro-America y los Estados Unidos de America, en todo la estencion de sus posesiones y territorios, y entre sus pueblos y ciudadanos, respectivamente, sin distincion de personas ni lugares.

ARTICULO 2. La Federacion de Centro-America y los Estados Unidos de America, deseando vivir en paz y harmonia con las demas naciones de la tierra, por medio de una politica franca é igualmente amistosa con todas, se obligan mutuamente à no conceder favores particulares à otras naciones, con respecto à comercio y navegacion, que no se hagan inmediatamente comun à una ù otra, quien gozará de los mismos libremente si la concesion fuese hecha libremente, ó prestando la misma compensacion si la concesion fuere condicional.

ARTICULO 3. Las dos altas partes contratantes, deseando tambien establecer el comercio y navegacion de sus respectivos paises sobre las liberales bases de perfecta igualdad y reciprocidad, convienen mutuamente que los ciudadanos de cada una podran frecuentar todas las costas y paises de la otra, y residir i traficar en ellos con toda clase de producciones, manufacturas, i mercaderias; i gozaran de todos los derechos, privilegios, y esempciones, con respecto à navegacion i commercio, que gozan ó gozaren los ciudadanos nativos, sometiendo à las leyes, decretos, é usos establecidos, à que estan sujetos dichos ciudadanos nativos. Pero deber entenderse que este articulo no comprende el comercio de costa de cada uno de los dos paises, cuya regulacion es reservada à las partes, respectivamente, segun sus propias i peculiares leyes.

ARTICULO 4. Igualmente convienen, que cualquiera clase de producciones, manufacturas ó mercaderias extranjeras que puedan ser, en cualquier tiempo, legalmente introducidas en la Republica Central en sus propios buques, puedan tambien ser introducidas en los buques de los Estados Unidos; i que no se impondran ó cobraran otras ó mayores derechos de tonelada ó por el cargamento, ya sea que la importacion se haga en buques de la una ó de la otra. De la misma manera que cualesquiera clase de producciones, manufacturas ó mercaderias extranjeras que pueden ser en cualquier tiempo legalmente introducidas en los Estados Unidos en sus propios buques, puedan tambien ser introducidas en los buques de la Federacion de Centro-America; i que no se impondran ó cobraran otros ó mayores derechos de tonelada ó por el cargamento ya sea que la importacion se haga en buques de la una ó de la otra. Convienen ademas, que todo lo que pueda ser legalmente esportado ó re-esportado de uno de los dos paises, en sus buques propios para un pais extranjero pueda de la misma manera ser esportado ó re-esportado en los buques de el otro. Y los mismos derechos, premios ó descuentos se concederan i cobraran ya sea que tal exportacion, ó re-exportacion se haga en los buques de la Republica Central ó de los Estados Unidos.

ARTICULO 5. No se impondran otros ó mayores derechos sobre la importacion de cualquier articulo, produccion ó manufactura de los Estados Unidos en la Federacion de Centro-America, i no se impondran otros ó mayores derechos sobre la importacion de cualquier articulo, produccion ó manufactura de la Federacion de Centro-America en los Estados Unidos, que los que se pagan ó pagaren en adelante por iguales articulos, produccion ó manufactura de cualquiera pais extranjero; ni se impondran otros ó mayores derechos ó cargas en cualquiera de los dos paises sobre la esportacion de cualesquiera articulos para la Federacion de Centro-America ó para los Estados Unidos respectivamente, que los que se pagan ó pagaren en adelante por la esportacion de country; nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the exportation or importation of any articles the produce or manufactures of the United States, or of the Federation of the Centre of America, to or from the territories of the United States, or to or from the territories of the Federation of the Centre of America, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

ARTICLE 6. It is likewise agreed that it shall be wholly free for all merchants, commanders of ships, and other citizens of both countries, to manage, themselves, their own business in all the ports and places subject to the jurisdiction of each other, as well with respect to the consignment and sale of their goods and merchandise by wholesale or retail, as with respect to the loading, unloading, and sending off their ships; they being, in all these cases, to be treated as citizens of the country in which they reside, or at least to be placed on a footing with the subjects or citizens of the most favored nation.

ARTICLE 7. The citizens of neither of the contracting parties shall be liable to any embargo, nor be detained with their vessels, cargoes, merchandise, or effects, for any military expedition, nor for any public or private purpose whatever, without allowing to those interested a sufficient indemnification.

ARTICLE 8. Whenever the citizens of either of the contracting parties shall be forced to seek refuge or asylum in the rivers, bays, ports, or dominions, of the other, with their vessels, whether merchant or of war, public or private, through stress of weather, pursuit of pirates or enemies, they shall be received and treated with humanity, giving to them all favor and protection for repairing their ships, procuring provisions, and placing themselves in a situation to continue their voyage without obstacle or hindrance of any kind.

ARTICLE 9. All the ships, merchandise, and effects belonging to the citizens of one of the contracting parties, which may be captured by pirates, whether within the limits of its jurisdiction or on the high seas, and may be carried or found in the rivers, roads, bays, ports, or dominions, of the other, shall be delivered up to the owners, they proving, in due and proper form, their rights before the competent tribunals; it being well understood that the claim should be made within the term of one year by the parties themselves, their attorneys, or agents of the respective Governments.

ARTICLE 10. When any vessel belonging to the citizens of either of the contracting parties shall be wrecked, foundered, or shall suffer any damage on the coasts, or within the dominions of the other, there shall be given to them all assistance and protection, in the same manner which is usual and customary with the vessels of the nation where the damage happens, permitting them to unload the said vessel, if necessary, of its merchandise and effects, without exacting for it any duty, impost, or contribution whatever, until they may be exported.

ARTICLE 11. The citizens of each of the contracting parties shall have power to dispose of their personal goods within the jurisdiction of the other, by sale, donation, testament, or otherwise; and their representatives, being citizens of the other party, shall succeed to their said personal goods, whether by testament or ab intestato, and they may take possession thereof, either by themselves or others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their will, paying such dues only as the inhabitants of the country wherein said goods are shall be subject to pay in like cases. And if, in the case of real estate, the said heirs would be prevented from entering into the possession of the inheritance on account of their character of aliens, there shall be granted to them the term of three years to dispose of the same, as they may think proper, and to withdraw the proceeds without molestation, and iguales artículos para cualquiera otro país extranjero; ni se estableciera prohibición sobre la importación ó exportación de cualesquiera artículos, producción ó manufactura de los territorios de la Federación de Centro-América para los de los Estados Unidos, ó de los territorios de los Estados Unidos para los de la Federación de Centro-América, que no sea igualmente extensiva á las otras naciones.

ARTÍCULO 6. Se conviene además, que será enteramente libre y permitido, a los comerciantes, comandantes de buques, y otros ciudadanos de ambos países el manejar sus negocios, por sí mismos, en todos los puertos y lugares sujetos á la jurisdicción de uno ú otro, así respecto á las consignaciones y ventas por mayor y menor de sus efectos y mercaderías, como de la carga, descarga y despacho de sus buques, debiendo en todos estos casos, ser tratados como ciudadanos del país en que residan, ó al menos puestos sobre un pie igual con los subditos ó ciudadanos de las naciones más favorecidas.

ARTÍCULO 7. Los ciudadanos de una ú otra parte, no podrán ser embargados ni detenidos con sus embarcaciones, tripulaciones, mercaderías, y efectos comerciales de su pertenencia, para alguna expedición militar, usos públicos, ó particulares cualesquiera que sean, sin conceder á los interesados una suficiente indemnización.

ARTÍCULO 8. Siempre que los ciudadanos de alguna de las partes contratantes se vieren precisados á buscar refugio, ó asilo en los ríos, bahías, puertos, ó dominios de la otra, consus buques, ya sean mercantes, ó de guerra, públicos ó particulares, por mal tiempo, persecución de piratas ó enemigos, serán recibidos y tratados con humanidad, dándoles todo favor y protección, para reparar sus buques, procurár víveres, y ponerse en situación de continuar su viaje, sin obstáculo ó estorbo de ningún género.

ARTÍCULO 9. Todos los buques, mercaderías y efectos pertenecientes a los ciudadanos de una de las partes contratantes, que sean apresados por piratas, bien sea dentro de los límites de su jurisdicción, ó en alta mar, y fueren llevados, ó hallados en los ríos, radas, bahías, puertos, ó dominios de la otra, serán entregados á sus dueños, probando estos en la forma propia y debida sus derechos ante los tribunales competentes; bien entendido que el reclamo ha de hacerse dentro del término de un año por las mismas partes, sus apoderados ó agentes de los respectivos Gobiernos.

ARTÍCULO 10. Cuando algun buque perteneciente á los ciudadanos de alguna de las partes contratantes, naufrague, encalle, ó sufra alguna avería, en las costas, ó dentro de los dominios de la otra, se les dará toda ayuda y protección, del mismo modo que es uso y costumbre, con los buques de la nación en donde suceda la avería; permitiéndoles descargar el dicho buque (si fuere necesario) de sus mercaderías y efectos, sin cobrar por esto hasta que sean esportados, ningún derecho, impuesto ó contribución.

ARTÍCULO 11. Los ciudadanos de cada una de las partes contratantes, tendrán pleno poder para disponer de sus bienes personales dentro de la jurisdicción de la otra, por venta, donación, testamento, ó de otro modo; y sus representantes, siendo ciudadanos de la otra parte, sucederán á sus dichos bienes personales, ya sea por testamento ó ab intestato, y podrán tomar posesion de ellos, ya sea por sí mismos ó por otros, que obren por ellos, y disponer de los mismos, segun su voluntad, pagando aquellas cargas, solamente, que los habitantes del país en donde estan los referidos bienes, estuvieren sujetos á pagar en iguales casos. Y si en el caso de bienes raíces, los dichos herederos fuesen impedidos de entrá en la posesion de la herencia por razon de su caracter de extranjeros, se les dará el término de tres años para disponer de ella como juzguen conveniente, y para extraer el producto sin exempt from all duties of detraction, on the part of the Government of the respective States.

ARTICLE 12. Both the contracting parties promise and engage formally to give their special protection to the persons and property of the citizens of each other, of all occupations, who may be in the territories subject to the jurisdiction of the one or the other, transient or dwelling therein, leaving open and free to them the tribunals of justice for their judicial recourse, on the same terms which are usual and customary with the natives or citizens of the country in which they may be; for which they may employ, in defence of their rights, such advocates, solicitors, notaries, agents, and factors, as they may judge proper in all their trials at law; and such citizens or agents shall have free opportunity to be present at the decisions and sentences of the tribunals in all cases which may concern them, and likewise at the taking of all examinations and evidence which may be exhibited in the said trials.

ARTICLE 13. It is likewise agreed that the most perfect and entire security of conscience shall be enjoyed by the citizens of both the contracting parties in the countries subject to the jurisdiction of the one and the other, without their being liable to be disturbed or molested on account of their religious belief, so long as they respect the laws and established usages of the country. Moreover, the bodies of the citizens of one of the contracting parties who may die in the territories of the other shall be buried in the usual burying grounds, or in other decent and suitable places, and shall be protected from violation or disturbance.

ARTICLE 14. It shall be lawful for the citizens of the United States of America and of the Federation of the Centre of America to sail with their ships with all manner of liberty and security, no distinction being made who are the proprietors of the merchandise laden thereon, from any port to the places of those who are now, or hereafter shall be, at enmity with either of the contracting parties. It shall likewise be lawful for the citizens aforesaid to sail with the ships and merchandise before mentioned, and to trade with the same liberty and security from the places, ports, and havens of those who are enemies of both or either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatsoever, not only directly from the places of the enemy before mentioned to neutral places, but also from one place belonging to an enemy to another place belonging to an enemy, whether they be under the jurisdiction of one power or under several. And it is hereby stipulated that free ships shall also give freedom to goods, and that everything shall be deemed to be free and exempt which shall be found on board the ships belonging to the citizens of either of the contracting parties, although the whole lading, or any part thereof, should appertain to the enemies of either, contraband goods being always excepted. It is also agreed in like manner that the same liberty be extended to persons who are on a free ship, with this effect, that, although they be enemies to both or either party, they are not to be taken out of that free ship, unless they are officers or soldiers, and in the actual service of the enemies: Provided, however, and it is hereby agreed, that the stipulations in this article contained, declaring that the flag shall cover the property, shall be understood as applying to those powers only who recognize this principle; but if either of the two contracting parties shall be at war with a third, and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral shall cover the property of enemies whose Governments acknowledge this principle, and not of others.

ARTICLE 15. It is likewise agreed, that, in the case where the neutral flag of one of the contracting parties shall protect the property of the enemies of the other by virtue of the above stipulation, it shall molestia, y esentos de todo derecho de deducción, por parte del Gobierno de los respectivos Estados.

ARTICULO 12. Ambas partes contratantes se comprometen y obligan formalmente á dar su proteccion especial á las personas y propiedades de los ciudadanos de cada una reciprocamente transeuntes ó habitantes detodas ocupaciones, en los territorios sujetos á la jurisdiccion de una y otra, dejandoles abiertos y libres los tribunales de justicia, para sus recursos judiciales, en los mismos terminos que son de uso y costumbre para los naturales ó ciudadanos del pais en que residan; para lo cual, podrán emplear en defensa de sus derechos aquellos abogados, procuradores, escribanos, agentes, ó factores que juzguen conveniente, en todos sus asuntos y litigios; y dichos ciudadanos ó agentes tendrán la libre facultad de estar presentes en las decisiones y sentencias de los tribunales, en todos los casos que les conciernan, como igualmente al tomar todos los exámenes y declaraciones que se ofrezcan en los dichos litigios.

ARTICULO 13. Se conviene igualmente en que los ciudadanos de ambas partes contratantes gozen la mas perfecta y entera seguridad de conciencia en los paises sugetos á la jurisdiccion da una ù otra, sin quedar por ello espuestos á ser inquietados ó molestados en razon de su creencia religiosa, mientras que respeten las leyes y usos establecidos. Ademas de esto, podrán sepultarse los cadaveres de los ciudadanos de una de las partes contratantes, que fallecieron en los territorios de la otra, en los cementerios acostumbrados, ó en otros lugares decentes, y adecuados, los cuales, serán protegidos contra toda violacion ó trastorno.

ARTICULO 14. Será lícito á los ciudadanos de la Federacion de Centro-America, y de los Estados Unidos de America, navegár con sus buques, con toda seguridad y libertad, de cualquiera puerto á las plazas ó lugares de los que son ó fueren en adelante enemigos de cualquiera de las dos partes contratantes, sin hacerse distincion de quienes son los dueños de las mercaderías cargadas en ellos. Será igualmente lícito á los referidos ciudadanos navegár con sus buques y mercaderías mencionadas y traficár con la misma libertad y seguridad, de los lugares, puertos y enseñadas de los enemigos de ambas partes, ó de alguna de ellas, sin ninguna oposicion, ó disturbio cualquiera, no solo directamente de los lugares de enemigo arriba mencionados á lugares neutros, sino tambien de un lugar perteneciente á unáenemigo, á otro enemigo, ya sea que esten bajo la jurisdiccion de una potencia, ó bajo la de diversas. Y queda aqui estipulado, que los buques libres, dan tambien libertad á las mercaderías, y que se ha de considerar libre y esento todo lo que se hallare á bordo de los buques pertenecientes á los ciudadanos de cualquiera de las partes contratantes, aunque toda la carga ó parte de ella pertenezca á enemigos de una ù otra, eceptuando siempre los artículos de contrabando de guerra. Se conviene tambien del mismo modo, en que la misma libertadáse estienda á las personas que se encuentren á bordo de buques libres, con el fin de que aunque dichas personas sean enemigos de ambas partes ó de alguna de ellas, no deban ser estraidos de los buques libres, ó menos que sean oficiales ó soldados en actual servicio de los enemigos: á condicion no obstante, y se conviene aqui en esto, que las estipulaciones contenidas en el presente artículo, declarando que el pabellon cubre la propiedad, se entenderán aplicables solamente á aquellas potencias que reconocen este principio; pero si alguna de los dos partes contratantes, estuviere en guerra con una tercera, y la otra permaneciese neutrál, la bandera de la neutrál cubrira la propiedad de los enemigos, cuyos Gobiernos reconozcan este principio y no de otros.

ARTICULO 15. Se conviene igualmente que en el caso de que la bandera neutrál de una de las partes contratantes protega las propiedades de los enemigos de la otra en virtud de lo estipulado arriba, always be understood that the neutral property found on board such enemy's vessels shall be held and considered as enemy's property, and as such shall be liable to detention and confiscation, except such property as was put on board such vessel before the declaration of war, or even afterwards, if it were done without the knowledge of it; but the contracting parties agree that, two months having elapsed after the declaration, their citizens shall not plead ignorance thereof. On the contrary, if the flag of the neutral does not protect the enemy's property, in that case the goods and merchandise of the neutral embarked in such enemy's ships shall be free.

ARTICLE 16. This liberty of navigation and commerce shall extend to all kinds of merchandise, excepting those only which are distinguished by the name of contraband, and under this name of contraband or prohibited goods shall be comprehended—

1st. Cannons, mortars, howitzers, swivels, blunderbusses, muskets, fuzees, rifles, carbines, pistols, pikes, swords, sabres, lances, spears, halberds, and grenades, bombs, powder, matches, balls, and all other things belonging to the use of these arms.

2dly. Bucklers, helmets, breast plates, coats of mail, infantry belts, and clothes made up in the form and for military use.

3dly. Cavalry belts and horses, with their furniture.

4thly. And generally all kinds of arms and instruments of iron, steel, brass, and copper, or of any other materials manufactured, prepared, and formed expressly to make war by sea or land.

ARTICLE 17. All other merchandise and things not comprehended in the articles of contraband explicitly enumerated and classified as above shall be held and considered as free, and subjects of free and lawful commerce, so that they may be carried and transported in the freest manner by both the contracting parties, even to places belonging to an enemy, excepting only those places which are at that time besieged or blockaded; and to avoid all doubt in this particular, it is declared that those only are besieged or blockaded which are actually attacked by a belligerent force capable of preventing the entry of the neutral.

ARTICLE 18. The articles of contraband before enumerated and classified, which may be found in a vessel bound for an enemy's port, shall be subject to detention and confiscation, leaving free the rest of the cargo and the ship, that the owners may dispose of them as they see proper. No vessel of either of the two nations shall be detained on the high seas on account of having on board articles of contraband, whenever the master, captain, or supercargo of said vessel will deliver up the articles of contraband to the captor, unless the quantity of such articles be so great and of so large a bulk that they cannot be received on board the capturing ship without great inconvenience; but, in this and in all other cases of just detention, the vessel detained shall be sent to the nearest convenient and safe port, for trial and judgment according to law.

ARTICLE 19. And whereas it frequently happens that vessels sail for a port or place belonging to an enemy without knowing that the same is besieged, blockaded, or invested, it is agreed that every vessel so circumstanced may be turned away from such port or place, but shall not be detained, nor shall any part of her cargo, if not contraband, be confiscated, unless, after warning of such blockade or investment from the commanding officer of the blockading forces, she shall again attempt to enter; but she shall be permitted to go to any other port or place she shall think proper. Nor shall any vessel of either, that may deberá siempre entenderse, que las propiedades neutrales encontradas á bordo de tales buques enemigos, han de tenerse y considerarse como propiedades enemigas, y como tales, estarán sujetas á detencion, y confiscacion; esceptuando solamente aquellas propiedades que hubiesen sido puestas á bordo de tales buques antes de la declaracion de la guerra, y aun despues, si hubiesen sido embarcadas en dichos buques, sin tener noticia de la guerra; y se conviene, que pasados dos meses despues de la declaracion, los ciudadanos de una y otra parte no podrán alegar que la ignoraban. Por el contrario, si la bandera neutral, no protegiese las propiedades enemigas, entonces serán libres los efectos y mercaderias de la parte neutral, embarcadas en buques enemigos.

ARTICULO 16. Esta libertad de navegacion y comercio se estenderá á todo genero de mercaderias, eceptuando aquellas solamente, que se distinguen con el nombre de contrabando, y bajo este nombre de contrabando ó efectos prohibidos se comprenderán:

1º. Cañones, morteros, obuces, pedreros, trabucos, mosquetes, fusiles, rifles, carabinas, pistolas, picas, espados, sables, lanzas, chuzos, alabardas, y granadas, bombas, polvoro, mechas, balas, con las demas cosas correspondientes al uso de estas armas.

2º. Escudos, casquetes, corazas, cotas de malla, fornituras, y vestidos hechos en forma, y á usanza militar.

3º. Bandoleras, y caballos junto con sus armas y arneses.

ARTICULO 17. Todas las demas mercaderias, y efectos no comprendidos en los articulos de contrabando esplicitamente enumerados, y classificados en el articulo anterior, serán tenidos, y reputados por libres, y de licito y libre comercio de modo, que ellos puedan ser transportados, y llevados de la manera mas libre, por los ciudadanos de ambas partes contratantes, aun á los lugares pertenecientes á un enemigo de una ú otra, eceptuando solamente aquellos lugares ó plazas, que están al mismo tiempo sitiadas ó bloqueadas; y para evitar toda duda en el particular, se declaran sitiadas ó bloqueadas áquellas plazas, que en la actualidad estuviesen atacadas por una fuerza de un beligerante capaz de impedir la entrada del neutral.

ARTICULO 18. Los articulos de contrabando antes enumerados y classificados, que se hallen en un buque destinado á puerto enemigo estarán sujetos á detencion y confiscacion; dejando libre el resto del cargamento y el buque, para que los dueños puedan disponer de ellos como lo crean conveniente. Ningun buque de cualquiera de las dos naciones, será detenido, por tener á bordo articulos de contrabando, siempre que el maestre, capitán, ó sobrecargo de dicho buque quiera entregar los articulos de contrabando al apresador, á menos que la cantidad de estos articulos sea tan grande y de tanto volumen, que no puedan ser recibidos á bordo del buque apresador, sin grandes inconvenientes; pero en este, como en todos los otros casos de justa detencion, el buque detenido será enviado al puerto mas inmediato, comodo, y seguro, para ser juzgado y sentenciado conforme á las leyes.

ARTICULO 19. Y por cuanto frecuentemente sucede que los buques navegan para un puerto ó lugar perteneciente á un enemigo, sin saber que aquel esté sitiado, bloqueado ó investido, se conviene en que todo buque en estas circunstancias se pueda hacer volver de dicho puerto, ó lugar; pero no será detenido, ni confiscada parte alguna de su cargamento, no siendo contrabando; á menos que despues de la intimacion de semejante bloqueo ó ataque, por el comandante de las fuerzas bloqueadoras, intentase otra vez entrar; pero le será permitido ir á qualquiera otro puerto ó lugar que juzque conveniente. Ni have entered into such port before the same was actually besieged, blockaded, or invested by the other, be restrained from quitting such place with her cargo, nor, if found therein after the reduction and surrender, shall such vessel or her cargo be liable to confiscation, but they shall be restored to the owners thereof.

ARTICLE 20. In order to prevent all kind of disorder in the visiting and examination of the ships and cargoes of both the contracting parties on the high seas, they have agreed mutually, that whenever a vessel of war, public or private, shall meet with a neutral of the other contracting party, the first shall remain out of cannon shot, and may send its boat, with two or three men only, in order to execute the said examination of the papers concerning the ownership and cargo of the vessel, without causing the least extortion, violence, or ill treatment, for which the commanders of the said armed ships shall be responsible with their persons and property; for which purpose, the commanders of said private armed vessels shall, before receiving their commissions, give sufficient security to answer for all the damages they may commit. And it is expressly agreed that the neutral party shall in no case be required to go on board the examining vessel for the purpose of exhibiting her papers, or for any other purpose whatever.

ARTICLE 21. To avoid all kinds of vexation and abuse in the examination of the papers relating to the ownership of the vessels belonging to the citizens of the two contracting parties, they have agreed, and do agree, that in case one of them should be engaged in war, the ships and vessels belonging to the citizens of the other must be furnished with sea letters or passports, expressing the name, property, and bulk of the ship, as also the name and place of habitation of the master or commander of said vessel, in order that it may thereby appear that the ship really and truly belongs to the citizens of one of the parties; they have likewise agreed that, such ships being laden, besides the said sea letters or passports, shall also be provided with certificates, containing the several particulars of the cargo, and the place whence the ships sailed, so that it may be known whether any forbidden or contraband goods be on board the same; which certificates shall be made out by the officers of the place whence the ship sailed, in the accustomed form; without which requisites, said vessel may be detained, to be adjudged by the competent tribunal, and may be declared legal prize unless the said defects shall be satisfied, or supplied by testimony entirely equivalent.

ARTICLE 22. It is further agreed, that the stipulations above expressed, relative to the visiting and examination of vessels, shall apply only to those which sail without convoy; and when said vessels shall be under convoy, the verbal declaration of the commander of the convoy, on his word of honor, that the vessels under his protection belong to the nation whose flag he carries, and, when they are bound to an enemy's port, that they have no contraband goods on board, shall be sufficient.

ARTICLE 23. It is further agreed, that in all cases the established courts for prize causes, in the country to which the prizes may be conducted, shall alone take cognizance of them. And whenever such tribunal of either party shall pronounce judgment against any vessel or goods or property claimed by the citizens of the other party, the sentence or decree shall mention the reasons or motives on which the same shall have been founded, and an authenticated copy of the sentence or decree, and of all the proceedings in the case, shall, if demanded, be delivered to the commander or agent of said vessel without any delay, he paying the legal fees for the same.

ningun buque de una de las partes, que haya entrado en semejante puerto, ó lugar, antes que estuviere sitiado, bloqueado, ó investido por la otra, sera impedido de dejar el tal lugar con su cargamento, ni si fuere hallado allí despues de la rendicion y entrega de semejante lugar, estará el tal buque ó su cargamento sujeto à confiscacion, sino que serán restituidos á sus dueños.

ARTICULO 20. Para evitar todo genero de desorden en la visita, y examen de los buques y cargamentos de ambas partes contratantes en alta mar, han convenido mutuamente, que siempre que un buque de guerra, publico ó particular se emontrase con un neutral de la otra parte contrante, el primero permanecerà fuera de tiro de cañon, y podrá mandàr su bote, con dos ó tres hombres solamente, para ejecutar el dicho examen de los papeles concernientes à la propiedad y carga del buque, sin ocasionar la menor estorcion violencia à mal tratamiento, por lo que los comandantes del dicho buque armado serán responsables, con sus personas y bienes; à cuyo efecto los comandantes de buques armados, por cuenta de particulares, estarán obligados antes de entregarseles sus comisiones ó patentes, à dar fianza suficiente para responder de los perjuicios que causen. Y se ha convenido espresamente, que en ningun caso se exigira à la parte neutral, que vaya à bordo del buque examinador con el fin de exhibir sus papeles, ó para cualquiera otro objeto sea el que fuere.

ARTICULO 21. Para evitar toda clase de vejamen y abuso en el examen de los papeles relativos à la propiedad de los buques pertenecientes à los ciudadanos de las dos partes contratantes, han convenido y convienen, que en caso de que una de ellas estuviere en guerra, los buques, y bajeles pertenecientes à los ciudadanos de la otra, serán provistos con letras de mar, ó pasaportes, espresando el nombre, propiedad y tamaño del buque, como tambien el nombre y lugar de la residencia del maestre ó comandante, à fin de que se vea que el buque, real y verdaderamente pertenece à los ciudadanos de una de las partes; y han convenido igualmente, que estando cargados los espresados buques, ademas de las letras de mar, ó pasaportes, estarán tambien provistos de certificados, que contengan los por menores del cargamento, y el lugar de donde salió el buque, para que asi pueda saberse, si hay à su bordo algunos efectos prohibidos ó de contrabando, cuyos certificados serán hechos per los oficiales del lugar de la procedencia del buque, en la forma acostombrada, sin cuyos requisitos el dicho buque puede ser detenido, para ser juzgado por el tri bunal competente, y puede ser declarado buena presa, à menos que satisfagan, ó suplan el defecto con testimonios enteramente equivalentes.

ARTICULO 22. Se ha convenido ademas, que las estipulaciones anteriores, relativas al examen y visita de buques, se aplicarán solamente à los que navegan sin conboy y que cuando los dichos buques estuvieren bajo de conboy, será bastante la declaracion verbal del comandante del conboy, bajo su palabra de honor, de que los buques que están bajo su proteccion pertenecen a la nacion, cuya bandera llevan, y cuando se dirijen à un puerto enemigo, que los dichos buques no tienen à su bordo articulos de contrabando de guerra.

ARTICULO 23. Se ha convenido ademas que en todos los casos que ocurran, solo los tribunales establecidos para causas de presas, en el pais á que las presas sean conducidas, tomarán conocimiento de ellas. Y siempre que semejante tribunal de cualquiera de las partes, pronunciasse sentencia contra algun buque, ó efectos, ó propiedad reclamada por los ciudadanos de la otra parte, la sentencia ó decreto hará mencion de las razones ó motivos en que aquella se haya fundado, y se entregará sin demora alguna al comandante ó agente de dicho buque, si lo solicitase, un testimonio autentico de la sentencia, ó decreto, ó de todo el proceso, pagando por él los derechos legales.

ARTICLE 24. Whenever one of the contracting parties shall be engaged in war with another State, no citizen of the other contracting party shall accept a commission, or letter of marque, for the purpose of assisting or co-operating hostilely with the said party so at war, under the pain of being treated as a pirate.

ARTICLE 25. If, by any fatality which cannot be expected, and which God forbid, the two contracting parties should be engaged in a war with each other, they have agreed, and do agree, now for then, that there shall be allowed the term of six months to the merchants residing on the coasts and in the ports of each other, and the term of one year to those who dwell in the interior, to arrange their business, and transport their effects wherever they please, giving to them the safe conduct necessary for it, which may serve as a sufficient protection until they arrive at the designated port. The citizens of all other occupations, who may be established in the territories or dominions of the United States and of the Federation of the Centre of America, shall be respected and maintained in the full enjoyment of their personal liberty and property, unless their particular conduct shall cause them to forfeit this protection, which, in consideration of humanity, the contracting parties engage to give them.

ARTICLE 26. Neither the debts due from individuals of the one nation to the individuals of the other, nor shares, nor moneys which they may have in public funds, nor in public or private banks, shall ever, in any event of war or of national difference, be sequestered or confiscated.

ARTICLE 27. Both the contracting parties, being desirous of avoiding all inequality in relation to their public communications and official intercourse, have agreed, and do agree, to grant to the envoys, ministers, and other public agents, the same favors, immunities, and exemptions, which those of the most favored nation do or shall enjoy; it being understood that whatever favors, immunities, or privileges the United States of America or the Federation of the Centre of America may find it proper to give to the ministers and public agents of any other power, shall by the same act be extended to those of each of the contracting parties.

ARTICLE 28. To make more effectual the protection which the United States and the Federation of the Centre of America shall afford in future to the navigation and commerce of the citizens of each other, they agree to receive and admit consuls and vice consuls in all the ports open to foreign commerce, who shall enjoy in them all the rights, prerogatives, and immunities of the consuls and vice consuls of the most favored nation; each contracting party, however, remaining at liberty to except those ports and places in which the admission and residence of such consuls may not seem convenient.

ARTICLE 29. In order that the consuls and vice consuls of the two contracting parties may enjoy the rights, prerogatives, and immunities which belong to them by their public character, they shall, before entering on the exercise of their functions, exhibit their commission or patent in due form to the Government to which they are accredited; and having obtained their exequatur, they shall be held and considered as such by all the authorities, magistrates, and inhabitants in the consular district in which they reside.

ARTICLE 30. It is likewise agreed that the consuls, their secretaries, officers, and persons attached to the service of consuls, they not being citizens of the country in which the consul resides, shall be exempt from all public service, and also from all kind of taxes, imposts, and contributions, except those which they shall be obliged to pay on account of commerce or their property, to which the citizens and inhabitants, native and foreign, of the country in which ARTICULO 24. Siempre que una de las partes contratantes estuviere empeñada en guerra, con otro Estado, ningun ciudadano de la otra parte contratante aceptara una comision ó letra de marca para el objeto de ayudar ó co-operar hostilmente con el dicho enemigo, contra la dicha parte que este así en guerra, bajo la pena de ser tratado como pirata.

ARTICULO 25. Si por alguna fatalidad, que no puede esperarse, y que Dios no permita, las dos partes contratantes se viesen empeñadas en guerra una con otra, han convenido y convienen de ahora para entonces, que se concedera el termino de seis meses á los comerciantes residentes en las costas y en los puertos de entrambas, y el termino de un año á los que habitan en el interior, para arreglar sus negocios, y transportar sus efectos á donde quieran, dandoles el salvo conducto necesario para ello, que les sirva de suficiente proteccion hasta que lleguen al puerto que designen. Los ciudadanos de otras ocupaciones, que se hallen establecidos en los territorios ó dominios de la Federacion de Centro-America, ó los Estados Unidos de America, serán respetados, y mantenidos en el pleno goze de su libertad personal y propiedad, á menos que su conducta particular les haga perder esta proteccion, que en consideracion á la humanidad, las partes contratantes se comprometen á prestarles.

ARTICULO 26. Ni las deudas contraidas por los individuos de una Nacion, con los individuos de la otra, ni las acciones ó dineros, que puedan tener en los fondos publicos, ó en los bancos publicos, ó privados, serán jamas secuestrados ó confiscados en ningun caso de guerra, ó diferencia nacional.

ARTICULO 27. Deseando ambas partes contratantes, evitar, toda diferencia, relativa á etiqueta en sus comunicaciones, y correspondencias diplomaticas han convenido así mismo, y convienen en conceder á sus enviados, ministros, y otros agentes diplomaticos, los mismos favores, inmunidades, y esenciones de que gozan, ó gozaren en lo venidero los de las naciones mas favorecidas, bien entendido que cualquier favor, inmunidad ó privilegio, que la Federacion de Centro-America, ó los Estados Unidos de America, tengan por conveniente dispensar á los enviados, ministros, y agentes diplomaticos de otras potencias, se haga por el mismo hecho estensivo á los de una y otra de las partes contratantes.

ARTICULO 28. Para hacer mas efectiva la proteccion, que la Federacion de Centro-America, y los Estados Unidos de America, darán en adelante á la navegacion y comercio de los ciudadanos de una y otra, se convienen en recibir y admitir consules y vice consules en todos los puertos abiertos al comercio extranjero, quienes gozarán en ellos todos los derechos, prerrogativas é inmunidades de los consules y vice consules de la nacion mas favorecida quedando no obstante en libertad cada parte contratante, para exceptuar aquellos puertos y lugares en que la admission y residencia de semejantes consules y vice consules no parezca conveniente.

ARTICULO 29. Para que los consules y vice consules de las dos partes contratantes puedan gozar los derechos, prerrogativas, é inmunidades que les corresponden por su caracter publico, antes de entrar en el ejercicio de sus funciones, presentarán su comision ó patente en la forma debida, al Gobierno con quien esten acreditados; y habiendo obtenido el exequatur, serán tenidos y considerados como tales por todas las autoridades, majistrados, y habitantes del distrito consular en que residan.

ARTICULO 30. Se ha convenido igualmente, que los consules, sus secretarios, oficiales y personas agregadas al servicio de los consulados (no siendo estas personas ciudadanos del pais en que el consul reside) estarán esentos de todo servicio publico, y tambien de toda especie de pechos, impuestos, y contribuciones, exceptuando aquellas que esten obligados á pagar por razon de comercia, ó propiedad, y á las cuales estan sujetos los ciudadanos, y habithey reside are subject, being in everything besides subject to the laws of the respective States. The archives and papers of the consulate shall be respected inviolably, and under no pretext whatever shall any magistrate seize or in any way interfere with them.

ARTICLE 31. The said consuls shall have power to require the assistance of the authorities of the country for the arrest, detention, and custody of deserters from the public and private vessels of their country; and for that purpose they shall address themselves to the courts, judges, and officers competent, and shall demand the said deserters in writing, proving, by an exhibition of the registers of the vessel's or ship's roll, or other public documents, that those men were part of the said crews; and on this demand, so proved, (saving, however, where the contrary is proved,) the delivery shall not be refused. Such deserters, when arrested, shall be put at the disposal of the said consuls, and may be put in the public prisons at the request and expense of those who reclaim them, to be sent to the ships to which they belonged, or to others of the same nation. But if they be not sent back within two months, to be counted from the day of their arrest, they shall be set at liberty, and shall be no more arrested for the same cause.

ARTICLE 32. For the purpose of more effectually protecting their commerce and navigation, the two contracting parties do hereby agree, as soon hereafter as circumstances will permit them, to form a consular convention, which shall declare specially the powers and immunities of the consuls and vice consuls of the respective parties.

ARTICLE 33. The United States of America and the Federation of the Centre of America, desiring to make as durable as circumstances will permit the relations which are to be established between the two parties by virtue of this treaty or general convention of peace, amity, commerce, and navigation, have declared solemnly and do agree to the following points:

1. The present treaty shall remain in full force and virtue for the term of twelve years, to be counted from the day of the exchange of the ratifications, in all the parts relating to commerce and navigation; and in all those parts which relate to peace and friendship, it shall be permanently and perpetually binding on both powers.

2. If any one or more of the citizens of either party shall infringe any of the articles of this treaty, such citizen shall be held personally responsible for the same, and the harmony and good correspondence between the two nations shall not be interrupted thereby, each party engaging in no way to protect the offender or sanction such violation.

3. If, (which, indeed, cannot be expected,) unfortunately, any of the articles contained in the present treaty shall be violated or infringed in any other way whatever, it is expressly stipulated that neither of the contracting parties will order or authorize any acts of reprisal, nor declare war against the other, on complaints of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended shall first have presented to the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verified by competent proof, and demanded justice and satisfaction, and the same shall have been either refused or unreasonably delayed.

4. Nothing in this treaty contained shall, however, be construed or operate contrary to former and existing public treaties with other sovereigns or States.

The present treaty of peace, amity, commerce, and navigation, shall be approved and ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by the Government of the Federation of the Centre of America, and the ratifications shall tantes naturales, y extranjeros del pais en que residen, quedando en todo lo demas, sujetos a las leyes de los respectivos Estados. Los archivos y papeles de los consulados serán respetados inviolablemente, y bajo ningun pretexto los ocupará magistrado alguno, ni tendrá en ellos ninguna intervencion.

ARTICULO 31. Los dichos consules tendrán poder de requerir el auxilio de las autoridades locales, para la prision, detencion y custodia de los desertores de buques publicos y particulares de su pais, y para este objeto se dirigirán a los tribunales, jueces, y oficiales competentes, y pedirán los dichos desertores por escrito, probando por una presentacion de los registros de los buques, rol del equipage, u otros documentos publicos, que aquellos hombres eran parte de las dichas tripulaciones, y á esta demanda asi probada (menos no obstante cuando se probare lo contrario) no se reusará la entrega. Semijantes desertores, luego que sean arrestados, se pondrán á disposicion de los dichos consules, y pueden ser depositados en las prisiones publicas, á solicitud y espensas de los que los reclamen, para ser enviados á los buques á que corresponden, ó á otros de la misma nacion. Pero si no fueren mandados dentro de dos meses contados des de el dia de su arresto, serán puestos en libertad, y no volverán a ser presos por la misma causa.

ARTICULO 32. Para proteger mas efectivamente su comercio y navegacion, las dos partes contratantes se convienen en formar luego que las circunstancias lo permitan, una convencion consular, que declare mas especialmente los poderes é inmunidades de los consules y vice consules de las partes respectivas.

ARTICULO 33. La Federacion de Centro-America, y los Estados Unidos de America, deseando hacer tan duraderas y firmes, como las circunstancias lo permitan las relaciones que han de establecerse entre las dos potencias, en virtud del presente tratado ó convencion general de paz, amistad, navegacion, y comercio, han declarado solemnemente y convienen en los puntos siguientes:

1. El presente tratado permanecerá en su fuerza y vigor por el termino de doce años contados desde el dia del cange de las ratificaciones, en todos los puntos concernientes á comercio y navegacion, y en todos los demas puntos que se refieren á paz y amistad, será permanente, y perpetuamente obligatorio para ambas potencias.

2. Si alguno, ó algunos de los ciudadanos de una ú otra parte infringiesen alguno de los articulos contenidos en el presente tratado, dichos ciudadanos serán personalmente responsables, sin que por esto se interrumpa la harmonia y buena correspondencia entre las dos naciones, comprometiendose cada una á no proteger de modo alguno al ofenser ó sancionar semejante violacion.

3. Si (lo que á la verdad no puede esperarse) desgraciadamente, alguno de los articulos contenidos en el presente tratado, fuesen en alguna otra manera violados, ó infringidos, se estipula espresamente que ninguna de las dos partes contratantes, ordenará, ó autorizará ningunos actos de represalia, ni declarará la guerra contra la otra por quejas de injurias, ó daños, hasta que la parte que se crea ofendida, haya antes presentado á la otra una esposicion de aquellas injurias, ó daños, verificada con pruebas y testimonios competentes, exigiendo justicia y satisfaccion, y esto haya sido negado, ó diferido sin razon.

4. Nada de cuanto se contiene en el presente tratado, se construirá sin embargo, ni obrará, en contra de otros tratados publicos anteriores, y existentes con otros soberanos ó Estados.

El presente tratado de paz, amistad, comercio, y navegacion, será ratificado por el Gobierno de la Federacion de Centro America y por el Presidente de los Estados Unidos de America, con consejo, y consentimiento del Senado de los mismos; y las ratificaciones serán cangeadas en la ciudad de Guate-be exchanged in the city of Guatemala, within eight months from the date of the signature hereof, or sooner, if possible.

In faith whereof, we, the plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and of the Federation of the Centre of America have signed and sealed these presents.

[1ST SESSION.]

CORRESPONDENCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN RELATIVE TO THE SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DECEMBER 27, 1825.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 20th instant, I transmit, herewith, a report from the Secretary of State, with copies of such portions of the correspondence between the United States and Great Britain, on the subject of the convention for suppressing the slave trade, as have not heretofore been and which can be communicated without detriment to the public interest.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, December 27, 1825.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 22, 1825.

The Secretary of State, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 20th instant, which has been referred to him, requesting the President of the United States to communicate to that House copies of such portions of the correspondence between the United States and Great Britain, on the subject of the convention for suppressing the slave trade, as have not heretofore been and which can be communicated without detriment to the public interest, has the honor to submit, herewith, to the President, copies of all the correspondence upon that subject which is embraced by the call of the House.

Respectfully submitted.

WASHINGTON, March 2, 1825.

Sir: On the 6th of November last I had the honor to inform you that I had received full powers from his Majesty to conclude and sign, with this Government, a convention, verbatim the same as that entered into on the 13th March, last year, between Great Britain and the United States, with all the amendments subsequently effected in it by the Senate, the erasure of the words "and America," in the first article, excepted.

In reply to that communication, you did me the honor to acquaint me that the President had decided upon referring the whole subject to Congress, whereby it became necessary for you to postpone giving a definitive answer to my proposal.

This resolution of the President was, at the commencement of the session, carried into effect; and I understand that the subject has been under the consideration of Congress. You will, therefore, I trust, sir, allow me now to request to be made acquainted with the definitive intention of the President with respect to the proposition submitted by me on behalf of his Majesty's Government.

I have the honor to be, with distinguished consideration, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

H. U. ADDINGTON.

HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Mr. O'lay to Mr. Addington.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 6, 1825.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the delay in the transmission of a definitive answer to your note of the 6th of November last has proceeded from an anxious desire on the part of the late President of the United States to ascertain the practicability of reconciling, if possible, the views of the Government of the United States with those which are entertained by that of his Britannic Majesty in respect to the convention for more effectually suppressing the slave trade. With that object, the correspondence with your Government, and the convention in which it terminated, together with what has since passed between the two Governments, both here and at London, were submitted to Congress during its late session. Of that reference you were apprised by the note of my predecessor of the 4th December last. It has so happened that neither the Senate nor the House of Representatives has expressed, directly, any opinion on the subject. But, on another convention, having the same object, concluded with the Republic of Colombia on the 10th day of December, 1824, which was formed after the model of that which is pending between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, the Senate has expressed a very decided opinion. In the Colombian convention, the coasts of America were excepted from its operation, and yet, notwithstanding this conciliating feature, the Senate, after full deliberation, in the exercise of its proper constitutional powers, has, by a large majority, deemed it inexpedient to consent to and advise the ratification of this convention.

The Government of his Britannic Majesty is well acquainted with the provision of the Constitution of the United States, by which the Senate is a component part of the treaty-making power; and that the consent and advice of that branch of Congress are indispensable in the formation of all treaties. According to the practice of this Government, the Senate is not ordinarily consulted in the initiatory state of a negotiation, but its consent and advice are only invoked, after a treaty is concluded, under the direction of the President, and submitted to its consideration. Each of the two branches of the treaty-making authority is independent of the other, whilst both are responsible to the States and to the people, the common sources of their respective powers. It results, from this organization, that, in the progress of the Government, instances may sometimes occur of a difference of opinion between the Senate and the Executive as to the expediency of a projected treaty, of which the rejection of the Colombian convention affords an example. The people of the United States have justly considered that, if there be any inconveniences in this arrangement of their executive powers, those inconveniences are more than counterbalanced, by the greater security of their interests, which is effected by the mutual checks which are thus interposed. But it is not believed that there are any inconveniences to foreign powers of which they can with propriety complain. To give validity to any treaty, the consent of the contracting parties is necessary. As to the mode by which that consent shall be expressed, it must necessarily depend with each upon its own peculiar constitutional arrangement. All that can rightly be demanded in treating is to know the contingencies on the happening of which that consent is to be regarded as sufficiently testified. This information the Government of the United States has always communicated to the foreign powers with which it treats, and to none more fully than to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Nor can it be admitted that any just cause of complaint can arise out of the rejection by one party of a treaty which the other has previously ratified. When such a case occurs, it only proves that the consent of both, according to the constitutional precautions which have been provided for manifesting that consent, is wanting to make the treaty valid. One must necessarily precede the other in the act of ratification; and if, after a treaty be ratified by one party, a ratification of it be withheld by the other, it merely shows that one is, and the other is not, willing to come under the obligations of the proposed treaty.

I am instructed by the President to accompany these frank and friendly explanations by the expression of his sincere regret that, from the views which are entertained by the Senate of the United States, it would seem to be unnecessary and inexpedient any longer to continue the negotiation respecting the slave convention, with any hope that it can be made to assume a form satisfactory to both parties. The Government of his Britannic Majesty insists, as an indispensable condition, that the regulated right of search, proposed in the convention, should be extended to the American coasts as well as to those of Africa and the West Indies. The Senate, even with the omission of America, thinks it unadvisable to ratify the Colombian convention. And it is, therefore, clearly to be inferred that a convention with his Britannic Majesty, with a similar omission, would not receive the approbation of the Senate. The decision of the Senate shows that it has made up its deliberate judgment, without any regard to the relative state of the military or commercial marine, for all the considerations belonging to a view of that subject would have urged the Senate to an acceptance of the Colombian convention. It is hoped, therefore, that his Britannic Majesty cannot fail to perceive that the Senate has been guided by no unfriendly feeling towards Great Britain.

Before closing this note, I must express my regret that I am unable to concur with you in the view which you have been pleased to present of the act of the British Parliament, by which it has denounced as piratical the slave trade, when exercised by British subjects. It is acknowledged that the Government of the United States considered such a denunciation as expedient, preliminary to the conclusion of the projected convention. But the British Parliament, doubtless upon its own sense of the enormity of the offence, deemed it proper to affix to it the character and penalties of piracy. However much it may be supposed to have been actuated by an accommodating spirit towards the United States, it can hardly be imagined that it would have given that denomination to the fact of trading in slaves from motives of concession merely, contrary to its own estimate of the moral character of that act. The Executive of the United States believed that it might conduce to the success of the negotiation, if the British Parliament would previously declare, as the United States had done, the slave trade to be piratical. But it did not follow, from the passage of that act, that any treaty, in which the negotiation might terminate, was to be taken out of the ordinary rule by which all treaties are finally submitted to the scrutiny and sanction of the respective Governments. No peculiar advantage has accrued to the United States from the enactment of that British law. Its continued existence, moreover, now depends upon the pleasure of the British Parliament.

But there is no disposition to dwell longer on this subject. The true character of the whole negotiation cannot be misconceived. Great Britain and the United States have had in view a common end of great humanity, entitled to their highest and best exertions. With respect to the desire of attaining that end, there is no difference of opinion between the Government of his Britannic Majesty and that of the United States in any of its branches. But the Senate has thought that the proposed convention was an instrument not adapted to the accomplishment of that end, or that it was otherwise objectionable. And, without the concurrence of the Senate, the convention cannot receive the constitutional sanctions of the United States. Without indulging, therefore, unavailing regrets, it is the anxious hope of the President that the Government of his Britannic Majesty should see, in all that has occurred, nothing towards it unfriendly on the part of the United States, and nothing that ought to slacken their separate or united exertions in the employment of all other practical modes to effectuate the great object, so dear to both, of an entire extirpation of a traffic which is condemned by reason, religion, and humanity.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

H. CLAY.

HENRY U. ADDINGTON, Esq., Chargé d'Affaires from Great Britain.

Mr. Addington to Mr. Clay.

WASHINGTON, April 9, 1825.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 6th instant, in which you announce to me the definitive decision of the President with regard to the convention for the more effectual suppression of the slave trade, which I had the honor to submit for the acceptance of this Government on the 6th of November last.

In expressing my regret at the failure of the benevolent efforts which have been employed in a cause so dear to humanity, I may venture to assure you that, however deeply his Majesty's Government may deplore the present disappointment of their hopes, they will consider the unfortunate issue of this business as in nowise affecting the friendly feelings which exist between the two Governments, and will accept, with pleasure, the expression of the President's desire that every exertion should still be used for effecting the entire extirpation of that odious traffic which the convention was designed to suppress.

I cannot dismiss this subject without a brief observation on that part of your letter in which you animadvert upon the argument employed in mine of the 6th of November last, relative to the act passed by the British Parliament for denouncing the slave trade as piracy. The expressions used by you would lead to the belief that I had represented the passage of that act, on the part of Great Britain, as rendering it imperative on the American Government to accede to the convention, even at the expense of a sacrifice of their constitutional prerogatives.

A reference to the expressions of my letter will, I apprehend, at once demonstrate the erroneousness of this impression, by showing that I put the case as a point of conscience, not one of right, and that I urged the argument above alluded to in the form of an appeal, not of a demand.

The denunciation of the slave trade as piracy by the British statute was made by this Government a sine qua non to the signature of the convention. As far as Great Britain was concerned, that proceeding, although perfectly conformable to the views of Parliament, quo ad morality, was one of pure supererogation, and conferred no power towards the suppression of the slave trade not possessed before. Had the Government of the United States not expressly desired the enactment of that statute it would never have been passed; but, being passed, its revocation, although certainly within the competence of Parliament, is now, by the interposition of subsequent events, rendered tantamount to morally impracticable.

These circumstances will, I apprehend, amply justify both the form of the argument which I built upon then, and the warmth with which I urged it.

I offer the preceding remarks, not by any means with a view to invite to further discussion, but simply in order to obviate all misconception of the meaning of words already employed by me.

I have the honor, sir, to renew to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

H. U. ADDINGTON.

HON. HENRY CLAY, Secretary of State.

[1ST SESSION.]

CLAIMS OF ELIPHALET LOUD, SAMUEL BAILEY, AND ISRAEL THORNDIKE, ON THE RUSSIAN GOVERNMENT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 6, 1826.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom, by a resolution of the House of the 9th of December last, was referred the petition of Eliphalet Loud and Samuel Bailey; and, by a resolution of the House of the 3d of January instant, the claim of Israel Thorndike on the Russian Government, have had the said petition and claim under consideration, and report:

That Eliphalet Loud and Samuel Bailey, inhabitants of the town of Weymouth, Massachusetts, represent themselves as the principal owners of the ship Commerce; that, in the year 1807, the said ship sailed from Boston to Leghorn, where she discharged her cargo; that she proceeded thence to Manfredonia, in the Gulf of Venice, and loaded with a cargo of wheat for Lisbon, under a contract with a merchant of Leghorn; that on her passage from Manfredonia to Lisbon the vessel was in distress by reason of the choking of the pumps, and consequently attempted to put into the island of Corfu; that in so doing she was captured by a Russian gun-boat, and condemned by a prize court sitting in Corfu, to which court neither the captain of the Commerce, nor any of the ship's company, nor counsel on their behalf, was admitted; that the ship's crew was left wholly destitute of money or means of return to America; that appeal was made from the decision of the prize court to the court of St. Petersburg, through Leavit Harris, esq., the American consul in that city; and that the successive ministers of the United States to the court of St. Petersburg have been charged by the American Government to present this case to the consideration of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias for indemnity.

The committee further report, that the claim of Israel Thorndike, of Boston, is for indemnity for the loss of the brigantine Hector and her cargo, the property of the said Thorndike; that this vessel, while pursuing, as the claimant is fully persuaded, a lawful commerce, was captured by his Imperial Majesty's frigate Venus, and carried into the island of Tenedos; that she was, with her cargo, condemned by the officers of the Russian fleet, in the cabin of the Admiral's ship, assuming the functions of a prize court, to which irregular court the captain of the Hector was not admitted; that due appeal was made to the court at St. Petersburg, through the American consul, Leavit Harris, esq., and that application has been made, in behalf of the claimants, by the successive ministers of the United States at St. Petersburg, to the Russian Government, up to the year 1819.

By a report of John Quincy Adams, esq., then Secretary of State, bearing date April 17, 1820,* it appears that the foregoing representations of the claimants are believed to be true; and from the same report it appears that, including the appeal made to the Russian Government by Mr. Harris, the American consul at St. Petersburg, at least three distinct representations of these cases had been made by the ministers of the United States of America to the Government of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias. The last of these being a memorial addressed by Mr. G. W. Campbell to Count Nesselrode, the Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs, under date of June 6, 1819, was communicated to the Senate of the United States with the report of the Secretary of State just mentioned. From this report, and from a communication made by the present Secretary of State to the Committee of Foreign Affairs, on the 27th of December last, the committee learn that no answer has ever been returned by the Russian Government to these representations, made to that Government by our ministers under the special instructions of the President of the United States.

More than six years having elapsed since the last of these representations was made, no answer to it from the Russian Government can now be expected; and the committee infer, from the note of the Secretary of State last alluded to, that the Executive has desisted from the repetition of appeals to the justice of his Imperial Majesty, which have so long remained not only unsuccessful but unnoticed. Whether a happier effect might be produced by a representation directly made by the Executive of the United States to the Russian minister in this country, it is not the province of the Committee of Foreign Affairs to decide. Under this view of the subject, not deeming it advisable to recommend any legislative measure to the House, the Committee of Foreign Affairs submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That Eliphalet Loud and Samuel Bailey have leave to withdraw their petition, and that the Committee of Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the claim of Israel Thorndike.

COMMITTEE OF FOREIGN RELATIONS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, December 23, 1825.

SIR: By order of the Committee of Foreign Relations, of the House of Representatives, I have to request a copy, from the Department of State, of the statement presented in October, 1809, to the Government of Russia, by Leavit Harris, Consul General of the United States, of the claims of the owners of the ship Commerce, Captain Tirrell, captured by an Imperial privateer, carried into, and condemned in, Corfu, in 1807, by the committee of prizes of that island; also, the answer of the Russian Government to the reclamation of our minister in favor of the owners of said vessel.

I am, sir, respectfully, your most obedient,

JOHN FORSYTH, C. C. F. R., H. of R.

Hon. H. CLAY, Secretary of State.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 27, 1825.

SIR: I have the honor to state, for the information of the committee, and in reference to the request in your letter of the 23d instant, that a search has been made through the letters from Mr. Leavit Harris, formerly Consul General of the United States at St. Petersburg, to this Department, and that the statement to which you refer is not to be found here. It would seem probable, indeed, that a transcript of it was communicated directly by Mr. Harris to the legation of the United States at St. Petersburg, and that it was never sent to this office. On the 6th of June, 1819, Mr. Campbell presented a note to the Russian Government, in relation to the claim to which the statement refers—the claim of the Weymouth Importing Company—as Mr. Adams, his predecessor, had done before; to which note no answer has since been received from that Government, nor was any ever given to the note of Mr. Adams.

I am, with great respect, sir, your obedient and very humble servant,

H. CLAY.

Hon. JOHN FORSYTH, Chairman of Committee of Foreign Relations of the House of Representatives of the United States.

[1ST SESSION.]

CORRESPONDENCE WITH FRANCE RELATIVE TO DESERTIONS FROM FRENCH SHIPS IN THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 23, 1826.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 5, 1826.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 3d instant, transmitting a copy of a resolution of the House of Representatives, instructing the Committee of Foreign Relations to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, for the more complete execution of the 6th article of the convention with France, of June 24, 1822, touching the delivery of deserters, and requesting any information in the Department of State on the subject of that resolution, I have the honor now to communicate—

1st. Copy of a correspondence which has taken place with the French minister, in regard to the interpretation and execution of the 6th article of the convention;

2d. Copy of a letter from the Department of State, addressed to the mayor of Norfolk; and

3d. Copy of a letter, under date of 29th December, 1825, from the mayor of Norfolk to Mr. Hersant, vice consul of France at Norfolk.

The above correspondence shows that, from the opinion in which both the Executive of the United States and the representative of France concur, as to the meaning of the 6th article of the convention, the mayor of Norfolk dissents; and, according to his letter to Mr. Hersant, that the attorney general of Virginia, to whom he had appealed for advice, has confirmed the correctness of his declaration, that he did not possess the authority to lend his official assistance in the recovery of French sailors who had deserted from the public ships of France. Not having seen the opinion of that law officer of Virginia, the ground upon which it is placed, or the extent of its scope, cannot be now stated. Whatever they may be, it is presumed that the magistracy of that State will act in conformity to his opinion, and will decline, in the cases in which he thinks they ought to withhold, their co-operation in the recovery of French deserters.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

HON. JOHN FORSYTH, Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations,

WASHINGTON, October 3, 1824.

SIR: The French squadron which is in Hampton Roads has experienced some desertion in their crews. The vice consul of France residing at Norfolk took the necessary steps to obtain the arrest of these deserters, agreeably to the 6th article of the maritime and commercial convention of the 24th of June, 1822; and having only, on this subject, to acknowledge the readiness of the magistrates to whom he applied, he attributes his want of success hitherto to a circumstance of form, with which I have the honor to make you acquainted.

The convention stipulates that, to obtain the delivery of deserters, the respective consuls must address themselves to the courts, judges, and officers competent: consequently, the consul must address himself to the magistrate of the county in which the vessel is stationed from which the desertion took place; but it happens, from the very division of the territory of each State, that the particular competence of each magistrate being restricted, the deserters may easily, in the space of a day, shift from the counties several times, and the mandate obtained in the one being of no force in the other, it is very easy for them to escape the researches directed against them.

The same inconvenience does not exist in France, where the tribunals are permanent, where their competence is less limited, and where, moreover, their mandates, by means of a simple formality, have force through the whole Kingdom.

It is therefore true, that the intention of the 6th article of the convention to give, in a just and complete reciprocity, to the commerce of the two countries a sufficient protection, is partly eluded, to the detriment of France, and it becomes indispensable that the Federal Government be pleased to find means for re-establishing, in this regard, the perfect equality which the spirit of the treaty demands.

With this view I have thought it my duty to address you, sir, and to request you to call all the attention, which the President cannot fail to give it, to a point which so nearly touches the commercial interests of the two countries.

Accept, sir, the assurances of my very high consideration.

BARON DE MAREUIL.

WASHINGTON, October 4, 1825.

SIR: On the 3d of October, last year, I had the honor to address the Department of State, to call its attention to certain difficulties relative to the execution of the 6th article of the convention of 1822, and to measures to be taken in the States of the Union, for securing the surrender of marine deserters. My letter still remaining without answer, I proposed to revert to this matter, when a fact still more grave should put me to the necessity of demanding of you an immediate explanation.

During the stay of the French brig, the Endymion, at Norfolk, one of her sailors having disappeared from on board, the vice consul of France immediately applied to the mayor of the city and to the judge of the county, from the one the assistance, and from the other the warrant necessary for the seizure of the deserter and sending him on board. Both formally refused it, and under the pretext, equally new and unexpected, that the 6th article of the convention was only applicable to the sailors of merchant vessels, and not to those of ships-of-war.

As this is the first time in three years that a distinction so strange has been advanced, and as I cannot believe that it had the approbation of the Government, I shall abstain from discussing it; but I pray you, sir, to be pleased to put me right in this regard, and to cause the necessary orders to be given, that a similar refusal on the part of the local authorities may no more fetter the execution of stipulation, so formal and so important to the maritime interests of the two States.

I send herewith a copy of the two answers made to Mr. Hersant.

Accept, sir, the assurances of my very high consideration.

BARON DE MAREUIL.

VICE CONSULATE OF FRANCE AT NORFOLK.

Copy of a letter addressed to the Vice Consul of France, at Norfolk, by Mr. Holt, Mayor of said city.

NORFOLK, September 29, 1825.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 28th instant, informing me of the desertion of a sailor from his most Catholic Majesty's brig Endymion, and requesting me to issue an order for his arrest and delivery to that vessel, in conformity to the convention between France and the United States, signed on the 22d of June, 1822.

There exists no law of our General and State Government that authorizes a magistrate of this Commonwealth to cause a deserter from a foreign national or private vessel-of-war to be apprehended and restored to such vessel; nor is it presumed that the convention to which you refer confers the power, but is solely applicable to cases of desertion from those employed between the two countries for the purposes of commerce. The sixth article provides that "the contracting parties, wishing to favor their mutual commerce, by affording in their ports every necessary assistance to their respective vessels, have agreed that the consuls and vice consuls may cause to be arrested the sailors, being part of the crews of the vessels of their respective nations, who shall have deserted from the said vessels, in order," &c.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your very obedient servant,

JOHN E. HOLT.

VICE CONSULATE OF FRANCE AT NORFOLK.

Copy of a letter addressed by Mr. Stephen Wright, Judge of the county of Norfolk, to the Vice Consul of France, in said city.

NORFOLK COUNTY, September 29, 1825.

SIR: I have the honor, in reply to your note of yesterday requesting a warrant to apprehend a deserter from the Endymion, a French vessel-of-war, to state that the construction given to the sixth article of the convention by the Commonwealth's attorney does not relate to deserters from vessels-of-war. This opinion I feel myself bound to respect. Your application to the higher authorities may produce a more liberal construction.

Accept, sir, an assurance of my high respect and consideration. Respectfully, your obedient servant,

STEPHEN WRIGHT.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Holt and Mr. Wright.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 7, 1825.

SIR: The Baron de Mareuil, the minister of France, has presented a complaint to the Government, founded upon your refusal, on the 29th of September last, to afford your official co-operation for the recovery of a sailor who had deserted from the Endymion. It has been laid before the President, who conceives that the sixth article of the convention with France of the 24th day of June, 1822, comprehends as well deserters from public ships as from merchant vessels. The inducement which operated with the parties to agree to the sixth article was that of favoring their mutual commerce; that the stipulation itself makes no exception of public vessels; on the contrary, it applies to all vessels of the respective parties, and to all deserting sailors, being part of the crews of those vessels. Besides, it cannot be said that the surrender of the deserter from the public vessel has no tendency to favor commerce. This is believed to be the true construction of the treaty; and if we have to extend the benefit of it to French vessels, public as well as private, in our ports, it should not be forgotten that we derive a corresponding benefit in the ports of France. Assuming this to be the meaning of the treaty, all observation is presumed to be unnecessary to show that it is the law of the land.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 7, 1825.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 4th ultimo, which has been submitted to the President. In respect to that of the third of same month of the previous year, I understand, in this Department, that an answer was not sent to it, in consequence of some conversation which passed between my predecessor and you, which appeared to render one unnecessary. If any misconception prevailed in that particular, and you should desire a written reply, it will afford me pleasure to furnish one.

In regard to the refusal of the mayor of Norfolk, and the justice of the peace of Norfolk county, to afford the requisite aid to the recovery of the sailor who deserted from the Endymion, that refusal, so far as it was founded upon the interpretation which those officers gave to the sixth article of the convention of 1822, ought not to have occurred. The President believes that, according to the true construction of that article, sailors deserting from public ships are comprehended as well as those from vessels in the merchant service. The error of those officers might have been corrected by resort to the tribunals of the United States, which will ever be ready to afford their co-operation, when questions are regularly brought before them, in carrying into effect the engagements of the United States with foreign nations, with all the precision and good faith which the President desires should characterize their execution. I have, in the meantime, communicated to the mayor of Norfolk, and to the justice of the peace of Norfolk county, the opinion of the President as to the erroneous construction of the convention which they have adopted, and doubt not that if their authority should again be invoked it will not be withheld upon the ground heretofore assumed by them.

I avail myself of the occasion to repeat to you assurances of the distinguished consideration of your obedient servant.

The Baron de Mareuil to Mr. Clay.

WASHINGTON, November 16, 1825.

SIR: The letter under date of the 7th of this month, which you did me the honor to write me in answer to mine of October 3, 1824, and of October 4, of the present year, places me under the necessity of making you acquainted with, and of recommending also to your benevolent attention, two important observations.

The first is relative to that conversation, of which you remind me, that took place last year between your predecessor and me, and in which I do not remember that there was any other question than the difficulties arising from the division of territories, and that of jurisdiction for the very execution of the 6th article of our convention; so that it appeared to have been intended that the Attorney General of the United States should be consulted upon the means of procuring a more easy execution of the stipulation relative to deserters in the ports and countries of the American Confederacy.

This is the result of that consultation which I solicited, and which I still solicit, for the purpose of establishing upon this subject a complete reciprocity between the two countries.

My second observation will bear upon that part of your letter where, after having acknowledged that the interpretation given by the mayor of Norfolk and the magistrate of the county to the same article of the convention is erroneous, and that this article applies to deserters from ships-of-war, as well as to those from merchant vessels; announcing to me, moreover, that, according to the orders of the President, you have transmitted to Norfolk the necessary information, that a difficulty of the same nature may not again take place. You, in the meantime, add, that there would be an appeal in the matter from this first decision to the tribunals of the United States. On this subject, sir, it is impossible for me not to remark that, from Government to Government, in all that concerns the general interests of the respective States, the execution of treaties can never afford matter for juridical actions; that it belongs to each Government to procure, in its territory, the full and entire execution of stipulations which bind it towards foreign Governments; and that, in the case in question, for example, if the consuls of France shall be always bound to pursue before the courts the arrest and return of deserters, there will result a loss of time and expense which would render illusory the stipulation made for the mutual interest of the navigation and commerce of the two States.

Be pleased to receive these two observations as emanating from the very duties of my station, and the sincere desire which I shall always have to contribute all in my power to the maintenance of a perfect understanding, which no one appreciates more than I do.

Accept, sir, the assurances of my very high consideration.

BARON DE MAREUIL.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 19, 1825.

SIR: In answer to the note which you did me the honor to address to me on the 16th ultimo, it is quite unnecessary to repeat the assurance already given of an anxious disposition on the part of the Government of the United States to fulfil its engagements with France, in their true spirit, and to their utmost extent. With respect to the desertion of sailors from the vessels of one of the two countries in the ports of the other, the instances cannot be so numerous as to require the establishment of any new tribunals or the creation of any new officers to enforce the provisions of the 6th article of the convention. The facilities for apprehending deserters necessarily depend, in some degree, upon the density of population and other circumstances at the place where a desertion happens; and they are greater at some ports than at others. This observation is applicable to both countries. It is believed that the suggestion is not well founded, that any difficulty in arresting and securing such deserters is to be attributed to the form of our Confederacy. "The courts, judges, and officers competent," referred to in the above article, comprehend those of the several States, as well as of the General Government; and one or other of the two descriptions of officers are to be found in sufficient number at all places. Besides, both nations contemplated, at the time of contracting, the actual forms of their respective Governments.

In regard to the second observation which you have done me the honor to make in your note, I have to remark, that, whatever may be the case with treaties generally between State and State, the above article of the convention, so far from being withdrawn from judicial action, expressly refers itself to judicial means for its execution; and from the very nature of the facts to be examined, the intervention of judicial functionaries was indispensable.

I pray you, sir, to accept renewed assurances of my high consideration.

The Baron DE MAREUIL, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from France.

The Baron de Mareuil to Mr. Clay.

WASHINGTON, December 24, 1825.

SIR: When, on the 3d October, 1824, I submitted to your honorable predecessor some difficulties which obstructed the execution of the 6th article of the convention of 1822, relative to the mutual surrender of deserters, I did not require that there should be, on that account, new courts of justice established or new functionaries created for the execution of said article; but I only showed the desire that means might be found of rendering effective, from one country to another of the same State, the warrant obtained from the magistrate residing in the port where the desertion took place, in order to obtain the reciprocity of what is practiced in France on the same occasion.

I regret, without doubt, to learn that the Federal Government has not discovered any means of procuring this perfect equality in the execution of a stipulation so interesting to the navigation of the two countries.

But an object more important has engaged me since then, and to which I find myself obliged to recur, as, on the one hand, we are not entirely agreed on the sense itself of the convention, and on the other, the assurances given in your letter of the 7th of November last are not sufficient to prevent a new refusal of the mayor of Norfolk, which you will see expressed, sir, in the letter of which a copy is sent.

It is, besides, evident to me that the 6th article of the convention in enumerating the tribunals, judges, and officers competent, has principally had in view to specify, according to the organization of each country, the different authorities to which the consuls and vice consuls ought to address themselves for the arrest and surrender of deserters, but that it has not supposed that there ever was, in this circumstance, a ground of procedure to appeal from one jurisdiction to another, unless in the case where one party appeared, denying the very fact of the desertion. The question from the beginning, therefore, has been, to know what was, in the ports of the United States, the competent authority to which the French consuls ought to address themselves. Now it had appeared, until now, that the magistrate or justice of the peace granted the warrant, and that the mayor attended to the execution of it. Several examples have already presented themselves, where those of Norfolk had attended to the requisitions of the consul. Still it is not their competence that they refuse to acknowledge; it is not the justice of the requisition that they discuss; it is the very application of the treaty; it is its interpretation that they contest; and in this case, as in those of which I spoke in my letter of the 17th of November, it is impossible for me to admit that the consul ought to address himself to the court of the United States. It appeared to me, on the contrary, that his representation could only come to the minister of his Government, and that it was my part to make it the object of a direct representation to the Federal Government; for if, definitively, (and the new letter of the mayor of Norfolk afforded the idea,) the directions of the cabinet were not sufficient to regulate the conduct of this magistrate, there was a necessity, in the system of the country, to cause judgment to be given by the court of the United States, it would be for the Federal Government to cause it.

I can only, therefore, through your means, sir, refer myself to the justice of the President, and to the express intention which I, without doubt, acknowledge that he has to contribute all in his power to the full and entire execution of the engagements which subsist between France and the United States.

Accept, sir, the assurances of the high consideration with which I have the honor to be your most humble and obedient servant,

BARON DE MAREUIL.

NORFOLK, December, 16, 1825.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letters of the 8th instant and of this date, in which you desire me to cause two deserters from his most Catholic Majesty's brig Endymion to be apprehended and confined, subject to your order. I had the honor to communicate to you, in answer to your former note on this subject, my impression that the 6th article of the convention of navigation and commerce between the United States and France provided for cases of desertion from vessels engaged in their mutual commerce, and not from their ships-of-war. This construction still appears to me to be correct, and I must therefore decline for the present complying with your request. I have, however, applied to the attorney general of the State for his interpretation of the article above alluded to, which, when received, shall be communicated to you, and your demand complied with, if sustained by his opinion.

I am, sir, with the greatest respect, your most obedient servant,

JOHN E. HOLT.

SIR: In the note I had the honor to address you on the 16th instant, you were apprised I had submitted to the consideration of the attorney general of the State your application to me to cause two deserters from his most Catholic Majesty's brig Endymion to be arrested and confined, subject to your order, and that I had desired his opinion as to the propriety of my affording my official co-operation for their recovery. No. 417.

[1ST SESSION.]

CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT RELATIVE TO THE BOUNDARY OF THE UNITED STATES ON THE PACIFIC COAST.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 31, 1826.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 18th instant, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, with the correspondence with the British Government, relating to the boundary of the United States on the Pacific Ocean, desired by the resolution.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, January 31, 1826.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 30, 1826.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of January 18, 1826, requesting the President to communicate to that House all the correspondence between the Government of the United States and the Government of Great Britain, respecting the boundary of that part of the territory of the United States which is situated upon the Pacific Ocean, and which has not already been communicated, or so much thereof as may be compatible with the public interest to disclose, has the honor to report to the President, as coming within the purview of the resolution, copies of—

1. A letter from Mr. Adams, late Secretary of State, to Mr. Rush, under date July 22, 1823.
  2. An extract from a despatch of Mr. Rush to the Secretary of State, under date August 12, 1823.
  3. Copy of the protocol of the 11th conference of the American and British Plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, (in London,) on April 1, 1824.
  4. Copy of the protocol of the 12th conference.
  5. Copy of the protocol of the 20th conference.
  6. Extract from the protocol of the 23d conference.
  7. Copy of paper marked F, American paper, on the Northwest Coast of America.
  8. Copy of paper marked P, British paper, on the Northwest Coast of America.
- Respectfully submitted.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 22, 1823.

SIR: Among the subjects of negotiation with Great Britain which are pressing upon the attention of this Government is the present condition of the Northwest Coast of this continent. This interest is connected in a manner becoming from day to day more important with our territorial rights; with the whole system of our intercourse with the Indian tribes; with the boundary relations between us and the British North American dominions; with the fur trade; the fisheries in the Pacific Ocean; the commerce with the Sandwich Islands and China; with our boundary upon Mexico; and lastly, with our political standing and intercourse with the Russian Empire.

By the third article of the convention between the United States and Great Britain of October 20, 1818, it is agreed that "any country that may be claimed by either party on the Northwest Coast of America, westward of the Stony mountains, shall, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers of the same, be free and open, for the term of ten years from the date of the signature of the convention, to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two powers. It being well understood that this agreement is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim which either of the two high contracting parties may have to any part of the said country, nor shall it be taken to affect the claims of any other power or State to any part of the said country, the only object of the high contracting parties in that respect being to prevent disputes and differences among themselves."

On the 6th of October, 1818, fourteen days before the signature of this convention, the settlement at the mouth of Columbia river had been formally restored to the United States by order of the British Government.—(Message of the President of the United States to the House of Representatives, April 15, 1822, page 13. Letter of Mr. Prevost to the Secretary of State of November 11, 1818.)

By the treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, between the United States and Spain, of February 22, 1819, the boundary line between them was fixed at the 42° of latitude from the source of the Arkansas river to the South Sea. By which treaty the United States acquired all the right of Spain north of that parallel.

The right of the United States to the Columbia river, and to the interior territory washed by its waters, rests upon its discovery from the sea and nomination by a citizen of the United States; upon its exploration to the sea by Captains Lewis and Clarke; upon the settlement of Astoria, made under the protection of the United States, and thus restored to them in 1818; and upon the subsequent acquisition of all the rights of Spain, the only European power who, prior to the discovery of the river, had any pretensions to territorial rights on the Northwest Coast of America.

The waters of the Columbia river extend by the Multnomah to the 42° of latitude, where its source approaches within a few miles of those of Platte and Arkansas, and by Clarke's river to the 50th or 51st degree of latitude; thence descending southward till its sources almost intersect those of the Missouri.

To the territory thus watered and immediately contiguous to the original possessions of the United States, as first bounded by the Mississippi, they consider their right to be now established by all the principles which have ever been applied to European settlements upon the American hemisphere.

By the ukase of the Emperor Alexander of September 4, (16,) 1821, an exclusive territorial right, on the Northwest Coast of America, is asserted as belonging to Russia, and as extending from the northern extremity of the continent to latitude 51°, and the navigation and fishery of all other nations are interdicted by the same ukase to the extent of 100 Italian miles from the coast.

When Mr. Poletica, the late Russian minister here, was called upon to set forth the grounds of right, conformable to the laws of nations which authorized the issuing of this decree, he answered in his letters of February 28 and April 2, 1822, by alleging, first, discovery, occupancy, and uninterrupted possession.

It appears upon examination that these claims have no foundation in fact. The right of discovery on this continent, claimed by Russia, is reduced to the probability that in 1741 Captain Tchirikoff saw from the sea the mountain called St. Elias, in about the 59th degree of north latitude. The Spanish navigators, as early as 1582, had discovered as far north as 57° 30'.

As to occupancy, Captain Cook, in 1779, had the express declaration of Mr. Ismaloff, the chief of the Russian settlement at Onalaska, that they knew nothing of the continent in America; and in the Nootka Sound controversy, between Spain and Great Britain, it is explicitly stated in the Spanish documents that Russia had disclaimed all pretension to interfere with the Spanish exclusive rights to beyond Prince William's Sound, latitude 61°. No evidence has been exhibited of any Russian settlement on this continent, south and east of Prince William's Sound, to this day, with the exception of that in California, made in 1816.

It never has been admitted by the various European nations which have formed settlements in this hemisphere that the occupation of an island gave any claim whatever to territorial possessions on the continent to which it was adjoining. The recognized principle has rather been the reverse, as, by the law of nature, islands must be rather considered as appendages to continents than continents to islands.

The only color of claim alleged by Mr. Poletica, which has an appearance of plausibility, is that which he asserts as an authentic fact, "that in 1789 the Spanish packet St. Charles, commanded by Captain Haro, found, in latitude 48° and 49°, Russian settlements to the number of eight, consisting, in the whole, of twenty families, and 462 individuals." But more than twenty years since Flurieu had shown, in his introduction to the voyage of Marchand, that in this statement there was a mistake of at least ten degrees of latitude, and that instead of 48° and 49°, it should read 58° and 59°. This is, probably, not the only mistake in the account. It rests altogether upon the credit of two private letters—one written from St. Blas, and the other from the city of Mexico, to Spain, there communicated to a French consul in one of the Spanish ports, and by him to the French Minister of Marine. They were written in October, 1788, and August, 1789. We have seen that in 1790 Russia explicitly disclaimed interfering with the exclusive rights of Spain to beyond Prince William's Sound, in latitude 61°; and Vancouver, in 1794, was informed by the Russians on the spot that their most eastern settlement there was on Hinchinbrook island, at Port Etches, which had been established in the course of the preceding summer, and that the adjacent continent was a sterile and uninhabited country. Until the Nootka Sound contest, Great Britain had never advanced any claim to territory upon the Northwest Coast of America by right of occupation. Under the treaties of 1763 her territorial rights were bounded by the Mississippi.

On the 22d July, 1793, Mackenzie reached the shores of the Pacific, by land, from Canada, in latitude 52° 21' north, longitude 128° 2' west of Greenwich.

It is stated in the 52d number of the Quarterly Review, in the article upon Kotzebue's voyage, "that the whole country, from latitude 56° 30' to the United States, in latitude 38°, or thereabouts, is now, and has long been, in the actual possession of the British Northwest Company;" that this company have a post on the borders of a river in latitude 54° 30' north, longitude 125° west, and that in latitude 55° 15' north, longitude 129° 44' west, "by this time (March, 1822) the United Company of the Northwest and Hudson's Bay have, in all probability, formed an establishment."

It is not imaginable that, in the present condition of the world, any European nation should entertain the project of settling a colony on the Northwest Coast of America; that the United States should form establishments there, with views of absolute territorial right and inland communication, is not only to be expected, but is pointed out by the finger of nature, and has been for years a subject of serious deliberation in Congress. A plan has, for several sessions, been before them for establishing a territorial government on the borders of Columbia river. It will, undoubtedly, be resumed at their next session, and even if then again postponed, there cannot be a doubt that, in the course of a very few years, it must be carried into effect. As yet, however, the only useful purposes to which the Northwest Coast of America has been or can be made subservient to the settlements of civilized men are the fisheries on its adjoining seas, and trade with the aboriginal inhabitants of the country. These have hitherto been enjoyed in common by the people of the United States and by the British and Russian nations. The Spanish, Portuguese, and French nations have also participated in them hitherto, without other annoyance than that which resulted from the exclusive territorial claims of Spain, so long as they were insisted on by her.

The United States and Great Britain have both protested against the Russian Imperial ukase of September 4, (16,) 1821. At the proposal of the Russian Government, a full power and instructions are now transmitted to Mr. Middleton for the adjustment, by amicable negotiation, of the conflicting claims of the parties on this subject.

We have been informed by the Baron de Tnyll that a similar authority has been given on the part of the British Government to Sir Charles Bagot.

Previous to the restoration of the settlement at the mouth of Columbia river in 1818, and again upon the first introduction in Congress of the plan for constituting a territorial government there, some disposition was manifested by Sir Charles Bagot and Mr. Canning to dispute the right of the United States to that establishment; and some vague intimation was given of British claims on the Northwest Coast. The restoration of the place, and the convention of 1818, were considered as a final disposal of Mr. Bagot's objections, and Mr. Canning declined committing to paper those which he had intimated in conversation.

The discussion of the Russian pretensions in the negotiation now proposed necessarily involves the interests of the three powers, and renders it manifestly proper that the United States and Great Britain should come to a mutual understanding with respect to their respective pretensions as well as upon their joint views with reference to those of Russia. Copies of the instructions to Mr. Middleton are, therefore, herewith transmitted to you; and the President wishes you to confer freely with the British Government on the subject.

The principles settled by the Nootka Sound convention of October 28, 1790, were—

1st. That the right of fishing in the South Seas; of trading with the natives of the Northwest Coast of America; and of making settlements on the coast itself, for the purposes of that trade, north of the actual settlements of Spain, were common to all the European nations, and, of course, to the United States.

2d. That, so far as the actual settlements of Spain had extended, she possessed the exclusive rights, territorial, and of navigation and fishery, extending to the distance of ten miles from the coasts so actually occupied.

3d. That, on the coasts of South America and the adjacent islands south of the parts already occupied by Spain, no settlement should thereafter be made either by British or Spanish subjects; but, on both sides, should be retained the liberty of landing and of erecting temporary buildings for the purposes of the fishery. These rights were also, of course, enjoyed by the people of the United States.

The exclusive rights of Spain to any part of the American continents have ceased. That portion of the convention, therefore, which recognizes the exclusive colonial rights of Spain on these continents, though confirmed, as between Great Britain and Spain, by the first additional article to the treaty of the 5th of July, 1814, has been extinguished by the fact of the independence of the South American nations and of Mexico. Those independent nations will possess the rights incident to that condition, and their territories will, of course, be subject to no exclusive right of navigation in their vicinity, or of access to them, by any foreign nation.

A necessary consequence of this state of things will be, that the American continents, henceforth, will no longer be subject to colonization. Occupied by civilized, independent nations, they will be accessible to Europeans, and to each other, on that footing alone; and the Pacific Ocean, in every part of it, will remain open to the navigation of all nations, in like manner with the Atlantic.

Incidental to the condition of national independence and sovereignty, the rights of interior navigation of their rivers will belong to each of the American nations within its own territories.

The application of colonial principles of exclusion, therefore, cannot be admitted by the United States as lawful, upon any part of the Northwest Coast of America, or as belonging to any European nation. Their own settlements there, when organized as territorial Governments, will be adapted to the freedom of their own institutions, and, as constituent parts of the Union, be subject to the principles and provisions of their Constitution.

The right of carrying on trade with the natives throughout the Northwest Coast they cannot renounce. With the Russian settlements at Kodiack, or at New Archangel, they may fairly claim the advantage of a fur trade, having so long enjoyed it unmolested, and because it has been, and would continue to be, as advantageous, at least, to those settlements as to them. But they will not contest the right of Russia to prohibit the traffic, as strictly confined to the Russian settlement itself, and not extending to the original natives of the coast.

If the British Northwest and the Hudson's Bay Companies have any posts on the coast, as suggested in the article of the Quarterly Review, above cited, the 3d article of the convention of the 20th October, 1818, is applicable to them. Mr. Middleton is authorized by his instructions to propose an article of similar import, to be inserted in a joint convention between the United States, Great Britain, and Russia, for a term of ten years from its signature. You are authorized to make the same proposal to the British Government, and, with a view to draw a definite line of demarkation for the future, to stipulate that no settlement shall hereafter be made on the Northwest Coast, or on any of the islands thereto adjoining, by Russian subjects, south of latitude 55°; by citizens of the United States, north of latitude 51°; or by British subjects, either south of 51° or north of 55°. I mention the latitude of 51° as the bound within which we are willing to limit the future settlement of the United States, because it is not to be doubted that the Columbia river branches as far north as 51°, although it is most probably not the Tacoutche Tesse of Mackenzie. As, however, the line already runs in latitude 49° to the Stony mountains, should it be earnestly insisted upon by Great Britain, we will consent to carry it in continuance on the same parallel to the sea. Copies of this instruction will likewise be forwarded to Mr. Middleton, with whom you will freely, but cautiously, correspond on this subject, as well as in relation to your negotiation respecting the suppression of the slave trade.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

[1ST SESSION

RELATIVE TO THE INTERVENTION OF FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS TO INDUCE SPAIN TO ACKNOWLEDGE THE INDEPENDENCE OF THE SOUTH AMERICAN GOVERNMENTS.COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, IN EXECUTIVE SESSION, FEBRUARY 2, 1826, AND THE INJUNCTION OF SECRECY SINCE REMOVED.To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 30th ultimo, I communicate herewith, in confidence, a report from the Secretary of State, with the documents containing the information desired by the resolution.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, February 1, 1826.

The Secretary of State, to whom the President has referred the resolution of the Senate of January 30, 1826, requesting him to inform the Senate whether the Government of Spain has been informed of the application made by our Government for the intervention of the Emperor of Russia to induce Spain to recognize the independence of the South American States, and to lay before the Senate the correspondence, if any has taken place; between our minister at Madrid and the Spanish Government, and also between such minister and our Government on the subject of such intervention and recognition, has the honor to report—

An extract of a letter from this Department to Mr. Everett, dated Department of State, April 27, 1825.

An extract from the notes of a conversation between Mr. Everett and Mr. Zea, communicated with a despatch from Mr. Everett to this Department, dated September 25, 1825.

An extract of a despatch from Mr. Everett to this Department, of October 20, 1825.

All which is respectfully submitted.

H. CLAY.

*Extract of a letter from Mr. Clay to Mr. Everett, dated*DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 27, 1825.

“Besides the preceding objects, to which your attention will be directed, others of great interest will also claim it. Of these, that of the highest importance is the present war between Spain and her former colonies on this continent. The President wishes you to bring this subject in the most conciliating manner possible before the Spanish Government. It would be as unnecessary as unprofitable to look to the past, except for the purpose of guiding future conduct. True wisdom dictates that Spain, without indulging in unavailing regrets on account of what she has irretrievably lost, should employ the means of retaining what she may yet preserve from the wreck of her former possessions. The war upon the continent is, in fact, at an end. Not a solitary foot of land from the western limit of the United States to Cape Horn owns her sway; not a bayonet in all that vast extent remains to sustain her cause. And the Peninsula is utterly incompetent to replace those armies which have been vanquished and annihilated by the victorious forces of the new Republics. What possible object, then, can remain to Spain to protract a war which she can no longer maintain, and to the conclusion of which, in form, there is only wanting the recognition of the new Governments by treaties of peace? If there were left the most distant prospect of her reconquering her continental provinces, which have achieved their independence, there might be a motive for her perseverance. But every expectation of such reconquest, it is manifest, must be perfectly chimerical. If she can entertain no rational hope to recover what has been forced from her grasp, is there not great danger of her losing what she yet but feebly holds? It should be borne in mind that the armies of the new States, flushed with victory, have no longer employment on the continent, and yet, whilst the war continues, if it be only in name, they cannot be disbanded without a disregard of all the maxims of just precaution. To what object, then, will the new Republics direct their powerful and victorious armies? They have a common interest and a common enemy, and let it be supposed that that enemy, weak and exhausted as he is, refuses to make peace, will they not strike wherever they can reach? and from the proximity and great value of Cuba and Porto Rico, is it not to be anticipated that they will aim, and aim a successful blow too, at those Spanish islands? Whilst they would operate from without, means would doubtless be, at the same time, employed to stimulate the population within to a revolt. And that the disposition exists among the inhabitants, to a considerable extent, to throw off the Spanish authority, is well known. It is due to the United States to declare that they have constantly declined to give any countenance to that disposition.

It is not, then, for the new Republics that the President wishes you to urge upon Spain the expediency of concluding the war. Their interest is probably on the side of its continuance, if any nation can ever have an interest in a state of war. But, it is for Spain herself, for the cause of humanity, for the general repose of the world, that you are required, with all the delicacy which belongs to the subject, to use every topic of persuasion to impress upon the councils of Spain the propriety, by a formal pacification, of terminating the war. And as the views and policy of the United States in regard to those islands may possibly have some influence, you are authorized, frankly and fully, to disclose them. The United States are satisfied with the present condition of those islands in the hands of Spain, and with their ports open to our commerce, as they are now open. This Government desires no political change of that condition. The population itself of the islands is incompetent at present, from its composition and its amount, to maintain self-government. The maritime force of the neighboring Republics of Mexico and Colombia is not now, nor is it likely shortly to be, adequate to the protection of those islands, if the conquest of them were effected. The United States would entertain constant apprehension of their passing from their possession to that of some less friendly sovereignty; and of all the European powers, this country prefers that Cuba and Porto Rico should remain dependent on Spain. If the war should continue between Spain and the new Republics, and those islands should become the object and the theatre of it, their fortunes have such a connexion with the prosperity of the United States that they could not be indifferent spectators; and the possible contingencies of such a protracted war might bring upon the Government of the United States duties and obligations, the performance of which, however painful it should be, they might not be at liberty to decline. A subsidiary consideration in favor of peace, deserving some weight, is, that as the war has been the parent cause of the shocking piracies in the West Indies, its termination would be, probably, followed by their cessation; and thus the Government of Spain, by one act, would fulfil the double obligation under which it lies to foreign Governments, of repressing enormities, the perpetrators of which find refuge, if not succor, in Spanish territory; and that to the Spanish nation itself, of promoting its real interests.

MADRID, September 25, 1825.

"In the course of this conversation upon matters touching so nearly the independence of the colonies, there were, of course, frequent opportunities of alluding to that question, and the minister seemed to feel no delicacy or reserve in expressing his sentiments upon it. He remarked, repeatedly, that the King would never abandon his claim to these his ancient and rightful possessions; that the cause was a good one; and that, however unfavorable their prospect might appear at present, they had a right to suppose that they should, in the end, succeed; that we had seen, of late, revolutions in political affairs at least as violent as this would be—for example, the overthrow of Bonaparte and the restoration of Louis XVIII to the throne of his ancestors; that the party in the colonies in favor of independence, though dominant and apparently unresisted, was not, in reality, so strong as was generally supposed; that it consisted of a busy and active, but in reality feeble minority; that the mass of the good citizens, constituting a great majority of the population, were in favor of the King, and were only waiting for some suitable occasion to come out in their strength and to put down the insurgents, and, finally, that the cause being a just one, they had a right to suppose that they should be assisted, sooner or later, by an interference of Providence.

"I did not think it necessary to enter very fully into the argument with Mr. Zea.

"I said to him, however, that I regretted to hear from him so decisive a declaration of the King's resolution not to acknowledge the new States; that my Government had hoped that the battle of Ayacucho, and the recognition of England, would have been considered by his Majesty as settling the question, and that he would have been induced to put an end to the violent state of things now existing, which was more or less injurious to all Christian nations; that enlightened men of all classes, parties, and opinions in most of the civilized countries of Europe, and in the United States, were now satisfied that Spain could never recover her authority over the colonies. As a single instance, I mentioned to him the opinion of the Bishop of Hermopolis, minister of church affairs in France, and well known throughout Europe as one of the ablest and most decided adherents of the anti-liberal sect, whom I had seen at Paris on my way, and who had told me expressly that they regarded the affair of South America as settled.

"To this he made answer that the Bishop had also, in the time of Bonaparte, despaired of the possibility of the King's restoration, and that he might be as much in the wrong now as he was then. I remarked that there were evident symptoms in the proceedings of the French Government of an intention to recognize the new States at no very distant period. He said that France had hitherto stood by them faithfully in all their troubles; that he could not say how long she would be true to them, but should she even desert them, the King would still adhere firmly to his principles; that the standing and invariable rule of conduct observed by his Majesty upon all occasions was that of strict justice; that he made no concessions to expediency, acknowledged no distinction between politics and morals, and was prepared to sacrifice everything rather than surrender what he knew to be his right. He then recurred to his favorite example of Louis XVIII; said that they were by no means reduced to so low a point as he had been; that he, too, often had been solicited to abandon his claims to the French throne; but that, by firmly rejecting all such propositions, and tenaciously adhering to his purpose, he had finally succeeded in recovering everything.

"It struck me that the example of Bonaparte, who had lost all by obstinately refusing to make a timely surrender of a part, would have been rather more to the point, but I did not think it worth while to press this subject at present. I told him that I was not called upon to advise his Majesty's ministers upon this or any other question, and that what I had said had been thrown out incidentally in reply to his remarks."

No. 10.

MADRID, October 20, 1825.

"It was reported here very confidentially, a few days ago, that the new Consulative Junta, or Council of Government, was occupied in preparing the way for an arrangement with the South American States. Upon tracing this rumor to its origin, I found that it arose from the fact that the council had deputed some of its members to confer with two Spanish officers who lately arrived from South America by way of the Havana and New York, and are the same that were sent out by the constitutional Government to Buenos Ayres as Commissioners. They landed at Bordeaux from New York, and came on immediately to this place; remained here about three weeks, during which time they had occasional conferences with members of the council, and afterwards proceeded to Cadiz. These facts being known, and it being also understood that the council had been requested by the minister to give their opinion upon the measures proper to be taken in regard to the colonies, it was natural enough to draw the conclusion that the conferences in question had some connexion with this subject, and that the persons with whom they were held might, perhaps, have gone to Cadiz, on their way to America, as private agents of the Government. Another, and a more probable construction of the fact, would be, that the council had no other object in conferring with these gentlemen than to obtain information respecting the state of the colonies.

"About the time when this report was in circulation I went to the Escurial, in order to be present at the celebration of the King's birthday, and when there had, of course, frequent opportunities of seeing the minister. In one of the conversations which I had with him I inquired of him what foundation there was for this rumor, and whether there was any change of policy contemplated in regard to the American States. To this question he replied most decidedly in the negative, and entered anew, and very readily, at great length, into an exposition of the intentions of the Government, repeating, in substance, the same remarks which he had made to me at San Ildefonso. He declared that the King would never abandon his rights; that it was a matter of conscience with him to transmit his hereditary possessions to his successors; that the Royalist cause was not so desperate as we supposed; that there were even now symptoms of a return of these provinces to their ancient loyalty; and that such an event would not be at all strange, considering what violent and sudden revolutions have been constantly occurring during the last thirty years. From all that he said upon the subject I was quite satisfied that the reports of an intended arrangement were entirely groundless, and that the detention and examination of the above mentioned officers were merely for the purpose of obtaining information as to facts.

"The tone and manner of the minister during this conversation were such as to induce me to doubt the correctness of the opinion which I had entertained and expressed to you as to his private sentiments upon this subject. He spoke with so much decision and apparent openness of the probability of reconquering the colonies that I found myself bound to give him credit for his sincerity, at the expense of his sagacity and good sense. He inquired of me at this time whether I had any knowledge of the communications that had lately been made by my Government upon that subject to the Emperor of Russia. I replied in the affirmative, and he then said that he had received the day before, for the first time, upon his return to the Escurial from Madrid, an intimation (probably from one of the ministers abroad) that some overtures had been made in that quarter, and requested me to give him such information respecting them as I might think it proper to communicate. I was not quite so fully prepared upon this subject myself as I could have wished, not having obtained any answer from Mr. King to the request which I made him for a copy of the instructions to Mr. Middleton, probably because he has had no good private occasion to send it. I, however, told him that my Government made no secret of their policy in regard to this business, and that I had no objection to inform him that our minister at St. Petersburg had been directed to express to the Emperor their full conviction that the contest between Spain and the colonies must be considered as finally settled in favor of the latter party; their persuasion that the interest of Spain and the general good of the civilized world would be promoted by the early acquiescence of his Catholic Majesty in this result, and their wish that the Emperor, should he also entertain these opinions, would unite with them in advising and requesting the Spanish Government to put an end to the war by an acknowledgment of the independence of the colonies. I took this opportunity of informing the minister, more precisely than I had done before, that what I had already suggested to him in favor of this measure must be considered as expressing the wishes and policy of my Government, and not my own individual sentiments, which I should not, of course, think of intruding upon his Majesty's cabinet. I told him that I was formally instructed to avail myself of any suitable occasion to suggest to him, with the delicacy required by the nature of the subject, the earnest desire of the Government of the United States to see this long struggle brought to an amicable conclusion, and their complete conviction that all further effort on the part of Spain to recover the colonies must be wholly fruitless, and more injurious to herself than to them.

"Mr. Zea seemed to be a good deal struck with these remarks, and I was inclined to suppose, from his manner, that he had considered what I had said to him before upon the subject as a merely personal communication. He replied, that these proceedings of the Government of the United States placed him under the necessity of declaring, in the most positive manner, the King's unalterable resolution never to abandon his rights, and to reject all offers of mediation, or of amicable intervention, which should contemplate an acknowledgment of the independence of the new States. He said that they were, and always had been, ready and willing to accept any proposal for mediation, or to treat directly with the colonies, upon the basis of their previous submission to the King's sovereign power; but that they would never consent to negotiate in any way upon any other terms; that the King, being once satisfied on this head, would doubtless be disposed to grant his subjects in America every favor and indulgence which they could possibly wish, but that they must begin by proving their loyalty and their confidence in his Majesty's justice and good intentions. He wondered that, among the offers of mediation that had been made from time to time, especially by England, none had ever been proposed upon this basis. I told him that the reason probably was, that the British Government, as well as that of the United States, considered the independence of the new States as now firmly established, and were well aware that they would never treat upon any other terms than an acknowledgment of it by Spain. I added, however, that I should be well pleased to know, if he were disposed to inform me, what concessions the King would be willing to grant to the Americans, in the event of their return to their allegiance; as, for example, whether he would allow them to make their own laws, in legislative assemblies of their own choice? My object in asking this question was, of course, merely to obtain a more complete view of the intentions and dispositions of the Government upon the whole subject. He replied, that, as to legislative assemblies, he was far from being satisfied that they would suit the condition of the colonies, and that, in general, he thought the only safe course for the Americans would be to trust entirely and implicitly to the King's known good character. I should have thought, from this answer, that my question did not make a very favorable impression upon him. At the close, however, of the conversation he recurred to it in such a way as induced me to think that he would have been glad to consider it as an indirect overture from some of the colonies. He said, after I arose to go, that the conversation had turned upon a number of delicate and interesting topics; that on such occasions it was not always possible to distinguish between remarks that were merely of a private and personal description and such as were official, and that, in order to avoid mistakes upon that point, he should be glad if I would state, in writing, what my instructions required me to communicate to him as the opinions and intentions of the Government, and especially any propositions that I might be authorized to make, in the nature of an overture from the colonies, founded on the basis of submission. I told him that I had no authority, from any quarter, to make propositions of that description; but that I would, with pleasure, if he wished it, give him an official statement of what I had said to him, by order of my Government, in favor of the acknowledgment of the independence of the new States. He replied that he was ready to receive any note that I might send him; but that on that head the King's mind was completely made up beyond the possibility of change. Notwithstanding this, I have thoughts of preparing and transmitting to the minister a pretty detailed communication upon this subject. Such a paper, if it does not produce much immediate effect upon the Spanish cabinet, may, perhaps, in one way or another, have a favorable bearing on the general question.

"Previously to this interview with Mr. Zea I had availed myself of such occasions as offered to converse upon the same subject with the British and Russian ministers. The former is Mr. Frederick Lamb, brother of Lord Melbourne, a gentleman of about forty-five years of age, regularly trained to the diplomatic line, and apparently well fitted for it by his talents and information. The latter is Mr. D'Oubril, who has also passed his life in the employment of a foreign minister, and has now reached the age of about sixty. He seems to enjoy the confidence of his Government, and last year took the place of Count Nesselrode, as Minister of Foreign Affairs, during an absence of the latter from St. Petersburg, which lasted several months. Both these gentlemen have shown, since my arrival here, every disposition to be on friendly terms with me, and have plainly manifested, by their attentions, the high esteem in which they hold the American nation and character. Mr. D'Oubril, in particular, has been more civil than any other of the diplomatic body with whom I was not previously acquainted.

"Mr. Lamb's sentiments in regard to the South American question are, of course, precisely the same with ours. I was desirous to ascertain whether the British Government had lately made any attempts to urge Spain to a recognition of the new States, and questioned Mr. Lamb upon this point. He said he had had one or two conversations with Mr. Zea soon after his arrival, (he has been here about five months,) and stated the substance of what had passed between them. The minister, it seems, gave to him the same answer which he has since given to me, and cited, to illustrate his argument, the same examples of Louis XVIII and Bonaparte. No offer of formal mediation has been made by England since her recognition. Indeed her interest as a commercial and manufacturing country is now on the other side. The longer the war continues, the longer she enjoys a monopoly of the Spanish American market for her fabrics, and the more difficult will Spain find it to recover her natural advantages upon the return of peace. England will therefore, probably, be very easy in regard to this matter, and will leave Spain to pursue, unmolested, the course she may think expedient. I suggested this point both to Mr. Zea and to the Russian minister, and was inclined to think, from what they said of it, that it had more weight with them than any other consideration in favor of recognition. They both admitted the justice of my remarks and the great inconvenience that resulted in this way from the present state of things, and could only avoid the proper conclusion by reverting to their common places of the probability of a return of the colonies to their allegiance, which they really seem to imagine will come about sooner or later, without any effort on the part of either Spain or her allies, and by the aid of some unlooked for intervention of Divine Providence. I learned nothing material from Mr. L., excepting the fact that the British Government is now quiet in regard to this matter, and makes no attempts to influence the decision of Spain. He professed to have but little information as to the state of the Spanish settlements in America, and, having passed the greater part of his life, including the last eight or ten years, on the continent, has been, in fact, rather out of the way of obtaining it.

"Mr. D'Oubril was somewhat guarded in his language, and did not seem quite willing to admit that it was the decided intention of the Emperor to encourage Spain in her present system. He said that, individually, he did not by any means take the same view of the subject which the Spanish Government did, and yet that he was not completely satisfied that an immediate recognition was the true policy. He cited, in his turn, the old instance of Louis XVIII and Bonaparte, and was far from being sure that the internal divisions which did or would distract the colonies might not bring them again under the Spanish Government. He was aware, nevertheless, that Spain was daily and yearly suffering great injury from the effects of the present system, and that, by continuing it, she would probably lose her remaining possessions in America and her chance of ever obtaining a due share in the trade with that continent, besides endangering her national existence at home. This was making out a pretty strong case in favor of recognition, but he still returned to his former text, that he considered the question as extremely doubtful. In all that he said upon it he professed to declare merely his own personal opinions and feelings, and, if I recollect right, did not say directly what language he was ordered to hold in his communications with this Government. It is understood, however, that the influence of the Emperor has been employed in support of the present system, and the general impression which I received from his remarks coincided with this opinion. Mr. D'Oubril's private sentiments may possibly be different. Both he and Mr. L. inquired of me respecting the late overtures made by the President's order at St. Petersburg, and appeared to have some though not a very minute acquaintance with the language of your instructions to Mr. Middleton. The representatives of France, Holland, Sweden, Saxony, and Prussia, with whom I have had more or less conversation on this subject, have all expressed themselves strongly in opposition to the policy of Spain. Even the Pope's Nuncio and the ambassador from Naples seem to be of the American party. The French, I suspect, are making pretty strong efforts in favor of the new States, but on this point I have, at present, no very precise information."

CLAIMS ON ACCOUNT OF SPANISH SPOILIATIONS UNDER TREATY WITH SPAIN FOR THE CESSION OF FLORIDA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES FEBRUARY 7, 1826.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The memorial of the subscribers most respectfully represents:

That the property of the citizens of the United States, while peaceably and honestly engaged in their lawful commerce and business, was, to a very great amount, at various times and under various pretences, forcibly taken from them by means and under circumstances which rendered the Government of Spain responsible for the losses thus sustained; and, of consequence, gave to the sufferers an undoubted right to the direct and efficient aid of their own Government to obtain a just indemnity from Spain. The Government of the United States never denied or shrunk from this great duty of protection which was due to her citizens, but in every form of complaint or remonstrance continued, without ceasing, to urge the Government of Spain to make reparation for the wrongs committed under her authority.

After many years of tedious negotiations and ruinous delay, a provision was made for the satisfaction of those claims in the treaty concluded between the United States and Spain for the purchase and cession of Florida, and a Board of Commissioners was constituted to examine and judicially decide upon the validity of the claims which should be preferred to them.

In this manner the United States received from Spain what was admitted to be an equivalent for the claims of our citizens upon Spain, and by assuming these claims our Government became discharged from their obligation to enforce the payment of them by Spain. This arrangement was a just one only on the supposition that it was the intention of our Government to take upon itself to pay all that Spain was bound to pay; for it could justly cancel the claims of our citizens upon Spain on no other terms; and such would be the justice of the case, even if no consideration had been received from Spain; but it is made much stronger from the circumstance that the United States have actually received from Spain the cession of a country of immense value and extent, for which no consideration has been given to Spain but the assumption of these claims by the United States, and the discharge of Spain from all future responsibility in relation to them. Your memorialists, therefore, take for granted that it was bona fide the intention of their Government to place itself precisely, as to these claims, in the situation of the debtor, thus discharged by its interference, to pay whatever that debtor was bound to pay, and to make the same satisfaction to the injured citizens of the United States which Spain was bound to make. Your memorialists do not conceive that the limitation of a certain sum in the treaty was ever intended to impeach or evade a principle of justice so unquestionable as that above referred to; that is, that he who steps between me and my debtor takes upon himself the whole responsibility of the debtor, most especially when he receives from the debtor a full consideration for doing so.

The limitation of the sum, your memorialists respectfully suggest, was introduced as a measure of precaution, to prevent that carelessness in the admission of claims which might prevail, if the whole Treasury of the United States was thrown open to them, and to raise an interest amongst just and honest claimants to lend their assistance to detect and exclude every attempt at imposition. This was a fair and perhaps a necessary policy; and as an extension of the sum allowed would always be in the power of the Government, it held the means in its own hands of preventing any injustice being done by this limitation. Your memorialists confidently take this position, that when the sum of five millions of dollars was assumed by the treaty as the limit of the responsibility of the United States, it was honestly and truly believed that this sum would be sufficient to pay and satisfy all the claims which could be substantiated under the treaty; and calculations, intended to be just and liberal, were made from the materials in the possession of the Government which justified this limitation. But it never was the intention of the Government—it is inconsistent with its honor and justice to imagine it—to save itself an inconsiderable sum of money by deducting eight or ten per cent., or any other amount, from the honest claims of its citizens.

After a patient and severe scrutiny by a tribunal selected and constituted by the Government itself, in whose investigations the utmost circumspection and rigor, as well as learning and ability, are manifest, it turns out that the estimate of the claims made by the Government was too low, the amount established by said tribunal as positively due requiring a deduction of one-twelfth part, or eight and one-third per cent., in order to bring it within the sum stipulated in the treaty. It is, indeed, surprising that it was so near the truth. Your memorialists, therefore, respectfully request that this mistake may be corrected; that the original intention of Government in assuming these claims may be carried into effect; and that provision may be made to make good the unexpected deficiency in the fund appropriated to the payment of these debts.

Your memorialists beg leave respectfully to call your attention to another subject connected with these claims. The Commissioners, after much argument and deliberation, decided that the principal only of the claims admitted should be paid, and rejected every application for interest. The interest for delay of payment has become so inseparably connected with the debt, both in our judicial proceedings and the common understanding, that a difference between them is scarcely recognized; to establish the debt is to establish a right to interest from the period when the debt ought to have been paid. Thus only can equal justice be administered, and the creditor of twenty years' standing be placed on as favorable a footing as one of yesterday. It is understood that the Commissioners departed from this obvious rule of equality principally, if not altogether, on the ground that they had but a limited fund to distribute; that it should first be applied to the debts or claims admitted; and that, by allowing interest, they would take the principal of one claimant to pay the interest of another. Without discussing the soundness of this reasoning, which does not consider the interest as a part of the debt, your memorialists are content to remark, that it can have no force or application to the case as presented to Congress, who are not fettered in the administration of justice by the narrowness of their means, but have ample room and power to give to the claimants all they shall believe they are justly entitled to. Whether the payment of interest should be at once and absolutely assumed by our Government, or be made contingent upon the sales of the lands in Florida, your memorialists submit to your wisdom and justice, being assured that, if the property received by the United States in commutation for the claims held by our citizens against Spain shall yield to our Treasury an amount sufficient to pay the interest as well as the principal of the claims, both will be paid with the same exactitude which the law would enforce between individual creditors and debtors.

Your memorialists are not unmindful of, or unthankful for, what has been already done for them in this behalf; nor do they mean to make it a ground for any unreasonable importunity for more. They truly intend to limit their demands to that mere indemnity which was always their right, and which their country has so long and urgently labored to obtain for them; and they confidently believe the measure of that indemnity will be the same, whether it is to be made by Spain or the United States.

Resting on the hope that their request will be viewed by your honorable bodies as just and proper, your memorialists will, as in duty bound, ever pray.

[1ST SESSION.]

RELATIVE TO DESERTIONS FROM SHIPS OF THE NETHERLANDS IN THE UNITED STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES FEBRUARY 13, 1826.

The Chevalier Huygens to the Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

WASHINGTON, December 27, 1825.

The Dutch ship Anna Elizabeth, commanded by Captain Brunow, arrived lately at New York from Curaçoa, has experienced in that port inconveniences from a legislation entirely singular, at least unusual among the commercial nations of Europe, but which appears in force in that State.

The ship has been detained there by a mandate of arrest, issuing from the marine court sitting in that city, against the master, who, being cited before that court to hear and defend himself against the complaints of one of his crew, on account of his having corrected him on board, and on the high sea, had to pass through the forms, and await the issue of a process, the termination of which, fortunately, turned out favorable to him; but after having obtained the judgment, he has incurred the charge of a second mandate of arrest upon the complaints of another sailor of his crew. This last, however, being unable to support the charge, has fled from his duty, and, in fine, the two men have broken their obligations contracted in the role, and have deserted.

The master immediately making application to the court of police to obtain their arrest, has been refused; after this he applied to the mayor with the same success; then going to Judge Thompson, of the Supreme Court of the United States, he was told by him that he knew of no treaties or arrangements between the United States and the Netherlands to sanction this requisition, nor any law to authorize it.

The consequence of all this was, that the ship was retarded in her voyage; that the master and his crew were engaged four days in appearing before the court, thereby losing their time; that the first was attended with great expense, and that if he had not found sufficient security he would have certainly been sent to prison; and, finally, that he was obliged to depart with his crew weakened by the loss of two men.

The simple exposition of the facts, more fully detailed in the subjoined report of the master's lawyer, will doubtless suffice to show how contrary this state of things is to the liberty of navigation, which may be stopped and troubled by the complaint of a single man of the crew, contrary to the liberty of nations, which gives the right of being judged by their own tribunals; in fine, contrary to the interest of commerce, which risks all if a captain loses authority over his crew, and has no support to maintain the integrity of his role.

To watch for this maintenance, and to judge the differences between captains and their crews, is one of the attributes which the laws of the Kingdom assign to the consuls, and which their admission in the ports of the United States should secure to them. Yet Mr. Zimmerman, the consul of the Netherlands at New York, was deprived of his attributes by the competence which the marine court exercises in the causes of the crews of his nation, to which circumstance is added the facility of desertion, and the refusal of the authorities to act against deserters, as has happened in the present case.

When, during this summer, two ships of the royal marine touched and sojourned in American ports, and when the commanders as well as the consuls called for the interposition of the authorities against deserters, the refusal was not pronounced, but what was equivalent took place, inasmuch as of a great number of men, the greater part of whom, were, moreover, accused of thefts, not one was arrested, or justice rendered to these commanders. Their reports upon this subject, having already fixed the attention of the Government of the Netherlands, that upon the affair of the crew of the ship Ann Elizabeth will doubtless cause a painful impression, as it will compel the belief that the system of the marine court of New York is that of the United States.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of his Majesty the King of the Netherlands, being authorized to inform the Government of the United States of the great inconveniences which result from this facility, and a sort of protection granted to desertion, and to agree upon the means of remedying it, seizes this moment to submit to it his representations, and to demand of it the adoption of a system analogous to that which is followed in the Netherlands.

Coincident with this demand, the undersigned is authorized, at the same time, to assure that his Government makes no difficulty in satisfying the claims of American consuls in regard to their marine deserters, which he has just proved by the restoration of four men engaged on board a ship-of-war.

As it is a matter of public notoriety that the American consuls in the ports of the Netherlands enjoy the right of determining the differences between the crews of their nation, the undersigned flatters himself that the President, by the admission of consuls of the Netherlands in the ports of the United States, will see fit to recognize in their attributes the same authority.

The undersigned, on this occasion, prays Mr. Clay to accept the assurance of his high consideration.

[1ST SESSION.]

INDEMNITIES DUE UNDER THE AWARD OF THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA, FOR SLAVES AND OTHER PRIVATE PROPERTY CARRIED AWAY BY THE BRITISH FORCES IN VIOLATION OF THE TREATY OF GHENT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 8, 1826.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 10th ultimo, requesting information relating to the proceedings of the joint commission of indemnities, due under the award of the Emperor of Russia, for slaves and other private property carried away by the British forces in violation of the treaty of Ghent, I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, and documents containing the information desired by the resolution.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, March 8, 1826.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 7, 1826.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred by the President the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 10th of February, 1826, requesting certain information therein described in relation to the mixed American and British commission, respecting the indemnity due under the award of the Emperor of Russia, for slaves and other property, transported by the British forces, in violation of the treaty of Ghent, has the honor to submit the following report:

1. A copy of the list of slaves and other private property carried away, which has been submitted to the Commissioners, together with a statement of the amount of the several claims, as far as it is practicable to prepare such a statement.

2. That no claim has been finally acted upon and allowed by the Commissioners.

3. That none has been finally rejected, and all yet remain to be determined.

4. That "the causes which have delayed the complete adjustment of those claims" are, first, the time which was consumed in procuring the necessary testimony to establish their amount and validity; and, secondly, disagreement in opinion between the American and British Commissioners in the execution of the commission. One of the questions on which they disagree (that of interest) applies to every claim for indemnity which is presented to the Board. Another extends to all, or nearly all, of the slaves belonging to citizens of Louisiana, for the loss of which they claim to be indemnified. These disagreements occurred in the course of the last spring. By the first article of the convention, concluded and signed at St. Petersburg in June, 1822, under the mediation of the late Emperor of Russia, provision is made for the appointment of two arbitrators, as well as of two Commissioners, for the purpose of ascertaining and determining the amount of indemnification which may be due to citizens of the United States, under the decision of his Imperial Majesty. And, by the fifth article of the same convention, it is stipulated that "in the event of the two Commissioners not agreeing in any particular case under examination, or of their disagreement upon any question which may result from the stipulations of this convention, then, and in that case, they shall draw, by lot, the name of one of the two arbitrators, who, after having given due consideration to the matter contested, shall consult with the Commissioners, and a final decision shall be given conformably to the opinion of the majority of the two Commissioners and of the arbitrator so drawn by lot. The American Commissioner has offered, on his part, to give effect to that article, in the several cases in which the two Commissioners have disagreed, by proceeding to designate one of the arbitrators in the mode prescribed; but the British Commissioner has declined to concur in the selection of an arbitrator, upon the ground taken by him that the cases on which the Commissioners differ in their judgment are not comprehended in the decision of the Emperor of Russia and the terms of the convention. This ground being deemed wholly inadmissible, instructions adapted to the circumstances of the commission were given during the last spring to the minister of the United States at the court of London to bring the subject before the British Government. A negotiation was accordingly opened as soon as it was practicable; but, at the date of the last despatches from Mr. King, (the 25th day of December, 1825,) it was not brought to a close; and it is now submitted to the President whether the progress which had been then made in it be such as to admit of any other notice of the negotiation than that which is now respectfully presented.

With respect to the inquiry, "at what period said commission will probably terminate," no satisfactory answer can be given. The commission does not depend upon the sole will of one party, but upon that of two. Its progress is now obstructed by the non-concurrence of the two Commissioners. That obstacle to the execution of the business, and the consequent termination of the commission, can only be removed by a change of opinion of one of the Commissioners, or by the American or British Government operating upon its Commissioner. One of the objects of the negotiation at London is to remove that obstacle; and when that negotiation, the precise duration of which cannot be anticipated, is brought to a conclusion, some probable estimate may be made of the subsequent continuation of the commission. The hope is indulged that the issue of that negotiation may be known here before the adjournment of Congress.

All which is respectfully submitted.

H. CLAY.

19TH CONGRESS.]

No. 422.

[1ST SESSION.

CLAIMS OF THE INHABITANTS OF EAST FLORIDA FOR PROPERTY LOST AND DESTROYED BY TROOPS OF THE UNITED STATES IN 1812.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 10, 1826.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee of Foreign Relations, on the memorial of sundry persons, inhabitants of East Florida previous to the cession of it to the United States, reported:

That the petitioners state that they suffered greatly by the invasion and occupation of a part of the province of East Florida, in 1812, by troops under the command of General Matthews, a Commissioner of the United States, and they pray Congress to adopt the proper means to ascertain the amount of their respective losses, and provide for the speedy payment of them when ascertained. No evidence accompanies the memorial; but the committee have not thought it necessary to call for evidence, as their judgment is unfavorable to the claimants, on the admission of the truth of the principal facts stated by them. The attempted revolution in East Florida, in 1812, is well remembered; the part said to have been taken in it by General Matthews, the disavowal of his conduct, and the revocation of his authority by the President, are equally well known. The transactions of that day formed a part of complicated negotiations with Spain, which were terminated by the treaty of cession of February 22, 1819. As individuals, the Spanish inhabitants of East Florida had no claim upon the United States. The question of indemnity, arising out of the events of 1812, was purely international, urged by Spain, doubtless, for the benefit of the sufferers. What were the obligations of the United States to Spain for the transaction of 1812 the committee do not think it necessary to inquire; an agreement, mutually satisfactory to the parties, was made, and to that agreement a resort must be had to ascertain the foundation of the claims of the petitioners upon the United States. Such part of the 9th article of the treaty of the 22d of February, 1819, which relates to the various transactions in Florida, is as follows:

"And the high contracting parties, respectively, renounce all claim to indemnities for any of the recent events or transactions of their respective commanders and officers in the Floridas.

"The United States will cause satisfaction to be made for the injuries, if any, which, by process of law, shall be established to have been suffered by the Spanish officers and individual Spanish inhabitants by the late operations of the American army in Florida.

Soon after the Floridas were delivered to the United States, to fulfil the obligations under this article of the treaty of cession, an act was passed, on the 3d day of March, 1823, authorizing the judges of the Territory to receive evidence of the several claims under it; to report them to the Secretary of the Treasury, who was directed to re-examine them, and to pay those which were approved out of any moneys in the Treasury not specially appropriated to some other object. Various claims were presented, established by authentic evidence, and transmitted to the Treasury Department. Upon all those presented before March last the late Secretary of the Treasury decided. Three classes of cases have been presented, arising in 1812, 1814, and 1818. It appears, by the records of the Treasury Department, that all those of 1812 and 1814 were rejected as not embraced by the treaty. It is understood by the committee that, before a final decision upon them, the late Secretary of the Treasury applied to the Chief Magistrate, under whose instructions the treaty was framed, and was confirmed in the opinion previously entertained by him, that no cases were within the scope of the 9th article which occurred prior to 1818.

An application has been lately made on behalf of claimants for losses sustained in 1812 and 1814, and the opinion of the present coincides with that of the preceding administration. The only question for the committee to consider is, whether that decision is justified by the 9th article of the treaty, the words of which have been already quoted. In the judgment of the committee, the word late operations refers only to the last operations of the American army. Prior to 1812 no operations are known to have occurred; to include 1812, 1814, and 1818, three distinct periods, under the term late, would be using a latitude of construction not warranted by the letter or spirit of the article. If "late operations" do not exclude any "operations," why was the term used? It is alleged, however, in the very ingenious and elaborate argument of the delegate of Florida, which accompanies this report, that the 9th article in the English differs from the Spanish, no qualifying word equivalent to "late" being used in the Spanish. The English and Spanish are equally originals, and it cannot be important to ascertain which is the translation of the other. On a careful comparison of the English and Spanish, the committee are of opinion, however, that the same idea is conveyed in both languages, and that the same construction may be put on the Spanish as upon the English. The Spanish is as follows:

"Las altas partes contratantes renuncian reciprocamente todos sus derechos à indemnizaciones por qualquiera de los ultimos a contecimientos y transacciones de sus respectivos comandantes y oficiales en las Floridas."

"Y los Estados Unidos satisfarán los perjuicios, si los hubiese habido, que los habitantes y oficiales Españoles justifiquen legalmente haber sufrido por las operaciones del Exército Americano en ellas."

The words "por las operaciones del Exército Americano en ellas" refer to the "ultimos a contecimientos y transacciones." The whole should form but one sentence; there is evidently a mistake in the punctuation. The copulative conjunction y (and) unites the two parts of the sentence together. "Las Floridas" should be followed by a semicolon, otherwise the relative pronoun "ellas," which concludes the whole, would be without an antecedent.

The committee recommend, therefore, to the House, not to disturb the decision made under the treaty and the law to carry it into effect, and offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the inhabitants of East Florida, who pray indemnity for injuries sustained in 1812, in the then province, have leave to withdraw their memorial and the accompanying documents.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the subscribers, Spanish subjects, resident in East Florida previous to the cession of that province to the United States, respectfully sheweth:

That on the 17th of March, 1812, an invasion of the said province, and the capture of the town of Fernandina, within its limits, took place, by a naval force of the United States, consisting of several gun-boats, under the command of Commodore Campbell, and a body of men from Georgia, among whom were the Savannah Guards and Blues, under the direction of General George Matthews, Commissioner on the part of the United States; that said body of men were joined by regular troops of the United States, under the command of Colonel Thomas Smith, and proceeded through the province to the city of St. Augustine, which they invested, and continued before, from the 25th of March to the middle of September, during which time the American flag was constantly flying; that they were obliged to retreat from thence to St. John's river, where they remained until the United States troops were finally withdrawn, in consequence of the convention between Governor Kindelan and General Thomas Pinckney, in the May following.

Your memorialists beg leave further to represent: That at the time of the aforesaid invasion they were subjects of the Crown of Spain, a power then at peace with the United States, and in the enjoyment of prosperity and domestic comfort; that the officers and troops of the United States, with those associated with them, did, under the sanction of the American flag, burn the houses of your memorialists; destroy their cattle and other property; and that the Indians, let loose upon the country in consequence of the invasion, did complete the ruin of your memorialists, by carrying off their negroes and destroying all that remained of their property; that, in consequence of these unprovoked hostilities and atrocities, they are involved in distress and poverty; their debts have accumulated; their creditors are coming down upon them; they are deprived of the means of paying them; and the remnant of their property is seized and sacrificed to satisfy their demands; in one word, they have nothing before them but distress and ruin. That your memorialists did look forward with confidence to remuneration for the pecuniary losses they have sustained by the aforesaid invasion; those of their domestic comforts, and the prospects of their families, can never be repaired; hitherto their expectations have been disappointed; they therefore pray your honorable body will take such measures as to your wisdom may seem fit, in order that the amount of said losses may be ascertained, and means taken for their speedy liquidation; and your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

St. AUGUSTINE, January 14, 1826.

Letter from Joseph M. White to Mr. Rush.

WASHINGTON, November 28, 1825.

SIR: By an act of Congress approved March 3, 1823, the claims of Spanish officers and individual Spanish inhabitants, under the 9th article of the treaty between Spain and the United States, concluded at Washington on the 22d of February, 1819, were referred to the judges of the superior courts of East and West Florida, for examination and adjustment, and a provision made for their payment, upon the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. These claims were submitted and judicially investigated by the judges, in obedience to the requisitions of the act, and reported during the last winter, at a time when it is believed the health of your predecessor was such as to prevent his giving that attention to the subject which its magnitude and importance required. A list has been furnished by one of the clerks of your Department, purporting to be an account of the number admitted and those rejected, without giving the reason of the decision against the latter, with which some of my constituents, particularly in East Florida, are greatly and (in my humble opinion, although it is uttered with deference and respect,) justly dissatisfied.

It therefore becomes my duty, as the representative of that Territory, to invite your attention to the subject, under a firm conviction that upon an examination of the facts and the treaty itself you cannot fail, by the application of those principles of rational construction with which you are so familiar, to give such an interpretation as will do ample justice to the claimants and preserve the honor and faith of the nation, without subjecting them to the necessity of appealing to Congress to institute an inquiry whether any further provision is necessary to carry into effect that article of the treaty. The amount of the claims dwindle into comparative insignificance when the great principles involved in their determination are considered by a Government that possesses the proud pre-eminence of a national character, unsullied by injustice or punic faith, and when it is recollected that these claimants are not foreign subjects, having a Government to interpose its negotiations in their behalf; by the treaty they have been made citizens of the United States, and are now relying on the magnanimity of their own adopted rulers, and, appealing only to the standard of reason and national law, expect by that to be judged. It is said, in a letter written to East Florida, that the claims in that section of the Territory were rejected because they were not embraced by the provisions of the treaty. The claims for losses in West Florida occasioned by the invasion of 1814 were no doubt doomed to the same fate and for the same reason. By this construction the operation of the treaty is only confined to the losses occasioned by the operations of the army in 1818, when it is known that in that year there were few losses, in consequence of the strict discipline and uncommon prudence of the commanding general and his officers, and when the quartermaster had not only stores, but money, adequate to the demands of the army, with the exception, perhaps, of a few instances, which resulted more from the consequences of the consternation occasioned by an invasion than the immediate destruction of the soldiery.

I shall endeavor, however, to inquire, in the first place, what were the obligations incurred by the United States in consequence of the invasion of Florida, independently of any treaty on the subject; and in the second, to prove that those losses, such as might be established by the decision of the judges, were embraced by it, and so intended by the contracting parties. It will be recollected by you, sir, that, for many years previously to the occupation of the province of East Florida by the American troops, there had been various questions of controversy between the Spanish monarchy and the Government of the United States in relation to limits, the right of deposit at New Orleans, the navigation of the Mississippi, and particularly the Spanish spoliations on our commerce and the condemnation of prizes captured by French privateers in the ports of Spain, for the latter of which our Government claimed an indemnity, which was provided for in the convention of 1802. My object in referring to these facts, so prominent in the diplomatic history of our country and so perfectly familiar to you, is to present a view of the relations of the two Governments previous to the passage of the secret act of Congress of 1811. I do not pretend that the Spanish Government had not violated the laws of nations and the convention they had solemnly entered into. These are questions that it would be useless to discuss. Whatever may have been the undoubted rights, equitable claims, and just complaints of the United States on the one hand, and the fraud, injustice, and perfidy of the Spanish Government on the other, it will be obvious that the inhabitants of East Florida could incur no responsibility, and that their private fortunes could not be appropriated to the satisfaction of these spoliations or the support of an American army in pursuit of redress within the acknowledged limits of the Spanish territory, without previous declaration of war by the constitutional authorities. Even in case there had been an open war existing at the time of the invasion between the two Governments, according to the well settled principles of all civilized nations, the private property of the inhabitants of the belligerent parties would be free from molestation or injury. This question is of too recent occurrence in our own Government to admit of controversy; in the late war with England the United States asserted successfully her claims for the deportation of slaves, taken from individuals by the enemy in time of open and declared war. There was, however, no war between Spain and the United States when despatches were issued in 1811 to General Matthews, directing him to "repair with all possible expedition, concealing from general observation the trust committed," and directing him, if the local authorities were willing to surrender the country, to take possession, and in case a foreign power should be suspected of a design to take it, "to preoccupy by force the territory," and if a "military force" should be required, they are placed under his command. Under these instructions General Matthews entered the country with an army, took possession of Amelia island, contrary to the declared will and in defiance of the Spanish authority, and against their loudest protestations. Many of the inhabitants of that country, seeing an American general, bearing the commission of the President of the United States, and upon his "assurances" that the United States intended to hold possession, joined his standard, or declared the province independent of the Spanish monarchy, and made a formal delivery of it to the United States, and placed themselves under its protection. All the confusion and consequent loss of property, of both the inhabitants and what has been denominated the Patriots, was to be attributed directly to the invasion of General Matthews.

The Patriots, seeing from his instructions that he was authorized to receive it from the local authorities, proclaimed a revolution, that they, the dominant party in the country, might surrender the province. The proceedings of General Matthews were, however, disavowed, his powers revoked, and finally conferred on General Mitchell, of Georgia; and in the official communication to this gentleman, the Government seem to be sensible that the inhabitants who had declared the province independent "placed reliance on the countenance and support of the Government of the United States. In subsequent instructions from the Department of State, bearing date May 27, 1812, the following language is employed: "It is not expected, if you find it proper to withdraw the troops, that you will interfere to compel the Patriots to surrender the country, or any part of it, to the Spanish authorities; the United States are responsible for their own acts only." Here is an explicit declaration that, although the Government admits that the Patriots were encouraged by the countenance and support of its officers, yet they will only be responsible for their own acts. It is submitted for your consideration, sir, whether this position is defensible, and whether it was not abandoned in the formation of the treaty? I humbly conceive that they were, in foro conscientiæ, liable for all the injuries to the property of both the Spanish subjects and Patriots, resulting from the alternate conflicts of both parties. The United States, although they disavow the acts of General Matthews and dismiss him from service, still maintain his position in the interior of a country with which we are at peace, and say, "we are responsible for our own acts," by which it is evidently meant they intend "to hold the ground occupied," and settle with the King of Spain for the hostile entry, and the inhabitants for any injury to their personal property.

All these proceedings took place prior to the declaration of war against England, and when there was no apprehension of Indian hostility in that quarter to justify such precautionary measures. At the succeeding session of Congress a bill was introduced to authorize the forcible possession of the Floridas, which was rejected in the Senate, and, notwithstanding, the position was still maintained. The Governor of Georgia seemed to have understood the diplomatic instructions he had received, and in his letter of the 17th July, 1812, he says: "I have carefully avoided making any proposition for withdrawing the troops, under the fullest conviction that such a step was not intended." Here, although General Matthews was dismissed for transcending orders, as it was alleged, his position is maintained by a subsequent commander, under the fullest conviction that it was not the intention that he should recede from it. That possession of the country was forcibly held, against the wishes and entreaties of the Spanish officers and inhabitants, will be seen by a letter from Governor Kindelan to Governor Mitchell, forwarded to the Department of State, in which the former protests against a longer continuance of the troops in the Spanish dominions, and against the destruction of the property of the inhabitants. As an evidence of the great destruction of property "in consequence of the operations of the Army," reference is requested to the letter of Colonel Smith, the commander of the United States troops, dated "Camp, twenty miles north of St. Augustine, September 22, 1812;" he says: "the inhabitants have all abandoned their houses, with as much of their movables as they could carry with them;" and again, "the province will soon become a desert." This letter was written to General Mitchell and sent to the Government. Here is the most unequivocal proof of the American commander that, on account of the operations of the Army, and the consequences resulting from it, the whole country was abandoned and exhibited a spectacle of desolation. I know it has been alleged that the occupation was persisted in, in consequence of an attack which resulted in the death of one man, made upon a scouting party, doubtless in defence of the lives or property of the inhabitants.

In all the negotiations of the two Governments up to the conclusion of the treaty, it will be seen that the Spanish minister insists for reparation for what he calls the war in East Florida upon a neighboring and friendly power; and again, "I protest against the occupation of Amelia island by the naval and military forces of this Republic," &c. It is apparent, sir, from the foregoing, that there have been "losses" occasioned by the operations of the American Army in the provinces of a country with which we were at peace, at a time when we cannot impute the sin of encouraging or abetting the enemy, against the known will and in defiance of the repeated protestations of the authorities and the peaceful and unoffending inhabitants. For these losses the Spanish minister insisted upon reparation up to the time of concluding the treaty. I humbly conceive that without any stipulation on the subject, but upon the immutable principles of justice and good faith, and the precedents established by the practice of our own Government, the United States are bound to pay for these "losses."

It has been said that interest and ambition are the pole star and magnet of nations, but the United States has heretofore, and we hope will hereafter be considered the great exemplar of liberal principles and liberal establishments, and that the escutcheon of its fame will never be tarnished with injustice, with or without the obligations of treaty stipulations.

If it has been assumed as a position by your predecessor, deemed supported by the phraseology of the treaty, that under its provisions the United States were only bound to pay for the losses occasioned by the entry of the Army in pursuit of the enemy in 1818, the question naturally presents itself, why were the others not provided for? The considerations that impelled the invasion in either of the other instances were not more pressing or powerful than the one in 1818. In the one made in 1814, it was by the same Army, for the same purpose; if Spain had a right to demand indemnity and satisfaction for the injuries of her subjects, and the United States acquiesced in the justice and legality of her demand in the one case, with what color of propriety could they claim an exemption from it in the other? The same rights existed on the part of Spain, and the same moral and political obligations were imposed on the United States; whilst in East Florida the obligation was increased fourfold, from the fact that at the time of the hostile entry into that province there was no war, no enemy fostered and encouraged by the local authorities, no Indians furnished with ammunition and weapons to be used against us; none of these extenuating circumstances existed; the movement was a political one altogether, and the object to seize the province as an indemnity for spoiliations, with which these inhabitants had nothing to do; and to that, as the immediate and not remote cause, may be attributed all the consequences of the revolution, and proceedings of the Patriots, the sortie of Sir Gregor McGregor, and the excursions of the visionary Aury, in addition to the devastations of our own Army. A proposition of this kind, successfully advanced, would result in the establishment of a principle of this kind, that the United States have a right to invade the provinces of a friendly or neutral power, destroy the property of the inhabitants without making any compensation, without its being forced upon them by the stipulations of a treaty. Such an argument would not only be indefensible, but incompatible with the honor and magnanimity of the nation. No one, it is presumed, will contend that, according to the usages and laws of war, the private property of an enemy could be appropriated or destroyed by an invader without incurring a just liability to make compensation, and if it is not made by the aggressor the Government ought to remunerate her own citizens or subjects, and continue the war until the object is accomplished; a contrary doctrine would subvert established principles, and make a new chapter in the code of nations that few civilized communities would deem it politic to adopt.

If, then, the private property of an enemy is sacred in time of war, the argument applies much more forcibly in favor of a friendly or neutral power. The British seem to have been so sensible of the application of this principle, that after the arrival of their troops in the West Indies they despatched an officer to pay for all losses occasioned by their troops during the temporary occupation of Pensacola; in addition to this, the British Government, upon the representations of the Spanish ministers, have constituted a commission in England to receive and adjust all claims of Spanish subjects against that Government for property, and particularly negroes, carried off in British vessels. Instances of a similar character are not wanting in our own Government; when the Northwestern Army invaded Canada, and were reduced to considerable extremities, to carry on the war more vigorously, destroyed the individual property of the enemy, an American agent was despatched to Frenchtown to adjust all claims and pay for the losses occasioned by the operations of the Army. So far as the decision of the Emperor of all the Russias may be quoted as an exposition of national law, it was made in our favor in the controversy with England in regard to the deportation of slaves. Governments should not be unmindful of the benign maxim, "to do unto others as they would have others do unto them."

I have endeavored to prove that the United States were bound to pay for these losses, without the injunctions of a treaty. I beg leave now to refer to that instrument itself, as constituting a positive covenant that has not been discharged; the words in the English copy are as follows: "The United States will cause satisfaction to be made for injuries, if any, which by process of law shall be established to have been suffered by the Spanish officers and individual Spanish inhabitants by the late operations of the American Army in Florida." To establish these claims, an act of Congress was passed, referring them to the judges of East and West Florida, who have performed that service, and have reported them to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is authorized to exercise appellate jurisdiction over the decisions of the judges in pronouncing upon the interpretation of the treaty. It appears, however, that the Secretary, if he examined the claims at all, has overruled and reversed their opinions, and confined the treaty to 1818. If it had ever occurred to Congress that such an interpretation could fairly be given to that article, they would have only invested the judge of West Florida with authority, inasmuch as the "operation" of that year was in that province only; and had the contracting parties intended it to be confined to that year, they would have said the "late operations in West Florida," and not "in Florida," which comprehends both provinces; besides, sir, the word "late," in the English copy, does not, by any principle of construction, apply to one invasion; it may refer to one, or to a half a dozen operations with equal propriety. In the correspondence between the plenipotentiaries of the two Governments, they speak of the "late events," and late "operations," referring to a variety, and comprehending all the transactions connected with the invasion of Florida, East and West. Taken in connexion with this part of the subject, the correspondence of the Chevalier de Onis, pending the negotiations which resulted in the conclusion of a treaty, in which he uniformly claimed reparation for the injuries sustained in East Florida, it is satisfactorily demonstrated that the "late operations," comprising a period of six years, in which these expeditions were projected and carried on, were intended by the contracting parties, and the United States are bound to pay for all that may be established.

If, however, I should be mistaken in supposing that the word "late" could not be made legitimately to apply to any proceedings prior to the campaign of 1818, there is another ground deemed incontrovertible. In the Spanish copy of the treaty, to be found in the 6th volume of the Laws of the United States, there is no word employed to signify "late." The phraseology is, "por las operaciones," "by the operations" of the Army in Florida, applying to East as well as to West; and as this is one of the few covenants in favor of Spain, it must be taken most strongly against the grantor. How this difference between the two copies occurred I am at a loss to conjecture, unless it be a mistake of the translator, in turning that article into English, as it is probable it was proposed in the Spanish language.

However that may be, the Spanish negotiator believed at the time that the rights of these claimants were provided for; and as I have endeavored to show that the United States were bound, by the unchanging and unchangeable obligations of justice, to pay for them, and when there are such strong arguments in favor of that construction, I think they cannot hesitate to do so.

I do not know the nature or amount of the claims in East Florida; it is the principle alone for which I contend, leaving it to the judges, who are fully competent to the duties assigned them, and who have, no doubt, examined them with the strictest scrutiny, and to you, sir, in whose judgment I have the most implicit confidence, to say whether they were embraced by the treaty.

That illegitimate claims should be presented under this law excites no surprise, and is of frequent occurrence, as is shown by the frequent rejections at your own Department; that these claims have been thoroughly examined, and the good separated from the fraudulent, we may have every confidence, from the high character of the tribunals to whom they were referred, and they having received their examination in pursuance of law, ought not now to be questioned by the United States.

In West Florida, having been engaged as counsel for some of the claimants, I had occasion to attend the examination of the judge, and in that district the claims were submitted to the ordeal of the strictest investigation; it was proved by all the witnesses examined that every effort was made by the commanding general and his officers to preserve the property of the inhabitants inviolate, and you will observe, by an inspection of these claims, that they resulted more from the consternation and flight of the inhabitants than the excesses of the militia, and that there was no such desolation as followed the invasion of East Florida. I trust that every suspicious claim will be promptly rejected; that the honest sufferer alone shall be provided for, and the fraudulent claimant repulsed.

The negotiations in regard to the treaty terminated so soon after the campaign of 1818, the losses were comparatively so insignificant, and the paucity of complaints on the subject, that the conclusion is inevitable that the treaty was intended to embrace those of 1812 and 1814.

I have thus endeavored to call your attention to a subject in which my constituents are deeply interested with the zeal due to their interests, and with a freedom that confidence in the justice of their claims inspires; if I have mistaken any of the facts or principles of legal construction arising from them, you will please to ascribe it to error of judgment and a sincere desire to do justice to those I have the honor to represent. My views have been expressed with frankness and, at the same time, with all possible respect and unlimited confidence in the constituted authorities, and from a belief that your predecessor could never have examined them.

I have the honor to be, with high considerations of respect, your obedient servant,

JOS. M. WHITE.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 16, 1825.

SIR: I received, and have not failed to lay before the President, your communication of the 28th of last month, relative to the construction of the ninth article of the treaty between the United States and Spain, of the 22d of February, 1819.

I am directed to state to you, in reply, that the President's opinion is, that the article in question does not embrace claims for injuries suffered prior to the campaign of 1818; and that this was also the opinion entertained by the Government during the late administration, at which time the question was fully considered.

I have the honor to remain, with great respect, your obedient servant,

RICHARD RUSH.

Hon. JOSEPH M. WHITE, Delegate from Florida.

19TH CONGRESS.]

No. 423.

[1ST SESSION.

MESSAGES AND DOCUMENTS COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, AND THE EXECUTIVE PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE, FROM WHICH THE INJUNCTION OF SECRECY HAS BEEN REMOVED, ON THE SUBJECT OF THE MISSION TO THE CONGRESS AT PANAMA.

IN EXECUTIVE SESSION, SENATE UNITED STATES, TUESDAY, MARCH 21, 1826.

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy be removed from the President's message of December 26, 1825, relative to the proposed Assembly of American Nations at Panama, and from all Executive communications made and documents sent to the Senate in relation thereto, and from all proceedings in the Senate upon that subject, from which the injunction of secrecy has not yet been removed, and that six thousand copies of the whole be printed. Also, that the injunction of secrecy be removed from all communications relative thereto received from the Executive since the Senate's decision upon the mission, and that an equal number thereof be printed as an appendix to the proceedings had and documents first sent. Also, that all papers and documents sent and communications made by the Executive to the House of Representatives, and not sent or made to the Senate, shall, in like manner, be printed in a second appendix, distinguishing the papers and passages sent to the House and not to the Senate, and those sent to the Senate and not to the House. Also, that the resolution of December 28 shall be transferred to the Legislative Journal of the Senate.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. John Adams, jr.:

To the Senate of the United States:

In the message to both Houses of Congress at the commencement of the session it was mentioned that the Governments of the Republics of Colombia, of Mexico, and of Central America, had severally invited the Government of the United States to be represented at the Congress of American Nations, to be assembled at Panama, to deliberate upon objects of peculiar concernment to this hemisphere, and that this invitation had been accepted.

Although this measure was deemed to be within the constitutional competency of the Executive, I have not thought proper to take any step in it before ascertaining that my opinion of its expediency will concur with that of both branches of the Legislature: first, by the decision of the Senate upon the nominations to be laid before them; and, secondly, by the sanction of both Houses to the appropriations, without which it cannot be carried into effect.

A report from the Secretary of State, and copies of the correspondence with the South American Governments on this subject, since the invitation given by them, are herewith transmitted to the Senate. They will disclose the objects of importance which are expected to form a subject of discussion at this meeting, in which interests of high importance to this Union are involved. It will be seen that the United States neither intend nor are expected to take part in any deliberations of a belligerent character; that the motive of their attendance is neither to contract alliances, nor to engage in any undertaking or project importing hostility to any other nation.

But the Southern American nations, in the infancy of their independence, often find themselves in positions, with reference to other countries, with the principles applicable to which, derivable from the state of independence itself, they have not been familiarized by experience. The result of this has been, that, sometimes in their intercourse with the United States, they have manifested dispositions to reserve a right of granting special favors and privileges to the Spanish nation as the price of their recognition; at others they have actually established duties and impositions, operating unfavorably to the United States, to the advantage of other European powers; and sometimes they have appeared to consider that they might interchange, among themselves, mutual concessions of exclusive favor, to which neither European powers nor the United States should be admitted. In most of these cases, their regulations unfavorable to us have yielded to friendly expostulation and remonstrance; but it is believed to be of infinite moment that the principles of a liberal commercial intercourse should be exhibited to them, and urged, with disinterested and friendly persuasion, upon them, when all assembled for the avowed purpose of consulting together upon the establishment of such principles as may have an important bearing upon their future welfare.

The consentaneous adoption of principles of maritime neutrality, and favorable to the navigation of peace and commerce, in time of war, will also form a subject of consideration to this Congress. The doctrine that free ships make free goods, and the restrictions of reason upon the extent of blockades, may be established, by general agreement, with far more ease, and perhaps with less danger, by the general engagement to adhere to them, concerted at such a meeting, than by partial treaties or conventions with each of the nations separately. An agreement between all the parties represented at the meeting, that each will guard, by its own means, against the establishment of any future European colony within its borders, may be found advisable. This was, more than two years since, announced by my predecessor to the world as a principle resulting from the emancipation of both the American continents. It may be so developed to the new Southern nations that they will all feel it as an essential appendage to their independence.

There is yet another subject upon which, without entering into any treaty, the moral influence of the United States may, perhaps, be exerted with beneficial consequences at such a meeting—the advancement of religious liberty. Some of the Southern nations are, even yet, so far under the dominion of prejudice that they have incorporated with their political constitutions an exclusive church, without toleration of any other than the dominant sect. The abandonment of this last badge of religious bigotry and oppression may be pressed more effectually by the united exertions of those who concur in the principles of freedom of conscience upon those who are yet to be convinced of their justice and wisdom, than by the solitary efforts of a minister to any one of the separate Governments.

The indirect influence which the United States may exercise upon any projects or purposes originating in the war in which the Southern Republics are still engaged, which might seriously affect the interests of this Union, and the good offices by which the United States may ultimately contribute to bring that war to a speedier termination, though among the motives which have convinced me of the propriety of complying with this invitation, are so far contingent and eventual that it would be improper to dwell upon them more at large.

In fine, a decisive inducement with me for acceding to the measure is to show, by this token of respect to the Southern Republics, the interest that we take in their welfare, and our disposition to comply with their wishes. Having been the first to recognize their independence, and sympathized with them, so far as was compatible with our neutral duties, in all their struggles and sufferings to acquire it, we have laid the foundation of our future intercourse with them in the broadest principles of reciprocity and the most cordial feelings of fraternal friendship. To extend those principles to all our commercial relations with them, and to hand down that friendship to future ages, is congenial to the highest policy of the Union, as it will be to that of all those nations and their posterity. In the confidence that these sentiments will meet the approbation of the Senate, I nominate RICHARD C. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, and JOHN SERGEANT, of Pennsylvania, to be Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary to the Assembly of American Nations at Panama; and WILLIAM B. ROCHESTER, of New York, to be secretary to the mission.

WASHINGTON, December 26, 1825.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 20, 1825.

SIR: Agreeably to your direction, that a statement should be presented to you of what passed in the Department of State, with the ministers of the Republics of Colombia, Mexico, and Central America, in respect to the invitation to the United States to be represented in the Congress at Panama, I have the honor now to report:

That during the last spring I held separate conferences on the same day with the respective ministers of Mexico and Colombia, at their request, in the course of which each of them verbally stated that his Government was desirous that the United States should be represented at the proposed Congress, and that he was instructed to communicate an invitation to their Government to send representatives to it. But that as his Government did not know whether it would or would not be agreeable to the United States to receive such an invitation, and as he did not wish to occasion any embarrassment, he was charged informally to inquire, previous to the delivery of the invitation, whether it would be accepted if given by both of the Republics of Mexico and Colombia. It was also stated, by each of those ministers, that his Government did not expect that the United States would change their present neutral policy, nor was it desired that they should take part in such of the deliberations of the proposed Congress as might relate to the prosecution of the present war.

Having laid before you what transpired at these conferences, I received, about a week after they had been held, your direction to inform the ministers of Mexico and Colombia, and I accordingly did inform them, that their communication was received with due sensibility to the friendly consideration of the United States by which it had been dictated; that, of course, they could not make themselves a party to the existing war with Spain, nor to councils for deliberating on the means of its further prosecution; that the President believed such a Congress as was proposed might be highly useful in settling several important disputed questions of public law, and in arranging other matters of deep interest to the American continent, and strengthening the friendship and amicable intercourse between the American powers; that, before such a Congress, however, assembled, it appeared to him to be expedient to adjust, between the different powers to be represented, several preliminary points, such as the subjects to which the attention of the Congress was to be directed, the nature and the form of the powers to be given to the diplomatic agents who were to compose it, and the mode of its organization and action. If these preliminary points could be arranged in a manner satisfactory to the United States, the ministers from Colombia and Mexico were informed that the President thought the United States ought to be represented at Panama. Each of those ministers undertook to transmit to his Government the answer which was thus given.

In this posture the affair remained until the letters were received which accompany this report, from the ministers of the Republics of Mexico and Colombia, under date of the 3d and 2d of November last. To both of those letters the same answer was returned, in official notes, a copy of one of which is with this report.

The first and only communication from the minister of the Republic of Central America to this Department, in regard to the Congress at Panama, is contained in his official note, a copy of which, together with a copy of the answer which was returned by your directions, will be found along with this report.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF MEXICO, Washington, November 3, 1825.

The underwritten minister plenipotentiary has the honor of informing the honorable Secretary of State that he has communicated to his Government the conversations which occurred between them on his making known to him the determination of the Governments of Colombia and Mexico to form a Congress of representatives from the new States of the continent, who, to that end, had been invited; in which were to be discussed subjects of general interest to all the American powers, as well as those which might be particularly suggested by the existence and actual position of the new powers; and in the meeting of which it was thought proper, by the Government of the subscriber, that the United States of America, by means of their Commissioners, should constitute and take part, as being much interested in the first and principal subject upon which the Congress would be engaged.

In consequence of which, being informed of the concurrence of this Government in the idea of discussing the first point in a Congress, as was desired; and that it would send representatives to it, under condition that the neutrality in which it stood towards Spain should not be violated, and that it should be invited thereto by the Republics of Mexico and Colombia, who should, moreover, signify the affairs with which it was to be occupied to promote its object, and the necessary uniformity of credentials, or authorization of the respective representatives, the President of the United States of Mexico has charged and commissioned anew the underwritten to make the invitation, and to point out the affairs as stated.

The Government of the subscriber never supposed nor desired that the United States of America would take part in the Congress about to be held, in other matters than those which, from their nature and importance, the late administration pointed out and characterized as being of general interest to the continent; for which reason, one of the subjects which will occupy the attention of the Congress will be the resistance or opposition to the interference of any neutral nation in the question and war of independence between the new powers of the continent and Spain.

The Government of the undersigned apprehends that, as the powers of America are of accord as to resistance, it behooves them to discuss the means of giving to that resistance all possible force, that the evil may be met, if it cannot be avoided; and the only means of accomplishing this object is by a previous concert as to the mode in which each of them shall lend its co-operation; for otherwise, resistance would operate but partially, and in a manner much less certain and effective.

The opposition to colonization in America by the European powers will be another of the questions which may be discussed, and which is in like predicament with the foregoing.

After these two principal subjects, the representatives of the United States of America may be occupied upon others to which the existence of the new States may give rise, and which it is not easy to point out or enumerate; for which the Government of the United States of Mexico will give instructions and ample powers to its Commissioners, and it trusts that those from the other powers may bear the same.

The Congress is to be assembled in Panama, at which city the representatives from Colombia, Peru, Guatemala, and Mexico, will have already arrived at the date of this; they will be engaged upon the preliminary rules of the Assembly, and likewise upon questions which belong exclusively to the belligerents.

The United States of America may send their representatives to that city to take part in those questions which, long since, they were the first in declaring to the world they regarded as of transcendent importance to the interests of all America; and in others, to which the formation of the new States will give rise, the concurrence in which will, moreover, accomplish the object so much desired by their respective Governments, of manifesting, by deeds, the disposition and facility which the powers of this continent possess to act in concert in the common cause. To which end, and in compliance with the tenor of the conversations held with the honorable Secretary of State, the underwritten minister plenipotentiary invites this Government to send representatives to the Congress of Panama, with authorities as aforesaid, and with express instructions in their credentials upon the two principal questions; in which step, he is likewise joined by the minister of Colombia, and with which, he trusts, he has fulfilled all that was stipulated to this end.

The subscriber has the honor, on this occasion, to present to the honorable Secretary of State his respects and highest consideration.

PABLO OBREGON.

Hon. HENRY CLAY, Secretary of State.

Mr. Salazar to the Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

LEGATION OF COLOMBIA, NEAR THE UNITED STATES OF NORTH AMERICA,
Washington, November 2, 1825.

The undersigned has the honor to communicate to the Hon. Henry Clay, for the information of his Government and the attainment of the objects proposed, that the assembly of American plenipotentiaries, in relation to which the minister from Mexico and the undersigned have held some verbal conferences with the Secretary of State, at their previous request, will shortly be organized; as the plenipotentiaries from Peru are already at the Isthmus of Panama, the place appointed for the Congress, and those from Colombia and other American Republics are on their way to this Assembly, which they have provided for by public treaties.

The honorable Secretary having intimated, in the name of his Government, that the United States, if formally invited by Mexico and Colombia, and apprised of the subjects to be discussed, would, on their part, appoint a person to represent them, if these subjects should be approved by the United States, the undersigned is accordingly authorized by his Government to address this invitation which he now makes by this note in all due form. He is also assured that the minister from Mexico will present the same invitation on the part of his Government, and the minister from Guatemala has just received similar instructions from his Government.

Of the points which will be under discussion by the Assembly of Panama the undersigned is unable to give a minute enumeration, as they will evidently arise out of the deliberations of the Congress. He is, however, authorized by his Government to assure the United States that these points have no tendency to violate their professed principles of neutrality. The undersigned has also been instructed to suggest some subjects that will form useful matter of discussion in the Congress.

These subjects constitute two classes:

- 1st. Matters peculiarly and exclusively concerning the belligerents;
- 2d. Matters between the belligerents and neutrals.

As the United States will not take part in the discussion of subjects of the first description, we will confine ourselves to the latter.

At Panama, the best and most opportune occasion is offered to the United States to fix some principles of international law, the unsettled state of which has caused much evil to humanity. It is to be presumed that this Government possesses more light upon the subject than the other States of our hemisphere, both from its experience during the wars that succeeded the French revolution, and from its negotiations now on foot with Great Britain and other nations relative to these principles. It belongs to each of the concurring parties to propose their views, but the voice of the United States will be heard with the respect and deference which its early labors in a work of such importance will merit.

The manner in which all colonization of European powers on the American continent shall be resisted, and their interference in the present contest between Spain and her former colonies prevented, are other points of great interest. Were it proper, an eventual alliance, in case these events should occur, which is within the range of possibilities, and the treaty, of which no use should be made until the casus fœderis should happen to remain secret; or, if this should seem premature, a convention so anticipated would be different means to secure the same end of preventing foreign influence. This is a matter of immediate utility to the American States that are at war with Spain, and is in accordance with the repeated declarations and protests of the cabinet at Washington. The conferences held on this subject being confidential, would increase mutual friendship and promote the respective interests of the parties.

The consideration of the means to be adopted for the entire abolition of the African slave trade is a subject sacred to humanity and interesting to the policy of the American States. To effect it, their energetic, general, and uniform co-operation is desirable. At the proposition of the United States, Colombia made a convention with them on this subject, which has not been ratified by the Government of the United States. Would that America, which does not think politic what is unjust, would contribute in union, and with common consent, to the good of Africa!

The descendants of this portion of the globe have succeeded in founding an independent Republic, whose Government is now recognized by its ancient metropolis. On what basis the relations of Hayti, and of other parts of our hemisphere that shall hereafter be in like circumstances, are to be placed, is a question simple at first view, but attended with serious difficulties when closely examined. These arise from the different manner of regarding Africans, and from their different rights in Hayti, the United States, and in other American States. This question will be determined at the Isthmus, and, if possible, a uniform rule of conduct adopted in regard to it, or those modifications that may be demanded by circumstances.

The undersigned merely makes these suggestions by way of example; it is left to the wisdom of the Governments and the judgments of their representatives to propose whatever may be esteemed of common good to the new hemisphere. Inviting the United States, in the name of Colombia, to a Congress, the mere assembling of which will increase the political importance of America, and show the facility with which she can combine her resources in defence of common rights when necessary, the undersigned hopes that the United States will make an early appointment of a person or persons to represent them in this Assembly, as the conditions that were required have been fulfilled.

The undersigned has the honor to offer to the Hon. Henry Clay his most distinguished consideration.
 JOSÉ MARIA SALAZAR.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Obregon.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, November 30, 1825.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your official note of the 3d instant, communicating a formal invitation from the Government of the United States of Mexico to that of the United States to send deputies to the contemplated Congress of Panama, and particularizing several subjects which your Government conceives may be proper for the consideration of that Congress; and I have laid your note before the President of the United States.

When, at your instance, during the last spring, I had the honor of receiving you at the Department of State, and conferring with you, verbally, in regard to the proposed Congress, and to the friendly wish entertained by your Government that ours should be represented at it, I stated to you, by direction of the President, that it appeared to him to be necessary, before the assembling of such a Congress, to settle between the different powers to be represented several preliminary points, such as the subjects to which the attention of the Congress should be directed; the substance and the form of the powers to be given to the respective representatives, and the mode of organizing the Congress; and that if these points should be satisfactorily arranged, the President would be disposed to accept, in behalf of the United States, the invitation with which you were provisionally charged.

In your note there is not recognized so exact a compliance with the conditions on which the President expressed his willingness that the United States should be represented at Panama as could have been desired. It would have been, perhaps, better if there had been a full understanding between all the American powers who may assemble, by their representatives, of the precise questions on which they are to deliberate; and that some other matters, respecting the powers of the deputies and the organization of the Congress, should have been distinctly arranged prior to the opening of its deliberations. But as the want of the adjustment of these preliminaries, if it should occasion any inconvenience, could be only productive of some delay, the President has determined at once to manifest the sensibility of the United States to whatever concerns the prosperity of the American hemisphere, and to the friendly motives which have actuated your Government in transmitting the invitation which you have communicated. He has therefore resolved, should the Senate of the United States, now expected to assemble in a few days, give their advice and consent, to send Commissioners to the Congress at Panama. While they will not be authorized to enter upon any deliberations, or to concur in any acts inconsistent with the present neutral position of the United States and its obligations, they will be fully empowered and instructed upon all questions likely to arise in the Congress on subjects in which the nations of America have a common interest. All unnecessary delay will be avoided in the departure of these Commissioners from the United States for the point of their destination.

I avail myself of the occasion to offer you assurances of my distinguished consideration.

Mr. Canaz to the Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

WASHINGTON, November 14, 1825.

The Government of Central America, which I have the honor to represent, as early as the year 1821 was sensible of the importance to the independent nations of this continent of a general Congress of their representatives, at some central point, which might consider upon and adopt the best plan for defending the States of the New World from foreign aggression, and, by treaties of alliance, commerce, and friendship, raise them to that elevation of wealth and power which, from their resources, they may attain. It also acknowledged that, as Europe had formed a continental system, and held a Congress whenever questions affecting its interests were to be discussed, America should form a system for itself, and assemble, by its representatives, in Cortes, whenever circumstances of necessity and great importance should demand it.

Entertaining these views, the Government of Central America voluntarily expressed its willingness to appoint its deputies for such an object. Sensible of its importance, which has also been felt by the Governments of South America, it has resolved to send plenipotentiaries to a general Congress, to be formed for the purposes of preserving the territorial integrity, and firmly establishing the absolute independence of each of the American Republics. On the 19th of March last the Government of Central America formed a convention with that of Colombia providing for this object; and I, as its representative, have been instructed to express to the Government of the United States the desire entertained by my Government that it should send a representative to the general Congress.

To fulfil the wishes of my Government, and convinced, at the same time, of the importance and respectability which would attach to the general Congress of the American Republics, from the presence of envoys from the United States of America, I now address this high Government upon this subject, in the name of Central America. I am anxious, therefore, to know if this Republic, which has ever shown itself the generous friend of the new American States, is disposed to send its envoys to the general Congress, the object of which is to preserve and confirm the absolute independence of these Republics, and to promote the general good, and which will not require that the representatives of the United States should, in the least, compromise their present neutrality, harmony, and good intelligence with other nations. This my Government has deemed it necessary to state distinctly in making the present invitation.

Be pleased, sir, to accept expressions of the high consideration with which I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

ANTONIO JOSÉ CANAZ.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF STATE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, November 30, 1825.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your official note of the 14th instant, communicating an invitation from the Government of the Federation of the Centre of America to that of the United States to the contemplated Congress at Panama. Having laid it before the President, I am instructed by him to say that the United States, always feeling the deepest interest in whatever concerns the prosperity of the American hemisphere, and receiving with great sensibility this new proof of the friendly esteem of the Government of the Central Republic, will be represented at that Congress, if the Senate of the United States should so advise and consent. That body will assemble in the course of a few days, and, if it concur with the President, Commissioners from the United States will be deputed to Panama without any unnecessary delay. These Commissioners will be empowered and instructed upon all questions which may appear to this Government to be likely to arise in the Congress on subjects in which the nations of America may be supposed to have a common interest.

I avail myself of the occasion to offer you, sir, assurances of my distinguished consideration.

H. CLAY.

DON ANTONIO JOSÉ CANAZ,

Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Central America.

The message and the accompanying documents were read.

Ordered, That they be printed, in confidence, for the use of the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1826.

On motion,

Ordered, That the message of the President of the United States, of the 26th instant, nominating Richard C. Anderson and John Sergeant to be Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary to the Assembly of American Nations at Panama, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations to consider and report thereon.

Mr. Branch submitted the following motion for consideration; which was read and ordered to be printed, in confidence, for the use of the Senate:

Whereas the President of the United States, in his opening message to Congress, asserts that "invitations had been accepted, and that ministers on the part of the United States would be commissioned to attend the deliberations at Panama," without submitting said nominations to the Senate; and whereas, in an Executive communication of the 26th day of December, 1825, although he submits the nominations, yet maintains the right, previously announced in his opening message, that he possesses an authority to make such appointments, and to commission them without the advice and consent of the Senate; and whereas a silent acquiescence on the part of this body may, at some future time, be drawn into dangerous precedent: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the United States does not constitutionally possess either the right or the power to appoint ambassadors or other public ministers but with the advice and consent of the Senate, except when vacancies may happen in the recess.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 3, 1826.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the motion, submitted on the 28th of December, relative to the extent of the Executive power; and

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 4, 1826.

On motion of Mr. Macon,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, confidentially, any conventions in possession of the Executive between any of the new States of America relative to the proposed Congress of Panama; and also any other information upon that subject not heretofore communicated tending to show the propriety of the United States sending ministers to said Congress.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 10, 1826.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. John Adams, jr.:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 3d instant, I communicate herewith, in confidence, a report from the Secretary of State, with translations of the conventions and documents containing information of the nature referred to in the said resolution.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, January 9, 1826.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 9, 1826.

The Secretary of State, to whom the President has referred the resolution of the Senate of the 3d of January, 1826, requesting him to communicate to the Senate, confidentially, any conventions in possession of the Executive between any of the new States of America relative to the proposed Congress of Panama; and also any other information upon that subject not before communicated tending to show the propriety of the United States sending ministers to said Congress, has the honor to report:

That, in compliance with the first part of the resolution, conventions are herewith presented between—

The Republic of Colombia and that of Chile;

The Republic of Colombia and Peru;

The Republic of Colombia and the Federation of the Centre of America; and

The Republic of Colombia and the United Mexican States.

That the latter part of the resolution of the Senate opens a wide field, and might be made to embrace all the foreign relations, American and European, of the United States; but it is presumed that it was not intended to have this extended scope. Under this impression, certain parts of the correspondence between the Executive Government of the United States and the Governments of Russia, France, Colombia, and Mexico, of which a descriptive list accompanies this report, and which are supposed to have such a connexion with the resolution of the Senate as to render their communication acceptable, are now respectfully laid before the President. The negotiations to which a portion of this correspondence relates being yet in progress, the propriety of the confidential restriction which the Senate itself has suggested must be quite evident.

All which is respectfully submitted.

COLOMBIA AND CHILE.

[Translation.]

Francisco de Paula Santander, of the Liberators of Venezuela and Cundinamarca, decorated with the cross of Boyacá, General of Division of the Armies of Colombia, Vice President of the Republic, charged with the Executive power, &c., &c., &c.

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Whereas there has been concluded and signed, in the city of Santiago de Chile, on the twenty-first day of October, in the year of Grace one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, between the Republic of Colombia and the State of Chile, by means of plenipotentiaries sufficiently authorized by both parties, a treaty of perpetual union, league, and confederation, the tenor whereof is, word for word, as follows:

In the name of God, the Author and Legislator of the Universe: The Government of the Republic of Colombia on the one part, and on the other that of the State of Chile, animated with the most sincere desire of putting a speedy termination to the calamities of the present war, to which they have been incited by the Government of his Catholic Majesty the King of Spain, by effectually co-operating for so important an object, with all their influence, resources, and forces, by sea and land, to secure forever to their respective people, subjects, and citizens, the precious enjoyments of their internal tranquillity, of their liberty and national independence: and his excellency the Liberator, President of Colombia, having for that purpose conferred full powers upon the honorable Joaquin Mosquera and Arbolida, member of the Senate of the Republic of the same name; and his excellency the Supreme Director of the State of Chile, upon his Minister of State in the Departments of Government and Foreign Relations, D. Joaquin de Echeverria, and in those of Finance and War, D. José Antonio Rodríguez; they, after having exchanged, in good and due form, the said powers, have agreed on the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The Republic of Colombia and the State of Chile are united, bound, and confederated, in peace and war, to maintain with their influences and forces, by sea and land, as far as circumstances permit, their independence of the Spanish nation, and of any other foreign domination whatsoever, and to secure, after that is recognized, their mutual prosperity, the greatest harmony and good understanding, as well between their people, subjects, and citizens, as with other powers with which they may enter into relations.

ARTICLE 2. The Republic of Colombia and the State of Chile, therefore, voluntarily promise and contract a league of close alliance and firm and constant friendship for the common defence, for the security of their independence and liberty, for their reciprocal and general good, and for their internal tranquillity, obliging themselves to succor each other, and to repel, in common, every attack or invasion which may in any manner threaten their political existence.

ARTICLE 3. In order to contribute to the objects pointed out in the foregoing articles, the Republic of Colombia binds itself to assist with the disposable sea and land forces, of which the number or its equivalent shall be fixed at a meeting of plenipotentiaries.

ARTICLE 4. The State of Chile shall also contribute with the disposable sea and land forces, of which the number or its equivalent shall be likewise fixed at the said meeting.

ARTICLE 5. In cases of sudden invasion, both parties shall be empowered to act in a hostile manner in the territories of the dependence of either, whenever circumstances of moment prevent their acting in concert with the Government to which the sovereignty of the invaded territory belongs. But the party so acting shall fulfil, and caused to be fulfilled, the statutes, ordinances, and laws of the respective States, so far as circumstances permit, and cause its Government to be respected and obeyed. The expenses which shall be incurred in these operations, and others which may be incurred in consequence of the third and fourth articles, shall be liquidated by separate conventions, and shall be made good one year after the conclusion of the present war.

ARTICLE 6. To secure and perpetuate in the best mode possible the good friendship and correspondence between both States, their subjects and citizens, they shall have free entrance and departure in their ports and territories, and shall enjoy there all the civil rights and privileges of trade and commerce, being subjected only to the duties, imposts, and restrictions to which the subjects and citizens of each of the contracting parties shall be subject.

ARTICLE 7. In virtue hereof, the vessels and territorial productions of each of the contracting parties shall pay no higher duties of importation, exportation, anchorage, and tonnage than those established, or to be established, for those of the nation in the ports of each State, according to the existing laws; that is to say, that the vessels and productions of Colombia shall pay the duties of entering and departure in the ports of the State of Chile as Chileans, and those of the State of Chile as Colombians in those of Colombia.

ARTICLE 8. Both contracting parties oblige themselves to furnish what assistance may be in their power to the ships-of-war and merchant vessels that may come to the ports belonging to them on account of damage or for any other cause, and as such they shall be empowered to careen, repair, provision, arm, augment their armament and their crews, so as to enable them to continue their voyages or cruises at the expense of the State or individuals to whom they belong.

ARTICLE 9. In order to avoid the scandalous abuses which may be caused by privateers, armed on account of individuals, to the injury of the national commerce and neutrals, both parties agree in extending the jurisdiction of their maritime courts to the privateers which sail under the flag of either, and their prizes indiscriminately, whenever they are unable to sail easily to the ports of their destination, or when there are appearances of their having committed excesses against the commerce of neutral nations with whom both States are desirous of cultivating the greatest harmony and good understanding.

ARTICLE 10. If by misfortune the internal tranquillity be disturbed in any part of the States mentioned by men turbulent, seditious, and enemies of the Governments lawfully constituted by the voice of the people, freely, quietly, and peaceably expressed in virtue of their laws, both parties solemnly and formally bind themselves to make common cause against them, assisting each other with whatever means are in their power till they obtain the re-establishment of order and the empire of their laws.

ARTICLE 11. If any person guilty or accused of treason, sedition, or other grievous crime, flee from justice and be found in the territory of any of the States mentioned, he shall be delivered up and sent back at the disposal of the Government which has cognizance of the crime, and in whose jurisdiction he ought to be tried, as soon as the offended party has made his claim in form. Deserters from the national armies and marine of either party are also comprehended in this article.

ARTICLE 12. To draw more closely the bonds which ought in future to unite both States, and to remove any difficulty which may present itself, or interrupt in any manner their good correspondence and harmony, an assembly shall be formed, composed of two plenipotentiaries for each party, in the same terms and with the same formalities which, in conformity to established usages, ought to be observed for the appointment of the ministers of equal class near the Governments of foreign nations.

ARTICLE 13. Both parties oblige themselves to interpose their good offices with the Governments of the other States of America, formerly Spanish, to enter into this compact of union, league, and confederation.

ARTICLE 14. As soon as this great and important object has been attained, a general assembly of the American States shall be convened, composed of their plenipotentiaries, with the charge of cementing, in the most solid and stable manner, the intimate relations which ought to exist between all and every one of them, and who may serve as a council in the great conflicts, as a rallying point in the common dangers, as a faithful interpreter of their public treaties when difficulties occur, and as an umpire and conciliator in their disputes and differences.

ARTICLE 15. The Republic of Colombia and the State of Chile bind themselves cheerfully to afford to the plenipotentiaries who may compose the assembly of the American States all the aids which hospitality among brotherly people and the sacred and inviolable character of their persons demand, whenever the plenipotentiaries shall choose their place of meeting in any part of the territory of Colombia or that of Chile.

ARTICLE 16. This compact of union, league, and confederation shall in nowise interrupt the exercise of the national sovereignty of each of the contracting parties, as well as to what regards their laws and the establishment and form of their respective Governments, as to what regards their relations with other foreign nations. But they expressly and irrevocably bind themselves not to yield to the demands of indemnifications, tributes, or exactions which the Spanish Government may bring for the loss of her ancient supremacy over these countries, or any other nation whatever, in her name and stead, nor enter into any treaty with Spain, or any other nation, to the prejudice and diminution of this independence, maintaining on all occasions, and in all places, their reciprocal interests with the dignity and energy of nations free, independent, friendly, brotherly, and confederated.

ARTICLE 17. This treaty, or convention, of amity, league, and confederation shall be ratified within the third day by the Government of the State of Chile, with the advice of the honorable National Convention, in conformity to article 4, chapter 3, title 3, of the Provisional Constitution, and by that of the Republic of Colombia as soon as it can obtain the approbation of the Senate, in virtue of the resolution by the law of Congress of October 13, 1821; and in case, by any accident, it cannot assemble, it shall be ratified in the next Congress, agreeably to the provision of the Constitution of the Republic, in article 55, section 18. The ratifications shall be exchanged without delay, and in the period which the distance that separates both Governments permits.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed these presents, and sealed them with the seals of the States which they represent.

Done in the city of Santiago de Chile, on the twenty-first day of the month of October, in the year of Grace one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, twelfth of the independence of Colombia, thirteenth of the liberty of Chile, and fifth of its independence.

ADDITIONAL ARTICLE. The honorable National Convention of Chile having terminated its sessions on the twenty-third day of October last, and not having, on that account, had time sufficient for the discussions by which the present treaty ought to be ratified in the time which was agreed upon by the 17th article, and the honorable Minister Plenipotentiary of Colombia having proposed to their excellencies the Ministers Plenipotentiary of Chile that a new period for the ratifications should be appointed, they consulted the most excellent Supreme Court of Representatives, with whose consent they have agreed with the honorable Minister Plenipotentiary of Colombia on the following article:

The present treaty, concluded in Santiago de Chile on the 21st of October, 1822, shall be ratified in the space of four months, which shall be counted from this day, or sooner if possible, and the ratifications shall be exchanged without delay in the time which the distance that separates both Governments permits.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries sign this, and seal it with the seals of the Governments which they represent.

Done at Santiago de Chile, the twentieth of November, of the year of Grace one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, twelfth of the independence of Colombia, and fifth of that of Chile.

Therefore, having seen and examined the said treaty of union, league, and confederation, the consent and approbation of the Congress of the Republic being first had, agreeably to article 55, section 18, of the Constitution, I make use of the power conferred upon me by the 120th article of the same Constitution in ratifying it, and by these presents I ratify it and hold it as valid, grateful, and firm, in all its articles and clauses, with the exception of the words: and for their internal tranquillity, of article 2d; all those which the 10th article expresses, and those which follow of the 11th article, to wit: If any person guilty, or accused of treason, sedition, or other grievous crime, flee from justice and be found in the territory of any of the States mentioned, he shall be delivered up and sent back to the disposal of the Government which has cognizance of the crime, and in whose jurisdiction he ought to be tried, as soon as the offended party has made his claim in form. And for its fulfilment and exact observance on our part, I solemnly engage and compromit the national honor. In faith whereof, I have caused issue these presents, signed with my hand, sealed with the great seal of the Republic, and countersigned by the Secretary of State and of the Despatch of Foreign Relations, in the capital of Bogota, the twelfth of July, of the year of Grace one thousand eight hundred and twenty-three, thirteenth of our independence.

[Translation.]

Francisco de Paula Santander, of the Liberators of Venezuela and Cundinamarca, decorated with the cross of Boyacá, General of Division of the Armies of Colombia, Vice President of the Republic, charged with the Executive power, &c., &c., &c.

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Whereas there has been concluded and signed, between the Republic of Colombia and the State of Peru, a treaty additional to that of perpetual union, league, and confederation, on the 6th day of July, of the year of Grace one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, by means of plenipotentiaries sufficiently authorized by both parties, the tenor whereof, word for word, is as follows:

In the name of God, the Sovereign Ruler of the Universe: The Government of the Republic of Colombia on the one part, and on the other that of the State of Peru, animated with the most sincere desires of terminating the calamities of the present war, to which they have been provoked by the Government of his Catholic Majesty the King of Spain, determined with all their resources and forces by sea and land to maintain effectually their liberty and independence, and desirous that this league be general between all the States of the America, formerly Spanish, that united, strong, and powerful, they may maintain in common the cause of their independence, which is the primary object of the present contest, have appointed plenipotentiaries to discuss, arrange, and conclude a treaty of union, league, and confederation, to wit:

His excellency the Liberator, President of Colombia, the honorable Joaquin Mosquera, member of the Senate of the Republic of the same name; and his excellency the Supreme Delegate of the State of Peru, the most illustrious and honorable Colonel Dn. Bernardo Monteagudo, Counsellor and Minister of State and Foreign Relations, founder and member of the great Council of the order of the Sun, and Secretary thereof, decorated with the medal of the Liberator Army, Superintendent of the finances of the General Post Office, and President of the Patriotic Society; who, after having exchanged their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed on the following articles:

1. To draw more closely the bonds which ought in future to unite both States, and to remove any difficulty which may present itself, and interrupt in any manner their good correspondence and harmony, an assembly shall be formed, composed of two plenipotentiaries for each party, in the terms and with the same formalities which, in conformity to established usages, ought to be observed for the appointment of the ministers of equal class near the Governments of foreign nations.

2. Both parties oblige themselves to interpose their good offices with the Governments of the other States of America, formerly Spanish, to enter into this compact of perpetual union, league, and confederation.

3. As soon as this great and important object has been attained, a general assembly of the American States shall be convened, composed of their plenipotentiaries, with the charge of cementing, in a manner the most solid, and of establishing the intimate relations which ought to exist between all and every one of them, and who may serve as a council in the great conflicts, as a rallying point in the common dangers, as a faithful interpreter of their public treaties when difficulties occur, and as an umpire and conciliator in their disputes and differences.

4. The Isthmus of Panama being an integral part of Colombia, and the most adequate for that august assembly, this Republic cheerfully obliges itself to afford to the plenipotentiaries who may compose the assembly of the American States all the aids which hospitality among brotherly people and the sacred and inviolable character of their persons demand.

5. The State of Peru, from this time, contracts the same obligation, whenever, by the casualties of the war or by the consent of the majority of the American States, the said assembly may meet in the territory of its dependence, in the same terms as the Republic of Colombia has obliged itself in the former article, as well with respect to the Isthmus of Panama as any other point of its jurisdiction, which may be believed for the purpose to this most interesting end by its central position between the States of the north and of the south of this America, formerly Spanish.

6. This compact of perpetual union, league, and confederation, shall in nowise interrupt the exercise of the national sovereignty of each of the contracting parties, as well as to what regards their laws and the establishment and form of their respective Governments, as with respect to their relations with other foreign nations. But they expressly and irrevocably bind themselves not to accede to the demands of tributes or exactions which the Spanish Government may bring for the loss of her ancient supremacy over these countries, or any other nation whatever, in her name and stead, nor enter into any treaty with Spain, or any other nation, to the prejudice and diminution of this independence, maintaining on all occasions, and in all places, their reciprocal interests, with the dignity and energy of nations, free, independent, friendly, brotherly, and confederated.

7. The Republic of Colombia specially obliges itself to raise and maintain on foot a force of four thousand men, armed and equipped, in order to concur in the objects pointed out in the preceding articles. Her national marine, whatever it may be, shall be also directed to the fulfilment of those stipulations.

8. The State of Peru shall contribute on its part with its maritime forces, whatever they may be, and with an equal number of troops as the Republic of Colombia.

9. This treaty shall be ratified by the Government of the State of Peru in the space of ten days, and approved by the next constituent Congress, if in the time of their session they should think good to publish it; and by that of the Republic of Colombia as soon as the approbation of the Senate can be obtained, according to the provision of the law of Congress of October 13, 1821; and if, by some occurrence, it be not extraordinarily assembled, it shall be ratified in the next Congress, agreeably to the resolution of the Constitution of the Republic in article 55, section 18. The ratification shall be exchanged without delay, in the space which the distance separating both Governments permits.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this, and sealed it with the seals of the States which they represent.

Done in the city of the Free of Lima, the sixth of July, of the year of Grace one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, twelfth of the independence of Colombia, and third of that of Peru.

JOAQUIN MOSQUERA.

Therefore, having seen and examined the said additional treaty of perpetual union, league, and confederation, the consent and approbation of the Congress of the Republic being previously had, agreeably to section 18 of the 55th article of the Constitution, I make use of the power which the 120th article of the same Constitution grants me in ratifying it, as by these presents I ratify it, and hold it as valid, grateful and firm, and for its fulfilment and exact observance I solemnly engage and compromise the honor of the Republic. In faith whereof, I have caused issue these presents, signed with my hand, sealed with the great seal of the Republic, and countersigned by the Secretary of State and the Despatch of Foreign Relations, in the city of Bogota, the twelfth of July, in the year of Grace one thousand eight hundred and twenty-three, thirteenth of independence.

COLOMBIA AND GUATEMALA.

Treaty of perpetual union, league, and confederation, between the Republic of Colombia and the United Provinces of Central America.

[Translation.]

The Republic of Colombia and the United Provinces of Central America, desirous of putting a speedy termination to the calamitous war in which they are engaged with the King of Spain, and both contracting powers being disposed to unite all their resources with their naval and land forces, and to identify their principles and interests in peace and war, have resolved to form a treaty of perpetual union, league, and confederation, which shall forever secure to them the advantages of liberty and independence.

For this desirable object, Pedro Gual, Minister of Foreign Relations of the Republic of Colombia, and Pedro Molina, Plenipotentiary of the United Provinces of Central America, being respectively furnished with full powers, and in due form, have agreed to the following articles:

1. The Republic of Colombia and the United Provinces of Central America bind themselves to a perpetual union, league, and confederation, in peace and war, to defend their independence of the Spanish nation, and every other, by naval and land forces, and thus to secure their mutual prosperity, to promote harmony and good intelligence with each other, and with other nations.

2. The Republic of Colombia and the Provinces of Central America, therefore, promise and freely contract a firm and constant friendship and a permanent alliance, which shall be intimate and binding for their common defence, the security of their independence and liberty, and for their reciprocal and general good. They oblige themselves mutually to aid in repelling every attack or invasion from the enemies of either that may in anywise affect their political existence.

3. That the objects contemplated by the preceding articles may be carried into effect, the Republic of Colombia engages to aid the United Provinces of Central America with that amount of its disposable naval and land forces which shall be determined by the Congress of Plenipotentiaries to be mentioned hereafter.

4. The United Provinces of Central America shall, in like manner, aid the Republic of Colombia with their disposable naval and land forces, or its equivalent, which shall be fixed by the aforesaid Congress.

5. The contracting parties guaranty, mutually, the integrity of their respective territories as they existed prior to the present war of independence, against the designs and invasions of the subjects of the King of Spain and his adherents.

6. In case, therefore, of sudden invasion, each party shall be at liberty to act against the enemy, within the territory of the other, whenever circumstances will not allow of a communication with the Government to which the sovereignty of the country invaded belongs. But the party so acting shall observe, and cause to be observed, the statutes, ordinances, and laws of the State, as far as circumstances may permit, and cause its Government to be respected and obeyed. The expenses of these operations, and whatever may be incurred in consequence of articles third and fourth, shall be settled by separate conventions, and paid one year after the conclusion of the present war.

7. The Republic of Colombia and the United Provinces of Central America promise and oblige themselves, formally, to respect the limits of each other as they now exist; and agree, as soon as circumstances will permit, to settle, in a friendly manner, by a special convention, the line of demarkation between the two States, or whenever one of the parties shall be disposed to enter on this negotiation.

8. To facilitate the progress and happy termination of the negotiation about limits, as in the preceding article, both parties shall be at liberty to appoint Commissioners, who shall survey the whole frontier for the purpose of fixing the boundary line. The local authorities shall not offer them the least obstruction, but shall, on the contrary, furnish every protection and aid for the proper execution of their object, provided they exhibit the passport of their Governments authorizing their operations.

9. The contracting parties, desirous, in the meantime, of providing against the evils that might arise to both, from unauthorized colonies of adventurers on that part of the Mosquito shore between Cape Gracias a Dios and the river Chagres, promise and oblige themselves to employ their naval and land forces against any individual or individuals who shall attempt to form establishments on the above coast without having previously obtained permission from the Government to which it may belong.

10. To make the union and alliance contracted by the present convention more intimate and close, it is moreover stipulated and agreed that the citizens and inhabitants of each State shall have free entrance to, and departure from, the ports and territories of the other, and shall enjoy therein all the civil rights and privileges of traffic and commerce; but they shall be subject to the same duties, imposts, and restrictions, as the citizens and inhabitants of the State themselves.

11. In consequence of this, their vessels and cargoes, composed of productions or merchandise, domestic or foreign, and registered at the custom-houses of either of the contracting parties, shall not pay in the ports of the other greater duties of importation, exportation, anchorage, or tonnage, than those already established, or which may be established for its own vessels and cargoes; that is to say, vessels and cargoes from Colombia shall pay the same duties of importation, exportation, anchorage, and tonnage in the ports of the United Provinces of Central America as if they belonged to these United Provinces; and those from the United Provinces of Central America shall pay in the ports of Colombia the same duty as Colombians.

12. The contracting parties oblige themselves to afford every aid in their power to the merchant and national vessels of each other that may go into port to repair any damage they may have received. They shall there be at liberty to refit, increase their armaments and crews, so as to be able to continue their voyage or cruise. The expense of these repairs shall be sustained by the State or individuals to whom they may belong.

13. To suppress the shameful abuses that may be committed on the high seas by armed privateers upon neutrals and the national commerce, the contracting parties agree to extend the jurisdiction of their maritime courts to the privateers and their prizes, of each other indiscriminately, whenever they shall not be able to reach the port of their departure, or suspicions may be excited of their having committed abuses against the commerce of neutral nations with whom both States desire to cultivate lasting harmony and good intelligence.

14. To prevent all disorder in the Army and Navy of each other, the contracting parties moreover agree that, if any soldiers or sailors shall desert from the service of one to the territory of the other, even if the latter belong to merchant vessels, they shall be immediately restored by the tribunal or authority within whose jurisdiction they may be found; provided, the reclamation of the commander, or of the captain of the vessel, as the case may be, shall previously be made, giving a description of the individual or individuals, with their names, and that of the corps or vessel from which they may have deserted. Until the demand be made in form, they shall be confined in the public prisons.

15. To cement the bonds of future union between the two States, and remove every difficulty that may occur to interrupt their good correspondence and harmony, there shall be formed a Congress, composed of two plenipotentiaries from each contracting party, who shall be appointed with the same formalities as are required by established usages in the commission of ministers of equal character among other nations.

16. The contracting parties oblige themselves to interpose their good offices with the other ci-devant Spanish States of America to induce them to unite in this compact of perpetual union, league, and confederation.

17. As soon as this great and important object shall be accomplished, a general Congress shall be assembled, composed of plenipotentiaries from the American States, for the purpose of establishing, on a more solid basis, the intimate relations which should exist between them all, individually and collectively, and that it may serve as a council in great events, as a point of union and common danger, as a faithful interpreter of public treaties when difficulties may arise, and as an arbitrator and conciliator in their disputes and differences.

18. This compact of union, league, and confederation shall not affect in any manner the exercise of the national sovereignty of the contracting parties in regard to their laws and the establishment and form of their respective Governments, nor in regard to their relations with other nations; but they bind themselves, irrevocably, not to accede to any demands of indemnity or tribute from the Spanish Government, or any other in its name, for the loss of its supremacy over these countries. They also bind themselves not to enter into any treaty with Spain, or any other nation, that shall in the least prejudice their independence, but to maintain their mutual interests on all occasions with the dignity and energy of free, independent, friendly, and confederate nations.

19. As the Isthmus of Panama is an integral part of Colombia, and the point best suited for this august assembly, this Republic freely engages to afford to the plenipotentiaries of the American States composing it all the attentions which are required by hospitality among sister States, and by the sacred and inviolable character of their persons.

20. The United Provinces of Central America oblige themselves, in like manner, whenever the events of war, or by the voice of a majority of the American States, the Congress shall assemble within their territory, at the Isthmus of Panama, or any point of their territory which, from its central position between the States of North and South America, may be fixed on as best suited for this most interesting object.

21. The Republic of Colombia and the United Provinces of Central America, desirous of avoiding all interpretation contrary to their intentions, declare that any advantages which either power may gain from the preceding stipulations are, and shall be, considered as compensation for the obligations they contract in the present compact of perpetual union, league, and confederation.

22. The present perpetual treaty of union, league, and confederation shall be ratified by the President or Vice President of the Republic of Colombia, charged with the executive power, with the consent and approbation of the Congress, within thirty days; and by the Government of the United Provinces of Central America as early as possible, regarding the distance; and the ratifications shall be exchanged in the city of Guatemala within six months from the date hereof, or sooner, if possible.

In faith of which, we, the plenipotentiaries from the Republic of Colombia and of the United Provinces of Central America, have signed and sealed the present, in the city of Bogota, on this fifteenth day of March, in the year of our Lord 1825, fifteenth of Colombian independence, and fifth of that of the United Provinces of Central America.

COLOMBIA AND MEXICO.

Treaty of perpetual union, league, and confederation, between Colombia and Mexico, published at the city of Mexico on the 20th of September, 1825.

The Government of the Republic of Colombia on the one part, and that of Mexico on the other, sincerely desirous of terminating the evils of the present war, into which they have been forced by the King of Spain, and having determined to employ their whole naval and land forces in defence of their liberty; and anxious, also, that this league should be general among all the States of Spanish America, that they may contribute their united strength and resources to maintain the common cause of their independence, have appointed plenipotentiaries, who have concluded the following treaty of union, league, and confederation:

ARTICLE 1. The Republics of Colombia and Mexico unite, league, and confederate forever, in peace and war, to maintain, with their naval and land forces, as far as circumstances may permit, their independence of Spain and all other foreign dominion, and, after the recognition of their independence, to assure their mutual prosperity, harmony, and good intelligence, both among their people and citizens and the States with which they may institute relations.

ARTICLE 2. The Republics of Colombia and Mexico, therefore, enter into and mutually form a perpetual compact of alliance and firm and constant friendship for their common defence, obliging themselves to aid each other, and mutually repel any attack or invasion that may in any manner menace the security of their independence and liberty, affect their interests, or disturb their peace: Provided that, in the last case, requisition be made by one or other of two Governments legally established.

ARTICLE 3. To effect the objects of the preceding article, the contracting parties promise to aid each other with the amount of land forces that may be fixed upon by special conventions, as the circumstances may demand, and during the continuance of the occasion.

ARTICLE 4. The military Navy of both contracting parties shall also be in fulfilment of the preceding convention.

ARTICLE 5. In cases where aid is suddenly required, each party shall operate against the enemy with all the disposable forces within the territories of the other, if time be not allowed for concert between both Governments. But the party thus operating shall observe the laws and ordinances of the State, as far as circumstances may permit, and shall respect and obey its Government. The expenses thus incurred shall be fixed by separate conventions, and be paid one year after the conclusion of the present war.

ARTICLE 6. The contracting parties oblige themselves to furnish whatever assistance they may be able to the military and mercantile vessels arriving at the ports of each other from distress or other cause; and they shall have power to repair, refit, provision, arm, and increase their armament and crews, so as to be able to continue their voyages or cruises, at the expense of the State or individuals to whom they may belong.

ARTICLE 7. To avoid abuses by armed privateers of the commerce of the State and that of neutrals, the contracting parties agree to extend the jurisdiction of the maritime courts of each other to their privateers and prizes indifferently, when they cannot readily ascertain their port of departure, and abuses shall be suspected of the commerce of neutral nations.

ARTICLE 8. The contracting parties mutually guaranty to each other the integrity of their respective territories as they existed before the present war, recognizing also, as part of this territory, what was not included in the Viceroyalties of Mexico and New Granada, but is now a component part of it.

ARTICLE 9. The component parts of the territory of both parties shall be defined and recognized.

ARTICLE 10. If internal quiet should unfortunately be disturbed in the territory of either party by disorderly men and enemies of legal government, the contracting parties engage to make common cause against them until order and the empire of law be re-established. Their forces shall be furnished as provided by articles 2 and 3.

ARTICLE 11. All persons taking arms against either Government, legally established, and fleeing from justice, if found within the territory of either contracting party, shall be delivered up to be tried by the Government against which the offence has been committed. Deserters from the Army and Navy are included in this article.

ARTICLE 12. To strengthen the bonds of future union between the two States, and to prevent every interruption of their friendship and good intelligence, a Congress shall be formed, to which each party shall send two plenipotentiaries, commissioned in the same form and manner as are observed towards ministers of equal grade to foreign nations.

ARTICLE 13. Both parties oblige themselves to solicit the other co-devant Spanish States of America to enter into this compact of perpetual union, league, and confederation.

ARTICLE 14. As soon as this important purpose shall have been attained, a general Congress of the American States shall assemble, composed of their plenipotentiaries. Its object will be to confirm and establish intimate relations between the whole and each one of the States. It will serve as a council on great occasions, a point of union in common danger, a faithful interpreter of public treaties in cases of misunderstanding, and as an arbitrator and conciliator of disputes and differences.

ARTICLE 15. The Isthmus of Panama being an integral part of Colombia, and the most suitable point for the meeting of the Congress, this Republic promises to furnish to plenipotentiaries of the Congress all the facilities demanded by hospitality among a kindred people, and by the sacred character of ambassadors.

ARTICLE 16. Mexico agrees to the same obligation, if ever, by the accidents of war or the consent of a majority of the States, the Congress should meet within her jurisdiction.

ARTICLE 17. This compact of perpetual union, league, and confederation shall not in any wise affect the exercise of the national sovereignty of either contracting party in regard to its laws and form of government, or its foreign relations. But the parties bind themselves positively not to accede to any demand of indemnity, tribute, or impost from Spain for the loss of her former supremacy over these countries, or from any other nation in her name. They also agree not to enter into any treaty with Spain, or any other nation, to the prejudice of their independence; but to maintain at all times their mutual interests, with the dignity and energy proper to free, independent, friendly, and confederate States.

ARTICLE 18 provides for the time of ratification of this treaty.

The foregoing treaty has been duly ratified.

GAUDALUPE VICTORIA.

LUCAS ALAMAN.

NOTE.—The foregoing is the copy of the only translation, as far as it goes, in possession of the Department of State, of the treaty between Colombia and Mexico.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Middleton.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 10, 1825.

SIR: I am directed by the President to instruct you to endeavor to engage the Russian Government to contribute its best exertions towards terminating the existing contest between Spain and her colonies.

Among the interests which, at this period, should most command the serious attention of the nations of the Old and New World, no one is believed to have a claim so paramount as that of the present war. It has existed, in greater or less extent, seventeen years. Its earlier stages were marked by the most shocking excesses, and, throughout, it has been attended by an almost incalculable waste of blood and treasure. During its continuance whole generations have passed away without living to see its close, while others have succeeded them, growing up from infancy to majority without ever tasting the blessings of peace. The conclusion of that war, whatever and whenever it may be, must have a great effect upon Europe and America. Russia is so situated, as that, while she will be less directly affected than other parts of Christendom, her weight and her councils must have a controlling influence on its useless protraction or its happy termination. If this peculiar attitude secures her impartiality, it draws to it great responsibility in the decision which she may feel it proper to make. The predominance of the power of the Emperor is everywhere felt. Europe, America, and Asia, all own it. It is with a perfect knowledge of its vast extent, and the profoundest respect for the wisdom and the justice of the august personage who wields it, that his enlightened and humane councils are now invoked.

In considering that war, as in considering all others, we should look back upon the past, deliberately survey its present condition, and endeavor, if possible, to catch a view of what is to come. With respect to the first branch of the subject, it is, perhaps, of the least practical importance. No statesman can have contemplated the colonial relations of Europe and continental America without foreseeing that the time must come when they would cease. That time might have been retarded or accelerated, but come it must, in the great march of human events. An attempt of the British Parliament to tax, without their consent, the former British colonies, now these United States, produced the war of our Revolution, and led to the establishment of that independence and freedom which we now so justly prize. Moderation and forbearance on the part of Great Britain might have postponed, but could not have prevented our ultimate separation. The attempt of Bonaparte to subvert the ancient dynasty of Spain, and to place on its throne a member of his own family, no doubt, hastened the independence of the Spanish colonies. If he had not been urged, by his ambition, to the conquest of the Peninsula, those colonies, for a long time to come, might have continued quietly to submit to the parental sway. But they must have inevitably thrown it off, sooner or later. We may imagine that a vast continent, uninhabited, or thinly peopled by a savage and untutored race, may be governed by a remote country, blessed with the lights and possessed of the power of civilization; but it is absurd to suppose that this same continent, in extent twenty times greater than that of the parent country, and doubling it in a population equally civilized, should not be able, when it chooses to make the effort, to cast off the distant authority. When the epoch of separation between a parent State and its colony, from whatever cause, arrives, the struggle for self-government on the one hand, and for the preservation of power on the other, produces mutual exasperation, and leads to a most embittered and ferocious war. It is then that it becomes the duty of third powers to interpose their humane offices, and calm the passions and enlighten the councils of the parties. And the necessity of their efforts is greatest with the parent country, whose pride, and whose wealth and power, swelled by the colonial contributions, create the most repugnance to an acquiescence in a severance which has been ordained by Providence.

In the war which has been so long raging between Spain and her colonies the United States have taken no part, either to produce or to sustain it. They have been inactive and neutral spectators of the passing scenes. Their frankness forbids, however, that they should say that they have beheld those scenes with feelings of indifference. They have, on the contrary, anxiously desired that other parts of this continent should acquire and enjoy that independence with which, by the valor and the patriotism of the founders of their liberty, they have been, under the smiles of Heaven, so greatly blessed.

But, in the indulgence of this sympathetic feeling, they have not for one moment been unmindful of the duties of that neutrality which they had deliberately announced. And the best proof of the fidelity with which they have strictly fulfilled its obligations is furnished in the fact that, during the progress of the war, they have been unjustly accused, by both parties, of violating their declared neutrality. But it is now of little consequence to retrace the causes, remote or proximate, of the revolt of the Spanish colonies. The great and much more important consideration which will, no doubt, attract the attention of his Imperial Majesty is the present state of the contest. The principles which produced the war, and those which may be incorporated in the institutions of the new States, may divide the opinions of men. Principles, unhappily, are too often the subject of controversy; but notorious facts are incontestible. They speak a language which silences all speculation, and should determine the judgment and the conduct of States, whatever may be the school in which their rulers are brought up or practiced, and whatever the social forms which they would desire to see established. And it is to the voice of such facts that Europe and America are now called upon patiently to listen.

And in contemplating the present state of the war, what are the circumstances which must forcibly strike every reflecting observer? Throughout both continents, from the western limits of the United States to Cape Horn, the Spanish power is subdued. The recent decisive victory of Ayacucho has annihilated the last remains of the Spanish force. Not a foot of territory in all that vast extent owns the dominion, not a bayonet sustains the cause of Spain. The war, in truth, has ended. It has been a war between a contracted corner of Europe and an entire continent; between ten millions of people, amidst their own extraordinary convulsions, fighting, at a distance across an ocean of three thousand miles in extent, against twenty millions contending at home for their lives, their liberty, and their property. Henceforward it will present only the image of a war between an exhausted dwarf struggling for power and empire, against a refreshed giant combating for freedom and existence. Too much confidence is reposed in the enlightened judgment of his Imperial Majesty to allow of the belief that he will permit any abatement of his desire to see such a war formally terminated, and the blessings of peace restored, from sympathies which he may feel, however strong, for the unhappy condition of Spain. These very sympathies will naturally lead his Imperial Majesty to give her the best and most friendly advice in her actual posture. And in what does that consist? His Imperial Majesty must be the exclusive, as he is the most competent judge. But it will not be deemed inconsistent with respect to inquire if it be possible to believe that Spain can bring the new States again under her dominion. Where does the remotest prospect of her success break out? In Colombia, Mexico, or Peru? The reconquest of the United States by Great Britain would not be a more mad and hopeless enterprise than that of the restoration of the Spanish power on these continents. Some of the most considerable of the new States have established Governments, which are in full and successful operation, regularly collecting large revenues, levying and maintaining numerous and well appointed armies, and already laying the foundations of respectable marines. Whilst they are consolidating their institutions at home, they are strengthening themselves abroad by treaties of alliance among themselves, and of amity and commerce with foreign States. Is the vain hope indulged that intestine divisions within the new States will arise, which may lead to the recall of the Spanish power, as the Stuarts were recalled in England, and the Bourbons in France, at the close of their respective revolutions?

We should not deceive ourselves. Amidst all the political changes of which the new States are destined to be the theatre, whatever party or power may be uppermost, one spirit will animate them all, and that is, an invincible aversion from all political connexion with Spain, and an unconquerable desire of independence. It could not be otherwise. They have already tasted the fruits of independence. And the contrast between what their condition now is in the possession of free commerce, liberal institutions, and all the faculties of their country, and its population allowed full physical and moral development, and what it was under Spain, cramped, debased, and degraded, must be fatal to the chimerical hope of that monarchy, if it be cherished, by any means whatever to re-establish her power. The cord which binds a colony to its parent country being broken is never repaired. A recollection of what was inflicted and what was borne during the existence of that relation, the pride of the former governing power, and the sacrifices of the interests of the colony to those of the parent, widen and render the breach between them, whenever it occurs, perpetual. And if, as we may justly suppose, the embittered feelings excited by an experience of that unequal connexion are in proportion to the severity of the parental rule, they must operate with irresistible force on the rupture which has taken place between Spain and her colonies, since in no other instance has it been exerted with such unmitigated rigor.

Viewing the war as practically terminated, so far at least as relates to Spanish exertion on the continent, in considering the third branch of the inquiry which I proposed, let us endeavor to anticipate what may be expected to happen if Spain obstinately perseveres in the refusal to conclude a peace. If the war has only a nominal continuance, the new Republics cannot disband their victorious armies without culpable neglect of all the maxims of prudence and precaution. And the first observation that occurs is, that this protracted war must totally change its character and its objects. Instead of being a war of offensive operations, in which Spain has been carrying on hostilities in the bosom of the new States, it will become one to her of a defensive nature, in which all her future exertions must be directed to the protection and defence of her remaining insular possessions. And thus the Peninsula, instead of deriving the revenue and the aid so necessary to the revival of its prosperity from Cuba and Porto Rico, must be further drained to succor those islands. For it cannot be doubted that the new States will direct their combined and unemployed forces to the reduction of those valuable islands. They will naturally strike their enemy wherever they can reach him. And they will be stimulated to the attack by the double motive arising from the richness of the prize, and from the fact that those islands constitute the rendezvous of Spain, where are concentrated and from which issue all the means of annoying them which remain to her. The success of the enterprise is by no means improbable. Their proximity to the islands, and their armies being perfectly acclimated, will give to the united efforts of the Republics great advantages. And if with these be taken into the estimate the important and well known fact that a large portion of the inhabitants of the islands is predisposed to a separation from Spain, and would therefore form a powerful auxiliary to the republican arms, their success becomes almost certain. But even if they should prove incompetent to the reduction of the islands, there can be but little doubt that the shattered remains of Spanish commerce would be swept from the ocean. The advantages of the positions of Colombia and Mexico for annoying that commerce in the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean sea must be evident from the slightest observation. In fact, Cuba is in the mouth of a sack, which is held by Colombia and the United Mexican States. And if, unhappily for the repose of the world, the war should be continued, the coasts of the Peninsula itself may be expected soon to swarm with the privateers of the Republics. If, on the contrary, Spain should consent to put an end to the war, she might yet preserve what remains of her former American possessions. And surely the retention of such islands as Cuba and Porto Rico is eminently worthy of serious consideration, and should satisfy a reasonable ambition. The possessions of Spain in the West Indies would be still more valuable than those of any other power. The war ended, her commerce would revive, and there is every reason to anticipate, from the habits, prejudices, and tastes of the new Republics, that she would find, in the consumption of their population, a constantly augmenting demand for the produce of her industry, now excluded from its best markets. And her experience, like that of Great Britain with the United States, would demonstrate that the value of the commercial intercourse would more than indemnify the loss, while it is unburdened with the expense incident to political connexion.

A subordinate consideration, which should not be overlooked, is, that large estates are owned by Spanish subjects, resident in Spain, which may possibly be confiscated if the war be wantonly continued. If that measure of rigor shall not be adopted, their incomes must be greatly diminished during a state of war. These incomes, upon the restoration of peace, or the proceeds of the sales of the estates themselves, might be drawn to Spain, and would greatly contribute towards raising her from her present condition of embarrassment and languishment. If peace should be longer deferred, and the war should take the probable direction which has been supposed, during its further progress other powers not now parties may be collaterally drawn into it. From much less considerable causes the peace of the world has been often disturbed. From the vicinity of Cuba to the United States, its valuable commerce and the nature of its population, their Government cannot be indifferent to any political change to which that island may be destined. Great Britain and France also have deep interests in its fortunes, which must keep them wide awake to all those changes. In short, what European State has not much at stake, direct or indirect, in the destiny, be it what it may, of that most valuable of all the West India islands? The reflections and the experience of the Emperor on the vicissitudes of war must have impressed him with the solemn duty of all Governments to guard against even the distant approach of that most terrible of all scourges by every precaution with which human prudence and foresight can surround the repose and safety of States.

Such is the view of the war between Spain and the new Republics which the President desires you most earnestly, but respectfully, to present to his Imperial Majesty. From this view it is evident that it is not so much for the new States themselves as for Spain that peace has become absolutely necessary. Their independence of her, whatever intestine divisions may, if intestine divisions shall, yet unhappily await them, is fixed and irrevocable. She may, indeed, by a blind and fatal protraction of the war, yet lose more: gain, for her, is impossible. In becoming the advocate for peace, one is the true advocate of Spain. If the Emperor shall, by his wisdom, enlighten the councils of Spain, and bring home to them a conviction of her real interests, there can be no fears of the success of his powerful interposition. You are authorized, in that spirit of the most perfect frankness and friendship which have ever characterized all the relations between Russia and the United States, to disclose, without reserve, the feelings and the wishes of the United States in respect to Cuba and Porto Rico. They are satisfied with the present condition of those islands, now open to the commerce and enterprise of their citizens. They desire for themselves no political change in them. If Cuba were to declare itself independent, the amount and the character of its population render it improbable that it could maintain its independence.

Such a premature declaration might bring about a renewal of those shocking scenes of which a neighboring island was the afflicting theatre. There could be no effectual preventive of those scenes, but in the guaranty, and in a large resident force of foreign powers. The terms of such a guaranty, and the quotas which each should contribute of such a force, would create perplexing questions of very difficult adjustment, to say nothing of the continual jealousies which would be in operation. In the state of possession which Spain has, there would be a ready acquiescence of those very foreign powers, all of whom would be put into angry activity upon the smallest prospect of a transfer of those islands. The United States could not, with indifference, see such a transfer to any European power. And if the new Republics, or either of them, were to conquer them, their maritime force as it now is, or for a long time to come is likely to be, would keep up constant apprehensions of their safety. Nor is it believed that the new States desire, or will attempt, the acquisition, unless they shall be compelled, in their own defence, to make it, by the unnecessary prolongation of the war. Acting on the policy which is here unfolded, the Government of the United States, although they would have been justified to have seized Cuba and Porto Rico, in the just protection of the lives and the commerce of their citizens, which have been a prey to infamous pirates finding succor and refuge in Spanish territory, have signally displayed their patience and moderation by a scrupulous respect of the sovereignty of Spain, who was herself bound, but has utterly failed, to repress those enormities.

Finally, the President cherishes the hope that the Emperor's devotion to peace, no less than his friendship for Spain, will induce him to lend the high authority of his name to the conclusion of a war the further prosecution of which must have the certain effect of an useless waste of human life. No power has displayed more solicitude for the repose of the world than Russia, who has recently given the strongest evidence of her unwillingness to disturb it, in the East, by unexampled moderation and forbearance. By extending to America the blessings of that peace which, under the auspices of his Imperial Majesty, Europe now enjoys, all parts of this continent will have grateful occasion for regarding him, as the United States ever have done, as their most potent and faithful friend.

This despatch is confided to your discretion, to be communicated in extenso, or its contents disclosed in such other manner to the Government of Russia as shall appear to you most likely to accomplish its object.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient and very humble servant.

Mr. Middleton to Mr. Clay.

ST. PETERSBURG, July 15, (27,) 1825.

SIR: I had the honor of receiving your despatch No. 1 on the 23th June, (O. S.) The Emperor was, at that period, absent from this residence, but expected about the 5th of the present month. Count Nesselrode had preceded him by a few days, and had announced, by a circular letter, dated June 24, that he had resumed the direction of the Imperial Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

I conceive it would be best to lose no time in opening the matter committed to my care by your instructions in the despatch above mentioned. After having carefully weighed what would be the best mode of proceeding, I mentioned to the count the purport of the instructions. He gave me, at first, no great encouragement, adverting to the essential difference in our way of thinking on the question between Spain and her colonies. I begged leave, however, to furnish him with a copy of the despatch, (as you had permitted,) in order that he might lay it before the Emperor. Accordingly, on the second of July, a copy of your instructions, together with a short introductory note, was sent in. (See the accompanying paper.)

I conclude, from my knowledge of the modes of proceeding in all matters of general concern, that the proposition is in consideration between the allies, it being a fundamental maxim with them not to take any determination in matters affecting the general policy without the mutual consent of the parties to this alliance.

I trust that I need not add that every endeavor shall be made, on my part, to give effect to your proposition.

I have the honor to be, sir, very faithfully, your obedient servant,

HENRY MIDDLETON.

ST. PETERSBURG, August 27, (September 8,) 1825.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith a copy of the answer of the Russian Secretary of State to my note of 2d July last, by which I had communicated to this Government, in extenso, the instructions I had received by your despatch No. 1.

I think I am warranted in considering this answer to be, in substance, (when divested of diplomatic garb,) in every respect as favorable to the views developed in your despatch as could possibly be expected to be given by this Government, standing in the predicament it now does. We are left to infer from it that the proposal that the Emperor shall lend his aid towards the conclusion of the war between Spain and her colonies, by interposing his good offices in the form of pacific counsel to the mother country, has been communicated to the allied cabinets, and I am fully of opinion that the majority, if not the whole of them, will agree to it. If such should be the event, the diplomatic committee sitting at Paris will be instructed accordingly. The chief difficulty to be overcome will be in the cabinet of the King of Spain, where it is understood that all parties are opposed to the independence of the colonies. The necessity of the case, however, begins to be so crying that a hope may be entertained that even there the counsels of wisdom may ere long be listened to. For obvious reasons we must not expect to learn, officially, that such advice as that alluded to above has been given, unless it should be attended to.

I have the honor to be, sir, very faithfully, your very obedient servant,

HENRY MIDDLETON.

The SECRETARY OF STATE, &c., &c., &c.

Count Nesselrode to Mr. Middleton.

[Translation of a paper with Mr. Middleton's No. 49.]

St. PETERSBURG, August 20, 1825.

The undersigned, Secretary of State, directing the Imperial Administration of Foreign Affairs, hastened to submit to the Emperor the note with which Mr. Middleton, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, did the honor to address him on the 2d of July last, accompanying a copy of the despatch from Mr. Clay, in which that minister, in the name of the cabinet at Washington, urges the necessity of confirming the general peace by terminating the contest of the Spanish colonies against the Government of his Catholic Majesty, of securing to Spain the peaceful possession of the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, and of effecting these objects by the impartial intervention of Russia.

The principles of the Emperor were sufficiently known to the Government of the United States to justify the perfect confidence that, in expressing a wish for the continuance and confirmation of the peace enjoyed by the world, it did but represent the most sincere desire of his Imperial Majesty; that, in professing a generous solicitude for the rights of Spain over her islands in the West Indies, it avowed principles that had long since been adopted by Russia as the bases of her political system; and that, in anticipating perfect impartiality and true disinterestedness from her intervention, it was not deceived as to the sentiments of the Emperor in relation to all arrangements in which foreign powers might be pleased to claim or admit his good offices.

His Imperial Majesty felicitates himself with having inspired this confidence in the United States of America, and the undersigned is charged to invite Mr. Middleton to convey to his Government the assurance of the high value at which the Emperor estimates those sentiments, of which new evidence is furnished by its present propositions.

The opinions of his Imperial Majesty as to the question discussed by Mr. Clay in his despatch cannot be concealed from the cabinet of Washington. His Imperial Majesty has ever thought that justice, the law of nations, and the general interest in having the indisputable titles of sovereignty respected, could not allow the determinations of the mother country in this important case to be prejudged or anticipated. On the other side, whenever Spain has wished to discuss the future condition of South America, she has addressed overtures to all the allied powers of Europe. It will not be possible, therefore, for his Imperial Majesty to change principles in this negotiation, nor to institute it separately (isolement); and until positive information has been received of the ulterior views of Spain in regard to her American possessions, of her decision upon the proposition of the United States, and of the opinions of her allies in relation to the same subject, Russia cannot give a definitive answer.

She is, however, in the meanwhile, pleased to hope that the United States, becoming every day more convinced of the evils and dangers that would result to Cuba and Porto Rico from a change of Government, being satisfied, as Mr. Clay has said in his despatch, with the present commercial legislation of these two islands, and deriving an additional motive of security from the honorable resolution of Spain not to grant to them any longer letters of marque, will use their influence in defeating, as far as may be in their power, every enterprise against these islands; in securing to the rights of his Catholic Majesty constant and proper respect; in maintaining the only state of things that can preserve a just balance of power in the sea of the Antilles, prevent shocking examples, and, as the cabinet of Washington has remarked, secure to the general peace salutary guarantees.

The undersigned seizes, with pleasure, this occasion to repeat to Mr. Middleton the assurances of his very distinguished consideration.

NESSELRODE.

No. 2.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Middleton.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 26, 1825.

Sir: Your despatches (Nos. 48 and 49) have been duly received and submitted to the President. He sees with much satisfaction that the appeal which has been made through you to the Emperor of Russia, to employ his friendly offices in the endeavor to bring about a peace between Spain and the new American Republics, has not been without favorable effect. Considering the intimate and friendly relations which exist between the Emperor and his allies, it was perhaps not to be expected that, previous to a consultation with them, language more explicit should be held than that which is contained in Count Nesselrode's note. Although very guarded, it authorizes the belief that the preponderating influence of Russia has been thrown into the scale of peace. Notwithstanding the predictions of a contrary result, confidently made by Mr. Secretary Canning, this decision of the Emperor corresponds with the anticipations which have been constantly entertained here ever since the President resolved to invoke his intervention. It affords strong evidence both of his humanity and his enlightened judgment. All events out of Spain seem now to unite in their tendency towards peace; and the fall of the Castle of St. Juan d'Ulloa, which capitulated on the eighteenth day of last month, cannot fail to have a powerful effect within that Kingdom. We are informed that when information of it reached the Havana it produced great and general sensation; and that the local Government immediately despatched a fast sailing vessel to Cadiz to communicate the event, and, in its name, to implore the King immediately to terminate the war and acknowledge the new Republics, as the only means left of preserving Cuba to the Monarchy.

In considering what further measures could be adopted by this Government to second the pacific exertions which, it is not doubted, the Emperor is now employing, it has appeared to the President that a suspension of any military expedition which both or either of the Republics of Colombia and Mexico may be preparing against Cuba and Porto Rico might have a good auxiliary influence. Such a suspension, indeed, seemed to be due to the friendly purposes of the Emperor. I have accordingly addressed official notes to the ministers of those Republics accredited here, recommending it to their Governments, an extract from one of which (the other being substantially the same) is herewith transmitted. You will observe it intimated in those notes that other Governments may feel themselves urged, by a sense of their interests and duties, to interpose in the event of an invasion of the islands, or of contingencies which may accompany or follow it. On this subject it is proper that we should be perfectly understood by Russia. For ourselves, we desire no change in the possession of Cuba, as has been heretofore stated. We cannot allow a transfer of the island to any European Power. But if Spain should refuse to conclude a peace, and obstinately resolve on continuing the war, although we do not desire that either Colombia or Mexico should acquire the island of Cuba, the President cannot see any justifiable ground on which we can forcibly interfere. Upon the hypothesis of an unnecessary protraction of the war, imputable to Spain, it is evident that Cuba will be her only point d'appui in this hemisphere. How can we interpose, on that supposition, against the party clearly having right on his side, in order to restrain or defeat a lawful operation of war? If the war against the islands should be conducted by those Republics in a desolating manner; if, contrary to all expectation, they should put arms into the hands of one race of the inhabitants to destroy the lives of another; if, in short, they should countenance and encourage excesses and examples, the contagion of which, from our neighborhood, would be dangerous to our quiet and safety, the Government of the United States might feel itself called upon to interpose its power. But it is not apprehended that any of those contingencies will arise, and, consequently, it is most probable that the United States, should the war continue, will remain hereafter, as they have been heretofore, neutral observers of the progress of its events.

You will be pleased to communicate the contents of this despatch to the Russian Government. And as, from the very nature of the object which has induced the President to recommend to the Governments of Colombia and Mexico a suspension of their expeditions against the Spanish islands, no definite time could be suggested for the duration of that suspension, if it should be acceded to, it must be allowed, on all hands, that it ought not to be unnecessarily protracted. Therefore, you will represent to the Government of Russia the expediency of obtaining a decision from Spain as early as possible in respect to its disposition to conclude a peace.

I am your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

HENRY MIDDLETON, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary United States, St. Petersburg.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Salazar.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 20, 1825.

SIR: During the last spring I had the honor to state to you that the Government of the United States had addressed that of Russia with the view of engaging the employment of its friendly offices to bring about a peace, if possible, between Spain and the new American Republics, founded upon the basis of their independence; and the despatch from this Department to the American minister at St. Petersburg, having that object, was read to you. I have now the satisfaction to state that it appears, by late advices just received from St. Petersburg, that this appeal to the Emperor of Russia has not been without good effect, and that there is reason to believe that he is now exerting his friendly endeavors to put an end to the war. The first would be naturally directed to his allies, between whom and his Imperial Majesty it was desirable that there should be, on that interesting subject, concurrence of opinion and concert in action. Our information from Europe authorizes the belief that all the great powers are now favorably inclined towards peace, and that, separately or conjointly, they will give pacific counsels to Spain. When all the difficulties exterior to Spain in the way of peace are overcome, the hope is confidently indulged that those within the Peninsula cannot long withstand the general wish. But some time is necessary for the operation of these exertions to terminate the war, and to ascertain their effect upon the Spanish Government.

Under these circumstances, the President believes that a suspension, for a limited time, of the sailing of the expedition against Cuba or Porto Rico, which is understood to be fitting out at Carthagena, or of any other expedition which may be contemplated against either of those islands by Colombia or Mexico, would have a salutary influence on the great work of peace. Such a suspension would afford time to ascertain if Spain, resisting the powerful motives which unite themselves on the side of peace, obstinately resolves upon a protraction of the war. The suspension is due to the enlightened intentions of the Emperor of Russia, upon whom it could not fail to have the happiest effect. It would also postpone, if not forever render unnecessary, all consideration which other powers may, by an irresistible sense of their essential interests, be called upon to entertain of their duties in the event of the contemplated invasion of those islands, and of other contingencies which may accompany or follow it. I am directed, therefore, by the President, to request that you will forthwith communicate the views here disclosed to the Government of the Republic of Colombia, which, he hopes, will see the expediency, in the actual posture of affairs, of forbearing to attack those islands until a sufficient time has elapsed to ascertain the result of the pacific efforts which the great powers are believed to be now making on Spain.

I seize, with pleasure, the occasion to renew to you assurances of my distinguished consideration.

H. CLAY.

DON JOSÉ MARIE SALAZAR, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Colombia.

No. 18.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Joel R. Poinsett to Mr. Clay, dated

Mexico, September 13, 1825.

"I had this morning a second conference with the plenipotentiaries of this Government, and, as some difficulties have been presented that may retard the progress of the negotiation, I am anxious that you should be made acquainted with them as early as possible, and lose no time, therefore, in laying them before you.

"The project of the treaty was drawn up by me, and of course contains the principle of perfect reciprocity in the commerce and navigation of the two countries, according to the spirit of the act of January 7, 1824. This was objected to, as might have been expected, and an effort made to introduce the fourth article of their treaty with Great Britain, which contains an exception, in my opinion, highly objectionable. It is at the close of that article, in these words: 'Excepting only the American nations which were formerly Spanish possessions, to which, on account of the fraternal relations that unite them to the United Mexican States, the latter may grant special privileges which shall not be extended to the dominions and subjects of his Britannic Majesty.' It was agreed to reserve the point of perfect reciprocity in the commercial relations between the two countries, but I most strenuously opposed the exception above cited, and, as at present advised, will never sign a treaty on such terms.

"The mail leaves the city in a few hours, so that I have not time to give you the arguments which were urged for and against it. My principal objections are the impolicy of admitting any distinctions in the interests of the American States which would tend to unite these more closely and place us, in some contingencies, without the pale. Treaties, in all probability, by this time, have been concluded between the United States and Buenos Ayres and Chile, on such terms as would render a provision of this nature nugatory in time of peace; but in the event of a war between the United States and either of those powers, an event which, however remote, ought to be provided against, such an exception would enable this country to assist very materially our enemies without violating the treaty. With these impressions, and with this view of the subject, I will not agree to this provision; and as I know the plenipotentiaries and the President of the Mexican States to be obstinately bent on carrying this point, I earnestly solicit that you will instruct me if you think I ought to yield it."

Mexico, September 28, 1825.

"Anxious to conclude the pending negotiations in time for the President to communicate the result in his message to the next Congress, I urged the President of these States either to permit Alaman to continue them, or to appoint another plenipotentiary. He preferred the latter alternative, and has given powers to Don José Gomez Pedraza, the Secretary of War, who now holds the portfolio of the Minister of Foreign Relations ad interim. The Secretary of the Treasury, being about to leave town for the coast, on business connected with the capture of the castle of Ulloa, a desire was expressed to complete the negotiations before his departure. In consequence we have had two conferences, yesterday and to-day, but the exception contained in the fourth article of the treaty between Great Britain and Mexico, to which I alluded in my communication No. 18, and to which the Mexican plenipotentiaries pertinaciously adhere, has prevented our coming to any conclusion.

"They continue to urge the fraternal ties by which they are bound to the American nations which formerly were Spanish possessions, and the treaties of alliance, offensive and defensive, which have been made between them. But what really prevents them from yielding the point is their having succeeded in persuading the British negotiators to consent to insert this exception in their treaty. I will, however, give you a succinct account of what passed at our several conferences on this subject.

"I first objected to the exception in favor of the American nations formerly Spanish possessions, on the ground that no distinctions ought to be made between any of the members of the great American family; that Great Britain, having consented to such a provision, ought not to influence the United States, because the Republics of America were united by one and the same interest, and that it was the interest of the European powers to cause such distinctions to be made as would divide it into small confederacies, and if possible to prevent us from so uniting as to present one front against the attempts of Europe upon our republican institutions. That it might, therefore, have been considered by the British plenipotentiaries important to lay the foundation of distinctions which must disunite us; but that it was much more manifestly our interest that all the States of America should be united as intimately as possible, an union which could only exist on the basis of the most perfect equality and reciprocity.

"The plenipotentiaries of Mexico observed, in reply, that Mexico was united by fraternal ties and strong sympathies to the nations which had, like themselves, shaken off the yoke of Spain; and that they had concluded with them an offensive and defensive alliance which united them more intimately, and placed them on a different footing from that on which they stood towards the United States. To which I rejoined, that the policy we had observed towards these countries gave us a right to expect that no such distinctions as those sought to be introduced into the treaty should be made in our case, and entitled us to be considered on at least an equal footing with any of the American Republics. And further, that this exception could now avail them nothing, as our treaty with Colombia, and those probably, by this time, concluded with Buenos Ayres and Chile, contained no such provision. The plenipotentiaries of Mexico hastily remarked that a war might dissolve any one of those treaties, and in such an event they thought Mexico ought to possess the power to evince her sympathies in favor of either of the American nations which had been formerly Spanish possessions without violating her neutrality. To this observation I replied that I considered this argument conclusive why the United States should not accede to the insertion of such a provision in the treaty; that I regarded a war between the United States and any of the other Republics of America as a very remote and improbable event; but that I never would consent, by treaty, to place the former in a less favorable situation than their enemies, if, unfortunately, those Republics should ever become so. This was the substance of our discussion at the first conference on this subject. It has been alluded to since, in conversation, in a manner that induced me to believe they were bent on carrying their point, and they must have perceived that I was equally decided not to yield it.

"Yesterday, after adjusting all other disputed points, inserting an article similar to the 15th article of our treaty with Spain, signed at San Lorenzo el Real in 1795, and one on the arrest, detention, and delivery of fugitive slaves, this subject was again renewed. The President, they said, was so decided on the subject that they feared there could be no treaty without it. I replied that I was perfectly aware what would be the view my Government would take of this subject, and I could not agree to a provision which would cause the treaty to be rejected at Washington; that such distinctions were entirely contrary to the course of policy we were desirous America should pursue, and that, by persisting in them, Mexico placed herself in opposition to the interests of all the other American Republics, and that uselessly, because, whatever advantage she had promised herself from such an exception in favor of the former Spanish colonies, it was now manifest that she could derive none, as the other American States had made their treaties on a different basis. I remarked, too, that it appeared to me very singular that they should persist in their desire to insert a provision in this treaty which had already occasioned the non-ratification of the first Mexico had entered into; certainly exposed the second to be rejected by England, for the plenipotentiaries of that power had consented to it only because the treaty with Colombia had been made and ratified here, and which would insure the rejection of this treaty at Washington if I were to consent to it.

"The plenipotentiaries replied that all the Spanish American Republics had not made their treaties, and instanced Peru and Guatemala. They readily admitted that Peru would, in all probability, follow the example of Colombia; and I then observed that, after what had so lately passed between Mexico and Guatemala, by which it was evident that the latter had more to fear than to hope from the former, she would scarcely adopt a line of policy which would place her in closer union with Mexico, and separate her from the other States of America. As it was late before this subject was touched upon, little more passed yesterday.

"This morning, early, I received a visit from Don Ramos Arispe, a priest and an intimate of mine, who brought me a proposal from the plenipotentiaries to annex a condition that the exception should extend only to those Spanish American nations who would treat with Mexico on the same terms. I told him that I must persist in my objection, and would not admit the principle at all; that I believed the exception Mexico insisted upon making would avail her nothing, for no other American nation would agree to it; but that any distinctions at all among the nations of America were, in my opinion, destructive of the best interests of this hemisphere. As I knew that he is appointed one of the plenipotentiaries of this Government to the Congress at Panama, I hinted to him that the course of policy Mexico appeared determined to pursue would leave her at that Congress entirely alone; for it was to be expected that those American Republics who stood towards each other on the same footing, and whose interests were identical, would be united more closely among themselves than with a third, which had thought proper to pursue a separate line of policy, and to unite herself more closely with a European power than with them, notwithstanding they had, obviously, all the same interests. After some further discussion, in which I went over the whole course of policy pursued by the United States towards these countries, and recapitulated the reasons which induced me to believe that the great interests of America required us all to be intimately united, he either was or pretended to be convinced, and promised to use his influence to induce the President and the plenipotentiaries to yield to this point.

"We met at noon, and the plenipotentiaries of this Government commenced the conference by saying that, as I had not agreed to the modification proposed to me through Arispe, they had now one to submit to me, which they presumed I could not refuse, as I had the day before expressed an opinion that their treaty with Great Britain would be rejected, in London, on the ground of this exception. They then proposed to insert the following words: 'with respect to the exception contained in the ——— article, which speaks of the Republics which formerly were Spanish possessions, it shall be understood in the same terms which finally shall be agreed upon, in relation to this subject, between Mexico and England.'

"To this proposal I instantly replied that I would prefer agreeing to the article as it stood rather than consent to be governed by the decision of Great Britain; that our interests were separate and distinct; that nation formed one of the European powers, and the United States were the head of the American powers; and that, in treaties which were intended to strengthen the interests of the latter, no allusion ought to be made to those made with the former. Great Britain had concluded a treaty with these States in order to secure a profitable commerce with the Americans, but her interests were European, whereas ours were strictly American. With respect to the opinion I had advanced, that their treaty with England would not be ratified in London, I had been induced to suppose so from the fact that one of the plenipotentiaries of that Government had assured me the exception in question never would have been agreed to by them if they had not been shown the treaty with Colombia, which contained this principle of exclusive alliance among the Spanish American States. It had been ratified here, and they supposed it would be ratified in Colombia, and therefore consented to what they considered irremediable, satisfied that we were excluded as well as themselves. If, therefore, this state of things constituted their only motive for agreeing to it, and they had so declared to their Government, I had a right to suppose, as the principle was not sanctioned by Colombia, that the treaty with that condition would not be ratified in London; and I knew that the chargé d'affaires of her Britannic Majesty had sent in a note to explain the only reasons why the British plenipotentiaries had agreed to that provision in the treaty, and to declare that, as the treaty between Mexico and Colombia had not been ratified by the latter, those reasons no longer existed, and the exception ought to be expunged. If the cabinet of London took the same view of it, the alteration would be insisted upon; but, on the contrary, if it should appear to them more important in a political than in a commercial view, they might not object, as an European power, to the establishment of such distinctions as those proposed, because these must necessarily separate the interests of the American Republics, and that nothing but the policy Great Britain might be disposed to adopt towards America, as one of the European powers, could induce them to make so unnecessary a sacrifice of their commercial interests.

"The plenipotentiaries of this Government then asked what would be their situation if their treaty with Great Britain should arrive ratified, after they had signed one with us without inserting this exception. Aware that this was the real difficulty as well as the source of this obstinacy on their part, I replied that, in my opinion, as the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain had been induced to consent to this exception from the mistaken belief that the treaty with Colombia, in which the principle was established, would be ratified by both parties, and that, therefore, they must admit it, however objectionable, or make no treaty at all with Mexico, and as these motives had fallen to the ground with the rejection of the treaty by Colombia, it would be not only decorous but honorable in the Mexican Government to agree, at once, to expunge that exceptionable provision of their treaty with Great Britain. One of the plenipotentiaries who had assisted at the conferences with those of Great Britain protested that the motive alleged by the British plenipotentiaries had not been the only one. *I could only repeat that one of the British plenipotentiaries has assured me it was entered on the protocol of the conferences that the previous treaty of Mexico with Colombia was the only motive which induced them to accede to this exception in favor of the Spanish American States.

"They continued to insist that they were bound by fraternal ties to the Spanish American States, and that it was natural they should unite themselves more intimately with States in their infancy, whose interests were identified with theirs from the peculiar circumstances in which they mutually stood towards Spain, than with a nation already in adolescence, and which had to pursue a different policy towards Spain on account of the relations they had with the other powers of Europe. To these observations I replied, that against the power of Spain they had given sufficient proof that they required no assistance, and the United States had pledged themselves not to permit any other power to interfere either with their independence or form of government; and that, as, in the event of such an attempt being made by the powers of Europe, we would be compelled to take the most active and efficient part and to bear the brunt of the contest, it was not just that we should be placed on a less favorable footing than the other Republics of America, whose existence we were ready to support at such hazards. They interrupted me by stating that we had no right to insist upon being placed on the same footing with the Spanish American States, unless we were willing to take part with them in their contest with Spain. I told them that such an act would be in the highest degree impolitic towards all parties; it was true that the power of the United States was sufficient not only at once to put an end to this contest, but, if the nations of Europe did not interfere, to crush and annihilate that of Spain. This measure, however, which they now proposed, would infallibly produce what it was so much our interest to avoid, the alliance of the great powers of Europe against the liberties of America. I then recapitulated the course of policy pursued towards the Spanish colonies by our Government, which had so largely contributed to secure their independence and to enable them to take their station among the nations of the earth, and declared what further we were ready to do in order to defend their rights and liberties, but that this could only be expected from us, and could only be accomplished, by a strict union of all the American Republics on terms of perfect equality and reciprocity; and repeated that it was the obvious policy of Europe to divide us into small confederacies, with separate and distinct interests, and as manifestly ours to form a single great confederacy, which might oppose one united front to the attacks of our enemies.

"As this conference had already lasted some hours, for Spanish eloquence is diffuse, and as I understood their motives for insisting on this provision in the treaty, I broke it up, with a positive declaration that, putting out of view my duty as representative of the United States, I regarded the proposed exception in favor of the nations which were formerly Spanish possessions so contrary to the best interests of the Americas that I never would agree to its insertion in a treaty between the United States and any of the American Republics."

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, November 9, 1825.

SIR: Since the date of my letter of the 26th of September last, your despatches to No. 21 have been received. That of the 13th of September, 1825, was received yesterday. They have all been laid before the President, and I shall now make the remarks which appear to be called for by the last, being the only one which seems to require particular notice. In that you state that, in the course of your conferences with the plenipotentiaries of the United Mexican States, on the subject of the proposed commercial convention, a point of difficulty has arisen which has been agreed to be reserved. The point is an exception in favor of the American nations which were formerly Spanish possessions, to which, on account of the fraternal relations that unite them to the United Mexican States, the latter may grant special privileges which shall not be extended to the dominions and citizens of the United States. The President approves of your refusal to accede to that exception.

The United States have neither desired nor sought to obtain for themselves, in their commercial relations with the new States, any privileges which were not common to other nations. They have proposed and only wished to establish, as the basis of all their commercial treaties, those of equality and reciprocity. They can consent to no other. Ready, themselves, to extend to the United Mexican States any favors which they have granted to other nations, the United States feel themselves authorized to demand, in this respect, a perfect reciprocity. They could not agree to treat on the principle of a concession to any European power of commercial privileges which were denied to them. They would feel even more repugnance to the adoption of such a principle in respect to any American nations, because, by placing the United States, in some degree, out of the pale of that American system of which they form no unessential part, it would naturally wound the sensibility of the people of the United States. As you had not time, at the date of your despatch, to communicate the reasons which were urged in support of this extraordinary exception, they can only be collected from the tenor of the clause inserted in the British treaty, which you have cited. That clause asserts as the motives for the exception: first, that the new States, in whose favor it is to be applied, were formerly Spanish possessions; and second, that certain fraternal relations unite them to the Mexican States. The validity of neither of these reasons can be perceived. What is there in the nature of the fact that those nations were once bound by a common allegiance to Spain to justify the exception? Can any rule be fairly deduced from a colonial condition which should govern independent nations no longer bound by any common tie? Is there not something derogatory from the character of free States and free men in seeking to find a rule for their commercial intercourse in their emancipated condition from a retrospect of their colonial state, which was one of dependence and vassalage? What is to be the limit of this principle? If the accident of a colonial connexion under a common sovereign is to justify a peculiar rule for the emancipated colonies, may not that common sovereign also insist, on the ground of ancient relations, upon special privileges? And then it would be incumbent upon the United States to consider if they had not been premature in their recognition of the independence of the United Mexican States. But if the fact of the Spanish dominion having once stretched over the new States is to create an exception of commercial privileges in their behalf, the United States, upon a similar ground, have a right to demand the benefit of it. For the same Spanish dominion once, and at no very distant day, extended over the larger part of their territories, and all that part which is continuous with those of the United Mexican States.

With respect to the second reason, deducible from the clause in the British treaty, there is no statement of the nature of those fraternal relations which are supposed to warrant the exception. Certainly, as between the United Mexican States and the other new nations carved out of the former Spanish colonies, none are known to the world which can sanction the exception. The United Mexican States have, it is true, been waging war with Spain contemporaneously with the other States, but hitherto there has been no co-operation of arms between them. The United Mexican States have alone sustained their contest. If the idea of those fraternal relations is to be sought for in the sympathy between the American belligerents, this sympathy has been equally felt and constantly expressed throughout the whole struggle by the United States. They have not, indeed, taken up arms in support of the independence of the new States, but the neutrality which they have maintained has enabled them, more efficaciously, to serve the cause of independence than they could have done by taking part in the war. Had they become a belligerent, they would, probably, have drawn into the war, on the other side, parties whose force would have neutralized if it had not overbalanced their exertions. By maintaining neutral ground, they have entitled themselves to speak out with effect, and they have constantly so spoken to the powers of Europe. They disconcerted the designs of the European alliance upon the new States by the uncalculating declarations which they made in the face of the world. They were the first to hasten to acknowledge the independence of the United Mexican States, and by their example drew after them Great Britain.

It has, no doubt, not escaped your observation that, in the case of the treaty which has been concluded between the United States and the Republic of Colombia, (and of which a printed authentic copy, as it has been ratified by the two Governments, is herewith transmitted) no such exception was set up by that Republic. On the contrary, it is expressly stipulated in the second article that the parties "engage, mutually, not to grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect of commerce and navigation, which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same freely, if the concession was freely made, or on allowing the same compensation, if the concession was conditional."

There is a striking inconsistency in the line of policy which the United Mexican States would seem disposed to pursue towards the United States. They would regard these States as an American nation or not, accordingly as it shall suit their own purposes. In respect to commerce, they would look upon us as an European nation, to be excluded from the enjoyment of privileges conceded to other American nations. But when an attack is imagined to be menaced by Europe upon the independence of the United Mexican States, then an appeal is made to those fraternal sympathies which are justly supposed to belong to our condition as a member of the American family. No longer than about three months ago, when an invasion by France of the island of Cuba was believed at Mexico, the United Mexican Government promptly called upon the Government of the United States, through you, to fulfil the memorable pledge of the President of the United States in his message to Congress of December, 1823. What they would have done had the contingency happened may be inferred from a despatch to the American minister at Paris, a copy of which is herewith sent, which you are authorized to read to the plenipotentiaries of the United Mexican States. Again, the United Mexican Government has invited that of the United States to be represented at the Congress of Panama, and the President has determined to accept the invitation. Such an invitation has been given to no European power, and it ought not to have been given to this if it is not to be considered as one of the American nations.

The President indulges the confident expectation that, upon reconsideration, the Mexican Government will withdraw the exception. But, if it should continue to insist upon it, you will, upon that ground, abstain from concluding any treaty, and put an end to the negotiation. It is deemed better to have no treaty and abide by the respective commercial laws of the two countries, than to subscribe to a principle wholly inadmissible, and which, being assented to in the case of Mexico, might form a precedent to be extended to others of the new States.

I am your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

JOEL R. POINSETT, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary United States, Mexico.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Brown.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, October 25, 1825.

SIR: During the last summer a large French fleet visited the American seas and the coast of the United States. Its object naturally gave rise to much speculation. Neither here nor through you at Paris was the Government of the United States made acquainted with the views of that of France in sending out so considerable an armament. The President conceives it due to the friendly relations which happily subsist between the two nations, and to the frankness by which he wishes all their intercourse to be characterized, that the purpose of any similar movement hereafter, made in a season of peace, should be communicated to this Government. You will therefore inform the French Government of his expectation that such a communication will, in future, be accordingly made. The reasonableness of it, in a time of peace, of which France shall enjoy the blessings, must be quite apparent. The United States having, at the present period, constantly to maintain, in the Gulf of Mexico and on the coasts of Cuba and Porto Rico, a naval force on a service beneficial to all commercial nations, it would appear to be quite reasonable that, if the commanders of any American squadron, charged with the duty of suppressing piracy, should meet with those of a French squadron, the respective objects of both should be known to each. Another consideration to which you will advert, in a friendly manner, is the present condition of the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico. The views of the Executive of the United States in regard to them have been already disclosed to France by you on the occasion of inviting its co-operation to bring about peace between Spain and her former colonies in a spirit of great frankness. It was stated to the French Government that the United States could not see, with indifference, those islands passing from Spain to any other European power; and that, for ourselves, no change was desired in their present political and commercial condition, nor in the possession which Spain has of them. In the same spirit, and with the hope of guarding beforehand against any possible difficulties on that subject that may arise, you will now add that we could not consent to the occupation of those islands by any other European power than Spain under any contingency whatever. Cherishing no designs on them ourselves, we have a fair claim to an unreserved knowledge of the views of other great maritime powers in respect to them. If any sensibility should be manifested to what the French minister may choose to regard as suspicions entertained here of a disposition on the part of France to indulge a passion of aggrandisement, you may disavow any such suspicions, and say that the President cannot suppose a state of things in which either of the great maritime powers of Europe, with or without the consent of Spain, would feel itself justified to occupy or attempt the occupation of Cuba or Porto Rico without the concurrence or, at least, the knowledge of the United States. You may add, if the tenor of your communications with the French minister should seem to make it necessary, that, in the course of the past summer, rumors reached this country, not merely of its being the design of the French fleet to take possession of the island of Cuba, but that it had, in fact, taken possession of that island. If the confidence in the Government of France, entertained by that of the United States, could not allow it to credit these rumors, it must be admitted that they derived some countenance from the weakness of Spain, the intimate connexion between that monarchy and France, and the general ignorance that prevailed as to the ultimate destination and object of a fleet greatly disproportionate, in the extent of its armament, to any of the ordinary purposes of a peaceful commerce.

You are at liberty to communicate the subject of this note to the French Government, in conference or in writing, as you may think most proper; but in either case it is the President's wish that it should be done in the most conciliatory and friendly manner.

I am, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

LEGATION OF COLOMBIA, New York, December 30, 1825.

I have the honor to inform you that I received the note of the 20th current, in which you are pleased to communicate to me the hopes of a favorable result to the good offices of his Majesty the Emperor of Russia with the great powers of Europe and with Spain to put an end to the war of America. The Government of Colombia, being informed by me of the instructions given to the American minister at St. Petersburg, which you had the goodness to read to me last spring, has seen, with the greatest satisfaction, this measure of real friendship and love of humanity of the Government of the United States, and charged me to declare its gratitude, as well as its anxiety for the continuance of those good offices with the other powers of the continent of Europe.

As to the views of the President of the United States for suspending the invasion of the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico until the result is obtained of the mediation of the great powers with Spain, I shall have the honor of transmitting them to my Government by the first opportunity, being able, in the meantime, to assure you that neither by official communications nor by my private letters from Colombia have I any knowledge relative to the expedition which is preparing at Carthagena. I am consequently inclined to believe that what is said upon that matter is founded on vague conjecture or, perhaps, on the convenience and opportunity of invasion. I ought likewise to add, in confirmation of my private opinion, that, as I have been informed, there are at Carthagena only the troops necessary to garrison the place, such as is requisite in these times, when new expeditions have sailed from the ports of the Peninsula, and are announced against America, and when the Spanish army in the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico has been augmented. When the great facility is considered of acting against the territory of Colombia or Mexico by the advantageous situation of said islands, their great resources, and, what is more important, the superiority of the marine which has assembled there, it will not be denied that Colombia has sufficient causes of alarm. It is true, in support of said conjectures on the approaching invasion of Cuba and Porto Rico, the necessity presents itself, under which the Government of Colombia is, of withdrawing the auxiliary forces from Peru by the way of Panama and Carthagena, which is the most convenient, ready, and economical way to place them on the Atlantic in an attitude of giving immediate succor to any point of our territory, or of that of our allies, which may be invaded; but it is clear that this military operation is rather the necessary effect of the geographical situation of Colombia and Peru than a meditated plan of an expedition without the continent.

To these reasons, which, in my private opinion, and for want of official communications from my Government upon the subject, sufficiently explain the movements of troops which are going on in Colombia, permit me to repeat to you what I said upon another occasion, that this military attitude, extremely grievous to our people, is a necessary consequence of the obstinacy of the Spanish Government in prolonging a useless war, and in declining every idea of treating with independent America, no less than the lamentably equivocal policy of the great continental powers which, notwithstanding they see our independence irrevocably established by force of arms, and upon the solid basis of general opinion and of just and moderate Governments, refuse the formal recognition of the new Republics, pretending to misunderstand what their own interest, justice, reason, and humanity demand. In this situation of justly inspired doubt and inquietude, when the obstinacy of Spain and the indifference of the rest of Europe have convinced us even that we are engaged in a question of fact, when the nations of America have displayed all the vigor of youth, and know the value of their forces and combined resources, and when our armies have gloriously terminated the campaign which has forever secured the liberty of the South, it will not appear to many reasonable to renounce all these favorable circumstances, to terminate at once the evils of war, and dictate conditions of peace, with the manifest advantage of the American system, in the absolute expulsion of one European nation from the important islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, which, in the precarious and miserable situation of Spain, are not without the possibility of falling into the power of some of the great powers of Europe.

It will appear even less reasonable that Colombia and her allies should have to continue in a state of inaction, enduring the heavy expenses and grievous inconveniences which accompany the maintenance of the army and the marine upon a war footing, not being able to rely upon a guarantee of suspension from armaments and attacks on the part of Spain, which, in spite of its nullity, does not cease in its efforts to augment the army of America so far as to induce us to suspect that a foreign hand affords these aids, which are by no means in harmony with the scantiness of the resources of the Peninsula.

I can likewise assure you that my Government has always regarded, with all due circumspection, the consequences which might result from an ill directed expedition against Cuba and Porto Rico; and, notwithstanding the urgent necessity which it has had to attack the headquarters (if I may so speak) of our enemies, and the opportunity which oftener than once has presented itself for that purpose, it has preferred to suffer repeated invasions from those islands, waiting for the favorable moment to attack them with a certainty of success by the greater forces which the alliance of all the sections of the south and Mexico will procure to us, and by the state, every day advancing, of the opinion for independence in the inhabitants of said islands, who have repeatedly implored our aid. By this prudent slowness it has wished to give time to the Spanish Government to reflect upon its own interest, and, consequently, to take the just resolution of recognizing the independence of the States of the continent to save the rest of her colonies; but the time has passed in vain, and Spain, in spite of the repeated reverses which she has suffered in the course of this year, shows herself as proud and indignant at every idea of accommodation as at the commencement of the contest. Already a plan of conciliation has been seen inadmissible by the independent States, presented by the Minister Zea, in which were proposed some slight modifications of the ancient colonial regimen, and which, however, were rejected by King Ferdinand as too liberal.

In fine, by the same risks and lamentable consequences which would happen from the invasion of Cuba and Porto Rico if the result is not secured by the combination of superior forces, at least of the nations most interested, Colombia and Mexico, and the plan of operations for this campaign be regulated by common consent, I think that the fortune of said islands must be decided in the Congress of the Isthmus of Panama, which gives time sufficient to receive positive accounts of the final result of the good offices of his Majesty the Emperor of Russia; and I doubt not that, in attention to the friendship which his Imperial Majesty professes to the United States, which have requested his high mediation, and the glory of attributing to the great work of peace, a boon so important will be obtained, or the recognition of our political existence by Russia and the other powers, which is the object of the most ardent desires of the new Governments of America.

I have the honor to offer you the sentiments of the most distinguished consideration, with which I am your very obedient servant,

JOSÉ MARIA SALAZAR.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF MEXICO, Washington, January 4, 1826.

SIR: I have the honor of answering your note of the 20th ultimo, in which you communicate to me the favorable hope of a happy issue in the negotiation undertaken by this Government with the Russian Cabinet, through its minister at St. Petersburg, to solicit of his Imperial Majesty his interposition in promoting peace between Spain and the powers of the American continent formerly a part of that monarchy, and in using his influence with his allies towards a general recognition, all of which you communicated to me in the month of May last, by reading to me the instructions which had been given to that effect to the American minister near his Imperial Majesty. I imparted to my Government a step so friendly and agreeable to the philanthropy and position of these States, and, although I have as yet received no answer thereto, I repeat to you what I had the honor to mention verbally, that Mexico was only desirous of peace, and that I acknowledged to this Government its interest and mode of acting in the cause of the continent and of liberty.

I shall make known to my Government the wishes of the President that any other expedition be suspended which may be projected, as well as that which is said to be fitting out at Carthagena, to assist the independence of one or both the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, as the means best adapted to obtain the negotiation mentioned.

I avail myself of this occasion to present to you my respects and most distinguished consideration, repeating myself to be your obedient servant,

PABLO OBREGON.

The message and the report and documents therein referred to were read.

Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations to consider and report thereon.

MONDAY, JANUARY 16, 1826.

Mr. MACON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred on the 28th of December the message of the President of the United States, nominating Richard C. Anderson and John Sergeant to be Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary to the Assembly of the American Nations at Panama; and on the 10th instant, the message communicating certain documents relating thereto, submitted the following report:

That they have examined the subject to them referred with the most profound attention, and have bestowed upon it all the consideration demanded by its novelty, delicacy, and high importance to the character and future destinies of the United States. In making this examination the committee found themselves not a little embarrassed at first by the circumstance announced by the President in his message to both Houses of Congress, at the commencement of the present session, that he had already accepted the invitation given to the United States by some of the American Republics to be represented at the contemplated Congress of American nations about to be assembled at Panama. But seeing in the several communications made by the Secretary of State to the different ministers of these Republics that an express reference was made to the concurrence of the Senate as the indispensable preliminary to the acceptance of this invitation, and finding in the present message of the President the explicit assurance that he had not thought proper to take any step in carrying this measure into effect until he could ascertain that his opinion of its expediency would concur with that of both branches of the Legislature, the committee believed it became a part of the duty they owed to the Senate, and would be evidence of the proper respect due to the President, that they should fully and freely examine into the propriety of the proposed measure, the expediency of adopting which was the subject that the Senate was thus invited to deliberate upon, and to make known their opinion.

Considerations of much higher importance than even these induced the committee to adopt this course. In the ordinary progress of their proceedings the Senate can rarely, if ever, find it either necessary or proper to inquire as to the objects expected to be attained by appointments to which their advice and consent is asked. As to all offices created by statute in which these objects are defined, and their attainment positively required, the single question arising before the Senate must ever refer merely to the fitness of the persons nominated by the President to fulfill such duties. The same will generally be found the sole inquiry necessary to be made in filling up vacancies happening in pre-existing foreign missions, designed to maintain the customary relations and intercourse of friendship and commerce between the United States and other nations. Very different, however, is the case when it is proposed to create new offices by nomination, or to despatch ministers to foreign States, for the first time, or to accomplish by such missions objects not specially disclosed, or under circumstances new, peculiar, and highly important. In all these cases, instead of confining their inquiries to the mere fitness of the persons nominated to fill such offices, it is not only the right, but the duty of the Senate to determine previously as to the necessity and propriety of creating the offices themselves; and in deciding these questions not only the objects for the accomplishment by which it is proposed to create them, but every other circumstance connected with such a measure must necessarily and unavoidably become a subject of their serious examination.

This right conferred by the Constitution upon the Senate is the only direct check upon the power possessed by the President in this respect which, relieved from this restraint, would authorize him to create and consummate all the political relations of the United States at his mere will. And as in the theory of their Government the high destinies of the people of the United States are never to be confided to the unrestrained discretion of any single man, even the wisest and best of their fellow-citizens, it becomes a solemn duty which the Senate owe to the sovereign States here represented most seriously to investigate all the circumstances connected with the novel measure now proposed by the President, as to the expediency of adopting which they have been invited to aid him with their counsel and advice.

Entertaining these opinions in the performance of the duty which they believe has been required by the Senate, and anxious to manifest to the President their high respect by complying fully with the wish which he has expressed upon this subject, the committee will proceed to investigate the circumstances connected with the measure proposed and disclosed by the documents to them referred, most deeply impressed with the importance of the consequences that may very probably result from it.

The first question which suggested itself to the committee, at the very threshold of their investigation, was, what cogent reasons now existed for adopting this new and untried measure, so much in conflict with the whole course of policy uniformly and happily pursued by the United States from almost the very creation of this Government to the present hour? By the principles of this policy, inculcated by our wisest statesmen in former days, and approved by the experience of all subsequent time, the true interest of the United States was supposed to be promoted by avoiding all entangling connexions with any other nation whatsoever. Steadily pursuing this course, while they have been desirous to manifest the most cordial good will to all nations, and to maintain with each relations of perfect amity, and of commerce, regulated and adjusted by rules of the most fair, equal, and just reciprocity, the United States have hitherto sedulously abstained from associating themselves in any other way, even with those nations for whose welfare the most lively sensibility has been at all times felt and otherwise manifested.

During the conflict for freedom and independence, in which these new States of America were so long engaged with their former sovereign, although every heart in the United States beat high in sympathy with them, and fervent aspirations were hourly put up for their success, and although the relations then existing with Spain were well calculated to excite strong irritation and resentment on our part, yet the Government of the United States, convinced of the propriety of a strict adherence to the principles it had ever proclaimed as the rule of its conduct in relation to other nations, forebore to take any part in this struggle, and maintained the most exact neutrality between these belligerents. Nor would it ever recognize the independence of these new Republics until they had become independent in fact, and the situation of their ancient sovereign in relation to them was such as to manifest that he ought no longer to be held responsible for their acts. So soon as this occurred the United States most gladly embraced the opportunity, and in being the first to proclaim the sovereignty and independence of these States gave to them the strongest pledge of respect and cordial friendship and sincere anxiety for their prosperity.

Since that event ministers have been despatched to each of these new Republics, instructed to declare the sentiments sincerely and warmly felt for them by the United States, and empowered to conclude treaties with them, the objects of which should be to establish, upon principles of the most perfect justice and equity, all the ordinary relations that exist between nations. Thus much was due not less to them than to ourselves; and in going so far we did all that our feelings dictated and the interests of either seemed then to require. What necessity has since arisen to do more? What cause exists now to prompt the United States to establish new and stronger relations with them, and so to abandon that rule of conduct which has hitherto been here so steadily and happily pursued?

These inquiries necessarily called the attention of the committee to a minute examination of all the documents to them referred, in order that they might therein discover the reasons assigned by the new States of America for desiring the United States to be represented at the Congress about to be assembled at Panama, and the motives of the President for intimating his willingness to accept this invitation. And in making such an examination many reflections presented themselves as connected with the proposed measure, all of which the committee will now state to the Senate.

In a Government constituted as is that of the United States, in which the sentiment so natural to freemen prompts them to scrutinize most exactly the extent of all the powers they grant, and to limit this extent by the objects desired to be accomplished by their exercise, the strongest anxiety is (and it is to be hoped always will be) felt to learn distinctly what is the precise object desired to be attained, and what are the precise means proposed for its attainment. Even the confidence reposed in the long-tried patriotism and well-proved wisdom of our own best citizens does not and ought not to suffice to quiet this anxiety, or to remove this jealousy inspired by an ardent attachment to our rights and privileges. It was therefore much to be desired, and certainly to have been expected, that before the destinies of the United States should be committed to the deliberation and decision of a Congress composed not of our own citizens but of the representatives of many different nations, that the objects of such deliberations should be most accurately stated and defined, and the manner of their accomplishment clearly and distinctly marked out.

In this opinion the President himself seems to have concurred at the commencement of this negotiation, for in the report made to him on the 20th of December last by the Secretary of State this officer states that, agreeably to his directions, he had informed the ministers by whom the invitation to the proposed Congress at Panama was given; that "before such a Congress assembled it appeared to the President to be expedient to adjust, between the different powers to be represented, several preliminary points, such as the subjects to which the attention of the Congress was to be directed, the nature and the form of the powers to be given to the diplomatic agents who were to compose it, and the mode of its organization and action." And it was made an express and previous condition to the acceptance of the invitation proposed to be given that "these preliminary points should be arranged in a manner satisfactory to the United States."

It was, therefore, not without much surprise and great regret that the committee discovered that although in none of the communications subsequently made to this Government by either of the ministers of the several States by whom this invitation was given are these preliminary points even stated, and although the want of "a compliance with these conditions" is expressly noticed in the reply made to them by the Secretary of State, yet they were therein told that the President had determined "at once" to send Commissioners to this Congress at Panama, provided the Senate would advise and consent to such a measure.

If, then, the Senate should now demand of this committee to inform them what are the objects to be accomplished at this Congress, and what are the means by which their accomplishment is to be effected—although as to objects the documents referred to them will enable the committee to name a few—yet as to all others they must answer, in the language of the communication made by the Mexican minister, that they are those "to which the existence of the new States may give rise, and which it is not easy to point out or enumerate." As to the means, however, the committee can only reply that, while it seems to be expected that the United States are to clothe their representatives with "ample powers" to accomplish all the enumerated, and these other undefined objects also, yet the mode in which these powers, if granted, are to be used and exercised, is nowhere even hinted at.

One great question, therefore, upon which the decision of the Senate is called for, will be whether, in the existing state of things, it is wise or expedient that the United States should be represented at a Congress of American nations by agents endowed with undefined powers to accomplish undefined objects? And this committee feel no hesitation in stating, as their opinion, that, if ever it may be proper to adopt such a measure, there is nothing known to them that requires or justifies it at this time.

It is true the power confided to the Senate to ratify or reject any agreement that may be entered into by such agents would constitute some safeguard to the important interests of the United States. But long experience must have informed the Senate that it is generally exceedingly difficult, and sometimes even impossible, to escape from the embarrassments produced by the mere act of entering into a negotiation, and that it is much better to abstain from doing so until its objects are distinctly known and approved than to confide in the power of the Senate, in the last resort, to refuse their assent to the ratification of an agreement after it is adjusted by means of such negotiation.

In the present case, if the measures to be accomplished by the proposed Congress, whatever may be their object or character, should not meet the concurring opinion of all the parties there to be represented, we need not the lights of history to inform us that many consequences, mischievous in themselves, and greatly to be deplored, not only may, but most probably will, result. And that a difference of opinion will exist in regard to measures so important in themselves, and so various and diversified in their effects upon nations differing from each other in almost every particular, is much to be apprehended. The power possessed by the Senate of withholding its assent ought not, therefore, to be regarded as furnishing sufficient assurance against the possible and probable effects of the proposed measure.

Turning from the undefined objects of this Congress, so imperfectly disclosed in the vague description given of them, that, if seen at all, they are presented most indistinctly to their view, and regarding those which are particularly mentioned and described with more precision, this committee have not been able to discover in any one of these last a single subject concerning which the United States ought to enter into any negotiation with the States of America to be assembled at the contemplated Congress at Panama.

Before proceeding to the enumeration of these objects the committee cannot refrain from calling the attention of the Senate to a singular circumstance, disclosed by the documents to them referred, although an enumeration of the subjects to which the attention of the proposed Congress was to be directed was explicitly stated as a condition preliminary to the acceptance by the United States of the invitation given to them to be there represented; although each of the ministers giving this invitation had communicated this to his Government, and received its instructions relative thereto; yet great diversities will be found in the enumeration of these subjects, made by each of these ministers in pursuance of such instructions. And, what is still more remarkable, while many of the subjects of intended discussion, so enumerated by each of these ministers, are not referred to in the message of the President to the Senate, others are therein stated, as matters for the deliberation of the proposed Congress, to which not the slightest allusion seems ever to have been made by any one of the American ministers in any of their communications to this Government; nay, one of the subjects (the most important, probably, of any which the United States are desirous to discuss at this Congress) is neither noticed in the communications made to this Government by any of the American States nor in the message of the President to the Senate, and is to be only inferred from the documents last referred to this committee, received under the call made by the Senate for further information; all which will be very clearly shown by the details which the committee will now lay before the Senate.

The first subject stated by the Mexican minister as one which would occupy the attention of the contemplated Congress, and in the deliberations concerning which the United States are expected to take a part, is "The resistance or opposition to be made to the interference of any neutral nation in the question and war of independence between the new powers of this continent and Spain." And in the deliberations upon this subject it seems to be proposed "to discuss the means of giving to that resistance all possible force," and so to adjust, by previous concert, the mode in which each of the States represented at the Congress "shall lend its co-operation."

The same subject is also stated by the minister of Colombia, and in terms still more explicit. He suggests as a matter of useful discussion in the Congress the formation of "an eventual alliance" of the States there to be represented, for the purpose of preventing any European power from interfering in the present contest between Spain and her former colonies, and that the treaty for this purpose should "remain secret until the casus fœderis should happen."

Notwithstanding this is so stated by both of these ministers, as the first and great object of the proposed Congress, yet the President, in his message, assures the Senate "that the motive of the attendance of the United States is neither to contract alliances nor to engage in any undertaking or project importing hostility to any other nation." It thus appears that in relation to this first and most important point, which seems to have given birth to the scheme of this Congress, the views and motives of the United States differ essentially from those of the other parties. And this difference of opinion occurring as to the very first proposition, which is said to be "a matter of immediate utility to the American States that are at war with Spain," and is believed by them to be in accordance with the repeated declarations and protests of the Cabinet at Washington," must unavoidably excite doubts as to "the interest we take in their welfare and our disposition to comply with their wishes," and would so contribute not a little to defeat other objects.

The next subject stated by the Mexican minister, as presenting "another of the questions which may be discussed," and which he considers as being "in like predicament with the foregoing," is, "the opposition to colonization in America by the European powers."

The minister of Colombia concurs in this enumeration. He places "the manner in which all colonization of European powers on the American continent shall be resisted" at the very head of all the subjects of proposed discussion; and couples this with the former, as an object to be effected by the joint and united efforts of all the States to be represented at the Congress, who should be bound by a solemn convention to secure this end.

The President concurs in part in the opinion as to the propriety of attaining this end, but differs radically as to the mode of accomplishing it. "An agreement between all the parties represented at the meeting, that each will guard, by its own means, against the establishment of any future European colony within its borders," he thinks, "may be found advisable." Now, if this be meant, that each nation shall, by its own means, protect its own territories against all encroachments upon them attempted by any European or other foreign State whatsoever, the committee cannot discern either the necessity or expediency of entering into any formal agreement with other States to that effect, more than exists for reducing to treaty stipulations any other of the high, just, and universally admitted rights of all nations. Such an idea, however, is obviously not that suggested by the ministers of Mexico and Colombia; and if more is meant to be comprehended in the agreement, which the President thinks may be found advisable, every other article it would contain must, in the opinion of this committee, violate all the well-settled principles of the policy of the United States, and put at hazard their best interests, without any adequate motive for so novel an experiment. In the one case the views and motives of the President differ again essentially from those of the other parties to be represented at this Congress; and from the disclosure of these repeated differences of opinion no good can possibly result. And in the other, should the views of the President concur with those of the other American States, (which the committee do not believe,) the mutual stipulations growing out of such an agreement, would, in the opinion of this committee, prove fatal to the best interests of the United States should the casus fœderis ever happen.

To adjust the means of most effectual resistance to the interference of neutral nations in the war of independence between the new powers of this continent and Spain, and of opposition to colonization in America by the European powers, are said by the Mexican minister to be "the two principal subjects" of intended discussion at the contemplated Congress; and, indeed, are all the subjects of discussion which he particularly states. The minister of Colombia, however, extends his enumeration of the subjects of intended discussion somewhat further; and after mentioning those before stated adds, as another, "the consideration of the means to be adopted for the entire abolition of the African slave trade."

To this subject the President makes no allusion in his message; and, after the examination which it has received in the Senate during two successive years, this committee deem it quite unnecessary to say much in relation to it at this time. Some of the sovereign States here represented were the first in the world to proclaim their abhorrence of this traffic. Since the formation of this Government the United States have exerted (and, as this committee believe, have exerted effectually) all the means in their power to arrest its progress, so far as their own citizens were concerned; and, if all other nations, and especially those nations holding possessions in America, would follow their example, the African slave trade would no longer exist. The United States, however, have not certainly the right, and ought never to feel the inclination to dictate to others who may differ with them upon this subject, nor do the committee see the expediency of insulting other States, with whom we are maintaining relations of perfect amity, by ascending the moral chair, and proclaiming from thence mere abstract principles, of the rectitude of which each nation enjoys the perfect right of deciding for itself.

The minister of Colombia states, as another subject of discussion at the contemplated Congress, "on what basis the relations of Hayti, and of other parts of our hemisphere that shall hereafter be in like circumstances, are to be placed." To this matter, also, the President makes no allusion in his message. And, surely, if there is any subject within the whole circle of political relations, as to which it is the interest and the duty of all States to keep themselves perfectly free and unshackled by any previous stipulation, it is that which regards their future connexions with any other people not parties to such an agreement. Of the propriety or impropriety of such connexions each must ever be permitted to judge freely for itself, because the benefit or disadvantage to result from them must be peculiar, and very different to each; and that relation which is highly desirable at one time may become hurtful at another. In the opinion of this committee, therefore, the United States should never permit themselves to enter into discussion with any foreign State whatever as to the relations they should be obliged to establish with any other people not parties to such discussions. And the objections to such a course become infinitely stronger when the discussions are intended to refer not only to those who then exist, but also to others who may hereafter be considered as placed "in like circumstances."

These are all the points particularly suggested by the minister of Colombia as subjects of discussion at the contemplated Congress. The minister of Guatemala (who also unites in the invitation given to the United States) has stated no particular subject as matter of discussion at this Congress. He intimates, however, "that as Europe had formed a Continental System, and held a Congress whenever questions affecting its interests were to be discussed, America should also form a system for itself."

How far this general suggestion meets the views of the President the committee are not enabled, by any document to them referred, to decide; but they will present to the Senate their own ideas in relation to it, the rather because it seems now to be the prominent object of the proposed Congress, the magnitude and variety of details belonging to which defied present enumeration and particular specification.

Without adverting to the great and obvious diversities existing between the States of this continent and those of Europe, by which the system here alluded to has been established, diversities growing out of the situation of their people, the nature of their governments, and the positions they occupy, not only in relation to each other but to the rest of the civilized world, this committee will state, as their opinion, that no effect yet produced by the continental system of Europe is of a character to invite the States of this continent to take that system as a model or example fit for their imitation. The great object of the continental system of Europe is to preserve ancient institutions, and relations long known and well understood, in the position which they now occupy and for many centuries have done.

The operation of this system is, by the combination of powers and the application of mere force, to arrest the progress of improvement in the science of government and in the condition of society. Ends which all free States must reprobate as much as they do the means employed for their accomplishment. If this were not so, however, a system formed for this continent for the same, or even different objects, would most probably produce the worst effects. The short political existence of all the States on this continent, even of the United States themselves, the most ancient of any, hath enabled them to profit so little as yet by experience that it would seem rash to proclaim their perfection at this time or to pledge any of them to perpetuate either their present institutions or existing political relations. Our own excellent Constitution is based upon the supposition of its own probable imperfections, and most wisely provides for its amendment whenever such defects shall be discovered to exist. We cannot, therefore, stipulate to preserve it as it is; and no compact with other States can be necessary to bestow upon each the power it now possesses to effect any change which experience may hereafter show to be beneficial to itself; and a stipulation to make such changes as the good of any others may hereafter require, would either be futile in itself or must inevitably lead to discord and to wars.

This committee doubt, moreover, the authority of the Government of the United States to enter into any negotiation with foreign nations for the purpose of settling and promulgating either principles of internal polity or mere abstract propositions as parts of the public law. And if the proposed Congress is viewed but as a convenient mode of conducting a summary negotiation relative to existing interests important to this continent alone, it not only may, but most probably will, be considered by all other civilized nations as a confederacy of the States therein represented for purposes as prejudicial to the interests of the Old as they are supposed to be beneficial to those of the New World. Many of the provisions in the different conventions already concluded between some of the new States relative to this very Congress, and which are now public, are well calculated to create such a suspicion, even if they do not justify a belief in its truth. And whensoever this suspicion shall be entertained by the nations of the Old World, and especially by those who still hold possessions on this continent, it must be obvious to all that consequences much to be deplored will unavoidably result.

Nothing that can be done thereafter by any department of this Government in refusing to sanction the stipulations concluded at a Congress regarded in this light will suffice to avert the calamity. And the United States, who have grown up in happiness to their present prosperity by a strict observance of their old well known course of policy, and by manifesting entire good will and most profound respect for all other nations, must prepare to embark their future destinies upon an unknown and turbulent ocean, directed by little experience, and destined for no certain haven. In such a voyage, the dissimilitude existing between themselves and their associates in interest, character, language, religion, manners, customs, habits, laws, and almost every other particular, and the rivalry these discrepancies must surely produce among them, would generate discords which, if they did not destroy all hope of its successful termination, would make even success itself the ultimate cause of new and direful conflicts between themselves. Such has been the issue of all such enterprises in past time, and we have therefore strong reasons to expect in the future similar results from similar causes.

The committee, having thus examined the several subjects of proposed discussions stated or alluded to by each of the ministers of the new States of America as matters of deliberation at the contemplated Congress, will now proceed to the investigation of others not mentioned or referred to by any of them, but exhibited in the message of the President.

The committee see nothing in the documents to them referred to prove that the States who originated the project of this Congress, and settled the subjects proper for its deliberation, and who most probably have already adjusted "the preliminary rules of that assembly," will admit as fit matters of discussion any other than those which they themselves have so previously announced. Should this be the case, the degraded position which the United States must then occupy at the Congress must be apparent to all. Without adverting further, however, at this time to this consideration, the committee will enter into the examination of the several topics suggested by the President, as though the discussion of them was a matter settled and already agreed.

The first of these subjects stated by the President is, "the establishment of principles of a liberal commercial intercourse." The motives for desiring this are stated to be, that "the Southern American nations in their intercourse with the United States have sometimes manifested dispositions to reserve a right of granting special favors and privileges to the Spanish nation as the price of their recognition; at others, they have actually established duties and impositions, operating unfavorably to the United States, to the advantage of other European powers; and sometimes they have appeared to consider that they might interchange among themselves mutual concessions of exclusive favor, to which neither European powers nor the United States should be admitted."

In considering these reasons it cannot escape the observation of any that, in manifesting dispositions to establish such commercial relations, the Southern American nations must have been actuated by the only motive that ever operates either upon nations or individuals, in regard to their mere commercial intercourse, a desire fairly to advance their own interests, and a belief that they could, by such means, properly accomplish this end. If, in this belief, these nations are right, then the United States can scarcely be viewed as acting towards them in that spirit of generous kindness and fraternal friendship they have professed, when they should strive to induce them to establish as liberal principles such as would be injurious to the interests of these southern nations themselves. And if they are wrong, it seems to this committee that the task of exhibiting their errors may be much better performed, as hitherto it hath been, by particular discussions with each separately than by general demonstrations made to all, assembled as a Congress.

The interests of commerce are necessarily peculiar; they grow out of numerous circumstances, produced by locality, climate, population, manners, customs, and other causes, no one of which exists alike in any two nations on the globe. Few general principles, therefore, can ever apply, with equal truth, to so many peculiarities; and such as do so apply need not the sanction of solemn compact to give them effect. They may be very safely confided to the natural disposition of man promptly to discover and eagerly to advance his own best interests.

Whatever dispositions, then, may have been manifested by the southern nations of America, this committee think that their effects, both upon themselves and the United States, will constitute subjects much more fit for separate discussions with each than of general investigation before all. And the committee are the more confirmed in this opinion by the assurance given by the President in this message, that "in most of these cases their regulations unfavorable to us have already yielded to friendly expostulation and remonstrance;" and by the fact that the treaties recently concluded between these States contain express stipulations that in no event will they agree or enter into any treaty with Spain, or any other nation, to the prejudice of their independence, but to maintain, at all times, their mutual interests with the dignity and energy proper to free independent States.

It is true a difference of opinion appears to exist at present between the United States and one of the new Republics of America in relation to a single principle of their commercial intercourse. When the Senate recollect, however, that treaties have been already concluded between the United States and three others of these Republics, in each of which treaties this point has been settled, as the United States themselves think, right, the committee believe that the Senate will concur with them in the opinion that it is much better to continue the discussion of this subject with the dissenting State singly, urging upon her the example of her sister States, than to put in hazard the stipulations already secured by voluntarily entering into an examination of their expediency before the contemplated Congress.

"The consentaneous adoption of principles of maritime neutrality, favorable to the navigation of peace and commerce in time of war," is the next object which, in the opinion of the President, should "also form a subject of consideration to this Congress." In relation to this, so far as it regards the commerce of peace, the committee have already expressed their opinion; and, so far as it is intended to settle the rules of war, as applicable to navigation, the committee will only remark that there exists so much risk of compromising and destroying the relations of neutrality, which the United States are now maintaining, should they involve themselves, by any compact, relative to belligerent rights, entered into with only one of the parties to the present war, during its continuance, that, in their opinion, it would be highly inexpedient to make such an experiment at this time. Any principle relating to the rights of war, which one of the parties in the existing contest might be willing to adopt, as promoting its interests, could scarcely be regarded with indifference by the other. And the great maritime States of Europe would most probably consider that the United States had seized the occasion of this war to enter into a confederacy with the other States of this continent now actually engaged in it for the purpose of settling principles intended to affect materially their future interests.

It is well known to the Senate, moreover, that treaties already exist between the United States and several of the new States of this continent, in which all the subjects alluded to by the President, in this part of his message are already settled; and no reason is known to this committee to excite the slightest doubt that the others of these States, with whom treaties are not yet concluded, will feel any disinclination to enter into similar stipulations for themselves.

"There is yet another subject, (says the President,) upon which, without entering into any treaty, the moral influence of the United States may, perhaps, be exerted with beneficial consequences at such a meeting—the advancement of religious liberty." And, as a motive for making an effort to accomplish this object, he states that "an exclusive church has been incorporated with the political constitutions of some of the southern nations, without toleration of any other than the dominant sect."

In the opinion of this committee there is no proposition concerning which the people of the United States are now and ever have been more unanimous than that which denies not merely the expediency but the right of intermeddling with the internal affairs of other States; and especially of seeking to alter any provision they may have thought proper to adopt as a fundamental law or may have incorporated with their political constitutions. And if there be any such subject more sacred and delicate than another, as to which the United States ought never to intermeddle even by obtrusive advice, it is that which concerns religious liberty. The most cruel and devastating wars have been produced by such interferences, the blood of man has been poured out in torrents, and, from the days of the crusades to the present hour, no benefit has resulted to the human family from discussions carried on by nations upon such subjects. Among the variety even of Christian nations which now inhabit the earth, rare, indeed, are the examples to be found of States who have not established an exclusive church, and to far the greater number of these toleration is yet unknown. In none of the communications which have taken place is the most distant allusion made to this delicate subject by any of the ministers who have given this invitation; and the committee feel very confident in the opinion that if ever an intimation shall be made to the sovereignties they represent that it was the purpose of the United States to discuss at the proposed Congress their plans of internal civil polity, or anything touching the supposed interests of their religious establishments, the invitation given would soon be withdrawn.

The committee have thus exhibited to the Senate in detail all the subjects which they have been enabled to find particularly stated either by the President in his first message or by any of the ministers of the new States of America as matters intended to be discussed at the contemplated Congress. In reviewing these they will repeat, that a concurrence of opinion does not seem to exist between the different parties as to the subjects of deliberation; nor has the mode of discussion or decision been in any way settled between them. In relation to some of the subjects alluded to as fit matters for consideration, differences of opinion, radical and irreconcilable, seem already to exist, which discussion may aggravate but cannot assuage. As to others, their very agitation, in this mode, threatens seriously the compromise of the neutral relations which the United States are now maintaining and have so carefully observed throughout this whole contest. Others, again, are unfit subjects for deliberation in this mode at all times, and any agreement resulting from their discussion must impair that freedom of action which it is so necessary for the United States to preserve as to these; and as to the residue, they are either not of sufficient importance to require the adoption of this new and untried experiment of a Congress of nations, or may be much better adjusted and settled in separate negotiations with each than in a general conference with all. For these reasons, if there were none other, this committee should regard the adoption of the measure proposed by the President as highly inexpedient at this time.

Although in the message of the President of the 9th instant no new subject of deliberation at the contemplated Congress is specially stated, yet, from the documents accompanying that message and therein referred to as containing information tending to show the expediency of adopting the proposed measure, it appears to this committee that the present and future condition of the remaining Spanish possessions in America are considered as proper matters to be there agitated and settled. Such being the inference of the committee they will proceed to lay before the Senate their opinion upon this subject also.

The committee are well aware that the United States can never regard with indifference the situation and probable destiny of the neighboring Spanish islands of Cuba and Puerto Rico; but so far from believing it expedient to discuss these subjects at a Congress of all the American States, and especially at this time, the committee consider the great probability that such a discussion might be forced upon the United States, if they are there represented, as a circumstance furnishing in itself the strongest objections to the adoption of the measure proposed.

If the existing war between Spain and the new States of America continues, the United States could scarcely endeavor to arrest the progress of that war, in the only direction it can hereafter take, or prevail upon one of the belligerents not to strike their enemy, where alone he is now assailable and most vulnerable by them, without announcing a determination to take part in the contest; and if peace shall happily be restored all apprehension of the effects of such a blow must cease of course. Why, then, discuss the merits of such a question, which it seems probable may never arise? Or why place the United States in a situation where, if the question does arise and they must speak, the language which they utter must be regarded as equally unfriendly to all the new States, and where, if the United States keep silence, this very silence will be misinterpreted?

Should the situation or policy of the United States induce them to look with indifference upon the new direction that the existing war may take and to abstain from all interference in it, even though the neighboring islands of Cuba and Puerto Rico may be threatened or assailed, then the very announcement of such a purpose must contribute much to accelerate an event that cannot be desired by us. In whatever light, therefore, this subject is viewed, it does not seem to be one which the United States should discuss with the other American States assembled as a Congress. The inexpediency of pursuing such a course appeared more obvious to this committee when they considered that many of the nations of Europe must also feel that their interests were materially involved in its decision, and that they would not abstain from making some movement in relation to it which must greatly embarrass any course that the United States may wish hereafter to pursue.

While the United States retain the position which they have hitherto occupied, and manifest a constant determination not to mingle their interests with those of the other States of America, they may continue to employ the influence they possess and have already happily exerted with the nations of Europe in favor of these new Republics; but if ever the United States permit themselves to be associated with these nations in any general Congress assembled for the discussion of common plans in any way affecting European interests, they will, by such an act, not only deprive themselves of the ability they now possess of rendering useful assistance to the other American States, but also produce other effects prejudicial to their own interests. Then the powers of Europe, who have hitherto confided in the sagacity, vigilance, and impartiality of the United States to watch, detect, announce, and restrain any disposition that the heat of the existing contest might excite in the new States of America to extend their empires beyond their own limits, and who have, therefore, considered their possessions and commerce in America safe, while so guarded, would no longer feel this confidence. Each would, therefore, endeavor to secure its own interests by its own means; and the power of Spain not being considered by any as equal to the protection of her remaining American possessions, a struggle would probably commence who should first obtain the islands of Cuba and Puerto Rico, the possession of which must ever be of the last importance to the commerce of this hemisphere. Or, if such should not be the case, the interest of many European nations might seem to require that they should make common cause with Spain for the purpose of preventing these islands from falling into other hands. To the United States it would be of little moment which of these events should occur; for it cannot be expected that any such contest could be carried on so near them without the most imminent danger to their neutrality.

The very situation of Cuba and Puerto Rico, therefore, furnishes the strongest inducement to the United States not to take a place at the contemplated Congress, since, by so doing, they must be considered as changing the attitude in which they hitherto have stood as impartial spectators of the passing scenes, and identifying themselves with the new Republics.

These reasons, strong as they have appeared to this committee, are not the only objections to the proposed measure disclosed by the documents to them referred. The manner in which this invitation has been given of itself furnishes many forcible obstacles to its acceptance; and, in the opinion of this committee, the United States will neither consult their own dignity nor what is due to the proper respect they have a right to claim from all nations, and especially from the new States of America, if they now agree to co-operate in carrying this proposed measure into effect.

The history of the transaction, so far as it is disclosed to this committee, seems to be this: So early as the year 1821 the project of assembling a General Congress of their representatives to consider and adopt the best plan for defending the States of the New World from foreign aggression, and to conclude treaties of alliance, commerce, and friendship for the promotion of their happiness and prosperity, appears to have been conceived by one at least of the new States of America. This scheme of forming a continental system for America, to resemble that already formed in Europe, was communicated to the others of these States, who, concurring in the project, negotiations were instituted between them for the purpose of concluding conventions to provide for this object.

The plan being so far matured the United States were for the first time informally applied to, during the last spring, by the ministers of two of the new States, separately, to learn whether an invitation to be represented at this Congress, if given by both these Republics, would be accepted. To this communication, informally made, the President as informally replied, that he believed such a Congress as was proposed might be highly useful for several purposes, but that, before it assembled, it appeared to him expedient to adjust, between the powers to be represented, several preliminary points, such as the subjects to be discussed, the nature of the powers to be given to the agents who were to compose it, and the mode of its organization and action. And if these preliminary points could be arranged in a manner satisfactory to the United States the ministers to whom this communication was made were informed that the President thought the United States ought to be represented at the contemplated Congress. Each minister undertook to transmit to his Government this answer thus given.

The affair remaining in this posture as to the United States, the negotiations previously entered into between the new States were brought to a close, and conventions providing for the objects of the proposed Congress were actually concluded, some of them so far back as the 6th day of July, 1822.

After the conclusion of all these conventions, and only a few weeks since, during the month of November last, separate formal communications were made to the United States by the ministers of Mexico, Colombia, and Guatemala, respectively, disclosing some of the objects intended to be discussed at the proposed Congress in the manner already stated by the committee, and giving the invitation to the United States to be there represented. In some of these communications the United States were informed that instructions and ample powers for the attainment of the proposed objects would be given by at least one of the new Republics, and a wish was expressed that the agents of all the others might bear the same. In none, however, is any mention made either of the mode of organization or action of the Congress, nor is it anywhere stated who would be the parties, or what representatives were either invited, expected, or would be received. But, in the very communication which conveys the information already stated, the United States are told that at the date of that communication (November 3) the representatives from Colombia, Peru, Guatemala, and Mexico would have arrived at Panama, the agreed place of assembling, and would be engaged in settling the preliminary rules of the assembly, and in discussing the questions which should be supposed by them to belong exclusively to the belligerents.

It thus appears that after everything relative to the meeting of the proposed Congress had been settled by formal negotiations and treaties between themselves, the United States have been thus loosely invited by the other American States, as if in mere courtesy, to attend its deliberations. Should the United States accept such an invitation the deputies whom they may send to Panama will there be associated with they know not whom, or for what purposes, or in what mode. When these deputies shall inquire of the Congress as to any of these important particulars they will receive the information they ask in resolutions and compacts adjusted and concluded before their arrival. And if, waiving all these things, which none ought to consider as mere ceremonials, the agents of the United States shall take the places previously assigned them, and propose to take a part in the discussions, they will find all the leading principal topics for deliberation already passed upon and concluded.

The committee are well aware that the interest and character of free States should never be permitted to rest upon matters of mere fastidious etiquette and ceremonious observance; but even in the intercourse between individuals, and much more in that between sovereignties, there is a point at which form becomes substance, and when scrupulous attention to the most minute ceremonials that comity and respect exact is due to the sacred character and dignity of the Republic. At that point the committee believe the United States should ever make a stand, and resting there, should always exact, even from the most ancient and puissant sovereign of the earth, everything required by their own self respect. Nor should anything be then waived even to manifest their sensibility to whatever concerns the prosperity of the American hemisphere or the sincere friendship which they feel for these new Republics.

As the most ancient State in the New World; the first acknowledged, sincere friend of those more recently existing; as a State from whose greater experience more light is said to be expected to be shed upon the subjects to be discussed and the principles to be established at the contemplated Congress than from the other States, the United States had a right to expect that when this project of a Congress of American nations was conceived, it should have been communicated to them as early as to any others whose presence, by their representatives, was deemed desirable. That they too should have been asked whether such a measure would be acceptable. That they too should have been consulted as to the time the place, and the manner of assembling such a Congress. That they too should have been permitted to assist in the enumeration of the subjects to which its attention might properly be directed; in the adjustment of the nature and form of the powers to be given to the diplomatic agents who were to compose it; in the mode of its organization and action; and, above all others, in the settlement of the great question, who should be invited to take a part in its deliberations. The United States had also a right to expect that the result of all such consultations should be fixed and secured by solemn pacts and conventions, in which they too should be parties.

Such, the committee believe, ought to have been, and would have been the course pursued by the United States, if the project of convening a Congress of American nations had occurred to us as a measure useful and beneficial to the American continent; and being never disposed to exact from others more respect than in like circumstances they are willing themselves to pay, the United States, in the opinion of this committee, owe it to themselves, even if an opinion should be entertained that anything exists requiring the adoption of such a measure at this time, courteously to decline the invitation given under the circumstances stated, and to institute the proper proceedings necessary to its consummation, in the mode which friendship, comity, and deference to others require. Such a movement belongs to the high character which the United States enjoy in the estimation of all the world, the merit of which is accorded to them by none more willingly than by the new born States of this continent; and, if it be not now made, the time will go by when the position may ever hereafter be properly assumed.

The committee would not be understood as suggesting the expediency of any such measure at this time. In their opinion there exists no adequate motive to induce its adoption. Every spot known or habitable in America is already appropriated by different nations, whose rights of territory all recognize; and if trifling differences may exist between any upon the subject of mere common boundary these differences constitute fit matter of friendly discussion between them alone. The idea of colonization in America, therefore, no longer exists; and in the present posture of nations there is little reason to apprehend the willful encroachment of any upon the American possessions of another. Each passing hour strengthens the just claims which the new States of America have preferred to be recognized as sovereign and independent by all other nations; and the quiet efflux of time, if it has not already done so, must very soon place their sovereignty upon the same basis on which rests that of the most ancient nations of the earth. Spain possesses not the ability to give any of them cause of serious concern; and enjoying the friendship and proclaimed recognition of Great Britain and of the United States, there is no sufficient reason to apprehend the interference of any European nation in the question and war of their independence. Compacts have been already concluded, or are now negotiating, between each of the States of this continent, wherein their mutual interests, both general and particular, will be firmly fixed, upon principles of the most perfect justice and liberal equity. And no common subject now remains of sufficient magnitude to require a movement so new and important as the assembling of a Congress of all the American nations, which cannot but excite suspicion and jealousy in the other hemisphere, and might so affect injuriously the interests of the new States themselves.

Should this happy state of things ever change, the lively interest which the United States have ever taken in the welfare of these their sister sovereignties ought to be regarded by them as the surest pledge that we cannot be indifferent to anything that concerns them. An eye the most vigilant we shall ever direct to their prosperity; the appearance of the first cloud, rising to obscure its light, will be announced to them; and the United States will then manifest the deep interest which they feel in the elevation and happiness of all the nations of the New World.

When such an event shall occur the United States will probably be the first to solicit the assembling a Congress of American States, and the invitations which they shall then give to others to be there represented will be such as their friendship and respect shall dictate, and upon terms which the most fair and liberal principles of policy require. The same, this committee have no doubt, would have been the character of the invitation given to the United States upon this occasion, if the new States of America, when they conceived or matured the scheme for assembling the Congress at Panama, had entertained the most remote idea that the United States either would or ought to be there represented. All the conventions concluded between these States, however, prove, beyond doubt, that even at the date of the most recent of all their compacts, none others were expected or desired to be represented at this Congress but the States of America who had formerly been colonies of Spain, and who were then engaged in war with that power; that the great object of this Congress was, to adjust between themselves the most effectual means of conducting this war to the most speedy and happy conclusion; and that the presence of no neutral State could, therefore, be anticipated.

Before they conclude their report, the committee beg leave to remark that the intimation given by the President, in his first message to the Senate, that this measure, in which he had thought proper to take no step before ascertaining that his opinion of its expediency would concur with that of both branches of the Legislature, was, nevertheless, "deemed by him to be within the constitutional competency of the Executive," did not escape their observation. But, as the correctness of this opinion, entertained and expressed by the President, will constitute proper matter for the deliberation and decision of the Senate, when they shall enter upon the consideration of a resolution now lying on their table, and not referred to this committee, they did not believe that they were authorized by the Senate to consider this subject. The committee, therefore, forbear from saying anything in relation thereto.

The committee feel most sensibly the embarrassing situation in which they are placed. On the one hand, the duty which they owe to themselves, and to the Senate, and to the President, required that they should examine fully and freely the measure proposed, and should state the reasons that lead to the conclusion which they felt themselves bound to adopt; on the other, they were well aware that the adoption of this conclusion, and the assignment of the reasons which produced it, might contribute not a little to embarrass the President, whose acceptance of the invitation given was already announced. Placed in this delicate situation, after bestowing upon the subject the most mature consideration—believing it to be a sacred duty, which the Senate owed to the sovereign States that they here represent, to exercise the constitutional power conferred upon them, by examining, at this time, every feature of this new project, and deciding upon its expediency or in expediency as to them might seem right—the committee could not hesitate to disclose all their views in relation to this important matter, in order that these, being fully exhibited to the Senate, might be by them either adopted or corrected. The committee were induced to adopt this course with less reluctance by the assurance given by the President that, until he could be aided by the advice and consent of the Senate, he would take no step to carry the measure which he had proposed into effect. Most willingly would the committee recommend to the Senate to abstain from pronouncing any opinion upon this now delicate subject, if they could permit themselves to propose to this body a dereliction of its bounden duty, or the adoption of any course that might lead it to shrink from its high responsibility. But, convinced that the Senate had the right, and were bound to decide directly upon the expediency of this new scheme, without limiting their decision to the mere nominations incidentally connected with it, and convinced that the project itself, viewed in any light, was highly inexpedient at this time, the committee thought it better to exhibit these their views, and to advise the expression of the opinion of the Senate, in relation thereto, in the first instance. Abstaining, therefore, from any remark at present as to the nominations to them referred, the committee recommend to the Senate the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is not expedient, at this time, for the United States to send any ministers to the Congress of American nations, assembled at Panama.

The report and resolution were read.

On motion by Mr. Macon,

Ordered, That the report, with the documents accompanying the message of the 10th instant, be printed, in confidence, for the use of the members.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 24, 1826.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, in relation to the expediency of sending ministers to the Congress at Panama; and Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Wednesday, the 1st of February.

MONDAY, JANUARY 30, 1826.

On motion by Mr. Van Buren,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether the Government of Spain has been informed of the application made by our Government for the intervention of the Emperor of Russia to induce Spain to recognize the independence of the South American States, and to lay before the Senate the correspondence, if any has taken place, between our minister at Madrid and the Spanish Government, and also between such ministers and our own Government on the subject of such intervention and recognition.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1826.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. John Adams, jr.:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 30th ultimo, I communicate herewith, in confidence, a report from the Secretary of State, with the documents containing the information desired by the resolution.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, February 1, 1826.

The Secretary of State, to whom the President has referred the resolution of the Senate of the 30th January, 1826, requesting him to inform the Senate whether the Government of Spain has been informed of the application made by our Government for the intervention of the Emperor of Russia to induce Spain to recognize the independence of the South American States, and to lay before the Senate the correspondence, if any has taken place, between our minister at Madrid and the Spanish Government, and also between such minister and our Government, on the subject of such intervention and recognition, has the honor to report—

An extract of a letter from this Department to Mr. Everett, dated Department of State, April 27, 1825.

An extract from the notes of a conversation between Mr. Everett and Mr. Zea, communicated with a despatch from Mr. Everett to this Department, dated September 25, 1825.

An extract of a despatch from Mr. Everett to this Department of the 20th October, 1825.

All which is respectfully submitted.

H. CLAY.

“DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 27, 1825.

“Besides the preceding objects to which your attention will be directed, others of great interest will also claim it. Of these, that of the highest importance is the present war between Spain and her former colonies on this continent. The President wishes you to bring this subject, in the most conciliating manner possible, before the Spanish Government. It would be as unnecessary as unprofitable to look to the past, except for the purpose of guiding future conduct. True wisdom dictates that Spain, without indulging in unavailing regrets on account of what she has irretrievably lost, should employ the means of retaining what she may yet preserve from the wreck of her former possessions. The war upon the continent is, in fact, at an end. Not a solitary foot of land from the western limit of the United States to Cape Horn owns her sway; not a bayonet in all that vast extent remains to sustain her cause; and the Peninsula is utterly incompetent to replace those armies which have been vanquished and annihilated by the victorious forces of the new Republics. What possible object, then, can remain to Spain to protract a war which she can no longer maintain, and to the conclusion of which, in form, there is only wanting the recognition of the new Governments by treaties of peace? If there were left the most distant prospect of her reconquering her continental provinces, which have achieved their independence, there might be a motive for her perseverance. But every expectation of such reconquest, it is manifest, must be perfectly chimerical. If she can entertain no rational hope to recover what has been forced from her grasp, is there not great danger of her losing what she yet but feebly holds? It should be borne in mind that the armies of the new States, flushed with victory, have no longer employment on the continent; and yet, whilst the war continues, if it be only in name, they cannot be disbanded, without a disregard of all the maxims of just precaution. To what object, then, will the new Republics direct their powerful and victorious armies? They have a common interest and a common enemy; and let it be supposed that that enemy, weak and exhausted as he is, refuses to make peace, will they not strike wherever they can reach? and, from the proximity and great value of Cuba and Porto Rico, is it not to be anticipated that they will aim, and aim a successful blow too, at those Spanish islands? Whilst they would operate from without, means would doubtless be, at the same time, employed to stimulate the population within to a revolt; and that the disposition exists among the inhabitants, to a considerable extent, to throw off the Spanish authority is well known. It is due to the United States to declare that they have constantly declined to give any countenance to that disposition.

“It is not, then, for the new Republics that the President wishes you to urge upon Spain the expediency of concluding the war. Their interest is, probably, on the side of its continuance, if any nation can ever have an interest in a state of war. But it is for Spain herself, for the cause of humanity, for the general repose of the world, that you are required, with all the delicacy which belongs to the subject, to use every topic of persuasion to impress upon the councils of Spain the propriety, by a formal pacification, of terminating the war. And as the views and policy of the United States in regard to those islands may possibly have some influence, you are authorized frankly and fully to disclose them. The United States are satisfied with the present condition of those islands, in the hands of Spain, and with their ports open to our commerce, as they are now open. This Government desires no political change of that condition. The population itself of the islands is incompetent at present, from its composition and its amount, to maintain self-government. The maritime force of the neighboring Republics of Mexico and Colombia is not now, nor is it likely shortly to be, adequate to the protection of those islands, if the conquest of them were effected. The United States would entertain constant apprehension of their passing from their possession to that of some less friendly sovereignty; and of all the European powers, this country prefers that Cuba and Porto Rico should remain dependent on Spain. If the war should continue between Spain and the new Republics, and those islands should become the object and the theatre of it, their fortunes have such a connexion with the prosperity of the United States that they could not be indifferent spectators; and the possible contingencies of such a protracted war might bring upon the Government of the United States duties and obligations, the performance of which, however painful it should be, they might not be at liberty to decline. A subsidiary consideration in favor of peace, deserving some weight, is, that as the war has been the parent cause of the shocking piracies in the West Indies, its termination would be, probably, followed by their cessation: and thus the Government of Spain, by one act, would fulfil the double obligation under which it lies to foreign Governments, of repressing enormities, the perpetrators of which find refuge, if not succor, in Spanish territory; and that to the Spanish nation itself of promoting its real interests."

"MADRID, September 25, 1825.

"In the course of this conversation upon matters touching so nearly the independence of the colonies, there were, of course, frequent opportunities of alluding to that question, and the minister seemed to feel no delicacy or reserve in expressing his sentiments upon it. He remarked, repeatedly, that the King would never abandon his claim to these his ancient and rightful possessions; that the cause was a good one; and that however unfavorable their prospect might appear at present, they had a right to suppose that they should, in the end, succeed; that we had seen of late revolutions in political affairs at least as violent as this would be—for example, the overthrow of Bonaparte and the restoration of Louis the XVIII to the throne of his ancestors; that the party in the colonies in favor of independence, though dominant, and apparently unresisted, was not in reality so strong as was generally supposed; that it consisted of a busy and active, but in reality feeble minority; that the mass of the good citizens, constituting a great majority of the population, were in favor of the King, and were only waiting for some suitable occasion to come out in their strength and to put down the insurgents; and, finally, that the cause being a just one, they had a right to suppose that they should be assisted, sooner or later, by an interference of Providence.

"I did not think it necessary to enter very fully into the argument with Mr. Zea. I said to him, however, that I regretted to hear from him so decisive a declaration of the King's resolution not to acknowledge the new States; that my Government had hoped that the battle of Ayacucho, and the recognition of England, would have been considered by his Majesty as settling the question, and that he would have been induced to put an end to the violent state of things now existing, which was more or less injurious to all Christian nations; that enlightened men of all classes, parties, and opinions, in most of the civilized countries of Europe, and in the United States, were now satisfied that Spain could never recover her authority over the colonies. As a single instance, I mentioned to him the opinion of the Bishop of Hermopolis, minister of church affairs in France, and well known throughout Europe as one of the ablest and most decided adherents of the anti-liberal sect, whom I had seen at Paris on my way, and who had told me expressly that they regarded the affair of South America as settled.

"To this he made answer that the Bishop had also, in the time of Bonaparte, despaired of the possibility of the King's restoration, and that he might be as much in the wrong now as he was then. I remarked that there were evident symptoms in the proceedings of the French Government of an intention to recognize the new States at no very distant period. He said that France had hitherto stood by them faithfully in all their troubles; that he could not say how long she would be true to them, but should she even desert them, the King would still adhere firmly to his principles; that the standing and invariable rule of conduct observed by his Majesty upon all occasions was that of strict justice; that he made no concessions to expediency, acknowledged no distinction between politics and morals, and was prepared to sacrifice everything rather than surrender what he knew to be his right. He then recurred to his favorite example of Louis the XVIII; said that they were by no means reduced to so low a point as he had been; that he, too, often had been solicited to abandon his claims to the French throne; but that, by firmly rejecting all such propositions, and tenaciously adhering to his purpose, he had finally succeeded in recovering everything.

"It struck me that the example of Bonaparte, who had lost all by obstinately refusing to make a timely surrender of a part, would have been rather more to the point; but I did not think it worth while to press this subject at present. I told him that I was not called upon to advise his Majesty's ministers upon this or any other question, and that what I had said had been thrown out incidentally in reply to his remarks."

No. 10.

"MADRID, October 20, 1825.

"It was reported here very confidently, a few days ago, that the new Consulative Junta or Council of Government was occupied in preparing the way for an arrangement with the South American States. Upon tracing this rumor to its origin, I found that it arose from the fact that the council had deputed some of its members to confer with two Spanish officers who lately arrived from South America, by way of the Havana and New York, and are the same that were sent out by the Constitutional Government to Buenos Ayres as Commissioners. They landed at Bordeaux from New York, and came on immediately to this place; remained here about three weeks, during which time they had occasional conferences with members of the council, and afterwards proceeded to Cadiz. These facts being known, and it being also understood that the council had been requested by the minister to give their opinion upon the measures proper to be taken in regard to the colonies, it was natural enough to draw the conclusion that the conferences in question had some connexion with this subject, and that the persons with whom they were held might perhaps have gone to Cadiz, on their way to America, as private agents of the Government. Another and a more probable construction of the fact would be, that the council had no other object in conferring with these gentlemen than to obtain information respecting the state of the colonies.

"About the time when this report was in circulation I went to the Escorial, in order to be present at the celebration of the King's birth-day, and when there had, of course, frequent opportunities of seeing the minister. In one of the conversations which I had with him I inquired of him what foundation there was for this rumor, and whether there was any change of policy contemplated in regard to the American States? To this question he replied most decidedly in the negative, and entered anew and very readily, at great length, into an exposition of the intentions of the Government, repeating in substance the same remarks which he had made to me at San Ildefonso. He declared that the King would never abandon his rights; that it was a matter of conscience with him to transmit his hereditary possessions to his successors; that the Royalist cause was not so desperate as we supposed; that there were even now symptoms of a return of these provinces to their ancient loyalty; and that such an event would not be at all strange, considering what violent and sudden revolutions have been constantly occurring during the last thirty years. From all that he said upon the subject I was quite satisfied that the reports of an intended arrangement were entirely groundless, and that the detention and examination of the above mentioned officers were merely for the purpose of obtaining information as to facts.

"The tone and manner of the minister during this conversation were such as to induce me to doubt the correctness of the opinion which I had entertained and expressed to you as to his private sentiments upon this subject. He spoke with so much decision and apparent openness of the probability of reconquering the colonies that I found myself bound to give him credit for his sincerity at the expense of his sagacity and good sense. He inquired of me at this time whether I had any knowledge of the communications that had lately been made by my Government upon that subject to the Emperor of Russia. I replied in the affirmative; and he then said that he had received the day before, for the first time, upon his return to the Escorial from Madrid, an intimation (probably from one of the ministers abroad) that some overtures had been made in that quarter, and requested me to give him such information respecting them as I might think it proper to communicate. I was not quite so fully prepared upon this subject myself as I could have wished, not having obtained any answer from Mr. King to the request which I made him for a copy of the instructions to Mr. Middleton, probably because he has had no good private occasion to send it. I, however, told him that my Government made no secret of their policy in regard to this business, and that I had no objection to inform him that our minister at St. Petersburg had been directed to express to the Emperor their full conviction that the contest between Spain and the colonies must be considered as finally settled in favor of the latter party; their persuasion that the interest of Spain and the general good of the civilized world would be promoted by the early acquiescence of his Catholic Majesty in this result, and their wish that the Emperor, should he also entertain these opinions, would unite with them in advising and requesting the Spanish Government to put an end to the war by an acknowledgment of the independence of the colonies. I took this opportunity of informing the minister, more precisely than I had done before, that what I had already suggested to him in favor of this measure must be considered as expressing the wishes and policy of my Government, and not my own individual sentiments, which I should not, of course, think of intruding upon his Majesty's cabinet. I told him that I was formally instructed to avail myself of any suitable occasion to suggest to him, with the delicacy required by the nature of the subject, the earnest desire of the Government of the United States to see this long struggle brought to an amicable conclusion, and their complete conviction that all further efforts on the part of Spain to recover the colonies must be wholly fruitless, and more injurious to herself than to them.

"Mr. Zea seemed to be a good deal struck with these remarks, and I was inclined to suppose, from his manner, that he had considered what I had said to him before upon the subject as a merely personal communication. He replied, that these proceedings of the Government of the United States placed him under the necessity of declaring, in the most positive manner, the King's unalterable resolution never to abandon his rights, and to reject all offers of mediation, or of amicable intervention, which should contemplate an acknowledgment of the independence of the new States. He said that they were, and always had been, ready and willing to accept any proposal for mediation, or to treat directly with the colonies, upon the basis of their previous submission to the King's sovereign power, but that they would never consent to negotiate in any way upon any other terms; that the King, being once satisfied on this head, would doubtless be disposed to grant his subjects in America every favor and indulgence which they could possibly wish, but that they must begin by proving their loyalty, and their confidence in his Majesty's justice and good intentions. He wondered that, among the offers of mediation that had been made from time to time, especially by England, none had ever been proposed upon this basis. I told him that the reason probably was, that the British Government, as well as that of the United States, considered the independence of the new States as now firmly established, and were well aware that they would never treat upon any other terms than an acknowledgment of it by Spain. I added, however, that I should be well pleased to know, if he were disposed to inform me, what concessions the King would be willing to grant to the Americans in the event of their return to their allegiance: as, for example, whether he would allow them to make their own laws in legislative assemblies of their own choice? My object in asking this question was, of course, merely to obtain a more complete view of the intentions and dispositions of the Government upon the whole subject. He replied that, as to legislative assemblies, he was far from being satisfied that they would suit the condition of the colonies, and that, in general, he thought the only safe course for the Americans would be to trust entirely and implicitly to the King's known good character. I should have thought from this answer that my question did not make a very favorable impression upon him. At the close, however, of the conversation, he recurred to it in such a way as induced me to think that he would have been glad to consider it as an indirect overture from some of the colonies. He said, after I arose to go, that the conversation had turned upon a number of delicate and interesting topics; that on such occasions it was not always possible to distinguish between remarks that were merely of a private and personal description and such as were official; and that in order to avoid mistakes upon that point, he should be glad if I would state, in writing, what my instructions required me to communicate to him as the opinions and intentions of the Government, and especially any propositions that I might be authorized to make, in the nature of an overture from the colonies, founded on the basis of submission. I told him that I had no authority from any quarter to make propositions of that description, but that I would, with pleasure, if he wished it, give him an official statement of what I had said to him, by order of my Government, in favor of the acknowledgment of the independence of the new States. He replied that he was ready to receive any note that I might send him, but that on that head the King's mind was completely made up beyond the possibility of change. Notwithstanding this, I have thoughts of preparing and transmitting to the minister a pretty detailed communication upon this subject. Such a paper, if it does not produce much immediate effect upon the Spanish cabinet, may, perhaps, in one way or another, have a favorable bearing on the general question.

"Previously to this interview with Mr. Zea I had availed myself of such occasions as offered to converse upon the same subject with the British and Russian ministers. The former is Mr. Frederick Lamb, brother of Lord Melbourne, a gentleman of about forty-five years of age, regularly trained to the diplomatic line, and apparently well fitted for it by his talents and information. The latter is Mr. D'Oubril, who has also passed his life in the employment of a foreign minister, and has now reached the age of about sixty. He seems to enjoy the confidence of his Government, and last year took the place of Count Nesselrode, as Minister of Foreign Affairs, during an absence of the latter from St. Petersburg, which lasted several months. Both these gentlemen have shown, since my arrival here, every disposition to be on friendly terms with me, and have plainly manifested, by their attentions, the high esteem in which they hold the American nation and character. Mr. D'Oubril, in particular, has been more civil than any other of the diplomatic body with whom I was not previously acquainted.

"Mr. Lamb's sentiments in regard to the South American question are, of course, precisely the same with ours. I was desirous to ascertain whether the British Government had lately made any attempts to urge Spain to a recognition of the new States, and questioned Mr. Lamb upon this point. He said he had had one or two conversations with Mr. Zea soon after his arrival, (he has been here about five months,) and stated the substance of what had passed between them. The minister, it seems, gave to him the same answer which he has since given to me, and cited, to illustrate his argument, the same examples of Louis XVIII and Bonaparte. No offer of formal mediation has been made by England since her recognition. Indeed, her interest as a commercial and manufacturing country is now on the other side. The longer the war continues, the longer she enjoys a monopoly of the Spanish American market for her fabrics, and the more difficult will Spain find it to recover her natural advantages upon the return of peace. England will, therefore, probably be very easy in regard to this matter, and will leave Spain to pursue, unmolested, the course she may think expedient. I suggested this point both to Mr. Zea and to the Russian minister, and was inclined to think, from what they said of it, that it had more weight with them than any other consideration in favor of recognition. They both admitted the justice of my remarks, and the great inconvenience that resulted in this way from the present state of things, and could only avoid the proper conclusion, by reverting to their common places, of the probability of a return of the colonies to their allegiance, which they really seem to imagine will come about sooner or later, without any effort on the part of either Spain or her allies, and by the aid of some unlooked-for intervention of Divine Providence. I learned nothing material from Mr. L., excepting the fact that the British Government is now quiet in regard to this matter, and makes no attempts to influence the decision of Spain. He professed to have but little information as to the state of the Spanish settlements in America, and having passed the greater part of his life, including the last eight or ten years, on the continent, has been, in fact, rather out of the way of obtaining it.

"Mr. D'Oubril was somewhat guarded in his language, and did not seem quite willing to admit that it was the decided intention of the Emperor to encourage Spain in her present system. He said that, individually, he did not by any means take the same view of the subject which the Spanish Government did, and yet that he was not completely satisfied that an immediate recognition was the true policy. He cited, in his turn, the old instance of Louis XVIII and Bonaparte, and was far from being sure that the internal divisions which did or would distract the colonies might not bring them again under the Spanish Government. He was aware, nevertheless, that Spain was daily and yearly suffering great injury from the effects of the present system, and that, by continuing it, she would probably lose her remaining possessions in America, and her chance of ever obtaining a due share in the trade with that continent, besides endangering her national existence at home. This was making out a pretty strong case in favor of recognition, but he still returned to his former text, that he considered the question as extremely doubtful. In all that he said upon it he professed to declare merely his own personal opinions and feelings, and, if I recollect right, did not say directly what language he was ordered to hold in his communications with this Government. It is understood, however, that the influence of the Emperor has been employed in support of the present system; and the general impression which I received from his remarks coincided with this opinion. Mr. D'Oubril's private sentiments may possibly be different. Both he and Mr. L. inquired of me respecting the late overtures made by the President's order at St. Petersburg, and appeared to have some, though not a very minute acquaintance with the language of your instructions to Mr. Middleton. The representatives of France, Holland, Sweden, Saxony, and Prussia, with whom I have had more or less conversation upon this subject, have all expressed themselves strongly in opposition to the policy of Spain. Even the Pope's Nuncio and the ambassador from Naples seem to be of the American party. The French, I suspect, are making pretty strong efforts in favor of the new States, but on this point I have, at present, no very precise information."

The message and accompanying documents were read.

Ordered, That they be printed, in confidence, for the use of the members.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1826.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, relative to the expediency of sending ministers to the Congress at Panama.

On motion by Mr. White,
That the resolution lie on the table,

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 22.

On motion by Mr. Harrison,

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Ellis, Findlay, Hayne, Holmes, Johnson, of Kentucky, Kane, King, Macon, Randolph, Rowan, Smith, Tazewell, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury—23.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bell, Boulogny, Chase, Clayton, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnston, Louis, Knight, Lloyd, McIlvaine, Marks, Mills, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Thomas, Van Dyke, Willey—22.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1826.

On motion by Mr. Mills,

That the Senate resume the consideration of the resolution, reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, relative to the expediency of sending ministers to the Congress at Panama.

A debate ensued; and

On motion by Mr. Lloyd,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1826.

Mr. Mills had leave to withdraw the motion submitted on the 9th instant, that the Senate resume the consideration of the resolution relative to the expediency of sending ministers to the Congress at Panama.

Mr. Van Buren submitted the following resolutions :

Resolved, That, upon the question whether the United States shall be represented in the Congress of Panama, the Senate ought to act with open doors, unless it shall appear that the publication of documents necessary to be referred to in debate will be prejudicial to existing negotiations.

Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to inform the Senate whether such objection exists to the publication of the documents communicated by the Executive, or any portion of them; and, if so, to specify the parts the publication of which would, for that reason, be objectionable.

On the question to agree thereto.

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 20.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Ellis, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson, of Kentucky, Kane, King, Macon, Randolph, Rowan, Ruggles, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bell, Boulogny, Chase, Clayton, Edwards, Findlay, Johnston, of Louisiana, Knight, Lloyd, McIlvaine, Marks, Mills, Noble, Robbins, Sanford, Seymour, Thomas, Van Dyke, Willey.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay the said resolutions before the President of the United States.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1826.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. John Adams, jr.:

To the Senate of the United States:

In answer to the two resolutions of the Senate of the 15th instant, marked Executive, and which I have received, I state, respectfully, that all the communications from me to the Senate relating to the Congress at Panama have been made, like all other communications upon Executive business, in confidence, and most of them in compliance with a resolution of the Senate requesting them confidentially. Believing that the established usage of free confidential communications between the Executive and the Senate ought, for the public interest, to be preserved unimpaired, I deem it my indispensable duty to leave to the Senate itself the decision of a question involving a departure hitherto, so far as I am informed, without example, from that usage, and upon the motives for which, not being informed of them, I do not feel myself competent to decide.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, February 16, 1826.

The message was read.

On motion, by Mr. Van Buren,

Ordered, That the said message, with the resolutions therein referred to, be printed, in confidence, for the use of the Senate.

Mr. Berrien submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the communication of the President of the United States, in answer to the resolutions of the Senate of the 15th instant, and the said resolutions, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report what is the usage of the Senate in relation to the publication of Executive communications, and the documents accompanying such communications. And that they be further instructed to report whether the publication of the documents necessary to be referred to in debate on the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the message of the President of the United States nominating ministers to the Congress at Panama will be prejudicial to existing negotiations, and to specify the parts, if any, the publication of which will be so prejudicial.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion.

On motion, by Mr. Noble,

It was agreed that when the question be taken, it be by yeas and nays.

On motion by Mr. Sanford,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1826.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted on the 17th instant by Mr. Berrien, and

On his motion,

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

Mr. Rowan submitted the following motion :

Resolved, That it is the unquestionable right of the Senate to call, in respectful terms, upon the President of the United States for such information as may be in his possession, and which the Senate deem necessary to the faithful discharge of the duties imposed upon it by the Constitution; and, more especially, the duties resulting from matters which the Constitution makes it the duty of the President to submit to the Senate for their advice and consent.

Resolved, That the two following resolutions of the 15th instant, viz: "Resolved, That, upon the question whether the United States shall be represented in the Congress at Panama, the Senate ought to act with open doors, unless it shall appear that the publication of documents necessary to be referred to in debate will be prejudicial to existing negotiations;" "Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to inform the Senate whether such objection exists to the publication of the documents communicated by the Executive, or any portion of them; and, if so, to specify the parts the publication of which would, for that reason, be objectionable"—requested information in the possession of the Executive, and in his possession only, which the Senate deemed important to guide its decision on a subject within the scope of its advising powers, and deeply interesting to the States and to the people of this Union.

Resolved, That the Senate regret that they do not perceive in the President's message of the seventeenth either a compliance with the call made by its resolutions of the fifteenth instant or the assignment of any reason for withholding the same: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senate cannot, consistently with a proper regard for its constitutional rights, nor without a manifest dereliction of the duties which it owes to the States and the people of the United States, proceed further to consider the subject, in any aspect of it, to which the call upon the President for information relates, until he shall have afforded the information, or assigned some satisfactory reason for withholding it.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion.

Mr. Holmes proposed the following amendment:

Strike out the two last resolutions, and insert the following:

Resolved, That, as the Senate have not been able to learn from the President whether the publication of the documents in relation to the proposed mission to the Congress at Panama would affect any pending negotiations, it is expedient to proceed to the discussion of the subject of that mission with closed doors.

On motion by Mr. Smith,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1826.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted yesterday by Mr. Rowan, together with the amendment proposed by Mr. Holmes.

Mr. Holmes had leave to withdraw his amendment.

On motion by Mr. Hayne,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1826.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. Rowan on the 20th instant; and the same having been modified, at the instance of Mr. Woodbury, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the unquestionable right of the Senate to call, in respectful terms, upon the President of the United States for such information as may be in his possession, and which the Senate deem necessary to the faithful discharge of the duties imposed upon it by the Constitution, and, more especially, the duties resulting from matters which the Constitution makes it the duty of the President to submit to the Senate for its advice and consent.

Resolved, That the two following resolutions, of the 15th instant, viz: "Resolved, That, upon the question whether the United States shall be represented in the Congress of Panama, the Senate ought to act with open doors, unless it shall appear that the publication of documents necessary to be referred to in debate will be prejudicial to existing negotiations;" "Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to inform the Senate whether such objection exists to the publication of the documents communicated by the Executive, or any portion of them; and, if so, to specify the parts the publication of which would, for that reason, be objectionable"—requested information in the possession of the Executive, and in his possession only, which the Senate deemed important to guide its decision on a subject within the scope of its advising powers, and deeply interesting to the States and to the people of this Union.

Resolved, That the message of the President, in the following words, viz: "In answer to the two resolutions of the Senate of the 15th instant, marked (Executive,) and which I have received, I state, respectfully, that all other communications from me to the Senate relating to the Congress at Panama have been made, like all other communications upon Executive business, in confidence, and most of them in compliance with a resolution of the Senate requesting them confidentially. Believing that the established usage of free confidential communications between the Executive and the Senate ought, for the public interest, to be preserved unimpaired, I deem it my indispensable duty to leave to the Senate itself the decision of a question involving a departure hitherto, so far as I am informed, without example, from that usage, and upon the motives for which, not being informed of them, I do not feel myself competent to decide," does not give to the Senate the information requested, "whether the publication of the documents," or "any portion of them," communicated by the Executive, as to the mission to Panama, "would be prejudicial to existing negotiations."

Resolved, That the Senate has the sole right, in all cases, to determine what shall be the "rules of its proceedings;" and that the President cannot interfere with the same without violating the constitutional privileges of the Senate.

Resolved, That the Senate has the sole right to determine what are its existing "rules of proceedings," whether founded on "usage" or positive written regulations; and that the President cannot officially decide what those rules are, or whether any proposed mode of acting is a "departure" from them "without example," or whether it be essential to the "public interest" that some supposed "usage" of the Senate should be "preserved unimpaired."

Resolved, That it is not competent for the President, on a call from the Senate, to decline giving information whether "the publication of documents necessary to be referred to in debate will be prejudicial to existing negotiations," on the ground that he disapproves of the mode of proceeding which the Senate proposes to follow on the subject to which those documents relate.

On motion by Mr. Barton, to postpone the same indefinitely, a division of the question was called for.

On the question to postpone indefinitely the first resolution,

It was decided in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 20.

On motion by Mr. Cobb,

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bell, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, of Louisiana, Knight, Lloyd, Marks, Mills, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Dyke, Willey—24.

On the question to postpone indefinitely the sixth resolution,

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 20.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bell, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, of Louisiana, Knight, Lloyd, Marks, Mills, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Dyke, Willey—24.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Ellis, Findlay, Hayne, Johnson, of Kentucky, Kane, King, Macon, Randolph, Rowan, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury—20.

Mr. Holmes submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the Senate having, on the 15th day of February, passed the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That, upon the question whether the United States shall be represented in the Congress of Panama, the Senate ought to act with open doors, unless it shall appear that the publication of documents necessary to be referred to in debate will be prejudicial to existing negotiations.

"Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to inform the Senate whether such objection exists to the publication of the documents communicated by the Executive, or any portion of them; and, if so, to specify the parts the publication of which would, for that reason, be objectionable."

To which the President returned the following message in answer, viz:

"To the Senate of the United States:

"In answer to the two resolutions of the Senate of the 15th instant, marked 'Executive,' and which I have received, I state respectfully that all communications from me to the Senate relating to the Congress at Panama have been made, like all other communications upon Executive business, in confidence, and most of them in compliance with a resolution of the Senate requesting them confidentially. Believing that the established usage of free confidential communications between the Executive and the Senate ought, for the public interest, to be preserved unimpaired, I deem it my indispensable duty to leave to the Senate itself the decision of a question involving a departure hitherto, so far as I am informed, without example, from that usage, and upon the motives for which, not being informed of them, I do not feel myself competent to decide.

"JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

"WASHINGTON, February 15, 1826."

Resolved, That as the Senate have not been informed by the President whether the publication of the documents in relation to the proposed mission to the Congress at Panama would affect any pending negotiations, it is expedient to proceed to the discussion of the subject of that mission with closed doors.

On motion by Mr. King,
The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1826.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted yesterday by Mr. Holmes, in relation to the proposed mission to the Congress at Panama.

On motion by Mr. Dickerson, to amend the same by striking out all after the word "Resolved," where it first occurs, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Resolved, That although the Senate cannot find in the answer of the President of the United States to their resolutions of the 15th instant, relative to the proposed mission to Panama, any distinct information that the publication of the communications alluded to in said resolutions would or would not be prejudicial to existing negotiations, they find a strong objection on the part of the President to the publication of those communications, inasmuch as they were made "in confidence, and most of them in compliance with a resolution of the Senate requesting them confidentially." And although the Senate have the right to publish communications so made, and to discuss the same with open doors, without the assent of the President, when in their opinion the public interest may require such publication and such discussion, they do not think that present circumstances require the exercise of this right, so far as respects a discussion of those confidential communications with open doors. Therefore,

Resolved, That the discussion upon the proposed mission to Panama and the confidential communications upon the same be held with closed doors.

A motion was made by Mr. Lloyd to postpone indefinitely the original motion; and

It was determined in the negative—yeas 15, nays 29.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Bouigny, Branch, Chambers, Chase, Edwards, Johnston, of Louisiana, King, Knight, Lloyd, Mills, Sanford, Smith, Van Dyke, White, Willey—15.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Chandler, Clayton, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Ellis, Findlay, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson, of Kentucky, Kane, Macon, Marks, Noble, Randolph, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Seymour, Thomas, Van Buren, Williams, Woodbury—29.

On motion by Mr. White, to amend the proposed amendment by striking out the following words:

"Resolved, That the discussion upon the proposed mission to Panama and the confidential communications upon the same be held with closed doors," and inserting, "Resolved, That the Senate cannot, consistently with the duty which it owes to the United States and to itself, proceed to consider the expediency of appointing ministers to attend the Congress at Panama until it can receive the information necessary to enable it to determine whether the consideration of that question ought to be with open or with closed doors."

On the question, "Will the Senate agree to this amendment to the proposed amendment," a division of the question was called for; and it was taken on striking out, and determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 17.

On motion by Mr. Cobb, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Bell, Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chase, Cobb, Eaton, Edwards, Ellis, Findlay, Harrison, Hayne, Holmes, Johnson, of Kentucky, King, Macon, Mills, Randolph, Rowan, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Thomas, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury—27.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bouigny, Chambers, Chandler, Clayton, Dickerson, Hendricks, Johnston, of Louisiana, Kane, Knight, Lloyd, Marks, Noble, Robbins, Smith, Van Dyke, Willey—17.

On the question to insert the amendment last proposed, it was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 31.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Berrien, Cobb, Eaton, Ellis, Hayne, King, Macon, Randolph, Rowan, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury—13.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bell, Benton, Bouigny, Branch, Chambers, Chandler, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson, Edwards, Findlay, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, Kane, Knight, Lloyd, Marks, Mills, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Dyke, Willey—31.

The question recurring on the adoption of the amendment first proposed to the original motion, amended by striking out the last clause:

On the question, "Will the Senate agree to this amendment?" a division of the question was called for; and,

On the question to strike out all the original motion after the word "Resolved," where it first occurs, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 31, nays 13.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Barton, Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chambers, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Ellis, Findlay, Hayne, Hendricks, Johnson, of Kentucky, Kane, King, Macon, Marks, Mills, Randolph, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Sanford, Van Buren, Van Dyke, White, Willey, Williams, Woodbury—31.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Bell, Boulogny, Chase, Clayton, Harrison, Holmes, Johnston, of Louisiana, Knight, Lloyd, Noble, Seymour, Smith, Thomas—13.

On the question to insert the proposed amendment, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 16.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Barton, Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Chandler, Clayton, Cobb, Dickerson, Findlay, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson, of Kentucky, Kane, King, Marks, Randolph, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Van Buren, Willey, Williams, Woodbury—27.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Branch, Chambers, Chase, Eaton, Edwards, Ellis, Johnston, of Louisiana, Knight, Lloyd, Macon, Mills, Noble, Sanford, Thomas, Van Dyke, White—16.

So it was

Resolved, That although the Senate cannot find in the answer of the President of the United States to their resolutions of the 15th instant, relative to the proposed mission to Panama, any distinct information that the publication of the communications alluded to in said resolutions would or would not be prejudicial to existing negotiations, they find a strong objection on the part of the President to the publication of those communications, inasmuch as they were made "in confidence, and most of them in compliance with a resolution of the Senate requesting them confidentially." And although the Senate have the right to publish communications so made, and to discuss the same with open doors, without the assent of the President, when, in their opinion, the public interest may require such publication and such discussion, they do not think that present circumstances require the exercise of this right so far as respects a discussion of those confidential communications with open doors.

On motion by Mr. Randolph,

Ordered, That the motion submitted by Mr. Rowan, as modified on the 21st instant, relating to the mission at Panama, and the resolution of this day, be printed, in confidence, for the use of the members.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1826.

On motion by Mr. Lloyd, that the Senate proceed to consider the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, in relation to the expediency of sending ministers to the Congress of Panama, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 32, nays 12.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bell, Benton, Boulogny, Branch, Chambers, Chandler, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson, Edwards, Findlay, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, Kane, Knight, Lloyd, Marks, Mills, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Dyke, Willey—32.

On motion by Mr. Benton, the said amendment was modified as follows: Strike out all after "Resolved," and insert, "That it is not expedient for the United States to send any ministers to the Congress of American nations assembled at Panama before it shall have received satisfactory information upon the following points: First. The subjects to which the attention of the Congress will be directed. Second. The substance and form of the powers to be given to the respective representatives. Third. The mode of organizing the Congress. Fourth. The mode of action in deciding the questions which may be submitted to it."

On motion by Mr. Hayne, that the further consideration of the resolution with the proposed amendment be postponed to Friday next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 20, nays 25.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Hayne, Johnson, of Kentucky, Kane, King, Macon, Randolph, Reed, Rowan, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury—20.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bell, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, of Louisiana, Knight, Lloyd, McIlvaine, Marks, Mills, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Dyke, Willey—25.

On motion by Mr. Reed, that he be excused from voting on the proposed amendment, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 32, nays 12.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Branch, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson, Edwards, Findlay, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, of Louisiana, Knight, Lloyd, McIlvaine, Macon, Marks, Mills, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Dyke, Willey, Williams—32.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Chandler, Cobb, Eaton, Hayne, Johnson, of Kentucky, Kane, King, Randolph, Rowan, Van Buren, White, Woodbury—12.

On the question to agree to the proposed amendment to the resolution, it was determined in the negative—yeas 19, nays 24.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Hayne, Holmes, Kane, King, Macon, Randolph, Rowan, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury—19.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bell, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, Knight, Lloyd, Marks, Mills, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Dyke, Willey—24.

A motion was made by Mr. Van Buren to amend the resolution, by adding thereto the following :

Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States, in authorizing the President of the United States to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint "ambassadors and other public ministers," authorizes the nomination and appointment to offices of a diplomatic character only, existing by virtue of international laws, and does not authorize the nomination and appointment (under the name of ministers) of representatives to an Assembly of Nations like the proposed Congress of Panama, who, from the nature of their appointment, must be mere deputies, unknown to the law of nations and without diplomatic character or privilege.

Resolved, That the power of forming or entering (in any manner whatever) into new political associations or confederacies belongs to the people of the United States in their sovereign character, being one of the powers which, not having been delegated to the Government, is reserved to the States or people; and that it is not within the constitutional power of the Federal Government to appoint deputies or representatives of any description to represent the United States in the Congress of Panama, or to participate in the deliberation, or discussion, or recommendation of acts of that Congress.

Resolved, As the opinion of the Senate, that (waiving the question of constitutional power) the appointment of deputies to the Congress of Panama by the United States, according to the invitation given and its conditional acceptance, would be a departure from that wise and settled policy by which the intercourse of the United States with foreign nations has hitherto been regulated, and may endanger the friendly relations which now happily exist between us and the Spanish American States, by creating expectations that engagements will be entered into by us at that Congress which the Senate could not ratify, and of which the people of the United States would not approve.

Resolved, That the advantages of the proposed mission to the Congress of Panama (if attainable) would, in the opinion of the Senate, be better obtained without such hazard, by the attendance of one of our present ministers near either of the Spanish Governments, authorized to express the deep interest we feel in their prosperity, and instructed fully to explain (when requested) the great principles of our policy, but without being a member of that Congress, and without power to commit the United States to any stipulated mode of enforcing those principles in any supposed or possible state of the world.

And, on the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative—yeas 19, nays 24.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Hayne, Holmes, Kane, King, Macon, Randolph, Rowan, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury—19.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bell, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, Knight, Lloyd, Marks, Mills, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Dyke, Willey—24.

On the question to agree to the resolution reported by the committee, in the following words:

Resolved, That it is not expedient at this time for the United States to send any ministers to the Congress of American Nations assembled at Panama,

It was determined in the negative—yeas 19, nays 24.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Hayne, Holmes, Kane, King, Macon, Randolph, Rowan, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury—19.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bell, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, Knight, Lloyd, Marks, Mills, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Dyke, Willey—24.

On motion by Mr. Chase, that the Committee on Foreign Relations be discharged from the further consideration of the message of the President of the United States of the 26th December, nominating Richard C. Anderson, John Sergeant, and William B. Rochester to the appointments therein mentioned, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 38, nays 6.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Branch, Chambers, Chandler, Chase, Clayton, Cobb, Dickerson, Edwards, Findlay, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, Kane, King, Knight, Lloyd, Macon, Marks, Mills, Noble, Reed, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Buren, Van Dyke, White, Willey—38.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Eaton, Hayne, Randolph, Rowan, Williams, and Woodbury—6.

On motion by Mr. Chandler, that, it being ten minutes past 12 o'clock, the Senate do adjourn, it was determined in the negative—yeas 15, nays 29.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Benton, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Findlay, Hayne, Holmes, Johnson, of Kentucky, King, Macon, Reed, Rowan, Williams, and Woodbury—15.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bell, Berrien, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Eaton, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnston, of Louisiana, Kane, Knight, Lloyd, Marks, Mills, Noble, Randolph, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Buren, Van Dyke, White, Willey—29.

On motion by Mr. Mills, that the Senate proceed to consider the nominations of Richard C. Anderson, John Sergeant, and William B. Rochester, contained in the message of the 26th December, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 25, nays 19.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bell, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, Knight, Lloyd, Marks, Mills, Noble, Reed, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Dyke, Willey—25.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Hayne, Holmes, Kane, King, Macon, Randolph, Rowan, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury—19.

On the question, "Will the Senate advise and consent to the appointment of Richard C. Anderson?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 17.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bell, Benton, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, Kane, Knight, Lloyd, of Massachusetts, Marks, Mills, Noble, Reed, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Dyke, Willey—27.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Hayne, Holmes, King, Macon, Randolph, Rowan, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury—17.

On the question, "Will the Senate advise and consent to the appointment of John Sergeant?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 18.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bell, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Edwards, Findlay, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, Kane, Knight, Lloyd, Marks, Mills, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Dyke, Willey—26.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Hayne, Holmes, King, Macon, Randolph, Reed, Rowan, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury—18.

On the question, "Will the Senate advise and consent to the appointment of Wm. B. Rochester?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 28, nays 16.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Barton, Bell, Benton, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Edwards, Findlay, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, Kane, Knight, Lloyd, Marks, Mills, Noble, Reed, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Dyke, Willey—28.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Hayne, Holmes, King, Macon, Randolph, Rowan, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury—16.

So it was

Resolved, That the Senate advise and consent to the appointments of Richard C. Anderson, John Sergeant, and William B. Rochester, agreeably to their nominations respectively.

Mr. Berrien submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy be removed from the journal of the Senate on the subject of sending ministers to the Assembly of American Nations at Panama, and that the Secretary of the Senate cause the same to be published, viz:

Resolutions of the Senate of the 15th of February, and proceedings thereon. Proceedings of the Senate of the 22d, 23d, and 24th February, and of the 13th and 14th of March.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

On motion by Mr. Bell that the Senate adjourn, it was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 29.

On motion by Mr. Van Buren, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—
Messrs. Barton, Bell, Chase, Clayton, Edwards, Knight, Macon, Marks, Noble, Reed, Robbins, Sanford, Seymour—13.

Those who voted in the negative are—
Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Branch, Chambers, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, Kane, King, Lloyd, Mills, Rowan, Ruggles, Smith, Thomas, Van Buren, White, Willey, Williams, Woodbury—29.

On the question "Will the Senate agree to the resolution?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 37.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,
Those who voted in the affirmative are—
Messrs. Barton, Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Branch, Chambers, Chandler, Chase, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, Kane, King, Lloyd, Macon, Marks, Mills, Noble, Reed, Rowan, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Van Buren, White, Willey, Williams, Woodbury—37.

So it was
Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy be removed from the journal of the Senate on the subject of sending ministers to the Assembly of American Nations at Panama, and that the Secretary of the Senate cause the same to be published, viz:

Resolutions of the Senate of the 15th of February, and proceedings thereon. Proceedings of the Senate of the 22d, 23d, and 24th February, and of the 13th and 14th of March.

FRIDAY, MARCH 17.

On motion by Mr. Randolph, and by unanimous consent,
Ordered, That the following motion, submitted by Mr. Randolph on the 21st of February, and withdrawn on the 22d of February, be inserted on the journal.

Resolved, That the Senate having, on the 15th day of February, passed the following resolutions:
"Resolved, That upon the question whether the United States shall be represented in the Congress of Panama the Senate ought to act with open doors, unless it shall appear that the publication of documents necessary to be referred to in debate will be prejudicial to existing negotiations.

"Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to inform the Senate whether such objection exists to the publication of the documents communicated by the Executive, or any portion of them; and if so, to specify the parts the publication of which would, for that reason, be objectionable."

To which the President returned the following message in answer, viz:

"To the Senate of the United States:

"In answer to the two resolutions of the Senate of the 15th instant, marked 'Executive,' and which I have received, I state respectfully that all the communications from me to the Senate relating to the Congress at Panama have been made, like all other communications on Executive business, in confidence, and most of them in compliance with a resolution of the Senate requesting them confidentially. Believing that the established usage of free confidential communications between the Executive and the Senate ought, for the public interest, to be preserved unimpaired, I deem it to be my indispensable duty to leave to the Senate itself the decision of a question involving a departure, hitherto, so far as I am informed, without example, from that usage, and upon the motives for which, not being informed of them, I do not feel myself competent to decide.

"JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

"WASHINGTON, February 16, 1826."

Resolved, That the Senate cannot, consistently with a due sense of its constitutional rights and duties, proceed, under the circumstances of the case, to a further consideration of the question whether or not it be expedient for the United States to send a mission to the Congress at Panama.

On motion by Mr. Randolph, and by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That the following motion, made by Mr. Randolph on the 14th of March, and afterwards withdrawn, be entered on the journal.

Resolved, That the States of South Carolina and Alabama, being unrepresented in consequence of the death of John Gaillard and of Henry Chambers; and the State of Virginia being also unrepresented by the unavoidable absence of Littleton Waller Tazewell; and the State of Mississippi, by the vote that Thomas B. Reed, one of the Senators, be excused from voting, he not having had time to make up his opinion so as to be prepared to vote understandingly on the question, the Senate cannot, on a question involving the dignity and neutrality of the United States, and the fundamental principles of their union, and the peace and security of a great subdivision of the Confederacy, proceed to consider the nominations until the States shall be more fully represented.

On motion by Mr. Hayne,

Ordered, That the injunction of secrecy be removed from the foregoing proceedings, and that the Secretary cause the same to be published.

TUESDAY, MARCH 21, 1826.

Mr. Benton submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy be removed from the President's message of December 26, 1825, relative to the proposed Assembly of American Nations at Panama, and from all Executive communications made and documents sent to the Senate in relation thereto, and from all proceedings in the Senate upon that subject from which the injunction of secrecy has not yet been removed, and that six thousand copies of the whole be printed. Also, that the injunction of secrecy be removed from all communications relative thereto received from the Executive since the Senate's decision upon the mission, and that an equal number thereof be printed as an appendix to the proceedings had and documents first sent. Also, that all papers and documents sent and communications made by the Executive to the House of Representatives, and not sent or made to the Senate, shall, in like manner, be printed in a second appendix, distinguishing the papers and passages sent to the House and not to the Senate, and those sent to the Senate and not to the House. Also, that the resolution of December 28 shall be transferred to the legislative journal of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration thereof.

On motion by Mr. Mills, that the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow, it was determined in the negative—yeas 6, nays 30.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Barton, Chase, Edwards, Mills, Sanford, Seymour—6.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Chandler, Clayton, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, Kane, King, Knight, Macon, Marks, Noble, Reed, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Smith, Van Buren, White, Willey, Woodbury—30.

On the question to agree to the resolution, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 3.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Barton, Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Chandler, Chase, Clayton, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson, of Kentucky, Johnston, of Louisiana, Kane, King, Knight, Macon, Marks, Noble, Reed, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Van Buren, White, Willey, Woodbury—33.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Edwards, Mills, Seymour—3.

Attest:

WALTER LOWRIE, Secretary.

Extract of a letter (No. 15) from Mr. Everett, minister to Spain, to the Secretary of State, dated MADRID, November 21, 1825.

"After conversing with the Duke (del Infantado) as much as was necessary upon the direct relations between the two countries, the opportunity being favorable for a longer interview, I availed myself of it to introduce the subject of the colonies, upon which I had not before said anything to him. I told him that it was a part of my instructions to intimate to his Majesty's Government, in the most delicate manner possible, the full conviction of that of the United States that the question of the independence of the colonies was, in point of fact, settled; and their strong desire that the war might, as soon as possible, be brought to a close. I inquired of him whether there was at present any disposition in his Majesty's cabinet towards a change of policy upon this subject. He replied in the negative, but did not express himself to this effect with the same fullness and decision that I had observed in Mr. Zea's communications. I presume, however, that this difference, which was certainly very perceptible and obvious, is rather owing to the difference in the characters of the men and their habit of expressing themselves than to any actual intention in the cabinet to yield; at least I do not learn from any other quarter that such an intention is supposed to exist. The Duke said that the matter was a delicate one; that he could easily imagine how inconvenient and injurious it must be to the United States to have this struggle constantly going on at their doors; and that he was not surprised or dissatisfied that they should exert their influence in endeavoring to procure the termination of it in the way which they thought just; but that the King could not yet resolve to abandon his rights, or give up the hope that these countries would in one way or another be ultimately brought back to their allegiance. I then suggested to him particularly the opinion entertained by the Government of the United States that the loss of the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico would be the inevitable effect of the continuance of the struggle for two or three years longer; but that Spain, by making peace at once, might very probably retain them. When I made this remark to Mr. Zea, he answered that the King did not consider these islands as in danger in any event, and that his Majesty confidently trusted that he should not only retain them, but reconquer very shortly all the other American provinces. The Duke's answer was quite different. He inquired of me, in reply, upon what evidence the American Government founded the opinion that Spain would be able to retain these islands in case of her recognizing the independence of the other colonies. This question seemed to suppose the persuasion that the islands must at all events be lost unless the King should recover the whole of his American possessions. I replied that the principal circumstance in favor of this opinion was the fact that no symptoms of a disposition to separate from the mother country had yet appeared in the islands, and that as their situation, in consequence of the opening of the ports, was extremely flourishing, there was room to suppose that they were contented with it. He acquiesced in this remark, and expressed his deep regret that a similar system of allowing a full freedom of trade had not been adopted in season in regard to the other colonies. This was the substance of our conversation. The general impression I received from it was, that there is at present no direct intention in the cabinet to change their policy; but that there is at least as much probability of a recognition now as before the late ministerial revolution. I mentioned to the Duke that Mr. Zea had expressed a wish that I would give him in writing what I had to say by order of my Government upon this subject, and inquired of him whether this would also be agreeable to him. He said that he had no objection whatever to receive such a communication, and I shall accordingly at my leisure prepare and transmit one."

MADRID, December 12, 1825.

"I received two or three days ago from Mr. King a copy of the instructions to Mr. Middleton on the affairs of Spanish America. It came very opportunely, while I was engaged in preparing the note which I intend to address to this Government upon the same subject. This communication, as it requires to be drawn up with care and caution, does not admit of being hastened, and will not probably be ready before the first of January. I learn with much pleasure, through the medium of Mr. Brown, that the overture made by Mr. Middleton at St. Petersburg has been well received and is likely to produce a favorable effect. I shall take an early opportunity of conversing anew with Mr. D'Oubril upon the subject and of ascertaining what are his present instructions."

Mr. Everett to the Secretary of State, No. 18.

MADRID, January 1, 1826.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a translation of a decree which has just been published for establishing a Council of State. A council has already existed, I believe, ever since the King's return, bearing the same name, composed of nearly the same persons, and charged with substantially the same duties as this, but the King has not been in the habit of calling them together. The only thing, therefore, really new in the decree is the part which declares that the council shall meet every day and remain in session three hours. How far this regulation is likely to be observed is, of course, a matter of mere conjecture. It is rather singular that no allusion is made to an existing council, and that the decree purports to be for the establishment of an entirely new one. The measure is considered here as pretty important, but I do not see that it is likely to introduce any very great changes either in the principles or proceedings of the Government. The latent object of the institution is, probably, to get rid of the Ministerial Council established by Mr. Zea; no allusion is, however, made to the latter in the decree which thus supercedes two of these high state corporations, without naming either. Some of the most considerable members of Mr. Zea's council are transferred to the new one, including the President, General Castanos, a person much respected by all parties, and of known liberal sentiments. He told me yesterday that this was the fifth council to which he had been called, as they were successively instituted. He does not appear to anticipate any very important consequences from the innovation.

There are some things, however, in the decree, and in the composition of the council, which may be construed into indications that the measure has been taken with a view to a more careful consideration of the great question of America. Among the members named who, exclusively of the ministers, only amount to fourteen or fifteen, are the Archbishop of Mexico, the Viceroy of Mexico, Venegas, and Apodaca, under new names, the Duke de San Carlos, an American, and Father Cyril, who has been in America. The last is considered the ablest man in the council. It is worthy of remark, that none of these, except San Carlos, were of the old Council of State. General Castanos is friendly to the recognition of the independence of America. Provision seems to have been made in this way for bringing into the meeting a great deal of positive information upon American affairs. The decree also mentions that this question is one to which the attention of the council is to be particularly called; and speaks of it in terms which will bear a favorable interpretation, although they do not necessarily require it. Among other things deserving consideration are enumerated "the weighty affairs of the colonies in America, which are endeavoring to separate from the mother country, by a necessary effect of the dangers to which the Crown has been exposed." To acknowledge the necessity of the separation on any account seems to be a large step towards the acknowledgment of the new States, and to call the effort to separate a necessary effect of the late political crisis is, perhaps, to give the best possible justification of it. The passage may, however, be interpreted in a different sense; and there is, at present, no other evidence of any recent change on this subject, in the disposition of this Government. The French newspapers abound, as usual, with accounts, apparently authentic, of constant efforts made here by the foreign powers, especially the British minister, in favor of the colonies, but these accounts are also, as usual, without the slightest foundation. Mr. Lamb and myself converse, habitually, on this subject, with perfect freedom, and I am certain that he has said and done almost nothing for the Americans since I have been here; the others never interfere with the subject, excepting, perhaps, the French ambassador, who has recently arrived, and with whose proceedings I am not so well acquainted.

I lately read to the Duke del Infantado a part of a letter I had received from New York, which spoke with great confidence of the probability of an early and successful attack upon the Island of Cuba by the Mexicans and Colombians. The intelligence evidently made an impression upon him. He asked me, among other things, as he has done before, what security there would be for the possession of Cuba in the event of recognising the colonies. I replied by stating the general reasons why they should not wish to separate. It has since occurred to me that the Duke, by his repeated questions to this effect, intended to intimate a desire that a guaranty for the fidelity of Cuba should be offered by the United States, or by the Spanish American powers. This was proposed directly by Mr. Zea to Mr. Nelson and to me as a consideration for admitting our consul at the Havana.

Since I wrote to you last I have been principally engaged in preparing my note upon the affairs of the colonies. It is now nearly ready, and I shall probably send you a copy of it with my next despatches. The other affairs remain in the same state. The intelligence of the death of the Emperor of Russia arrived here about ten days ago, and was soon followed by that of the quiet succession of his brother Constantine. It does not appear that the change will produce any immediate effect upon the state of political affairs. The money market is exceedingly depressed in France and England, and the distress among the merchants is greater than was almost ever known before; but the crisis appears to have arisen, in part, from pure panic and will, in all probability, pass off very soon, leaving the value of public stocks somewhat lower, perhaps, than it stood before. The French Parliament is summoned for the 31st of this month.

I have the honor to transmit herewith copies of the notes which I have addressed to the minister since my last despatches, and of some official articles of general interest, and remain, with high respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

A. H. EVERETT.

P. S.—Upon looking again at the decree upon the Council of State, which was out of my hands when I was writing the above, I find that the council is not described as a new institution in such distinct terms as I had supposed and stated. The impression I had upon the subject was partly derived from conversation. The existence of the council had been pretty generally forgotten, and this revival of it has been commonly mentioned as the establishment of an entirely new one; in effect it is, as the King never called the members together under the former system.

HON. HENRY CLAY, Secretary of State.

No. 4.

No. 42.—Mr. Brown to Mr. Clay.

PARIS, January 10, 1826.

SIR: In order to comply with the instructions contained in your despatch No. 3, I obtained an interview with his excellency the Baron de Damas, on the 2d instant. I reminded him that, in the month of July last, I had, in a spirit of frankness, disclosed to him the views of the President of the United States in relation to the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, and that I had then stated to him that the United States could not see with indifference those islands passing from Spain to any other European Government; and that, for the United States, no change was desired in their political or commercial condition, nor in the possession which Spain has of them. I informed him that I was now instructed to add, in the same frank and friendly spirit, and in order to guard against all possible difficulties that might arise on that subject, that we could not consent to the occupation of those islands by any other European power than Spain under any contingency whatever. Disclaiming, as we now did, all designs on them ourselves, we believed we might justly claim an unreserved communication of the views of other great maritime States in relation to them. I observed that the President could not suppose a state of things in which it would be right or proper that possessions so important should be occupied by either England or France without the concurrence, or, at least, the knowledge, of the United States.

The Baron de Damas appeared to concur entirely in the view which I took of the subject, and inquired whether it had been mentioned to the British Government. I told him that a similar communication had been made to Mr. Canning, and I had sufficient reason to think that the British Government concurred with the President in the policy of not disturbing the possession of those islands in favor of either of the great maritime nations.

I then, in the most delicate and friendly manner, alluded to the French squadron which had appeared in the West Indies and on the American coast last summer, and stated that my Government would expect that, in case France should again send out a naval force disproportionate in the extent of its armament to the ordinary purpose of a peace establishment, its design and object should be communicated to the Government of the United States. The Baron de Damas answered that the vessels composing that squadron had been stationed at different places, where the number on each station was not more than sufficient for the service of protecting French commerce and their West India islands; that it had become necessary definitively to settle the relations between France and St. Domingo; that this squadron was hastily collected for that object, and that the nature of the service required secrecy. He said that it was not only right in itself, but had been customary with the French Government to communicate to friendly Governments, in time of peace, the objects of considerable fleets sent on distant service; that the peculiar circumstances in the instance I alluded to had occasioned a departure from the rule, but that, in future, the United States should be duly apprised of the objects of every such squadron sent into their vicinity. The Baron de Damas closed the conference by saying that he would communicate what had passed to the King, to whom, he was sure, it would give great satisfaction.

On the same day I addressed a short note to the Baron de Damas, of which I inclose a copy; and meeting him in the evening I told him, in an informal manner, that I had written it with the design of avoiding any mistake in my communication to the President of what had passed at the conference. He said he was well satisfied that no mistake existed on either side, and that he had communicated our conversation to the King.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,
JAMES BROWN.

PARIS, January 2, 1826.

SIR: In the month of July last I had the honor to state to your excellency, with the utmost frankness, the views of the President of the United States in relation to the Spanish islands of Cuba and Porto Rico. I informed you that the United States could not see with indifference those islands passing from Spain to any other European power, and that the United States desired no change in their political or commercial condition, nor in the possession which Spain had of them. In the conference with which your excellency honored me on this day I repeated the same assurances, and added, in a spirit of friendship, and with a view of guarding beforehand against any possible difficulties on the subject which might arise, that my Government could not consent to the occupation of those islands by any other European power than Spain under any contingency whatever.

Having understood your excellency to say that the policy and views of the United States, as disclosed by me, corresponded with those of his Majesty's Government, I shall not fail to communicate the information to the President, who will feel happy in finding the two nations agreeing on a point of so much importance to the tranquillity of that portion of the globe.

I request your excellency to accept, &c.

JAMES BROWN.

APPENDIX—No. 2.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 17, 1826.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of the 5th ultimo, requesting me to cause to be laid before the House so much of the correspondence between the Government of the United States and the new States of America, or their ministers, respecting the proposed Congress or meeting of diplomatic agents at Panama, and such information respecting the general character of that expected Congress, as may be in my possession, and as may, in my opinion, be communicated without prejudice to the public interest, and also to inform the House, so far as in my opinion the public interest may allow, in regard to what objects the agents of the United States are expected to take part in the deliberations of that Congress, I now transmit to the House a report from the Secretary of State, with the correspondence and information requested by the resolution.

With regard to the objects in which the agents of the United States are expected to take part in the deliberations of that Congress, I deem it proper to premise that these objects did not form the only nor even the principal motive for my acceptance of the invitation. My first and greatest inducement was to meet in the spirit of kindness and friendship an overture made in that spirit by three sister Republics of this hemisphere.

The great revolution in human affairs which has brought into existence, nearly at the same time, eight sovereign and independent nations in our own quarter of the globe, has placed the United States in a situation not less novel, and scarcely less interesting, than that in which they had found themselves by their own transition from a cluster of colonies to a nation of sovereign States. The deliverance of the Southern American Republics from the oppression under which they had been so long afflicted was hailed, with great unanimity, by the people of this Union, as among the most auspicious events of the age. On the 4th of May, 1822, an act of Congress made an appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars "for such missions to the independent nations on the American continent as the President of the United States might deem proper."

In exercising the authority recognized by this act, my predecessor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appointed, successively, ministers plenipotentiary to the Republics of Colombia, Buenos Ayres, Chile, and Mexico. Unwilling to raise among the fraternity of freedom questions of precedency and etiquette, which even the European monarchs had of late found it necessary in a great measure to discard, he despatched these ministers to Colombia, Buenos Ayres, and Chile, without exacting from those Republics, as by the ancient principals of political primogeniture he might have done, that the compliment of a plenipotentiary mission should have been paid first by them to the United States. The instructions, prepared under his direction, to Mr. Anderson, the first of our ministers to the southern continent, contain, at much length, the general principles upon which he thought it desirable that our relations, political and commercial, with these our new neighbors, should be established for their benefit and ours, and that of the future ages of our posterity. A copy of so much of these instructions as relates to these general subjects is among the papers now transmitted to the House. Similar instructions were furnished to the ministers appointed to Buenos Ayres, Chile, and Mexico, and the system of social intercourse which it was the purpose of those missions to establish, from the first opening of our diplomatic relations with those rising nations, is the most effective exposition of the principles upon which the invitation to the Congress at Panama has been accepted by me, as well as of the objects of negotiation at that meeting, in which it was expected that our plenipotentiaries should take part.

The House will perceive that, even at the date of these instructions, the first treaties between some of the southern Republics had been concluded, by which they had stipulated among themselves this diplomatic assembly at Panama. And it will be seen with what caution, so far as it might concern the policy of the United States, and at the same time with what frankness and good will towards those nations, he gave countenance to their design of inviting the United States to this high assembly for consultation upon American interests. It was not considered a conclusive reason for declining this invitation that the proposal for assembling such a Congress had not first been made by ourselves. It had sprung from the urgent, immediate, and momentous common interests of the great communities struggling for independence, and, as it were, quickening into life. From them the proposition to us appeared respectful and friendly; from us to them it could scarcely have been made without exposing ourselves to suspicions of purposes of ambition, if not of domination, more suited to rouse resistance and excite distrust than to conciliate favor and friendship. The first and paramount principle upon which it was deemed wise and just to lay the corner-stone of all our future relations with them was disinterestedness; the next was cordial good will to them; the third was a claim of fair and equal reciprocity. Under these impressions, when the invitation was formally and earnestly given, had it even been doubtful whether any of the objects proposed for consideration and discussion at the Congress were such as that immediate and important interests of the United States would be affected by the issue, I should, nevertheless, have determined, so far as it depended upon me, to have accepted the invitation, and to have appointed ministers to attend the meeting. The proposal itself implied that the Republics by whom it was made believed that important interests of ours or of theirs rendered our attendance there desirable. They had given us notice that, in the novelty of their situation, and in the spirit of deference to our experience, they would be pleased to have the benefit of our friendly counsel. To meet the temper with which this proposal was made with a cold repulse was not thought congenial to that warm interest in their welfare with which the people and Government of the Union had hitherto gone hand in hand through the whole progress of their revolution. To insult them by a refusal of their overture, and then invite them to a similar assembly, to be called by ourselves, was an expedient which never presented itself to the mind. I would have sent ministers to the meeting had it been merely to give them such advice as they might have desired, even with reference to their own interests, not involving ours. I would have sent them had it been merely to explain and set forth to them our reasons for declining any proposal of specific measures to which they might desire our concurrence, but which we might deem incompatible with our interests or our duties. In the intercourse between nations temper is a missionary perhaps more powerful than talent. Nothing was ever lost by kind treatment. Nothing can be gained by sullen repulses and aspiring pretensions.

But objects of the highest importance, not only to the future welfare of the whole human race, but bearing directly upon the special interests of this Union, will engage the deliberations of the Congress of Panama whether we are represented there or not. Others, if we are represented, may be offered by our plenipotentiaries for consideration, having in view both these great results—our own interests and the improvement of the condition of man upon earth. It may be that, in the lapse of many centuries, no other opportunity so favorable will be presented to the Government of the United States to subservise the benevolent purposes of Divine Providence, to dispense the promised blessings of the Redeemer of mankind, to promote the prevalence in future ages of peace on earth and good will to man, as will now be placed in their power by participating in the deliberations of this Congress.

Among the topics enumerated in official papers published by the Republic of Colombia, and adverted to in the correspondence now communicated to the House, as intended to be presented for discussion at Panama, there is scarcely one in which the result of the meeting will not deeply affect the interests of the United States. Even those in which the belligerent States alone will take an active part will have a powerful effect upon the state of our relations with the American, and probably with the principal European States. Were it merely that we might be correctly and speedily informed of the proceedings of the Congress, and of the progress and issue of their negotiations, I should hold it advisable that we should have an accredited agency with them, placed in such confidential relations with the other members as would insure the authenticity and the safe and early transmission of its reports. Of the same enumerated topics are the preparation of a manifesto setting forth to the world the justice of their cause and the relations they desire to hold with other Christian powers, and to form a convention of navigation and commerce applicable both to the confederated States and to their allies.

It will be within the recollection of the House that, immediately after the close of the war of our independence, a measure closely analogous to this Congress of Panama was adopted by the Congress of our confederation, and for purposes of precisely the same character. Three commissioners, with plenipotentiary powers, were appointed to negotiate treaties of amity, navigation, and commerce with all the principal powers of Europe. They met and resided for that purpose about one year at Paris, and the only result of their negotiations at that time was the first treaty between the United States and Prussia—memorable in the diplomatic annals of the world, and precious as a monument of the principles, in relation to commerce and maritime warfare, with which our country entered upon her career as a member of the great family of independent nations. This treaty, prepared in conformity with the instructions of the American plenipotentiaries, consecrated three fundamental principles of the foreign intercourse which the Congress of that period were desirous of establishing. First, equal reciprocity and the mutual stipulation of the privileges of the most favored nation in the commercial exchanges of peace; secondly, the abolition of private war upon the ocean; and thirdly, restrictions favorable to neutral commerce upon belligerent practices with regard to contraband of war and blockades. A painful, it may be said a calamitous, experience of more than forty years has demonstrated the deep importance of these same principles to the peace and prosperity of this nation, and to the welfare of all maritime States, and has illustrated the profound wisdom with which they were assumed as cardinal points of the policy of the Union.

At that time, in the infancy of their political existence, under the influence of those principles of liberty and of right so congenial to the cause in which they had just fought and triumphed, they were able but to obtain the sanction of one great and philosophical, though absolute sovereign, in Europe to their liberal and enlightened principles. They could obtain no more. Since then a political hurricane has gone over three-fourths of the civilized portions of the earth, the desolation of which, it may with confidence be expected, is passing away, leaving at least the American atmosphere purified and refreshed. And now, at this propitious moment, the new-born nations of this hemisphere, assembling by their representatives at the isthmus between its two continents, to settle the principles of their future international intercourse with other nations and with us, ask, in this great exigency, for our advice upon those very fundamental maxims which we from our cradle at first proclaimed, and partially succeeded to introduce into the code of national law.

Without recurring to that total prostration of all neutral and commercial rights which marked the progress of the late European wars, and which finally involved the United States in them, and adverting only to our political relations with these American nations, it is observable that while, in all other respects, those relations have been uniformly, and without exception, of the most friendly and mutually satisfactory character, the only causes of difference and dissension between us and them which have ever arisen originated in those never-failing fountains of discord and irritation, discriminations of commercial favor to other nations, licentious privateers, and paper blockades. I cannot, without doing injustice to the Republics of Buenos Ayres and Colombia, forbear to acknowledge the candid and conciliatory spirit with which they have repeatedly yielded to our friendly representations and remonstrances on those subjects, in repealing discriminative laws which operated to our disadvantage, and in revoking the commissions of their privateers, to which Colombia has added the magnanimity of making reparation for unlawful captures by some of her cruisers, and of assenting, in the midst of war, to treaty stipulations favorable to neutral navigation. But the recurrence of these occasions of complaint has rendered the renewal of the discussions which result in the removal of them necessary, while in the mean time injuries are sustained by merchants and other individuals of the United States which cannot be repaired, and the remedy lingers in overtaking the pernicious operation of the mischief. The settlement of general principles, pervading with equal efficacy all the American States, can alone put an end to these evils, and can alone be accomplished at the proposed assembly.

If it be true that the noblest treaty of peace ever mentioned in history is that by which the Carthaginians were bound to abolish the practice of sacrificing their own children, because it was stipulated in favor of human nature, I cannot exaggerate to myself the unfading glory with which these United States will go forth in the memory of future ages if, by their friendly counsel, by their moral influence, by the power of argument and persuasion alone, they can prevail upon the American nations at Panama to stipulate, by general agreement among themselves, and so far as any of them may be concerned, the perpetual abolition of private war upon the ocean. And if we cannot yet flatter ourselves that this may be accomplished as advances towards it, the establishment of the principle that the friendly flag shall cover the cargo, the curtailment of contraband of war, and the proscription of fictitious paper blockades—engagements which we may reasonably hope will not prove impracticable—will, if successfully inculcated, redound proportionally to our honor, and drain the fountain of many a future sanguinary war.

The late President of the United States, in his message to Congress of December 2, 1823, while announcing the negotiation then pending with Russia, relating to the Northwest Coast of this Continent, observed that the occasion of the discussions to which that incident had given rise had been taken for asserting, as a principle, in which the rights and interests of the United States were involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they had assumed and maintained, were thenceforward not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power. The principle had first been assumed in that negotiation with Russia. It rested upon a course of reasoning equally simple and conclusive. With the exception of the existing European colonies, which it was in no-wise intended to disturb, the two continents consisted of several sovereign and independent nations, whose territories covered their whole surface. By this their independent condition the United States enjoyed the right of commercial intercourse with every part of their possessions. To attempt the establishment of a colony in those possessions would be to usurp, to the exclusion of others, a commercial intercourse, which was the common possession of all. It could not be done without encroaching upon existing rights of the United States. The Government of Russia has never disputed these positions, nor manifested the slightest dissatisfaction at their having been taken. Most of the new American Republics have declared their entire assent to them; and they now propose, among the subjects of consultation at Panama, to take into consideration the means of making effectual the assertion of that principle, as well as the means of resisting interference from abroad with the domestic concerns of the American Governments.

In alluding to these means it would obviously be premature at this time to anticipate that which is offered merely as matter for consultation, or to pronounce upon those measures which have been or may be suggested. The purpose of this Government is to concur in none which would import hostility to Europe, or justly excite resentment in any of her States. Should it be deemed advisable to contract any conventional engagement on this topic, our views would extend no further than to a mutual pledge of the parties to the compact to maintain the principle in application to its own territory, and to permit no colonial lodgments or establishments of European jurisdiction upon its own soil; and, with respect to the obtrusive interference from abroad, if its future character may be inferred from that which has been and perhaps still is exercised in more than one of the new States, a joint declaration of its character, and exposure of it to the world, may be probably all that the occasion would require. Whether the United States should or should not be parties to such a declaration may justly form a part of the deliberation. That there is an evil to be remedied needs little insight into the secret history of late years to know, and that this remedy may best be concerted at the Panama meeting deserves at least the experiment of consideration. A concert of measures, having reference to the more effectual abolition of the African slave trade, and the consideration of the light in which the political condition of the Island of Hayti is to be regarded, are also among the subjects mentioned by the minister from the Republic of Colombia, as believed to be suitable for deliberation at the Congress. The failure of the negotiations with that Republic, undertaken during the late administration, for the suppression of that trade, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, indicates the expediency of listening, with respectful attention, to propositions which may contribute to the accomplishment of the great end which was the purpose of that resolution, while the result of those negotiations will serve as admonition to abstain from pledging this Government to any arrangement which might be expected to fail of obtaining the advice and consent of the Senate by a constitutional majority to its ratification.

Whether the political condition of the island of Hayti shall be brought at all into discussion at the meeting may be a question for preliminary advisement. There are in the political constitution of Government of that people circumstances which have hitherto forbidden the acknowledgment of them by the Government of the United States as sovereign and independent. Additional reasons for withholding that acknowledgment have recently been seen in their acceptance of a nominal sovereign by the grant of a foreign prince, under conditions equivalent to the concession by them of exclusive commercial advantages to one nation, adapted altogether to the state of colonial vassalage, and retaining little of independence but the name. Our plenipotentiaries will be instructed to present these views to the assembly at Panama, and, should they not be concurred in, to decline acceding to any arrangement which may be proposed upon different principles.

The condition of the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico is of deeper import and more immediate bearing upon the present interests and future prospects of our Union. The correspondence herewith transmitted will show how earnestly it has engaged the attention of this Government. The invasion of both those islands by the united forces of Mexico and Colombia is avowedly among the objects to be matured by the belligerent States at Panama. The convulsions to which, from the peculiar composition of their population, they would be liable in the event of such an invasion, and the danger therefrom resulting of their falling ultimately into the hands of some European power other than Spain, will not admit of our looking at the consequences to which the Congress at Panama may lead with indifference. It is unnecessary to enlarge upon this topic, or to say more than that all our efforts in reference to this interest will be to preserve the existing state of things, the tranquillity of the islands, and the peace and security of their inhabitants.

And lastly, the Congress of Panama is believed to present a fair occasion for urging upon all the new nations of the South the just and liberal principles of religious liberty. Not by any interference whatever in their internal concerns, but by claiming for our citizens, whose occupations or interests may call them to occasional residence in their territories, the inestimable privilege of worshipping their Creator according to the dictates of their own consciences. This privilege, sanctioned by the customary law of nations, and secured by treaty stipulations in numerous national compacts—secured even to our own citizens in the treaties with Colombia and with the Federation of Central America—is yet to be obtained in the other South American States and Mexico. Existing prejudices are still struggling against it, which may, perhaps, be more successfully combatted at this general meeting than at the separate seats of Government of each Republic.

I can scarcely deem it otherwise than superfluous to observe that the assembly will be in its nature diplomatic and not legislative. That nothing can be transacted there obligatory upon any one of the States to be represented at the meeting, unless with the express concurrence of its own representatives; nor even then, but subject to the ratification of its constitutional authority at home. The faith of the United States to foreign powers cannot otherwise be pledged. I shall, indeed, in the first instance, consider the assembly as merely consultative; and although the plenipotentiaries of the United States will be empowered to receive and refer to the consideration of their Government any proposition from the other parties to the meeting, they will be authorized to conclude nothing unless subject to the definitive sanction of this Government in all its constitutional forms. It has, therefore, seemed to me unnecessary to insist that every object to be discussed at the meeting should be specified with the precision of a judicial sentence, or enumerated with the exactness of a mathematical demonstration. The purpose of the meeting itself is to deliberate upon the great and common interests of several new and neighboring nations. If the measure is new and without precedent, so is the situation of the parties to it. That the purposes of the meeting are somewhat indefinite, far from being an objection to it, is among the cogent reasons for its adoption. It is not the establishment of principles of intercourse with one, but with seven or eight nations at once. That, before they have had the means of exchanging ideas and communicating with one another in common upon these topics, they should have definitively settled and arranged them in concert is to require that the effect should precede the cause. It is to exact, as a preliminary to the meeting, that for the accomplishment of which the meeting itself is designed.

Among the inquiries which were thought entitled to consideration before the determination was taken to accept the invitation was that, whether the measure might not have a tendency to change the policy, hitherto invariably pursued by the United States, of avoiding all entangling alliances and all unnecessary foreign connexions.

Mindful of the advice given by the Father of our Country in his farewell address that the great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our foreign relations, to have with them as little political connexion as possible, and faithfully adhering to the spirit of that admonition, I cannot overlook the reflection that the counsel of Washington, in that instance, like all the counsels of wisdom, was founded upon the circumstances in which our country and the world around us were situated at the time when it was given. That the reasons assigned by him for his advice were, that Europe had a set of primary interests which to us had none, or a very remote relation. That hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the cause of which were essentially foreign to our concerns. That our detached and distant situation invited and enabled us to pursue a different course. That by our union and rapid growth, with an efficient Government, the period was not far distant when we might defy material injury from external annoyance—when we might take such an attitude as would cause our neutrality to be respected, and, with reference to belligerent nations, might choose peace or war, as our interests, guided by justice, should counsel.

Compare our situation and the circumstances of that time with those of the present day, and what, from the very words of Washington then, would be his counsels to his countrymen now? Europe has still her set of primary interests with which we have little or a remote relation. Our distant and detached situation with reference to Europe remains the same. But we were then the only independent nation of this hemisphere; and we were surrounded by European colonies, with the greater part of which we had no more intercourse than with the inhabitants of another planet. Those colonies have now been transformed into eight independent nations, extending to our very borders. Seven of them Republics like ourselves; with whom we have an immensely growing commercial, and must have, and have, already important political connexions; with reference to whom our situation is neither distant nor detached; whose political principles and systems of Government, congenial with our own, must and will have an action and counteraction upon us and ours to which we cannot be indifferent if we would.

The rapidity of our growth and the consequent increase of our strength has more than realized the anticipations of this admirable political legacy. Thirty years have nearly elapsed since it was written, and in the interval our population, our wealth, our territorial extension, our power, physical and moral, have nearly trebled. Reasoning upon this state of things from the sound and judicious principles of Washington, and must we not say that the period which he predicted as then not far off has arrived? That America has a set of primary interests which have none or a remote relation to Europe. That the interference of Europe, therefore, in those concerns, should be spontaneously withheld by her upon the same principles that we have never interfered with hers; and that if she should interfere, as she may by measures which may have a great and dangerous recoil upon ourselves, we might be called, in defence of our own altars and firesides, to take an attitude which would cause our neutrality to be respected, and choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, should counsel.

The acceptance of this invitation, therefore, far from conflicting with the counsel or the policy of Washington, is directly deducible from and conformable to it. Nor is it less conformable to the views of my immediate predecessor, as declared in his annual message to Congress of December 2, 1823, to which I have already adverted, and to an important passage of which I invite the attention of the House. "The citizens of the United States," said he, "cherish sentiments the most friendly in favor of the liberty and happiness of their fellow men on that (the European) side of the Atlantic. In the wars of the European Powers, in matters relating to themselves, we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defence. With the movements in this hemisphere we are of necessity more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the allied powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective Governments. And to the defence of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations subsisting between the United States and those powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered, and shall not interfere. But with the Governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition, for the purposes of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States. In the war between those new Governments and Spain we declared our neutrality at the time of their recognition, and to this we have adhered and shall continue to adhere, provided no change shall occur which, in the judgment of the competent authorities of this Government, shall make a corresponding change on the part of the United States indispensable to their security."

To the question which may be asked, whether this meeting and the principles which may be adjusted and settled by it as rules of intercourse between the American nations may not give umbrage to the Holy League of European powers or offence to Spain, it is deemed a sufficient answer that our attendance at Panama can give no just cause of umbrage or offence to either; and that the United States will stipulate nothing there which can give such cause. Here the right of inquiry into our purposes and measures must stop. The Holy League of Europe itself was formed without inquiring of the United States whether it would or would not give umbrage to them. The fear of giving umbrage to the Holy League of Europe was urged as a motive for denying to the American nations the acknowledgment of their independence. That it would be viewed by Spain as hostility to her was not only urged but directly declared by herself. The Congress and administration of that day consulted their rights and duties, and not their fears. Fully determined to give no needless displeasure to any foreign power, the United States can estimate the probability of their giving it only by the right which any foreign State could have to take it from their measures. Neither the representation of the United States at Panama, nor any measure to which their assent may be yielded there, will give to the Holy League, or any of its members, nor to Spain, the right to take offence. For the rest the United States must still, as heretofore, take counsel from their duties rather than their fears.

Such are the objects in which it is expected that the plenipotentiaries of the United States, when commissioned to attend the meeting at the Isthmus, will take part; and such are the motives and purposes with which the invitation of the three Republics was accepted. It was, however, as the House will perceive from the correspondence, accepted only upon condition that the nomination of Commissioners for the mission should receive the advice and consent of the Senate.

The concurrence of the House to the measure, by the appropriations necessary for carrying it into effect, is alike subject to its free determination and indispensable to the fulfilment of the intention.

That the Congress at Panama will accomplish all or even any of the transcendent benefits to the human race which warmed the conceptions of its first proposer, it were, perhaps, indulging too sanguine a forecast of events to promise. It is, in its nature, a measure speculative and experimental. The blessing of Heaven may turn it to the account of human improvement. Accidents unforeseen and mischances not to be anticipated may baffle all its high purposes and disappoint its fairest expectations. But the design is great, is benevolent, is humane.

It looks to the melioration of the condition of man. It is congenial with that spirit which prompted the Declaration of our Independence; which inspired the preamble of our first treaty with France; which dictated our first treaty with Prussia, and the instructions under which it was negotiated; which filled the hearts and fired the souls of the immortal founders of our Revolution.

With this unrestricted exposition of the motives by which I have been governed in this transaction as well as of the objects to be discussed and of the ends, if possible, to be attained by our representation at the proposed Congress, I submit the propriety of an appropriation to the candid consideration and enlightened patriotism of the Legislature.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, March 15, 1826.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 14, 1826.

The Secretary of State, to whom the President has referred that part of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 3d instant which requests that he would cause to be laid before that House "so much of the correspondence between the Government of the United States and the new States of America, or their ministers, respecting the proposed Congress or meeting of diplomatic agents at Panama, and of such information respecting the general character of that expected Congress as may be in his possession," has the honor now to report:

That during the last spring he held, at the Department of State, separate conferences, on the same day, with the respective ministers of Colombia and Mexico, in the course of which each of them verbally stated that his Government was desirous that the United States should be represented at the proposed Congress, and that he was instructed to communicate an invitation to their Government to send representatives to it; but that, as his Government did not know whether it would be agreeable or not to the United States to receive such an invitation, and as it was not wished to occasion any embarrassment to them, he was charged informally to inquire, previous to the delivery of the invitation, whether it would be accepted, if given, by both of the Republics of Mexico and Colombia. It was also stated by each of those ministers that his Government did not expect that the United States would change their present neutral policy, nor was it desired that they should take part in such of the deliberations of the proposed Congress as might relate to the prosecution of the existing war with Spain.

Having laid before the President what transpired at these conferences, his direction was received, about a week after they had been held, to inform the ministers of Mexico and Colombia, and they were accordingly informed, that their communication was received with due sensibility to the friendly consideration of the United States by which it had been dictated; that of course they could not make themselves a party to the war between the new States and Spain, nor to councils for deliberating on the means of its further prosecution; that the President believed that such a Congress as was contemplated might be highly useful in settling several important disputed questions of public law, in arranging other matters of deep interest to the American continent, and in strengthening the friendship and amicable intercourse between the American powers; that before such a Congress, however, assembled, it appeared to the President to be expedient to adjust, between the different powers to be represented, several preliminary points, such as the subjects to which the attention of the Congress was to be directed, the nature and the form of the powers to be given to the diplomatic agents who were to compose it, and the mode of its organization and its action. If these preliminary points could be arranged in a manner satisfactory to the United States, the ministers from Colombia and Mexico were informed that the President thought that the United States ought to be represented at Panama. Each of those ministers undertook to transmit to his Government the answer which was thus given to both.

In this posture the overture remained until the letters were received, which accompany this report, from the ministers of the Republics of Mexico and Colombia, under date of the 2d and 3d of November, 1825. A similar answer was returned to each of those letters in official notes, a copy of one of which is with this report.

The first and only communication from the minister of the Republic of Central America to this Department in regard to the Congress at Panama is contained in his official note, a copy of which, together with a copy of the answer which was returned, will be found along with this report.

Copies of conventions, containing stipulations respecting the intended Congress, are herewith reported between—

- The Republic of Colombia and that of Chile;
- The Republic of Colombia and Peru;
- The Republic of Colombia and the Federation of the Centre of America; and
- The Republic of Colombia and the United Mexican States.*

The Secretary of State has also the honor to report to the President extracts from the instructions which were given by the Department of State to Mr. Anderson on the 27th day of May, 1823; and copies of certain parts of the correspondence which, since the last session of Congress, has taken place between the Executive of the United States and the Governments of Russia, France, Spain, and Mexico, of which a descriptive list accompanies this report. In respect to the negotiation which Mr. Middleton was authorized, by the despatch of the 10th of May last, † (one of the papers now reported,) to institute at St. Petersburg, considering the lapse of time and the great and lamented event which has lately occurred in Europe, perhaps there is no adequate reason for refraining from a communication of it to the House, which is recommended by its intimate connexion with the interests of the new Republics. About the same period with the date of that despatch instructions were given to Mr. Everett to inculcate on Spain the necessity of peace, and to our ministers in France and England to invite the Cabinets of Paris and London to co-operate in the same work. The hope, not yet abandoned, was indulged that, by a united exertion of all the great powers, and especially of Russia, Spain might be brought to see her true interests in terminating the existing war. Other negotiations, growing out of and subordinate to that which was authorized in the before-mentioned despatch of the 10th of May to Mr. Middleton, have been more recently commenced. They have for their object the prevention of disorder in the Spanish islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, and also to guard the United States against the danger of bad examples and excesses, of which, in the course of events, those islands might become the theatre, as well as the conservation of our commercial and navigating interests.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

H. CLAY.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, to Mr. Anderson, Minister Plenipotentiary to Colombia, dated May 27, 1823.

"The revolution which has severed the colonies of Spanish America from European thralldom, and left them to form self-dependent Governments as members of the society of civilized nations, is among the most important events in modern history. As a general movement in human affairs it is perhaps no more than a development of principles first brought into action by the separation of these States from Great Britain, and by the practical illustration, given in the formation and establishment of our Union, to the doctrine that voluntary agreement is the only legitimate source of authority among men, and that all just Government is a compact. It was impossible that such a system as Spain had established over her colonies should stand before the progressive improvement of the understanding in this age, or that the light shed upon the whole earth by the results of our Revolution should leave in utter darkness the regions immediately adjoining upon ourselves. The independence of the Spanish colonies, however, has proceeded from other causes, and has been achieved upon principles in many respects different from ours. In our Revolution the principle of the social compact was, from the beginning, in immediate issue. It originated in a question of right between the Government in Europe and the subject in America. Our independence was declared in defence of our liberties, and the attempt to make the yoke a yoke of oppression was the cause and the justification for casting it off.

"The revolution of the Spanish colonies was not caused by the oppression under which they had been held, however great it had been. Their independence was first forced upon them by the temporary subjugation of Spain herself to a foreign power. They were, by that event, cast upon themselves, and compelled to establish Governments of their own. Spain, through all the vicissitudes of her own revolutions, has clung to the desperate hope of retaining or reclaiming them to her own control, and has waged, to the extent of her power, a disastrous war to that intent. In the mind of every rational man it has been for years apparent that Spain can never succeed to recover her dominion where it has been abjured, nor is it probable that she can long retain the small remnant of her authority yet acknowledged in some spots of the South American continent.

"The political course of the United States, from the first dawning of South American independence, has been such as was prescribed by their relative duties to all the parties. Being on terms of peace and amity with Spain through all the changes of her own Government, they have considered the struggles of the colonies for independence as a case of civil war, to which their national obligations prescribed to them to remain neutral. Their policy, their interest, and their feelings, all concurred to favor the cause of the colonies; and the principles upon which the right of independence has been maintained by the South American patriots have been approved, not only as identical with those upon which our own independence was asserted and achieved, but as involving the whole theory of Government on the emphatically American foundation of the sovereignty of the people and the unalienable rights of man. To a cause reposing upon this basis the people of this country never could be indifferent, and their sympathies have accordingly been, with great unanimity and constancy, enlisted in its favor. The sentiments of the Government of the United States have been in perfect harmony with those of their people, and while forbearing, as their duties of neutrality prescribed, from every measure which could justly be construed as hostile to Spain, they have exercised all the moral influence which they possessed to countenance and promote the cause of independence. So long as a contest of arms, with a rational or even remote prospect of eventual success, was maintained by Spain, the United States could not recognise the independence of the colonies as existing de facto without trespassing on their duties to Spain by assuming as decided that which was precisely the question of the war. In the history of South American independence there are two periods, clearly distinguishable from each other: the first, that of its origin, when it was rather a war of independence against France than against Spain; and the second, from the restoration of Ferdinand VII, in 1814. Since that period the territories now constituting the Republic of Colombia have been the only theatre upon which Spain has been able to maintain the conflict offensively, with even a probable color of ultimate success. But when, in 1815, she made her greatest effort, in the expedition from Cadiz, commanded by Morillo, Mexico, Peru, and Chile were yet under her authority; and had she succeeded in reducing the coast of Terra Firma and New Granada, the provinces of La Plata, divided among themselves, and weakened by the Portuguese occupation of Montevideo, would probably not have held out against her long. This, at least, was the calculation of her policy; and from the geographical position of those countries, which may be termed the heart of South America, the conclusion might well be drawn that if the power of Spain could not be firmly re-seated there, it must be, on her part, a fruitless struggle to maintain her supremacy in any part of the American continent. The expedition of Morillo, on its first arrival, was attended with signal success. Carthagena was taken, the whole coast of Terra Firma was occupied, and New Granada was entirely subdued. A remnant of Patriots in Venezuela, with their leader, Bolivar, returning from expulsion, revived the cause of independence; and after the campaign of 1819, in which they reconquered the whole of New Granada, the demonstration became complete, that every effort of Spain to recover the South American continent must thenceforward be a desperate waste of her own resources, and that the truest friendship of other nations to her would consist in making her sensible that her own interest would be best consulted by the acknowledgment of that independence which she could no longer effectually dispute.

To this conclusion the Government of the United States had at an earlier period arrived. But from that emergency, the President has considered the question of recognition, both in a moral and political view, as merely a question of the proper time. While Spain could entertain a reasonable hope of maintaining the war and of recovering her authority, the acknowledgment of the colonies as independent States would have been a wrong to her; but she had no right, upon the strength of this principle, to maintain the pretension after she was manifestly disabled from maintaining the contest, and, by unreasonably withholding her acknowledgment, to deprive the Independents of their right to demand the acknowledgment of others. To fix upon the precise time when the duty to respect the prior sovereign right of Spain should cease, and that of yielding to the claim of acknowledgment would commence, was a subject of great delicacy, and, to the President, of constant and anxious solicitude. It naturally became, in the first instance, a proper subject of consultation with other powers having relations of interest to themselves with the newly opened countries as well as influence in the general affairs of Europe. In August, 1818, a formal proposal was made to the British Government for a concerted and cotemporary recognition of the independence of Buenos Ayres, then the only one of the South American States which, having declared independence, had no Spanish force contending against it within its borders; and where it therefore most unequivocally existed in fact. The British Government declined accepting the proposal themselves, without, however, expressing any disapprobation of it; without discussing it as a question of principle, and without assigning any reason for the refusal, other than that it did not then suit with their policy. It became a subject of consideration at the deliberations of the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, in October, 1818. There is reason to believe that it disconcerted projects which were there entertained of engaging the European Alliance in actual operations against the South Americans, as it is well known that a plan for their joint mediation between Spain and her colonies, for restoring them to her authority, was actually matured and finally failed at that place, only by the refusal of Great Britain to accede to the condition of employing force eventually against the South Americans for its accomplishment. Some dissatisfaction was manifested by several members of the Congress at Aix-la-Chapelle at this avowal on the part of the United States of their readiness to recognize the independence of Buenos Ayres.

The reconquest, in the campaign of 1819, of New Granada to the Patriot cause was immediately followed by the formation of the Republic of Colombia, consisting of three great divisions of the preceding Spanish Government: Venezuela, Cundinamarca, and Quito. It was soon succeeded by the dissolution of the Spanish authority in Mexico; by the revolution in Spain itself; and by the military operations which resulted in the declaration of independence in Peru. In November, 1820, was concluded the armistice between the Generals Morillo and Bolivar, together with a subsequent treaty, stipulating that, in case of the renewal of the war, the parties would abstain from all hostilities and practices not consistent with the modern law of nations and the humane maxims of civilization. In February, 1821, the partial independence of Mexico was proclaimed at Yguala; and in August of the same year was recognized by the Spanish Viceroy and Captain General O'Donoju, at Cordova.

The formation of the Republic of Colombia, by the fundamental law of the 17th of December, 1819, was notified to this Government by its agent, the late Don Manuel Torres, on the 20th of February, 1821, with a request that it might be recognized by the Government of the United States, and a proposal for the negotiation of treaties of commerce and navigation, founded upon the bases of reciprocal utility and perfect equality, as the most efficacious means of strengthening and increasing the relations of amity between the two Republics.

The request and proposal were renewed in a letter from Mr. Torres, of the 30th of November, 1821, and again repeated on the 2d of January, 1822. In the interval since the first demand, the General Congress of the new Republic had assembled, and formed a constitution, founded upon the principles of popular representation, and divided into legislative, executive, and judicial authorities. The Government under this constitution had been organized and was in full operation; while, during the same period, the principal remnant of the Spanish force had been destroyed by the battle of Carabobo, and its last fragments were confined to the two places of Porto Cabello and Panama.

Under these circumstances, a resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States, on the 30th of January, 1822, requested of the President to lay before the House the communications from the agents of the United States with the Governments south of the United States which had declared their independence, and those from the agents of such Governments here with the Secretary of State, tending to show the political condition of their Governments and the state of the war between them and Spain. In transmitting to the House the papers called for by this resolution, the President, by his message of the 8th of March, 1822, declared his own persuasion that the time had arrived when, in strict conformity to the law of nations and in the fulfilment of the duties of equal and impartial justice to all parties, the acknowledgment of the independence declared by the Spanish American colonies could no longer be withheld. Both Houses of Congress having almost unanimously concurred with these views of the President, an appropriation was made by law (4th of May, 1822,) for such missions to the independent nations on the American continent as the President should deem proper.

On the day after the President's message of the 8th of March, the Spanish minister, Anduaga, addressed to this Department a remonstrance against the measure which it recommended, and a solemn protest against the recognition of the Governments mentioned of the insurgent Spanish provinces of America. He was answered on the 6th of April, by a letter recapitulating the circumstances under which the Government of the United States had "yielded to an obligation of duty of the highest order, by recognizing as independent States nations which, after deliberately asserting their right to that character, had maintained and established it against all the resistance which had been or could be brought to oppose it." On the 24th of April he gave information that the Spanish Government had disavowed the treaty of the 24th of August, 1821, between the Captain General O'Donoju and Colonel Iturbide, and had denied the authority of the former to conclude it.

On the 12th of February, 1822, the Spanish Extraordinary Cortes adopted the report of a committee proposing the appointment of Commissioners to proceed to South America to negotiate with the revolutionary Patriots concerning the relations to be established thereafter in regard to their connexion with Spain. They declared, at the same time, all treaties made with them before that time by Spanish commanders, implying any acknowledgment of their independence, null and void, as not having been authorized by the Cortes; and on the next day they passed three resolutions, the first annulling expressly the treaty between O'Donoju and Iturbide.

The second, "That the Spanish Government, by a declaration to all others with which it has friendly relations, make known to them that the Spanish nation will regard, at any epoch, as a violation of the treaties, the recognition, either partial or absolute, of the independence of the Spanish provinces of Ultramar, so long as the dissensions which exist between some of them and the Metropolis are not terminated, with whatever else may serve to convince foreign Governments that Spain has not yet renounced any of the rights belonging to it in those countries."

The third resolution recommended to the Government to take all necessary measures, and to apply to the Cortes for the needed resources to preserve and recover the authority of Spain in the ultramarine provinces.

These measures of the Cortes were not known to the President of the United States when he sent to Congress his message of the 8th of March; but information of them was received while the bill making an appropriation for the missions was before Congress, and on the 25th of April a resolution of the Senate requested of the President any information he might have, proper to be disclosed, from our minister at Madrid, or from the Spanish minister resident in this country, concerning the views of Spain relative to the recognition of the independence of the South American colonies and of the dictamen of the Spanish Cortes. In answer to this resolution, the letter from Mr. Anduaga, protesting against the recognition, and one from Mr. Forsyth, inclosing a translation of the dictamen, were transmitted to the Senate, which, with all these documents before them, gave their concurrent sanction, with that of the House of Representatives, to the passage of the bill of appropriation.

This review of the proceedings of the Government of the United States in relation to the independence of Spanish America has been taken to show the consistency of the principles by which they were uniformly dictated, and that they have been always eminently friendly to the new Republics, and disinterested. While Spain maintained a doubtful contest with arms to recover her dominion it was regarded as a civil war. When that contest became, so manifestly desperate that Spanish Viceroy, Governors, and Captain Generals themselves, concluded treaties with the insurgents, virtually acknowledging their independence, the United States frankly and unreservedly recognized the fact, without making their acknowledgment the price of any favor to themselves, and although at the hazard of incurring the displeasure of Spain. In this measure they have taken the lead of the whole civilized world; for, although the Portuguese Brazilian Government had, a few months before, recognized the revolutionary Government of Buenos Ayres, it was at a moment when a projected declaration of their own independence made the question substantially their own cause, and it was presented as an equivalent for a reciprocal recognition of their own much more questionable right to the eastern shore of La Plata.

On the 17th day of June, 1822, Mr. Manuel Torres was received by the President of the United States as the chargé d'affaires from the Republic of Colombia, and the immediate consequence of our recognition was the admission of the vessels of the South American nations, under their own colors, into the ports of the principal maritime nations of Europe.

The European alliance of Emperors and Kings have assumed, as the foundation of human society, the doctrine of unalienable allegiance. Our doctrine is founded upon the principle of unalienable right. The European allies, therefore, have viewed the cause of the South Americans as rebellion against their lawful sovereign. We have considered it as the assertion of natural right. They have invariably shown their disapprobation of the revolution, and their wishes for the restoration of the Spanish power. We have as constantly favored the standard of independence and of America. In contrasting the principles and the motives of the European powers, as manifested in their policy towards South America, with those of the United States, it has not been my intention to boast of our superior purity, or to lay a claim of merit to any extraordinary favor from South America in return. Disinterestedness must be its own reward; but in the establishment of our future political and commercial intercourse with the new Republics it will be necessary to recur often to the principles in which it originated; they will serve to mark the boundaries of the rights which we may justly claim in our future relations with them, and to counteract the efforts which it cannot be doubted European negotiators will continue to make in the furtherance of their monarchical and monopolizing contemplations.

Upon a territory by one-half more extensive than the whole inhabited part of the United States, with a population of less than four millions of souls, the Republic of Colombia has undertaken to establish a single, and not a confederated Government.

Whether this attempt will be found practicable in execution may be susceptible of doubt; but in the new organization of society upon this hemisphere, even unsuccessful experiments lead to results by which the science of Government is advanced and the happiness of man is promoted. The Republic of Colombia has a constitution deliberately formed and adopted upon principles entirely republican, with an elective Legislature in two branches, a distribution of the powers of Government, with the exception of the federative character, almost identical with our own, and articles declaratory of the natural rights of the citizen to personal security, property, and reputation, and of the inviolable liberty of the press. With such a constitution, in such a country, the modifications which experience may prove to be necessary for rendering the political institutions most effectually competent to the ends of civil Government, will make their own way by peaceable and gradual conquests of public opinion. If a single Government should be found inadequate to secure and protect the rights of the people living under it, a federation of Republics may, without difficulty, be substituted in its place. Practical effect having once been given to the principle that lawful government is a compact and not a grant, the pretences for resorting to force for effecting political revolutions disappear. The subordination of the military to the civil power is the only principle yet remaining to be established in Colombia to insure the liberties of the future generations as well as those of the present age; and that subordination, although not directly guaranteed by their present constitution, is altogether conformable to its spirit.

In the letter of February 20, 1821, from the late Mr. Torres, demanding the recognition of the Republic of Colombia, it has been observed that the additional proposal was made of negotiating "treaties of navigation and commerce, founded upon the bases of reciprocal utility and perfect equality, as the most efficacious means of strengthening and increasing the relations of amity between the two Republics."

In compliance with this proposal, among the documents furnished you, for proceeding upon the mission to which you have been appointed, of minister plenipotentiary to the Republic of Colombia, is a full power which will authorize you to negotiate with any plenipotentiary or plenipotentiaries of that Government, duly provided with like powers, such a treaty. The President wishes, however, that every step in such negotiation should be taken with full deliberation. The treaty, if concluded, must, as you are aware, be reserved subject to ratification here, with the advice and consent of the Senate, by the constitutional majority of two-thirds, as by the constitution of Colombia (article 120) their treaties, to be valid, must receive the consent and approbation of their Congress.

Our commercial relations with the Colombian territory are of so recent origin, and have depended so much upon the revolutionary condition of that country, under which they have arisen, that our knowledge of their state and character is very imperfect, although we are certain that they are altogether different from those which may be expected to arise from permanent interests, when the independence of the Republic shall be universally recognized, and a free trade shall be opened to its inhabitants with all parts of the world. The only important point now to be settled, as the radical principle of all our future commercial intercourse, is the basis proposed by Mr. Torres, of reciprocal utility and perfect equality. As the necessary consequence of which, you will claim that, without waiting for the conclusion of a treaty, the commerce and navigation of the United States, in the ports of the Colombian Republic, should be received on the footing of equality with the most favored nation. It is hoped, indeed, that on your arrival at the place of your destination you will find the principle already settled, assurances to that effect having been given by the Minister of Foreign Relations to Mr. Todd.

By an act of the Congress of Colombia of the 25th of September, 1821, an impost duty of  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, was laid upon all articles imported from any part of America, additional to the duty upon the like articles imported from Europe. This discrimination was mentioned to Mr. Torres at the time of his reception. He thought it had arisen only from an inadvertency, and promised to write concerning it to his Government. Mr. Todd was instructed to remonstrate against it, which he accordingly did. From his correspondence and conferences relating to it with the Colombian Minister of Foreign Relations, Dr. Gual, it appears that the object of the law was to burden with heavier duties the indirect trade from Great Britain and France, carried on through the medium of the West India islands, and thereby to present to those powers an inducement to acknowledge the independence of the Republic. However just or reasonable this expedient might be with reference to the relations between the Colombian people and European nations, it was manifestly injurious to the United States; nor was its injustice in any manner compensated by the provisions of another law of the Congress of September 27, 1821, allowing a drawback of duties upon re-exportations in their own vessels of provisions imported from the United States. It is alleged by Dr. Gual that the object of this latter law was to favor the United States by facilitating the indirect trade between them and the British colonies in the West Indies, the direct trade being then interdicted by the laws of the United States and of Great Britain. But this trade was carried on more advantageously to the United States by the way of the Swedish, Danish, and Dutch islands, than it could be by that of the Colombian ports, and the object of favoring their own shipping appears more obviously as the motive of the law, than that of favoring the commerce of the United States. The opening of the direct trade between the United States and the British islands has, at all events, rendered all the provisions of the Colombian law of September 27, 1821, inoperative; and assurances have been given by Dr. Gual that, at the meeting of the Congress which was to take place in March last, measures would be taken for procuring the immediate repeal of the discrimination, to the disadvantage of the United States, prescribed by the law of the 25th of September.

The spirit of the Colombian constitution is explicitly that of entire and unqualified independence, and the sentiments expressed by Dr. Gual to Mr. Todd have been altogether conformable to it. He has declared that the intention of the Government is to treat all foreign nations upon the footing of equal favor and of perfect reciprocity. This is all that the United States will require, and this, so far as their interests are concerned, they have a right to exact.

It had been, in the first instance, proposed by Mr. Torres that the treaty of commerce and navigation should be negotiated here, and he informed me that a minister would be appointed with powers and instructions sufficient for concluding it at this place. Dr. Gual has informed Mr. Todd that the views of the Colombian Government have since undergone a change; and although they have appointed Mr. Salazar as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States, and in March last he was under instructions to proceed forthwith upon his mission to this country, they were, nevertheless, exceedingly desirous that the treaty should be negotiated there.

The President deems it of no material importance to the United States whether the treaty shall be negotiated at Washington or at Bogota; but the proposal having first been made for concluding it here, it was natural to inquire what it was that produced the change in the wishes of the Colombian Government with regard to the seat of the negotiation. Dr. Gual intimated confidentially to Mr. Todd that it had proceeded from two causes: one, the desire to establish a precedent which might prevail upon the great European Governments to negotiate likewise with the Republic at its own capital, and thereby hasten them to the recognition of Colombian independence; and the other, a jealousy of their own negotiators in Europe, who were apt to become themselves entangled with European intrigues, and to involve the Republic in unsuitable and perplexing engagements. With regard to the second of these causes, whatever occasion may have been given to the distrust of their own agents which it avows, it could have no application to their transactions with the United States. By assuming the principles of independence, equality, and reciprocity as the foundations of all our negotiations, we discard all the incentives and all the opportunities for double dealing, overreaching, and corrupt caballing. We shall ask nothing which the Colombian Republic can have any interest to deny. We shall offer nothing for which she may be unwilling to yield the fair equivalent. To the other reason, however, the President the more readily accedes, because, perceiving its full force, it gives him an opportunity of manifesting in action the friendly disposition of the United States towards the Republic, and their readiness to promote by all proper means the recognition of its independence by the great European powers.

In the negotiation of all commercial treaties there is undoubtedly an advantage, at least of convenience, enjoyed by the party which treats at home; and this advantage acquires greater importance when, as is now the case with both parties, the treaty, to become valid, must obtain the assent of legislative assemblies. This advantage, in the ordinary course of things, accrues to the party to whom the proposal of negotiation is first made. Independent, then, of all questions of precedence, and without resorting to the example of the first treaties negotiated by the United States, both of which considerations have been mentioned by Mr. Todd to Dr. Gual, the United States might insist upon having the negotiation concluded here, not only as the first proposal of it was made to them, but because the proposal itself was that it should be concluded here. The President, however, is well aware of the stimulus which a treaty negotiated, and even a negotiation known to be in progress at Bogota, will apply to the attention of European interests, and has no doubt that it will press them to the recognition more powerfully than they have been urged by the example, or are likely to be by the exhortations of the North American Government. You are accordingly furnished, by his direction, with the full power necessary for the conclusion of the treaty.

Dr. Gual informed Mr. Todd that the project of the treaty was already prepared, and that a copy of it would be committed to Mr. Salazar, with powers and instructions authorizing him to conclude the negotiation, if this Government should insist upon its being completed here. The arrival of Mr. Salazar may be expected from day to day. In the meantime, we are yet unacquainted with the particular objects of commercial intercourse which the Colombian Government wishes to regulate with us by treaty. The only object which we shall have much at heart in the negotiation will be the sanction by solemn compact of the broad and liberal principles of independence, equal favors, and reciprocity. With this view I recommend to your particular attention the preamble and first four articles of the first treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and France, concluded on the 6th of February, 1778. The preamble is believed to be the first instance on the diplomatic record of nations upon which the true principles of all fair commercial negotiation between independent States were laid down and proclaimed to the world. That preamble was to the foundation of our commercial intercourse with the rest of mankind what the Declaration of Independence was to that of our internal Government. The two instruments were parts of one and the same system, matured by long and anxious deliberation of the founders of this Union in the ever memorable Congress of 1776; and as the Declaration of Independence was the fountain of all our municipal institutions, the preamble to the treaty with France laid the corner stone for all our subsequent transactions of intercourse with foreign nations. Its principles should be therefore deeply impressed upon the mind of every statesman and negotiator of this Union, and the first four articles of the treaty with France contain the practical exposition of those principles which may serve as models for insertion in the projected treaty, or in any other that we may hereafter negotiate with any of the rising Republics of the south.

There is indeed a principle of still more expansive liberality, which may be assumed as the basis of commercial intercourse between nation and nation. It is that of placing the foreigner, in regard to all objects of navigation and commerce, upon a footing of equal favor with the native citizen, and, to that end, of abolishing all discriminating duties and charges whatsoever. This principle is altogether congenial to the spirit of our institutions, and the main obstacle to its adoption consists in this: that the fairness of its operation depends upon its being admitted universally. For while two maritime and commercial nations should bind themselves to it as a compact operative only between them, a third power might avail itself of its own restrictive and discriminating regulations to secure advantages to its own people, at the expense of both the parties to the treaty. The United States have, nevertheless, made considerable advances in their proposals to other nations towards the general establishment of this most liberal of all principles of commercial intercourse.

On the 3d of March, 1815, immediately after the conclusion of our late war with Great Britain, an act of Congress (United States Laws, vol. 4, p. 824) repealed so much of the discriminating duties of tonnage and impost as were imposed on foreign vessels and merchandise beyond the duties imposed on the same in our own vessels; so far as they respected the produce or manufacture of the nation to which the foreign vessel might belong. The repeal to take effect in favor of any foreign nation whenever the President of the United States should be satisfied that the discriminating or countervailing duties of such foreign nation, so far as they operated to the disadvantage of the United States, had been abolished.

On the 3d of July, 1815, (United States Laws, vol. 6, p. 603,) a convention was concluded with Great Britain, by the second article of which this principle was adopted for the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British territories in Europe, so far as related to duties and charges of tonnage, impost, export, and bounties upon articles of the produce or manufacture of the two countries, respectively. It was partially admitted for drawbacks. But the intercourse between the United States and the British possessions in India was differently regulated by another article of the same convention, and that between the United States and the British colonies in America was expressly excepted from the convention, leaving each party to the exercise, in this respect, of its own rights. This convention, originally limited to four years, was afterwards, by the convention of October 20, 1818, (United States Laws, vol. 6, p. 607,) extended for the term of ten years from that time.

On the 4th of September, 1816, (United States Laws, vol. 6, p. 642,) a treaty with Sweden and Norway was concluded and extended to the Swedish island of St. Bartholomew, in the West Indies; by the second article of which the same principle is established of equal duties and charges, of tonnage, impost, export, and prohibition, upon vessels and their cargoes, being of the produce or manufacture of the respective countries, whether in vessels of the foreigner or the native. The duration of this treaty is limited to the 25th of September, 1826.

On the 20th of April, 1818, (United States Laws, vol. 6, p. 344,) an act of Congress repealed all discriminating duties of tonnage and impost in favor of the vessels of the Netherlands and their cargoes, being of the produce or manufacture of the Territories in Europe, of the King of the Netherlands, or "such produce and manufactures as can only be or most usually are first shipped from a port or place in the Kingdom

oforeaid." Such repeal to take effect from the time the Government of the Netherlands had abolished its discriminating duties upon the vessels of the United States, and on merchandise imported in them, being of the produce or manufacture of the United States.

By an act of March 3, 1819, in addition to the above, (United States Laws, vol. 6, p. 411,) it was extended in all its provisions and limitations to the vessels of Prussia, of the city of Hamburg, and of the city of Bremen.

This same act of March 3, 1819, limited its own duration and that of the act to which it was in addition, and the act of March 3, 1815, itself, to the first of January, 1824.

The provisions of the 3d March, 1815, have been extended by proclamations of the President of the United States, as follows:

1818, July 24, to the Free and Hanseatic city of Bremen.—(United States Laws, vol. 6, p. 599.)

August 1, to the Free and Hanseatic city of Hamburg.—p. 600.

1820, May 4, the Free and Hanseatic city of Lubec.—p. 601.

1821, August 20, to the Kingdom of Norway.—p. 602.

November 22, to the Dukedom of Oldenburg.—p. 774.

You will observe that the act of March 3, 1819, admitted the vessels of Hamburg and Bremen to advantages more extensive than those offered by the act of March, 3 1815, and which had already been secured to them by the proclamations of July 24, and August 1, 1818. The same enlargement of the favors offered by the act of March 3, 1815, is extended to the vessels of the Netherlands and of Prussia; while Norway has the double security, of the principle offered in the act of March 3, 1815, by the stipulation in the treaty with Sweden, and by the President's proclamation under the act.

The proclamation with regard to Norway was founded on an act of the Government of that Kingdom, not extending, however, to Sweden, abolishing all discriminating duties whatsoever in the Norwegian ports between their own vessels and vessels of the United States, and upon their cargoes of whatsoever origin, and whencesoever coming. This is the consummation of the principle of treating the foreigner, in respect to navigation and foreign commerce, upon a footing of equal favor with the native. The Government of Norway, in adopting this regulation, required that it should be reciprocally granted to Norwegian vessels and their cargoes in the ports of the United States. This, however, could be granted only by an act of Congress; and the proclamation could only extend to them under the law that to which they were already entitled by the treaty.

The subject was submitted to Congress by a message from the President towards the close of the first session of the 17th Congress, (May 1, 1822,) and the general policy of our commercial system, with particular reference to the act of March 3, 1815, and the subsequent measures resulting from it, had been reviewed in the message of December 5, 1821, at the commencement of the same session. The principle offered by the Norwegian Government could not, however, then have been accepted without great disadvantage to the United States. Our direct trade with the British colonies in America was interdicted by our own and British laws. That with France was under countervailing regulations of both parties, equivalent to interdiction. To have granted then to Norwegian vessels unrestricted admission into our ports upon the same terms with our own would, in fact, have granted them privileges which our own did not and could not enjoy; our own being under the operation of restrictions and prohibitions, ordained by Britain and France, from which the Norwegian vessels would have been exempt.

Our direct trade with the British American colonies has since been opened, and that with France has been restored; both, however, shackled with countervailing restrictions and regulations, burdensome to those by whom it may be carried on. As the act of Congress of March 3, 1815, and all the regulations founded upon it, will expire on the first of January next, the whole subject will again be before that body at their next session for revival. In this state of things, it may be perhaps most prudent, in the commercial negotiations with the Republic of Colombia, to adhere to the principle of equal favor to the most friendly nation, leaving that of equal favor with the native for future consideration and concert between the parties.

To the same extent, however, as we are already bound by treaty with Great Britain until October, 1828, and with Sweden until September, 1826, you may safely proceed; taking the second article of each of those compacts for a model, and forming an article embracing the stipulations of both. Thus far we may safely go with any one or more foreign nations, without endangering, by the liberality of our engagements with them, the interests of our own country, to be affected by the restrictive ordinances of others. An exception must be made with regard to the ports of St. Augustine and Pensacola, where, by the 15th article of the late treaty with Spain, special privileges are secured to Spanish vessels until the 22d of May, 1833.

Among the usual objects of negotiation in treaties of commerce and navigation are the liberty of conscience and of religious worship. Articles to this effect have been seldom admitted in Roman Catholic countries, and are even interdicted by the present constitution of Spain. The South American Republics have been too much under the influence of the same intolerant spirit; but the Colombian constitution is honorably distinguished by exemption from it. The 10th and 11th articles of our treaty with Prussia, or articles to the like effect, may be proposed for insertion in the projected treaty; and after setting the first example in South America of a constitution unsullied by prohibitions of religious liberty, Colombia will deserve new honors in the veneration of present and future ages by giving her positive sanction to the freedom of conscience, and by stipulating it in her first treaty with these United States. It is, in truth, an essential part of the system of American independence. Civil, political, commercial, and religious liberty, are but various modifications of one great principle, founded in the unalienable rights of human nature, and before the universal application of which the colonial domination of Europe over the American hemisphere has fallen, and is crumbling into dust. Civil liberty can be established on no foundation of human reason which will not at the same time demonstrate the right to religious freedom. The tendency of the spirit of the age is so strong towards religious liberty that we cannot doubt it will soon banish from the constitutions of the southern Republics of this hemisphere all those intolerant religious establishments with which they have hitherto been trammelled. Religious and military coercion will be alike discarded from all the institutions framed for the protection of human rights in civil society of independent nations, and the freedom of opinion and of faith will be guaranteed by the same sanction as the rights to personal liberty and security. To promote this event by all the moral influence which we can exercise, whether of example, of friendly counsel, or of persuasion, is among the duties which devolve upon us in the formation of our future relations with our southern neighbors; and in the intercourse which is hereafter to subsist between us, as their citizens who may visit or transiently reside with us will enjoy the benefit of religious freedom in its utmost latitude, we are bound to claim for our countrymen who may occasionally dwell for a time with them the reciprocal exercise of the same natural rights.

In the present imperfect state of our information with regard to the existing commerce between the two countries, and the uncertainty as to what its future and permanent relations may be, it would be useless to enter into any further detail of articles which it may be proper to propose for the intended treaty of commerce. The Republic of Colombia, if permanently organized to embrace the whole territory which it now claims, and blessed with a Government effectually protective of the rights of its people, is undoubtedly destined to become hereafter one of the mightiest nations of the earth. Its central position upon the surface of the globe, directly communicating at once with the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans, north and south, with the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf of Mexico, brings it into relations of proximity with every other part of the world; while the number and variety of its ports on every sea by which it is surrounded, the magnitude and extent of its navigable rivers, three of which, the Amazon, the Orinoco, and the Magdalena, are among the largest in the world, intersecting with numberless tributary streams, and in every direction the continent of South America, and furnishing the means of water communication from every point of its circumference to every spot upon its surface; the fertility of its soil; the general healthiness and beauty of its climate; the profusion with which it breeds and bears the precious and the useful metals, present a combination of elements unparalleled in the location of the human race, and relieve, at least from all charge of enthusiasm, the sentiment expressed by the late Mr. Torres, that this republic appeared to have been destined by the Author of Nature "as the centre and the empire of the human family."

But it is to man, placed in a Paradise like this, that Nature, with her loudest, voice exclaims: "God to thee has done his part—do thine;" and the part of man, so gifted and so endowed, is to enjoy and to communicate the bounties of Providence so largely lavished upon him, and not to fancy himself destined to the empire of the human family. If the natural advantages bestowed upon the Colombian territory were to be improved by its inhabitants only for purposes of empire, that which nature has bestowed as a blessing upon them would, in its consequences prove a curse inflicted upon the rest of mankind. The territory of Colombia contains, at this moment, little more than three million and a half of souls. Were it only as populous as its late parent country, Spain, it would bear one hundred millions; and if as populous as France, nearly three times that number. At the most rapid rate of increase which human population has ever attained, even a doubling every quarter of a century, the Republic of Colombia, for two hundred years to come, may devote all her exertions to the improvement of her internal means of subsistence for the multiplying myriads of her people, without seeking support from the extension of her empire beyond her own borders. Let her look to commerce and navigation, and not to empire, as her means of communication with the rest of the human family. These are the principles upon which our confederated Republic is founded, and they are those upon which we hope our sisters of the southern continent will ultimately perceive it to be for their own welfare, no less than for that of the world, that they should found themselves.

The materials of commercial intercourse between the United States and the Colombian Republic are at present not many. Our exports to it hitherto have been confined to flour, rice, salted provisions, lumber, a few manufactured articles, warlike stores, and arms, and some East India productions, for which we have received cocoa, coffee, indigo, hides, copper, and specie. Much of this trade has originated and has continued only by the war in which that country has been engaged, and will cease with it. As producing and navigating nations, the United States and Colombia will be rather competitors and rivals than customers to each other. But as navigators and manufacturers, we are already so far advanced in a career upon which they are yet to enter, that we may, for many years after the conclusion of the war, maintain with them a commercial intercourse, highly beneficial to both parties, as carriers to and for them of numerous articles of manufacture and of foreign produce. It is the nature of commerce, when unobstructed by interference of authority, to find its own channels and to make its own way. Let us only not undertake to regulate that which will best regulate itself.

In the conferences between Dr. Gual and Mr. Todd, the Colombian Minister of Foreign Affairs has spoken of treaties, almost treaties of alliance, concluded by the Colombian plenipotentiary, Mosquera, with the Governments of Peru and of Chile, and which he expected would also be shortly concluded with Buenos Ayres. The purport of these treaties was mentioned by Dr. Gual only in general terms, but he said that Mr. Salazar would be authorized to communicate copies of them to this Government, and eventually to propose that the United States should accede to them, or take a part in the system which it was their purpose to originate. In January last, about the same time when Dr. Gual was making this confidential communication to Mr. Todd, we learn, by despatches from Mr. Forbes, that Mr. Mosquera was at Buenos Ayres, and had made his proposals of negotiation to the Government there. Mr. Forbes speaks doubtfully of his prospects of success. The general intention, but not the specific purport of the treaties had also been communicated by Mr. Mosquera to Mr. Forbes. But the Colombian minister had been more confidential with Mr. Prevost, who, in a despatch dated the 14th of December last, states that he had obtained a sight of the original treaty. He describes it in a preceding letter as a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, containing "a pledge from each of the contracting parties to send deputies to the Isthmus, within a limited time, for the double purpose of effecting an union in support of a representative system throughout, and of preventing partial associations with any one of the powers of Europe. An agent (he adds) has gone to Mexico with the same object; and it is in contemplation, as soon as the several treaties shall be ratified by Colombia, to invite a representation from the United States to preside at a meeting intended to assimilate the politics of the south with those of the north;" and in a letter of 14th December, after having seen the treaty, he says: "It embraces in the most express terms the several objects to which I alluded, together with a stipulation not to enter into partial arrangements with Spain, and not to listen to overtures on her part unaccompanied with an acknowledgment of the independence of all."

Mr. Prevost, as well as Dr. Gual, entertains higher expectations of the success of this negotiation at Buenos Ayres than Mr. Forbes. Mr. Prevost thinks that it must succeed, although the Government of Buenos Ayres is secretly averse to it, and implicated in secret intrigues with the Portuguese Government and General Le Cor for a confederacy of a different character. Dr. Gual told Mr. Todd that proposals had been made by the Portuguese Government at Lisbon, to Colombia, for a general confederacy of all America, North and South, together with the Constitutional Governments of Portugal and Spain, as a counterpoise to the European Holy Alliance; but he said they had been rejected on account of their European aspect. Loose and indefinite projects of the same kind have been presented by the present

Portuguese Government to us, but they have never been considered even as objects of deliberation. Brazil has declared its own independence of Portugal, and constituted itself into an Empire, with an Emperor at its head. General Le Cor has lost the real command of his own army, and has been, or cannot fail shortly to be, compelled to embark, with all his European Portuguese troops, for Lisbon. Then will come the question between Buenos Ayres and Brazil, for Montevideo and the Oriental Band of La Plata.

Of this mighty movement in human affairs, mightier far than that of the downfall of the Roman Empire, the United States may continue to be, as they have been hitherto, the tranquil but deeply attentive spectators. They may, also, in the various vicissitudes by which it must be followed, be called to assume a more active and leading part in its progress. Floating, undigested purposes of this great American confederation have been for some time fermenting in the imaginations of many speculative statesmen; nor is the idea to be disdainfully rejected because its magnitude may appal the understanding of politicians accustomed to the more minute but more complicated machinery of a contracted political standard.

So far as the proposed Colombian confederacy has for its object a combined system of total and unqualified independence of Europe, to the exclusion of all partial compositions of any one of the emancipated colonies with Spain, it will have the entire approbation and good wishes of the United States, but will require no special agency of theirs to carry it into effect.

So far as its purposes may be to concert a general system of popular representation for the government of the several independent States which are floating from the wreck of the Spanish power in America, the United States will still cheer it with their approbation, and speed with their good wishes its success.

And so far as its objects may be to accomplish a meeting, at which the United States should preside, to assimilate the politics of the south with those of the north, a more particular and definite view of the end proposed by this design, and of the means by which it is to be effected, will be necessary to enable us to determine upon our concurrence with it. An agent from France, named Molién, and Mr. Lorich, the Consul General of Sweden in the United States, arrived at Bogota in January last. Dr. Gual told Mr. Todd that Molién had no letters or avowed powers, though he had intimated he was there by authority; that he was considered as a spy on behalf of a faction in France. "He had insinuated that the United States were influenced by interested motives in recognizing the new Governments in South America; that our influence in Europe had been impaired by a measure which was considered premature; and that he supposed we were now endeavoring to procure exclusive advantages for having been the first to recognize." And Dr. Gual added, that Mr. Molién undertook "to give him some advice as to our views"—Mr. Lorich came with authority.

The political systems of Europe are all founded upon partial rights and exclusive privileges. The colonial system had no other basis; and having no generous or liberal views of their own, it is not surprising that they should entertain and disseminate suspicions of the disinterestedness of others. The French Government sends an agent to Bogota, without daring to trust him with a credential or an avowed power; and he executes his commission by misrepresenting our motives, upon suspicions which those to whom he makes the misrepresentation know to be unfounded, and by testifying to those who were benefitted by our recognition that we had made it by the sacrifice of some part of our influence in Europe. It must be admitted that the address of the agent in the performance of his trust was upon a level with the candor and frankness in which it originated.

We are well aware that our recognition of South American independence was not palatable to the taste of any of the European Governments. But we felt that it was a subject upon which it became us to take the lead, and as we knew that the European Governments, sooner or later, must and would, whether with good or with bad grace, follow our example, we determined that both Europe and America should have the benefit of it. We hope, also, and this is the only return which we ask, and have a right to ask, from the South Americans for our forwardness in their favor, that Europe will be compelled to follow the whole of our example—that is, to recognize without condition and without equivalent. We claim no exclusive privilege for ourselves. We trust to the sense of justice, as well as to the interest of the South Americans, the denial of all exclusive privileges to others. The Colombian Government, at various times, have manifested a desire that the United States should take some further and active part in obtaining the recognition of their independence by the European Governments, and particularly by Great Britain. This has been done even before it was solicited. All the ministers of the United States in Europe have, for many years, been instructed to promote the cause, by any means consistent with propriety and adapted to their end, at the respective places of their residence. The formal proposal of a concerted recognition was made to Great Britain before the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle. At the request of Mr. Torres, on his dying bed, and signified to us after his decease, Mr. Rush was instructed to give every aid in his power, without offence to the British Government, to obtain the admission of Mr. Ravenga; of which instruction we have recent assurances from Mr. Rush that he is constantly mindful. Our own recognition undoubtedly opened all the ports of Europe to the Colombian flag, and your mission to Colombia, as well as those to Buenos Ayres and Chile, cannot fail to stimulate the cabinets of maritime Europe, if not by the liberal motives which influenced us; at least by selfish impulses, to a direct, simple, and unconditional recognition. We shall pursue this policy steadily through all the changes to be foreseen of European affairs. There is every reason to believe that the preponderating tendency of the war in Spain will be to promote the universal recognition of all the South American Governments; and, at all events, our course will be to promote it by whatever influence we may possess."

"One of the complaints of Mr. Lowry was relative to the case of the ship Caravan, from Providence, captured by a Colombian cruiser and carried into Laguayra, where the vessel had been cleared as neutral, and the cargo condemned as enemy's property. Mr. Lowry had invoked the stipulations of various treaties, establishing and recognizing the principle that free ships make free goods, the application of which is denied by Dr. Gual, who appealed to the instructions from Mr. Pickering, in 1797, to Messrs. Marshall, Pinckney, and Gerry, our envoys to France.

By the general usage of nations, independent of treaty stipulations, the property of an enemy is liable to capture in the vessel of a friend. It is not possible to justify this rule upon any sound principle of the law of nature; for by that law the belligerent party has no right to pursue or attack his enemy without the jurisdiction of either of them. The high seas are a general jurisdiction common to all, qualified by a special jurisdiction of each nation over its own vessels. As the theatre of general and common jurisdiction, the vessels of one nation and their commanders have no right to exercise over those of another any act of authority whatsoever. This is universally admitted in time of peace. War gives the belligerent a right to pursue his enemy within the jurisdiction common to both, but not into the special jurisdiction of the neutral party. If the belligerent has a right to take the property of his enemy on the seas, the neutral has a right to carry and protect the property of his friend on the same element. War gives the belligerent no natural right to take the property of his enemy from the vessel of his friend. But as the belligerent is armed, and the neutral, as such, is defenceless, it has grown into usage that the belligerent should take the property of his enemy; paying the neutral his freight and submitting the question of facts to the tribunals of the belligerent party. It is evident, however, that this usage has no foundation in natural right, but has arisen merely from force used by the belligerent, and which the neutral in the origin did not resist because he had not the power. But it is a usage harsh and cruel in its operation and unjust in its nature; and it never fails in time of maritime war to produce irritation and animosity between the belligerent and the neutral. So universally has this been found to be its consequence, that all the maritime nations of modern Europe have shown their sense of it by stipulating in treaties the contrary principle, namely, that the property of an enemy shall be protected in the vessel of a friend. Great Britain, herself the most unwilling to admit this principle, because the most enabled to use the force upon which the usage is founded, has recognized the superior justice and expediency of the other principle, by stipulating it at distant intervals of time in two treaties with France: the treaty of Utrecht and the treaty of commerce of 1786. In the seven years' war, the King of Prussia resisted the capture by British vessels of the property of their enemies in the vessels of his subjects, then neutrals, and made reprisals upon British property for such captures. The question was then ultimately settled by a compromise, under which the British Government paid a large sum of money for indemnity to the Prussian subjects who had suffered by those captures. The armed neutrality of the American war is a memorable example of the testimony by all the civilized nations of the world to the principle, that the protection of all property, excepting contraband of war, on board of neutral vessels, by neutral force, is of natural right; and of this principle there can be no question. If, however, a belligerent power, founded upon the usage which has superseded the natural right, practices the seizure and condemnation of enemy's property found in the vessel of a friend, it remains for the neutral to decide whether he will acquiesce in the usage, or whether he will maintain his natural right by force. No neutral nation is bound to submit to the usage; for it has none of the properties which can give to any usage the sanction of obligatory law. It is not reasonable. It is not conformable to the law of nature. It is not uninterrupted. But reduced to the option of maintaining its right by force, or of acquiescing in the disturbance of it, which has been usual, the neutral nation may yield at one time to the usage, without sacrificing her right to vindicate by force the security of her flag at another. And the belligerent nation, although disposed to admit the right of neutrals to protect the property of her enemy upon the seas, may yet justly refuse the benefit of this principle, unless admitted also by the enemy for the protection of her property by the same neutral flag. Thus stands the state of this question upon the foundation of natural, voluntary, and customary law. How stands it between us and the Republic of Colombia on the ground of conventional law? By a treaty between the United States and Spain, concluded at a time when Colombia was a part of the Spanish dominions, and, so far as the Spanish laws would admit, enjoyed the benefit of its stipulations, the principle that free ships make free goods was expressly recognized and established. Is it asserted that, by her declaration of independence, Colombia has been entirely released from all the obligations by which, as a part of the Spanish nation, she was bound to other nations? This principle is not tenable. To all the engagements of Spain with other nations, affecting their rights and interests, Colombia, so far as she was affected by them, remains bound in honor and in justice. The stipulation now referred to is of that character, and the United States, besides the natural right of protecting by force, in their vessels on the seas, the property of their friends, though enemies of the Republic of Colombia, have the additional claim to the benefit of the principle by an express compact with Spain, made when Colombia was a Spanish country. Again, by the late treaty of February 22, 1819, between the United States and Spain, it is agreed that the 15th article of the treaty of 1795, in which it is stipulated that the flag shall cover the property, shall be so understood with respect to those powers who recognize the principle; but if either of the two contracting parties shall be at war with a third party, and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral shall cover the property of enemies whose Governments acknowledge the principle, and not of others.

This treaty having been concluded after the territories now composing the Republic of Colombia had ceased to acknowledge the authority of Spain, they are not parties to it, but their rights and duties in relation to the subject-matter remain as they had existed before it was made. Nor will she be affected by it at all, if she continues to acknowledge in her new national character, and with reference to the United States, the principle that free ships make free goods, which was the conventional law between them while Colombia was a part of Spain.

You will urge all these considerations upon the Colombian Minister of Foreign Affairs, to obtain restitution of the cargo of the Caravan, or indemnity for it. The claim rests upon foundations so solid that it is earnestly hoped your representations in its favor will be successful; and in the negotiation of the treaty you will press in like manner for the insertion of an article of the same purport as that of our last treaty with Spain above recited. This principle can with safety be recognized only to that extent; and to that extent the United States would willingly assent to it with every other nation. It is a principle favorable to the rights of peace, and of pacific spirit and tendency. It is recommended by every humane and liberal consideration as a rule of universal application. But the nation which would enjoy the benefit of it as a neutral, or as a passive belligerent resorting to the neutral flag, must also recognize it as an active belligerent, and suffer the property of her enemy to be conveyed safely by the same flag which safely conveys hers; otherwise the liberal principle of itself is turned to the advantage of the belligerent which rejects it, and the mild spirit of peace is made subservient to the unfeeling rapacity of war.

A resolution of the House of Representatives, of the late session of Congress, requests the President of the United States to enter upon and to prosecute from time to time such negotiations with the several maritime powers of Europe and America as he may deem expedient, for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade, and its ultimate denunciation as piracy, under the law of nations, by the consent of the civilized world.

In pursuance of this object, you will communicate to the Colombian Government copies of the several acts of our Congress, for the suppression of the slave trade, of the 20th of April, 1818, (United States Laws, vol. vi, p. 325,) of March 3, 1819, (p. 435,) and of May 15, 1820, (p. 529,) pointing their attention particularly to the fourth and fifth sections of the last, which subject to the penalties of piracy every citizen of the United States guilty of active participation in the African slave trade. The adoption of this principle in the legislative code of all the maritime nations would, of itself, probably suffice for the suppression of the trade. But as it would yet not authorize the armed vessel of any one nation to capture those of another engaged in the trade, a stipulation to that effect may be agreed to by the treaty, conditioned that the captor shall deliver over the captured party to the tribunals of his own country for trial, to which should be added some guard of responsibility upon the capturing officer to prevent the abusive exercise of his power.

There are several cases of claims by the citizens of the United States upon the Colombian Government, which were given in charge to Mr. Todd, and concerning which he has been often promised by Dr. Gual that satisfactory proceedings would be had. Some of them are already of several years' standing, and indemnity was acknowledged to be due upon them so long since as when the late Commodore Perry was at Angostura. Mr. Todd will put you in possession of the papers relating to them, and you will follow up the demand of indemnities with all the earnestness and perseverance which their justice and the delays already interposed may require.

Most of them are complaints which have arisen from maritime captures. Before the establishment of the Republic of Colombia, the Venezuelan revolutionary authorities for some time countenanced an irregular system of maritime warfare, which soon degenerated into absolute piracy. It became a subject of very earnest remonstrance by the Government of the United States, whose citizens suffered severely under its depredations, whose laws were continually outraged by its operative agents, and whose good faith and justice towards other nations it tended very seriously to implicate. Since the organization of the new Republic there has been less reason for complaints, but satisfaction has not yet been made for those which had arisen before. A list of the cases committed to Mr. Todd, and copies of papers recently received at this Department from the Delaware Insurance Company at Philadelphia, relating to the schooner Minerva, are now furnished you.

In this case of the Minerva, the sentence is given by an assessor, acting as a Court of Admiralty, and confirmed by the Commandant General of Marine at Santa Martha. It refers to the 19th article of an ordinance of March 4, 1817, which is no doubt a law relating to prizes. You are requested to procure and transmit to this Department a copy of that ordinance, and also exact information of the organization of the Admiralty Courts, and any laws relating to prize or privateering which may be in force, whether Spanish law continued or new law promulgated since the revolution.

Our intercourse with the Republic of Colombia, and with the territories of which it is composed, is of recent origin, formed while their own condition was altogether revolutionary and continually changing its aspect. Our information concerning them is imperfect, and among the most important objects of your mission will be that of adding to its stores; of exploring the untrodden ground, and of collecting and transmitting to us the knowledge by which the friendly relations between the two countries may be extended and harmonized to promote the welfare of both, with due regard to the peace and good will of the whole family of civilized man. It is highly important that the first foundations of the permanent future intercourse between the two countries should be laid in principles benevolent and liberal in themselves, congenial to the spirit of our institutions, and consistent with the duties of universal philanthropy.

In all your consultations with the Government to which you will be accredited, bearing upon its political relations with this Union, your unvarying standard will be the spirit of independence and of freedom, as equality of rights and favors will be that of its commercial relations. The emancipation of the South American continent opens to the whole race of man prospects of futurity, in which this Union will be called, in the discharge of its duties to itself and to unnumbered ages of posterity, to take a conspicuous and leading part. It involves all that is precious in hope, and all that is desirable in existence, to the countless millions of our fellow creatures which, in the progressive revolution of time, this hemisphere is destined to rear and to maintain.

That the fabric of our social connexions with our southern neighbors may rise, in the lapse of years, with a grandeur and harmony of proportion corresponding with the magnificence of the means placed by Providence in our power, and in that of our descendants, its foundations must be laid in principles of politics and of morals new and distasteful to the thrones and dominations of the elder world, but co-extensive with the surface of the globe, and lasting as the changes of time.

APPROPRIATION TO CARRY INTO EFFECT A MISSION TO PANAMA.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS MARCH 17, 1826.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I now submit to the consideration of Congress the propriety of making the appropriation necessary for carrying into effect the appointment of a mission to the Congress at Panama.

[1ST SESSION.]

CLAIM OF RICHARD W. MEADE ON THE SPANISH GOVERNMENT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE MARCH 21, 1826.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Select Committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Richard W. Meade, reported:

That, by the fifth clause of the ninth article of the treaty between the United States and Spain, by which Florida was ceded to the United States, the Government of the United States renounced to Spain "all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Spanish Government, statements of which, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, have been presented to the Department of State, or to the minister of the United States in Spain, since the date of the convention of 1802, and until the signature of the treaty."

By the eleventh article of that treaty the United States undertook to make satisfaction for these claims to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars. To ascertain the full amount and validity of these claims, it was stipulated that a commission, to consist of three Commissioners, should be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, which commission should meet at the City of Washington, and, within the space of three years from the time of their first meeting, should receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of all claims included within the renunciations of the treaty.

The Commissioners were accordingly appointed, and they commenced their sessions in June, 1821, and closed them in June, 1824. Mr. Meade, among others, presented his claims on the Spanish Government to the Commissioners for ascertainment and decision. The sum claimed at that time was $491,153 62; and it was conceded that Mr. Meade had presented a statement of his claims on the Spanish Government to the Department of State, and to the minister of the United States in Spain, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, since the date of the convention of 1802, and before the signature of the treaty of 1819; and that, therefore, if he could establish the amount and validity of his claims by "suitable authentic testimony," he came within the fifth clause of the ninth article, above recited. Mr. Meade failed, in the opinion of the Commissioners, to prove, by sufficient evidence, the amount and validity of his claims, and they were, therefore, on the 7th of June, 1824, finally rejected.

Under these circumstances, it is not deemed necessary that the committee should go into an investigation of the claims of Mr. Meade, nor to inquire whether the evidence adduced to the Commissioners was sufficient to establish the validity of his claims, because the Commissioners, in the opinion of the committee, were constituted the sole and exclusive judges of that question.

It will be proper to inquire what were the obligations imposed by the treaty on the Government of the United States. It assumed the payment of the claims of its citizens to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars. To distribute this sum among its citizens, proportionate to their respective claims, it undertook to establish a commission, to be composed of three of its citizens, to ascertain, by "suitable authentic testimony," the full amount and validity of these claims; and it may be conceded that a further obligation was imposed on the Government, not, indeed, in terms, but impliedly, to be careful in appointing persons to form the commission, to select men of known intelligence, integrity, and learning; and when the claims presented to the Commissioners for decision had been adjusted and admitted, to pay them, provided they did not exceed five millions of dollars; and if they did exceed that sum, to pay them pro rata. All these obligations the government has performed with the utmost sincerity and good faith.

It will not be pretended that the Government stipulated that the decisions of the Commissioners should be infallible; it is enough that the commission was composed of learned and discreet men, whose decisions would be respected in all parts of the world. But it is by no means intended to insinuate that the correctness of the final rejection of Mr. Meade's memorial is questioned, because the committee have not permitted themselves to go into a consideration of that matter. By undertaking to review the proceedings of the Commissioners a wide door would be opened to a flood of claims to an amount which it was not in the contemplation of the Government to pay when it entered into the stipulations of the treaty. A fund of five millions of dollars was provided, to be distributed, by the adjudication of the Commissioners, among citizens having valid claims on the Spanish Government. This distribution has been made, and the whole fund is exhausted. The amount of claims exhibited to the Commissioners, the committee are informed, exceeded forty millions of dollars; so that, if the proceedings of the Board are to be reviewed and investigated anew, as but about five and a half millions of dollars were allowed, claims to the amount of thirty-five millions more are yet to be investigated and provided for. In such a course of proceeding there is no mutuality of advantage between the Government and the claimants; for if an erroneous decision shall have been made against the Government, there is no possible means by which the injury can be redressed.

It is insisted that the United States, having renounced these claims to the Spanish Government, are under a moral obligation to discharge them all, without regard to the limited sum specified in the treaty. But without the aid of the Government these claims on the Spanish nation never could have been enforced. Its aid was invoked; it was extended to them; and the most beneficial terms of compromise were made which could be obtained without the sacrifice of a much larger sum than prudence would authorize to be given for the ceded territory. Nor should it be forgotten that the sum of five millions was not the only consideration given for the cession of Florida. We, at the same time, surrendered a large and valuable territory lying beyond our present southern limits; and without this treaty all the claims would have remained unpaid to a much more distant day than the present; and if we looked to the exhausted state of the Spanish treasury and its impoverished resources, perhaps that period never would have arrived. Statements of these claims were presented to the Government, soliciting its interposition in their favor, and the consequence was the treaty of 1819, by which the Government assumed the payment of these claims to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars. Had the aid of the Government not been asked, the fate of the claimants must have rested altogether upon the honor and justice of the Spanish nation; but the interposition of the Government being required, the claimants were bound to submit either to the fate of war or to such amicable compromise as could be made in their behalf. And it may be truly said that, in estimating the value of these claims, their nominal amount is not to be looked to only; but the spes recuperandi is the standard by which their just value is to be estimated. The certainty of having a smaller sum paid by this Government would, by a prudent man, be valued higher than the contingent prospect of obtaining a larger sum from Spain.

But a further view of this case, from the facts presented, is required. Mr. Meade's claim was disallowed by the Commissioners because the evidence which he adduced to them was not sufficient to prove the amount or validity of his claim; and it is believed they went so far as to say that it was incompetent evidence, and wholly inadmissible to prove anything before them. This was a matter of which they, by the treaty, were made the exclusive judges. This opinion was rendered on the 16th of April, 1823; and on the next day Mr. Meade filed a specification of the documents which he requested the Commissioners to demand of the Spanish Government, under the following clause of the 11th article of the treaty, viz: "And the Spanish Government shall furnish all such documents and elucidations as may be in their possession for the adjustment of the said claims according to the principles of justice, the laws of nations, and the stipulations of the treaty between the two parties, of October 27, 1795; the said documents to be specified when demanded at the instance of the said Commissioners;" and on the following day the Commissioners requested the Secretary of State to adopt such means as he should think proper to require of the Spanish authorities the documents so specified. On the 13th of May the Secretary of State instructed Mr. Nelson, who was then about to depart this country as minister to Spain, to demand the specified documents from the Spanish Government. These documents were accordingly demanded; but owing to the distracted situation of the country, being then recently overrun by French troops, the documents were not obtained so as to enable Mr. Meade to lay further proof before the Board before the termination of the commission; nor has the demand of our Government for these proofs yet been complied with. The consequence has been, that the Commissioners, adhering to their decision of the 16th of April, 1823, and no further proof being presented to them, on the 7th of June, the day previous to the close of their sessions, finally rejected the claim. This statement is made to show that no negligence is imputable to the Government of the United States, in performing its duty under the treaty, to demand the desired documents; for the earliest opportunity was taken by the Secretary of State to instruct our minister to make the demand; and if there has been a failure of duty anywhere, it is attributable to Spain. That Government engaged to furnish the documents when demanded, and it has not furnished them. If, therefore, a fair claim (about which the committee express no opinion) has been lost through the fault of the Spanish authorities, who ought to make good that loss? Spain, or the United States, to whom no blame or negligence can be imputed?

Every suitor prepares his cause for the hearing. He comes to it, if unprepared, at his peril. It is not the duty of the tribunal which is to decide his cause to instruct him beforehand as to the nature of the evidence which it will require to sustain his case. That is the duty of others; and if he is erroneously advised, it is his misfortune. The documents, which it is alleged are to be found in the Spanish archives, and which, it is contended, would sustain Mr. Meade's claim, were not specified to the Commissioners until the 17th of April, 1823, when nearly two-thirds of the time limited for the duration of the Board had expired. Had the specification of the documents been made at the commencement of the sessions, as Spain was at that time, and for a long time after, free from invasion, the probability is, that all the documents relating to the claim might have been procured in season to have enabled the Commissioners to judge whether they would sustain the claim, or any part of it. That these documents were not earlier demanded was not the fault of any agent of the Government. The Commissioners, after having decided the cause against Mr. Meade, upon the evidence on which he relied, indulged him to the last moment to enable him to produce further proof; and upon his failing to do so, they finally dismissed his memorial. The committee, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the memorialist ought not to be granted.

EXPENSE OF THE MISSION TO PANAMA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 23, 1826.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 23, 1826.

SIR: In compliance with the request which you made yesterday, at the instance of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, I have the honor to transmit the following estimate of the sum which it may be proper to appropriate for the proposed mission to Panama, agreeably to the recommendation of the President, viz:

For the outfits of two Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary.....	$18,000
Salaries for the same, at $9,000 a year, for one year.....	18,000
Secretary of the mission, at $2,000 a year, for one year.....	2,000
Contingent expenses of the mission.....	2,000
	40,000

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

HON. LOUIS McLANE,

Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 24, 1826.

SIR: In reply to the note which you did me the honor to address to me this morning, by direction of the Committee of Ways and Means, I have to state that it is not contemplated by the President to allow Mr. Anderson more than one salary during his service in the proposed mission to Panama. The affairs of the legation at Bogota will be placed in charge of some other person during Mr. Anderson's absence, and he will not then receive his salary as minister to Colombia.

In respect to the other inquiry contained in your note, as to the "usual allowance for outfit made to a minister abroad, when transferred temporarily to another Court, or on a new mission," I have the honor to state that the practice has always been to allow a full outfit where the transfer has been temporary, but the amount of the allowance has varied according to circumstances. The general rule has been, to allow a full outfit when the transfer from one mission to another has been permanent. If the requisite authority be conferred, the President is disposed, considering the importance and the peculiarity of the mission to Panama, to allow to Mr. Anderson a full outfit.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

HON. LOUIS McLANE,
Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 19, 1826.

SIR: In answer to the letter which you addressed to me this day, I have the honor to state that no information is possessed in this Department which enables me to determine the probable duration of the Congress at Panama, and the continuance of ministers who may be sent there from the United States. Upon the supposition that the instructions with which the ministers from the several powers may be charged embrace all the matters to be treated of in their negotiations, I should imagine that a period of six months after they have entered on their conferences might be sufficient to bring them to a close. But the arrival of some of them at Panama may be delayed; they may have occasion to send home for fresh instructions; and these or other causes may prolong the Congress beyond that period. In asking an appropriation for the term of one year, the hope was indulged that in the course of that time the negotiations might be completed, including the time of the ministers going and returning. As their salaries are annual, if the mission should terminate in less than a year, less than a year's salary would be paid. If it requires a longer time, the House of Representatives would, of course, have to pass upon any additional appropriation that might be required.

With respect to the outfit to Mr. Anderson, in proposing it the Department has been guided by what has been most usual in the case of the transfer of a minister from one Government to another, and by considerations connected with the importance of the mission, the place where the Congress is to be held, and unavoidable expenses which may be incurred in the interchanges of civility and hospitality, which may be more frequent among the ministers who attend the Congress, in consequence of the place not being the seat of any Government. Circumstances may also occur to require, for the preservation of their health, the removal of the Congress to some place in that respect more eligible.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

HON. LOUIS McLANE,

Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives.

No. 426.

[1ST SESSION.]

ON THE MISSION TO PANAMA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 25, 1826.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States to the House of Representatives, of the 15th instant, with the documents accompanying it, having had the same under consideration, reported:

That it appears from the above named message and papers that an invitation has been received by the United States from the Republics of Colombia, Central America, and Mexico, to attend the Congress about to be held at Panama. It appears that this invitation was accepted by the President, on the condition that the nomination of Commissioners for the mission should receive the advice and consent of the Senate. This advice and consent having been constitutionally expressed, in the confirmation of the ministers nominated by the President, the Concurrence of the House of Representatives is requested, as necessary to carry the mission into effect, by an appropriation to defray the expense of it. This concurrence being "subject to the free determination" of the House, the committee have regarded it as their duty to the House to inquire into the expediency of accepting this invitation. The ordinary courtesy of nations in friendship with each other, and the peculiar interest which, for the strongest reasons, the people of the United States have ever felt, and must ever feel, in the new American Republics, would seem to dictate the propriety of accepting this invitation, unless there were sufficient reasons for declining it. No such reasons are believed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to exist.

In order to present the subject in its true light to the House, the committee would first make a remark on the general nature of the assembly designated by the name of the Congress of Panama. The term Congress, it need scarcely be observed, is by no means to be here understood in the sense in which it is applied to some other political assemblies. The Congress of Panama is not a representative delegation, forming a branch of a Government, like the present Congress of the United States. It is not a body in which the government of several confederated sovereign States is deposited, like the old American Congress. Neither is it a personal meeting of Sovereigns, like the recent Congresses of Europe. It is an assembly of diplomatic agents, clothed with no powers except to discuss and to negotiate, deputed by Governments whose constitutions require that all engagements with foreign powers shall be subject to the ratification of some organic body at home; and the more effectually to guard against mistake, even of the design in which this Congress has been proposed, it is stipulated, in the several treaties formed by Colombia with the other new Republics, that this meeting at Panama "shall not affect in any manner the exercise of the national sovereignty of the contracting parties in regard to their laws and the establishment and form of their respective Governments."

Such is the general nature of the proposed Congress, as appears from the papers referred to this committee. Of its objects the committee will, in the course of this report, more particularly speak. They are, in general, all subjects interesting to the powers represented at the Congress, and susceptible of discussion at such a meeting. The minister of the Colombian Republic, with the liberal design, as it would appear, of excluding the supposition that his own Government, or those which joined it, in inviting us to the Congress, had any wish to exercise a dictation as to what subjects should exclusively be discussed, has observed, in his letter to the Secretary of State of November 2, 1825, that the topics of discussion therein enumerated are designed merely "as suggestions by way of example," while "it is left to the wisdom of the Governments and the judgment of their representatives to propose whatever may be esteemed of common good to the new hemisphere." In the same letter of the Colombian minister to the Secretary of State the following remarks also occur: "At Panama the best and most opportune occasion is offered to the United States to fix some principles of international law, the unsettled state of which has caused much evil to humanity. It is to be presumed that this Government (the United States of America) possesses more light upon the subject than the other States of our hemisphere, both from its experience during the wars that succeeded the French revolution, and from its negotiations now on foot with Great Britain and other nations relative to these principles. It belongs to each of the concurring parties to propose their views; but the voice of the United States will be heard with the respect and deference which its early labors in a work of such importance will merit." The sentiments here expressed by the minister of Colombia are in accordance with those of the ministers of Mexico and of Central America, as contained in their respective letters to the Secretary of State, on the subject of the invitation to attend the Congress.

The objects of this body, therefore, as far as the United States are concerned, are all subjects which the United States may deem it for their interest to propose for discussion. They embrace, consequently, in general terms, our political and commercial relations with the new American Republics.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs has, accordingly, been led to inquire what the principle of our diplomatic intercourse with other Governments has been? The answer to this inquiry is, that it has ever been the policy of the United States to maintain diplomatic relations with those powers, and those only, with which we have important political and commercial relations. We have not formed diplomatic connexions with very powerful States, such as Austria and the Porte, where no great political, no extensive commercial relations required such connexions; while, with powers not of the first class, such as Holland and Spain, important political and commercial relations have led the United States to the establishment of permanent missions.

This being the principle of our diplomatic intercourse, the committee conceive it to apply with great force in the present instance, and to require the attendance of our agents at the Congress of Panama. In that body questions directly involving our most important political and commercial interests are to be discussed. Though the new Republics there represented are so many separate Governments, our relations with them are not merely those which we hold toward each, individually; they form one whole family in language, religion, law, historical fortunes, and present political alliance. From this family, as far as the enumerated circumstances go, we are necessarily excluded; out of this exclusion springs an entire class of political and commercial relations between us, on the one side, and a large family of new Republics on the other. This family of Republics has thought it expedient to convene an assembly of plenipotentiaries at Panama. As an important part of their public relations are those in which they stand to us, they have invited us to send our ministers to this assembly. The law of nations warrants them in thus designating the place and mode of treating with friendly powers, and, if we refuse to accept the invitation, takes from us the right of complaining of any result, however inconsistent with our interests.

Under the circumstances in which this subject is before the House, the committee deem it their duty to consider some of the objections which may be urged against the acceptance by the United States of this invitation. These may be, among others: that such acceptance is unconstitutional; that all the objects of the Congress, as far as we are concerned, may be attained by negotiations with the separate States; that the subjects of discussion, the powers of the ministers, the mode of organizing the Congress, and the mode of deciding questions, are not sufficiently settled to authorize our accepting the invitation; that our attendance would endanger our neutrality toward Spain; that it might involve us in an entangling alliance with the new States; that our attendance would be a novel and unprecedented measure; that there is, in a Congress of States, something essentially pernicious, as proved by the example of Europe in its recent history.

The first objection may be, that the attendance of the United States at the Congress of Panama would be unconstitutional. To this objection the committee would reply, that they are not acquainted with any restriction in the Constitution on the appointment of foreign ministers by the proper authority. It may not, however, be superfluous to add, that this objection proceeds on the assumption that the Congress at Panama is either a Government, a branch of a Government, or a confederacy of Governments, and that the United States, by attending this assembly, unite themselves to the said Government or Confederacy. Neither part of this assumption is true. The Congress is a meeting of diplomatic agents from independent Governments; and, granting for a moment that the Congress at Panama were a Government or a Confederacy, our attendance at it by diplomatic ministers would be no entrance into such Confederacy—no union with such Government. It need scarcely be urged that the United States do not enter into confederacy, do not form a union with a foreign power, or any number of powers, by sending a minister to treat with such power or powers.

It may, in the next place, be objected to our attendance at this meeting, that all its objects may be attained by separate negotiations with the several States. It may admit a doubt whether this could, by possibility, be the case. It is questionable whether separate and disconnected negotiations between States geographically so remote, and in various respects politically so different from each other, could be brought to the same harmonious and systematic result as a discussion in an assembly of diplomatic agents, promptly communicating with each other information, counsel, and argument. At all events, it may safely be affirmed that the same result may be far more expeditiously and conveniently attained by a conference with the assembled ministers of States so remote from each other that an interchange of intelligence with their respective capitals could not take place more than twice in a twelvemonth. This objection, going only to the convenience of the measure, need not be more particularly weighed.

The third objection may be, that the subjects of discussion, the powers of the ministers, the mode of organizing the Congress, and mode of deciding questions, are not yet sufficiently settled to justify our attendance. From the papers submitted to the committee it appears that this consideration engaged the attention of the Executive when the invitation was made to this Government, last spring, by the ministers of Mexico and Colombia. It was then required by the President that previous satisfaction should be given on these points. The replies of those ministers, after having consulted their Governments, do not enter into minute detail on all these points, yet the committee are of opinion that they are satisfactory. As to the subjects in general to be discussed, there is no limitation to the disadvantage of any Government represented; and the meeting being one of diplomatic agents, and it being stipulated in the Colombian treaties that the ministers to the Congress are to go with the usual diplomatic powers and instructions, it follows that their mode of proceeding must be that of diplomatic discussion and conference, and their mode of deciding that which can alone exist between diplomatic agents—the mutual reference of whatever convention or pact may be negotiated to the constitutional authorities at home. That such is to be the case with respect to our ministers is particularly stated in the message of the President, as also that they are to be bound by no decision of the Congress without their own consent. While the committee are of opinion that these details are of no great importance, they apprehend that, as far as they are of importance, the omission to fix them, or to propose them for acceptance to the United States, is rather favorable than disadvantageous to us. The committee are persuaded that, on these details, as well as in the leading business of the Congress, the new States are desirous to have the advantage of our experience. This sentiment is repeatedly expressed in the letters of the ministers of the new States communicating the invitation.

The next objection may be, that our attendance at this Congress may put to hazard our neutrality. To this it may be answered that, having already acknowledged the independence of the new States, we have established the right of treating them as free and independent States, as well toward Spain as all the rest of the world. These States are nominally at war with Spain, and Spain alone. Her allies have taken no part in this war. The most powerful of those allies, Great Britain, has formally acknowledged the independence of several of these States, and has established diplomatic relations with them. To these acts on our part and that of Great Britain Spain submits, although they not only essentially weaken her as a belligerent, but directly violate her colonial laws. But if our recognition of each of the States represented at the Congress, and our trading with them in direct contravention of the colonial laws of Spain be no breach, as it is none, of our neutrality, so neither is our attendance at a diplomatic council of all those States united a breach of neutrality. This is particularly true when it is added that the United States, instead of going to the Congress to animate the war against Spain, will go as mediators and peacemakers, to promote by every means a termination of the contest on terms honorable to the new States and advantageous to Spain. This power has already received the strongest pledges that such is the policy of the United States. The committee are clearly of opinion that, if our attendance at this Congress be desirable on the part of the new States, it is not less so on the part of Spain.

The next objection that may be urged against our attendance at the Congress of Panama is, that it may involve us in an entangling alliance with the new States. To this it may be answered that the project of such an alliance is expressly disclaimed by the President in the message referred to the committee. In the next place, the Congress is neither a Government nor a confederacy of Governments with which we could, by possibility, in the first instance, enter into an alliance, entangling or not; and lastly, even if a negotiation for such an alliance were entered into by our ministers, contrary to the principles on which it appears from the message of the President that the invitation was accepted, it would still remain for the treaty of alliance to be submitted to the constitutional ratifying powers in this country. Whether, under these circumstances, our acceptance of the invitation can be considered even as an approach to an alliance, the committee need not say.

If it be still objected that, from the nature of this assembly, there is danger that we, by our attendance, may be drawn into an alliance, it may be replied that there is no other danger of the formation of an entangling alliance, in consequence of this mission, than that which is incident to any mission to any power. We have ministers to France, to Russia, to England. We have had ministers to European countries at periods when very strong temptations of momentary interest existed for forming alliances with foreign powers. The committee are not aware that it ever was suggested that the least danger existed of the formation of such an alliance in consequence of such missions. Our minister to France followed the march of the French Emperor to the confines of Russia, but no one surmised that we projected an alliance with him, although we were at the time engaged in a war with his other chief enemy, Great Britain. Yet it is plain that the way to an alliance is much more direct in an ordinary mission than in that proposed. When our minister is accredited to a foreign Sovereign, particularly an absolute one, he is accredited to a party competent to form an alliance without further delay or ulterior responsibility. While, on the other hand, our ministers to Panama will be accredited to other ministers no more competent than our own to pledge their Governments.

Further, it is particularly to be observed that an alliance with any one of the new Republics would be fully as entangling as an alliance with them all. They are all at war, and with the same enemy. They stand in an alliance, offensive and defensive, with each other. Precisely the same consequences, therefore, would result from the formation of an alliance with either of them (Colombia, for instance) as with all of them. If, then, the danger of being drawn into an alliance requires us to abstain from attending the Congress at Panama, the same danger, with equal force, requires us to withdraw all diplomatic connexion with these new States.

But, in truth, this suggestion of the danger of an alliance, incident to a diplomatic mission, carries with it so direct a reflection on the wisdom and fidelity of the treaty-making power, as lodged in the hands of the President and Senate, that the committee, out of proper respect to the co-ordinate branches of the Government, will not longer consider it.

Another objection to the proposed mission may be, that the Congress is an unprecedented measure, and that our attendance at it would, on our part, be a novel and unprecedented step. A little reflection will show that this assumption, as far as it forms an objection to our attendance at the Congress, involves a confusion of ideas. The establishment of several new Republics at once may be called an unprecedented event, and, as a historical occurrence, without a parallel in the history of the world. But the committee cannot admit that every subsequent political act of these new States, or of other States in reference to them, is therefore to be called novel and unprecedented, and that in an injurious sense of the words. On the contrary, it appears to the committee exceedingly natural that these States should hold diplomatic conferences with each other and neighboring nations who have important relations with them. Nothing, perhaps, is more frequent in political history than similar meetings among friendly States.

Nor, when the subject is correctly viewed, is there anything in principle novel or unprecedented in our attendance at the proposed Congress. As a merely historical event, indeed, it may be considered as without an exact precedent, although the negotiations between the United States, France, and Great Britain, in 1782, which resulted in the treaties of peace between the several countries, were of the nature of the conferences of a meeting of diplomatic agents. It will also not escape the reflection of the House that, had this Government ever acted on the principle that exact precedent was necessary to authorize its measures, no one of the most important measures of the Government since the date of the Constitution could have been adopted. Whatever weight there is in the mere argument of want of exact precedents, applied, in full force, to the adoption of the Federal Constitution itself. The whole history of the world contained no precedent of such a Government.

But, in point of principle, there is no novelty in our attendance at the proposed Congress at Panama. Our ministers will carry with them the same powers, no larger, no more discretionary, than have ever been vested in the foreign ministers of the United States. It has been the characteristic policy of the United States to ask no questions about the quality or constitution of the power to which our ministers were sent. We have rested for our security, not on a timid calculation of the powers of the Government or of the body with which our ministers were to treat, but on constitutional safeguards at home. It has been indifferent to us whether Europe were at peace or at war, or by what titles her Sovereigns filled their thrones. To instance in a single case: we have sent missions to France, alike under the ancient absolute monarchy, limited monarchy, and revolutionary anarchy; to the Convention and to the Directory, to the Consular and the Imperial despotisms, and to the present Constitutional Government. The posture of affairs which our ministers found in that country has often been novel; their personal position unprecedented; the scenes they witnessed strange and unexampled. But of none of our successive missions could it have been said, in any important sense, that the mission itself was novel; that is, that it opened a door to any relaxation of the constitutional checks in the administration of any foreign affairs of the Government at home. In like manner the mission to Panama is in the strictest conformity with our whole international policy, which is to be represented wherever we have important political and commercial connexions. Our Commissioners will go there to do the business of the country. Their appearance at that meeting cannot surely have the effect of breaking down the Senate and House of Representatives, and, by a kind of dictatorial power unknown to the Constitution, of binding the country in a foreign alliance.

Lastly, it may be objected that, in a Congress of assembled powers, there is something essentially pernicious, which this country, instead of approaching, ought to shun; and the existing organization in Continental Europe may be quoted as the illustration. The committee deem it hardly necessary to remark, that the pernicious character of the late European Congresses, or of any European Congresses, does not consist in the act of assembling and treating together, but in the character of the Governments assembled, and in the objects effected or aimed at. A Congress of despotic powers, wielding the force of large standing armies, and meeting to concert measures for violent interference in the internal affairs of other States, is certainly a pernicious assembly. In other words, despotic Governments, standing armies, and unprovoked invasion, are pernicious in a single State, and proportionably more so when several despotic Governments league their forces to prevent the establishment of liberal institutions in any country not beyond their reach. But if the States of Europe were free Republics, blessed with popular Governments, written laws, elective magistrates, and senatorial bodies beyond the reach of corruption, the committee do not perceive that a meeting of the diplomatic agents of such Governments, to form treaties and conventions on their mutual interests and concerns, that are to be sent home to their constitutional ratifying functionaries, would be in any degree alarming. Moreover, it is an obvious reflection that this argument against the mission to Panama, if it prove anything, proves too much. If the pernicious character of the power to which the mission is to be sent form a reason for not sending it, it would be impossible for the United States to maintain a single mission in Europe. Our ministers there are, in every case, accredited to Governments constructed, as we think, on principles which could not be introduced here without immediate national ruin. If it be safe for us to hold diplomatic intercourse with the unlimited monarchy of Russia, it cannot be dangerous to hold the same kind of intercourse with an assembly of the agents of our neighboring Republics.

Having thus considered the objections which may exist to this measure, and endeavored to show that it is strictly within the line of the international policy of the United States, the committee regard it as their duty to the House, on the present occasion, to dwell for a moment on the subjects of discussion at the Congress of Panama.

By the terms of the invitation, as well as the nature of the case, the discussions at Panama are to extend to all subjects of importance—

To the new States, as among each other;

Or, as between them and Spain;

Or of importance directly to us, in our connexion with them.

Each power is at liberty to propose what subject for discussion or negotiation it may please, the only limitation being that which the United States impose upon themselves, with the understanding of the other powers, that we are to engage in no discussions inconsistent with an entire neutrality.

Although, in different degrees, the three classes of subjects above enumerated are interesting to the people of the United States, the relations of the new States to each other are very important to us.

They are our near neighbors. One of them has an immense landed frontier on our territory, and, together with the two next in geographical succession, lies on the waters into which the great internal communications of the United States are discharged. With the others we have no direct geographical, but we have highly important commercial, connexions. At present there are eight or nine independent States formed out of the late Spanish and Portuguese colonies; seven of these, viz: Mexico, Guatemala, Colombia, the Provinces of La Plata, Chile, Peru, and Upper Peru, have adopted republican Governments. Now, it is to us a matter of very great interest how these States shall stand towards each other. Should they fall into dissensions and wars, those great advantages which we have reasonably promised ourselves from their growth and prosperity could not be realized. The great drawbacks on the progress of these States and on the extension of advantageous commercial relations with them, arising from the war with Spain, would be perpetuated by the growth of feuds and conflicts with each other. It would have been as well for us and for themselves that the mother country had continued to rule them, as that their energies should be wasted in civil wars. The committee do not intend to augur unfavorably for the peace and harmony of these States; but it is obvious that the simultaneous rise of so many neighboring independent Republics must be attended with its hazards. Rival claims to portions of territory may form a subject of contention among the new States, as they did in our own Confederacy after the war of the Revolution. A controversy of this kind has actually arisen between Mexico and Guatemala, which the committee trust will be settled by friendly compromise, for few events could be more deprecated by us than a war between two States lying on and near the Gulf of Mexico. Unfortunately, a controversy of the same kind has broken out into a war between Brazil and the United Provinces of La Plata for the disputed possession of the Banda Oriental. The effect of this war on us has been instantaneous. It has already become necessary to ask for an additional appropriation for the naval service of the year of near one hundred thousand dollars, to protect the property and lives of our citizens from the dangers to which, in the progress of this war, they will be exposed. Now, it has been expressly provided in the treaties which led to the formation of the Congress of Panama that the ministers there assembled should exercise the office of mediators when such differences shall arise. Brazil and La Plata have both been invited to the Congress; and had it been in active operation, it certainly is within the reach of political probability that this unfortunate controversy might, by friendly mediation, have been prevented from ripening into the fatal issue of war. To the work of mediation, in all such cases, the United States would come as the most disinterested party; and, as we ourselves have experienced the benefits of the mediation of a foreign friendly power, it may happen that we may render the like good office to our sister States. Could we but in a single instance avert or terminate a war, it would itself form a sufficient motive for accepting the invitation. We claim no right of interference; we do not obtrude ourselves as umpires. We are invited to a Congress where we are told these national differences, if any arise, will be discussed; we are told that our presence, counsel, and experience are desired. No maxim of the most cautious political prudence bids us stand aloof. Next to peace on our own part, their peace and prosperity are our leading interest; and the policy of maintaining peace through the instrumentality of friendly mediation is entirely congenial with the principles and feelings of the people of the United States of America, and sanctioned by their practice.

The next general class of subjects to be discussed at the Congress of Panama are the relations of the new States with Spain. This subject, it is expressly stipulated, is only to be approached by our ministers under the reservation of strict neutrality. More than this, our great efforts will be directed to pacification. The policy of the United States, in this respect, is sufficiently unfolded in the letter of the Secretary of State to Mr. Middleton, dated May 10, 1825, and the letter of the Secretary of State to Mr. Salazar, dated December 20, 1825. Pacification between the belligerents is an object which it is our most decided interest to pursue. No single political event, perhaps, could be named more desirable to the United States, in reference to their industrious interests, than the termination of the present contest. We suffer every way by its continuance; our commerce with Spain languishes, and it is impossible that it should assume a profitable expansion with the new States.

Connected with the belligerent relations between Spain and the new States is the fate of the Spanish islands, particularly Cuba. If the war continues, the invasion of that island will be attempted; it is an avowed subject of discussion at the Congress. This is a subject of the greatest moment to the United States in every respect. We have an intercourse with that island, which acts upon our industry in all its branches. The Moro may be regarded as a fortress at the mouth of the Mississippi; and what is infinitely more important, unless Cuba should be invaded by an overwhelming force, (such a force as the new States will hardly be able to organize,) that invaluable island may renew, almost within sight of our shores, the terrific example of San Domingo. Any effort on the part of the United States to avert such a catastrophe would be cheaply made; none could justifiably be omitted. Had the Government of the United States, after being invited to attend a conference of the ministers of the powers by whom that invasion is projected, declined to be present, they would have been heavily responsible to the people for whatever disastrous effects our friendly interference might have averted or delayed.

The last general class of subjects to be discussed and treated at Panama are the direct interests between the United States and the new Republics; unquestionably, as far as we are concerned, the most important branch of the negotiations. With several of these powers we have no treaty whatever. With Mexico, as appears from the correspondence between the Secretary of State and Mr. Poinsett, we have been unable, as yet, to form a treaty on satisfactory conditions; and the obstacles which have hitherto prevented this from being done are precisely such as are most likely to be removed at a conference of ministers of all the new States. At such a conference we shall of course possess the best opportunity of establishing uniform and liberal relations with all. The arrangements to be made with them comprehend the great principles of belligerent, neutral, and commercial law, as set forth in the general instructions to Mr. Anderson by the then Secretary of State. The United States have long been laboring to introduce into every branch of public law principles of liberality, equality, and humanity, hitherto unknown in its codes. The various respects in which our policy, in many leading points of the laws of war and trade, differs from that of Europe, are well known to the House, and need not here be stated. The Republic of Colombia, in inviting our attendance at the Congress, has asked for herself and her sister Republics the benefits of our experience in the great school of international politics. To refuse our attendance at the Congress, when urged on this ground, would be to neglect to seize, perhaps, the fairest opportunity which the history of the world ever afforded of giving a wide and prompt diffusion to liberal doctrines of public law. It would certainly put it out of our power to complain of any policy these States might adopt, however unfriendly toward our interests, and however vicious in principle.

Such are the views of the committee with respect to the several classes of subjects which will be discussed at this Congress. It is a very obvious reflection that our attendance may have a powerful effect in giving a character to the assembly itself. Our presence is particularly requested by one of the new States, who have joined in the invitation, on the ground of the "importance and respectability" which would thence attach to the Congress. The committee do not foresee the possibility that, under any circumstances, the Congress could become an inconvenient or dangerous assembly. But, if it be thought by any one that evil consequences are likely to flow from it, the prospect of such consequences would furnish new reasons why we should be represented at it. Whatever opinions may be held of the expediency of such a meeting, in itself, it would seem that there could be but one opinion as to the duty of our attendance at the Congress, to correct the pernicious tendency which it may be feared to have. To neglect to attend the Congress because it was a combination of unfriendly aspect, would be to neglect the ordinary preparations of defence, precisely because there was danger of war. Viewing the Congress at Panama in this unfavorable light, (for which, however, the committee apprehend there is no reason,) no administration of the Executive Government would stand justified to the country, without taking measures most promptly to be informed of its proceedings. If not invited to send authorized and accredited ministers, it would have been their duty to send private political agents.

The committee have felt it their duty to consider this question chiefly on strict grounds of political expediency, and in reference to the principle of our diplomatic intercourse. They, however, accord in sentiment with the President, that a sufficient inducement to accept the invitation would have been "to meet in the spirit of kindness and friendship an overture made in that spirit by three sister Republics of this hemisphere." It will not escape the consideration of the House that the conduct of the United States toward the new Republics has ever been regulated by the maxims of a frank and liberal policy. Had we acted toward them even as we have felt it our duty to act toward Europe, our course would have been essentially different. Had our feelings toward them been the same as those which our political fathers have inculcated toward Europe, we should certainly have regarded it rather as an evil than a benefit, that so many new Republics, of which the greater part must be powerful States, are rising into existence on the same side of the water as ourselves. We are henceforward to be without that which has formerly been regarded as the great bulwark of our national security, our geographical distance from every other powerful State. But we have not hesitated to break down this bulwark. We have gone to meet and welcome the new Republics. We have ourselves assisted to exchange weak colonial for powerful sovereign neighbors. As far as it depended on us, we have chosen to place the regions on our immense southwestern frontier beneath the government of vigorous republican institutions, instead of having them under the safe and enervating despotism of Spain. In the judgment of the committee, this has been a sound, a great, an auspicious policy. It was not rashly adopted; it was long deliberated, well weighed, and at length received its sanction in the unanimous voice of this House and the acclamations of the people. From this policy it is now too late to recede. We cannot now do much to obstruct the growth of the new States; we can do everything to conciliate and attach them, or to estrange and disgust them. The first course will promote the general cause of liberty, will perpetuate friendly relations between the two great portions of this continent, to the mutual advantage of both, and will render us more and more independent of Europe. The latter course will tend to revive in the New World the false and pernicious maxims of the Old; to teach neighboring Republics to fix on each other the fatal name of natural enemies; to create piratical and border wars; to generate systems of exclusion; and, finally, to establish in this hemisphere those political principles and habits which have caused the downfall of so many foreign States, and made so many others stationary and languishing, and checked the growth of all. We are now to consider whether we will take the first step in an unfriendly and repulsive policy, by refusing to accept the courteous invitation of three most respectable neighboring Governments, tendered in a manner equally creditable to their delicacy and flattering to the United States. Nothing but a certainty of pernicious consequences to result from our attendance at the Congress would, in the opinion of the committee, be sufficient to justify our refusal to accept such an invitation. As our attendance at the Congress, instead of being prejudicial to the public interests, is, in the judgment of the committee, a measure of the most obvious political expedience; as it is stipulated to bring into no hazard the neutrality of the United States, as all fears of an entangling alliance have been shown to be unfounded; in a word, as the Congress will be regarded by the Executive of the United States as purely a consultative meeting, and as the objects of consultation are of primary importance to the country, the Committee on Foreign Affairs are of opinion that the mission to Panama ought to receive the sanction of the House of Representatives, and they accordingly recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the House, it is expedient to appropriate the funds necessary to enable the President of the United States to send ministers to the Congress of Panama.

GENERAL CONVENTION OF FRIENDSHIP, COMMERCE, AND NAVIGATION, WITH DENMARK.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, IN EXECUTIVE SESSION, APRIL 28, 1826, AND THE INJUNCTION OF SECRET SINCE REMOVED.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith to the Senate, for their advice concerning its ratification, a general convention of friendship, commerce, and navigation, between the United States and his Majesty the King of Denmark, signed by the Secretary of State and the Danish minister on the 26th instant; a copy of the convention and a note from the Secretary of State, together with Mr. Pedersen's answer, respecting the claims of the citizens of the United States upon the Danish Government, are likewise communicated.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, April 28, 1826.

VOL. V.—114 R

The following convention was read twice by unanimous consent, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and, together with the accompanying documents, ordered to be printed in confidence for the use of the Senate.

General Convention of Friendship, Commerce, and Navigation, between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of Denmark.

The United States of America and his Majesty the King of Denmark being desirous to make firm and permanent the peace and friendship which happily prevail between the two nations, and to extend the commercial relations which subsist between their respective territories and people, have agreed to fix, in a manner clear and positive, the rules which shall in future be observed between the one and the other party, by means of a general convention of friendship, commerce, and navigation. With that object, the President of the United States of America has conferred full powers on HENRY CLAY, their Secretary of State, and his Majesty the King of Denmark has conferred like powers on PETER PEDERSEN, his Privy Counsellor of Legation and Minister Resident near the said States, Knight of the Danneborg; who, after having exchanged their said full powers, found to be in due and proper form, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The contracting parties, desiring to live in peace and harmony with all the other nations of the earth, by means of a policy frank and equally friendly with all, engage, mutually, not to grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect of commerce and navigation, which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same freely, if the concession were freely made, or on allowing the same compensation, if the concession were conditional.

ARTICLE 2. The contracting parties being likewise desirous of placing the commerce and navigation of their respective countries on the liberal basis of perfect equality and reciprocity, mutually agree that the citizens and subjects of each may frequent all the coasts and countries of the other, (with the exception hereafter provided for in the sixth article,) and reside and trade there in all kinds of produce, manufactures, and merchandise; and they shall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and exemptions, in navigation and commerce, which native citizens or subjects do or shall enjoy, submitting themselves to the laws, decrees, and usages there established to which native citizens or subjects are subjected. But it is understood that this article does not include the coasting trade of either country, the regulation of which is reserved by the parties, respectively, according to their own separate laws.

ARTICLE 3. They likewise agree that whatever kind of produce, manufacture, or merchandise, of any foreign country, can be, from time to time, lawfully imported into the United States in vessels belonging wholly to the citizens thereof, may be also imported in vessels wholly belonging to the subjects of Denmark; and that no higher or other duties upon the tonnage of the vessel or her cargo shall be levied and collected, whether the importation be made in vessels of the one country or of the other. And, in like manner, that whatever kind of produce, manufacture, or merchandise, of any foreign country, can be, from time to time, lawfully imported into the dominions of the King of Denmark in the vessels thereof, (with the exception hereafter mentioned in the sixth article,) may be also imported in vessels of the United States; and that no higher or other duties upon the tonnage of the vessel or her cargo shall be levied and collected, whether the importation be made in vessels of the one country or of the other. And they further agree that whatever may be lawfully exported or re-exported from the one country in its own vessels to any foreign country may, in like manner, be exported or re-exported in the vessels of the other country. And the same bounties, duties, and drawbacks shall be allowed and collected, whether such exportation or re-exportation be made in vessels of the United States or of Denmark. Nor shall higher or other charges of any kind be imposed in the ports of one party on vessels of the other, than are or shall be payable in the same ports by native vessels.

ARTICLE 4. No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any article the produce or manufacture of the dominions of his Majesty the King of Denmark; and no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the said dominions of any article the produce or manufacture of the United States than are or shall be payable on the like articles being the produce or manufacture of any other foreign country. Nor shall any higher or other duties or charges be imposed in either of the two countries on the exportation of any articles to the United States, or to the dominions of his Majesty the King of Denmark, respectively, than such as are or may be payable on the exportation of the like articles to any other foreign country. Nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the exportation or importation of any articles the produce or manufacture of the United States, or of the dominions of his Majesty the King of Denmark, to or from the territories of the United States, or to or from the said dominions, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

ARTICLE 5. Neither the vessels of the United States nor their cargoes shall, when they pass the Sound or the Belts, pay higher or other duties than those which are or may be paid by the most favored nation.

ARTICLE 6. The present convention shall not apply to the northern possessions of his Majesty the King of Denmark—that is to say, Iceland, the Feroé Islands, and Greenland—nor to places situated beyond the Cape of Good Hope, the right to regulate the direct intercourse with which possessions and places is reserved by the parties respectively. And it is further agreed that this convention is not to extend to the direct trade between Denmark and the West India colonies of his Danish Majesty; but in the intercourse with those colonies it is agreed that whatever can be lawfully imported into or exported from the said colonies in vessels of one party from or to the ports of the United States, or from or to the ports of any other foreign country, may, in like manner, and with the same duties and charges, applicable to vessel and cargo, be imported into or exported from the said colonies in vessels of the other party.

ARTICLE 7. The United States and his Danish Majesty mutually agree that no higher or other duties, charges, or taxes of any kind, shall be levied in the territories or dominions of either party upon any personal property, money, or effects of their respective citizens or subjects on the removal of the same from their territories or dominions reciprocally, either upon the inheritance of such property, money, or effects, or otherwise, than are or shall be payable in each State upon the same when removed by a citizen or subject of such State, respectively.

ARTICLE 8. To make more effectual the protection which the United States and his Danish Majesty shall afford in future to the navigation and commerce of their respective citizens and subjects, they agree mutually to receive and admit consuls and vice consuls in all the ports open to foreign commerce, who shall enjoy in them all the rights, privileges, and immunities of the consuls and vice consuls of the most favored nation; each contracting party, however, remaining at liberty to except those ports and places in which the admission and residence of such consuls may not seem convenient.

ARTICLE 9. In order that the consuls and vice consuls of the contracting parties may enjoy the rights, privileges, and immunities which belong to them by their public character, they shall, before entering on the exercise of their functions, exhibit their commission or patent in due form to the Government to which they are accredited; and having obtained their exequatur, which shall be granted gratis, they shall be held and considered as such by all the authorities, magistrates, and inhabitants in the consular district in which they reside.

ARTICLE 10. It is likewise agreed that the consuls and persons attached to their necessary service, they not being natives of the country in which the consul resides, shall be exempt from all public service, and also from all kind of taxes, imposts, and contributions, except those which they shall be obliged to pay on account of commerce or their property, to which inhabitants, native and foreign, of the country in which such consuls reside are subject; being in everything besides subject to the laws of the respective States. The archives and papers of the consulate shall be respected inviolably, and, under no pretext whatever, shall any magistrate seize or in any way interfere with them.

ARTICLE 11. The present convention shall be in force for ten years from the date hereof, and further until the end of one year after either of the contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its intention to terminate the same; each of the contracting parties reserving to itself the right of giving such notice to the other at the end of the said term of ten years; and it is hereby agreed between them that, on the expiration of one year after such notice shall have been received by either from the other party, this convention, and all the provisions thereof, shall altogether cease and determine.

ARTICLE 12. This convention shall be approved and ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by his Majesty the King of Denmark, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in the city of Copenhagen within eight months from the date of the signature hereof, or sooner, if possible.

In faith whereof, we, the plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and of his Danish Majesty, have signed and sealed these presents.

Done in triplicate, at the city of Washington, on the twenty-sixth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, in the fiftieth year of the Independence of the United States of America.

H. CLAY.
PR. PEDERSEN.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Pedersen.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 25, 1826.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, by direction of the President thereof, has the honor to state to Mr. Pedersen, minister resident of his Majesty the King of Denmark, that it would have been satisfactory to the Government of the United States if Mr. Pedersen had been charged with instructions in the negotiation which has just terminated to treat of the indemnities due to citizens of the United States, in consequence of the seizure, detention, and condemnation of their property in the ports of his Danish Majesty. But as he has no instructions to that effect, the undersigned is directed, at and before proceeding to the signature of the treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation, on which they have agreed, explicitly to declare that the omission to provide for those indemnities is not hereafter to be interpreted as a waiver or abandonment of them by the Government of the United States, which, on the contrary, is firmly resolved to persevere in the pursuit of them until they shall be finally arranged upon principles of equity and justice. And, to guard against any misconception of the fact of the silence of the treaty in the above particular, or of the views of the American Government, the undersigned requests that Mr. Pedersen will transmit this official declaration to the Government of Denmark. And he avails himself of this occasion to tender to Mr. Pedersen assurances of his distinguished consideration.

Chevalier PEDERSEN, Minister Resident from Denmark.

The Chevalier Peter Pedersen to Mr. Clay.

WASHINGTON, April 26, 1826.

The undersigned, minister resident of his Majesty the King of Denmark, has the honor herewith to acknowledge having received Mr. Clay's official note of this day, declaratory of the advanced claims against Denmark not being waived on the part of the United States by the convention agreed upon and about to be signed, which note he, as requested, will transmit to his Government. And he avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Clay assurances of his distinguished consideration.

[1ST SESSION.

RELATIVE TO INSTRUCTIONS TO MINISTERS OF THE UNITED STATES, AND CONCERNING ANY PLEDGE GIVEN ON THE PART OF THE GOVERNMENT TO MEXICO AND SOUTH AMERICA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 30, 1826.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 27th instant, requesting a copy of such parts of the answer of the Secretary of State to Mr. Poinsett's letter to Mr. Clay, dated Mexico, September 28, 1825, No. 22, as relates to the pledge of the United States therein mentioned; and also requesting me to inform the House whether the United States have, in any manner, made any pledge to the Governments of Mexico and South America; that the United States would not permit the interference of any foreign power with the independence or form of government of those nations; and, if so, when, in what manner, and to what effect; and also to communicate to the House a copy of the communication from our minister at Mexico, in which he informed the Government of the United States that the Mexican Government called upon this Government to fulfil the memorable pledge of the President of the United States, in his message to Congress of December, 1823, I transmit to the House a report from the Secretary of State, with documents containing the information desired by the resolution.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, March 30, 1826.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 29, 1826.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred, by the President, the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 27th March, 1826, requesting him to transmit to that House certain parts of the correspondence between the Department of State and the minister of the United States at Mexico, and to communicate certain information therein mentioned, has the honor to report:

That no answer was transmitted from this Department to the letter of Mr. Poinsett, No. 22, under date at Mexico, of the 28th September, 1825; that No. 18, from Mr. Poinsett, under date of the 13th of the same month, and No. 22, relate to the same subject; the first stating the obstacle which had occurred to the conclusion of the commercial treaty in the pretension brought forward by Mexico to grant to the American nations of Spanish origin special privileges which were not to be enjoyed by other nations; and the second narrating the arguments which were urged for and against it in the conferences between Mr. Poinsett and the Mexican ministers; that No. 22 was received on the 9th of December last, and the answer, of the 9th of November, 1825, from this Department to No. 18, having been prepared and transmitted, superseded the necessity, as was believed, of any more particular reply to No. 22.

That extracts from the general instructions to Mr. Poinsett, under date the 25th March, 1825, are herewith reported, marked A; that the United States have contracted no engagement, nor made any pledge to the Governments of Mexico and South America, or to either of them, that the United States would not permit the interference of any foreign power with the independence or form of government of those nations, nor have any instructions been issued authorizing any such engagement or pledge. It will be seen that the message of the late President of the United States of the 2d of December, 1823, is adverted to in the extracts now furnished from the instructions to Mr. Poinsett, and that he is directed to impress its principles upon the Government of the United Mexican States. All apprehensions of the danger to which Mr. Monroe alludes, of an interference by the allied powers of Europe to introduce their political systems into this hemisphere, have ceased. If, indeed, an attempt by force had been made by allied Europe to subvert the liberties of the southern nations on this continent, and to erect upon the ruins of their free institutions monarchical systems, the people of the United States would have stood pledged, in the opinion of their Executive, not to any foreign State, but to themselves and to their posterity, by their dearest interests and highest duties, to resist to the utmost such attempt; and it is to a pledge of that character that Mr. Poinsett alone refers.

That extracts from a despatch of Mr. Poinsett, under date the 21st August, 1825, marked B, are also herewith reported, relating to the movements of the French fleet in the West India seas during the last summer; that his previous letter, to which he refers, on the same subject, with the accompanying papers, is accidentally mislaid, and cannot, therefore, now be communicated, which is less regretted because the information contained in that now reported, it is presumed, will be entirely satisfactory.

All which is respectfully submitted.

H. CLAY.

Extracts from the general instructions of Mr. Clay, Secretary of State, to Mr. Poinsett, appointed Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to Mexico, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 25, 1825.

"The mission on which the President wishes you, with all practicable despatch, to depart, would at any time be highly important, but possesses at this moment a peculiar interest. Everywhere on this continent, but on the side of the United Mexican States, the United States are touched by the colonial territories of some Sovereign authority fixed in Europe. You are the first minister actually leaving the United States to reside near a Sovereign power established and exerted on this continent whose territories are contiguous with our own. You will probably be the first minister received by that power from any foreign State, except from those which have recently sprung out of Spanish America. The United Mexican States, whether we regard their present fortune, or recall to our recollection their ancient history and fortunes, are entitled to high consideration. In point of population, position, and resources, they must be allowed to rank among the first powers of America. In contemplating the progress in them towards civilization which the aborigines had made at the epoch of the Spanish invasion, and the incidents connected with the Spanish conquest which ensued, an irresistible interest is excited which is not surpassed, if it be equalled, by that which is awakened in perusing the early history of any other part of America. But what gives, with the President, to your mission peculiar importance at this time is, that it has for its principal object to lay for the first time the foundations of an intercourse of amity, commerce, navigation, and neighborhood, which may exert a powerful influence for a long period upon the prosperity of both States.

"In more particularly inviting your attention to the objects which should engage it on your mission, I will, in the first place, refer you to the general instructions which were given by my predecessor on the 27th May, 1823, to Mr. Anderson, the minister of the United States at Colombia, of which a copy is annexed, and which are to be considered as incorporated in these. So far as they are applicable alike to the condition of Colombia and of Mexico, and shall not be varied in this or subsequent letters, you will view them as forming a guide for your conduct. In that letter of the 27th of May the principles which have regulated the course of this Government in respect to the contest between Spanish America and Spain, from its origin, are clearly stated, explained, and indicated, and the bases of those upon which it is desirable to place the future intercourse between the United States and the several Governments which have been established in Spanish America are laid down. So that, although that letter was intended to furnish instructions for the American minister deputed to one of those Governments only, it should be contemplated as unfolding a system of relations which it is expedient to establish with all of them.

"From that letter, as well as from notorious public facts, it clearly appears that the people and the Government of the United States have alike, throughout all the stages of the struggle between Spain and the former colonies, cherished the warmest feelings and the strongest sympathies towards the latter; that the establishment of their independence and freedom has been anxiously desired; that the recognition of that independence was made as early as it was possible, consistently with those just considerations of policy and duty which this Government felt itself bound to entertain towards both parties; and that, in point of fact, with the exception of the act of the Portuguese Brazilian Government, to which it was prompted by self-interest, and which preceded that of the United States only a few months, this Government has been the first to assume the responsibility and encounter the hazard of recognizing the Governments which have been formed out of Spanish America. If there ever were any ground for imputing tardiness to the United States in making that recognition, as it respects other parts of what was formerly Spanish America, there is not the slightest pretext for such a suggestion in relation to Mexico. For, within a little more than a year after its independence was proclaimed, the United States hastened to acknowledge it. They have never claimed, and do not now claim, any peculiar favor or concession to their commerce or navigation, as the consideration of the liberal policy which they have observed towards those Governments. But the President does confidently expect that the priority of movement, on our part, which has disconcerted plans which the European allies were contemplating against the independent Governments, and which has no doubt tended to accelerate similar acts of recognition by the European powers, and especially that of Great Britain, will form a powerful motive with our southern neighbors, and particularly with Mexico, for denying to the commerce and navigation of those European States any favors or privileges which shall not be equally extended to us."

"You will bring to the notice of the Mexican Government the message of the late President of the United States to their Congress, on the 2d December, 1823, asserting certain important principles of inter-continental law, in the relations of Europe and America. The first principle asserted in that message is, that the American continents are not henceforth to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers. In the maintenance of that principle all the independent Governments of America have an interest; but that of the United States has probably the least. Whatever foundation may have existed three centuries ago, or even at a later period, when all this continent was under European subjection, for the establishment of a rule, founded on priority of discovery and occupation, for apportioning among the powers of Europe parts of this continent, none can be now admitted as applicable to its present condition. There is no disposition to disturb the colonial possessions, as they may now exist, of any of the European powers; but it is against the establishment of new European colonies upon this continent that the principle is directed. The countries in which any such new establishments might be attempted are now open to the enterprise and commerce of all Americans. And the justice or propriety cannot be recognized, of arbitrarily limiting and circumscribing that enterprise and commerce, by the act of voluntarily planting a new colony, without the consent of America, under the auspices of foreign powers, belonging to another and a distant continent. Europe would be indignant at any American attempt to plant a colony on any part of her shores, and her justice must perceive, in the rule contended for, only perfect reciprocity.

"The other principle asserted in the message is, that whilst we do not desire to interfere in Europe with the political system of the allied powers, we should regard as dangerous to our peace and safety any attempt, on their part, to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere. The political systems of the two continents are essentially different. Each has an exclusive right to judge for itself what is best suited to its own condition and most likely to promote its happiness; but neither has a right to enforce upon the other the establishment of its peculiar system. This principle was declared in the face of the world, at a moment when there was reason to apprehend that the allied powers were entertaining designs inimical to the freedom if not the independence of the new Governments. There is ground for believing that the declaration of it had considerable effect in preventing the maturity, if not in producing the abandonment, of all such designs. Both principles were laid down, after much and anxious deliberation, on the part of the late administration. The President, who then formed a part of it, continues entirely to coincide in both. And you will urge upon the Government of Mexico the utility and expediency of asserting the same principles on all proper occasions."

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Poinsett, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to Mexico, to Mr. Clay, Secretary of State, dated

"MEXICO, August 21, 1825.

"The correspondence respecting the reported movements of the French fleet on the West India seas, which accompanied my last letter, was attended with circumstances which I had not then time to communicate.

"The intelligence was received on the 15th instant by the Secretary of State. On the morning of the 16th he called upon the chargé d'affaires of his Britannic Majesty and showed him the letters from the agent of this Government at Jamaica. Mr. Ward came immediately to me to consult what was to be done, and expressed a wish that we should act in concert. As I had not seen the Secretary nor the letters to which he alluded, I could only reply that I was perfectly willing to do so, provided this Government, in their communications with us, placed both our Governments on precisely the same footing. He immediately went to the palace and saw the Secretary of State, to whom he explained his desire that the notes to be addressed to us should be verbatim et literatim the same. Late in the afternoon the Secretary called on me and exhibited the letters he had received from Jamaica, and which induced him to believe that France entertained hostile intentions against this country. In this conversation I assured him of the friendly disposition of the United States, and that they would not view with indifference the occupation of the island of Cuba by France, especially if it was the result of any hostile views towards Mexico; but, at the same time, hinted that the imprudent conduct of some of their commanders might have induced Spain to cede that island to the French, rather than have it wrested from her in the manner proposed by Santa Anna, of which they were fully aware."

"When Mr. Ward was informed that the Secretary had said nothing to me of his interview with him, nor of his intention to make the notes to be addressed to us on this subject similar, he waited on the President and reiterated his request. The President, after assuring him that this should be done, declared that he himself was ignorant of the arrival of this important intelligence until he saw it published in the Sol."

"On the ensuing day, notes, couched in exactly the same words, were received by both Mr. Ward and myself. I objected to the language, and waited upon Mr. Alaman to state my objections. The original note—after stating that we had declared, in the most solemn manner, that we would never consent that any third power should interpose in the question between Spain and her former colonies, and that the conduct of France, on this occasion, is certainly an interposition, which, however cloaked, is not the less inexcusable—goes on to say: 'The President, therefore, instructs me to inform your excellency of these important occurrences, so that, by bringing them to the notice of your Government, it may demand of his Most Catholic Majesty such explanations as the case requires.'

"I told the Secretary that the declaration of the President and the known friendly disposition of the Government and of the people of the United States towards these countries did not confer upon this Government the privilege of demanding our interference as a right. He expressed his readiness to alter the phraseology of the note, and it was done." "The note to his Britannic Majesty's chargé d'affaires was afterwards altered in the same terms, and the substance of our answers corresponded."

No. 429.

[1ST SESSION.]

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH COLOMBIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 31, 1826.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

By the second article of the general convention of peace, amity, navigation, and commerce, between the United States and the Republic of Colombia, concluded at Bogota on the 3d of October, 1824, it was stipulated that the parties engaged, mutually, not to grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect of commerce and navigation, which should not immediately become common to the other party, who should enjoy the same freely, if the concession was freely made, or on allowing the same compensation, if the concession was conditional.

And, in the third article of the same convention, it was agreed that the citizens of the United States might frequent all the coasts and countries of the Republic of Colombia, and reside and trade there in all sorts of produce, manufactures, and merchandise, and should pay no other or greater duties, charges, or fees whatsoever than the most favored nation should be obliged to pay; and should enjoy all the rights, privileges, and exemptions, in navigation and commerce, which the most favored nation should enjoy, submitting themselves, nevertheless, to the laws, decrees, and usages there established, and to which were submitted the subjects and citizens of the most favored nations, with a reciprocal stipulation in favor of the citizens of the Republic of Colombia in the United States.

Subsequently to the conclusion of this convention, a treaty was negotiated between the Republic of Colombia and Great Britain, by which it was stipulated that no other or higher duties, on account of tonnage, light or harbor dues, should be imposed in the ports of Colombia on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by Colombian vessels; and that the same duties should be paid on the importation into the territory of Colombia of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of his Britannic Majesty's dominions, whether such importation should be in Colombian or in British vessels, and that the same duties should be paid, and the same discount (drawbacks) and bounties allowed on the exportation of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of Colombia, to his Britannic Majesty's dominions, whether such exportation were in Colombian or British vessels.

The minister of the United States to the Republic of Colombia having claimed, by virtue of the second and third articles of the convention between the two Republics, that the benefit of these subsequent stipulations should be alike extended to the citizens of the United States, upon the condition of reciprocity provided for by the convention, the application of those engagements was readily acceded to by the Colombian Government, and a decree was issued by the Executive authority of that Republic, on the 30th of January last, a copy and translation of which are herewith communicated, securing to the citizens of the United States in the Republic of Colombia the same advantages, in regard to commerce and navigation, which had been conceded to British subjects in the Colombian treaty with Great Britain.

It remains for the Government of the United States to secure to the citizens of the Republic of Colombia the reciprocal advantages to which they are entitled by the terms of the convention, to commence from the 30th of January last; for the accomplishment of which, I invite the favorable consideration of the Legislature.

No. 1.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Clay to Mr. Anderson, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, September 16, 1825.

"By the treaty recently concluded between Great Britain and Colombia, it is understood that the vessels of the two countries, and their cargoes, are admitted into their respective ports upon the payment, without discrimination, of the same duties of impost and tonnage, whenever the cargo consists of the produce of the country to which the vessel belongs. Colombia having adopted the system of protecting her own tonnage by subjecting native vessels, and their cargoes, to a less rate of duty than that which is demanded on foreign vessels and their cargoes, these discriminating duties are paid by all foreign nations with which she has not agreed to equalize them. But the treaty between the United States and Colombia has not stipulated for the equalization of those duties, and, consequently, the vessel and its cargo, of each country, now remain subject, in the ports of the other, to alien duties. The United States would have had just cause to complain of the advantage conceded to Great Britain, if, by the second article of our treaty with Colombia, we had not a right to demand the same concession; and, if Mr. Gual had not, in a friendly spirit, in the course of the month of June last, informed Mr. Watts 'that the United States, whenever its Government desired, would be invested with all the privileges and powers which had been surrendered to England.' The President wishes, and you are authorized to propose, a mutual abolition of those discriminating duties. No difficulty, on the part of the Government of Colombia, in acceding to this proposal is anticipated; and it is only necessary to inquire into the best way of accomplishing the object. This may be done in either of the two following modes: 1st. By the fourth section of the act of Congress of January 7, 1824, it is enacted 'That, upon satisfactory evidence being given to the President of the United States by the Government of any foreign nation that no discriminating duties of tonnage or impost are imposed or levied within the ports of the said nation upon vessels wholly belonging to citizens of the United States, or upon merchandise, the produce or manufacture thereof, imported in the same, the President is hereby authorized to issue his proclamation, declaring that the foreign discriminating duties of tonnage and impost within the United States are and shall be suspended and discontinued, so far as respects the vessels of the said nation, and the merchandise, of its produce or manufacture, imported into the United States in the same; the said suspension to take effect from the time of such notification being given to the President of the United States, and to continue so long as the reciprocal exemption of vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, and merchandise, as aforesaid, thereon laden, shall be continued and no longer.'

"This act, conceived in a genuine spirit of liberality, makes a general proposition to all nations. The same offer had been made by a previous act of Congress, and it has been embraced by the King of the Netherlands, Prussia, the Imperial Hanseatic cities of Hamburg, Lubec, and Bremen, the Dukedom of Oldenburg, Norway, Sardinia, and Russia. A convention between the United States and Great Britain and a treaty with Sweden adopt the same principle; and Mr. Poinsett has been instructed to propose it to Mexico. The President is desirous that all nations would see and appreciate the fairness of the principle of reciprocity and competition upon which the act of Congress is based. To enable the President to give effect, as it respects any particular foreign nation, to the act, by issuing the proclamation for which it provides, all that is requisite is, that satisfactory evidence should be given to him 'that no discriminating duties of tonnage or impost are imposed or levied within the ports of the said nation upon vessels wholly belonging to citizens of the United States, or upon merchandise, the produce or manufacture thereof, imported in the same.' In regard to Colombia, an act of its Congress abolishing all such discriminating duties, or a diplomatic note from its Minister of Foreign Affairs, declaring that no such discriminating duties exist against the United States, would be deemed by the President evidence sufficiently satisfactory to authorize the issuing of his proclamation; and it would, accordingly, upon the production of such evidence, be by him issued.

"Secondly. A convention might be concluded between the two powers effecting the proposed mutual abolition of alien duties; and, in that case, the second article of that which, on July 3, 1815, was formed between the United States and Great Britain, (6th vol. of the Laws of the United States, page 603,) will supply a model that may be safely followed. It is not very important which of these two modes be adopted; but the President rather prefers the latter, because the proposed equalization of duties would not, when depending upon compact, be so liable to a sudden termination as if it rested on separate acts of the two parties, revocable at the pleasure of either. But if a strong inclination to the other mode should be manifested by the Government of Colombia, you are authorized to accede to it. A commission empowering you to conclude and sign a convention, if that should be the form selected, accompanies these instructions."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Watts to Mr. Clay, Secretary of State, dated

"BOGOTA, January 17, 1826.

"I have the honor to inclose you a copy of my note addressed to the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, growing out of the treaty recently ratified between this Republic and his Majesty the King of Great Britain.

"This morning I had a short interview with M. Revenga, when he apologized for not answering my note of the 15th, but gave me assurances that vessels of the United States, trading to the territories of Colombia, would be treated by the authorities of his Government as in possession of all the privileges granted to the Colombian and English vessels, upon a reciprocal equality, and that orders would immediately issue to the officers of the customs directing them to observe the same."

Mr. Watts to Mr. Revenga.

BOGOTA, January 15, 1826.

SIR: Since your excellency has been pleased to communicate to me the ratification of the treaty entered into between the Republic of Colombia and his Majesty the King of Great Britain, it becomes my duty to call your attention to the second and third articles of the treaty made and ratified between this Republic and the United States, wherein it is declared that the contracting parties engage, mutually, not to grant any particular favor to other nations which shall not immediately become common to the other party. In the treaty between Colombia and his Britannic Majesty, it is stipulated that no other or higher duties or imposts shall be levied on account of tonnage, light-house dues, port fees, &c., in the territories of Colombia, on British vessels, than the payments made for the same by Colombian vessels, and the same discount and bounties granted, whether in British or Colombian vessels.

May I therefore, sir, remind you of the promise made by your predecessor, Dr. Gual, and subsequently renewed by yourself, that, whenever it should be officially communicated to your Government that the treaty with Colombia and Great Britain had been ratified, that, simultaneously thereafter, orders would be issued placing the United States in all the privileges of the most favored nations.

I have the honor to repeat to your excellency the assurances of my high regard.

BEAUFORT T. WATTS.

No. 3.

BOGOTA, February 1, 1826.

SIR: Agreeably to the expectation intimated in my letter No. 32, no difficulty has occurred in procuring from this Government its assent to a mutual and immediate renunciation of the countervailing duties to which the commerce and navigation of the two countries have been heretofore subjected in the ports of each other, and a few days only were occupied in concerting the means of accomplishing that end. Not having ascertained, with distinctness, in the conversation which I had with the Secretary of Foreign Relations on this subject, the views of his Government in relation to the mode of effecting the desired object, I determined to submit, at once, in a formal manner, the alternative suggested in your instructions, of effecting the abolition either by a convention, or by an order to that end, to be issued by Colombia, in anticipation of a corresponding order from the Government of the United States.

To this mode I was led from a wish to exclude, without delay, a subject which, in truth, admitted no delay without great injury to our commerce, and, also, because, although an inclination had been indicated to adopt the course of mutual Executive orders, no such distinct preference had been announced as to justify me in forbearing to make the proposition to effect the object by treaty. This Government has, however, elected to abolish the duties under consideration, by a decree of the Executive, a copy of which, together with the official note accompanying it, is herewith transmitted to you. The thing is, I believe, satisfactory and complete. The decree, in recapitulating the different motives and obligations which moved the Executive to issue it, has gone into a recital much more minute than was necessary for our purpose, but probably not more so than was necessary to show, on its face, the authority of the Vice President for acting in the case.

The late convention between Colombia and Great Britain, which has been assumed, in this case, as the standard for affixing the regulations to be established with us, embraces the following principles:

- 1st. It equalizes the tonnage and other port duties on the vessels of the two countries.
- 2d. It equalizes the duties on the importation of goods, whether it be in the vessels of the one or the other country, provided those goods are of the produce or manufacture of the country from which the importation is made.
- 3d. The duty; and
- 4th. The bounty on exportation are made equal, whether the exportation be made in Colombian or British vessels.

It is on this footing that the recent order has placed our navigation, and it is to this extent, no doubt, that Colombia expects an entire reciprocity from the United States. But you will observe that, in this respect, the inclosed decree is broader than the act of Congress to which you refer me, as giving the President authority to reciprocate the abolition. The fourth section of the act of the 7th of January, 1824, authorizes the President, in certain events, to declare discontinued and suspended the duties of tonnage and impost. I am aware that no difficulty can, at any time, occur with regard to a duty on exportation, as none by our laws, has been or can be imposed; but, inasmuch as it is within the competency of Congress to legislate at any time on the subject of a bounty on exports, I considered it proper to call your attention to the extent of the arrangement on the part of Colombia, in order that the reciprocity which I believe will exist under our laws as they now are may not be violated by future legislation.

In that part of the decree which refers to my letter of the 28th of January to the Secretary of Foreign Relations, as giving an assurance that there will be a mutual abrogation of the corresponding duties in the United States, it is stated that this abolition will take place from the day on which the suspension occurs in Colombia. You will see that this is not the language of my note. My expressions conform more nearly to the language of the law, which says: "The suspension shall take effect from the time of the notification being given to the President of the United States." But well knowing the liberal spirit which governs our conduct on analogous occasions, I did not doubt that, if a Colombian vessel should arrive in our ports under the faith of that construction, the excess between the alien and domestic duties would be refunded. I have therefore permitted the subject to pass without notice, under the certain belief that no difficulty can arise out of it.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

R. C. ANDERSON, Jr.

HON. HENRY CLAY, Secretary of State, Washington.

P. S. A copy of my letter to the Secretary of Foreign Relations is herein also inclosed.

(a.)

SIR: The propriety of abolishing the discriminating duties of imposts and tonnage, hitherto imposed by the laws of our respective countries on the vessels and merchandise of the one in the ports of the other, has been a subject of correspondence between yourself and Mr. Watts, chargé d'affaires of the United States near this Republic. It is with great pleasure I learn from that correspondence that the Government of Colombia is not indisposed to make a mutual abolition of those duties; and it is with still further satisfaction I learned from you, in conversation on Thursday last, that this Government was now ready, in confirmation of its previous declaration, to make an immediate arrangement which would place the commerce and navigation of the two States on so eligible a foundation. In that conversation I had the honor of stating to you that two modes occurred to me, by either of which the same beneficial result would probably be produced, but that there were considerations connected with one of them which seemed to give claims to its adoption beyond the other.

The one mode of accomplishing the object is that referred to in your letter to Mr. Watts, of the 20th of the present month, in which you declare the readiness of Colombia to extend, by a decree of the Government, to the vessels and merchandise of the United States, the same rights and exemptions which have been recently granted to Great Britain. This course will be in fulfilment of those clauses of the treaty between the United States and Colombia, signed on the 3d of October, 1824, by which each has assured to the commerce and navigation of the other the footing of the most favored nation. This principle, then, taken in connexion with the provisions of the late convention between this Government and the Government of Great Britain, under which the vessels of those countries and their cargoes pay only, in the ports of each other, the duties demanded in like cases from native vessels and their cargoes.

If this shall be the mode preferred to be made to the United States, I am authorized to say, and I desire that this may be deemed the necessary declaration, that, immediately on receiving the information that the duties in question have been abolished here, the President of the United States will issue his proclamation declaring a mutual and immediate abolition of the corresponding duties with regard to Colombia in the ports of the United States.

Another mode suggesting itself for effecting the desired object is, a convention between the two powers declaring a mutual abolition of alien duties. This mode is recommended by its superior simplicity. A single instrument would then show the whole rule governing the commerce of the two countries. A convention would declare on its face, without reference for explanation to any other treaty or public document, the duties demandable in the ports of the one from the citizens of the other nation.

The relations produced in this way would be more permanent, inasmuch as they would not rest for their existence or continuance on any arrangement made with a third power, which would necessarily be the case if the first course referred to be adopted.

Under this view, it is respectfully submitted whether it is not more desirable to effect an object directly, and by express stipulation, than to reach it by a circuitry, and then to permit it to depend for its duration on the continuance of an arrangement to which one of our Governments is no party. It does not occur to me that any objection can exist on the part of Colombia to make the same stipulations with the United States, and in the same form, too, in which they have been recently made between this Government and that of his Britannic Majesty; and especially, as whatever objection to the principle or precedent of such a compact may once have existed is now destroyed by the adoption and ratification of that convention.

In the event that the manner here last suggested should be preferred by this Government, it will give me great pleasure, under the full powers with which I have been furnished for the purpose, to enter on the negotiation at as early a day as it may be convenient.

I have the honor to assure you of my high consideration and respect.

REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Bogota, January 31, 1826.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive and to lay before the Vice President your communication of the 28th ultimo, in which, after referring to that addressed by this Department to Mr. Watts, chargé d'affaires of the United States, on the 20th, you are pleased to propose a treaty in addition to that which was concluded between Colombia and the United States on the 3d October, 1824, as the most simple means of extending to their vessels, productions, and manufactures, the privileges which, by the treaty concluded here in April last, were granted to the vessels, productions, and manufactures of the dominions of his Britannic Majesty.

The Vice President agrees in opinion with you, that a treaty which should abolish all the duties to which foreign vessels are subject in the mutual commerce of our respective countries would facilitate the comprehension of the rules to be observed in our mutual mercantile relations; but he judges, at the same time, that this object is no less attainable by a simple declaration, and that this being in the power of the Executive of both countries, in virtue of the said treaty of October, the adoption of what you propose would only have the effect of deferring it.

The copy with which you were pleased to accompany your above-mentioned communication has inspired the Vice President with the agreeable persuasion that, for this purpose, a decree, such as that which I have the honor to inclose, would be entirely satisfactory to the Government of the United States. And the apprehension that the duration of these new privileges would be thus more ephemeral has appeared to his excellency to be removed, as he flatters himself that those States endeavor, no less than Colombia, to strengthen and cultivate, mutually, the most frank, friendly, and benevolent relations. These sentiments have induced the Vice President to order me to communicate that decree to the proper persons, that it may be observed as a law of the Republic; and I am gratified in adding that I this day fulfil that order.

I pray you, sir, to accept my assurances of perfect respect, and the sentiments of high esteem with which I have the honor to be your obedient humble servant.

JOSEPH R. REVENGA.

Translation of the decree.

FRANCISCO DE PAULA SANTANDER, Vice President, charged with the Executive authority of the Republic of Colombia.

The ratifications of the treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation, concluded in this city on the eighteenth of April, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, between Colombia and his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, having been exchanged, as is duly known; in which treaty it is declared, in the fifth article, "that no other or higher duties on account of tonnage, light or harbor dues, shall be imposed in the ports of Colombia on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by Colombian vessels;" and, also, in the sixth article, "that the same duties shall be paid on the importation into the territories of Colombia of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of his Britannic Majesty's dominions, whether such importation shall be in Colombian or British vessels; and the same duties shall be paid, and the same discount (drawback) and bounties allowed on the exportation of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of Colombia, to his Britannic Majesty's dominions, whether such exportation be in Colombian or British vessels."

And it being stipulated in the third article of the general convention of peace, amity, navigation, and commerce, concluded in this city on the third day of October, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, between Colombia and the United States of America, the ratifications of which were exchanged on the twenty-seventh of May, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, "that the citizens of the United States of America shall pay no other or greater duties, charges, or fees, whatsoever, than the most favored nation is or shall be obliged to pay; and they shall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and exemptions, in navigation and commerce, which the most favored nation does or shall enjoy."

And the honorable Richard C. Anderson, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States near the Government of Colombia, having made known, in a communication dated on the twenty-eighth day of the present month of January, that the President of the said United States is ready to concede, or cause to be conceded, to the vessels, productions, and manufactures of Colombia, the same exemptions which, by the before-mentioned treaty, are granted to the vessels, productions, and manufactures of the dominions of his Britannic Majesty, which may be introduced into the ports and territories of Colombia; and that those exemptions will be granted from the day in which, in Colombia, there shall be extended to the commerce of the citizens of the United States the privileges which are granted to British commerce.

And it being obligatory on Colombia, by the second and third articles of the before-mentioned general convention, "not to grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect to commerce and navigation, which shall not become common to the United States:"

Wherefore, and the condition of which the said second article speaks being considered as complied with, and in the execution of the laws of the Republic, I declare:

Article 1. That there shall be paid the same duties on the importation into the territories of Colombia of any article whatever of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States of America and of the territories subject to the Government of the United States; and that there shall be paid the same duties, and there shall be granted the same discounts and bounties on the exportation of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of Colombia to the United States, or to the territories of the same, whether the said importation or exportation be made in Colombian vessels or in vessels of the said United States.

Article 2. The vessels of the United States which may enter into the ports of the Republic of Colombia shall not pay other or higher duties or charges, on account of tonnage, light, or harbor dues, or other local charges, than shall be payable in the same ports by Colombian vessels.

Article 3. The Secretary of State in the despatch of foreign affairs is charged with communicating this declaration.

Done in the city of Bogota, this thirtieth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, in the sixteenth of independence.

FRANCISCO DE PAULA SANTANDER.

M. B. ya sea que esta exportacion se haga en buques Británicos ó en Colombianos."

Y habiendose estipulado en el artículo III de la convencion jeneral de paz, amistad, navegacion y comercio, concluida en esta ciudad á tres de Octubre del año de mil ochocientos veinte y cuatro, entre Colombia y los Estados-Unidos de America cuyas ratificaciones fueron canjeadas en veinte y siete de Mayo de mil ochocientos veinte y cinco: "Que los ciudadanos de los Estados-Unidos de America no pagarán otros ó mayores derechos, impuestos ó emolumentos cualesquiera que los que las naciones mas favorecidas estan ó estuvieren obligadas á pagar, y gozarán de todos los derechos, privilegios y exenciones que gozan ó gozaren los de la nacion mas favorecida con respeto á navegacion y comercio."

Y habiendo manifestado el Honorable Sr. R. C. Anderson, enviado extraordinario y ministro plenipotenciario de los Estados Unidos cerca del Gobierno de Colombia en comunicacion fecha á veinte y ocho del corriente mes de Enero que el Presidente de dichos Estados-Unidos está pronto á conceder ó á hacer que se conceda en ellos, á los buques, producciones y manufacturas Colombianas los mismos goces que por el sobre-dicho tratado se conceden á los buques, producciones, y manufacturas de los dominios de S. M. B. que se introduzcan en los puertos y territorios Colombianos; y que los concedera ó hará que se concedan desde el dia en que en Colombia se estiendan al comercio de los ciudadanos de los Estados-Unidos los goces concedidos al comercio Británico.

Y siendo obligatorio á Colombia por los artículos II y III de la sobre-dicha convencion general "el no conceder favores particulares á otras naciones con respecto á comercio y navegacion que no se hagan comunes" á los Estados-Unidos:

Por tanto; y cumplida ya como se concidera la condicion de que habla el citado artículo II, en ejecucion de las leyes de la Republica, declaro:

Artículo 1º. Se pagaran los mismos derechos á la importacion en los territorios de Colombia de cualquier artículo del producto natural, producciones ó manufacturas de los Estados-Unidos de America y de los territorios sujetos al Gobierno de los Estados-Unidos; y se pagarán los mismos derechos, y se concederan los mismos descuentos y gratificaciones á la exportacion de cualesquiera artículos del producto natural, producciones ó manufacturas de Colombia, para los Estados-Unidos ó para los territorios de los Estados-Unidos; ya sea que la importacion se haga en buques Colombianos ó en buques de dichos Estados-Unidos.

Artículo 2º. No pagarán los buques de los Estados-Unidos que entren en puertos de la Republica de Colombia otros ó mas altos derechos ó impuestos por razon de tonelada, fanal ó emolumentos de puerto, ú otros gastos locales, que los pagaderos en los mismos puertos por buques Colombianos.

Artículo 3º. El Secretario de Estado en el despacho de relaciones exteriores queda encargado de comunicar esta declaracion.

No. 430.

[1ST SESSION.

CORRESPONDENCE RELATIVE TO THE CONGRESS AT PANAMA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES APRIL 5, 1826.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of the 30th ultimo, I transmit to the House a report from the Secretary of State, with the documents desired by the resolution, and also a copy of the letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Poinsett, acknowledging the receipt of his despatch No. 22, accidentally overlooked in the answer to the resolution of the House of the 27th ultimo.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, April 5, 1826.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 3, 1826.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred by the President the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 30th ultimo, requesting him to transmit to the House "a copy of Mr. Middleton's letter of the 2d of July to Count Nesselrode, communicated with the despatch of the Secretary of State of the 10th of May, 1825, and so much of the instructions from the Department of State to the ministers of the United States to Buenos Ayres, Chile, and Mexico, as relates to a proposed or contemplated Congress of the Spanish American States," has the honor to report:

1. A copy of the letter of Mr. Middleton, requested, with a copy of a translation of it into English.
2. An extract from a despatch from the late Secretary of State to Mr. Rodney, under date of 17th day of May, 1823, containing the only instructions given to any minister of the United States at Buenos Ayres respecting the contemplated Congress; and
3. An extract from a despatch from the Department of State, under date of the 24th of September, 1825, embracing the only instructions given to the minister of the United States at Mexico in relation to the Congress.

That no instructions have been given to the minister of the United States at Chile in relation to the proposed Congress.

The Secretary of State asks permission to take this occasion to state that, when his report of the 29th ultimo was made, in obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 27th ultimo, it was overlooked in the office; that in a despatch to Mr. Poinsett of the 9th of December last, communicating the conclusion of a treaty with the Central Republic, the receipt was acknowledged of Mr. Poinsett's despatch, No. 22. Although, in fact, nothing is contained in that despatch of the 9th of December falling within the scope of the resolution of the House, a copy of it is, nevertheless, now laid before the President, that he may decide on the propriety of its being communicated to the House. The Secretary also begs leave to add that Mr. Poinsett has been requested to furnish to this Department a duplicate of the despatch referred to by him in his letter of the 21st of August, 1825, which was accidentally mislaid, as stated in the above report of the 29th ultimo.

All which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. Middleton to Count Nesselrode.

à ST. PETERSBOURG, ce 2 (14) Juillet, 1825.

Le soussigné, Envoyé Extraordinaire et Ministre Plénipotentiaire des Etats-Unis d'Amérique à l'honneur de prévenir son Excellence Monsieur le Comte de Nesselrode, qu' à fin de remplir les intentions de son Gouvernement, il croit ne pouvoir mieux faire que de lui envoyer ci-près copie d'une dépêche en forme d'instruction qu'il vient de recevoir, et de la prier de vouloir bien la mettre sous les yeux de sa Majesté l'Empereur, dont intervention amicale, invoquée avec succès dans plus d'une occasion, peut encore en ce moment servir à la fois les intérêts de l'Europe et de l'Amérique.

Le soussigné est d'autant plus porté à faire cette démarche, qu'il est dans la persuasion que sa Majesté Impériale trouvera consignées, dans la dépêche sus-mentionnée, de nouvelles preuves ajoutées à tant d'autres, des sentimens de haute estime et de confiance qu'elle inspire au Gouvernement des Etats-Unis, et par conséquent, qu'elle daignera accueillir avec bienveillance les vœux qu'il à émis.

Dans la guerre actuelle entre l'Espagne et ses ci-devant possessions d'outremer, les Etats-Unis n'ont jamais pris de part, ni pour l'exciter ni pour l'alimenter; ils ont toujours observé la neutralité la plus stricte. On ne peut pas dire, à la vérité, qu'ils aient été des spectateurs indifférents aux événements qui se passaient sous leur yeux. Dans des vues raisonnées de commerce, ils ont toujours désiré que ces nations placées sur la même continent qu'ils habitent pussent établir une indépendance politique dont ils avoient eux même ressenti l'heureuse influence; mais ce sentiment n'a jamais faussé la neutralité qu'ils avoient déclarée. La preuve de la fidélité avec laquelle ils en ont rempli les obligations est, que dans le cours de la guerre actuelle, les deux parties belligérantes se sont également et faussement plaintes de la violation de cette neutralité.

Mais si les Etats-Unis ont vû avec satisfaction les efforts des nations du Continent Américain pour se soustraire au joug de la domination Espagnole, il n'en est pas de même pour ci qui regarde les isles de Cuba et de Porto Rico. Le caractère de la population de ces isles rend extrêmement problématique leur capacité de maintenir l'indépendance. Une déclaration prématurée n'aurait probablement pour résultat, que la répétition affligeante des scènes désastreuses de St. Domingue.

Contre un telle catastrophe il ne puit y avoir d'autre garantie que celle de la présence d'une force armée fournie par quelque puissance protectrice. Si les nouveaux Etats, ou quelques uns d'entre eux, faisaient la conquête de ces îles, leurs moyens militaires et maritimes ne sauraient rassurer contre l'occurrence de scènes sanglantes et déplorables.

Ayant égard donc aux circonstances, et sous le point de vue commercial, des Etats-Unis sont parfaitement satisfaits de la condition politique de ces îles sous la domination de leur metropole; mais ils ne pourraient envisager comme indifférent à leurs intérêts l'intervention armée d'aucune autre nation.

Toutes les puissances qui ont des possessions dans l'archipel Américain ont un intérêt pressant d'empêcher le bouleversement de l'ordre existant dans ces îles. Quoique la Russie ne se trouve pas dans cette catégorie, le caractère bienveillant de sa Majesté Impériale et son penchant décidé pour le maintien de toutes les légitimités, font espérer qu'elle ne refusera pas de prêter son puissant appui au seul moyen qui paraît s'offrir pour éviter un surcroît de malheurs pour l'Espagne et le monde civilisé.

Ce moyen se trouve indiqué dans l'écrit dont copie ci-près.

Le Gouvernement des Etats Unis plus à portée par sa position géographique et par les informations qu'il a prises sur la condition actuelle des nouveaux états de juger des chances probables de cette guerre, que ne le sont des Gouvernements moins rapprochés, peut sans témérité se croire autorisé à mettre son opinion sur la meilleure manière de tarir une source déjà abondante de maux pour l'humanité et qui menace incessamment de redoubler d'activité.

Dans toute cette question il ne s'agit pas de considérer qu'ils peuvent être le vrais principes du droit. En cela il peut y avoir, pas, ou n'y avoir dissentiment d'opinion. Il s'agit ici de constater les faits. Où les faits ont prononcé, le droit se trouve anéanti. Il n'est question donc que de faire le bien qui soit encore possible, lorsqu'on ne peut pas accomplir tout le bien qu'on aurait désiré. Mais si l'on ne sa hâte en ce moment de sauver pour l'Espagne les dernières colonies qui lui restent, l'occasion en sera peut-être à jamais perdue.

En appelant une attention sérieuse sur l'urgence du cas qui se presente, il ne reste au soussigné qu'à prier son Excellence M. le Comte de Nesselrode de vouloir bien agréer l'assurance renouvelée de sa haute consideration.

H. MIDDLETON.

Mr. Middleton to Count Nesselrode.

[Translation.]

St. PETERSBURG, July 2, (14,) 1825.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to inform his excellency the Count de Nesselrode that, in order to fulfil the intentions of his Government, he thinks he cannot do better than send him a copy of a despatch, in the form of an instruction, which he has just received, and pray him to be pleased to lay it before his Majesty the Emperor, whose friendly interposition, invoked with success on more than one occasion, may still at this moment subserve at once the interests of Europe and of America.

The undersigned is, moreover, the more inclined to do this, as he is persuaded that his Imperial Majesty will find recorded, in the above-mentioned despatch, new proofs, in addition to so many others, of the sentiments of high esteem and confidence with which he inspires the Government of the United States, and consequently that he will deign to receive with kindness the wishes therein expressed.

In the present war between Spain and her late ultramar possessions the United States have never taken a part, either to excite or foster it; they have always observed the strictest neutrality. It cannot, in truth, be said that they have been indifferent spectators of the events passing under their view. In the reasonable views of commerce they have always desired that the nations placed upon the same continent with them might establish a political independence, the happy influence of which they themselves had felt, but this sentiment has never infringed the neutrality which they had declared. It is a proof of the fidelity with which they have fulfilled its obligations, that, in the course of the existing war, the two belligerent parties have equally and erroneously complained of the violation of that neutrality.

But if the United States have seen with satisfaction the efforts of the nations of the American continent to withdraw themselves from the yoke of Spanish domination, it is not so with regard to the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico. The character of the population of these islands renders extremely problematical their capacity to maintain independence. A premature declaration would probably result only in the afflicting repetition of the disastrous scenes of St. Domingo.

Against such a catastrophe there can be no other security than that of the presence of an armed force furnished by some protecting power. If the new States, or any of them, were to make conquest of these islands, their military and naval means could be no security against the occurrence of bloody and deplorable scenes. Having regard, therefore, to the circumstances, and in a commercial point of view, the United States are perfectly satisfied with the political condition of these islands under the dominion of their mother country; but they could not see, as indifferent to their interests, the armed intervention of any other nation.

All the powers that have possessions in the American archipelago have an urgent interest in preventing the overthrow of the existing order in these islands. Although Russia is not in that predicament, the benevolent character of his Imperial Majesty and his decided inclination for the maintenance of all legitimacies create a hope that he will not refuse to lend his powerful aid to the only means which appear to offer for averting an increase of misfortunes from Spain and the civilized world.

These means are pointed out in the writing of which a copy is inclosed.

The Government of the United States, better able, by their geographical position, and by the information which they receive of the actual condition of the new States, to judge of the probable chances of this war than those Governments at a greater distance, may, without temerity, think themselves authorized to give their opinion upon the best manner of drying up a source, already overflowing, of evils to mankind, and which incessantly threatens to be redoubled in activity.

In all this question there enters no consideration of what may be the true principles of right. In that there may or may not be a difference of opinion. Here there is only a verification of facts. When facts have decided, the question of right has vanished. It remains, therefore, only to do the good which is still possible, when all the good which may be desired cannot be accomplished. But if haste be not made at present to save to Spain the last colonies which remain to her, the opportunity of doing so will be perhaps forever lost.

In calling a serious attention to the urgency of the case which is presented, it only remains for the undersigned to pray his excellency Count Nesselrode to be pleased to accept the renewed assurances of his high consideration.

HENRY MIDDLETON.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, to Mr. Cesar A. Rodney, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Buenos Ayres, dated

MAY 17, 1823.

"In the meantime a more extensive confederation has been projected under the auspices of the new Government of the Republic of Colombia. In the last despatch received from Mr. Forbes, dated the 27th of January last, he mentions the arrival and reception, at Buenos Ayres, of Mr. Joaquin Mosquera y Arbolada, senator of the Republic of Colombia, and their Minister Plenipotentiary and Extraordinary, upon a mission, the general object of which, he informed Mr. Forbes, was to engage the other independent Governments of Spanish America to unite with Colombia in a Congress, to be held at such point as might be agreed on, to settle a general system of American policy in relation to Europe, leaving to each section of the country the perfect liberty of independent self-government. For this purpose he had already signed a treaty with Peru, of which he promised Mr. Forbes the perusal; but there were some doubts with regard to the character of his associations and the personal influence to which he was accessible at Buenos Ayres, and Mr. Forbes had not much expectation of his success in prevailing on that Government to enter into his project of extensive federation.

"By letters of a previous date, November, 1822, received from Mr. Prevost, it appears that the project is yet more extensive than Mr. Mosquera had made known to Mr. Forbes. It embraces North as well as South America, and a formal proposal to join and take the lead in it is to be made known to the Government of the United States.

"Intimations of the same design have been given to Mr. Todd at Bogota. It will be time for this Government to deliberate concerning it when it shall be presented in a more definite and specific form. At present it indicates more distinctly a purpose on the part of the Colombian Republic to assume a leading character in this hemisphere than any practicable objects of utility which can be discovered by us. With relation to Europe, there is perceived to be only one object in which the interests and wishes of the United States can be the same as those of the Southern American nations, and that is, that they should all be governed by republican institutions, politically and commercially independent of Europe. To any confederation of Spanish American provinces for that end the United States would yield their approbation and cordial good wishes. If more should be asked of them, the proposition will be received and considered in a friendly spirit, and with a due sense of its importance."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Clay, Secretary of State, to Mr. Poinsett, Minister of the United States to Mexico, dated DEPARTMENT OF STATE, September 24, 1825.

"During the last spring the ministers of Mexico and Colombia near this Government made separate, but nearly simultaneous, communications to this Department in relation to the contemplated Congress at Panama. Each of them stated that he was instructed by his Government to say that it would be very agreeable to it that the United States should be represented at that Congress; that it was not expected they would take any part in its deliberations, or measures of concert, in respect to the existing war against Spain, but that other great interests, affecting the continent of America and the friendly intercourse between the independent nations established on it, might be considered and regulated at the Congress; and that, not knowing what might be the views of the United States, a previous inquiry was directed to be made whether they would, if invited by Mexico or Colombia, be represented at Panama, and, if an affirmative answer were given, each of those ministers stated that the United States would be accordingly invited to be represented there. The President directed me to say, and I accordingly replied, that the communication was received with great sensibility to the friendly consideration of the United States by which it had been dictated; that of course they could not make themselves any party to the existing war with Spain, or to councils for deliberating on the means of its further prosecution; that he believed such a Congress as was proposed might be highly useful in settling several important controverted questions of public law, and in arranging other matters of deep interest to the American continent, and to the friendly intercourse between the American powers; that before such a Congress assembled, however, it appeared to him to be necessary to arrange between the different powers to be represented several preliminary points, such as the subjects to which the attention of the Congress should be directed, the nature and the form of the powers to be given to the ministers, and the mode of organizing the Congress. If these preliminary points could be adjusted in a manner satisfactory to the United States, the ministers from Mexico and Colombia were informed that the United States would be represented at the Congress. Upon inquiry if these preliminary points had yet engaged the attention of either the Government of Mexico or Colombia, they were unable to inform me that they had, whilst both appeared to admit the expediency of their being settled. Each of them undertook to communicate to his Government the answer which I delivered to their invitations, and nothing further has since transpired. It is deemed proper that you should be made acquainted with what has occurred here on this matter, in order that, if it should be touched upon by the Mexican Government, you may, if necessary, be able to communicate what passed. We shall make no further movement in it until we hear from the Governments of Mexico or Colombia."

Mr. Clay to Mr. Poinsett, No. 8.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 9, 1825.

Sir: Your despatch No. 22, under date of September 28, 1825, is this day received. By mine of the 9th ultimo you will have learned that the President approves of your rejection of the exception in the proposed commercial treaty, which the Mexican Government insists upon making, of favors in behalf of the new Governments established within what was formerly Spanish territory, and that you are instructed to break off the negotiation rather than accede to that exception. It is therefore seen with regret that the Mexican Government perseveres in an exception which is so inadmissible. On the 5th instant a treaty of peace, amity, commerce, and navigation was concluded and signed here with the Central Republic, which will be submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent in a day or two. This treaty embraces the same articles as that which we have made with Colombia, and three others, (one a modification of a similar article in that treaty, and two new ones,) of which copies are herewith sent. It contains no exception of favors to any of the American Republics carved out of former Spanish territory. On the contrary, no such pretension was ever advanced in the progress of the negotiation. It has been brought forward by no American power but Mexico. The treaty with the Republic of the Centre is characterized by the greatest liberality and by a true American spirit; and it expressly provides that whatever favors shall be granted to any foreign power (of course American as well as European) by either of the high contracting parties shall extend to and be enjoyed by the other.

Our information here in regard to the treaty negotiated by Great Britain with Mexico is, that the objection taken to it in England was that it embraced the principle that free ships should make free goods, to which Great Britain is not prepared to subscribe.

I am your obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

19TH CONGRESS.]

No. 431.

[1ST SESSION.]

RELATIVE TO WHAT GOVERNMENTS ARE EXPECTED TO BE REPRESENTED AT THE CONGRESS OF PANAMA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES APRIL 15, 1826.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of the 11th instant, I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State and documents containing the information desired by the resolution.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, April 15, 1826.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred by the President the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 11th instant, requesting him to inform that House ("if within his power) whether any Government, except the Government of the United States, has been invited to send ministers to the Congress at Panama, and, also, whether he has any reason to expect that any other Government or Governments, in addition to the independent Governments of Spanish America and the Government of the United States of North America, (and, if any, what other Government or Governments,) will be represented in or at the Congress at Panama," has the honor to report:

1. A copy of a note from Mr. Salazar, addressed to the Secretary of State from New York, under date of March 10, 1826, with a copy of the note to which it refers, from the Chevalier de Gamiero to Mr. Hurtado, under date at Park Crescent, in London, October 30, 1825.
2. An extract from a despatch from Mr. Raguet, chargé d'affaires of the United States to Brazil, under date of February 14, 1826; and
3. An extract from a letter of Mr. Poinsett, under date at Mexico, January 18, 1826.

The Secretary has also the honor to state that other information, though not in an official form, has reached this Department of the intention of Great Britain to have an agent present at the Congress at Panama; and the Department has also been informed that France (whether with or without invitation is not known here) will likewise have an agent there. But it is not believed that these agents of Great Britain and France are expected to take any part in the conferences or negotiations of the Congress. No information is possessed in the Department of the intention of any other Government to be represented in or at the Congress of Panama, except the independent Governments of Spanish America, the United States Great Britain, France, and the Emperor of Brazil.

All which is respectfully submitted.

LEGATION OF COLOMBIA NEAR THE UNITED STATES OF NORTH AMERICA,
New York, March 10, 1826.

SIR: I have just received the orders of my Government to communicate to that of the United States that his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil has accepted a formal invitation, given by the Government of Colombia, to come to the Congress of Panama, and it has been resolved to send plenipotentiaries to take part in the deliberations of general interest, and which may be compatible with the neutrality which Brazil has observed in the war of America with Spain.

The plenipotentiary of his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil near his Britannic Majesty has made this declaration to the Hon. Manuel José Hurtado, minister of Colombia at the said court, by a note, dated the 30th of October last, a copy of which I have the honor to inclose.

The Government of Colombia has seen with the greatest pleasure this disposition of his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil to enter into relations of friendship with the new Republics, and to labor in concert for the general prosperity of America, at the same time that he puts an end to the sinister interpretations which have been given in Europe to the objects of the Congress of Panama.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you, sir, the assurances of my distinguished consideration.
JOSE MARIA SALAZAR.

The Chevalier de Gamiero to Mr. Hurtado.

[Translation.]

PARK CRESCENT, October 30, 1825.

SIR: I fulfil to-day a very agreeable duty in announcing to you that the Emperor, my master, to whom I made known the note which you addressed to me on the 7th of June last, has been pleased to accept the formal invitation, which the Government of Colombia gave to him, that Brazil should join the other States of America, about to assemble at Panama, to arrange in common their mutual relations, and fix their respective political and commercial system.

The policy of the Emperor is so generous and benevolent that he will always be ready to contribute to the repose, the happiness, and the glory of America. And as soon as the negotiation relative to the recognition of the empire shall be honorably terminated at Rio de Janeiro he will send a plenipotentiary to the Congress to take part in the deliberations of general interest, which shall be compatible with the strict neutrality which he observes between the belligerent States of America and Spain.

Such, sir, is the answer which I am charged to make you, adding that the Emperor appreciates the friendship of the Colombian Government, and it will give him pleasure to cultivate it.

Happy to be the organ of the sentiments of my august master, I pray you to accept the renewed assurances of the high consideration with which I have the honor to be your most humble and most obedient servant,

CHEVALIER DE GAMIERO.

Extract of a letter to Mr. Clay, Secretary of State, from Mr. Condy Raguet, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States, Brazil, dated

"RIO DE JANEIRO, February 14, 1826.

"By decree of January 25 Theodoro Jose Brancardi, chief clerk of the Home Department, was appointed plenipotentiary of this Government to the Congress at Panama, in which his Majesty was invited by the Government of Colombia, through the Brazilian minister at London, to take a part."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Poinsett to Mr. Clay, Secretary of State, dated

"MEXICO, January 18, 1826.

"The chargé d'affaires of the United Mexican States at Bogota has very lately sent an official communication to this Government, from that of Colombia, setting forth that the Emperor of Brazil had been invited to send plenipotentiaries to the Congress of Panama, and his Majesty the King of Great Britain to send an agent there. Nothing is said as to the precise character of the latter."
