As no person belonging to the crew was to be taken out, the British plenipotentiaries, continuing their remarks upon the fifth article, next said that a power on the part of the capturing ship to confine the crew below, or otherwise restrain them, would be absolutely necessary, in contingencies to be fairly imagined, to give full effect to the principles which the projet intended to secure. The delinquent vessel, as often happened, might be powerfully manned. These men rendered fierce, not to add desperate, by their vocation, and the perils to which by capture they would become exposed, could not want the desire and would naturally watch the opportunity of overcoming the captors in whose custody they were placed. Ought not, therefore, the captors to be furnished with adequate means of keeping the mastery over them until the captured vessel was safely conveyed to her destination?

Such were the principal amendments or suggestions which the British plenipotentiaries at an early stage put forward, and they were discussed between us in a temper frank and amicable. They declared that they did not offer them in the spirit of objection, but under sincere wishes to secure for the plan at all points the recommendations and potency which it must be supposed each nation equally aimed at imparting to it. It was designed to act upon a stubborn as well as malignant class of offenders, whose cunning was not behind their depravity, and who had hitherto put to scorn the efforts of good men in all countries to check the stupendous enormity of their deeds. They concluded with saying that they would present to my consideration a counter-projet, on the part of Great Britain, embracing what they deemed to be the necessary provisions upon the whole subject. I replied, that the articles of the plan which I had submitted had not been drawn up to the exclusion of others that Great Britain might, in turn, have to propose; nor were they all to be insisted upon in the shape in which they first stood. There were, indeed, cardinal principles in them that could on no account be departed from; but there were others, as well as much of detail, open to whatever alterations or additions both parties might be able to agree in thinking proper and useful. This was the spirit in which I knew it to be the desire of my Government that the negotiation should be conducted.

The essential principles of our plan, as gathered from my best attention to it, in connexion with your instructions, I considered to be: 1st. That this nation was to declare the slave trade piracy by act of Parliament. 2d. That the captured vessel was to be sent to her own country for trial before its own tribunals, and never before those of the capturing power. 3d. That no individual belonging to the crew was ever to be taken out of the accused vessel. 4th. That the capturing officer should be laid under the most effective responsibility for his conduct, in all respects. 5th. That no merchant vessel under the protection or in the presence of a ship-of-war of her own nation was ever to be visited by a ship-of-war of the other nation. I informed the British plenipotentiaries, unreservedly, that I could consent to nothing that did not give full security to each and all of the above principles. I knew that some of them bespoke a great change in pre-existing principles and usages under the maritime code of the world; but the change was not for light but high objects, and was believed by my Government to be the only means by which they could be adequately and permanently secured.

At the fourth conference their counter-projet was brought forward. I was happy to find that it acceded to all the principles that are above recapitulated, adopting, too, and largely, the language in which our own articles had been framed. To its first article, however, or rather to that passage in it which relates to convoy, I took strong exception, owing to the manner in which it was worded and the import that it might bear. I also objected as strongly to the phraseology of so much of its tenth article as purported to save to both parties all their existing rights; upon both these passages; upon their second article, bringing under the cognizance of the convention the subjects or citizens of either power surreptitiously chartering the flag of a third power; upon that part of their seventh article, also, bringing within the pale of the convention the subjects or citizens of either power found on board the slave trading vessel of a third power, though not chartered or owned by them; and upon those parts of their fourth article which make provision for restraining the crew of the captured vessel and removing the slaves, full discussions followed at the fourth, the fifth, and the sixth conferences. More than once I was not without apprehensions that the whole work would fall through. More than once it rested upon a difficult balance, awakening solicitude for its fate. To their passage on convoy I objected, on full consideration, absolutely, and urged the reinsertion of our own article on this subject in its very words, as being simple, intelligible, and appropriate. They as strenuously resisted its reinsertion, not, as they repeatedly and unequivocally declared, from any desire ever to exercise the power which it interdicted, and which would, therefore, render the reinsertion superfluous, but because they objected to the word convoy and to the whole formality of our article, which would be embarrassing in its comparison with the arrangements settled on this point in the treaty between Great Britain and the Netherlands of May, 1818. Finally, as I could not give up the principle, but was not tenacious of the word, I agreed to drop it on having any other words, however few, that would carry the principle, but not more than the principle. Their own words, viz: except when in the presence of a ship-of-war of its own nation, would, I said, satisfy me, provided all that followed were expunged; and to this they assented. To the part expunged I had many objections, and, amongst others, that it approximated closely to the article in their treaty with the Netherlands, if, indeed, constructively, it might not have become identical with it, though the British plenipotentiaries protested against intending to give it any such character or meaning. It implied, also, I thought, the indecorum of presupposing that the naval officers of either power could be lax in the execution of their own duty.

The words of their tenth article, designed to save existing rights, I also struck out, declaring that those which formed the concluding passage of our own ninth article must be received as the substitute for them. Why, I asked, mention existing rights at all? By the universal rule of interpretation, applicable to treaties, they would remain unchanged. The treaty or convention that we were forming was special in its objects; special in its powers; special in its concessions. All other rights, whatever they might be, on either side, that did not range within the peculiar orbit of this convention, as novel as beneficent in its grand intention, were necessarily left just as they were before. But they continued to insist upon the exclusion of my words and the retention of their own until the close of the sixth conference, when they agreed to allow mine to stand, and to abandon theirs, in the parts from which I did not feel authorized to withdraw my opposition. The last member of the sentence upon this point, in the article as it now stands in the convention, viz: nor be taken to affect in any other way the existing rights of either of the high contracting parties, is that with which, in the end, they became satisfied. It will be seen how essentially it varies from the parallel passage as first submitted in their counter-projet.

To the sending home of our citizens for trial if taken in the act of piracy under the flag of a third power, as provided in their seventh article, I objected, on more consideration, as not likely to bring with it the due practicable reciprocity when the convention went into operation. Great Britain had the right under existing treaties to seize the slave trading vessels of Portugal, of Spain, and of the Netherlands; whereas the United States, as yet, had no such correlative right. But the British plenipotentiaries earnestly pressed its adoption, with a view to the more full attainment of all the objects of the convention now and hereafter. In the face of our own act of Congress of the 15th of May, 1820, which already subjects to death as a pirate any citizen of the United States convicted of being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign vessel engaged in the slave trade; in the face, too, of the general rule of public law, which has heretofore authorized the punishment of pirates by the courts of whatever nation they may be brought before, I did not feel called upon to persist in my opposition. I could scarcely continue to urge as very objectionable the being furnished with the means (should the occasion arise) of executing our own laws upon our own citizens, by whomsoever they might be detected and secured, whilst in the act of violating them. The British plenipotentiaries, moreover, remarked that the whole convention exhibited a preponderance of concession on the side of Great Britain in accommodation to the principles and views of the United States. At our instance she was about, by a new statute of her realm, to make the slave trade piracy; at our instance she agreed that the captured vessel and crew should be sent to their own country for trial, a course also new to all her past maritime doctrines and experience; and as regarded all the incidental consequences flowing from these two fundamental concessions, she still, at our instance, gave up or modified many of her former national and jurisprudential practices and predilections. They said, too, that the preponderance of burden under the convention would lie with Great Britain, both in the greater number of public ships that she would employ in the suppression of the traffic, and in the fact of the United States not having colonial dependencies, as Britain had, to serve as ready depots for those detected in it. I was far from lending my concurrence to these sentiments, which were to be taken with their just qualifications. The occasion, I remarked, was one where, instead of each nation pushing adverse rights, or striving for superior advantages, it ought rather to be considered that each was equally and spontaneously surrendering up a portion of its anterior system; each moving under one and the same impulse, towards one and the same object; each proposing to itself no other interests than those of benevolence and justice; no other gain (yet how great the gain!) than that of protecting the innocent, and laying prostrate the guilty. It was a negotiation with this distinguishing feature, that it looked exclusively to the benefit of a third party, assuming reciprocal duties and burdens for its sake, and flinging aside, as alien to the benign spirit in which it was conceived and undertaken, every selfish end or feeling. To the obligations, no less elevated than interesting, that sprung from such a negotiation, it was believed that neither party was insensible, and that both stood alike anxious to hail its favorable results. In mentioning the sentiments which the British plenipotentiaries expressed it must not be understood that I report them as having been uttered in complaint; and it would be an omission inexcusable in me were I not to add that they cordially and zealously responded to the enlarged and animating objects of the international compact which we were endeavoring to adjust.

To their second article, bringing under the penalties of the compact the subjects or citizens of either power, chartering the vessel of a third power for the purpose of carrying on the trade, I assented, believing that it did no more than effectuate the intention of our own second article, under words more full. To the provision in their fourth article, giving a power for laying the crew of the captured vessel under such restraints as might become indispensable for their detention and safe delivery, I also consented; varying its language to such as it will now be seen in the convention. I considered, in fact, such a power as only analogous, under one view, to that which is familiar to all jurisprudence, of securing an accused party between the time of arrest and of trial; and as doubly called for in this instance, in that it went to the necessary safeguard and protection of those who were constituted, by the convention, its incipient ministers of justice. With a like variation in the language, I consented to the passage, in the same article, which gives power for removing the slaves. The preservation of their lives, or other urgent motive of humanity, is made the condition of their removal, and a stipulation is superadded that they are to be accounted for to the Government of the country to which the captured vessel belongs, and be disposed of according to its laws.

I have thus indicated all the changes appearing to me to be important between the projet which you committed to me and the convention as it has been signed. A few other deviations, verbal, or in arrangement, will be perceived, but have not struck me as sufficiently material to call for particular notice or elucidation. The less so as I write under the pressure of other duties, arising out of the general negotiation, and with a desire to secure for the convention as early an arrival at Washington as possible; considerations which, I trust, will account for and excuse my omitting to trace, by minute marginal parallels, the whole of the alterations superinduced upon the counter-projet before the work was terminated. It is only left for me to hope that this despatch, with its inclosures, will render the progress of the negotiation intelligible. It may be needless in me to say that I have done all in my power to make the result satisfactory. The motive for using all practicable expedition in making up my despatch is, that should the convention be approved by the President, the option may not be lost of submitting it to the consideration of the Senate before the present session of Congress reaches its close. Should it, looked at as a whole, meet acceptance in the eyes of my Government, and become, happily, the era of a new and saving spirit introduced into the laws of nations for the relief of Africa, her redeemed and grateful children will have cause to pour out the fervent thanksgiving of their hearts towards those Christian powers that have at length been enabled, and rejoice that they have been enabled, to arrest the portentous desolation that for long ages has swept over their land, filling it with the concentration of every human woe. Then, at last, may we all hope, and not in vain, to see their tears dried up, their sufferings turned to joy, their groans to songs of benediction.

The inclosures of this despatch are: 1st. The convention. 2d. The British counter-projet, marked C. 3d. Copies of the first, second, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh protocols. I have ventured to omit sending a copy of our own projet, marked B; it having been submitted in the precise state in which I had it from you. Nor do I employ a special messenger for conveying the convention; not having done so when I forwarded the treaty of 1818, a course that was not disapproved. I shall now, as then, commit it to the care of our consul at Liverpool, with a request that he will get it on shipboard with all speed, and under the best auspices he can command.

I have the honor to remain, with very great respect, your obedient servant,

RICHARD RUSH.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,

CONVENTION.

The United States of America and his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, being desirous to co-operate for the complete suppression of the African slave trade, by making the law of piracy, as applied to that traffic under the statutes of their respective Legislatures, immediately and reciprocally operative on the vessels and subjects or citizens of each other, have, respectively, appointed their plenipotentiaries to negotiate and conclude a convention for that purpose, that is to say: on the part of the United States of America, Richard Rush, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from those States to the court of his Majesty; and, on the part of his Britannic Majesty, the Right Honorable William Huskisson, a member of his Majesty's most honorable Privy Council, President of the Committee of Privy Council, for Affairs of Trade and Foreign Plantations, Treasurer of his Majesty's Navy, and a member of the Parliament of the United Kingdom; and the Right Honorable Stratford Canning, a member of his said Majesty's most honorable Privy Council, and his Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States of America; which plenipotentiaries, after duly communicating to each other their respective full powers, found to be in proper form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE I. The commanders and commissioned officers of each of the two high contracting parties, duly authorized under the regulations and instructions of their respective Governments, to cruise on the coasts of Africa, of America, and of the West Indies, for the suppression of the slave trade, shall be empowered under the conditions, limitations, and restrictions hereinafter specified, to detain, examine, capture, and deliver over for trial and adjudication by some competent tribunal of whichever of the two countries it shall be found on examination to belong to, any ship or vessel concerned in the illicit traffic of slaves, and carrying the flag of the other, or owned by any subjects or citizens of either of the two contracting parties, except when in the presence of a ship-of-war of its own nation; and, it is further agreed that any such ship or vessel, so captured, shall be either carried or sent by the capturing officer, to some port of the country to which it belongs, and there given up to the competent authorities, or be delivered up for the same purpose to any duly commissioned officer of the other party; it being the intention of the high contracting powers that any ship or vessel within the purview of this convention, and seized on that account, shall be tried and adjudged by the tribunals of the captured party, and not by those of the captor.

ARTICLE II. In the case of any ship or vessel detained under this convention, by the cruisers of either of the two contracting parties, on suspicion of carrying on the slave trade, being found, on due examination by the boarding officer, to be chartered on account of any of the subjects or citizens of the other party, although not actually bearing the flag of that party, nor owned by the individuals on whose account she is chartered, or by any other citizens or subjects of the same nation, it is hereby agreed that, in such case also, upon the delivery of the said vessel to the tribunals of that country to which the persons on whose account she is chartered belong, the vessel, cargo, and crew, shall be proceeded against in like manner as any other vessel, cargo, and crew, within the purview of this convention, in so far as the general practice under the law of nations will allow.

ARTICLE III. Whenever any naval commander or commissioned officer of either of the two contracting powers shall, on the high seas, or anywhere not within the exclusive jurisdiction of either party, board, or cause to be boarded, any merchant vessel bearing the flag of the other power, and visit the same as a slave trader, or on suspicion of her being concerned in the slave trade; in every such case, whether the vessel so visited shall or shall not be captured and delivered over, or sent into the ports of her own country for trial and adjudication, the boarding officer shall deliver to the master or commander of the visited vessel a certificate in writing, signed by the said boarding officer, and specifying his rank in the Navy of his country, together with the names of the commander by whose orders he is acting, and of the national vessel commanded by him; and the said certificate shall further contain a declaration purporting that the only object of the visit is to ascertain whether the merchant vessel in question is engaged in the slave trade, or not; and, if found to be so engaged, to take and deliver her to the officers or tribunals of her own country, being that of one of the two contracting parties, for trial and adjudication.

In all such cases, the commander of the national vessel, whether belonging to Great Britain or to the United States, shall, when he makes delivery of his capture, either to the officers or to the tribunals of the other power, deliver all the papers found on board the captured vessel, indicating her national character, and the objects of her voyage, and, together with them, a certificate, as above, of the visit, signed with his name, and specifying his rank in the Navy of his country, as well as the name of the vessel commanded by him, together with the name and professional rank of the boarding officer by whom the said visit has been made.

This certificate shall also contain a list of all the papers received from the master of the vessel detained or visited, as well as those found on board the said vessel; it shall also contain an exact description of the state in which the vessel was found when detained, and the statement of the changes, if any, which have taken place in it, and of the number of slaves, if any, found on board at the moment of detention.

ARTICLE IV. Whenever any merchant vessel of either nation shall be visited under this convention, on suspicion of such vessel being engaged in the slave trade, no search shall in any such case be made on board the said vessel, except what is necessary for ascertaining, by due and sufficient proofs, whether she is or is not engaged in that illicit traffic. No person shall be taken out of the vessel so visited (though such reasonable restraints as may be indispensable for the detention and safe delivery of the vessel may be used against the crew) by the commanding officer of the visiting vessel, or under his orders; nor shall any part of the cargo of the visiting vessel be taken out of her till after her delivery to the officers or tribunals of her own nation; excepting only when the removal of all or a part of the slaves, if any, found on board the visited vessel shall be indispensable, either for the preservation of their lives, or from any other urgent consideration of humanity, or for the safety of the persons charged with the navigation of the said vessel after her capture. And any of the slaves so removed shall be duly accounted for to the Government of that country to which the visited vessel belongs, and shall be disposed of according to the laws of the country into which they are carried; the regular bounty, or head-money, allowed by law, being in each instance secured to the captors, for their use and benefit, by the receiving Government.

ARTICLE V. Whenever any merchant vessel, of either nation, shall be captured under this convention, it shall be the duty of the commander of any ship belonging to the public service of the other, charged with the instructions of his Government for carrying into execution the provisions of this convention, at the requisition of the commander of the capturing vessel, to receive into his custody the vessel so captured, and to carry or send the same for trial and adjudication into some port of his own country, or of its dependencies. In every such case, at the time of the delivery of the vessel, an authentic declaration shall be drawn up in triplicate, and signed by the commanders both of the delivering and receiving vessels; one copy, signed by both, to be kept by each of them, stating the circumstances of the delivery, the condition of the captured vessel at the time of delivery, including the names of her master or commander, and of every other person, not a slave, on board at that time, and exhibiting the number of the slaves, if any, then on board of her, and a list of all the papers received or found on board at the time of capture, and delivered over with her. The third copy of the said declaration shall be left in the captured vessel, with the papers found on board, to be produced before the tribunal charged with the adjudication of the capture.

And the commander of the capturing vessel shall be authorized to send any one of the officers under his command, and one or two of his crew, with the captured vessel, to appear before the competent tribunal as witnesses of the facts regarding her detention and capture; the reasonable expenses of which witnesses in proceeding to the place of trial, during their detention there, and for their return to their own country, or to their station in its service, shall be allowed by the court of adjudication, and defrayed, in the event of the vessel being condemned, out of the proceeds of its sale; in case of the acquittal of the vessel, the expenses, as above specified, of these witnesses, shall be defrayed by the Government of the capturing officer.

ARTICLE VI. Whenever any capture shall be made under this convention by the officers of either of the contracting parties, and no national vessel of that country to which the captured vessel belongs is cruising on the same station where the capture takes place, the commander of the capturing vessel shall, in such case, either carry or send his prize to some convenient port of its own country, or of any of its dependencies, where a court of vice admiralty has jurisdiction, and there give it up to competent authorities for trial and adjudication.

The captured vessel shall then be libelled according to the practice of the court taking cognizance of the case; and, if condemned, the proceeds of the sale thereof, and of its cargo, if also condemned, shall be paid to the commander of the capturing vessel, for the benefit of the captors, to be distributed among them according to the rules of their service respecting prize money.

ARTICLE VII. The commander and crew of any vessel captured under this convention and sent in for trial shall be proceeded against, conformably to the laws of the country whereinto they shall be brought, as pirates engaged in the African slave trade; and it is further agreed that any individual, being a citizen or subject of either of the two contracting parties, who shall be found on board any vessel not carrying the flag of the other party, nor belonging to the subjects or citizens of either, but engaged in the illicit traffic of slaves, and lawfully seized on that account by the cruisers of the other party, or condemned under circumstances which, by involving such individual in the guilt of slave trading, would subject him to the penalties of piracy, he shall be sent for trial before the competent court in the country to which he belongs, and the reasonable expenses of any witnesses belonging to the capturing vessel, in proceeding to the place of trial, during their detention there, and for their return to their own country, or to their station in its service, shall, in every such case, be allowed by the court and defrayed by the country in which the trial takes place; but every witness belonging to the capturing vessel shall, upon the criminal trial for piracy, be liable to be challenged by the accused person and set aside as incompetent, unless he shall release his claim to any part of the prize money upon the condemnation of the vessel and cargo.

ARTICLE VIII. The right reciprocally conceded by the two contracting parties of visiting, capturing, and delivering over for trial the merchant vessels of the other engaged in the traffic of slaves shall be exercised only by such commissioned officers of their respective navies as shall be furnished with instructions for executing the laws of their respective countries against the slave trade.

For every vexatious and abusive exercise of this right, the boarding officer and the commander of the capturing or searching vessel shall, in each case, be personally liable in costs and damages to the master and owners of any merchant vessel delivered over, detained, or visited by them under the provisions of this convention.

Whatever court of admiralty shall have cognizance of the cause, as regards the captured vessel, in each case the same court shall be competent to hear the complaint of the master or owners, or of any person or persons on board the said vessel or interested in the property of her cargo at the time of her detention, and, on due and sufficient proof being given to the court of any vexation and abuse having been practiced during the search or detention of the said vessel, contrary to the provisions and meaning of this convention, to award reasonable costs and damages to the sufferers, to be paid by the commanding or boarding officer convicted of such misconduct.

The Government of the party thus cast in damages and costs shall cause the amount of the same to be paid, in each instance, agreeably to the judgment of the court, within twelve months from the date thereof.

In case of any such vexation and abuse occurring in the detention or search of a vessel detained under this convention, and not afterwards delivered over for trial, the persons aggrieved, being such as are specified above, or any of them, shall be heard by any court of admiralty of the country of the captors before which they make complaint thereof, and the commanding and boarding officer of the detaining vessel shall, in such instance, be liable, as above, in costs and damages to the complainant, according to the judgment of the court, and their Government shall equally cause payment of the same to be made within twelve months from the time when such judgment shall have been pronounced.

ARTICLE IX. Copies of this convention and of the laws of both countries actually in force for the prohibition and suppression of the African slave trade shall be furnished to every commander of the national vessels of either party charged with the execution of those laws; and in case any such commanding officer shall be accused by either of the two Governments of having deviated, in any respect, from the provisions of this convention and the instructions of his own Government in conformity thereto, the Government to which such complaint shall be addressed agrees hereby to make inquiry into the circumstances of the case, and to inflict on the officer complained of, in the event of his appearing to deserve it, a punishment adequate to his transgression.

ARTICLE X. The high contracting parties declare that the right which in the foregoing articles they have each reciprocally conceded of detaining, visiting, capturing, and delivering over for trial the merchant vessels of the other engaged in the African slave trade, is wholly and exclusively grounded on the consideration of their having made that traffic piracy by their respective laws; and further, that the reciprocal concession of the said right, as guarded, limited, and regulated by this convention, shall not be so construed as to authorize the detention or search of the merchant vessels of either nation by the officers of the Navy of the other, except vessels engaged or suspected of being engaged in the African slave trade, or for any other purpose whatever than that of seizing and delivering up the persons and vessels concerned in that traffic for trial and adjudication by the tribunals and laws of their own country, nor be taken to affect in any other way the existing rights of either of the high contracting parties.

And they do also hereby agree and engage to use their influence, respectively, with other maritime and civilized powers, to the end that the African slave trade may be declared to be piracy under the law of nations.

ARTICLE XI. The present convention, consisting of eleven articles, shall be ratified, and the ratifications exchanged at London, within the term of twelve months, or as much sooner as possible.

In witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the same, and have affixed thereunto the seals of their arms.

Done at London, the thirteenth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four.

C.

PREAMBLE.

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the United States of North America, being desirous to co-operate for the complete suppression of the African slave trade, by making the law of piracy, as applied to that traffic under the statutes of their respective Legislatures, immediately and reciprocally operative on the vessels and subjects or citizens of each other, have, respectively, appointed their plenipotentiaries to negotiate and conclude a convention for that purpose: that is to say, on the part of his Britannic Majesty, the Right Honorable William Huskisson, &c., &c., and the Right Honorable Stratford Canning, &c., &c., and on the part of the United States, Richard Rush, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from those States to the court of his Majesty; which plenipotentiaries, after duly communicating to each other their respective full powers, found to be in proper form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

I. The commanding and commissioned officers of each of the two high contracting parties, duly authorized under the regulations and instructions of their respective Governments to cruise on the coasts of Africa, of America, and of the West Indies, for the suppression of the slave trade, shall be empowered, under the conditions, limitations, and restrictions hereinafter specified, to detain, examine, capture, and deliver over for trial and adjudication by some competent tribunal of whichever of the two countries it shall be found on examination to belong to, any ship or vessel concerned in the illicit traffic of slaves, and carrying the flag of the other, or owned by any subjects or citizens of either of the two contracting parties, except when in presence of a ship-of-war of its own nation; in which case the commanding officer of the other party, instead of ordering the detention or search of the suspected vessel himself, shall give information of his suspicions to the commander of the said ship-of-war, and invite him to cause the suspected vessel to be searched and detained under his exclusive authority; provided, however, that the delay required for this purpose be not such, from peculiar and unavoidable circumstances, as to enable the suspected vessel to escape.

It is further agreed that any such ship or vessel, so captured, shall either be carried or sent by the capturing officer to some port of the country to which it belongs, and there given up to the competent authorities, or be delivered up for the same purpose to any duly commissioned officer of the other party; it being the intention of the high contracting powers that any ship or vessel within the purview of this convention, and seized on that account, shall be tried and adjudged by the tribunals of the captured party, and not by those of the captor.

II. In the case of any ship or vessel detained by the cruisers of either of the two contracting parties on suspicion of carrying on the slave trade being found, on due examination by the boarding officer, to be chartered on account of any of the subjects or citizens of the other party, although not actually bearing the flag of that party, nor owned by the individuals on whose account she is chartered, or by any other citizens or subjects of the same nation, it is hereby agreed that in such case also, upon the delivery of the said vessel to the tribunals of that country to which the persons on whose account she is chartered belong, the vessel, cargo, and crew shall be proceeded against in like manner as any other vessel, cargo, and crew within the purview of this convention, in so far as the general practice under the law of nations will allow.

III. Whenever any naval commander or commissioned officer of either of the two contracting powers shall, on the high seas, or anywhere not within the exclusive jurisdiction of either party, board or cause to be boarded any merchant vessel bearing the flag of the other power, and visit the same as a slave trader, or on suspicion of her being concerned in the slave trade, in every such case, whether the vessel so visited shall or shall not be captured and delivered over or sent into the ports of her own country for trial and adjudication, the boarding officer shall deliver to the master or commander of the visited vessel a certificate in writing, signed by the said boarding officer, and specifying his rank in the Navy of his country, together with the names of the commander by whose orders he is acting, and of the national vessel commanded by him; and the said certificate shall further contain a declaration purporting that the only object of the visit is to ascertain whether the merchant vessel in question is engaged in the slave trade or not, and if found to be so engaged, to take and deliver her to the officers or tribunals of her own country, being that of one of the two contracting parties, for trial and adjudication.

In all such cases, the commander of the national vessel, whether belonging to Great Britain or to the United States, shall, when he makes delivery of his capture either to the officers or to the tribunals of the other power, deliver all the papers found on board the captured vessel indicating her national character and the objects of her voyage, and, together with these, a certificate, as above, of the visit, signed by his name, and specifying his rank in the Navy of his country, as well as the name of the vessel commanded by him, together with the name and professional rank of the boarding officer by whom the said visit has been made.

This certificate shall also contain a list of all the papers received from the master of the vessel detained or visited, as well as those found on board the said vessel. It shall also contain an exact description of the state in which the vessel was found when detained, and a statement of the changes, if any, which have taken place in it, and of the number of slaves, if any, found on board at the moment of detention.

IV. Whenever any merchant vessel of either nation shall be visited, under this convention, on suspicion of such vessel being engaged in the slave trade, no search shall in any such case be made on board the said vessel, except what is necessary for ascertaining by positive and sufficient proofs whether she is or is not engaged in that illicit traffic. No person shall be taken out of the vessel so visited, though measures of restraint and personal coercion, necessary for the detention and safe delivery of the vessel, may be employed against its crew by the commanding officer of the visiting vessel or under his orders; nor shall any part of the cargo of the visited vessel be taken out of her till after her delivery to the officers or tribunals of her own nation, excepting only when the immediate removal of all or a part of the slaves, if any, found on board the visited vessel shall be necessary, either for the preservation of their lives or for the safety of the persons charged with the navigation of the said vessel after her capture. And any of the slaves so removed shall be duly accounted for to the Government of that country to which the visited vessel belongs, and shall be disposed of according to the laws of the country into which they are carried, the regular bounty or head-money allowed by law being, in each instance, secured to the captors for their use and benefit by the receiving Government.

V. Whenever any merchant vessel of either nation shall be captured under this convention, it shall be the duty of the commander of any ship belonging to the public service of the other, charged with the instructions of his Government for carrying into execution the provisions of this convention on the coast of Africa, of America, or of the West Indies, at the requisition of the commander of the capturing vessel, to receive into his custody the vessel so captured, and to carry or send the same for trial and adjudication into some port of his own country. In every such case, at the time of the delivery of the vessel, an authentic declaration shall be drawn up in triplicate and signed by the commander, both of the delivering and receiving vessel, one copy signed by both to be kept by each of them, stating the circumstances of the delivery, the condition of the captured vessel at the time of delivery, including the names of her master or commander, and of every other person, not a slave, on board at that time, and exhibiting the number of the slaves, if any, then on board her, and a list of all the papers received or found on board at the time of capture and delivered over with her. The third copy of the said declaration shall be left in the captured vessel, with the papers found on board, to be produced before the tribunal charged with the adjudication of the capture.

And the commander of the capturing vessel shall be authorized to send any one of the officers under his command, and one or two of his crew, with the captured vessel, to appear before the competent tribunal as witnesses of the facts regarding her detention and capture; the reasonable expenses of which witnesses in proceeding to the place of trial, during their detention there, and for their return to their own country, or to their station in its service, shall be allowed by the court of adjudication and defrayed, in the event of the vessel being condemned, out of the proceeds of its sale. In case of the acquittal of the vessel, the expenses, as above specified, of these witnesses shall be defrayed by the Government of the capturing officer.

VI. Whenever any capture shall be made under this convention by the officers of either of the contracting parties, and no national vessel of that country to which the captured vessel belongs is cruising on the same station where the capture takes place, the commander of the capturing vessel shall, in such case, either carry or send his prize to some convenient port of its own country, or of any of its dependencies where a court of vice admiralty has jurisdiction, and there give it up to the competent authorities for trial and adjudication. The captured vessel shall then be libelled according to the practice of the court taking cognizance of the case; and in case of its being condemned, the proceeds of the sale thereof and of its cargo, if also condemned, shall be paid to the commander of the capturing vessel for the benefit of the captors, to be distributed among them according to the rules of their service respecting prize money.

VII. The commander and crew of any vessel captured under this convention, and sent in for trial, shall be proceeded against, conformably to the laws of the country whereinto they shall be brought, as pirates engaged in the African slave trade; and it is further agreed that any individual, being a citizen or subject of either of the two contracting parties, who shall be found on board any vessel not carrying the flag of the other party, nor belonging to the subjects or citizens of either, but engaged in the illicit traffic of slaves, and seized or condemned on that account by the cruisers of the other party under circumstances which, by involving such individual in the guilt of slave trading, would subject him to the penalties of piracy, he shall be sent for trial before the competent court in the country to which he belongs, and the reasonable expenses of any witnesses belonging to the capturing vessel in proceeding to the place of trial, during their detention there, and for their return to their own country, or to their station in its service, shall, in every such case, be allowed by the court, and defrayed by the country in which the trial takes place.

VIII. The right, reciprocally conceded by the two contracting powers, of visiting, capturing, and delivering over for trial the merchant vessels of the other engaged in the traffic of slaves, shall be exercised only by such commissioned officers of their respective navies as shall be furnished with instructions for executing the laws of their respective countries against the slave trade.

For every vexatious and abusive exercise of this right, the boarding officer and the commander of the capturing or searching vessel shall, in each case, be liable in costs and damages to the master and owners of any merchant vessel delivered over, detained, or visited by them, under the provisions of this convention.

Whatever court of admiralty shall have cognizance of the cause, as regards the captured vessel, in each case the same court shall be competent to hear the complaint of the master, or of any person on board, or interested in the property of her cargo, at the time of her detention; and on clear, indubitable proof being given to the court of any vexation and abuse having been practiced during the search or detention of the said vessel, contrary to the provisions and meaning of this convention, to award reasonable costs and damages to the sufferers, to be paid by the commanding or boarding officer convicted of such misconduct.

The Government of the party thus cast in damages and costs shall cause the amount of the same to be paid, in each instance, agreeably to the judgment of the court, within twelve months from and after the date thereof.

In case of any such vexation and abuse occurring in the detention or search of a vessel detained under this convention, and not afterwards delivered over for trial, the persons aggrieved, being such as are specified above, or any of them, shall be heard by any court of admiralty of the country of the captors before which they make complaint thereof, and the commander and boarding officer of the detaining vessel shall, in each instance, be liable, as above, in costs and damages to the complainants, according to the judgment of the court, and their Government shall equally cause payment of the same to be made within twelve months from the time when such judgment shall have been pronounced.

IX. Copies of this convention and of the laws of both countries, actually in force, for the prohibition and suppression of the African slave trade, shall be furnished to every commander of the national vessels of either party charged with the execution of those laws; and in case any such commanding officer shall be accused by either of the two Governments of having deviated in any respect from the provisions of this convention, and the instructions of his own Government in conformity thereto, the Government to which such complaint shall be addressed agrees hereby to make inquiry into the circumstances of the case, and to inflict on the officer complained of, in the event of his appearing to deserve it, a punishment adequate to his transgression.

X. The high contracting parties declare that the right which, in the foregoing articles, they have each reciprocally conceded, of detaining, visiting, capturing, and delivering over for trial the merchant vessels of the other engaged in the African slave trade, is wholly and exclusively grounded on the consideration of their having made that traffic piracy by their respective laws; and, further, that the concession of the said right, as guarded, limited, and regulated by this convention, is meant and understood by them neither to extend to nor in any way to affect any other existing or eventual right of search or of capture at sea, in like manner as the mode of delivery and adjudication stipulated in this convention is not intended by them to affect in any way the ordinary modes of proceeding against vessels captured on the high seas under the law of nations; and they do also hereby agree and engage to use their influence, respectively, with other maritime and civilized powers to the end that the African slave trade may be generally declared to be piracy under the law of nations.

[With Mr. Rush's No. 2, of March 15, 1824.]

Protocol of the first conference of the American and British Plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade on the 23d of January, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, Mr. Stratford Canning.

It was agreed, after the communication and exchange of the respective full powers, that the negotiation should be carried on by conference and protocol, with the right on both sides of annexing to the protocol any written statement which either party might consider necessary, as matter either of record or of explanation.

It was further agreed that the slave trade should be made the first subject of discussion, and that any articles on that head which the parties might agree in drawing up should be formed into a separate convention, to be submitted for ratification to the respective Governments immediately on its conclusion, and without reference to the state of the negotiation on other matters.

The British plenipotentiaries intimated their expectation to receive from Mr. Rush, in the first instance, a full communication of the proposals intended to be brought forward successively by his Government, under the heads of the several questions for the adjustment of which the negotiation had been opened, in conformity with the annexed memorandum previously communicated by him, (marked A.)

In pursuance of this intimation, Mr. Rush, after some introductory remarks explanatory of the views of his Government upon this subject, communicated in extenso the projet of a convention (marked B) for effecting a system of co-operation between the United States and Great Britain, with a view to the complete suppression of the slave trade.

The British plenipotentiaries, in receiving this projet, observed that they could not be expected to express any opinion as to its admissibility, either in whole or in part, on a first perusal; to which observation the American plenipotentiary assented; and it was agreed that the next conference should take place on Monday, the 2d of February.

1. Commercial intercourse between the United States and the colonial possessions of Great Britain in America and the West Indies, and the claim of the United States to the navigation of the river St. Lawrence.

2. Suppression of the slave trade.

3. Boundary line under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent.

4. Admission of consuls of the United States in the colonial ports of Great Britain.

5. Newfoundland fishery.

6. Ukase of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia, of September, 1821, with a view to an adjustment of the boundaries between the United States and Great Britain on the Northwest Coast of America.

7. Questions of maritime law heretofore in discussion between the two nations, and also that of abolishing privateering as between them.

Protocol of the second conference of the American and British Plenipotentiaries, assembled at the Board of Trade, on the 2d of February, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The British plenipotentiaries stated that, after mature consideration of the projet given in by Mr. Rush at the former conference, they were disposed to consent to the general principle on which it rested, but that there were serious difficulties in the mode of carrying that principle into effect, which they wished to point out and discuss with Mr. Rush, in the hope of arriving, with his assistance, at some solution satisfactory to both parties.

The discussion which ensued, with a view to the removal or modification of such provisions in the projet as were thought likely to render the proposed convention more or less ineffectual, terminated in an agreement on the part of the American plenipotentiary, after he had stated his first impressions on the subject, to reconsider, more at leisure, the points of his projet which appeared objectionable to the British plenipotentiaries, and on their part to ascertain, by reference to the proper law officers, how far it might be practicable to obviate the legal difficulties on their side.

It was agreed to meet again on the 5th instant, and, in case of any further causes of delay arising in the consideration of the slave trade projet, to proceed at once with the next subject of negotiation until these causes should be removed.

RICHARD RUSH.
W. HUSKISSON.
STRATFORD CANNING.

Protocol of the fourth conference of the American and British Plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, February 16, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

Several points connected with the propositions brought forward by the American plenipotentiary in the previous conferences were informally discussed with a view to explanation and, if possible, to the removal of difficulties on both sides.

The British plenipotentiaries communicated a counter-projet, (marked C,) comprising the principal alterations which they proposed to introduce into the articles on the slave trade, presented by Mr. Rush and annexed to the protocol of the first conference.

After discussing these alterations in a general way, it was agreed that a formal consideration of the articles on this subject, as produced on both sides, should take place at the next conference, to be fixed at as early a period as possible, with a view to the conclusion of a convention satisfactory to each of the contracting parties.

Adjourned.

RICHARD RUSH.
W. HUSKISSON.
STRATFORD CANNING.

Protocol of the fifth conference of the American and British Plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, March 9, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The discussion which had taken place at the last conference upon the subject of the slave trade was renewed, principally with reference to the first and tenth articles of the counter-projet of the British plenipotentiaries.

No satisfactory adjustment of the points at issue being arrived at, it was agreed to meet again on the 11th instant for their further consideration.

RICHARD RUSH.
W. HUSKISSON.
STRATFORD CANNING.

Protocol of the sixth conference of the American and British Plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, March 11, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The points on the subject of the slave trade which had been left undetermined at the last conference were again brought under discussion, and being at length satisfactorily adjusted, it was determined that at the next meeting, to be held on the 13th instant, the business should be completed by the signature of the convention as agreed on.

RICHARD RUSH.
W. HUSKISSON.
STRATFORD CANNING.

Protocol of the seventh conference of the American and British Plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, March 13, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

In pursuance of the agreement entered into at the last conference, the convention on the subject of the slave trade was produced, and, being found on perusal to be in all respects satisfactory to the plenipotentiaries on both sides, received their respective signatures.

The protocol of the present conference was also read over and signed.

WASHINGTON, January 29, 1823.

SIR: To the complete abolition of the African slave trade, Great Britain, as you are well aware, has long devoted her anxious and unremitting exertions; she availed herself, during war, of her belligerent rights, and extended dominion in the colonies to put down the inhuman traffic; in peace, she has spared no labor and shrunk from no sacrifice to supply, by a general co-operation of the maritime powers, whatever has been withdrawn from her peculiar control by the cessation of hostilities and the colonial arrangements consequent on that event. It is matter of deep regret to his Majesty's Government that the result of their exertions is far from corresponding either to the cause which demands or to the zeal which sustains them. The pest, which they have pledged themselves to destroy, if it be in human power to destroy it, not only survives, to the disgrace and affliction of the age, but seems to acquire a fresh capacity for existence with every endeavor for its destruction.

To whatever fatality it may be owing, that, while the obligation of adopting and enforcing measures for the extermination of the slave trade is solemnly acknowledged by the civilized world, this great object seems rather to elude the grasp than to approach its consummation. Great Britain perceives, in the postponement of her hopes, however mortifying for the moment, no reason either to relax from her efforts or to abandon the expectation of final success. Impelled by the noblest motives to persevere in the cause of abolition, and mindful by what slow, laborious steps the present point has been attained, she looks forward, through surrounding obstacles, to the triumphant accomplishment of her purpose, the benefit and glory of which will only be rendered more signal by the difficulties attending on its progress.

In calling on Europe and America to join with them in the discharge of this sacred duty, his Majesty and his ministers have appealed, sir, with the more confidence, to your Government, as the United States have long proclaimed their decided hostility to the slave trade, and are surpassed by no country in the vigor of their legislative enactment for its repression. The identity of principle existing on this subject between the two Governments is distinctly recorded in the treaty of peace; and, in answer to every proposal which has since, by his Majesty's command, been addressed to your cabinet for redeeming that pledge by a broad and effectual application of the principle, a fresh assurance has been given of the unceasing interest with which the United States continue to promote the cause of abolition. When to this accord, in principle and sentiment, is added the conviction, avowed by both parties, that, in spite of laws and treaties, the accursed traffic still thrives, under the eyes of an indignant world, it would seem impossible that the two powers should be long prevented from concerting a joint system of measures against the common object of their abhorrence and just proscription. Whatever circumstances, views, or impressions may have hitherto defeated this expectation, his Majesty's ministers are still unwilling to despair of finding the United States at length prepared either to close with the system of concert already offered to their acceptance, or to suggest a plan of equal efficiency in its place. The alternative embraces a duty, for the performance of which both countries are responsible before God and man.

A deep sense of this duty, and a reliance, by no means relinquished, on the general disposition of the United States, have prompted the several communications on this question which have been addressed to you at successive periods, either through me or by means of the American envoy in London. You will readily call to mind, sir, that in the course of last summer I apprised you of the intention of his Majesty's ministers to press for an early reconsideration of the subject, submitting whether it might not prove agreeable to the American cabinet to anticipate that intended recurrence to it on the part of Great Britain, by some efficient proposal, originating with itself. I took occasion, in repeated conversations, to urge anew those various arguments which support and justify the opinion of his Majesty's Government; and I also placed in your hands the official papers, then recently printed by order of Parliament, in further evidence of the extent to which the traffic in human beings was still carried on from Africa, under circumstances of aggravated cruelty. In declaring, as on former occasions, the readiness of his Majesty's ministers to examine, with respect and candor, whatever scheme of concert, if any, the American cabinet might think proper to bring forward, as a substitute for theirs, you will remember how strongly I expressed my belief that the only effectual measure devised or likely to be devised, was a mutual concession of the right of search. In the exercise of that right, under such guards and with such limitations as may serve to tranquillize the most apprehensive and scrupulous minds, it is still conceived that the best and only cure for this intolerable mischief is to be found. You assured me, at a subsequent conference, that my representations had been duly submitted to the President. I wish it were in my power to add that the cause which I pleaded had prevailed.

From the printed documents which I had the honor of communicating to you, it appears that the French flag is more particularly employed to cover the illicit trade on the coast of Africa. It would, perhaps, be unfair to conclude that French property and French subjects are concerned to the full proportion in which the colors of that nation are used; but it is manifest that both are engaged in this commerce of blood, to an extent which reflects discredit, if not on the motives of the French administration, at least on the efficiency of its measures, and makes it imperative on those Governments which are pledged to each other for the suppression of the slave trade to declare their reprobation of what is at best a culpable remissness, and to omit nothing that may rouse the French cabinet to a more active exercise of its authority.

It was a part of my instructions to bring this point under your immediate consideration, and to intimate that the remonstrances of his Majesty's ambassador at Paris might be attended with more effect if the American envoy at that court were directed to concur with his excellency in a joint representation on the subject. It would be idle at present to repeat the arguments adduced in executing this instruction. The answer which you returned in the name of the President was unfavorable to the step I had suggested; and such was the result which it became my duty to announce to his Majesty's Secretary of State. But no doubt was started with respect to the grounds on which my application rested; and of those notorious facts to which I referred, as calling for a joint and impressive appeal to the good faith and good feelings of the French Government, you seemed to be equally convinced with myself.

The reasons, indeed, which you allege for declining at that time to comply with a proposal no less simple in its nature than useful in its object, I understood to be rather of a temporary character; and under this impression I cannot but hope that the period is now arrived when they will no longer be found to stand in opposition to the great considerations involved in this question.

In repeating, therefore, the invitation which I have already had the honor to convey to you on the part of his Majesty's Government, it only remains for me to request an early communication of the intentions at present entertained on this head by the Government of the United States.

I beg, sir, that you will accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration,

STRATFORD CANNING.

HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State, &c.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 31, 1823.

SIR: Your letter of the 29th of January was, immediately after being received, submitted to the consideration of the President of the United States. The delay which has hitherto procrastinated a reply to it has been occasioned, not by any abatement of the interest on the part of the Government of the United States with which it regards every effort and proposal for the full and final suppression of the African slave trade, nor by any hesitation with regard to the decision which had already been formed and declared respecting the proposal of submitting the vessels and citizens of the United States to the search of foreign officers upon the high seas, but by an expectation that measures contemplated by the national House of Representatives might, before the close of the session of Congress, indicate to the Executive Government of this country views upon which it would be enabled to substitute a proposal for accomplishing a total abolition of the traffic, more effectual to its purpose, and less liable to objections on other accounts, than that, to which the United States cannot be reconciled, of granting the right of search. These measures were matured in the branch of the Legislature where they originated, only at the very termination of the session, and the Senate had not the opportunity of pronouncing its opinion upon them. There is, however, no doubt on the mind of the President that they would have obtained their sanction; and he has, therefore, no hesitation in acting so far upon the expressed and almost unanimous sense of the House, as to declare the willingness of this Union to join with other nations in the common engagement to pursue and to punish those who shall continue to practice this crime, so reprobated by the just and humane of every country as enemies of the human race, and to fix them irrevocably in the class and under the denomination of pirates.

I have the honor of inclosing herewith a copy of the 4th and 5th sections of a law of the United States, passed on the 15th of May, 1820, by which it will be seen that any citizen of the United States being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign ship or vessel engaged in the slave trade, or any person whatever being of the crew or ship's company of any ship or vessel owned in the whole or part, or navigated for or in behalf of any citizen or citizens of the United States participating in the slave trade, is declared to have incurred the penalties of piracy, and made liable to atone for the crime with his life. The legislation of a single nation can go no further to mark its abhorrence of this traffic, or to deter the people subject to its laws from contamination by the practice of others.

If the inference in your letter of the 29th of January, from the documents to which it refers, be correct, that the French flag is more particularly employed to cover the illicit trade on the coast of Africa; and the conjecture likewise suggested in it, that this flag is used to cover the property and the persons of individuals bound to other allegiances, be well founded, this statute makes every citizen of the United States concerned in such covered traffic liable, if detected in it, to suffer an ignominious death. The code of Great Britain herself has hitherto no provision of equal severity in the pursuit of her subjects, even under the shelter of foreign banners, and to the covert of simulated papers and property.

I am directed by the President of the United States to propose on their part the adoption, by Great Britain, of the principle of this act, and to offer a mutual stipulation to annex the penalties of piracy to the offence of participating in the slave trade by the citizens or subjects of the respective parties. This proposal is made as a substitute for that of conceding a mutual right of search, and of a trial by mixed commissions which would be rendered useless by it. Should it meet the approbation of your Government, it may be separately urged upon the adoption of France, and upon the other maritime powers of Europe in the manner most conducive to its ultimate success.

I have the honor of tendering to you the renewed assurance of my distinguished consideration,
JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The Right Hon. STRATFORD CANNING,

WASHINGTON, April 8, 1823.

SIR: I have received your official letter dated the 31st ultimo, in answer to that which I had the honor of addressing to you on the 29th of January, and, together with it, a transcript of the 4th and 5th sections of an act of Congress approved the 15th of May, 1820.

From this communication I learn that the Government of the United States is willing to join with other powers in declaring slave trade piracy, under the law of nations, and treating the perpetrators of this crime as enemies of the human race; that the American Government is further prepared to enter into a formal engagement with Great Britain, to the effect of carrying the principle just specified into immediate operation, reciprocally, as to their respective subjects or citizens; and, finally, that as soon as this proposal shall be accepted by the British Government, the United States will be ready to concur in pressing its adoption on the court of France and other maritime powers in such manner as may afford the fairest prospect of success.

In whatever degree his Majesty's Government may be disposed to receive this offer as an acknowledgment that measures more efficient than any now generally in force are indispensable for the suppression of the slave trade, it is not difficult to foresee that fresh sentiments of regret will be excited by the unfavorable view which the American administration continues to take of the principal measure suggested on the part of his Majesty. That measure, you are well aware, sir, is a mutual limited concession of the right of search; and though, as I have frequently stated, his Majesty's Government, in adopting it by treaty with several of the maritime powers, and in recommending it with earnestness to the acceptance of others, particularly of the United States, have never opposed the consideration of any other plan brought forward as equally effective; yet, having from the first regarded it in conscience as the only true and practical cure for the evil in question, they are naturally anxious, from a deep sense of duty, to place it in its proper light, and to guard it as far as possible from prejudice or misconception. I therefore deem it of importance on this occasion to bring into one point of view the several limitations under which it is conceived that the right of search might be so exercised as to clear it of every imaginable difficulty. To give the intended limitations their just value, it is requisite to bear in mind the particular objections which have been urged against the interchange of a right of search; and for these, in their full extent, I can hardly be wrong in referring to your previous correspondence, since the last communication which I have received from you on this subject, though it describes the impressions of the American Government as remaining unaltered, does not exhibit any argument in support of their opinion.

In answer to that class of objections which relate to the mixed commissions established by treaty between his Majesty and the courts of Lisbon, Brussels, and Madrid, it may suffice to remind you of the intimation conveyed through Mr. Rush, in the early part of last year, which I had subsequently the honor of confirming at the Department of State. It might be expected that any arrangement for the adjudication of vessels engaged in the slave trade, independent of those tribunals, would either leave the detained vessels to be disposed of in the ordinary way, by the sentence of a court of admiralty in the country of the captor, or place them under the jurisdiction of a similar court in the country to which they belonged. On the former supposition it is not to be anticipated that the United States could hesitate to admit the jurisdiction of a foreign court of admiralty, when sanctioned by mutual agreement, over the persons and property of citizens abandoned to a pursuit so flagrantly iniquitous as to be classed by the Legislature of their country with crimes of the most heinous description, and which the American Government has declared its willingness to treat as piracy, under the law of nations. Great Britain, for her part, desires no other than that any of her subjects, who so far defy the laws and dishonor the character of their country as to engage in a trade of blood, proscribed not more by the acts of the Legislature than by the national feeling, should be detected and brought to justice even by foreign hands and from under the protection of her flag. In either of the supposed cases it is clear that all impediments connected with the forms of proceeding and peculiar construction of the mixed commissions would be completely avoided; and with respect to any embarrassment attending the disposal of condemned vessels and liberated slaves, it has already been suggested by a committee of the House of Representatives that the provisions of the act of Congress, passed the 3d of March, 1819, might be applied to them without difficulty or inconvenience.

The question being thus relieved from all connexion with the mixed commissions, every constitutional objection arising out of their alleged incompatibility with the institutions of the United States is at once removed from consideration. The remaining obstacles may be reduced under the following heads: the unpopularity of the right of search in this country; its tendency, if mutually employed, to produce an unfriendly collision between the two nations; and a certain supposed inequality which would attend its exercise.

With respect to any doubt of its utility, created by a persuasion that very few vessels under American colors have been discovered, for some time past, on the coast of Africa, it requires but little reflection to prove that no conclusive inference can be drawn from that circumstance. Not to dwell upon the extent and nature of the slave coast, peculiarly favorable to the concealment of trading vessels, it must be remembered that the United States have maintained at no time a greater number of cruisers than two, rarely more than one, and latterly, during several months together, no ship-of-war whatever on the African station. As late as the 14th of January, 1822, it was stated officially by the Governor of Sierra Leone, "that the fine rivers Nunez and Pongas were entirely under the control of renegade European and American slave traders."

But, if it were even manifest that the active and judicious exertions of your naval officers in that quarter had really effected a total disuse of the American flag in slave trading, the right of search would still be most highly desirable, in order to secure and extend so important an advantage. As an example, indeed, to other powers, particularly to France, whose subjects, encouraged by the loose and equivocal measures of their Government, are convicted, by a mass of evidence too strong to be resisted, of being concerned to a deplorable degree in this atrocious commerce, the concurrence of the United States in a system of which the very first result is to augment considerably the means of bringing offenders to justice, can hardly be rated at too high a value. The example which they are called upon to give is not merely due to the claims of humanity; Great Britain and the United States are not only pledged to put down the slave trade within the limits of their immediate jurisdiction, they are also bound by solemn obligations to employ their utmost endeavors for its complete and universal extermination. They have both succeeded in their benevolent object, so far as the rigor of legislative enactments is capable of counteracting the temptation of enormous profit, which stimulates the unprincipled avarice of the slave merchant. It is the facility of escaping detection, and not any want of severity in the punishment attached to a violation of their laws, which, so far as they are concerned, requires a more decisive remedy; and a remedy adequate to the evil can only be found in such measures as will strip the illicit trader of every disguise, and throw the chances entirely on the side of failure in his inhuman speculations. In the case of search at sea, the means unavoidably employed in the commission of this crime are fortunately, it may be said providentially, of such a nature as in general to furnish a plain substantial body of proof for the conviction of the criminal.

For the satisfaction of those who seriously apprehend that the friendly relations subsisting between the two countries would be endangered by the admission of a practice which, in their opinion, must necessarily produce a vexatious exercise of authority on the part of the searching officer, and frequent complaints on that of the merchant whose vessel is subjected to search, with the supposed aggravation of an unequal pressure on one of the contracting parties, his Majesty's Government would doubtless agree to confine the right of visit to a fixed number of cruisers on each side, restricted in the performance of this duty to certain specified parts of the ocean, and acting under regulations prepared by mutual consent, for the purpose of preventing abuses. To these important limitations, if not deemed sufficient, others might easily be added; the arrangement, for example, might be temporary; adopted in the first instance for a short period, and only to be continued in the event of its being found on trial to operate in a satisfactory manner. With this understanding a speedy termination would, at least, be insured to any objectionable result attending its operation; and for the sake of interests as dear to humanity, an experiment, of which the advantage as to its main object is certain and complete, the inconvenience, contingent and momentary, might surely be reconciled with a due regard to considerations exclusively national.

Supposing that inconvenience should be found in practice to press unequally on the two parties, Great Britain, and not the United States, is most likely to have cause of complaint, inasmuch as the greater extent of her trade, especially on the coast of Africa, must naturally expose her in a greater degree to any injurious consequences of the agreement. Great Britain, however, is less disposed to shrink from any sacrifice by which she can materially advance the sacred cause of abolition, than to lament, and, if possible, to dispel those mistaken notions and unfounded jealousies which deprive her exertions of their full effect, and serve, but too successfully, to protract the existence of a mischief which all unite in deploring. In point of principle, the honor of neither flag would be tarnished by having its protection withdrawn for a season from those who perpetrate the atrocities of the slave trade; and permit me, sir, to add, that what Great Britain is ready to allow in a matter so vital to her pride and to her power may surely be allowed, reciprocally, by any other nation, however scrupulous in the maintenance of its maritime independence.

That an agreement between our respective cabinets, founded on a mutual right of search, thus guarded and explained, would fail to obtain the consent of the American Senate, or that a nation so inquiring and enlightened as the United States would confound the proposed measures with that practice which afforded matter of painful contention during the last wars in Europe, is what I am extremely unwilling to anticipate. The two objects are, in fact, so totally distinct from each other in principle, purpose, and mode of execution, that the proposal of the British Government need only be presented to the examination, I will not say of a select and experienced assembly, but of the people at large, in order to be seen in its true bearings.

So far is the British proposal from tending to commit the American Government on the long disputed question of the belligerent right of search, that if it may be supposed to touch that question at all, it appears rather to operate in the sense of the United States, than unfavorably for their view of the subject.

The officers intrusted on either side with the duty of examining suspected vessels would necessarily act under instructions calculated to insure a perfect harmony between the principle and the application of this conceded right, nor is it to be feared that they would presume, in any case, to extend the visit thus authorized at sea beyond the particular and specified object to which it is meant to be confined.

I have the honor to request, sir, that you will again accept the assurance of my highest consideration.

STRATFORD CANNING.

HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State, &c.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 24, 1823.

SIR: In the letter which I had the honor of addressing you on the 31st of March last a proposal was made, to be submitted to the consideration of your Government, that the principle assumed in an act of the Congress of the United States of May 15, 1820, of considering and punishing the African slave trade as piracy, should be adopted as the basis of a stipulation by treaty between the United States and Great Britain, and to be urged separately upon the adoption of France and upon the other maritime nations of Europe, in the manner most conducive to its ultimate success. It was observed that this offer was presented as a substitute for that of conceding a mutual right of search and a trial by mixed commissions, to which the United States could not be reconciled, and which would be rendered useless by it.

Your letter of the 8th of April, to which I have now the honor to reply, intimates that his Majesty's Government will be disposed to receive this offer only as an acknowledgment that measures more efficient than any now generally in force are indispensable for the suppression of the slave trade; and that, although they have never opposed the consideration of any other plan, brought forward as equally effective, yet, having from the first regarded a mutual limited concession of the right of search as the only true and practical cure for the evil, their prevailing sentiment will be of regret at the unfavorable view still taken of it by the Government of the United States. Your letter, therefore, urges a reconsideration of the proposal for the mutual concession of the right of search, and by presenting important modifications of the proposal heretofore made removes some of the objections which had been taken to it as insuperable, while it offers argumentative answers to the others which had been disclosed in my previous communications on this subject to you.

In the treaties of Great Britain with Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands, for the suppression of the slave trade, heretofore communicated, with the invitation to the United States to enter into similar engagements, three principles were involved, to neither of which the Government of the United States felt itself at liberty to accede. The first was the mutual concession of the right of search and capture, in time of peace, over merchant vessels on the coast of Africa. The second was the exercise of that right even over vessels under convoy of the public officers of their own nation; and the third was the trial of the captured vessels by mixed commissions in colonial settlements under no subordination to the ordinary judicial tribunals of the country to which the party brought before them for trial should belong. In the course of the correspondence relating to these proposals it has been suggested that a substitute for the trial by mixed commissions might be agreed to, and in your letter of the 8th of April an expectation is authorized that an arrangement for the adjudication of the vessels detained might leave them to be disposed of in the ordinary way, by the sentence of a court of admiralty in the country of the captor, or place them under the jurisdiction of a similar court in the country to which they belonged; to the former alternative of which you anticipate the unhesitating admission of the United States, in consideration of the aggravated nature of the crime, as acknowledged by their laws, which would be thus submitted to a foreign jurisdiction. But it was precisely because the jurisdiction was foreign that the objection was taken to the trial by mixed commissions; and if it transcended the constitutional authority of the Government of the United States to subject the persons, property, and reputation of their citizens to the decisions of a court partly composed of their own countrymen, it might seem needless to remark that the constitutional objection could not diminish in proportion as its cause should increase, or that the power incompetent to make American citizens amenable to a court consisting one-half of foreigners should be adequate to place their liberty, their fortune, and their fame at the disposal of tribunals entirely foreign. I would further remark that the sentence of a court of admiralty in the country of the captor is not the ordinary way by which the merchant vessels of one nation, taken on the high seas by the officers of another, are tried in time of peace. There is, in the ordinary way, no right whatever existing to take, to search, or even to board them; and I take this occasion to express the great satisfaction with which we have seen this principle solemnly recognized by the decision of a British court of admiralty. Nor is the aggravation of the crime for the trial of which a tribunal may be instituted a cogent motive for assenting to the principle of subjecting American citizens, their rights, and interests, to the decision of foreign courts; for, although Great Britain, as you remark, may be willing to abandon those of her subjects who defy the laws and tarnish the character of their country by participating in this trade to the dispensation of justice even by foreign hands, the United States are bound to remember that the power which enables a court to try the guilty authorizes them also to pronounce upon the fate of the innocent, and that the very question of guilt or innocence is that which the protecting care of their Constitution has reserved for the citizens of this Union to the exclusive decision of their own countrymen. This principle has not been departed from by the statute which has branded the slave trader with the name, and doomed him to the punishment, of a pirate. The distinction between piracy by the law of nations and piracy by statute is well known and understood in Great Britain; and while the former subjects the transgressor guilty of it to the jurisdiction of any and every country into which he may be brought, or wherein he may be taken, the latter forms a part of the municipal criminal code of the country where it is enacted, and can be tried only by its own courts.

There remains the suggestion, that the slave trader, captured under the mutual concession of the power to make the capture, might be delivered over to the jurisdiction of his own country. This arrangement would not be liable to the constitutional objection, which must ever apply to the jurisdiction of the mixed commission, or of the admiralty courts of the captor; and if your note is to be understood as presenting it in the character of an alternative, to which your Government is disposed to accede, I am authorized to say that the President considers it as sufficient to remove the insuperable obstacle which had precluded the assent of the United States to the former proposals of your Government, resulting from the character and composition of the tribunals to whom the question of guilt or innocence was to be committed.

The objections to the right of search, as incident to the right of detention and capture, are also, in a very considerable degree, removed by the introduction of the principle that neither of them should be exercised but under the responsibility of the captor to the tribunals of the captured party in damages and costs. This guard against the abuses of a power so liable to abuse would be indispensable; but if the provisions necessary for securing effectually its practical operation would reduce the right itself to power merely nominal, the stipulation of it in a treaty would serve rather to mark the sacrifice of a great and precious principle than to attain the end for which it would be given up.

In the objections heretofore disclosed to the concession desired of the mutual and qualified right of search, the principal stress was laid upon the repugnance which such a concession would meet in the public feeling of this country, and of those to whom its interests are intrusted in the department of its Government, the sanction of which is required for the ratification of treaties. The irritating tendency of the practice of search, and the inequalities of its probable operation, were slightly noticed, and have been contested in argument, or met by propositions of possible palliatives, or remedies for anticipated abuses, in your letter. But the source and foundation of all these objections was, in our former correspondence, scarcely mentioned, and never discussed. They consist in the nature of the right of search at sea, which, as recognized or tolerated by the usage of nations, is a right exclusively of war, never exercised but by an outrage upon the rights of peace. It is an act analogous to that of searching the dwelling-houses of individuals on the land. The vessel of the navigator is his dwelling-house, and like that, in the sentiment of every people that cherishes the blessings of personal liberty and security, ought to be a sanctuary inviolable to the hand of power, unless upon the most unequivocal public necessity, and under the most rigorous personal responsibility of the intruder. Search at sea, as recognized by all maritime nations, is confined to the single object of finding and taking contraband of war. By the law of nature, when two nations conflict together in war, a third, remaining neutral, retains all its rights of peace and friendly intercourse with both. Each belligerent, indeed, acquires by war the right of preventing a third party from administering to his enemy the direct and immediate materials of war; and, as incidental to this right, that of searching the merchant vessels of the neutral on the high seas to find them. Even thus limited, it is an act of power which nothing but necessity can justify, inasmuch as it cannot be exercised but by carrying the evils of war into the abodes of peace, and by visiting the innocent with some of the penalties of guilt. Among the modern maritime nations, an usage has crept in, not founded upon the law of nature, never universally admitted, often successfully resisted, and against which all have occasionally borne testimony by renouncing it in treaties, of extending this practice of search and seizure to all the property of the enemy in the vessel of the friend. This practice was, in its origin, evidently an abusive and wrongful extension of the search for contraband: effected by the belligerent, because he was armed; submitted to by the neutral, because he was defenceless; and acquiesced in by his sovereign for the sake of preserving a remnant of peace, rather than become himself a party to the war. Having thus, occasionally, been practiced by all as belligerents, and submitted to by all as neutrals, it has acquired the force of an usage which, at the occurrence of every war, the belligerent may enforce or relinquish, and which the neutral may suffer or resist, at their respective options.

This search for and seizure of the property of an enemy in the vessel of a friend is a relic of the barbarous warfare of barbarous ages—the cruel and, for the most part, now exploded system of private war. As it concerns the enemy himself, it is inconsistent with that mitigated usage of modern wars which respects the private property of individuals on the land. As relates to the neutral, it is a violation of his natural right to pursue, unmolested, his peaceful commercial intercourse with his friend. Invidious as is its character in both these aspects, it has other essential characteristics equally obnoxious. It is an uncontrolled exercise of authority by a man in arms over a man without defence—by an officer of one nation over the citizen of another—by a man intent upon the annoyance of his enemy, responsible for the act of search to no tribunal, and always prompted to balance the disappointment of a fruitless search by the abusive exercise of his power, and to punish the neutral for the very clearness of his neutrality. It has, in short, all the features of unbridled power, stimulated by hostile and unsocial passions.

I forbear to enlarge upon the further extension of this practice by referring to injuries which the United States experienced when neutral in a case of vital importance; because, in digesting a plan for the attainment of an object which both nations have equally at heart, it is desirable to avoid every topic which may excite painful sensations on either side. I have adverted to the interest in question from necessity, it being one which could not be lost sight of in the present discussion.

Such being the view taken of the right of search, as recognized by the law of nations and exercised by belligerent powers, it is due to candor to state that my Government has an insuperable objection to its extension by treaty, in any manner whatever, lest it might lead to consequences still more injurious to the United States, and especially in the circumstance alluded to. That the proposed extension will operate in time of peace and derive its sanction from compact present no inducements to its adoption. On the contrary, they form strong objections to it. Every extension of the right of search on the principles of that right is disapproved. If the freedom of the sea is abridged by compact for any new purpose, the example may lead to other changes. And if its operation is extended to a time of peace, as well as of war, a new system will be commenced for the dominion of the sea, which may eventually, especially by the abuses into which it may lead, confound all distinction of time and circumstances, of peace and of war, and of rights applicable to each state.

The United States have, on great consideration, thought it most advisable to consider this trade as piracy, and to treat it as such. They have thought that the trade itself might, with great propriety, be placed in that class of offences; and that by placing it there we should more effectually accomplish the great object of suppressing the trade than by any other measure which we could adopt.

To this measure none of the objections which have been urged against the extension of the right of search appear to be applicable. Piracy being an offence against the human race, has its well known incidents of capture and punishment by death by the people and tribunals of every country. By making this trade piratical, it is the nature of the crime which draws after it the necessary consequences of capture and punishment. The United States have done this, by an act of Congress, in relation to themselves. They have also evinced their willingness and expressed their desire that the change should become general by the consent of every other power, whereby it would be made the law of nations. Till then, they are bound by the injunctions of their Constitution to execute it, so far as respects the punishment of their own citizens by their own tribunals. They consider themselves, however, at liberty until that consent is obtained to co-operate to a certain extent with other powers to insure a more complete effect to their respective acts; they placing themselves severally on the same ground by legislative provisions. It is in this spirit, and for this purpose, that I have made to you the proposition under consideration.

By making the slave trade piratical, and attaching to it the punishment as well as the odium incident to that crime, it is believed that much has been done by the United States to suppress it in their vessels and by their citizens. If your Government would unite in this policy, it is not doubted that the happiest consequences would result from it. The example of Great Britain in a manner so decisive could not fail to attract the attention and command the respect of all her European neighbors. It is the opinion of the United States that no measure short of that proposed will accomplish the object so much desired, and it is the earnest desire of my Government that the Government of his Britannic Majesty may co-operate in carrying it into effect.

I pray you, sir, to accept the renewed assurances of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 28, 1823.

"A resolution of the House of Representatives, at the last session of Congress, requests the President to enter upon and to prosecute, from time to time, such negotiations with the several maritime powers of Europe and America as he may deem expedient for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade, and its ultimate denunciation as piracy under the law of nations, by the consent of the civilized world. You will take an early opportunity to make known this disposition to the Spanish Government; communicating to them copies of the fourth and fifth sections of the act of 3d March, 1819, which declares this traffic piratical when pursued by citizens of the United States; and you will express the willingness of the American Government to enter into negotiations for the purpose of declaring it so by the common consent of nations."

"A resolution of the House of Representatives, at the late session of Congress, requests the President of the United States to enter upon and prosecute, from time to time, such negotiations with the several maritime powers of Europe and America as he may deem expedient for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade, and its ultimate denunciation as piracy under the law of nations, by the consent of the civilized world.

"In pursuance of the object proposed by this resolution, you will communicate to the Government of Buenos Ayres copies of the several acts of Congress for the suppression of the slave trade, of April 20, 1818, (U. S. Laws, vol. 6, page 325;) March 3, 1819, (page 435;) and of May 15, 1820, (page 529;) pointing their attention particularly to the fourth and fifth sections of the last, which subject to the penalties of piracy every citizen of the United States guilty of active participation in the African slave trade. The adoption of this principle in the legislative code of all the maritime nations would, of itself, probably, suffice for the suppression of the trade. But as it would yet not authorize the armed vessels of any one nation to capture those of another engaged in the trade, a stipulation to that effect might be agreed to by treaty, conditioned that the captor shall deliver over the captured party to the tribunals of his own country for trial; to which should be added some guard of responsibility upon the capturing officer, to prevent the abusive exercise of his power."

"In pursuance of this object, you will communicate to the Colombian Government copies of the several acts of our Congress for the suppression of the slave trade, of April 20, 1818, (U. S. Laws, vol. vi, p. 325;) of March 3, 1819, (p. 435;) and of May 15, 1820, (p. 529;) pointing their attention particularly to the fourth and fifth sections of the last, which subject to the penalties of piracy every citizen of the United States guilty of active participation in the African slave trade. Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to Mr. Rush, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 24, 1823.

"A resolution of the House of Representatives, almost unanimously adopted at the close of the last session of Congress, requested 'the President of the United States to enter upon and to prosecute, from time to time, such negotiations with the several maritime powers of Europe and America as he may deem expedient for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade, and its ultimate denunciation as piracy under the law of nations, by the consent of the civilized world.'

"At the two preceding sessions of Congress, committees of the House had proposed a resolution, expressed in more general terms, that 'the President of the United States be requested to enter into such arrangements as he may deem suitable and proper, with one or more of the maritime powers of Europe, for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade;' and this resolution had, in each case, been the conclusion of a report, recommending that the United States should accede to the proposal of a mutual and qualified concession of the right of search. The sentiments of the committee were, in this respect, different from those which had been expressed by the Executive Department of the Government in its previous correspondence with that of Great Britain. No decision by the House of Representatives was made upon these resolutions, proposed at the preceding sessions; but, upon the adoption of that which did pass at the last session, it was well ascertained that the sentiments of the House in regard to the right of search coincided with those of the Executive, for they explicitly rejected an amendment which was moved to the resolution, and which would have expressed an opinion of the House favorable to the mutual concession of that right.

"You have been fully informed of the correspondence between the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain concerning the suppression of the slave trade heretofore, and have been, from time to time, effectually instrumental to it yourself. You are aware of the grounds upon which the proposals on the part of Great Britain, that the United States should accede to the stipulations similar to those which she had succeeded in obtaining from Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands, were on our part declined.

"The subject was resumed by the British minister residing here, Mr. S. Canning, a short time before the decease of the Marquis of Londonderry. It was suggested that, since the total disappearance of the British and American flags, as well as of those of the nations which had consented to put the execution of their laws against the trade under the superintendence of British naval officers, it continued to flourish under that of France; that her laws, though in word and appearance equally severe in proscribing the traffic, were so remiss in the essential point of execution that their effect was rather to encourage than to suppress it; and the American Government was urged to join in friendly representations to that of France by instructing the minister of the United States at Paris to concur in those which the British ambassador at that court had been charged with making to insure a more vigilant fulfilment of the prohibitory laws. This invitation, at that time given only in oral conference, was also declined, from an impression that such a concurrence might give umbrage to the French Government and tend rather to irritation than to the accomplishment of the object for which it was desired. Mr. Gallatin was, nevertheless, instructed separately to bring the subject to the notice of the French Government, and did so by a note communicating to them copies of the recent laws of the United States for the suppression of the slave trade, and particularly of that by which it has subjected every citizen of the United States who, after the passage of the law, should be polluted with it to the penalties of piracy.

"On the 29th of January last, Mr. Canning, in a letter to this Department, repeated the invitation of a joint and concurrent remonstrance to be made by the British ambassador and our minister in France; and, at the same time, called with great earnestness upon the Government of the United States either to accede to the principle of the mutual and qualified right of search, emphatically pronounced, in his belief, to be the only effectual measure devised or likely to be devised 'for the accomplishment of the end, or to bring forward some other scheme of concert,' which it again declared the readiness of his Majesty's minister to examine with respect and candor, as a substitute for that of the British cabinet.

"However discouraging this call for an alternative might be, thus coupled, as it was, with so decisive a declaration of belief that no effectual alternative had been or was likely to be devised, an opportunity was offered, in pursuance of the resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted at the close of the late session of Congress, for proposing a substitute, in our belief, more effectual than the right of search could be for the total and final suppression of this nefarious trade, and less liable either to objections of principle or to abuses of practice.

"This proposition was accordingly made in my letter to Mr. Canning of 31st of March last, to which his letter of the 8th of April was the answer. In this answer, Mr. Canning barely notices our proposition to express an opinion that his Government will see in it nothing but an acknowledgment of the necessity of further and more effectual measures, and then proceeds with an elaborate review of all the objections which, in the previous correspondence between the two Governments, had been taken on our part to the British connected proposal of a mutual right of search and a trial by mixed commissions. Our objection had been of two kinds: first, to the mixed commissions, as inconsistent with our Constitution; and secondly, to the right of search, as a dangerous precedent, liable to abuse and odious to the feelings and recollections of our country.

"In this letter of Mr. Canning the proposal of trial by mixed commissions is formally withdrawn, and an alternative presented as practicable, one side of which only, and that the inadmissible side, is distinctly offered, namely, of trial by the courts of the captor. The other side of the alternative would, indeed, remove our constitutional objection, and with it might furnish the means of removing the principal inherent objection to the concession of the right of search, that by which the searching officer is under no responsible control for that act.

"But in our previous correspondence our strong repugnance to the right of search had been adverted to merely as matter of fact, without tracing it to its source or referring to its causes. The object of this forbearance had been to avoid all unnecessary collision with feelings and opinions which were not the same on the part of Great Britain and upon ours. They had been willingly left undiscussed. This letter of Mr. Canning, however, professedly reviewing all the previous correspondence for the removal or avoidance of our objections, and contesting the analogy between the right of search, as it had been found obnoxious to us, and as now proposed for our adoption by formal compact, I have been under the absolute necessity of pointing out the analogies really existing between them, and of showing that, as right of search, independent of the right of capture, and irresponsible or responsible only to the tribunals of the captor, it is, as proposed, essentially liable to the same objections as it had been when exercised as a belligerent right. Its encroaching character, founded in its nature as an irresponsible exercise of force, and exemplified in its extension from search for contraband of war to search for enemies' property, and thence to search for men of the searcher's own nation, was thus necessarily brought into view, and connected the exhibition of the evils inherent in the practice with that of the abuses which have been found inseparable from it.

"We have declared the slave trade, so far as it may be pursued by citizens of the United States, piracy; and, as such, made it punishable with death. The resolution of the House of Representatives recommends negotiation to obtain the consent of the civilized world to recognize it as piracy under the law of nations. One of the properties of that description of piracies is, that those who are guilty of it may be taken upon the high seas and tried by the courts of every nation. But by the prevailing customary law they are tried only by the tribunals of the nation to which the vessel belongs in which the piracy was committed. The crime itself has been, however, in modern times, of so rare occurrence that there is no uniformity in the laws of the European nations with regard to this point, of which we have had remarkable and decisive proof within these five years in the case of piracy and murder committed on board the schooner Plattsburg, a merchant vessel of the United States. Nearly the whole of her crew were implicated in the crime, which was committed on the high seas. They carried the vessel into Christiansand, Norway, there abandoned her and dispersed. Three of them were taken up in Denmark; one in Sweden; one at Dantzic, in Prussia; and one in France. Those taken up in Denmark and in Sweden were delivered up to officers of the United States, brought to this country, tried, convicted, and executed. The man taken at Dantzic was, by the consent of the Prussian Government, sent to Elsinour, and there confronted with those taken in Denmark. The evidence against him on the examination was decisive; but as he persisted in the refusal to confess his guilt, the Prussian Government, bound by an established maxim of their municipal law, declined either to deliver him up or to try him themselves, but sent him back to Dantzic, there to remain imprisoned for life. The French Government, upon advisement of the highest judicial authority of the kingdom, declined also either to try the man taken up there or to deliver him up, unless upon proof of his guilt being produced against him at the place where he was confined; with which condition it not having been in our power to comply, the man remained there also in prison presumably for life. From these incidents it is apparent that there is no uniformity in the modes of trial to which piracy, by the law of nations, is subjected in different European countries; but that the trial itself is considered as the right and the duty only of the nation to which the vessel belongs on board of which the piracy was committed. This was, however, a piracy committed on board of a vessel by its own crew. External piracies, or piracies committed by and from one vessel against another, may be tried by the courts of any country, but are more usually tried by those of the country whose vessels have been the sufferers of the piracy, as many of the Cuba pirates have been tried in the British West India islands, and some of them in our courts.

"This principle we should wish to introduce into the system, by which the slave trade should be recognized as piracy under the law of nations, namely: that, although seizable by the officers and authorities of every nation, they should be triable only by the tribunals of the country of the slave trading vessel. This provision is indispensable to guard the innocent navigator against vexatious detentions and all the evils of arbitrary search. In committing to foreign officers the power, even in a case of conventional piracy, of arresting, confining, and delivering over for trial a citizen of the United States, we feel the necessity of guarding his rights from all abuses, and from the application of any laws of a country other than his own.

"The draught of a convention is herewith inclosed, which, if the British Government should agree to treat upon this subject on the basis of a legislative prohibition of the slave trade by both parties under the penalties of piracy, you are authorized to propose and to conclude. These articles, however, are not offered to the exclusion of others which may be proposed on the part of the British Government, nor is any one of them, excepting the first, to be insisted on as indispensable, if others equally adapted to answer their purposes should be proposed. It is only from the consideration of the crime in the character of piracy that we can admit the visitation of our merchant vessels by foreign officers for any purpose whatever, and in that case only under the most effective responsibility of the officer for the act of visitation itself, and for everything done under it.

"If the sentiments of the British Government should be averse to the principle of declaring the trade itself, by a legislative act, piratical, you will not propose or communicate to them the inclosed project of convention. Its objects, you will distinctly understand, are two-fold—to carry into effect the resolution of the House of Representatives, and to meet, explicitly and fully, the call so earnestly urged by the British Government, that in declining the proposals pressed by them upon us of conceding a mutual and qualified right of search we should offer a substitute for their consideration. The substitute, by declaring the crime piracy, carries with it the right of search for the pirates existing in the very nature of the crime. But to the concession of the right of search, distinct from the denomination of the crime, our objections remain in all their original force.

“It has been intimated by Mr. S. Canning that the suggestion itself to the British Government of the propriety of their passing a legislative act might excite in them some repugnancy to it. We should regret the excitement of this feeling, which the very nature of the negotiation seems to foreclose. Besides the legislative enactments which have virtually been pressed upon us by all the invitations to concede the right of search and to subject our citizens to trial for violations of our own laws by foreign tribunals, Great Britain, in almost all her slave trade treaties, has required and obtained express stipulations for the enactment of prohibitory laws by France, Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands. It was not expected that she would receive with reluctance herself a mere invitation to that which she had freely and expressly required from others. Still, if the sentiment should exist, we would forbear pressing it to the point of irritation by importunity. You will, in the first instance, simply state that, if the British Government is prepared to proclaim the slave trade piracy by statute, you are authorized to propose and to conclude a convention by which the mutual co-operation of the naval force of Great Britain and of the United States may be secured for carrying into effect the law which, on that contingency, will be common to both. Should the obstacle to the preliminary prove insuperable, you will refer the objections on the part of the British cabinet to this Government for consideration.

“By the loose information hitherto communicated in the public journals it would seem that the proposition for recognizing the slave trade as piracy, by the law of nations, was discussed at the Congress of Verona. We are expecting the communication of the papers relating to this subject, promised by Lord Liverpool to be laid before Parliament. Heretofore, although the United States have been much solicited and urged to concur in the measures of Great Britain and her allies for the suppression of the trade, they have been always communicated to us as purposes consummated to which the accession of the United States was desired. From the general policy of avoiding to intermeddle in European affairs, we have acquiesced in this course of proceeding; but, to carry fully into effect the late resolution of the House of Representatives, and to pursue the discussions hereafter with Great Britain herself, whether upon her proposals or upon ours, it is obviously proper that communication should be made to us of the progress of European negotiation for accomplishing the common purpose while it is in deliberation. If we are to co-operate in the result, it is just that we should be consulted, at least with regard to the means which we are invited to adopt.”

DRAFT OF A CONVENTION FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE, REFERRED TO IN MR. ADAMS' NOTE OF JUNE 24, 1823.

ARTICLE 1. The two high contracting powers, having each separately, by its own laws, subjected their subjects and citizens who may be convicted of carrying on illicit traffic in slaves on the coast of Africa to the penalties of piracy, do hereby agree to use their influence, respectively, with the other maritime and civilized nations of the world, to the end that the said African slave trade may be recognized and declared to be piracy under the law of nations.

ARTICLE 2. It is agreed by the two high contracting parties that the commanders and commissioned officers of either nation, duly authorized, under the regulations and instructions of their respective Governments, to cruise on the coasts of Africa, of America, or of the West Indies, for the suppression of the slave trade, shall be authorized, under the conditions, limitations, and restrictions hereinafter mentioned, to capture, and deliver over to the duly authorized and commissioned officers of the other, any ship or vessel carrying on such illicit traffic in slaves under the flag of the said other nation, or for the account of their subjects or citizens, to be sent in for trial and adjudication by the tribunals of the country to which such slave ship or vessel shall belong. And the said commanders and commissioned officers shall be further authorized to carry or send in any such slave-trading ship, so by them captured, into the ports of the country to which such slave-trading ship shall belong, for trial by the tribunals and conformably to the laws of the said country. But the slave ship so captured shall not be sent into the ports or tried by the tribunals of the captor.

ARTICLE 3. If any naval commander or commissioned officer of the United States of America shall, on the high seas, or anywhere without the territorial jurisdiction of the said States, board, or cause to be boarded, any merchant vessel of Great Britain, and visit the same as a slave trader, or on suspicion of her being engaged in carrying on the illicit traffic in slaves, in every case, whether the said visited vessel shall be captured and delivered over or sent into the ports of her own country for trial and adjudication or not, the boarding officer shall deliver to the master or commander of the visited vessel a certificate in writing, signed by the said boarding officer with his name and the addition of his rank in the service of the United States, and the name of the public vessel of the United States and of her commander by whose order the said visit shall have been ordered; and the said certificate shall declare that the only object of the said visit is to ascertain whether the said British merchant vessel is engaged in the slave trade or not; and if found to be so engaged, to take and deliver her over to the officers or the tribunals of her own nation for trial and adjudication. And the commander of the said public vessel of the United States shall, when he delivers her over to the officers or tribunals of Great Britain, deliver all the papers found on board of the captured vessel, indicating her national character and the objects of her voyage, and with them a like certificate of visitation in writing, signed by his name, with the addition of his rank in the Navy of the United States and the name of the public vessel commanded by him, together with the name and rank of the boarding officer by whom the said visit was made. This certificate shall also specify all the papers received from the master of the vessel detained or visited, or found on board the vessel, and shall contain an authentic declaration exhibiting the state in which he found the vessel detained and the changes, if any, which have taken place in it, and the number of slaves, if any, found on board at the moment of detention. And the same duties, herein described, shall devolve upon every commander or commissioned officer of the Royal Navy of Great Britain by whom, or by whose order, any merchant vessel of the United States, or navigating under their flag, shall be visited for the said purposes, and upon the boarding officer by whom the visit shall be effected, on the high seas, or anywhere without the territorial jurisdiction of Great Britain.

ARTICLE 4. No merchant vessel of either of the contracting parties under the convoy of a public vessel of her own nation shall, under any circumstances whatever, be captured or visited by or from any public vessel of the other nation as being engaged, or on suspicion of being engaged, in the slave trade.

ARTICLE 5. No search shall be made by or under the orders of the commander or boarding officer of any public vessel of either party visiting any merchant vessel of the other as being engaged, or under suspicion of being engaged, in the slave trade, excepting such as may be necessary to ascertain if there be slaves on board for the purposes of the said traffic, or other proof that the said vessel is so engaged. No person shall be taken out of the said visited or captured merchant vessel of either nation by the commanding officer of the visiting vessel, or under his order. Nor shall any part of the cargo of the said visited vessel be removed out of her until delivered over to the officers or tribunals of her own nation.

ARTICLE 6. When a merchant vessel of either nation shall be captured as being engaged in the slave trade by any commander or commissioned officer of the Navy of the other nation, it shall be the duty of the commander of any public ship of the Navy of the nation to which the captured vessel shall belong, upon the offer thereof being made to him by the commander of the capturing vessel, to receive into his custody the vessel so captured, and to carry or send the same into the ports of his own country for trial and adjudication; and at the time of the delivery of the said vessel an authentic declaration shall be drawn up in triplicates, signed by both the commanders of the delivering and of the receiving vessels, one copy of which shall be kept by each of them, stating the circumstances of the delivery, the condition of the vessel captured at the time of the delivery, the number of slaves, if any, on board of her, a list of all the papers received or found on board of her at the time of capture and delivered over with her, and the names of the master or commander of the captured vessel, and of every person on board of her other than the slaves at the said time of delivery; and the third copy of the said declaration shall be transmitted, with the said captured vessel and the papers found on board of her, to one of the ports of the country to which the said captured vessel shall belong, to be produced before the tribunal appointed or authorized to decide upon the said capture; and the commander of the said capturing vessel shall be authorized to send the boarding officer and one or two of his crew with the said captured vessel to appear as witnesses of the facts in relation to her capture and detention before the said tribunal; the reasonable expenses of which witnesses, in proceeding to the place of trial, during their necessary detention there, and for their return to their own country, or to rejoin their station in its service, shall be allowed by the tribunal of trial, and in case of the condemnation of the captured vessel, be defrayed from the proceeds of the sale thereof; and in case of the acquittal of the said vessel, they shall be paid by the Government of the capturing officer.

ARTICLE 7. The commander or commissioned officer of the Navy of either of the contracting parties, having captured a merchant vessel of the other as being engaged in the slave trade, if there be no public vessel of the nation to which the said captured vessel belongs cruising upon the same station, to the commander of whom the said captured vessel may be delivered over as stipulated in the preceding article, shall carry or send the said captured vessel to some convenient port of her own country, there to be delivered up to the competent tribunal for trial and adjudication. And the said captured vessel shall there be libelled in the name and behalf of the captors; and in case of the condemnation of the said vessel, the proceeds of the sale thereof and of her cargo, if also condemned, shall be paid to the commander of the said capturing vessel for the benefit of the captors, to be distributed according to the established rules of the service of the nation to which such capturing vessel shall belong for the distribution of prize money.

ARTICLE 8. The captain or commander and crew of the said vessel so captured and sent in for trial and adjudication shall be proceeded against conformably to the laws of the country whereinto they shall be so brought upon the charge of piracy, by being engaged in the African slave trade; and the captain or commander, the boarding officer, and other persons belonging to the capturing vessel, shall be competent witnesses to the facts relating to the said charge and to the capture of the said vessel, to which they shall be personally knowing. But every such witness upon the criminal trial for piracy shall be liable to be challenged by the person accused, and set aside as incompetent, unless he shall release and renounce all his individual claim to any part of the prize money upon the condemnation of the vessel and cargo.

ARTICLE 9. It is agreed between the high contracting parties that the right of visiting, capturing, and delivering over for trial, the vessels engaged in the African slave trade, and assuming their respective flags, is mutually conceded to the officers of their respective navies, on the consideration that they have, by their respective laws, declared their citizens and subjects actively participating in the said traffic guilty of the crime of piracy.

That no part of this convention shall be so construed as to authorize the detention, search, or visitation of the merchant vessels of either nation, by the public officers of the Navy of the other, except vessels engaged in the African slave trade, or for any other purpose whatever than that of seizing and delivering up the persons and vessels concerned in that traffic for trial and adjudication by the tribunals and laws of their own country.

ARTICLE 10. It is further agreed that this right of visiting, detaining, and delivering over for trial, vessels engaged in the slave trade, shall be exercised only by the commissioned officers of the Navy of the parties, respectively, furnished with instructions from their respective Governments for the execution of their respective laws for the suppression of the slave trade. That the boarding officer, and the captain or commander, of the vessel exercising these rights, or either of them, shall be personally responsible in damages and costs to the master and owners of every merchant vessel so by them delivered over, detained, or visited, for every vexatious or abusive exercise of the right. In the case of every vessel delivered over, as herein stipulated, for trial, the tribunal shall be competent to receive the complaint of the master, owner, or owners, or of any person on board of such captured vessel, or interested in the property of her cargo at the time of her detention, and, on suitable proof of such vexatious or abusive detention or visitation, to award reasonable damages and costs to the sufferers, to be paid by the said commanding or boarding officer, or either of them, so charged with vexatious or abusive detention or visit. And the high contracting parties agree that their respective Governments shall, in every such case, cause payment to be made of all such damages and costs so awarded to the persons so entitled to receive them within twelve months from the date of such award. And if any case of such vexatious or abusive detention or visit should occur, in which the vessel detained or visited shall not be delivered over for trial and adjudication, as herein provided, the commander and boarding officer by whom such vexatious and abusive detention or visit shall have been made, shall also be responsible in costs and damages to the sufferers, upon complaint before the competent admiralty court of the country of the said commander and boarding officer. And the respective Governments shall, in like manner, cause payment to be made of any damages and costs awarded by said court within twelve months from the date of the award.

ARTICLE 11. A copy of this convention, and of the laws of the two countries actually in force for the prohibition and suppression of the African slave trade, shall be furnished to every commander of the public vessels instructed to carry into effect such prohibition. And in case any such commanding officer of the Navy of the United States or of Great Britain shall deviate in any respect from the dispositions of this treaty, and from the instructions of his Government conformable to it, the Government which shall conceive itself to be wronged by such conduct shall be entitled to demand reparation; and in such case the Government of the nation, to the service of which he may belong, binds itself to cause inquiry to be made into the subject of the complaint, and to inflict upon him, if he be found to have deserved it, a punishment proportioned to the transgression which may have been committed.

ARTICLE 12. The present treaty, consisting of — articles, shall be ratified, and the ratifications exchanged within one year from this date, or sooner if possible.

In witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the same, and thereunto affixed their seals.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 28, 1823.

SIR: At the close of the last session of Congress a resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives, almost unanimously, requesting "the President of the United States to enter upon, and to prosecute from time to time, such negotiations with the several maritime powers of Europe and America as he may deem expedient for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade, and its ultimate denunciation as piracy, under the law of nations, by the consent of the civilized world."

In pursuance of this resolution, instructions for carrying it into effect have been given to the ministers of the United States destined to the Republics of Colombia and of Buenos Ayres, and to the minister who has recently departed for Spain. But, as a negotiation for co-operation to effect the suppression of the African slave trade had already been commenced with Great Britain, a special instruction upon the subject was forwarded to Mr. Rush, together with a full power, and a draft of a convention, to be proposed, in substance, to that Government, and which he has been authorized to conclude.

A copy of that instruction and draft are herewith inclosed; the general terms of which you will communicate, at such time and in such manner, to the Imperial Russian Government, as you shall think proper.

You will also communicate to them the purport of the resolution of the House of Representatives, above cited, and copies of the laws of the United States prohibiting the slave trade. You will particularly invite their attention to the two sections of the act of the 15th May, 1820, by which this offence, when committed by citizens of the United States, is subjected to the penalties of piracy.

The proposal that this principle should be recognized by the general consent of civilized nations, recommended by the resolution of the House of Representatives, appears to be substantially the same with that made by Great Britain at the Congress of Verona. It was not acceded to by any one of the other powers there assembled, and the conferences on this subject terminated there by a mere renewal of the joint declaration against the traffic, of the Congress at Vienna. So long as the trade shall not be recognized as piracy by the law of nations, we cannot, according to our Constitution, subject our citizens to trial for being engaged in it by any tribunal other than those of the United States.

The admission of the crime as piracy by the law of nations would seem necessarily to subject the perpetrators of it to capture by the armed force of every nation. And this might endanger the lawful commerce of the maritime nations, by subjecting them to the abuses of vexatious searches, without some special provision to guard against them.

This is the object of the stipulations proposed in the draft herewith transmitted; requiring that all vessels of one nation which may be captured, as slave traders, by the cruisers of another, should be delivered over for trial to the tribunals of their own country.

You will see that Mr. Rush is instructed to correspond with you upon this subject. If the draft of the articles inclosed should lead to the conclusion of a convention between the United States and Great Britain, a communication of it to the Russian Government will be made as soon as possible, and we shall propose that his Imperial Majesty's accession to it, if agreeable to him, shall be invited.

In the meantime you will informally suggest to his ministry that it will be the desire of the Government of the United States to proceed in this matter in perfect good understanding and harmony with them; and you will further intimate that, as this has now become a general concern of the whole civilized world, and as Great Britain is negotiating jointly and severally with each and every of her allies in Europe, apart, and again with them all together, while she is also separately treating with us, we wish it to be considered whether it would not be expedient on all sides that communication should be made to us of all the jointly concerted measures while they are mere proposals, and not that the knowledge of them should be withheld from us until they are matured into positive treaties.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

HON. HENRY MIDDLETON, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, at St. Petersburg.

Mr. Adams to Mr. Everett, No. 10.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, August 8, 1823.

SIR: At the close of the last session of Congress a resolution was adopted, almost unanimously, by the House of Representatives, "that the President of the United States be requested to enter upon, and to prosecute from time to time, such negotiations with the several maritime powers of Europe and America as he may be expedient for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade, and its ultimate denunciation as piracy, under the law of nations, by the consent of the civilized world."

In pursuance of this resolution, instructions for carrying it into effect have been given to the ministers of the United States destined to the Republics of Colombia and of Buenos Ayres, and to the several ministers of the United States in Europe.

As a negotiation for co-operation to effect the suppression of the African slave trade had already been commenced with Great Britain, a special instruction upon the subject has been forwarded to Mr. Rush, together with a full power, and a draft of a convention, to be proposed, in substance, to the British Government, and which he is authorized to conclude.

A necessary preliminary to the conclusion of this proposed convention, should it meet the assent of the British Government, will be the enactment of a statute declaring the crime of African slave trading piracy by the British law. In that event, it is proposed, by proper co-operation, that the influence of the two powers should be exerted to obtain the consent of other nations to the general outlawry of this traffic as piracy. In the meantime, to give at once effect to the concert of both nations, it is proposed that the armed vessels of both, duly authorized and instructed, shall have power to capture the slave-trading vessels which may assume the flag of either, and, if not of their own nation, to deliver over the captured slave trader to the officers or tribunals of his own country for trial and adjudication.

This principle is essential, as connected with that of constituting the traffic piracy by the law of nations. So long as the offence was considered as of inferior magnitude, the Constitution of the United States forbade the submission of it, when charged upon their citizens, to any foreign tribunal; and when the crime and the punishment are aggravated to involve the life of the accused, it affords but a more imperative inducement for securing to him the benefit of a trial by his countrymen and his peers.

It appears that, at the conferences of Verona, the proposition was made by the British Government that the slave trade should be recognized and proclaimed as piracy by the law of nations. We have, therefore, reason to hope that the proposal now made to them on the part of the United States will be favorably considered by them. In that case, further communications on the subject with other Governments will ensue.

In the meantime, to fulfil the intentions of the House of Representatives in relation to the Netherlands, you will communicate to their Government a copy of the resolution, together with copies of the laws of the United States prohibiting the slave trade, with particular notice of the two sections of the act of 15th May, 1820, by which the crime of being concerned in the African slave trade, when committed by citizens of the United States, is declared to be and is made punishable as for piracy. And you will announce the readiness of the American Government, should it suit the views of his Majesty the King of the Netherlands, to enter upon a negotiation for the purpose of carrying into effect the object of the resolution of the House of Representatives, namely, the denunciation of the African slave trade as piracy by the law of nations.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Extracts of a letter, No. 6, from Mr. Adams to General Dearborn, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Lisbon, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, August 14, 1823.

"At the close of the last session of Congress a resolution was adopted, almost unanimously, by the House of Representatives—

"That the President of the United States be requested to enter upon, and to prosecute from time to time, such negotiations with the several maritime powers of Europe and America as he may deem expedient for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade, and its ultimate denunciation as piracy, under the law of nations, by the consent of the civilized world."

"A negotiation for concerting measures of co-operation to effect the suppression of the African slave trade had already for several years been pending with Great Britain, for which reason a special instruction has been transmitted to Mr. Rush, together with a full power, and a draft of a convention, to be proposed, in substance, to the British Government, which he is authorized to conclude.

"Should this proposal meet the assent of the British Government, a necessary preliminary to the conclusion of the convention will be the passage of an act of Parliament declaring the crime of African slave trading, when committed by British subjects, piracy. An act of Congress to that effect, as relates to citizens of the United States, has been in force, as you are aware, these three years. When the crime shall have been constituted piracy by the statute law of both countries, each with reference to its own citizens or subjects, the principle offered by the projected convention is, that the armed vessels of each, specially empowered and instructed to that end, shall be authorized to capture slave-trading vessels assuming the flag of the other, and to deliver over the captured vessels to the public cruisers, or to the tribunals of their own country, for trial. This plan is offered as a substitute for that which was offered to us by Great Britain, which was predicated on the treaties already concluded between that power and Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands. The leading principle of these treaties was the mutual concession of the right of maritime search, in time of peace, to the armed vessels of both cruising for slave traders, and a mixed court of commissioners and arbitrators, sitting in colonial possessions of the parties, for the trial of the delinquents. To this system the United States have steadily declined to accede, for two reasons: one, because they had an invincible repugnance to subject their merchant vessels to the maritime search of foreign officers in time of peace; and the other, because they could not subject their citizens to the jurisdiction of foreign tribunals, upon trials for offences against their laws.

"At the conferences of Verona, the British Government appears to have proposed that the African slave trade should be declared piracy by the law of nations. This is the same proposition recommended by the resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States. The ultimate object of the United States and of Great Britain, therefore, is the same."

"The negotiations suggested by the resolution of the House must depend materially for their character and progress, with reference to other powers, upon the event of that which is thus pending with Great Britain. The instructions to the ministers of the United States in other countries have therefore been only of a general character."

"Portugal is the only maritime power of Europe which has not yet declared the African slave trade, without exception, unlawful. Her own internal situation has, perhaps, recently tended to diminish the influence of those interests which have heretofore prevailed to delay and postpone her acquiescence in the principle of total proscription upon that trade. It is hoped that she will not much longer resist the predominating spirit of the age, calling so loudly upon the rulers of mankind effectually to put down the crying sin of that abominable traffic."

"In communicating to the Portuguese Government copies of the resolution of the House of Representatives, and of the laws of the United States prohibiting the slave trade, you will state that the Government of the United States will be ready to enter at any time, when it may suit the views of that of Portugal, upon the negotiation contemplated by the resolution."

Mr. Rush to Mr. Adams, giving him the substance of a conversation with Mr. Canning.

[Extracts.]

LONDON, October 9, 1823.

"This latter subject" (the slave trade) "he said it was his wish to take in hand with me himself, and thus keep it detached from the general negotiation."

"Whilst we were speaking of the mode of taking up the question of the slave trade, I did not scruple to intimate, even at this early stage, that unless this Government was prepared to say that it would cause a statute to be passed declaring the trade by its own subjects to be piracy, and rendering it punishable as such, in manner as had been done by the United States, that I was not authorized to make any proposals upon the subject; that this, in fact, was the only basis upon which it fell within the intentions of my Government to attempt any arrangement of the subject whatever. I was happy to hear Mr. Canning say, in reply, that he did not, speaking from his first impressions, see any insurmountable obstacle upon this score to our proceeding with the subject."

Extract from No. 11 of Mr. Sheldon, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at Paris, to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, October 16, 1823.

"In the same conference I also informed Mr. de Chateaubriand of the resolution of the House of Representatives respecting the slave trade, which made the subject of your despatch, No. 2, of the 14th of August. He repeated, in substance, what he had before stated to Mr. Gallatin in conversation, viz: that the French Government were sincerely desirous of putting an end to that trade, and were taking all the measures in their power to effect it by pursuing offenders and executing rigidly the laws now in existence; but that the public opinion generally in France, and more especially in the Chambers, was against it, owing not only to the prevalence of the colonial interest in the question, but particularly to the circumstances under which their stipulations with England upon this subject had been made; so tender were they upon this point that the proposition of adding new rigors to their laws would be taken as a new concession to that power, and, instead of being adopted in the Chambers, would be more likely to provoke an attempt to repeal the prohibitory measures already established, in order to rid themselves in that way of one of the charges imposed upon them by the foreign occupation; that time was necessary to wear away these impressions; and until that should have arrived, no minister in France could be strong enough upon this point to do more than to watch over the execution of the laws already in force, which they were now disposed to do fully and faithfully, and which, if not entirely efficient, at least made the prosecution of the trade under the French flag hazardous and difficult."

"At present, therefore, it is not probable that France will consent to the proposal of the President to enter upon the negotiation contemplated by the resolution of the House of Representatives. I have, however, made the proposal in obedience to your directions, and have the honor to inclose a copy of the letter to Viscount de Chateaubriand, in which I have communicated to him that resolution."

Extracts from No. 14 of Mr. Sheldon, Chargé d'Affaires, to the Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, November 5, 1823.

"I have received answers from Viscount de Chateaubriand on the subject of the new and more effective measures proposed against the slave trade."

“On the subject of the slave trade, the answer manifests a disposition to adopt such new provisions as may be found necessary for its more effectual suppression, and this disposition really exists; but after what Mr. de Chateaubriand had stated in conversation, and which I have already communicated, these new and more rigorous legislative provisions can only be introduced gradually, and some time will be required for effecting that purpose.”

---

PARIS, October 15, 1823.

SIR: The minister of the United States to this court had, some time before he left Paris, transmitted to your excellency copies of the laws successively adopted by the United States for the suppression of the slave trade. This communication was intended for the special purpose of making the French Government acquainted with the fact that, so far as the United States were concerned, their legislation upon this subject had been ineffectual; that their laws had been violated and the trade had continued until they had denounced against it the highest punishment that a human tribunal can inflict. Since it has been declared to be piracy, and punishable with death, the American flag has no longer been soiled with it.

At the last session of Congress that body, desirous that the co-operation of the maritime powers might be obtained in measures which we had found to be so effectual, formally requested the President to enter upon and prosecute negotiations with those powers to that end. I have the honor to inclose a copy of the resolution adopted with great unanimity by the House of Representatives upon that subject, and I am directed to declare that the President is ready to enter upon the negotiation contemplated by it with France whenever it may be agreeable to her. Instructions to the same effect have been given to all the ministers of the United States accredited to foreign powers, and the favorable results which are hoped from them will be made known at the earliest opportunities to the French Government. It may be expected that a co-operation in measures equally effectual with those heretofore brought forward for the suppression of this trade, and not open to similar objections, will be generally and readily afforded.

I beg to offer to your excellency the renewed assurances, &c.

D. SHELDON.

Viscount de Chateaubriand to Mr. Sheldon.

PARIS, October 29, 1823.

SIR: You did me the honor of writing me on the 15th of this month that the Government of the United States had only attained the effectual suppression of the slave trade by making it piracy, and by rendering those guilty of it liable to the same punishment. You have at the same time informed me that that Government was disposed to co-operate with the other powers, by negotiations, to attain by the same means the complete and general abolition of this traffic.

The communication which you did me the honor to address to me cannot but deserve great consideration. I have requested the Keeper of the Seals to review with great care the laws and ordinances which have been made in France for obtaining the abolition of the trade; to certify, after this examination, in what points they may be insufficient, and to propose for completing them, in case of need, all the new dispositions which might accord with the independence and rights of the flag, and which might appear most proper to assure, in France, in an efficacious manner, the absolute cessation of a traffic so contrary to the rights of humanity.

Accept, sir, the assurances, &c.

CHATEAUBRIAND.

BRUSSELS, November 7, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor to subjoin to your excellency, by order of my Government, a printed copy of the laws of the United States which forbid their citizens to pursue the slave trade; also a copy of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th of February, 1823, by which the President is requested to concert with the maritime powers of Europe and of America the measures which may be most proper to effect the abolition of that trade, and to make it, by the universal consent of the civilized world, equivalent to the crime of piracy.

Your excellency will remark that it is already viewed in this light by the laws of the United States. The act of March 15, 1820, declares (sections 4 and 5) that the persons subject to the jurisdiction of the Republic who shall be engaged in the slave trade, either by seizing these unfortunates by force or fraud and carrying them on board their vessels, or by keeping them there, and making them an object of traffic, shall be deemed pirates, and punished with death.

In fact, this pretended commerce bears all the characteristics of piracy—that is, of felony committed on the sea; and as it has been denounced as a crime by the greater part of civilized nations, it ought to fall into the particular class of crimes to which it naturally belongs, and undergo the penalties which the usage and the law of nations impose upon them. An unanimous declaration of the Christian powers to this effect would inevitably produce the entire cessation of the trade. The public ships of each power would then be authorized by the law of nations to cruise against the persons who might be engaged in it, without regard to the color of the flag with which they might pretend to be sheltered; whilst, if the trade is only regarded in each country as an offence against the municipal laws, it would be lawful for any one nation alone, by permitting it, to afford an asylum under its flag to the pirates of all the others.

The known character of the King, and the zeal which his Majesty has already displayed in his efforts to bring about the abolition of this infamous commerce, furnish a presumption to the Government of the United States that that of the Low Countries will voluntarily co-operate with it to that effect. In communicating to your excellency the subjoined papers, and in praying that you will be pleased to lay them before the King, I am charged to announce to him the desire of the President of the United States to obtain the co-operation of his Majesty in this work of justice and to establish a concert between the two powers in the measures which they may pursue, in common, to render the slave trade equivalent to the crime of piracy by the universal consent of the Christian world.

I eagerly embrace this occasion to renew to your excellency the homage of my most distinguished consideration.

LONDON, April 1, 1824.

SIR: I have now the honor to transmit, in the shape in which it has received the royal assent, a copy of the British act of Parliament making the slave trade piracy. It was sent to me to-day by Mr. Huskisson, with a note, of which a copy is inclosed. It passed the House of Lords the day before yesterday by an unanimous vote.

In addition to the explanation which Mr. Huskisson afforded me of the clause at the end of the act, both himself and Mr. Secretary Canning have since stated to me that a further reason for it was, that a consolidation of this act with all the other British slave trade laws and regulations is in contemplation, perhaps in the course of the present session of Parliament, with a view to give to the British naval officers one comprehensive code of instructions under them.

I have the honor to be, with very great respect, your obedient servant,

RICHARD RUSH.

BOARD OF TRADE, April 1, 1824.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the satisfaction to transmit to you three copies of the bill which received the royal assent yesterday, for declaring slave trading to be piracy.

These copies are the bill as printed for the House of Lords, in which shape, as no amendment was made in that House, it received the royal assent; but some few days will elapse before it can be published in the usual form among the laws of the present session.

I have the honor to be, dear sir, your very faithful, obedient servant,

W. HUSKISSON.

FOREIGN OFFICE, April 2, 1824.

SIR: I herewith inclose to you several copies of the bill which has now passed into a law, affixing to the crime of carrying on the slave trade by British subjects the pains and penalties attached to piracy.

You will lose no time in calling on Mr. Adams, and in communicating this act of Parliament to him, in proof of the anxiety of his Majesty to carry into early and effectual execution the convention lately concluded on this subject by the United States; and with reference to that clause in the act which provides for possible alteration in the course of the session, you will explain to the American minister that this clause has in view no change in the act, but merely its consolidation with all the other slave trade regulations in one general act, (which is intended to be brought in before the close of this session of Parliament,) in order that British officers may be furnished with one comprehensive code of instruction on this subject.

I have the honor to be, &c., &c.,

An act for the more effectual Suppression of the African Slave Trade.

MARCH 31, 1824.

Whereas it is expedient to make further provision for the suppression of the African slave trade, by enacting that persons committing the offences hereinafter specified shall be deemed and adjudged to be guilty of piracy:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That if any subject or subjects of his Majesty, or any person or persons residing or being within any of the dominions, forts, settlements, factories, or territories now or hereafter belonging to his Majesty, or being in his Majesty's occupation or possession, or under the Government of the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, shall, except in such cases as are in and by the laws now in force permitted, after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, upon the high seas, or in any haven, river, creek, or place, where the Admiral has jurisdiction, knowingly and wilfully carry away, convey, or remove, or aid or assist in carrying away, conveying, or removing any person or persons as a slave or slaves, or for the purpose of his, her, or their being imported or brought as a slave or slaves into any island, colony, country, territory, or place whatsoever, or for the purpose of his, her, or their being sold, transferred, used or dealt with as a slave or slaves; or shall, after the said first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, except in such cases as are in and by the laws now in force permitted, upon the high seas, or within the jurisdiction aforesaid, knowingly and wilfully ship, embark, receive, detain, or confine, or assist in shipping, embarking, receiving, detaining, or confining on board any ship, vessel, or boat, any person or persons, for the purpose of his, her, or their being carried away, conveyed, or removed, as a slave or slaves, or for the purpose of his, her, or their being imported or brought as a slave or slaves into any island, colony, country, territory, or place whatsoever, or for the purpose of his, her, or their being sold, transferred, used, or dealt with as a slave or slaves, then, and in every such case, the person or persons so offending shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of piracy, felony, and robbery, and being convicted thereof, shall suffer death, without benefit of clergy, and loss of lands, goods, and chattels, as pirates, felons, and robbers upon the seas, ought to suffer.

II. Provided always, and it is hereby further enacted and declared, That nothing in this act contained, making and declaring the aforesaid offences to be piracies, felonies, and robberies, shall be construed to repeal, annul, or alter the provisions and enactments of any other act or acts contained, imposing forfeitures and penalties, or either of them, upon the same offences, or to repeal, annul, or alter the remedies given for the recovery thereof; but that the said provisions and remedies shall, in all respects, be deemed and taken to be and remain in full force, as they existed immediately before the passing of this act: Provided, also, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to repeal, annul, or alter any of the enactments or provisions contained in an act passed in the fifty-first year of his late Majesty, intituled "An act for rendering more effectual an act made in the forty-seventh year of his Majesty's reign, intituled 'An act for the abolition of the slave trade,'" except so far as such enactments or provisions are altered or varied by this act, but that the said act shall, in all other respects, remain in full force and effect.

III. And be it further enacted and declared, That all and every the offences hereinbefore specified shall and may be inquired of, either according to the ordinary course of law and the provisions of an act passed in the twenty-eighth year of the reign of King Henry the Eighth, intituled "An act for pirates," or according to the provisions of an act passed in the forty-sixth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, intituled "An act for the more speedy trial of offences committed in distant parts upon the high seas."

IV. And be it further enacted, That this act may be amended, altered, or repealed, by any act or acts to be passed in this present session of Parliament.

[1ST SESSION.]

SUPPRESSION OF PIRACIES IN THE WEST INDIES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MAY 19, 1824.

Mr. POINSETT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred so much of the President's message as relates to the "piracies by which our commerce in the neighborhood of the island of Cuba has been afflicted;" and "to the depredations which have been committed on the lawful commerce of the United States, under other pretences and other color, in the neighboring island of Porto Rico," reported:

That the prompt and energetic measures adopted by Congress at the commencement of their last session, seconded by the zeal and enterprise of the officers entrusted with the command of the light squadron destined to suppress piracy in the West Indies and the Gulf of Mexico, have succeeded in putting a stop to the piracies by which our commerce had been afflicted in the neighborhood of the island of Cuba, as far as a foreign force, unaided by the public authorities of the island, could succeed in accomplishing this object.

These piracies had been continued for years under the immediate observation of the Government of the island of Cuba, which, as well as the Spanish Government, has been repeatedly and ineffectually required to suppress them. Many of them have been committed by boats which remained concealed in the harbors and under the headland until they discovered their prey, which they captured, plundered and destroyed upon the shores of the island. When pursued by a superior force the pirates have escaped to the shore, and our commanders have been refused permission to land in pursuit of them, even on the desert and uninhabited parts of the island.

It appears, from the most respectable testimony, that these atrocious robberies were committed by persons well known in Havana and in Regla, where they were organized into a band, and that the traffic in their plunder was carried on openly; that they were sometimes committed by vessels equipped at Havana and at Regla; and that they cautiously avoided molesting Spanish vessels, but attacked without discrimination the defenceless vessels of all other nations.

The present Captain General of the island of Cuba has acted with great courtesy towards our commander and officers engaged on this service, and has co-operated with them by arresting the pirates who had escaped to the shore, nor has he complained when our officers have found it necessary to pursue them, and to break up their haunts on the desert and infrequented keys that surround the island. In no case, however, within our knowledge, where pirates have been seized by the authorities of the island, have they been brought to that punishment their crimes merited; and those who are well known to have fitted out piratical cruisers and to have sold their plunder with the utmost notoriety, are suffered to remain in Havana and Regla in the unmolested enjoyment of the fruits of their crimes. Under these circumstances the British and American squadrons in those seas may repress piracy, so long as they continue cruising in the neighborhood of the island; but there is reason to apprehend that, on their removal, similar outrages on our commerce will be renewed. In the opinion of your committee, piracy can only be effectually suppressed by the Government of Spain and by the authorities of the island taking the necessary measures to prevent piratical vessels or boats from being equipped or sailing from any part of the island, and to apprehend and punish every description of outlaws, as well those who actually commit acts of piracy as those who receive and traffic in goods plundered on the high seas.

The commerce of the United States with the island of Cuba, superior to that with Spain and all its other dependencies, and fully equal to that with France, claims in a peculiar manner the protection of Government. The safety of that commerce requires that the Government of Spain should be urged to adopt prompt and vigorous measures effectually to suppress piracy in the neighborhood of the island, and to co-operate with the maritime powers most interested in effecting this object: and your committee are of opinion, that, for the protection of this important commerce, and of the persons and property of our fellow-citizens, when in the ports of the island, the residence of consuls or authorized commercial agents of the United States at these places is absolutely necessary, and ought to be insisted upon.

Privateers, distinguished from pirates only by commissions of most equivocal character from Spanish officers whose authority to issue them has never been shown, have been equipped in the island of Porto Rico, and have committed outrages and depredations upon the persons and property of the citizens of the United States; outrages which no commission could divest of their piratical character. With no other naval force than a frigate, a brig and a schooner, they presumed to declare a blockade of more than twelve hundred miles of coast. To this violation of all the rights of neutrality they added the absurd pretension of interdicting the peaceable commerce of other nations with all the ports of the Spanish main, upon the pretence that it had heretofore been forbidden by the Spanish colonial laws; and, on the strength of these two inadmissible principles, they issued commissions in the island of Porto Rico to a swarm of privateers, which have committed extensive and ruinous depredations upon the lawful commerce of the United States. Frequent remonstrances have been made, both to Spain and to the authorities of the island, by the Executive, without producing any effect. During the last summer a special agent was sent to Porto Rico to obtain the restitution of American vessels captured by the privateers of that island, and to collect documentary evidence of the trials and condemnation of others. To the first demand the political chief referred the agent to the Government of Spain, declaring that he could not, without an open infraction of fundamental laws, take cognizance of causes legally determined; that the officers of that province could not proceed but by the express orders of the Supreme Government, and to that the United States, after the example of Great Britain, must have recourse.

It appears by the testimony collected by this gentleman that it had been the practice of these privateers not to send in their prizes to the large and frequented ports where impartial judges could determine on the validity of the capture, and where the captured could have the means of fairly defending their rights; but to send them into distant and obscure seaports where the courts are notoriously corrupt, and where the captains and owners were deprived of the means of making even statements of their cases. There are many instances of vessels condemned most unjustly; and even where they have had the rare good fortune to escape condemnation, their owners have been subjected to ruinous costs and charges; and in some cases, before the vessels have reached the port, the cargoes and property have been plundered, and the officers and crew treated in a cruel and barbarous manner.

In San Juan, the principal town of the island of Porto Rico, attempts have been made to assassinate the commercial agent of the United States and the master of a merchant vessel in order, as they believe, to prevent them from taking legal measures to recover property unlawfully captured. Your committee deem it unnecessary to enumerate the vessels that have been captured and condemned without the color of justice, or to recapitulate each particular case of barbarous outrage committed upon the persons and property of the citizens of the United States by privateers fitted out in the ports of Porto Rico; outrages which, in their opinion, would justify reprisals and a rigorous blockade of the ports of that island. Your committee forbear to recommend the immediate adoption of those measures only because the minister of the United States at Madrid has been instructed to remonstrate with his Catholic Majesty on the culpable neglect of the Spanish authorities in the island of Porto Rico, and to require indemnity for the losses sustained by the citizens of the United States from the lawless conduct of the commanders of privateers bearing his Majesty's commission. That this remonstrance and demand were not made earlier arose from circumstances beyond the control of Government. The former minister had left Madrid before his instructions on this subject reached that place, and the subsequent invasion of Spain by France, and the conduct of the French commander of the blockading squadron off Cadiz, retarded the arrival of our present minister. While the committee advise that Government wait the result of the negotiation now pending at Madrid, or, at all events, the answer to the remonstrance of our minister at that court, before a resort is had to reprisals and blockade, they earnestly recommend that two or more small cruisers should be constantly kept off the ports of San Juan, and in the Moro Passage so as to protect our commerce and intercept at the entrance of San Juan, Aguadilla, Mayaguez, Cape Roco, and Ponce, American vessels unlawfully captured by Spanish privateers; and that the commanders of the United States vessels-of-war be instructed to capture and send into a port of the United States for trial any privateer that commits an outrage on the persons or plunders the property of citizens of the United States on the high seas, whenever good and sufficient testimony of such piratical act can be obtained.

SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, IN EXECUTIVE SESSION, MAY 21, 1824, AND THE INJUNCTION OF SECRECY SINCE REMOVED.

To the Senate of the United States:

Apprehending, from the delay in the decision, that some difficulty exists with the Senate respecting the ratification of the convention lately concluded with the British Government for the suppression of the slave trade, by making it piratical, I deem it proper to communicate, for your consideration, such views as appear to me to merit attention. Charged, as the Executive is, and as I have long been, with maintaining the political relations between the United States and other nations, I consider it my duty, in submitting for your advice and consent, as to the ratification, any treaty or convention which has been agreed on with another power, to explain, when the occasion requires it, all the reasons which induced the measure. It is by such full and frank explanation, only, that the Senate can be enabled to discharge the high trust reposed in them with advantage to their country. Having the instrument before them, with the views which guided the Executive in forming it, the Senate will possess all the light necessary to a sound decision.

By an act of Congress of May 15, 1820, the slave trade, as described by that act, was made piratical, and all such of our citizens as might be found engaged in that trade were subjected, on conviction thereof by the circuit courts of the United States, to capital punishment. To communicate more distinctly the import of that act, I refer to its fourth and fifth sections, which are in the following words:

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any citizen of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign ship or vessel engaged in the slave trade, or any person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any ship or vessel, owned in the whole or part, or navigated for or in behalf of any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall land from any such ship or vessel, and on any foreign shore, seize any negro or mulatto, not held to service or labor by the laws of either of the States or Territories of the United States, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall decoy or forcibly bring or carry, or shall receive such negro or mulatto on board any such ship or vessel, with intent as aforesaid, such citizen or person shall be adjudged a pirate; and on conviction thereof, before the circuit court of the United States for the district wherein he may be brought or found, shall suffer death."

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any citizen of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign ship or vessel engaged in the slave trade, or any person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any ship or vessel, owned wholly or in part, or navigated for or in behalf of any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall forcibly confine or detain, or aid and abet in forcibly confining or detaining on board such ship or vessel any negro or mulatto, not held to service by the laws of either of the States or Territories of the United States, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall, on board any such ship or vessel, offer or attempt to sell, as a slave, any negro or mulatto not held to service as aforesaid, or shall, on the high seas, or anywhere on tide water, transfer or deliver over to any other ship or vessel any negro or mulatto, not held to service as aforesaid, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall land or deliver on shore from on board any such ship or vessel any such negro or mulatto, with intent to make sale of, or having previously sold such negro or mulatto as a slave, such citizen or person shall be adjudged a pirate; and on conviction thereof, before the circuit court of the United States for the district wherein he may be brought or found, shall suffer death."

And on the 28th February, 1823, the House of Representatives, by a vote of 131 to 9, passed a resolution to the following effect:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to enter upon, and prosecute from time to time, such negotiations with the several maritime powers of Europe and America as he may deem expedient for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade, and its ultimate denunciation as piracy, under the law of nations, by the consent of the civilized world."

By the act of Congress above referred to, whereby the most effectual means that could be devised were adopted for the extirpation of the slave trade, the wish of the United States was explicitly declared that all nations might concur in a similar policy. It could only be by such concurrence that the great object could be accomplished; and it was by negotiation and treaty alone that such concurrence could be obtained, commencing with one power and extending it to others. The course, therefore, which the Executive, who had concurred in the act, had to pursue, was distinctly marked out for it. Had there, however, been any doubt respecting it, the resolution of the House of Representatives, the branch which might with strict propriety express its opinion, could not fail to have removed it.

By the tenth article of the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain, concluded at Ghent, it was stipulated that both parties should use their best endeavors to accomplish the abolition of the African slave trade. This object has been, accordingly, pursued by both Governments with great earnestness, by separate acts of legislation, and by negotiation almost uninterrupted, with the purpose of establishing a concert between them in some measure which might secure its accomplishment.

Great Britain, in her negotiations with other powers, had concluded treaties with Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands, in which, without constituting the crime as piracy or classing it with crimes of that denomination, the parties had conceded to the naval officers of each other the right of search and capture of the vessels of either that might be engaged in the slave trade, and had instituted courts, consisting of judges, subjects of both parties, for the trial of the vessels so captured.

In the negotiations with the United States, Great Britain had earnestly and repeatedly pressed on them the adoption of similar provisions. They had been resisted by the Executive on two grounds: one, that the constitution of mixed tribunals was incompatible with their Constitution; and the other, that the concession of the right of search in time of peace for an offence not piratical would be repugnant to the feelings of the nation and of dangerous tendency. The right of search is the right of war of the belligerent towards the neutral. To extend it in time of peace to any object whatever might establish a precedent which might lead to others with some powers, and which, even if confined to the instance specified, might be subject to great abuse.

Animated by an ardent desire to suppress this trade, the United States took stronger ground, by making it, by the act above referred to, piratical—a measure more adequate to the end, and free from many of the objections applicable to the plan which had been proposed to them. It is this alternative which the Executive, under the sanctions and injunctions above stated, offered to the British Government, and which that Government has accepted. By making the crime piracy, the right of search attaches to the crime, and which, when adopted by all nations, will be common to all; and that it will be so adopted may fairly be presumed, if steadily persevered in by the parties to the present convention. In the meantime, and with a view to a fair experiment, the obvious course seems to be to carry into effect with every power such treaty as may be made with each in succession.

In presenting this alternative to the British Government, it was made an indispensable condition that the trade should be made piratical by act of Parliament, as it had been by an act of Congress. This was provided for in the convention, and has since been complied with. In this respect, therefore, the two nations rest on the same ground. Suitable provisions have also been adopted to protect each party from the abuse of the power granted to the public ships of the other. Instead of subjecting the persons detected in the slave trade to trial by the courts of the captors, as would be the case if such trade was piracy by the law of nations, it is stipulated that, until that event, they shall be tried by the courts of their own country only. Hence there could be no motive for an abuse of the right of search, since such abuse could not fail to terminate to the injury of the captor.

Should this convention be adopted, there is every reason to believe that it will be the commencement of a system destined to accomplish the entire abolition of the slave trade. Great Britain, by making it her own, confessedly adopted at the suggestion of the United States, and being pledged to propose and urge its adoption by other nations in concert with the United States, will find it for her interest to abandon the less effective system of her previous treaties with Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands, and to urge on those and other powers their accession to this. The crime will then be universally proscribed as piracy, and the traffic be suppressed forever.

Other considerations of high importance urge the adoption of this convention. We have, at this moment, pending with Great Britain, sundry other negotiations intimately connected with the welfare and even with the peace of our Union. In one of them, nearly a third part of the territory of the State of Maine is in contestation. In another, the navigation of the St. Lawrence, the admission of consuls into the British islands, and a system of commercial intercourse between the United States and all the British possessions in this hemisphere, are subjects of discussion. In a third, our territorial and other rights upon the Northwest Coast are to be adjusted; while a negotiation on the same interest is opened with Russia. In a fourth, all the most important controvertible points of maritime law in time of war are brought under consideration; and in the fifth, the whole system of South American concerns, connected with a general recognition of South American independence, may again, from hour to hour, become, as it has already been, an object of concerted operations of the highest interest to both nations, and to the peace of the world.

It cannot be disguised that the rejection of this convention could not fail to have a very injurious influence on the good understanding between the two Governments on all these points. That it would place the Executive administration under embarrassment, and subject it, the Congress and the nation, to the charge of insincerity respecting the great result of the final suppression of the slave trade; and that its first and indispensable consequence will be to constrain the Executive to suspend all further negotiation with every European and American power to which overtures have been made in compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of February 28, 1823, must be obvious. To invite all nations, with the statute of piracy in our hands, to adopt its principles as the law of nations, and yet to deny to all the common rights of search for the pirate, whom it would be impossible to detect without entering and searching the vessel, would expose us not simply to the charge of inconsistency.

It must be obvious that the restriction of search for pirates to the African coast is incompatible with the idea of such a crime. It is not doubted, also, if the convention is adopted, that no example of the commission of that crime by the citizens or subjects of either power will ever occur again. It is believed, therefore, that this right, as applicable to piracy, would not only extirpate the trade, but prove altogether innocent in its operation.

In further illustration of the views of Congress on this subject, I transmit to the Senate extracts from two resolutions of the House of Representatives—one of February 9, 1821, the other of April, 12, 1822. I transmit also a letter from the Chargé d'Affaires of the British Government, which shows the deep interest which that Government takes in the ratification of the treaty.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, May 21, 1824.

---

Extract of a report of the 9th February, 1821, to the House of Representatives by the Committee to whom had been referred so much of the President's message as relates to the slave trade, and to whom were referred the two messages of the President, transmitting, in pursuance of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th of December, a report of the Secretary of State, and inclosed documents relating to the negotiation for the suppression of the slave trade.

"The detestable crime of kidnapping the unoffending inhabitants of one country, and chaining them to slavery in another, is marked with all the atrociousness of piracy; and, as such, it is stigmatized and punishable by our own laws.

"To efface this reproachful stain from the character of civilized mankind would be the proudest triumph that could be achieved in the cause of humanity. On this subject, the United States, having led the way, owe it to themselves to give their influence and cordial co-operation to any measure that will accomplish the great and good purpose; but this happy result, experience has demonstrated, cannot be realized by any system except a concession by the maritime powers to each other's ships-of-war of a qualified right of search. If this object was generally attained, it is confidently believed that the active exertions of even a few nations, would be sufficient entirely to suppress the slave trade."

Extract from a report made April 12, 1822, by the Committee on the suppression of the slave trade, to whom had been referred a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 15th January preceding, instructing them to inquire whether the laws of the United States prohibiting that traffic have been duly executed; also, into the general operation thereof; and, if any defects exist in those laws, to suggest adequate remedies therefor; and to whom many memorials had been referred touching the same subject.

"But the conclusion to which your committee have arrived, after consulting all the evidence within their reach, is, that the African slave trade now prevails to a great extent, and that its total suppression can never be effected by the separate and disunited efforts of one or more States; and as the resolution to which this report refers requires the suggestion of some remedy for the defects, if any exist, in the system of laws for the suppression of this traffic, your committee beg leave to call the attention of the House to the report and accompanying documents submitted to the last Congress by the committee on the slave trade, and to make the same a part of this report. That report proposes, as a remedy for the existing evils of the system, the concurrence of the United States with one or all the maritime powers of Europe in a modified and reciprocal right of search on the African coast, with a view to the total suppression of the slave trade.

"It is with great delicacy that the committee have approached this subject; because they are aware that the remedy, which they have presumed to recommend to the consideration of the House, requires the exercise of a power of another Department of this Government, and that objections to the exercise of this power, in the mode here proposed, have hitherto existed in that Department.

"Your committee are confident, however, that these objections apply rather to a particular proposition for the exchange of the right of search than to that modification of it which presents itself to your committee. They contemplate the trial and condemnation of such American citizens as may be found engaged in this forbidden trade, not by mixed tribunals sitting in a foreign country, but by existing courts, of competent jurisdiction, in the United States; they propose the same disposition of the captured Africans now authorized by law; and least of all their detention in America.

"They contemplate an exchange of this right, which shall be in all respects reciprocal; an exchange, which, deriving its sole authority from treaty, would exclude the pretension, which no nation, however, has presumed to set up, that this right can be derived from the law of nations; and further, they have limited it, in their conception of its application, not only to certain latitudes and to a certain distance from the coast of Africa, but to a small number of vessels to be employed by each power, and to be previously designated. The visit and search thus restricted, it is believed, would insure the co-operation of one great maritime power in the proposed exchange, and guard it from the danger of abuse.

"Your committee cannot doubt that the people of America have the intelligence to distinguish between the right of searching a neutral on the high seas, in time of war, claimed by some belligerents, and that mutual, restricted, and peaceful concession by treaty suggested by your committee, and which is demanded in the name of suffering humanity."

Mr. Addington to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, May 16, 1824.

SIR: Nearly three weeks have now elapsed since I had the honor of making my first communication to you on the subject of the convention, concluded on the 13th of March last, between the British Government and the American envoy in London.

At that time, in pursuance of instructions conveyed to me from his Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs I made known to you the earnest desire of the British Government, that no time should be lost by that of the United States in proceeding to the ratification of that instrument, in order that it might be returned to England in time to have it submitted to Parliament prior to its prorogation, which was expected to take place at an early period.

I flattered myself, sir, that the wish thus anxiously expressed by me on behalf of his Majesty's Government would meet with a corresponding ardor on the part of all the authorities to whom it was addressed, especially considering that the project of the convention originated with this Government, at the instigation of the House of Representatives; and that his Majesty's ministers had not hesitated an instant to comply with the preliminary act desired by the President, of procuring the passage of a bill through Parliament denouncing as piracy by statute the African slave trade when exercised by British subjects.

This consideration, sir, necessarily precludes my entertaining a doubt as to the eventual ratification of the convention by this Government, and I, therefore, attribute the delay which has hitherto occurred to the pressure of other business which it would have been found inconvenient to postpone.

I think it my duty, however, to press once more and in the most earnest manner upon your attention the anxiety of the British Government on this subject. Of this anxiety, a most convincing proof may be found in the circumstance of an extra packet having been despatched by them for the sole purpose of conveying to this country the act of Parliament, declaring slave trade piracy, immediately after its passage through both Houses, in order that the want of that document might not oppose any obstacle to the sanction of the convention by this Government.

Perhaps, sir, you will allow me to add, that I now detain that same packet for the express purpose of reconveying the instrument in question, as soon as ratified, with utmost possible celerity to England.

I have the honor to be, with distinguished consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,
H. U. ADDINGTON.

ON COUNTERVAILING DUTIES AFFECTING THE COMMERCE AND TONNAGE BETWEEN GREAT BRITAIN AND THE UNITED STATES—DUTIES ON ROLLED IRON, ETC.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MAY 22, 1824.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom has been referred a resolution "instructing them to report to this House whether any law exists in contravention of the provisions of the convention of the 3d of July, 1815, made between this country and Great Britain; also to inquire into the expediency of countervailing by law any duties or port charges on American commerce and tonnage which Great Britain may lay thereon in her colonies or elsewhere," reported:

That, having bestowed on the first part of the resolution the consideration due to its importance, take leave to state to the House that no law has been passed by Congress which contravenes or violates any provision of the convention subsisting between the United States and Great Britain. They regret, however, to find that an opinion is entertained by the British Government that the act of Congress passed the 27th of April, 1816, entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," in imposing a higher duty on iron manufactured by rolling than on hammered iron, contravenes the provisions of that convention on the ground that the duty operates exclusively on iron manufactured by that mode in Great Britain. Were the facts on which this opinion rests established, the committee do not think they would, giving to the convention either a strict or liberal construction, warrant the inference.

From the views taken of this subject by the committee, they are much gratified in being relieved from the necessity of going into a long and elaborate argument on that point by stating that the facts set forth and relied on by the British Government to support the position taken by it will not enable it to maintain successfully that position, as will satisfactorily appear by reference to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 11th of February, 1824, stating the imports into and exports from the United States. That report informs the committee that iron manufactured by rolling is an import into the United States not only from Great Britain, but also from Sweden, Russia, and other countries. During the last fiscal year, ending the 30th of September, 1823, 27,700 cwt. of iron manufactured by rolling was imported from Sweden, and 2,003 cwt. from Russia, which iron was subjected to the payment of one dollar and fifty cents per hundred weight.

These facts, therefore, evidently and conclusively show that iron manufactured by rolling is not, according to the position taken by the British Government, a manufacture exclusively British. One among many reasons which influence Congress to impose a higher duty on rolled than on hammered iron was the inferiority of the former to the latter in use and quality. Mr. Stratford Canning, in his letter to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, November 26, 1821, says: "Any difference of use or quality resulting from the mode of manufacture may, indeed, constitute a fair ground of distinction; but there is every reason to believe that no such difference exists in the present instance." That a difference in use and quality does exist, which Mr. Canning admits to be a fair ground of distinction, is known to every blacksmith, and to every man who has used it. Every man of judgment gives the preference to hammered iron, because it is freer from dross or impurities than the rolled, and because, whatever articles are made of the former are not only better, but more durable. The allusion made by Mr. Canning to Mr. Whitney's saw gin, and his comparison of that machine to the machinery employed in rolling iron, is an ingenious effort to get over puzzling difficulty by attempting to make things similar which have in them nothing common to each other on which to found a similitude. It is known, and it not unfrequently happens, that the importance of the interest threatened to be attacked produces a solicitude for its security which often occasions its advocates, more zealous to preserve it from injury than judicious in their defence of it, to surrender unwarily the vantage ground. Aware of this, the committee have given to the suggestion or allusion of Mr. Canning all the consideration it merits, and have satisfied themselves, on investigating it, that it does not support him in the argument he founds on it. The machinery employed in rolling or manufacturing iron requires, to use it properly, expert and skilful workmen, disciplined in that business, and also the constant and vigilant attention of an intelligent superintendent to make that mode of manufacturing iron succeed. But Mr. Whitney's saw gin, how happy soever the invention may be, or how much credit soever it may reflect on his genius, is so simple in its construction, so easily worked and managed, that negroes in the Southern States are employed to work it, and the effect of its operation is not to produce a change in the use or quality of the cotton by that mode of separating the cotton from the seed; for, after the process is completed, the cotton is as much a raw material as iron ore is when taken from the mine.

The ports of the United States have been open generally to the introduction of British manufactures, before and since the convention, on principles of amity and liberality; and the committee are not a little surprised to find that the Government of the United States should be charged with giving to the convention an astuteness of construction incompatible with its provisions, especially when the ports of his Britannic Majesty in Europe are closed against the introduction of the staple articles of the Eastern and Middle States. Will the Government of Great Britain allow the importation into Great Britain of cotton and wool cards and cut nails, manufactures of the United States, on the ground that those articles are manufactured exclusively in the United States by machines the invention of ingenious citizens? Or does it allow, on any terms, the importation of those articles into Great Britain? The statutes of that kingdom will give the answer and the commentary. In short, on which side soever the committee look, they see the industry and enterprise of the citizens of the United States subjected by British policy to prohibitions or restrictions that are not retorted by the Government of the United States on the industry and enterprise of British subjects. From the views which the committee have taken of this subject, they cannot recommend to the House any alteration or modification of the act of Congress imposing a higher duty on iron manufactured by rolling than on that prepared by the hammer.

As to the second part of the resolution, the committee respectfully state that, although the commerce and navigation of these United States with the British West India islands experience many embarrassments, and are subjected to high duties and charges to which the commerce and navigation of those islands are not liable in the United States, yet the committee forbear at this time to recommend the adoption of any countervailing measure, as the points of difference in relation to this subject are in negotiation between the two Governments.

The committee, having performed the duty assigned them, respectfully submit to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution referred to them.

WASHINGTON, November 25, 1822.

SIR: The approach of another session of Congress induces me to remind you of the correspondence which I had the honor of addressing to you last year, by the express commands of my Government, on the subject of the unequal duties levied on rolled and hammered iron, according to the tariff which is now in force. Being aware that the correspondence in question has been communicated officially to Congress, and that the consideration of it by that assembly has been deferred only in consequence of the great pressure of business at the close of the last session, I confine myself at present to requesting your good offices that, as far as depends upon the Executive Government, this matter may be brought, in the course of the ensuing session, to a just and satisfactory conclusion.

I beg, sir, that you will accept the assurance of my perfect consideration.

STRATFORD CANNING.

Hon. JOHN Q. ADAMS, &c.

WASHINGTON, March 17, 1823.

SIR: Not having the honor to hear from you during the late session of Congress, or since its close, respecting the equalization of the duties on British rolled and hammered iron imported into the United States, on which subject I have frequently had occasion to address you, it becomes my duty to request a communication of the intentions of the American Government on this point, for the information of his Majesty's ministers. The message which was sent down to Congress last year by the President of the United States, together with the correspondence relative to the duties on rolled and hammered iron, afforded a reasonable expectation that the many strong facts and arguments repeatedly urged against the existing discrimination in the duties on those articles had at length produced their just effect, and that the American Legislature would hasten to pass an act for placing the duties in question on a footing consistent with a fair and equitable construction of the commercial treaty.

In ignorance of the circumstances, if any, which may have prevented this expectation from being realized, I cannot but hope, sir, that your occupations will admit of my being honored with an early answer to this letter.

I avail myself of the opportunity to repeat to you the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

STRATFORD CANNING.

WASHINGTON, November 20, 1823.

SIR: It is now seven years since, in pursuance of instructions from his Majesty's Secretary of State, the first representation was submitted by the British minister, resident in this capital, to the Government of the United States, against the unequal and unjust duties laid on British rolled iron imported into the United States.

Since that time the subject has been repeatedly brought under their consideration, as well as under that of the supreme legislative body.

It has been presented in so many lights, and all the arguments in support of the claim advanced by the British traders to be exonerated from those duties have been so often and so unanswerably pressed, that it would be presumption in me to attempt to add anything in support of a cause advocated by persons so much more capable by their weight and ability of doing justice to it than myself.

I feel, therefore, sir, that, as far as regards the discussion of the merits of the question, I cannot do better than refer you to Mr. Stratford Canning's letter to yourself, dated November 26, 1821, in which the subject is handled with a clearness and soundness of logic difficult to surpass, and which must carry conviction to every candid and unprejudiced mind.

Setting aside, then, all further argumentation of the question, I shall content myself with appealing, which I do with confidence, to the feelings of integrity and justice which animate the Government of this country, for the exertion of its powerful influence with the Legislature, in order to procure the revision of an act passed under an erroneous impression, or rather total misapprehension of the subject.

That act is manifestly contrary to the spirit, indeed to the letter of the convention, concluded in 1815, between Great Britain and the United States, in which it is stipulated, that like duties shall be reciprocally leviable upon like articles. No mention is therein made of the specific mode of manufacturing those articles.

By imposing an extra duty on rolled iron, between which and that produced by hammering it is now proved that, if there exist any difference in quality, that difference is in favor of the former, a shackle is placed on the hands of genius and invention, and a premium offered for the discouragement of science. But surely, sir, this war against useful invention and improvement is altogether unworthy of a nation distinguished by its love of novelty, by its rapid progress in the arts, and by the native vigor and inventiveness of mind of its inhabitants.

If Great Britain, instead of allowing in her own markets to the manufactures of the United States a fair and free competition with those of other nations, were, by a forced construction of the terms of her conventions, to burden with oppressive duties such of the articles of the former as, being the produce of the creative talents of their citizens, evinced in the superiority of their machinery, enjoy thereby an advantage over "the like" wares of other countries, would she not render herself justly obnoxious to the imputation of injustice, and illiberality? And yet, sir, this is but the course which the United States have adopted with regard to the iron manufactures of Great Britain.

But I am persuaded that this course is not accordant with the genuine feelings of the country; that the duties in question were originally imposed by Congress under a misapprehension of the real merits of the case; that those merits being once well known and duly appreciated, as they must now be, the appeal made to the candor of a body so distinguished by integrity and liberality of sentiment as the Congress of the United States will not be urged in vain; and that the inventive genius of Great Britain will be allowed to secure to her manufacturers those honest profits to which they are so justly entitled.

I have only to add, sir, the expression of my hope that you will lose no time in submitting to Congress, as shortly after its convocation as may be expedient, the application now made in behalf of the British iron merchants, and that you will lend it the powerful aid of a recommendation from the Government that the subject may be taken by that body into their immediate consideration.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,
H. U. ADDINGTON.

HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State, &c., &c.

WASHINGTON, March 4, 1824.

SIR: I take the liberty of calling your attention to a letter which I had occasion to address to you on the 20th of November last, (to which I have not as yet had the honor of receiving an answer,) in which I requested the interposition of the Executive Government with the House of Congress, for the purpose of procuring an equalization of the duties on British iron.

In a conversation which, posterior to the date of that letter, I had the honor of holding with you, I received an assurance, that although no step in furtherance of the above object had at that time been taken by the Government, yet, as soon as the question of the tariff should be brought under the consideration of the Legislature, my wishes should be attended to.

It was with no small mortification that I learnt yesterday that the subject of the duties on iron had been already brought to an issue unfavorable to the just demands of the British Government; and that, without any formal intervention in favor of those demands having taken place on the part of this Government with the House of Representatives. I have also been assured that, had such an intervention taken place at the proper time, the point desired would, in all probability, have been carried.

I have now, therefore, the honor of addressing you once more upon this subject, and of submitting a request, in the name of his Majesty's Government, that the President will be pleased to recommend to the Senate the consideration of this matter, in order that, according to the express terms of the commercial treaties existing between the two countries, the iron manufactures of Great Britain may be placed upon a footing of strict equality with those of the nations which, in the existing state of things, enjoy an undue advantage over the former.

I have the honor to be, with distinguished consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,
H. U. ADDINGTON.

HON. JOHN Q. ADAMS, &c., &c.

WASHINGTON, May 5, 1824.

SIR: Agreeably to your desire, as expressed to me yesterday, I have the honor to transmit to you, herewith, the copy of a despatch which I have recently received from his Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, relative to the unequal duties levied in this country upon rolled iron, the manufacture of Great Britain.

In this despatch you will perceive, sir, that I am instructed to press this subject once more, and in the most earnest manner, upon the attention of the American Government, and to represent to them that, in case a claim founded upon the clearest grounds of right and equity be still disregarded by the Legislature of the United States, it must become a question for the consideration of his Majesty's Government whether, in justice to the interest of Great Britain, it may not be expedient to act upon the principles laid down by the United States themselves, by considering their cotton, which stands in precisely the same relation to that of other countries as the iron of Great Britain to foreign iron as a manufactured article, and subjecting it, as such, to a higher rate of duty than is charged on other cotton which has not been cleansed by machinery.

I trust, sir, that the Legislature of the United States, by candidly admitting the validity of the claim advanced by Great Britain, will spare his Majesty's Government the pain of taking a measure which, however just, would not be resorted to by them without unfeigned reluctance, and as a step called for by an imperious sense of justice to the interests of his Majesty's subjects.

The equalization of duties desired by the British Government is of comparatively trifling importance to this country, but of very serious moment to the interests of Great Britain, inasmuch as those duties directly affect one of her staple commodities; and surely, sir, it were much to be regretted that, by persevering in a course by which, independent of its injustice, the United States in general are so little benefitted, the Legislature of this country should hazard any diminution of the friendly feelings and good correspondence which subsist between the two nations, by forcing Great Britain (for it would be a matter of positive compulsion) into the adoption of measures which, however undeniably equitable, might yet tend to create in the United States sentiments of a character opposite to those which at present so happily animate both people in their relations with each other, and which it is the earnest desire of his Majesty's Government to perpetuate by every legitimate means.

I have the honor to be, with distinguished consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,
H. U. ADDINGTON.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Addington.

FOREIGN OFFICE, March 13, 1824.

Sir: In consequence of renewed applications from the persons engaged in the iron trade of this kingdom, his Majesty's Government have again had under their consideration the difference of duty levied in the United States on rolled and hammered iron the produce of Great Britain.

The British Government had hoped that the message sent by the President of the United States to the Congress in the year 1822, and the very strong facts and arguments repeatedly used by Sir Charles Bagot and Mr. Stratford Canning, during their several missions in America, against the existing discrimination in the duties on these articles, would have produced their just effect; but as this, unfortunately, does not appear to have been the case, I have to instruct you to bring this business again before the American Government, and to represent to them the injury to which the iron trade of this country continues to be exposed by this measure, and the injustice of withholding that relief to which they, in effect, admitted our claim by the message of the President above referred to.

You will observe, that, if the principle which appears to have led the Congress to delay the repeal of this discriminating duty were admitted, it might with equal justice be applied by his Majesty's Government to the article of American cotton, imported into this country, as compared with that brought from the East Indies or South America; for the cotton of the United States, being cleaned and separated from the seeds and husks by a process requiring the aid of machinery, becomes, (if this principle is to be acted upon to its fullest extent,) by parity of reasoning, as much, in truth, as the rolled iron, a manufactured article, when compared with the cotton of the other countries above mentioned; this last article being imported nearly in the state in which it is gathered, without undergoing any process for the purpose of cleaning or separating it from the seeds, &c.

In pressing, therefore, the American Government to come to a conclusion on this subject, in conformity with the repeated representations addressed to them from hence, I have to request that, in addition to the very able reasoning contained in the notes of your predecessor to the American Government, of the 31st March and the 26th November, 1821, on this subject, you will urge this argument also, and that you will apprise them that if, contrary to our just expectation, the existing inequality of duty on rolled and hammered iron be not removed, it must become a question for the consideration of his Majesty's Government whether, in justice to the interests of this country, it may not be expedient to act on the principle laid down by the United States themselves, by considering their cotton as a manufactured article, and subjecting it, as such, to a higher rate of duty than is charged on other cotton which has not been cleaned by machinery.

I am, &c.,

GEORGE CANNING.

No. 376.

[1ST SESSION.

SPOILIATIONS BY FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MAY 24, 1824.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, on the several petitions of Archibald Gracie, Ezra Davis, Matthew, Thomas S. and Levinus Clarkson, William Gray, and others, of the merchants and insurance companies of Philadelphia, of the merchants and underwriters of Baltimore, referred to them by the House, reported:

That the petitioners ask the intervention of Congress for the recovery of their just claims against France for spoliations committed and property seized or destroyed under different pretexts since the year 1806. These claims are alluded to by the President in his message at the opening of the present session of Congress as resting upon the same principle with other claims which have been admitted by the French Government, and are the subject of the correspondence of the minister of the United States with the French Government, communicated to the House of Representatives on the 5th of February last. To this correspondence the attention of the House is invited for a full and fair understanding of the claims of the present petitioners and of the other citizens of the United States having similar demands against France, but who have not joined in this application for redress.

The committee have seen with surprise that, although the attention of the present Government of France was especially invited to this subject in 1816, and has been repeatedly recalled to it since that time, France has not yet thought proper to enter upon the discussion of it. No other answers have yet been given to various official communications of the minister of the United States than those required by the mere obligations of international courtesy.

The committee are of opinion that measures ought to be taken to impress upon France the necessity of an early and definite adjustment of this subject, and they would offer such measures to the consideration of the House if the hope was not entertained that the Government of France would be found, during the ensuing summer, prepared to investigate it.

The committee are confident that a fair examination, entered into with a disposition to do full justice, will be followed by an arrangement satisfactory to all parties.

The claims of our citizens may be divided into four classes:

1. For property sequestered.

2. For property condemned, regularly, under the Berlin and Milan decrees.
3. For property irregularly condemned under the same decrees, including that condemned by imperial mandate without the intervention of any judicial tribunal.
4. For property burnt or destroyed at sea; a portion of it after the decrees authorizing such destruction had been repealed.

The first class includes, in addition to other property not acted upon by the judicial tribunals, the seizures at Antwerp in 1807, at St. Sebastian in 1809-'10, in Holland in 1810, under a secret article of the treaty incorporating Holland with France. The right of the claimants to an immediate and full indemnity for all property sequestered and never condemned cannot be plausibly contested. It was put under sequestration by an imperial decree, on suspicion that it was English property, merely to give time to ascertain whether it was English or not. That it was not English is now well known to the Government of France. Had it been English it must have been given up or paid for under the 4th article of the additional articles of the treaty of the 30th of May, 1814, between that power and Great Britain. By that article the parties stipulate to release all property put under sequestration since 1792. If the property of our citizens seized at Antwerp, St. Sebastian, and in Holland, had been what it was, without the shadow of reason, alleged to be, payment would be due for it to English owners. A singular spectacle will be exhibited if payment is denied when the motive for the seizure is shown to have been false, or should any doctrine of France place the property of a neutral in a worse situation than if it had belonged, as was suspected, to an enemy. Such doctrine cannot be advanced by France unless she intends to instruct other powers that, in all future wars in which she may be engaged with a formidable rival, it will be more prudent to be her enemy than her friend.

Nor can the committee anticipate any grounds upon which a decision unfavorable to the other claims embraced in the other three enumerated classes can be justly made, resting as they obviously do upon the immutable bases of justice and national law.

A due regard to those relations of amity that have ever united this Government with France, to the stipulations of her treaty with us, to her character for liberal justice to foreign claimants, will doubtless induce the Government of that country to adjust those claims whenever they are fairly considered.

Under the hope and expectation that attention will be given to this interesting subject by France, prior to the next session of Congress, the committee, without asking to be discharged from the further consideration of the several petitions referred to them, recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the House at the next session, as early as the public interest will permit, the correspondence which may be held with the Government of France, prior to that time, on the subject of injuries sustained by citizens of the United States since the year 1806.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE SESSION.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS DECEMBER 7, 1824.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

The view which I have now to present to you of our affairs, foreign and domestic, realizes the most sanguine anticipations which have been entertained of the public prosperity. If we look to the whole, our growth as a nation continues to be rapid beyond example; if to the States which compose it, the same gratifying spectacle is exhibited. Our expansion over the vast territory within our limits has been great, without indicating any decline in those sections from which the emigration has been most conspicuous. We have daily gained strength by a native population in every quarter—a population devoted to our happy system of Government, and cherishing the bond of union with fraternal affection. Experience has already shown that the difference of climate and of industry proceeding from that cause, inseparable from such vast domains, and which under other systems might have a repulsive tendency, cannot fail to produce with us, under wise regulations, the opposite effect. What one portion wants the other may supply, and this will be most sensibly felt by the parts most distant from each other, forming thereby a domestic market and an active intercourse between the extremes and throughout every portion of our Union. Thus, by a happy distribution of power between the national and State Governments, Governments which rest exclusively on the sovereignty of the people and are fully adequate to the great purposes for which they were respectively instituted, causes which might otherwise lead to dismemberment operate powerfully to draw us closer together. In every other circumstance a correct view of the actual state of our Union must be equally gratifying to our constituents. Our relations with foreign powers are of a friendly character, although certain interesting differences remain unsettled with some. Our revenue, under the mild system of impost and tonnage, continues to be adequate to all the purposes of the Government. Our agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and navigation flourish. Our fortifications are advancing in the degree authorized by existing appropriations to maturity, and due progress is made in the augmentation of the Navy to the limit prescribed for it by law. For these blessings, we owe to Almighty God, from whom we derive them, and with profound reverence, our most grateful and unceasing acknowledgments.

In adverting to our relations with foreign powers, which are always an object of the highest importance, I have to remark, that, of the subjects which have been brought into discussion with them during the present administration, some have been satisfactorily terminated; others have been suspended, to be resumed hereafter under circumstances more favorable to success; and others are still in negotiation, with the hope that they may be adjusted with mutual accommodation to the interests and to the satisfaction of the respective parties. It has been the invariable object of this Government to cherish the most friendly relations with every power, and on principles and conditions which might make them permanent. A systematic effort has been made to place our commerce with each power on a footing of perfect reciprocity, to settle with each in a spirit of candor and liberality all existing differences, and to anticipate and remove, so far as might be practicable, all causes of future variance.

It having been stipulated by the 7th article of the convention of navigation and commerce, which was concluded on the twenty-fourth of June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, between the United States and France, that the said convention should continue in force for two years from the first of October of that year, and for an indefinite term afterwards, unless one of the parties should declare its intention to renounce it, in which event it should cease to operate at the end of six months from such declaration; and no such intention having been announced, the convention having been found advantageous to both parties, it has since remained, and still remains in force. At the time when that convention was concluded many interesting subjects were left unsettled, and particularly our claim to indemnity for spoliations which were committed on our commerce in the late wars. For these interests and claims it was in the contemplation of the parties to make provision at a subsequent day by a more comprehensive and definitive treaty. The object has been duly attended to since by the Executive, but as yet it has not been accomplished. It is hoped that a favorable opportunity will present itself for opening a negotiation which may embrace and arrange all existing differences, and every other concern in which they have a common interest, upon the accession of the present King of France, an event which has occurred since the close of the last session of Congress.

With Great Britain our commercial intercourse rests on the same footing that it did at the last session. By the convention of one thousand eight hundred and fifteen the commerce between the United States and the British dominions in Europe and the East Indies was arranged on a principle of reciprocity. That convention was confirmed and continued in force, with slight exceptions, by a subsequent treaty for the term of ten years from the twentieth of October, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, the date of the latter. The trade with the British colonies in the West Indies has not as yet been arranged by treaty, or otherwise, to our satisfaction. An approach to that result has been made by legislative acts, whereby many serious impediments which had been raised by the parties in defence of their respective claims were removed. An earnest desire exists, and has been manifested on the part of this Government, to place the commerce with the colonies likewise on a footing of reciprocal advantage, and it is hoped the British Government, seeing the justice of the proposal and its importance to the colonies, will ere long accede to it.

The Commissioners who were appointed for the adjustment of the boundary between the Territories of the United States and those of Great Britain, specified in the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, having disagreed in their decision, and both Governments having agreed to establish that boundary by amicable negotiation between them, it is hoped that it may be satisfactorily adjusted in that mode. The boundary specified by the sixth article has been established by the decision of the Commissioners. From the progress made in that provided for by the seventh, according to a report recently received, there is good cause to presume that it will be settled in the course of the ensuing year.

It is a cause of serious regret that no arrangement has yet been finally concluded between the two Governments to secure, by joint co-operation, the suppression of the slave trade. It was the object of the British Government, in the early stages of the negotiation, to adopt a plan for the suppression which should include the concession of the mutual right of search by the ships-of-war of each party of the vessels of the other for suspected offenders. This was objected to by this Government, on the principle that, as the right of search was a right of war of a belligerent towards a neutral power, it might have an ill effect to extend it by treaty, to an offence which had been made comparatively mild, to a time of peace. Anxious, however, for the suppression of this trade, it was thought advisable, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, founded on an act of Congress, to propose to the British Government an expedient which should be free from that objection, and more effectual for the object, by making it piratical. In that mode the enormity of the crime would place the offenders out of the protection of their Government, and involve no question of search, or other question, between the parties, touching their respective rights. It was believed, also, that it would completely suppress the trade in the vessels of both parties, and, by their respective citizens and subjects, in those of other powers with whom, it was hoped, that the odium which would thereby be attached to it would produce a corresponding arrangement, and, by means thereof, its entire extirpation forever. A convention to this effect was concluded and signed in London, on the thirteenth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, by plenipotentiaries duly authorized by both Governments, to the ratification of which, certain obstacles have arisen which are not yet entirely removed. The difference between the parties still remaining has been reduced to a point not of sufficient magnitude, as is presumed, to be permitted to defeat an object so near to the heart of both nations, and so desirable to the friends of humanity throughout the world. As objections, however, to the principle recommended by the House of Representatives, or at least to the consequences inseparable from it, and which are understood to apply to the law, have been raised, which may deserve a reconsideration of the whole subject, I have thought it proper to suspend the conclusion of a new convention until the definitive sentiments of Congress may be ascertained. The documents relating to the negotiation are, with that intent, submitted to your consideration.

Our commerce with Sweden has been placed on a footing of perfect reciprocity by treaty, and with Russia, the Netherlands, Prussia, the free Hanseatic Cities, the Dukedoms of Oldenburg and Sardinia, by internal regulations on each side, founded on mutual agreement between the respective Governments.

The principles upon which the commercial policy of the United States is founded are to be traced to an early period. They are essentially connected with those upon which their independence was declared, and owe their origin to the enlightened men who took the lead in our affairs at that important epoch. They are developed in their first treaty of commerce with France of sixth of February, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, and by a formal commission which was instituted immediately after the conclusion of their revolutionary struggle for the purpose of negotiating treaties of commerce with every European power. The first treaty of the United States with Prussia, which was negotiated by that commission, affords a signal illustration of those principles. The act of Congress of the third March, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, adopted immediately after the return of a general peace, was a new overture to foreign nations to establish our commercial relations with them on the basis of free and equal reciprocity. That principle has pervaded all the acts of Congress and all the negotiations of the Executive on the subject since.

A convention for the settlement of important questions in relation to the Northwest Coast of this continent, and its adjoining seas, was concluded and signed at St. Petersburg, on the fifth day of April last, by the minister plenipotentiary of the United States and plenipotentiaries of the Imperial Government of Russia. It will immediately be laid before the Senate for the exercise of the constitutional authority of that body with reference to its ratification. It is proper to add, that the manner in which this negotiation was invited and conducted on the part of the Emperor has been very satisfactory.

The great and extraordinary changes which have happened in the Governments of Spain and Portugal within the last two years, without seriously affecting the friendly relations which, under all of them, have been maintained with those powers by the United States, have been obstacles to the adjustment of the particular subjects of discussion which have arisen with each. A resolution of the Senate, adopted at their last session, called for information as to the effect produced upon our relations with Spain by the recognition, on the part of the United States, of the independent South American Governments. The papers containing that information are now communicated to Congress.

A chargé d'affaires has been received from the independent Government of Brazil. That country heretofore a colonial possession of Portugal, had, some years since, been proclaimed by the sovereign of Portugal himself an independent kingdom. Since his return to Lisbon a revolution in Brazil has established a new Government there, with an Imperial title, at the head of which is placed the prince, in whom the Regency had been vested by the King at the time of his departure. There is reason to expect that, by amicable negotiation, the independence of Brazil will ere long be recognized by Portugal herself.

With the remaining powers of Europe, with those on the coast of Barbary, and with all the new South American States, our relations are of a friendly character. We have ministers plenipotentiary residing with the Republics of Colombia and Chili, and have received ministers of the same rank from Colombia, Guatemala, Buenos Ayres, and Mexico. Our commercial relations with all those States are mutually beneficial and increasing. With the Republic of Colombia a treaty of commerce has been formed, of which a copy is received, and the original daily expected. A negotiation for a like treaty would have been commenced with Buenos Ayres, had it not been prevented by the indisposition and lamented decease of Mr. Rodney, our minister there, and to whose memory the most respectful attention has been shown by the Government of that Republic. An advantageous alteration in our treaty with Tunis has been obtained by our Consular Agent residing there, the official document of which, when received, will be laid before the Senate.

The attention of the Government has been drawn with great solicitude to other subjects, and particularly to that relating to a state of maritime war, involving the relative rights of neutral and belligerent in such wars. Most of the difficulties which we have experienced, and of the losses which we have sustained since the establishment of our independence, have proceeded from the unsettled state of those rights, and the extent to which the belligerent claim has been carried against the neutral party. It is impossible to look back on the occurrences of the late wars in Europe, and to behold the disregard which was paid to our rights as a neutral power, and the waste which was made of our commerce by the parties to those wars by various acts of their respective Governments, and under the pretext by each that the other had set the example, without great mortification, and a fixed purpose never to submit to the like in future. An attempt to remove those causes of possible variance by friendly negotiation and on just principles, which should be applicable to all parties, could, it was presumed, be viewed by none other than as a proof of an earnest desire to preserve those relations with every power. In the late war between France and Spain, a crisis occurred, in which it seemed probable that all the controvertible principles involved in such wars might be brought into discussion, and settled to the satisfaction of all parties. Propositions having this object in view have been made to the Governments of Great Britain, France, Russia, and of other powers, which have been received in a friendly manner by all, but as yet no treaty has been formed with either for its accomplishment. The policy will, it is presumed, be persevered in, and in the hope that it may be successful.

It will always be recollected that with one of the parties to those wars, and from whom we received those injuries, we sought redress by war. From the other, by whose then reigning Government our vessels were seized in port as well as at sea, and their cargoes confiscated, indemnity has been expected, but has not yet been rendered. It was under the influence of the latter that our vessels were likewise seized by the Governments of Spain, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, and Naples, and from whom indemnity has been claimed and is still expected, with the exception of Spain, by whom it has been rendered. With both parties we had abundant cause of war, but we had no alternative but to resist that which was most powerful at sea and pressed us nearest at home. With this all differences were settled by a treaty founded on conditions fair and honorable to both, and which has been so far executed with perfect good faith. It has been earnestly hoped that the other would, of its own accord, and from a sentiment of justice and conciliation, make to our citizens the indemnity to which they are entitled, and thereby remove from our relations any just cause of discontent on our side.

It is estimated that the receipts into the Treasury during the current year, exclusive of loans, will exceed eighteen million five hundred thousand dollars, which, with the sum remaining in the Treasury at the end of the last year, amounting to nine million four hundred and sixty-three thousand nine hundred and twenty-two dollars and eighty-one cents, will, after discharging the current disbursements of the year, the interest on the public debt, and upwards of eleven million six hundred and thirty-three thousand dollars of the principal, leave a balance of more than three million dollars in the Treasury on the 1st day of January next.

A larger amount of the debt contracted during the late war, bearing an interest of six per cent., becoming redeemable in the course of the ensuing year than could be discharged by the ordinary revenue, the act of the 26th of May authorized a loan of five million dollars, at four and a half per cent., to meet the same. By this arrangement an annual saving will accrue to the public of seventy-five thousand dollars.

Under the act of the 24th of May last a loan of five million dollars was authorized, in order to meet the awards under the Florida treaty, which was negotiated at par with the Bank of the United States at four and a half per cent., the limit of interest fixed by the act. By this provision the claims of our citizens who had sustained so great a loss by spoliations, and from whom indemnity had been so long withheld, were promptly paid. For these advances the public will be amply repaid, at no distant day, by the sale of the lands in Florida. Of the great advantage resulting from the acquisition of the territory in other respects too high an estimate cannot be formed.

It is estimated that the receipts into the Treasury during the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five will be sufficient to meet the disbursements of the year, including the sum of ten million dollars, which is annually appropriated, by the act constituting the Sinking Fund, to the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt.

The whole amount of the public debt on the first of January next may be estimated at eighty-six million dollars, inclusive of two millions five hundred thousand dollars of the loan authorized by the act of the twenty-sixth of May last. In this estimate is included a stock of seven million dollars issued for the purchase of that amount of the capital stock of the Bank of the United States, and which, as the stock of the Bank still held by the Government will at least be fully equal to its reimbursement, ought not to be considered as constituting a part of the public debt. Estimating, then, the whole amount of the public debt at seventy-nine million dollars, and regarding the annual receipts and expenditures of the Government, a well-founded hope may be entertained that, should no unexpected event occur, the whole public debt may be discharged in the course of ten years, and the Government be left at liberty thereafter to apply such portion of the revenue as may not be necessary for current expenses to such other objects as may be most conducive to the public security and welfare. That the sum applicable to these objects will be very considerable may be fairly concluded when it is recollected that a large amount of the public revenue has been applied since the late war to the construction of the public buildings in this city; to the erection of fortifications along the coast, and of arsenals in different parts of the Union; to the augmentation of the Navy; to the extinguishment of the Indian title to large tracts of fertile territory; to the acquisition of Florida; to pensions to revolutionary officers and soldiers, and to invalids of the late war. On many of these objects the expense will annually be diminished, and cease at no distant period on most of them. On the first of January, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, the public debt amounted to one hundred and twenty-three million four hundred and ninety-one thousand nine hundred and sixty-five dollars and sixteen cents; and notwithstanding the large sums which have been applied to these objects, it has been reduced since that period thirty-seven million four hundred and forty-six thousand nine hundred and sixty-one dollars and seventy-eight cents. The last portion of the public debt will be redeemable on the first of January, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five; and while there is the best reason to believe that the resources of the Government will be continually adequate to such portions of it as may become due in the interval, it is recommended to Congress to seize every opportunity which may present itself to reduce the rate of interest on every part thereof. The high state of the public credit and the great abundance of money are at this time very favorable to such a result. It must be very gratifying to our fellow-citizens to witness this flourishing state of the public finances, when it is recollected that no burden whatever is imposed upon them.

The military establishment in all its branches, in the performance of the various duties assigned to each, justifies the favorable view which was presented of the efficiency of its organization at the last session. All the appropriations have been regularly applied to the objects intended by Congress; and, so far as the disbursements have been made, the accounts have been rendered and settled without loss to the public. The condition of the Army itself, as relates to the officers and men in science and discipline, is highly respectable. The Military Academy, on which the Army essentially rests, and to which it is much indebted for this state of improvement, has attained, in comparison with any other institution of a like kind, a high degree of perfection. Experience, however, has shown that the dispersed condition of the corps of artillery is unfavorable to the discipline of that important branch of the military establishment. To remedy this inconvenience eleven companies have been assembled at the fortification erected at Old Point Comfort, as a school for artillery instruction, with intention, as they shall be perfected in the various duties of that service, to order them to other posts, and to supply their places with other companies for instruction in like manner. In this mode a complete knowledge of the science and duties of this arm will be extended throughout the whole corps of artillery. But to carry this object fully into effect will require the aid of Congress, to obtain which the subject is now submitted to your consideration.

Of the progress which has been made in the construction of fortifications for the permanent defence of our maritime frontier, according to the plan decided on and to the extent of the existing appropriations, the report of the Secretary of War, which is herewith communicated, will give a detailed account. Their final completion cannot fail to give great additional security to that frontier, and to diminish, proportionably, the expense of defending it in the event of war.

The provisions in the several acts of Congress of the last session for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi and the Ohio, of the harbor of Presque Isle, on Lake Erie, and the repair of the Plymouth beach, are in the course of regular execution, and there is reason to believe that the appropriation, in each instance, will be adequate to the object. To carry these improvements fully into effect, the superintendence of them has been assigned to officers of the Corps of Engineers.

Under the act of thirtieth April last, authorizing the President to cause a survey to be made, with the necessary plans and estimates, of such roads and canals as he might deem of national importance in a commercial or military point of view, or for the transportation of the mail, a Board has been instituted, consisting of two distinguished officers of the Corps of Engineers and a distinguished civil engineer, with assistants, who have been actively employed in carrying into effect the object of the act. They have carefully examined the route between the Potomac and the Ohio rivers; between the latter and Lake Erie; between the Alleghany and the Susquehanna, and the routes between the Delaware and the Raritan, Barnstable and Buzzard's bay, and between Boston harbor and Narraganset bay. Such portion of the Corps of Topographical Engineers as could be spared from the survey of the coast has been employed in surveying the very important route between the Potomac and the Ohio. Considerable progress has been made in it, but the survey cannot be completed until the next season. It is gratifying to add, from the view already taken, that there is good cause to believe that this great national object may be fully accomplished.

It is contemplated to commence early in the next season the execution of the other branch of the act, that which relates to roads, and with the survey of a route from this city, through the Southern States, to New Orleans, the importance of which cannot be too highly estimated. All the officers of both the Corps of Engineers who could be spared from other services have been employed in exploring and surveying the routes for canals. To digest a plan for both objects, for the great purposes specified, will require a thorough knowledge of every part of our Union, and of the relation of each part to the others, and of all to the seat of the General Government. For such a digest it will be necessary that the information be full, minute, and precise. With a view to these important objects, I submit to the consideration of Congress the propriety of enlarging both the Corps of Engineers, the military and topographical. It need scarcely be remarked, that the more extensively these corps are engaged in the improvement of their country, in the execution of the powers of Congress, and in aid of the States in such improvements as lie beyond that limit, when such aid is desired, the happier the effect will be in many views of which the subject is susceptible. By profiting of their science, the works will always be well executed; and, by giving to the officers such employment, our Union will derive all the advantage, in peace as well as in war, from their talents and services, which they can afford. In this mode, also, the military will be incorporated with the civil, and unfounded and injurious distinctions and prejudices of every kind be done away. To the corps themselves, this service cannot fail to be equally useful, since, by the knowledge they would thus acquire, they would be eminently better qualified, in the event of war, for the great purposes for which they were instituted.

Our relations with the Indian tribes within our limits have not been materially changed during the year. The hostile disposition evinced by certain tribes on the Missouri during the last year still continues, and has extended in some degree to those on the Upper Mississippi and the upper lakes. Several parties of our citizens have been plundered and murdered by those tribes. In order to establish relations of friendship with them, Congress at the last session made an appropriation for treaties with them, and for the employment of a suitable military escort to accompany and attend the Commissioners at the places appointed for the negotiations. This object has not been effected. The season was too far advanced when the appropriation was made, and the distance too great to permit it, but measures have been taken, and all the preparations will be completed, to accomplish it at an early period in the next season.

Believing that the hostility of the tribes, particularly on the Upper Mississippi and the lakes, is in no small degree owing to the wars which are carried on between the tribes residing in that quarter, measures have been taken to bring about a general peace among them, which, if successful, will not only tend to the security of our citizens, but be of great advantage to the Indians themselves.

With the exception of the tribes referred to, our relations with all the others are on the same friendly footing, and it affords me great satisfaction to add, that they are making steady advances in civilization and the improvement of their condition. Many of the tribes have already made great progress in the arts of civilized life. This desirable result has been brought about by the humane and persevering policy of the Government, and particularly by means of the appropriation for the civilization of the Indians. There have been established under the provisions of this act thirty-two schools, containing nine hundred and sixteen scholars, who are well instructed in several branches of literature, and likewise in agriculture and the ordinary arts of life.

Under the appropriation to authorize treaties with the Creeks and Quapaw Indians, Commissioners have been appointed, and negotiations are now pending, but the result is not yet known.

For more full information respecting the principle which has been adopted for carrying into effect the act of Congress authorizing surveys, with plans and estimates for canals and roads, and on every other branch of duty incident to the Department of War, I refer you to the report of the Secretary.

The squadron in the Mediterranean has been maintained in the extent which was proposed in the report of the Secretary of the Navy of the last year, and has afforded to our commerce the necessary protection in that sea. Apprehending, however, that the unfriendly relations which have existed between Algiers and some of the powers of Europe might be extended to us, it has been thought expedient to augment the force there, and, in consequence, the "North Carolina," a ship of the line, has been prepared, and will sail in a few days to join it.

The force employed in the Gulf of Mexico and in the neighboring seas for the suppression of piracy has likewise been preserved essentially in the state in which it was during the last year. A persevering effort has been made for the accomplishment of that object, and much protection has thereby been afforded to our commerce; but still the practice is far from being suppressed. From every view which has been taken of the subject, it is thought that it will be necessary rather to augment than to diminish our force in that quarter. There is reason to believe that the piracies now complained of are committed by bands of robbers who inhabit the land, and who, by preserving good intelligence with the towns, and seizing favorable opportunities, rush forth and fall on unprotected merchant vessels, of which they make an easy prey. The pillage thus taken they carry to their lurking places and dispose of afterwards at prices tending to seduce the neighboring population. This combination is understood to be of great extent, and is the more to be deprecated because the crime of piracy is often attended with the murder of the crews, these robbers knowing, if any survived, their lurking places would be exposed and they be caught and punished. That this atrocious practice should be carried to such extent is cause of equal surprise and regret. It is presumed that it must be attributed to the relaxed and feeble state of the local Governments, since it is not doubted, from the high character of the Governor of Cuba, who is well known and much respected here, that if he had the power he would promptly suppress it. Whether those robbers should be pursued on the land, the local authorities be made responsible for these atrocities, or any other measure be resorted to to suppress them, is submitted to the consideration of Congress.

In execution of the laws for the suppression of the slave trade, a vessel has been occasionally sent from that squadron to the coast of Africa, with orders to return thence by the usual track of the slave ships, and to seize any of our vessels which might be engaged in that trade. None have been found, and it is believed that none are thus employed. It is well known, however, that the trade still exists under other flags.

The health of our squadron while at Thompson's island has been much better during the present than it was the last season. Some improvements have been made and others are contemplated there which, it is believed, will have a very salutary effect.

On the Pacific our commerce has much increased, and on that coast as well as on that sea the United States have many important interests which require attention and protection. It is thought that all the considerations which suggested the expediency of placing a squadron on that sea operate with augmented force for maintaining it there, at least in equal extent.

For detailed information respecting the state of our maritime force on each sea, the improvement necessary to be made on either, in the organization of the naval establishment generally, and of the laws for its better government, I refer you to the report of the Secretary of the Navy, which is herewith communicated.

The revenue of the Post Office Department has received a considerable augmentation in the present year. The current receipts will exceed the expenditures, although the transportation of the mail within the year has been much increased. A report of the Postmaster General, which is transmitted, will furnish in detail the necessary information respecting the administration and present state of this Department.

In conformity with a resolution of Congress of the last session, an invitation was given to General Lafayette to visit the United States, with an assurance that a ship-of-war should attend at any port of France which he might designate, to receive and convey him across the Atlantic, whenever it might be convenient for him to sail. He declined the offer of the public ship from motives of delicacy, but assured me that he had long intended and would certainly visit our Union in the course of the present year. In August last he arrived at New York, where he was received with the warmth of affection and gratitude to which his very important and disinterested services and sacrifices in our revolutionary struggle so eminently entitled him. A corresponding sentiment has since been manifested in his favor throughout every portion of our Union, and affectionate invitations have been given him to extend his visits to them. To these he has yielded all the accommodation in his power. At every designated point of rendezvous the whole population of the neighboring country has been assembled to greet him, among whom it has excited in a peculiar manner the sensibility of all to behold the surviving members of our Revolutionary contest, civil and military, who had shared with him in the toils and dangers of the war, many of them in a decrepid state. A more interesting spectacle, it is believed, was never witnessed, because none could be founded on purer principles—none proceed from higher or more disinterested motives. That the feelings of those who had fought and bled with him in a common cause should have been much excited was natural. There are, however, circumstances attending these interviews which pervaded the whole community and touched the breasts of every age, even the youngest among us. There was not an individual present who had not some relative who had not partaken in those scenes, nor an infant who had not heard the relation of them. But the circumstance which was most sensibly felt and which his presence brought forcibly to the recollection of all was the great cause in which we were engaged, and the blessings which we have derived from our success in it. The struggle was for independence and liberty, public and personal, and in this we succeeded. The meeting with one who had borne so distinguished a part in that great struggle, and from such lofty and disinterested motives, could not fail to affect profoundly every individual and of every age. It is natural that we should all take a deep interest in his future welfare, as we do. His high claims on our Union are felt, and the sentiment universal that they should be met in a generous spirit. Under these impressions I invite your attention to the subject with a view that, regarding his very important services, losses, and sacrifices, a provision may be made and tendered to him which shall correspond with the sentiments and be worthy the character of the American people.

In turning our attention to the condition of the civilized world, in which the United States have always taken a deep interest, it is gratifying to see how large a portion of it is blessed with peace. The only wars which now exist within that limit are those between Turkey and Greece, in Europe, and between Spain and the new Governments, our neighbors, in this hemisphere. In both these wars the cause of independence, of liberty, and humanity, continues to prevail. The success of Greece, when the relative population of the contending parties is considered, commands our admiration and applause, and that it has had a similar effect with the neighboring powers is obvious. The feeling of the whole civilized world is excited in a high degree in their favor. May we not hope that these sentiments, winning on the hearts of their respective Governments, may lead to a more decisive result? that they may produce an accord among them to replace Greece on the ground which she formerly held, and to which her heroic exertions at this day so eminently entitle her?

With respect to the contest to which our neighbors are a party, it is evident that Spain, as a power, is scarcely felt in it. These new States had completely achieved their independence before it was acknowledged by the United States, and they have since maintained it with little foreign pressure. The disturbances which have appeared in certain portions of that vast territory have proceeded from internal causes, which had their origin in their former Governments, and have not yet been thoroughly removed. It is manifest that these causes are daily losing their effect, and that these new States are settling down under Governments elective and representative in every branch similar to our own. In this course we ardently wish them to persevere, under a firm conviction that it will promote their happiness. In this their career, however, we have not interfered, believing that every people have a right to institute for themselves the Government which, in their judgment, may suit them best. Our example is before them, of the good effect of which, being our neighbors, they are competent judges, and to their judgment we leave it, in the expectation that other powers will pursue the same policy. The deep interest which we take in their independence, which we have acknowledged, and in their enjoyment of all the rights incident thereto, especially in the very important one of instituting their own Governments, has been declared and is known to the world. Separated, as we are, from Europe by the great Atlantic Ocean, we can have no concern in the wars of the European Governments, nor in the causes which produce them. The balance of power between them, into which ever scale it may turn, in its various vibrations, cannot affect us. It is the interest of the United States to preserve the most friendly relations with every power, and on conditions fair, equal, and applicable to all. But in regard to our neighbors our situation is different. It is impossible for the European Governments to interfere in their concerns, especially in those alluded to, which are vital, without affecting us; indeed, the motive which might induce such interference in the present state of the war between the parties, if a war it may be called, would appear to be equally applicable to us. It is gratifying to know that some of the powers with whom we enjoy a very friendly intercourse, and to whom these views have been communicated, have appeared to acquiesce in them.

The augmentation of our population, with the expansion of our Union, and increased number of States, have produced effects in certain branches of our system which merit the attention of Congress. Some of our arrangements, and particularly of the Judiciary Establishment, were made with a view to the original thirteen States only. Since then the United States have acquired a vast extent of territory; eleven new States have been admitted into the Union, and Territories have been laid off for three others, which will likewise be admitted at no distant day. An organization of the Supreme Court, which assigns to the judges any portion of the duties which belong to the inferior, requiring their passage over so vast a space, under any distribution of the States that may now be made, if not impracticable in the execution, must render it impossible for them to discharge the duties of either branch with advantage to the Union. The duties of the Supreme Court would be of great importance if its decisions were confined to the ordinary limits of other tribunals; but when it is considered that this court decides, and in the last resort, on all the great questions which arise under our Constitution, involving those between the United States individually, between the States and the United States, and between the latter and foreign powers, too high an estimate of their importance cannot be formed. The great interests of the nation seem to require that the judges of the Supreme Court should be exempted from every other duty than those which are incident to that high trust. The organization of the inferior courts would, of course, be adapted to circumstances. It is presumed that such a one might be formed as would secure an able and faithful discharge of their duties, and without any material augmentation of expense.

The condition of the aborigines within our limits, and especially those who are within the limits of any of the States, merits likewise particular attention. Experience has shown that, unless the tribes be civilized, they can never be incorporated into our system, in any form whatever. It has likewise shown that, in the regular augmentation of our population, with the extension of our settlements, their situation will become deplorable, if their extinction is not menaced. Some well digested plan, which will rescue them from such calamities, is due to their rights, to the rights of humanity, and to the honor of the nation. Their civilization is indispensable to their safety, and this can be accomplished only by degrees. The process must commence with the infant state, through whom some effect may be wrought on the parental. Difficulties of the most serious character present themselves to the attainment of this very desirable result on the territory on which they now reside. To remove them from it by force, even with a view to their own security and happiness, would be revolting to humanity, and utterly unjustifiable. Between the limits of our present States and Territories, and the Rocky mountains and Mexico, there is a vast territory to which they might be invited, with inducements which might be successful. It is thought if that territory should be divided into districts, by previous agreement with the tribes now residing there, and civil Governments be established in each, with schools for every branch of instruction in literature and the arts of civilized life, that all the tribes now within our limits might gradually be drawn there. The execution of this would necessarily be attended with expense, and that not inconsiderable; but it is doubted whether any other can be devised which would be less liable to that objection or more likely to succeed.

In looking to the interests which the United States have on the Pacific Ocean and on the Western Coast of this continent, the propriety of establishing a military post at the mouth of Columbia river, or at some other point in that quarter within our acknowledged limits, is submitted to the consideration of Congress. Our commerce and fisheries on that sea and along the coast have much increased and are increasing. It is thought that a military post to which our ships-of-war might resort would afford protection to every interest, and have a tendency to conciliate the tribes to the Northwest, with whom our trade is extensive. It is thought, also, that, by the establishment of such a post, the intercourse between our Western States and Territories and the Pacific and our trade with the tribes residing in the interior, on each side of the Rocky mountains, would be essentially promoted. To carry this object into effect, the appropriation of an adequate sum to authorize the employment of a frigate, with an officer of the Corps of Engineers, to explore the mouth of the Columbia river and the coast contiguous thereto, to enable the Executive to make such establishment at the most suitable point, is recommended to Congress.

It is thought that attention is also due to the improvement of this city. The communication between the public buildings and in various other parts and the grounds around those buildings require it. It is presumed, also, that the completion of the canal, from the Tiber to the Eastern Branch, would have a very salutary effect. Great exertions have been made and expenses incurred by the citizens in improvements of various kinds; but those which are suggested belong exclusively to the Government, or are of a nature to require expenditures beyond their resources. The public lots which are still for sale would, it is not doubted, be more than adequate to these purposes.

From the view above presented, it is manifest that the situation of the United States is, in the highest degree, prosperous and happy. There is no object which, as a people, we can desire which we do not possess, or which is not within our reach. Blessed with Governments the happiest which the world ever knew, with no distinct orders in society or divided interests in any portion of the vast territory over which their dominion extends, we have every motive to cling together which can animate a virtuous and enlightened people. The great object is to preserve these blessings and to hand them down to the latest posterity. Our experience ought to satisfy us that our progress, under the most correct and provident policy, will not be exempt from danger. Our institutions form an important epoch in the history of the civilized world. On their preservation, and in their utmost purity, everything will depend. Extending, as our interests do, to every part of the inhabited globe, and to every sea, to which our citizens are carried by their industry and enterprise, to which they are invited by the wants of others, and have a right to go, we must either protect them in the enjoyment of their rights, or abandon them, in certain events, to waste and desolation. Our attitude is highly interesting as relates to other powers, and particularly to our Southern neighbors. We have duties to perform with respect to all to which we must be faithful. To every kind of danger we should pay the most vigilant and unceasing attention, remove the cause where it may be practicable, and be prepared to meet it when inevitable.

Against foreign danger the policy of the Government seems to be already settled. The events of the late war admonished us to make our maritime frontier impregnable by a well-digested chain of fortifications, and to give efficient protection to our commerce by augmenting our Navy to a certain extent, which has been steadily pursued, and which it is incumbent upon us to complete as soon as circumstances will permit. In the event of war, it is on the maritime frontier that we shall be assailed. It is in that quarter, therefore, that we should be prepared to meet the attack. It is there that our whole force will be called into action to prevent the destruction of our towns, and the desolation and pillage of the interior. To give full effect to this policy, great improvements will be indispensable. Access to those works by every practicable communication should be made easy, and in every direction. The intercourse, also, between every part of our Union should be promoted and facilitated by the exercise of those powers which may comport with a faithful regard to the great principles of our Constitution. With respect to internal causes, those great principles point out with equal certainty the policy to be pursued. Resting on the people, as our Governments do, State and National, with well-defined powers, it is of the highest importance that they severally keep within the limits prescribed to them. Fulfilling that sacred duty, it is of equal importance that the movement between them be harmonious; and, in case of any disagreement, should any such occur, a calm appeal be made to the people, and their voice be heard and promptly obeyed. Both Governments being instituted for the common good, we cannot fail to prosper, while those who made them are attentive to the conduct of their representatives and control their measures. In the pursuit of these great objects, let a generous spirit and national views and feelings be indulged, and let every part recollect that by cherishing that spirit, and improving the condition of the others in what relates to their welfare, the general interest will not only be promoted, but the local advantage be reciprocated.

I cannot conclude this communication, the last of the kind which I shall have to make, without recollecting, with great sensibility and heartfelt gratitude, the many instances of the public confidence, and the generous support which I have received from my fellow-citizens in the various trusts with which I have been honored. Having commenced my service in early youth, and continued it since with few and short intervals, I have witnessed the great difficulties to which our Union has been exposed, and admired the virtue and courage with which they were surmounted. From the present prosperous and happy state I derive a gratification which I cannot express. That these blessings may be preserved and perpetuated will be the object of my fervent and unceasing prayers to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 29, 1824.

SIR: The convention between the United States and Great Britain for the suppression of the African slave trade is herewith transmitted to you, with the ratification on the part of the United States, under certain modifications and exceptions, annexed as conditions to the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification.

The participation of the Senate of the United States in the final conclusion of all treaties, to which they are parties, is already well known to the British Government; and the novelty of the principles established by the convention, as well as their importance, and the requisite assent of two-thirds of the senators present to the final conclusion of every part of the ratified treaty, will explain the causes of its ratification under this form. It will be seen that the great and essential principles which form the basis of the compact are admitted, to their full extent, in the ratified part of the convention. The second article, and the portion of the seventh which it is proposed to expunge, are unessential to the plan, and were not included in the project of convention transmitted to you from hence. They appear, indeed, to be, so far as concerned the United States, altogether inoperative, since they could not confer the power of capturing slave traders under the flag of a third party—a power not claimed either by the United States or Great Britain, unless by treaty, and the United States having no such treaty with any other power. It is presumed that the bearing of those articles was exclusively upon the flags of those other nations with which Great Britain has already treaties for the suppression of the slave trade, and that, while they give an effective power to the officers of Great Britain, they conferred none upon those of the United States.

The exception of the coast of America from the seas upon which the mutual power of capturing the vessels under the flag of either party may be exercised had reference, in the views of the Senate, doubtless, to the coast of the United States. On no part of that coast, unless within the Gulf of Mexico, is there any probability that slave-trading vessels will ever be found. The necessity for the exercise of the authority to capture is, therefore, no greater than it would be upon the coast of Europe. In South America, the only coast to which slave traders may be hereafter expected to resort, is that of Brazil, from which it is to be hoped they will shortly be expelled by the laws of the country.

The limitation by which each party is left at liberty to renounce the convention, by six months' notice to the other, may, perhaps, be useful in reconciling other nations to the adoption of its provisions. If the principles of the convention are to be permanently maintained, this limitation must undoubtedly be abandoned; and when the public mind shall have been familiarized to the practical operation of the system, it is not doubted that this reservation will, on all sides, be readily given up.

In giving these explanations to the British Government, you will state that the President was fully prepared to have ratified the convention without alteration as it had been signed by you. He is aware that the conditional ratification leaves the British Government at liberty to concur therein or to decline the ratification altogether, but he will not disguise the wish that, such as it is, it may receive the sanction of Great Britain and be carried into effect. When the concurrence of both Governments has been at length obtained, by exertions so long and so anxiously continued, to principles so important and for purposes of so high and honorable a character, it would prove a severe disappointment to the friends of freedom and of humanity if all prospect of effective concert between the two nations for the extirpation of this disgrace to civilized man should be lost by differences of sentiment, in all probability transient, upon unessential details.

Should the convention, as ratified on the part of the United States, be likewise ratified on the part of Great Britain, you will exchange the ratifications and forthwith transmit the British ratified copy to this place. On exchanging the ratifications, a certificate of that act is usually executed under the hand and seal of the persons performing it and mutually delivered. A copy of the form of that used in exchanging the ratifications of the convention of 20th October, 1818, is herewith inclosed, and it appears to be the form generally used on such occasions by the British Government. You will transmit the certificate exchanged with the British ratification. To complete the documents belonging to the negotiation, a copy of the full power of the British plenipotentiaries and of the protocol of the third conference are yet to be forwarded to us.

By the ninth article of the convention it is provided that copies of it "and of the laws of both countries, actually in force, for the prohibition and suppression of the slave trade shall be furnished to every commander of the national vessels of either party charged with the execution of those laws." The fulfilment of this article will require the continued and particular attention of both Governments. I inclose, herewith, a printed pamphlet containing all the laws of the United States on this subject now in force. It is stated in your despatches to have been the intention of the British Government to consolidate into one act, during the present session of Parliament, all the British laws relating to the subject; and perhaps Congress, at their next session, may deem it expedient to do the same here. At all events, you will not fail to forward to me a copy of all the laws in force which come within the purview of the convention; and although not expressly stipulated in that instrument, you will suggest to the British Government that copies of the instructions relating to this object, given by each of the parties to its own naval officers, should be communicated to the other and furnished to all the officers, on either side, intrusted with the execution of the laws made by this convention common to both. Lists of the vessels of either party, and of their commanders, thus instructed, might also facilitate the accomplishment of the great purposes of both, and harmonize the practical operation of a system not less important by the magnanimous end to be obtained than by the novelty of the means adopted for its accomplishment.

The conclusion of this convention has been highly satisfactory to the President, whose entire approbation of the course pursued by you in the negotiation of it I am instructed to make known to you. He indulges the hope that it will, even as now modified, contribute largely to two objects of high importance: to the friendly relations between the two countries, and to the general interests of humanity. He sees in it, with much pleasure, that spirit of mutual accommodation so essential to the continuance and promotion of their harmony and good understanding, and welcomes it as an earnest of the same spirit in accomplishing the adjustment of the other interesting objects in negotiation between the two parties.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

"I have this day had the honor to receive your despatch, No. 79, of the 29th of May, with the convention for the suppression of the slave trade, as ratified on the part of the United States, under certain modifications and exceptions, annexed as conditions to the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification.

"I shall proceed immediately to lay the convention, as thus ratified, before this Government, and endeavor to recommend to its acceptance the modifications and exceptions, now a part of the instrument, by all the suggestions and arguments with which your despatch has supplied me."

LONDON, July 5, 1824.

"I have had one interview with Mr. Secretary Canning since the 28th of last month on the business of the convention for the suppression of the slave trade, but as yet am not able to communicate any of the sentiments of this Government in relation to it. You shall hear them from me at the earliest moment after I am myself apprised of them."

"I have the honor to inform you that Mr. Secretary Canning has given me to understand, in an interview which I have this day had with him, that this Government finds itself unable to accede to the convention for the suppression of the slave trade, with the alterations and modifications that have been annexed to its ratification on the part of the United States. He said that none of these alterations or modifications would have formed insuperable bars to the consent of Great Britain, except that which had expunged the word America from the first article, but that this was considered insuperable."

"The reasons which Mr. Canning assigned for this determination on the part of Great Britain I forbear to state, as he has promised to address a communication in writing to me upon the subject, where they will be seen more accurately and at large; but to guard against any delay in my receiving that communication, I have thought it right not to lose any time in thus apprising you, for the President's information, of the result."

LONDON, August 30, 1824.

SIR: I had the honor to apprise you in my letter of the 9th instant that Mr. Secretary Canning had informed me, in an interview that I had with him on that day, that this Government would decline acceding to the convention for the suppression of the slave trade as ratified in May on the part of the United States, and that he promised to address me an official note upon this subject. This note I received on Saturday the 28th instant, the delay having arisen from an attack of fever under which he has been laboring. A copy of it is herewith inclosed.

I lost no time after receiving your instructions of the 29th of May in laying the matter of them before Mr. Canning, having, on the 30th of June, written him a note to request an interview for the purpose of executing this duty, which he granted me at the Foreign Office, on the first of July. It was in that interview that I laid fully before him all the considerations and arguments for the adoption of the treaty as ratified at Washington, with which your above instructions had charged me, omitting no part of them. He gave no opinion at that time on the course which this Government would be likely to pursue, but afterwards, on the 9th of August, informed me, as I have heretofore mentioned, that the omission of the words "and America," from the first article of the treaty, was considered by Great Britain as an insuperable objection to its acceptance on her part, and to this effect is the note which I now transmit from him. A copy of my answer to it, dated to-day, is inclosed.

It may be proper for me to state, that, whilst Mr. Canning, in the interview I had with him on the ninth of August, was assigning the reasons of this Government, as they will now be seen in his note, for not acceding to the treaty, took occasion to remark that Great Britain would be willing to give to the omitted words a meaning that would restrict their operation to the southern portion of North America as proximate to the British West Indies, excluding the range of coast which comprehended the middle and northern States, if I thought that such a plan would be acceptable to my Government. I immediately and most decidedly discountenanced such a proposition as objectionable under every view. He replied, that, having no other object in making the intimation than that of preventing the treaty from falling through, and not knowing himself in what light it might be received, he had, of course, nothing more to say, after learning from me that it would be objectionable.

I avail myself of this opportunity to forward to you a copy of the act of the last session of Parliament for consolidating the laws of this realm for the abolition of the slave trade, as requested in your communication of the 29th of May.

I have the honor to remain, &c.,

RICHARD RUSH.

HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

No. 6, (a.)

Mr. George Canning to Mr. Rush.

FOREIGN OFFICE, August 27, 1824.

SIR: In pursuance of what I stated to you in our late conference, I have now the honor to address you on the subject of the qualified ratification, on the part of your Government, of the treaty for the more effectual suppression of the slave trade, which was concluded and signed in the month of March last by you and his Majesty's plenipotentiaries.

His Majesty's Government have given the most anxious and deliberate consideration to this subject, and if the result of that consideration has been to decide that they cannot advise his Majesty to accept the American ratification, (notwithstanding the arguments alleged by you, in the name of your Government, in favor of such acceptance,) I entreat you to believe it is not from any diminished sense of the importance of the matter to which that treaty relates.

Nor do they at all underrate the desire which, as you have assured me, and as they really believe, was felt by the President of the United States to adopt the provisions of the treaty, such as it was transmitted to America. But the result is not the less inconvenient.

A treaty of which the basis was laid in propositions framed by the American Government was considered here as so little likely to be made a subject of renewed discussion in America that not a moment was lost in ratifying it, on the part of his Majesty; and his Majesty's ratification was ready to be exchanged against that of the United States when the treaty came back; not as it had been sent to America, but with material variations: variations not confined to those stipulations or parts of stipulations which had been engrafted upon the original projet, but extending to that part of the original projet itself which had passed unchanged through the negotiation.

The knowledge that the Constitution of the United States renders all their diplomatic compacts liable to this sort of revision undoubtedly precludes the possibility of taking exception at any particular instance in which that revision is exercised; but the repetition of such instances does not serve to reconcile to the practice the feelings of the other contracting party whose solemn ratification is thus rendered of no avail, and whose concessions in negotiation having been made (as all such concessions must be understood to be made) conditionally, are thus accepted as positive and absolute, while what may have been the stipulated price of those concessions is withdrawn.

In the instance before us the question is not one merely of form. A substantial change is made in the treaty, and, as I have said, on a point originally proposed by yourself, sir, as the American plenipotentiary, and understood to be proposed by the special direction of your Government.

The right of visiting vessels suspected of slave trading, when extended alike to the West Indies and to the coast of America, implied an equality of vigilance, and did not necessarily imply the existence of grounds of suspicion on either side.

The removal of this right as to the coast of America, and its continuance to the West Indies, cannot but appear to imply the existence on one side and not on the other of a just ground either of suspicion of misconduct, or for apprehension of an abuse of authority.

To such an equality, leading to such an inference, his Majesty's Government can never advise his Majesty to consent. It would have been rejected if proposed in the course of negotiation. It can still less be admitted as a new demand after the conclusion of the treaty.

With the exception of this proposed omission, there is nothing in the alterations made by the Senate of the United States in the treaty (better satisfied, as his Majesty's Government undoubtedly would have been if they had not been made,) which his Majesty's Government would not rather agree to adopt than suffer the hope of good to which this arrangement had given rise to be disappointed.

Upon this omission they trust the Senate of the United States will, on another consideration of the subject, see that it is not equitable to insist.

A full power will therefore be sent to Mr. Addington, his Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Washington, to conclude and sign, with any plenipotentiary to be appointed by the American Government, a treaty verbatim the same as the returned treaty would be with all the alterations introduced into it by the Senate, excepting only the proposed omission of the words "and America," in the first article; which treaty, if transmitted to England with the ratification of the Government of the United States, his Majesty will be ready to ratify.

But I am to apprise you, sir, that his Majesty will not be advised to appoint plenipotentiaries to conclude and sign the like treaty here, to be, as before, ratified by his Majesty and to be again subjected, after ratification by his Majesty, to alterations by the Senate of the United States.

I am confident that you will see in this distinction nothing more than a reasonable safeguard for his Majesty's dignity and a just desire to ascertain, before his Majesty again ratifies a diplomatic instrument, to what conditions that ratification is affixed.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient servant,
 GEORGE CANNING.

Mr. Rush to Mr. G. Canning.

LONDON, August 30, 1824.

SIR: I had the honor to receive, on the 28th instant, your note of the 2d of this month, giving me information that his Britannic Majesty's Government have declined, for the reasons you have enumerated, advising his Majesty to accept the ratification by the President and Senate of the United States of the treaty for the suppression of the slave trade, lately signed on behalf of the two powers, in manner and form as that ratification had been made known by me to his Majesty's Government.

Having already, sir, had the honor to lay before you all the reasons that operated with my Government for giving way to the desire and the hope that his Majesty's Government might have felt able to accept the treaty with the alterations introduced by the Senate as conditions of its ratification, I have only to express my regret at the disappointment of this hope.

All power over the instrument on my part, as the plenipotentiary of the United States at his Majesty's court, ceasing by this decision, it only remains for me to say that I will, with promptitude, transmit to my Government a copy of your note, at which source it will receive, I am sure, all the attention due to the high interests of which it treats.

I have the honor to be, with distinguished consideration, sir, your most obedient servant,
 RICHARD RUSH.

His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, November 12, 1824.

SIR: Your despatches to Nos. 395 and 12, inclusive, have been received. The proposal for the negotiation of a new convention for the suppression of the slave trade will receive the deliberate consideration of the President.

It is observed with regret that the reasons assigned in Mr. Secretary Canning's letter of August 27 to you, as having induced the British Government to decline the ratification of that which you had signed, as modified by the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, appear to have arisen from impressions altogether erroneous. It is stated that, under the expectation that the treaty would not be made a subject of renewed discussion in the United States, it had actually been ratified on the part of the British Government as at first concluded; and hence an argument of inconvenience is deduced that a second and qualified ratification could not be given without impairing the dignity of the Government, by the implication that the former ratification had been an act of the sovereign performed in vain.

To give weight to this reasoning, it would seem an essential part of the facts that the ratification alluded to had been transmitted to the United States, or at least that it was known to have taken place by the Government of the United States at the time when the convention came under the consideration of the Senate. This, however, was not the case. That it had been ratified in Great Britain was neither known nor believed. It appears to have been an act altogether voluntary, and in nowise referring to that which was expected on the part of the United States. The argument, therefore, rests upon facts other than those which were really applicable to the subject.

While admitting that the knowledge of those provisions of our Constitution which reserve to the Senate the right of revising all treaties with foreign powers, before they can obtain the force of law, precludes the possibility of taking exception to any particular instance in which that revision is exercised, Mr. Canning urges that this part of our system operates unfavorably upon the feelings of the other contracting party, whose solemn ratification, he says, is thus rendered of no avail, and whose concessions in negotiation, having been made (as all such concessions must be understood to be made) conditionally, are thus accepted as positive and absolute, while what may have been the stipulated price of those concessions is withdrawn.

It may be replied, that, in all cases of a treaty thus negotiated, the other contracting party being under no obligation to ratify the compact before it shall have been ascertained whether and in what manner it has been disposed of in the United States, its ratification can in no case be rendered unavailing by the proceedings of the Government of the United States upon the treaty; and that every Government contracting with the United States, and with a full knowledge that all their treaties, until sanctioned by the constitutional majority of their Senate are, and must be, considered as merely inchoate and not consummated compacts, is entirely free to withhold its own ratification until it shall have knowledge of the ratification on their part. In the full powers of European Governments to their ministers, the sovereign usually promises to ratify that which his minister shall conclude in his name; and yet, if the minister transcends his instructions, though not known to the other party, the sovereign is not held bound to ratify his engagements. Of this principle Great Britain has once availed herself in her negotiations with the United States. But the full powers of our ministers abroad are necessarily modified by the provisions of our Constitution, and promise the ratification of treaties signed by them only in the event of their receiving the constitutional sanction of our own Government.

If this arrangement does in some instances operate as a slight inconvenience to other Governments, by interposing an obstacle to the facility of negotiation, it is, on the other hand, essential to guard against evils of the deepest import to our own nation utterly incompatible with the genius of our institutions; and it is supported by considerations to which the equitable sense of other nations cannot fail to subscribe.

The treaties of the United States are, together with their Constitution, the supreme law of the land. The power of contracting them is, in the first instance, given to the President, a single individual. If negotiated abroad, it must be by a minister or ministers under his appointment; and if in Europe, with powers largely discretionary—the distances seldom permitting opportunities to the minister of consulting his Government for instructions during the progress of negotiation. Were there no other check or control over this power, and were there an obligation, even of delicacy, requiring the unqualified sanction of every treaty so negotiated, the result would be an authority possessed by every minister of the United States entrusted with a full power for negotiating a treaty to change the laws of this Union upon objects of the first magnitude to the interests of the nation.

In their negotiations with each other, the European nations are generally so near, and the communications between them are so easy and regular, that a negotiator can seldom have a justifiable occasion to agree to any important stipulation without having an opportunity of asking and receiving the instructions of his Government; a practice always and peculiarly resorted to by British plenipotentiaries. With an intervening ocean, this is seldom possible; and it is, therefore, just and proper that the right of judgment upon all the stipulations agreed to by a minister should be reserved in the most unqualified manner to both Governments parties to the treaty, and that every compact so negotiated should be understood to be signed by the minister remote from his own country only sub spe rati; not conclusive upon his nation until its Government shall have passed sentence of approbation upon it.

These general observations are submitted in order that you may make such use of them as you shall deem expedient to satisfy the British Government that in this established principle of our Constitution there is nothing to which any foreign Government can justly take exception, and that it only reserves to our Government a power of supervision necessary for our own safety which the European Governments effectively reserve to themselves, and none more cautiously than Great Britain.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Hon. R. RUSH, Envoy, &c., London.

No. 8.

WASHINGTON, November 6, 1824.

Sir: You have already been apprised of the circumstance of his Majesty, my sovereign, having declined affixing his ratification to the convention concluded in London on the 13th of March last, between the British and American plenipotentiaries, for the more effectual suppression of the slave trade, amended and qualified as that instrument had been by the Senate of the United States.

In lieu of that convention, however, his Majesty proposes to the American Government to substitute another, verbatim the same as the amended instrument, one point alone excepted. That exception is the erasure of the word "America," in the first article, a word which stood in the original projet of the article as proposed by the President to the British Government, but which the United States thought fit, after the mutual acquiescence of both parties in it, to expunge.

In announcing to you the fact of my having been furnished with full powers to conclude and sign with the American Government a new treaty, such as I have above described, it will be unnecessary for me to enter at length into the motives which have actuated his Majesty in coming to this decision, as you have already been made acquainted with those motives through the medium of an official letter addressed on the 27th of August last by his Majesty's Secretary of State to the American Envoy in London, in which all the grounds of that determination are fully expounded.

A few observations on my part, however, in brief allusion to one or two points connected with this subject, may here be not misplaced.

In the acquiescence of his Majesty in all the alterations, with one only exception, effected by the Senate in a treaty originally projected by this Government at the spontaneous recommendation of the House of Representatives, the President will, I doubt not, see the clearest manifestation of the earnest desire of his Majesty's Government to carry into effect the important and salutary object for which that treaty was designed, however they may have deemed the original form in which the treaty was presented for the ratification of this Government the best calculated to attain that object.

To the amendment which would exempt the shores of America from that vigilance which is to be employed on those of the British West Indies, thereby destroying that equality which is the prevailing principle of the provisions of the treaty, and which cannot be withdrawn on the one side or on the other consistently with the mutual respect and confidence which subsist between the two contracting parties, his Majesty has found himself unable to accede; and I doubt not that, upon a fair and unbiassed reconsideration of that point, the American Government will see and acknowledge the justice of his Majesty's views, and will not hesitate to prove that acknowledgment by consenting to re-admit the expunged word "America" into the treaty.

It will not fail, sir, to occur to you that the condition required of Great Britain prior to the signature of the treaty by the American plenipotentiary, namely, the denunciation as piracy by the British Parliament of the slave trade, when exercised by British subjects, has already been fulfilled.

On the justice of accepting the value already paid for a stipulated act, and withholding the performance of that act, I leave it with confidence to your own sense of honor and equity to determine.

The sanction of this Government of the original provisions of the treaty in full was the equivalent to be received by his Majesty for his performance of the condition required of him, namely, his sanction of an act of Parliament declaring the slave trade piracy. Those provisions have been in part rejected, in part modified by this Government, and yet his Majesty is still willing to abide by his original agreement, provided this Government will recede from one alone of the various amendments made by them in the treaty.

I might here cite as a proof, if proof were necessary, of the unlimited confidence which his Majesty reposed in the good faith of the Government of this republic, and their sincerity in wishing to execute the treaty signed by their plenipotentiary in London—a treaty, I repeat, projected in conformity with the express recommendation of the House of Representatives, that his Majesty affixed without delay his own ratification to the treaty, in the full security of that instrument being equally invested with that of this Government. No shadow of a suspicion ever entered, ever could enter, his Majesty's mind that that ratification could be withheld in whole or in part.

Under all the circumstances of the case, sir, I cannot but feel an entire conviction that the sense of justice and the right feelings which animate the American Government will lead them to accede without hesitation to the proposition now submitted to them on the part of his Majesty, and that the President will find no difficulty in sanctioning the conclusion of a treaty the provisions of which must eventually result in such incalculable benefits to a most oppressed and afflicted portion of the human race.

With this conviction I need not assure you, sir, of my readiness to wait upon you at any time which you may think fit to appoint, in order to give effect to the instructions which I have received from his Majesty's Secretary of State, by affixing my signature to the convention as newly modelled.

I beg, sir, that you will receive the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 4, 1824.

Sir: Your note of the 6th ultimo has been submitted to the consideration of the President of the United States. While regretting that it has not been found conformable to the views of his Britannic Majesty's Government to concur in the ratification of the convention for the suppression of the slave trade, as recommended by the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, he has thought it most advisable, with reference to the success of the object common to both Governments, and in which both take the warmest interest, to refer the whole subject to the deliberate advisement of Congress. In postponing, therefore, a definitive answer to the proposal set forth in your note, I have only to renew the assurance of the unabated earnestness with which the Government of the United States looks to the accomplishment of the common purpose, the entire extinction of that odious traffic, and to the concert of effective measures to that end between the United States and Great Britain.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

No. 1.

*Mr. Adams to Mr. Forsyth, No. 16.*DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 13, 1821.

SIR: The hope had been entertained, after the ratification by both parties of the treaty of February 22, 1819, between the United States and Spain, that all our relations with that country would, thenceforth, have been of the most amicable character, signalized only by the interchange of good offices. It is painful to be obliged, on the return to your station at Madrid, to charge you with representations to be made to the Government of Spain relative to the unwarrantable delays by the Governor and Captain General of the island of Cuba, in taking the measures incumbent upon him for carrying the treaty into execution.

By the seventh article of the treaty the Spanish troops were to be withdrawn from the ceded territories, and possession of them was to be given of the places occupied by them within six months after the exchange of the ratifications, or sooner if possible. And the United States were to furnish the transports and escort necessary to convey the Spanish officers and troops, and their baggage, to the Havana.

As soon as was practicable after the exchange of the ratifications arrangements were made on the part of this Government with the view of carrying into effect these stipulations. The royal order from the King of Spain to the Captain General of the island of Cuba for the delivery of the ceded territories, and of the archives belonging to them, to the Commissioner of the United States authorized to receive them, had been transmitted with the Spanish ratification of the treaty to the minister of Spain residing here, to be delivered by him after the exchange of the ratifications. It was accordingly delivered by him. Colonel James Grant Forbes was appointed by the President to carry it to the Governor of Cuba, and commissioned to receive the orders to the Governors or commanding officers of the places within the territories for their delivery, and also the archives which were to be given up. The United States ship Hornet was despatched to the Havana with Colonel Forbes, who was instructed, on receiving them, to proceed with them, forthwith, to Pensacola, taking suitable measures for transmitting the order to the Governor of East Florida, at St. Augustine. A letter from the Spanish minister here to the Governor of Cuba was also furnished to Colonel Forbes, announcing him as the officer authorized to receive the order for delivery and the archives. General Jackson was appointed by the President Governor of East and West Florida, and was instructed to proceed immediately to Montpelier, the post within the United States nearest to Pensacola, there to await the arrival of Colonel Forbes with the necessary orders; upon which the General was directed to receive possession for the United States, and to provide for the transportation of the Spanish officers and troops, and their baggage, to the Havana; and by a liberal construction of that article of the treaty the provisions necessary for the subsistence of these officers and troops on their passage was considered as concluded within its obligation.

General Jackson reached the post of his destination on the 30th of April. On the 22d of the same month Colonel Forbes had arrived in the Hornet at the Havana; and had he been despatched without delay might have arrived at Pensacola in season for the reception of General Jackson without any unnecessary detention. The letters received at this Department from Colonel Forbes, copies of which are herewith inclosed, exhibit a series of delays on the part of the Governor for which no adequate reason is assigned, but which have already produced great public inconvenience to the United States, and which, if longer continued, will give them the most serious grounds of complaint. The last letter received from Colonel Forbes bears date the 23d of May, when his detention had already been protracted more than a month, in the interval of which the re-appearance of the disease incident to the climate excited strong apprehensions for the health of the captain and crew of the Hornet, as well as of Colonel Forbes himself. There is too much reason for the alarm with regard to Captain Reid, who is stated, by accounts of dates more recent than those officially received, to have been on the 28th of May still at the Havana, and very dangerously ill.

General Jackson, desirous of ascertaining the number of men for whom it would be necessary to procure transports and provisions, as well as to make arrangements for the supplies necessary to the troops of the United States who were to take their place, sent, on the 1st of May, Dr. Bronaugh and Judge Brackenridge to Pensacola, with a communication to Don José Callava, Governor of West Florida, to communicate to him the commission and authority with which he was clothed, and to ask of him such information as would be necessary for the arrangements adapted to the evacuation of the territory by the troops of Spain, and to the taking of possession on the part of the United States. Governor Callava declined making any such communication, declaring himself subordinate altogether to the Governor General of Cuba, and that he did not feel authorized to act at all in regard to the execution of the treaty until duly instructed to that effect by his superior officer. The letters, copies of which are inclosed, contain intimations from various sources that all these dilatory proceedings have too much connexion with private purposes and dishonorable pecuniary speculations. It is yet wished that this awkward and unpleasant state of things may, before this, have terminated; but the unreasonable delays of the Governor General of Cuba, inconsistent no less with good faith than with the good harmony which we are so desirous of cultivating with Spain, cannot be suffered to pass without animadversion. You will take the earliest opportunity after your arrival at Madrid to make suitable representations on this subject to the Spanish Government, and to state that whatever unpleasant or injurious consequences may result from this unwarrantable conduct of the Governor of Cuba must be attributed altogether to him.

By the fourth article of the treaty each of the contracting parties engages to appoint a Commissioner and surveyor, to meet, before the termination of one year from the ratification of the treaty, at Natchitoches, on the Red river, to run and mark the boundary line. Colonel McRae has been appointed the Commissioner on the part of the United States, and will be ready to proceed on the important duties of the commission as soon as the appointment of the Spanish Commissioner and surveyor shall be notified to us. It is further stipulated that the two Governments will amicably agree respecting the necessary articles to be furnished to those persons, and to their escorts, if necessary. At the time of the exchange of the ratifications, General Vives, at my request, promised to remind his Government of the necessity of an immediate appointment of the Commissioner and surveyor on their part. It is presumed this will have been done before you reach Madrid. Your attention to the subject is, nevertheless, requested, in case anything should yet remain to be done to put in train the execution of this article. As the necessary supplies for the Commissioners will be naturally best known on the scene of their operations, it is presumed the Spanish Government will authorize its minister here to agree for them to such arrangements, in this particular, as may be found necessary.

I am, with much respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 16, 1821.

SIR: Since my letter of the 13th instant, a letter of the 28th ultimo, with inclosures, has been received from Colonel James G. Forbes, copies of which will be forwarded to you next week. By a letter of the 5th instant from Mr. Warner, our commercial agent at the Havana, we are informed that Colonel Forbes, in the Hornet, sailed for Pensacola on the 30th ultimo, and the Nonsuch for St. Augustine on the 1st instant.

It is hoped that, on the arrival of these vessels at their respective places of destination, no further vexations and unwarrantable delays will occur in the execution of the seventh article of the treaty. But Colonel Forbes has been obliged to depart without the archives and public documents which were stipulated by the treaty, and directed by the royal order to the Governor and Captain General of Cuba to be delivered over to us.

As Colonel Forbes thus appears to have been at last despatched, the uncertainty as to the extent of time during which this measure might be protracted has ceased, and the representation which, by my letter of the 13th instant, you were requested to make to the Spanish Government, will properly be accommodated to the circumstances as now known to us, with the complaints of delays, without the assignment of any reasonable cause, which it will yet be proper that you should prefer; a firmer confidence in the expectation that no further unnecessary postponements will occur may be expressed, but our disappointment at the detention of the archives will also require to be more explicitly signified; and it will be very desirable that you should obtain a new and peremptory order to the Governor and Captain General for the delivery of all the archives and documents to which we are entitled by the treaty, which will leave him no apology or pretence for either denial or procrastination.

I am, with much respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 18, 1821.

SIR: Herewith are inclosed copies of a letter from Captain Downes, commander of the United States frigate Macedonian, to the Secretary of the Navy, together with correspondence between him and the Vice Roy of Peru, relating to certain transactions in which several persons belonging to the Macedonian lost their lives, and others were wounded; and much injury was suffered by the American schooner Rampart, for which some responsibility seems to attach to the officers and troops of Spain, if not personally to the Vice Roy.

These papers are transmitted to you that you may be in possession of the facts, and that you should make such representation of them to the Spanish Government as may be warranted by circumstances. Much of the injuries suffered by our people in this case is perhaps irreparable; but, in communicating the facts and the correspondence to the Spanish Government, without any specific or formal demand of reparation, you will avoid any form of statement which might foreclose any such demand which, upon further and more special information, may hereafter be found necessary or proper.

I am, with much respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Hon. JOHN FORSYTH, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to Spain.

No. 4.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 20, 1821.

SIR: In a despatch received from Mr. Brent, at Madrid, dated the 23d of March last, it is observed that, as by the 20th article of the decree of the Spanish Cortes of the 6th of October last, the same tonnage duty and other charges are to be exacted from American vessels in the ports of Spain as are paid by Spanish vessels in those of the United States, he suggests the propriety of transmitting a note of the charges upon Spanish vessels here that it may be officially communicated to that Government.

The duties paid by Spanish vessels in the ports of the United States are fifty cents a ton for tonnage, and the same sum for light money. They pay none others, to which vessels of the United States are not equally subjected; but an advance of ten per cent. on the amount of duties levied upon articles the produce or manufacture of Spain, imported from Spain in vessels of the United States, is paid when they are imported in Spanish vessels.

By an act of Congress of March 3, 1815, since limited in its operation to the 1st day of January, 1824, all these discriminating duties are repealed, the repeal to take effect in favor of any foreign nation whenever the President shall be satisfied that the countervailing or discriminating duties of such foreign nation, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States, have been abolished.

Upon this act, if the 20th article of the decree of the Cortes of 6th of October last had stood alone, the President would have issued his proclamation declaring the repeal to have taken effect from that date in favor of the vessels and produce or manufactures of Spain.

But, from your despatch of the 22d of November last, it appears that the duties payable on goods imported into Spain in foreign vessels are regulated by the decree of November 6, 1820, referring to a former regulation by which they pay one-third or 33 $\frac{1}{3}$  per cent. more than in Spanish vessels—a discriminating duty more than three times heavier than ours, and under which the act of Congress of March 3, 1815, cannot take effect.

The act of March 3, 1815, being an offer made to all commercial and navigating nations, is a manifestation of the liberal spirit of Congress, which, it is hoped, when understood, the Cortes will duly appreciate. You will take a proper occasion of suggesting to the Spanish Government that, in the operation of their two decrees upon their commercial relations with us, there is an inconsistency of principle between the 20th article of the decree of the 6th of October and the 5th article of that of the 6th of November; since, while the former places the direct duty upon shipping on the fair and equitable principle of perfect reciprocity, the latter lays a heavy indirect charge upon all foreign shipping, which totally destroys the balance so accurately poised in the other. You will add that, if the Cortes will extend the principle of reciprocity to the indirect charge of one-third upon the merchandise the produce or manufacture of the two countries, respectively, the President will readily issue his proclamation, conformably to the act of March 3, 1815, and thenceforward Spanish vessels and Spanish produce or manufactures imported in them will pay no more than the vessels of the United States on the same article imported in them.

Mr. Brent has, during your absence, urged the admission of consuls of the United States in the ultramarine ports of Spain without obtaining a definitive answer. You will resume the subject immediately after your return. There appears to be no doubt that a Russian consul has been formally recognized at Manila. At the Havana our intercourse has become so great that the agency of a consul is as necessary to the convenience of the Colonial Government as to our citizens. Numbers of seamen frequent that port, who, in illness or distress, will become burdensome to the local Government itself, unless provided for by an acknowledged agent of our own.

In general, I beg leave to recommend to your particular attention our commercial relations, both with Spain and all her possessions. The effect of the recent changes by the Cortes will come more immediately under your observation than ours, and you will lose no opportunity which may present itself of removing any obstructions, or of promoting any facility or advantages to our commerce.

You will not fail to avail yourself of any opportunity which may be accessible to obtain copies of records which may throw light on the titles to possessions in the newly ceded territories, and particularly which may tend to screen the public from the imposture of false, illegal, or forfeited concessions. You are authorized to employ Mr. Rich in this service, if you think it expedient, and to charge in your accounts any reasonable expense which it may occasion.

I am, with much respect, sir, your very obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Mr. Daniel Brent to Mr. Forsyth.

WASHINGTON, September 25, 1821.

Sir: I received a letter from Mr. Adams, at Boston, a few days ago, directing me to forward to you the copy inclosed, of one which he has written to General Vives upon the subject of the cannon attached to the fortifications in the Floridas, and the provisions furnished for the transportation of the Spanish garrisons, &c., to the Havana. I am sorry that I cannot send at the same time a copy of the letter of General Vives, to which this is a reply; that letter being in the hands of Mr. Adams, who is still at Boston.

You will find in the public prints which accompany this the statement of a very unpleasant occurrence at Pensacola, in the arrest and imprisonment of the ex-Governor, Callava, by the order of Governor Jackson, for refusing to deliver up some papers supposed to be interesting to individuals at Pensacola, and which were regularly demanded of him at the instance and upon the representation of the alcalde of the court, Brackenridge. Governor Jackson himself has furnished this Department with a full and particular account of the transaction, in which he states the motives and the grounds of his proceeding in it, and of that which grew out of it in relation to Judge Fromentin, which is not materially different from that taken from the Floridian, except in the exposition of the motives and grounds of his conduct. The Secretary, upon his return to this place, will probably have occasion to give you special instructions on this subject; and you will then, I presume, be furnished with the copies of all the papers connected with it.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient and humble servant,

DANIEL BRENT.

*Mr. Adams to Mr. Forsyth, No. 21.*DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 9, 1822.

SIR: Your despatches from No. 26 to No. 31, inclusive, with their inclosures, have been received.

I have now barely time to inclose with this letter the communications made by the President to Congress, during their present session, relating to our affairs with Spain. The message yesterday sent in, and which you will find in the National Intelligencer of this morning, may, perhaps, excite the attention of the Spanish Government; and should any manifestation of it be made to you, its purport will enable you to give every necessary explanation concerning it, and, particularly, that it resulted from a disposition in nowise unfriendly to Spain.

With this letter you will also receive a letter from the President to his Catholic Majesty on the recall of General Vives, which you are requested to present in the usual form.

I am, with much respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

*Extract of a letter (No. 38) from Mr. Forsyth to the Secretary of State, dated*MADRID, May 2, 1822.

"The President's message to Congress of the 8th of March, carried to Liverpool by the March packet from New York, was brought to this Government by a special messenger from Mr. Onis. The message was published in the French and English papers that arrived here on Monday week. On the afternoon of that day I had a casual conversation with Don F. M. de la Rosa. I asked him if he knew such a message had been sent to Congress; he replied that he had seen it in the French papers of that morning. From his mode of expressing these few words, and his suddenly shifting the conversation to an indifferent subject, I saw that this event was not expected by the ministers here, and has created great sensibility.

"You will find in the Madrid Gazette of the 29th ultimo, herewith inclosed, a circular of the Minister of War on the subject of the Spanish officers who have left the ultramarine army to return to this Peninsula. It is interesting, as, joined to other circumstances, it tends to show the determination of this Government to continue the war with some, at least, of their former provinces."

No. 8.

*Extract of a letter (No. 39) from Mr. Forsyth to the Secretary of State, dated*MADRID, May 20, 1822.

"The King and royal family went down to Aranjuez shortly after the meeting of the Cortes; the diplomatic body made the ordinary complimentary visit on the Queen's day, and it was understood among us that we were to pay no more visits until the anniversary of the King's entrance into Madrid, on his return from France, on the 13th of this month, and St. Ferdinand's day, the 30th. Notes were written by the Secretary of State, on the 4th of April, inviting us to be present at the time of the delivery of the wife of Don Carlos; (a copy of that to me is inclosed, No. 1.) I had determined not to go; but a second note, on the 30th, (copy No. 2,) and the knowledge that all the other ministers had gone down to Aranjuez, induced me to change this determination, being unwilling, especially at this juncture, to give any room for complaint from a failure to comply with the customs of the court. I went to Aranjuez on the 5th instant. On the 7th I received a note (copy marked No. 3) to attend at the expected delivery of Don Francisco's wife. The wife of Don Francisco gave birth, on the 13th instant, to a prince. Although I had been so long at Aranjuez I received no notice to attend when the event took place. Under ordinary circumstances I should have taken it for granted that the omission was accidental, but in the present state of the relations of Spain and the United States I thought it necessary to ascertain that it was not an intended slight. I wrote, therefore, on the 13th, a note to M. de la Rosa, (copy No. 4,) to which I received a satisfactory reply, (copy No. 5.) On the 16th the other princess was delivered of a second son. I had notice, but not early enough to get to the apartment adjoining that of the princess, to witness the exhibition of the new-born babe, at which I very heartily rejoiced.

"On the 14th instant I received your No. 21, inclosing the President's answer to the King's letter of recall of General Vives. Copies of my note to the Secretary of State and of his reply, on the subject of that letter, are inclosed, (Nos. 6 and 7.) I remained in Aranjuez until the 17th, and, agreeably to the King's wish, as communicated to me by the Secretary of State, I delivered the letter on that day.

"Nos. 8 and 9 are copies of the Secretary of State's answers to the application for a continuance of the privilege of depositing, free of duty, naval stores, &c., for the exclusive use of our squadron in the Mediterranean, at Mahon, and to that for an order in favor of American vessels coming loaded with prohibited goods to St. Sebastian's. The refusal to continue longer the privilege of deposit at Mahon was altogether unexpected, and shows that this Government is determined to prove to us its displeasure at the message of the 8th of March. It is the more remarkable, as the Cortes, in their session of the 6th of April, approved a report of the Committee of Hacienda, recommending that this privilege should be continued. A statement of this determination of the Cortes, translated from the Government Gazette, is as follows:

"The Committee of Hacienda, in view of the application of the minister of the United States for the continuance, for an indefinite period, of the permission to introduce, free of duties, into the port of Mahon, the naval stores for the use of the American squadron cruising in the Mediterranean, is of opinion that the request should be acceded to, taking the necessary precautions to avoid abuses. Approved?

"I had previously understood from the English Secretary of Embassy, Mr. Harvey, resident minister since Sir H. Wellesly's departure, that M. de la Rosa had spoken of the President's message of the 8th of March as hostile towards the Spains, and the report of the committee of the House of Representatives as an attack upon legitimacy. On my return to Madrid, on the 18th, I saw M. de la Rosa, and, as instructed by your No. 21, assured him that the message 'resulted from a disposition in nowise unfriendly to Spain.' He spoke with a great deal of warmth on the subject; said it was what, from the friendly conduct of the Spains to the United States, they could not have expected; in no state of circumstances could it have a friendly effect on the interests of this Government; that it appeared from the message itself that, not satisfied with taking this step ourselves, we had been, and still were, instigating on other Governments to do so likewise, and that the measure was adopted upon information incorrect in itself and derived from sources of doubtful authority. As it regarded Mexico and Peru, especially, there was absolutely no authentic information communicated to Congress with the message, as was proved by a copy of the published documents in his office. He considered it particularly injurious to Spain at this moment when they were about setting on foot a negotiation with the different parts of Spanish America. He concluded by expressing an opinion that the Spanish Americans were unequal to self-government, and that their independence, instead of being accelerated, would be retarded by this act of our Government. I replied, that the message itself explained the ground upon which the step was taken; that the intentions of the President were not unfriendly to Spain. As to the effect of the measure, it would, or it would not, be injurious, according to the views of this Government. If they were disposed to yield to circumstances and act prudently it could do them no injury. I made no reply to his remarks on the published documents as I had not seen them. As to the communications made to other foreign Governments, instead of being unfriendly, they had, in reality, proceeded from a contrary disposition—from a desire, on our part, that other powers, more remotely concerned in the question, should express an opinion on it at the same time with ourselves, with a view to its effects on the policy of this Government. That this step was taken in entire ignorance of the negotiation to which he alluded. The Cortes Extraordinary had authorized the Government to enter upon this negotiation only in February last. The only information possessed by the Government of the United States of conciliatory attempts on the part of Spain was the knowledge of the mission to Buenos Ayres in 1820, and of the negotiation begun here with the Commissioners of Venezuela in 1821. The first had totally failed, the Commissioners of Spain not being permitted to land; and the second had been interrupted by an order from the Government to the Commissioners of Colombia to leave the kingdom. It might be convenient to Spain to delay; but circumstances did not permit other Governments to imitate her dilatory policy. That 'the Spanish Americans were unequal to self-government,' I thought an unfortunate observation, as it proved, if true, that they were not fit to live under the Spanish constitution. We should regret very much that a measure intended to be useful should prove injurious to either of the parties, but should not be satisfied that such would be the effect until experience had proved it. The conversation terminated by a remark on his part, that what was intended to be done by the President was yet uncertain, and that they would wait to know how far the Government of the United States would go."

"There has been a Council of State on this act of ours. A protest was recommended; the minister of Spain not to be withdrawn from the United States, at least for the present, and the preparation of the necessary force to act efficiently in Ultramar, as formerly advised by the same council. This advice, it is said, has been sent to the Cortes, and is before the Commission of Ultramar; of this I have no certain information, but it is altogether probable.

"The proposed admission of the flags of the Spanish American Governments into English ports is said to be as vexatious as our determination to recognize their independence. Of herself, Spain can do nothing but negotiate with the Spanish American Governments. Nor has she the means to procure the assistance of other powers which she is willing to give and they willing to accept. M. de la Rosa has spoken to some of the foreign ministers here of the proposed recognition as a violation of treaty stipulations; referring, I conjecture, to the treaty of Utrecht, and of the Holy Alliance, with which we have as little concern as with the compact between Rome and Carthage. Constitutional Spain is no favorite with the Holy Alliance, and the revolution of 1820, glorious as it was for this country, settled the question between the Spanish Old and New World. The use of force to be sent from Europe, since March of that year, has not been seriously thought of. The liberal Government adopted here, and the equality of rights and privileges offered to the Spanish Americans, were supposed to be means sufficient to restore at least a portion of revolted Spanish America and assure the fidelity of the parts still connected with Spain to the empire. The appeal of M. de la Rosa to the principles of the Holy Alliance is a proof of mental weakness I did not expect from him.

"If a successor is appointed, with directions to come to Spain about that time, all the necessary instructions will, of course, be given to him; if not, you will be so good as to communicate to me what disposition the President desires to have made of the affairs of the legation, when I am about to leave Spain, and, in either case, to furnish me with the necessary documents to enable me to take leave here with decorum."

MADRID, May 15, 1822.

SIR: I acknowledged to you in proper time the receipt of your note of the 18th of September last, in which you requested that his Majesty would extend, for an indefinite or a limited time, the privilege which he was pleased to grant on February 26, 1821, to admit into Mahon, for the term of six months, naval stores and provisions sent from the United States for the exclusive use of the American squadron cruising in the Mediterranean.

Having submitted a translated copy of the above note of yours to the Secretary of Hacienda, he replied to me that his Majesty was not disposed at present to grant the extension for which you applied.

I renew to you the assurances of my most distinguished consideration, and pray God to preserve you many years.

Your very obedient servant,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 19, 1822.

SIR: Since I had the honor of writing you on the 30th ultimo, I have received your letter, No. 36, of the 15thth April, inclosing your accounts.

A letter, of which a translation is now inclosed, has also been received from the Spanish minister, Anduaga.

If the Spanish Government are desirous of postponing the meeting of the Commissioners to run the line, we are not disposed to urge them to it. You will, accordingly, not press the subject upon them; and if they address you concerning it, will manifest our readiness to attend to it at their convenience.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Extract of a letter (No. 40) from Mr. Forsyth to the Secretary of State, dated

MADRID, June 23, 1822.

"Mr. de Barras arrived here twenty days since with Mr. Anduaga's protest against the message of the 8th March, and your reply. On the 21st I received from the Secretary of State two copies of a manifesto passed by order of the King to the different courts of Europe. One of them is inclosed with this despatch, with a copy of the note received with it, and of my acknowledgment of their receipt. This manifesto was prepared in obedience to the resolutions of the Extraordinary Cortes, a translation of which was sent to you with my No. 34. When it was written I do not know; but my belief is, that it has been prepared since a copy of the President's message of 8th March was received by this Government. I wait with some anxiety to receive instructions subsequent to the close of your correspondence with Mr. Anduaga on this subject. I cannot anticipate exactly what this Government will do. The probability is, that they will not do more than break off their diplomatic intercourse with us. If this is done by merely recalling their minister from the United States, I shall not feel at ease until I know the wishes of the President.

"The 'informé' of the Commission of Ultramar, on the memoir of the Minister of Ultramar, which you will receive herewith, is an interesting document; although the question between the Spanish American Government and Spain is not considered under the new shape it assumed after the President's message of the 8th March, the 'informé' will serve to put you in possession of the views of a respectable committee of the Cortes after the message was known to have been sent to Congress. The idea of establishing neutral ports in Spanish America, and a neutral flag only, for the Peninsular and American Spaniards, is new. The only propositions that promise any practical good are those made by Sanchez, already alluded to, and those with which Sbarra, a member of the Commission of Ultramar, concludes his particular vote. Everything which has been done on this subject proves, conclusively, that the Cortes and the Government are satisfied that they are without the power to produce a reunion of Spanish America with the Peninsula by force; yet, with this conviction, there exists a perverse determination not to adopt the only measure which promises to be advantageous to Spain. The Cortes will close its session in a few days; they will probably do something before they rise. I expect, however, nothing of a decisive character. There have been lately several secret sessions, with what object, as yet, I know not."

To his excellency the Secretary of Despatch of State Mr. John Forsyth presents his respects, and has had the honor to receive the two copies of the manifesto passed, by order of his Catholic Majesty, to the courts of Europe, inclosed with his excellency's note of the 21st instant.

JUNE, 22, 1822.

No. 10, (c.)

Manifesto that, by order of his Majesty, the Ministers and Chargé d'Affaires of Spain have passed to the courts of Europe.

[Translation.]

His Catholic Majesty, in calling the attention of his august allies towards the dissident Spanish provinces of America, judges it not only useless, but unseasonable, to examine the causes which produced in those countries a desire to separate from the mother country; it is sufficient to his Catholic Majesty to have the consolation that it was not the abuse of power nor the weight of oppression which originated so serious an event; and that only extraordinary circumstances, and the terrible crisis in which Spain saw herself compromised, to free her throne and her dignity from the imminent risk of a foreign usurpation, could occasion a disunion so fatal between the members of one and the same family.

Since that epoch, as glorious as unfortunate, various have been the political aspects which the different provinces of Ultramar have presented; military events have succeeded each other with alternate success; the cause of the dissidents has taken a different direction in each one of the principal parts of that immense continent, and his Majesty sees with the most profound grief those interesting regions suffering all the ills and exposed to all the dangers which are the inevitable consequences of a revolution.

For the same reason his Catholic Majesty desires ardently to put an end to a situation so painful of anxiety and of uncertainty; and, carrying into execution the beneficent resolutions of the Cortes, has named the respective Commissioners to proceed to the dissident provinces of Ultramar, hear their propositions, transmit them to the Spanish Government, and open a frank and sincere correspondence, which may have for object and end the good of those countries and that of the nation in general.

H. C. M. does not present himself to those provinces as a resentful monarch before his misled subjects, but as a pacific mediator in the discords of his children. He casts a veil over the past, in order to see the present without any kind of prejudice, and contemplates the actual situation under all the relations which unite it with the future. The common good of the provinces of both hemispheres; this is the only end of the negotiations; this, its only basis; this, the common centre where all its combinations must be directed.

Never has a more important transaction presented itself; but neither is it possible for a Government to prepare to commence it with greater loyalty and good faith. H. C. M. cannot persuade himself that the interest of the provinces of Ultramar can be found in opposition to that of European Spain; and this sentiment, so worthy of his heart, stimulates him to look for the means of reconciling their common advantages, and offers him a consolatory confidence that it will not be impossible to find it. H. C. M. gratifies himself with the flattering hope that this frank and generous confidence will spare those regions whole ages of misery and destruction; prevent civil war and anarchy from retarding the progress of civilization and improvement; avoid the depopulation, poverty and immorality which attend great political oscillations, and which condemn to disgrace and misery one generation without securing the repose or the felicity of the following.

H. C. M. believes, at the same time, that the greatest good he can procure to Peninsular Spain is to put an end to a desolating and fratricide war; and that, placed between brothers united by the ties of blood and of religion, of language, of customs, and even of convenience itself, his voice cannot fail to be heard with benefit to one and the other.

But H. C. M. extends his views to a more extensive horizon, and considers this great question as an European question. A long time passed before the prodigious effects of the discovery of the New World were perceived in this continent; nobody could foresee them, much less calculate them; it was an unknown, immense career, without any barriers to confine it within its space. The same, H. M. judges, may be said of the great events which are agitating America, and whose effects must influence necessarily, and in a very rapid manner, the lot of Europe. It is not possible to determine the degrees of this influence, nor the alterations which it must produce in the reciprocal relations of the one and the other hemisphere; but H. C. M. hesitates not to affirm that the transaction which fixes the lot of the Spanish provinces of America, and puts an end to the blind and impetuous course of its revolution, will be one of the benefits the most memorable for the civilized world.

Necessities, commerce, habit, communications of every species, have united with multiplied bonds the two hemispheres; and it is easy to conceive that an entire continent, delivered to the struggle of the passions, and made the theatre of a durable revolution, cannot fail to influence perniciously the political and moral relations of Europe, when it has scarcely begun to recover from the agitations and disturbances it has labored under for the space of thirty years.

There will be, perhaps, superficial spirits who will see a solid and established Government and a constituted nation in each province which may have declared its independence; and who, without attending to obstacles of any kind, nor to the principles of public right, nor to the best known maxims of the law of nations, will believe that the mere fact of the separation of a province from the state of which it formed a part legitimates its existence! insulated and independent! and gives it the right to be recognized as such by other powers.

But Governments fortunately know, by a sad experience, the effects which are produced by a similar overthrow of principle; they foresee the consequences of its propagation, not less fatal to legitimate Governments than to the integrity of nations; and are well aware of the consequence to Europe of sanctioning in America, as some pretend, the undefined right of insurrection.

Thus it is that H. C. M. believes not only interested in this question those nations who possess colonies and establishments in Ultramar, to which the same theory could be applied, that it is now intended to legitimate with respect to the Spanish provinces of America; but that he also considers this business as intimately connected with those conservatory principles that offer securities to all Governments and guarantees to society.

Before this great and capital object all other considerations disappear by their smallness, and therefore H. C. M. does not recur to those subaltern reasons which, in ordinary times and circumstances, are employed by policy in support and defence of justice.

Although the question is viewed under this other aspect, Spain presents in all her relations new and powerful motives, which ought to excite in her favor profound sentiments of the most severe impartiality. Without any kind of ambitious pretension, placed with respect to all nations in an inoffensive situation, and dedicated exclusively to affirm and consolidate her interior felicity, she can neither provoke jealousies nor rivalries, nor cause to be desired the violent dismemberment of the various parts of the monarchy with the object of debilitating it. Spain, however powerful she may be, cannot threaten the repose nor the security of other nations; and Spain, rich and powerful, could advantageously influence the preservation of the equilibrium of power. An instinct of honor and of loyalty reunited the unknown elements of her strength, and engaged in the most unequal struggle, gave time to the continent to rise up against the common enemy and destroy his oppressive yoke. This fact alone renders unnecessary all reflections and commentaries. It alone inspires interest in favor of the magnanimous nation, and announces what ought to be its destiny, always beneficent, and never offensive; nature and policy designate it this advantageous position on the map of nations.

This grand political view was not hidden from the European cabinets when they saw destroyed the colossal and exaggerated power which Spain, alarming Europe, had exercised for the space of two centuries.

After a long struggle, it was determined at last to fix the lot of Spain, considering it inwoven with the federal European system, and, at the same moment, was foreseen the advantage of affirming her power, securing it in America a point of support that might augment its weight in the political balance to obtain the equilibrium of Europe.

To such a point was given importance to this consideration of general interest, that Spain obliged herself not to transfer or dispose of, in any manner, any portion of her territory in America; and, in order to make its possession more secure and inviolable, and to remove even the motives for suspicion and want of confidence, she deprived herself even of the liberty of conceding to other nations, by any means or under any pretext, the commerce and trade with those countries.

Time, notwithstanding, has produced a very important alteration in this point and a more enlightened policy; the change in the mercantile relations, the rectification of economical principles, and a multitude of other combined causes, have convinced Spain that it will be as prejudicial to her peninsular interests, as injurious to the provinces of Ultramar, to aspire to the preservation of a commercial monopoly formerly viewed as the bond of union between the two great moieties of the monarchy.

H. C. M. judges, on the contrary, that those ties only are durable which are founded on the common interest, and that peninsular Spain may obtain commercial advantages favorable to her industry and navigation without aspiring to a privilege so exclusive; that new necessities and new desires, arising from the progress of civilization and of wealth, make necessary a more frank and liberal system for the provinces of Ultramar; and that, in place of struggling uselessly with the mercantile spirit, which has so much influence in the political system of modern nations, the true interests of Spain consist in conciliating it, instead of provoking it as an irreconcilable enemy.

Proposing to itself such important objects, all the laws, all the dispositions given since the restoration of the constitution, have a tendency beneficent, generous, and to the colonization of strangers in Spanish America, and to the freedom of commerce in those regions; and the experiment made in the island of Cuba has been sufficient to demonstrate practically that the general interest of all nations, the interest of the provinces of America and that of European Spain, all coincide in one same point.

By this simple and natural mean, H. C. M. has found absolutely removed the only obstacle that might prevent the most perfect union between the policy of Spain and that of the other cabinets. A solid, stable, and recognized Government, a faithful observer of its treaties, prepares to treat with the dissident provinces of America, and offers to the other powers the greatest commercial advantages; it would not be possible to designate (even when the question should be reduced to the simple calculation of lucrative interest) an object which might serve as a counterpoise in the opposite extreme.

The civil wars and the anarchy that frequently succeed revolutions, and especially when their elements are so heterogeneous and contradictory as in America, are surely not calculated to augment the exchangeable products of a country, nor to invite strangers with the effective and persuasive security which is the soul of commerce, nor can precarious and uncertain governments, without any guarantee, secure themselves the advantages which they may offer. It is now twelve years since Buenos Ayres, delivered to its own fortune, has toiled in vain to consolidate a Government, and the misery and depopulation suffered by the provinces of Costa-firma have retarded, instead of accelerating their wealth and prosperity. In matters of this class, when facts come in support of reason, it is useless to oppose to certain and known results vague and indefinite hopes.

But it appears only as if a new calamity has taken place, in confirmation of the evils which should have been foreseen; the insurrection of the American continent has given color and support to the piracy of the seas, and commerce in general begins to suffer from the insecurity and dangers of this immoral and barbarous war, which knows no law but that of sordid interest, and which treats and despoils as enemies the industrious individuals of all nations, indiscriminately.

Hence, and by an admirable concatenation, everything concurs to establish the utility and urgency of a definitive arrangement of a business of such vast and profound ramifications, and everything contributes to stimulate the Spanish Government not to retard, by any secondary motive, a transaction so important.

H. C. M. flatters himself with the greatest satisfaction that, about to establish with the dissident provinces this simple and friendly communication, he will find in the other Governments that circumspect and deliberate conduct that justice prescribes, and that policy recommends, and that sentiments of impartiality and benevolence inspire.

The Spanish nation, treating to put an end to a domestic discord, the same inviolable respect which it professes to the rights of other nations inspires it with the just confidence of being treated reciprocally with the same considerations, not being able to suspect, even on the part of the nations who desire to continue in friendship and harmony with her, any hazarded step which might suppose already resolved the question which the Spanish nation is about to decide as its own, in use of its legitimate acknowledged rights, and which it has never in any manner renounced.

In which state the same means made use of to excite Government to the recognition of the independence of the dissident Spanish provinces of America will offer, on the contrary, a notorious and solemn occasion to sanction the fundamental principles upon which the integrity and tranquillity of nations and the public morality of Governments repose.

The tenor and spirit of treaties, the good faith which ought to reign between friendly powers, the conviction of an obligation supported equally by an enlightened and foreseeing policy, the real welfare itself of the dissident provinces, and even the general utility of all the potentates, offer an equal number of securities to his Catholic Majesty that his laudable desires will find in his august allies the most favorable and friendly reception.

Extract of a letter (No 41) from Mr. Forsyth to the Secretary of State, dated

MADRID, June 28, 1822.

"I have not been able to ascertain if anything has been said or proposed in the Cortes during their secret sessions with regard to the United States. There is one striking circumstance that renders it probable that there has. In the discussion of the business of Ultramar not even the most remote allusion has been made to the resolution of our Government to recognize the Spanish American Governments. The message of the 8th of March, your subsequent correspondence with Anduaga, and the determination of the Council of State when consulted by the ministers, are certainly known to the Cortes, if not, as is more probable, formally communicated to them. I can hardly conceive it possible that a reference to this step of ours should not have been made, if it had not been studiously avoided, and I see no sufficient motive for a studious avoidance of it if the subject had not been under consideration in a different shape. This is mere conjecture; you will give to it its due importance, as you are made acquainted with the foundation of it."

MADRID, August 26, 1822.

"The late events have had a favorable effect for us. The danger so near home has drawn their attention from American affairs and blunted the sensibility excited by our recognition of the Governments established in our hemisphere. Every one feels, too, that, among the Governments, the Spanish constitution has no friends but the United States, and perhaps England. Every one is sensible that Spain has no power to compel Spanish America to unite with the Peninsula, and that no assistance is to be procured from the European powers without a sacrifice of the free institutions now established here. The administration has passed into the hands of a party at all times more reasonable and less prejudiced on this subject than those who have heretofore administered the Government."

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, October 23, 1822.

SIR: By an act passed at the last session of Congress, (May 8, 1822,) for ascertaining claims and titles to land within the Territory of Florida, a commission was established, to consist of three Commissioners, for the adjudication of claims at Pensacola and St. Augustine, under certain rules, regulations, and conditions prescribed in the act. James P. Preston, Nathaniel A. Ware, and Samuel R. Overton were appointed the Commissioners.

I have the honor of inclosing herewith copies of letters from two of them, Mr. Ware and Mr. Overton, in session as a Board at Pensacola, and from Joseph W. White, their secretary, from which you not only perceive conclusive proof of the indispensable necessity, for the purposes of public justice, that the documents and archives transmitted to the Havana should be delivered up, conformably to the express stipulation of the treaty, but, what is still more extraordinary, that copies have been produced before the Board, certified by the Captain General himself at the Havana, of documents which could not consistently with good faith be withheld.

By the decease of the Captain General, Mahy, the duties of his office have passed into other hands. The President hopes and trusts that it will afford an opportunity, of which the Spanish Government will readily avail itself, to redeem the pledge of their express and positive engagements. He desires you therefore to renew, in an earnest though friendly and conciliatory manner, the application for the most explicit orders to the commanding officer at the Havana for the delivery to the United States of all the archives and documents relating to the sovereignty and property of Florida which, conformably to the treaty, should have been surrendered. They include, of course, all documents relating to land titles in the province, since the province itself is the only place where they can be useful or necessary to establish the right of any one to property there, and since such rights can, in most cases, be established there only by them.

Should the Spanish Government accede to this demand, due to its own good faith no less than to justice, you will request that a duplicate of the order to the Captain General or commanding officer at the Havana for the delivery of the archives should be furnished to you to be transmitted hither, that it may be forwarded hence by a person duly authorized by the Government of the United States to receive them.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 16, 1822.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your despatches to No. 48, inclusive, with their inclosures.

Copies of a late correspondence between the Spanish minister, Auduaga, and this Department, relating to the capture of the Spanish privateer brig Palmyra by the United States schooner Grampus, are herewith transmitted; and in the printed documents and papers now forwarded you will see the multiplied outrages and depredations to which the commerce of the United States has been and continues to be exposed, from pirates issuing chiefly from the islands of Porto Rico and Cuba. To the distressing catalogue of injuries which we have thereby sustained is now added the loss of several lives of our seamen; and among them, that of Lieutenant Allen, commander of the Alligator, who perished in the act of re-capturing five valuable vessels which were in possession of the pirates.

This evil has been long growing to a magnitude which is no longer supportable nor remediable but by measures of promptitude and vigor. These atrocious robberies are committed by men issuing from the ports of those islands in shoal waters and under the protection of the very shores in many cases, with small boats unapproachable by vessels of force adequate to subdue them. When closely pursued they abandon their boats and escape to the shores; and, when successful, the fruits of their lawless plunder are exposed in the public marts of the island with an indecency little creditable to the authorities of the island themselves, which have hitherto made little more than ostensible exertion to suppress them.

In this state of things a plan has been laid before Congress for their consideration, for the organization of a force specially adapted to the extirpation of this cluster of banditti, a force adapted to pursue them into the shallow waters, where they have hitherto often found a too effectual refuge. To its complete success it may occasionally be necessary for our officers and men to follow them even to and upon the shores of the island; of this necessity the President wishes you to apprise the Spanish Government, and to obtain their immediate consent thereto. You will state that the urgency of the case will not admit of delay, and that he trusts it will be assented to by Spain without hesitation. You will, at the same time, press upon the Spanish Government the propriety of instructions being given forthwith to their commanding officers in those islands to co-operate by the most effective means with our naval force for the suppression of these common enemies of the human kind, and of affording to our officers every facility in their power in aid of their operations. An agent will be shortly despatched to the Havana for the purpose of concerting with the authorities in Cuba the measures which may be most effectual to this end, and of giving effect, by communication with the officers commanding our armament, to their proceedings. He will, also, be charged with authority to receive the archives and documents relating to Florida, which have been so long withheld, and for the delivery of which by your despatch, No. 48, it appears that a new and positive order has been promised.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very obedient and humble servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 3, 1823.

SIR: Mr. Edward Wyer, the bearer, is despatched as a confidential messenger with the letters and documents, which he will deliver to you. The unpleasant incidents which occurred in the course of the last summer at Algiers are doubtless known to you. If the misunderstanding should be known to you to be still subsisting upon Mr. Wyer's arrival at Madrid, he is instructed to proceed thence with a despatch to our Consul General, Mr. Shaler, wherever he may be.

It is hoped, however, that ere this an amicable explanation may have removed the difficulties which had arisen, and that Mr. Shaler will have returned to Algiers and resumed his consular functions there. In that case, Mr. Wyer will transmit the despatch for Mr. Shaler with which he is charged by any safe and ordinary mode of conveyance, and will return here with any despatches which you may intrust to him; waiting, as long as you may think advisable, for the answer to the demand of permission to pursue the pirates of Cuba on the shores of the island.

Besides the correspondence with Mr. Anduaga, copies of which are herewith transmitted, I have received several very long and earnest communications from that minister, the replies to which have been and yet are delayed, in the hope that they may be received by him in a disposition more calm and temperate than that which is manifested by his notes. He appears to think it material to the interest of his Government to maintain the attitude of loud complaint in regard to transactions with respect to which the primary cause of complaint is on our side. The only exception to this remark relates to a miserable attempt at an expedition against the island of Porto Rico, headed by a foreign officer named Decoudray de Holstein, but on board of which were some misguided citizens of the United States. One of the vessels appears to have been fitted out at Philadelphia and one at New York, but the first intimation of these facts, received by this Government, was long after they had sailed, and from the island of St. Bartholomew's.

We have since learned that the masters of the vessels were deceived with regard to their destination, and that when it was discovered by them they positively refused to proceed upon it, and insisted upon going into the island of Curaçoa, where the chief and others of the expedition were arrested. You will make this known to the Spanish Government, and assure them that this Government knew nothing of this expedition before the departure of the vessels from the United States. This will not be surprising when it is known that it escaped equally the vigilance of Mr. Anduaga himself, who divides his residence between New York and Philadelphia, and of all the other Spanish official agents and consuls at those places.

Mr. Anduaga has taken this occasion to renew, with much sensibility, all his own complaints and those of his predecessors against armaments in our ports in behalf of the South American patriots, and even against that commerce which our citizens, in common with the subjects of all the maritime nations of Europe, have for many years maintained with the people of the emancipated colonies. These complaints have been so fully and repeatedly answered that there is some difficulty in accounting for Mr. Anduaga's recurrence to them with the feelings which mark his notes concerning them. Should the occasion present itself, you will give it distinctly to be understood, that, if some of those notes remain long, and may even finally remain unanswered, it is from a principle of forbearance to him and of unequivocal good will towards his Government and his country.

I am, with much respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

"I determined to improve the first opportunity of sounding Mr. San Miguel. This opportunity was presented on the 13th, when he informed me that he had resisted the demand of England to be permitted to land on the island in pursuit of pirates. I said that if it was true, as circulated, that the British had landed 500 men at Matanzas, they had not been satisfied with his answer. To this Mr. San Miguel replied that he did not believe the report, as the only pretext which the English could allege for landing had been abandoned by them, on being assured that the Governor of Cuba would readily co-operate with their fleet for the destruction of the pirates."

[Translation.]

WASHINGTON, March 9, 1822.

Sir: In the National Intelligencer of this day I have seen the message sent by the President to the House of Representatives, in which he proposes the recognition by the United States of the insurgent Government of Spanish America. How great my surprise was may be easily judged by any one acquainted with the conduct of Spain towards this Republic, and who knows the immense sacrifices which she has made to preserve her friendship. In fact, who could think that, in return for the cession of her most important provinces in this hemisphere; for the forgetting of the plunder of her commerce by American citizens; for the privileges granted to this Navy, and for as great proofs of friendship as one nation can give another, this Executive would propose that the insurrection of the ultramarine possessions of Spain should be recognized. And, moreover, will not his astonishment be augmented to see that this power is desirous to give the destructive example of sanctioning the rebellion of provinces which have received no offence from the mother country, to those to whom she has granted a participation of a free constitution, and to whom she has extended all the rights and prerogatives of Spanish citizens? In vain will a parallel be attempted to be drawn between the emancipation of this Republic and that which the Spanish rebels attempt, and history is sufficient to prove that if a harassed and persecuted province has a right to break its chains, others loaded with benefits, elevated to the high rank of freemen, ought only to bless and embrace more closely the protecting country which has bestowed such favors upon them.

But, even admitting that morality ought to yield to policy, what is the present state of Spanish America, and what are its Governments to entitle them to recognition? Buenos Ayres is sunk in the most complete anarchy, and each day sees new despots produced who disappear the next. Peru, conquered by a rebel army, has near the gates of its capital another Spanish army, aided by part of the inhabitants. In Chili, an individual suppresses the sentiments of the inhabitants, and his violence presages a sudden change; on the coast of Firma, also, the Spanish banners wave, and the insurgent generals are occupied in quarrelling with their own compatriots, who prefer taking the part of a free power to that of being the slave of an adventurer. In Mexico, too, there is no Government, and the result of the questions which the chiefs commanding there have put to Spain is not known. Where, then, are those Governments which ought to be recognized? where the pledges of their stability? where the proof that those provinces will not return to a union with Spain when so many of their inhabitants desire it? and, in fine, where the right of the United States to sanction and declare legitimate a rebellion without cause, and the event of which is not even decided?

I do not think it necessary to prove that, if the state of Spanish America were such as it is represented in the message; that if the existence of its Governments were certain and established; that if the impossibility of its reunion with Spain were so indisputable; and that if the justice of its recognition were so evident, the powers of Europe, interested in gaining the friendship of countries so important for their commerce, would have been negligent in fulfilling it. But, seeing how distant the prospect is of even this result, and faithful to the ties which unite them with Spain, they await the issue of the contest, and abstain from doing a gratuitous injury to a friendly Government, the advantages of which are doubtful and the odium certain. Such will be that which Spain will receive from the United States in case the recognition proposed in the message should take effect. And posterity will be no less liable to wonder that the power which has received the most proofs of the friendship of Spain should be the one delighted with being the first to take a step which could have only been expected from another that had been injured.

Although I could enlarge upon this disagreeable subject, I think it useless to do so, because the sentiments which the message ought to excite in the breast of every Spaniard can be no secret to you. Those which the King of Spain will experience at receiving a notification so unexpected will be, doubtless, very disagreeable, and at the same time that I hasten to communicate it to his Majesty, I think it my duty to protest, as I do solemnly protest, against the recognition of the Governments mentioned of the insurgent Spanish provinces of America by the United States; declaring that it can in no way now, or at any time, lessen or invalidate in the least the right of Spain to the said provinces, or to employ whatever means may be in her power to reunite them to the rest of her dominions.

I pray you, sir, to be pleased to lay this protest before the President, and I flatter myself that, convinced of the solid reasons which have dictated it, he will suspend the measure which he has proposed to Congress, and that he will give to his Catholic Majesty this proof of his friendship and of his justice.

I remain, with the most distinguished consideration, praying God to guard your life many years, your most obedient, humble servant,

JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 6, 1822.

SIR: Your letter of the 9th of March was, immediately after I had the honor of receiving it, laid before the President of the United States, by whom it has been deliberately considered, and by whose direction I am, in replying to it, to assure you of the earnestness and sincerity with which this Government desires to entertain and to cultivate the most friendly relations with that of Spain.

This disposition has been manifested not only by the uniform course of the United States in their direct political and commercial intercourse with Spain, but by the friendly interest which they have felt in the welfare of the Spanish nation, and by the cordial sympathy with which they have witnessed their spirit and energy, exerted in maintaining their independence of all foreign control and their right of self-government.

In every question relating to the independence of a nation two principles are involved—one of right and the other of fact; the former exclusively depending upon the determination of the nation itself, and the latter resulting from the successful execution of that determination. This right has been recently exercised, as well by the Spanish nation in Europe as by several of those countries in the American hemisphere which had for two or three centuries been connected as colonies with Spain. In the conflicts which have attended these revolutions the United States have carefully abstained from taking any part respecting the right of nations concerned in them to maintain or newly organize their own political constitutions, and observing, whenever it was a contest by arms, the most impartial neutrality. But the civil war in which Spain was for some years involved with the inhabitants of the colonies in America has, in substance, ceased to exist. Treaties equivalent to an acknowledgment of independence have been concluded by the commanders and Vice Roys of Spain herself with the Republic of Colombia, with Mexico, and with Peru, while in the province of La Plata and in Chili no Spanish force has, for several years, existed to dispute the independence which the inhabitants of those countries had declared.

Under these circumstances the Government of the United States, far from consulting the dictates of a policy questionable in its morality, yielded to an obligation of duty of the highest order by recognizing as independent States nations which, after deliberately asserting their right to that character, have maintained and established it against all the resistance which had been or could be brought to oppose it. This recognition is neither intended to invalidate any right of Spain nor to affect the employment of any means which she may yet be disposed or enabled to use, with the view of reuniting those provinces to the rest of her dominions. It is the mere acknowledgment of existing facts, with a view to the regular establishment with the nations newly formed of those relations, political and commercial, which it is the moral obligation of civilized and Christian nations to entertain reciprocally with one another. It will not be necessary to discuss with you a detail of facts, upon which your information appears to be materially different from that which has been communicated to this Government, and is of public notoriety, nor the propriety of the denominations which you have attributed to the inhabitants of the South American provinces. It is not doubted that other and more correct views of the whole subject will very shortly be taken by your Government, and that it will, as well as the other European Governments, show that deference to the example of the United States which you urge it as the duty or policy of the United States to show to theirs. The effect of the example of one independent nation upon the counsels and measures of another can be just only so far as it is voluntary; and as the United States desire that their example should be followed, so it is their intention to follow that of others upon no other principle. They confidently rely that the time is at hand when all the Governments of Europe friendly to Spain, and Spain herself, will not only concur in the acknowledgment of the independence of the American nations, but in the sentiment that nothing will tend more effectually to the welfare and happiness of Spain than the universal concurrence in that recognition.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

PHILADELPHIA, April 24, 1822.

SIR: As soon as the news was received in Madrid of the recent occurrences in New Spain, after the arrival at Vera Cruz of the Captain General and Supreme Political Chief, appointed for those provinces, Don Juan O'Donoju, and some papers were seen relative to those same transactions, it was feared that, for forming the treaty concluded in Cordova, on the 24th of August last, between the said general and the traitor, Colonel Don Augustin Iturbide, it had been falsely supposed that the former had power from his Catholic Majesty for that act, and in a little time the correctness of those suspicions was found, as, among other things, the said O'Donoju, when, on the 26th of the same August, he sent this treaty to the Governor of Vera Cruz, notifying him of its prompt and punctual observance, he told him that, at his sailing from the Peninsula, preparation for the independence of Mexico was already thought of, and that its bases were approved of by the Government and by a commission of the Cortes. His Majesty, on sight of this, and of the fatal impression which so great an imposture had produced in some ultramarine provinces, and what must, without difficulty, be the consequence among the rest, thought proper to order that, by means of a circular to all the chiefs and corporations beyond seas, this atrocious falsehood should be disbelieved; and now he has deigned to command me to make it known to the Government of the United States that it is false as far as General O'Donoju published beyond his instructions, by pointing out to it that he never could have been furnished with other instructions than those conformable to constitutional principles.

In compliance with this order of his Majesty, I can do no less than observe to you, sir, how unfounded one of the reasons is, in your note of the 6th instant, for the recognition by this Government of those of the insurgent provinces of Spanish America; that it was founded on the treaty made by O'Donoju with Iturbide, since, not having had that power, nor instruction to conclude it, it is clearly null and of no value.

I repeat to you, sir, the sentiments of my distinguished consideration, and pray God that you may live many years.

PHILADELPHIA, October 11, 1822.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you a copy of a despatch which has been sent to me by the Political Chief of the island of Porto Rico relative the capture of the Spanish privateer Panchita, alias Palmyra, by the United States vessel-of-war the Grampus, and another of the declaration delivered to the Spanish vice consul in Charleston by the captain of the said privateer. Both documents, notwithstanding their having been dictated by persons and in places far apart, are so consistent in the facts to which they refer that there can be no doubt of their certainty.

The circumstances of the capture of the Panchita are as follows: Having approached the Grampus to deliver an official letter to her captain, having the Spanish flag and pendant flying, and, moreover, the parliamentary white flag at the foretop, the Grampus poured into her a discharge of her artillery with such effect that the Panchita was continually in danger of sinking, and had to surrender. The attack, the discharge, the assassination of a Spanish mariner, the wounds of others, and the destruction of the Palmyra, was all the work of an instant, without any preceding altercation or dispute, and as scarcely could have been done if the two nations had been at war, because in this case the commander of the Grampus, before the attack, would have demanded a surrender. The succeeding conduct was agreeable to such a beginning. He caused to be put in chains and irons one part of the crew and Spanish officers, guarding the rest with sentinels in view. He first carried his prize and prisoners to St. Thomas, where he celebrated his victory with feasting and drinking; from thence he sent the wounded to Porto Rico, and eventually he carried the privateer and the rest of the crew to Charleston, where they were put into the public prison, being conducted thither in a manner the most insulting and ignominious.

This is the purport of the subjoined documents, but, not satisfied with the evidence which appears from them, I endeavored to procure information from the various publications which have been made in the newspapers of this Republic upon this subject, of the motive which had impelled the commander of the Grampus to commit so unheard of an outrage; and at last, in the National Gazette of this city, of the 7th instant, I saw the opinion given by Judge Johnson in this case, the result of which was, that the aforesaid commander, when in St. Thomas, received a complaint from the captain of an American merchant vessel, the Coquette, of having been robbed of some effects by the mariners of a boat which had been sent to examine her by a privateer, the name of which he did not know, and gave him her marks; that Captain Gregory was persuaded that they were those of the Palmyra, and that this was the reason he had for attacking her. It does not appear that he stopped to investigate the truth of the complaint; and, upon the simple word of an individual, he hurried to attack a vessel belonging to a nation in friendship with his own, and to sacrifice the lives and property of Spanish citizens. Besides, by the subjoined declaration of Captain Escurra, you will see that the accusation made by the captain of the Coquette was false; and that if the individuals in the boat who came to examine his vessel committed any trifling excess, they were restrained in the act, and the guilty reserved for future punishment. But yet, admitting the truth of the complaint, the same Judge Johnson, in his opinion, says that those only who had committed the crime ought to be punished, and by no means the officers and the rest of the crew to which they belonged. Yet Captain Gregory, with his impetuosity, sacrificed the lives of those who were not yet accused, and the property of the owners of the privateer who never could be so. Very clear is the conduct which the captain of the Coquette and of the Grampus ought to have observed, if they believed the offence made out, to have demanded of the captain of the Palmyra the punishment of the guilty, and if that had been refused, to give information to this Government, to which that of Spain would have had the pleasure of giving the most prompt and complete satisfaction. Far from this, the Spanish flag has been insulted and attacked, Spanish citizens killed and wounded, Spanish property plundered and carried away on the high seas. Such atrocities call for a prompt and severe punishment, and I believe the informing you of them, sir, sufficient to persuade me that the President, pursuing the principles of justice which characterize him, will be pleased to give the most prompt and determined orders that the Palmyra be immediately restored and delivered to her captain, her crew set at liberty, satisfaction made for the immense damages caused to the owners of the privateer; and that, to give to Spain the satisfaction which is due to her for the outrage which has been committed on her in this circumstance, he will order an inquiry, in the competent tribunal, into the conduct of Captain Gregory, that he may be punished as those deserve who so scandalously violate the general laws of civilized nations and the treaties and particular connexion of two friendly powers.

I await your orders, sir, and renew the assurance of my high consideration.

PHILADELPHIA, October 16, 1822.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 10th of the present month, in which you are pleased to communicate to me that the commission established at Washington in fulfilment of the treaty of February 22, 1819, had judicially declared, on the 17th of June last, its intention of considering as null the liquidation made by the Spanish Government of the claims which you had against it, and of demanding other proofs of their validity and justice, concluding with asking me if you can be certain of the intervention of Spain in your favor, and that, in case of necessity, the documents, proceedings, and evidence, to which you alluded in the letter which you addressed to me in April of this year, would be presented.

What you communicate to me upon the resolution of the commission has surprised me above measure, and I am persuaded that it will not persist in it when it reflects on the injustice which it contains and the notable injury which it does to my Government.

The obligation and the desires of the commission in the examination of your claim can be no other than that of being convinced of its justice, in order to adjudge to you its amount. For this purpose, they ought to demand of you the most authentic and credible documents that are known in the country in which your claims took place; and if you exhibit them and prove that they have the greatest character of authenticity, and that they are authorized by the tribunals established for that purpose in said country, and by the persons to whom, being at the head of the Government, entire credit should be given, there being neither corporations nor individuals more elevated, and in whom greater confidence may be placed, it is clear that the commission cannot ask for more satisfactory evidence. Yet the liquidation which was made to you by the Spanish Government took place at the instances of the minister of the United States at Madrid; was not the work of subjects chosen by the ministry, but of the most respectable tribunals of Spain; was not examined by one only, but by various commissions, composed of persons of the greatest probity, high rank, and little disposed to favor you; and at last, after the most minute proceedings, received the sanction of the King. It is worthy of notice, that, when all this was done, there was no probability that the United States would be obliged to pay this debt, and that when the liquidation which was made to you was communicated to the minister of the United States at Madrid by the Minister of State he not only made no difficulty, but he returned thanks, in the name of his Government, and appeared very much satisfied with it. This liquidation, thus sanctioned by his Catholic Majesty, admitted and approved by the minister of the United States, is what you presented to the commission; and what document more convincing can be given by any Government? Will the commission give more credit to the signature of a notary, of a merchant, than to the testimony of the Council of Finance, of the great tribunal of accounts, of the Treasurer General, Minister of Finance, and, in one word, of the King himself? Will the commission refuse its credit to the monarch and authority to their constituents, the President of the United States? Can it be doubted that Spain made, with the most scrupulous exactness, a liquidation which, in the time of her greatest fiscal distresses, she thought herself bound to satisfy?

Although I am persuaded that you have made these reflections, I thought it my duty to point them out, in order to observe to you the natural consequence to be deduced from them, that the Spanish Government will consider it as a grievous insult to see the testimony considered as null which in Spain is acknowledged as the most sacred and respectable; that she will never consent that the legality and integrity with which your liquidation was made should be placed in doubt, which has all the characters of authenticity which could be given to it; and, in fine, that, although it were practicable to collect again the documents which served to make the aforesaid liquidation, his Catholic Majesty knows too well what is due to his high dignity, to the reputation of his ministers, and to the integrity of his tribunals, to admit that a foreign commission should think itself authorized to revise his decrees. As to the rest, you may be assured that I am ready to render you what good offices you may think necessary with this Government.

God preserve you many years.

SIR: The vice consul of Spain at Charleston has informed me, under date of the 28th of November last, that a certain Pereyra, a native of the Havana, detained in that prison, had been condemned as a pirate.

Inclosed I have the honor to send you an original, a judicial information, taken at the Havana, in which the innocence of the Pereyras of the crime of piracy is not only proved, but that they were forcibly torn from their firesides by the crew of an American vessel-of-war, and their property destroyed, in consequence of a violation of the Spanish territory, which produced the ruin of said family. In these circumstances, I pray you, sir, as the pressure of the case requires, to be pleased to obtain from the President an order for the suspension of the sentence fulminated against Pereyra, in order that his cause may be reconsidered with the presence of the subjoined document; and that, if the truth of its contents be proved, Pereyra may be set at liberty, and the violators of his Catholic Majesty's territory may be punished, and the damages and injuries originating from this crime be repaired.

NEW YORK, December 14, 1822.

SIR: The expedition formed in the ports of this Republic, and which sailed from thence in the month of August last, to conquer the island of Porto Rico and to separate it from Spain, has fixed the attention of all Europe. The effect which this extraordinary event has produced on the citizens of the United States proves, to a demonstration, the sentiments of virtue and probity which animate an immense majority of them, and that the attempts which unfortunately so frequently stain the meritorious reputation of these inhabitants are the work of a small number, and are felt and detested by the mass of the nation. The publications made on this noisy subject, in all the newspapers of the Union, clearly display this truth; and, at the same time that I admire and respect the virtues and sensibilities of the American people, I can do no less than give them the tribute of my sincere gratitude for the indignation they have shown at seeing their laws so scandalously trampled upon, and a nation, their friend, and from which they have received such great proofs of esteem and regard, so perfidiously dealt by.

The nature of the aforesaid expedition, the manner in which it has been framed, the publicity which it had before its sailing, the criminality or negligence which has appeared in the officers of the United States, are so odious, and so clearly is it the interest of the Government to show to the whole world, for its own reputation, that, far from approving such excesses, it hastens to repress them, and to punish them, as soon as they come to their knowledge, that I flatter myself that the bare mention which I have made to you, sir, of this event in my former notes was sufficient for the President to have taken those means dictated by his justice that the delinquents should suffer the punishment which they deserved; that the conduct observed on this occasion by the officers of the customs should be examined, and to the end that, by means of some communication, I should have been enabled to calm the uneasiness and concern which have been caused to his Catholic Majesty by an event so opposite to the friendship which unites him with this Republic and to the laws of all nations.

I will not do the President the injustice to doubt for a moment that he has taken the measures which public vengeance and the honor of this Republic demand; but I must express how much I am hurt that in so long a time you have not had the goodness to give me any explanation on so important a subject, and the means of fully acquainting his Catholic Majesty with the object I have just mentioned.

Such is the publicity of the aforesaid expedition, of its authors, of those who are parties to it, and of its event, that I think I may dispense with distracting your attention with the particulars, except that I ought to fix it upon the circumstance, of which I am assured, of Mr. Irvine, one of the chiefs of it, having been claimed by the captain of the United States corvette the Cyane from the governor of Curaçoa, who had arrested him upon the petition of Spanish officers. If this circumstance should be certain, it would give rise to consequences which it is impossible to admit, and I am persuaded that the President will reprove the conduct observed in this case by the commander of the Cyane, contrary, no doubt, to the instructions and intentions of his Government.

Although I anticipate the communication the President will be pleased to order me relative to the said expedition, which can be no other than that which the honor of this Republic and justice imperiously claim, I take the liberty of asking you, sir, to have the goodness to transmit it to me as soon as possible; my object in this request being to be able to dissipate, without more delay, the anxiety and uncertainty with which the silence of this Government upon a case so public and scandalous cannot fail to inspire his Catholic Majesty and all the Spaniards.

I repeat, sir, that I am at your disposal, assuring you of my very high consideration.

NEW YORK, January 6, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you a copy of a note which, under date of the 3d of September last, his excellency Don Evaristo San Miguel sent to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States near his Catholic Majesty. By that you will be pleased to observe that his Majesty has not thought himself bound to accede to the broad and free interpretation which the President has given to the articles two and seven of the treaty of 1819, concerning the artillery and munitions of war in the Floridas at the time of the delivery of those provinces, inasmuch as that interpretation would be injurious to Spain; and that he demanded, according to the literal tenor of the second article, the delivery of said artillery and other effects, his Majesty relinquishing the claim which he thought he had upon this Government to furnish provisions for the Spanish troops which were transported from the said provinces, and binding himself to reimburse the amount of the rations which were furnished as soon as the proper account of them should be presented and the orders for the delivery of the artillery, &c., should be furnished.

His Majesty does not doubt that the President, convinced of the justice and solidity of the reasons which have produced this determination, will not delay a moment in giving orders for the delivery of the artillery and other effects, and he has thought proper to command me to request it, as well as an account of the rations which were furnished to our troops by this Government. He has, moreover, authorized me, in case this Government should wish to purchase the whole or any part of the effects which ought to be delivered to us, to listen to its propositions of purchase, and to transmit them to his Majesty, observing to you, sir, that, if it shall be preferred that a valuation be made by experienced persons nominated by both parties, the one on our side will be pointed out when his Majesty is informed of the wishes of the President in this particular.

It being urgent for my Government to know as soon as possible the intentions of the President relative to this business, it has been pleased to order me to pray of you, sir, to have the goodness to communicate them to me as soon as may be possible; and, persuaded that you will cheerfully comply with my wishes, I confine myself to renew to you the assurances of my high consideration.

[Translation.]

Copy of a note transmitted on the 3d of September, 1822, by his excellency the Secretary of Despatch of State to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid.

SIR: The minister at Washington duly informed his Majesty of the disputes between the Spanish and American Commissioners charged with the delivery of the Floridas relative to the interpretation which was attempted to be given to the 2d article of the treaty, by pretending that in the word fortifications the artillery and munitions of war ought to be considered as included. This point being discussed by the respective Commissioners, they came to a provisional agreement, by which it was stipulated that the effects should remain in deposit until their Governments decided upon the business in question.

The principal reason which the Commissioners of your Government alleged for supposing that the artillery and munitions should be considered as included in the cession of the fortifications consisted in this: that the transportation of those effects not having been promised in the 6th article, it must be understood to have been the intention of the negotiator that they should be comprehended in the word fortifications. His Majesty's minister, in the note which he sent to Mr. Adams on the 27th July, 1821, showed that the artillery and munitions could not be comprehended in the fortifications, which consist of works built to defend a point in the way; that in the word barracks, the utensils which are in them for the service of the troops are not comprehended. These and other reasons being alleged by the minister, to show that the cession referred to the buildings, and in nowise to the movable effects which they might contain, he requested that, in fulfilment of the 2d article of the treaty, the artillery, munitions, and instruments of war in both the provinces at the time of the delivery should be given over to the Spanish Commissioners, that they might provide for their transportation agreeably to the orders which they had received.

In the answer which Mr. Adams gave on the 13th of August, 1821, to his Majesty's minister, he informs him of the correspondence which had taken place upon the subject between the respective Commissioners, and shows that the conduct of those of his Government had been approved of, as being conformable to the instructions which had been communicated to them. Mr. Adams added, that it was certain that in the 2d article of the treaty the cession of the artillery, &c., was not comprehended, because it was not expressed in precise terms; but that it was no less certain that, by the 7th article, the United States were not obliged to furnish provisions for the transportation of the Spanish troops, inasmuch as it was not expressly mentioned; that this being the strict and literal sense of each of the articles, the President had given a broad and free interpretation to their tenor by ordering that the necessary provisions should be furnished for the transportation of the Spanish troops, although they were not expressly mentioned in the 7th article, and considering the artillery and munitions of war in the fortifications as ceded, although not expressly mentioned in the 2d article; and, lastly, that the President was persuaded that the Spanish Government would not insist that the 2d article should be interpreted rigorously and the 7th literally, but that it would agree to give a liberal sense to both, knowing that that interpretation emanated from the same principle, and that if in one case it was favorable to the United States, in the other it was so to Spain.

The King's minister made it appear, in his answer to Mr. Adams on the 23d of August, that there was not between the 2d and 7th articles the analogy which was supposed, because, setting aside that the Spanish negotiator was no doubt well apprised that, in the transportation of the Spanish troops, it was understood the provisions should be furnished at the expense of the United States, as the transports were, there was not and could not be the pretended equality in the interpretation of both articles, because Spain would have ceded for a small number of rations the value of an artillery and munitions of great consideration, and the said minister concluded his note by showing that he would inform his Government of the correspondence which had passed upon the subject, that it might settle this point by a common agreement with that of the United States.

In the reply of Mr. Adams of the 25th of September, he brings forward the same arguments as in his former, insists upon the mutual convenience of the liberal interpretation of the articles, and leaves this point to the decision of both Governments.

These are the proceedings which have taken place in this business and the state in which it is left. His Majesty considers it as superfluous, after the discussion which has been had upon this point, to give new reasons in support of those given by his minister at Washington, to show that the artillery, munitions, and instruments are not comprehended in the cession of the fortifications. Both yourself, sir, and your Government have in your possession a copy of the cedula, order, which his Majesty addressed to the Captain General of the island of Cuba, under date of the 24th of October, 1820, and in that he tells him, "that the papers and effects which might belong to the nation, and might not be comprehended and mentioned in the expressed clauses of the cession, he should cause to be carried and transported to another point of the Spanish possessions."

Your Government cautiously examined the contents of the order, and never avowed pretensions to the artillery, although the phrase, the other papers and the effects which may belong to the nation, could not and ought not to be understood as having reference except to the papers not comprehended in the cession, and to the artillery and munitions of war; the movable effects are not comprehended in the cession of the immovable unless express mention of it is made, and the 2d article of the treaty speaks of fortifications and public buildings, and does not name the artillery nor the effects which they might contain. Your Government, sir, knows the irresistible force of these reasons; and hence it is that it has had no recurrence to an allegation of right, but to interpretations which it supposes reciprocally advantageous. It is evident that the pretended utility which the President supposes would result to both nations from the liberal interpretation of the 2d and 7th articles of the treaty, being admitted on the part of the Spanish Government, would cause injury of great consideration to Spain, because, in virtue of it, the United States would receive all the artillery, munitions, and instruments of war in both Floridas, the value of which is nearly about a hundred thousand dollars; and Spain, for a pretended equivalent, the provisions which were furnished to the transported troops, which, to judge by those given in West Florida, would not exceed the sum of $2,500.

It being demonstrated that the supposed reciprocity in the interpretation of the articles does not exist, his Majesty omits giving reasons sufficiently well founded, without having recourse to interpretations, to make it appear that the provisions for the Spanish troops ought to have been at the expense of your Government; since the 7th article, being extended by the Spanish negotiator, appears to raise a doubt, lest he wished to include the rations in the word transports, and that he made no particular expression of them from supposing that no doubt could arise upon the matter, because, in the transports for an expedition, speaking in a military manner, the provisions are included.

The King does not wish to make a merit of these and other reasons to show that the provisions ought to be at the expense of your Government, and, adhering scrupulously to the literal text of the articles, he yields the right, which he believes he has by the 7th article, to the furnishing by the United States of the provisions for the transportation of the Spanish troops, and demands that delivery be made, agreeably to the 2d article, of the artillery, munitions, and instruments of war, &c., which were in the magazines and fortifications of both Floridas at the time when those provinces were delivered up to your Government. In virtue of this mode of conciliating the interests of both powers, in conformity with the literal tenor of the treaty, his Majesty's Government is ready to make good to yours the sum which has been paid for furnishing the Spanish troops with provisions in their passage to the island of Cuba, as soon as the corresponding account of its amount is presented, and the proper orders have been despatched for placing the artillery and other effects at the disposal of the Spanish Government.

His Majesty, being of opinion that many of the articles which ought to be delivered over to Spain may be an accommodation to your Government, orders me to acquaint you, for the information of your Government, that it would not be inconvenient to sell the effects which might be of use to the United States, hearing their propositions, and making, in case of necessity, a valuation of them by skilful men appointed by both Governments.

The King promises himself that, by this means, agreeably to the literal tenor of the treaty, this business will be definitively concluded, which could have been terminated, at first, in the United States, between your Government and his Majesty's minister, without having given occasion to the disagreements, raised by this subject, between the Commissioners of both Governments; disagreements which your Government foresaw would occur, as the result of the instructions communicated by Mr. Adams to General Jackson, under date of the 23d of March, 1821. It has been a matter of great grief to the King that the American Government, which extended its foreknowledge to understand that, from the artillery not being delivered to the Spanish Commissioner, disgusts would originate, should not have, in obedience to justice and to the desire which has been manifested to avoid every cause of complaint between the two powers, hindered this compromise between the two Commissioners of both Governments, who, with contradictory orders, could not agree among themselves. To this and other acts, which might have been avoided, his Majesty attributes the disagreements which have taken place between the Commissioners of both powers; and that an operation so simple as the delivery of the Floridas has been accompanied with violent steps and insults offered to the Spanish Governors; and it is as certain that when the minds are exasperated in the commencement of a business, although it be for a cause of little import, it is not easy to bring it to a conclusion with a calmness, good faith, and cordiality which are necessary for its amicable and happy conclusion.

I hope, sir, that you will communicate this note to your Government, and I do the same on my part to his Majesty's minister at Washington, that an agreement may take place with the Federal Government upon the points of which it treats.

I renew to you, sir, the assurances of my most distinguished consideration, and pray God that you may live many years.

No. 26.

Don Joaquin de Anduaga to the Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

NEW YORK, February 23, 1823.

SIR: In the month of January last, the United States brig-of-war Spark being in the port of Havana, Captain Howell, of the American ship Nancy Elenora, presented himself to her commander, and informed him that a schooner which had robbed him two months before was then in the very port of Havana. The vessel accused was the Spanish merchantman named the Catalan Nymph. It appears that the commander of the Spark was with Captain Howell and two of his sailors, at the house of the commercial agent of the United States, Mr. Warner, and caused some declarations to be extended which said that the robbery had been committed in October last, near Honduras. Afterwards, without making the least representations to the authorities of the Havana, the Spark set sail, convoying the Nancy, at the same time that the Catalan Nymph sailed for Campeachy, and scarcely was she out of port when she was captured by the Spark and sent to Baltimore for adjudication for the pretended crime, into which port not having been able to enter for the ice, she has been carried to Norfolk. This is what Captain Howell and individuals of the Spark have published.

According to the official information which I have received from Norfolk, it turns out that the schooner Catalan Nymph, Captain Don Pablo Daunes, is a merchant vessel, sailing between the Havana and Campeachy, and carries one cannon and some muskets to defend herself against the pirates which infest the coast, her crew consisting of ten men; that on the present occasion she had sailed from the Havana with a cargo of brandy, wine, liquors, coffee, fruits, cloths, and other articles belonging to various individuals, and twelve passengers; that upon her sailing from the Havana, about three miles from the Moro, the Spark began to give chase to the Nymph; that the Captain, wondering at this, tried to return to the Havana, but the Spark cut off her retreat, and her commander made him come on board of him with his papers; that he afterwards ordered an officer with Captain Howell to go to the schooner, who did not recognize any individual, until at last Howell said that he recognized the boatswain as one of the pirates of whom he made a declaration; that Captain Daunes represented to the commander of the Spark that he should examine his papers and he would see that his vessel was a merchantman, or that he should carry her to the Havana, where he could deliver the boatswain to the authorities; that the said commander refused everything; that upon the arrival of the Nymph at Norfolk the captain and the ten sailors of the Nymph were publicly carried to prison, escorted by a troop of marines, the latter handcuffed; that the Spanish consul, having had recourse to the competent authority, obtained by the law of habeas corpus that the captain and crew should be set at liberty, except the boatswain, Nicholas Gargoy; and that two of the sailors, in consequence of such atrocities, were dangerously ill.

I have the honor to inclose to you copies of the declaration of Captain Howell, and of the representation which Captain Daunes has made to me; it appearing by this and other documents that on the 16th of October, when the robbery was said to have been committed, the Catalan Nymph was at Sisal, loading for Havana.

From this relation it results—

1. That the United States brig-of-war Spark being in the port of Havana, her commander received from the captain of another merchant vessel of the same nation a declaration that he had been plundered at sea by a schooner which at that time was in the very port of Havana.

2. That the said commander took before the commercial agent of the United States in the said city a declaration of the aforesaid Captain Howell upon his complaint.

3. That without further examination he resolved to capture the Nymph as soon as she should sail from the port.

4. That he did not make the least attempt with the competent authorities to investigate the foundation of the accusation, nor to punish the guilty, if it should be certain.

5. That he carried his intention into effect by actually capturing the Nymph in sight of the port.

6. That he refused to examine the papers of Captain Daunes and the just representations which he made to him.

7. That, by sending the Catalan Nymph to Norfolk, the proprietors and freighters of the vessel have suffered immense losses, and Spanish citizens have been treated in a manner the most unworthy, and two of them have been rendered so ill as to endanger their lives. And, in a word, that the commander of the Spark, in union with Mr. Warner, have erected in the port of Havana a tribunal to try Spaniards in the said city, to condemn them without a hearing, and to carry their sentence into execution in a manner so vile and treacherous that only a few examples of similar conduct can be met with among the pirates, whom the commander of the Spark has orders to pursue, and not to imitate.

I think it needless to observe that the commander aforesaid has covered with ignominy, upon this occasion, the uniform which he wears, and that the outrage which he has committed upon Spain is such as no doubt the Government of the United States will not delay a moment in punishing as a crime no less injurious to Spain than degrading to this Republic—in this manner proving to Europe that it wishes to preserve with his Catholic Majesty the ties which unite both nations. This provision is so much the more urgent, inasmuch as, if it should be tardy in the execution, it is impossible to calculate the effect which this delay will have in the Spanish dominions, into the ports of which the ships-of-war of the United States cannot be admitted with safety, after so scandalous an example. Thus, then, in compliance with the orders which I have from his Majesty to promote with all my power the means which may draw more close the friendship which he wishes to maintain with this Republic, and to remove what may be capable of relaxing it, I pray you, sir, be pleased to lay what I have explained before the President, and obtain from his justice the due punishment of the commander of the Spark, the restitution of the schooner Catalan Nymph, the liberty of the boatswain, and security for the immense losses and damages which the owners and shippers of the said vessel have sustained.

The importance of this business, and my anxiety to avoid the deplorable consequences which may ensue in the island of Cuba to the trade between the Spaniards and Americans, oblige me to request that you will be pleased to answer this note as soon as possible.

I repeat to you, sir, the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

Don Pablo Daunes to Don Joaquín de Anduaga.

[Translation.]

NORFOLK, February 12, 1823.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: Don Pablo Daunes, captain of the Spanish schooner named the Catalan Nymph, the property of Don Bartolomé Yglesias, Don José Calvet, Don Domingo Zubira, and Don Gregoria Garcia, passengers in said schooner and owners of some part of her cargo, all Spaniards, in their name and in that of the others interested, with the greatest respect, explains to your excellency that the said schooner having sailed from Havana on the 26th of January last, cleared by that custom-house and the respective authorities, bound to Campeachy, were detained on their voyage by the brig-of-war of the United States named the Spark, her commander, Wilkinson, under pretext of a declaration which it appears an American captain made to him in the Havana that the said schooner had plundered him. Having made Captain Daunes come on board of him, he caused the said American captain, with two sailors, to appear, whom he ordered, with his boat armed, on board the Nymph. They caused all the crew to appear, and the American captain referred to, after having hesitated some time, at last said he recognized her to be the same schooner which had plundered him, and pointed to one of the individuals, (who is the boatswain, Nicholas Gargoy,) saying that he likewise recognized him, which, being heard by his two sailors, although doubtful, they agreed in the same. At the same moment, the commander, Wilkinson, captured her as a pirate, put the crew in irons, and a prize captain and crew to conduct her to the United States. Captain Daunes presented to him the papers that he might see they were in due form, and represented to him that, carrying a cargo of value belonging to various individuals, he should carry her to the Havana, and that there he would be assured that he was not a pirate, and that neither the schooner nor that individual had plundered any vessel; and, on the contrary, she was a vessel of such credit that all the merchants preferred her for a cargo, and she always made voyages from Havana to Campeachy and Sisal with valuable cargoes. The commander, Wilkinson, would attend to nothing, nor look at the papers, wherefore Captain Daunes told him that he protested against the losses and damages which might result to the interested from an act so violent. Conducted to this port by a prize officer and crew, she arrived on the 8th current, and on the 9th, in the morning, they publicly conducted to the prison, escorted by troops, Captain Daunes and the crew (the latter in irons) and told the three passengers they might go where they pleased. These proceedings would have been just if they really were pirates, but being all persons of good credit in the Havana for their conduct, to whom interests of consideration were intrusted, Captain Wilkinson should have examined the papers, and, in case of suspicion, have carried them to the Havana, reflecting that a vessel, with a cargo of so great a value which he himself saw sail, and which had not a crew sufficient for committing piracies, was a scandalous, arbitrary act, contrary to the good understanding which subsists between the United States and Spain. The losses and damages which the owners of the schooner and cargo sustain are incalculable; the expenses of the exponents in this country considerable, in virtue of her being a Spanish merchant vessel, with her papers in due form, not pirates, as Captain Wilkinson supposes, and the robbery which he attributes to her being also a supposition, as, upon the 16th of October last, which appears evident in the declaration, the robbery was committed near the Honduras, it can be easily proved, and even here, by letters which are in the possession of Captain Daunes, that at that time the schooner was in Sisal loading for the Havana, and that she had never gone so far as those points. The invariable rules of justice and of the good understanding used by nations, and chiefly between the United States and Spain, imperiously demand that the Government of the United States immediately order the restoration of the schooner and cargo to their owners, with security for all the losses, damages, and deteriorations, which may be the result of the said capture, inasmuch as it has been committed by one of their vessels and officers without its being deserved, and contrary to every rule of justice, as also indemnification to the individuals of the crew of the stigma of pirates and ill treatment which they have suffered, to which their refined conduct never caused them to be subjected: Therefore the exponents entreat your excellency, with the utmost submission, as their only protector, to be pleased to claim of the Government of the United States the restoration of the vessel and cargo, security for losses and damages, and indemnification which they solicit, which they hope from your accredited zeal, and whose life, &c.

Don Joaquin de Anduaga to the Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

NEW YORK, March 6, 1823.

SIR: Under date of the 14th of December of last year I had the honor to address you a note, requesting explanations on the expedition from these ports for the conquest of the island of Porto Rico, and the disapprobation of the conduct of the captain of the United States corvette Cyane, in the claim which he was said to have made to the Governor of Curaçoa in favor of Mr. Irvine, one of the chiefs of that expedition. Lately I have received official letters from my Government, in which is energetically expressed the surprise of his Catholic Majesty at seeing the possessions of Spain attacked in a manner so public and scandalous by the citizens of a power to which so great and so costly proofs have been given of its friendship; and although it has appeared to him extraordinary that the President should have been ignorant of preparations made with so little secrecy, and that a collection of men and of ships, laden with munitions of war, in the ports nearest to the capital, should have been able to be concealed from him; nevertheless, judging by his own sentiments of those which he believed animated the President, he did not doubt that it was so, and that this Government, the instant it should have notice of such an event, would hasten to take the most vigorous measures for the punishment of the delinquents and for preventing such excesses in future; and, above all, that to prove to his Majesty and to all Europe the indignation produced to it by this attempt, it would have been gratified in giving to the cabinet of Spain the satisfaction and explanations which so odious a breach of the laws of nations and of the friendship which unites this Republic with Spain so imperiously demanded. This persuasion was so natural that it is very easy to calculate what effect it would have on the mind of his Majesty, and on that of all the Spaniards, to know that this Government not only has thought proper not to give a spontaneous explanation on an event injurious to Spain, and which in so shameful manner stains the good faith and reputation of this Republic, but that an answer has been withheld for so many months to the notes which I have had the honor to address to it on this subject. The consequence which should be drawn from this cannot escape your penetration. It is very clear that if, from the ports of Spain, an expedition should depart for the attack and conquest of a province of the United States, and that his Catholic Majesty should not only not give at the time explanations of his ignorance and disapprobation of it, but that he should neglect the representations of the American minister at Madrid, the President would have a right to believe that that hostile measure had been carried into execution, if not with the consent of the Spanish Government, at least with its connivance. But if the conviction which I have of the equity of the President, and of his desire to maintain with Spain the amity which happily subsists, prevents me from drawing, in the case whereof I treat, that consequence, evident as it may appear, I cannot help seeing in your silence a singular indifference to the feelings of his Catholic Majesty, in respect to the attacks which his possessions and subjects receive on the part of the Americans. I know how painful this will be to my Government, and how grievous not to see its friendship towards this Republic answered in a correspondent manner, nor the proofs which it has given of it; and anxious to tranquilize it, I take the liberty of requesting you to be pleased to answer my note of the 14th of December last, not doubting but that it will be such as will calm the inquietude and uneasiness which must be caused in the mind of his Catholic Majesty by the expedition referred to, and by having left my notes unanswered.

I renew to you, sir, therefore, the assurance of my high consideration.

Don Joaquin de Anduaga to the Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

NEW YORK, March 7, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor to send you inclosed copies of the protest made in Pensacola by Don Jacinta Correa, captain of the Spanish schooner called the Carman, alias Galliga the Third, and of a judicial declaration made by the same before the consul of Spain in New Orleans.

In both documents are set forth the capture of the said schooner by the United States ship-of-war Peacock and the oppression and robbery committed by her crew, all which has been confirmed to me by the Captain General of the Havana, and by the consul of Spain in New Orleans. As the circumstances of these crimes are expressed in the inclosed documents I avoid repeating them in this note, and shall rest content with calling your attention to three of the principal, which are, the Peacock having made the capture with the Spanish flag, the violation of the public correspondence between two provinces of his Catholic Majesty, and the malicious contrivance of Captain Cassin in sending the crew of the Carman to Pensacola and the vessel to New Orleans, that there might be no one to defend her there. Such violations of all public law, and such refined perfidy, are so evident and odious that I think it unnecessary to insist upon them, since it would be doing an injury to the sense and justice of this Government. Notwithstanding the insidious precaution of Captain Cassin, scarcely had the courts of Pensacola and New Orleans examined the case, when the former declared the crew innocent and set them at liberty, and the other ordered the restitution of the vessel, which saves me the trouble of proving the illegality of the capture; and it only remains with me to request that the President would be pleased to order satisfaction to the owners of the schooner Carman for the losses and damages which they have sustained, and that the money and effects of which they have been plundered be restored to the crew. This is what it concerns me to ask in favor of said individuals; but the just satisfaction of my Government, the assurance in future of due respect to the Spanish flag and the lives and property of Spanish citizens, imposes upon me the obligation of speaking to you with that frankness which ought to subsist between two friendly powers whose interest it is to maintain the greatest harmony.

The injuries done by this country to his Catholic Majesty and to his subjects are not confined to expeditions of individuals for the conquest of his provinces, to hostilities under the insurgent flag, to building armed ships for the enemies of Spain, to furnish these men with munitions of war, &c.; but they have gone to attack publicly the vessels of Spain by ships-of-war of the United States, and to trample upon Spanish citizens by American officers; the excess being carried to such a pitch that his Catholic Majesty's territory is violated, and if a speedy check be not put to it the Spanish commerce must be in dread of the ships-of-war of a nation which is said to be friendly as it would of another with which it was in a complete state of rupture.

The violations of neutrality and of friendship between two nations, committed by individuals, always give room to the offended power to believe that they have taken place without the knowledge and against the will of the Government of the aggressors, and that it will grant a competent satisfaction; but when this is not only refused, and not even private citizens but the ships and officers of that Government give the insult and commit hostilities with its approbation, since it neither punishes them nor prevents them from continuing their aggressions, the illusion must cease, and, alarmed for the intentions of said Government, the imperious obligation which it is under of protecting its subjects lays it under the necessity of demanding a frank explanation of them, and indispensable provisions for the putting a stop to the scandal of acts which continue could only be followed by consequences which his Catholic Majesty has a lively desire of avoiding, it being his most sincere wish to preserve inviolate the friendship which he professes towards this Republic.

Vain have been my repeated remonstrances to obtain satisfaction for the insults offered to my Government and fellow-citizens by the American officers. And if, in the courts of the United States, the Spaniards have found justice, the Government has not only refused my petitions, but has not even given an answer to the greater part of my notes. The very sentences of the courts prove the justice of my complaints against the said officers; and when it is seen that this Government, in spite of these complaints and the opinion of the most eminent and just judges of this Republic, refuses to his Catholic Majesty the satisfaction which is his due, does not answer the representations of his minister, and continues its protection and favor to the officers accused, the suspicion is allowed that its friendly sentiments towards Spain have undergone an alteration. This doubt will be extremely painful to his Catholic Majesty, wherefore I spend more time in requesting you to be pleased to clear it up, and this can be done in no other way than by giving to his Majesty the satisfaction which he has demanded for so great injuries, with the punishment of the officers who have committed them, and especially of Captain Cassin, and giving the most peremptory orders that they be not repeated.

The multiplied proofs of friendship which his Majesty has given to this Republic, the sacrifices which he has made in its favor, and the utility which results to both nations in the continuance of a good understanding between both, are to me a sure guaranty that the President, deigning to take into consideration the important contents of this note, will be pleased to order such an answer to it as will at once dissipate the disagreeable impressions which the acts of the American officers have made, and assure his Catholic Majesty that his desires for the continuance of the strictest friendship with this Republic will be fulfilled.

I repeat my devotion to you, sir, and pray you to accept the assurance of my high consideration.

No. 29.

Don Hilario de Rivas y Salmon to the Secretary of State, April 15, 1823.

[Translation.]

SIR: Don Richard Meade, a citizen of the United States, addressed two letters to my predecessor, his excellency Don Joaquin de Anduaga, dated April 4 and October 10, 1822, inclosing your correspondence with the Commissioners appointed in virtue of the 11th article of the treaty of the 22d of February, 1819, ratified by his Catholic Majesty and exchanged in February, 1821, relative to the admission of certain claims which are therein mentioned. The said gentleman sent these documents to my Government, along with the answer which he made to Mr. Meade, on the 16th of October, 1822, copy of which I have the honor to inclose to you.

His Majesty has been pleased to approve and sanction the said answer to Mr. Meade, and commands me to support his claims, and to represent to you, in the most friendly terms, but, at the same time, in the most energetic and solemn manner, against all opposition which may be attempted to be made, that the particular credit which said Meade had against the Spanish nation is not satisfied, but that, in virtue of the last treaty, the Government of the United States has taken it upon itself.

This credit is, in truth, the only one which has been solemnly acknowledged by his Catholic Majesty. It was executed at the pressing instances of the minister of the United States at Madrid, and its acknowledgment and final liquidation took place at a time and in circumstances which do not admit the least doubt to ensue as to its legitimacy and import.

The value of the credit was represented to both Governments during the negotiation. Its liquidation could be effected only by the parties interested in the contracts and in the damages and injuries by which an indemnification was claimed, and the investigation, with precision of the exact sum which was due, appeared to be a point of equal interest to both Governments. This was at least shown and insisted on with vigor by the Government of the United States before and after the date of the treaty; and his Catholic Majesty, when he acceded to its anxiety, desirous of shunning new causes of complaint, chose four of his counsellors, from different tribunals, and commanded them to examine, scrupulously and in detail, all the circumstances regarding an account so complicated, and which required all the possible knowledge and intelligence of the laws of Spain and commercial regulations of the nation to be able to form a just conception of all the transaction. No subject of this nature has been ever considered so cautiously and with so much matureness, not only by the Commissioners appointed for that purpose, but, latterly, by the Treasurer General, by the greater accountant's office, by the Minister of Finance, and, lastly, it received the sanction of his Majesty.

In these circumstances, his Majesty thinks that he ought not to see with indifference, nor remain undisturbed, when an attempt is made to invalidate an act so solemn. The Spanish nation was certainly responsible for the total amount of the acknowledged debt. The Government of the United States, by the latter ratification of the treaty, took upon itself this debt, in virtue of the fifth renunciation of the 11th (9th) article, and with a full knowledge of its amount, which had been communicated long before the conclusion of the treaty to the minister of the United States at Madrid by his Majesty's Secretary of State for the information of the American Government. Certainly, after all that has passed, it was not to be expected that a new investigation of the business should be judged necessary.

There cannot be a doubt that if the treaty of the 22d of February had not been concluded, Mr. Meade would have received from the Spanish nation the total amount of his debt; and his Majesty cannot comprehend the justice of the Commissioners in having attempted, in the first place, to reject entirely this debt as not being comprehended in the treaty, and much less could his Majesty be persuaded that so solemn an act of his Government, an act which was in a great degree founded upon the interposition of the American cabinet, and which was done in good faith, would have been afterwards placed in doubt by their agents.

The slight which the commission of claims has endeavored to throw upon the most respectable authorities of Spain, and upon his Majesty himself, and consequently on the whole nation, has caused his Majesty great pain.

I have, therefore, the order of my Government to inform you that it cannot keep silence when an act so incontestable is placed in doubt, and I beforehand protest solemnly and respectfully against any decision of the Commissioners appointed in virtue of the treaty which invalidates, in any manner, the acknowledgment made by my Government of the total debt of Mr. Meade, agreeably to the certificate which they sent to him in consequence and which is in their possession.

I have the honor to repeat to you, sir, the testimony of my distinguished and high consideration.

APRIL 23, 1823.

SIR: I recommend very forcibly to your attention the letter of Dr. Pablo Chacon, a copy of which I have the honor to inclose, respecting the business of the Spanish schooner the Ninfa Catalana. My predecessor sent you two notes, dated the 23d and 28th of February last, concerning the unjust detention of this vessel and the scandalous insulting of her crew without any motive or cause whatever. His excellency accompanied this sad truth with sufficient proofs, but, for the greater abundance, I now inclose other testimony, which I have just received from the Havana, of the process raised there by the consignee of the said vessel. You will find that it is in accordance with the other proofs, and forms, with them, one whole. But what more evident proof can be required of the innocence of the whole crew and of the atrocious injustice of the captors than that the whole individuals of it being set free in virtue of the habeas corpus in their favor?

Permit me, sir, to repeat with efficacy the representations of his excellency on this business, and I pray you to obtain from your Government a decision prompt and satisfactory to his Majesty and the subjects of Spain, so grievously injured in their reputation and interests.

I renew to you, sir, the assurance of my respect and high consideration.

MARCH 4, 1823.

In consequence of what I mentioned to your excellency in my official letter of the 17th of February last, relative to the decree by the Junta of Government of this national consulship, on the event which took place to the Spanish schooner named Ninfa Catalana on her sailing from this port with the American brig-of-war Spark, I now send to your excellency a copy of the memorial which Don Pedro Lopez, a merchant here, has presented to me, as consignee of the vessel, inclosing at the same time testimony of the process which has been raised upon the business, in order that your excellency may be pleased to take the representations which you may think best, as well in regard to the vessel as of the rest which is mentioned. I recommend very particularly to your excellency this business, in which the national honor and the interests of this trade are concerned.

God preserve your excellency many years.

Testimony in the case of the Ninfa Catalana.

[Translation.]

HAVANA, January 31, 1823.

PETHON.

SEÑOR SUPERIOR POLITICAL CHIEF: Don Pedro Lopez, merchant of this city, and consignee of the Spanish schooner Ninfa Catalana, Captain Don Pablo Daunes, with the usual respect says: That being charged with the despatch of said vessel for the port of Campeachy, she sailed for that destination on the twenty-sixth of the present month, under the formal and circumspect order which our laws prescribe; and when I thought that she was pursuing the course of her voyage, yesterday a letter from her captain was delivered to me, informing me of his having been detained, or rather captured and maltreated, by the United States brig-of-war called the Spark; I being obliged, in such a case, to make the protest, which I duly present in testimony. By said document you will see at first that the only pretext for such a proceeding is that a merchant captain, also an American, complained to the commander of the Spark that the boatswain and the schooner Ninfa herself, coming from Cadiz, had robbed him; and when delicacy, the law of nations, that of reciprocal alliance and friendship, the laws of the territory, and the consideration just and due to its authorities legally constituted, might have dictated that he should have had recourse to the judicial power of this capital, in order that the accuser and accused might be heard in form, and the matter be determined as civilized nations are accustomed to do, the commander of the Spark feigned not to understand at all; he remained until the sailing of the schooner Ninfa to perpetrate the offence which produces the protest which I am about to make. From such a proceeding you will infer that the navigation, the commerce, and the property of the Spaniards are subject to the caprice of a malicious man, who, without any appearance of justice, may wish to destroy at once the most sacred rights of men in society; that the laws and authorities of the Spaniards are of so little value and importance that the simple will of one man renders them not only insignificant, but also insecure and so despised that, with an unheard-of freedom, the said brig Spark has returned to enter this port yesterday, bringing several passengers of the Ninfa with her. In virtue of this, and with a reservation of the rights of others who act with me, I entreat you that, receiving as presented the protest which I now produce, you will be pleased to take into your superior consideration an act so scandalous, that the true spirit of general law and of the common laws may be put in force; what is necessary may be done, that this occurrence may not remain unpunished to prevent its progress; that the entire losses and damages may be made good; that the guilty be punished; that it may not be concealed from the respective Governments, and that we may be Spaniards in reality and not in theory. All which in justice I implore from you.

TESTIMONY OF PROTEST.

HAVANA, January 31, 1823.

In the always faithful city of the Havana, on the thirtieth of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-three, before me, the public notary, and the witnesses, appeared Don Pedro Lopez, an inhabitant and merchant here, to whom I give credit and whom I know, and said, that about half-past one in the afternoon of this day the American brig-of-war of the United States called the Spark entered this port, and there was delivered to him, as he says, a letter by Don Ignatio Lopez, dated at sea, the 26th of the current month, subscribed by Don Pablo Daunes, the tenor of which is literally as follows:

"AT SEA, January 26, 1823.

"SIR: The brig of Don Pedro Martinez having this morning made the signal for getting under way, I weighed and went out, the American brig-of-war named the Spark having gone before, and being about pistol shot from her, he ordered me to launch the boat, which I obeyed, and he told me that I was accused of having robbed the American schooner, which had this day sailed from this port of the Havana, called or named the Elenora, Captain Howell; and said Howell having gone on board to recognize the men, said that it is the boatswain, Nicholas Gongoll, very old in this vessel, as you and the house of Sogas know; said Howell also said that the schooner Ninfa Catalana was the same that had robbed him; and thus I have endeavored to show you the whole truth, as all the merchants of the Havana, it appears to me, know me and the vessel; that we have never been guilty of any crime, either the vessel, myself, or the crew. They command us to follow, it appears, to Baltimore or Charleston, and I have charged the commander with the losses which may take place. I desire you to pass and send it to your friend Pablo Daunes. Do not fail to write me, and to speak with some one who has knowledge of these matters, or others whom I mention, how we may conduct ourselves, and write to Iglesias.

"Senor Don PEDRO LOPEZ."

It is conformable to said letter which I, the notary, corrected and compared, and have returned sealed to the same Don Pedro Lopez, to whom I refer, who pursues, saying, that having been informed by the same D. Ignacio Lopez, D. Juan Pastor, D. Juan Alvarez, D. Salvador Fernandez, and others, who may be named in time and form, passengers and shippers, interested in the Spanish schooner Ninfa Catalana; that in fact, being on board said vessel, within cannon shot of the Moro Castle of this port, the aforesaid schooner Ninfa Catalana was detained, seized, and manned by the crew of the American brig-of-war Spark, by the order and will of her commander, manning her with eighteen of the crew of the said brig, with two marine guards, leaving on board of the same Ninfa her armament, putting manacles on the boatswain and irons on his feet, and leaving the captain, D. Pablo Daunes, and three passengers free; in which state it was determined, as the said witnesses understood and will agree with their signatures as proof, and likewise mentioned in the letter which has just been produced, that they directed the said schooner to the port of Charleston, or of Baltimore, observing that the before mentioned American brig-of-war sailed from this port on the same twenty-sixth day of the current month, half an hour before the schooner Ninfa Catalana: so that the attack was premeditated, in violation of the laws of justice and of nations, of the local authorities of the territory, of a friendly flag, and of the reciprocal respect which civilized nations insure to commerce and the nation. Wherefore, there being no example of a similar crime, leaving safe all the resources which may be favorable to him and the laws allow him, he protests, once, twice, thrice, and four times, if it be necessary, and the laws authorize him, against the commander, crew and vessel of the said American brig-of-war Spark, of the United States of America, for the detention, seizure, losses, damages, injuries, demurrage, consequent damage, and profit ceasing, expenses and charges which such a proceeding may occasion, that they may be refunded to those who may be lawfully interested in the before mentioned Spanish schooner Ninfa Catalana, hull, keel, and other appurtenances, as well to those who may be her shippers, as whatever else may be necessary of her hull.

In testimony whereof, thus he said, agreed, and signed, at half-past five in the afternoon of this day, with the other individuals referred to as witnesses, D. José Segundo, D. Calletano Covisor, and D. Francisco Valerio, inhabitants and present. Pedro Lopez, Salvador Hernandez, at the request of D. Ignacio Lopez, and D. Juan Alvarez, who in the act declared that they knew not how to sign; Francisco Valerio, Juan Pastor, José de Salinas. Agreeable to the original, which remains in the archive of this notarial office under my charge, to which I refer, and upon the petition of Don Pedro Lopez I give these presents in duplicate.

JOSE SALINAS.

PETITION.

To the Acting Captain General:

D. Pedro Lopez, an inhabitant and merchant of this city, and consignee of the Spanish schooner Ninfa Catalana, Captain D. Pablo Daunes, with due respect explains to you that, by the former decree which provides that competent information be received before the Auditor of War which may establish the truth of the facts to which he confines himself in his former process, and to fulfil it, it is proper for him that you will be pleased to order that those to whom he refers in his said memorial should say, under the solemnity of an oath, and declare, respecting the following particulars, 1st. If they know Don Bartolomé Iglesias, owner and captain of the said schooner, D. Pablo Daunes, second captain, and accidentally first, he (Iglesias) having been left sick in Campeachy, and Nicolas Gongall, boatswain in the present voyage, formerly a sailor in her, incapable from their known honor of having committed hostility or injury upon any vessel of a friendly or allied power, it being impossible, from the said circumstances, that they could have tolerated any other individual belonging to the said schooner to have perpetrated the crime of which the commander of the American brig-of-war Spark accuses them. That they say, as they know and is evident to them, that from the 26th of November of the year 1818, when the aforesaid Iglesias purchased the said schooner Ninfa Catalana of D. Martin de Zavala, to the present time, he has made no other voyage than to Campeachy, Sisal, or other port of the Gulf of Mexico, without ever having seen or heard of this vessel having been destined to other places than those mentioned. In the same manner, that Don Ignacio Lopez, or any other of the witnesses to whom it may be known, say how he knows that the accusation which the American schooner made of the Ninfa Catalana, to the commander of the brig already cited, arises from the resentment of a sailor of the former against one of the latter, who shall certainly be the boatswain of her, for not having permitted him to make fast a rope to the Ninfa when he came alongside of the former at the wharf, for which reason the American threatened that he would pay him, and this was the cause of the false accusation already related; wherefore I entreat you to be pleased to accede to this request agreeably to justice.

In the ever faithful city of the Havana, on the 3d of February, 1823, before the Acting Auditor of War, appeared Don Ignacio Lopez, a native of the Kingdom of Galicia, an inhabitant of Campeachy, and at present a resident here, a married man, and by profession a merchant, who made oath in due form of law, under which he offered to speak the truth; and being examined by the particulars of the foregoing interrogatory and memorial of the former page, said, after being informed of the said memorial and of the protest which accompanies it, that the passage is certain and true which the last relates, in which appears copied the letter which the captain of the schooner Ninfa Catalana directed to Don Pedro Lopez, his consignee, which fact took place at the distance of a cannon shot from the Moro, loading the boatswain of the schooner Ninfa and the sailors with chains; and answers, being interrogated on the first particular, he said: That he knows the individuals to whom the interrogatory refers, whom he takes and has taken for honest men, and of regular conduct, not having ever heard it said that the said individuals could have committed the crime of which they have been accused by the captain of the schooner which was said to be robbed, conceiving at the same time that such an imputation is a falsehood; and answers to the second, that it is certain that, from the date which is cited, the voyages which the said schooner has made have been to the ports which the interrogatory mentions, in the Gulf of Mexico, without having heard it said that she had been destined to other points than those related; to the third and last, that it is certain that the accusation which the captain of the American schooner made has no other origin than that which is related as having passed in the terms written; and answers that what he has declared is the truth, in virtue of the oath which he has taken; that he is forty years of age. It was read to him, and he declared it to be correct; that he is not comprehended in the general principles of the law; does not sign from not knowing how; which I attest. Before me,

In the ever faithful city of the Havana, the same day, month and year, before the same S<sup>or</sup> Auditor, appeared Don Salvador Fernandez, a native of Galicia, a married man, and by profession a merchant, to whom an oath was administered, which he made with due form of law, under which he promised to speak the truth; and being examined as to the foregoing, said, that the event is certain and true, described in the memorial of the first page and the protest, which is added in testimony, as it happened accordingly and as this document relates it, which is evident to him in consequence of his being on board the schooner Ninfa Catalana on the day mentioned, as he had taken his passage in her for Campeachy; to which port she was bound and proceeded about a cannon shot's distance from the Moro; and answers, being interrogated by the first particular of the preceding interrogatory, said, that he has been in the habit of sailing upwards of two years in the said schooner, for the purchase and sale of his merchandise, for which reason he knows and is acquainted with the persons whom the interrogatory indicates, whom he has considered, and still considers as men of honorable proceedings, who are incapable of committing hostilities, or allowing them to be committed, or causing damage to any vessel belonging to nations our allies; and answers to the second, that, by what he has related in his former answer, he knows that the schooner Ninfa Catalana has not directed her voyages to other ports than those mentioned. To the third and last, that it is certain the declarant was present, and also one of the sailors of the schooner Ninfa, who had been brought by the orders of the American brig Spark; and answers that what he has declared is the truth, in virtue of his oath; that he is twenty-seven years of age; it was read to him and he declared it to be correct and signed it, declaring that he is not comprehended in the general principles of the law. The Auditor did it, which I attest.

DECLARATION.

In continuance of the act, appeared before his lordship D. José Ferrer, a native of Catalonia, a married man, domiciliated in Campeachy, and by profession a merchant, to whom was administered the oath in the form prescribed by law, under which he promised to speak the truth; and being examined by the memorial of the first page, which was read to him, as also the protest, which is added in testimony, said, that the fact is certain and true which the memorial and protest mention as having happened on the date and in the terms which the letter inserted in the protest indicates, the schooner Ninfa Catalana being distant about a cannon shot from the Moro; and answers, being interrogated by the first particular of the preceding interrogatory, said, that from having made voyages in the schooner Ninfa Catalana, as a passenger, he knows the persons mentioned, whom he has considered and considers as men of all honor, incapable, from their good qualities, of committing hostilities or causing damage to any vessel belonging to nations our allies, or of permitting a sailor belonging to her to commit it; and answers to the second, for the reason already given, he is equally certain that the said schooner has made no other voyages than to the points which the interrogatory indicates; and answers to the third and last, that he is ignorant of it, although he has heard it said in the same vessel, for which reason he does not assert it; and answers that what he has declared is the truth, in virtue of his oath; that he is of the age of thirty-five years; that it was read to him, and he declared it to be correct; he did not sign from not knowing how; the Auditor did it, which I attest.

DECLARATION.

In the ever faithful city of the Havana, on the fourth of February, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-three, before acting Auditor of War, appeared Don Juan Pastor, a native of Tarragona, in the principality of Catalonia, and an inhabitant of Merida, in Yucatan, a widower, and professionally a merchant, whose oath was taken by God and the Holy Cross, under which he promised to speak the truth; and being examined by the preceding representations and the protest, which is added in testimony, being read to him, he said that the said protest attests the truth of the facts, for which purpose he subscribed it, the said first memorial being also agreeable to it. Being examined by the contents of the second, he said that he knows the persons who are mentioned, and has sailed with them, and by the same he can say, with all safety, that they are honorable men, of irreproachable conduct, and thus he considers them incapable of having committed any hostility on vessels belonging to a friendly nation, esteeming whatever may be said to the contrary as a calumny; he can do no less than represent, that, having requested the captain of the American brig-of-war to mark the point at which the schooner Ninfa Catalana had caused the damage, as she had been in the trade from Campeachy to the Havana about four years, the declarant being the consignee in Sisal, and he answered in his language, and by an interpreter, that he did not know. To the second, that all that is related in the interrogatory is certain, and answers that what he has declared is the truth, in virtue of his oath; that he is advanced in age. It was read to him, and he declared it to be correct, and signed it with his lordship, which I attest—one dash.

In continuation, appeared before his lordship Don Juan Alvarez de Castro, a native of Galicia, and inhabitant of this city, a bachelor, and his business that of a merchant, who made oath, in due form of law, under which he promised to speak the truth; and being examined by the memorial of the first page, which was read to him, as well as the protest, which accompanies it in testimony, said: That what both documents express is certain and true, because, as a passenger of the schooner Ninfa Catalana, he was present at the whole and assisted in forming the protest; and being examined by the other representations, said: To the first, that he knows all the persons who are named, whom he considers as men of honorable conduct, and does not believe capable of having committed the crime which the commander of the American brig-of-war Spark, belonging to an allied nation, attributes to them. To the second, that, as far as the interrogatory contains, is well known to him, and answers that what he has declared is the truth by the oath which he has taken; that he is forty-six years of age. It was read to him, and he declared it to be correct. He did not sign, as he said he did not know how, which was done for him, which I attest.

To the second, that what the interrogatory expresses is known to him, except the date when the schooner was purchased, and answers that what he has declared is the truth by his oath; that he is thirty-one years of age. It was read to him, and he declared it to be correct, and signed with his lordship, which I attest.

the twenty-sixth of November, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, when his consigner, Don Bartolomé Iglesias, purchased her, according to the testimony of writing which duly accompanies. Certify in continuation, if from any of them it appear that she had at any time been despatched to the port of Cadiz; and, as is the truth, that from the said date to the present time she has performed no other voyages than to the Gulf of Mexico and almost constantly to Campeachy; as also that the said Iglesias has constantly commanded her, whose conduct has been irreprehensible in his command of captain and master of her; therefore he entreats your excellency to be pleased to order that the certificate which he solicits by the principal be proved to him by the said office, and the act be delivered to him, to serve him as a proof in what he intends doing respecting the false accusation which the captain of an American merchant vessel made against said schooner to the commander of the brig-of-war which took her and is now in the port; which is justice, and which he expects from your excellency's equity.

TESTIMONY.

Be it known that I, Don Martin Zavala, an inhabitant and merchant of this place, by these presents agree to sell, really, in favor of Don Bartolomé Iglesias, an inhabitant of the city of Campeachy, residing in this, of the Havana, a Spanish merchant schooner, my property, named Sircasiana, of the burden of one hundred and sixteen and a half tons; the same which I had and purchased of a citizen of the United States of America, Patrick Ayres, for himself, and as attorney of William Wood, merchant, of Philadelphia, as appears from the writing lodged in this very archive, and before the present notary, on the eleventh of September of the past year, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, at which date she was naturalized and matriculated in this province, with the formalities of the ordinance, being placed in the roll of the register at folio one thousand four hundred and eighty-two of the lists of smaller vessels; and she was sold, moored, and anchored in this port with all her masts, sails, anchors, rigging, rudder, bowsprit, yards, binnacle, launch or boat, and other necessaries, as appear from her inventory, with which the purchaser was furnished free from all demands, claims, and obstacles, from which, in sufficient form, I insure and make her good for the price and clear sum of one thousand five hundred and fifty dollars, which I have received of the aforesaid in current money in hand and admit as paid to my satisfaction. I renounce the proof, laws of delivery, specie, fraud, and other things of the case, of which I acknowledge the formal receipt, by which I declare that the just price and value of the said schooner Circaciana, at the time of her last bidding at the public vendue of Don Mariano Canelas on the twenty-fourth current, is that of those who know, one thousand five hundred and fifty dollars, for which the highest bid was made; but if somewhat more is or may be the value of the excess, whatever it may be, I make a gift and donation to the purchaser, mere, pure, perfect, and irrevocable, the assignable right and title, (titula intervivos;) with all the clauses, entails, requisites, and stabilities necessary for its validity. In virtue of which, I abandon and desist from the right, property, possession, use, dominion, and other actions, real and personal, which I held or had to the said schooner, and all her advantages; I give up and transfer the whole to the purchaser and his lawful representative, that, as his own property, he may possess, sell, or alienate her at his pleasure, in virtue of this writing, which I acknowledge in his favor, in token of the real delivery with which he is seen to have acquired his possession and dominion, without the necessity of other proof, from which I exonerate him, and bind myself to the security and guarantee of this sale with my property, present and future, in sufficient form of right and as may be most proper, in favor of the purchaser, who, being present, received in his favor this writing; by it he receives the purchase of the said schooner, which, by his order, has since been named the Ninfa Catalana; and for her being delivered to his satisfaction he renounces the proof, laws of delivery, fraud, and other things of the case, of which he acknowledges the formal receipt. In testimony whereof, it is dated in the ever faithful city of the Havana, the 26th of November, 1818. I, the Notary of War Marine, attest, know the person granting, that thus they said, granted, and signed. Witnesses: Don Carlos Alvarez, Don Manuel Lopez, and Don José Poso, inhabitants, and present.

Pablo Daunes, from the said Iglesias having been left sick in the said port of Campeachy, as the whole is plain by the rolls of said vessel in this office. And that it is evident, I give the present, in consequence of the provision of this date of his excellency the Commander General of the Marine of this station, returned in the instance presented by D. CERTIFIED COPY.

Mr. President, and Members of the Economical and Administrative Junta of the Consulate:

Don Pedro Lopez, an inhabitant and merchant here, with due respect represents to you, that on account of his being in this port, consignee of the Spanish schooner named Ninfa Catalana, Captain Don Pablo Daunes, he loaded and despatched her for that of Campeachy, and she set sail on the twenty-sixth of the current month; and when he was calculating on the issue of his navigation, he yesterday received a letter from said captain, informing him of the capture which he had undergone by the United States brig-of-war called the Spark; in consequence of which he immediately set about forming the protest which followed, and which, in testimony, duly accompanies. The preliminary step of the protest being finished, the exponent endeavored to be informed of the case, and was informed that, the said brig Spark being at anchor in this port, it was announced to her commander by an American captain that the schooner Ninfa and her boatswain had robbed him on her voyage from Cadiz. This being so, it appears that the order of things dictated that the said commander should have addressed himself to the tribunals of this country; but, crime in every point of view scandalous! he waited for the day in which the Ninfa Catalana was to set sail; he weighed before the said schooner, waited for her in the mouth of the harbor, and detained her within cannon shot of the castle, manned her with sixteen men and two marine guards, put handcuffs upon her crew, and, in addition, put a pair of irons upon the boatswain; he left on board the captain and three passengers, transferred to his own ship six passengers, commanded the vessel to go to Charleston or Baltimore, and, having perpetrated this deed, returned to enter into this port yesterday, scandalizing this commerce and its bay in a manner which, from its results, tends to compromise the public tranquillity, retard it from entering, at the time of one of his boats endeavoring to come alongside the wharf of Caballaria. An occurrence of such magnitude sufficiently calls the attention: the exponent has had recourse to the Superior Political Chief, that, as the superior authority of the territory, he may know of an act which may produce very fatal consequences; to his excellency the Commander General of Marine, as Military Naval Chief, and an aggression committed on his coasts; and to you, gentlemen, as the protectors of the navigation, the commerce, and the agriculture of this island. You, gentlemen, will sufficiently know that the law of nations has been violated; that the laws and authorities of the territory have been trampled upon; that the fortress of the Moro has been despised; that the navigation and the commerce are ruined at once; that the least dissimulation of a similar crime places the Spaniards in the most deplorable state; that thus public securities are destroyed; and, lastly, nothing proves with more evidence the contempt and want of consideration with which we are treated than the very brig Spark having returned to enter this port after having committed such an offence. It is not possible, Mr. President and members, that such an act can be authorized by the Government of the United States; but so it is, that, in the meantime, it is notorious that their vessels respect the independent flags, whilst they attack and detain ours, as happened with the schooner Gallega the Third, carried to New Orleans; the brig seized near Porto Rico; the permitting to arm in their ports the greater part of the privateers which have ruined and destroy our navigation and commerce, carrying our vessels captured to their own ports, and planting the courts in their own country. The crews of the independents are, comparatively speaking, citizens of the United States, and, in a word, they have already thrown off the mask, and their own ships-of-war attack with impunity Spanish ships upon our coasts and under our batteries; and what will the Government of the United States say? It is content with disapproving the conduct of the commander who perpetrates a crime as the Spark, and reserves the right against him. And is this capable of giving satisfaction or securing any person? Every individual privateer has a security, which guarantees the bad use which she may make of her patent. And what security do the commanders of American vessels-of-war produce? They are authorized to make what depredations their commanders desire; but they resent, and suppose our authorities indifferent to, the crimes which are committed, to their great sorrow, upon these coasts by foreign subjects, for the most part, of their nation; and they determine, notwithstanding, on a naval armament to cruise upon the seas of this island, which may, God grant it, be not the artful covering of their intentions. In the time of the meritorious intendant, D. Alexandro Ramirez, an expedition of the captured vessels was formed, which were in pursuit of this trade, and this very expedition sufficiently proved the disasters which the United States of America have caused to the Spanish navigation. At this very time privateers of force, which persecute and ruin us, are supplied in their ports; in the Old Channel, at opening that of Bahama, at the Capes of San Antonio, and Corrientes, and even in the mouth of the Straits of Gibraltar, are vessels cruising at the present moment which, although under the flag of Colombia, are Americans of the United States. And is our Government criticized? After all this exposition, what will be the lot of the boatswain of the schooner Ninfa, fettered and manacled, and what that of her crew? What losses have not been caused to her proprietors and shippers? Who will repair these losses? We cannot even appeal to the principal sufferers, or those unable; we cannot expect that the individuals can claim some rights which, although their own, already interest the whole nation and, very particularly, the island of Cuba, which object may be the resort of these scandalous intrigues; and that, if the legitimate authorities do not reclaim in time with energy, and take such measures as may produce order, the excesses which may at such a time be committed as reprisals ought not to be wondered at, which may produce consequences that cannot be remedied when it is thought necessary. On an idea of all that can be explained, I entreat you, gentlemen, that, having as presented the testimony of protest which I produce, you will be pleased to grant what appears most just and agreeable to the enlightened penetration of the Junta; now may it render its desires uniform with the Superior Political Chief; now with his excellency the Commander General of Marine; now being addressed, in an official letter, to the Government of the United States; and now, lastly, to the legislative and executive of our monarchy, that the evil, damages, and vexations caused to the schooner Ninfa by the commander and brig Spark may be reported, and dictating such means as may correct, radically, like abuses, and put entirely to rest the Spaniards from other new ones, as interesting to this country and the bodies which you, gentlemen, represent.

HAVANA, January 31, 1823.

Besides, by the interest and urgency of this business, he entreats you to be pleased to convoke the extraordinary Junta to grant what it may think fit, before the brig Spark weigh from this port, which is to be done in the state of this business; (date as above.) Besides, to have recourse, in case of necessity on my part, to the supreme Government of the nation, I entreat you to be pleased to order that I may be provided, by the Secretary of the consulate, with a copy, certified in form, of this proceeding and all its determinations or resolutions, (date as above.)

PEDRO LOPEZ.

RESOLUTION OF THE CONSULATE.

In Junta of Government of the consulate, of the 3d of February, 1823, the President being the second consul, D. Antonio Toso, a representation was seen of Don Pedro Lopez, merchant here, in which he relates the scandalous fact that the commander of the American brig-of-war Spark, anchored in this port, had gone to sea, and, in sight of our forts, had captured the schooner Ninfa Catalana, of his consignment, sending her to Charleston, and making prisoners the captain and crew, under the pretext that he was informed, by the captain of an American vessel, that the boatswain of the schooner had robbed him, on the high sea, on another voyage; and, after the commission of this act and violence, the brig Spark had returned to enter the port without having brought the complaint before the Spanish authorities, which was in order, if he wished the boatswain to be punished agreeably to the laws. In virtue of this exposition, Lopez solicited that, by the consulate, as a corporation charged with the protection of the interests of this commerce, what was proper should be granted to him; and the Junta, taking into consideration some facts which, by their notoriety, have called the attention of this public, and conceiving the necessity that suitable measures be taken by the Anglo-American Government, as well in respect to the fault committed by the commander of the brig Spark as to avoid, on the part of their naval officers, the repetition of such acts, which can in no manner be authorized by that Government, bound to ours in terms of friendship by a solemn treaty, and this consulate desires, at the same time, to favor the just solicitude of the individuals injured, has granted it in the case to which allusion is made; that by the prior and consuls, a certified copy of the representation of Lopez be transmitted to the Captain General, Acting Superior Political Chief, that the indemnification to which he is in justice entitled may be obtained in that Government, and that, in the same manner, he may make the proper complaints to its high representation, in order to avoid similar injuries to our navigation and insults to our flag. And, finally, that our supreme Government may take, at convenience, the measures which the protection of the national flag requires; the same Superior Political Chief will be pleased to lay the document before his Majesty, with a recommendation of its importance. Lastly, that a certified copy of this resolution be given to Lopez, for the effects which may take place.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 29, 1823.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 15th instant, inclosing a copy of one bearing date the 16th of October, 1822, from Don Joaquin de Anduaga to Mr. Meade.

By the 5th specific renunciation, in the ninth article of the treaty between the United States and Spain, signed on the 22d of February, 1819, but ratified by his Catholic Majesty only on the 24th of October, 1820, it was provided, that the renunciation, on the part of the United States, of all claims for damages or injuries sustained by themselves or their citizens from Spain, stipulated by the preceding part of the same article, should extend—

“To all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Spanish Government, statements of which, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, have been presented to the Department of State or to the minister of the United States in Spain, since the date of the convention of 1802, and until the signature of this treaty.”

You will observe that the time of the signature, and not that of the ratification by either party, nor that of the exchange of ratifications, is expressly agreed upon as the time, until which the claim and the statements of them to the Department of State or to the minister of the United States in Spain had been received, which claims were, on the part of the United States, renounced.

The reason for fixing upon this particular time for the period at which the obligation of the United States to assume the payment of these claims should terminate is obvious. It was neither proper nor could it be the intention of the parties that they should renounce claims or admit statements of them not known to the party assuming the obligation at the time of contracting it. Whatever claims might arise or whatever statements of them might be made after the signature of the treaty, were not, therefore, and could not, with propriety, be provided for by it.

By the eleventh article of the same treaty it was stipulated that—

“The United States, exonerating Spain from all demands in future on account of the claims of their citizens, to which the renunciations herein contained extend, and considering them entirely cancelled, undertake to make satisfaction for the same to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars. That—

“To ascertain the full amount and validity of these claims, a commission, to consist of three Commissioners, citizens of the United States, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, which commission shall meet at the city of Washington, and within the space of three years from the time of their first meeting shall receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of all claims included within the descriptions above mentioned.” That “The said Commissioners shall take an oath or affirmation, to be entered on the record of their proceedings, for the faithful and diligent discharge of their duties,” and that “the said Commissioners shall be authorized to hear and examine, on oath, every question relative to the said claims, and to receive all suitable authentic testimony concerning the same. And the Spanish Government shall furnish all such documents and elucidations as may be in their possession for the adjustment of the said claims according to the principles of justice, the laws of nations, and the stipulations of the treaty between the two parties of October 27, 1795, the said documents to be specified, when demanded, at the instance of the said Commissioners.”

It has been necessary to set forth, in the terms of the treaty itself, the engagements respectively contracted by the parties to it in these articles, in order to show with clearness their bearing upon the question now brought into discussion by your letter and that of Mr. Anduaga, which it inclosed.

The claims, payment of which to a fixed and limited amount was assumed by the United States, were claims not only existing, but statements of which had been exhibited at the Department of State or to the minister of the United States in Spain before the signature of the treaty.

To ascertain the full amount and validity of those claims, Commissioners were to be appointed, to act under oath, and charged with the duty to receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of all the claims.

And the Spanish Government solemnly bound itself to furnish all such documents and elucidations as might be in their possession for the adjustment of the said claims.

If anything in human intention can be made clear by human language, it is that the claims provided for by the above stipulation were in the condition as they had been exhibited at the time of the signature of the treaty; that the authority and the trust of examining, ascertaining, and deciding their amount and validity was solely and exclusively committed to the Commissioners, and that the Spanish Government was and is bound to furnish them, at their demand, all documents and elucidations in possession of the said Government for the adjustment of the claims.

No transaction between any of the claimants and the Spanish Government, subsequent to the signature of the treaty, could be evidence to the Commissioners of the condition of the claim at the time of that signature. No appeal from the decision of the Commissioners, either to the Government of the United States or of Spain, was reserved. By the transfer to the United States of the obligation of making payment, conformably to the treaty, of those claims, Spain deliberately and with full knowledge transferred also the right of examining and deciding their amount and validity. It is to little purpose, therefore, that Mr. Anduaga's letter descants so largely upon the variety and respectability of the Spanish commissions and tribunals, which, many months after the signature of the treaty, undertook to liquidate, that is, to decide upon, the amount and validity of Mr. Meade's claim upon the Spanish Government. Neither the number nor the character of those courts is at all questioned, but from the day of the signature of the treaty they had no jurisdiction to try or decide upon any of the claims, the payment of which was assumed by the United States. Whatever jurisdiction they did exercise, however obligatory it might be upon his Catholic Majesty's Government, could have no effect whatever to charge the United States, or, so far as they were concerned, to change the condition of the claim, as it had been exhibited to the Government of the United States or to their minister at Madrid, before the signature of the treaty. It had been exhibited as an unsettled and unliquidated claim; if comprised at all within the provisions of the treaty, it was as an unsettled and unliquidated claim, upon which, as upon all the rest, the commission instituted under the treaty was, by the express engagement of both parties, exclusively to decide.

It is alleged by Mr. Anduaga, and repeated in substance by you, that the decision by the Spanish tribunals upon the amount and validity of Mr. Meade's claim, made many months after the signature of the treaty, many months even after his Catholic Majesty was bound to have ratified the same, and after its ratifications ought to have been exchanged, was given at the earnest instance of the minister of the United States in Spain, and that he, as well as the Government of the United States, expressed their satisfaction at the event. The answer to this argument is, however, furnished by Mr. Anduaga and by you. Mr. Anduaga says: “When all this was done, there was no probability that the United States would be obliged to pay this debt;” that is to say, there was no probability that his Catholic Majesty would perform the express and solemn promise that he had made to ratify the treaty. Undoubtedly, when there was no probability that the United States would be charged with the payment of the debt, their Government and their minister did earnestly press the Spanish Government to do justice at least to Mr. Meade. What that justice was, what was the amount and validity of his claim upon the Spanish Government, the United States neither had nor claimed the right to decide. So far as it was an obligation to be paid by Spain, and by which no other interests of the United States or of their citizens could be affected, the right to decide upon it was exclusively of the resort of Spanish tribunals; and the American Government and minister naturally expressed their satisfaction at the adjustment, by the Spanish Government, of a claim of one of their citizens, in whose favor they had taken a deep and generous interest, it being always understood by them that this interest did not conflict with their duties to the people of the United States and to all their other fellow-citizens, also claimants upon Spain, and in whose favor their Government was bound to take an interest as earnest and generous as in that of Mr. Meade.

While there was no probability that the treaty would be ratified by Spain, the adjustment by Spanish tribunals, binding only upon Spain, could in nowise affect any other right or interest of the people of the United States, or of other American citizens claimants upon Spain. That adjustment could in nowise charge the United States. It was an obligation of Spain, contracted after the signature of the treaty, and was thereby excluded, by the express terms of the treaty itself, from the number of those which the United States had by the treaty engaged to assume upon themselves. The cognizance taken at the time by the Spanish tribunals of this claim, and the acknowledgment of the amount and validity of this one alone, as you affirm, among many hundreds of other claims of American citizens, many of much longer standing and all equally entitled to adjustment and liquidation, are, indeed, powerful arguments to prove that Mr. Meade's claim was not one of those for which Spain had intended to provide by the treaty. And this argument is strongly fortified by another, which Mr. Meade himself and his learned counsel in this country have urged with great force, namely: that the claims of Mr. Meade upon Spain were of a nature which, by the laws of nations and of justice, Spain could not discharge and the United States could not renounce by any treaty or compact between themselves. The conclusion from these arguments, if correct, undoubtedly is, that Mr. Meade's claims upon Spain were not intended to be, and even could not be, provided for by the treaty, and were, therefore, not included in it. If, then, the Commissioners under the treaty did, in the first instance, entertain very serious doubts whether the claim of Mr. Meade was among those provided for, or intended to be provided for by the treaty, it was to these proceedings of the Spanish Government after the signature of the treaty, and to the argument of Mr. Meade and his counsel against the right of the contracting parties to the treaty to dispose of Mr. Meade's claim, that these doubts must be ascribed. It was assuredly never the intention of the Government of the United States, in that treaty, either to renounce any claim which they had not the right to assume, nor to assume any claim which they had not the right to renounce. As far as it, doubtless, from the intention of Spain to discharge any just claim of Mr. Meade's upon her by the attempt to transfer it to a third party without his consent. Nothing can be more clear than that Spain remains at this hour bound to satisfy, to the last real, every claim acknowledged by herself to be just, and which she had not the right to transfer to a third party without the consent of the claimant.

The treaty, by its express terms, made provision only for unsettled and unliquidated claims. The United States assumed them as they existed and had been exhibited at the signature of that instrument, the 22d of February, 1819. In assuming the duty of Spain to discharge those claims, the United States acquired the right, and it was in express words secured to them by the treaty, of ascertaining and deciding, exclusively by a commission of their own citizens, the amount and validity of each claim assumed. At the same moment when the obligation to discharge the claim attached to the United States, this exclusive right of the commission to examine and decide its amount and validity attached with it. From that moment the Spanish tribunals had no more right to examine or pass, in any manner, upon the claims than the tribunals of the United States had to examine and pass upon them before the signature of the treaty. This provision imported no distrust in the justice or integrity of the Spanish tribunals. It followed, as an indispensable consequence, from the engagement contracted by the United States to pay the claims.

By the treaty itself, and by the full power of Don Luis de Onis, its negotiator on the part of Spain, his Catholic Majesty was bound to ratify the treaty so that the ratifications should be exchanged within six months from the day of its signature. Had this engagement been performed, Mr. Meade's claims would have remained in the same state in which they had been on the day of the signature of the treaty, unsettled and unliquidated. Mr. Meade's claims were not provided for by name, nor had any mention of them been made in the course of the negotiation. The Spanish Government was at that time so far from admitting that Mr. Meade had any just claim upon them that they had but very recently, at the earnest and peremptory interposition of the Government of the United States, released him from imprisonment as a defaulter to them.

The treaty remaining unratified by his Catholic Majesty, and, as Mr. Anduaga affirms, there being no probability that it would be ratified, long after the period had expired when he had promised, on his royal word, that it should be ratified, the minister of the United States at Madrid, at the earnest and repeated solicitations of Mr. Meade, certainly did urge the Spanish Government to adjust, liquidate, and satisfy his claims. From the nature of these claims, his learned counsel in this country have since drawn it in question whether the Government of the United States had any right to interpose with that of Spain in relation to them at all; and upon this question depends the other, before noticed, whether Spain could, by treaty, transfer to the United States her own obligation to pay those claims. They were claims which Mr. Meade had acquired, not in his neutral character as a citizen of the United States, but as a voluntary contractor with the Spanish Government, while residing in their territory and living under their allegiance. They were therefore, unquestionably, much less entitled to the interference of the American Government than the great mass of the claims provided for by the treaty—claims for wrongs suffered by citizens of the United States in their genuine character as such—for wrongs, in the origin of which there was no voluntary agency of their own, no forfeiture of their neutral rights, no resort but to the perfect obligation of their own Government to support them. Had the Spanish Government, at the time when the minister of the United States interposed in behalf of this claim, taken the ground of argument since assumed by Mr. Meade and his counsel—had they said this is a claim in which the Government of the United States have no right to interfere—a question upon contracts between Mr. Meade and us, while living in our territories and amenable to our laws—undoubtedly, by the principles of the rights and duties of nations, universally recognized, Mr. Meade and the American Government must fain have put up with this answer as conclusive, and Mr. Meade's claim could never have been pretended to be included in the provisions of the treaty.

But no such ground was then taken either by the Spanish Government or by Mr. Meade; so little was his reliance upon the justice of the Government with which he had contracted, and under whose protection he dwelt, without the effectual interposition in his favor of the Government under which he had been born, that his entreaties for the interposition of the American minister and Government, in favor of his claims, were urgent and unceasing. To this interposition the Spanish Government did not object. Mr. Meade desired that provision for his claim should be made in the treaty which was then negotiating, and made known this desire to the Government of the United States. He was informed, in answer, that, if the treaty should be concluded, his claims would be considered and attended to, as far as might be practicable, in common with the others; and to this arrangement he never suggested an objection till after the ratification of the treaty by Spain, nor until just at the moment before its second ratification by the United States. He then, to be sure, and then, for the first time, addressed the President and Senate of the United States, calling upon them to refuse the ratification of a treaty in which the only possible indemnity of many hundreds of their fellow-citizens for their losses, to the amount of five millions of dollars, was secured; or to make the ratification conditional, that another article should be added, by which his claim, not as existing at the time of the signature of the treaty, but as many months after that compact ought to have been ratified by Spain, liquidated by Spanish officers before the Spanish ratification of the treaty, should be paid to the full amount as acknowledged by them, and without being subject, like all the other claims, to the honest investigation and scrutiny of the American Commissioners; and the principal argument urged by Mr. Meade's counsel in support of this demand, that the American Government should sacrifice the acquisition of the Floridas, and five millions of dollars of indemnities justly due to their citizens, whose right to the effectual support of their country was perfect, was, that his claim was of a nature that the American Government had no right to interpose with Spain in its favor at all.

If the claims of Mr. Meade upon Spain were included among those provided for by the treaty, it was in common with all the others, to be treated like all the others, and to abide the same issue with the others. Such was the clear, unequivocal intention of both parties to the treaty; nor could the American Government, in equal justice to all the claimants, have negotiated upon any other principle. The amount of claims exhibited to them to be provided for by the treaty, as stated by the claimants themselves, was nearly ten times the five millions which they agreed that the people of the United States should pay, from the proceeds of the Florida lands, to discharge them. But it was well understood that many of the claims were not even valid against Spain; that most of them were swollen by the statements far beyond what, upon a fair examination, would be found to be due; that equitable deductions from equitable claims would reduce almost all of them within very contracted dimensions; and that, for the whole mass of them, the only hope of the claimants was in the munificence of the treaty. They were all, by the terms of the treaty, unsettled claims. Their just amount could then be only judged of by an estimate, in many respects conjectural, but it was believed, upon considerations duly weighed, that, when stripped of all their appendages to naked justice, five millions of dollars would be sufficient to cover them all. As they were to be paid by the people of the United States, it was the duty of the Government to allow no larger sum than would be sufficient, in rigorous justice, to discharge them. It might happen that even the just and indisputable claims would amount to something more. In that case, the claimants must consider it as a composition of their claims, the best that their Government has been able to obtain for them; and it was not doubted that they who had been from one to twenty years waiting, with very little probability of ever obtaining anything for their claims, would be more than contented to receive so nearly all that they could have asked, and to abandon to their country the small remainder for the salvage of the rest. But to render this principle compatible with justice to all parties, it was indispensable that all the claims should be placed upon the same footing; that all should be subjected to the close, vigilant, and rigorous scrutiny and investigation of an upright and intelligent commission of American citizens; that all should be alike submitted to their examination and decision, and that no transaction between the Spanish Government and any one of the claimants, subsequent to the signature, but before the ratification of the treaty, should alter the character of his claim, and give him an advantage at the expense of the people of the United States, and of all the other claimants under the treaty. If the American Government could have admitted any discrimination between the claims, and that any one should have been privileged above the rest, Mr. Meade's claim, if the present argument of his learned counsel is sound, would have been the very lowest on the list and the least entitled to favor; since most, if not all the rest, were claims which the American Government had been, from the beginning, bound, by the duty of protection to the rights of their own citizens, to support and maintain even, if necessary, to the issuing of reprisals, while that of Mr. Meade, incurred voluntarily by himself while domiciliated in Spain, and by transactions of no neutral character, was of a nature to leave it doubtful whether the American Government had ever possessed the right of interposing in its behalf at all.

The interest taken, therefore, by the American minister at Madrid in Mr. Meade's favor, by urging on the Spanish Government the settlement of his claims; the satisfaction that he expressed after the liquidation had been obtained; the letter of congratulation from the American Secretary of State to Mr. Meade upon the event when informed of it by him, have not the slightest bearing upon this argument. The answer to all this is furnished by Mr. Anduaga when he says: "There was, then, no probability that the treaty would be ratified by Spain." The American minister and Secretary of State expected that what the Spanish tribunals had liquidated and settled the Spanish Government would pay. They knew perfectly well that no interests of the people of the United States, or of the other claimants upon Spain, could be injuriously affected by this Spanish liquidation of Mr. Meade's claims. If the treaty should be ratified, and Mr. Meade should be receivable as a claimant under it, they knew that his claims could be admitted only as provided for by the treaty, and that no intermediate transaction between him and the Spanish Government could be evidence of his claims, as they had existed and been exhibited at the signature of the treaty. That no decision of a Spanish tribunal could settle that which the treaty in express terms reserved to the exclusive decision of the American commission. If the treaty should not be ratified, they rejoiced that their exertions in his favor had been so far successful; that he had a nearer prospect of obtaining satisfaction from the Spanish Government itself. Their pleasure was that of a benevolent and friendly feeling towards Mr. Meade. But the American Government had duties of a more imperious nature to others: to the people of the United States and to all their fellow-citizens, the other claimants upon Spain. To them it was due that, if the treaty should be ratified and Mr. Meade be a claimant under it, his claim should stand on the same foundation and pass through the same ordeal with the rest. The American Government knew that it was so stipulated in the treaty, and they little expected the pretension that, by this separate transaction between him and the Spanish Government, the treaty being yet unratified, the nature of the engagements of the United States in it was changed if it ever should be ratified; that they would be bound to receive as settled claims which they had engaged to receive as unsettled, and to take the dictum of a Spanish tribunal as the decision which the treaty had trusted exclusively to an American commission.

Mr. Meade himself, and the learned counsel whom he has employed in this country, know better. They were the first to doubt whether his claims were provided for by the treaty at all. They clearly saw that, if provided for, it was only upon the same terms and upon the same conditions with all the rest. His memorial to the President of the United States, objecting to the ratification of the treaty, was on the avowed and only ground that it had not provided for the satisfaction of his claims. He demanded that the ratification of the treaty should be refused, or given upon a condition that a new article should be added providing for the payment, in full, of his claims; that the Floridas should be sacrificed, and the only hopes of many hundreds of other claimants blasted, that he might be sure to receive, at the expense of the United States, payment, to the last maravedi, of what a Spanish tribunal had, since the treaty was concluded, awarded him as a debt due to him from Spain. His memorial insisted that neither Spain nor the United States had ever possessed the right of making between themselves a composition of his claims; and without being aware or mindful that, if this position was true, the irresistible conclusion from it was, that they were not included in the treaty at all, and remained in full force against Spain as if the treaty had never been made, he yet required that the United States should make the ratification of this treaty conditional upon the assent of Spain to another, by which his claims should be distinguished from all the rest; admitted without asking questions, and paid without the deduction of a millé. And the principal argument for this moderate proposal was, that his claims upon Spain were such that the American Government has never possessed the right of interfering to support them against Spain at all.

Thus Mr. Meade himself, and his learned counsel, first raised the question whether his claims were included among those provided for by the treaty; and if they failed of convincing the President and Senate of the United States of the propriety of withholding the ratification of the treaty which they had made to exact the consent of Spain to another which they had not made, they conclusively proved that the United States had never been under obligations of negotiating with Spain concerning them at all, and gave plausible color, at least, to the belief that his claims, not being embraced by the provisions of the treaty, remained in all their force, acknowledged and unimpaired, to be paid, without deduction or compromise, from the treasury of Spain.

But after the ratifications of the treaty had been exchanged, and after the commission instituted under it was organized, Mr. Meade produced before them his claims as being among those provided for by the treaty; and when the Commissioners, in the discharge of their duty to their country and to all the other claimants whose rights and interests were involved in the decision—when the Commissioners, yielding to the force of arguments which had been most strenuously urged by Mr. Meade himself and counsel—when the Commissioners, seeing in the treaty, which was their law, no mention of Mr. Meade's claim by name, and no description of claims within which it could, as a settled and liquidated claim, be embraced—when the Commissioners, men of high and irreproachable character, with the oath of God upon their souls, with no evidence before them but such as the treaty must exclude, and no argument but that of Mr. Meade and of his counsel, excluding his claim from the treaty—when these Commissioners but intimated an opinion that Mr. Meade's claims were not among those submitted by the treaty to their decision, the basest and most inflammatory anonymous newspaper publications issued from a prostituted press, for the apparent purpose of intimidating by defamation the members of a judicial tribunal from the discharge of their trust according to the conviction of their consciences.

Mr. Meade then, too, resorted to the Spanish minister in this country for his testimony to prove that it had been the intention of the Spanish Government to include his claim among those which were provided for by the treaty. That Spanish minister was not the negotiator of the treaty, nor could he more than any other person testify to the intention of the Spanish Government any otherwise than as appeared on the face of the treaty itself. It has already been said, that during the negotiation of the treaty neither the name nor the claim of Mr. Meade had ever been mentioned between the negotiators; and that when it was signed the Spanish Government had never admitted that he had a valid claim upon them for so much as a dollar. Mr. Anduaga did, however, furnish Mr. Meade with his opinion that Mr. Meade's claim was embraced by the treaty, and that opinion was laid before the Commissioners. Other claims were also presented to them involving the same question, whether contracts of the Spanish Government had been among the cases provided for by the treaty; and at the application of one of the suitors they addressed a letter to the Secretary of State, suggesting their impressions that claims of that description, which the American Government had never been under any obligation to enforce, and in favor of which even their right to interfere might be questioned, were not included in the treaty, the main and obvious object of which was to obtain indemnity for the wrongs of American citizens entitled beyond all question to the full protection of their Government. This letter was laid before the President of the United States, by whose direction the answer was returned, which was conformable to the truth of the facts, and this formed the correspondence which you state to have been communicated by Mr. Meade to Mr. Anduaga, and by him to your Government.

In concluding the treaty, the American Government was well aware, and the Spanish Government could not be ignorant, that by the laws of eternal justice a nation has no more than an individual the right of discharging itself from the obligation of its contracts by the agreement of a third party to assume them, without the consent, express or implied, of the party (whether nation or individual) with whom the contract was made.

The parties to the treaty well knew, also, that contracts and liquidated acknowledged debts are not in their nature subjects of negotiation; especially not of negotiation between one of the parties with a third party not privy to the contract. The duty of a nation bound by such a contract is not negotiation, but performance.

They likewise knew that with regard to the contracts of an individual born in one country with the Government of another, most especially when the individual contracting is domiciliated in the country with whose Government he contracts, and formed the contract voluntarily, for his own private emolument and without the privity of the nation under whose protection he had been born, he has no claim whatsoever to call upon the Government of his nativity to espouse his claim, this Government having no right to compel that with which he voluntarily contracted to the performance of that contract.

But unacknowledged, unsettled, unliquidated claims form the natural subject of negotiation; and of all negotiation, the necessary and essential character is compromise. Of such claims, whether originating in contract or in wrong, the very application of an individual to one Government to assist him in the enforcement of his claims upon another, imports of itself the consciousness that he cannot obtain his claims without that assistance, and makes them at once a subject of negotiation and compromise.

For such unliquidated claims, alone, provision was made by the 5th renunciation of the United States in the ninth article of the treaty of 22d February, 1819, which, by its terms, is limited to claims of citizens of the United States upon the Spanish Government, statements of which, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, had been exhibited since the convention of 1802, and until the signature of the treaty.

Mr. Meade was a citizen of the United States, who, since the convention of 1802, and before the signature of the treaty, had solicited the interposition of the Government of the United States and had presented some general statement of part of his claims. He had specially desired that they should be included in the negotiation of the treaty, and had been informed of the only terms upon which they would or could be considered in that negotiation in common with the other claims for which it was to provide. They were and could be known to the American Government only as unsettled and disputed claims, and the right to negotiate a compromise for them in common with the rest, founded upon his own solicitation and the acquiescence of Spain, was not for a moment questioned; but as an acknowledged claim, the amount and validity of which was known and admitted, and about which the United States and Spain had no right to negotiate between themselves a compromise not sanctioned by him, it certainly was not included nor ever intended to be included in the treaty. From the moment that Spain considers it as such, she contracts the obligation of discharging it herself as a contract, the compromise of which neither she nor the United States could rightfully negotiate between themselves without the privity of Mr. Meade, and which, not having been so negotiated, she, Spain, is bound in honor and in justice to him to discharge to the last farthing from her own Treasury.

This is what Spain can perform without injustice to others. But you will perceive at a glance that the Government of the United States could not, without the grossest injustice to their nation, and to all the other claimants under the treaty, admit that a transaction between Spanish tribunals and Mr. Meade, between the signature and ratification of the treaty, should change the nature of the compact between the United States and Spain, control the express terms of the treaty itself, and bind the Commissioners charged with the duty of ascertaining and deciding the amount and validity of unliquidated claims to take an acknowledgment in 1820 as evidence of the condition of a claim in 1819. The sum stipulated for payment by the United States of all the claims assumed was limited to five millions of dollars. The amount due upon the whole mass might ultimately be found less, or it might exceed that sum. If it should prove less, the balance would be so much less of debt to be paid by the people of the United States. If more, a proportional deduction from the sum awarded to every claimant must be made, each of whom must make this small sacrifice to the adjustment of all these long standing, perplexed, disputed, and I may safely say, otherwise desperate demands. Those of Mr. Meade, in February, 1819, were assuredly not less desperate than the rest. To allow that a Spanish tribunal, long after the treaty ought to have been ratified, and while Spain retained the power of ratifying or rejecting it, should select this claim of Mr. Meade from all the rest, to invest it with the exclusive and invidious exemption from the scrutiny to which all others must be subjected; that it should be taken out of the treaty for examination and settlement and cast back upon the treaty for payment in full; that it should be screened from all investigation and privileged from all proportionable deduction; that the people of the United States, and the fund devoted to the just indemnity of many hundred claimants, should be doubly ransomed to satisfy the plenitude of that claim, and in reverence to the dignity of tribunals, which under the treaty had no right to pass upon it at all, would be as wide from all the duties of the American Government as from the dictates of justice, and as far from its present intentions as from those of either party to the treaty at the time of its conclusion.

It was intended by the Government of the United States that Mr. Meade's claims, as then exhibited to them, unsettled, disputed claims of a mixed character for contracts; for losses upon exchange; for depreciation of Spanish Government paper; for interest and for damages, all, except the first, of most uncertain amount and validity, should, in common with the other claims provided for, have the benefit of the treaty. But no stipulation of special favor to the claims of Mr. Meade, at the expense of other claimants, was or could be intended by the Government of the United States. The claim presented by Mr. Meade to the Commissioners is for an acknowledged debt from the Spanish Government to him, dated May, 1820, and directed to be paid out of the funds of the royal finance department, with interest. To say that this is not the claim which, in February, 1819, the United States had renounced and agreed to compound, would be to say that daylight is not darkness. Mr. Meade might, with as much propriety, have purchased in the market at its current price any other order upon the funds of the royal finance department, and brought it before the Commissioners as a claim provided for by the treaty, as he could this order—a part of the sum constituting which was for interest accrued after the treaty had been signed.

Of the obligation of the Spanish Government to pay Mr. Meade, with interest, the whole amount of this sum, acknowledged by its own tribunals to be due, there can be no doubt. But it is equally clear that it is not the debt which, in February, 1819, the United States had agreed to assume, to consider as cancelled, and to discharge. It was not the claim which had been exhibited, or had even existed in February, 1819. It was a claim of a totally distinct and different character. It was a new obligation of Spain, for which no provision had been made by the treaty, and with which the United States could not, without injustice to themselves and to all the other claimants, be charged.

By the intention of including Mr. Meade's claims among those provided for by the treaty at the time of its negotiation, the American Government had shown its kindness towards him to the utmost verge of its compatibility with their duties to others. Mr. Meade's claims, as then existing, however meritorious as against Spain, were far from being against the United States as deserving as many others with which they were to share the benefit of the treaty. They were claims, part of which were for supplies to support the ally of Spain, then, or very shortly after, the enemy of the United States; supplies to maintain a cause to which, so far as concerned Spain, the United States were neutral, but which, by its inseparable connexion with Great Britain, was the cause of that nation against Mr. Meade's country. There was no one point of view in which those claims could be considered that gave them a title to the special favor or support of the American Government or nation; and by extending to them the advantages of a composition which they were enabled to effect with Spain of numerous other and far more meritorious claims, in meaning to do equal justice to all, they perhaps did more than justice to Mr. Meade.

While, therefore, your position that the Spanish nation was certainly responsible to Mr. Meade for the total amount of the acknowledged debt is indisputable, his Catholic Majesty will find, by further examination of the treaty, that the Government of the United States did not take upon itself by the latter ratification of the treaty, nor ever in any other manner, this debt. The fifth renunciation of the ninth article of the treaty neither did, nor could, nor was ever intended to include this debt. And the latter ratification of the United States neither did, nor could, in the slightest degree, alter the character of the obligation which the United States had contracted on the face of the treaty on the 22d of February, 1819. The fifth renunciation, upon its face and by its terms, was limited to claims stated but unsettled of uncertain amount and validity, as existing at the signature of the treaty. The ratification of the United States could no more change the import of this renunciation than it could change the words in which it was expressed. The fourth article of the treaty reserves the examination and decision of the amount and validity of all the claims assumed by the United States for the exclusive cognizance of a commission of American citizens; and whoever appears before them as a claimant under the treaty must abide by their decision conformably to the treaty. For all subsequent engagements, contracts, and debts of the Spanish Government, whether with Mr. Meade or with any other claimants, Spain, and not the United States, is chargeable. If Mr. Meade claims the benefit of the treaty by the treaty, must he submit to be judged; and according to the terms of the treaty must he receive his indemnity. If he means to resort to engagements or debts subsequently contracted, or to the decisions of Spanish tribunals, to Spain alone must he have recourse for satisfaction.

This conclusion cannot be departed from by the Government of the United States. It is due to the plain intent and unequivocal language of the treaty; it is due to the rights and interests of the people of the United States; it is due to those of many hundreds of their citizens, whose demands upon the justice of Spain were at least as strong and clear, and whose right to the support and protection of their country was at least more perfect and unequivocal than those of Mr. Meade. Special, unstipulated favor to him would be flagrant injustice to them.

When, therefore, in the conclusion of your letter, you beforehand solemnly and respectfully protest against any decision of the Commissioners appointed in virtue of the treaty which invalidates, in any manner, the acknowledgment made by your Government of the total debt of Mr. Meade, agreeably to the certificate which they sent to him in consequence, and which you state to be in possession of the commissioners, I am directed to say in answer: 1. That the Government of the United States have no more than the Government of Spain the right or authority to dictate or control the decisions of the Commissioners appointed by virtue of the treaty of February 22, 1819; and that as the United States will not assume themselves, so they will not suffer from Spain the exercise of any such dictation or control, alike repugnant to the principles of impartial justice and to that judicial independence which constitutes the excellence and the glory of the institutions, both of this country and of Spain; and 2. That there neither has been nor is there reason to expect any decision of the Commissioners, to invalidate, in any manner, any acknowledgment by your Government of the total debt to Mr. Meade; the validity of any such acknowledgment being, like the obligation which it imports, for the exclusive cognizance of the Spanish Government itself, and importing neither obligation nor authority for which the United States is answerable or the charge of which they have ever consented to assume.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, September 22, 1824.

SIR: I was directed by the Secretary of State, before his late departure from this city, to furnish the Attorney of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania with an extract from your letter to him of the 16th of August, and, at the same time, to request that officer to adopt such measures as might be deemed advisable to the preservation of the neutrality of the United States and the vindication of their laws, in reference to certain armaments which you state to have been already prepared, and to others which are now preparing in the port of Philadelphia, for the use and on account of some of the South American States in the contest in which they are engaged with Spain; and I lost no time in complying with the Secretary's instructions.

I have the honor now, sir, to transmit to you a copy of Mr. Ingersoll, the District Attorney's letter, in answer to the one which I addressed to him in pursuance of the Secretary's instructions, including a short correspondence between himself and the Collector of Customs at Philadelphia, which I flatter myself will prove abundantly satisfactory as to the armaments in question, already sent forth from the port of Philadelphia, and entirely remove any apprehensions which you may entertain with regard to those which are in a train of preparation at the same port.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my very distinguished consideration.

DANIEL BRENT.

[Translation.]

LEGATION OF SPAIN, Philadelphia, September 29, 1824.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your note, in absence of Mr. Adams, in answer to mine of the 16th of August last, relative to the illegal armaments which have been made in this port on account of the separated Governments of Spanish America.

I shall, as soon as possible, transmit its contents to my Government, but I cannot say that it will be so satisfactory as you flatter yourself, as, at the very time that you were writing that note, three of the twelve gun-boats which I said were building on account of the Colombian Government were dropping down the river, and two more have sailed since, all despatched in the name of a Mr. H. Somers, scarcely known in this place. It is true, as I have been informed, the custom-house did not permit them to take on board the armament which they had prepared close by the very arsenal of the United States; but this is of little moment, because they can easily send this armament in another vessel as ballast. They run no risk in doing this, as they have done it before on many occasions. I do not understand, however, that the custom-house has used more rigor with these Colombian vessels than with those despatched by Mr. Meade to Mexico, because, if by chance there was any difference in the force or armament between these vessels and the former, they were stronger than those just sailed; and if the custom-house do not consider cannon of very large calibre, and upon pivots, as an armament, but as mere signal guns, as it appears the guns which these vessels ought to carry will be signal guns, as those were which the others carried, and, in this case, it will be cruelty to prevent those that sail now from carrying them as well as the others, mounted on deck, that they may be ready in case of need. But you will be pleased to observe that if said artillery were embarked for the sole purpose of signals, there could be no necessity for each boat carrying two pieces, nor for their being of so large a calibre as from 24 to 32-pounds, much less for any of them being on pivots, because for making signals it is not necessary to take aim, which is the only intention of a pivot gun. It is to be observed that the Fiscal (or Attorney General) of the United States for this district was unable to obtain the legal proofs which he sought from the different persons employed by the custom-house, whose information it was easy to anticipate, because it is to be supposed that if they had considered said armaments as illegal they would not have been wanting to their duty in permitting them to sail with them. Upon the whole, it appears by their correspondence with the said Fiscal that they were not entirely ignorant by whom and for whom these gun-boats were building. Neither are they fit for trade, nor can it be presumed that either Mr. Meade or Mr. Barry, who have retired from business, would make use of them. This alone, in my opinion, ought to have infused a suspicion founded on the real object which they had, and was a just cause for detaining them to investigate the case with certainty. The ten gun-boats which Mr. Meade despatched in this port are not the only vessels which he has got built in the United States on account of the Government of Mexico. According to information which I have, very worthy of credit, he has caused some more to be built in Baltimore, although there his name has not been mentioned. One of them, now called the Yguala, detains vessels of the United States themselves which go to the ports of Mexico, as I have lately seen in the newspapers. Another, called Anahuæ, a most beautiful schooner of 238 tons, came here before going to Mexico, carrying the armament in the hold, which consisted of twelve cannons, 18-pounds, with their carriages, besides other arms and oars, &c. She was despatched from hence with some cargo by Mr. R. Adams, under the command of one Whigman, and at present is in New York, now with the Mexican flag. Her present captain, Cochrane, is a native of that port, where likewise his family resides.

The Colombian privateer, the General Santander, of which I made mention in the note which you answer, a little after came into Norfolk with a crew of 250 men, who only speak English, and although he who at present commands her is not now Chase, but one NORRIS, likewise a citizen of the United States, a native of Connecticut. In that port he recruited men and augmented his force with four officers and the crew of another Colombian privateer that was in Baltimore and belongs to Daniels, of whom I also spoke at that time. Being thus supplied, he sailed to cruise off New York, where there is a Spanish vessel which cannot sail without great risk of falling into his power. Thus it may be said that Spanish vessels seem blockaded in the ports of the United States themselves through the agency of their citizens. The consul of Spain gave information of this to the competent authorities that they might put a stop to it, but all excused themselves, saying they could not do it; that the laws upon this point were not sufficiently positive and clear. The same thing was told to the acting vice consul of Spain in Charleston on another occasion by the marshal of the United States in that district, (whose original letter I have in my possession,) and Mr. Ingersoll gives the same understanding in his correspondence which you now inclose to me. But, as I have already said before, his Catholic Majesty has nothing to do with the peculiar laws of this country. They, such as they are, are the exclusive work of the United States, and Spain, in this point only, ought to attend to the treaties.

But how do the United States fulfil these treaties with Spain? If his Majesty's representative have recourse to the Federal Government, to prevent the armaments which the citizens of the United States fit out, to commit hostilities upon the Spanish commerce under insurgent banners, he is told that there are laws which have respect to the treaties, and tribunals which put them in force, and that it is necessary to apply to them. When, in virtue of this, his Majesty's consuls apply to those tribunals, requesting the punishment of such citizens as have applied for and accepted commissions from Governments enemies of his Catholic Majesty, they declare that they have no jurisdiction for it. When they request of the custom-houses (or other authorities) the detention of vessels built, armed, and manned in this country on account of those Governments, or of individuals who attempt hostilities against Spain, they answer that the laws are not sufficiently clear, and that they have not sufficient authority. If said vessels carry the armament in the hold, it is called ballast. If the artillery is mounted on deck, it is to make signals only. The consequence is, that these vessels and armaments and citizens of the United States sail publicly, and without any risk, and that they continue making innumerable prizes, and cause immense losses to the Spanish nation.

Permit me, sir, to make another important observation. A learned man so eminent as Mr. Ingersoll, charged with the execution of the laws of the United States, ought not to be ignorant of them; and when he says that he does not know in the present case another law applicable to it but the act of Congress of the 20th of April, 1813, it is to be believed that there is no other. But if, in effect, there be no more law than this for preventing the armaments which are made here, and punishing the citizens of the United States, who, with commissions of foreign States or Governments, make war on his Catholic Majesty, the irresistible consequence is, that the laws of the United States contradict one another. Because here we have one law, which is the present act, which prescribes to the courts an arbitrary punishment, to the decision of the judges, of only fine and imprisonment to the citizens, for instance, who accept and make use of commissions of any State or Government at war with a power at peace with the United States; whilst there is another, sanctioned at the same time also by Congress, which are the treaties with Spain, which point out a determinate punishment against those delinquents, and it is that of death, because they are called pirates. To which of these two laws, differing upon the same case, ought the tribunals to have recourse? They cannot depart from the letter of the law, nor impose the punishment of death, if they hold to the former, which prescribes only fine and imprisonment. I will not conceal from you, sir, that if, in the United States, there is no other law than the act cited by Mr. Ingersoll respecting illegal armaments, I have few hopes that the Federal Government can, with it alone, duly fulfil the existing treaties with Spain, although it should recommend the greatest vigilance to the local authorities. Besides, such an act appears to me little serviceable and insufficient for the effect. The officers of the custom-house may, in virtue of this act, detain a vessel which they know or suspect to carry an illegal armament; but what responsibility have they if they do not? I see none. What obligation have they to inquire into these armaments? None. They are not ordered to take this trouble. Who will come to inform them of what is passing? No citizen of the United States has an interest in doing it; rather the contrary. What, then, signifies this act, which appears so completely to defeat the intention of the 14th article of the treaty of 1795, with Spain? Can it be said that Congress, at the passing of said act, did not bear the treaties in mind? or will it be said (and may be even much worse) that it knew it, but that still it addressed the tribunals in other words, the following for example:

"The treaties which we have with Spain call such of our citizens pirates as, with foreign commissions, make war upon her; and consequently, they incur thereupon the penalty of death. But we declare by this that you ought not to fulfil this part of the treaty. The Government of the United States, who concurred with Spain in imposing upon them a punishment so severe, atrocious, and disproportioned to the offence, was wanting to its duty and to the confidence of the nation which it governs. The Senate, which approved the treaty at that time, was not worthy of us, who, as being more illustrious, establish other laws more rational and humane. His Catholic Majesty will be very well satisfied with imposing upon these delinquents a fine and imprisonment, at your pleasure. To diminish the punishment is not to change the treaty."

The consequences of such a doctrine would be fatal. What would succeed if other nations should follow this example? England has just made a convention with the United States, as appears, relative to the abolition of the slave trade. If any of the two contracting parties should afterwards alter the punishment of those who are declared pirates, would not this be to change the essence of their stipulations, and in fact to annul such convention? It would be utterly to destroy the treaties which bind nations, if it were permitted to alter them in this manner by the particular legislation of each. Thus, then, it is not possible to expect this immoral and Machiavelian language from any Government of the civilized world; and it would be doing the greatest injury to the respectable and august Congress of the United States to believe that it would on any occasion alter intentionally the literal sense of the treaties, in the religious fulfilment of which its own honor is concerned. Whatever may be the defect which may be observed in the act of the 20th of April, (and what human law has not defects?) I am well persuaded that the intention was not to alter, as appears at first view, but, on the contrary, to enforce the fulfilment of the stipulations of the treaty referred to with Spain, although experience has proved that that noble object has not been realized, as we see by the infractions which still continue to be committed in spite of it; and that the officers of the United States themselves do not hit upon the proper means of fulfilling it, and interpret it in different ways to the incalculable loss of Spain.

I have just received a letter from Charleston, an extract of which I have the honor to inclose, which will give you some idea how considerable these losses and damages must be. You will be pleased to remark that that port was one of those which the privateers of which I complain frequented less till now; but the evil is spreading and augments in an extraordinary degree every day, doubtless because they see how little they have to fear in this country the consequences of their shameful intrigues. The privateer named the "Padilla," of which it speaks, was last in the same port of Charleston, commanded apparently by a Frenchman called Daverac, but the true captain was (and when she sailed commanded her) one Bradford, a native of the United States, (as well as, also, was a great part of the crew which she carried,) and, having there surreptitiously augmented their number, returned to cruise against the Spaniards. Only since I sent my last note to Mr. Adams, two more Spanish prizes have entered, which I know, into the ports of this Union. One is the brig "Cazador," of which the inclosed letter speaks, and another is the schooner "Tereza," which has gone into Savannah to the care of one Bureil, a prize of the same privateer, the "Polly Hampton." Such privateers, availing themselves of various pretexts and subterfuges, easily dispose of their robberies here. This is public and notorious, and there is no cause to conceal it if they see that it can be done with impunity. And, in truth, how can they cease to see this, if even the newspapers of the same United States publish and celebrate the part which they take against Spain in the war with the revolted Governments of her America, not as if it were some private and obscure citizen of the United States, but even men of the greatest distinction for their talents and ranks in society and officers of the very Government. The inclosed newspaper, which came to my hands a little after having sent my last note to Mr. Adams, is an undeniable proof of this. By it you will see, sir, that a Consul General of the United States, putting himself at the head of a body of insurgents in South America, has been probably the cause of his Catholic Majesty losing one of his best kingdoms.

I have been more diffuse in my thoughts, with the view of letting you know how little good has been produced by the means hitherto taken by the Federal Government to prevent the armaments of which I complain, and you supposed there was no reason to fear in future, whilst they were still continuing to carry them on. I will conclude by requesting that you will be pleased to inform the President of it, in order that if he sees fit he may adopt other means more efficacious and satisfactory to his Catholic Majesty. I should be very happy if on this occasion I could assure his Majesty that the correct intentions of the President would in future be realized, and that he had no reason to fear the sailing of more armaments from the ports of the United States against the Spanish trade.

In the meantime I have much satisfaction in the honor of offering to you the assurances of my respect and attentive consideration.

No. 33, (a.)

Copy communicated with Mr. Salmon's letter to Mr. Daniel Brent, of September 29, 1824.

CHARLESTON, September 19, 1824.

"One vessel had been fitted out of this port to cruise against the property of Spaniards; she was a sloop called 'Amelia.' Said vessel was captured by the Spanish.

"Several vessels arrived in this port under the insurgent flag have augmented their force in arms and men. This may be ascertained by some persons who shipped them; one, however, who was very instrumental in this business, died a few days ago of the yellow fever.

"There have and continue to arrive prizes taken by vessels under the insurgent flags, who come in and pretend distress, and get liberty to sell a sufficient quantity to defray expenses, or repairs, &c., under which permission they generally sell the greater part of their plunder. This is the general impression.

"Yesterday arrived the Spanish brig 'Cazador,' Williams, with sugar, leather, corn, &c., prize to the Colombian armed schooner 'Polly Hampton,' Captain Natty, captured four weeks since off Havana, in distress, leaky, bound to Cumana, Spanish Main, having sprung a leak on the 14th instant. This is a very likely story.

"Ought to be taken into consideration Mr. Ortega's application to the district judge for process to have the property taken by the 'Padilla' restored, she having made captures contrary to the law of nations, which he refused hearing.

"One of the prizes of the 'Centella' being run ashore at Key West, with an understanding of a certain Captain Appleby, part of the cargo was sent here to Mr. Street & Co., say, value about $15,000 sugar, cigars, cochineal, indigo, &c.; the remainder was sold by the Captain of the schooner at public auction; with which circumstances I believe you are acquainted."

Extract of the General Instructions, No. 1, from Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, to Mr. Nelson, Minister Plenipotentiary to Spain, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 28, 1823.

The critical and convulsed condition of Spain may indeed bring forth many incidents now unforeseen, and upon which the President relies upon your own judgment for the course which, under them, you will find it prudent to pursue. But with regard to the ordinary relations between the two countries there are various objects upon which I now proceed to request your attention.

The renewal of the war in Venezuela has been signalized on the part of the Spanish commanders by proclamations of blockade unwarranted by the laws of nations, and by decrees regardless of those of humanity. With no other naval force than a single frigate, a brig, and a schooner, employed in transporting supplies from Curaçoa to Porto Cabello, they have presumed to declare a blockade of more than twelve hundred miles of coast. To this outrage upon all the rights of neutrality they have added the absurd pretension of interdicting the peaceable commerce of other nations with all the ports of the Spanish Main, upon the pretence that it had heretofore been forbidden by the Spanish colonial laws; and on the strength of these two inadmissible principles they have issued commissions, at Porto Cabello and in the island of Porto Rico, to a swarm of privateers, which have committed extensive and ruinous depredations upon the lawful commerce of the United States as well as upon that of other nations, and particularly of Great Britain.

It was impossible that neutral nations should submit to such a system; the execution of which has been as strongly marked with violence and cruelty as was its origin with injustice. Repeated remonstrances against it have been made to the Spanish Government, and it became necessary to give the protection of our naval force to the commerce of the United States exposed to these depredations.

By the act of Congress, of March 3, 1819, "to protect the commerce of the United States and punish the crime of piracy," the President was authorized to instruct the commanders of the public armed vessels of the United States to take any armed vessel "which shall have attempted or committed any piratical aggression, search, restraint, depredation, or seizure upon any vessel of the United States, or of the citizens thereof, or upon any other vessel; and, also, to retake any vessel of the United States, or its citizens, which may have been unlawfully captured upon the high seas."

A copy of this act and of the instructions from the Navy Department to the officers who have been charged with the execution of it are herewith furnished you. The instructions will enable you to show how cautiously this Government, while affording the protection due to the lawful commerce of the nation, has guarded against the infringement of the rights of all others.

The privateers from Porto Rico and Porto Cabello have been, by their conduct, distinguishable from pirates only by commissions of most equivocal character, from Spanish officers, whose authority to issue them has never been shown; and they have committed outrages and depredations which no commission could divest of the piratical character. During the same period swarms of pirates and of piratical vessels, without pretence or color of commission, have issued from the island of Cuba and the immediate neighborhood of the Havana, differing so little in the composition of their crews and their conduct from the privateers of Porto Cabello and Porto Rico as to leave little distinction other than that of being disavowed between them. These piracies have now been for years continued, under the immediate observation of the Government of the island of Cuba, which, as well as the Spanish Government, has been repeatedly and ineffectually required to suppress them. Many of them have been committed by boats within the very harbors and close upon the shores of the island. When pursued by superior force the pirates have escaped to the shores; and twelve months have elapsed since the late Captain General Mahy refused to Captain Biddle the permission to land even upon the desert and uninhabited parts of the island where they should seek refuge from his pursuit. Governor Mahy at the same time declared that he had taken the necessary measures to defend his territorial jurisdiction and for the apprehension of every description of outlaws.

Governor Mahy is since deceased; but neither the measures which he had then taken nor any since adopted by the Government of the island have proved effectual to suppress or in any manner even to restrain the pirates. From the most respectable testimony we are informed that these atrocious robberies are committed by persons well known, and that the traffic in their plunder is carried on with the utmost notoriety. They are sometimes committed by vessels equipped as merchant vessels, and which clear out as such from the Havana. It has also been remarked that they cautiously avoid molesting Spanish vessels, but attack without discrimination the defenceless vessels of all other nations. You will see by a letter from Lieutenant Gregory to the Secretary of the Navy (p. 64 of the printed documents) that a large portion of the crews of the Porto Rico privateers consist of these same pirates from Cuba.

In November last, a gallant officer of the Navy, Lieutenant Allen, lost his life in a conflict with some of these pirates; and an armament was immediately afterwards fitted out, and is now on the spot under the command of Commodore Porter, for the defence and protection of our commerce against them. Notice was despatched of this movement to Mr. Forsyth, by a special messenger, in January last, with instructions to him to require of the Spanish Government the permission to land in case of necessity in pursuit of the robbers. Copies of the instructions from the Secretary of the Navy are herewith furnished. From this statement of facts it is apparent that the naval officers of the United States who have been instructed to protect our commerce in that quarter have been brought in conflict with two descriptions of unlawful captors of our merchant vessels, the acknowledged and disavowed pirates of Cuba, and the ostensibly commissioned privateers from Porto Rico and Porto Cabello; and that in both cases the actual depredaters have been of the same class of Spanish subjects and often probably the same persons. The consequence has been that several of the commissioned privateers have been taken by our cruisers; and that in one instance a merchant vessel, belonging to the Havana, but charged upon oath of two persons as having been the vessel from which a vessel of the United States had been robbed, has been brought into port and is now at Norfolk to be tried at the next session of the District Court of the United States. In all these cases the Spanish minister, Anduaga, has addressed to this Department complaints and remonstrances in language so exceptionable that it precluded the possibility of an amicable discussion of the subject with him. In some of the cases explanations have been transmitted to Mr. Forsyth to be given in a spirit of amity and conciliation to the Spanish Government. But as your mission affords a favorable opportunity for a full and candid exposition of them all, copies of the correspondence with Mr. Anduaga, relating to them, are annexed to these instructions, to which I add upon each case of complaint the following remarks:

1. The first is the case of a man named Escandell, prize master of a Dutch vessel called the Neptune, taken by a privateer, armed in Porto Cabello, called the Virgin del Carmen, and retaken by the United States armed brig Spark, then commanded by Captain John H. Elton, since deceased. From the report of Captain Elton it appears: 1st. That the Dutch vessel had been taken within the territorial jurisdiction of the Dutch island of Curaçoa. 2d. That he, Captain Elton, delivered her up to the Governor of the island of Aruba. 3d. That he retook her as a vessel piratically captured; the prize master, Escandell, having produced to him no papers whatsoever. He therefore brought him and the prize crew to Charleston, South Carolina, where they were prosecuted as pirates.

Mr. Anduaga's first letter to me on this case was dated the 24th of July, 1822, inclosing a copy of a letter from Escandell to the Spanish vice consul at Charleston, invoking his protection; Escandell being then in prison, and under an indictment for piracy. He solicits the interposition of the vice consul, that he may obtain, from the Captain General of the Havana and the commanding officer at Porto Cabello, documents to prove that he was lawfully commissioned; and he alleges that the captain of the privateer had furnished him with a document to carry the prize into Porto Cabello; that he did deliver this document to Captain Elton, who concealed it from the court at Charleston; that Elton and his officers well knew that he, Escandell, was commissioned by the King of Spain, and had assisted at the disembarking of General la Torre with the privateer and the prize, but that Elton had withheld his knowledge of these facts from the grand jury. Mr. Anduaga's letter to me noticed this contradiction between the statement of Captain Elton and the declaration of Escandell, and requested that the trial at Charleston might be postponed till he could receive answers from the Captain General of the Havana and the commandant of Porto Cabello, to whom he had written to obtain the documents necessary to prove the legality of the capture. This was accordingly done.

This letter of Mr. Anduaga was unexceptionable in its purport; but, on the 17th of October, he addressed me a second, inclosing the papers which he had received from Porto Cabello, and assuming a style of vituperation not only against Captain Elton, then very recently dead, but against the Navy in general, the Government, and even the people of the United States, which required the exertion of some forbearance to avoid sending it back to him as unsuitable to be received at this Department from a foreign minister.

It was the more unwarrantable, because, while assuming, as proved, against an officer of the United States, no longer living to justify himself, that he had concealed documents furnished him by Escandell, he declares it "evident that not the public service but avarice, and the atrocious desire of sacrificing upon a gibbet the lives of some innocent citizens of a friendly power, were the moving principles of this commander's conduct." To those who personally knew Captain Elton, what language could reply in terms of indignation adequate to the unworthiness of this charge? And how shall I now express a suitable sense of it, when I say that it was advanced without a shadow of proof, upon the mere original assertion of Escandell, made in the most suspicious manner, and which the very documents from Porto Cabello tended rather to disprove than to sustain.

It was made, I say, in the most suspicious manner; for, in his affidavit before the clerk of the United States court at Charleston, made on the 8th of June, 1822, where he might have been confronted by Captain Elton and the officers of the Spark, Escandell had not even hinted at this concealment of his papers by Captain Elton, or pretended that he had produced any to him. But after he had been arraigned upon the indictment, and after the court had, at the motion of his counsel, postponed his trial to the next term, for the express purpose of giving him time to obtain proof that he had been commissioned, in a secret letter to Castro, the owner of the privateer, at Porto Cabello, and in another to the Spanish vice consul at Charleston, he makes these scandalous allegations against Captain Elton at times and places where he could not be present to refute them. That the documents from Porto Cabello, transmitted to Mr. Anduaga, tended rather to disprove than to sustain them, you will perceive by an examination of the translations of them herewith furnished you. The only documents among them showing the authority under which Escandell, when captured by Captain Elton, had possession of the Neptune, is a copy of the commission of the privateer Virgin del Carmen, which had taken the Neptune, and a declaration by the captain of the privateer, Lorenzo Puyol, that, on capturing the Neptune, he had put Escandell, as prize master, and six men, on board of her, ordering her into the port of Cabello, and furnishing Escandell with the documents necessary for his voyage. No copy of these documents is produced; and the declaration of this Captain Puyol himself is signed only with a cross, he not knowing how to write his name.

It is conceived that the only admissible evidence of Escandell's regular authority as prize master of a captured vessel would have been an authenticated copy of the document itself, furnished him by Puyol. The extreme ignorance of this man, who appears, on the face of his own declaration, unable to write his own name, raises more than a presumption that he knew as little what could be a regular document for a prize master, and is by no means calculated to give confidence to his declaration as a substitute for the authentic copy of the document itself. The absurdity of the imputation of avaricious motives to Captain Elton is demonstrated by the fact that he delivered up the prize, which was a Dutch vessel, to the Governor of Aruba, and to her original captain; and as to that of his having concealed Escandell's papers to bring him and six innocent seamen to a gibbet, I can even now notice it only to leave to the candor of the Spanish Government whether it ought ever to be answered.

Copies are herewith furnished of Captain Elton's report of this transaction to the Secretary of the Navy; of the agreement by which the Neptune was by him delivered up to the Dutch commandant, at the island of Aruba, Thielen; and of the receipt given by her original captain, Reinar Romer, to whom she was restored. In these documents you will see it expressly stipulated both by the Dutch commandant and by Captain Romer that the "vessel and cargo, or the value thereof, should be returned to any legal authority of the United States of America, or to the Spanish Government, or prize claimants, in due course of the laws of nations." You will find, also, that in the document signed by Captain Romer he expressly declares that the persons by whom he had been captured purported to belong to a Spanish felucca privateer, but not having any credentials or authority to cruise upon the high seas with them he supposes them to have been pirates.

This declaration of Romer himself is directly contradictory to the assertion which Escandell, in his affidavit at Charleston, on the 8th of June, 1822, pretends that Captain Romer made to the boarding officer from the Spark, in answer to his inquiries whether Escandell and his men were pirates. Escandell says that Romer answered they were not; Romer himself says that he supposes they were.

You will remark that, in the copy of Escandell's affidavit, transmitted by Mr. Anduaga to the Department of State, the name of the Dutch captain of the Neptune is written Reinas Buman, apparently by mistake in the copy. The name, as signed by himself, is Reinar Romer.

On a review of the whole transaction, as demonstrated by these documents, it will be seen that the conduct of Captain Elton was fair, honorable, cautiously regardful of the possible rights of the captors and Spanish Government, and eminently disinterested. He retook the Neptune, a Dutch vessel, at the request of an officer of the Dutch Government. He had already known and protected her as a neutral before. He restored her to her captain without claiming salvage, and upon the sole condition that the Dutch Governor should restore to their owners, citizens of the United States, the proceeds of a vessel and cargo also wrongfully captured by a Spanish privateer, and which had been brought within his jurisdiction. And he provided that if the capture of the Neptune should eventually prove to have been lawfully made, the Dutch commandant and the captain of the Neptune himself should be responsible to the Spanish and American Governments and to the captors for the result.

I have entered into this detail of the evidence in this case not only to give you the means of satisfying the Spanish Government that the complaints of Mr. Anduaga against Captain Elton were as groundless in substance as they were unjust to him and disrespectful to this Government and nation in form, but to vindicate from unmerited reproach the memory of a gallant officer, of whose faithful and valuable services his country had been deprived by death only twenty days before these dishonorable imputations were cast upon him by Mr. Anduaga.

The harshness and precipitation of that minister's judgment, in preferring this complaint, is the more remarkable, inasmuch as he avows in that very note the opinion that the bare word, without proof, of a merchant captain is not evidence sufficient to furnish even a pretext to the naval officers of the United States to attack the armed vessel by which he had been plundered. If the word of the captain of a merchant vessel, supported by his oath, were of such trivial account, of what weight in the scale of testimony is the bare word of a captain of a privateer who cannot write his name, to prove the existence and authority of a written or printed document pretended to have been given by himself?

If the capture of the Neptune by Puyol had been lawful, her owners would at this day possess the means of recovering indemnity for their loss by the recapture, in the written engagements of the Dutch commandant, Thieleman, and of Captain Romer. But it was not lawful. By the documents transmitted by Mr. Anduaga it appears that a part of the cargo of the Neptune, after her capture by the Virgin del Carmen, had been transhipped to another vessel, and that at Porto Cabello it was condemned by Captain Lavorde, commander of the Spanish frigate Ligera, who had issued the privateer's commission, and then sat as judge of the admiralty court upon the prize. And the sole ground of condemnation assigned is the breach of the pretended blockade by the Neptune and her trading with the Independent Patriots. You will remark the great irregularity and incompatibility with the principles of general justice as well as of the Spanish Constitution, that one and the same person should be acting at once in the capacity of a naval officer, of a magistrate issuing commissions to privateers, and of a judge to decide upon the prizes taken by them.

But the whole foundation of his decision is a nullity. The blockade was a public wrong. The interdiction of all trade was an outrage upon the rights of all neutral nations, and the resort to two expedients bears on its face the demonstration that they who assumed them both had no reliance upon the justice of either; for if the interdiction of all neutral trade with the Independents were lawful, there was neither use nor necessity for the blockade; and if the blockade were lawful, there could be as little occasion or pretence for the interdiction of the trade. The correctness of this reasoning can no longer be contested by the Spanish Government itself. The blockade and interdiction of trade have, from the first notice of them, not only been denounced and protested against by the Government and officers of the United States, but by those of Great Britain, even when the ally of Spain, and who has not yet acknowledged the independence of the revolted colonies. The consequences of these pretensions have been still more serious to Spain, since they terminated in a formal notification by the British Government that they had issued orders of reprisal to their squadrons in the West Indies to capture all Spanish vessels until satisfaction should be made for the property of all British subjects taken or detained under color of this preposterous blockade and interdiction. And Spain has formally pledged herself to make this demanded reparation.

2. The second cause of complaint by Mr. Anduaga, upon which I have to animadvert, is that of the capture of the Porto Rico privateer Palmyra by the United States armed schooner Grampus, Lieutenant Gregory, commander.

With his letter of the 11th of October, 1822, Mr. Anduaga transmitted copies of a letter from the captain of the privateer Escurra to the Spanish consul at Charleston, dated the 16th of September, 1822, and of sundry depositions taken at Porto Rico from seamen who had belonged to her relating to the capture. The account of the transaction given by Lieutenant Gregory is among the documents transmitted to Congress with the President's message at the commencement of the last session, pages 62, 63, and 64, to which I refer. The subject is yet before the competent judicial tribunal of this country.

The captain and seamen of the Palmyra, with the exception of those charged with the robbery of the Coquette, were discharged by a decree of the District Court of the United States at Charleston, and the vessel was restored to her captain; but the judge, (Drayton, since deceased,) in giving this decree, declared that Lieutenant Gregory had been fully justified in the capture. By a decree of the Circuit Court of the same district heavy damages were awarded against Lieutenant Gregory, from which sentence there is an appeal pending before the Supreme Judicial Court of the United States. Whatever their final decision may be, the character of the court is a sure warrant that it will be given with every regard due to the rights and interests of all the parties concerned, and the most perfect reliance may be placed upon its justice, impartiality, and independence. The decision of the Circuit Court, indeed, would imply some censure upon the conduct of Lieutenant Gregory, and may be represented as giving support to the complaints of the Spanish minister against him. But it is the opinion of a single judge, in direct opposition to that of his colleague on the same bench, and liable to the revisal and correction of the supreme tribunal. It is marked with two principles, upon which it may be fairly presumed the judgment of the Supreme Court will be more in accord with that of the district. The justification of Lieutenant Gregory for taking and sending in the Palmyra rests upon two important facts: First, the robbery committed by part of her crew, sworn to by Captain Souther, of the schooner Coquette, and confirmed by the oaths of her mate and two of her seamen; and secondly, that at the time of her capture she had commenced the firing upon the Grampus by a full volley from small arms and cannon. But as the fact of the robbery from the Coquette was not in rigorously judicial evidence before the Circuit Court, the judge declared that, although he had no doubt the fact was true, yet, in the absence of the evidence to prove it, he must officially decide that it was false; and as to the circumstance of the first fire, as the Spanish and American testimony were in contradiction to each other, he should set them both aside and form his decision upon other principles. If, indeed, Lieutenant Gregory is ultimately to be deprived of the benefit of these two facts, he will be left judicially without justification. But, considered with reference to the discharge of his duty as an officer of the United States, if the declaration of Captain Souther, taken upon oath, confirmed by those of his mate and two of his men, was not competent testimony upon which he was bound to act, upon what evidence could an officer of the Navy ever dare to execute his instructions and the law by rescuing or protecting from the robbers of the sea the property of his fellow-citizens?

The robbery of the Coquette by the boat's crew from the Palmyra is assuredly sufficiently proved for all other than judicial purposes by the fact, which was in evidence before the District Court, that the memorandum book, sworn by John Peabody, junior, mate of the Coquette, to have been taken from him, together with clothing, was actually found in a bag with clothing on board the Palmyra.

In answering Mr. Anduaga's letter of October 11, I transmitted to him a copy of the printed decree of Judge Drayton, in which the most material facts relating to the case, and the principles applicable to it upon which his decision was given, are set forth. Some additional facts are disclosed in a statement published by Lieutenant Gregory, highly important to this discussion, inasmuch as they identify a portion of the crew of the Palmyra with a gang of the Cape Antonio pirates, and with an establishment of the same character which had before been broken up by that officer.

In a long and elaborate reply to my letter, dated the 11th of December, 1822, Mr. Anduaga, without contesting the fact that the Coquette had been robbed by the boarding crew from the Palmyra, objects to the decision of Judge Drayton, as if, by detaining for trial the individual seamen belonging to the Palmyra charged with the robbery, it assumed a jurisdiction disclaimed by the very acknowledgment that the privateer was lawfully commissioned, and sanctioned the right of search, so long and so strenuously resisted by the American Government.

In this reply, too, Mr. Anduaga attempts, by laborious argument, to maintain, to the fullest and most unqualified extent, the right of the Spanish privateers to capture, and of the Spanish prize courts to condemn, all vessels of every other nation trading with any of the ports of the Independent Patriots of South America, because, under the old colonial laws of Spain, that trade had been prohibited. And with the consistency of candor, at least, he explicitly says that the decrees issued by the Spanish commanders on the Main, under the name of blockades, were not properly so called, but were mere enforcements of the antediluvian colonial exclusions; and such were the instructions under which the Palmyra, and all the other privateers from Port Rico and Port Cabello, have been cruising. Is it surprising that the final answer of Great Britain to this pretension was an order of reprisals? or that, under the laws of the United States, it has brought their naval officers in conflict of actual hostility with privateers so commissioned and so instructed? The Spanish Government have for many years had notice, both from Great Britain and from the United States, that they considered as rightful the peaceful commerce of their people with the ports in possession of the Independent Patriots. Spain herself has opened most of those of which her forces have been able to retain or to recover the possession. The blockades proclaimed by General Morillo, in 1815, were coupled with this same absurd pretension; they were formally protested against by the Government of the United States; and wherever Morillo obtained possession, he himself immediately opened the port to foreign and neutral commerce.

Mr. Anduaga seems to have had much confidence in the conclusiveness of his reasoning in this letter of December 11; for, without considering the character of our institutions which have committed to the Executive authority all communications with the ministers of foreign powers, he permitted himself the request that the President would communicate it to Congress; without having the apology for this indiscretion, which, on a prior occasion, he had alleged for a like request, namely, that it was in answer to letters from this Department which had been communicated to the Legislature. In the former case he was indulged by compliance with his request. In the latter it was passed over without notice. But Mr. Anduaga was determined that his argument should come before the public, and sent a copy of it to the Havana, where it was published in the newspapers, whence it has been translated, and inserted in some of our public journals.

The British order of reprisals; the appropriation by the Cortes of forty millions of reals for reparation to British subjects of damages sustained by them, in part from capture and condemnation of their property, under this absurd pretension; and the formal revocation by the King of Spain of these unlawful blockades, will, it is presumed, supersede the necessity of a serious argument in reply to that of Mr. Anduaga upon this point. It is in vain for Spain to pretend that, during the existence of a civil war, in which, by the universal law of nations, both parties have equal rights, with reference to foreign nations, she can enforce against all neutrals, by the seizure and condemnation of their property, the laws of colonial monopoly and prohibitions, by which they had been excluded from commercial intercourse with the colonies before the existence of the war, and when her possession and authority were alike undisputed. And if, at any stage of the war, this pretension could have been advanced with any color of reason, it was pre-eminently nugatory on the renewal of the war, after the formal treaty between Morillo and Bolivar, and the express stipulation which it contained, that, if the war should be renewed, it should be conducted on the principles applicable to wars between independent nations, and not on the disgusting and sanguinary doctrine of suppressing rebellion.

As little foundation is there for the inference drawn by Mr. Anduaga from the decree of the district judge, admitting the Palmyra to have been lawfully commissioned as a privateer, but detaining for trial the portion of her crew charged with the robbery from the Coquette, that it sanctions the right of search, against which the United States have so long and so constantly protested; for, in the first place, the United States have never disputed the belligerent right of search as recognized and universally practiced conformably to the laws of nations. They have disputed the right of belligerents, under color of the right of search for contraband of war, to seize and carry away men, at the discretion of the boarding officer, without trial and without appeal; men, not as contraband of war, or belonging to the enemy, but as subjects, real or pretended, of the belligerent himself, and to be used by him against his enemy. It is the fraudulent abuse of the right of search, for purposes never recognized or admitted by the laws of nations; purposes, in their practical operation, of the deepest oppression, and most crying injustice, that the United States have resisted and will resist, and which warns them against assenting to the extension, in time of peace, of a right which experience has shown to be liable to such gross perversion in time of war. And secondly, the Palmyra was taken for acts of piratical aggression and depredation upon a vessel of the United States, and upon the property of their citizens. Acts of piratical aggression and depredation may be committed by vessels having lawful commissions as privateers, and many such had been committed by the Palmyra. The act of robbery from the Coquette was, in every respect piratical; for it was committed while the privateer was under the Venezuelan flag, and under that flag she had fired upon the Coquette, and brought her to. It was piratical, therefore, not only as depredation of the property by the boat's crew who took it away, but as aggression under the sanction of the captain of the privateer who was exercising belligerent rights under false colors. To combat under any other flag than that of the nation by which she is commissioned, by the laws of nations subjects a vessel, though lawfully commissioned, to seizure and condemnation as a pirate.—(See Valin's Ordonnance de la Marine, vol. 2., p. 239.) And although the decree of the district judge ordered the restitution of the vessel to her captain, because it held him to have been lawfully commissioned; neither did the law of nations require, nor would the law of the United States permit, that men brought within the jurisdiction of the court, and charged with piratical depredations upon citizens of the United States, should be discharged and turned over to a foreign tribunal for trial, as was demanded by Mr. Anduaga. They had been brought within the jurisdiction of the court, not by the exercise of any right of search, but as part of the crew of a vessel which had committed piratical depredations and aggressions upon vessels and citizens of the United States. The District Court, adjudging the commission of the privateer to have been lawful, and considering the gun fired under the Venezuelan flag, to bring the Coquette to, though wrongful and unwarrantable, as not amounting rigorously to that combat, which would have been complete piracy, discharged the captain and portion of the crew which had not been guilty of the robbery of the Coquette, but reserved for trial the individuals charged with that act.

The conduct of the Palmyra for months before her capture had been notoriously and flagrantly piratical. She had, in company with an other privateer, named the Boves, both commanded by the same captain, Pablo Slinger, fired upon the United States schooner Porpoise, Captain Ramage, who abstained from returning the fire. For this act of unequivocal hostility, Captain Slinger's only apology to Captain Ramage was, that he had taken the Porpoise for a Patriot cruiser.—(See documents with the President's message of December, 1822, p. 65.) Numbers of neutral vessels, of different nations, had been plundered by her; and among the affidavits made to Lieutenant Gregory, at St. Thomas, was one of the master and mate of a French schooner, that she had been robbed by a boat's crew from her of a barrel of beef and a barrel of rice. In the letter from Captain Escurra to the Spanish consul at Charleston, he admits the taking of these provisions, alleging that the master of the French vessel gave them to him at his request. The affidavit of the French master and mate shows what sort of a gift it was, and is more coincident with all the other transactions of this privateer.

In the same letter of December 11, Mr. Anduaga, with more ingenuity than candor, attempts at once to raise a wall of separation between the pirates of Cuba and the privateersmen of Porto Rico and Porto Cabello, and to identify the pirates, not only with all those who at a prior period had abused the several independent flags of South America, but with the adventurers from the United States who at different times have engaged in the Patriot service; and he endeavors to blend them all with the foolish expedition of last summer against Porto Rico. While indulging his propensity to complain, he revives all the long exploded and groundless charges of his predecessors in former years, and does not scruple to insinuate that the Cuba pirates themselves are North Americans from the United States. It is easy to discern and point out the fallacy of these endeavors to blend together things totally distinct, and to discriminate between things that are identical. It is in proof before our tribunals, in the case of the Palmyra itself, that some of the pirates of Cuba and of the Porto Rico privateersmen are the same. Among the Cuba pirates that have been taken, as well by the vessels of the United States as by British cruisers, not one North American has been found. A number of those pirates have been executed at the Bahama islands, and ten from one vessel at the island of Jamaica, all Spanish subjects, and from the Spanish islands. Not a shadow of evidence has been seen that, among the Cuba pirates, a single citizen of the United States was to be found.

As to the complaints of Mr. Anduaga's predecessors, meaning those of Don Luis de Onis, it might have been expected that we should hear no more of them after the ratification of the treaty of 1819. Whatever had been the merits of those complaints, full satisfaction for them all had been made by that treaty to Spain, and was acknowledged by the ratification of the Spanish Government in October, 1820. Since that time no complaints had been made by Mr. Anduaga's predecessors. It was reserved for him as well to call up those phantoms from the dead, as to conjure new ones from the living. That supplies of every kind, including arms and other implements of war, have been, in the way of lawful commerce, procured within the United States for the account of the South American Independents, and at their expense and hazard exported to them, is doubtless true. And Spain has enjoyed and availed herself of the same advantages.

The neutrality of the United States has, throughout this contest between Spain and South America, been cautiously and faithfully observed by their Government. But the complaints of Mr. Anduaga as well as those of his predecessor, Mr. Onis, are founded upon erroneous views and mistaken principles of neutrality. They assume that all commerce, even the most peaceful commerce of other nations, with the South Americans, is a violation of neutrality. And while they assert this in principle, the Spanish commanders, in the few places where they yet hold authority, attempt to carry it into effect in a spirit worthy of itself. The decree of General Morales, of the 15th of September, 1822, as in perfect accord with the argument of Mr. Anduaga, on the 11th of December of the same year. The unconcerted but concurring solemn protests against the former, of the Dutch Governor of Curaçoa, Cantzlaar, of the British Admiral Rowley, and of our own Captain Spence were but the chorus of all human feeling revolting at the acts of which Mr. Anduaga's reasoning was the attempted justification.

3. The next case of complaint by Mr. Anduaga is in a letter of the 23d of February last, against Lieutenant Wilkinson, commander of the United States schooner Spark, for capturing off the Havana a vessel called the Ninfa Catalana or the Santissima Trinidad, Nicholas Garyole master, and sending her into Norfolk. As there are reasons for believing that in this case Lieutenant Wilkinson acted upon erroneous information, a court of inquiry has been ordered upon his conduct, the result of which will be communicated to you. The Ninfa Catalana remains for trial at the District Court to be held in the eastern district of Virginia in the course of the next month. Immediately after receiving Mr. Anduaga's letter on the subject, I wrote to the attorney of the United States for the district, instructing him to obtain, if possible, an extraordinary session of the court, that the cause might be decided without delay; but the judge declined appointing such session unless all the witnesses summoned to the court upon the case could be notified of it, which not being practicable, the short delay till the meeting of the regular session of the court has been unavoidable. You will assure the Spanish Government that the most impartial justice will be rendered to all the parties concerned, as well by the adjudication of the admiralty court as by the military inquiry on the conduct of Lieutenant Wilkinson. I ought to add, that no evidence hitherto has come to the knowledge of the Government which has implicated the correctness of Lieutenant Wilkinson's intentions, or manifested any other motive than that of discharging his duty and protecting the property of his fellow-citizens.

4. The capture of the Spanish schooner Carmen, alias Gallega the Third, by the United States sloop-of-war Peacock, Captain Cassin, has furnished the fourth occasion for this class of Mr. Anduaga's remonstrances.

There are two declarations, or depositions, made by the captain and persons who were on board of this vessel at the time of her capture: one at Pensacola, and the other at New Orleans. The first, before the notary, José Escaro, by Jacinto Correa, captain of the Gallega, the pilot, Ramon Echavarria, boatswain, Manuel Agacio, three sailors, and Juan Martín Ferreyro, a passenger. All the witnesses, after the first, only confirm, in general and unqualified terms, all his statements, although many of the circumstances, asserted by him as facts, could not have been personally known to them, and others could not have been known to himself but by hearing from some of them. The protest, for example, avers that, when first captured by the Peacock, Captain Correa, with his steward and cook, were taken on board that vessel, and, while they were there, he represents various disorders to have been committed on board of his own vessel by the boarding officer from the Peacock, though, by his own showing, he was not present to witness them. His whole narrative is composed of alleged occurrences on board of three vessels, the Peacock, the Louisiana cutter, and the Gallega, and no discrimination is made between those of his own knowledge and those which he had heard from others. The second declaration was made before Antonio Argote Villalobos, Spanish consul at New Orleans, only by Captain Correa and Echavarria, the mate, and gives an account of several other Spanish vessels captured by the Peacock while they were on board of that vessel as prisoners. A very inadequate reason is assigned by Captain Correa for not having made it at the same time with the first at Pensacola; and the whole purport of it is, to represent those other vessels which he had seen captured as inoffensive, unarmed vessels, and the capture of them by the Peacock as itself piratical.

Copies of the proceedings of the courts at Pensacola and at New Orleans upon these cases are expected at this Department, and the substance of them will be duly communicated to you.

In the meantime, the reports of Captain Cassin, of the Peacock, and of Captain Jackson, commander of the revenue cutter Louisiana, to the Navy Department, will give you a very different and, doubtless, more correct account of these transactions.

There is a strong reason for believing that the Gallega did actually belong to the gang of pirates of which those pretended inoffensive and unarmed vessels certainly formed a part; that Correa and Echavarria were testifying in behalf of their accomplices; and their warm sympathy with those convicted pirates is much more indicative of their own guilt than of their belief in the innocence of the others.

That the other vessels were piratical is no longer a subject of question or dispute. Two of them were carried by Captain Cassin to the Havana, where one of them, a schooner of nine guns, was claimed by a lady, widow of a merchant in that city, as her property, and, at her application, supported by that of the Captain General, was restored to her upon payment of $1,000 salvage. The part of the cargo which had been saved was sold in like manner with the approbation of the Captain General. The vessel had been taken by the pirates but a few days before, and, in retaking and restoring her to the owner, Captain Cassin had not only rendered an important service to a Spanish subject, but taken from the pirates the means of committing more extensive and atrocious depredations.

Among the articles found on board of these vessels were some of female apparel, rent and blood-stained; and many other traces to deeds of horror with which these desperate wretches are known to be familiar. The pirates had, when close pursued, abandoned their vessels and escaped to the shore. They were pursued, but not discovered. The coffee was found hidden in the woods, and, with the vessel brought into New Orleans, has been regularly condemned by the sentence of the court. And these are the characters, and this the description of people, whom Captain Correa and his mate, Echavarria, represent, in their declaration before the Spanish consul at New Orleans as innocent Spanish subjects, piratically plundered of their lawful property by Captain Cassin. And upon such testimony as this has Mr. Anduaga suffered himself to be instigated to a style of invective and reproach, not only against that officer, but against the officers of our Navy generally, against the Government and people of this country, upon which, while pointing it out and marking its contrast with the real facts of the case, I forbear all further comment.

Let it be admitted that the Catalan Nymph and the Gallega were lawful traders, and that, in capturing them as pirates, Lieutenant Wilkinson and Captain Cassin have been mistaken; that they had probable cause, sufficient for their justification, I cannot doubt, and am persuaded will, upon a full investigation of the cases, be made apparent.

In the impartial consideration of this subject, it is necessary to advert to the character of these pirates, and to the circumstances which have made it so difficult to distinguish between lawfully commissioned and registered Spanish vessels and the pirates.

The first of these has been the unlawful extent given to the commissions and instructions of the privateers, avowed by the Spanish Government—an authority to take all commercial vessels bound to any of the ports in possession of the Patriots. The very assumption of this principle, and the countenance given to it by the adjudications of the courts, was enough to kindle all the passions of lawless rapine in the maritime population of the islands. It was holding out to them the whole commerce of the neutral world as lawful prey. The next is the impunity with which those robberies have been committed in the very port of the Havana, and under the eye of the local Government. It is represented, and believed to be true, that many inhabitants of the city, merchants of respectable standing in society, are actively concerned in these transactions. That of the village of Regla, opposite the city, almost all the inhabitants are, with public notoriety, concerned in them. That some of the deepest criminals are known and pointed at—while the vigilance or energy of the Government is so deficient that there is an open market for the sale of those fruits of robbery; and that threats of vengeance are heard from the most abandoned of the culprits against all who molest them in their nefarious and bloody career.

The third is, that many of the piracies have been committed by merchant vessels laden with cargoes. The Spanish vessels of that description in the islands are all armed, and when taken by the pirates, are immediately converted to their own purposes. The schooner of nine guns, taken by Captain Cassin, and restored to its owner in the Havana, affords one proof of this fact; and one of the most atrocious piracies committed upon citizens of the United States was that upon the Ladies' Delight, by the Zaragosa, a vessel regularly cleared at the Havana as a merchant vessel.

There are herewith furnished you copies of the general instructions, from the Secretary of the Navy, given to all our naval officers, successively stationed in those seas, for the protection of our commerce and for carrying into effect the laws against piracy and the slave trade, together with printed copies of those laws. They will enable you to present to the Spanish Government the most conclusive proof of the friendly sentiments towards Spain, and of the undeviating regard to her rights which have constantly animated this Government, and effectually to counteract any representations of a different character, which may be made by Mr. Anduaga.

In reflecting upon the conduct of this minister, during his residence in the United States, it has been impossible to avoid the suspicion that it has been instigated by a disposition, not more friendly to the existing liberal institutions of his own country than to the harmonious intercourse, to which they were so well calculated to contribute, between the United States and Spain.

From the time of the re-establishment in Spain of a constitutional Government the sympathies of this country have been warm, earnest, and unanimous in favor of her freedom and independence. The principles which she asserts and maintains are emphatically ours, and, in the conflict with which she is now threatened for supporting them, a cordial good understanding with us was as obviously the dictate of her policy as it was the leading principle of ours. This national sentiment has not been silent or unobserved. It was embodied and expressed in the most public and solemn manner in the message to Congress at the commencement of their last session, as will be within your recollection. The conduct of the Government has been invariably conformable to it. The recognition of the South American Governments, flowing from the same principle which enlisted all our feelings in the cause of Spain, has been, in its effects, a mere formality. It has in nowise changed our actual relations, either with them or with Spain. All the European powers, even those which have hitherto most strenuously denied the recognition in form, have treated and will treat the South Americans as independent in fact. By his protest, against the formal acknowledgment, Mr. Anduaga had fulfilled his duties to his own Government, nor has any one circumstance arisen from that event which could require of him to recur to it, as a subject of difference between us and Spain, again. We have not been disposed to complain of his protest, nor even of his permanent residence at a distance from the seat of Government. But the avidity with which he has seized upon every incident which could cause unpleasant feelings between the two countries; the bitterness with which his continual notes have endeavored to exasperate and envenom; the misrepresentations of others, which he has so precipitously assumed as undeniable facts; and the language in which he has vented his reproaches upon the fair and honorable characters of our naval officers, upon the Government, and even the people of this Union; and, above all, the artifice by which he suffered the absurd and ridiculous expedition of De Coudray Holstein to obtain some paltry supplies of men and arms in this country, without giving notice of it to this Government, when they might have effectually broken it up, leaving it unknown to us till after its inevitable failure, when he could trump it up as a premeditated hostility of ours against Spain, and a profligate project of invasion of her possessions, are indications of a temper which we can trace to no source, either of friendly feeling towards our country or of patriotic devotion to his own. It has the aspect of a deliberate purpose to stir up and inflame dissensions between the United States and Spain; to produce and cherish every means of alienation and distrust between them, with ultimate views to the counteraction of these differences, upon the internal administration and Government of his own nation.

It is hoped that he will, in no event, be permitted to return hither; and, in the full and just explanations which you will be enabled to give upon every complaint exhibited by him while here, the Spanish Government will be satisfied with the justice, and convinced of the friendly disposition towards Spain, which have governed all our conduct. With the same spirit, and the just expectation that it will be met with a reciprocal return, you will represent to them the claim of all the citizens of the United States, whose vessels and other property have been captured by the privateers from Porto Rico and Porto Cabello, and condemned by the courts of those places for supposed breaches of the pretended blockade, or for trading with the South American Independents. Restitution or indemnity is due to them all; and is immediately due by the Spanish Government, inasmuch as these injuries, having been sanctioned by the local authorities, military and civil, the sufferers in most of the cases can have no resort to the individuals by whom the captures were made. A list of all the cases which have come yet to the knowledge of this Department is now inclosed. There are probably many others. An agent will be shortly sent to collect, at the respective places, the evidence in all the cases not already known, and to obtain, as far as may be practicable, restitution by the local authorities. Whatever may be restored by them will diminish by so much the amount of claim upon the Spanish Government; which will be the more indisputable, as they have already admitted the justice and made provision for the satisfaction of claims of British subjects which sprung from the same cause.

Of the formal revocation by the Spanish Government of the nominal blockade the Governor of Porto Rico has given express notice to Commodore Porter. As a consequence of this, it is hoped that no commissions for privateers will be issued. The revocation did, indeed, come at a critical time; for it cannot be too strongly impressed upon the Spanish Government that all the causes of complaint, both by Spanish subjects against the Navy officers of the United States, and by the citizens of the United States, with which you are now charged, proceeded directly, or as a consequence, from those spurious blockades. They were in violation of the laws of nations. They were in conflict with the law of Congress for protecting the commerce of the United States. It was impossible that ships-of-war of the United States with commanders instructed to carry that law into execution, and Spanish privateers commissioned and instructed to carry into effect the atrocious decree of General Morales, should meet and fulfil their respective instructions without hostile collision. The decree of General Morales constituted all those Spanish subjects who acted under it in a state of war de facto with all neutral nations; and on the sea it was a war of extermination against all neutral commerce. It is to the responsibility of her own officers, therefore, that Spain must look for indemnity to the wrongs endured by her own subjects as necessary consequences of their official acts, as well as for the source of her obligation to indemnify all the innocent sufferers under them who are entitled to the protection of other nations. You will take an immediate opportunity, after your reception, to urge upon the Spanish Government the absolute necessity of a more vigorous and energetic exercise of the local authorities in the island of Cuba for the suppression of the piracies by which it is yet infested. Their professions of co-operation with the naval force of the United States to this object have not been followed up by corresponding action. As long since as last May Captain Biddle, then commanding the Macedonian frigate, represented to the Captain General, Mahy, the necessity that would frequently arise of pursuing them from their boats to the shores on the desert and uninhabited parts of the island, and requested permission to land for such purpose, which was explicitly refused. Mr. Forsyth has been instructed to renew the demand of this permission to the Spanish Government itself. And, as there are cases in which the necessity will constitute the right of anticipating that permission, Commodore Porter has been instructed accordingly. From a recent debate in the British Parliament it appears that similar instructions have been given to the commanders of the British squadrons despatched for the protection of the commerce of that nation, and that when notified to the Spanish Government, although at first resisted by them, they finally obtained their acquiescence. These circumstances will serve for answer to one of the most aggravated complaints of Mr. Anduaga against Captain Cassin. That officer did land; and although not successful in overtaking the pirates themselves, he did break up one of the deposits of their lawless plunder, burned several of their boats, and took from them two of their armed vessels. Mr. Anduaga sees in all this nothing but a violation of his Catholic Majesty's territory; a sentiment, on such an occasion, which would be more suitable for an accessory to the pirates than for the officer of a Government deeply and earnestly intent upon their suppression.

From the highly esteemed and honorable character of General Vives, who has, probably, before this, arrived at the Havana as Governor and Captain General of the island, we hope for more effectual co-operation to this most desirable event. There has been, according to every account, a laxity and remissness on that subject in the Executive authority of that port which we hope will no longer be seen. The boldness and notoriety with which crimes of such desperate die are committed in the very face of authority is, of itself, irrefragable proof of its own imbecility or weakness. Spain must be sensible that she is answerable to the world for the suppression of crimes committed within her jurisdiction, and of which the people of other nations are almost exclusively the victims. The pirates have generally, though not universally, abstained from annoying Spanish subjects and from the robbery of Spanish property. It is surely within the competency of the Government of Cuba to put down that open market of the pirates which has so long been denounced at the Havana. It appears that masters of American vessels which had been robbed have seen their own property openly exposed to sale in that city, but have been dissuaded from reclaiming it by the warning that it would expose them to the danger of assassination. One instance, at least, has occurred of unpunished murder of a citizen of the United States for the indiscreet expression of his expectation that the arrival of Commodore Porter's squadron would secure more respect to the persons and property of American citizens; and other cases have happened of outrages upon citizens of the United States in which the protecting power of the Government has been deficient, at least, in promptitude and vigor.

To the irritation between the people of the two nations, produced by the consequences of the abominable decree of General Morales, must be attributed that base and dastardly spirit of revenge which recently actuated a Spanish subaltern officer at Porto Rico, by which Lieutenant Cocke lost his life. Copies of the correspondence between Commodore Porter and the Governor of Porto Rico on that occasion are among the inclosed papers. They will show that the act of firing upon the Fox was utterly wanton and inexcusable; and the President desires that you would expressly demand that the officer, by whom it was ordered, should be brought to trial and punishment for having ordered it.

There are several subjects connected with the execution of the treaty of February 22, 1819, to which it may be proper to advert as being likely to claim your attention. On the delivery of the two provinces of the Floridas to the United States, by virtue of stipulations of that treaty, a question arose whether, under the term fortifications which were to be delivered over with them, was included the artillery, without which they could not, with propriety, bear the name. By another article of the treaty it was agreed that the United States should furnish transports for the conveyance of the Spanish officers and troops to the Havana. Under this engagement, the Spanish officers understood it was implied that the provisions necessary for the passage should also be furnished at the expense of the United States. In this liberal construction of that article this Government acquiesced, insisting, however, that on that same principle that provisions for the passage would be understood as implied in an engagement to supply the passage itself, the ordnance, which constituted the essential part of the fortifications, must be considered as embraced by the word, and that the United States were entitled to claim its delivery with the buildings which, without it, would substantially be no fortifications at all. The Spanish officers at Pensacola and St. Augustine objected to this liberal construction of the article which imposed an obligation upon Spain, while they insisted upon it with regard to the article in her favor. It was therefore agreed, both at Pensacola and St. Augustine, that the artillery in the forts should be left there, receipts for it being given by General Jackson and Colonel Butler, leaving the question as to the property in them to the determination of the two Governments. A correspondence ensued between this Department and the Spanish Legation here, and between the Ministers of Foreign Affairs and our Legation at Madrid, the last document of which is a note of September 3, 1822, from Don Evaristo San Miguel to Mr. Forsyth, from whom, as well as from Mr. Anduaga, separate copies of it have been transmitted to this Department. This note announces his Catholic Majesty's final determination to abide by the strict construction of both the articles in question, on the acknowledged ground that the value of the cannon is more than the cost of the provisions. It therefore proposes that the cannon should be restored to Spain, and offers to repay the expense incurred by the United States for the provisions; or it offers to receive proposals for the purchase, by the United States, of the cannon, and, if necessary, to sell them at a fair appraisement, by competent persons to be appointed by the two Governments; and after deducting the amount paid by the United States for the provisions, to receive the balance.

In the compacts between nations, as in the bargains of individuals, the most essential requisites are candor and fair dealing. The comparative value of the cannon in the forts, and of the provisions for the passage of the Spanish troops, formed no part of the considerations upon which the artillery was claimed by the United States, together with the walls of which they formed the defence. It was to the principle alone that our attention was turned. The officers of Spain, under a stipulation for passage, claimed a supply of provisions. Acquiescing in that liberal construction of our engagement which would warrant them in the claim, we thought it, in fairness and reciprocity, applicable to another article, the benefit of which would enure to the United States. In the course of this discussion no distinction has been shown on the part of Spain that could justify a different rule of construction for the two articles. In both cases the incident was so essential to the main object of the stipulation as to be inseparable from its existence and accomplishment. The passage without provisions was impracticable. The walls, without their artillery, were no fortifications. If in one case the implication was just, it was indispensable in the other. But we do not wish to press the controversy further. You are authorized to signify to the Spanish Government the acceptance of the proposal contained in Mr. San Miguel's note, and that, on the repayment by the Spanish Government of the money paid by the United States for provisions for the Spanish officers and troops from the Floridas to the Havana, the ordnance left behind, and received for by General Jackson and Colonel Butler, will be delivered up to the order of the Governor of Cuba, or to any officer duly authorized to receive it.

There is in the note of Mr. San Miguel a complaint, somewhat gratuitous, that the American Government had not, in the first instance, adjusted this question with the Spanish Minister at Washington, or afterwards prevented the compromise between the Commissioners of the two Governments at the delivery of the provinces. The Government of the United States was not informed that the Spanish Minister here had any authority to discuss the mode of execution with regard to the delivery of the territory. It was not to him, but to the Governor and Captain General of the island of Cuba, that the royal order for the delivery was addressed; nor was it supposed that he had, or could have, any instructions authorizing him to settle any question of construction which might arise in the details of the execution. That a question might arise, both with regard to the provisions and to the artillery, was foreseen, but there was no necessity for anticipating it, by a reference to the Spanish Minister, when it might not arise at all, and who, if it should, had no power to settle it. The suggestion of it, as a question to him, could, in all probability, tend only to delay the delivery itself of the Floridas; for if his views of the construction of the article concerning the fortifications should differ from those of this Government, he could only refer it to his own, and, in the meantime, the delivery of the country must be postponed, or accepted by the United States, subject to the construction of the Spanish envoy. The American Government had no motive for starting questions which might be turned to purposes of delay. It was sufficient for them to proceed upon principles fair and equitable in themselves, and to foresee questions of construction only so far as to preclude the admission of one rule, when its operation would be against the United States, and of another, when its effect would be in their favor. When the question between the Commissioners had arisen, it was not more in the power of this Government to prevent the compromise upon which they agreed than it was in that of Spain. A reference of it prior to the delivery might have been made to Madrid in little more time than to Washington. And the intimation of Mr. San Miguel, that the unfortunate disputes in which the ex-Governors of St. Augustine and Pensacola were involved, and which issued in occurrences personally unpleasant to them, originated in this compromise concerning the artillery, is founded upon erroneous impressions. Those incidents, much and sincerely lamented by us, arose from the non-delivery, deliberate, concerted, and systematic, by the late Captain General Mahy, and by both the Governors of St. Augustine and Pensacola, of the archives and documents, which they were required by an express stipulation of the treaty and an explicit order from the King of Spain to deliver up. The Governor of Cuba, after informing Colonel Forbes, who was commissioned to receive that portion of those archives and documents which were at the Havana, that twenty boxes of documents had been sent there from Pensacola, relating to West Florida, and that all those relating to East Florida were at St. Augustine; and after detaining Colonel Forbes at the Havana nearly six weeks, in the daily protracted expectation of delivering them, finally obliged him, with exhausted patience, to depart without the former, and with an explicit assurance that he had instructed the Governor of St. Augustine to deliver the latter. Yet the Governor of St. Augustine refused to deliver them, on the allegation of doubts whether the engagement of the treaty extended to the delivery of any public documents or archives relating to individual property. This extraordinary effort to withhold and to carry away all the records of land titles of both the provinces has been the fruitful source of all those subsequent misunderstandings and painful occurrences to which Mr. San Miguel's note alludes; and it commenced on the part of the Governor of Cuba long before any question relating to the delivery of the artillery had occurred.

Mr. Thomas Randall is now about to proceed to the Havana, charged with a new mission, to demand and receive the archives and documents yet remaining there, and of which, as Mr. Forsyth was informed, a new royal order has been expedited to command the delivery. There are also many at Madrid, in the office of the Ultramarine Department, which Mr. Forsyth has taken measures, at different times, to obtain, hitherto without success. You will learn the state of this concern upon your arrival, and, as occasions may present themselves, will give it all the attention it may require.

By the fourth article of the treaty of February 22, 1819, provision was made for the appointment of Commissioners and surveyors to run the boundary line between the United States and the then adjoining Spanish provinces, from the mouth of the Sabine river to the South sea. They were to meet at Natchitoches within one year from the ratification of the treaty. But the appointment of the Spanish Commissioner and surveyor, though repeatedly urged by Mr. Forsyth upon the Spanish Government, was not made in seasonable time, and the revolution in Mexico having soon after demolished the Spanish dominion in that country, it became doubtful whether that article of the treaty could be carried into execution.

There was some hesitation in Congress, and different votes between the two Houses, with regard to making the appropriation for that purpose. The appropriation was, however, made, and the appointment of the Commissioner and surveyor on the part of the United States was made known to Mr. Anduaga, and also, through Mr. Forsyth, to the Spanish Government, with notice that we were ready to proceed in the measures agreed upon for carrying the article into execution.

No further notice of the subject has been taken by the Spanish Government, nor have we been informed who were the Commissioner and surveyor appointed by them. It will not be necessary for you to revive the subject by any communication to that Government, unless it should be brought up on their part. The new Government of Mexico, since the revolution there, has made known its assent to the boundary as marked out by the treaty, and it is probable that Spain will, henceforth, have no interest in the settlement of the line. It may form a subject of further arrangement between us and our immediate neighbors hereafter. Of the other subjects of discussion with Spain, which may require your official notice, you will be informed by Mr. John James Appleton, remaining there, charged with the affairs of the legation after the departure of Mr. Forsyth, and by the archives of the legation which he will deliver over to you. The laws relating to commerce, since the restoration of the Cortes, have been rather restrictive than favorable to the relations between the United States and Spain. You will be specially attentive to all negotiations, whether commercial or political, in which Spain may be concerned, during the continuance of your mission; transmit to this Department two copies of every treaty printed by authority immediately after its publication, and copies, by duplicate, of all conventions, treaties, separate articles, or other diplomatic communications of which you may acquire the knowledge, and which you can obtain without expense or charge.

An object of considerable importance will be to obtain the admission of consuls from the United States in the ports of the colonies; specially in the islands of Cuba and of Porto Rico. It was incidental to the old colonial system of Spain, which excluded all commerce of foreign nations with their colonies, to admit in their ports no foreign consuls. The special duties and functions of those officers consisting in the protection of the commerce, navigation, and seamen of their respective countries, in the ports where they reside, it was a natural and necessary consequence of the exclusive colonial principle that, where no commerce was allowed to foreign nations, there could be no duties for a foreign consul to perform, and no occasion for the acknowledgment of such an officer; but when the colonial ports were opened to foreign trade, all the reasons which recommend, and all the necessities which urge the appointment and admission of foreign consuls to reside in them, apply as forcibly to those ports as to any others. The commerce between the United States and the Havana is of greater amount and value than with all the Spanish dominions in Europe. The number of American vessels which enter there is, annually, several hundreds. Their seamen, from the unhealthiness of the climate, are peculiarly exposed to need there the assistance which it is a primary purpose of the consular office to supply; nor is there any conceivable motive for continuing to maintain the pretension to exclude them, and to refuse the formal acknowledgment of consuls. Informal commercial agents have, in many of the ports, been allowed to reside, and partially to perform the consular duties; but as they are thus left much dependent on the will of the local Government, and subject to control at its pleasure, they have neither the dignity nor authority which properly belongs to the office. There has already been much correspondence between Mr. Forsyth and the Spanish Department of Foreign Affairs on this subject. You will follow it up, as there may be opportunity, till a definitive answer shall be obtained.

A letter from the Spanish chargé d'affaires, Mr. Salmon, dated the 15th of April, has been received at this Department, inclosing a copy of one from Mr. Anduaga to Mr. R. W. Meade, of October 16, 1822, relating to his claim, pending before the Commissioners under the Florida treaty. Translations of these papers, and a copy of my answer to Mr. Salmon's letter, are herewith inclosed. The claim of Mr. Meade, as presented to the Commissioners, was palpably not, and could not be, embraced by the treaty, as, [by] an order for payment of it by the Spanish Department of Finance, Spain was undoubtedly bound to the payment of it in full; and so she was for the payment of all the certificates of her public debt, which were purchasable in the market at thirty or forty per cent. of their nominal value. All the claims provided for by the treaty were unsettled claims, the proper subjects of compromise, and the avowed and unequivocal principle of the treaty was to make such compromise. This was well known to Mr. Meade as well as to the Spanish Government. The first report of the Spanish Junta of four counsellors, in favor of Mr. Meade's claims, was made on the 30th of September, 1819, after the termination of the period when the treaty should have been ratified by Spain. The certificate delivered to Mr. Meade in May, 1820, directed that the sum which had been found due to him should be paid out of the funds of the Royal Finance Department, with interest. The treaty, though not ratified by Spain, was then public in Europe and America. It had twice been communicated by the President of the United States to Congress; first in February, 1819, immediately after it was signed, and again in December of the same year, when it was published with the documents at the commencement of that session. It was well known to Mr. Meade that it did not provide for his claim, thus liquidated and acknowledged. If he then expected that it should ever be chargeable upon the United States, that was the time for him to have so declared to the Spanish Government. The nature of his claim was entirely changed by the liquidation, but it made and could make no corresponding change in the stipulation of the treaty. It was not for an order on the funds of the Royal Finance Department of Spain for near half a million of dollars, with interest from May, 1820, that the United States had undertaken to provide; and the real effect of the liquidation and certificate was to take the case entirely out of the treaty.

That Mr. Meade was fully sensible of this is proved by his subsequent memorial to the President of the United States, soliciting, on their part, a conditional ratification, either acknowledging his claim as finally liquidated by Spain, to be paid in full, or excepting specifically the renunciation which included his claim, as it had existed when the treaty was signed, or the claim itself by name as afterwards settled. His whole memorial, indeed, is an unanswerable argument to prove that his settled claim was not included in the treaty, nor was it possible that it should be. The treaty was signed in February, 1819, and professed to provide for none but unsettled claims, prescribing the manner in which they should all be settled alike. Mr. Meade's claim was liquidated in May, 1820, the treaty being then as if it had never been made. It is a strange use to make of the warm interest and ardent solicitation of the American minister in Spain, in Mr. Meade's favor, to obtain a settlement by Spain of his claims, and of the friendly congratulation of the American Secretary of State, after it had been obtained, when the treaty had no existence, to contend that these manifestations of kindness to him bound the United States to payment in full of his demand upon Spain, if the treaty should ever be ratified. It is very evident that the liquidation of Mr. Meade's claims in Spain was made on principles which, however fair and laudable as between him and the Spanish Government, would not be proper for the liquidation to be made by the American Commissioners conformably to the treaty. The principle of the treaty is a compromise of unadjusted claims. The principle of the liquidation was payment in full, with profuse allowances for interest and damages; these, very suitably for Spain to make in acknowledgment of great services of the claimant to her, were in nowise proper for the United States, being under no such obligation to assume, nor could they assume them without wrong to other claimants more entitled to favor from them, though less from Spain, than Mr. Meade. In that liquidation it is abundantly shown by Mr. Meade himself that the Spanish tribunals intended to discharge a debt of Spanish gratitude as well as of justice; to remunerate services as well as to fulfil engagements. It is doubtful whether any others of the claimants under the treaty will obtain any allowance for interest, even simple interest, upon the clearest and most inveterate of their demands. Mr. Meade's liquidated claim calls for interest upon interest on a debt of half a million of dollars; compound interest accruing after the treaty was signed, and accumulating by the act of Spain herself in withholding the stipulated ratification of the treaty. Other claimants besides Mr. Meade had been wrongfully and far more rigorously imprisoned by authority of the Spanish Government. Should they be paid at the rate of nearly forty thousand dollars a year for such detention, the five millions of dollars allotted to the settlement of the claims, five times doubled, would scarcely suffice for their satisfaction. To complete the demonstration that Mr. Meade's liquidated claim was not included in the treaty, let it be supposed that the order which, in May, 1820, he received upon the funds of the Royal Finance Department had been immediately paid, and that the Spanish Government had afterwards ratified the treaty as it did, Mr. Meade would assuredly then have had no claim under the treaty; and as little could the Spanish Government have claimed repayment by the United States of the money paid to Mr. Meade.

And why was not the order upon the Royal Finance Department immediately paid? Mr. Meade himself has answered that it was owing to the embarrassments of the new Revolution. He petitioned the Cortes for immediate payment, and to designate the mode of payment. But he could obtain no definitive resolution from the Cortes till the 5th of October, 1820, the day they decided in favor of ratifying the Florida treaty. Upon which occasion, says Mr. Meade, "they ordered that my memorial should be united with the papers relative to the treaty, and submitted to the King, in order to have it ascertained whether the American Government had consented to the introduction of my individual claim into the negotiations of the treaty, and, if so, that the American Government had distinctly assumed upon itself the payment of my claim, and had wholly exonerated Spain from it; but if it should be found that my case had not been taken into view by the negotiators, and was not distinctly understood as embraced in the treaty stipulations, they in that case decreed the immediate payment of the debt by the Spanish Government. Upon this reference from the Cortes the Spanish Minister of State pronounced an unequivocal opinion that the debt had been distinctly and specifically assumed by the United States in exoneration of Spain; or would be so upon the exchange of the ratifications." Here we see that the Cortes, when advising to the ratification of the treaty before them, considered the assumption by the United States of Mr. Meade's claim as entirely depending on the question whether it had individually, distinctly and specifically been treated for in the negotiation between Mr. Onis and the American Secretary of State. This the Cortes did not know, with the treaty and all the documents of the negotiation before them. As little did the minister to whom they referred it know; for he only pronounced an opinion that the debt had been distinctly and specifically assumed by the United States in exoneration of Spain, or would be so upon the exchange of the ratifications.

Mr. Meade proceeds in his memorial to say, "the opinion of the minister was founded (as I was informed from high authority) upon facts said to have been notorious to the negotiators of the treaty, and verified, as it was said, by the official communications of Mr. Onis to the Spanish Government, to wit, that my claim had been introduced by name into the discussion between Mr. Adams and Mr. Onis, who finally agreed in their verbal conferences that it should be assumed and paid by the United States; that Mr. Onis proposed the insertion of my name and a specific stipulation to that effect in the treaty; but that Mr. Adams thought it unnecessary to do so, though he agreed to the insertion of a clause intended to comprehend my case, without naming it, and to exonerate Spain from the debt, with the understanding, nevertheless, that it was to be specifically assumed and paid by the United States." I shall not inquire how it happened that the Cortes, with this fable, said to have been verified by the official communications of Mr. Onis to the Spanish Government, before them, could have referred it to the King to ascertain whether Mr. Meade's claim had been assumed by the United States or not; nor how the minister of State, to whom it was again referred, should have been so uncertain with regard to the fact as merely to give an opinion that the claim had been specifically assumed by the United States, or would be so upon the exchange of the ratifications. Neither shall I ask how it happened that Mr. Meade, at Madrid, in October, 1820, with his claim liquidated and acknowledged, and demanding immediate payment, when put off with these uncertainties of the Cortes and the minister, should have contented himself with this information from high authority of facts said to have been notorious, and said to have been verified by official communications of Mr. Onis to his Government, without demanding, as under those circumstances he had the unquestionable right and the deepest interest to do, authenticated copies of these official communications of Mr. Onis to produce them before the American Government: how it happened that for this only document which could have given Mr. Meade the shadow of a claim upon the American Government for specific satisfaction of his liquidated claim, he took at Madrid this information from high authority of things said to have been said, and then came to the United States and called upon their President and Senate to palm upon the people of this Union the payment of half a million of dollars, with interest, to him, or to annul by a conditional ratification the Florida treaty, with this hearsay of hearsay for the only color of his demand. That it was from beginning to end a fable is certain. Mr. Meade's claim, far from being specifically provided for by name, was never even mentioned by Mr. Onis during the negotiation of the treaty. No individual claim was ever mentioned, nor would the American Government have stipulated for the benefit of any claimant a favor which could not be extended equally to all the rest.

But the facility with which Mr. Meade received upon trust this information from high authority of an official document, which would have been the only admissible voucher for his new claim upon the United States, is not the only surprising part of this allegation in his memorial to the President. He says that the Spanish Minister of State pronounced an unequivocal opinion that the debt had been distinctly and specifically assumed by the United States, in exoneration of Spain, or would be so upon the exchange of the ratifications. That it had not been is now shown beyond all power of reply, nor was it at the exchange of the ratifications. Mr. Meade, after failing in the attempt to stay the ratification of the United States, did apply to the Spanish minister then here, General Vives, to make some such specific reference to his individual claim, which General Vives explicitly declined. There was, indeed, no pretence upon which it could have been made, and the tale which Mr. Meade had received from high authority appears to be no other than a device to elude his importunities for payment, and only proves the consciousness, of necessity for resorting to fiction to give a show of coloring to Mr. Meade's liquidated claim as chargeable to the United States.

It may be said that, if the claims of Mr. Meade, as existing in February, 1819, are admitted to have been included within the provisions of the treaty, the United States cannot justly avail themselves of the liquidation subsequently effected at the instances of their own minister, to recharge upon Spain the paymen of the whole sums from which she would have been exonerated but for the intermediate liquidation between the signature and the final ratification of the treaty. Neither is this the desire of the American Government. The Commissioners, whose doubt, whether Mr. Meade was receivable at all as a claimant under the treaty, arose, first, from the certainty that his claim, as presented by himself, was not included in the treaty, and, secondly, from his own argument that it was of a character that the United States and Spain had no right to dispose of it by negotiation, on application to the Secretary of State, were informed that the intention of the treaty on the part of the United States had been to include within its provisions all unsettled and unliquidated claims of citizens of the United States upon Spain for which the interposition of the Government of the United States had been solicited by the claimants themselves, until the signature of the treaty. Mr. Meade's claim, at the time of the signature of the treaty, was of that description, and the Commissioners have received him as a claimant under the treaty.

The subsequent liquidation and acknowledgment of the Spanish tribunals gave Mr. Meade a new, entirely distinct claim upon Spain. It was an order upon the Spanish treasury for a specific sum of money, with interest from May, 1820. The effect of this transaction was to take the claims of Mr. Meade entirely out of the treaty; and Spain, by the subsequent ratification of the treaty without noticing in any manner this claim or its liquidation, gave the United States some reason for insisting, were they so disposed, that no provision for any part of it had been made by the treaty at all.

But the rule of equity applicable to this case, and by which substantial justice may be done to all parties, is this: Mr. Meade's claims, as existing and exhibited before the signature of the treaty, are included in its provisions. Their amount and validity must be proved to the Commissioners, conformably to the provisions of the treaty. The allowance or rejection of every item in them must be determined on principles applied by the Commissioners to all other claims of a similar description before them. The sum finally awarded to him must be subject to all the other provisions of the treaty. To charge the United States in the exact proportion stipulated by the treaty, and to suffer deduction from their admitted account, in common with all the other claims, as they may be finally admitted. So far have they been assumed by the United States, and so far has Spain been exonerated from them. For the balance of the sum which Mr. Meade may thus receive from the United States, to equalize in amount the specific sum, with interest from May, 1820, awarded him by the Spanish liquidation, his claim remains unimpaired upon the Spanish treasury. It was never assumed or renounced by the United States; it was never cancelled by Spain. For the decisions of her own tribunals, subsequent to the signature of the treaty, Spain alone must be responsible. The treaty alone must be the standard to which the decisions of the American Commissioners and the obligations of the United States must conform.

By the fifteenth article of the treaty of October 27, 1795, it was stipulated that, in times of war, the flag should cover the property, and free ships make free goods. By the twelfth article of the treaty of February 22, 1819, it is agreed that this shall be so understood with respect to those powers who recognize this principle; but if either of the two contracting parties shall be at war with a third, and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral shall cover the property of enemies whose Government acknowledge this principle, and not of others.

In the impending war between Spain and France you may, perhaps, have occasion to require the exact observance of this engagement. In all the treaties between the United States and France the principle that free ships make free goods is established and recognized. It is presumed that it will yet be recognized by France, and it is hoped there will be no cause to complain of its infringement by Spain.

A resolution of the House of Representatives at the last session of Congress requests the President to enter upon, and to prosecute from time to time, such negotiations with the several maritime powers of Europe and America as he may deem expedient for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade, and its ultimate denunciation as piracy, under the law of nations, by the consent of the civilized world. You will take an early opportunity to make known this disposition to the Spanish Government, communicating to them copies of the fourth and fifth sections of the act of March 3, 1819, which declares this traffic piratical when pursued by citizens of the United States; and you will express the willingness of the American Government to enter into negotiations for the purpose of declaring it so by the common consent of nations.

MADRID, January 15, 1824.

"I herewith inclose another note which I addressed to the Spanish Government on the 10th instant. In this I have presented the views of our Government on two of the important subjects with which I was entrusted—the piracies on our commerce in the West Indies, with a requisition on the Spanish Government for immediate orders to their provincial officers to suppress these outrages; and the offence of the Spanish officer by whose order the life of Lieutenant Cocke was sacrificed, with a demand upon his Catholic Majesty's Government for a satisfactory atonement for this unparalleled aggression. In a few days I shall present to this Government another note, embracing the remaining interesting topics of my instructions, with a demand for the appropriate redress for the respective wrongs sustained by our citizens."

No. 35, (a.)

Mr. Nelson to the Count of Oñatia.

MADRID, January 10, 1824.

The undersigned, the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor, through his excellency, to assure his Catholic Majesty of the unfeigned desire of the President of the United States to preserve inviolate the friendly relations subsisting between the two Governments. This harmony, sometimes menaced with interruption by the great convulsions which the world has witnessed at the termination of the last century and in the progress of the present, has fortunately never experienced a total rupture. Events have occurred which seemed to threaten a collision between nations long united in the strongest bonds of friendship; measures deemed necessary to maintain the security of some who were engaged in the conflict of arms, or to preserve the neutrality of others who were so fortunate as to escape its ravages, may have sometimes, in their tendency, borne with severe pressure on those against whom they were not intended to operate injuriously; a sensibility, bordering on a degree of jealousy, may have been excited by erroneous views of the policy and measures of the American Government; and the councils of Spain may have received impressions calculated to produce suspicions incompatible with the frank and mutual confidence necessary to sustain the cordial intercourse of friendly nations. The policy of the American Government, founded in justice and truth, has never led to the adoption of any measure towards a foreign nation which it would not cheerfully acquiesce in if, under similar circumstances, adopted towards itself; nor has it ever asked an act of justice from a foreign power which it would not have equally conceded to the demand of such foreign power, in a parallel condition, appealing for justice to the American Government. This onward course of candid and disinterested policy ever leads it to expect a reciprocal return from the foreign powers to whom it appeals, at any time, for the fulfilment of those obligations which are imposed by the principles of justice and reciprocity. These are expected with confidence from his Catholic Majesty; and whilst, on the one hand, the undersigned is authorized to give full assurance of the earnest wish of the American Government to cherish and perpetuate its friendly relations with Spain, on the other he is directed to ask of the Government of Spain the fulfilment of those obligations which a sense of honor and of justice and a reciprocal desire to preserve inviolate the friendly and harmonious intercourse between the two countries will impose upon the Government of his Catholic Majesty. Actuated by feelings congenial to those which he is instructed to avow and manifest by his Government towards the Government of Spain, the undersigned begs to call the attention of his excellency to cases of aggravated injury and wrong which the citizens of the United States have suffered from the subjects of his Catholic Majesty, and in some instances from those who had been distinguished by his royal commissions.

It had been heretofore made known to his Catholic Majesty's Government by his predecessor, that, in the great agitations which, of late years, have been experienced in a portion of the Western World, swarms of pirates, issuing from the island of Cuba, had infested the West Indian seas, desolating, wherever they could encounter it, the peaceful commerce of the neighboring nations. In their ruthless fury after rapine and destruction, sweeping from that ocean the peaceful and defenceless navigators, they have not spared even the subjects of Spain herself. The nations exercising commerce in these seas have been compelled to arm for its protection, and to send their ships into that region to defend their citizens in their persons and their property from these insatiate plunderers. The United States, in common with others, have been forced to send naval armaments into these regions, and have always, in a spirit of harmony and friendship, given ample notice to the local authorities of the Spanish islands of the object and destination of these equipments. Time after time have they called upon the Spanish authorities in Cuba to suppress these hordes of banditti. Often has the assurance been given that the local authorities would, and had taken all the necessary measures to suppress them. Yet, in defiance of these repeated assurances, the ocean teemed with these freebooters; and so fearless and undaunted were these scourges of the ocean, that the city of Havana itself has witnessed piracies committed at the verge of its harbor. Armament after armament has been equipped and despatched from the United States, instructed to co-operate with the local authorities in their suppression; and always with the fullest and most positive instructions to pay the utmost respect to the rights and interests of Spain. Her rights have always been respected by the commanders of the American squadrons; nor has a single instance, it is believed by the American Government, occurred, wherein there has been a wanton violation of that respect which, as a friendly nation, the United States owed to the rights and interests of Spain. But, although such has been the scrupulous regard which the United States have, on all occasions, manifested to these obligations which their friendly relations to Spain imposed, they have not found any relief to their commerce against these piracies, either from the reiterated assurance given by the Spanish local authorities of their determination to suppress, or of their adoption of the "necessary measures to defend their territorial jurisdiction, and for the apprehension of every description of outlaw." On the contrary, the American Government has had too much reason to believe that, however the local authorities might be inclined to apprehend these outlaws, yet from want of power, or from some other cause, adequate measures were not adopted for their suppression, but that these sea robbers, acquiring boldness from the inaction of the Government of the Captain General, not only displayed their successful cruisers, laden with their spoils, in the port of the Havana, but fearlessly exposed to sale in the streets of the city, in the very teeth of the Government, unawed and unrestrained, the unhallowed fruits of their piracies and plunder. Instances have occurred in which the American citizen has beheld exposed to sale, in open market, in the streets of Havana, the property plundered from him by these ferocious miscreants, from reclaiming which he has been restrained by the admonition of others, warned that he would find no protection from the Government, and that he would only draw down upon his own head the infernal malice of the secret assassin. Nor has a case been wanting in which one of the citizens of the United States, excited by this shameless disregard of all laws, human and divine, having declared that, on the arrival of the American naval commander, who was then expected in those seas, more respect would be shown to the rights of persons and property, met, as the reward of his temerity, the deadly stroke of the poniard from the midnight murderer. These pirates have their establishments and places of asylum in the bays and harbors on the coast of the uninhabited parts of the island of Cuba. Thence they sally forth in quest of plunder in vessels adapted to a shoal water navigation, bringing ruin and desolation on the defenceless commercial vessels they can find, and if, perchance, they encounter a foe, competent by his armament to subdue them, they fly for refuge to these shoals and bays, whither the pursuer cannot come, through fear of being wrecked if rashly he rush on; or if, perchance, the commander of some lighter vessel pursue them to the margin of the shore, they instantly abandon their vessel, and, concealing themselves in places of retreat previously marked out and prepared for this purpose, they elude their pursuers, and escape by the sacrifice of some mean, worthless vessel, and save their persons from seizure and detection.

The American Government beheld with regret this unfortunate state of things in that region; anxious to treat with due respect the rights and interests of Spain; bound to protect their citizens in their persons and their property; wishing to believe that the local authorities were thus inactive only because they were unable to repress these pirates; and never for a moment entertaining any other opinion of his Catholic Majesty's Government than that it deplored, equally with the American Government, the calamities to which the commerce of these seas was subjected by the diabolical passions of the most abandoned and nefarious ruffians of the human race, has felt most sensibly the delicacy and difficulty of its situation when summoned, by a sense of duty, to adopt measures of energy to insure protection to those who were entitled to demand it from their Government. Believing that, in the adoption of such measures as the necessity of the case imposed, they would equally consult the interest and honor of Spain, as of the whole civilized world, in destroying a horde of monsters who were leagued and combined against the fair and legitimate trade of all nations using these seas, they gave instructions to the predecessor of the undersigned to make known to his Catholic Majesty's Government that it would be indispensable for the American cruisers, in pursuing these banditti to their places of shelter and retreat in the uninhabited parts of the island, to land some portion of their crews in those places in which the power of the local authorities was not exercised to suppress them, to execute the purpose of arresting and bringing to justice these freebooters and marauders. Conscious of the purity of their designs, and convinced that Spain would equally benefit with all the world in the extirpation of this stock of buccaniers, they did not hesitate to instruct their naval commanders, in case of indispensable necessity, and of that only, to land in these desert and uninhabited places for the sole purpose of pursuing and arresting the pirates; and as soon as that service was performed, to embark immediately in their vessels again, withdrawing from the territory of Spain.

Presuming that, in a case of such imperious necessity, when the rights and interests of humanity were so deeply involved as in the extirpation of these outlaw freebooters; in a case where the object and design of the American Government were so open and notorious, and, with great propriety it may be added, were so laudable, as being aimed at the suppression of those who, by common consent, are denominated the enemies of all mankind; in a case where, as no contempt of the authority of Spain was or could be intended, so none could be inferred, the American Government hoped and believed that Spain would sanction a measure fraught with so much benefit to all the maritime nations of the earth, although it might not so strictly accord with those little observances of scrupulous punctilio which nations so fastidiously exact in their intercourse with each other. The measure was free from all design of wounding the feelings or of offering contempt to Spain. It was called for by the irresistible necessity of the case, and was scarcely less than justified by the omission of the local authorities, through weakness or through want of inclination, to adopt measures for their suppression, which had been often promised and too rarely fulfilled. The scrupulous delicacy of the American Government towards the rights and interests of Spain are displayed in the orders to their naval commanders, of which copies accompany this note. In their efforts to attain the desirable object of expelling from the ocean these lawless buccaniers, the United States have had to deplore the loss of one of their most gallant and distinguished naval officers, Lieutenant Allen, who fell by the hands of one of these pirates whilst he was nobly attempting to subdue a nest of them in arms against the honest commerce of the civilized world. The undersigned is directed by the President of the United States to urge upon the Government of Spain the absolute necessity of its ordering the local authorities of the island of Cuba to adopt the most energetic and efficacious measures for controlling and suppressing these pirates, and of asking that these authorities may be instructed to use every possible means of co-operation with the naval armaments of the United States which may be sent into the West Indian seas for the purpose of suppressing an evil under which the American commerce has too long suffered.

Connected with the facts detailed in the foregoing part of this note is another case of a most malignant character, on which I am directed to ask of his Catholic Majesty's Government a prompt and vigorous redress of an unparalleled injury which the American Government has sustained at the hands of an officer having the commission of his Catholic Majesty. The United States, under the increasing urgency of affording protection against the pirates in the West Indian seas, have sent out their naval armaments to afford this protection. But even with these exertions they have not been able to afford entire security to their commerce. The local authorities, with an indifference to the sufferings of commerce and an incredible tolerance to this system of plundering, have almost uniformly refused all co-operation in this just and holy object. They have denied to the fleets and naval armaments of the United States those courtesies and civilities which common hospitality would enjoin even in the case of entire strangers, but which, to a nation in the strictest bond of friendship, and engaged in the holy and beneficent object of extirpating a nest of pirates, all laws, human and divine, would imperiously command them to administer; they have denied those facilities and accommodations to the American Navy, whilst they have permitted them to be enjoyed by the lawless freebooters of the ocean. Nor have markets, open and shameless, been wanting in the most conspicuous places in the islands for the sale of the plunder piratically obtained by them. When the American Government has sent their ships into these seas, the most rigid orders have been given to their commanders to respect, in the fullest possible extent, the rights of Spain. When, in the beginning of the last year, a necessity arose from the continued and increased depredations on the commerce of the American merchants to augment the United States naval armament in these seas, the same scrupulous regard to the rights of Spain was observed. Due notice was given to the Spanish authorities, both in the mother country and in the islands, of the object and design of this equipment. The proceedings of the American Legislature, open and unconcealed, announced and proclaimed to the whole world, through the medium of the press, the object and destination of this augmented armament. And the officer commanding this squadron, Commodore Porter, on his arrival in the West Indies, gave notice to the Spanish authorities of Porto Rico, when he approached that island, of the object and design of the expedition under his command. He found, on his arrival near St. John's, in that island, the ships-of-war of England enjoying freely and uninterruptedly the facilities and accommodations of that port. Before attempting to enter with his ships, he sent into the port of St. John's one of the smallest vessels of the squadron, whose commander bore a letter to the Governor of the island, assuring him of the friendly object of his visit to these seas. This vessel was permitted to enter and anchor in the port, and the officer to land and hold intercourse with the commandant in the fort, in the absence of the Governor, who was out of town; whilst the commodore, with the residue of his fleet, lay off a few miles distant from the port, but in full view of the forts, with the American flag displayed at their masthead, giving assurance of the real character of the fleet which had recently arrived. The officer despatched to bear the letter to the Governor of the island had with him a copy of that letter, which he was authorized to show to the second in command, should the case occur of the temporary absence of the Governor. This copy was shown and its contents made known to the second in command, the Governor being absent. (A copy of it is herewith furnished.)

The American commodore, finding the vessel delayed in port some days, and much longer than he had expected, still forbearing to attempt to enter with his fleet, despatched another of the smaller vessels of his squadron to bear an order to the officer commanding the vessel which lay at anchor in the port. Lieutenant Cocke, a young and gallant officer, commanding this latter vessel, in obedience of the orders of his commander, sailing into port, unsuspecting of hostility from the forts, under pressure of a strong breeze and a very high sea, was treacherously and perfidiously fired upon from the fort by order of the second in command in the port of St. John's. The wind blowing with great violence and the sea breaking most dangerously around the vessel, Lieutenant Cocke was unable to hear if anything was said, or to comprehend, by the firing of the gun, what was the object of the officer commanding in the fort. His vessel, driven on by the force of the wind and the irresistible power of the waves, pursued her course towards the harbor, when the firing was repeatedly reiterated, until this gallant officer, in the act of endeavoring by hailing to learn the object of the fort, was almost literally torn in pieces by a ball from a forty-two pounder, discharged from this fort. This vessel, thus treacherously and wantonly fired upon, carried three guns and was of little more than forty tons; the fort mounted nearly five hundred guns from thirty-two to forty-two pounders. This vessel was then compelled, at the hazard of its own destruction and the loss of the whole crew, to anchor in the billows of a sea running continually over her. Her boat was despatched with a midshipman and crew, at whom a large gun was pointed as soon as he reached the shore, and he was ordered not to move on pain of being fired on; and, as if to add insult to injury, he was then put under guard, conducted like a criminal and delivered to the officer of the fort who had so wantonly murdered his gallant commander. In this case of the murder of Lieutenant Cocke, the undersigned is directed by the President of the United States to demand of his Catholic Majesty's Government that the officer by whose order this act was done should be brought to trial and punished for a deed so flagrant, wanton, and unprovoked. On this occasion the undersigned rests assured that the indignant feelings of his Catholic Majesty will correspond with those of the President of the United States, and that justice will not be delayed in an instance which so imperiously requires it.

The undersigned tenders to his excellency the Count of Ofalia, holding ad interim the office of first Secretary of State and of the Despatch, his distinguished consideration, and subscribes himself his excellency's very humble and obedient servant,

HUGH NELSON.

MADRID, July 15, 1824.

"The change in the cabinet of his Catholic Majesty, in the removal of the Count of Ofalia from his office of first Secretary of State, occurred two days since, and is disclosed in the annexed document, dated the 13th instant, which announced this alteration. This place is filled 'ad interim' by Salazar, the Minister of Marine; but the permanent appointment is conferred on Zea Bermudez, the minister of Spain to England, who is at present not in the Kingdom. This constant changing the minister at the head of their foreign affairs is extremely embarrassing to the intercourse which other nations are constrained to hold with this Government. It will be fortunate for Spain if foreigners alone feel the evil consequences of this perpetual vacillation. The Count of Ofalia is not only deprived of his office, but is banished from Madrid, and ordered to retire to his estates in Grenada. This removal is regretted by most of the diplomatic corps, who found the Count ready in his duties, accessible in his deportment, and easy and polite in his intercourse with them."

"I have now had the honor to present my respects to four of these different gentlemen in about six months. It produces a necessity of beginning 'ab ovo' with each new Secretary on all matters of consequence, on which one may have discoursed and corresponded repeatedly, and in which the hope may have been indulged that an approach was making to the consummation of some desired object."

Extracts of a letter (No. 39) from Mr. Nelson to the Secretary of State, dated

"In pursuance of my intention expressed in a late despatch, I have prepared and presented to the Spanish Government a note concisely recapitulating the communications on the most important subject of my correspondence with it. These are the murder of Lieutenant Cocke, the piracies by the vessels from Cuba, and the captures by the privateers from Porto Rico and Porto Cabello. The tone of this note is somewhat higher than the original communications on these subjects. To this I was led by the last newspapers received from the Department, in one of which was contained the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations on piracies. Long convinced that we should derive more advantage from communicating with this Government in a higher pitch than we had used in the previous applications, I seized with pleasure the style of this document, which I was as willing to consider as an index of the national feeling as of that of the Government, and notified the Secretary that respectful delicacy for his Catholic Majesty, and the expectation that the remonstrances of the American minister at Madrid would meet the prompt attention of this Government, alone restrained the recommendation of a system of reprisals. That the legislative councils would again shortly convene, when it might be anticipated that these measures would speedily follow, unless prevented by the measures adopted by this Government. In order to prevent all apology for delay in taking up this communication, it was translated into Spanish by Mr. Appleton, and the translation furnished with the original. A copy of this note is inclosed.

"I send also a copy of another note which I have found it necessary to present to this Government, on account of their conduct to American vessels coming into Spanish ports.

"On the 4th of July the King issued a royal order, requiring that all foreign vessels entering his ports with goods in transit for foreign countries should be compelled to give bond, with good security, for producing the certificate of the Spanish consul residing at the foreign port to which they were represented to be destined, that they were actually delivered at such port. This royal order had never been published in the papers of Madrid, but had been sent to the seaports, and there communicated to foreign consuls by the local authorities. My first information of it was derived from our consul, Mr. Sterling, at Barcelona. Nothing occurring under it for some time, I had not made it a subject of communication until, within a few days, I received information from the same consul that the authorities of Tarragona had proceeded to enforce it against an American vessel in that port, where the vice consul had obtained the release of the vessel by executing bond with the captain for the fulfilment of this condition. I instantly addressed a remonstrance to the Secretary of State, urging the repeal of this order and the cancelling of the bonds which should be executed under it.

"This remonstrance was succeeded by another application, of which a copy is also inclosed, produced by an incident of a most unpleasant nature. A man, asserting that he is an American citizen, was captured with a band of insurgents, who made an unsuccessful assault, in August, on the town of Almeria, on the Mediterranean coast. They approached in an armed brig the batteries of the place, and attempted to force its surrender by a cannonade; they were repulsed in this onset. Thirty of the crew afterwards landed, and being joined by a number of the inhabitants of the neighborhood, they attempted to storm the place by attacking it at several points. They were baffled in these, and most of those who landed from the brig were either killed or captured. Among the latter was this unfortunate man. Under a royal decree, issued immediately after the affair of Tariffa, the sentence of death was promptly pronounced against all these prisoners. The vice consul appointed at that place by Mr. Barrell, of Malaga, learning that a seaman claiming to be an American was included in this sentence, promptly interfered, and, by his exertions, suspended, as to this man, for a time, the execution which was forthwith carried into effect against the others, including foreigners as well as Spaniards. Mr. Spencer, the vice consul, made his report to Mr. Barrell, who directly transmitted the documents to me. I lost no time in laying these, accompanied by my note, before the Secretary of State. They were presented last night at eleven o'clock by Mr. Appleton, who explained the subject fully, and urged the interference of the proper authority immediately to suspend all proceedings until the pleasure of the King could be understood in this case. This man, very young, had only been twenty-four hours in the Bay of Gibraltar, when he was inveigled into this expedition by the means of intoxication and the flattering promises held out to him. To the solicitation for his pardon, I have added, in case of failure on this point, the assertion of the just claim to a fair trial under the right secured by the stipulations of the treaty of 1795."

"SEPTEMBER 13.

"With a promptitude very unusual in this Government, and which does them honor on this occasion, we last night received the inclosed answer to the last application. The King has consented to spare the life of the man, and orders that he shall be sent out of this Kingdom, under a prohibition never to return. I also inclose my note, written in acknowledgment of this concession of his Majesty, in which I have ventured, without instructions, to state the estimate which the American Government would place on an act of this character."

"It is said here that all the agents of France, who have been sent out to the new Governments of South America, have gone with the sanction of the Government of Spain, and that they are furnished with credentials from this Government, to be used by them if occasions should make it necessary. From what we have learned, I think we are justified in believing that the English Government have resolved on some new measure for the protection of their commerce in the West Indies. I am not certain if it extend to making of reprisals, but the chargé d'affaires who is left here since Sir William A'Court departed, acknowledged that measures had been adopted for the effectual suppression of the pirates, from whom their commerce had suffered greatly."

MADRID, September 7, 1824.

The undersigned, the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, begs leave to call the attention of his Catholic Majesty's Government to certain subjects of the deepest interest to the United States, on which the applications heretofore made by the undersigned have failed to rouse the attention, or to obtain the slightest mark of regard from his Catholic Majesty. The undersigned, from delicacy to the Sovereign of Spain, whom he found, on his presentation, occupied in the re-establishment of the affairs of the Kingdom, just emerging from the confusion incident to a state of war, has forborne to urge, with the vehement pressure which his instructions from his Government would seem to require, the decisions of Spain on the several reclamations which were a long time since presented by the undersigned to his Catholic Majesty's Secretary of State.

On the 10th day of January last the undersigned had the honor to address to the Secretary of State of his Catholic Majesty a reclamation on the part of his Government in behalf of its citizens injured by the illegal and piratical conduct of the subjects of his Catholic Majesty in the West Indian seas. It was represented that property to a very large amount had been captured and sent into the ports of his Catholic Majesty, in his American possessions, in many instances against all law and justice, by pirates, who, after committing the most atrocious and nefarious deeds, sought and found shelter and asylum in the islands, and often in the most conspicuous ports and harbors, with the fruits and profits of their inhuman outrages. In many instances these atrocities were perpetrated not less in defiance of right and justice by persons pretending to act under the color of authority, but whose authority has never been justified; and which, if justified, would never sanction these transactions, marked by a character of piracy and rapacity which no commission could justify. In the cases of robberies committed by the Spanish vessels acting as pirates, the American property thus plundered was often carried into the ports of Cuba, and especially of the Havana, and there, in the most open and daring manner, exposed to sale, in the view of the local authorities, unrestrained and unchecked by their slightest interference. American citizens have seen their property, thus violently and feloniously taken from them, offered for sale in open market, without the protection of the local Government in the assertion of their rights, and deterred from the vindication of their just claims by the fullest conviction that they would find no support in the Government of the island, but would meet, in all probability, as the requital of their temerity, the fiend-like vengeance of the murderous assassin. In other instances, where the property of the American citizen has been captured under color of authority in the vessel making the capture, the conduct of the captors has been scarcely less flagrant than that practiced by the pirates. Oftentimes has the booty found in the American vessel been partitioned among the plunderers without going into port, and distributed, without legal adjudication, by these lawless robbers; and when carried, occasionally, into port, a secret, unknown, and unfrequented port has been resorted to, where law and justice were disregarded, and where every means of obtaining right was denied to the parties concerned—unapprised of the proceedings—and not permitted to avail themselves of the customary means of vindication. In the prosecution of these felonious practices, American citizens have been seized and thrown into prison, and there cruelly detained, often in a horrible state of suffering, almost without the indispensable necessaries for human subsistence. In some instances, their property, which the merciless captors had spared and sent into port, has been wasted and embezzled to such an extent that, when the mock trial to which it had been subjected had terminated, even in their favor, the subject of controversy could no longer be found. Thus has every species of abuse of the rights of person and of property of American citizens been practiced in these regions. The local authorities have been appealed to in vain; the Government of Spain has been appealed to, as yet, without effect; the reclamations are again renewed; the patience of the American Government is tried to its fullest extent of sufferance; and the day is probably not very distant when the necessity of warding off these reiterated and aggravated injuries, and the obligation of doing justice to its citizens, may compel the Government of the United States to resort to measures of a more efficient character for prevention of injury and the redress of wrongs. This interesting subject has already claimed the attention of the legislative councils of the nation. They have hitherto forborne to recommend the adoption of measures of reprisals from a desire to manifest their friendly dispositions to his Catholic Majesty, and from the hope that the reclamations, long since presented by their minister near this court, would speedily receive attention, and be followed with his Majesty's answer and determination on these important questions. At no very distant period their councils will, in the regular course of their proceedings, be again assembled at the seat of the National Government, when, doubtless, this subject will again be revived by them, and such measures as the existing evils and the disregard, on the part of his Majesty, of the demands hitherto presented by the American minister, will form with them irrefragable arguments for the adoption of a more efficient system of energetic policy. The undersigned has presented, in different appeals to the Government of his Catholic Majesty, the various subjects of complaint which have arisen from the misconduct of his Majesty's officers and subjects in his ultramarine possessions. One of the most prominent and aggravated was the sacrifice of a gallant officer of the American Navy, whilst peaceably entering the port of St. John's, in Porto Rico, who was most wantonly and treacherously murdered by a gun from the fort, fired by the order of the officer at that time in command, in the absence of the Governor. In this instance, the American Government demands that this subject shall be rigorously investigated, and an adequate punishment inflicted on the officer by whose command this outrage was perpetrated.

An appeal has likewise been made to his Catholic Majesty's Government on the subject of the multiplied piracies which have been committed on the peaceable American commerce in the West Indian seas by vessels equipped and sailing from the ports of his Majesty's possessions in these regions, on which reiterated complaints have been made to the local authorities without effect, and on which the interference of his Majesty has been required to compel those authorities to fulfil their duty in this regard by effectual measures for the suppression of the pirates, and by co-operating with the squadron of the United States, sent into these seas for the extirpation of this scourge to the honest and lawful commerce of the whole civilized world.

Another demand upon his Majesty's Government has been made for indemnification against the enormous losses sustained by the American citizens, from the captures made by vessels pretending to act under commissions issued by agents alleging to be authorized by his Catholic Majesty.

The authority to issue these commissions has never been proved; the right to issue them, on the principles avowed, of a paper blockade, without adequate force, of an interdiction of all neutral commerce with the ports of the Spanish Main, on the alleged ancient rights of Spain over that country, has always been resisted and protested against by all neutral nations, and especially by the United States, and relinquished by his Majesty's officers in that region, and finally renounced or abandoned by his Majesty himself, in his decree of December last, opening the commerce of these countries to all the world. On this subject the undersigned, in obedience to instructions of his Government, demanded that a just indemnification should be made to all the American citizens who had suffered any loss in consequence of these illegal acts, done under color and pretence of his Majesty's authority, but really perpetrated in violation of all laws and justice, whose obligation is acknowledged by all the civilized nations of the world. The release of all citizens, and surrender of all American property whose condition had not been changed, but was unjustifiably and illegally detained, was also required.

The undersigned begs leave to present to his excellency this rapid and cursory sketch of the most important subjects of complaint, which he was instructed to press upon the Government of his Catholic Majesty. He begs to refer his excellency to the different notes presented by him, dated the 10th and 23d of January, and the 3d of February last, in which these grievances are more minutely and specially detailed, and where the appropriate and specific redress demanded is more explicitly and at large stated than the undersigned has considered it necessary at this time to recapitulate.

The undersigned begs leave to urge upon his excellency the necessity of an early answer to these applications that his Government may learn how far the spirit and disposition of an harmonious intercourse is reciprocated towards the United States by his Catholic Majesty; that they may be confirmed in that opinion which they have ever entertained, that an appeal to his Majesty's honor is only necessary to obtain the redress of grievances inflicted without his sanction and authority; and that the United States may be relieved from the painful necessity of deciding that an appeal to a more energetic policy, totally at variance with their ardent desire to preserve harmony, and avoid collision, is at length become absolutely and indispensably necessary.

The undersigned tenders to his excellency his most distinguished consideration, and subscribes himself his excellency's very humble and obedient servant,

HUGH NELSON.

MADRID, October 4, 1824.

"I waited upon Mr. Zea yesterday, and had an opportunity of conversing with him on that subject, as also upon others of importance. He assured me that in a very few days I should receive an answer on the subject of this debt which he did not doubt would be perfectly satisfactory. That there was every disposition on the part of his Majesty's Government to afford the aid requested, and that everything that could be done would be complied with to effectuate the object. I then stated to him the subject of the claims of American citizens for spoliations on their commerce in the West Indies, by vessels pretending to act under commissions which had never been legalized; and which, if legalized, would never sanction the piratical acts which they had perpetrated under pretext of these commissions. He assured me that he would forthwith undertake the examination of the correspondence on this subject. He would not content himself with assuring me that he would devote the first leisure he should have to this object, but that he would enter upon it promptly, and avail himself of every occasion to obtain an acquaintance with the whole matter. I urged upon him the necessity of enabling me to communicate immediately to the American Government the views of Spain on this interesting subject; that the attention of Congress would doubtless be turned to it at a very early period of their session; that it had been reviewed by them at their late session, and they had forborne to adopt some measure of energy for the relief of the American commerce, simply from deference to their wish to maintain the friendly relations with Spain inviolate, and from a hope that the appeals made by the American minister at Madrid to his Catholic Majesty's Government would meet with a proper attention, and produce the desired effect of a friendly adjustment of all existing differences. I assured him of the earnest desire of the Executive of the United States to maintain, unimpaired the friendship between the two Governments, but that I would not assure him how far the influence of this feeling might operate with the Legislature to control the adoption of energetic measures, even to the extent of making reprisals on the commerce of Spain, unless Spain should manifest a disposition to pay a due regard to the reclamations which had been presented upon this subject. I stated that the Count of Ofalia had assured me that the new minister to the United States should be instructed and empowered to treat upon this matter at Washington, as being most convenient to the place where these transactions had occurred, and more convenient for obtaining the necessary testimony. He then remarked on the death of the Chevalier Isnardi, and said that he had not yet had leisure to designate a fit person for this mission, but that this would soon be done. He was informed that Congress would meet in the beginning of December, before which the American Government ought to receive the answer of Spain to the communications made on this subject. He reciprocated the anxious wish of his Majesty to preserve the harmony between Spain and the United States, and that he personally felt the influence of the same consideration."

No. 39.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Nelson to the Secretary of State, (No. 43,) dated

MADRID, October 12, 1824.

"The despatch, No. 39, has presented the correspondence with this Government, in the case of John B. Pechut, an American citizen, taken with the band of insurgents at Almeria, in the Kingdom of Grenada. From that you will have learned that the King had consented to his pardon, on condition of his being sent out of his dominions, never to return to them. Whilst I was in the daily expectation of receiving intelligence of the happy release of Pechut under this act of clemency, I had the mortification to receive communications from Mr. Barrell, and his vice consul, Mr. Spencer, acting at Almeria, and who was so prompt and active as to obtain from the local authorities the suspension of Pechut's execution, giving the melancholy news of the execution of this unfortunate man under a positive order from the Captain General of Grenada—this same ruffian Quesada, who had been sent from Madrid for conniving at the assassination of some of the French soldiers. I learn that the Military Government of Almeria, on the application of Mr. Spencer, claiming this man as an American citizen, and informing the Governor that the case would be sent to the American minister, to be presented to his Majesty, had suspended the sentence until the pleasure of the King should be known. The Military Governor made a report to the Captain General Quesada, stating the fact that the case had been suspended on the claim made of the American citizen, and that an appeal was in progress to his Majesty for his directions in reference to the prisoner. Yet, notwithstanding this full knowledge, Quesada immediately replied to the Military Governor's report with a peremptory order for the prompt execution of Pechut. The subordinate officer conceived himself bound to obey the command of the superior, and the execution was effected upon this poor man on the 10th of September. Instantly on receiving the information of the facts I addressed a note to the Secretary of State, couched in the terms which my feelings dictated, and as strong as the proper decorum would justify. The Secretary replied immediately, asking information in regard to dates. To his note I replied forthwith, much in the spirit of the first communication. The copies of this correspondence accompany this despatch. I have nothing further from this Government on this subject.

"I also send a copy of a note addressed to the Secretary, dated of this day, written with the design of obtaining some answer in relation to our demands on the subject of the spoliations on our commerce in the West Indies, in the hope of getting something in time to enable the President to show to Congress the state of this question between the two Governments. It must come very soon to be in time. I have talked and written continually on this subject, without effect. If this terror of reprisals on their commerce do not bring forth something, I shall despair of vanquishing Spanish apathy, and shall think the energy of the Committee on Foreign Relations will not be excessive, even if it should extend to the recommendation of doing justice to our citizens, by something more effectual than negotiation.

"If I might presume to advise, I should at least think it prudent to forbear for a reasonable portion of the session; giving Spain time to answer, so as not to lose the occasion of acting upon this subject during the session. Some allowance must be made for the perpetual change in their councils, and some respect may be due to Count Ofalia's promise given, to authorize the new minister who should go to the United States to treat upon this important question."

MADRID, October 6, 1824.

The undersigned, the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to communicate to his excellency that he has this day experienced the deepest mortification in learning from the American consul at Malaga and the vice consul at Almeria that the inexorable rigor of the Captain General of Grenada has cruelly defeated the benignant clemency of his Majesty, which, on the application of the undersigned, had been graciously extended to an American citizen, John Baptist Pechut, seduced, through ignorance, into a combination with others, charged with an attempt to disturb the repose of his Majesty's dominions. This unfortunate young man, just arrived in the port of Gibraltar, in less than twenty-four hours after his reaching this port was beguiled by the artifice and seductions of subtle and insidious men to engage in an enterprise, the object of which, as disclosed to him, was in no manner levelled against the safety or power of his Catholic Majesty. The undersigned had the honor to address to his excellency, the then acting Secretary of State, on the 9th ultimo, his appeal to his Majesty's clemency for the exercise of his most glorious and divine-like attribute of mercy to the unfortunate; this appeal was promptly answered by the assurance that his Majesty, actuated by that clemency which it is his Majesty's highest delight to practice on all just occasions, and by a wish to manifest his feelings of respect and friendship to the representative of the American Government, had granted a pardon to this unfortunate, deluded young man; and by the communication of the information that an order to that effect had been immediately transmitted to his Majesty's Secretary for the Department of War, with instructions that Pechut should be placed at the disposal of the undersigned; to be sent out of his Majesty's dominions, and to incur the sentence of perpetual banishment from them. The undersigned, under the influence of those feelings which this act of clemency was calculated to inspire, lost no time in making to his Majesty the proper return of the acknowledgments of his Government and of his own personal sensibility for this distinguished mark of liberality. The undersigned immediately communicated to his Government this act of clemency on the part of his Catholic Majesty, as a new evidence of his Majesty's disposition to cherish and fortify the harmony and friendship happily subsisting between the two Governments. His excellency cannot fail to appreciate the indignant sensibility with which the undersigned must receive the report from the American consul, that the unrelenting severity of one of his Majesty's officers has baffled the gracious purposes of his royal clemency, and set at nought the sacred obligations of existing treaties which, at least, pretend to assure to the citizens or subjects of either in the jurisdiction of the other a just and fair trial for alleged offences or crimes against their laws. But the undersigned must experience still deeper regret, when, in the execution of his duties to his own Government, it shall devolve upon him to announce to it that the highly-lauded humanity of his Majesty has been counteracted by the infuriated vengeance of an arbitrary Governor of a province, and that his Majesty's design of according to the representative of a friendly power a new evidence of his sincere wish to cultivate their good will has been converted into an instrument of discord and irritation by a blind surrender to the most vindictive feelings.

The undersigned feels constrained to ask of his excellency that the officer whose conduct has produced this unhappy disappointment may be called upon to answer for this unjustifiable act; and that, henceforward, should any American citizen be unhappily placed in a situation subjecting him to be proceeded against judicially in Spain, to demand that the rights secured to them by treaty shall be most scrupulously administered in all cases by the tribunals of his Catholic Majesty.

The undersigned has the honor to tender to his excellency the consideration of his most distinguished regard, and to subscribe himself his excellency's very humble and obedient servant,

HUGH NELSON.

His Excellency DON FRANCISCO ZEA BERMUDEZ,
His Catholic Majesty's First Secretary of State, &c.

No. 39, (b.)

Don Francisco de Zea Bermudez to Mr. Nelson.

[Translation.]

SAN LORENZO, October 8, 1824.

SIR: The sad communication which you were pleased to make to me in your note of the 6th current, which came to my hands at half-past 8 o'clock this morning, referring to the pardon which the King, my august master, with his natural clemency, judged good to grant to John Pechut, in whose favor, as an American subject, you were pleased to interest yourself, not having had the desired fulfilment, has caused to me the most lively grief. I am certain that his Majesty, to whom I shall hasten to give an account of this unfortunate occurrence, will learn, with the most sincere sorrow, that his beneficent disposition, intended to prove more and more his friendly sentiments to your Government, has not been realized. Anticipating his royal orders, I have not lost a moment in communicating the proper orders, that all the circumstances relative to the trial and sentence of the unfortunate Pechut may be investigated with scrupulous exactness, including the fixed times of the despatch and arrival of the royal orders communicated in this business, which were sent from this chief office, under my charge, without the least delay, on the 11th of last month, as I had the honor of informing you on the same day. You need not doubt, sir, that the known rectitude of his Majesty will severely punish any fault, omission, or disobedience to his royal commands, if any such have taken place in this affair; and, in the whole case, I shall consider it as a duty, sir, to inform you, circumstantially, of the result of the investigations ordered, and of the consequent resolution of his Majesty, for your information and satisfaction. In the meantime, and to elucidate further this painful event, I request you will have the goodness to transmit to me, with due precision and punctuality, all the data relative to it which may have come to your knowledge; resting assured that, on my part, I shall omit no means within the compass of my power to evince to you the distinguished value which his Majesty's Government sets upon their friendly relations with yours, and of their constant exactitude in observing justice and treaties.

I embrace, with pleasure, this occasion of renewing to you, sir, the sentiments of my most distinguished consideration. God preserve you many years.

FRANCISCO DE ZEA BERMUDEZ.

MADRID, October 9, 1824.

The undersigned, the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of his excellency's note of the 8th instant, which was received this morning, and to state, in reply, that he is informed, by letters from the vice consul at Almeria, that, on the 25th of August last, on his urgent solicitation, the Military Governor and Junta of Almeria suspended the execution of Pechut, who had been previously, with others, made a prisoner; and that they gave an assurance to the American vice consul, on his representation that this subject would be immediately laid before his Majesty's Government; that his sentence should be respited until his Majesty's pleasure should be known. The American vice consul proceeded to correspond with the consul at Malaga, who transmitted the documents to the American minister at Madrid, who, immediately on their receipt, addressed the Secretary of State on the subject, who promptly returned the assurance of his Majesty's pardon. The further correspondence of the American vice consul at Almeria informs the undersigned that the Military Governor of that place, on the 29th of August last, suspending the execution of Pechut, on the vice consul's representations of the case being in a course to be submitted to his Majesty's pleasure, presented the subject to his excellency the Captain General of the Kingdom of Grenada, stating the reasons which induced the suspension of Pechut's execution, being those which the American vice consul offered at the time that the declaration of the said Pechut was made before the Military Governor of Almeria, and the Junta associated with him. This declaration accompanied the first note of the undersigned to the Secretary of State on this subject. The Captain General of the Kingdom of Grenada, in defiance of the knowledge conveyed to him by the Military Governor of Almeria, that this case of an American citizen, claimed by the American representative, was in course of submission to his Catholic Majesty, on the 6th of September proceeded to order the execution of Pechut, and enjoined upon the authorities implicit obedience to this command. The Military Governor of Almeria, having received this peremptory command from his superior, who was fully informed of all the facts of the case, and especially made to know that an appeal to his Majesty's clemency was in progress for the pardon of this unfortunate young man, conceived himself bound to execute this sanguinary order; nor could the remonstrances, protests, and appeals of the American vice consul produce any effect in mitigating or suspending this inexorable sentence, which the undersigned learns was cruelly fulfilled on the evening of the 10th of September. The undersigned presents this case to his excellency, not as one of complaint against the Captain General for disregard of his Majesty's command, which would be an affair entirely between his Majesty and the officer, with which a foreign Government could have no right to interfere, but as a complaint against this officer for a total disregard of the rights of a foreign power, secured by the sacred obligations of a treaty, which the Military Governor and Junta of Almeria, not less zealous in the service of his Majesty than the Captain General himself, deemed of sufficient force to induce them, in the first instance, to suspend Pechut's execution; as a complaint against the Captain General of Grenada, for presuming to decide a question between a foreign Government and his Catholic Majesty, wresting the authority from the higher tribunals, by a decision not to be reversed from the unhappy condition of the unfortunate victim, outraging the rights of a foreign nation, presumptuously anticipating the judgment of his Majesty, and defeating the humane and benevolent designs of his Majesty in extending his clemency to a deluded and ignorant victim, uninfluenced by any sentiment of hostility to the sacred rights of his Catholic Majesty; a complaint that this officer remained inexorable to an appeal which aroused the sympathies of the tribunal which first investigated the case, and which, at the first blush, met in the clemency of his Majesty a sympathizing sentiment sufficient to produce an immediate order for the pardon of the unfortunate Pechut. The undersigned closes this with feelings of the deepest regret, and laments that an officer in his Majesty's service, high and distinguished by his confidence, should be found manifesting an overweening zeal, by the perpetration of acts from which humanity revolts, and from which the benignant clemency of his Majesty's heart must recoil with the deepest abhorrence. The undersigned begs to repeat his earnest appeal to his Majesty to cause the subsisting treaties between Spain and the United States to be fulfilled, should any cases occur wherein American citizens may be so unfortunate as to be involved in criminal prosecutions in Spain, and to renew to his excellency the tender, &c., &c.

MADRID, October 12, 1824.

The undersigned, the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, salutes his excellency, and asks to call his attention to the topics on which they conversed when last the undersigned had the honor of an interview with his excellency; but especially to that which concerned the claims of the American citizens for spoiliations on their commerce in the West India seas, committed by Spanish cruisers, in violation of the laws of nations and the peaceful relations subsisting between Spain and the United States. The undersigned is led to recall this subject to his excellency's recollection from an apprehension that the great pressure of important business, at this time occupying his excellency's attention, may have diminished the force of his recollection in regard to communications made in a personal conference, and not in writing; and from an earnest desire to prevent, by all means, the chance of the friendly and harmonious relations between the two countries being brought into the hazard of collision. The undersigned had the honor to state that this subject had been presented to his Majesty's Government on the 10th of January last; that it had been continually recalled since, both in writing and in conversation, at intervals, to its recollection; that it had been presented to the Secretary of State ad interim who had preceded his excellency; and was, lastly, presented to his excellency, accompanied by the information that the maintenance of the friendship and good feelings between the United States and Spain seemed to make it highly important that Spain would turn her attention to the subject as soon as possible, and give an answer to those repeated remonstrances, which the undersigned might communicate to the Government of the United States as the evidence that Spain was not wholly inattentive to a subject to which the United States attached so much importance. The undersigned had the honor to urge upon his excellency the necessity of a speedy reply, because of the approaching session of the American Congress, before whom there was great reason to believe the President of the United States would consider it necessary to lay some report in reference to this subject, so interesting to a large class of the American community; and, also, because the Congress of the United States had, at their last session, turned their attention to this subject, but had forborne to recommend measures of energy, by possibility extending to measures of reprisal on the commerce of Spain, purely from deference to their anxious desire to maintain, unimpaired, their friendly relations with Spain, and from the hope which they entertained that a strong sense of justice on the part of Spain would induce her to give a just attention to the remonstrances on the subject presented by the American minister near his Catholic Majesty. The undersigned had the honor to state that he was authorized to say, that the Executive of the United States felt an anxious wish to preserve undisturbed the harmonious relations and the friendly sentiments between the two Governments; that he, the undersigned, personally felt the influence of the same strong feelings; but that he did not feel justified in expressing the opinion that the same influence might operate with the National Legislature to the extent of protracted forbearance, after the lapse of twelve months, expended in fruitless efforts on the part of the American minister to induce the councils of his Majesty to turn their attention to the appeals of a friendly nation, bound to protect its citizens and to obtain justice for them, aggrieved by the misconduct of the officers of another nation. The undersigned begs leave to inform his excellency that the Congress of the United States will commence its session on the sixth day of December ensuing; at which time it would, doubtless, be highly agreeable to the American Government to be informed of the disposition of his Catholic Majesty to meet their reclamations in the most amicable manner, and of his Majesty's determination to adopt such a plan of accommodation of these matters of difference between the two Governments as shall comport with the great principles of justice and with the just obligations of a friendly nation to indemnify others injured by the misconduct of its officers in a manner satisfactory to the nation whose citizens have sustained the injuries.

The undersigned has the honor to renew to his excellency the tender of his most distinguished consideration, and subscribes himself his excellency's very humble and obedient servant,

HUGH NELSON.

PIRACIES ON THE COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES IN THE WEST INDIES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DECEMBER 13, 1824.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The citizens of New York solicit the attention of your honorable body to a subject of the deepest interest, affecting equally the commerce and revenue of the nation, the lives of our citizens, and the prosperity of a most respectable class of merchants.

The trade to the island of Cuba has for many years been increasing, and has now become one of the most valuable branches of our foreign commerce. In its importance to the Union it is not inferior to our trade with France and all her colonies. It is a most advantageous market for our produce and manufactures; furnishes us with many useful articles of consumption; employs a vast amount of American tonnage; is a nursery for our seamen, and yields a large revenue to our Treasury. This trade was prosecuted until within a few years past with but little interruption; but in consequence of wars in the different Spanish provinces, which have had the effect greatly to weaken the sense of moral obligation, and from a partial suppression of the Spanish slave trade, many ferocious spirits have been put out of employment, and a class of men have arisen and located themselves in different parts of that island who seem, by their robberies and their cruelties, to emulate the buccaniers of former times.

The piracies of these men were confined for a time principally to plundering our vessels and maltreating our seamen. By the exertions of the naval force under Commodore Porter their atrocities were rendered less frequent, and a hope was entertained that they would be entirely discontinued, but this hope has proved delusive. The necessary withdrawal of our ships-of-war during the sickly season, the supineness or connivance of the local authorities of Cuba, and the imbecility of the Spanish Government, have conspired to renew the piratical system with increased activity and horror. Whole crews have been recently murdered, their vessels burnt, and their cargoes plundered, and, in some instances, openly sold at the Matanzas or the Havana.

Without some protection to this trade more efficient than any which has yet been afforded, and better adapted to repel the attacks of these abandoned men, we are apprehensive that this great branch of our foreign commerce, and the revenues arising from it, will be materially diminished. It is a lawful commerce, and our citizens have the right to claim the protection of Government in its pursuit.

The system adopted by these bands of pirates is to go out from their places of concealment in small open boats, attack unarmed vessels, and, by indiscriminate slaughter, to remove all chance of detection. A commerce liable to such risks cannot be prosecuted; merchants will be unwilling to expose their property, and seamen will not be willing to jeopardize their lives.

We have thus briefly stated the evils which threaten not only our direct trade to Cuba, but also our commerce to every part of the Gulf of Mexico. It is not too much to say that they are too great to be endured; and, confiding in the wisdom and justice of your honorable body, we pray that suitable and effectual measures may be speedily devised to remove them.

We would respectfully submit to the consideration of Congress whether it would not be expedient that a law should be passed authorizing merchant vessels to arm for their own protection, under such regulations and with such rules for their government as may appear necessary, and which may avoid the danger of committing the peace of the nation to the discretion of individuals; and that the squadron on the Cuba station should be reinforced; that decoy vessels should be employed, and that the ships-of-war be furnished with additional launches and boats calculated to pursue the pirates into their retreats and fastnesses.

We would further respectfully suggest that the President of the United States be requested to make suitable remonstrances to the Government of Spain and to the authorities of Cuba relative to the piracies committed on American vessels and the murder of their crews by persons issuing from the shores of that island, and to state most explicitly that, if the evils are not removed, they will be held liable for the consequences.

Should such remonstrances be made, and should they be ineffectual, the citizens of New York pledge themselves to support their Government in any ulterior measures which may be necessary, even if they extend to the blockade of every part of that island.

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

A true copy of a memorial unanimously adopted at a meeting of merchants and citizens of the city of New York, held at the Tontine Coffee House on the 2d day of December, 1824.

CLAIM OF PELATIAH FITCH, ON ACCOUNT OF FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DECEMBER 14, 1824.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

The SECRETARY OF STATE, to whom, by a resolution of the 9th of January, 1822, was referred the petition, with the accompanying documents, of Pelatiah Fitch, of Athens, in the county of Greene, in the State of New York, and who, by a resolution of this House of the 24th of May last, was directed to report, at this session of Congress, his opinion upon the claim of the said Fitch, has the honor, in compliance therewith, of submitting the following report:

The petition sets forth that a vessel, called the Hiram, sailed from New York in December, 1796, bound to Jamaica, and was captured and condemned by the French in the year 1797; that the Hiram was valued at five thousand dollars and upwards, the whole claim to which has devolved upon the petitioner; and that the portion of the cargo belonging to him at the time of its shipment was worth three thousand dollars or more.

That the petitioner was advised and believed that he had a valid claim upon David Ross and John Baptist Loir for the value of the vessel; that proceedings were commenced against them in Pennsylvania, prosecuted with great trouble and expense through the courts of law and equity, and recently resulted in a total failure.

That it was his confidence of succeeding against said Ross and Loir, and his wish to save the United States the expense, that prevented him from interposing his claim under the Louisiana treaty.

That he hopes, therefore, should all the funds growing out of the cession of Louisiana to the United States and set apart for liquidating claims for French spoiliations be exhausted, that Congress will take into consideration the justice and hardship of his case and grant him compensation, either in money or in lands, or in such other way as shall be deemed right.

By a document accompanying the petition it appears that the Hiram and her cargo were condemned by the French Commissioners, Santhonax and Raimond, in the island of St. Domingo, about the first of February, 1797, under the authority of a decree of the Executive Directory of France, and upon the sole ground that the vessel was cleared out for, and bound to, the island of Jamaica.

From this decision no appeal was taken in behalf of the owners of the Hiram, nor was any claim of indemnity interposed in their behalf upon the subsequent negotiation for indemnities at the cession of Louisiana. Whether the funds, therefore, set apart for liquidating claims provided for by that negotiation are or are not exhausted, no part of them could, under any circumstances, be applied to indemnify the petitioner for this loss.

The only question remaining, then, is, whether Congress, in consideration of the justice and hardship of his case, will grant him compensation from other public funds. The reasons assigned by the petitioner for his omission to interpose his claim under the Louisiana treaty are, his wish to save expense to the United States and his confidence of succeeding in a claim against David Ross and John Baptist Loir for recovering, by process of law in their country, the property which had thus come into their possession.

These persons, it appears, had purchased the vessel at the time when she was condemned by the French Commissioners in St. Domingo in 1797. She was immediately sent to the United States, entered at the port of Philadelphia on the 27th of April, 1797, and again on the first of September following. On the 5th of September, 1797, she was registered at Philadelphia as the property of David Ross, and on the 4th day of October of the same year again as the property of John Baptist Loir, Joseph Henry Chevalier, and David Ross.

The petitioner and Rufus Bacchus, then joint owner with him of the Hiram, sued out, in the Circuit Court of the United States, at the October session of the said court, at Philadelphia, a writ of replevin for the said vessel, upon which was returned by William Nickols, then marshal of the Pennsylvania district, "Replevied and delivered;" which return the petitioner states to have been contrary to the fact, though not known to him to have been so until after the death of the said Nickols. On this suit, however, judgment for the plaintiff was rendered by the court in October, 1800.

Ten years after that time a bill in chancery was filed in the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Delaware by the same complainants, Pelatiah Fitch and Rufus Bacchus, against the same defendants, David Ross and John Baptist Loir, setting forth the facts above stated and others, showing that the complainants had, notwithstanding the above cited return of the marshal upon the writ of replevin and judgment of the court in their favor, never received restitution of their property or indemnity for the loss of it, and praying a subpoena to the defendants, commanding them to appear and answer the said bill, and to abide the order and decree of the court upon the premises.

To this bill David Ross, one of the defendants, by his counsel, filed a demurrer, which, upon full argument, was sustained by the court, and in October, 1812, the bill of complaint was dismissed, but without costs.

Without inquiry into the causes of the petitioner's failure to obtain the restitution of his vessel or indemnity for his loss, through the channel in which he voluntarily sought his remedy, the tribunals of his own country, it is apparent that they have given him no claim to indemnity from the United States. The omission to press the claim upon the Government of France at the time when it might have been provided for was altogether of the petitioner's own option; and patriotic as one of his motives for this forbearance was, and disappointed as he has been in the expectation which suggested the other, they can, neither separately nor united, constitute any obligation upon the United States to take upon themselves the burden of an injury, in the infliction of which they had no participation, and for the reparation of which their interposition was not even requested by the petitioner.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

CONVENTION WITH THE BEY OF TUNIS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, IN EXECUTIVE SESSION, DECEMBER 15, 1824, AND THE INJUNCTION OF SECRECY SINCE REMOVED.

To the President of the Senate pro tempore:

I transmit to the Senate a convention negotiated and signed by Samuel D. Heap, Acting Consul of the United States, on the part of the United States, and Mahmoud Bashaw, Bey of Tunis, on the 24th day of February last, together with copies of Mr. Heap's correspondence appertaining to the negotiation of the same, for the constitutional consideration of the Senate with regard to its ratification.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, December 13, 1824.

CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE BEY OF TUNIS.

Whereas sundry articles of the treaty of peace and friendship concluded between the United States of America and Hamuda Bashaw, of happy memory, in the month of Rebia Elul, in the year of the Hegira 1212, corresponding with the month of August of the Christian year 1797, have, by experience, been found to require alteration and amendment; in order, therefore, that the United States should be placed on the same footing with the most favored nations having treaties with Tunis, as well as to manifest a respect for the American Government, and a desire to continue, unimpaired, the friendly relations which have always existed between the two nations, it is hereby agreed and concluded between his Highness Mahmoud Bashaw, Bey of Tunis, and S. D. Heap, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, that alteration be made in the sixth, eleventh, twelfth, and fourteenth articles of said treaty; and that the said articles shall be altered and amended in the treaty to read as follows:

ARTICLE VI. If a Tunisian corsair shall meet with an American vessel, and shall visit it with her boat, two men only shall be allowed to go on board, peaceably to satisfy themselves of its being American; who, as well as any passengers of other nations they may have on board, shall go free, both them and their goods; and the said two men shall not exact anything on pain of being severely punished. In case a slave escapes and takes refuge on board an American vessel-of-war, he shall be free, and no demand shall be made either for his restoration or for payment.

ARTICLE XI. When a vessel-of-war of the United States shall enter the port of the Goletta, she shall be saluted with twenty-one guns, which salute the vessel-of-war shall return gun for gun only; and no powder will be given as mentioned in the ancient eleventh article of this treaty, which is hereby annulled.

ARTICLE XII. When citizens of the United States shall come within the dependencies of Tunis to carry on commerce there, the same respect shall be paid to them which the merchants of other nations enjoy; and if they wish to establish themselves within our ports, no opposition shall be made thereto; and they shall be free to avail themselves of such interpreters as they may judge necessary, without any obstruction, in conformity with the usages of other nations; and if a Tunisian subject shall go to establish himself within the dependencies of the United States, he shall be treated in like manner. If any Tunisian subject shall freight an American vessel, or load her with merchandise, and shall afterwards want to unload and ship them on board of another vessel, we shall not permit him until the matter is determined by a reference of merchants, who shall decide upon the case, and after the decision the determination shall be conformed to.

No captain shall be detained in port against his consent, except when our ports are shut for the vessels of all other nations, which may take place with respect to merchant vessels, but not to those of war. The subjects and citizens of the two nations, respectively, Tunisians and Americans, shall be protected in the places where they may be, by the officers of the Government there existing; but on failure of such protection and for redress of every injury, the party may resort to the chief authority in each country, by whom adequate protection and complete justice shall be rendered. In case the Government of Tunis shall have need of an American vessel for its service, such vessel being within the Regency, and not previously engaged, the Government shall have the preference, on its paying the same freight as other merchants usually pay for the same service, or at the like rate, if the service be without a customary precedent.

ARTICLE XIV. All vessels belonging to the citizens and inhabitants of the United States shall be permitted to enter the ports of the Kingdom of Tunis, and freely trade with the subjects and inhabitants thereof, on paying the usual duties which are paid by other most favored nations at peace with the Regency. In like manner all vessels belonging to the subjects and inhabitants of the Kingdom of Tunis shall be permitted to enter the different ports of the United States, and freely trade with the citizens and inhabitants thereof, on paying the usual duties which are paid by other favored nations at peace with the United States.

Concluded, signed, and sealed, at the palace of Bardo, near Tunis, the 24th day of the moon Jumed-teni, in the year of the Hegira 1239, corresponding to the 24th of February, 1824, of the Christian year; and the 48th year of the Independence of the United States; reserving the same, nevertheless, for the final ratification of the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Extract of a letter from S. D. Heap, acting as Consul of the United States at Tunis, to the Secretary of State, dated January 24, 1824.

"I have now the honor to inform you that all the consuls waited on the Bey this morning, on the occasion of his return to Bardo from the Baths, where he had spent some weeks for the restoration of his health. After we had withdrawn, I was informed his Highness wished to see me, when he expressed the most friendly disposition towards the United States, and wished to know why American vessels never visited his ports; I replied, that his Highness must be well aware of the cause; that, so long as the present treaty existed, he must not expect to see an American merchantman enter his ports. I also observed, that the commerce of the United States in the Mediterranean was very considerable, and annually increasing; that I had reason to believe, if such changes were made in the treaty as would place us in the situation of the most favored nation, he would soon see our enterprising citizens engage in a commerce which would prove highly beneficial to his Government and subjects. I further observed, that many years' experience must have convinced his Highness of the truth of my remark, and that he must have become sensible, by this time, that the objectionable articles in the treaty had ceased to be of much consequence to us, but that they operated greatly to his disadvantage. I then briefly stated to him all the objectionable articles which it would be necessary to expunge or alter in order to produce the desired effect. The Bey, with the utmost apparent candor, assented to the truth of my observations, and charged me to inform my Government of his willingness to expunge or alter the objectionable articles. He moreover requested me to inform the commander of the first American vessel-of-war which should arrive in this bay that he would salute him, and that in future no demand would be made for powder, nor should any claim be made for any slave who might escape in a United States vessel hereafter."

UNITED STATES CONSULATE, Tunis, March 4, 1824.

SIR: I had the honor of informing you, in my communications of January 20 and 24 and February 10, that his Highness the Bey had evinced the most friendly disposition towards the United States, and had agreed to expunge and remodel certain articles of our treaty which have always been considered as disgraceful, and have not unfrequently been a source of litigation and trouble.

I thought it advisable to avail myself of the present favorable disposition of the Bey to effect such a change as could not but be agreeable to my Government, more especially as it has been effected without expense, or the slightest intimation that presents of any description would be expected.

I inclose a copy of the treaty; the original will be forwarded by the first vessel-of-war of the United States which may visit this port.

In this affair, I trust I shall not be considered by the honorable the Secretary of State to have acted with precipitation; if, however, such should, unfortunately for me, be the case, I hope it will be attributed to my zeal to be of service to my country.

With great respect, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

S. D. HEAP,

ARTICLE PREMIERE. Il est convenu que dans aucune partie du grand océan, appelé communément

Océan Pacifique ou Mer du Sud les citoyens ou sujets respectifs des hautes puissances contractantes ne seront ni troubles, ni gênés soit dans la navigation, soit dans l'exploitation de la pêche, soit dans la faculté d'aborder aux côtes sur des points qui ne seroient pas déjà occupés, à fin d'y faire le commerce avec les indigènes, sauf toutefois les restrictions et conditions déterminées par les articles qui suivent.

ARTICLE DEUXIEME. Dans la vue d'empêcher que les droits de navigation et de pêche exercés sur le grand océan par les citoyens et sujets des hautes Puissances contractantes ne deviennent le prétexte d'un commerce illicite, il est convenu, que les citoyens des Etats Unis n'aborderont à aucun point où il se trouve un établissement Russe, sans la permission du gouverneur ou commandant; et que réciproquement les sujets Russes ne pourront aborder sans permission à aucun établissement des Etats Unis sur la côte nord-ouest.

ARTICLE CINQUIEME. Sont toutefois exceptées de ce même commerce, accordé par l'article précédent, toutes les liqueurs spiritueuses, les armes à feu, armes blanches, poudre, et munition de guerre de toute espèce, que les deux puissances s'engagent réciproquement à ne pas vendre, ni laisser vendre aux indigènes par leur citoyens et sujets respectifs, ni par aucun individu, que se trouveroit sous leur autorité. Il est également stipulé, que cette restriction ne pourra jamais servir de prétexte, ni être alléguée, dans aucun cas, pour autoriser soit la visite ou la détention des vaisseaux, soit la saisie de la merchandise, soit enfin des mesures quelconques de contrainte envers les armateurs ou les équipages qui feroient ce commerce, les hautes puissances contractantes s'étant réciproquement réservé de statuer sur les peines à encourir, et d'infliger les amendes encourues en cas de contravention à cet article, par leur citoyens ou sujets respectifs.

ARTICLE SIXIEME. Lorsque cette convention aura été dûment ratifiée par le President des Etats Unis de l'avis et du consentement du Sénat, d'une part, et de l'autre, par sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies, les ratifications en seront échangées à Washington dans le délai de dix mois de la date ci-dessous, ou plutôt si faire se peut. En foi de quoi les plenipotentiaires respectifs l'ont signée, et y ont fait apposer les cachets de leurs armes.

Convention between the United States and Russia.

In the name of the most Holy and Indivisible Trinity:

The President of the United States of America and his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias wishing to cement the bonds of amity which unite them, and to secure between them the invariable maintenance of a perfect concord, by means of the present convention, have named as their plenipotentiaries to this effect, to wit: The President of the United States of America, HENRY MIDDLETON, a citizen of said States, and their Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary near his Imperial Majesty; and his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, his beloved and faithful CHARLES ROBERT, Count of NESSELRODE, Actual Privy Counsellor, member of the Council of State, Secretary of State, directing the administration of Foreign Affairs, Actual Chamberlain, Knight of the order of St. Alexander Nevsky, Grand Cross of the order of St. Vladimir of the first class, Knight of that of the White Eagle of Poland, Grand Cross of the order of St. Stephen of Hungary, Knight of the orders of the Holy Ghost and of St. Michael, and Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor of France, Knight Grand Cross of the orders of the Black and of the Red Eagle of Prussia, of the Annunciation of Sardinia, of Charles III, of Spain, of St. Ferdinand and of Merit of Naples, of the Elephant of Denmark, of the Polar Star of Sweden, of the Crown of Wirtemberg, of the Guelphs of Hanover, of the Belgic Lion, of Fidelity of Baden, and of St. Constantine of Parma; and PIERRE DE POLETICA, Actual Counsellor of State, Knight of the order of St. Anna of the first class, and Grand Cross of the order of St. Vladimir of the second; who, after having exchanged their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon and signed the following stipulations:

ARTICLE 1. It is agreed that in any part of the great ocean, commonly called the Pacific Ocean, or South Sea, the respective citizens or subjects of the high contracting powers shall be neither disturbed nor restrained either in navigation, or in fishing, or in the power of resorting to the coasts upon points which may not already be occupied, for the purpose of trading with the natives, saving always the restrictions and conditions determined by the following articles.

ARTICLE 2. With the view of preventing the rights of navigation and of fishing exercised upon the great ocean by the citizens and subjects of the high contracting powers from becoming the pretext for an illicit trade, it is agreed that the citizens of the United States shall not resort to any point where there is a Russian establishment without the permission of the Governor or commander; and that, reciprocally, the subjects of Russia shall not resort without permission to any establishment of the United States upon the Northwest Coast.

ARTICLE 3. It is moreover agreed that hereafter there shall not be formed by the citizens of the United States, or under the authority of the said States, any establishment upon the Northwest Coast of America, nor in any of the islands adjacent to the north of fifty-four degrees and forty minutes of north latitude; and that in the same manner there shall be none formed by Russian subjects or under the authority of Russia south of the same parallel

ARTICLE 4. It is, nevertheless, understood that during a term of ten years, counting from the signature of the present convention, the ships of both powers, or which belong to their citizens or subjects, respectively, may reciprocally frequent, without any hindrance whatever, the interior seas, gulfs, harbors, and creeks upon the coast mentioned in the preceding article for the purpose of fishing and trading with the natives of the country.

ARTICLE 5. All spirituous liquors, fire-arms, other arms, powder, and munitions of war of every kind, are always excepted from this same commerce permitted by the preceding article; and the two powers engage reciprocally neither to sell nor suffer them to be sold to the natives by their respective citizens and subjects, nor by any person who may be under their authority. It is likewise stipulated that this restriction shall never afford a pretext nor be advanced in any case to authorize either search or detention of the vessels, seizure of the merchandise, or, in fine, any measures of constraint whatever towards the merchants or the crews who may carry on this commerce; the high contracting powers reciprocally reserving to themselves to determine upon the penalties to be incurred and to inflict the punishments in case of the contravention of this article by their respective citizens or subjects.

ARTICLE 6. When this convention shall have been duly ratified by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, on the one part, and on the other by his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington, in the space of ten months from the date below, or sooner, if possible. In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this convention and thereto affixed the seals of their arms.

Done at St. Petersburg the 5th (17th) of April, of the year of grace one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four.

Le soussigné, Envoy Extraordinaire et Ministère Plenipotentiaire de sa Majesté l'Empereur des toutes les Russies, près les Etats Unis d'Amerique, a eù l'honneur de témoigner à Monsieur Adams, Secrétaire d'Etat, que l'Empereur, son maître, constamment animé d'une amitié sincere envers le Gouvernement des Etats Unis, desire de voir terminer, au moyen d'une negociation amicale, les discussions, qui se sont elevées entre le cabinet de St. Petersburg et celui de Washington, à l'occasion de quelques unes des dispositions comprises dans l'oukaze du 4, (16,) Septembre, 1821, concernant les possessions Russes sur la côte nord-ouest d'Amerique.

Ces vûes de sa Majesté Impériale coincident avec le voeu expremé, il y a quelque tems, de la part des Etats Unis, relativement à une fixation de limites sur la dite côte.

Le ministère de l'Empereur ayant engagé le ministère Britannique à munir Sir Charles Bagot, Ambassadeur de S. M. le Roi d'Angleterre, près sa Majesté Impériale, des plein pouvoirs requis pour la négociation, que va s'entamer dans le but d'appaiser les difficultés nées entre les deux cours, au sujet de la côte nord-ouest, le Gouvernement Anglais s'est empressé d'accéder à cette invitation.

Le soussigné a reçu l'ordre de témoigner à Monsieur le Secrétaire d'Etat Adams, au nom de son auguste maître, et comme une nouvelle preuve de sentimens que sa Majesté Impériale porte à Monsieur le President des Etats Unis, et au Gouvernement Americain, l'expression du désir, que Mons. Middleton soit, de même, muni des pouvoirs nécessaires pour terminer avec le cabinet Impériale, par un arrangement fondé sur le principe des convenances mutuelles, toutes les discussions, qui se sont élevées entre la Russie et les Etats Unis, à la suite du règlement publié le 4 (16) Septembre, 1821.

Le soussigné croit pouvoir espérer, que le cabinet de Washington accueillera, avec plaisir, une proposition tendante à faciliter la conclusion d'un arrangement basé sur les sentimens d'une bienveillance réciproque, et de nature, à concilier les intérêts de deux pays.

Il profite de cette occasion pour réitérer à Monsieur Adams, l'assurance de sa haute considération.

WASHINGTON, ce 12 (24) Avril, 1823.

No. 1.

Baron Tuyll to the Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

WASHINGTON, April 12, (24,) 1823.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias near the United States of America, has had the honor to express to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, the desire of the Emperor, his master, who is ever animated by a sincere friendship towards the United States, to see the discussions that have arisen between the cabinets of St. Petersburg and Washington, upon some provisions contained in the ukase of the 4th (16th) of September, 1821, relative to the Russian possessions on the Northwest Coast of America, terminated by means of a friendly negotiation.

These views of his Imperial Majesty coincide with the wish expressed some time since on the part of the United States in regard to a settlement of limits on the said coast.

The ministry of the Emperor, having induced the British ministry to furnish Sir Charles Bagot, ambassador of his Majesty the King of England near his Imperial Majesty, with full powers necessary for the negotiation about to be set on foot for reconciling the difficulties existing between the two courts on the subject of the Northwest Coast, the English Government is desirous of acceding to that invitation.

The undersigned has been directed to communicate to Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, in the name of his august master, and as an additional proof of the sentiments entertained by his Imperial Majesty towards the President of the United States and the American Government, the expression of his desire that Mr. Middleton be also furnished with the necessary powers to terminate with the Imperial cabinet, by an arrangement founded on the principle of mutual convenience, all the differences that have arisen between Russia and the United States in consequence of the law published September 4, (16,) 1821.

The undersigned thinks he may hope that the cabinet of Washington will, with pleasure, accede to a proposition tending to facilitate the completion of an arrangement based upon sentiments of mutual good will and of a nature to secure the interests of both countries.

He profits of this occasion to renew to Mr. Adams the assurance of his high consideration.

Mr. ADAMS, Secretary of State, &c., &c.

No. 2.

Mr. Adams to the Baron de Tuyll.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 7, 1823.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has submitted to the consideration of the President the note which he had the honor of receiving from the Baron de Tuyll, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, dated the 12th (24th) of the last month.

The undersigned has been directed, in answer to that note, to assure the Baron de Tuyll of the warm satisfaction with which the President receives and appreciates the friendly dispositions of his Imperial Majesty towards the United States; dispositions which it has been, and is, the earnest desire of the American Government to meet with corresponding returns, and which have been long cemented by the invariable friendship and cordiality which have subsisted between the United States and his Imperial Majesty.

Penetrated with these sentiments, and anxiously seeking to promote their perpetuation, the President readily accedes to the proposal that the minister of the United States at the court of his Imperial Majesty should be furnished with powers for negotiating, upon principles adapted to those sentiments, the adjustment of the interests and rights which have been brought into collision upon the Northwest Coast of America, and which have heretofore formed a subject of correspondence between the two Governments, as well at Washington as at St. Petersburg.

The undersigned is further commanded to add that, in pursuing, for the adjustment of the interests in question, this course, equally congenial to the friendly feelings of this nation towards Russia and to their reliance upon the justice and magnanimity of his Imperial Majesty, the President of the United States confides that the arrangements of the cabinet of St. Petersburg will have suspended the possibility of any consequences resulting from the ukase to which the Baron de Tuxill's note refers which could affect the just rights and the lawful commerce of the United States during the amicable discussion of the subject between the Governments respectively interested in it.

The undersigned requests the Baron de Tuxill to accept the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The BARON DE TUXILL,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Russia.

Mr. Adams to Mr. Middleton, No. 16.

INSTRUCTIONS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 22, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor of inclosing, herewith, copies of a note from Baron de Tuxill, the Russian minister, recently arrived, proposing, on the part of his Majesty the Emperor of Russia, that a power should be transmitted to you to enter upon a negotiation with the ministers of his Government concerning the differences which have arisen from the imperial ukase of 4th (16th) September, 1821, relative to the Northwest Coast of America, and of the answer from this Department acceding to this proposal. A full power is accordingly inclosed, and you will consider this letter as communicating to you the President's instructions for the conduct of the negotiation.

From the tenor of the ukase, the pretensions of the Imperial Government extend to an exclusive territorial jurisdiction from the forty-fifth degree of north latitude, on the Asiatic coast, to the latitude of fifty-one north on the western coast of the American continent; and they assume the right of interdicting the navigation and the fishery of all other nations to the extent of one hundred miles from the whole of that coast.

The United States can admit no part of these claims. Their right of navigation and of fishing is perfect, and has been in constant exercise from the earliest times, after the peace of 1783, throughout the whole extent of the Southern Ocean, subject only to the ordinary exceptions and exclusions of the territorial jurisdictions, which, so far as Russian rights are concerned, are confined to certain islands north of the fifty-fifth degree of latitude, and have no existence on the continent of America.

The correspondence between Mr. Poletica and this Department contained no discussion of the principles or of the facts upon which he attempted the justification of the Imperial ukase. This was purposely avoided on our part, under the expectation that the Imperial Government could not fail, upon a review of the measure, to revoke it altogether. It did, however, excite much public animadversion in this country, as the ukase itself had already done in England. I inclose herewith the North American Review for October, 1822, No. 37, which contains an article (p. 370) written by a person fully master of the subject; and for the view of it taken in England, I refer you to the 52d number of the Quarterly Review, the article upon Lieutenant Kotzebue's voyages. From the article in the North American Review it will be seen that the rights of discovery, of occupancy, and of uncontested possession, alleged by Mr. Poletica, are all without foundation in fact.

It does not appear that there ever has been a permanent Russian settlement on this continent, south of latitude 59; that of New Archangel, cited by Mr. Poletica, in latitude 57° 30', being upon an island. So far as prior discovery can constitute a foundation of right, the papers which I have referred to prove that it belongs to the United States as far as 59° north, by the transfer to them of the rights of Spain. There is, however, no part of the globe where the mere fact of discovery could be held to give weaker claims than on the Northwest Coast. "The great sinuosity," says Humboldt, "formed by the coast between the 55th and 60th parallels of latitude embraces discoveries made by Gali, Behring and Tchivikoff, Quadra, Cook, La Perouse, Malespiér and Vancouver. No European nation has yet formed an establishment upon the immense extent of coast from Cape Mendosino to the 59th degree of latitude. Beyond that limit the Russian factories commence, most of which are scattered and distant from each other, like the factories established by the European nations for the last three centuries on the coast of Africa. Most of these little Russian colonies communicate with each other only by sea, and the new denominations of Russian America, or Russian possessions in the new continent, must not lead us to believe that the coast of Behring's bay, the peninsula of Alaska, or the country of the Ischugatschi, have become Russian provinces in the same sense given to the word when speaking of the Spanish provinces of Sonora, or New Biscay."—(Humboldt's New Spain, vol. 2d, book 3d, ch. 8, p. 496.)

In Mr. Poletica's letter of 28th February, 1822, to me, he says that when the Emperor Paul I granted to the present American Company its first charter in 1799, he gave it the exclusive possession of the Northwest Coast of America, which belonged to Russia, from the 55th degree of north latitude, to Behring's Strait.

In his letter of 2d of April, 1822, he says that the charter to the Russian American Company, in 1799, was merely conceding to them a part of the sovereignty, or rather certain exclusive privileges of commerce.

This is the most correct view of the subject. The Emperor Paul granted to the Russian American Company certain exclusive privileges of commerce—exclusive with reference to other Russian subjects; but Russia had never before asserted a right of sovereignty over any part of the North American continent; and in 1799 the people of the United States had been at least for twelve years in the constant and uninterrupted enjoyment of a profitable trade with the natives of that very coast, of which the ukase of the Emperor Paul could not deprive them.

It was in this same year, 1799, that the Russian settlement at Sitka was first made, and it was destroyed in 1802 by the natives of the country. There were, it seems, at the time of its destruction three American seamen, who perished with the rest, and a new settlement at the same place was made in 1804.

In 1808, Count Romanzoff, being then Minister of Foreign Affairs and of Commerce, addressed to Mr. Harris, consul of the United States at St. Petersburg, a letter, complaining of the traffic carried on by citizens of the United States with the native islanders of the Northwest Coast, instead of trading with the Russian possessions in America. The Count stated that the Russian Company had represented this traffic as clandestine, by which means the savage islanders, in exchange for otter skins, had been furnished with fire-arms and powder, with which they had destroyed a Russian fort, with the loss of several lives. He expressly disclaimed, however, any disposition on the part of Russia to abridge this traffic of the citizens of the United States, but proposed a convention by which it should be carried on exclusively with the agents of the Russian American Company at Kodiack, a small island near the promontory of Alaska, at least 700 miles distant from the other settlement at Sitka.

On the 4th of January, 1810, Mr. Daschkoff, Chargé d'Affaires and Consul General from Russia, renewed this proposal of a convention, and requested, as an alternative, that the United States should, by a legislative act, prohibit the trade of their citizens with the natives of the Northwest Coast of America, as unlawful and irregular, and thereby induce them to carry on the trade exclusively with the agents of the Russian American Company. The answer of the Secretary of State, dated the 5th of May, 1810, declines those proposals for reasons which were then satisfactory to the Russian Government, or to which, at least, no reply on their part was made. Copies of these papers, and of those containing the instructions to the minister of the United States then at St. Petersburg, and the relation of his conferences with the chancellor of the empire, Count Romanzoff, on this subject, are herewith inclosed. By them it will be seen that the Russian Government at that time explicitly declined the assertion of any boundary line upon the Northwest Coast, and that the proposal of measures for confining the trade of the citizens of the United States exclusively to the Russian settlement at Kodiack, and with the agents of the Russian American Company, had been made by Count Romanzoff, under the impression that they would be as advantageous to the interests of the United States as to those of Russia.

It is necessary now to say that this impression was erroneous. That the traffic of the citizens of the United States with the natives of the Northwest Coast was neither clandestine nor unlawful nor irregular. That it had been enjoyed many years before the Russian American Company existed, and that it interfered with no lawful right or claim of Russia.

This trade has been shared, also, by the English, French, and Portuguese. In the prosecution of it, the English settlement of Nootka Sound was made, which occasioned the differences between Great Britain and Spain in 1789 and 1790, ten years before the Russian American Company was first chartered.

It was in the prosecution of this trade that the American settlement at the mouth of the Columbia river was made in 1811, which was taken by the British during the late war, and formally restored to them on the 6th of October, 1818. By the treaty of the 22d of February, 1819, with Spain, the United States acquired all the rights of Spain north of latitude 42°; and by the third article of the convention between the United States and Great Britain, of the 20th of October, 1818, it was agreed that any country that might be claimed by either party on the Northwest Coast of America, westward of the Stony mountains, should, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open, for the term of ten years from that date, to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two powers, without prejudice to the claims of either party or of any other State.

You are authorized to propose an article of the same import for a term of ten years from the signature of a joint convention between the United States, Great Britain, and Russia.

The right of the United States from the forty-second to the forty-ninth parallel of latitude on the Pacific Ocean we consider as unquestionable, being founded, first, on the acquisition by the treaty of February 22, 1819, of all the rights of Spain; second, by the discovery of the Columbia river, first from sea, at its mouth, and then by land by Lewis and Clarke; and third, by the settlement at its mouth in 1811. This territory is to the United States of an importance which no possession in North America can be of to any European nation, not only as it is but the continuity of their possessions from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, but as it offers their inhabitants the means of establishing hereafter water communications from the one to the other.

It is not conceivable that any possession upon the continent of North America should be of use or importance to Russia for any other purpose than that of traffic with the natives. This was, in fact, the inducement to the formation of the Russian American Company and to the charter granted them by the Emperor Paul. It was the inducement to the ukase of the Emperor Alexander. By offering free and equal access for a term of years to navigation and intercourse with the natives to Russia, within the limits to which our claims are indisputable, we concede much more than we obtain. It is not to be doubted that, long before the expiration of that time, our settlement at the mouth of the Columbia river will become so considerable as to offer means of useful commercial intercourse with the Russian settlements on the islands of the Northwest Coast.

With regard to the territorial claim, separate from the right of traffic with the natives and from any system of colonial exclusions, we are willing to agree to the boundary line within which the Emperor Paul had granted exclusive privileges to the Russian American Company, that is to say, latitude 55°.

If the Russian Government apprehend serious inconvenience from the illicit traffic of foreigners with their settlements on the Northwest Coast, it may be effectually guarded against by stipulations similar to those, a draft of which is herewith subjoined, and to which you are authorized, on the part of the United States, to agree.

As the British ambassador at St. Petersburg is authorized and instructed to negotiate likewise upon this subject, it may be proper to adjust the interests and claims of the three powers by a joint convention. Your full power is prepared accordingly.

Instructions conformable to these will be forwarded to Mr. Rush at London, with authority to communicate with the British Government in relation to this interest, and to correspond with you concerning it, with a view to the maintenance of the rights of the United States.

I am, &c.,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

HENRY MIDDLETON,

Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, St. Petersburg.

ARTICLE 1. In order to strengthen the bonds of friendship, and to preserve, in future, a perfect harmony and good understanding between the contracting parties, it is agreed that their respective citizens and subjects shall not be disturbed or molested, either in navigating or in carrying on their fisheries in the Pacific Ocean or in the South Seas, or in landing on the coasts of those seas in places not already occupied, for the purpose of carrying on their commerce with the natives of the country; subject, nevertheless, to the restrictions and provisions specified in the two following articles.

ARTICLE 2. To the end that the navigation and fishery of the citizens and subjects of the contracting parties, respectively, in the Pacific Ocean or in the South Seas, may not be made a pretext for illicit trade with their respective settlements, it is agreed that the citizens of the United States shall not land on any part of the coast actually occupied by Russian settlements, unless by permission of the Governor or commander thereof, and that Russian subjects shall, in like manner, be interdicted from landing without permission at any settlement of the United States on the said Northwest Coast.

ARTICLE 3. It is agreed that no settlement shall be made hereafter on the Northwest Coast of America by citizens of the United States or under their authority, nor by Russian subjects, or under the authority of Russia, south of the fifty-fifth degree of north latitude.

JAMES MONROE,

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

To all to whom these presents may come, greeting:

KNOW YE, That, reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity, prudence, and abilities of Henry Middleton, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at the court of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, I have invested him with full and all manner of power, for and in the name of the United States, to meet and confer with any person or persons furnished with like powers on the part of his said Imperial Majesty, and with him or them to negotiate and conclude a convention or conventions, treaty or treaties, of and concerning the commerce and navigation of the two countries; of and concerning their respective rights and claims in respect to navigation, fishery, and commerce, on the Northwest Coast of America and the ocean and islands thereto adjoining or appertaining; of and concerning the abolition of the African slave trade; and of and concerning the principles of maritime war and neutrality. And I do further invest him with full power, also, to meet and confer on the said subjects with any person or persons furnished with like powers on the part of his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; and with the said Russian and British plenipotentiaries jointly to conclude a treaty or treaties, convention or conventions, in relation to the respective rights and claims of the three powers in and to the said navigation, fishery, commerce, and territorial possessions on the said Northwest Coast of America and adjoining ocean and islands; or in relation to the abolition of the African slave trade; or in relation to the principles of maritime war and neutrality; he, the said Henry Middleton, transmitting any and every such convention or treaty, whether concluded jointly with British and Russian, or severally with Russian plenipotentiaries, to the President of the United States, for his ratification, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, if the same shall be given.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the twenty-ninth day of July, anno Domini 1823, and of the Independence of the United States of America the forty-eighth.

No. 3, (b.)

Mr. Daschkoff to Mr. Smith.

[Translation.]

The undersigned, Chargé d'Affaires and Consul General of his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, in conformity with the orders of his Government, has the honor to address to the Secretary of State of the United States the copy of the note of his excellency the Count de Romanzoff, Minister of Foreign Affairs and Commerce of his Imperial Majesty, to Mr. Levett Harris, Consul General of the United States at St. Petersburg, under date of the 17th of May, 1808, and that of Mr. Harris' reply to the Russian minister, relative to the illicit trade carried on by vessels of the United States with the natives of his Imperial Majesty's possessions on the Northwest Coast of America.

The Secretary of State will there perceive that his Majesty the Emperor, ever anxious for the happiness of his people, could not but learn with regret the injurious effects attending the illicit trade of some Americans with the natives of the said possessions of his Imperial Majesty, upon that portion of his subjects who, by their proximity to the United States, might cultivate relations of commerce with their citizens with reciprocal and increasing advantage, if they were properly regulated, and in accordance with the principles of equity and the law of nations.

The undersigned, therefore, prays the Secretary of State to communicate to his excellency the President of the United States the subject of the above note of the minister of his Imperial Majesty. The Russian Government, persuaded of the friendship existing between both States, and assured of their mutual desire to strengthen this connexion, believes that the Government of the United States will not refuse to terminate, by proper and sufficient means, the illicit trade of some American speculators on the Northwest Coast of America and the adjacent islands, by which the security of the subjects of the said possessions of his Imperial Majesty is not only endangered, but has been violated, as also that of many citizens of the United States.

In exhibiting the dangerous consequences of the trade which some Americans carry on in articles contraband of war with the natives of said countries, who, from their savage character, are frequently excited to insurrection, and make use thereof to destroy the establishments and commerce of his Imperial Majesty's subjects, the undersigned cannot refrain from mentioning to the Secretary of State the opinion entertained by the Russian Government in regard to the commercial relations of the United States and the possessions of his Imperial Majesty on the Northwest Coast of America, an opinion which he has frequently found among American merchants.

It consists in the important advantages that might be derived from a law of the Government of the United States which, in drawing off its citizens from an illicit and irregular trade with the natives of the Northwest Coast of America, prejudicial to both nations, would induce them to trade in those countries exclusively with the factory or agents of the Russian Company. The utility of it would be real and reciprocal. By suppressing in this way a small number of adventurers, who, by a trade without regularity, without calculation, with operations committed to chance, may obstruct the progress of mutual relations, and destroy rather than strengthen this rising branch of commerce, it might be expected that these relations would daily become firmer and more extensive, whilst subjected to a certain, judicious and prudent regulation.

If his excellency the President should also be of opinion that the idea suggested by the minister of his Imperial Majesty to the Consul General of the United States, of stipulating, by a convention, the above arrangement of commerce between the United States and the Russian establishments on the Northwest Coast of America, may be carried into effect, as the most proper means of preventing all future complaint, and of strengthening the connexions of amity and good feeling that subsist between the two States, the undersigned has the honor to inform the Secretary of State that he is clothed with the necessary powers for entering upon that negotiation.

The undersigned, requesting the Secretary of State to communicate to him his views of the subject before mentioned, seizes this occasion to renew to the Secretary of State the assurance of his high esteem and distinguished consideration.

ANDRE DE DASCHKOFF.

No. 3, (c.)

Count Romanzoff to Mr. Harris.

[Translation.]

The commercial establishment here, under the name of the American Company, has repeatedly represented to the undersigned, Minister of Foreign Affairs and of Commerce, that the ships of the United States, instead of trading with the Russian possessions in America, have there carried on a clandestine trade with the savages, to whom, in exchange for otter skins, they furnish fire-arms and powder, the use of which, till then unknown to these islanders, has been in their hands very prejudicial to the subjects of his Imperial Majesty.

By means of these arms a Russian fort has been destroyed and a number of persons have lost their lives.

Some citizens of the United States, themselves deceived by an unfortunate carelessness for the offensive means of these savages, have become the victims of the imprudent speculation of their countrymen.

Pursuant to these established facts, the undersigned has been charged by the Emperor, his august master, to communicate them to Mr. Harris, Consul General of the United States, requesting him to make them known to his Government, and to call their serious attention thereto. The care which they take to show the scrupulous connexion of their interests with those of other powers and their respect for the principles of the law of nations induce the hope that this illicit traffic will meet with their disapprobation, and that positive orders will put a stop to it.

Very far, however, from wishing to obstruct the commercial relations between the two nations in the said Russian possessions, his Imperial Majesty, on the contrary, would behold with satisfaction their increase; but, to avoid the pernicious consequences of a clandestine trade with the savages, he would wish that a commerce of exchange were established exclusively at Kodiack, and with the agents of the company. For this purpose, the undersigned, believing that it would be mutually useful to stipulate the above mentioned object by a convention, has the honor to propose the matter to Mr. Harris, as the most proper to remove every successive complaint and to strengthen the bonds of amity and of good understanding which subsist between the two countries; the undersigned anxiously believing that Mr. Harris will do full justice to the personal dispositions which he has uniformly shown, on his part, in either administration, in favor of the commerce of the citizens of the United States.

Requesting, therefore, the Consul General to communicate to him his ideas upon the subject above expressed, the undersigned seizes with pleasure this occasion of renewing to him the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

THE COUNT ROMANZOFF.

*Mr. Smith to Mr. Adams.*DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 5, 1810.

SIR: You will herewith receive copies of a letter from Mr. Daschkoff, and of my answer. They relate, as you will perceive, to a subject of a very delicate character. The Russian Government, it would seem, considers the United States bound to restrain their citizens from trading in warlike articles with the Indians connected with the Russian establishments on the Northwestern Coast of America. This is manifestly an error. If the Indians be under the Russian jurisdiction, the United States are bound only to leave their citizens to the penalties operating within the territorial limits. If the Indians are to be considered as independent tribes inhabiting an independent territory, Russia cannot of right prohibit other nations from trading with them, unless it be in contraband of war, during a state of war, in which case she may enforce the prohibition on the high seas. If the Indians should fall under the character of rebels or insurgents against Russian authority, the same rule may be applicable.

In this view of the subject, the United States being under no legal obligation to comply with the demand of Russia, they cannot otherwise be brought under such obligation than by compact, and whatever disposition they may feel to seek for a foundation for such a compact, in consideration of reciprocity and of friendship, it would be difficult to attain the end in that mode without maintaining a right which this nation has not yet asserted, in opposition to the Spanish claim to the Western Coast of America south of that of Russia, and consequently without a contest unseasonable and premature, at least with the Spaniards.

The United States might, indeed, by a gratuitous regulation, yield to the wishes of the Emperor on this subject, and certainly it would be very agreeable to them to give proofs, on every occasion, of their friendship for his Imperial Majesty. But such a measure is not within the authority of the Executive, and could not well be formally proposed to the Legislature without the usual basis of mutual stipulations.

These remarks may assist you in placing the subject before the Russian Government in a light best fitted to satisfy them. It may be added that, as Russia has the means of enforcing its own rights against those who intrude on the coast possessed by her, or who are carrying implements of war to be used in hostility against her, it cannot be essential that any foreign power should co-operate with her for the purpose.

In explaining the sentiments of the United States on this occasion, it will be advisable for you to bring into view the hopes of the United States that it will be found consistent with the liberal policy of the Emperor to favor a commerce of the Americans in innocent articles, both with the Russians and Indians in that quarter, and even their intercession in the trade between the Russian establishments and China.

As it does not appear how far the Russians stretch their claim southwardly, along the coast, it is material that some latitude should be fixed as the limit, and it is desirable, as the coast south of it will enter into the plan of Indian trade likely to be embraced by our citizens, that the limit should be as little advanced southwardly as may be. It appears, from what passed between Spain and Great Britain, in the affair of Nootka Sound, in the year 1790, that the claim of the former extended to the 60th degree of latitude.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.,

R. SMITH.

A mon depart de Washington vous avez paru desirer de savoir le tems où j'expedierai mon rapport au Ministère Imperial concernant la negociation que j'ai eu l'honneur d'entamer avec vous, a fin d'envoyer à la même époque des instructions relatives à cette affaire à votre ministère, près de ma cour, dans le cas qu'elle puisse se terminer à St. Petersburg.

Je me fais un plaisir de vous informer, monsieur, qu'ayant rencontré, à la fin, un passager d'un bâtiment destiné pour la Russie, à qui je peux confier mes dépêches, et qui doit partir la semaine prochaine, je vais profiter de cette occasion favorable. Si vous desirez que les vôtres parviennent à Monsieur Adams par la même voie, je me charge de les lui faire parvenir avec autant de sûreté, que je peux compter pour les miennes.

J'ai mandé à mon Gouvernement que ma negociation, relative au trafic des Americains des articles de contrebande de guerre avec les naturels dans nos établissemens, a été remise; que Monsieur le President ayant appris que je n'étois pas autorisé de fixer une latitude, au sud de nos établissemens, pour servir de ligne de démarcation au batimens Americains que feroient le commerce de ces côtes, trouve de la difficulté de passer une loi precise par la quelle le trafic de la contrebande doit être prohibé au dé la d'un certain degré; que son excellence n'a pas cru les inconveniens obviés, par la proposition, que j'ai eu l'honneur de vous faire ensuite, de substituer à une latitude nommée la fixation de quelque degrés au dessous de nôtre établissement, situé au sud-est, jusqu'à ce qu'on aura des nouvelles exactes sur sa situation géographique. J'ai aussi informé mon Gouvernement, que Monsieur le President n'a pas jugé d'entrer dans des détails ulterieurs de ma negociation, avant que je ne reçoive des pouvoir plus étendus, ou que mon Gouvernement ne choisisse de la terminer avec vôtre ministère près de sa Majesté Imperiale. Il m'a été très agreable de rendre compte en même tems, au Ministère Imperiale, des assurances reiterées que vous m'avez données des dispositions favorables de son excellence aux desirs de mon Gouvernement.

Je saisis avec empressement cette occasion de vous communiquer, Monsieur, un paragraphe d'une dépêche, datée du 3<sup>e</sup> Novembre, du Ministère des Affaires Etrangères de sa Majesté Imperiale, qui m'est parvenue depuis peu. Je suis persuadé, qu'il ne manquera pas de vous être très agreable.

“L'accueil qu'a fait l'Empereur à Mr. Adams, a dû le convaincre que si sa destination étoit agreable à sa Majesté la choix de sa personne n'y contribuait pas moins. Recommandable par le nom qu'il porte, ainsi que par ses qualités personnelles, ces titres ont été justement appréciés par sa Majesté Imperiale.” Je ne doute pas, Monsieur que son Excellence le President des Etats Unis n'en réssente une satisfaction personnelle de l'attention de sa Majesté l'Empereur à son choix.

Je vous prie de me croire, &c., &c.

[Translation]

PHILADELPHIA, April 24, 1810.

At my departure from Washington you appeared desirous of knowing the time when I was to send my report to the Imperial Ministry concerning the negotiation which I had the honor of commencing with you, in order to send, at the same time, instructions relative to that affair to your minister near my court, in case it could be terminated at St. Petersburg.

I am happy to inform you, sir, that having at last met with a passenger of a ship bound for Russia to whom I can entrust my despatches, and who must depart the ensuing week, I shall take advantage of this favorable opportunity. If you wish to forward yours to Mr. Adams by the same way, I undertake for their reaching him with as much safety as I can reckon on for my own.

I have written to my Government that my negotiation relative to the trade of the Americans in articles of contraband of war with the natives in our establishments has been suspended; that the President, having learned that I was not authorized to fix a latitude to the south of our establishments to serve as a line of demarkation to the American ships which trade on these coasts, finds difficulty in passing a precise law by which the traffic of contraband should be prohibited beyond a certain degree; that his excellency did not think the inconveniences obviated by the proposition which I had afterwards the honor of making to you, of substituting a latitude named, as a boundary, some degrees below our last establishment situated to the southeast, until there should be exact accounts of its geographical situation. I have also informed my Government that the President had determined not to enter into any further details of my negotiations until I should receive more extended powers, or my Government should choose to terminate it with your minister near his Imperial Majesty. I have had very great pleasure in stating, at the same time, to the Imperial Ministry the repeated assurances which you have given me of the favorable dispositions of his excellency to the desires of my Government.

I embrace, with pleasure, sir, this opportunity of communicating to you a paragraph of a despatch, dated November 10, (22,) from the Minister of Foreign Affairs of his Imperial Majesty, which has come to my hand lately. I am persuaded that it will not fail of being very agreeable to you. “The reception which the Emperor has given to Mr. Adams ought to convince him that, if his appointment was agreeable to his Majesty, the choice of his person contributed no less to his pleasure. Commendable by the name which he bears, as well as by his personal qualities, these titles have been justly appreciated by his Imperial Majesty.” I doubt not, sir, that his excellency the President of the United States has received personal satisfaction from the attention of his Majesty the Emperor to his choice.

I pray you to believe me, &c., &c.,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 5, 1810.

SIR: Your letter of the 24th ultimo, which I have had the honor of receiving, has been laid before the President of the United States. Sincerely anxious to foster the friendly relations existing between Russia and the United States, the President will have great satisfaction in any equitable arrangement relative to the traffic of Americans with the natives of the Russian establishments. Your instructions not having authorized you to fix a precise line of demarkation, no definitive adjustment could, therefore, be possibly made. But, had this difficulty been removed, others of a very delicate character would have occurred. These I will now present to your view.

If the Indians be under the Russian jurisdiction the United States are bound only to leave their citizens to the penalties operating within the territorial limits. If the Indians are to be considered as independent tribes, inhabiting an independent territory, Russia cannot, of right, prohibit other nations from trading with them, unless it be in contraband of war in a state of war, in which case she may enforce the prohibition on the high seas. If the Indians should fall under the character of rebels, or insurgents, against Russian authority, the same rule may be applicable. In this view of the subject, the United States being under no legal obligation to comply with the demand of Russia, they cannot otherwise be brought under such obligation than by compact, and whatever disposition they may feel to seek for a foundation for such a compact in consideration of reciprocity and of friendship, it would be difficult to attain the end in that mode without maintaining a right which this nation has not yet asserted, in opposition to the Spanish claim to the Western Coast of America, south of that of Russia, and, consequently, without a contest, unseasonable and premature, at least with the Spaniards. The United States might, indeed, by a gratuitous regulation, yield to the wishes of the Emperor on this subject, and certainly it would be very agreeable to them to give proofs on every occasion of their friendship for his Imperial Majesty. But such a measure is not within the authority of the Executive, and could not well be formally proposed to the Legislature, without the usual basis of mutual stipulations.

The paragraph of the despatch from the Minister of Foreign Affairs of his Imperial Majesty, which you have done me the honor of communicating to me, has afforded the President great satisfaction, as will every circumstance of an aspect auspicious to the lasting good understanding between the two countries.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

ST. PETERSBURG, September 5, 1810.

"The day after I had the honor of receiving the duplicate of your despatches, dated 5th May and 5th June last, I had a conference with the chancellor, Count Romanzoff, in which I mentioned to him that I received those despatches, observing, however, that I was referred by them to other documents which I have not yet received. He said that he had also received despatches from Mr. Daschkoff, stating that his application had been favorably received by the Government of the United States. That this Government had a growing settlement on the Northwest Coast of America, from which a very profitable trade might be carried on to China. They had sent two public ships there, under the command of Captain Krusenstern, which had proceeded from thence to Canton, in China. Canton was a port open to all the nations of Europe; but the Russians, who were specially favored by the Chinese Government, had an exclusive trade with them, carried on at a place called Kiachta. The Chinese had refused to admit Captain Krusenstern, under the cunning pretext, that, as the Russian trade with them had long been carried on overland, with exclusive privileges at Kiachta, they supposed that if the Russians had meant to change the channels of trade they would have given them notice of it. And as they had heard nothing about such vessels coming to Canton beforehand, although they gave themselves out for Russians, the Chinese Government could not tell whether they were such or not, and therefore had refused to receive them. There had been, the Count said, some sheets passed between the two Governments since on the subject, but the convulsed state of Europe, and other objects of so much greater magnitude, had so much absorbed his attention that they had not yet come to any arrangement with them for the admission of Russian vessels at Canton. He had therefore wished that the trade from the Russian settlements on the Northwest Coast of America to China might be carried on by the Americans. And as the settlement itself was in the neighborhood of Indians who were sometimes troublesome and dangerous neighbors to it, he had thought an arrangement might be concerted with the United States under which the Americans might have the trade of the settlement, subject to a restriction not to furnish warlike weapons and materials to the neighboring Indians.

"I told him that I collected from the papers which I had received that Mr. Daschkoff was not specifically instructed as to the limits within which it was wished that this restriction should be extended, and asked him whether he could point them out to me. He said that it would require some consideration, but that their maps included the whole of Nootka Sound and down to the mouth of Columbia river as a part of the Russian possessions. It will be unnecessary for me to say anything further to the Count upon this subject until I shall have received your original despatch, inclosing the copy of Mr. Daschkoff's letter to you containing the proposal on the part of Russia. I do not imagine that it is the Count's serious intention to claim to the mouth of the Columbia river; but perhaps the fixing upon a boundary may present difficulties to the proposed convention which had not been anticipated. In the meantime, the Count manifested no objection to the carrying on of the trade between the settlements by American vessels. And as Russian vessels are not admitted at Canton, it is much for the interest of the settlement that vessels which have access there should come and take their peltries to carry there. This can be done so conveniently and, probably, so cheaply by no others as by the Americans."

Extract of a letter (No. 25) from Mr. Adams to Mr. Smith, Secretary of State, dated,

ST. PETERSBURG, September 30, 1810.

"In the course of a few days I purpose to ask a conference with the chancellor, Count Romanzoff, on the subject referred to in Mr. Daschkoff's letter. The difficulty of fixing upon a boundary within which a prohibition of trade could be stipulated, I suppose, will not easily be removed. I know not whether it had been contemplated when the proposition was first made, but the necessity of fixing upon a line is obvious. Mr. Harris has communicated to me copies of his correspondence with Count Romanzoff and the memorials of the Russian American Company relative to this object. I find by them that the Russian claim, even then, was asserted to the mouth of the Columbia river."

Extract of a letter (No. 27) from Mr. Adams to Mr. Smith, Secretary of State, giving an account of a conference with Count Romanzoff, dated

St. PETERSBURG, October 12, 1810.

"The Count requested me to call upon him, on the 9th instant, at eleven in the forenoon, which I accordingly did. I told him that I had now received from the United States the despatches respecting the proposition which had been made by Mr. Daschkoff, in relation to the trade with the Indians on the Northwest Coast of America; that I was instructed, in the first instance, to declare the sincere and earnest desire of the President of the United States to concur in any measure which might be useful to the Russian dominions, and agreeable to his Imperial Majesty; that some difficulties had occurred to the American Government with regard to the nature of the stipulation which had been suggested as desirable by Mr. Daschkoff. The people of the United States were so extensively engaged in commercial navigation to all parts of the world that the traffic with the Indians on the Northwest Coast could not be prevented, unless by special prohibitions of law—prohibitions which it would seem almost, if not altogether, impracticable to carry fully into execution. The Russians were a nation not so much addicted to navigation as my countrymen, and yet he, the Count, was well aware how ineffectual the prohibitions to send vessels to particular foreign countries were to prevent them from going thither, in fact.

"If such was the experience of this Government, the difficulties must be obviously much greater in preventing a trade so distant with wandering savages, scattered along a coast over several degrees of latitude, having no ports or custom-houses, not even permanent dwelling places, from which it would be possible to collect evidence of any transgression of the law. That even were a convention concluded to prohibit this traffic, the Indians would probably still get their supplies, if not from our vessels, yet from the English, either by water or by land, from the English settlements north of us. And although nothing could be easier than to draw an article of a convention to prohibit the trade, it would indicate a want of frankness and candor in the United States to contract such engagements, and then find them not executed. For, although it should arise from a state of things not within their control, it would be manifest that such a state of things ought to have been considered before the contract was formed. I was, however, instructed to inquire what would be the boundary line within which it was the wish of this Government to extend the prohibition?—a question which I had intimated in a former conference, immediately after receiving your despatches, which first came to hand on this subject.

"The Count answered me that he would render to the Emperor an exact report of the observations I had now made to him; that it was an object concerning which they had no great solicitude. Their first idea had been that this trade with the Indians, especially as to the article of fire-arms, might be as detrimental to the United States themselves as to the Russian settlement, and more so. That in that point of view the United States might find it expedient to issue the prohibition, provided it were compatible with our constitutions. He did not think it possible for those supplies of arms to be furnished to those Indians from the British settlements by land. The distance and the wilderness between them were too wide. A voyage by an American vessel round Cape Horn was much easier, and it was, in fact, by that means that the savages had been furnished with the weapons which they had used against the Russian settlement. He must do the English the justice to say, although they were at war with Russia, he had not received any complaint that the Indians had ever received any supplies from them.

"I told him it was what they were in the constant habit of doing, even when at peace with us, to the Indians within our boundaries, and the Spaniards had formerly done the same.

"With regard to a mutual stipulation, the Count said he must candidly confess there was no basis for it. To engage that the Russians should not thus traffic would be nugatory, as no Russian vessels traded there, and there was no privilege which could be granted for trade with the Russian settlement but which now existed de facto. What might be done at a future period, if the settlement should become an object of important consideration, he could not say; but now the trade of all nations there was perfectly free. As to the fixing of a boundary, it would be most advisable to defer that to some future time, for the sake of avoiding all possible collision, and even every pretext for uneasiness or jealousy. In the present state of the world, the first and strongest wish of his heart was to bring all the civilized nations to pacific dispositions, and most carefully to avoid everything which could strike out a single new spark of discord among them. At any rate, I might be assured of the continuance of the Emperor's amicable dispositions towards the United States."

No. 3, (k.)

Observations on the claim of Russia to territorial possessions on the continent of North America, communicated with Mr. Adam's letter to Mr. Middleton of July 22, 1823.

It is assumed as an indisputable fact, that, before the third and last voyage of Captain Cook, no European settlement had been formed on the Northwest Coast of the American continent north of Cape Mendocino, or of the fortieth degree of north latitude.

The account of that voyage was published under the direction of the British Government in 1784. In the introduction to it, written by Dr. Douglass, Bishop of Salisbury, among the advantages enumerated as derivable to all mankind from the discoveries which had been made in the progress of that undertaking, was the opening of a valuable trade in furs from the Northwest Coast of America, and particularly from King George's or Nootka Sound to China.

This advantage was also pointed out in various passages of the work itself, both by Captain Cook, in the two volumes written by him, and by Captain King, the author of the third and concluding volume.

The only place on the Northwestern American Coast where Captain Cook found a Russian settlement was at Onalashka, one of the Aleutian islands; the principal person of which settlement, Ismaeloff, and the other Russians whom he met there, "affirmed that they knew nothing of the continent of America to the northward."

The first Russian settlement, at Kodiack, was made by Shele koff, in the winter of 1748.—(Coxe's Russian Discoveries, p. 215.) In 1786, the first English trading voyage between the Northwest Coast of America and China was undertaken, and was prosecuted under the command and direction of Lieutenant Meares.

A similar expedition was undertaken in 1787, at Boston, in the United States, whence two vessels, the Washington and Columbia, were despatched. It was by the commander of one of these vessels that the great river of the west was discovered, and from her received its name. Until that time the only European nation which pretended to an exclusive right on the Western Coast of the American continent was SPAIN.

These commercial expeditions, as well as the Russian attempts to make settlements at the northern extremity of the American continent, excited the jealousy of the Spanish Government, and produced the seizure, in May, 1789, of two English vessels at Nootka Sound, by Don Estevan Joseph Martinez, commander of two Spanish vessels-of-war despatched by the Viceroy of Mexico from the port of San Blas, to which place they were taken, but where they were released by order of the Viceroy.

At the time of this seizure the American vessels, the Washington and Columbia, were likewise in the harbor of Nootka Sound, but were not molested by the Spanish commander, Martinez. This difference of treatment between the British and American vessels was alleged to be because the former appeared to be there for the purposes of trade and settlement, while it appeared from the papers of the latter that they were driven there by distress, and only came in to refit.

This transaction gave rise to the remarkable Nootka Sound dispute between Spain and Great Britain, which for some time threatened an immediate war between those two nations.

Martinez had taken possession of the lands at Nootka Sound, upon which Lieutenant Meares had built a temporary habitation, "pulled down the British flag and hoisted the standard of Spain thereon, with such ceremonies as are usual upon such occasions;" declaring at the same time "that all the lands comprised between Cape Horn and the sixtieth degree of north latitude did belong to his Catholic Majesty." This claim was asserted by Spain in all the diplomatic papers of that controversy, the following passages from which prove how erroneous the assertions of Mr. Poletica, in his letter of February 28, 1822, were, that the Spanish Government at that time acknowledged that its possessions ought not to extend beyond the latitude of 42° 50' north. They will also give a very sufficient reason why Martinez gave no disturbance to the Russian colonies and navigators, none of which had then reached within ten degrees of latitude from Nootka Sound.

Extracts from the memorial of the Court of Spain, delivered June 13, 1790, to Mr. Fitzherbert, the British Ambassador at Madrid.—(Annual Register, 1790, p. 294, State Papers.)

"The vast extent of the Spanish territories, navigation, and dominion, on the continent of America, isles and seas, contiguous to the South Sea, are clearly laid down and authenticated by a variety of documents, laws, and formal acts of possession, in the reign of King Charles II. It is also clearly ascertained that, notwithstanding the repeated attempts made by adventurers and pirates on the Spanish coasts of the South Sea and adjacent islands, Spain has still preserved her possessions entire, and opposed with success those usurpations by constantly sending her ships and vessels to take possession of such settlements. By these measures and reiterated acts of possession Spain has preserved her dominion, which she has extended to the borders of the Russian establishments in that part of the world.

"The Viceroy of Peru and New Spain having been informed that these seas had been for some years past more frequented than formerly; that smuggling had increased; that several usurpations prejudicial to Spain and the general tranquillity had been suffered to be made, they gave orders that the Western Coasts of Spanish America and islands and seas adjacent should be more frequently navigated and explored.

"They were also informed that several Russian vessels were upon the point of making commercial establishments upon that coast. At the time that Spain demonstrated to Russia the inconveniences attendant upon such encroachments, she entered upon the negotiation with Russia, upon the supposition that the Russian navigators of the Pacific Ocean had no orders to make establishments within the limits of Spanish America, of which the Spaniards were the first possessors, (limits situated within Prince William's Strait,) purposely to avoid all dissensions, and in order to maintain the harmony and amity which Spain wished to preserve.

"The court of Russia replied, it had already given orders that its subjects should make no settlements in places belonging to other powers, and that if those orders had been violated, and any had been made in Spanish America, they desired the King would put a stop to them in a friendly manner. To this pacific language on the part of Russia, Spain observed that she could not be answerable for what her officers might do at that distance, whose general orders and instructions were not to permit any settlements to be made by other nations on the continent of Spanish America."

"You will pardon me, sir, that I cannot give my assent to the principles laid down in your last letter, as Spain maintains, on the most solid grounds, that the detention of the vessels was made in a port, upon a coast, or in a bay of Spanish America, the commerce and navigation of which belonged, exclusively, to Spain, by treaties with all nations, even England herself. The principles laid down cannot be adapted to the case. The vessels detained attempted to make an establishment at a port where they found a nation actually settled, the Spanish commander at Nootka having, previous to their detention, made the most amicable representations to the aggressors to desist from their purpose."

Extract from the letter of Count Fernan Nunez to Mr. Montmorin, Secretary of the Foreign Department of France, Paris, June 16, 1790.—(Annual Register, page 301, State Papers.)

"I have the honor to address you with this a faithful extract of all the transactions which have hitherto passed between my court and that of London, on the subject of the detention of two English vessels which were seized in the bay of St. Lawrence or Nootka, situated in the fiftieth degree to the north of California, and which were afterwards taken to the port of San Blas.

"You will observe by this relation—

"1. That, by the treaties, demarkations, takings of possession, and the most decided acts of sovereignty, exercised by the Spaniards in these stations from the reign of Charles II, and authorized by that monarch in 1692, the original vouchers for which shall be brought forward in the course of the negotiation, all the coast to the north of the western America, on the side of the South Sea, as far as beyond what is called Prince William's Sound, which is in the sixty-first degree, is acknowledged to belong exclusively to Spain.

"2. That the court of Russia, having been informed of this extent of our boundary, assured the King, my master, without the least delay, of the purity of its intentions in this respect, and added, 'That it was extremely sorry that the repeated orders issued to prevent the subjects of Russia from violating, in the smallest degree, the territory belonging to another power, should have been disobeyed.'

By these papers it is demonstrated—

That, at that time, the claim of Spain to exclusive possession of the Northwest Coast extended beyond Prince William's Sound, in latitude 61.

That the court of Russia had been informed of this extent of the Spanish boundary; had disclaimed any intention of interfering with it, and added expressions of its sorrow that its repeated orders to prevent the subjects of Russia from violating the territory belonging to another power had been disobeyed.

So far was Russia, in 1790, from asserting any claim whatsoever to territory on the continent of North America.

The ground assumed by Great Britain in the Nootka Sound controversy was, that British subjects "had been forcibly interrupted in a trade which they had carried on for years, without molestation, in parts of America where they had an incontrovertible right of trading, and in places to which no country could claim an exclusive right of commerce and navigation;" that "the court of Madrid had advanced a claim to the exclusive right of navigation in those seas that was unfounded and exorbitant, indefinite in its consequences, aiming destruction to the valuable fisheries (of the British subjects) in the southern ocean, and tending to the annihilation of a commerce in its infancy, just beginning to be carried on to the profit of Britain, in hitherto unfrequented parts of the globe."—(Annual Register for 1790, p. 96.)

The result of the contest was, that Spain receded from her claim of exclusive right to navigation, commerce, or territory north of those parts already occupied by Spain, but that wherever settlements, either British or Spanish, had been made since April, 1789, or wherever they should thereafter be made, the subjects of the other party should have free access and should carry on their trade without any disturbance or molestation.

By the convention of October 28, 1790, it was agreed that the buildings and tracts of land situated on the Northwest Coast of the continent of North America, or on the islands adjacent to that continent, of which the subjects of his Britannic Majesty were dispossessed about the month of April, 1789, by a Spanish officer, shall be restored to the said British subjects.

In June, 1794, this restitution was partially effected, but not completely, in consequence of a disagreement between the Spanish officer, Quadra, and Captain Vancouver, as to the extent of the order of restitution in the letter from Count Florida Blanca.

At that time it was ascertained by Captain Vancouver that the extremest eastern Russian settlement on the Northwest Coast was at Port Etches, on Hinchinbrook island, latitude 60, in Prince William's Sound.

In 1799 the settlement at New Archangel was first made.

The Spanish settlement at Nootka Sound was undoubtedly made with the view to maintain the claim of that nation to the exclusive possession of the whole Northwest Coast. Its abandonment in 1794 was reluctant, and with pretensions, still retained, that the exclusive right of Spain, recognized in the 5th article of the convention of the 28th of October, 1790, extended to the immediate vicinity of that spot. Vancouver refused to receive the restoration upon the terms on which it was offered. He received it as a Spanish settlement, and it was abandoned by both nations.

The first purchases of lands from the native inhabitants of the Northwest Coast were made by the adventurers in the Washington and Columbia. They were made at Nootka, and from the chief, Maquinna.

The principle upon which the convention between Great Britain and Spain of October 28, 1790, was concluded was, that the Northwest Coast of America, north of the Spanish settlements actually made, could not be considered as the exclusive property of any European nation. It has been seen that Russia, so far from claiming any such exclusive property at that time, had just before, in substance, admitted that of Spain to beyond Prince William's Sound, in latitude sixty-one.

The only object of present interest, for which all these settlements on the Northwest Coast have been made, whether by Russians, English, or Americans, has been the traffic with the native inhabitants in furs, for the Chinese market. This trade has, in point of fact, not only been enjoyed by the citizens of the United States, but has been prosecuted by them to a greater extent than by all the others together. It has been combined with a trade in sandal wood from the Sandwich Islands to China; and during the long wars in which Europe was involved, from 1790 to 1815, it was left almost entirely to them.

In 1816 a Russian settlement was made at Atooi, one of the Sandwich Islands, and another near the coast of California, within a few leagues of San Francisco, the most northern Spanish settlement. If the motive of these establishments was to lay the foundation for an exclusive territorial claim of Russia to the Northwest Coast, down to the very borders of California, and, founded thereon, to assert exclusive rights of trading with the natives of the Northwest Coast, and to navigation and fishery in the Pacific Ocean, it is time for the nations whose rights and interests are affected by this project effectually to interpose.

There can, perhaps, be no better time for saying, frankly and explicitly, to the Russian Government, that the future peace of the world, and the interest of Russia herself, cannot be promoted by Russian settlements upon any part of the American Continent. With the exception of the British establishments north of the United States, the remainder of both the American continents must henceforth be left to the management of American hands. It cannot possibly be the purpose of Russia to form extensive colonial establishments in America. The new American Republics will be as impatient of a Russian neighbor as the United States; and the claim of Russia to territorial possession, extending to the 51st degree of north latitude, is equally incompatible with the British pretensions.

These observations, thus supported by reference to indisputable documents, are made with a view to the following conclusion:

That the United States can in nowise admit the right of Russia to exclusive territorial possession on any part of the continent of North America south of the 60th degree of north latitude.

That they will maintain the right of their citizens, enjoyed without interruption since the establishment of their independence, of free trade with the original natives of the Northwest Coast throughout its whole extent.

That the right of navigation and of fishing in the Pacific Ocean, even upon the Asiatic coast, north of latitude forty-five, can as little be interdicted to them as that of traffic with the natives of North America.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 22, 1823.

SIR: Among the subjects of negotiation with Great Britain which are pressing upon the attention of this Government is the present condition of the Northwest Coast of this Continent. This interest is connected, in a manner becoming from day to day more important, with our territorial rights; with the whole system of our intercourse with the Indian tribes; with the boundary relations between us and the British North American dominions; with the fur trade; the fisheries in the Pacific Ocean; the commerce with the Sandwich Islands and China; with our boundary upon Mexico; and, lastly, with our political standing and intercourse with the Russian empire.

By the third article of the convention between the United States and Great Britain of October 20, 1818, it is agreed that any "country that may be claimed by either party on the Northwest Coast of America, westward of the Stony mountains, shall, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open, for the term of ten years from the date of the signature of the convention, to the vessels, citizens and subjects of the two powers: it being well understood that this agreement is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claims which either of the two high contracting parties may have to any part of the said country, nor shall it be taken to affect the claims of any other power or State to any part of the said country, the only object of the high contracting parties in that respect being to prevent disputes and differences amongst themselves."

On the 6th of October, 1818, fourteen days before the signature of this convention, the settlement at the mouth of Columbia river had been formally restored to the United States by order of the British Government.—(Message of the President of the United States to the House of Representatives, April 15, 1822, page 13. Letter of Mr. Prevost to the Secretary of State of November 11, 1818.)

By the treaty of amity, settlement and limits between the United States and Spain, of February 22, 1819, the boundary line between them was fixed at the forty-second degree of latitude, from the source of the Arkansas river to the South Sea. By which treaty the United States acquired all the rights of Spain north of that parallel.

The right of the United States to the Columbia river, and to the interior territory washed by its waters, rests upon its discovery from the sea and nomination by a citizen of the United States; upon its exploration to the sea by Captains Lewis and Clarke; upon the settlement of Astoria, made under the protection of the United States, and thus restored to them in 1818; and upon this subsequent acquisition of all the rights of Spain, the only European power who, prior to the discovery of the river, had any pretensions to territorial rights on the Northwest Coast of America.

The waters of the Columbia river extend by the Multnomah to the forty-second degree of latitude, where its source approaches within a few miles of those of the Platte and Arkansas, and by Clarke's river to the fiftieth or fifty-first degree of latitude; thence, descending southward, till its sources almost intersect those of the Missouri.

To the territory thus watered, and immediately contiguous to the original possessions of the United States, as first bounded by the Mississippi, they consider their right to be now established by all the principles which have ever been applied to European settlements upon the American hemisphere.

By the ukase of the Emperor Alexander, of the 4th (16th) of September, 1821, an exclusive territorial right on the Northwest Coast of America is asserted as belonging to Russia, and as extending from the northern extremity of the continent to latitude 51°, and the navigation and fishery of all other nations are interdicted by the same ukase to the extent of one hundred Italian miles from the coast.

When Mr. Poletica, the late Russian minister here, was called upon to set forth the grounds of right conformable to the laws of nations which authorized the issuing of this decree, he answered in his letters of February 28 and April 2, 1822, by alleging, first, discovery, occupancy, and uninterrupted possession.

It appears, upon examination, that these claims have no foundation in fact. The right of discovery, on this continent, claimable by Russia, is reduced to the probability that, in 1741, Captain Tchirikoff saw from the sea the mountain called St. Elias, in about the 59th degree of north latitude. The Spanish navigators, as early as 1582, had discovered as far north as 57° 30'.

As to occupancy, Captain Cook, in 1779, had the express declaration of Mr. Ismaeloff, the chief of the Russian settlement at Onalashka, that they knew nothing of the continent in America; and in the Nootka Sound controversy between Spain and Great Britain it is explicitly stated in the Spanish documents that Russia had disclaimed all pretension to interfere with the Spanish exclusive rights to beyond Prince William's Sound, latitude 61°. No evidence has been exhibited of any Russian settlement on this continent south and east of Prince William's Sound to this day, with the exception of that in California, made in 1816.

It never has been admitted by the various European nations which have formed settlements in this hemisphere that the occupation of an island gave any claim whatever to territorial possessions on the continent to which it was adjoining. The recognized principle has rather been the reverse, as, by the law of nature, islands must be rather considered as appendages to continents than continents to islands.

The only color of claim alleged by Mr. Poletica which has an appearance of plausibility is that which he asserts as an authentic fact: "that in 1789 the Spanish packet St. Charles, commanded by Captain Haro, found in the latitude 48° and 49° Russian settlements, to the number of eight, consisting, in the whole, of twenty families and 462 individuals." But, more than twenty years since, Heurieu had shown, in his introduction to the voyage of Marchaud, that in this statement there was a mistake of at least ten degrees of latitude, and that, instead of 48° and 49°, it should read 58° and 59°. This is probably not the only mistake in the account. It rests altogether upon the credit of two private letters—one written from San Blas, and the other from the city of Mexico, to Spain—there communicated to a French consul in one of the Spanish ports, and by him to the French Minister of Marine. They were written in October, 1788, and August, 1789. We have seen that in 1790 Russia explicitly disclaimed interfering with the exclusive rights of Spain to beyond Prince William's Sound in latitude 61°; and Vancouver, in 1794, was informed by the Russians on the spot that their most eastern settlement there was on Hitchinbrook island, at Port Etches, which had been established in the course of the preceding summer, and that the adjacent continent was a sterile and uninhabited country.

Until the Nootka Sound contest Great Britain had never advanced any claim to territory upon the Northwest Coast of America by right of occupation. Under the treaty of 1763 her territorial rights were bounded by the Mississippi.

On the 22d of July, 1793, McKenzie reached the shores of the Pacific by land from Canada, in latitude 52° 21' north, longitude 128° 2' west of Greenwich.

It is stated in the 52d number of the Quarterly Review, in the article upon Kotzebue's voyage, "that the whole country, from latitude 56° 30' to the boundary of the United States, in latitude 48°, or thereabouts, is now and has long been in the actual possession of the British Northwest Company;" that this company have a post on the borders of a river in latitude 54° 30' north, longitude 125° west, and that, in latitude 55° 15' north, longitude 129° 44' west, "by this time (March, 1822) the United Company of the Northwest and Hudson's Bay have, in all probability, formed an establishment."

It is not imaginable that, in the present condition of the world, any European nation should entertain the project of settling a colony on the Northwest Coast of America. That the United States should form establishments there, with views of absolute territorial right and inland communication, is not only to be expected, but is pointed out by the finger of nature, and has been for many years a subject of serious deliberation in Congress. A plan has, for several sessions, been before them for establishing a Territorial Government on the borders of the Columbia river. It will undoubtedly be resumed at their next session, and even if then again postponed there cannot be a doubt that, in the course of a very few years, it must be carried into effect.

As yet, however, the only useful purpose to which the Northwest Coast of America has been or can be made subservient to the settlements of civilized men are the fisheries on its adjoining seas and trade with the aboriginal inhabitants of the country. These have, hitherto, been enjoyed in common by the people of the United States, and by the British and Russian nations. The Spanish, Portuguese and French nations have also participated in them hitherto, without other annoyance than that which resulted from the exclusive territorial claims of Spain, so long as they were insisted on by her.

The United States and Great Britain have both protested against the Russian Imperial ukase of September 4, (16,) 1821. At the proposal of the Russian Government, a full power and instructions are now transmitted to Mr. Middleton, for the adjustment, by amicable negotiation, of the conflicting claims of the parties on this subject.

We have been informed by the Baron de Tuijl that a similar authority has been given on the part of the British Government to Sir Charles Bagot.

Previous to the restoration of the settlement at the mouth of Columbia river in 1818, and again upon the first introduction in Congress of the plan for constituting a Territorial Government there, some disposition was manifested by Sir Charles Bagot and by Mr. Canning to dispute the right of the United States to that establishment, and some vague intimation was given of British claims on the Northwest Coast. The restoration of the place and the convention of 1818 were considered as a final disposal of Mr. Bagot's objections, and Mr. Canning declined committing to paper those which he had intimated in conversation.

The discussion of the Russian pretensions in the negotiation now proposed necessarily involves the interests of the three powers, and renders it manifestly proper that the United States and Great Britain should come to a mutual understanding with respect to their respective pretensions, as well as upon their joint views with reference to those of Russia. Copies of the instructions to Mr. Middleton are, therefore, herewith transmitted to you, and the President wishes you to confer freely with the British Government on the subject.

The principles settled by the Nootka Sound convention of October 28, 1790, were—

1st. That the rights of fishery in the South Seas, of trading with the natives of the Northwest Coast of America, and of making settlements on the coast itself for the purposes of that trade, north of the actual settlements of Spain, were common to all the European nations, and of course to the United States.

2d. That so far as the actual settlements of Spain had extended, she possessed the exclusive rights, territorial, and of navigation and fishery, extending to the distance of ten miles from the coasts so actually occupied.

3d. That on the coasts of South America, and the adjacent islands south of the parts already occupied by Spain, no settlement should thereafter be made either by British or Spanish subjects, but on both sides should be retained the liberty of landing, and of erecting temporary buildings for the purposes of the fishery. These rights were, also, of course, enjoyed by the people of the United States.

The exclusive rights of Spain to any part of the American continents have ceased. That portion of the convention, therefore, which recognizes the exclusive colonial rights of Spain on these continents, though confirmed as between Great Britain and Spain, by the first additional article to the treaty of the 5th of July, 1814, has been extinguished by the fact of the independence of the South American nation and of Mexico. Those independent nations will possess the rights incident to that condition, and their territories, will, of course, be subject to no exclusive right of navigation in their vicinity, or of access to them by any foreign nation.

A necessary consequence of this state of things will be, that the American continents, henceforth, will no longer be subjects of colonization. Occupied by civilized independent nations, they will be accessible to Europeans and to each other on that footing alone, and the Pacific Ocean in every part of it will remain open to the navigation of all nations, in like manner with the Atlantic.

Incidental to the condition of national independence and sovereignty, the rights of anterior navigation of their rivers will belong to each of the American nations within its own territories.

The application of colonial principles of exclusion, therefore, cannot be admitted by the United States as lawful upon any part of the Northwest Coast of America, or as belonging to any European nation. Their own settlements there, when organized as Territorial Governments, will be adapted to the freedom of their own institutions, and, as constituent parts of the Union, be subject to the principles and provisions of their constitution.

The right of carrying on trade with the nations throughout the Northwest Coast they cannot renounce. With the Russian settlements at Kodiack, or at New Archangel, they may fairly claim the advantage of a free trade, having so long enjoyed it unmolested, and because it has been and would continue to be as advantageous at least to those settlements as to them. But they will not contest the right of Russia to prohibit the traffic, as strictly confined to the Russian settlement itself, and not extending to the original natives of the coast.

If the British Northwest and Hudson's Bay Companies have any posts on the coast, as suggested in the article of the Quarterly Review above cited, the third article of the convention of October 20, 1818, is applicable to them. Mr. Middleton is authorized by his instructions to propose an article of similar import, to be inserted in a joint convention between the United States, Great Britain, and Russia, for a term of ten years from its signature. You are authorized to make the same proposal to the British Government, and, with a view to draw a definite line of demarkation for the future, to stipulate that no settlement shall hereafter be made on the Northwest Coast or on any of the islands thereto adjoining by Russian subjects south of latitude 55°, by citizens of the United States north of latitude 51°, or by British subjects either south of 51° or north of 55°. I mention the latitude of 51°, as the bound within which we are willing to limit the future settlement of the United States, because it is not to be doubted that the Columbia river branches as far north as 51°, although it is most probably not the Taconesche Tesse of Mackenzie. As, however, the line already runs in latitude 49° to the Stony mountains, should it be earnestly insisted upon by Great Britain, we will consent to carry it in continuance on the same parallel to the sea. Copies of this instruction will likewise be forwarded to Mr. Middleton, with whom you will freely, but cautiously, correspond on this subject, as well as in relation to your negotiation respecting the suppression of the slave trade.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your very humble obedient servant,
JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, London.*

ST. PETERSBURG, September 19, 1823.

Sir: I have the honor to acquaint you that Count Nesselrode, on the morning of the day in which he left St. Petersburg for Odessa, addressed me the note of which copy is herewith sent. He mentioned to me some days previously having had advices from Baron Tuyll, intimating that the negotiation upon the subject of the ukase of September, 4, (16,) 1821, would be transferred to this place.

Sir Charles Bagot likewise has communicated to me instructions he has received from his Government, in which a joint negotiation appears to be in contemplation of the British minister. Sir Charles at the same time informed me that Mr. Canning eagerly caught at the proposition of Mr. Rush going to that effect; and that instructions from you, correlative to those of the British Government, would undoubtedly be sent me. I have told him that I do not as yet know anything of the intentions of my Government upon that head, having received no despatch from the Department of State later than that brought by Mr. Pinkney. Upon Sir Charles's expressing his wish to be informed respecting the actual state of the northwest question between the United States and Russia, so far as it might be known to me, I saw no objection to making a confidential communication to him of the note of Count Nesselrode, dated August 1, 1822, by which, in fact, staying the execution of the ukase above mentioned, Russia has virtually abandoned the pretensions therein advanced. I learned in this conversation with the British ambassador that up to that time he had done nothing upon the subject further than telling Count Nesselrode that Great Britain would probably, at some future day, feel obliged to object to some of the provisions of this ukase. The reply made to him was, that in such case the matter must be made the subject of a negotiation.

I am in daily expectation of learning what arrangements the President may have been pleased to direct. Mr. Poletica, who is charged by the Imperial Government with the laboring oar upon this occasion, is not unfrequently inquiring whether there are yet any instructions received which might authorize the conferences invited by Count Nesselrode.

I have the honor to be, sir, very faithfully, your obedient servant,
HENRY MIDDLETON.

ST. PETERSBURG, August 22, 1823.

Sir: On quitting St. Petersburg, the Emperor charged me to announce to you that, as he had given me orders to follow him on his journey, he had authorized Mr. Poletica, Actual Counsellor of State, to begin with you, sir, the conferences relative to the differences which have arisen between Russia and the United States, in consequence of the new regulation given to the Russian American Company by the ukase of his Imperial Majesty, dated September 4, (16,) 1821.

These conferences will have for their aim to prepare the way for the definitive adjustment of these differences, and I doubt not they will facilitate this result so eagerly desired by the Emperor.

I seize with pleasure the occasion which is offered to me of repeating to you, sir, the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

NESSELRODE.

ST. PETERSBURG, October 5, (17,) 1823.

SIR: I avail myself of the sailing of the last American vessel in port to send a duplicate of my last despatch, and to acknowledge the receipt of yours, numbered 15, 16, and 17, brought to hand yesterday, in the afternoon, by Mr. Hughes, who has been detained much beyond his original calculation by his own account. The delay, however, is not much to be regretted, as nothing important can be done here during the absence of the Emperor from this residence, where he cannot be expected to return before November.

I have only to add, that the different subjects embraced in these despatches shall receive my best attention, and that no endeavor shall be wanting on my part to carry into effect the intentions of the President.

I have the honor to be, sir, very faithfully, your obedient servant,

HY. MIDDLETON.

Extract of a letter (No. 32) from Mr. Middleton to Mr. Adams, dated

ST. PETERSBURG, November 1, (15,) 1823.

"Shortly after the receipt of the instructions contained in No. 16 I had several conferences with Mr. Poletica, as well as with Sir Charles Bagot, upon the subject referred to in that despatch. I found that the first named of these gentlemen had no powers to conclude anything, and that he was merely authorized to hold des pour parler, in other words, to discuss the matter. I very soon discovered, too, that a very great divergence of opinion between him and me upon all points relative to the Northwest question must render fruitless all attempts at coming to an understanding with him. I was not sorry, therefore, when an incident enabled me to decline further conference until it could be renewed with a better prospect of success. Sir Charles, upon referring to his full power, of which a copy is herewith sent,* discovered that it had only relation to the maritime question. It became necessary, then, to remedy this before he could proceed in the business; and accordingly a special messenger was despatched by him for the purpose of obtaining the requisite full powers. I availed myself of the circumstances to decline further conference with Mr. de Poletica, and all proceedings remain suspended until an answer to Sir Charles' despatches can be received, which may be expected about the middle of December. I am hopeful, from the conversations I have had with him, that a perfect understanding respecting the common objects desirable to be attained by the two countries in this negotiation will be effected through him. In the meantime I have prepared a confidential memoir upon the Northwest question, to be ready against the return of the Emperor."

ST. PETERSBURG, December 1, (13,) 1823.

"I have prepared, and shall deliver in on the first fit occasion, for his Imperial Majesty's inspection, a confidential memoir on the Northwest question; and I now forward a copy of it, marked (a.) The subject must be trite to you; but I have found here that it is indispensable to make some statement of facts and principles in this case, before I can proceed further in the negotiation. I hope you will approve of the course I am pursuing, and that you will find that I have stated correctly both facts and principles. I felt it to be necessary to broach the subject in this mode, knowing the erroneous impressions which prevail. I have now great hopes, notwithstanding the unfavorable appearances which this affair has worn for a few weeks past, that it may take a new turn, and that I may yet be enabled to succeed in attaining the main objects of the negotiation.

"Sir Charles Bagot is now daily expecting the return of his messenger with new powers and instructions respecting the same matters. I mentioned in my last, and I now repeat, that I have a reasonable expectation that he will be instructed to pursue the course of policy so obviously pointed out by the true interests of England and suggested by a sense of the propriety of being consistent, and of persevering in the principles which marked the Nootka Sound contestation. Neither he nor I foresee any difficulty in reconciling and adjusting the interests of our respective countries upon this question."

CONFIDENTIAL MEMORIAL.

"Great men never fear the truth, and wish nothing to be concealed from them."—(Montesquieu.)

Observations upon the rights and claims of Spain, of Russia, of England, and of the United States, relative to the West Coast of North America; and upon the Ukase of September 4, (16,) 1821.

The part of the New World situated towards the north of the great ocean has been explored and known very much later than any other portion of the same continent in the torrid and temperate zones, by reason of its greater distance from Europe, whose navigators can only arrive thither by doubling Cape Horn or that of the Good Hope.

* See document marked 10, b.

Yet Spain, about the end of the sixteenth century and in the course of the seventeenth, had pushed her discoveries even in these remote regions; and already, in 1692, claimed the exclusive property of the coasts which she had there discovered, in virtue of grants made by an authority respected at the time, and which continued to be so until she acquired the right of prescription over these possessions.

About this last time, but a little later, in 1697, the Russians penetrated by Siberia as far as Kamtschatka; and from thence, embarking at the ports of Okhotsk and Avatcha, between the years 1710 and 1741, they pushed their discoveries in the northern latitudes of the great ocean. From these discoveries Russia derives her rights to that long chain of islands intervening between the western and the eastern continents, and even to a very considerable portion of the continent of America—rights which have never been contested.

Although the navigators of England, from Drake, in 1578, to Cook and Vancouver, that is, for more than two centuries, had frequently visited these coasts, either to make discoveries there or for trade, yet she never announced having any pretensions there whatever until in the year 1790, when a very sharp dispute broke out with Spain relative to Nootka Sound.

The summary of what passed between the courts of England, Spain and Russia at the time of the discussion of that question may serve to throw light upon the respective pretensions of these powers.

This difference arose from the seizure of an English vessel from Macao to trade for peltries. After the discoveries of Cook, in 1778, Nootka began to be considered as the principal market for furs of the Northwest Coast of America, and the enormous profits of this trade had, after some time, brought thither a great number of European and American navigators.

The court of Madrid, fearing lest the English or Russians should attempt to fix themselves at Nootka, had given order to form an establishment there. Mr. Martinez, charged with that order, arrived in this port on the 5th of May, 1789. He found there, in fact, one English ship, one Portuguese and two American. He seized all four. Two months after the English ship Argonaut arrived, under the command of Captain Colnet. He imparted to the Spanish commander the order of his Government, of which he was the bearer, to establish a factory at that place, and there to build a frigate and a schooner, in order henceforth to prevent every other European nation from taking part in the fur trade.

Martinez represented in vain that, long before Cook, Perez had first anchored in this port. The dispute grew warm between the two officers, and Martinez, to make good his title of priority, caused to be arrested Colnet, and sent him prisoner to San Blas.

It is unnecessary to the object of these observations to pursue the discussion which took place between the courts of London and Madrid in consequence of the act of Martinez. It will be sufficient to refer to note (a) for some particulars of this subject, and to cite here the letter of Count Fernan Nunez to M. de Montmorin, Secretary of the Department of Foreign Affairs of France, under date of June 15, 1790:

"I have the honor of addressing to you below a faithful extract of all the transactions between my court and that of London, on the subject of the detention of two English ships, which were seized in the bay of St. Lawrence or Nootka, situated to the north of California, under the 50th degree of latitude.

"By this relation you will be enabled to judge: 1st, That, by treaties, boundary lines, taking possession, and by all the most decided acts of sovereignty exercised by the Spaniards upon these regions, from the reign of Charles II, and authorized by that monarch in 1692, the proofs of which will be produced in the course of this negotiation, all the Northwest Coast of America on the side of the Pacific Ocean, as far as to the other side of what is called Prince William's Sound, under the 61st degree of latitude, is recognized as belonging exclusively to Spain. 2dly, That the court of Russia, having had knowledge of this extent of our limits, did not hesitate to give assurances to the King, my master, of the purity of his intentions on this subject; and added, that he regretted exceedingly that the repeated orders given to prevent the violation of the territory of a foreign power by the subjects of Russia had been disobeyed."

It is proved by the pieces produced in this discussion that the claims of Spain extended to the other side of Prince William's Sound, situated in the 61st degree of north latitude; and that the court of Russia, having had information of the extent of these limits, has declared that she had no intention of opposing it; that she had even added expressions of regret that her repeated orders to prevent the violation of the territory of Spain by Russian subjects should have been disobeyed.

It is then demonstrated that Russia, in the year 1790, was far from forming any territorial claim for herself upon the continent of North America, on this side of the 61st degree of north latitude.

The principle upon which England insists is, that the Northwest Coast of America, north of the actual establishments of Spain, ought not to be deemed to belong exclusively to any European.

Thus England did not, like Russia, admit the exclusive claims of Spain as far as the 61st degree; and it appears that, in consequence, she took for the basis of her stipulations in the treaty of the 28th of October, 1790, the principle that the rights of freely navigating and fishing in the Pacific Ocean, and of trading with the natives of the coasts, by landing in the unoccupied places and there making establishments, are common to all nations. The 5th article, moreover, stipulates that in all parts of the Northwest Coast of North America, or of the adjacent islands, situated to the north of the parts of said coast occupied by the Spaniards before the month of April, 1789, as well in the places restored as in those where the subjects of one of the two powers shall come to form establishments, the subjects of the other shall have free access, and shall carry on their trade without trouble or molestation. Besides, several other articles of immediate interest to the two nations, but which involve no general principle, were agreed on.

From what precedes, it will be readily perceived what was the relative position of the three powers in their claims upon the Northwest Coast of America in the year 1790. Russia confined herself on the other side of the 60th degree of north latitude, whilst Spain and England had conventionally fixed their respective rights in all the parts of the Northwest Coast situated from the last establishments of Spain to the south of Cape Mendocino, to the 60th degree, inclusive.

Nine years after, the Emperor Paul granted to the Russian American Company (see note b) certain exclusive privileges of commerce on these coasts as far as the 55th degree of north latitude, (see note c,) exclusive, it must be believed, in respect to other Russian subjects simply; for Russia had never claimed sovereignty of the part of this coast situated on this side of the 60th degree, to which, on the contrary, she had recognized the rights of Spain; and in the year 1799 several nations, and especially the United States of America, for more than twelve years had pursued a free and uninterrupted trade with the natives of this coast, from which, consequently, the ukase of that State neither ought nor could exclude them.

It is difficult to be convinced of the fact that such was the intention of the ukase when attention is paid to the declaration of Russia (known to all Europe) of which we have made mention before.

Yet, to be enabled to judge if the claim of having exclusive rights upon all the coast, even to the 55th degree, could be justified by facts, it may be useful to take a hasty review of the discoveries of Russia in the Eastern Ocean as to them, and, for this purpose, let us refer to note d, partly extracted from the work of M. Levesque.

It appears by this extract that Behring and Tschirikoff are the only Russian navigators who touched at the continent of America, on this side of the 60th degree, previous to the year 1790; and it is even on this sole circumstance that a foundation was made for forming a claim to the discovery and the possession of this coast. It is alleged "that in 1789 the Spanish packet San Carlos, commanded by Captain de Haro, found, in latitude 48° to 49°, Russian establishments to the number of eight, making in all twenty families, or 468 individuals." But it may be answered, that it is more than twenty years since M. de Fleurieu demonstrated, in the learned historical introduction to the voyage of Captain Marchaud, that there must be in this recital an error of ten degrees of latitude at least, and that, instead of 48° to 49°, it ought to read 58° to 59°. It is even very probable that that is not the only error which is in the relation, for that story originates from two private letters, the one written from San Blas, the other from Mexico, communicated to a French consul in one of the ports of Spain, and by him to the Minister of Marine in France. The dates are, October, 1788, and August, 1789. Now, we have just seen that in the following year Russia confirmed the rights of Spain as far as the other side of Prince William's Sound, in the latitude 61 degrees. It can scarcely, then, be necessary to lay more stress upon the trifling importance of the alleged circumstance.

It appears that Tschirikoff never landed, but having approached the coast without knowing if it were the continent or an island, and having successively sent his long-boat, and then his canoe, he lost both, together with the men who were in them, whom he believed to be massacred by the natives of the country, and then he returned to Kamtschatka. Behring, on his part, discovered and examined the bay (strait) which bears his name.

Captain Vancouver learned, in 1794, from the Russians themselves, upon the spot, that their most easterly establishment was then at port Eches, in Hinckin Brook island, (Tchatcha island of the Russians, and Magdalena of the Spaniards, in latitude 60° 25') where they were established the preceding summer; and that the continent in the vicinity of that place was barren and uninhabited.

From these facts, incontestibly proved by historical documents, an irresistible conclusion follows, which agrees with the declaration of Russia in 1790; and it ought to appear definitive that she had no right to claim, either under the title of discovery or of possession, on the continent east or south of Behring's Strait, about the 60th degree of north latitude.

Moreover, the note (e) on the diplomatic communications between the Government of the United States and Russia, on this subject, will make known what were the ideas of the Imperial Minister during the year 1810. It will be perceived, by the recital of what passed in the conferences of September and October of that year, that the Imperial Government was then undecided what side it should have taken definitively, for foreign commerce, on the Northwest Coast, either Russian or Spanish, of North America. It will also be remarked, that the Government of the United States had, till then, principally insisted on the difficulty of pronouncing in a case where Spain ought to have claims. This scruple proves, at least, how attentive it was not to do prejudice to the right of a third.

In expectation of the decision which thus remained in suspense, the commerce of the United States increased very considerably in these latitudes. It is easy to prove, even by the authority of Russian voyagers, what the extent of this commerce was. Among others, Mr. Lisianski had remarked, from the year 1804, that the Russians could collect as many as eight thousand otters' skins annually, in the bay of Sitka, if they had the means of excluding the Americans from this trade; whilst at that time they only took from thence about three thousand.—(See page 236, English edition.) It will be sufficient to add, that in the last years there has been sent from the ports of the United States, in the season for trade on the Northwest Coast, as many as seventeen merchant vessels, which are for the most part in the habit of trading in China with the cargoes which they obtain on this coast, and in the islands of the Pacific Ocean.

It is now time to consider what can be the foundations of the territorial claims of the United States of America upon the Northwest Coast of their continent. Their bordering position to one part of that coast gives them a much greater importance for themselves than for any of the powers of Europe. The territory situated west of the ancient provinces of the United States presents to them contiguity of possessions from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, and will afford their inhabitants the means of establishing communications of internal navigation from the one sea to the other.

The two ships which had been seized by Martinez were released by him, to continue the navigation which they had attempted round the globe. During this voyage the sloop Columbia anchored the first in a great river, which had been but imperfectly discovered by Quadra, and which Vancouver was unable to find again, but which is since known under the name of Columbia. An establishment has been since formed at its mouth, under the protection of the United States, whose Government has also sent by land, for the same destination, a military expedition under the command of Captains Lewis and Clarke. These officers have visited and explored the country surrounding this river and its tributaries, and have published a chorographical account of it.

During the last war between the United States and Great Britain the fort situated at the mouth of the river was given up to the English, but they afterwards restored it to the United States, under the stipulation of the first article of the treaty of peace.

To the rights acquired by that possession, situated on the coast of the continent under 46° 15' of north latitude, and contiguous to their ancient territory, the United States have joined those which they derive from the treaty of limits with Spain, signed at Washington, February 22, 1819. By the third article of this treaty his Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States all his rights, claims, and pretensions to the territories situated to the north of the 42d parallel of latitude, from the source of the river Arkansas to the great ocean.

It may be useful to remark here that the establishment at Nootka has been abandoned both by Spain and by England; and that it appears probable that these two nations have not now any possession upon the Northwest Coast between the 42d and the 60th degrees of north latitude.

The Russians have an establishment upon the island of Sitka,* in latitude 57° 50'. This fort, built in 1799, was destroyed three years after by the natives of the country, and re-established in 1804, by Mr. Lisianski, who called it New Archangel. Russia cannot, however, avail herself of the circumstance of that possession to form a foundation for rights upon the continent, the usage of nations never having established that the occupation of an island could give rights upon the neighboring continent. The principle is, rather, that the islands ought to be considered as dependent upon the continent, than the inverse of the proposition.

It appears, then, that the position of Russia, relative to her rights upon the Northwest Coast of America, had not at all changed since 1790. The Russian American Company had enjoyed its exclusive rights granted by the Emperor Paul. It had prospered and formed an establishment in the limits marked out by the ukase of 1799. It had, however, never pretended to exclude other nations from a commerce shared with them for so long a time; but it saw with jealousy its profits diminished by this rivalry. In fine, it took a violent part, and at length obtained by its solicitations the ukase of 4th (16th) September, 1821.

In speaking of this measure, we shall make it our business to say nothing but what appears strictly necessary to set it in its true light, convinced, as we are, that the enlightened Government from whence it emanates will listen with good will to observations conceived with the intention of obtaining nothing but what is just in itself and useful to all interested.

The ukase, by its first three articles, under the form of a grant to a private association, presupposes the existence of exclusive territorial rights (a pretension unknown till now) on a great extent of continent, with the intervening islands and seas, and it forbids all foreign nations from approaching nearer them than one hundred Italian miles to these coasts. The ukase even goes to the shutting up of a strait which has never been till now shut up, and which is at present the principal object of discoveries interesting and useful to the sciences.

The very terms of the ukase bear that this pretension has now been made known for the first time.

The following sections relate to the seizure of vessels, and to the proceedings before the tribunals against those who infringe the regulation, and might furnish remarks worthy of attention as to the right of visit against ships in times of peace, permitted even to merchant vessels, as well as upon other points. But it is thought better to pass over these matters, as simply accessories to the principal point. Nothing is intended but first to know if the vast territory contained in the limits marked out by the ukase is, in fact, incorporated with the empire of Russia upon admissible principles.

All jurists are agreed upon the principle that real occupation only can give the rights to the property and to the sovereignty of an unoccupied country, newly discovered.—(See note f.)

With all the respect which we owe to the declared intention and to the determination indicated by the ukase, it is necessary to examine the two points of fact: 1st, If the country to the south and east of Behring's Strait, as far as the 51st degree of north latitude, is found strictly unoccupied? 2d, If there has been, latterly, a real occupation of this vast territory?

We have already seen, in the summary of the dispute between England and Spain, what was the decision of Russia upon the first point. It cannot be necessary for us to repeat it.

As to what regards the real occupation, one may be convinced, on having recourse to the charts officially published by the Russian Government, that the only establishment on this side of the 60th degree is that which is found on the island of Sitka, situated under 57° 30' of latitude, and consequently more than six degrees from the southern limit fixed by the ukase.

The conclusion which must necessarily result from these facts does not appear to establish that the territory in question had been legitimately incorporated with the Russian empire.

The extension of territorial rights to the distance of a hundred miles from the coasts upon two opposite continents, and the prohibition of approaching to the same distance from these coasts, or from those of all the intervening islands, are innovations in the law of nations, and measures unexampled. It must thus be imagined that this prohibition, bearing the pains of confiscation, applies to a long line of coasts, with the intermediate islands, situated in vast seas, where the navigation is subject to innumerable and unknown difficulties, and where the chief employment, which is the whale fishery, cannot be compatible with a regulated and well determined course.—(See note g.)

The right cannot be denied of shutting a port, a sea, or even an entire country, against foreign commerce in some particular cases. But the exercise of such a right, unless in the case of a colonial system already established, or for some other special object, would be exposed to an unfavorable interpretation, as being contrary to the liberal spirit of modern times, wherein we look for the bonds of amity and of reciprocal commerce among all nations being more closely cemented.

Universal usage, which has obtained the force of law, has established for all the coasts an accessory limit of a moderate distance, which is sufficient for the security of the country and for the convenience of its inhabitants, but which lays no restraint upon the universal rights of nations, nor upon the freedom of commerce and of navigation.—(See Vattel, B. I, chap. 23, sec. 289.)

In the case where this territorial limit would be insufficient, it is always allowable to make to it the augmentations which may be desired, by the way of diplomacy, in concluding treaties with the nations that might be found interested in it, the only means of reconciling them to the species of constraint which must necessarily result in this case to the maritime powers.

The only object of these observations is to induce a reconsideration of all this question, in general, on the part of the Russian Government, whose just and reasonable disposition cannot be doubted, and to prevail upon it to adopt the measures which its wisdom shall point out to it as most proper to mitigate the inconveniences which arise to foreign nations from the decree on the privileges of the Russian American Company.

NOTE (a.)

Dispute between the Courts of Madrid and of London.

The court of Madrid hastened to give to that of London the news of what had passed at Nootka, by demanding that the Government of Great Britain should give orders that the coasts occupied by subjects of Spain should be no more visited by the English; and it announces that, in consideration of the ignorance in which the captains of English ships had been of the rights of Spain, and out of regard to the nation to which they belonged, the Viceroy of Mexico had released the vessels.

The memorial of June 4, signed by the Count of Florida Blanca, declares that "the vast extent of the Spanish territories, navigation, and dominion, on the continent of America, isles and seas contiguous to the South Sea, are clearly laid down, and authenticated by a variety of documents, laws, and formal acts of possession in the reign of King Charles II. It is also clearly ascertained that, notwithstanding the repeated attempts made by adventurers and pirates on the Spanish coasts of the South Sea and adjacent islands, Spain has still preserved her possessions entire, and opposed with success those usurpations, by constantly sending her ships and vessels to take possession of such settlements. By these measures and reiterated acts of possession Spain has preserved her dominion, which she has extended to the borders of the Russian establishments in that part of the world.

"The Viceroys of Peru and Mexico having been informed that these seas had been for some years past more frequented than formerly; that smuggling had increased; that several usurpations prejudicial to Spain and the general tranquillity had been suffered to be made, they gave orders that the western coasts of Spanish America, and islands and seas adjacent, should be more frequently navigated and explored.

"They were also informed that several Russian vessels were upon the point of making commercial establishments upon that coast. At the time that Spain demonstrated to Russia the inconveniences attendant upon such encroachments, she entered upon the negotiation with Russia, upon the supposition that the Russian navigators of the Pacific Ocean had no orders to make establishments within the limits of Spanish America, of which the Spaniards were the first possessors, (limits situated within Prince William's Straits,) purposely to avoid all dissensions, and in order to maintain the harmony and amity which Spain wished to preserve.

"The court of Russia replied, it had already given orders that its subjects should make no settlements in places belonging to other powers, and that if those orders had been violated, and any had been made in Spanish America, they desired the King would put a stop to them in a friendly manner. To this pacific language on the part of Russia, Spain observed that she could not be answerable for what her officers might do at that distance, whose general orders and instructions were, not to permit any settlements to be made by other nations on the continent of Spanish America."

Mr. Pitt, then Prime Minister in England, in his speech to Parliament on this subject, declared, "That the subjects of his Britannic Majesty had been forcibly interrupted in a trade which they had carried on for years without molestation, in parts of America where they had an incontrovertible right of trading, and in places to which no country could claim an exclusive right of commerce and navigation; that the court of Madrid had advanced a claim to the exclusive right of navigation in those seas that was unfounded and exorbitant, indefinite in its consequences, aiming destruction to the valuable fisheries established by the English in the South Seas; in fine, that it was necessary to adopt such measures as might in future prevent any such disputes."—(See Annual Register for 1790, p. 96.)

Suffice it to say, that they could not agree upon the question of right, and that after a negotiation, supported by immense preparations for war on both sides, the court of Madrid determined to accept the ultimatum which arrived with an order to the English ambassador to leave Madrid if it was not agreed to.

The first and second articles of the convention signed at the Escurial, October 28, 1790, stipulate the damages to be paid by Spain for the ships seized and restored. The third and fourth articles determine that the respective subjects may freely navigate and fish in the Pacific Ocean or South Sea, landing on the coasts in the places unoccupied, and the fifth article bears that all the parts of the Northwest Coast of North America (situated to the north of the parts of this coast already occupied by Spain previous to the month of April, 1789) the respective subjects shall have free access everywhere where the subjects of either power shall have formed, after the same date, or may by consequence form, establishments. In fine, that the respective subjects shall not form any establishment upon the parts of these coasts situated to the south of the parts already occupied by Spain.

NOTE (b.)

The Russian American Company.

Chilikoff may be considered as the founder of the American Company. After the discoveries of Behring and Tchirikoff, of the islands between Asia and America, the Russian merchants made voyages thither to procure peltries, which they traded with great profit upon the frontiers of China; for all furs, and especially the beautiful skins of the sea otter, are an indispensable article for the effeminate Chinese. They change their dress upon the least variation of air, and in winter wear pelisses even at Canton, which is situated under the tropic. As many as twenty ships depart annually from the ports of Okhotsk and Avatchka; each ship equipped for the chase of animals for furs had its different proprietors, who, without pity either for the inhabitants of the Aleutian Islands, whom they treated barbarously, or for the animals which they hunted beyond measure, without any providence for the future, only thought of promptly completing their cargo and returning as soon as possible to Okhotsk. From hence, so great a destruction of these precious animals took place, that there was soon room to believe that this trade would cease entirely.

Convinced of the necessity of putting a stop to these devastations, Chilikoff made the greatest efforts to unite in one company all those interested in this trade, that it might in future be conducted with prudence, according to a plan which he had laid down. The brothers Golikoff joined the association in 1785. Their united capitals enabled them even to fit out several ships, which the enterprising Chilikoff commanded himself. They formed an establishment upon the island of Kodiak, which still serves as a depot for the trade of America. Placed at an equal distance from the Aleutian Isles, and from Kamtschatka on the west, and from the coast of America on the east, no situation is, in fact, more convenient. This trade, thus conducted, produced great riches. The good success of this association induced several merchants to join it. From this came the present company of America.

On almost all the Aleutian Isles factories were formed, protected by small forts. The principal seat of the company was fixed at Irkutsk. Yet the company appeared rather simply tolerated than formally authorized by the Government; so that its existence was always precarious enough. The irregular manner in which this sort of trade had been carried on, the unjust and cruel conduct of the Russian merchants towards the unhappy inhabitants of the isles of America, complaints of which had even come to the capital, had raised up so great and so powerful enemies that Paul the First resolved to abolish the company, in order to put an end to a traffic so revolting. This resolution would certainly have been carried into effect but for the interposition of M. de Resanoff, who was afterwards sent to Japan as ambassador. He had married the daughter of Chilikoff, who had brought him in dowry a very great number of bills of the company, the value of which depended upon gains or losses of the trade. By his knowledge and authority he happened to render the Emperor so favorable to the company that he rejected all the representations which were addressed to him against it, confirmed it formally in 1799, and granted to it great privileges. Then the principal residence of the company was transferred from Irkutsk to St. Petersburg, and its trade began to acquire great importance.

As soon as the Emperor Alexander mounted the throne he took a lively interest in the company; he himself took shares in it, and thus induced many of the nobility of the empire to imitate him. Assured by that of a lasting protection, the company labored with zeal, under the direction of the Count Romanzoff, to give to its trade, so long neglected, a form entirely new.—(Voyage of M. de Krusenstern, vol. 1, p. 14, and the following pages.)

NOTE (c.)

Extract from M. de Humboldt's Essay on New Spain, Book III, chapter 8, page 344.

"If the puerile ceremonies which the Europeans name acts of possession, if the astronomical observations made upon a coast recently discovered, could give rights of property, this portion of the new continent would be singularly parcelled out and subdivided among the Spaniards, the English, the Russians, the French, and the Americans of the United States. Even a small island would sometimes have to be divided among two or three nations at once, because each one could prove its having discovered a different cape of it. The great sinuosity of the coast between the parallels of 55 and 60 degrees embraces the discoveries made successively by Gali, Behring, and Tchirikoff, Quadra, Cook, La Perouse, Malaspina, and Vancouver.

"As far as this no European nation has formed a lasting establishment upon the immense extent of coasts which reach from Cape Mendocino to the 59th degree of latitude. Beyond this limit the Russian factories commence, the greatest part of which are scattered and distant from one another as the factories which the Europeans have established for the last three centuries on the coasts of Africa. The greater part of these small Russian colonies only communicate with each other by sea, and the new denominations of Russian America, or the Russian possessions in the new continent, ought not to induce us to believe that the coast of Behring's Basin, the peninsula Alashka, or the countries of Tschugatschi, are become Russian provinces in the sense given to this word, when speaking of the Spanish provinces of Sonora, or New Biscay"

NOTE (d.)

It was only towards the year 1710, when a Japanese ship was wrecked on the coasts of Kamtschatka, that it began to be supposed that Japan was not far distant from that peninsula. Some Cossack adventurers consequently made the discovery of several of the Kurile islands, and Peter the First, in the latter part of his life, thought of the project of ordering an expedition for resolving the doubts which existed respecting the separation or contiguity of Asia and America. He died without having had time to put his design in execution; but his successors, the Empresses, Catherine I, Anne, and Elizabeth, successively resumed it, and in 1728 Behring made his first expedition, penetrated the strait which bears his name by coasting along Asia, but returned to Kamtschatka without having seen the coasts of America. On his return he was assured that, from the high coasts of Kamtschatka, one might see, in a clear day, the neighboring land, which encouraged him to undertake, in the following year, a new voyage, which had no better success, for, having sailed fifty leagues from the coast without seeing anything, he changed his course, landed at Okhotsk, and returned afterwards to St. Petersburg.

The attention of the Russian Government having been attracted anew to the eastern coasts of their empire by another shipwreck of a Japanese vessel in 1732, Behring proposed to attempt new discoveries in a sea still so little known. In fine, on the 4th of June, 1741, two vessels, built at Okhotsk, set sail from the port of Avatcha, (which was on that occasion named Petro Parloskoi), the one commanded by Behring, the other by his Lieutenant, Tchirikoff.

The vessels having been separated by a severe storm and thick fogs, the commodore saw the continent of America on the 18th of July, and three days before Tchirikoff had gained the same coast. In rectifying their estimate for the longitude, the learned Muller thinks that the first had seen the land at 58° 28' of latitude, and at 236° of longitude, and the second at 56° of latitude and 241° of longitude. Tchirikoff having had the misfortune of sending to the land his long-boat and his canoe, from whence they did not return, lost them, with several of his companions and took the route for Kamtschatka. Behring, on his part, trying to obtain a knowledge of the coast which he had seen, anchored, on the 20th of July, a short distance from the continent. He named a cape, which advanced into the sea, St. Elias, and another cape, west of the former, St. Hermogenes, between which there is a gulf known afterwards by the name of Behring's bay. He remained a long time in sight of that coast, entangled among the rocks which line it. At length he bent his course south, and soon found himself in a safe sea. On the 30th of July they discovered an island which was named Toumanoï, or Foggy island.

It would be useless to recount the misfortunes which pursued the commodore during the rest of this voyage. Attacked by the scurvy, which broke out among the crew, he soon became incapable of fulfilling the duties of his station. The advanced season made him resolve, in the month of September, to endeavor to return to Kamschatka. A group of islands was discovered, which received the names of St. Macaire, St. Theodore, and St. Abraham. In fine, on the 30th of October, they saw two other islands which they had the misfortune to take for the most northerly of the Kuriles; this fatal error made them call those islands by the name of Seduction. They are nearly at the same elevation of the pole, but they are distant from them nearly eight degrees of longitude east. They thought they were not more than two days' sail from Avatcha; they steered west, but they saw no point of coast, and the season being too much advanced left no more hope of gaining the port. They then went back, and after several days of a horrible navigation their vessel run upon an island, where the commodore and a great part of the crew perished of disease and fatigue, and which afterwards received his name. In the spring his companions constructed a small vessel with one mast, in which they returned to the port of Avatcha in the month of August, 1742.

This voyage, by informing the Russians of the relative situation of Asia and America, opened to them the path for the successive discovery of this long archipelago of islands known under the collective names of Aleutian Islands, Fox Islands, Andreanorski Islands, and of that part of the coast of America which is spread under the parallel of sixty degrees, with a great number of islands situated to the south of the main land; in short, of the peninsula of Alashka and of the lands situated to the north of this peninsula as far as the 70th degree. Such were the discoveries made successively, either by adventurers at the expense of owners of Kamschatka, or by the officers of the imperial marine at the expense of the Russian Government. The voyage of Miche, Navodtsikoff, in 1745, that of Emelien Yagoff, of 1750, Cholodiloff, Serebrankoff, and Krassilnickoff, of 1756, Demetrius Paikoff, Pushkareff, Pierre Wasintinskoi, and Maxime Lazaroff, of 1758 to 1760, Drusinin, Medredeff, Korovin, and Etienne Glotoff, of 1762, Solovioff and Lieutenant Synd, of 1764, Aphanasseï Otcheredin, of 1766, and that of Captain Krenitzin and Lieutenant Levassheff, in 1768 to 1769.—(See Russian Discoveries by Cook.)

The voyages of Billings, of 1789 to 1793, of Krusenstern, of 1803 to 1806, and of Kotzbue, who all sailed upon the tracks of Cook, De la Perouse, and of so many other modern navigators, do not enter into the consideration of the present question.

NOTE (e.)

Abstract of diplomatic communications between the United States and Russia on the subject of the trade of the Northwest Coast.

Count Romanzoff, Minister of Foreign Affairs and of Commerce, acquainted the chargé d'affaires of the United States at St. Petersburg, in the year 1808, "that the American Company had represented to him that the ships of the United States, instead of trading with the Russian possessions in America, went thither to carry on a clandestine traffic with the savages, to whom they furnished, in exchange for otters' skins, fire-arms and powder, the use of which, till then unknown to these islanders, had been in their hands very hurtful to the subjects of his Imperial Majesty; and that the citizens of the United States had become themselves the victims of the imprudent speculation of their countrymen." (His excellency doubtless meant to speak of the destruction of the Russian fort at Sitka, in 1801, of which Mr. Lisianski gives the account in his voyage from 1803 to 1806.) His excellency requests the chargé d'affaires to make known these established facts to his Government and to call its serious attention to them, adding "that the care it takes of becoming distinguished by the scrupulous combination of its interests with those of other powers, and its respect for the law of nations, excite the hope that this illicit traffic will meet with its disapprobation, and that rigid orders will put a stop to it."

The chargé d'affaires of America, in acknowledging the receipt of this note, promised to convey information of the reclamation to his Government.

Mr. Daschkoff, chargé d'affaires of his Imperial Majesty, renewed, under date of January 4, 1810, the same representation to the Government of the United States at Washington; and he proposed as a remedy the medium of a regulation of the Government of the United States, which should forbid to their citizens all commerce with the natives of the Northwest Coast of America, and which should confine them to trade with the Russian factories in the said latitudes; in a word, he solicited a law of the United States, or a convention between the two Governments, to declare all commerce with the natives of the country to be contraband. This negotiation was put off to another time, Mr. Daschkoff not being authorized to fix a latitude which might serve as a line of demarkation to American vessels that might trade on these coasts; and it appears by his letter of April 24, 1810, that he "was under the necessity of waiting as long as he could to receive correct information of the geographical situation of the Russian establishments."

The Government of the United States answered him, under date of May 5, 1810, that it would afford the President the utmost satisfaction to come to an equitable arrangement for the commerce of the United States with the natives in the Russian establishments; but that, the instructions of Mr. Daschkoff not having authorized him to fix a precise line of demarkation, the definitive arrangement of this question was not at present possible; but that if this obstacle were even removed by the full powers of his Government, others of a very delicate nature would present themselves to it.

That on the supposition that the natives of the country should be found under the jurisdiction of Russia, the United States would have only to abandon their merchants to the penalties incurred by those who carry on a contraband trade in a foreign jurisdiction; that if, on the contrary, the natives ought to be regarded as independent tribes, Russia could not prohibit foreigners from trading with them unless in contraband of war and in time of war; in which case she can herself put in execution the prohibition on the open sea.

The same rule may be applicable if the natives are considered as rebels or insurgents against the authority of Russia. Considering the subject in this point of view, it would be difficult for the United States, notwithstanding their constant desire of giving proofs of their friendship and of their respect towards his Imperial Majesty, to receive this proposition by recognizing such a state of things, since, in pronouncing upon opposite pretensions, they might expose themselves with Spain, whose rights upon the Northwest Coast of America extended to the south of the establishments of Russia. And, in fine, that if such an arrangement should be proposed to Congress it would still want there the basis of reciprocity. In expressing the sentiments of the Government of the United States, the Secretary of State added the expression of the desire that it might be found conformable to the benevolent and magnanimous intentions of his Imperial Majesty to favor the commerce of the United States, as well with the natives of the country as with the Russian establishments in these latitudes, in all the objects which may not be of a nature to be prejudicial to either.

In the month of September, 1810, his excellency Count Romanzoff, in a conference with Mr. Adams, minister of the United States at St. Petersburg, explained to him his ideas on the commerce of the Northwest Coast of America. His excellency observed that Russia had establishments on this coast from which a very advantageous trade with China might be carried on. That the Imperial Government had sent thither two ships, under the command of Captain Krusenstern, who had proceeded from thence to China; that, although the port of Canton be open to all the European nations, the Chinese had refused to admit the ship of Captain Krusenstern, under the pretext that the Russians had for a long time enjoyed the advantage of an exclusive privilege of trade by land at Kiachta, and that they were persuaded that if the Russians had had the intention of changing the route of their trade they would have mentioned it beforehand. Count Romanzoff wished, for these reasons, that the trade of the Russian establishments in these parts with China might be carried on by the intervention of American ships; and as these establishments were in the vicinity of the natives of the country, a race of men ferocious and dangerous, he thought an arrangement possible with the United States by which they might enjoy the trade of the establishments, under the restriction of not furnishing arms and munitions of war to the natives in the neighborhood of these establishments.

Upon Mr. Adams observing that he would wish to know what were the limits in which the restriction would operate, his excellency replied that this point required deliberation, but that the Russian charts represented the whole coast to the mouth of Columbia river as comprehended in their possessions.

In a second conference, in the month of October following, Mr. Adams mentioned in detail the difficulties which opposed an arrangement of the nature of that which his excellency the Minister of Trade wished, who finally appeared to agree that reciprocity, at least, was wanting to the restrictions which were demanded; and as to what regards the privilege granted for them, namely, the trade with the Russian establishments, it was evident that it did, in fact, already exist; (and it may be added, by way of parenthesis, that it was a trade without which the very existence of the Russian colonies had been often exposed.)

Besides, his excellency has not raised objections to the continuation of the trade of American vessels with the coasts in the neighborhood of the Russian establishments; he had even declared that this commerce was open to all friendly nations; he had only insisted on the inconveniences which resulted from their having furnished fire-arms and powder to the natives. In fine, his excellency observed, that, as to what regarded the fixing of a limit to the Russian territories, the measure presented great difficulties at the moment, and that it would be better to defer this fixing to a future time, in order to avoid possible collisions and every pretext of discontent and jealousy. For, in the present state of the world, the most ardent wish of his heart was to bring all the civilized nations to pacific dispositions, and to avoid everything which might be capable of sowing discord.

Mr. Adams saw, about the same time, the memorials of the Russian American Company, in which a territorial claim was advanced as far as the mouth of Columbia river.

NOTE (f.)

Vattel's Law of Nations, book 1, chapter 18, section 207. "All mankind have an equal right to the things that have not yet fallen into the possession of any one; and these things belong to the first possessor. When, therefore, a nation finds a country uninhabited, and without a master, it may lawfully take possession of it; and after it has sufficiently made known its will in this respect, it cannot be deprived of it by another. Thus navigators going on the discovery, furnished with a commission from their sovereign, and meeting with islands or other desert countries, have taken possession of them in the name of their nation; and this title has been commonly respected, provided it was soon after followed by a real possession."

SEC. 208. "But it is questioned whether a nation may thus appropriate to itself, by merely taking possession of a country which it does not really occupy, and in this manner reserve to itself much more than it is able to people or cultivate. It is not difficult to determine that such a pretension would be absolutely contrary to the law, and opposite to the views of nature, who, appointing all the earth to supply the wants of man in general, gave to no nation the right of appropriating to itself a country but for the use it makes of it, and not to hinder others from improving it. The law of nations then only acknowledges the property and sovereignty of a nation over uninhabited countries, of which they shall really, and in fact, take possession, in which they shall form settlements, or of which they shall make actual use."

NOTE (g.)

Vattel's Law of Nations, book 1, chap. 23, section 282. "The right of navigating and fishing in the open sea being then a right common to all men, the nation who attempts to exclude another from that advantage does it an injury, and gives a sufficient cause for war; nature authorizing a nation to repel an injury, that is, to make use of force against whoever would deprive it of its rights."

SEC. 283. "We may moreover say that a nation which, without a title, would arrogate to itself an exclusive right to the sea, and support it by force, does an injury to all nations, whose common right it violates; and all are at liberty to unite against it, in order to repress such an attempt. Nations have the greatest interest in causing the law of nations, which is the basis of their tranquillity, to be universally respected. If any one openly tramples it under foot, all may and ought to rise up against them; and, by uniting their forces to chastise the common enemy, they will discharge their duty towards themselves and towards human society, of which they are members."—(Prelim. sec. 22.)

Extracts of a letter (No. 34) from Mr. Middleton to Mr. Adams, dated February 5, (17,) 1824.

"Sir Charles Bagot not having received any instructions from his court in relation to the Northwest question up to the middle of December last, I was unwilling to lose any further time, and took occasion, (as I informed you in my last it was my intention to do,) from Count Nesselrode having expressed an opinion to me, "qu'il y avoit beaucoup de vague dans toute cette question," to assure him that it was far otherwise, and to request him to receive for his own and for the Emperor's perusal the Confidential Memorial, of which I forwarded you the first sketch with my number 33. This was put into his hand on the 17th December, and will have changed, I hope, some of the views entertained up to that time. I think it must appear clearly to all who examine the subject that the acts of this Government in relation to the Northwest Coast have originated in errors of fact and of theory."

"I have within these few days past been notified by Sir Charles Bagot that it is the intention of Great Britain to proceed separately in relation to this interest. I shall abstain from making any remark at present upon this very unexpected turn in the affair, but I am hopeful that the Imperial Government will now proceed in the negotiation without further delay, as it has always professed its readiness to do."

No. 10.

Mr. Middleton to Mr. Adams, No. 35.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 7, (19,) 1824.

Sir: I am here to have the honor of endeavoring to give you a connected though cursory narrative of the proceedings which have taken place, during several months past, in relation to the negotiation upon the Northwest Coast question, which has at length terminated in the conclusion of a convention, signed with the Russian plenipotentiaries, upon the 5th (17th) of this month, and now to be forwarded by Mr. Lucius Bull, who is to proceed hence for Washington as special messenger.

You are already apprised of the proceedings upon this question having been suspended, in the expectation that Great Britain would proceed jointly with the United States in the measures to be taken in relation to this interest. That such an expectation was not altogether groundless will appear from the following extracts of a note I made at the time from two despatches addressed by Mr. Secretary Canning to Sir Charles Bagot, and read by him to me just after receiving them:

"Upon the subject of the ukase I have delayed sending you further and more precise instructions, in consequence of an intimation from the Government of the United States, through our minister in America, that they were desirous of combining with ours their representations and negotiations on the subject."

Another despatch, extracts of which were read to me, stated, "That a copy of a despatch from his Majesty's minister in America upon the subject of the Russian ukase was forwarded for his excellency the ambassador's information. It is therein stated that the Government of the United States are desirous to join with that of his Majesty in bringing forward some proposition for the definitive settlement of this question with Russia."

"But we have no specific information as to the views of the American Government, Mr. Rush not having yet received any instructions upon the subject."

"It seems probable, however, that the part of the question in which the American Government is peculiarly desirous of establishing a concert with this country is that which concerns the extravagant assumption of maritime jurisdiction. Upon this point, such a concert as the United States are understood to desire might be peculiarly advantageous."—Dated July 12, 1823.

With these extracts before me, and frequent opportunities of observing how anxious Sir C. Bagot was to have our co-operation, it is not surprising that I should be fully under the impression that England would willingly adopt a joint negotiation. It may be very well understood why, then, when I discovered that the full power sent over to Sir Charles had relation to the maritime question alone, (see the paper lettered A,) and when, too, I perceived that Mr. Poletica, who was left in the absence of the Emperor and of Count Nesselrode to "hold conferences," it may well be understood why I was well pleased to avail myself of Sir Charles' want of powers, to decline continuing a negotiation which could conclude nothing. I then waited patiently until the return of the Emperor; but finding, in the middle of December, that Sir Charles' instructions were not yet forthcoming, and being unwilling to lose any further time, I took occasion, from Count Nesselrode's telling me in conversation upon the subject of the Northwest Coast question, * * * * to beg to offer to his perusal and that of the Emperor a confidential memoir I had drawn up, a copy of which (in the form in which it was presented) I now forward.—(See book lettered A.) I then waited anxiously the news we were to have from London. Great, indeed, was my surprise when, on the 9th of February, (N. S.,) I received Mr. Rush's letter, dated January 9.—(See papers lettered b and c.) Mr. Rush therein states that Mr. Canning had intimated to him that Sir Charles Bagot had only paused under my suggestions. Mr. Rush might have contradicted this, for he must have known that the fact was otherwise. The first intimations from our Government of its desire to concert measures with England had been conveyed through Mr. Stratford Canning.

My first act, upon receiving the notification that England would treat separately from the United States, was, to acquaint both the Russian Secretary and the British Ambassador that if any attempt was made to negotiate upon the territorial question without our participation it would become my duty to protest in the strongest terms. I represented to Sir Charles, 1st. That Great Britain having no establishment or possession upon any part of the Northwest Coast of America, she can have no right or pretension, except such as may result from her convention with Spain, concluded October 28, 1790; and, of course, she can convey to a third power no rights, claims, or pretensions, except such as she herself may have derived from her convention with Spain. 2d. That the United States, in virtue of their convention concluded with Spain February 22, 1819, have acquired all the rights, claims, and pretensions whatsoever of that power upon the same coast, north of the 42d parallel of latitude; and that, consequently, the said States have concurrent rights, claims, and pretensions with Great Britain, to whatever point hers may be considered to extend. 3d. That, therefore, any convention or agreement which might be made between Russia and Great Britain, without the participation of the United States, must be nugatory and null as regards them, and cannot divest the said States of the rights they enjoy upon that coast.

To Count Nesselrode I stated that the benefit to Russia, at least of a convention with England from which we should be excluded, must be small indeed. They seemed willing to assume that the territorial question regarded exclusively Russia and England as "limitrophes" upon this coast. This I denied, and contended that the rights of the United States, to say the least, were concurrent with those of England; and to show how little any agreement to which we were not parties would avail them, I used the argument of which a condensed statement follows in the language we used:

"That supposing that England, for herself, renounced the rights which the community of the waters which wash these shores gives her, this renunciation can in no way prejudice the rights of others. Thus, in spite of her renunciation, these seas would remain free to all other nations. For a convention between two nations which stipulate their interests according to their own good pleasure, cannot have any effect either on the principles of the law of nations, or on the rights of other nations. It will be found, then, that when our citizens go to traffic in the latitudes of the great Northern Ocean, the Russians cannot oppose to them, in a valid manner, the convention concluded with Great Britain. The compact with this power would only prove that there had been a dispute, and that the two contracting powers had made an arrangement in this regard," &c., &c.

Such was the general reasoning I used; and shortly after the circumstance of England having determined to treat separately was known here, I received permission to see Count Nesselrode officially, and he invited me by note, under date of February 6, (O. S.,) stating the fact as communicated to him by the British ambassador, of his Government having determined to act separately, and inviting any communication I might think proper to make. At my solicitation he appointed the Saturday following for our first meeting upon the Northwest question. I was happy to find at this meeting that the Russian Government was as well disposed to treat with us as ever. Various conferences have since taken place, from my notes of all which, (as, in general, no protocol was drawn up,) I shall endeavor to make a short statement in the following sheets.

FIRST CONFERENCE.

Count Nesselrode received me by appointment, at his own house, on Saturday, February 9, at eight o'clock in the evening. He opened the business of the Northwest Coast negotiation by declaring that he believed it would be best for us to waive all discussion upon abstract principles of right and upon the actual state of facts, and that we must endeavor to settle the difference which had arisen between our Governments "on the basis which might be found most conformable to our mutual interests." In answer, I stated that I was perfectly ready to accede to the course proposed by him, although I felt confident that the United States had nothing to apprehend from the strictest examination into their claims and pretensions, but that I must reserve to myself the right, which he would also of course retain on his part, of invoking, occasionally, such principles of national law and of alleging such facts as we might, respectively, deem necessary to the defence of the rights and interests of either party.

He then inquired whether I had prepared any projet of convention for the settlement of the disputed points in this question? I placed under his eye the two drafts of which the copies herewith sent are lettered D and E.—(See the documents.) He promised that these papers should be submitted to the Emperor at an early day, and we parted with an understanding that he would give me notice when I could again [see] him upon the same business.

SECOND CONFERENCE.

Having received an invitation from Count Nesselrode, I waited on him on Wednesday, February 20, at one o'clock p. m. I found Mr. Poletica with the Count, and a rescript from the Emperor to these gentlemen was exhibited to me, empowering them to treat and adjust a settlement of the differences which had arisen in consequence of his Majesty's ukase of September 4, (16,) 1821.—(See paper lettered f.) I exhibited to them my power from the President of the United States, to the same effect, and we exchanged copies of the same. Some informal talk then arose respecting the general merits of the question we had in hand. I shall give a very short statement upon this head, because, according to previous understanding with Count Nesselrode, who took no part in it, all discussion of this nature was private and extra official. I shall use the language in which we spoke.

M. de Poletica, among other things, has affirmed that the pretended declaration of Russia, in the dispute between Spain and England on the subject of Nootka, is only a gratuitous assertion on the part of Spain. It was answered that this assertion, made in the face of Europe, had not been denied at the time by Russia, and that from that it is to be concluded to be well founded, until the proofs of the contrary were produced.

M. de Poletica has also pretended that the convention of 1819 only cedes to the United States the rights and pretensions of Spain to the territories to the east and to the north of the boundary line, (which would, in effect, be the position of the greatest part of the Northwest Coast of America,) so that, according to him, a perpendicular line ought to be drawn from the point where the forty-second parallel touches the Pacific Ocean, that is to say, that it ought to follow the parallel of longitude from this point towards the North Pole for finding the western limits of the United States. But, it has been answered to him, can M. de Poletica be ignorant that the forty-second parallel of north latitude actually reaches across the great ocean, and that the coasts of the northwest are necessarily found all to the north of this parallel? Besides, these coasts having been included in the pretensions of Spain, in the year 1790, as far as Prince William's Sound, all this territory ought actually to be comprised in the cession of the rights of Spain to the United States. Otherwise, it cannot be denied that, in the case of the cession not having been made to the United States, then the possession must necessarily still belong to Spain, and can in no manner be claimed by Russia, &c., &c.

After some further desultory conversation upon the same topics, the Count put into my hand a contre-projet, consisting of a translation into French of the projet I had offered, with some insertions, alterations, and additions, (see paper lettered g.) I observed, that the insertion in the second article was utterly inadmissible, as repugnant to the stipulations of the former article, and that, instead of the admission of American vessels solely to New Archangel, in the third article, I should propose the commercial principle adopted by the United States and England upon the same coast, (indiscriminate admission, &c., for a limited period.) That I must now frankly tell them that my instructions required that I should obtain two points as necessary conditions to the third object contemplated by the projet of convention. First, the revocation, either spontaneous or by convention, of the maritime provisions of the ukase of September 4, (16,) 1821. Secondly, the adoption of the commercial principle (or something similar) agreed upon between the United States and Great Britain, in their convention of 1818, in relation to these coasts. Thirdly, that, these preliminaries being settled, a territorial delimitation for settlements at fifty-five degrees might be agreed upon.

Upon this Mr. Poletica assured me, with a strong asseveration, that he would never be brought to sign an instrument containing the principle of free admission for our ships to their coasts, whatever the Count might think proper to do. He continued to argue warmly against anything of the kind. I replied somewhat at length, and concluded by saying that, unless he could be brought to change his mind upon this point, it was more than probable we should be able to do nothing. Russia must then be content to keep her ukase, and other nations would only have to see what means they may possess of carrying on the northwest trade in spite of it. The Count took no share in this a-parte discussion, and when it concluded I told him that I should take his contre-projet home with me to consider it and make such further propositions as reflection should suggest. We agreed to meet again in three days.

THIRD CONFERENCE.

We met again at 8 o'clock in the evening of Saturday, February 23, when I presented my counter-projet, (see paper lettered h.) accepting the first article, and the second, with the omission of what they had inserted upon my first projet. With regard to the third article, I observed that the proposal of inserting 54° 40' instead of 55°, with a view, as they explained it, of preserving to Russia two points of the island in which the port, called Bucarelli by the Spaniards, is situate, might [not] be absolutely inadmissible, although I should exceed my instructions in agreeing to it; but that at all events I must restore the phraseology I had used in the commencement of the article, as we could not admit for them or claim for ourselves possessions, except where there are actual establishments. Count Nesselrode stated that he had intentionally introduced the alteration in the phraseology, meaning thereby to secure their settlement near Bodeja (which lies south of the line of delimitation) against all possible objection, if, indeed, they should hereafter consider it to be worth their while to continue it, and, provided also, that neither Spain nor Mexico should object to it. He would now, however, consent to adopt my phraseology, since it should seem that what lies south of Cape Mendocino cannot be correctly considered as being any part of the Northwest Coast. Coming to the latter part of the article as proposed by me, which substitutes, in lieu of admission to our vessels at the port of Archangel, a provision for their free admission to all parts of that coast, including a free trade with the natives, he appeared to consider this to be utterly inadmissible. Upon my persisting, however, to aver that nothing could be done without it, he consented, at least, to take the proposition ad referendum. I stated I had yet an alternative to offer, which, leaving the line of delimitation undecided, might settle all difficulties on our part; and I proposed to let the third article run as set forth in the paper lettered (d.) It was not difficult to perceive that the utmost reluctance was felt in admitting the principle of free trade in any form. I thought it probable that this proposition would lead them to appreciate the advantage they might derive from delimitation, and prepare them to be willing to pay the price of it.

FOURTH CONFERENCE.

After a fortnight's interruption, I met his Majesty's plenipotentiaries on Saturday, March 8, at 8 o'clock in the evening. Count Nesselrode stated that my last projet had been considered, and that there remained very little to be done to bring our projets together. That there were but two lines to be omitted and one word to be altered. [See lines in italic, in paper (h.)] viz: the words "and the trade with the natives of the country," to be omitted; and the word "ten" to be exchanged for "five." I observed that, as the article would in that case remain, it would amount to a stipulation that we should enjoy for a very limited period, and as a privilege, what we are now entitled to by the law of nature, in common with all the independent nations, to wit: the fisheries upon an unoccupied coast; less infinitely than is permitted by this same projet upon all the other shores of the great ocean; where, by the preceding articles, as well as by common right, we may land and trade in unoccupied places. I therefore must at once declare the positive inadmissibility of that proposition. With regard to shortening the term for which a free trade was reciprocally to be granted, I could have no idea that it would be seriously pressed, being in itself so small an object. I then begged leave to place under his eye a short statement of principles and facts, which might have some weight in relation to the subject under consideration, and which I considered to be incontrovertible.

See paper lettered (k.) Having read this with attention, he exclaimed, "Well, here is a convention. We must see if 'tis not possible to come to an arrangement." He then stated that there could, however, now remain only one mean of accommodating the existing difference. This he would state hypothetically, (supposing the possibility of the Emperor's permitting the stipulation of a free trade for ten years to be agreed to.) It was a proposition which, perhaps, would be made to me at a future meeting. It would be intended to prohibit the trade in fire-arms and ammunition. He went into a recapitulation of the complaints of Mr. Daschkoff and Count Pahlen, on account of the injuries arising from the fire-arms furnished to the natives by our citizens. I took occasion here to declare that all these proceedings of the Russian Government were founded in erroneous impressions, and arose from their having improperly conceived that they had a right to regulate our commerce upon a coast which, being unoccupied, was free and open to all nations. It was clear that they had no right to demand any regulation of the kind. He replied, they did not now, of course, expect any arrangement which should not be marked by reciprocity. I remarked, that any restriction of the kind would be in many respects liable to objections. That the first which presented itself to my mind was, that such a regulation could not be carried into effect without admitting a right of search, which was wholly inadmissible in time of peace. He replied, they had no intention of proposing anything of the kind, for that they would be satisfied with the right of making representations to our Government, in case of the infraction of the regulation which should be adopted by our traders. I remarked, that if the restriction could be carried into effect, as regards our vessels and their own, that it would be giving a premium to the traders of other nations; for example, to the English or to the Dutch, who have considerable possessions west of the Pacific, or to the Portuguese of Macao, or to the Mexicans, since Mexico may now be considered as a State; all of whom would enjoy the faculty of carrying on a trade, voluntarily relinquished by ourselves, in arms and ammunition, articles which appear to be much coveted by the natives of those coasts. I was answered, that the English were ready to give up, altogether, the right of trading to the coasts, which would accrue to Russia by the arrangements about to be made, (a circumstance, by way of parenthesis, which was fully confirmed to me by Sir Charles Bagot, in a subsequent conversation,) and that Russia has the means of influencing all other nations to abstain from a trade which would be no longer open, except in the form she should please to give it. I still objected to the impracticability of the project, and intimated my apprehensions that it would only be a pretext for vexations; stating, however, that the question was new to me, and entirely unprovided for in my instructions; but that I was bound, at least, to consider any proposition they might think proper to offer. We then parted, the Count promising to notify me when I could have another meeting with him.

SUBSEQUENT CONFERENCES.

Considerable delay occurred after the conference of the 8th March, occasioned partly, as I understood, by the indisposition of the Emperor, and partly, too, as I supposed, to give time for consultation with the Directors of the Russian American Company. At length, on the morning of the 22d March, Mr. Poletica called upon me, and stated that he had now a projet to offer on the part of his Government, (see paper lettered l.) and that he would leave it with me for consideration. Among other things, he observed that the prohibition of a trade in arms and ammunition would be a sine qua non, and that the Emperor wished, in views of benevolence, to add thereto all kinds of spirituous liquors. This was confirmed to me by Count Nesselrode's note of 20th March, (see paper lettered m.) Mr. Poletica stated that Count Nesselrode proposed to receive me on Monday, the 24th instant, at his house, at one o'clock p. m.

Accordingly I attended on Monday, the 24th March, and offered the projet, (lettered n.) The argument this day turned generally upon the restrictions proposed to be imposed upon the trade. The sale of arms to savages, whose blind passions are unrestrained by any moral tie, must be equally pernicious to themselves and all who come within their reach. The greatest objection to this prohibition appeared to me to be, that the restriction may be converted into a pretext for vexations upon our commerce, if seizure or confiscation were permitted; and, on the other hand, it seemed likely that all other modes of carrying the prohibition into effect would prove nugatory. I had been told, however, that they would be satisfied with its interdiction under such penalties as we might think proper to impose; that in case of infraction they would content themselves with representations to the Government; but that, finally, the measure was a sine qua non. In order to meet this proposition, I had drawn up the article as it stands in the projet, as, upon the whole, I concluded that our Government will probably consider the proposal as less objectionable than at a former period, from considerations, at least, of reciprocity, now that we have an acknowledged territory upon the western coast, and when, too, it might perhaps be unavailing to attempt to resist the claims of Russia, likely so soon to be fully acknowledged by Great Britain.

On the 28th Mr. Poletica brought me the projet lettered (o.) It now appeared to me that the latter part of the fourth article, "that the reciprocal right shall cease," &c., had still too much the appearance of a substantive stipulation, although I had changed it from an entire article in their projet of the 22d of March, so as to stand as an accessory to the preceding stipulation of an open trade. In the fifth article, their expression "of arbitrary measures" did not appear to me to be sufficiently precise, as it left them at liberty to adopt regulations and to carry them into effect, because it could not be said that such regulations were arbitrary. For these reasons, I proposed at our meeting on the 31st that the fourth and fifth articles should stand as set forth in the projet lettered (p.)

The fourth article became the subject of warm debate during the three meetings upon the 31st of March and the 1st and 2d of April; at the last of which they proposed that I should sign a protocol of the tenor of that lettered (q.) This was refused by me as asserting what was evidently untrue, to wit: that the two forms specified therein meant the same thing; but I consented to sign another protocol, of which one of the originals is forwarded herewith, lettered (r.) The protocol of signature is lettered (s.) and the convention (t.)

Such is the sum and substance of what passed in our conferences, as extracted from the short notes I made directly after each meeting. If it should appear to be meagre and desultory, this must be accounted for from the circumstance that we had set out disclaiming all regular discussion of right or of fact; and if anything approaching to it was resorted to, it was only when I deemed some statement absolutely necessary to support our pretensions; but in general everything of the nature of discussion appeared to be carefully avoided by the adversary.

I now beg leave to add a few observations on the convention as concluded.

In order to judge equitably the merits of this convention, (or indeed of any other,) it may be necessary to make some allowance for the circumstances in which it was negotiated.

In the very outset of this negotiation the defection of England was a circumstance of a character likely to throw great difficulties in the way of it. This was occasioned, as I am well informed, partly by a conviction that our interests were different from if not directly opposed to hers, and partly, too, by the notion that the doctrine of the President's message respecting colonization upon the American continent must be peculiarly displeasing to Russia, and such as would render the negotiation much more difficult for the United States than for Great Britain. The latter power appears to have given over all thoughts of keeping open the trade upon the Northwest Coast of America. Her object in this negotiation seems to be to obtain an abandonment of the extravagant maritime pretension set up by Russia, and at the same time to acquire for herself territorial rights over such portion of the shores of the American continent as may secure her free egress from her interior possessions, lying towards the east, into the Pacific Ocean. Whenever these rights shall have been acknowledged, she will probably use her accessorial maritime domain for the purpose of excluding other nations from trading within her jurisdiction. With these prospects we must not indulge in the expectation of her renewing the trading privilege we now enjoy within her limits, unless it be made the price of our acknowledgment of a line of delimitation.

From the commercial activity which prevails universally at this day it is not to be expected that any coasts upon which valuable articles of trade are obtained can long continue unappropriated. That this should have been the case up to the present time upon the Northwest Coasts of America can be only accounted for from the circumstance of those regions being of extreme difficult access to all the inhabitants of Europe by reason of their remoteness from that part of the globe; while at the same time the wars which have generally absorbed the attention of the whole civilized portion of mankind almost continually since the discoveries of Captain Cook have prevented their importance being duly appreciated. In the short period of peace which intervened between the first American war and those of the French revolution, several expeditions were undertaken, which indicate that the general opinion of that importance had begun to prevail. That of M. de la Perouse, and that of Marchaud, by the French; those of Vancouver, and other English navigators; several voyages undertaken by enterprising citizens of the United States; and lastly, the affair of Nootka Sound, all go to prove how general an opinion prevailed of the value of the trade in furs, above all, with reference to the China market. During a length of time the Russians had enjoyed the benefit of supplying that market with furs obtained either in their Asiatic possessions or in the American islands, although they are obliged to transport them from Okhotsk by land carriage to Kiachta, thence to introduce them by Malmaichin, the only port of entry for all the borders between Russia and China. They have been anxious, on account of the delay and expense attendant upon this route, to establish a right of admission for their vessels into Canton, where all European flags are admitted; but they have been hitherto prevented from doing so by some strange caprice of the Chinese.

The confusion prevailing in Europe in 1799 permitted Russia (who alone seems to have kept her attention fixed upon this interest during that period) to take a decided step towards the monopoly of this trade, by the ukase of that date, which trespassed upon the acknowledged rights of Spain; but at that moment the Emperor Paul had declared war against that country as being an ally of France. This ukase, which is, in its form, an act purely domestic, was never notified to any foreign State with injunction to respect its provisions. Accordingly it appears to have been passed over unobserved by foreign powers, and it remained without execution in so far as it militated against their rights. The partial success of this measure seems, however, to have encouraged the yet more bold assumptions of the ukase of September, 1821. It may easily be imagined how much a fancied but equally unquestioned (either by themselves or others) possession during upwards of twenty years must have strengthened the opinion the Russians had of their own rights. I have reason to know that even in the Emperor's mind this conviction had taken strong hold. When urged both by England and America to recede from his territorial pretensions, he expressed himself ready to undo his own act, but declared that the act of his father must be maintained. The fifty-fifth degree was therefore a barrier not to be broken through; and a further small addition was required because the point of an island was cut off by that parallel. In consequence of this, it was urgently pressed by the Russian plenipotentiaries to make the line of delimitation run upon the parallel of 54° 40', a small deviation from the instructions I had received. To this I thought I could, without impropriety, accede. To show how much importance they attach to the parallel of 54° 40', it may now be mentioned that it is only upon this point that the negotiation with Great Britain has been broken off. England had agreed to accept this delimitation upon the islands, but insisted upon carrying her territorial claim upon the continent up to 56° and some minutes, in order to retain the mouth and course of a river which disembogues about that latitude, and as being necessary to the convenience of certain posts established in that neighborhood by the Northwest and Hudson's Bay Companies; but Russia has decidedly refused to accede to that delimitation, and Sir Charles has sent for further instructions.

It may, perhaps, be thought that, as certain restrictions upon our trade were insisted upon, which were not provided for in any instructions, I ought to have deferred the signature of the convention, and to have sent home for further instructions. Such would have been my course had I not apprehended that the question of delimitation between England and Russia must certainly, long before I could have any answer, be settled one way or other without our participation, and that we should then have no equivalent to offer for the trade we covet upon their shores, as neither of these nations seem disposed to consider as valuable any like advantage we may have it in our power to grant.

It may possibly, too, be objected, upon a superficial view of the convention, that it surrenders a permanent right to a community of trade upon the Northwest Coast in exchange for a privilege which is to expire in ten years. In answer to this objection, I submit that this right must always have been held subject to extinguishment whenever the maritime domain, incident to actual occupation and settlement, shall be acquired by any nation upon those coasts; and I beg leave further to remark upon the same point, that I kept it always in recollection that when the stipulation of the fourth article, for liberty of trading with the natives, shall have expired by its own limitation, these coasts, in so far as they may then remain unoccupied, will fall into the general category of unoccupied places upon the coasts of the great ocean.

The Russian plenipotentiaries had been all along particularly anxious to introduce into the convention a substantive stipulation, that the privilege to trade upon these coasts should absolutely cease after ten years. An example of this may be seen in their projet of March 22, in which it formed the subject of the fifth article. Such a stipulation I perseveringly resisted in all shapes, declaring that we retained a hope that our trade would become valuable and indispensable to their settlements before the expiration of the period specified, and that I was not authorized to enter into any stipulation of that nature. After three conferences, in which this point was the principal subject of contest, they consented to adopt my projet of a fourth article, with the explanation to be seen in the protocol of the 2d of April, "that the reciprocal right to trade granted by this stipulation cannot be extended beyond said term but by mutual consent." This appeared to satisfy them, although it can by no means change the nature or character of the article, and only admits that the privilege granted by the article must cease by its own limitation—a proposition sufficiently evident from the terms of the article itself, and which cannot affect the stipulations of other articles. As to the mutual consent necessary to the prolongation of the faculty granted by the article, it must be self-evident that if that were not necessary to its existence in the form allowed by the article, the article itself would have been altogether without an object. But with regard to the trade in unoccupied places, as permitted by the permanent articles, I am confident in the opinion that all the shores of the great ocean upon which the parties to this contract have any claim will continue open to them, respectively, for its pursuit under these stipulations.

The specific and particular privileges granted by the article (which, upon examination, will be found to contain an extension of the general privileges embraced by the preceding articles,) will, of course, cease after ten years, unless renewed by mutual consent.

The entire article was offered in conformity to the spirit of the instruction, although the tripartite convention anticipated by the instruction had not been concluded, because the agreement for an open trade upon that portion of the coast claimed by England has yet five years to run.

Such are my views of this subject. I have only to hope that I may not have mistaken those of my Government. If I have erred in concluding this convention, which may, indeed, in some degree disappoint just expectation, I shall console myself, knowing that I have done so under the impression that I was bound to take upon myself the responsibility of this act, rather than to suffer, through a fear of incurring a disavowal of it, that the public interest should risk a loss by my letting pass an opportunity of securing advantages which can never again offer.

You will be aware, sir, how anxiously I must expect your answer, by which I shall be enabled to ascertain how far the President will approve of what I have done.

I have the honor to be, sir, most faithfully, your obedient servant,

HENRY MIDDLETON.

P. S. In stating the communication made to me by the British ambassador, respecting the determination of his court to treat separately from the United States with Russia, I omitted to mention that he at the same time informed me that he was instructed, in case he should form a convention with Russia, without our being admitted to treat, to insert in it a saving clause for the rights of other States, similar to that contained in our convention of October 20, 1818. Since the conclusion of the negotiation on our part, the British ambassador has furnished me with a copy of his instruction ad hoc. (See paper lettered v.)

G. R. (manu regiâ.)

George the Fourth, by the Grace of God King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, King of Hanover, &c., &c., to all and singular to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Whereas an imperial edict was promulgated at St. Petersburg, on the fourth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, prohibiting, under pain of confiscation, all foreign vessels from approaching within one hundred Italian miles of the Northwestern Coast of America, the Aleutian and Kurile Isles, and the eastern coasts of Siberia; and whereas differences have, in consequence, arisen respecting the right of commerce and navigation in those seas, and we, being desirous that the said differences should be amicably adjusted, have thought proper to name some person of approved fidelity, ability, and zeal, for this salutary purpose: Know ye, therefore, that we, reposing especial trust and confidence in our right trusty and well-beloved counsellor Sir Charles Bagot, Knight Grand Cross of the most honorable order of the Bath, and our Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to our good brother the Emperor of all the Russias, have named, made, constituted, and appointed, as we do by these presents name, make, constitute, and appoint him our undoubted Commissioner, Procurator, and Plenipotentiary; giving unto him all and all manner of power and authority to treat, adjust, and conclude, with such minister or ministers as may be vested with similar power and authority on the part of our good brother the Emperor of all the Russias, any articles or agreement that may promote the above mentioned end, and to sign for us and in our name everything so agreed upon and concluded, and to do and transact all such matters in as ample manner and form, and with equal force and efficacy, as we ourself could do if personally present; engaging and promising, upon our royal word, that whatever things shall be so transacted and concluded by our said Commissioner, Procurator, and Plenipotentiary, shall be agreed upon, acknowledged and accepted by us in the fullest manner, and that we will never suffer any person whatsoever to infringe the same or act contrary thereto. In witness whereof, we have caused the great seal of our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to be affixed to these presents, which we have signed with our royal hand.

Given at our court at Brighthelmstone, the twentieth day of February, in the year of our Lord one [L. s.] thousand eight hundred and twenty-three, and in the fourth of our reign.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Rush, dated

LONDON, December 22, 1823.

"In an interview that I had with Mr. Canning last week I made known to him, as preparatory to the negotiation, the views of our Government relative to the Northwest Coast of America. These, as you know, are:

"First, That, as regards the country westward of the Rocky mountains, the three powers, viz: Great Britain, the United States, and Russia, should jointly agree to a convention, to be in force ten years, similar in its nature to the third article of the convention of October, 1818, now subsisting between the two former powers; and secondly, that the United States would stipulate not to make any settlements on that coast north of the fifty-first degree of latitude, provided Great Britain would stipulate not to make any south of 51° or north of fifty-five; and Russia not to make any south of 55°.

"Mr. Canning expressed no opinion on the above propositions further than to hint, under his first impressions, strong objections to the one which goes to limit Great Britain northwards to 55°. His object in wishing to learn from me our propositions at this point of time was, as I understood, that he might the better write to Sir Charles Bagot on the whole subject to which they relate."

LONDON, December 6, 1823.

"I received, in the course of the past summer, instructions from our Government to open negotiations with this Government upon a great variety of subjects interesting to the two countries; and amongst others, on that of the Russian ukase of September, 1821, relative to the Northwest Coast of America. As you are in possession of a copy of the Secretary of State's letter to me of the second [22d] of July, on this last subject, I need say nothing at present respecting it. I write on this occasion barely to inform you that, as yet, the negotiations have not commenced on any one of the subjects which I have in charge, and of course, therefore, this of the Russian ukase remains also untouched. As I am instructed to correspond with you upon this subject, as well as upon that relating to the suppression of the slave trade, I will take care to do so as events may render it necessary and proper after the negotiations shall have been entered upon. I have announced to this Government my entire readiness to commence them, but am still unable to say at what precise time a beginning will be made.

"I will also apprise you in due time of the results that may attend my discussions upon all the other subjects."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Rush, dated

LONDON, January 9, 1824.

"I have heretofore written to you on the 6th and 22d of December, and have now to inform you that from interviews which I have had with Mr. Canning since the present month set in, I find that he will decline sending instructions to Sir Charles Bagot to proceed jointly with our Government and that of Russia in the negotiation relative to the Northwest Coast of America; but that he will be merely informed that it is now the intention of Great Britain to proceed separately.

"Mr. Canning intimated to me that to proceed separately was the original intention of this Government, to which effect Sir Charles Bagot had been instructed, and never to any other; and that Sir Charles had only paused under your suggestions to him of its being the desire of our Government that the three powers should move in concert at St. Petersburg upon this subject.

"The resumption of its original course by this Government has arisen chiefly from the principle which our Government has adopted, of not considering the American continents as subjects for future colonization by any of the European powers—a principle to which Great Britain does not accede.

"I have informed the Secretary of State of the above intention of this Government. It will produce no alteration in my endeavors to obtain in negotiation here a settlement of the points as between the United States and Great Britain, respecting the Northwest Coast, in manner as my instructions lay them down to me."

State of the Question.

The United States, by their discovery of the mouth of the Columbia river, and by their subsequent real occupation and continued possession of a district on the same part of the Northwest Coast of America, have perfected their right of sovereignty to that territory.

By the third article of a convention with Great Britain, concluded October 20, 1818, they stipulated "that any country that might be claimed by either party on the Northwest Coast of America westward of the Stony mountains should, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open, for the term of ten years from that date, to all vessels, citizens, and subjects, of the two powers, without prejudice to the claims of either party or of any other State."

By a convention with Spain of February 20, 1819, the United States acquired all the rights, claims, and pretensions, of that power to all the Northwest Coast lying north of the 42d parallel of latitude. The claims of Spain appear to have rested on prior discovery, as far as the 59th degree north. So far, then, as prior discovery can constitute a foundation of right, the Northwest Coast as far as the 59th degree north belongs to the United States by the transfer of the rights of Spain.

Great Britain has no establishment or possession on any part of the Northwest Coast. She has, therefore, no right, claim, or pretension to any portion thereof, except such as may result from the convention with Spain concluded October 28, 1790. It is, then, evident that her claim is concurrent with those of the United States, and can only reach to whatever point these last may be considered to extend.

It appears, then, that Russia and England cannot make a definitive arrangement without the participation of the United States, or at least going to their exclusion. Any agreement which these two powers may make will be binding upon themselves, but cannot affect the rights of a third power.

The United States offer to Russia an article of the same import with that of October, 1818, with Great Britain, to be in force for the term of ten years. By offering free and equal access to navigation and intercourse within the limits to which their claims are indisputable, they concede much more than they obtain.

With regard to territorial claim, separate from any system of exclusion, they are willing to agree to the boundary line within which the Emperor Paul had granted exclusive privileges to the Russian Company, that is to say, latitude 55°.

If the Russian Government apprehends serious inconvenience from illicit traffic with their settlements, it may be guarded against by stipulations similar to those in the annexed projet.

Projet of the United States of February 8.

ARTICLE I. In order to strengthen the bonds of friendship and to preserve in future a perfect harmony and good understanding between the high contracting parties, it is agreed that their respective citizens and subjects shall not be disturbed or molested, either in navigating or in carrying on their fisheries in any part of the great ocean vulgarly called the Pacific or South Sea, or in landing on the coasts thereof in places not already occupied, for the purpose of carrying on their commerce with the natives of the country, subject nevertheless to the restrictions and provisions specified in the following articles.

ARTICLE II. To the end that the navigation and fisheries in the great ocean carried on by citizens and subjects of the high contracting parties may not be made a pretext for illicit trade with their respective settlements, it is agreed that the citizens of the United States shall not land on any part of the coast actually occupied by Russian settlements, unless by permission of the Governor or commandant thereof; and that Russian subjects shall, in like manner, be interdicted from landing without permission at any settlement of the United States on the Northwest Coast.

ARTICLE III. It is further agreed that no settlement shall be made hereafter on the Northwest Coast of America, or on any of the islands adjacent thereto, north of the 55th degree of north latitude, by citizens of the United States, or under their authority, nor by Russian subjects or under the authority of Russia, south of the same parallel of latitude.

Counter Projet of Russia of February 20.

[Translation]—(g.)

ARTICLE 1. To cement the bonds of amity, and to secure, for the future, a good understanding and a perfect concord between the high contracting powers, it is agreed that, in any part of the great ocean, commonly called the Pacific Ocean, or South Sea, the respective citizens or subjects shall be neither disturbed nor restrained, either in navigation or in fishing, or in the power of resorting to the coasts upon points which may not already be occupied, for the purpose of trading with the natives; saving, always, the restrictions and conditions determined by the following articles.

ARTICLE 2. With the view of preventing the rights of navigation and of fishing, exercised upon the great ocean by the citizens and subjects of the high contracting powers, from becoming the pretext for an illicit trade with their respective establishments, it is agreed that the citizens of the United States shall not resort to any part of the coasts already occupied by Russian establishments, or belonging to Russia, from the line of demarkation pointed out in the article below, without the permission of the governor or commander of said establishments; and that, reciprocally, the subjects of Russia shall not resort, without permission, to any establishment of the United States upon the Northwest Coast, from the same line of demarkation.

ARTICLE 3. It is, moreover, agreed that, in the respective possessions of the two high powers on the Northwest Coast of America, or in any of the adjacent islands, there shall not be formed by the citizens of the United States, or under the authority of the said States, any establishments to the north of 54° 40' of north latitude; and that, in the same manner, there shall be none formed by Russian subjects, or under the authority of Russia, to the south of the same parallel.

[With admission of American vessels to New Archangel.]

Counter Projet of the United States of February 23.

[Translation.]—(h.)

ARTICLE 1. The article proposed by the projet of February 20 is accepted.

ARTICLE 2. Same, with the omission of these words, "or belonging to Russia from the line of demarkation pointed out in the article below," words repugnant to the stipulation expressed in the preceding article, which grants the power of resorting to points not occupied. The words which terminate this article, "from the same line of demarkation," ought also to be erased.

ARTICLE 3. The modification of the article which proposes for a line of demarkation fifty-four degrees forty minutes instead of 55° may be accepted, provided the article be conceived in the following manner:

It is, moreover, agreed that, hereafter, there shall not be formed any establishment upon the Northwest Coast of America, nor in any of the islands adjacent to the north of 54° 40' of north latitude, by the citizens of the United States, or under the authority of said States; and on the other side there shall be none formed by Russian subjects, or under the authority of Russia, to the south of the same parallel. It is at the same time agreed, however, that the vessels of the two powers, or belonging to their citizens and subjects, may, reciprocally, frequent all the interior seas, gulfs, harbors, and creeks of the said coast, in order to carry on fishing [and trade with the natives of the country]* without any hindrance or molestation whatever, during ten [five] years, to be counted from the date of signing the present convention.

Second Counter Projet of the United States of February 23.

ARTICLE 3. The high contracting parties being unable at this time to adjust, to their mutual satisfaction, a line of demarkation for their respective possessions upon the Northwestern Coast of America, it is hereby agreed that all the said coast to which they respectively lay claim, together with all interior seas, bays, and creeks of the same, shall remain free and open to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two nations, reciprocally, without prejudice to the claims of either party, or of any other State, to the full end and term of ten years from the signature of this convention, or until the high contracting parties shall have come to some agreement respecting the aforesaid limitation of their possessions.

FOURTH CONFERENCE.

The dominion cannot be acquired but by a real occupation and possession, and an intention (animus) to establish it is by no means sufficient.

Now, it is clear, according to the facts established, that neither Russia nor any other European power has the right of dominion upon the continent of America between the 50th and 60th degrees of north latitude.

* Words erased by the plenipotentiaries of Russia at the conference of March 3.

Still less has she the dominion of the adjacent maritime territory, or of the sea which washes these coasts, a dominion which is only accessory to the territorial dominion.

Therefore, she has not the right of exclusion or of admission on these coasts, nor in these seas, which are free seas.

The right of navigating all the free seas belongs, by natural law, to every independent nation, and even constitutes an essential part of this independence.

The United States have exercised navigation in the seas, and commerce upon the coasts, above mentioned, from the time of their independence; and they have a perfect right to this navigation and to this commerce, and they can only be deprived of it by their own act or by a convention.

Projet of a Convention offered by Russia on Saturday, March 22.

His Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias and the Government of the United States of America, wishing to cement the bonds of amity which unite them, and to secure between them the invariable maintenance of a perfect concord, by means of the present convention, have named as their plenipotentiaries to this effect, to wit: his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, his beloved and faithful Charles Robert, Count of Nesselrode, &c., and Pierre de Poletica, &c., and the Government of the United States of America, Henry Middleton, esquire, &c.; who, after having exchanged their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon and signed the following stipulations:

ARTICLE I. It is agreed that in any part of the great ocean, commonly called the Pacific Ocean, or South Sea, the respective citizens and subjects of the high contracting parties shall be neither disturbed nor restrained either in navigation or in fishing, or in the power of resorting to the coasts upon points which may not already be occupied for the purpose of trading with the natives, saving always the restrictions and conditions determined by the following articles.

ARTICLE III. It is moreover agreed that, in the respective possessions of the two high powers upon the Northwest Coast of America or in any of the adjacent islands, there shall not be formed by the citizens of the United States, or under the authority of said States, any establishment to the north of 54° 40' of north latitude; and that, in the same manner, there shall be none formed by Russian subjects, or under the authority of Russia, to the south of the same parallel.

ARTICLE IV. It is, nevertheless, understood that the vessels of the two powers, or which belong to their respective citizens or subjects, may reciprocally frequent, without any hindrance whatever, the interior seas, gulfs, harbors and creeks in the possessions of Russia and of the United States of America on the Northwest Coast, for the purpose of fishing and trading with the natives of the country.

ARTICLE V. This reciprocal right of fishing and of trade is only granted for a term of ten years from the date of the signing of the present convention, at the end of which term it shall cease on both sides.

ARTICLE VI. From this time, fire-arms, other arms, powder, and munitions of war of every kind, are always excepted from this same commerce, which the two powers engage not to sell nor allow to be sold to the natives by their respective citizens and subjects, nor by any person who may be under their authority.

ARTICLE VII. The present convention shall be ratified, and the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged at St. Petersburg in the space of ———.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed it, and thereto affixed the seal of their arms.

Done at ——— the ——— of the year of Grace 1824.

Count Nesselrode to Mr. Middleton.

[Translation.]—No. 35, (m.)

The undersigned, Actual Privy Counsellor, Secretary of State directing the administration of Foreign Affairs, has had the honor to mention to Mr. Middleton, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, the desire which the Emperor had of seeing arms, munitions, and spirituous liquors excepted from the articles of which the reciprocal trade might be declared free during ten years with the natives of the Northwest Coast of America, by the convention which Russia and the United States are upon the point of concluding.

The undersigned hastens to assure Mr. Middleton, by writing, that the immediate prohibition of the trade in arms and munitions with the natives is a condition to which his Imperial Majesty attaches the highest importance, a condition the absence of which would not permit him to give his assent to the rest of the treaty.

As to the prohibition of the trade in spirituous liquors the Emperor eagerly desires that it should be pronounced, and he does not doubt that Mr. Middleton and the Government of the United States [will] receive in the most favorable manner this wish, dictated by motives of humanity and morality.

The undersigned embraces with pleasure this occasion of repeating to Mr. Middleton the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

[Translation.]—(n.)

His Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias and the President of the United States of America, wishing to cement the bonds of amity which unite them, and to secure between them the invariable maintenance of a perfect concord, by means of the present convention, have named as their plenipotentiaries to this effect, to wit: his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, his beloved and faithful Charles Robert, Count of Nesselrode, &c., &c., and Pierre de Poletica, &c., &c., and the President of the United States of America, Henry Middleton, a citizen of said States, and their Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary near his Imperial Majesty; who, after having exchanged their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon and signed the following stipulations:

ARTICLE I. It is agreed that in any part of the great ocean, commonly called the Pacific Ocean, or South Sea, the respective citizens and subjects of the high contracting parties shall be neither disturbed nor restrained either in navigation or in fishing, or in the power of resorting to the coasts upon points which may not already be occupied for the purpose of trading with the natives, saving always the restrictions and conditions determined by the following articles.

ARTICLE IV. It is, nevertheless, understood that the vessels of the two powers, or which belong to their citizens or subjects, respectively, may reciprocally frequent, without any hindrance whatever, the interior seas, gulfs, harbors, and creeks upon the said coast, for the purpose of fishing and of trading with the natives of the country. But the reciprocal right granted by this article shall cease, on both sides, after the term of ten years, to be counted from the signing of the present convention.

ARTICLE V. Fire-arms, other arms, powder, and munitions of war of every kind, are always excepted from this same commerce permitted by the preceding article; and the two powers engage, reciprocally, neither to sell, nor suffer them to be sold, to the natives, by their respective citizens and subjects, nor by any person who may be under their authority. It being well understood that, in any case, this restriction shall not be considered to authorize, under the pretext of a contravention of this article, the visit, or the detention of vessels, or the seizure of the merchandise, or, in fine, any vexations whatever, exercised towards the owners or the crews employed in this commerce; the high contracting powers, reciprocally, reserving to themselves to determine upon the penalties to be incurred, and to inflict the punishments due, in case of the contravention of this article by their respective citizens and subjects.

ARTICLE VI. When this convention shall have been duly ratified by his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, on one part, and on the other by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged at Washington in the space of ten months from the date below, or sooner, if possible.

With the view of preventing the rights of navigation and of fishing, exercised upon the great ocean by the citizens and subjects of the high contracting powers, from becoming the pretext for an illicit trade, it is agreed that the citizens of the United States shall not resort to any point where there is a Russian establishment, without the permission of the governor or commander; and that, reciprocally, the subjects of Russia shall not resort, without permission, to any establishment of the United States upon the Northwest Coast.

ARTICLE 3. It is moreover agreed that, hereafter, there shall not be formed by the citizens of the United States, or under the authority of said States, any establishment upon the Northwest Coast of America, nor in any of the islands adjacent, to the north of 54° 40' of north latitude; and that, in the same manner, there shall be none formed by Russian subjects, or under the authority of Russia, to the south of the same parallel.

ARTICLE 4. It is, nevertheless, understood that the vessels of the two powers, or which belong to their respective citizens or subjects, may reciprocally frequent, without any hindrance whatever, the interior seas, gulfs, harbors, and creeks upon the said coasts, for the purpose of fishing and trading with the natives of the country. But the reciprocal right granted by this article shall cease, on both sides, after the term of ten years, to be counted from the signing of the present convention.

ARTICLE 5. Fire-arms, other arms, powder, and munitions of war of every kind, are always excepted from this same commerce permitted by the preceding article; and the two powers engage, reciprocally, neither to sell, nor suffer them to be sold, to the natives by their respective citizens and subjects, nor by any person who may be under their authority. It is stipulated always that this restriction shall never be deemed to authorize, under the pretext of a contravention of the present article, the visit or the detention of vessels, or the seizure of the merchandise, or, in fine, any arbitrary measures whatsoever exercised towards the owners or the crews employed in this commerce; the high contracting powers, reciprocally, reserving to themselves to determine upon the penalties to be incurred, and to inflict the punishments due, in case of the contravention of this article by their respective citizens or subjects.

ARTICLE 6. When this convention shall have been duly ratified by his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, on one part, and on the other by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged at Washington in the space of ten months from the date below, or sooner, if possible. In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this convention, and thereto affixed the seal of their arms.

ARTICLE 4. It is, nevertheless, understood that, during a term of ten years, to be counted from the signing of the present convention, the ships of the two powers, or which belong to their citizens or subjects, respectively, may reciprocally frequent, without any hindrance whatever, the interior seas, gulfs, harbors, and creeks upon the coast mentioned in the preceding article, for the purpose of fishing and trading with the natives of the country.

ARTICLE 5. All spirituous liquors, fire-arms, other arms, powder, and munitions of war of every kind, are always excepted from the commerce permitted by the preceding article; and the two powers engage, reciprocally, neither to sell, nor suffer them to be sold, to the natives by their respective citizens and subjects, nor by any person who may be under their authority. It is likewise stipulated that this restriction shall never serve for a pretext, nor be alleged, in any case, to authorize either the search or detention of vessels, or the seizure of the merchandise, or, in fine, any measures of constraint whatever towards the merchants or the crews who may carry on this commerce; the high contracting powers, reciprocally, reserving to themselves to determine upon the penalties to be incurred, and to inflict the punishments due, in case of a contravention of this article by their respective citizens or subjects.

The undersigned, after having discussed in several conferences a projet of convention proposed for removing all the differences which have arisen between Russia and the United States of America, in consequence of a regulation published by the former of these powers, on the 4th (16th) September, 1821, definitively drew up the different articles of which this convention is composed, added to them their sign manual, and mutually engaged to sign them as they are found annexed to the present protocol.

In drawing up the 4th of these articles, the plenipotentiaries of Russia recollected that they had proposed to the plenipotentiary of the United States to arrange the said article in the following terms:

[Translation.]—(r)

The undersigned, after having discussed in several conferences a projet of a convention proposed for settling all the differences which arose between the United States of America and Russia, in consequence of a regulation published by the latter of these powers, on the 4th (16th) September, 1821, definitively drew up the different articles of which this convention is composed, added to them their sign manual, and mutually engaged to sign them as they are found annexed to the present protocol.

In drawing up the 4th of these articles, the plenipotentiaries of Russia recollected that they proposed to the plenipotentiary of the United States to arrange the said article in the following terms:

ARTICLE 4. "It is, nevertheless, understood that the ships of the two powers, or which belong to their citizens or subjects, respectively, may mutually frequent, without any hindrance whatever, the interior seas, gulfs, harbors, and creeks upon the said coast, for the purpose of there fishing and trading with the natives of the country. But the reciprocal right granted by this article shall cease, on both sides, after a term of ten years, to be counted from the signing of the present convention."

The plenipotentiaries of Russia added, that, after agreeing to this arrangement, the plenipotentiary of the United States had afterwards invited them to change the ending of this very article, and agree to it as it is found signed in the convention, observing that this second arrangement, more conformable to the letter of the instructions which he received, is the only one which he thinks himself authorized to sign; but, moreover, that this arrangement does not essentially alter the sense of that which had been proposed by the plenipotentiaries of Russia, because, at the end of the term mentioned, the stipulation ceasing equally by the two arrangements, the reciprocal power of trading granted by that stipulation cannot be prolonged beyond the said term but by mutual agreement.

Under these observations the article in question has been signed, with the modification which the plenipotentiary of the United States had demanded to be there introduced.

After which, all the other articles were also signed respectively, and it was resolved to proceed to the signature of the convention itself on the fifth following.

Extract from a despatch from Mr. Canning to Sir Charles Bagot, upon the Northwest business.

"The only point of view in which the United States can now desire to take cognizance of the negotiation between us and Russia would be in order to see that the pretensions on the Northwest Coast of America, derived to the United States from Spain through the treaty of 1819, were not prejudiced by our separate agreement. That object cannot be more effectually provided for than by inserting into our convention with Russia, as a protection for the claims of the United States, that part of the third article of the convention concluded by us with the United States in 1818 which was inserted in that convention for the protection of the claims of Spain herself, in the rights which she had not then ceded. By that article it is stipulated 'that the agreement between the two contracting parties should not be taken to affect the claims of any other power or State in any part of the said country.'

"Such a clause your excellency will voluntarily propose to insert in the convention which you are to conclude with Count Nesselrode, and you will apprise Mr. Middleton of your intention to propose that insertion."

Mr. Rush to Mr. Adams, (No. 353.)

LONDON, December 19, 1823.

SIR: Since I last wrote, Mr. Canning has been confined to his house by a sharp attack of gout; nevertheless, he wrote me a note the day before yesterday inviting me to call upon him on that day, for the purpose of having our proposed conference on the topic of the Northwest Coast. I went accordingly, and was received by him in his chamber.

He repeated his wish to learn from me our general grounds upon this subject, preparatory to his sending off instructions to Sir Charles Bagot.

I at once unfolded them to him by stating that the proposals of my Government were, 1st. That as regarded the country lying between the Stony mountains and the Pacific Ocean, Great Britain, the United States, and Russia, should jointly enter into a convention, similar in its nature to the third article of the convention of the 20th of October, 1818, now existing between the two former powers, by which the whole of that country westward of the Stony mountains and all its waters would be free and open to the citizens and subjects of the three powers as long as the joint convention remained in force. This my Government proposed should be for the term of ten years.

And 2d. That the United States were willing to stipulate to make no settlements north of the 51st degree of north latitude on that coast, provided Great Britain stipulated to make none south of 51° or north of 55°, and Russia to make none south of 55°.

These, I said, were the principal points which I had to put forward upon this subject. The map was spread out before us, and, in stating the points, I endeavored to explain and recommend them by such appropriate remarks as your instructions supplied me with, going as far as seemed fitted to a discussion regarded only as preparatory and informal.

Mr. Canning repeated that he had not invited me to call upon him with any view to discussion at present, but only to obtain from me a statement of the points, in anticipation of the opening of the negotiation, from the motive that he had mentioned of writing to Mr. Bagot. Yet my statement naturally led to further conversation. He expressed no opinion on any of the points, but his inquiries and remarks under that which proposes to confine the British settlements within 51° and 55° were evidently of a nature to indicate strong objections on his side, though he professed to speak only from his first impressions. It is more proper, I should say, that his objections were directed to our proposal of not letting Great Britain go above 55° north, with her settlements, whilst we allowed Russia to come down to that line with hers. In treating of this coast, he had supposed that Britain had her northern question with Russia, as her southern with the United States. He could see a motive for the United States desiring to stop the settlements of Great Britain southward; but he had not before known of their desire to stop them northward, and, above all, over limits conceded to Russia. It was to this effect that his suggestions went. He threw out no dissent to the plan of joint usufruct between the three powers of the country westward of the Stony mountains for the period of time proposed.

In the course of my remarks I said that the United States no longer regarded any part of that coast as open to European colonization, but only to be used for purposes of traffic with the natives, and for fishing in the neighboring seas; that we did not know that Great Britain had ever advanced any claim whatever to territory there founded on occupation, prior to the Nootka Sound controversy; that under the treaties of 1763 her territorial rights in America were bounded westward by the Mississippi; that if the Northwest and Hudson's Bay Companies now had settlements as high up as 54° or 55° we suppose it to be as much as could be shown, and were not aware how Great Britain could make good her claims any further; that Spain, on the contrary, had much larger claims on that coast, by right of discovery, and that to the whole extent of these the United States had succeeded by the Florida treaty; that they were willing, however, waiving for the present the full advantage of these claims, to forbear all settlements north of 51°, as that limit might be sufficient to give them the benefit of all the waters of the Columbia river; but that they would expect Great Britain to abstain from coming south of that limit, or going above 55°, the latter parallel being taken as that beyond which it was not imagined that she had any actual settlements. The same parallel was proposed for the southern limit of Russia, as the boundary within which the Emperor Paul had granted certain commercial privileges to his Russian American Company in 1799; but that, in fixing upon this line as regarded Russia, it was not the intention of the United States to deprive themselves of the right of traffic with the natives above it, and still less to concede to that power any system of colonial exclusion above it.

Such was the general character of my remarks which Mr. Canning said he would take into due consideration. In conclusion, I said to him that I should reserve myself for the negotiation itself, for such further elucidations of the subject as might tend to show the justice and reasonableness of our propositions.

I have the honor to be, &c., &c., &c.,

Mr. Rush to Mr. Adams, (No. 358.)

LONDON, January 19, 1824.

SIR: It was an omission in me not to have stated in my communication of the 6th instant what are to be the claims of Great Britain on the Northwest Coast of America, though as yet Mr. Canning has not made them known to me formally.

She will claim, I understand, to a point northwards above 55°, though how much above it I am not able to say, and southwards as low down as 49°. Whether she designs to push a claim to the whole of this space with earnestness I am also unable as yet to say, but wait the more full and accurate disclosure of her views. To a portion of it she will certainly assert her title with great confidence, and she will be chiefly tenacious of the right which she will allege to settle or colonize, after her own plans, now or in future, all such parts of that coast, out of the admitted boundaries of other nations, as she can make good her title to.

She will regard as alike open (standing upon the question of right) to her future settlements or colonization any part of the North American continent, however minute, on the eastern coast, northern coast, or elsewhere, heretofore undiscovered and unsettled by other powers, and which she has recently explored, or may for the future explore and settle, through her expeditions under Parry and Franklin, or others that she may fit out by land or water.

I need scarcely subjoin that I shall resist her claims under the lights that your instructions afford me and such others as I may be able to command; that I shall allege and endeavor to prove, from treaties and other sources, that the true sovereignty over the whole of that coast from the 42d to the 61st or 60th degree of north latitude is now vested in the United States; and that, consequently, if the United States are willing to leave to Great Britain her present actual settlements there between 55° and 51°, it is as much as the latter power can reasonably ask.

Nevertheless, if the President should think that, as connected with any part of this subject, further instructions might prove useful to me, I beg to repeat that I should be thankful to receive them from you, taking the chance of their still getting to hand before the negotiation, not yet begun, shall finally close.

I have the honor to remain, &c., &c., &c.,

PIRACIES ON THE COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES IN THE WEST INDIES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DECEMBER 16, 1824.

To the honorable the Senate and the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The subscribers, a committee selected for the purpose by the merchants of the town of Portland, in the State of Maine, beg leave respectfully to represent, that for many years the trade to Cuba and the other islands and ports in the West India seas has occupied the principal part of the tonnage of this collection district; that of late this trade has been much annoyed by a set of pirates, who have constantly watched every opportunity to commit the most lawless depredations. At first, they were content to plunder and maltreat the crews of our vessels, without proceeding to actual murder. Of late, however, they have not stopped short of the most brutal and inhuman outrages. In some instances whole crews, humble and unoffending, have fallen victims to their barbarous and unrelenting fury.

We are in no wise unmindful of the efforts of our own Government, made with a view to the suppression of these intolerable practices, and we are moreover aware that these efforts have, in some measure, been crowned with success. It can but be observed, nevertheless, that the effect has been, at the same time, to add to the desperation and fury of these freebooters. They seem now to consider themselves as engaged with the people of the United States in a war of extermination as well as of plunder. To this they have been led by motives of revenge, and a hope thereby to avoid the means of detection.

These enemies of the human race are found almost wholly in the vicinity of Spanish territory and Spanish population, and are themselves generally Spaniards, and uniformly come from and fly to Spanish territory for succor and protection; and the goods plundered are unblushingly exposed to sale, not unfrequently, in the most public marts of the Spanish West Indies, and in such a manner and under such circumstances as clearly to evince the connivance, if not of the officers of Government themselves, certainly of a portion of their citizens. It is not even too much to infer, from what has currently taken place, that a very considerable part of the population of the Spanish islands are concerned, directly or indirectly, in these piratical expeditions; and, furthermore, that if the Spanish authorities are not actually implicated in these atrocities, they are at least overawed by those who are.

Your memorialists would not, without manifest reason, depart from that comity which is ordinarily due from one nation to another, and would not on any occasion entertain jealousies and suspicions without adequate foundation. But such has been the frequency and publicity of these acts of piracy, especially on the coasts of Cuba; so formidable and imposing have been their numbers and their armaments; and so long have they been tolerated there, with scarcely the color of an effort on the part of the Spanish authorities to suppress them, that none but the most infatuated or the most wilfully blind can hope for any voluntary exertions on the part of the Spaniards or their Government to afford redress.

Your memorialists cannot hesitate to believe that the time has arrived when it is incumbent on the United States to assume such an attitude, in relation to the Governments of these islands, as shall induce them to consider that we shall hold them responsible for these hostilities of their own people. Have we not already made Spain responsible for spoliations committed upon our commerce in those very seas? And do we not hold all nations answerable for the acts of their people?

It will be replied, perhaps, that Spain constantly disavows and disapproves of these lawless acts; that she professes to abhor piracy, and considers pirates as outlaws, and as her enemies, as well as the enemies of the human race. If so, let her acts correspond with her professions, and sincerity will be accorded to her. Till then, and while she continues a forbearance nothing short in its effect of direct encouragement, we must and ought to hold her identified with the pirates themselves, and answerable for their depredations.

The trade from this part of the country to the West Indies is carried on almost wholly by the shipment of lumber, great portions of which are necessarily carried on deck, perhaps to the amount of one-third, at least. Hence we cannot arm in our defence. And, besides, these lumber cargoes are of small comparative value, and would by no means admit of such an expense. We have, therefore, but one resource: a reliance upon the arm of the Government for protection—a Government, we trust, that will not be duped by empty profession, and that will not with impunity see its peaceful and unoffending citizens wantonly butchered by the desperadoes of any nation.

We do not stop to calculate the value, although inestimable, of our trade to Cuba or to the West Indies. It should suffice that we have a right to a free and uninterrupted navigation of those seas. When whole crews of our fellow-citizens, in the pursuit of a lawful commerce, are seized and unrelentingly butchered, shall we coolly set ourselves down to a calculation of profit and loss before we determine to seek redress? The means are in our power to secure protection to our suffering fellow-citizens, and it is not to be apprehended that we shall be backward in using them.

Your memorialists would respectfully suggest that the class of small cruisers heretofore destined to this service should be increased, and kept constantly upon the alert in those seas, and particularly upon the coasts of Cuba and Porto Rico; and that during the summer and sickly season they should never be allowed to enter any of the ports in that climate but from necessity or in pursuit of pirates; by which means our commerce would be effectually guarded, and the health of our brave seamen effectually secured. Whether a system of convoying can be established in the vicinity of Cuba is also respectfully submitted to the wisdom of Congress. And, as in duty bound, &c.

SIR: I have the honor of inclosing herewith two resolutions of the House of Representatives of the United States, adopted on the 23d of last month, and of requesting that instructions may be given to Captain David Porter to endeavor to obtain and transmit such information as may enable me to report to the House, as required by one of the resolutions, whether the rocks called the Double Headed Shot Keys, or any other of the rocks or desert isles near the Bahama Banks, but separated therefrom by a deep channel, and on which the security of the navigation of the Gulf of Florida requires that light-houses or beacons should be placed, are within the dominion of any, and what, foreign Kingdom or State, or whether they are not now subject to be appropriated by the right of occupancy. And, secondly, to specify what portion of the island of Abaco, at or near the Hole in the Wall, and what other places within the acknowledged dominions of Great Britain, on the islands, keys, or shoals, on the Bahama Banks, may be necessary for the erection and support of light-houses, beacons, or buoys, or floating lights, for the security of navigation over and near the said Banks. The description of the place should be made with sufficient precision with regard to the topography to be inserted in the articles of cession, if the consent of Great Britain to make it should be obtained.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

SIR: I have the honor to submit you copies of my correspondence with the Duke of Manchester, Governor of Jamaica, the Governor of the Bahamas, and the Captain General of Cuba, on the subject confided to me by your instructions of the —.

As the interests of the Government of the Bahamas will be much lessened by the building of light-houses on Abaco and the neighboring keys, it deriving its principal revenue from wrecked goods, it is reasonable to apprehend that some obstacles will be opposed to the benevolent project of our Government from that quarter; but should this be the case, the efforts of the Duke of Manchester, and those of the Captain General of Cuba, in favor of it, will more than counterbalance them.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.,

*Commodore Porter to Governor Grant.*UNITED STATES SHIP JOHN ADAMS, Thompson's Island, April 15, 1824.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to transmit you copies of two resolutions of the Congress of the United States, in the House of Representatives, adopted on the 23d of December last, requiring that the Secretary of State be directed to ascertain and report to that House "whether the rocks called the Double Headed Shot Keys, or any other of the rocks or desert isles near the Bahama Banks, but separated therefrom by a deep channel, and in which the security of the navigation of the Gulf of Florida requires that light-houses or beacons should be placed, are within the dominion of any, and what, foreign Kingdom or State, or whether they are not now subject to be appropriated by the right of occupancy;" and, secondly, "that the President of the United States be requested to negotiate with the Government of Great Britain for a cession of so much land on the island of Abaco, at or near the Hole in the Wall, and on such other places within the acknowledged dominion of that power, on the islands, keys, and shoals, on the Bahama Banks, as may be necessary for the erection and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, or floating lights, for the security of navigation over and near the said Banks, and to be used solely for such purposes."

In consequence of these resolutions, and a call made by the Secretary of State on the Secretary of the Navy, the whole subject has been referred to me, with instructions to obtain the necessary information thereon, to be laid before the Government; and I have the honor to solicit of your excellency the information called for, with your opinion as to what portion of the island of Abaco, near the Hole in the Wall, and what other places within the acknowledged dominion of Great Britain, on the islands, keys, and shoals, as described in the resolutions, may be necessary for the purposes therein mentioned.

The description of the places should be made with sufficient precision in regard to topography to be inserted in the articles of cession, if the consent of Great Britain to make it should be obtained.

Such information as your excellency may be enabled to furnish, without reference to his Britannic Majesty's Government, I shall be glad to have as early as convenient; and where reference is necessary, when the information may be obtained, I beg that I may be enabled to lay it before the Government of the United States with as little loss of time as possible, in order that an object so desirable to the commercial world may be promptly undertaken and speedily executed.

I had hoped to have had it in my power to have done myself the honor to make this application in person, but circumstances connected with my public duties here will deprive me of the pleasure I had anticipated.

His Excellency Major General LEWIS GRANT,
Governor of the Bahamas.

*Governor Grant to Commodore Porter.*GOVERNMENT HOUSE, Bahama, April 24, 1824.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving from Lieutenant Commander McIntosh your excellency's communication of the 16th instant, containing two inclosures. Connected with the subject-matter of your excellency's despatch, and in part reply thereunto, I have to mention that, very early last year, I received from our minister at Washington, Mr. Canning, a letter, stating to me that, in the course of occasional conversation, not altogether official, with the authorities at Washington, the subject of facilitating and rendering less dangerous the navigation in the vicinity of the Gulf of Florida, by means of light-houses and buoys, had been repeatedly brought forward, and that he had been applied to for information whether the British Government would be inclined to establish light-houses on certain points of the Bahama islands, and to buoy a part of the channel for the benefit of trade passing in that direction, in return for the light-houses which were contemplated to be built, under acts of Congress, on certain other points on the opposite shores of the United States.

Accompanying Mr. Canning's letter, a memorandum came to me, of which the inclosed is a copy. My reply to Mr. Canning was to the effect that, in the event of the British Government adopting its proposed portion of the undertaking, the information which I had obtained here was in favor of the Hole in the Wall, the Binvinis, (in preference to the Great Isaacs,) and the Double Headed Shot Keys, as the fit situations for light-houses, and that the placing of buoys might serve to mark the course between Stirrup Key and Orange Key. I think I may venture to suppose it must be a mistake in that part of the memorandum which speaks of placing buoys between the Hole in the Wall and the Great Isaacs. It does not appear to me that there is much necessity for placing buoys all the way across the Bank, from Stirrup Keys to Orange Keys; but that it might be sufficient to mark distinctly and conspicuously the N.E. and S. points of the extensive shoal lying halfway between them. Notwithstanding the general opinion being in favor of the Hole in the Wall as the most eligible site for a light-house in that quarter, I cannot say that I am completely brought over to think that it is entitled to a preference over some point of Abaco, more to the east and north, about Cheesic Sound. This, however, is only a suggestion, and by no means an attempt to put an opinion of mine in competition with that of a professional person.

My letter to Mr. Canning went from hence about the middle of March, 1823, and, as he seemed to be earnest on the subject, I have little doubt but he, early after its receipt, made it part of his correspondence with his Government; nothing further, however, relative to the matter has as yet reached me.

Having now, from a desire to facilitate the inquiry which your excellency has been directed to make, freely communicated all the circumstances of information I was in possession of in any way connected with the subject of your despatch, previous to my receiving it, I have to state, in continuation, and in more direct reply to your excellency's letter, and in reference to the two resolutions of the House of Representatives which accompanied it, that I have not hitherto been put in possession by my Government of any authority to enter upon the discussion of the subject of ceding any portion of the island of Abaco, or other place, within the Government of Bahamas; and in respect to the Double Headed Shot Keys, your excellency will perceive, on inspection of the charts, that their locality constitutes them an appendage to that portion of the Bahama Government which lies on Key Sal Bank, and therefore not subject to be appropriated by the right of occupancy by any other Government.

I shall embrace the earliest opportunity which offers to transmit to my Government the contents of your excellency's despatch, in order to place the subject in view, although I have no doubt that Mr. Canning has already done this sufficiently, if ever it became an official topic of discussion, while he was at Washington.

I should have had very much pleasure in welcoming your excellency here had it been convenient for you to have paid this place a visit; or if on a future occasion this should be the case, it will afford me very great satisfaction. I purpose soon going towards the Turk's islands, if I can conveniently do so, on the arrival of our European mail. I shall return early in June, and should regret to be absent if your excellency was coming this way.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

LEWIS GRANT, M. G.,
Governor of Bahamas.

Original inclosed in Governor Grant's letter to Commodore Porter.

Copy of memorandum in Mr. Canning's letter.

Light-houses are wanted at the Hole in the Wall (or rock) at the Double Headed Shot Keys, and at Great Isaac island.

Buoys are wanted in the channel across the Bank from the Hole in the Wall (or rock) to Great Isaacs, nearly in a straight direction.

In the United States a sum of money has already been appropriated by Congress for light-houses at Tortugas islands and Key Largo. It is expected that a further sum will be appropriated during the present session for erecting another light-house either at Cape Carnaveral or at some point between that cape and Key Largo.

L. GRANT.

Commodore Porter to Governor Vives.

HAVANA, May 12, 1824.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: In the conversation had with you yesterday respecting the benevolent object of the Government of the United States in erecting light-houses for the purpose of rendering the navigation of the Gulf channel more secure, it afforded me sincere pleasure to perceive that your excellency fully appreciated the motives which prompted the measure and the importance of the object, either as regards the preservation of the lives of those engaged in navigation, or its effects in increasing the commerce of Cuba and the Gulf of Mexico, by lessening the risks which now attend it.

It afforded me no less pleasure to hear your excellency declare that the sovereignty of the Double Headed Shot Keys belonged exclusively to Spain, and that you would use your efforts to further the views of the Government of the United States by such measures towards the Government of Spain as would be calculated to produce the cession of one of the said keys for the sole purpose of erecting a light-house in the event of Spain not being disposed to erect and maintain one at her own expense.

The cause of my satisfaction on this subject is, that, in a correspondence had with the Governor of Bahamas, he claims the Double Headed Shot Keys as part of the Government of Bahamas, not subject to be appropriated to the use of any foreign nation by right of occupancy, and without giving any assurance corresponding with that given by your excellency.

I have now the honor to transmit the two resolutions on which I have been instructed to act. Your excellency will perceive that only one of them has relation to the Double Headed Shot Keys, which lie on the Key Sal Bank, (the key from which the bank takes its name being now in the occupancy of Spain,) and are separated from the Bank of Bahama by the deep channel of Santareen; the other relates to islands and keys under, it is presumed, the exclusive jurisdiction of the British Government. I have, however, laid both resolutions before your excellency that you may be enabled to bring the subject more fully before the Government of Spain, and make it the better acquainted with the object and the extent of the views of the Government of the United States, taken in connexion with the erection of light-houses and placing of beacons on the capes, islands, and shoals of the coast of Florida, and within its acknowledged jurisdiction.

It will be the cause of great satisfaction to the Government of the United States, and it will be of great utility, if your excellency will express your own views as regards the most eligible situations for light-houses for the Gulf channel generally; and in fixing on that for the Double Headed Shot Keys, it is very desirable that the description of the place should be made with sufficient precision, in regard to the topography, to be inserted in the articles of cession, if the consent of Spain to make it should be obtained.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

D. PORTER.

His Excellency the CAPTAIN GENERAL OF CUBA, and its dependencies.

HAVANA, May 15, 1824.

I have had the pleasure to receive your letter of the 12th instant, inclosing two resolutions of the Congress of the United States, respecting the erection of light-houses in this Gulf, for the better security of the vessels navigating the Bahama channel; all of which, according to the assurances I gave you in our conversation on the subject, I shall submit to his Majesty, that, as far as depends on me, so benevolent an object may be speedily effected.

Receive assurances of my high consideration. God protect you many years.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams (No. 1) to Mr. Sheldon, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, August 13, 1823.

"I have had the honor of receiving your despatches Nos. 1 and 2; the latter dated the 10th of June. Mr. Gallatin arrived, with his family, at New York on the 24th of that month.

"I inclose, herewith, copies of the recent correspondence between the Count de Menou, the Chargé d'Affaires of France, and this Department, on various subjects, highly interesting to the relations between the two countries.

"With regard to the Count's note of the 11th of July, the President received, with great satisfaction, the testimonial of the Viscount de Chateaubriand to the candor and ability with which Mr. Gallatin has performed the duties of his official station in France. The proposal to renew the negotiation in behalf of the well-founded claims of our citizens upon the French Government, in connexion with a claim, on the part of France, to special privileges in the ports of Louisiana, which, after a full discussion, had, in the views of this Government, been proved utterly groundless, could neither be accepted nor considered as evidence of the same conciliatory spirit. The claims of our citizens are for mere justice. They are for reparation of unquestionable wrongs; for indemnity or restitution of property taken from them, or destroyed, without shadow or color of right. The claim under the 8th article of the Louisiana convention has nothing to rest upon but a forced construction of the terms of the stipulation, which the American Government considered, and have invariably considered, as totally without foundation. These are elements not to be coupled together in the same negotiation; and while we yet trust to the final sense of justice in France for the adjustment of the righteous claims of our citizens, we still hope that their unquestionable character will ultimately secure to them a consideration unincumbered with other discussions. You will, respectfully, make this representation to the Viscount de Chateaubriand, with the assurance of the readiness of this Government to discuss the question upon the Louisiana convention further, if desired by France, but of our final conviction that it is not to be blended with the claims of our citizens for mere justice."

LEGATION OF FRANCE TO THE UNITED STATES, Washington, July 11, 1823.

His excellency the Viscount de Chateaubriand, in announcing to me that Mr. Gallatin was about to leave France, expresses his regret at his departure in such terms that I should do him injustice were I not to use his own expressions. "My correspondence with this minister," he remarks to me, "has caused me to appreciate his talents, his ability, and his attachment to the system of friendship that unites the two powers. It is with regret that I suspend my communications with him."

I esteem myself happy, sir, in conveying to you such sentiments towards the representative of the United States in France, and I should have thought that I had but imperfectly apprehended the design of the Viscount de Chateaubriand had I neglected to communicate them to the Federal Government.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs reminds me also, on this occasion, that Mr. Gallatin having frequently laid before him claims of Americans against the French Government, he had shown himself disposed to enter upon a general negotiation, in which they should be comprehended with the claims of French citizens against the Federal Government, at the same time with the arrangement relative to the execution of the 8th article of the treaty of Louisiana. The object of his excellency was to arrive at a speedy and friendly disposition of all difficulties that might subsist between the two powers, well assured that France and the United States would be found to have the same views of justice and conciliation.

His excellency regrets that Mr. Gallatin, who, he says, "has convinced him how pleasing and advantageous it is to negotiate with a statesman who exhibits candor and ability in his discussions," did not receive from his Government during his stay in France the necessary powers for this double negotiation. But he informs me that the Government of his Majesty remains always disposed to open it, either with Mr. Gallatin, should he return with these powers, or with Mr. Sheldon, if the Federal Government should think proper to confer them on him.

I greatly desire, sir, to see these propositions acceded to by the Federal Government, and to be able to reply to his excellency, as he expresses his wish that an arrangement, putting an end to every subject of discussion, might soon be expected.

I pray the Secretary of State to receive the renewed assurance of my high consideration.

MENOU,

Chargé d'Affaires of France near the United States.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF STATE.

No. 1, (b.)

*Mr. Adams to Count de Menou.*DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, August 12, 1823.

SIR: Your letter of the 11th of last month has been submitted to the consideration of the President of the United States, by whom I am directed to express the high satisfaction that he has felt at the manner in which his excellency the Viscount de Chateaubriand has noticed in his correspondence with you in the temporary absence of Mr. Gallatin from France, and the terms of regard and esteem with which he notices the character and conduct of that minister. The anxious desire of the President for the promotion of the good understanding between the United States and France could not be more gratified than by the testimonial of his most Christian Majesty's Government to the good faith and ability with which the minister of the United States at his court has performed his official duties.

With regard to the assurance of his excellency the Viscount de Chateaubriand's disposition to enter upon a negotiation with Mr. Gallatin, in the event of his return to France, or with Mr. Sheldon during his absence, concerning the claims of citizens of the United States on the Government of France, in connexion with an arrangement concerning the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty, I am directed to observe that those subjects rest upon grounds so totally different that the Government of the United States cannot consent to connect them together in negotiation.

The claims of the citizens of the United States upon the French Government have been of many years standing, often represented by successive ministers of the United States, and particularly by Mr. Gallatin, during a residence of seven years, with a perspicuity of statement and a force of evidence which could leave to the Government of the United States no desire but that they should have been received with friendly attention, and no regret but that they should have proved ineffectual. The justice of these claims has never been denied by France; and while the United States are still compelled to wait for their adjustment, similar and less forceful claims of the subjects of other nations have been freely admitted and liquidated.

A long and protracted discussion has already taken place between the two Governments in relation to the claim of France under the 8th article of the Louisiana convention, the result of which has been a thorough conviction on the part of the American Government that the claim has no foundation in the treaty whatever. The reasons for this conviction have been so fully set forth in the discussion that it was not anticipated a further examination of it would be thought desirable. As a subject of discussion, however, the American Government are willing to resume it whenever it may suit the views of France to present further considerations relating to it; but, while convinced that the claim is entirely without foundation, they cannot place it on a footing of concurrent negotiation with claims of their citizens, the justice of which is so unequivocal that they have not even been made the subject of denial.

From the attention which his Excellency the Viscount de Chateaubriand has intimated his willingness to give to the consideration of these claims, the President indulges the hope that they will be taken into view upon their own merits; and in that hope the representative of the United States at Paris will, at an early day, be instructed to present them again to the undivided and unconditional sense of the justice of France.

I pray you, sir, to accept the renewed assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

*Extract of a letter from Mr. Sheldon (No. 11) to Mr. Adams, dated*PARIS, October 16, 1823.

"I took an early occasion, after the receipt of your despatch, No. 1, of the 10th of August, to communicate the subjects of it in a conversation I had with Viscount de Chateaubriand. His observations in relation to that of the claims, as connected with the pretensions of France under the Louisiana treaty, were of a very general nature, and amounted to little more than a repetition of his readiness to enter upon the consideration of whatever subjects of discussion might exist between the two countries, and the expression of his satisfaction at the prospect of being soon relieved from the labor which the affairs of Spain had thrown upon him, and having thus more time to devote to those of the United States and others not of the same pressing nature. He avoided any intimation of a disposition to take up the claims by themselves, and it can hardly be expected that the French Government will, at this time, relax from the ground they have so lately taken upon that point. I informed him that I should communicate, in writing, an answer to the overture made by Count de Menou, at Washington, for uniting in a new negotiation this subject with that of the Louisiana treaty, in substance the same as that gentleman had already received there, and should again press upon the French Government the consideration of the claims by themselves; to which he replied that any communication I might make would be received and treated with all the attention to which it was entitled on his part."

No. 2, (a.)

*Mr. Sheldon to the Viscount de Chateaubriand.*PARIS, October 11, 1823.

SIR: Mr. Gallatin, during his residence as minister of the United States in France, had, upon various occasions, called the attention of his Majesty's Government to the claims of our citizens for the reparation of wrongs sustained by them from the unjust seizure, detention, and confiscation of their property by officers and agents acting under authority of the Government of France. During the past year his Majesty's ministers had consented to enter upon the consideration of these claims, but they proposed to couple with it another subject, having no connexion with those claims, either in its nature, its origin, or the principles on which it depended—a question of the disputed construction of one of the articles of the treaty of cession of Louisiana, by virtue of which France claimed certain commercial privileges in the ports of that province. Mr. Gallatin had not received from his Government any authority to connect these two dissimilar subjects in the same negotiation, or indeed to treat upon the latter, which had already been very amply discussed at Washington, between the Secretary of State of the United States and his Majesty's minister at that place, without producing any result, except a conviction on the part of the Government of the United States that the privileges for French vessels, as claimed by the minister of France, never could have been, and were not in fact, conceded by the treaty in question. A stop was then put to the negotiations already commenced in relation to the claims, and with which had been united on the proposition of the French Government, and as being naturally connected with it, the consideration of certain claims of French citizens on the Government of the United States.

The Chargé d'Affaires of France at Washington has lately, on behalf of his Government, expressed to that of the United States a wish that this double negotiation might be resumed, and that a definitive arrangement might be made, as well in relation to the disputed article of the Louisiana treaty, as of the subject of the claims upon one side and upon the other. The Government of the United States has nothing more at heart than to remove, by friendly arrangements, every subject of difference which may exist between the two countries, and to examine, with the greatest impartiality and good faith, as well the nature and extent of the stipulations into which they have entered, as the appeals to their justice made by individuals claiming reparation for wrongs supposed to have been sustained at their hands.

But these two subjects are essentially dissimilar; there are no points of connexion between them; the principles upon which they depend are totally different; they have no bearing upon each other, and the justice which is due to individuals ought not to be delayed or made dependent upon the right or the wrong interpretation, by one or the other party, of a treaty having for its object the regulation of entirely distinct and different interests.

The reclamations of American citizens upon the Government of France are for mere justice; for the reparation of unquestionable wrongs, indemnity, or restitution of property taken from them, or destroyed forcibly and without right. They are of ancient date, and justice has been long and anxiously waited for; they have been often represented to the Government of France, and their validity is not disputed. Similar reclamations, without greater merit or stronger titles to admission, presented by citizens of other nations, have been favorably received, examined, and liquidated; and it seems to have been hitherto reserved to those of the United States alone to meet with impediments at every juncture, and to seek in vain the moment in which the Government of France could consent to enter upon their consideration.

Although the question arising under the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty has already been fully examined, the Government of the United States is ready, if it is desired by France, and if it is thought that any new light can be thrown upon it, to discuss the subject further, whenever it shall be presented anew by France to their consideration. But they are convinced that, by blending it with the claims, not only will no progress be made towards its solution, but that these last, standing upon their own unquestionable character, ought not to be trammelled with a subject to which they are wholly foreign.

I am instructed to bring them anew before your excellency, and to express the hope of the President that his Majesty's Government will not continue to insist upon connecting together two subjects of so different a nature, but that the claims may be taken up, on their own merits, and receive the consideration which they deserve, unincumbered with other discussions.

I request your excellency to accept the assurance, &c.

D. SHELDON.

Extracts of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Brown, dated

WASHINGTON, December 23, 1823.

"You will immediately, after your reception, earnestly call the attention of the French Government to the claims of our citizens for indemnity."

"You will at the same time explicitly make known that this Government cannot consent to connect this discussion with that of the pretension raised by France, on the construction given by her to the 8th article of the Louisiana cession treaty. The difference in the nature and character of the two interests is such that they cannot, with propriety, be blended together. The claims are of reparation to individuals for their property, taken from them by manifest and undisputed wrong. The question upon the Louisiana treaty is a question of right, upon the meaning of a contract. It has been fully, deliberately, and thoroughly investigated, and the Government of the United States are under the entire and solemn conviction that the pretension of France is utterly unfounded. We are, nevertheless, willing to resume the discussion, if desired by France; but to refuse justice to individuals, unless the United States will accede to the construction of an article in a treaty, contrary to what they believe to be its real meaning, would be not only incompatible with the principles of equity, but submitting to a species of compulsion derogatory to the honor of the nation."

"APRIL 28, 1824.

"I have, in a letter to M. de Chateaubriand, copy of which I have now the honor to send, made an effort to separate the claims of our citizens from the Louisiana question."

No. 4, (a.)

*Mr. Brown to M. de Chateaubriand.*PARIS, April 28, 1824.

SIR: In the conference with which your excellency honored me a few days ago I mentioned a subject deeply interesting to many citizens of the United States, on which I have been instructed to address your excellency, and to which I earnestly wish to call your immediate attention.

It is well known to your excellency that my predecessor, Mr. Gallatin, during several years, made repeated and urgent applications to his Majesty's Government for the adjustment of claims, to a very large amount, affecting the interests of American citizens, and originating in gross violations of the law of nations and of the rights of the United States, and that he never could obtain from France either a settlement of those claims or even an examination and discussion of their validity. To numerous letters addressed by him to his Majesty's ministers on that subject, either no answers were given, or answers which had for their only object to postpone the investigation of the subject. Whilst, however, he indulged the hope that these delays would be abandoned, and that the rights of our citizens, which had been urged for so many years, would at length be taken up for examination, he learned with surprise and regret that his Majesty's Government had determined to insist that they should be discussed in connexion with the question of the construction of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty of cession. Against this determination he strongly but ineffectually remonstrated in a letter to Mr. de Villele, dated the 12th November, 1822.

It is notorious that the Government of the United States, whenever requested by that of his Majesty, have uniformly agreed to discuss any subject presented for their consideration, whether the object has been to obtain the redress of public or private injuries. Acting upon this principle, the question of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty was, upon the suggestion of the minister of France, made the subject of a voluminous correspondence, in the course of which all the arguments of the parties respectively were fully made known to each other and examined. The result of this discussion has been a thorough conviction on the part of the Government of the United States that the construction of that article of the treaty contended for by France is destitute of any solid foundation and wholly inadmissible. After a discussion so full as to exhaust every argument on that question, the attempt to renew it in connexion with the question of the claims of our citizens appeared to the Government of the United States to be a measure so contrary to the fair and regular course of examining controverted points between nations, that they instructed Mr. Sheldon, their Chargé d'Affaires, to prepare and present a note explaining their views of the proceeding, which he delivered on the 11th of October, 1823. To this note no answer has ever been received.

I have the express instructions of the Government again to call the attention of that of his Majesty to this subject, and to insist that the claims of our citizens may continue to be discussed as a distinct question, without connecting it in any way with the construction of the Louisiana treaty. The two subjects are in every respect dissimilar. The difference in the nature and character of the two interests is such as to prevent them from being blended in the same discussion. The claims against France are of reparation to individuals for their property taken from them by undisputed wrong and injustice. The claim of France under the treaty is that of a right founded on a contract. In the examination of these questions the one can impart no light to the other: they are wholly unconnected, and ought on every principle to undergo a distinct and separate examination. To involve in the same investigation the indisputable rights of American citizens to indemnity for losses and the doubtful construction of a treaty, can have no other effect than to occasion an indefinite postponement of the reparation due to individuals, or a sacrifice on the part of the Government of the United States of a treaty stipulation in order to obtain that reparation. The United States would hope that such an alternative will not be pressed upon them by the Government of his Majesty.

Whilst I indulge a hope that the course to which I have objected will no longer be insisted on by his Majesty's ministers, permit me to renew to your excellency the sincere assurance that the United States earnestly desire that every subject of difference between the two countries should be amicably adjusted, and all their relations placed upon the most friendly footing. Although they believe that any further discussion of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty would be wholly unprofitable, they will be at all times ready to renew the discussion of that article or to examine any question which may remain to be adjusted between them and France.

I request your excellency to accept, &c.

JAMES BROWN.

"I have the honor to inclose a copy of the answer of the Minister of Foreign Affairs to the letter which I addressed to him on the 28th ultimo upon the subject of the claims of our citizens against the French Government. You will perceive that no change has been made in the determination expressed to Mr. Gallatin, of connecting in the same discussion the question on the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty of cession, and the claims of the citizens of the United States against France. In expressing this resolution it has not been considered necessary even to notice the arguments made use of to induce them to adopt a different opinion."

Viscount Chateaubriand to Mr. Brown.

PARIS, May 7, 1824.

SIR: The object of the letter which you did me the honor to address me on the 28th of April is to recall the affair of American claims, already repeatedly called up by your predecessors, that they may be regulated by an arrangement between the two powers, and that in this negotiation the examination of the difficulties which were raised about the execution of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty should not be included.

Although the claims made by France upon this last point be of a different nature from those of the Americans, yet no less attention ought to be paid to arrange both in a just and amicable manner.

Our claims upon the 8th article had already been laid before the Federal Government by his Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary when he was negotiating the commercial convention of June 24, 1822.

The negotiators, not agreeing upon a subject so important, the King's Government did not wish this difficulty to suspend any longer the conclusion of an arrangement which might give more activity to commerce, and multiply relations equally useful to the two powers. It reserves to itself the power of comprehending this object in another negotiation, and it does not renounce in any manner the claim which it urged.

It is for this reason, sir, that my predecessors and myself have constantly insisted that the arrangements to be made upon the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty should be made a part of those which your Government were desirous of making upon other questions still at issue.

It is the intention of his Majesty not to leave unsettled any subject of grave discussion between the two States; and the King is too well convinced of the friendly sentiments of your Government not to believe that the United States will be disposed to agree with France on all the points.

His Majesty authorizes me, sir, to declare to you that a negotiation will be opened with you upon the American claims, if this negotiation should also include the French claims, and particularly the arrangements to be concluded concerning the execution of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty.

Accept, sir, the assurances of the very distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be, &c.

CHATEAUBRIAND.

"The subject which has first claimed the attention of the President has been the result of your correspondence with the Viscount de Chateaubriand in relation to the claims of numerous citizens of the United States upon the justice of the French Government.

"I inclose, herewith, a copy of the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the House of Representatives upon several petitions addressed to that body at their last session by some of those claimants, and of a resolution of the House adopted thereupon."

"The President has deliberately considered the purport of Mr. de Chateaubriand's answer to your note of April 28 upon this subject; and he desires that you would renew with earnestness the application for indemnity to our citizens for claims notoriously just, and resting upon the same principle with others which have been admitted and adjusted by the Government of France."

"In the note of the Viscount de Chateaubriand to you of May 7 it is said that he is authorized to declare, a negotiation will be opened with you upon the American claims, if this negotiation should also include French claims, and particularly the arrangements to be concluded concerning the execution of the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty."

"You are authorized, in reply, to declare that any just claims which subjects of France may have upon the Government of the United States will readily be included in the negotiation; and to stipulate any suitable provision for the examination, adjustment, and satisfaction of them."

"But the question relating to the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty is not only of a different character, it cannot be blended with that of indemnity for individual claims without a sacrifice on the part of the United States of a principle of right. The negotiation for indemnity presupposes that wrong has been done; that indemnity ought to be made; and the object of any treaty stipulation concerning it can only be to ascertain what is justly due, and to make provision for the payment of it. By consenting to connect with such a negotiation that relating to the eighth article of the Louisiana convention the United States would abandon the principle upon which the whole discussion concerning it depends. The situation of the parties to the negotiation would be unequal. The United States, asking reparation for admitted wrong, are told that France will not discuss it with them, unless they will first renounce their own sense of right to admit and discuss with it a claim the justice of which they have constantly denied."

"The Government of the United States is prepared to renew the discussion with that of France, relating to the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty, in any manner which may be desired, and by which they shall not be understood to admit that France has any claim under it whatever."

PARIS, August 12, 1824.

SIR: Some very unimportant changes have taken place in the composition of the ministry. The Baron de Damas, late Minister of War, is now Minister of Foreign Affairs; the Marquis de Clermont Tonese is appointed to the Department of War; and the Count Chabrol de Crousal to that of the Marine.

These appointments are believed to correspond with the wishes of the President of the Council of Ministers, and do not inspire a hope that our claims will be more favorably attended to than they have been under the former administrations. The interpretation of the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty contended for by France will, I apprehend, be persisted in, and all indemnity refused until it shall have been discussed and decided. After the correspondence which has already passed upon that article, it would appear that any further discussion upon it would be wholly unprofitable. With a view, however, of ascertaining the opinions of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, I shall, at an early day, solicit a conference with him, and inform you of the result.

I have had the honor of receiving your letter recommending the claim of Mr. Kingston to my attention. The difficulties which that claim must experience from its antiquity, and from the operation of the treaty of 1803, cannot have escaped your observation. It has also to encounter, in common with all our claims, the obstacle presented by the eighth article, which is found broad enough to be used as a shield to protect France, in the opinion of ministers, from the examination and adjustment of any claim which we can present.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

JAMES BROWN.

PARIS, September 28, 1824.

SIR: Little has occurred of importance during the present month except the death of the King. This event had been anticipated for nearly a year; he had declined gradually, and the affairs of the Government have been for some time almost wholly directed by Monsieur, who, on his accession to the throne, has declared that his reign would be only a continuation of that of the late King. No change in the policy of the Government is expected, and probably none in the composition of the ministry. The present King is satisfied with Mr. de Villèle, who is at its head, and if any of its members should be changed, the spirit in which public affairs are directed will not, it is believed, be affected by that circumstance.

The ceremonies attending the change of the crown have principally occupied the public attention for the last fortnight. It will, I presume, be officially announced by the French minister at Washington, and, according to the forms observed here, will, I understand, require fresh letters of credence for all foreign ministers at this court, addressed to the new King.

My health has not permitted me (having been confined for some weeks to the bed by a rheumatic affection) to confer with the Baron de Damas on our affairs, since his appointment as Minister of the Foreign Department. I should regret this the more if I were not satisfied that the same impulse will direct the decisions of the Government upon these points now, as before he had this Department in charge, and that no favorable change in those decisions can be expected from any personal influence which might be exerted by the new minister. I shall, however, take the earliest opportunity that my health will allow to mention the subject to him and ascertain what his views of it are.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

JAMES BROWN.

"The packet ship which sailed from New York on the 1st of September brought me the letter which you did me the honor to address to me on the 14th of August."

"In conformity with the instructions contained in that letter, I have addressed one to the Baron de Damas, Minister of Foreign Affairs, a copy of which I now inclose. I expect to receive his answer in time to be sent by the packet which will sail from Havre on the 1st of next month, in which event it may probably reach Washington about the 15th of December."

"The recent changes which have been made in the ministry, of which I have already informed you, do not justify any very strong expectation that a change of measures in relation to our affairs at this court will follow. The same individuals fill different places in the ministry from those which they formerly held, but in all probability adhere to their former opinions in relation to the subjects of discussion between the United States and France. On the point to which my letter to the Baron de Damas particularly relates, the Count de Villèle has already given his deliberate views in his letters to Mr. Gallatin, dated the 6th and 15th of November, 1822, and I have every reason to believe that they remain unchanged. Having bestowed much attention on the subject, it is probable his opinion will be, in a great measure, decisive as to the answer which shall be given to my letter. It is the opinion of many well informed men that, in the course of a few months, important changes will be made in the composition of the ministry. As these changes, however, will proceed from causes wholly unconnected with foreign affairs, I am by no means sanguine in my expectations that, under any new composition of the ministry, we may hope for a change of policy as it relates to our claims. The 8th article of the Louisiana treaty will be continually put forward as a bar to our claims, and its adjustment urged as often as we renew our claim for indemnity."

"The Journal des Debats of this morning states that at a superior Council of Commerce and of the Colonies, at which his Majesty yesterday presided, Mr. de St. Cricq, President of the Bureau de Commerce, made a report on the commercial convention of June 24, 1822, between the United States and France."

Mr. Brown to Baron de Damas.

PARIS, October 22, 1824.

SIR: I availed myself of the earliest opportunity to transmit to my Government a copy of the letter which I had the honor to address to the Viscount de Chateaubriand on the 28th day of April last, together with a copy of his answer to that letter, dated the 7th of May.

After a candid and deliberate consideration of the subject of that correspondence, my Government has sent me recent instructions to renew with earnestness the application, already so frequently and so ineffectually made, for indemnity to our citizens for claims notoriously just, and resting on the same principles with others which have been admitted and adjusted by the Government of France.

In reply to that part of the Viscount de Chateaubriand's letter in which he offers to open with me a negotiation upon American claims, if that negotiation should also include French claims, and particularly the arrangements to be concluded concerning the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty, I have been instructed to declare that any just claims which the subjects of France may have upon the Government of the United States will readily be embraced in the negotiation, and that I am authorized to stipulate any suitable provision for the examination, adjustment, and satisfaction of them.

The question relating to the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty is viewed by my Government as one of a very different character. It cannot be blended with that of indemnity for individual claims without a sacrifice on the part of the United States of a principle of right. Every negotiation for indemnity necessarily presupposes that some wrong has been done, and that indemnity ought to be made; and the object of every treaty stipulation respecting it can only be to ascertain the extent of the injury and to make provision for its adequate reparation. This is precisely the nature of the negotiation for American claims which has been for so many years the subject of discussion between the Governments of the United States and of France. The wrongs done to our citizens have never been denied, whilst their right to indemnity has been established by acts done by the French Government in cases depending upon the same principles under which they derive their claim. By consenting to connect with such a negotiation that relating to the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty the United States would abandon the principle upon which the whole discussion depends. When asking for reparation for acknowledged wrong, the United States have been told that France will not discuss it with them, unless they will first renounce their own sense of right, and admit and discuss in connexion with it a claim the justice of which they have hitherto constantly denied. In any negotiation commenced under such circumstances the situation of the parties would be unequal. By consenting to connect the pretensions of France under the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty with claims for indemnity for acknowledged injustice and injury, the United States would be understood as admitting that those pretensions were well founded; that wrong had been done to France, for which reparation ought to be made. The Government of the United States, not having yet been convinced that this is the case, cannot consent to any arrangement which shall imply an admission so contrary to their deliberate sense of right.

I am authorized and prepared, on behalf of the United States, to enter upon a further discussion of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty in any manner which may be desired, and by which they shall not be understood previously to admit that the construction of that article claimed by France is well founded, and also to renew the separate negotiation for American claims, embracing at the same time all just claims which French subjects may have upon the Government of the United States.

The change which has lately taken place in his Majesty's Department of Foreign Affairs encourages the hope that this important subject will be candidly reconsidered; that the obstacles which have arrested the progress of the negotiation may be removed, and that the subjects of contestation between the two Governments may be ultimately adjusted upon such principles as may perpetuate the good understanding and harmony which have so long subsisted between the United States and France.

Should I, however, be disappointed in the result of this application, it is to be seriously apprehended that, as the United States have not hitherto seen in the course of the discussion any just claim of France arising from the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty, so, in the persevering refusal of the French Government to discuss and adjust the well founded claims of citizens of the United States to indemnity for wrongs, unless in connexion with one which they are satisfied is unfounded, the United States will ultimately perceive only a determination to deny justice to the claimants.

Permit me respectfully to request that, at as early a day as your convenience will allow, your excellency will favor me with an answer to this letter.

I embrace with pleasure this occasion to offer to your excellency the renewed assurance, &c.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN RELATIVE TO CESSION OF LAND ON ISLAND OF ABACO, ONE OF THE BAHAMAS, FOR A LIGHT-HOUSE ESTABLISHMENT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DECEMBER 27, 1824.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 23d of December, 1823, requesting that a negotiation should be opened with the British Government "for the cession of so much land on the island of Abaco, at or near the Hole in the Wall, and on such other places within the acknowledged dominion of that power, on the islands, keys, or shoals, on the Bahama Banks, as may be necessary for the erection and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, or floating lights, for the security of navigation over and near the said Banks, and to be used solely for such purposes," directions were given to the minister of the United States at London, on the 1st of January, 1824, to communicate the purport of that resolution to the Government of Great Britain, with a view to their acceding to the wish of this; and I now transmit to the House copies of Mr. Rush's correspondence upon this subject, communicating the result of his application to the British Government.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 1, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor of inclosing herewith a copy of a resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States, adopted on the 23d of last month, the purport of which you will communicate to the Government of Great Britain. The object is of a nature to authorize the expectation that it will be readily acceded to by them, and, if the proposal should meet their acceptance, measures will be taken for ascertaining and fixing upon the sites specially adapted to the attainment of the objects of the resolution.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Hon. RICHARD RUSH, *Envoy Extraordinary and

LONDON, February 6, 1824.

SIR: I received on the 1st instant your despatch (No. 78) of the 1st of January, covering a resolution of the House of Representatives, passed on the 23d of December, relative to the establishment of lights on the island of Abaco, &c., for the security of navigation over and near the Bahama Banks; and, in fulfilment of your instructions upon this subject, I have this day addressed a note to Mr. Secretary Canning, of which a copy is inclosed.

I have the honor to remain, &amp;c.,

RICHARD RUSH.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.Mr. Rush to Mr. Canning.

LONDON, February 6, 1824.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States, has the honor to inclose to Mr. Secretary Canning a copy of a resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States, passed on the 23d of December, the purport of which will be seen to be to request the President to negotiate with his Majesty's Government for a cession of so much land on the island of Abaco, at or near the Hole in the Wall, and on such other places within the acknowledged dominion of Great Britain, on the islands, keys, or shoals, on the Bahama Banks, as may be necessary for the erection and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, or floating lights, for the security of navigation over and near the said Banks, and to be used solely for such purposes.

The object of the foregoing resolution is so distinctly stated in the resolution itself, that the undersigned deems it unnecessary at this time to enlarge upon it. It appears to be of a nature to authorize the hope that no objection will be seen to it; and the undersigned has been instructed by his Government to say that, should the proposal which the resolution embraces meet the acceptance of his Majesty's Government, measures will be taken for ascertaining and fixing upon the sites specially adapted to the attainment of the objects in view.

The undersigned is happy to avail himself of this opportunity of tendering to Mr. Canning the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

Extract of a letter (No. 379) from Mr. Rush to Mr. Adams, dated

LONDON, May 17, 1824.

"I have lately had some conversation with Mr. Huskisson on my application to this Government respecting the establishment of lights on the island of Abaco, and hope, before long, to have some communication to make upon this subject."

---

LONDON, September 16, 1824.

SIR: I had the honor to mention, in my despatch of May 17, that I had had some conversation with Mr. Huskisson on the application which I made to this Government respecting the establishment of lights on the island of Abaco, and that I expected, soon after that conversation, to have had it in my power to make some communication to you upon the subject of it.

On the twenty-second of July I had, at Mr. Huskisson's instance, a special interview with him, and with Lord Melville, upon the above subject at the Admiralty. It seems that my note to Mr. Secretary Canning of the 6th of February had been referred to the Admiralty, and I was given to understand, at the above interview, both by Lord Melville and Mr. Huskisson, that Great Britain could not accede to the principle contained in my note. She could not accede to the principle of negotiating with the United States with a view to the cession of any part of the island of Abaco, or other islands in the Bahamas, for the purpose of setting up beacons, buoys, or lights, for the benefit of navigation.

But his lordship and Mr. Huskisson proceeded to say that, if the United States would designate the proper sites, Great Britain herself would not be indisposed to the erection and establishment of these aids to navigation upon those islands, provided the United States would pay the necessary fees towards keeping them up, in all cases where their vessels derived benefit from them, whilst making voyages in that direction.

I immediately remarked upon what appeared to me the objectionable character of such a proposition. I asked how light money, charged upon vessels of the United States, was to be levied and paid over to the British treasury. They replied, that Britain would willingly leave that operation to the custom-houses of the United States, assisted by some agency on the part of her consuls in the ports of the United States, under any arrangements that the two countries might deem satisfactory.

I said that the whole plan appeared to me to be anomalous. The very principle of raising a revenue for any purpose, and however small, presupposed the right of enforcing it, and here was a plan for raising a revenue for one country in the heart of another.

They replied, that several of the lights on the British coast were in the hands of private individuals, or corporate bodies, but that the Government, nevertheless, received, under proper arrangements, a portion of the proceeds; to which I rejoined, that, however this might be as between a Government and its own subjects, the case, to my mind, appeared to be altogether different, as between one foreign nation and another.

The interview terminated by a declaration on my part, that, as the proposal was entirely new to me, and had not been within the contemplation of my instructions, all that I could do would be to transmit it to my Government, to which end I added, that I should be happy to receive it in writing. This was promised to me, and I have since been in expectation of receiving it. As it has not yet come, I have thought it best to impart to you, as above, without waiting longer, what may be regarded as the substantial decision of this Government upon the subject, though it will be more satisfactory to me to convey that decision to you hereafter, as I trust I shall be enabled to do, in the more accurate form of a written communication from Mr. Secretary Canning.

I have the honor to remain, with very great respect, your obedient servant,

RICHARD RUSH.

CLAIM OF REUBEN SHAPLEY UNDER SECOND ARTICLE OF TREATY OF PEACE WITH GREAT BRITAIN FOR A VESSEL AND CARGO.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 5, 1825.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The petition of Reuben Shapley, of Portsmouth, in the State of New Hampshire, merchant, most respectfully represents, that the schooner John, and cargo, belonging to your petitioner, was captured by his Britannic Majesty's ship-of-war Talbot, in latitude 31° 40' and longitude 78° 10' west. The time was March 5, 1815, which, with the place where, brought the capture within the stipulation of the second article of the treaty of peace for the restoration of such property.

That, seven days after, said schooner, under conduct of a prize master and crew, went ashore on the island of Cuba, and, with her cargo, was totally lost.

That it appeared by the protest of the schooner's officers that she was lost by the negligence or misconduct on the part of the captors.

That, on application by this Government to the British for indemnification, the British minister, with the advice of the King's law officers, proposed that your petitioner should apply to the Court of Admiralty, to which the minister sent the papers in the case, a court which it appeared had liberated a prize or prizes taken after the peace.

That, by advice of his friends in England, your petitioner made such application at much expense, and the result has been a judgment, that a case of negligence was not made out against the capturing officers on reasons alleged, which your petitioner has the utmost confidence that he can show to be insufficient, on which point he begs leave to refer to the annexed statement of his case.

A subsequent application to the British Government has been made for indemnity by the American minister, but that Government, relying on a judicial decision in the Court of Admiralty, refuses compensation, as the captor was ignorant of the peace, and chargeable with no fault, as is alleged in regard to the subsequent loss of the vessel.

This takes several things for granted: 1st. That the United States are bound to prove that there was no impossibility of restoring the vessel, except from the fault of the captors; whereas the proof of an impossibility, not caused by negligence or fault, is on the other side. 2d. That Britain, by its own court, can decide and has decided a national question; neither of which propositions are true. 3d. That, if a clear case of loss by fault of the captors is not made out, the British Government is not obliged to compensate or indemnify the owners; a position that can be easily disproved.

It is agreed that the vessel was lost, and admitted on both sides that, if the loss happened through any fault or negligence of any agent of the British Government, compensation must be made. And the freeing the captor, the commander, an individual, from blame in a proceeding against him, does not exculpate inferior agents for whom the Government may be responsible, nor touch the claim against the other party, viz: the Government itself.

The great question divides itself into two parts: 1st. Is the British Government bound to make compensation if the vessel was lost through negligence of its agents, who take it by force into their custody? And both parties admit her liability in such a case. And your petitioner is confident that he can establish this by proof, deemed sufficient in courts, whether of common or civil law; in regard to these proofs, he begs leave to refer to his statement, only remarking that the Admiralty had decreed restoration as directed by the treaty, and he took that course as recommended, and as being the readiest, not doubting compensation would be obtained in another course, if it failed in that—not entertaining a suspicion that he could be doomed to relinquish any right, or that this recommended course would be interpreted against his claim.

The other branch of the great question is this: Is not the British Government bound by the treaty to make compensation, even on the unadmitted supposition of the loss of the property by inevitable accident? And your petitioner is humbly of opinion that the affirmative is true, and may be clearly supported. It is evident from the common, easy, and familiar words of the treaty, from the apparent mind of the contracting parties from making this its own interpreter, from the rules of interpretation laid down by high authority for the construction of treaties. All this your petitioner has endeavored to evince in his statement of the case. He conceives, further, that this Government has put this construction on the treaty, and would have made compensation in a like case; and he understands that it has made compensation in a case which, though in many features not similar to this, yet, if he understands it, goes to show that where actual restoration was rendered impossible by a taking out and distributing captured goods, compensation was made for them instead of restoration; and he further understands that the captor had not authentic information of the peace, so might be legally ignorant, notwithstanding rumors.

Your petitioner, with all due deference, submits it whether it is not of great national importance that treaties should be so constructed, that tacit conditions or restrictions should not be supposed where none are expressed, whereby words creating rights are changed in meaning, and that the faith of treaties be considered as inviolable. He feels that the question that has arisen is deeply interesting and of very serious import to himself, and cannot admit a doubt of its receiving all due attention from the great council of the nation.

He looks up with strong and most respectful confidence to this high guardian of citizens' rights that he shall receive indemnity for his loss, humbly conceiving that it belongs to our nation to enforce the compact another has made with it, and to render justice to individual citizens.

He therefore prays that his petition, statement, and documents, may be examined by a committee or otherwise, and relief from so heavy a loss sustained from the injury of others, and no fault of his own, granted him, in such manner as to your wisdom and equity shall seem meet.

And he, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

REUBEN SHAPLEY.

Statement of the proofs in support of the petition of Reuben Shapley to Congress.

The great question respecting responsibility by the treaty of peace divides itself into two parts:

First, was the captured vessel lost through the fault or negligence of the captors?

Secondly, is not the British Government responsible, by the terms and spirit of the treaty, if the fact of negligence were doubtful, or even if the loss occurred by inevitable accident?

Two kinds of proof may be adduced on the first question equally pertinent: first, such as show that the loss arose from the negligence or faulty mistakes of the capturing commander; or, secondly, from those of some subordinate agent having custody of the property.

The proofs of the first kind are, the testimony of the master and mate of the captured vessel, distinctly stated in their protest. This is the usual, natural, and proper evidence, together with the daily register, styled the log-book, of occurrences at sea. These narratives, having internal marks of fairness and truth, are, and must be, received as proofs for the security of maritime property removed from the ordinary protection of municipal law. Protests are so established by commercial usage that the want of them is set down as a defect of expected and often indispensable proof. Those who make them are, from the trust reposed in them, respectable. They are not only the proper but the only witnesses the case admits of, and must always be deemed credible, unless their characters or the testimony itself be in some way discredited.

By two such witnesses (whose characters are capable of honorable support were it needful) the negligence of the capturing commander is proved, not by a general declaration that there was negligence, which would be only opinion, and might arise from mistake or ignorance, but a clear, distinct relation of facts, which they could not be mistaken in, and which, if true, undeniably proves negligence, though they never use the word. The master of the schooner, being applied to, assured the commander that the land in sight was not the key called the Hogsties, which, having been up it, he described, and positively said that the land in sight made very differently. But the captain disregarded the information of one declaring his judgment founded on personal knowledge, and whose personal safety was concerned in judging right. And the fact confirmed his judgment, and the ignorance of the captain, who, shaping his course for the windward passage, confident of seeing Jamaica the next day, that very night got his prize wrecked about 180 miles east of that passage, not driven on a lee shore by a tempest, but in good weather, under full sail for Jamaica, stranded on Cuba. After seeing land, and warned as he was, the captain ought not to have run in the night, as he did for about nine hours, among keys which might be mistaken one for another, or lest he might strike Cuba instead of the passage, as he did in fact. Again, he ought not to have trusted a prize master, an inferior officer, to keep a lookout in the night for both vessels. The prize should not have been suffered to be ahead of the ship, and then she would not have run on shore, nor does it appear she would had she or the ship kept a good lookout, as they ought to have done. Certainly not; had they laid to, or kept off, lest they should strike land in the night, such negligent conduct would have freed insurers from bearing the loss. Again, it is the duty of a commander, unless in particular cases restrained by orders, to send a prize to a near port instead of a distant one, other things being equal; and had he, instead of ordering this prize (for his own convenience probably) for Jamaica, ordered her to New Providence, about half as far distant, she had never been wrecked on the island of Cuba; or, had she been sent to Bermuda, through an open sea, and safe, though longer navigation, she would not have blundered and missed her way among dangerous keys, so as finally to get on shore far from her proper course to Jamaica, and the deviation not owing to winds, but to ignorance of the way. If the point of capture be marked on the chart, it will appear that the schooner had passed the danger of shores and shoals, and, well advanced, was pursuing her course in a safe and open sea, with a fair prospect of soon reaching her port, and ought not, without necessity, in a time of peace, to have entangled among shoals in a dangerous sea, where, if lost, no insurance, except that of the treaty, could relieve the suffering owners, and a comparison of the protest with the chart will tend greatly to confirm the former.

But an attempt has been made to take off the force of the strong, clear testimony of the protest. It appears from the Proctor's letter that the Judge of Admiralty said that a case of negligence in the loss of the vessel was not made out; the master, in his protest and letter written at Jamaica on his arrival there, made no charge of negligence, and it is not until his arrival in America that he, in his protest made there, mentioned any mistake or neglect in the navigation of the vessel after capture. He added, that he did not decide whether the Government was or was not responsible, under the stipulations of the treaty, as the proceeding was against the captor.

This implies, first, that a protest, unless invalidated, is proper and good evidence. 2d. That the second protest is not proof in this case, because negligence is not stated in the first, seeming to intimate that it was a story made up afterwards. But here an inference is drawn not warranted by the premises. The omission is perfectly accounted for. The master wrote the commander that his owner would seek indemnity, and required his log-book and papers. They were refused and suppressed. Had he only protested against this, and left all matters out until his return home, he would have acted correctly. He who unjustly withholds the materials of a protest must not object to its insufficiency. The master had a right to complete the log-book by the insertion of after occurrences. This right, against all reason and justice, was denied him, and then advantage is sought to be taken from this injurious conduct. His letter intimated plainly enough the pursuing the claim for indemnity, and the want and demand of the documents for that very purpose, and this might be the cause of the detention. No good reason can be presumed, and, just out of prison, it surely was not for him to provoke a powerful captor by writing to him that his ignorance and blunders had caused the loss of the vessel. But there is another reason for the omission, of itself sufficient, and confirmed by oath, namely: at making his protest he was told by the notary or justice, or both, that there was no need of inserting the particulars. They might wish to favor the captors; at any rate, such advice of men in office, and supposed to know what was proper, was suited to have weight, and was submitted to. The master might naturally think that his having certified this purpose of claiming by letter was sufficient there, or that he could not so safely and fully have the facts appear, where his opponent had interest and he had none, and it is no uncommon thing to note a protest in due time at one port, and extend it, by an enumeration of circumstances in detail, at another. Under all these circumstances, there is no ground for the inference that the protest should be set aside as an after-made story. Thus, the objections being done away, the competent testimony remains in its full force, making out a case of negligence against the captor.

It might be the interest of the British Government to have a decision of the question respecting negligence; and the effect of the sentence pronounced would doubtless be to acquit the capturing officer, so that his Government could not throw the loss of the vessel on him; yet that Government might be, and is, responsible; the same question being still open as ever between it and the United States, for one power cannot decide a question between itself and another power. The sentence of a British court is as inoperative in such a question as the opinion of the Attorney General. But the court has declared that it has decided no national question.

The great principle that negligence clearly implies liability is the same wherever the negligence was found. If a prize was burnt or run ashore by the negligence of the prize master, or a sailor, the capturing commander would be free from blame, but the Government would be liable, whether it could or could not get satisfaction of its faulty agent; and in this case, if the prize master got ahead of the ship, contrary to orders, the loss occurred by his negligence, at least as one cause.

The burden of proof lies wholly on the other side. The law of nations speak of a legitimate excuse, founded on a real and insurmountable obstacle making it forever impossible to perform the stipulated act, as laid down in Vattel, 506. This imports impossibility not arising from the fault of the non-performing party, and that it lies on the party making the excuse to make proof.

But, supposing, without granting, that no negligence appears in the case, in answer to the second question, it may be affirmed that the British Government is bound, by the treaty of peace, to compensate the loss sustained.

There is not the least ambiguity in the second article. The act to be done could not have been more clearly and simply described. The word restore is not less easy and of less common use than the words pay or deliver; and the circumstance that the obligation is not less clear, capture in time and place distinctly described. To such a case is applicable the maxim of national law on treaties, that it is not permitted to interpret what has no need of interpretation.—(Vattel, 310.) But although plain words cannot be made plainer by other or explanatory words, yet the same meaning may be indicated by other sentences or clauses in the instrument.

It is stipulated in the beginning of the second article that orders shall be sent to the armies, squadrons, &c. To what end? Evidently to save to unoffending individuals their property, lawfully employed on the ocean, from loss by means of capture; and if this should not prevent it, they were to be reinstated, or placed, as nearly as possible, in their former state, by being entitled to re-possession where the intended prevention was impossible.

The stipulation to restore to that purpose follows, and is introduced or prefaced by these significant expressions "to prevent all causes of complaint which might arise, it is agreed," &c.

The owners of vessels captured after peace are here brought to view, as the persons who might have cause to make complaint. And it would be that theirs was a case of peculiar hardship; an event for the general good produced their calamity. Their property was their living, and while lawfully employed for their own and the public good, it was to them lost, taken by friends, in a time of peace. This just cause of complaint the parties undertake to prevent or remove. The property shall be restored; if this be not literally done, or an equivalent given where it is not, individuals would be left to complain of loss which might be their ruin.

It is laid down that, by the law of nature, he who has made a promise to any one has conferred upon him a true right to acquire the thing promised.—(Vattel, 260.)

What is the thing in this case promised?

The property forcibly taken away.

Again, as the engagements of a treaty impose, on the one hand, a perfect obligation, they produce, on the other, a perfect right, which to violate is to do an injury.—(Vattel, 261.)

Here, then, is a perfect right to the thing promised. When an act is stipulated to be done, and the circumstances that raise the obligation are clearly expressed, no tacit conditions, restrictions, or provisos, can limit the act. It must be performed, or the natural legal consequences of non-performance suffered, that is, making good the damage sustained by it. Most especially, if on one part of an agreement to restore property a restriction is mentioned, and in another part, speaking of another property, there is no mention of any restriction, which is the present case. By the first article of the treaty, certain property is to be restored conditionally, so far as practicable. By the second, certain captured vessels are to be restored, and no limiting restriction is inserted, which shows a distinction intended. The treaty thus explains itself.

The treaty was intended to give relief to suffering individuals. And national law gives "to every disposition the full extent properly implied in the terms, if it appears that the author had in his view everything properly comprehended in them."—(Vattel, 314.)

The terms import restoration when the subject of the promise was a vessel supposed to be at sea. It was impossible that it should not have been in view that it was liable to perish on seas or shores, and in such could not be restored; yet no proviso is inserted for explanation in such a case, though it was contemplated.

The law of nations raises an obligation to restore what should be captured, by misfortune, without authentic information, after peace was concluded. It must, says that law, be certainly restored. The only alteration made by the treaty is, substituting, in different places, another day for that of conclusion, after which the effect must be precisely the same certain restoration.

In the treaty each party speaks to the other in a promise, and whether in the same sentence in the plural number, or in different clauses in the singular, binding itself to the other, is of no manner of consequence, the binding is the same. The language on the part of Britain to these States, who use the same, is, we will restore; on our part this language is understood to be without restriction. The British say, we meant to restore conditionally, provided the property should not be lost by accident while in our possession. But where is this condition now for the first time mentioned? It cannot now be created, annexed, and made part of the agreement; for there is nothing in national law more clear than this, "If he who can and ought to have explained himself clearly and plainly has not done it, it is worse for him; he cannot be allowed to introduce subsequent restrictions which he has not expressed."—(Vattel, 311.)

Britain would probably have most vessels to be restored, (to avoid all questions on general law,) a clear article for restoration would be therefore for her interest; and, if so, she may be presumed to be the progressor, and then another plain rule in that law would apply on a question being made.

"In case of doubt, the interpretation goes against him who gave law in the treaty; for it was in some sort dictated by him. He is in fault in neglecting to express himself more clearly; therefore, in extending or restricting the signification of the terms within the meaning the least favorable to him, no injury is done him, or, at least, only that to which he has willingly exposed himself."—(Vattel.)

But, although the promise to perform a certain act be absolute, unqualified by condition or hint of any exception, yet a question is made as to the effects of non-performance, and is said, in this case, that the vessel, the subject, having perished, and restoration become, by an invincible obstacle, impossible, the promise is vacated and the promisor perfectly excusable; because it is a maxim that there can be no obligation to an impossibility. It is admitted that this maxim is founded in reason. If the act stipulated is, by unavoidable accident, become impossible, he who promised is not bound to perform that act, but reason and law require compensation or indemnification if the case admits of it. Some cases do, and some do not. In these last only is the promise vacated. Conventional law is clear on this head. It states, speaking of insurmountable obstacles, "that if the impediment be real, time must be allowed, for there can be no obligation to an impossibility; and, for the same reason, if an insurmountable obstacle should render the execution of the article not only impracticable for the present, but forever impossible, he who engaged for it is guilty of no fault, and the other party cannot make his inability a reason for breaking the treaty, but is to accept of indemnification if the case be of such a nature, and (or that) indemnification be practicable."—(Vattel, 515.)

Nothing can be plainer than that, in the case last mentioned, indemnification must be made, for the reason that the subject admits of it.

Again it is stated, "a legitimate excuse, founded on a real insurmountable obstacle, is to be admitted, nobody being bound to impossibilities. The obstacle, when the promise (or promisor) is not in fault, vacates a promise which cannot be made good by an equivalent, nor the performance of it be deferred to another time," &c.—(Ibid., 116.)

This shows clearly that no promise is vacated by insurmountable accident, but one that cannot be made good by an equivalent. The promise to restore, then, has not been vacated by impossibility.

This law, thus distinguishing, is grounded on reason; some things have, from their nature, an adequate perfect equivalent in specie as a common measure of value; some things cannot be so valued, have no equivalent, admit of no price. Of the first sort are chattels, even slaves, where slavery is permitted. Of the last sort are free, intelligent beings. An engagement to restore prisoners of war must be understood to mean living persons. If they die by the act of God merely, before the time of re-delivery, the party promising is perfectly freed from his obligation; the promise is vacated. But a ship or a puncheon of rum has, by universal consent, a capacity of being represented by a definite quantity of gold or silver; and the person, whether public or private, who promises to deliver, re-deliver, or restore a specific chattel, is bound, on failure, to pay such equivalent, which, with incidental damages, is all that is required or recovered in such cases, the legal substitute standing for the article itself. And the promisor is not excused from compensation by the circumstance that the article has perished, for the value has not, and by that the engagement may, and ought to be, substantially made good to the promisee. There being no invincible obstacle in this case to be made a legitimate excuse for non-performance, the party entitled by the promise can have the effect of it, as being, to every reasonable purpose, performed.

AFFAIRS WITH SPAIN RELATIVE TO PIRACIES IN THE WEST INDIES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE JANUARY 10, 1825.

The Committee on Foreign Relations submit a Report on so much of the President's Message as relates to Piracies.

That our commerce for years has been harassed and the lives of our citizens destroyed by pirates, issuing from the colonies of Spain in the West Indies, is a fact derived not only from the message of the President, but is of universal notoriety. These outrages have been so long and so often repeated, and marked with such atrocious circumstances, that a detail of the particular cases would be as impracticable as unnecessary. Our Government, with a view to protect our citizens, has resorted to the means within their power by stationing a naval force near the places where the pirates resort; a measure also pursued by other powers. Every effort, heretofore, has been unavailing to put an end to these atrocities. These desperadoes, acquiring confidence from impunity, becoming more ferocious from habit, and multiplying by recruits from the most abandoned of other nations, threaten the most disastrous mischiefs, justly alarming to that highly valuable and most respectable portion of our fellow-citizens whose pursuits are on the high seas. It is manifest, as well from facts derived from other sources as from the message of the President, that the continuance of this evil is ascribable to the asylum afforded the banditti in the colonies of Spain. The Government of the United States, cherishing the most amicable disposition towards Spain, has presented the subject with great earnestness to the Spanish Government, demanding reparation for the past and security for the future. To these reiterated remonstrances no answer was returned till very recently, and to this day all that has been obtained is a promise of a satisfactory answer to the applications of the Government of the United States; although Spain has been solemnly warned that if she did not promptly acquit herself of her obligations to us on this subject, our Government would be constrained, from the nature of the outrages, to become its own avenger, and, availing itself of its own resources, protect the commerce and lives of the American citizens from destruction. In the same spirit of conciliation an appeal has been made to the local authorities, accompanied with a request that if, from weakness, they were unable to exterminate the hordes of banditti who took shelter from pursuit within their territories, that permission might be given our forces to pursue them on land. This has been denied on the vain punctilio of national dignity. The posture in which Spain now stands is that of connivance in these injuries, or incapacity to prevent them. "A sovereign who refuses to cause reparation to be made of the damage caused by his subject, or to punish the guilty, or, in short, to deliver him up, renders himself an accomplice in the injury, and becomes responsible for it." If the committee were of opinion that the refusal on the part of Spain was wilful, and not the result of inability, they would, with a full view of all the consequences which the measure involves, at once recommend an appeal to the last resort of nations against Spain and all her dependencies; but believing, as they do, that courtesy requires that her refusal to do us justice should be placed on the ground of inability—an inability resulting from causes which the committee intentionally forbear to enumerate—they content themselves with recommending only such measures as are believed to be indispensable effectually to reach the mischief. And hence they beg leave to present a bill with suitable provisions for the end designed.

No. 391.

[2D SESSION.

MESSAGE AND DOCUMENTS RELATIVE TO PIRACIES NEAR THE SPANISH WEST INDIA ISLANDS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE JANUARY 13, 1825.

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with two resolutions of the Senate—the first of the 21st, and the second of the 23d December last—requesting information respecting the injuries which have been sustained by our citizens by piratical depredations, and other details connected therewith; and requesting, also, information of the measures which have been adopted for the suppression of piracy; and whether, in the opinion of the Executive, it will not be necessary to adopt other means for the accomplishment of the object; and, in that event, what other means it will be most advisable to recur to, I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of State, and likewise a report from the Secretary of the Navy, with the documents referred to in each.

On the very important question submitted to the Executive, as to the necessity of recurring to other more effectual means for the suppression of a practice so destructive of the lives and property of our citizens, I have to observe that three expedients occur: one, by the pursuit of the offenders to the settled as well as the unsettled parts of the island from whence they issue; another, by reprisal on the property of the inhabitants; and a third, by the blockade of the ports of those islands. It will be obvious that neither of these measures can be resorted to, in a spirit of amity with Spain, otherwise than in a firm belief that neither the Government of Spain nor the Government of either of the islands has the power to suppress that atrocious practice, and that the United States interpose their aid for the accomplishment of an object which is of equal importance to them as well as to us. Acting on this principle, the facts which justify the proceeding being universally known and felt by all engaged in commerce in that sea, it may fairly be presumed that neither will the Government of Spain nor the Government of either of those islands complain of a resort to either of those measures, or to all of them, should such resort be necessary. It is therefore suggested that a power commensurate with either resource be granted to the Executive, to be exercised according to his discretion, and as circumstances may imperiously require. It is hoped that the manifestation of a policy so decisive will produce the happiest result; that it will rid these seas and this hemisphere of this practice. This hope is strengthened by the belief that the Government of Spain and the Governments of the islands, particularly of Cuba, whose chief is known here, will faithfully co-operate in such measures as may be necessary for the accomplishment of this very important object. To secure such co-operation will be the earnest desire and, of course, the zealous and persevering effort of the Executive.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, January 13, 1825.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 11, 1825.

The Secretary of State, to whom have been referred the resolutions of the Senate of the 21st and 23d of December last, requesting that the President would cause to be communicated to that body correspondence and information relative to the piracies referred to in his message; the means adopted by the Executive for their suppression; and the additional means necessary and expedient to be entrusted to the Executive for the suppression of the same; and also the number of merchant vessels belonging to the citizens of the United States, with their names, owners, and value of merchandise, which have been captured or plundered, and of injuries inflicted on citizens of the United States by the pirates since the first of December, eighteen hundred and twenty-three; and the number of pirates and piratical vessels, with the names of the said vessels, that have been taken by our naval force since that period of time, has the honor of reporting to the President copies of documents received at this Department in relation to the subject of those resolutions, which, together with those already communicated to Congress, contain the information required by the resolutions, so far as it is within the competency of this Department to furnish it.

Extract of a Letter of Instructions from the Secretary of State to Mr. Thomas Randall, appointed Agent of Commerce and Seamen at Porto Rico and Cuba, dated April 21, 1823.

“You will also obtain and communicate to this Department any information which it may be useful to possess relating to the pirates and piracies which have so long infested the coasts of Cuba. And if it may prove useful to the public service, you will, with due discretion, correspond with any of the naval officers of the United States stationed in those seas for the suppression of the slave trade and of piracies.”

Extract of a letter from Mr. Randall to Mr. Adams, dated

HAVANA, July 1, 1824.

“Mr. Mountain, vice consul of the United States at this port, has just been informed by a respectable merchant of this place that there are some piratical boats or vessels lying off Matanzas, by which the sailing of a number of merchant vessels, now ready for sea, is prevented. The information is brought by a letter from Matanzas, which also contains a request from one of the persons interested that Mr. Mountain would advise some American man-of-war of the fact, that relief might be afforded them. Unfortunately, there is no vessel-of-war of the United States now here, but the intelligence will not be neglected.”

Mr. Randall to the Secretary of State.

HAVANA, July 5, 1824.

SIR: The last letter which I had the honor to address to you was dated the 1st instant, and despatched, via Charleston, by the brig Trader, which sailed the ensuing day. In that letter I advised you that information had been received at this place of the re-appearance of the pirates off the port of Matanzas, by which the sailing of a number of merchant vessels had been prevented. Recent captures made by those pirates off that port confirm the truth of the above report.

Two American vessels are certainly known to have been captured and plundered, and there are reports of the capture of three others. Of the former, the brig Castor, of Portland, Capt. Hood, has arrived at this port. This vessel was captured entering the bay of Matanzas by seven men in an open boat, was taken thence to port “Escondido,” in the neighborhood, where the pirates were joined by a large party from the shore with boats and horses, with the assistance of which the brig was plundered of everything portable or valuable, including all the clothes of the captain and his crew. The cargo being principally lumber, the amount taken from the brig was by no means considerable. The captain and his men were, as usual, most severely and cruelly beaten. This boat had previously captured, on the same morning, the brig Betsy, Done, of Newport; and after plundering the vessel and casting off her boats they set her on fire in several places and abandoned her. The crew succeeded in extinguishing the fire, and thus preserved themselves from the horrid death designed for them by their merciless captors.

It is reported here that a brig called the John, from an eastern port of the United States; a ship, the name and description of which are not stated; and a schooner from New York, with a valuable cargo of dry goods, have also been captured within a few days by the pirates. I have not yet been able to arrive at any direct and certain authority for this last report, which is, however, generally credited here. I thought it my duty to give you the earliest intelligence of those depredations, however imperfect in its details.

The temporary absence of the United States cruisers from their usual station has emboldened those men to renew their piracies. The necessity which has caused this very short and casual absence of the whole American squadron from the neighborhood of Matanzas and this port is much to be regretted. Very great alarm prevails in this place among the masters of vessels, several of whom are fearful of putting to sea without convoy. A British cutter, the Grecian, has just arrived at this port. Mr. Mountain, our vice consul, solicited her commander to make a short cruise to Matanzas in pursuit of those pirates. He promised to sail this evening with that object.

This letter will be sent by the steamship Robert Fulton, which will sail for New York early to-morrow morning. I regret that the short stay of this vessel prevents me from enlarging my letter on this very interesting topic, as I had designed. I have been endeavoring to collect all the facts I could arrive at in relation to the piracies committed from this island, and shall take occasion to write more fully upon the subject by the earliest safe conveyance.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest consideration and respect, sir, your obedient servant,
 THOMAS RANDALL.

HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

No. 4.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Randall to Mr. Adams, dated

HAVANA, July 14, 1824.

"I had the honor to write to you last by the steamship Robert Fulton, via New York, of the date of the 5th instant. In this letter I gave information of the capture of the brig Castor, of Portland, and of the Betsy, Done, of Newport, by the pirates, off Matanzas, and of the reported capture of several other American vessels. Since that date we have certain intelligence of the capture of the schooner Mercator by a piratical vessel off Port Escondido. It is derived from a passenger (a Spaniard) who, as far as we yet know, is the only person who has been permitted to escape from the hands of the captors. He calls himself Don Joseph Manuel Rey, and on the 9th instant made a deposition before the vice consul of the United States at this port, of which the following extract is the substance:

"That he was a passenger on board the schooner Mercator, Henry Allen master, from New York, bound to this port, Havana; that on the 3d day of this present month the said vessel was boarded, when near the port of Escondido, on this coast, by a sharp built foretopsail schooner, with about forty armed men, who took possession of said Mercator, confined this deponent in the cabin, (after first suspending him by the thumbs and then by the neck, to extort information where the money was to be found on board,) for three days, when they sent this deponent on shore, alone, near Camrioca, to the windward of Matanzas; for the three days this deponent was confined he had no communication with any one, and knows not what was done with Captain Allen and his crew."

"It is greatly to be feared that these unfortunate men have all been destroyed by the pirates, a fate from which the above named passenger was only saved by being a Spaniard.

"From further information derived from this passenger, I apprehend there was on board the Mercator both public and private letters for me, sent from the Department of State, through the Collector's office of New York. I mention this that, should the fact be so, and the communications of importance, duplicates may be despatched to me.

"The United States brig Grampus, Commandant Sloat, arrived off this port on the 7th, and sent in her boat with an officer. The Grampus is from the coast of Mexico, and is bound to New York. The consul wrote to Captain Sloat, informing him of the appearance of the pirates off Matanzas, and advising him to proceed to that place. I urged the same in a message by the lieutenant who was sent on shore. The Grampus sailed the same night, and I take it for granted has proceeded to the scene of those depredations.

"It will thus be seen to what a fearful head so short an interval of the absence of our vessels-of-war has enabled this horrible system of piracy again to swell, demonstrating conclusively that, though rendered inert for a time by the pressure of external force, it has continued to exist in full vitality, and ready to be exerted the moment that pressure was removed. Such, it is feared, will ever be the case until measures of greater severity on the part of the United States shall be resorted to. I hope the importance of the subject will serve as an excuse for me if I attempt, somewhat at large, to explain the nature and extent of this evil, and respectfully to suggest the only remedy which appears to me to be effectual and adequate to its entire suppression.

"It may be now assumed as an undoubted fact that the crime of piracy is not limited to the mariners who are the active agents in its perpetration, but has advocates and partisans in a very numerous class of the inhabitants of this island. Of the latter class, many have a direct concern in the equipment and arming of those vessels and a participation in their plunder. Others amongst the planters on the coast and the merchants are indirectly concerned in the great profit derived from purchasing the property plundered by them. Besides those persons thus concerned, the Spaniards of this island, generally, observe with perfect apathy, and some even with pleasure, those depredations against the commerce of the United States, for it is not a little extraordinary that one may hear in the streets of Matanzas, and even of this city, this most odious crime warmly defended, on principle, by men of property, and deemed respectable here. They urge in its defence that it is but a retaliation for the conduct of citizens of the United States in capturing, under the insurgent flag, the property of Spaniards. They say that the conduct of the people of Regla and Matanzas, and other places from which the pirates issue, is no worse than that pursued in certain places in the United States which they name. Many of the Spanish merchants have sustained immense losses from captures made by Colombian and other vessels-of-war, and privateers, commanded and partly manned by citizens of the United States; and they assert that the conduct of our Government and its citizens, in this particular, is no less reprehensible than that which is charged against the Spaniards in respect to piracy. I shall not stop to show the utter absence of truth in the charge made against the Government of the United States; and although I entirely disapprove of the conduct of those Americans who, for the sake of plunder, have engaged in the war between Spain and her colonies, I do not think it necessary to point out the great difference of turpitude in the respective practices. I merely mention the opinions of those Spaniards to give semblance and probability to the sentiments they utter, which would, otherwise, from their extreme perversity and immorality, be scarcely credited. The moment a prize to the pirates arrives on the coast, persons from the interior throng to the spot to share in or purchase the plunder, as in the late case of the brig Castor. The property soon finds its way into the cities and tempts cupidity by the advantages of the traffic. But four days past, the anchor and cable of the brig Castor, plundered about the beginning of this month, was found on board an American vessel in this port, the captain of which purchased it from the Patron of a droger or coaster of this island. Two years ago it was common for persons to cross the harbor to Regla publicly to buy property from the pirates. Allegations of this kind have been repeatedly made in the United States, and generally credited, and it is believed that the records of your Department contain sufficient proof of their truth. Here they are matters of notoriety, and generally credited.

"A publication appeared in the Charleston Courier, in or about September, 1823, in relation to this subject, containing a detail of the transactions at Regla. A suit was brought in the court of Carolina, by a Spaniard of Regla, against the editor of the Courier, for a libel, in charging him with being concerned with the pirates. A commission has been sent to this place to examine witnesses in behalf of the defendant in justification of the publication, and the commission is now open. The subject is much talked of, and I have been told by some of the commissioners, and by many of the most respectable merchants of this place, that every allegation in the piece charged as libellous is unquestionably true, and susceptible of full proof if witnesses dare to declare the whole truth. But such is the fear of the prosecutor and his associates, that it will be difficult to find a witness hardy enough to expose himself to the vengeance of those men, by disclosing, at this place, what he knows of their practices. The publication is said here to be a true but faint and imperfect sketch of the horrible transactions of the period to which it alludes. For that reason I mention it that it may be referred to for further information. I beg leave, for further confirmation of the opinions above advanced, to mention one other fact, which I have received from a gentleman of unquestionable veracity.

"A representation was made to the Captain General, about the period of the greatest activity amongst the pirates, that a large sum of money in doubloons, which had been plundered from a Boston vessel, had been traced to Regla, and could there be found and identified. Information had been given by one of the pirates concerned in the capture. After instituting an examination, the Captain General sent for the claimant, and informed him, 'that he feared all Regla would be found to be implicated in the robbery; and that, in the present disturbed and critical condition of the island, he dared not push the investigation further;' and so the affair rested.

"While, then, those practices, so far from finding a corrective or check in the moral feeling of this community, are rather countenanced and aided by it, it is obvious that a Government of even greater energy and virtue than that of this island would be scarcely adequate to their suppression. But with the exception of the present chief of this Government, and a very few of its highest officers, it is more than suspected that the great majority of these public agents are either indifferent, or feel an interest adverse to its suppression. Participating in the general prejudices of their countrymen, they have also a pecuniary interest in occasionally conniving at those robberies, and in protecting their perpetrators from the hands of justice. I should not have credited those charges but upon the most undoubted testimony. Various facts have been mentioned to me by resident merchants, of the highest respectability, of this place, as being known to them personally, where the officers of the customs and others have got possession of property known to have been captured by pirates, and have applied the whole or the greater part to their own use, preventing the legal owners from all chance of identifying and recovering their property; where they have, for large rewards, suffered persons known to be pirates to escape from justice. The case of the cargo of the Jamaica coffee, brought to this place, which is referred to in the Charleston Courier, above mentioned, was told to me as an undoubted fact before I had read it in that paper. Even where a few of the pirates have had the singular ill fortune to be arrested and confined in prison, they either manage to escape by bribery, or they are confined without trial until their names and offences have been forgotten, and their crimes no longer susceptible of proof.

"In aid of those moral causes, there exist others of a local and physical character, furnishing those marauders the means both of annoyance and protection. The numerous ports of this island, only partially visited by and known to strangers, afford them every facility to secrete their plunder and evade the most rigorous pursuit.

"Whatever disposition, then, the present Governor may evince to suppress this crime, (and from information I have received he has used every exertion,) his efforts, unaided by the executive officers, by the tribunals, and by public opinion, will be powerless and ineffectual; nor can more satisfactory results be anticipated from the application of the most active system of mere external preventive measures, such as have been heretofore resorted to by the United States. If experience had not conclusively settled the question, the facts and reasons above stated would seem sufficient to demonstrate, a priori, the inefficacy of those measures of prevention.

"Notwithstanding the large armament maintained by the United States on this coast, attended with a profuse waste of treasure, and with the sacrifice of the healths and lives of so many of their gallant crews, the only result has been the temporary and partial interruption of the practice, while the source and cause of the mischief have not been reached.

"This naturally brings me to an inquiry as to the means adequate to its suppression; and the obvious result, from what has been stated, is, that the remedy, to be effectual, must be applied directly to the origin and seat of the evil. Public opinion in this island must be changed; and as this cannot be effected by reason, or the voice of justice, it must be corrected by force. The authorities must be stimulated by counter-motives of interest or fear to the exercise of greater vigilance, and to measures of more rigor and severity against delinquents. Those salutary changes, in my opinion, can only be produced by a rigid system of reprisals and hostilities, on the part of the United States, against Spanish property, and particularly that belonging to this island. This plan is by no means new, but has been often suggested, and (I am informed) by the Committee of "Foreign Relations," at the last session of Congress. I have not read the report, but am told the committee forbear to recommend its immediate adoption, but advise the awaiting the result of an application to the supreme Government of Spain. If the views above presented, of the causes and extent of the evil, be correct, it is to be feared that, as at present circumstanced, Spain can do but little to remedy it. It is not believed that she is able or willing to spare an adequate force to effect the object. New orders may be issued to the authorities here, enjoining greater vigilance and energy, but it cannot be conceived that any greater sanction or obligation can be thereby superadded to those which ought already to exist. Those, however, have been insufficient so far.

"I am not unaware that the Executive, without the sanction of Congress, is incompetent to apply the above remedy. The remarks are made to impress the principle I wish to inculcate, and which I hope will be concurred in, that this remedy must in all probability be eventually resorted to, and thus to induce corresponding preparations.

"The reprisals should not be confined to the capturing of the foreign commerce of the island and its coasting trade, but should also extend to the levying of contributions on all places and towns on the coast (wherever assailable) at which piratical vessels are fitted out or received. The advantages of this would be, that every part of the community would partake of the distress caused by those retaliatory measures. Those participating, directly or indirectly, would be detected and exposed by their exasperated countrymen and be made to disgorge their plunder. Those merely indifferent or favorable to the crimes of those pirates would, through interest and fear, be incited to discountenance them. The planters would suffer by the capture of their produce in the coasting vessels; the merchants and others by the contributions levied on their property, and by the capture and interruption of their commerce. The authorities would be incited to redoubled vigilance and vigor, and, receiving the co-operation of the inhabitants, would in a short time render the pursuit of this practice hazardous and fruitless. For when it shall have been seen that for every capture made by pirates from this island strict and full retribution will be exacted from the inhabitants, there can be no doubt that the great mass of the community will combine to rid themselves of the cause of this infliction. That thus combined their efforts would be adequate to its extinction, no reasonable doubt can be entertained. If a rigorous blockade of the ports of this island was at the same time established, the distress produced, as well to individuals as to the Government, in cutting off its only source of supply and ordinary revenue, would soon bring all parties to a proper sense of their true interest and duty.

"It would be unnecessary and presumptuous in me to offer, seriously, to prove that such a course on the part of the United States would be fully justified by every principle of reason and of international law applicable to the subject. The facts of the case prove that a large part of the people of this island are engaged in hostilities of the most cruel and oppressive character against the property and lives of citizens of the United States, without the inclination or ability on the part of the supreme Government of Spain or the local authorities to put a stop to it. Nothing short of this remedy can afford a corrective, which is, therefore, justified on the great principles of humanity and self-defence.

"As to the amount of force adequate to effect those objects, it is believed that a ship of the line, a frigate, or two sloops-of-war, with some smaller vessels, armed with the requisite powers to make reprisals, would, in the course of a few months, give an entire check to it. Upon this subject, however, the President can doubtless be better informed by the naval officers of the United States.

"It is with feelings of more than mere diffidence that I have ventured, from a sense of duty, to submit with freedom these ideas to the Government. I claim for them no originality, for they are common to all the intelligent men with whom I have conversed who are acquainted with the transactions of this island for the last few years; and I shall be better satisfied if they are found to coincide with the opinions already formed by the Executive of the United States on this interesting subject.

"I have just been informed by Captain Paine, of the United States schooner Weasel, (arrived yesterday,) that he visited Port Escondido and its vicinity since the period of the captures made off that place, but could find no pirates. From the evidences of their practices existing there he will be induced to repeat his visit. This shows with what facility the pirates are enabled to dispose of their prizes and evade pursuit. The United States ship John Adams, Captain Dallas, arrived in this port the 12th instant from the Bay of Mexico, and will leave it for Philadelphia this day or to-morrow. I hasten to close this letter to be despatched by that ship."

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Randall to the Secretary of State, dated

HAVANA, September 6, 1824.

"The Government will have learned from my letter of the 14th July, by the John Adams, and from other accounts, of the renewal of the piracies at this island in their most atrocious and sanguinary form. In that letter I mentioned the cases of the Mercator, the Castor, and others. While at Matanzas I was informed that several other captures had occurred near that city, but, from the destruction of the vessels and crews, no particulars were known. At the same time the brig Industry, of Baltimore, when in the harbor of Matanzas, and only a few miles from the city, was attacked by five piratical boats, which were beaten off. The firing was distinctly heard in Matanzas. A Spanish brig-of-war lay in the port, but no efforts were made to capture the boats."

"While at Matanzas and in its neighborhood I heard much of the nature and extent of the piracies committed there, and of the extensive participation in it by persons of the city and country. The facts are truly appalling, and far exceed in degree and turpitude the views of it presented in my letter of the 14th July. Large quantities of their plunder are known to have been introduced by the pirates into Matanzas, and are vended there at prices which alone betray the nature of the property. Many articles of a peculiar fabric, and known not to have been regularly introduced, are seen there constantly, such as French hats, of the newest fashion, on the heads of vulgar ruffians. The retailers of goods are seen travelling to the coast with pack-horses, for the known purpose of making purchases from the pirates. A respectable Englishman, who keeps the ferry near the city, informed me that the returns from his ferry give certain indications when prizes are on the coast, from the number of persons who resort from Matanzas to their rendezvous. No effectual measures are taken to stop this traffic. If, occasionally, goods are seized in the attempt to smuggle them into the city, the affair terminates by their condemnation, or being taken by the officers of the customs, and nothing more is heard of it. Persons known to be pirates walk the streets unmolested, no one being willing to incur the risk of denouncing them.

"But very recently a scene of piracy has been exposed in another quarter, which must have been acting for several months, and which, for the extent of its depredations and their atrocity, transcends all that have been known for several years. They have taken place at Baya Honda, to the leeward of this place, near Cape San Antonio, the old scene of similar crimes. Information having been given to Captain Graham, of the British sloop-of-war Icarus, an expedition was fitted out in his boats, which proceeded to Baya Honda on the 21st ultimo, and succeeded in capturing two pirate vessels and in killing several of the pirates. On the approach of the boats the pirates, about forty in number, fled into the bushes. On board one of the pirate vessels were confined the captain and crew of the brig Henry, of Hartford, Connecticut, who were most seasonably released. The Henry was captured on the 16th ultimo, bound from a port in Mexico to Matanzas, with a cargo of mules. The captain and his crew were treated with the accustomed cruelty of those ruffians, and were designed to be killed the next day, after they had assisted in landing the mules. The Henry was dismayed and stripped.

"In the bay were found the wrecks of twelve vessels recently destroyed by the pirates, the crews of all of which are supposed to have been murdered. Some of the vessels were very large, and the British officers computed that their crews could not have consisted of a less number than one hundred and twenty persons. Of this horde of villains nothing had been previously heard, and they had been no doubt carrying on their depredations for a considerable time without interruption. Some of the crew of the Henry were told by the pirates that all those vessels, twelve in number, had been captured and destroyed by them; and upon being asked what had been done with their crews, they very significantly shrugged their shoulders, but gave no answer. This part of the coast has been but little observed of late by men-of-war, from an idea that the pirates had entirely deserted it, and it is still believed to be very imperfectly explored and known. The place is represented as having many secret harbors, difficult of detection without a very strict scrutiny with boats. The pirates run their prizes into those small harbors or inlets, cut away their masts, and to vessels merely cruising in the bay they are then invisible. It is further stated by the crew of the Henry that the pirates had sold to persons on shore the mules on board that vessel, which they were about landing when surprised by the boats of the Icarus. It is impossible that such extensive operations could have been carried on without the full knowledge and participation of the adjacent country.

"Captain Graham made a representation to the authorities of the island, but, I am told, complains much of the apathy evinced by them on the occasion. He has, however, been promised that measures should be taken to discover and punish the delinquents, to which purpose orders would be sent to the captain of the 'partido' or district where the affair occurred. To Captain Graham, his officers, and men, the greatest praise is due for their promptness in equipping the force, the gallantry and spirit with which it was conducted, and not less for their humanity to our unfortunate seamen, whom they relieved in the very crisis of their fate. This officer was before advantageously known for his good conduct and success against the pirates, in killing the noted chief, P  p  , and destroying his establishment at the Isle of Pines. Captain Graham states that the Governor of the Isle of Pines had, a short time before, presented to this notorious pirate an elegant pair of pistols. On the destruction of his party by the English, this same Governor claimed great merit for the aid he afforded. I have also been told, and have reason to believe, that the Spanish brig-of-war 'El Marte,' Don Jos   Apodaca commander, a few days since fell in with and boarded a pirate vessel, the consort of those destroyed by the boats of the Icarus. The visit terminated, however, in mutual civilities. The officers of the man-of-war received various presents from the pirate and let him pass, although his character was well known to all on board. The pirate urged that he only cruised against the enemies of Spain. The account is given by a seaman who was on board the 'Marte,' and visited the pirate.

"I report these facts, out of many similar ones which occur, to satisfy the Government that the whole body of the State is infected and tainted with this dreadful crime, and as a justification for any extremity of treatment which the United States may find it necessary to apply. I must add my increased conviction, arising from more varied information, that nothing short of a system of strict reprisals against this island, its trade, and property, will afford an effectual remedy. I took the liberty, in my letter sent by the John Adams, to offer some remarks in recommendation of this measure. In the meantime, to check and restrain it partially, a large and active force must be constantly kept up on this coast. It is also, in my opinion, necessary that the force employed should be always present, with an undivided view and attention to this business. Their occasional absence on other duties materially impairs their efficacy. Their operations against the pirates should be consecutive and unremitting. It has been found that occasional visits to suspected places, by different vessels, and at long intervals, produce no serious impression on the pirates. They serve, it is true, to afford convoy and a momentary protection, but the intervals of their absence are occupied by the pirates in renewed depredations. It is considered by all intelligent persons at Matanzas to be indispensable that a vessel of at least the force of one of our largest schooners should be constantly lying in the entrance of that harbor. The advantage of such a measure has been before evinced. While on this subject, I think it my duty to state that much dissatisfaction and complaint exists amongst the merchants and traders here, citizens of the United States, because of the great diminution of our naval force in this quarter during the past summer. They allege the summer months to be much more fraught with danger to vessels, because of the calms which prevail, and which, while they permit the smallest species of piratical boats to keep the sea, expose the merchant vessels much more to their attacks. In the more boisterous months many of those boats cannot cruise, and the vessels approaching rapidly to the coast, and running at once into port, are much less liable to capture. I have endeavored to silence their complaints (which will probably be heard in the United States) and to convince them that every possible care has been taken to afford them protection. I cannot but lament, however, the causes (sufficient no doubt) which have induced the withdrawing of so large a portion of the force. Recent events here have proved, that if this was induced by the supposition that piracy was effectually put down, or that the force left was adequate to restrain it, the opinion was erroneous and its consequences deplorable."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Randall to the Secretary of State, dated

HAVANA, September 15, 1824.

"The pirates at Key Sal and to the windward have lately received an increase of numbers, which threatens to give more extension to their ravages. Several slave vessels and others were captured by a Colombian privateer, and their crews, to the number of 140 men, sent into Matanzas. A large number of those desperadoes stole boats and left that place avowedly to join the pirates. The vessels to which they belonged were under convoy of a French brig-of-war, which, however, did not attempt to afford them any protection. This conduct of the French commander has much exasperated the Spaniards, and they are now as much incensed against the French as they were before against the Americans and English. Some of the owners of those vessels openly threaten reprisals, and say they will respect no flag; in other words, that they will turn pirates and make up their losses.

"Some persons have been lately arrested at or near Baya Honda and sent in custody to this city, charged with being concerned in the late piracies committed in that quarter. Some of them belong to Regla, a village in this harbor which has ever been the headquarters of the pirates. The authorities of this island have, at length, made a serious effort against the pirates. An expedition of launches and boats was prepared and actually sailed on the night of the 12th instant on this service. To conceal the design from the pirates, an embargo was, on the 11th, laid upon all vessels and boats in this harbor, which was not raised until the 14th. But, as much time was consumed by their tardy preparations, and no other precautions taken to prevent its being known, it is not to be doubted that the pirates have received, from their fellows here, timely intelligence of the movement. This new-born zeal of the authorities has excited some surprise and speculation in this city. It is supposed to have [been] excited by the affair of the brig Marte, mentioned in my last letter. The commandant of that vessel has himself reported to the Government his having fallen in with the pirates off 'Cayo Comfites,' or Sugar Key, and that he had treated with them under a flag of truce, not feeling strong enough to attack them. This disgraceful affair has thrown such contempt on the flag of Spain and its authorities that Government is now incited to attempt something effectual. The present expedition is, however, the subject of derision in this city, and from its composition promises nothing but failure and disgrace. I anticipate better results from two other expeditions which will be on the same service about the same time. The one in his British Majesty's brig Thracian, which sailed the 13th to the windward, on a cruise against the pirates. The other has been fitting out at Key West for some days past, and has ere this, I hope, fallen in with the party at Sugar Key."

HAVANA, October 1, 1824.

"My former letters contain all the cases of piracy which have come to my knowledge since my residence at this place, and I regret I have to add to the black catalogue some recent instances, marked with a degree of cruelty so wanton and atrocious as to be peculiar even in the annals of this most barbarous warfare. Several American vessels were captured about the 20th instant, near Matanzas, by a large launch from Regla, their crews all murdered, with the exception of one seaman, and the vessels burnt. Two of the vessels are known, viz: the Laura Ann and the Morning Star, both of New York, the latter supposed to have been bound to New Orleans, with passengers. From the first named vessel one seaman escaped, by secreting himself under the cargo, when his companions were murdered. The pirates, after setting fire to the vessel, deserted her, when this seaman escaped by swimming to the shore. He reached Matanzas, and has there given a detail of the horrid affair. A piratical boat, belonging to Regla, was, the next day, captured by the boats of the United States schooner Porpoise, and is the same which made the above captures. Her crew, unfortunately, escaped to the shore at —.

"The boat and the articles which it contained gave bloody evidences of the tragical scenes which had been acted by its crew. Many suits of clothes were found on board, bloody, and pierced with holes, through which their unfortunate wearers had been stabbed. Some of them, partly worn, belonged to females.

"The pirates are known to have remained together, and to have slept the ensuing night in a house on the shore, near —, without molestation, although the blaze of the vessel which they burnt, and the pursuit of their vessel by the boats of the Porpoise, were all distinctly seen by the people on the shore, in whose view the pirates landed. Those facts I have just heard from a respectable person from Matanzas, and Mr. Mountain has received a letter from Matanzas of the same tenor. This letter has been sent to the Captain General, on his application.

"A full detail of the affair has, no doubt, been sent to the United States by the naval officers and the consular agents on that station. Other vessels are missing, and are supposed to have shared the same fate. From the evidence of the seaman of the Laura Ann, above referred to, it appears that the pirates were not content with simply putting to death the crew of that vessel, which made no resistance and offered nothing to excite their cupidity, but perpetrated it with the most refined and cruel tortures they could invent. It is an important fact, also, in this case, that the fate of the Laura Ann was known at this place, through the means of the pirates themselves, more than twenty-four hours before any regular communications had or could have been received from the scene of action through any other medium. The first account came from Regla, and when inquiries were made by me as to its authority, I was answered, 'that it was undoubtedly true, for it came from Regla, and might, therefore, be relied upon as official.' One other circumstance convinces me that the first account must have been communicated by the pirates themselves to their confederates in Regla. It is this: it was first reported here that every man on board had been put to death. This the pirates certainly must have believed to be the case, from the care they took to effect it, and that the burning of the vessel had sealed the fate of all on board, and thus they reported it. The escape of the seaman was not known until the arrival of the steamboat from Matanzas brought the first authentic and certain intelligence on the subject.

"It will thus be seen that this horrible crime continues to be perpetrated to an extent, and with a savage ferocity, never before equalled. Of the numerous captures, the particulars of which are known, the indiscriminate murder of all on board appears to be the settled purpose of those remorseless villains. It is painful to reflect upon the numbers who may have fallen victims to the same fate, but whose tragical history may be buried in the ocean with their mangled bodies. It is now obvious that piracy has found so congenial a soil, has grown to so fearful an extent, and is so deeply rooted in this island, as to require the efforts of all commercial nations to eradicate it. Piracy, with the slave trade, (the prolific parent of this and many other crimes,) now reign in full licentiousness, and defy as well the sanction of law as the impotent arm of Government. These crimes have become the settled, inveterate habit and occupation of a large portion of the people of this island. The thirst for illicit gain has displaced all desire for fair and legitimate acquisitions, and familiarity with scenes of blood and carnage has stifled the voice of humanity and remorse. It has now become a cause in which not only individual property and lives, to a fearful aggregate, are jeopardized, but even the honor of nations and the cause of civilization are at stake. It cannot be endured, that this band of remorseless wretches should be suffered longer to cumber the earth. The robberies and cruelties of the Barbary States, which have so often roused all Christendom to arms, were trifling in extent and ferocity, compared with those of the pirates of Cuba. It is in vain for commercial nations to rely for security upon mere preventive measures at sea, or upon the efforts of the authorities and people of this island to extirpate it. The authorities cannot restrain it if they would. Even the present Governor, characterized as he is for firmness and moral courage, feels his honor too precarious, at this crisis, to venture upon the measures of rigor and severity essential to its suppression. The ridiculous issue of the late expedition from this port has only served to display in full relief the weakness of the Government, and to afford another argument of security to the pirates. The unprincipled and wicked have obtained the complete ascendancy, and the honest few dare not denounce or pursue the criminals. In such a state of things the pirates must be pursued by foreign forces into their retreats on land, and this community coerced by a severe and just retribution to aid in ejecting those miscreants from its bosom. The cause of justice and humanity will require that parts of this island be occupied by a foreign force, and that the sword of justice be wrested from the hands of those who have proved themselves unworthy or too weak to wield it. Pardon me, sir, if on this subject I suffer my feelings to lead me into too great a warmth of expression or importunity of zeal. To be here on the spot, to witness these horrid scenes of devastation and murder upon the unarmed citizens of friendly nations; to know that these savage acts are participated in and countenanced by numbers, and viewed with a frigid indifference by the whole community; to find the Government of this island shamefully remiss in measures of prevention and punishment, cannot but excite the most lively indignation at the past, and the most intense anxiety for the future.

"On this subject, I beg leave to refer you to a publication in the National Gazette, of Philadelphia, of the 17th September last, which I have just read, and which presents a most lively and faithful picture of this crime in Cuba. This piece has excited much sensation at this place, and the entire accuracy of its details, and the profound and just views which it exhibits of the causes, nature, and extent of this crime, are borne testimony to by every intelligent man with whom I have conversed upon the subject. I beg leave to refer to this account (the writer of which I know not) as developing fully, and more ably than I could myself do, my views upon this subject.

"I take the liberty to add some remarks on the disposition and conduct of the naval forces of the United States on this station, which were designed to be employed in the suppression of piracy. It is here a matter of common observation and complaint, that the anti-piratical squadron has effected nothing against the pirates, commensurate with its numbers and force, during the last six months. This has not been owing to the want of zeal, of enterprise, or courage on the part of our officers and seamen actually engaged in this pursuit, but to their diversion to other objects incompatible with the efficient performance of this highly important service. Since the spring the vessels have been dispersed on various services remote from this island, which they have merely made a touching point 'in transitu,' without remaining long enough to make any permanent impression on the system. For a considerable time the most exposed part of this coast, at the most dangerous season, was not visited by a single vessel of war, and, for a still longer time, by none but the smallest and most inefficient.

The temporary cessation of piracies some time before, caused by the presence of a large force on the coast, seems to have induced a delusive and fatal opinion that the evil was extinguished, and to have led to the diversion of too large a portion of the force to objects of infinitely less pecuniary, and of scarcely any national importance. I allude to the carrying of specie for our merchants in vessels of war, the whole effect of which is to give a trifling premium of insurance to one class of the community which would otherwise be paid to another class. In denouncing this practice as detrimental to the best interests of the nation, I but repeat the common sentiment of every man who has witnessed its effects during the past summer. If the benefit to commerce by this medium for the transportation of specie be of sufficient importance, it may be effected by vessels especially designated for that purpose. But experience shows that the suppression of piracy and the transportation of specie on the late system are incompatible. The first alone is more than sufficient to occupy all the time and energies of any force we can detach for that service. It must be evident that officers arriving here, their vessels freighted with large sums of money deliverable in the United States or elsewhere, for which they have signed bills of lading, and on which insurance has been effected by all parties for their respective interests, have contracted obligations, always embarrassing and frequently directly adverse to the performance of some important service. Such has been the predicament of many vessels of the United States, designed to protect our trade against the pirates, which have merely touched at this island, in their voyages to and from other islands out of the sphere of piracy, and the ports of the Gulf of Mexico, the usual termini of those cruises. They stop at the larger ports of this island barely time enough to take in water, and other supplies, to land or receive specie, and then, after a long cruise, return to the United States, their usefulness limited to the convoying of a few vessels from the coast. I trust the notoriety of the practice here, its effects upon the character of the Navy and of the nation, and more especially upon the property and lives of our citizens, will be sufficient to justify these suggestions. I am aware that it is a delicate subject, and not lightly or rashly to be touched; but I should illy discharge my duty as an American citizen, and as an officer of the Government, if, from an ill-timed or fastidious delicacy, I omitted to denounce a practice so pregnant with mischief.

"I am happy to add, that Captain Kennedy and the officers now on this station discountenance this practice, and that both their conduct and proceedings are entirely conformable to the most rigid dictates of duty. The Hornet, the Porpoise, and some of the smaller vessels, are actively engaged in the pursuit of the pirates."

John Mountain, Esq., acting as Consul, to John Warner, Esq., Consul of the United States, dated

HAVANA, July 5, 1824.

MY DEAR SIR: I am sorry to inform you that, in consequence of the absence of our squadron in this quarter, the pirates have again commenced their diabolical depredations on our commerce on this side of the island.

The brig Castor, of Portland, Captain Hood, from thence bound to Matanzas, was on the 1st instant, in the bay of Matanzas, boarded by a boat with seven men armed with muskets, carbines, swords, pistols and knives, who ordered the captain to take the vessel out; when, after beating the master most cruelly and driving the crew below, brought the vessel to anchor in the port of Escondido, where they robbed her of everything portable on board; the captain arrived here on the next day.

The brig John, of Portland, has arrived at Matanzas, after having been robbed of everything, except the lumber on board, by those marauders; the master and crew have been all treated in a very cruel manner. The pirates now boast that they have nothing to fear, as the United States squadron has left the station.

A number of American vessels are loaded and ready for sea at Matanzas, but dare not prosecute their voyage, fearful of being overtaken by those worst of enemies.

Several vessels in this port are ready for sea, but are fearful of the consequences of going out to sea; they prefer waiting a few days, hoping that some one of the squadron may come in to afford them protection. What has become of the squadron, and whether it is employed as directed by the act of Congress, appears to be the general inquiry. Indeed, I am unable to give a distinct answer to these questions. I have only to join in the general lamentations that this coast is entirely neglected, unprotected, and our commerce and citizens left completely at the mercy and entire control of a set of cut-throats, who boast and rejoice at the favorable opportunity of enriching themselves by plundering the Americans.

The Betsy, Done, a brig bound to Matanzas, has also been robbed, near Matanzas, of all that part of her cargo consisting of provisions, clothes, sails, rigging, boat, oars, &c.

Some two or three others are reported to be in the possession of the pirates at this time, but of this I have no certain information. I mention it as rumor, but am fearful it may be true.

I am, my dear sir, your very obedient servant,

JOHN MOUNTAIN.

"Herewith accompanying I have given you a long extract of a letter from Mr. Lattin, of Matanzas. It is a lamentable fact that, unless some efficient measures are taken by our Government to put a stop to the pirates, our poor countrymen must suffer; it is too true our trade has not been protected on this side of Cuba since early last spring; our men-of-war have, it is certain, occasionally been here, and off here on their way to or from the ports in the bay of Mexico, carrying freight. A thirst for making money prevails with others as well as those in the island of Cuba."

Mr. Mountain, acting Consul of the United States at Havana, to Mr. Warner, the Consul.

HAVANA, October 30, 1824.

MY DEAR SIR: Herewith I have the pleasure to hand you the latest weekly report.

Piracies have again commenced on or near the shores of Cuba to an alarming degree. The following is an extract of a letter from Mr. Lattin, with whom you are acquainted, dated

"MATANZAS, October 27, 1824.

"I am sorry to say the pirates have committed the most horrid depredations last Thursday and Friday between this and your port. The Laura Ann, of New York, belonging to Griswold, of that place, from Montevideo, with a cargo of jerked beef, was taken, all the crew except one hung, the vessel set on fire, when Jack, who had hid away amongst the beef, crawled out, jumped overboard, and got ashore; he presented himself here on Monday morning, in a state of nudity, not able to walk. He states that they first hung the captain, then the second mate, laid them on the quarter deck, talked as if they did not intend to injure the sailors, but drove them into the fore-castle, and were taken up one by one, and he had proof of their experiencing the same fate, which induced him to hide himself amongst the beef; they searched for him with a light, some saying todos had been hung, and others declaring uno mas. The fact is, they were determined, if not hung, he should be roasted; accordingly, set fire abaft to the vessel; after ascending on deck, he could see the dead bodies lying amongst the flames on the quarter deck; took his station on the bowsprit, and fell to praying; they having thrown beef overboard, the sharks were in abundance, which held poor Jack mighty uneasy; he preferred the risk of the watery enemy to the flames, and let himself down by a rope, when two sharks took him under their protection, swimming along side of him, so as occasionally to be in his way; so soon as he got to the rocks, they tacked ship and left him. Jack has some confidence in prayers; this took place just at dark; the burning of the brig gave light to see his companions on his way ashore, which was about 20 rods; after resting awhile, he looked out for a hole to pass the night; he found one with sundry goods in it, which induced him to clear out, and proceed from the scene of horror; he represents having fell in with several deposits of goods. Last evening the Ferret arrived, and has gone out, taking Jack to survey the premises; I hope they may succeed in getting some of the plunder. Jack says a brig was taken on Friday morning, and a schooner in the afternoon, by the same party; the boat is a schooner of about 25 to 30 hogsheads; was taken on Friday by the boats of the Porpoise off Camarioca, loaded with clothing, &c.; three American colors, six compasses, five quadrants, &c.; the crew all escaped on shore. Mr. Smith, from Camarioca, came in last night; was with all the English families on the beach; heard the firing, and afterwards that thirteen armed men had gone to a small estate and demanded food; the captain of the Partido got out his forces, but none were taken. We judge upwards of thirty lives were sacrificed from the three vessels taken; the letter bag of the brig Morning Star, of New York, was on board the piratical boat. If some efficient measures are not taken by foreign nations, we may say, shake hands Algiers, and acknowledge the buccaniers of Cuba to be your superiors in barbarity. The subject of this is an insult on our Government, and if Commodore Porter does not be prevailed on to believe the coasts of Cuba are not quite cleared of pirates, we may expect to hear of many tragical cases shortly."

The foregoing account, I have no doubt, is strictly true.

His excellency sent for and obtained Mr. Lattin's letter twice yesterday and this day for his perusal. We have some assassinations and a few cases of fever, yet the subject of piracy occupies the attention of most people here with whom I mingle.

"Piracies are not at an end; we learn, via Nassau, that the brig Edward, of New York, Dillingham master, from France, has been taken by the pirates, on the 15th day of October, off Cape Maisie, by four boats, manned by Spaniards. The captain and crew were murdered, except the supercargo and three men, who made their escape in an open boat, and, after fifteen days' exposure, landed in a small key near Turk's Island; and from thence were taken to Nassau, New Providence."

Copy of a letter from Mr. Nelson, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid, to Mr. Salazar, Secretary of State, dated

MADRID, September 7, 1824.

The undersigned, the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, begs leave to call the attention of his Catholic Majesty's Government to certain subjects of the deepest interest to the United States, on which the applications heretofore made by the undersigned have failed to arouse the attention or to obtain the slightest mark of regard from his Catholic Majesty. The undersigned, from delicacy to the Sovereign of Spain, whom he found, on his presentation, occupied in the re-establishment of the affairs of the Kingdom, just emerging from the confusion incident to a state of war, has forborne to urge, with the vehement pressure which his instructions from his Government would seem to require, the decisions of Spain on the several reclamations which were a long time since presented by the undersigned to his Catholic Majesty's Secretary of State.

On the 10th day of January last the undersigned had the honor to address to the Secretary of State of his Catholic Majesty a reclamation on the part of his Government, in behalf of its citizens injured by the illegal and piratical conduct of the subjects of his Catholic Majesty in the West Indian seas. It was represented that property to a very large amount had been captured and sent into the ports of his Catholic Majesty in his American possessions, in many instances against all law and justice, by pirates, who, after committing the most atrocious and nefarious deeds, sought and found shelter and an asylum in the islands, and often in the most conspicuous ports and harbors, with the fruits and profits of their inhuman outrages. In many instances these atrocities were perpetrated, not less in defiance of right and justice, by persons pretending to act under color of authority, but whose authority has never been justified; and which, if justified, could never sanction these transactions, marked by a character of piracy and rapacity which no commission could justify. In the cases of robberies committed by the Spanish vessels acting as pirates, the American property thus plundered was often carried into the ports of Cuba, and especially of the Havana, and there, in the most open and daring manner, exposed to sale in the view of the local authorities, unrestrained and unchecked by their slightest interference. American citizens have seen their property, thus violently and feloniously taken from them, offered to sale in open market, without the protection of the local Government in the assertion of their rights, and deterred from the vindication of their just claims by the fullest conviction that they would find no support in the Government of the island, but would meet, in all probability, as the requital of their temerity, the fiend-like vengeance of the murderous assassin. In other instances, where the property of the American citizen has been captured under color of authority in the vessel making the capture, the conduct of the captors has been scarcely less flagrant than that practiced by the pirates. Oftentimes has the booty found in the American vessel been partitioned among the plunderers without going into port, and distributed without legal adjudication by these lawless robbers; and when carried occasionally into port, a secret, unknown, and unfrequented port has been resorted to where law and justice were disregarded, and where every means of obtaining right was denied to the parties concerned—unapprised of the proceedings, and not permitted to avail themselves of the customary means of vindication. In the prosecution of these felonious practices American citizens have been seized and thrown into prison, and there cruelly detained, often in a horrible state of suffering, almost without the indispensable necessities for human subsistence. In some instances, their property, which the merciless captors had spared and sent into port, has been wasted and embezzled to such an extent, that, when the mock trial to which it had been subjected had terminated even in their favor, the subject of controversy could no longer be found. Thus has every species of abuse of the rights of person and of property of American citizens been practiced in these regions. The local authorities have been appealed to in vain. The Government of Spain has been appealed to, as yet, without effect. The reclamations are again renewed—the patience of the American Government is tried to its fullest extent of sufferance—and the day is probably not very distant when the necessity of warding off these reiterated and aggravated injuries, and the obligation of doing justice to its citizens, may compel the Government of the United States to resort to measures of a more efficient character, for prevention of injury and the redress of wrongs. This interesting subject has already claimed the attention of the legislative councils of the nation. They have hitherto forborne to recommend the adoption of measures of reprisals, from a desire to manifest their friendly dispositions to his Catholic Majesty, and from the hope that the reclamations long since presented by their minister near this court would speedily receive attention, and be followed with his Majesty's answer and determination on these important questions. At no very distant period these councils will, in the regular course of their proceedings, be again assembled at the seat of the National Government, when, doubtless, this subject will again be revived by them; and such measures as the existing evils, and the disregard on the part of his Majesty of the demands hitherto presented by the American minister, will form with them irrefragable arguments for the adoption of a more efficient system of energetic policy. The undersigned has presented, in different appeals to the Government of his Catholic Majesty, the various subjects of complaint which have arisen from the misconduct of his Majesty's officers and subjects in his ultramarine possessions. One of the most prominent and aggravated was the sacrifice of a gallant officer of the American Navy, whilst peaceably entering the port of St. John, in Porto Rico, who was most wantonly and treacherously murdered by a gun from the fort, fired by the order of the officer at that time in command, in the absence of the Governor. In this instance, the American Government demands that this subject shall be rigorously investigated, and an adequate punishment inflicted on the officer by whose command this outrage was perpetrated.

An appeal has likewise been made to his Catholic Majesty's Government on the subject of the multiplied piracies which have been committed on the peaceable American commerce in the West Indian seas by vessels equipped and sailing from the ports of his Majesty's possessions in these regions, on which reiterated complaints have been made to the local authorities without effect; and on which the interference of his Majesty has been required to compel those authorities to fulfil their duty in this regard by effectual measures for the suppression of the pirates, and by co-operating with the squadron of the United States, sent into these seas for the extirpation of this scourge to the honest and lawful commerce of the whole civilized world.

Another demand upon his Majesty's Government has been made for indemnification against the enormous losses sustained by the American citizens from the captures made by vessels pretending to act under commissions issued by agents alleging to be authorized by his Catholic Majesty.

The authority to issue these commissions has never been proved; the right to issue them, on the principles avowed, of a paper blockade, without adequate force, of an interdiction of all neutral commerce with the ports of the Spanish Main, or the alleged ancient rights of Spain over that country, has always been resisted and protested against by all neutral nations, and especially by the United States, and relinquished by his Majesty's officers in that region, and finally renounced or abandoned by his Majesty himself in his decree of December last, opening the commerce of these countries to all the world. On this subject, the undersigned, in obedience to instructions of his Government, demanded that a just indemnification should be made to all the American citizens who had suffered any loss in consequence of these illegal acts, done under color and pretence of his Majesty's authority, but really perpetrated in violation of all laws and justice, whose obligation is acknowledged by all the civilized nations of the world.

The release of all citizens and surrender of all American property, whose condition had not been changed, but was unjustifiably and illegally detained, was also required.

The undersigned begs leave to present to his excellency this rapid and cursory sketch of the most important subjects of complaint which he was instructed to press upon the Government of his Catholic Majesty; he begs leave to refer his excellency to the different notes presented by him, dated the 10th and 23d of January, and the 3d of February last, in which these grievances are more minutely and specially detailed, and where the appropriate and specific redress demanded is more explicitly and at large stated than the undersigned has considered it necessary at this time to recapitulate.

The undersigned begs leave to urge upon his excellency the necessity of an early answer to these applications, that his Government may learn how far the spirit and disposition of an harmonious intercourse is reciprocated towards the United States by his Catholic Majesty, that they may be confirmed in that opinion, which they have ever entertained, that an appeal to his Majesty's honor is only necessary to obtain the redress of grievances inflicted without his sanction and authority, and that the United States may be relieved from the painful necessity of deciding that an appeal to a more energetic policy, totally at variance with their ardent desire to preserve harmony and avoid collision, is at length become absolutely and indispensably necessary.

The undersigned tenders to his excellency his most distinguished consideration, and subscribes himself his excellency's very humble and obedient servant,

HUGH NELSON.

REPORT FROM THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 12, 1825.

The Secretary of the Navy has the honor to present the following report, in answer to two resolutions of the Senate of the United States, on the subject of piracies; one of which was passed on December 21, 1824, and the other on the 23d of the same month.

Immediately after the passage of the law of December 20, 1822, "authorizing an additional naval force for the suppression of piracy," the vessels contemplated in that act were purchased and prepared for sea, and, with others, placed under the command of Captain David Porter. They consisted of the sloops John Adams and Hornet; the brig Spark; the schooners Porpoise, Grampus, Alligator, and Shark; the Sea Gull, and eight small schooners; five barges, and one transport ship; in all, seventeen vessels of different sizes, besides the barges.

On February 14, 1823, Captain Porter sailed from the United States, under orders dated February 1, 1823, a copy of which is annexed to this report, and marked A.

The manner in which Captain Porter has performed the duty assigned him, and the "information" received from him, will be seen by the reports from this Department to the President of the United States, and communicated by him with his message at the commencement of the last and present sessions of Congress; and by paper marked B, which was unintentionally omitted in the report from this Department on the first of December last.

All the vessels above enumerated, except four, have been uniformly employed in the object, so far as their size and the necessity of occasional returns into port for stores and repairs would permit. Of the four vessels above alluded to, the Alligator and Wild Cat have been lost, and the Greyhound and Jackal were sold, "being so much out of repair that it was not for the interest of the United States to repair the same."

There are now employed in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico thirteen vessels and five barges; and the frigate Constellation will join the squadron in a few days, her crew being nearly completed. The disposition of the force has been left principally to the commanding officer, who, being in the region where its services were required, was best able to judge of the positions in which the vessels should be placed, and the particular duties each should perform.

The papers herewith transmitted, marked C and D, having been written in answer to letters from the Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, it appears to be proper to communicate them as part of the report from this Department.

SAM. L. SOUTHARD.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

A.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, February 1, 1823.

SIR: You have been appointed to the command of a squadron, fitted out under an act of Congress of the 20th of December last, to cruise in the West Indian seas and Gulf of Mexico for the purpose of suppressing piracy and affording effectual protection to the citizens and commerce of the United States. Your attention will also be extended to the suppression of the slave trade, according to the provisions of the several acts of Congress on that subject; copies of which, and of the instructions heretofore given to our naval commanders thereon, are herewith sent to you. While it is your duty to protect our commerce against all unlawful interruption, and to guard the rights both of person and property of the citizens of the United States wherever it shall become necessary, you will observe the utmost caution not to encroach upon the rights of others; and should you at any time be brought into discussion or collision with any foreign power in relation to such rights, it will be expedient and proper that the same should be conducted with as much moderation and forbearance as is consistent with the honor of your country and the just claims of its citizens. Should you, in your cruise, fall in with any foreign naval force engaged in the suppression of piracy, it is desirable that harmony and a good understanding should be cultivated between you; and you will do everything on your part that accords with the honor of the American flag to promote this object. So soon as the vessels at Norfolk shall be ready for sea, you will proceed to the West Indies by such route as you shall judge best for the purpose of effecting the object of your cruise. You will establish at Thompson's Island, usually called Key West, a depot, and land the ordnance and marines to protect the stores and provisions; if, however, you shall find any important objection to this place, and a more suitable and convenient one can be found, you are at liberty to select it as a depot.

You will announce your arrival and object to the authorities, civil and military, of the island of Cuba, and endeavor to obtain as far as shall be practicable their co-operation, or at least their favorable and friendly support, giving them the most unequivocal assurance that your sole object is the destruction of pirates. The system of piracy which has grown up in the West Indies has obviously arisen from the war between Spain and the new Governments, her late provinces in this hemisphere, and from the limited force in the islands and their sparse population, many portions of each being entirely uninhabited and desolate, to which the active authority of the Government does not extend. It is understood that establishments have been made by parties of those banditti in those uninhabited parts, to which they carry their plunder, and retreat in time of danger. It cannot be presumed that the Government of any island will afford any protection or countenance to such robbers. It may, on the contrary, confidently be believed that all Governments, and particularly those most exposed, will afford all means in their power for their suppression.

Pirates are considered, by the law of nations, the enemies of the human race. It is the duty of all nations to put them down; and none who respect their own character or interest will refuse to do it, much less afford them an asylum and protection. The nation that makes the greatest exertions to suppress such banditti has the greatest merit. In making such exertions, it has a right to the aid of every other power to the extent of its means, and to the enjoyment, under its sanction, of all its rights in the pursuit of the object.

In the case of belligerents, where the army of one party enters the territory of a neutral power, the army of the other has a right to follow it there. In the case of pirates, the right of the armed force of one power to follow them into the territory of another is more complete. In regard to pirates, there is no neutral party, they being the enemies of the human race; all nations are parties against them, and may be considered as allies. The object and intention of our Government is to respect the feelings as well as the rights of others, both in substance and in form, in all the measures which may be adopted to accomplish the end in view. Should, therefore, the crews of any vessels which you have seen engaged in acts of piracy, or which you have just cause to suspect of being of that character, retreat into the ports, harbors, or settled parts of the island, you may enter, in pursuit of them, such ports, harbors, and settled parts of the country, for the purpose of aiding the local authorities or people, as the case may be, to seize and bring the offenders to justice, previously giving notice that this is your sole object.

Where a Government exists and is felt, you will in all instances respect the local authorities, and only act in aid of and co-operation with them, it being the exclusive purpose of the United States to suppress piracy, an object in which all nations are equally interested, and in the accomplishment of which the Spanish authorities and people will, it is presumed, cordially co-operate with you. If, in the pursuit of pirates, found at sea, they shall retreat into the unsettled parts of the islands or foreign territory, you are at liberty to pursue them so long only as there is reasonable prospect of being able to apprehend them; and in no case are you at liberty to pursue and apprehend any one after having been forbidden so to do by competent authority of the local Government. And should you, on such pursuit, apprehend any pirates upon land, you will deliver them over to the proper authority to be dealt with according to law, and you will furnish such evidence as shall be in your power to prove the offence alleged against them. Should the local authorities refuse to receive and prosecute such persons so apprehended, on your furnishing them with reasonable evidence of their guilt, you will then keep them safely and securely on board some of the vessels under your command, and report without delay to this Department the particular circumstances of such cases. Great complaints are made of the interruption and injury to our commerce by privateers fitted out from Spanish ports. You will endeavor to obtain from the Spanish authorities a list of the vessels so commissioned, and ascertain how far they have been instructed to intercept our trade with Mexico and the Colombian Republic, impressing upon them that, according to the well-settled rule of the law of nations, the United States will not consider any portion of coast upon the Gulf of Mexico as legally blockaded, except where a naval force is stationed sufficient to carry into effect the blockading order or decree; and that this Government does not admit the right or authority of Spain to interdict or interrupt our commerce with any portion of the coast included within the Colombian Republic or Mexican Government not actually blockaded by a competent force.

All the United States ships and vessels-of-war in the West Indies, of which a list is herewith inclosed, are placed under your command; and you will distribute them to such stations as shall appear to you best calculated to afford complete protection to our commerce, in which you will embrace the object of protecting the convoy of specie from Vera Cruz, and the Mexican coast generally, to the United States. Keep one vessel, at least, upon this service, to be at or near Vera Cruz during the healthy season of the year, and to be relieved as occasion shall require, both for the convoy of trade and to bring specie to the United States, confining the transportation to the United States only. You will be particularly watchful to preserve the health of the officers and crews under your command, and to guard, in every possible manner, against the unhealthiness of the climate, not permitting any intercourse with the shore where the yellow fever prevails, except in cases of absolute necessity.

Wishing you good health and a successful cruise, I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
SMITH THOMPSON.

Com. DAVID PORTER, Commanding United States Naval Force, West Indies.

Copy of a letter from Lieutenant C. W. Skinner, commander of the United States schooner Porpoise, inclosing copies of the correspondence referred to in the letter.

UNITED STATES SCHOONER PORPOISE, Matanzas, October 24, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, after leaving the convoy from Havana, I stretched in for this port, where I anchored on the evening of the 18th. On inquiry, I was informed no piracies had been recently committed in this vicinity. I, however, determined to despatch the boats secretly from the harbor, and examine the adjacent bays and inlets. On the night of the 19th, I placed them under command of Lieut. Hunter and acting Lieut. Johnson, with orders to examine about Point Yeacos, Sewappa bay, and Camrioca, places long notorious as a retreat for pirates. On the evening of the 22d, Lieut. Hunter returned with a piratical schooner of one carriage gun, one new American cutter, and two other boats; one, having three men on board, he captured in Sewappa bay. Every appearance justified the suspicion of piracy. The persons informed Lieut. Hunter their vessel had been taken by armed men; the boat they were in given in exchange, with a promise of returning in a few days and restoring their vessel. The next day, off Camrioca, Lieut. Hunter discovered a suspicious schooner standing to sea, in chase of a vessel in sight. On his approach, the schooner tacked, and made for the shore, closely pursued by the boats. The crew abandoned the vessel and fled to the wood, where they were sought for in vain; she proved to be a pirate, mounting one gun, and small-arms. From the number of nautical instruments, trunks of clothing, rigging, and sails, with three sets of American colors, found on board, she must have robbed several vessels. From stains of blood on the clothes, and other articles on board, I fear the unfortunate persons to whom they belonged must have been murdered. No papers were discovered which could lead to the name of the vessel or vessels captured; several articles of clothing were marked "Captain Shaw," a number with the initials "A. S." A bag on board was lettered "Brig Morning Star's letter bag." One waistcoat contained in the pocket a printed card, "Mr. M. Loris' boarding-house, Charleston, South Carolina," and appeared to have been newly printed. A medicine chest on board was put up in New York. I have delivered the prisoners to the Governor of Matanzas, and shall furnish him all the testimony in my power which can throw light on their character. The schooner I sent out last night, under command of acting Lieut. Brown, in hopes of decoying some of her former comrades. I sail with convoy to-morrow, and after joining the prize at sea, shall proceed to Thompson's Island for supplies, and return to the protection of commerce on this coast. I trust, sir, should the prize be sufficiently fortunate to meet with pirates, I shall have the pleasure to give a satisfactory account of them.

I do myself the honor to inclose the correspondence relative to the capture of the vessels and prisoners.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

CH. W. SKINNER.

Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary of the Navy, Washington City.

UNITED STATES SCHOONER PORPOISE, Matanzas, October 23, 1824.

I deliver to your excellency three men, captured by a detachment of my boats, a few days since, under circumstances justifying a belief of their having committed piracy. An armed schooner was also captured, which the prisoners claim as their property, alleging, in explanation, that their vessel had been forcibly seized by armed men, and, in exchange, they had received from the pirate his vessel, with a promise to return in a few days, and restore their original property; under this expectation they were anxiously awaiting her arrival. Fortunately for humanity, my boats encountered her; from the quantity of clothing, goods, and nautical instruments found on board, she must have robbed several vessels, and, from stains of blood on clothes, &c., most probably murdered the unfortunate people who fell into their hands. We found on board, also, three sets of American colors. These enormities call loudly for punishment. It affords me pleasure to deliver these people to your excellency, as I am well persuaded, from your well known regard to justice, they will meet the punishment due their crimes.

If your excellency will inform me when you will receive them, they shall be landed under an escort.

I inclose to your excellency the papers found on board; and have the honor to be, respectfully, your excellency's obedient servant,

C. W. SKINNER,

His Excellency Don CECILIO AYLLOR, Governor of Matanzas.

I have just received your statement of this day, relative to the capture of a small vessel, whose crew ran to the sea shore, suspected, with much reason, to be pirates, not only on account of their flight and equipment, but of some crimes committed by them; in consequence thereof, I will give my orders to receive on the wharf, at four o'clock in the afternoon, the three men which you captured, and that you promised to remit me. I hope that to-morrow, between ten and eleven, you will have the kindness to send to this Government the officer and marine guards that joined in the capture of the vessel, to hear their respective informations, as the beginning of the summary. I hope, also, that, for their examination, you will please send the clothes stained with blood, and other articles and arms, all of which will serve for the inquiry or search, and which will be returned whenever you require it, after the matter is finished.

I now put you in mind that the papers that you mention in your statement have not come to hand.

I declare to you that your recommendable services to the cause of humanity, and in favor of our commercial relations, will be worthy of praise to the Superior Government; and for my part, I promise you, with all the justice of the laws, and my firmness to observe them, that I will contribute to the most to the extermination of these wicked men.

With the greatest regard, I am, dear sir, &c.,

CECELIO AYILLOR.

The COMMANDER of the American Schooner-of-war Porpoise.

UNITED STATES SCHOONER PORPOISE, Matanzas, October 24, 1824.

I had the honor to receive your excellency's reply to my communication in relation to the prisoners made by this vessel, and have delivered them agreeably to your wishes. The papers which I neglected to send I forwarded immediately on discovering the omission. The clothes stained with blood, and many other articles, were in a condition so filthy, I caused them to be thrown into the sea; for a corroboration of the testimony which you will receive this day, I beg leave to refer your excellency to the Spanish officer and his interpreter, who came on board the moment of arrival, and to whom the articles alluded to were exhibited.

I have the honor to be, your excellency's obedient servant,

C. W. SKINNER.

His Excellency Don CECELIO AYILLOR, Governor of Matanzas.

Copy of a letter addressed to the honorable Benjamin W. Crowninshield, Chairman of the Naval Committee in the House of Representatives.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 21, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th instant, making certain inquiries respecting the suppression of piracy, to which I submit the following answer:

The nature and extent of the force required must necessarily be regulated by the nature and extent of the evil to be repressed. The views of the Department on this latter point are contained in the annual report made to the President of the United States, and communicated by him to Congress with his message, and to which I beg leave to refer you.

There have lately been very few, if any, vessels of a large size engaged in piratical depredations at a distance from the land. The naval force which has been employed, and which is stated in the report referred to, has succeeded in driving away or destroying vessels of that description, and has thus effected the immediate object for which it was created. But the evil has assumed another shape, for which this force does not seem to be well fitted. Our vessels, even the smallest, cannot follow the pirates into many of the creeks and inlets to which they resort—this must always be done in boats, which cannot be carried by them in sufficient numbers to be effectual; nor can the greater part of them, on account of their size and the want of accommodations for water and stores, remain long at sea, so as permanently and effectually to watch even the most suspected places.

I would, therefore, respectfully recommend three or more frigates, or sloops-of-war, as an addition to the force now in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico, or as a substitute for the small vessels. The sloops would be as competent to the object as the frigates, and would be much less expensive. We cannot, however, detach that or even a less number from the stations where they now are without weakening our squadrons too much.

It will be necessary to build them, which can be done in less time, and at less expense, than would require to repair and fit for sea the same number of frigates. Two, or perhaps three, might be finished in four or five months. These vessels would be able to lie or cruise steadily, and for long periods, where their presence was most needed, and, being well provided with boats, could pursue into any waters where escape was attempted.

In addition to this provision, our officers should be authorized to pursue the pirates wherever they may fly. The authority which has heretofore been given on this point will be seen by the extracts from the orders to Commodore Porter, hereunto annexed, and marked A. The right to follow should be extended to the settled as well as the unsettled parts of the islands; and should this prove ineffectual, a resort will be necessary to such a general and rigorous blockade as will make both the local Governments and their subjects feel that their interest, as well as their honor, requires a respect for our rights and the rights of humanity. For such an extremity, the proposed sloops-of-war will be indispensable. What warnings should be given, or demands made upon Spain, or what negotiations had with other Governments, before this course be adopted, it is not my province to suggest. But, as these pirates are, essentially, robbers, living upon the land, and not upon the ocean, if the local Governments cannot, or will not, prevent them from inflicting such serious injuries upon us, we must seek them where they are to be found, and so punish them as to prevent a repetition of their crimes.

Should the foregoing suggestions be adopted, a law would be necessary authorizing the building of the sloops-of-war, with an appropriation of $85,000 for the cost of each, and $61,086 50 for the annual support of each; or the sums mentioned may be added to the estimates for the support of the Navy; the amount for building, under the head of building and repairs of vessels; and the other under those of—

Pay and subsistence.....	$31,391 50
Provisions.....	15,695 00
Repairs, including wear and tear.....	12,000 00
Hospital stores and medicine.....	2,000 00
	$61,086 50

In answer to your inquiry on the subject, I would suggest that it is not believed to be proper to designate, in any act of Congress, the disposition of the force, the only effect of which would be to apprise the pirates more fully of the mode and place of attack, and thus enable them more surely to escape.

It is proper to remark, that any naval force which we can apply to this object will not be sufficiently extensive to cover, at all times, every part of the shores of the islands and Gulf of Mexico; and that some merchant vessels may, and probably will, be caught, without other protection than that which their own strength affords. Hence, the suggestion of arming them is very obvious, and has been frequently made. The evils to be apprehended from it, however, are equally obvious. No sufficient pledge can be given that some of them, if armed, and feeling their power, would not abuse it, and, in the present situation of the West Indies and countries south of us, endanger our friendly relations, and commit acts almost as much to be deprecated as those against which we are attempting to guard. The natural state of merchant vessels is the peaceful and unarmed state; and although permission to arm might, in this instance, free them from some of the evils to which they would be exposed without such authority, yet it is believed that few whose only object is fair commerce would avail themselves of the legal privilege. The expense and inconvenience of arming is great, and would be illy borne by a large part of the commerce now carried on in that quarter in American vessels. The danger does not seem to be considered so urgent as to compel them to do it. Convoy has been often declined rather than submit to slight delays or changes in the course of the vessel; and it is understood that insurance is unusually low, and that the offices add little, if anything, on account of this risk. It may be effected to the West Indies at one per cent. on the outward, and one on the homeward voyage, and, in some instances, at one and a half, embracing both, which is below the actual expense of arming.

It has been sometimes proposed that the expense should be met by the Government, and protection afforded by placing on board each vessel a number of marines or soldiers; but this plan will at once be perceived to be impracticable, when the number of our merchant vessels is considered, with the different routes which they pursue, and the times at which they sail. The remedy must be extremely partial or the expense enormous. The whole marine corps would, probably, not equal one-fifth of what would be required for a sufficient and equal distribution among all.

It has also been proposed to furnish convoy at stated periods. This could be done at periods of fifteen or twenty days, from some position on our coast to some point which is considered beyond the danger. But to this there are also obvious objections. It would employ all our force in the Atlantic, and prevent attention to other objects; an evil of too serious a magnitude to be encountered. It would be impossible to extend the convoy throughout the whole cruise; and stopping at a given point, the pirates would immediately transfer and renew their attacks beyond that point, where the vessels would, in that case, be more unprotected than they now are. It would also destroy competition of enterprise among our merchants, and confine them all to the same times and course of navigation—an evil which they well know how to estimate. They would not accept your protection at such a price.

I do not, then, perceive in any of the suggestions which have been presented to my mind so cheap, efficient, and certain a remedy for the evil as that which I have preferred; and if it be adopted, we shall, after the proposed vessels are prepared, be enabled to dispose of the small schooners now employed in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico—a force which has been found exceedingly expensive and injurious to the discipline and efficiency of the service.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

SAML L. SOUTHARD.

Extracts of a letter to the Honorable James Lloyd, Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, of the Senate, dated December 29, 1824.

“I have the honor to state that there are no ‘cases of piratical depredations,’ or other information on the subject, in the possession of the Department, which are not referred to in the report accompanying the President’s message to Congress.”

“No reports of cases have been received, except those made by naval officers of such as have come, in some way, under their own observation. No memorandum has been kept of the cases detailed in the public journals, but some of them have occasionally been inclosed to the commanding officer of the station to afford him information in the discharge of his duties.”

“The ‘additional means’ alluded to as proper to be intrusted to the Executive, if an efficient co-operation of the local Governments could not be obtained, were three or four frigates or sloops-of-war, with boats for pursuit of the pirates; authority to pursue them wherever they might attempt to escape, and authority to enforce a rigorous blockade if other efforts should prove ineffectual.”

“I have not supposed that it would be expedient to authorize, by law, our merchant vessels to arm. Should Congress entertain a different opinion on this point, and pass a law on the subject, it should embrace ‘provisions and restrictions’ similar to those contained in the 3d and 4th sections of the ‘Act to authorize the defence of the merchant vessels of the United States against French depredations,’ passed June 25, 1798.”

[2D SESSION.]

CLAIM OF SAMUEL G. PERKINS ON THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT FOR SEQUESTRATIONS IN HOLLAND.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 17, 1825.

To the honorable the House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The memorial of Samuel G. Perkins, of Boston, Massachusetts, is respectfully submitted.

Your memorialist, having seen by the message of the President of the United States to the representatives of the nation that the Government contemplate taking some measures in relation to the property seized and sequestered on the continent of Europe by the French and other Governments submitting to their control, respectfully begs leave to lay before your honorable body a statement of facts in relation to the ship Governor Strong and her cargo, and the brig Sally and her cargo, belonging to the memorialist and other American citizens; parts of which cargoes were sequestered in Holland in the years 1809 and 1810 by the Dutch Government, and by them transferred to the French authorities, under whose orders the same were sold either at Antwerp or Paris, and the net proceeds paid into the caisse d'amortissement, or into the public treasury at Paris for the use of the French Government, in violation of the neutral rights of citizens of these United States, and without even a pretence that the said vessels or their crews had violated any law or decree of either of the said Governments.

The American ship Governor Strong, Robert Lord, master, belonging exclusively to citizens of the United States, was laden at Boston, State of Massachusetts, in May, 1809, with a cargo of sugar, coffee, cotton, potashes, tobacco, logwood, and elephants' teeth, and sailed on the 24th of said month for Rotterdam. On the 20th June she arrived at Helvoet Sluice, without having met with anything worth notice during the passage.

Here the ship was detained until the 7th July, when she was ordered to proceed up to Gravendeel. On her way there and at Gravendeel her cargo was taken out of her into lighters, under the orders of the Commissary General, and deposited in the Government stores, against the will and remonstrance of the master of the said ship.

A portion of the cargo having been subsequently delivered over to the consignees by the Government, will serve to show that no illicit act on our part had been the cause of the seizure; but the greater part of the cargo was detained until March, 1810, when it was transferred, without condemnation, and even without trial, to France, by an article of a secret treaty made between the French and Dutch Governments then existing; and the same was delivered over to the French authorities in conformity "by orders from his Majesty the Emperor and King," as appears by a certificate of the Director General of the Dutch Customs, dated October 11, 1810.

The portion of this cargo which was made over to the French Government by the Dutch nation was sold at auction at Antwerp, in October and November, 1810, under the direction of the collector of the customs at that place, for the sum of..... Fs. 1,605,805 71 or about $320,000; out of which the French customs took for duties

the sum of.....	Fs. 795,689 95
And the officers of the Government, for the expenses of the sale, took	36,561 19
		832,251 14

Leaving for account of the American owners..... 773,554 57 or about $150,000; which sum was deposited or paid into the French treasury, and employed for the current expenses of that Government, or went to pay off a portion of its debts.

The brig Sally, Cotton, master, belonging exclusively to citizens of the United States, sailed from Boston in June, 1809, bound for the north of Europe, with a cargo of coffee, sugar, and cotton, and arrived at the Texel, July 15, and was there detained by the Dutch authorities, and her cargo taken out and deposited in the King's stores. The cotton was subsequently given up to the consignees, but the rest of the cargo was, like that of the Governor Strong, delivered over to the French Government and sent to Paris, where it was sold, and the net proceeds, amounting to between fifty and sixty thousand dollars, paid into the treasury and used for the public service.

These two cases form a part of a considerable class which may be denominated the Dutch claims, in contradistinction to the Antwerp, St. Sebastian, and other designated claims, which have been so ably and manfully advocated by our late minister (Mr. Gallatin) at the court of St. Cloud, in his excellent memorial of January 10, 1822.

Of this class of Dutch cases your memorialist has now before him the catalogues of sixteen cargoes which were sequestered in Holland, delivered over to the French Government, and sold, either in Antwerp or Paris, in the fall of 1810, and the net proceeds applied to the use of the French nation.

These cases are all known to the Government of the United States, and have received the greatest attention from their chargé d'affaires (Mr. Everett) at the Hague; through whom a most able and interesting correspondence has been carried on with that Government upon this subject. As that correspondence will probably be laid before the honorable the House of Representatives, your memorialist need not enter upon the reasons which justice and good faith present in favor of these claims. Neither is it necessary for him at present to inquire against which nation our claim lies. If the Dutch nation found it for her interest to take the property of the citizens of a neutral State without condemnation, or even without the forms of a trial, and present it to France to appease her wrath or to conciliate her favor, or as an offset for pecuniary claims, she certainly has assumed a responsibility which it appears impossible she should disclaim; for she has, in fact, received the value of that property in some shape or other from France, or she never would have consented to the measure; and as the French nation have set Holland an example of justice, in having fully compensated one of her citizens belonging to Brabant for a large property seized and sequestered at Antwerp, under similar circumstances, by paying him the full of the net proceeds of the articles sold, with interest up to the time of payment, as stated by Mr. Gallatin in his memorial, it is to be hoped that she will not continue to resist claims so evidently just, when she sees that our Government is determined not to relinquish them, and that the Executive is supported in his demands by the representatives of the nation at large.

The positive and severe deprivations and sufferings which many of our citizens are now laboring under, in consequence of these sequestrations, are respectfully submitted to your consideration, in the hope that some means may be found by the Government to induce the Dutch or French nation to discharge this debt.

WESTERN BOUNDARY OF THE UNITED STATES UNDER THE TREATY WITH SPAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 17, 1825.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit herewith to the House a report from the Secretary of State, containing the information required by the resolution of the House of the 16th ultimo, relating to the western boundary of the United States.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, January 17, 1825.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 15, 1825.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States, of the 16th of December last, requesting information from the President, if not incompatible with the public welfare, of the causes which have prevented the execution of the fourth article of the treaty of the 22d of February, 1819, between the United States of America and the Kingdom of Spain, so far as the same relates to the surveying of the western boundary of the United States, and if the same has been prevented by the actual situation of the Government of Mexico in respect to the Kingdom of Spain and this country as connected with the said boundary; and whether any measures have been taken to call the attention of the Government of Mexico to the final establishment of a boundary between that country and the United States, has the honor of reporting to the President that the causes suggested in the resolution have prevented the execution, by the joint operation of the United States and of Spain, of the article referred to, as was contemplated by the treaty. That, soon after the change of Government in Mexico to the republican form, and before the adoption of the recent constitution, a communication was received from the supreme authority then existing that they assented to the boundary as established by the treaty, and would readily co-operate in the measures necessary for carrying that article into execution in concert with the United States. The postponements of the mission to Mexico have delayed the proposal of definitive arrangements with that Government upon the subject.

All which is respectfully submitted.

CLAIM OF JOHN F. DUMAS ON THE FRENCH OR SPANISH GOVERNMENT FOR SEQUESTRATIONS IN SPAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE JANUARY 19, 1825.

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom were referred the petitions of John F. Dumas and William Manson, reported:

That these petitioners claim relief from the Government of the United States for spoliations on their vessels and cargoes committed by Spaniards, or by Frenchmen in Spanish ports, previous to the Florida treaty, for which they urge they were entitled to indemnity under that treaty. But that the commissioners erroneously rejected their claims, and hence they ask relief from the Government.

The committee, independently of the high and unshaken confidence in the capacity and integrity of the citizens constituting the board whose decision is the subject of complaint, think, on principle, their decision should be conclusive, and that it would be a precedent fraught with much mischief should Congress again open for investigation that whole mass of cases which have been the subject of arbitration. They, therefore, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitions of John F. Dumas and William Manson be rejected.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the undersigned citizen of the United States, and resident merchant of the city of Philadelphia, respectfully sheweth:

That during the months of November and December, in the year 1809, your memorialist, confiding in the relations of peace and amity subsisting between the United States and France, and relying upon the faith of the law of nations, made shipment of a considerable amount of property (cotton, the produce of the United States,) on board of vessels solely owned by citizens of the United States, destined for the port of St. Sebastian, in Spain.

That at the departure of the said vessels from the United States there existed no decree or edict prohibiting American vessels entering the said port of St. Sebastian, but, on the contrary, American vessels entering the said port of St. Sebastian had been permitted to enter and depart at pleasure.

The vessels, having on board the goods so shipped by your memorialist, arrived safe at the port of their destination, on which a premium of insurance, in one instance, was paid at the rate of twenty-five per cent., free from any seizure in port, so little danger did your memorialist apprehend on the score of seizure; but, contrary to the common rules of justice, on the arrival of the said vessels they were seized by authority of the French Government, with their respective cargoes on board, and afterwards the latter were transported to Bayonne, and there sold at public auction, and the proceeds ordered to be deposited in the caisse d'amortissement.

The decree ordering the sequestration of this property took place about the latter end of March, 1810, but was only made public on the 13th of May following, when the same appeared in the newspapers.

The property thus situated was never considered by the late Government of France but as neutral property, for which it considered itself bound to restore, as the same was never condemned, but was only sold and the proceeds deposited in the caisse d'amortissement, to wait the issue of political events between the United States and France.

Property of a nature similarly detained has been restored by the late French Government, and your memorialist, with great deference, will cite the case of the brig Mary Torrens, belonging to the port of Philadelphia, bound also to the port of St. Sebastian, which was wrecked on the coast, near the port of St. John de Luz, in the month of November, 1809; the greater part of the cargo was saved, and was also sequestered; the same was sold by order of the French Government, and the funds deposited also in the caisse d'amortissement. After one or two years the property was finally restored to its lawful owners, which demonstrates that the then Government of France never did consider the property thus sequestered as the property of the Government.

There is also a number of other cases where property had been sequestered, nearly at the same time, by the late Government of France, and restored by the present Government. Among others, your memorialist will only mention the case of the ship Eagle, of the port of Philadelphia, which, having been captured by a French privateer and brought into the port of St Sebastian, was also sequestered by the late Government; and as it was a case of capture, a compromise took place between the captors and original owners, and the same has been restored by an order of the Council of Prizes, and sanctioned by the late Sovereign in council, and the proceeds of the sales ordered to be paid to the owners and captors, agreeable to the compromise entered into between them.

Your memorialist, deprived of his property for such length of time, has not failed to avail himself of all the circumstances that could have had a tendency to the restoration of his property, and has consequently sent his power of attorney to France, in order to claim and recover the same. His correspondents have presented petitions to the French Government on that subject, but the same has been without effect.

Under such circumstances your memorialist conceives that the private claims of an individual to that Government becomes abortive; he therefore, with all deference, begs leave to lay his claim before Congress, that they will please take the same under their consideration and grant such relief as in your wisdom you may deem proper.

JOHN F. DUMAS.

PHILADELPHIA, December 1, 1824.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress of the United States:

William Manson, late of the State of Massachusetts, humbly sheweth that he was captain of a certain vessel, viz: the brig Neptune, of Baltimore, and that on the 9th day of December, 1803, his vessel was captured by the Spaniards and carried into St. Jago de Cuba; and that he presented his claim to the Spanish commissioners under the late treaty, for loss and damage sustained on that account, as appears by the schedule annexed, and that said claim was rejected by the commissioners on the ground that the said vessel touched at St. Domingo, when, in fact, she only touched there in distress, for the purpose of obtaining water, which fact the claimant is ready to verify.

[2D SESSION.

RELATIVE TO THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A LIGHT-HOUSE ON THE BRITISH ISLAND OF ABACO, ONE OF THE BAHAMA ISLANDS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 20, 1825.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom the message of the President relative to the island of Abaco, &c., was referred, reported:

That the President, complying with the request of the House contained in the resolution adopted at the last session of Congress, instructed our minister near the court of Great Britain to negotiate for a cession of so much land on the island of Abaco, at or near the Hole in the Wall, and in such other places within the acknowledged dominion of that power, on the islands, keys, or shoals, on the Bahama Banks, as may be necessary for the erection and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, or floating lights, for the security of navigation over and near the said Banks, and to be used wholly for those purposes. Obeying these instructions, an official application was made to the British Government on the 6th of February last. To this application no formal answer has been given; but an official conversation was held on the subject with Mr. Rush, in July. From this conversation it appears that Great Britain cannot accede to the wishes of our Government in the manner proposed, but has a desire to accomplish the object in view in some other form. Great Britain will not cede any part of the island of Abaco, or other islands, &c., on the Bahama Banks, for the purpose of setting up light-houses, &c., for the benefit of navigation; but is not indisposed, if the United States will designate the proper sites, to erect and establish these aids to navigation among those islands: Provided, the United States will pay the necessary fees for keeping them up where their vessels derive benefit from them while making voyages in that direction. On the propriety of acceding to this arrangement, no difficulty would be felt if it was a question of cost merely; the cession is desired with the single motive to incur the expense of erecting and preserving the proposed safeguards to the vessels and crews of all nations frequenting those seas. Interesting as the object is, it is not, however, of sufficient importance to justify the admission of any new principle or practice in the intercourse of nations. The rule of the United States (and the committee are not aware that any nation has a different rule) is, that all vessels shall enjoy the benefit of lights, beacons, and buoys, on their coast, without charge, unless they enter some port of the United States. All Europe partake of the benefits of the expenditure on these objects on our extensive coast, as we, in like manner, partake of the advantages of the beacons of Europe. The plan suggested by Great Britain is impracticable, independent of the insurmountable objections to the collection of a revenue for a foreign Government in the United States. It must be obvious that it would be impossible to ascertain with accuracy what proportion of our commerce would be benefitted by the beacons and buoys proposed to be erected, and which ought to bear the expense incident to their erection. Although just in theory that the commerce benefitted by the erection of a light-house should pay the charge of preserving it, yet the establishment of it as a rule among nations would, in practice, be followed by innumerable inconveniences, and give birth to a thousand perplexing and disagreeable controversies, not justified by the value in dispute, and unworthy of the character of the objects of it. Policy dictates to all commercial nations a generous competition in the multiplication of every species of security to the life and property exposed to the hazard of navigation, without regard to immediate expense, or contingent reimbursement. The committee are confident, from what has been disclosed by the British Government, that the interesting object of the resolution of the last session may be soon, if not immediately, accomplished by negotiation with Great Britain. That Government has shown too much anxiety on the subject of increasing the security of commerce and navigation, to be indifferent to any proposition having that object only in view. When two nations honestly and cordially desire to effect the same end, means are easily discovered.

The committee forbear to bring into view any of the modes that have occurred to them as most likely to effect the object in the least objectionable form, as they do not consider it the province of the House of Representatives to make suggestions to the Executive of what ought to be done by treaty with a foreign power on any subject, and as they are aware that no suggestion which they could make would bind the representatives of the people hereafter to approve what might be done by the President and Senate. It is obvious, from the communication of Mr. Rush, that a proper caution is observed; that if the object is accomplished, it will be obtained without a change in the rule at present governing commercial nations, without fixing upon the United States an obligation to collect within their ports revenue for a foreign nation, or to pay a specific tax upon a portion of our commerce for the common security afforded by light-houses, beacons, &c., upon a desert shore. Satisfied that there is no call for the expression of an opinion of the House to prevent the Executive from entering into an engagement the representatives of the people could not approve, they ask leave to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 23, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor of inclosing herewith copies of the correspondence between the British minister residing here, Mr. Stratford Canning, and this Department, since the close of the last session of Congress, relating to the act of March 1, 1823, "to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British colonial ports."

This act was intended as a corresponding measure on the part of the United States to the act of Parliament of June 24, 1822, (3 Geo. IV, ch. 44.) On the 24th of August, 1822, immediately after this act of Parliament was received here, the President of the United States issued the proclamation, a copy of which was transmitted to you with my despatch No. 59, of the 27th of the same month.

That proclamation was issued in conformity with an act passed at the preceding session of Congress, (U. S. Laws, 17th Cong., 1st session, p. 49,) which had provided that, on satisfactory evidence being given to the President of the United States that the ports in the islands or colonies in the West Indies under the dominion of Great Britain had been opened to the vessels of the United States, the President should be authorized to issue his proclamation declaring that the ports of the United States should thereafter be open to the vessels of Great Britain employed in the trade and intercourse between the United States and such islands or colonies, subject to such reciprocal rules and restrictions as the President might, by such proclamation, make and publish, anything in the laws entitled "An act concerning navigation" or an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act concerning navigation" to the contrary notwithstanding.

The proclamation of the President was necessarily limited by the authority given in the law, and the law was enacted in anticipation of measures known to be then depending in Parliament, one of the objects of which was the opening of the British colonial ports to foreign vessels, including those of the United States. When the act of Congress passed (May 6, 1822,) it was not known what colonial ports would be opened by the expected act of Parliament, nor under what rules and restrictions. It was therefore expressed in general and indefinite terms, looking to the opening of the ports in the British West Indies generally, and manifesting the disposition to meet the British Government forthwith in any plan for opening the ports to the navigation of both countries upon terms of reciprocity, the laws of both countries having at that time interdicted the trade between the United States and those colonies in the vessels of either nation.

This interdiction on the part of the United States had been effected by the two laws referred to in the act of May 6, 1822, the act concerning navigation, bearing date the 18th of April, 1818, (United States Laws, vol. 6, p. 296,) and the supplementary act of the 15th of May, 1820, (p. 534.)

These laws had been enacted as counteractive to those of a like character, long before existing on the part of Great Britain, interdicting the trade in vessels of the United States. They had been resorted to after the failure of repeated attempts to settle by amicable negotiation the manner in which the trade might be regulated upon principles of reciprocity—attempts which were renewed immediately after the passage of the first of them, and upon the abortive issue of which the second received the sanction of Congress.

This intermediate negotiation, between the 18th of April, 1818, and the 15th of May, 1820, must be constantly borne in mind in all discussion of the measures adopted on the part of the United States, predicated upon the act of Parliament of June 24, 1822, opening the colonial ports. The whole subject of it is familiar to your memory as one of the negotiators of the convention of October 20, 1818, and as the sole subsequent negotiator, concerning the article referred by the plenipotentiaries of the United States who concluded that convention to their Government.

By the convention of July 3, 1815, the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British territories in Europe was placed, in relation to navigation and revenue, on the following footing:

1. No other or higher duties of importation are to be imposed in either country on any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the other, than are payable on the like articles being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country.

2. No higher or other duties or charges of exportation are to be imposed on any articles exported to the two countries, respectively, than are payable on the exportation of the like articles to any other foreign country.

3. No prohibition, of exportation or importation, of articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of either country to the other, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

4. No higher or other duties or charges to be imposed in the ports of either party upon the vessels of the other than upon its own.

5. The same duties to be paid on the importation of articles the growth produce, or manufacture of either country into the ports of the other, whether imported in the vessels of the United States or of Great Britain.

6. The same duties to be paid and the same bounties allowed on exportation of articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of either country to the other, whether exported in British vessels or in vessels of the United States.

7. In cases of drawbacks allowed upon re-exportation of any goods, the growth produce, or manufacture of either country to the other, respectively, the amount of drawback to be the same whether the goods re-exported were originally imported in a British or an American vessel.

8. But when the re-exportation is to any other foreign country the parties reserve to themselves, respectively, the right of regulating or diminishing the drawback.

9. And lastly, the intercourse between the United States and the British West Indies and on the continent of North America was not to be affected by any of these provisions, but each party was to remain in complete possession of its rights with respect to such an intercourse.

The system of reciprocity with regard to navigation established by this article between the United States and the British possessions in Europe was substantially the acceptance of a proposal made to all the nations with which the United States have commercial intercourse by the act of Congress of March 3, 1815, conditionally repealing our discriminating duties.—(United States Laws, volume 4, page 824.) But it was expressly limited to the British possessions in Europe, and while accepting it thus far, the British Government reverted to the system of interdiction to the admission of our vessels into her American colonial ports.

The direct trade between the United States and Great Britain was so interwoven with and dependent upon that between the United States and the colonies, that this convention would have been worse than nugatory to the United States, if, while the European part of this intercourse was placed upon a footing of entire reciprocity, that between the United States and the colonies had been exclusively monopolized by British navigators. This was practically felt from the moment that the convention took effect, and in the year 1816 several efforts were made to induce the British Government to adjust this collision of interests by amicable negotiation.—(See message of the President of the United States of February 13, 1823, pp. 37, 39, 49; also documents of the 15th Congress, 1st session, (87,) report of committee of House of Representatives of the United States of February 9, 1818, document marked F.)

In March, 1817, a draft of four articles was communicated by Lord Castlereagh through your predecessor to the Government of the United States, which were stated to embrace all that could then be assented to by Great Britain towards admitting the United States to a participation in the trade between them and the colonies.

The first of these articles extended to the United States the provisions of the free port acts of Parliament of June 27, 1805, and of June 30, 1808, authorizing a certain trade in certain enumerated articles with certain enumerated ports of British West India islands, to the colonial inhabitants of foreign European possessions, in vessels of one deck. The island of Bermuda was included in the provisions of this act.

The second article made a special and additional provision for the trade between the United States and the island of Bermuda—allowing a longer list of articles both of import and export, and without limitation as to the size or form of the vessels to be employed in the trade.

The third article proposed to allow access to vessels of the United States to Turk's Island for salt, and to import tobacco and cotton wool, produce of the United States.

The fourth proposed to regulate the intercourse between the United States and the British territories adjoining them on the continent of North America.

After a full and deliberate consideration these articles were considered by the Government of the United States as not acceptable, and the act of Congress of April 18, 1818, concerning navigation, was passed.

The negotiation of the convention of October 20, 1818, immediately afterwards ensued, with regard to which you are referred to—

Letter from this Department to you, dated May 27, 1820, transmitting the act of Congress of May 15, 1820, (p. 101.)

By the act of Congress of April 15, 1818, concerning navigation, the ports of the United States were, from the 30th of September of that year, closed against British vessels coming from any British colony, by the ordinary laws of navigation and trade, closed against vessels of the United States; and British vessels sailing with cargoes from ports of the United States were laid under bonds to land their cargoes in some port or place other than in a colony closed against vessels of the United States.

It was a non-intercourse in British vessels with ports closed by British laws against the vessels of the United States.

By the supplementary act of May 15, 1820, the ports of the United States were, from the 30th of September of that year, closed against British vessels coming or arriving by sea from any British colonial ports in the West Indies, or American British vessels from ports of the United States were laid under bonds to land their cargoes in some place other than any British American colony; and articles of British West Indian or North American produce were allowed to be imported into the United States only direct from the province, colony, plantation, island, possession, or place of which they were wholly the growth, produce, or manufacture. It was a non-intercourse in British vessels with all the British American colonies, and a prohibition of all articles the produce of those colonies, except the produce of each colony imported directly from itself.

In the meantime an act of Parliament of May 8, 1818, (58 Geo. III, ch. 19,) and an order of council of May 27, 1818, founded thereon, opened the ports of Halifax, in Nova Scotia, and of St. John, in New Brunswick, to the vessels of all foreign nations in amity with Great Britain, for importation of certain enumerated articles, and for exportation to the country to which the foreign vessel should belong. This act was limited in its duration to three years and six weeks after the commencement of the then next session of Parliament, but the order of council specifying the ports to which it should be extended was revocable at pleasure.

This act of Parliament and order in council were construed in the United States not to affect in any manner the provisions of the act of Congress of April 15, 1818. The ports of Halifax and St. John remained closed against vessels of the United States, by the ordinary laws of navigation and trade, although opened for a limited time by an order of council, revocable at pleasure. Their real condition, therefore, in October, 1818, was that of being open to the vessels of the United States, while the ports of the United States were closed against British vessels coming from them.

It was on October 6, 1818, that the British plenipotentiaries, at the negotiation of the convention of the 20th of that month, proposed the article D, relating to the intercourse between the United States and the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which article they on the 19th declared was, together with the one offered in March, 1817, relating to Bermuda, a sine qua non of any article to be signed by them relating to the direct intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in the West Indies.

And the article D contained precisely the same list of articles importable and the same limitations with regard to export in vessels of the United States as were already contained in the act of Parliament of the 8th and in the order in council of May 27, 1818; and the article further proposed an equalization of duties of impost and tonnage on the vessels and articles employed in the trade, whether British or American.

So that the proposition really was, that the United States should open to the British a free and equal participation of the intercourse between the United States and the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, then by the counteracting regulations of the two countries exclusively enjoyed by the United States themselves.

The article relating to the intercourse between the United States and Bermuda was yet more remarkable. By an act of Parliament of July 1, 1812, (52 Geo. III, ch.,) sugar and coffee, the produce of any British colony or plantation in the West Indies, imported into the island of Bermuda in British ships, was allowed to be exported from the port of St. George to the United States in any foreign ship above 60 tons burden, belonging to any country in amity with Great Britain, and a list of articles enumerated was allowed to be imported from the United States to the said port in any foreign ship belonging to any country in amity with Great Britain; and this list contained, besides every article enumerated in the proposal of the British plenipotentiaries, horses, neat cattle, sheep, hogs, poultry, and live stock of any sort, which in the British proposal were excluded from the Bermuda list, and transferred to that of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. To the articles of sugar and coffee, exportable by the act of Parliament, the proposal added molasses, cocoa nuts, ginger and pimento.

These two articles, therefore, were to be considered as the equivalents asked of the United States for the admission proposed of their vessels to any British ports in the West Indies which should be open to the vessels of any other foreign power or State.

The following parallel lists of articles proposed to be admitted for importation and exportation in the intercourse between the United States, on one part, and Nova Scotia, with New Brunswick, Bermuda, and the West Indies, on the other, by the three connected and inseparable articles proposed by the British plenipotentiaries, may serve further to elucidate the character of the proposal:

Articles of importation proposed to be admitted in vessels of the United States.

To Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.—Tobacco, pitch, tar, turpentine, scantling, staves, heading-boards, planks, shingles, hoops, horses, neat cattle, sheep, hogs, poultry, live stock of any sort, fruits, seeds, bread, biscuit, flour, pease, beans, potatoes, wheat, rice, oats, barley, grain of any sort.

To Bermuda.—Tobacco, pitch, tar, turpentine, hemp, flax, masts, yards, bowsprits, staves, heading-boards, plank, timber, shingles, lumber of any sort, bread, biscuit, flour, pease, beans, potatoes, wheat, rice, oats, barley, grain of any sort.

To the West Indies.—Tobacco, pitch, tar, turpentine, staves, headings, shingles, horses, mules, poultry, live stock, provisions of all sorts except salted, provisions of any description, whether meat, fish, or butter.

Exports.

From Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.—Gypsum, grindstones, any articles of the growth of the province or of British dominions.

From Bermuda.—Any goods exportable to any foreign country, sugar, molasses, coffee, cocoa nuts, ginger, pimento, any British goods.

From the West Indies.—Rum, molasses, salt, and other articles exportable in foreign vessels to any other foreign country.

By another act of Parliament of May 23, 1818, the articles of tobacco, rice, grain, pease, beans, and flour were allowed to be imported in British vessels into any British colony in the West Indies or on the continent of South America from any foreign European colony in America, and pease and beans were allowed to be imported into the enumerated ports of the British West Indies from foreign European possessions in the West Indies and on the continent of America in foreign single-decked vessels. In the letter from this Department to you of May 7, 1819, a comparative view was taken between the articles which had been proposed at the third conference by the American plenipotentiaries, at the negotiation of the convention, and the articles proposed at the fifth and eighth conferences by the British plenipotentiaries, and then received by the American plenipotentiaries for reference to their Government, and a draft of two articles was inclosed with the latter, forming a compromise between the two proposals reviewed, and which you were authorized to offer as a final proposal on the part of this Government in relation to the subject. These articles, acceding to a limited and enumerated list of ports of importation in the British colonies, and to a limited and enumerated list of articles importable in them, adhered only to two principles: First, that the list of importable articles should be the same for the West Indies, for Bermuda, and for the North American provinces; and second, that all the duties and charges imposable upon them should be equalized, and particularly that no other or higher duties should be charged upon them than upon similar articles when imported from any other country or place whatsoever. Your letter of June 14, 1819, announced that a copy of this draft had been submitted by you to the consideration of the British Government, and your letter of September 17, 1819, that they had declined accepting it. At the conference between you and Lord Castlereagh, when he informed you of this determination, he stated the special objections to the project upon which it had been founded, and you repeated to him the views of the Government of the United States on which the offer had been made. The supplementary navigation act of Congress was approved on the 15th of May, 1820.

This, then, was the relative state of the intercourse between the United States and, first, the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; second, the island of Bermuda; and, third, the British colonies in the West Indies, from September 30, 1820, till the passage of the act of Parliament of June 24, 1822.

By the acts of Parliament of 3 Geo. IV, ch. 42 and 43, the navigation act of 12 Charles II, ch. 18, was repealed so far as related to the importation of goods and merchandise into Great Britain. But the American trade acts, and the acts relating to importations from the British colonies in America and the West Indies were left in full force.

The act of 3 Geo. IV, ch. 44, purports to be an act to regulate the trade between his Majesty's possessions in America and the West Indies and other places in America and the West Indies.

It leaves the principle of the navigation act of Charles II untouched, but by its first section repeals the whole series of what were called American trade acts; that is, acts regulating the trade between the United States of America and the British American and West India colonies, since the independence of this country, beginning with the act of 28 Geo. III, ch. 39, and ending with 1 and 2 Geo. IV, ch. 7, twenty-five statutes, for which it substitutes the following system:

1. By the third section it provides that from and after the passing of the act a certain list of enumerated articles shall be importable into a certain list of enumerated ports in the British American colonies, insular or continental, in British vessels or in foreign vessels, bona fide the build of and owned by the inhabitants of the country of which the said articles are the growth, produce, or manufacture; or British built vessels become their property and navigated with a master and three-fourths of the mariners, at least, belonging to such country or place: Provided, that in the foreign vessels the articles shall only be brought directly from the country or place of which they are the growth, produce, or manufacture.

2. By the fourth section it allows the exportation from the enumerated ports, in British vessels or in any foreign ship or vessel as aforesaid, of any article of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any of the British dominions, or any other article legally imported into the said ports, (arms and naval stores excepted, unless by license from his Majesty's Secretary of State,) provided that in foreign ships they shall be exportable only direct to the country or State in America or the West Indies to which the vessel belongs; and export bonds are to be given, in a penalty equal to half the value of the articles, that they shall be landed at the port or ports for which entered, and certificate of the landing to be produced within twelve months.

By the 7th section it is provided that upon a certain portion, enumerated in schedule C, of the articles enumerated as importable in schedule B, certain duties shall be levied and collected when imported from any foreign island, State, or country, under the authority of the act.

The 11th section enacts that the same duties upon the foreign articles shall also be levied, if imported direct from any port of Great Britain and Ireland.

The 14th section authorizes the exportation in British vessels of the articles enumerated in schedule B to any other British colony or plantation in America or the West Indies, or to any port of Great Britain and Ireland subject to the provisions of the navigation act of 12 Charles II, ch. 18, and of 22 and 23 Charles II, ch. 26, and 20 Geo. III, ch. 10.

The 15th section authorizes the King, by order in council, to prohibit trade and intercourse with any country or island in America or the West Indies, if it shall appear to his Majesty that the privileges granted by this act to foreign ships and vessels are not allowed to British ships and vessels trading to and from any such country under the provisions of the act; and in case such order in council shall be issued, then, during the time of its being in force, none of the provisions of the act shall apply to any country or State the trade with which, under the provisions of the act, shall be prohibited by the order in council.

The 17th section prohibits, on penalty of the forfeiture of vessel and cargo, the importation into the enumerated ports, from any foreign country on the continent of America or any island in the West Indies, of any articles except those enumerated in the schedule B.

And the 18th section prohibits, upon like penalty, the importation or exportation of any articles whatever from or to any foreign country on the continents of North or South America, or any foreign island in the West Indies, into or from any port of any British colony, plantation, or island in America or the West Indies, not enumerated in the schedule A.

If the object of this act of Parliament was to open the ports of the British colonies in the West Indies and in America to the vessels of the United States upon terms of reciprocity, it was not well adapted to its purpose.

In the 15th section it is declared to be the intention and meaning of the act that the privileges granted by it to foreign ships and vessels shall be confined to the ships and vessels of such countries only as give the like privileges to British ships and vessels in their ports in America and the West Indies; and the King is authorized to issue his order in council prohibiting trade and intercourse under the authority of the act, if it shall appear to him that the privileges granted by this act to foreign ships and vessels are not allowed to British vessels trading to and from any such country or island under the provisions of this act.

Now, what are the privileges granted by this act to the vessels of the United States? That they may bring directly, and not otherwise, from some port of the United States, to certain colonial ports named in the act of Parliament, and none others, certain articles of merchandise specifically named, and none others. That upon their arrival, of all the articles which they are permitted to bring, they shall pay enormous duties upon that portion which consists of the productions of the United States, consumable in the colonies themselves; and the only portion which in the results of the trade would be to the United States profitable export, and to one part of the colonies necessary import; and these duties are to be paid while the British vessels, enjoying all the privileges granted by this act, possess the additional and exclusive privilege of carrying to the same West India ports, directly or indirectly, the same articles thus heavily charged when coming from the United States, but free from all duty when carried from the colony in North America to the colony in the West Indies.

Again: the vessel of the United States admitted to the above privilege, has the further privilege, if she can procure a cargo, to return directly, and not otherwise, to the United States, and to give bond, upon penalty equal to half the value of said cargo, for the landing it at the port or ports for which entered, and for producing a certificate whereof within twelve months. But there is a charge not indeed imposed by this act, but from which this act has not relieved them—that of paying a colonial export duty of four or five per cent. ad valorem upon this return cargo. To this charge British vessels may also be liable if their owners choose to incur it; but if they prefer exporting their cargoes without paying any export duty, they are free to go to any port of the British dominions in Europe or America. They are not required to give the export bond for the landing of the articles at the port or ports for which entered, and for producing within twelve months a certificate thereof.

By the letter of the act of Parliament, if the privileges granted by it to the vessels of the United States should appear to the King not to be allowed to British vessels trading under the provisions of the act, he may, by an order in council, at his discretion, prohibit trade and intercourse under the authority of the act.

The words "the privileges granted by this act" are explained by the context of the section to mean like privileges, to be allowed by the laws of the United States to British vessels employed in the same trade.

If an act of Congress had passed admitting British vessels, coming from colonial British ports in America and the West Indies, to enter a certain specified list of ports in the United States, selected at the pleasure of Congress, and no others; if it had allowed them to bring in those vessels an enumerated list of articles (from which rum and molasses, for example, should be excluded,) and no others; if it had included, for example, sugar and coffee among the admissible articles, but burdened them with duties equivalent to ten per cent. ad valorem more than would be paid upon the same articles imported from elsewhere; if it had compelled the British vessels, so admitted, if they took a return cargo, to give bonds for landing it at the port or ports in the British colonies for which the vessel should clear out, and if not by the act of Congress but by some law of the State from which this privileged British vessel should depart, an export duty of four or five per cent. ad valorem should be levied upon this her return cargo, then British vessels in the ports of the United States would have been allowed like privileges with those granted by the act of Parliament to vessels of the United States in the colonial ports; and so exactly like would they have been, that, under such an act of Congress and such a grant of privileges to British vessels, the conditional authority given by the 15th section of the act of Parliament to the King, of prohibiting the trade and intercourse, would not have attached according to the letter of the act, although it might have appeared to his Majesty that "the privileges granted by this act" were not allowed to British vessels trading to and from the United States under its provisions.

The privileges granted by this act could, of course, be allowed only by the same authority from which it emanated—that is, by the British Parliament. Like privileges would have been such as I have now described; that is, privileges subject to like limitations and restrictions, which, as the bare exposition of them here will show, would have been found to be no privileges at all.

The act of Parliament opened certain colonial ports upon certain very onerous conditions to vessels of the United States. If the United States had opened their ports to British vessels from the colonies without condition or limitation, the privileges of British vessels in our ports would have been in nowise like those of the vessels of the United States in the colonial ports. In point of fact, the privilege of the British vessels would have been exclusive, and that of the American vessels exclusion.

Immediately after receiving the act of Parliament which opened certain ports of the British colonies in the West Indies and in America to the vessels of the United States, the President, exercising the authority given him by anticipation in the act of Congress of May 6, 1822, issued his proclamation opening the ports of the United States generally to British vessels coming from any of the ports enumerated in the act of Parliament. And in this proclamation he gave the most liberal construction for the benefit of British vessels to the act of Congress on which it was founded. For, by the laws of the United States, when the act of Congress passed, and until the proclamation issued, the ports of the United States were closed against British vessels from any of the British colonies in the West Indies or in America; while by the British laws the ports of St. John and Halifax, in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, those of Port St. George and Hamilton, in the island of Bermuda, and the ports of the Bahama islands, were opened to vessels of the United States. These ports, therefore, the act of Parliament did not open to our vessels; and the proclamation, by opening the ports of the United States to vessels coming from them, was much more extensive in its operation than the act of Parliament itself.

As reciprocal to the rules and restrictions under which the trade was permitted by the act of Parliament, the President's proclamation provided that no articles should be imported into the United States in British vessels coming from the West Indies, other than articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the British West India colonies, and none other than articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the British colonies in North America or Newfoundland, in British vessels coming respectively from that island, or from the North America colonies; and by the existing revenue laws of the United States all British vessels and their cargoes, coming from any of the colonies, remained subject to the foreign tonnage and impost duties. In my letter to you of August 27, 1822, inclosing a copy of this proclamation, I suggested to you the opinion that some further understanding between the two Governments would be necessary for regulating this trade in a manner advantageous to the interests of both parties, and the readiness of this Government to enter upon arrangements for that purpose with the British Government.

On the 25th of October, 1822, the British minister residing here addressed a note to this Department, containing representations against the rules and restrictions provided in the proclamation, as not being specific counterparts to those of the act of Parliament, and also claiming exemption from the foreign tonnage and impost duties for British vessels and their cargoes coming from the colonies; because the act of Parliament subjected British and foreign vessels engaged in this trade only to the same duties and charges, and if there were in the colonies any discriminating charges against foreign vessels, they did not appear in the act of Parliament.

I have shown you above what would have been a specific counterpart to the rules and restrictions of the act of Parliament, and to the colonial export duty coexisting with it. Had the President possessed the power of prescribing them by his proclamation, they would have been, in effect, equivalent to a total prohibition of the intercourse in British vessels, and appeared little better than a mockery. But the President had no such power. He could neither select an exclusive list of ports of admission, nor levy an export duty, nor repeal the foreign tonnage and impost.

Mr. Canning's note was answered and he replied. There was also much discussion of the subject between us at personal interviews, in which, as well as in his note, he kept me constantly reminded of the authority given by the act of Parliament to the King to prohibit the intercourse by an order in council, if the privileges granted by this act should not be allowed to British vessels, and of the necessity there would be for countervailing discriminations, if those of the proclamation and the foreign tonnage and impost duty should remain.

In the course of this correspondence and of these conferences, which continued through the whole of the late session of Congress, Mr. Canning, with great earnestness, pressed the claim of admission for British vessels from the colonies, free from all discriminating duties and charges, on the argument that there were no discriminating duties or charges operating against vessels of the United States in the colonies. On the 13th of January, 1823, he addressed to this Department a note, claiming distinctly the withdrawal of all the discriminating duties, and particularly the application to British vessels coming from the colonies of the fair and full operation of such acts of Congress, including that of March 3, 1815, as appear to have an immediate application to the case.

In support of his argument, that there were no discriminating duties operating against us in the colonies, he then, and at other times, communicated copies of documents from a few of the enumerated ports, certifying that British and American vessels paid the same fees, or that by the act of Parliament they paid the same duties, or that they paid the same custom-house expenses; and he constantly urged that these were sufficient to establish the fact that our vessels and their cargoes paid in the colonies no other or higher fees, duties, or charges, than British vessels, and, consequently, the claim that British vessels from the colonies should pay no higher or other duties, fees, or charges, than our own; but he invariably declined pledging himself or his Government to any declaration that there were no discriminating duties in the enumerated ports; and we have now satisfactory information that in some of them there were and still are discriminations to our disadvantage, besides those of the act of Parliament.

The act of Congress of March 1, 1823, "to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British colonial ports," was introduced into the Senate by their Committee on Foreign Relations at an early period of their late session. In maturing it they had before them the act of Parliament of June 24, 1822, the President's proclamation, and the correspondence between Mr. Canning and this Department concerning it. While it was in discussion before the committee of the Senate, Mr. Canning, to whom a copy of the bill had been communicated, made some written remarks upon it, which were immediately submitted to the consideration of the committee. The full import of the term elsewhere, in the second, third, and fifth sections of the act, which formed the principal subject of these remarks, was deliberately examined and settled, as well in Senate as upon a consultation by the President with the members of the administration, and was explicitly made known to Mr. Canning.

The principle assumed by the act was not the repeal, but the suspension, during the continuance of the admission of our vessels into the colonial ports by the act of Parliament, of our two navigation acts. In return for the opening of the colonial ports to our vessels by the act of Parliament, we opened our ports to British vessels from the same colonial ports; but as a power was left to the King, by an order in council, to prohibit the trade and intercourse, it was necessary to be prepared for that contingency, if it should occur, by making the revival of our acts of navigation also contingent upon the same event.

As by the act of Parliament the intercourse in our vessels was limited to direct voyages both to and from the United States and the enumerated ports, the same limitation was prescribed for the intercourse in British vessels by the act of Congress; one of Mr. Canning's remarks was, that the condition in the 5th section of our act, which limits the permission to export in British vessels to such as have previously come directly from any of the enumerated ports, did not appear to have any counterpart in the British act of Parliament. This is true. The counterpart was not in that act of Parliament, but in the old navigation act of 12 Charles II. By that act no vessel of the United States could enter any of the enumerated ports, coming from any other part of the world, and the act of June 24, 1822, admitted them only direct from the United States; no vessel of ours, therefore, other than such as have previously come direct from the United States to the enumerated ports, can export anything from them, because no other are admitted into the enumerated ports at all. Now, we could not exclude British vessels from coming to the United States from every other part of the world except the enumerated ports, which would be the full counterpart to the exclusion of the old navigation act of Charles II, still in force against us; but we could and did exclude those coming from elsewhere from bringing with them merchandise from the enumerated ports, and those coming from the enumerated ports from bringing with them merchandise from elsewhere. The result was strictly reciprocal, though our act, in granting the like privilege to that of the act of Parliament of June 24, 1822, annexed to it the like restriction to that of the old British navigation act of Charles II.

The principal objection of Mr. Canning was to the import of the term elsewhere; he was distinctly informed that the construction of which he observes in his remarks it appears to be susceptible was the construction which it was intended to bear, and would receive; but that it would put the question of the discriminating duties on a footing irreconcilable with the fair and natural view "of the subject" we can by no means admit. As little do we admit that, having reference to the conclusion of the negotiation in 1819, it ought to have been unexpected. It has been seen that the United States then explicitly declined acceding to an article which would have opened the colonial ports, because it would have reserved to Great Britain the right of laying in the colonial ports higher duties upon articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, than upon the like articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain or her own colonies. The act of Parliament (3 George IV, chapter 44) of June 24, 1822, opened the colonial ports with a threat to close them again (or rather to prohibit all trade and intercourse with them) if it should not be acceded to in all its parts of privilege, without regard to its conditions of restriction, or to the other restrictions under which the privileges must be, if at all, accepted. It undertook to do, by British laws, that, the reserved right to do which we had unequivocally refused to accede to by compact. In the course of the conference with Mr. Canning I proved this to him by reading to him the parts of the joint letter from Messrs. Gallatin and Rush to this Department of October 20, 1818, relating to the subject, and the extracts from your letters of June 14 and September 17, 1819, connected with it. The duties in the schedule C of the act of Parliament are all upon articles of the first necessity to the West India colonies—articles which can be furnished them only from the United States or from the adjoining North American British colonies, and articles constituting almost all the valuable exports allowed by the act of Parliament, and consumable in the colonies. They are all upon breadstuffs, live stock, and lumber, and the whole of them are equivalent to an average of at least ten per cent. upon the value of the articles. Of these articles, the live stock and the lumber could be exported only from the northern parts of the United States; could it possibly be supposed that, while from the ports of the State of Maine such articles imported into Jamaica, St. Kitts, or Antigua, should be burdened with a duty of ten per cent. upon their value, the same articles from the province of New Brunswick being admitted duty free, there could be any competition sustainable between the vessels of the two countries in which they should on such unequal terms be introduced? And if we add to this that, after disposing of her cargo, the vessel from New Brunswick might take a return cargo, also duty free, or might trade from colony to colony without restraint, while the vessel from Maine must depart in ballast, or return to the United States laden with an export duty upon her cargo, what feature of reciprocity would there be upon which the very idea of competition could escape the charge of absurdity?

The act of Congress, therefore, opens the ports of the United States to British vessels from the colonial ports enumerated in the act of Parliament, but not upon the identical terms prescribed in it.

The restrictions of the act of Congress are counterparts not only to the restrictions of that particular act of Parliament, but to the others to which the American trade to the colonies is subject, whether by colonial laws or by the navigation act of Charles II; and as some of those British restrictions were of a character which we could not meet by specific counterparts, we meet them by analogical restrictions productive of the same result. This was insisted on by our plenipotentiaries at the discussion during the negotiation of the convention of 1818, and Great Britain could not justly expect that discriminating surcharges, the reserved right of levying which we unequivocally refused to sanction with our consent as a bargain, we should be ready to accept as a dispensation of British law. For an enumerated list of ports, part only of which are opened by the act of Parliament, we open all our ports in return; for an enumerated and very scanty list of importable articles, we agreed to receive in return all the valuable exportable articles of all the opened British colonies; for a duty of ten per cent. import, and of four or five per cent. on exports, upon the value of the articles of the trade, we retain a foreign tonnage duty of ninety-four cents per ton on British vessels employed in the trade, and ten per cent. additional (not upon the value of the article, but upon the import duty otherwise charged upon it) upon the articles imported in them.

It is doubtful whether these countervailing restrictions on our part will prove sufficient to enable our vessels to pursue the trade in equal competition with the British. Still more doubtful whether, under the double system of restrictions, the trade itself can be pursued in a manner which will relieve the British West India colonies from the distress which was rapidly hurrying them to ruin under the preceding restrictions of the navigation act of Charles II. Surely the British Government must be aware that profit is the sine qua non of trade, and that if they load with enormous duties the articles indispensable to the existence of their colonies, those duties must be paid by the colonies themselves, or they will smother the trade itself. If the object of the act of Parliament was merely to balance the advantages of our proximity to the West Indies, their duties of import are at least five-fold too heavy; and as to the export duty, how could it possibly be paid upon articles to be brought into our market in competition with the like articles, partly of our own produce, and most largely from Cuba, St. Domingo, and other West India islands, where no export duty exists. The result must be, and has already proved to be, that our vessels admitted to the British colonial ports can take no return cargoes, and must come away in ballast. So that if they could sell their outward cargoes at a profit upon which the trade could live, it must be paid in specie by the colonists, leaving their staple commodities to rot upon their plantations, or to the old monopoly of the market at home.

The request of explanation as to the extent of the meaning of the term elsewhere in the act of Congress in Mr. Canning's correspondence with this Department since the close of the session has not arisen from any doubt which he could entertain in his own mind of the construction which would be given to it here. This was fully discussed during the passage of the act and well understood by him; but the eagerness of the British merchants in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and in some of our cities, to have the trade entirely to themselves, prompted them to expect that a different construction would be given to the act—a construction which would have left the word elsewhere without any effect or meaning at all. Mr. Chipman, acting as Governor of New Brunswick, issued a proclamation declaring that in that province no other or higher duties of tonnage or impost, and no other charges of any kind, are levied or exacted on vessels of the United States than upon British vessels, or upon the like goods, wares, and merchandise imported therein from elsewhere; but in this elsewhere the British territories in Europe and the West Indies were not included. They, according to him, were not elsewhere with reference to the ports of the United States, or, in other words, were ports of the United States. The Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia was more cautious. He transmitted to Mr. Canning statements from the officers of the customs showing that by the act of Parliament no other duties of impost or of tonnage were levied upon vessels of the United States at Halifax than upon British vessels; but even this, according to a document accompanying these statements, did not include vessels of the province itself. They, by a colonial law, are entitled to a deduction of two pence per ton from the tonnage duty payable by British vessels, according to which doctrine they are not British vessels themselves.

I have explicitly assured Mr. Canning that the proclamation of the President, authorized by the third section of the act of Congress of March 1, 1823, cannot be issued without a declaration pledging the faith of the British Government that, upon the vessels of the United States admitted into all and every one of the enumerated ports, and upon any goods, wares, or merchandise imported therein, in the said vessels, no other or higher duties of tonnage or impost, and no other charges of any kind, are levied or exacted than upon all British vessels, (including all vessels of the colonies themselves,) or upon the like goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the said colonial ports from anywhere, including Great Britain and the other British colonies themselves; and that, until such proof shall be given, British vessels and their cargoes coming from the colonies to the United States must continue to pay our foreign tonnage and ten per cent. additional impost duties. Notice of this has been given by Mr. Canning to the British consuls in a letter which has been published, and which you will find in one of the newspapers herewith sent—(National Intelligencer of May 29, 1823.)

By the respective regulations of the two countries the present condition of the trade is as follows:

The intercourse between the ports of the United States and the enumerated colonial ports is open to the vessels of both parties.

By the British regulations—

American vessels are admitted into the enumerated ports only direct from the United States. They are allowed to import only certain enumerated articles.

Upon all the important articles of this list a duty equivalent to ten per cent. ad valorem is imposed.

If they take return cargoes, they must give export bonds for landing them in the port or ports of the United States, for which only they can clear out.

And in most, if not all, of the West India colonies they pay an export duty of from four to five per cent. ad valorem.

British vessels are admitted into the enumerated ports and others without restriction. They may enter direct from the United States or from any other part of America, or from the British possessions in Europe.

They are allowed to import not only the enumerated articles but all others not entirely prohibited; and among the articles the exclusive carriage of which is reserved to them are articles of the first necessity to the colonies, and staple exports from the United States; on the important articles which, in common with the vessels of the United States, they may import direct from the United States, if they do so import them, the ten per cent. duty ad valorem must be paid. But they may import the like articles from Great Britain, or from the North American to the West India colonies, duty free; they are liable to no export bond; may trade between colony and colony; may export cargoes for any port of the British dominions in Europe or America, and pay no export duty, unless they choose to return to the United States.

By the American regulations—

British vessels from the enumerated ports are admitted, if laden, into the United States only with cargoes of colonial produce.

They are allowed to take return cargoes only direct to the enumerated ports.

They pay the foreign tonnage duty of ninety-four cents per ton, and the foreign ten per cent. additional impost on their cargoes.

American vessels may bring from the enumerated ports any articles the exportation of which from those ports is permitted by the British laws.

They are in no case compelled to return to the enumerated ports.

They are exempt from the foreign tonnage and additional impost duties.

It is impossible to take this comparative view of the respective exemptions and restrictions operating on the vessels of the two countries employed in the same trade without perceiving that the balance of advantage is highly in favor of the British and against the American navigation; and that the United States could not consent to equalize the tonnage and impost duties without surrendering the whole trade to the British shipping and defeating the object for which both our navigation acts of 1818 and 1820 were provided.

The act of Parliament (3 Geo. IV, ch. 44) of June 24, 1822, must also be considered in connexion with the act of August 5, 1822, (3 Geo. IV, ch., 119,) or Canada trade act. I inclose herewith a copy of a memorial to the President, from a committee of the freeholders and inhabitants of the county of Franklin and State of New York, exhibiting the severe pressure of this act upon the people of a very large portion of our Union. A similar memorial was presented to the House of Representatives at the late session of Congress, and a report thereon was made to the House by their Committee on Foreign Relations, a copy of which is likewise inclosed.—(Document 96, House of Representatives United States, reports of committees, 17th Congress, 2d session.) The resolution recommended by the committee at the close of the report, requesting the President of the United States to obtain by negotiation with the Government of Great Britain such modifications of the act of Parliament of August 5, 1822, as may remove all just cause of complaint was adopted by the House.

The report of the committee discountenances the claim of the memorialists to the privileges to which they had supposed themselves to be entitled by the third article of the treaty of 1794; and it admits that there is in the act of Parliament nothing in their opinion repugnant to national law. But the committee remark that the act is highly detrimental to the interests of that portion of our citizens which it immediately affects—a measure unexpected and certainly inconsistent with that liberal spirit recently avowed by both Governments, in relation to their general commercial intercourse with each other, as well as repugnant to the course of conduct which both had tacitly pursued in relation to that particular commercial interest which it is intended specially to regulate.

You will see in the report of the committee a comparative view of the existing state of the trade before and until the act of Parliament of August 5, 1822, with that under which it now labors, and which so seriously affects the immediate interest of the people of six among the largest and most populous States of our Union and one Territory.

With regard to the right of that portion of our people to navigate the river St. Lawrence to and from the ocean, it has never yet been discussed between us and the British Government. I have little doubt that it may be established upon the sound and general principles of the law of nature; and if it has not been distinctly and explicitly asserted in negotiation with the British Government hitherto, it is because the benefits of it have been, as the committee remark, tacitly conceded, or because the interest, now become so great, and daily acquiring additional moment, has, it may almost be said, originated since the acknowledgment of our independence by the treaty of 1783.

The memorial from the committee of the inhabitants of Franklin county, New York, is perfectly correct when it asserts this right upon the principles asserted at the period when our right to the navigation of the Mississippi was in question; and so far as the right by the law of nature was maintained on the part of the United States in that case, so far is the Government of the United States bound to maintain for the people of the Territory of Michigan, and of the States of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, and Vermont, the natural right of communicating with the ocean by the only outlet provided by nature from the waters bordering upon their shores.

We know that the possession of both the shores of a river at its mouth has heretofore been held to give the right of obstructing or interdicting the navigation of it to the people of other nations inhabiting the banks of the river above the boundary of that in possession of its mouth. But the exclusive right of jurisdiction over a river originates in the social compact and is a right of sovereignty. The right of navigating the river is a right of nature preceding it in point of time, and which the sovereign right of one nation cannot annihilate as belonging to the people of another.

This principle has been substantially recognized by all the parties to the European alliance, and particularly by Great Britain at the negotiation of the Vienna Congress treaties. It is recognized by the stipulations of those treaties which declare the navigation of the Rhine, the Necker, the Mayne, the Moselle, the Maes, and the Scheldt, free to all nations. The object of those stipulations undoubtedly was to make the navigation of those rivers effectually free to all the people dwelling upon their banks, and to abolish all those unnatural and unjust restrictions by which the people of the interior of Germany had before that time been deprived of their natural outlet to the sea, by the abuse of that right of sovereignty which imputed an exclusive jurisdiction and property over a river to the State possessing both shores at its mouth. There is no principle of national law upon which those articles of the Vienna Congress treaties could be founded which will not apply to sustain the right of the people of this Union to navigate the St. Lawrence river to the ocean.

These ideas are suggested to you to be used, first, in conference with the British Minister of Foreign Affairs, and afterwards, if necessary, in correspondence with him. The manner and the time of presenting them will be best judged of by your discretion. By the two acts of Parliament of 3 Geo. IV, ch. 44 and 119, the navigation of the St. Lawrence from our territories to the ocean is, in fact, conceded to us; by the first, from the ocean to Quebec; and by the second, from any part of our territories to the same port. But a discretionary power is given to the colonial Governments in Canada to withdraw the latter of these concessions, by excepting any of the Canadian ports from those to which our vessels are, by the act, made admissible; and the duties imposed by the act upon all those of our exports which could render the trade profitable are prohibitory.

Throughout the whole course of these modifications of the old British navigation act of Charles II, offered us by the acts of Parliament of June 24 and August 5, 1822, the admission of our vessels to the British West India colonies has been presented to us, not only upon conditions excessively burdensome, but under a direct menace that, if we should not accept it upon the identical terms offered in those acts, all commercial intercourse between us and all the British colonies in this hemisphere would be prohibited by an order in council; and we have received frequent intimations that this power, reserved to the King by the act of June 24, would be exercised, if we should not immediately exempt British vessels employed in the trade from the foreign tonnage and additional impost duties, and place them in these respects on the same footing with our own. We have been, therefore, under the necessity of deciding upon our course of policy relating to this interest, upon a calculation of probability that the power would be exercised, and that the order of council would issue; and from a full and deliberate view of the subject, we have come to the conclusion that, however injurious that measure, if resorted to, would prove to us, it would still be less mischievous than the total abandonment of our defensive system of counteraction, established by our navigation acts of 1818 and 1820. We are also perfectly convinced that this would be the effect of our acceptance, unconditional, of the intercourse as prescribed by the act of Parliament of June 24, 1822, and particularly of releasing the British shipping employed in the trade from the foreign tonnage and impost duties. The act of Congress has provided that, if the British order prohibiting the trade and intercourse in our vessels with any of the enumerated ports, under the authority of the act of Parliament, should be issued, from the day of the date of the order in council, or from the time of its commencing to be in operation, our two navigation acts should revive and be in full force. This measure, on our part, is merely defensive; but we think we have some reason to complain, if not of harshness, at least of a proceeding somewhat peremptory in the mode of opening to us the West India colonial ports. They are opened to us, as I have shown, upon terms which we had effectively rejected in negotiation, and which we could not possibly accept without surrendering the whole navigation interest for which we have so long contended. They are opened to us, subject to a total interdiction of the commerce, at the discretion of the King, by an order in council, without an hour's notice to those of our citizens whose interest may be affected by it. There is also some obscurity in the phraseology of the 15th section of the act of Parliament of June 24, 1822, leaving us in doubt what the condition of our intercourse would be with any colony concerning which the prohibitory order in council might issue.

It says that, on the contingency prescribed, it shall be lawful for the King, by order in council, to prohibit trade and intercourse under the authority of this act with any country, &c.; and that if such order in council shall issue, "then, during the time that such order in council shall be in force, none of the provisions of this act, either as respects the laws herein repealed or to any other provisions of this act, shall apply or be taken to apply to any country or State the trade with which, under the provisions of this act, shall be prohibited by any such order of his Majesty in council." But the provisions of this act, as respects the laws repealed in it, are no other than the repeal of them itself; and if by virtue of the prohibitory order in council none of the provisions of this act, as respects the laws repealed in it, shall apply, or be taken to apply, the conclusion would seem to be that those laws would not be repealed, that is, that they would again revive and be in force with regard to the country the trade with which, "under the authority of this act," should be prohibited by the order in council. But some of these laws repealed are laws authorizing trade and intercourse, in vessels of the United States, with the colonies of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Bermuda, and the Bahama islands; and if by the prohibitory order in council the provisions as respect those laws, in the act of 3 Geo. IV, ch. 44, should cease to apply, it would follow that the trade and intercourse under them would again be authorized, and its condition would be precisely the same as if that act of Parliament had not been made. All this would be very clear and unequivocal but for the remaining part of the paragraph in the same 15th section of the act, which says that, "if any goods whatever shall be imported from or shipped for the purpose of being exported to any such country or island in America or the West Indies, in any foreign ship or vessel, after trade and intercourse therewith shall have been prohibited by any such order of his Majesty in council, issued under the authority of this act," all such goods, with the ship or vessel, &c., shall be forfeited. Thus the provisions of the section appear to be contradictory to themselves, and leave us in doubt whether it was meant that the prohibitory order in council would revive and reinforce the free port acts repealed by the act of Parliament, or would operate as a total interdiction of trade and intercourse in our vessels with the interdicted colony.

You are authorized to renew to the British Government the proposal of continuing this intercourse in other respects on the footing upon which it is placed by the acts of Parliament and the act of Congress, but with a removal of the discriminating duties on both sides, and particularly that the duties in the schedule C of the act of Parliament of 3 Geo. IV, ch. 44, and in the schedule B of the act of 3 Geo. IV, ch. 119, on the part of Great Britain, and the foreign tonnage duty and additional impost upon British vessels from the enumerated ports, on the part of the United States, should be mutually repealed. If this proposal should be accepted, it may be carried into effect by an act of Parliament, upon the passage of which the President's proclamation would immediately be issued; or it may be agreed upon by a convention, which you are hereby authorized to sign and to transmit for ratification. A new full power is inclosed, to be used if required. The act of Parliament or the convention should be explicit in the removal of all discriminating duties and charges, whether imposed by Parliament or by colonial laws, and it should apply to all the enumerated ports. Should the offer be declined, you will receive any proposition which may be made in its stead, for reference to this Government.

I am, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Hon. RICHARD RUSH, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, London.

WASHINGTON, March 27, 1823.

The undersigned, his Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, referring to the third section of an act of Congress approved March 1, 1823, and entitled "An act to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British colonial ports," requests the American Secretary of State will do him the honor to afford him information of the exact nature and scope of the "proof" which is thereby required to enable the President to issue his proclamation for the repeal of the discriminating duties still levied on British vessels entering from such ports of his Majesty's colonies as are enumerated in the first section of the act.

The undersigned conceives that in his previous communications on this subject he has already furnished abundant and satisfactory evidence of the intention of his Majesty's Government, long since carried into effect, to place American vessels on the same footing with British in respect to the duties on import and tonnage under the expectation of a strict reciprocity on the part of the United States; but learning, from the printed circular addressed, on the 17th instant, to the Collectors by the Comptroller of the Treasury in explanation of the act approved on the 1st, and but recently brought to his knowledge, that no authority has yet been given to dispense with the collection of alien duties on British vessels arriving from his Majesty's colonies, the undersigned is desirous of knowing whether any, and what, further communication may be expected by the President under the act now in force as necessary to the execution of the third section, to the end that he may either at once remove any obstacle which it depends on him to remove, or have it in his power to apprise his Government of the real state of the case in this particular.

The undersigned requests the Secretary of State to accept the assurance of his high consideration.

STRATFORD CANNING.

Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 8, 1823.

Sir: In answer to your note of the 27th ultimo, I have the honor of stating that any authentic declaration from your Government, communicated either through the minister of the United States in England, or through his Britannic Majesty's minister residing here, "that upon the vessels of the United States admitted into the enumerated British colonial ports, and upon any goods, wares, or merchandise imported therein in the said vessels, no other or higher duties of tonnage or impost, and no other charges of any kind are levied or exacted than upon British vessels or upon the like goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the said colonial ports from elsewhere," will be received by the President of the United States as the satisfactory proof required by the act to authorize him to issue his proclamation extending the reciprocal privileges offered in the same third section to British vessels and their cargoes coming from the enumerated ports to the United States.

In the communications hitherto received from you on this subject, although "the intention of his Majesty's Government to place American vessels on the same footing with British in respect to the duties on impost and tonnage" has been sufficiently manifested, they have fallen short of the proof required by the section of the act of Congress now referred to, inasmuch as they have not averred either that no other or higher duties are levied in the enumerated ports upon the goods, wares, or merchandise imported therein in American vessels than upon the like articles imported from elsewhere, or that no other charges of any kind are levied upon the vessels of the United States and their cargoes than upon British vessels and their cargoes; or finally, that the intention of your Government, even in its most limited purport, has been long since carried into effect in all the enumerated ports.

The act of Congress requires that the reciprocity of burdens and exemptions should extend not only to the vessels but to the articles imported in them. This has not hitherto been affirmed by you to be the intention of your Government. It is not doubted that their intention has been to equalize the charges, but it appears that in some of the enumerated ports discriminating duties have continued to be levied to a very recent date; and express information has but a few days since been received at this Department that a tonnage duty of two shillings and sixpence sterling, imposed by act of Parliament of 28 George III, continued to be levied upon all vessels of the United States, at Turk's Island, until the 23d of December last, several months after your communications claiming, even before the meeting of Congress, a total removal of discriminating duties upon British vessels from the enumerated ports, on the ground that American vessels were admitted upon the same terms with British vessels into them.

The act of Parliament of 3 George IV, chapter 44, appears to have given rise in several of the enumerated ports to questions with regard to its construction, and not to have received in all the same solution. As an experiment, to open an intercourse before interdicted by the laws both of Great Britain and the United States, its intention was received by this Government with a cordial welcome and a sincere disposition to meet it in the spirit of conciliation and of real reciprocity. But for the regulation of the intercourse, as the consent of both parties was indispensable, so it was just and necessary that the interests of both parties, as understood by themselves, should be consulted. It seems obvious that this could not be accomplished by mere legislation of either party. An arrangement by mutual understanding and concert was proposed by this Government immediately after the act of Parliament of June 24 was made known here. Whatever is yet known of the operation of that act, and of the system of which it forms a part, has contributed to fortify this impression. An act of Parliament of August 5, 1822, (3 George IV, chapter 119,) in particular, already bears upon the intercourse between an important portion of this Union and the contiguous British provinces with a pressure which has excited the attention of Congress, and which a resolution of the House of Representatives at their last session recommends to the Executive of the Union as a subject for immediate negotiation with Great Britain. I am directed by the President of the United States to make the proposal, and to request that you would make your Government acquainted with it. Should it prove acceptable, I shall be happy to confer with you upon it, with the view to the conclusion of a convention; or if your Government should prefer to treat of it in England, the powers and instructions necessary for the purpose may be transmitted to the minister of the United States at London.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Right Hon. STRATFORD CANNING,

Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Great Britain.

WASHINGTON, April 10, 1823.

SIR: The declaration which you describe in your letter of the 8th instant as requisite to authorize the President of the United States to issue his proclamation for the removal of all alien charges at present exacted on British vessels and their cargoes, arriving from his Majesty's colonies, I am ready to give, in so far as regards the corresponding condition of the act of Congress, an extract of the third section of which you have done me the honor to communicate. British and American vessels entering the colonial ports, under the act of Parliament passed June 24, are subject to equal charges on every article imported under that act, whether in American or in British vessels, the same if any and no other charges are levied. With respect to the succeeding clause of the same section, cited in your letter, relative to duties levied "upon the like goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the said colonial ports from elsewhere," I must request that you will have the goodness to inform me of the precise meaning attached to the expression which I have underlined, as, in strictness of construction, these words seem capable of bearing a sense completely at variance with a principal provision of the above mentioned act of Parliament, and one which it is therefore wholly out of my power to include in the proposed declaration. I might, perhaps, presume that the term elsewhere was only meant to signify other places not belonging to Great Britain in America and the West Indies; but the bare possibility of a more comprehensive signification being attached to it makes me desirous of ascertaining from you, in the first instance, whether I am right in giving it exclusively that interpretation; or, if not, in what more ample sense it is to be understood.

In answer to my previous representations on this subject, whether addressed to you before or during the late session of Congress, you informed me that the President was not at liberty to withdraw the discriminating duties on imports and tonnage, to which alone I adverted, in consequence of his not having received from Congress the authority necessary for that purpose. In proof, however, that the intention of his Majesty's Government, long since communicated to you, has also been long since carried into effect, I have only to mention that a circular instruction, a copy of which is at this moment before me, was issued as early as the third of July from the custom-house in London to the Collectors and Comptrollers of the Customs in his Majesty's colonial ports, directing them "not to charge any higher fees whatever, in respect of the trade allowed by the said act to be carried on in foreign vessels, than are now payable thereon in British vessels."

By what authority the tonnage duty of two shillings and sixpence, mentioned in your last letter, can possibly have been collected at Turk's Island so late as December 23 I am wholly at a loss to conceive, as, besides the operation of the custom-house circular, the act of Parliament under which you state that duty to have been levied was expressly repealed during the last session.

The remaining part of your letter must necessarily be left to the consideration of his Majesty's Government. It only occurs to me at this moment to submit whether some more definite statement of the points on which you have expressed the President's desire to negotiate might not be attended with the advantage of leading to an earlier and more satisfactory decision respecting that proposal.

I avail myself of this opportunity to repeat to you, sir, the assurance of my perfect consideration.

STRATFORD CANNING.

HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 14, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor of informing you that, by the third section of the act of Congress of the 1st of March last "to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British colonial ports," the term elsewhere is understood to be of meaning equivalent to anywhere else, and, of course, to include all places other than those from which the importations into those ports may be made in vessels of the United States.

The views of this Government with regard to a regulation of this intercourse in future by a convention, or by further concert between the two Governments, will, at an early day, be transmitted by the instructions to the minister of the United States at London.

In the meantime, it is to be observed that the circular instructions, referred to in your letter of the 10th of last month as having issued on the 3d of July last from the custom-house in London to the Collectors and Comptrollers of the Customs in his Majesty's colonial ports, directing them "not to charge any higher fees whatever, in respect of the trade allowed by the said act to be carried on in foreign vessels, than are now payable thereon in British vessels," did not, as, by the import of the terms it would seem that they could not, remove any existing discriminating duties or charges other than the mere fees of the officers to whom they were addressed.

That other charges and even duties discriminating to the disadvantage of the vessels of the United States have continued to be levied in several of the enumerated ports until a late period has been already shown; and, by the papers which you had the goodness to submit to my inspection only three days since, it appears that a discriminating tonnage duty is still levied upon the vessels of the United States in the ports of Nova Scotia equal to two-thirds of the whole tonnage duty which is paid in our ports by those British vessels which are admitted upon the same footing with our own.

I pray you, sir, to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Right Hon. STRATFORD CANNING,

---

WASHINGTON, May 17, 1823.

SIR: In acknowledging your letter of the 14th instant, which I had the honor to receive the day before yesterday, I must be allowed to express my regret at finding that the declaration expected by the American Government as a condition of the removal on their part of alien charges from British vessels entering the ports of the United States from certain of his Majesty's possessions in North America and the West Indies is meant to extend beyond the cessation of corresponding charges, as they affect the vessels of the United States in the open ports of the British colonies, the term elsewhere, in the third section of the act of Congress to which you refer, being intended, as I understood from your letter, to include even the British territories.

Such being the intention of the act, it is vain, for the present, to enter upon any discussion of the question which it involves, and it is altogether unnecessary to dwell upon the other points to which you have adverted, as this alone precludes, and necessarily precludes, my giving in a declaration such as would prove satisfactory to the President.

Suffice it on this occasion to observe, that the discriminating tonnage duty, which you described as being still levied on the vessels of the United States in harbors of Nova Scotia, appears, from the papers which you cite, to be levied on the vessels of Great Britain also; and, further, that the limited acceptance in which you seem to understand the circular instruction issued from the custom-house in London, under date of the 3d of July last, is completely at variance with the statement which I had the honor to communicate to you as long ago as the 18th of December, on the authority of a letter dated the 21st of October, from the Collector of the Customs at Kingston, in Jamaica.

I request, sir, that you will again accept the assurance of my high consideration.

STRATFORD CANNING.

No. 66.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 25, 1823.

SIR: Next to the colonial intercourse and the suppression of the slave trade, the subject upon which I am to invite your attention is the disagreement between the Commissioners under the 5th article of the treaty of Ghent. The authority and duty of that commission was—

1. To ascertain the northwest angle of Nova Scotia.
2. To ascertain the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river.
3. To survey the boundary line from the source of the river St. Croix directly north to the northwest angle of Nova Scotia; thence along the highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river; thence down along the middle of that river to the 45th degree of north latitude; thence by a line due west on said latitude until it strikes the river Iroquois or Cataraguy.
4. To make a map of the said boundary, and annex to it a declaration under their hands and seals, certify it to be the true map of the said boundary, and particularizing the latitude and longitude of the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, of the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, and of such other points of the said boundary as they might deem proper. And both parties to the treaty agreed to consider such map and declaration as finally and conclusively fixing the said boundary.

The treaty of Ghent further provided, that, in the event of the two Commissioners differing upon all or any of the matters so referred to them, they shall make, jointly or separately, report or reports to the two Governments, stating in detail the points on which they differ, and the grounds upon which their respective opinions have been formed. And the parties to the treaty agreed to refer the report or reports of the said Commissioners to some friendly sovereign to be then named for that purpose, and who shall be requested to decide on the differences which may be stated in the said report or reports. And his Britannic Majesty and the Government of the United States engaged to consider the decision of such friendly sovereign or State to be final and conclusive on all the matters so referred.

The two Commissioners, both sworn to examine and decide impartially upon all the points referred to them, after six years of meetings, examinations, and surveys, assisted by able surveyors, geographers, astronomers, and agents of both parties, have differed—

1. Upon the point where the northwest angle of Nova Scotia is.
2. Upon what is the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river.
3. Upon the meaning of the words "along the highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean."
4. Upon the admission of the general maps respectively presented by the agents of the two Governments, each objecting to the correctness of that presented by the other, and pressing for the reception of his own.

5. Upon a proposal by the British Commissioner to send out surveyors to ascertain the correctness of the former surveys in regard to the points objected to in the maps presented by the agents.

6. Upon a demand made by the British agent to examine upon oath the surveyors who made the maps, with regard to their correctness.

7. Upon the reception and entering upon the journals of a memorial of the British agent, containing a statement of one of the British surveyors relating to the maps presented by the agents.

8. Upon the reception of a written motion by the British agent, requesting leave to exhibit a memorial containing statements of the British surveyors relating to the maps, and that the same might be entered on the journals.

There is, therefore, no map of the said boundary, under the hands and seals of the Commissioners certifying it to be the true map, and particularizing the latitude and longitude of the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, or of the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river. The essential object of the commission was to ascertain those two points; and the only object of interest to the two nations which could possibly be obtained by the reference to a friendly sovereign to decide on the differences stated in the reports of the Commissioners would be to ascertain them by his decision.

The Commissioners differed upon other points, and from their reports, separately made, there appears to be less of harmony and concert in their operations than was to have been desired. There is a tone of mutual dissatisfaction and complaints in the reports, and some imputations of uncandid attempts in the surveyors and agents on both sides to overreach each other in the surveys and projection of the maps.

The difference between the Commissioners with regard to the northwest angle of Nova Scotia is of more than one hundred miles, and embraces a territory of more than ten thousand square miles. As the Commissioners could not agree upon either of the two points to be ascertained, it became impossible for them to agree upon the map and declaration which it was stipulated by the treaty should finally and conclusively fix the boundary. There is no such map, and the general map produced by each side is totally discredited by the other.

There was an astronomical survey of the 45th parallel of north latitude from the Connecticut river to the river Iroquois or Cataraguy, (viz: the St. Lawrence.) Of the accuracy of the survey itself there are some doubts; but its effect has been to unsettle a boundary which had been already fixed upon surveys made, by order of the British Government, just before the commencement of the American Revolution. The difference between the two lines is trifling in extent, but it cuts off a point of considerable importance to the State of New York, at Lake Champlain, and expensive fortifications erected upon it.

The principal astronomers on both sides who made this survey were both foreigners, both natives of Switzerland, countrymen and friends. Mr. Hasler, who was employed by the American Government, expressed an opinion that the survey of the 45th parallel of latitude should be made with allowance for the elliptical figure of the earth; or, as he terms it, the geocentric latitude. The agent of the United States presents this as a question for the consideration of the commissioners: If the ancient established line is to be unsettled? Upon which the British agent makes large extracts from Vattel about mental reservations, gross quibbles, a real piece of knavery, a real perfidy, and the like, all which the British Commissioner details at full length in his report; while, on the other hand, this very British agent himself labors under a heavy imputation of having filed a falsified copy of Mitchell's map to aid him in another point of his argument—a procedure which the British Commissioner thinks quite uncensurable, inasmuch as when this error was detected the agent obtained leave to file another and more correct copy of the map.

The American Commissioner did not think it necessary to give an opinion upon this survey, the reason assigned by him for which is, that as there was a disagreement about the two main points of the whole boundary line, the surveys became useless as to the purpose of fixing it. But the British Commissioner gives his opinion upon the whole line, refers to the map of the British surveyors as if it were admitted to be correct, and adopts all the arguments of the British agent as conclusive. Under this state of things it became a serious question for the two governments, What is there to refer to the decision of a friendly sovereign, conformably to the stipulation of the treaty? and, subordinate to it, the questions further arise, how and to whom it shall be referred?

The contingent reference to a friendly sovereign of this and of other questions was an experiment first proposed at the negotiation of the Ghent treaty by the plenipotentiaries on the part of Great Britain, instead of a commission of three members, which had been proposed on the part of the United States, the decision of a majority of which that proposal had intended should be final. The British substitute was accepted as an alternative, to the execution of which no immediate objection presented itself, and was agreed to without discussion. A question, which afterwards arose upon the construction of a few words in the first article of that treaty, has already been referred to the decision of a friendly sovereign, and the result of that reference is yet to be awaited.

From the moment when it became necessary to give practical effect to this new expedient for adjusting differences of national interest and importance, difficulties arose which had not been anticipated in the distant contemplation of a project, the broad and principal idea of which was, that of reference to an impartial arbitrator. It became obvious that if a question of no greater compass than the grammatical meaning of a few words in an article of a treaty might be referred to the personal decision of a foreign sovereign, without too severely taxing his patience or his friendship, it would scarcely be within the bounds of respectful decency to ask a foreign sovereign to pronounce between two such nations as Great Britain and the United States, upon differences between them involving a boundary line of at least six hundred miles extent, through a half discovered region, the topography of which was unknown, and which Commissioners of their own, aided by surveyors, geographers, astronomers, and agents, after years upon years of labor and investigation devoted entirely to that object, had not been able to settle. My impressions upon this subject were communicated to you, even at the threshold of the negotiation for the convention of October 20, 1818; and if nothing else had occurred to confirm them, the incident which has brought us to the necessity of acting upon the disagreement between the Commissioners under this 5th article of the treaty would have sufficed. What have we now to refer for decision? We are to ask a foreign sovereign to decide—

1. Where is the northwest angle of Nova Scotia?
2. What is the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river?
3. Where is the range of highlands that divide the rivers that flow into the St. Lawrence from those that flow into the Atlantic Ocean?
4. What point upon Connecticut river is the forty-fifth degree of north latitude?
5. Where a line due west from that point will strike the St. Lawrence river?

Incidental to these questions are others, embracing the construction of ancient charters, treaties, and royal proclamations—controversies between France and England before the cession of Canada to Great Britain—questions of theoretical geography and astronomy; and, finally, a choice between two maps, each discredited by one of the Commissioners under whose directions they were taken. The arbitrator must, in the first place, assume one of these maps, to the exclusion of the other. Upon the map assumed he must trace the boundary line of at least six hundred miles extent. He must mark upon it the points in dispute: the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, the range of highlands, the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, and the 45th parallel of latitude between the Connecticut and St. Lawrence rivers. The decision will, after all, be only upon the map, and not upon the territory; and the map of each party being declared by the other utterly incorrect, if the map on which the boundary must be drawn should prove so, will it not leave the question between the two countries more unsettled than ever?

It cannot be the desire of the parties, nor cannot be imagined, without disrespect to the arbitrator, that he would decide all these questions without understanding their merits. There are upwards of thirty folio volumes of manuscripts, all in the English language, containing the journals of the Commissioners, the proceedings of the surveyors and geographers, the observations and calculations of the astronomers, and the arguments of the agents. The report of the British Commissioner is a volume of about five hundred pages, closely written, and there are three atlases or collections of maps, filed before the Commissioners during the discussion, besides the two general maps not admitted by the Commissioners, but upon one of which, if the arbitrator decides at all, he must trace the boundary line in question.

Is there a sovereign upon earth of whom it could be reasonably requested that he would devote the time and take upon him the labor indispensable to inform himself of the merits of all those disputed questions; and if there be, is it not morally certain that upon examining them, as presented by the reports of the two Commissioners, questions must arise in his own mind which could be resolved only by evidence not before him, or upon discussion by the parties? No man worthy of being selected by two nations as the umpire of a difference between them would consent to assume the office without a deep sense of the duties which it would impose upon him; and if, at the first presentation of this reference, the sovereign to whom it would be made should not immediately perceive the laborious examination which it would require of him, he could not fail to be made sensible of it upon entering into the inquiries necessary for the performance of the duty; the result of which, I apprehend, must necessarily be that he would decline a task to the performance of which he must be conscious of his own incompetency.

It was on these and the like considerations that, when the disagreement between the Commissioners under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent was first known, a proposition was made, by direction of the President, to the British Government, that, before resorting to the reference stipulated by that article, an effort should be made by direct communication between the two Governments to adjust it between themselves. By your despatch of February 11, 1822, we were informed that this proposition had been offered by you to the late Marquis of Londonderry, and by that of April 6, 1822, you announced that it had been formally acceded to. From that time we had been in expectation that the British minister residing here would have been empowered to treat upon the subject with us; but the decease of Lord Londonderry having happened soon after, and a consequent change in the British Department of Foreign Affairs, we had supposed that those circumstances had occasioned a delay in the transmission of the powers until

Mr. S. Canning recently gave us notice that he had received instructions to propose an immediate reference of the case for the decision of a friendly sovereign, according to the stipulation of the treaty, and called upon us to nominate the sovereign to whom we should incline to make the reference. There has been much conversation between us on the subject, in which the difficulties necessarily incident to such a reference have again been adverted to, and the proposal itself, as now presented, has been noticed as unexpected. Mr. S. Canning appears to entertain the idea that the British Government, by acceding to the proposals of attempting an adjustment by direct communications, did not intend to pledge themselves to negotiate, but merely to receive from us and consider a direct and specific offer of a boundary line by compromise—a measure for which, had there been no other obstacles in the way, we could not be prepared, on account of the disagreement respecting the maps and surveys, and for which, from that and other causes, we are yet unprepared. Mr. Canning, however, now on the point of departure under a leave of absence, supposed that his Government, upon being reminded of their agreement, as notified in your despatch of April 6, 1822, will still consent either to treat for a boundary by compromise, or to receive and consider a distinct proposal of a line to be offered by us. I have admitted that, if they should agree to treat, we should be expected to propose a line, but have objected to make the proposal, under the uncertainty whether it would be received on the principle of negotiating, or merely as an offer to be accepted or rejected at the option of Great Britain. The President directs that, on receiving this despatch, you shall candidly communicate to the British Government his desire that the further prosecution of this affair should be by direct negotiation between the parties without reference to any foreign sovereign, and that an article to that effect should be introduced into the convention which you are to propose. You will fairly exhibit the reasons, founded upon the nature of the questions to be determined, and upon the state in which they are presented, by the reports of the Commissioners and the record of their proceedings under the commission, for the belief that it would be impossible for any foreign arbitrator, on the documents which could now be laid before him, to decide them. The extent of his power and of his office would be to fix a boundary line in various directions, and of six hundred miles extent, upon the surface of the earth, by delineating it upon a map; and the parties who ask him to do this for them furnish him a library of books and documents and three atlases of maps to examine and study, but among them not one map upon which he could, with any safety to his own judgment, or any chance of giving satisfaction to the parties, draw the delineation. You will add, that the Government of the United States feel some repugnance, in which repugnance they trust to the delicacy of sentiment of the British Government for taking their own share, at the idea of submitting such questions, in such a state, to the decision of a third party; or, in other words, of uncovering their common nakedness to the eyes of a common friend. Mutual imputations of bad faith, of falsification of documents, of knavery, and of perfidy, between the persons upon whose testimony the arbitrator must decide—in fact, the whole of that testimony—could scarcely fail of communicating their infection to the decision itself. If the British Secretary of State, after giving a full examination to the reports of the two Commissioners, with their necessary references to the maps, will undertake to prepare a statement of the case to be submitted to the arbitrator, it is not to be doubted that he will be sensible of the difficulties here suggested. If the British Cabinet should agree to negotiate, you will observe that the difficulty with regard to the map upon which the line shall be delineated presents an obstacle to be removed before a specific proposal of a line can be made. The Commissioners made no map, as by the commission they were required to do; and, without entering upon the inquiry upon whom the blame should fall for having left this part of their commission unexecuted, or whether blame attach to it at all, the result is, that neither the parties nor the contingent arbitrator can, in the present state of things, have a map upon which to delineate the boundary. Neither of the two general maps used by the agents for the illustration of their respective arguments is recognized by the Commissioners. They are both ex parte documents, acknowledged on both sides to be very incorrect, and each too obviously projected with more direct reference to the claims of the parties than to the territory of which they should be the portraiture.

The first thing which would seem to be indispensable to the settlement of this difference is the verification of the maps, or rather their correspondence with the territory upon which the line is to be drawn. Should the British Government entertain a different opinion, you will inquire what map they propose to use, either for fixing the line by agreement, or for the submission of it to the arbitrator? We cannot acquiesce in the use of the map offered by the British agent, for the account of the manner in which it was taken, given by Mr. Odell himself, who made it, is sufficient to destroy all our confidence in it. Yet the decision of the British Commissioner refers directly and explicitly to this map, which is not even part of the evidence reported by the commission. If the British Government are willing that both the maps should be received as if they had both been reported without objection by the commission, we are willing to waive all objections to them, and to propose a line, which, referring to local positions known and ascertained on the territory, shall be traceable on both the maps without danger of impairing the rights of the parties upon the land itself by the fictitious features of its picture upon paper. But either the two maps must be admitted as of equal authority, or we must insist on the objection to the use of either in forming the final decision upon the question, or in drawing the definitive boundary line. For the purposes of compromise, both the maps may be used without danger of error or injustice. For decision by an arbitration, neither of them would be admissible.

Should negotiation be agreed to, it is desirable that it should be transacted in this country; and you will propose that the British Government should furnish their minister here, or such other person as they may think proper to charge with the trust, with a power adequate to the purpose. The reasons for this are, that all the documents and maps reported by the commission are here, and could not, without some risk of loss, be transported beyond sea. Another copy of them is, indeed, in England; and might, with the assent of the British Government, be used by you in the management of the business there; but the territory upon which the line is to be settled is in this country, and all the interests immediately affected by it are here. It concerns the territorial rights and possessions of five or six States of this Union, whose inhabitants and authorities must so far be consulted as to insure the ratification, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, of the arrangement which may be concluded. This could be effected here with much less difficulty and loss of time than if the negotiation should be pursued in England. If, however, the British Government should decline negotiation, and insist upon resorting to the arbitration stipulated by the treaty, there remains the question, to whom and in what manner the case shall be submitted? I have already named to Mr. Canning the Emperor of Russia, as the sovereign whom we shall, on that contingency, propose; and you are authorized to repeat the nomination. Mr. Canning appeared to believe there might be some inconvenience in this, from the pendency of a prior reference to the same sovereign and an unwillingness to overburden him with the solicitation of a second friendly office, for the mere accommodation of the parties, and in which his own empire has no interest. He adverted to the fact that this had already been suggested on our part; and it really formed one of our motives for a preference of negotiation rather than a recurrence to any arbitrator. Mr. Canning, without naming any, has given me to understand that the King of the Netherlands would be agreeable to his Government. But the relations of that prince with great Britain are so intimate, and his obligations to the British Government so great, that, with whatever impartiality he might form his decision, it would, if favorable to Great Britain, be attributed, in the public opinion here, to a pre-existing bias, and give as much dissatisfaction as if the decision should be left to Great Britain herself. Excepting the Emperor of Russia, the only European sovereign who, by his general position, appears to be independent, and so disconnected otherwise with the parties as to promise entire impartiality, is the King of Prussia; and to him, if he should be proposed, you are authorized ultimately to assent.

The manner of submitting the case to the arbitrator, if that should be insisted on, is lastly to be considered. From the nature and the number of the questions to be determined, it cannot be expected that any sovereign would undertake personally to examine and investigate them in the detail necessary for coming to a decision upon their merits. In the case of the former reference to the Emperor of Russia, you will recollect, there was a statement of the case, drawn up by agreement between Mr. Middleton and Lord Castlereagh, and presented concurrently in memorials of Sir Charles Bagot and Mr. Middleton to the Russian ministry. A question of more simplicity could scarcely be presented for solution than that. But now, if the reference is to be made, you will request that a statement of the case, such as the British Government will agree to exhibit to the referee or arbitrator, should be drawn up and presented to us for consideration. I would readily send you such a statement as we could agree to, were it not from a conviction that we could draw none up to which the British Government would agree. To take the first and most important question: The location of the northwest angle of Nova Scotia. It is described in the treaty of 1783 as "that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of St. Croix river to the highlands; along the said highlands, which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean, to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river." The map used by the negotiators of the treaty of 1783 was one which, in the year 1755, had been published under the authority of the British Government and the direction of Governor Pownall. From the name of the publisher, it is called Mitchell's map. The northwest angle of Nova Scotia and the range of highlands described in the article of the treaty are very distinctly laid down upon this map; and the boundary line itself is marked on the copy of it used by the negotiators of the treaty now in our possession. Yet the report of the British Commissioner decides this angle and range of highlands to be upwards of one hundred miles distant from their location upon Mitchell's map, and in directions where, until this commission, it is believed there was never suspected to be any range of highlands at all. In support of this decision, the Commissioner refers to an ex parte map used by the British agent in support of his argument, but not admitted to be filed nor reported by the commission. The range of highlands delineated on this map is believed by the American Commissioner to have no existence in nature; and the same opinion appears to be entertained by the British Commissioner of the range delineated on the map exhibited by the American agent, which, however, is at least countenanced by Mitchell's map.

In drawing up the statement to which we should be willing to agree, we should necessarily refer either to the general map, exhibited by the agent of the United States before the Commissioners, or to Mitchell's map, the same that was used by the negotiators of the treaty of 1783. But will the British Government be willing to acquiesce in a statement of the case, for the decision of the arbitrator, which shall refer to either of them? The British Commissioner refused to admit upon the files the map exhibited by our agent, and certainly with sufficient reason, according to his views; for the bare inspection of it would have shown the absurdity of his report. But the same objection would exist against the very map used by the negotiators of the treaty of 1783, and with reference to which the boundary line in question was by them described. I have therefore thought it would be altogether useless to prepare a statement, which would probably not be accepted; and in desiring that the specific proposal of the statement to be submitted should come from Great Britain, I would exclude the consideration of nothing which should admit of reference to all the maps, though we can in nowise consent to a submission which should refer specially to the British map not reported by the commission.

The question concerning the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, and the forty-fifth parallel of latitude from the Connecticut to the St. Lawrence, do not depend so much upon the accuracy of the maps. But, besides the scientific question of the geocentric latitude, the survey of the line itself was not made in a satisfactory manner; and whether that survey shall be taken into consideration at all, or whether the old line of the survey of 1772 shall not be adhered to as definitive, is one of the points to be decided by the arbitrator. The appalling mass of argument and discussion upon all these topics, contained in the many volumes of documents reported by the Commissioners, and constantly referred to in their reports, carries with it a moral certainty that no sovereign would undertake the investigation of them in person. We think it could not even respectfully be proposed to any one that he should. This investigation must be made, if at all, by delegated authority; by a person or persons commissioned by the arbitrator sovereign to report to him a decision founded upon a deliberate examination of facts and arguments, and explanatory comments from the parties, to which decision the sovereign would be required only to give his approbation and sanction. The simplest course we can imagine would be, that the minister of the arbitrator residing here should be charged by him to make such a report, and you will accordingly make the proposal, in the event that the reference should still be claimed by the British Government as a right. But whatever arrangement is finally determined upon, the difficulty respecting the maps must first be removed. We are, on our part, exceedingly anxious to bring this difference to a termination; but the effect of the commission has unfortunately been to make it infinitely more difficult to settle than it was before. The report of the British Commissioner is a labored attempt to support a system of the British agent, in which ingenuity maintains an endless argument against common sense. They have removed mountains from their position upon the earth, to locate them where it suited their purposes that they should stand, and the result, if submitted to by us, would be to take off from the State of Maine one-third part of its territory. By objecting to the general map exhibited by our agent, the British Commissioner compelled ours to take the same objection against that exhibited by the British agent, and the consequence is, that the only evidence, without which no decision can be made, is excluded from the report. Whether this was the design of the British Commissioner or not, to him alone must it be imputed; and the manner in which he took the exception, as well as the absence of all substantial reason for his refusal to submit for the decision of the arbitrator evidence of the validity of which the arbitrator would have been the judge, while he insisted on the exclusive submission of the ex parte map produced by the agent of his own Government, manifests an eagerness for advantages in the submission which we cannot consent to indulge. We do not mean to complain of his conduct; but we must ask the British Government to inform us how they propose to supply the chasm in the evidence, essential to the decision of the dispute, occasioned by the exclusion of both the general maps which were exhibited to the commission?

We cannot but hope that the British Government will consent to settle the affair by direct negotiation, and that at all events they will admit the use of all the maps, without insisting upon any exclusive privilege for their own.

I am, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Hon. RICHARD RUSH, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to Great Britain.

No. 67.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 26, 1823.

SIR: Upon the subject of the admission of consuls of the United States into the ports of the British colonies which have been opened by the British acts of Parliament of June 24, 1822, to a commercial intercourse with the United States in the vessels of the latter, it appears by the note of Mr. S. Canning to you, 29th November last, a copy of which was transmitted with your despatch No. 281, that the British Government have consented to receive consuls at one port of the island of Jamaica, at one of the Leeward Islands, to be designated by the Government of the United States, and at one port in the North American colonies, with an assurance that the British Government will reconsider the proposition which had been made by you, that consuls should be admissible at all the ports opened to the intercourse, if any practical inconvenience should be shown on the part of the United States to the limitation of the number of their consuls to three for all the ports opened by the act of Parliament.

During the last session of Congress, consuls were appointed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for the islands of Jamaica and of St. Christopher, and for the colony of Demarara. The commissions for the consuls at St. Christopher and at Demarara are the only ones that have yet been issued. It was perfectly proper that your note claiming the admission of consuls into the enumerated ports should extend the claim equally to them all; but in advancing this claim it was not the intention nor is it the desire of this Government to make appointments for them all. Our consular system, as you are aware, allows no salaries to those officers, and their only emoluments arise from fees, levied upon actual trade, in the port where they reside. No appointment will, therefore, be made at any port where the services of the officer will not be needed. The person appointed as consul at Jamaica has declined accepting the office, and another appointment will shortly be made for that island. A certificate of consular commercial agency has been given to John M. Kankey for the island of Barbadoes. At the next session of Congress the President proposes to nominate the same or another person to the Senate as consul for that island, which is one of those where there will probably be the most occasion for the office. You will give notice of these circumstances to the British Government, and request that instructions may be sent to the Governor of Barbadoes to allow the exercise of the ordinary consular functions to Mr. Kankey until the regular appointment of a consul; and that when a person so appointed shall present himself, with a commission, the Governor be authorized to recognize him in that capacity. The suggestion in Mr. Canning's note, that the admission of consuls of the United States into the colonial ports is not considered by the British Government as a matter of mere reciprocity, because American consuls are received in all ports of Great Britain, and the United States have no colonies of their own, where a practical reciprocity could be exercised, as you have observed, admits of an easy answer. The essential object of the consular office is the protection of the commerce, merchants, and mariners of one nation in the ports of another. Wherever the commercial intercourse exists, the services of the consular office may be required; and if British merchants and mariners, coming from the colonies in the prosecution of the trade open to both nations, can avail themselves of the services of the British consuls in the ports to which they come, we think it would be an entire denial of reciprocity to say that our merchants and seamen pursuing the same trade, and going to the ports of the same colonies, should be refused the benefit of like protection from consuls of their own country there. If a British trader from Jamaica can claim and receive protection from a British consul at New York, it is needless to say there would be no reciprocity to the American trader to Jamaica who should there be told that he might claim the protection of the American consul at Liverpool.

It is presumed there will be no occasion for discussing this point with the British Government, and I have made the above remarks only to guard against the inference that our claim to the admission of consuls into the opened colonial ports rests upon other grounds than mere reciprocity. But in the negotiation of a convention it may be proper to propose, at least, an article prescribing the manner in which the exequatur shall be furnished to consuls generally. That they shall be delivered to them gratis we have a right of strict reciprocity to claim, because they are so delivered to all British consuls in the United States. With this addition, you are authorized to propose the sixteenth article of the treaty of November 19, 1794, as a model for one to be inserted in the convention. But as it reserves to the parties the right of excepting from the residence of consuls such particular places as each party shall judge proper to be so excepted, it may be necessary, if that clause should be retained, to reserve all the reciprocal right of excluding from the protection of the respective consuls all merchants, mariners, and vessels of their country coming from ports from which consuls of the other nation are excluded.

We are not, indeed, tenacious of the insertion of any article relating to consuls into the convention; but, whether by convention or otherwise, you will not fail to insist upon the claim of admission for our consuls into all the opened ports whence British vessels, merchants, and mariners, coming to our ports, may claim the protection of British consuls here, and where, from the state of the trade, we may deem it useful to our citizens that a consul of the United States should reside; and also that the exequaturs of all our consuls in the British dominions should henceforth be delivered without any charge or expense to them whatever.

The British Government may be assured that we shall use the power of appointing consuls to any of the opened ports for no improper purpose; but the right to consular protection is one of the ordinary advantages of trade in foreign ports which ought not to be denied to our countrymen, in ports where they are admitted, on the principles of reciprocal trade. The want of a consul of the United States at the island of Barbadoes, for instance, has been exemplified in a circumstance which has recently come to our knowledge. That island was one of those from which Mr. S. Canning received and communicated to me a declaratory certificate that vessels of the United States were liable to no other or higher duties and fees than British vessels coming from the United States. We are now informed that a citizen of the United States, who went to Barbadoes with a cargo of flour, was compelled, in December last, to pay a duty of two per cent. on the proceeds of the sales of his cargo, under the denomination of a transient tax, which no British subject would have been required to pay. We understand that the American himself would have escaped this tax if his cargo had been consigned to an established commercial house in the island. But it is one of the many modes of levying discriminating duties, which cannot comport with the principle of real reciprocity. If a tax of two per cent. is exacted from the foreign trader for the privilege of transacting his own business, which the native trader enjoys gratuitously, they are not upon terms of equal competition. It is presumed that had there been at that time a consul of the United States in the island, this tax would have been remitted upon his representations—at least, he would have given notice to this Government of its existence. This circumstance, as well as the other fact recently disclosed, and noticed in my letter of the 23d instant, that in Nova Scotia there is a deduction in favor of the vessels of the province from the tonnage duty paid by British vessels, proves at once the necessity that we should have consuls in the opened colonial ports, and that of the most vigilant caution, in abandoning on our part all discriminating duties favorable to our own navigation in this trade. Whether this subject is to be regulated hereafter by convention, or by corresponding acts of Parliament and of Congress, we are to understand explicitly, that, according to our view of removing all discriminations, the system must embrace the colonial as well as the parliamentary legislation; and if in any one colony the vessels or people of the colony have advantages or preferences secured to them over other British vessels and subjects, it cannot be satisfactory to us to be placed on the same footing with the British not of the province. If the Provincial enjoys at home a discriminating advantage over the Briton, we cannot admit him here as a Briton, unless our vessels are also admitted into the colony with the provincial privileges. All this is essential to real reciprocity, and to the removal of our foreign tonnage and impost duty upon British vessels and cargoes coming from the opened colonial ports for trade with the United States.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 27, 1823.

SIR: Your despatches Nos. 265 and 275, inclosing copies of your correspondence with Mr. Gallatin concerning the question which has arisen with France in regard to the right of fishing on a certain part of the coast of Newfoundland, have been duly received.

The transactions which gave rise to this controversy occurred in the years 1820 and 1821, when several fishing vessels of the United States, on the coast and within the strictest territorial jurisdiction of the island of Newfoundland, were ordered away by the commanders of French armed vessels upon the pain of seizure and confiscation. Two distinct questions arose from these incidents: one, upon the pretension of France to the exclusive right of fishing on that part of the coast of Newfoundland; and the other, upon the right of French armed vessels to order away vessels of the United States from places within the exclusive jurisdiction of Great Britain. In both these questions Great Britain had an interest and concern not less important than that of the United States; but the President, in the first instance, determined to address the complaint which the occasion required to the French Government alone. The motives for this forbearance were, to give the French Government the opportunity of disowning these acts of its officers, and of disclaiming any pretensions to the exclusive fishing right at the place where they had occurred, without implicating Great Britain at all in the transaction. This course of proceeding was thought to be most consistent with delicacy towards both those Governments, by avoiding towards France the appearance of recurring upon a question between her and us to the interposition of a third power, and by abstaining towards Great Britain from calling for her interference with France in a difference which might be adjusted without needing the aid of her influence. This was the reason upon which the instructions to make representations on this subject were forwarded only to Mr. Gallatin, and that until now it has never been mentioned in the instructions from this Department to you.

But the complaint to France has hitherto proved ineffectual, excepting to demonstrate that the pretensions of France to an exclusive right of fishing at the place referred to are without solid foundation, and that her intention of resorting to force to maintain this inadmissible pretension, though not yet unequivocally asserted, has been so far ascertained as to remove all scruple of delicacy with regard to the propriety of stating the case to the British Government, and calling upon them to maintain at once the faith of their treaty with us and the efficacy of their own territorial jurisdiction, violated by the exercise of force against the fishing vessels of the United States engaged in their lawful occupation under its protection.

The untenable character of the French claim and pretension has been so satisfactorily proved, as well in the correspondence between you and Mr. Gallatin as in that of Mr. Gallatin with the French Government, that it is altogether unnecessary for me to enter upon the discussion. I am not aware of anything that has escaped your attention in the development of our right to the free participation in the fisheries at the controverted points, and from the result of your oral communications with Mr. Robinson, in the course of your inquiries relating to this affair, it is not to be doubted that the whole contest will continue to be seen in its true light by Great Britain.

Copies are herewith transmitted to you of the correspondence between Mr. Gallatin, in the execution of his instructions, with the Viscount de Chateaubriand, in which you will find all the argument that France has been able to adduce in support of her claims to the exclusive right of fishery. It completes the demonstration that the pretension cannot be supported. But you will see that Mr. de Chateaubriand, in his letter of the 5th of April last, while evading or abandoning the attempt of reply to Mr. Gallatin, with regard to the claim of exclusive fishery, says that he had some time since instructed the chargé d'affaires of France at this place to enter upon explanations with the Government of the United States concerning this object, and that he was then writing to him again about it. With regard to the exercise of force within the British jurisdiction the Viscount has given Mr. Gallatin no answer whatever; but Mr. Gallatin, in his letter to this Department of 17th April, states that in a conversation with the Minister of Marine, to whom he knew the subject had been referred, that minister "gave it as his opinion, in explicit terms, that France, being in possession of the exclusive right of fishing on the coast in question, inasmuch as she had not before the last occurrence been disturbed in it by the fishermen either of England or America, she had the right to retain such possession, and ought to continue to exercise that right by expelling any vessels that should attempt to participate in the fisheries." Mr. Gallatin had not ascertained whether the Viscount de Chateaubriand and the other minister concurred in this opinion of the Minister of Marine, the candor and explicitness of which must be acknowledged, but the chargé d'affaires of France here declares that he has received no instructions from his Government to give the explanations promised by the letter of Mr. Chateaubriand to Mr. Gallatin, and we should no longer be excusable for refraining from a representation of the whole case to the Government of Great Britain. The question concerning the jurisdiction belongs peculiarly to her. The documents cited by you, in your correspondence with Mr. Gallatin, show that the premises of the French Marine Minister, upon which he relies for the basis of his opinion, are as incorrect in point of fact as his conclusion is extraordinary in point of principle. The deliberate pretension to exercise force within purely British waters was unexpected on the part of France. We shall not, for the present, employ force to meet force, although that result was properly presented by Mr. Gallatin to the French Government as a consequence to be anticipated from the perseverance of their armed vessels in disturbing our fishermen. We respect the territorial jurisdiction of Great Britain in resorting to her for the effectual exercise of it to carry into execution her engagements with us.

The President desires that, in your conferences with the British Secretary of State, you will give him information of the present state of this concern between us and France. You will be careful to present it in the aspect the most favorable and friendly towards France that can be compatible with the effective maintenance of our own rights. It is probable that there may be no such interruption to our fishermen during the present season; and the occasion appears to be highly favorable for an adjustment of it to our satisfaction. Perhaps a mutual explanation and understanding between the British and French Governments concerning it, at this time, may render any resort to other measures unnecessary. But if, on discussion of the subject between them, France should not explicitly desist from both the pretensions to the exclusive fishery and to the exercise of force within British waters to secure it, you will claim that which the British Government cannot fail to perceive is due, the unmolested execution of the treaty stipulation contained in the convention of October 20, 1818; and if the British Government admits the claim of France to exclusive fishery on the western coast of Newfoundland from Cape Bay to the Quirpon Islands, they will necessarily see the obligation of indemnifying the United States by an equivalent for the loss of that portion of the fishery, expressly conceded to them by the convention, which, in the supposed hypothesis, must have been granted by Great Britain under an erroneous impression that it was yet in her power to grant.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, London.*

No. 71.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 28, 1823.

SIR: Among the subjects of negotiation which you have been authorized to propose to the British Government, included in the full power recently transmitted to you, and with regard to which you have been informed that further instructions would be given you, are several points relating to the rights of maritime neutrality in time of war.

By the pervading principle of the treaty known under the denomination of the Holy Alliance, and by the persevering efforts of Great Britain for the suppression of the African slave trade, the principal powers of Europe have solemnly pledged themselves to the principle that it is among the most indispensable duties of the rulers of mankind to combine their exertions for the general amelioration of the condition of man.

This principle is entirely congenial to the political system of the United States, and has formed one of the maxims of their external policy from the period of the establishment of their independence. Among the benefits which the Christian religion has secured to the human race, and particularly to those nations by which it has been adopted as a rule of faith and of conduct, none has been more conspicuous than its influence in mitigating the laws and usages of war. It is impossible, indeed, to examine the system of Christianity, as contained in its sacred books, without coming to the conclusion that its main object was ultimately to abolish war upon earth altogether; and it is equally clear that if its precepts were universally adopted and practiced among men, war upon earth would cease by the fact itself. The history of the human race since the introduction of Christianity has not encouraged the expectation that this object can, for many ages yet, be fully accomplished; but if this must be conceded, the same appeal to history will justify the assertion that the influence of Christianity has been marked in a signal manner by the gradual establishment of rules in the hostile conflicts of nations tending to assuage the evils of war.

It is the prevalence of pacific and benevolent sentiment which has successively expunged from the laws of nations, as practiced among Christians, that absolute control over the life of the vanquished in war, upon which the customary right of reducing him to slavery was founded; all the rights of war over the person of an enemy are now, by the usages of Christian nations, reduced to that of holding him, if taken as a combatant, in prison; and even the usage is further relaxed by the liberation of officers upon parole. The same relenting spirit has extended to the disposal of property, and, without requiring the stipulation of treaties, it has become a law of war among Christian nations to exempt from violation the private property of individuals.

These great and cheering indications of progressive amelioration in the condition of man, effected by the influence of Christianity, have been set forth with much force and ingenuity by the English historian of the laws of nations, Ward. In the introduction and establishment of these mitigations to the rigor of war, Great Britain herself, to her never-fading honor, has more than once taken the lead. That the feelings in which these improvements upon the ancient laws of nations originated are strong in the breasts of her statesmen of the present age is proved, not only by the spirit and perseverance with which they are pursuing the abolition of the African slave trade, but by the stipulations in the tenth and twenty-sixth articles of her treaty of November 19, 1794, with the United States. To these principles and feelings, therefore, it is believed that an earnest and confident appeal may be made, as the foundation of the proposals which you will now be instructed to make.

In the conversation with Mr. S. Canning, before he left this city, in which a general idea was given of the negotiation which it was intended to propose to the British Government, the remark was made that, with the exception of the arrangement respecting colonial intercourse and the suppression of the slave trade, all the other subjects, concerning which instructions would be furnished to you, might be connected with the negotiation, or omitted from it, at the option of Great Britain. Your instructions would direct that you should express the earnest wish of the President that they should all be discussed between the two Governments, from a strong conviction that the adjustment of them would have an auspicious effect upon the future peace and harmony of the two nations, and from a belief that the present is a period peculiarly favorable for a strong exertion to obtain that adjustment. With regard especially to the debatable points of maritime law, and the relative rights of belligerent and neutral nations, I observed that we should not be discouraged by the failure of our endeavors and offers at the negotiation of Ghent, and of the convention of 1818. We saw that even since the latest of these dates the political aspect of Europe and of America had undergone a total change. The European Alliance, so far as Great Britain was a party to it, might be considered as virtually dissolved. She and the great continental powers, parties to that alliance, were now publicly pledged to principles hardly reconcilable together, and their policy was as much at variance as their principles. With regard to the war which appeared to be opening between France and Spain, the principles and the policy of the United States coincided with those of Great Britain, and not with those of the European continental allies. They disapproved a war made for the avowed purpose of dictating to a foreign nation the terms of her internal constitution. They disapproved especially a war declared upon the avowed principle, by a King of France, that Spain could receive a legitimate constitution only from the hands of her King. The general maxim, however, of abstaining from interference in the quarrels of other nations would still govern the policy of the United States on this occasion; their relation to the war would be like that of Great Britain, neutrality. The condition of every part of America, the United States excepted, had also changed since the conclusion of the convention of October, 1818. The independence of all Spanish America on these continents was no longer problematical. It had been formally acknowledged by the United States, and so far by Great Britain that she had maintained, to the extent of issuing reprisals, the right of her subjects to trade with the emancipated colonies. To the war between Spain and them the United States and Great Britain were also both neutral. The general interests of Great Britain, therefore, in all parts of the world, were interests of neutrality. Those of the United States were the same. From many recent indications of the policy of the British Cabinet we had seen cause to hope that the rights of neutrality were more favorably viewed by them than heretofore; and we thought it probable they would not be unwilling to review the doctrines heretofore held by them with a disposition more favorable to neutral interests. There was much in the general state of the world which we thought admonished the statesmen both of the United States and of Great Britain to cultivate and cherish the sentiments, and to avail themselves of the events which tended to conciliation and harmony between the two nations; and we, on our part, were so convinced of the importance to them both of a mutual good understanding, that we seized with eagerness every opportunity offered by the course of events for promoting it. But I observed our desire to discuss these collisions of neutral and belligerent right essentially reposed on the assumption that the views of Great Britain concerning them were not exactly the same that they had been when we had discussed them with her heretofore. If we were mistaken in that; if she would enter upon the negotiation only to adhere to the doctrines which she had maintained heretofore, we should prefer postponing again the discussion to a future period.

On this foundation you will broach that part of the subject to the British Secretary for Foreign Affairs. If the great changes in the political aspects of Europe and of America, since October, 1818, have left Great Britain unshaken in all her belligerent pretensions, we candidly say the time has not yet come when a hope may be entertained that we can agree with her concerning any of them; and we rather wish she would say so distinctly, and decline negotiation on these points, than that she should consent to enter upon the negotiation under the expectation that we are disposed to depart from any of the principles upon which we have heretofore insisted with regard to the rights of neutrality. Mr. S. Canning, to whom I made this explicit avowal, thought there might be some objection to the sacrifice of self-respect, which might be implied in the consent to open a negotiation upon such a basis, but he intimated that it would rather be an objection of form than of substance; that his Government could, of course, not accede to a negotiation from the outset of which they should acknowledge themselves to have been heretofore in the wrong. But he admitted that some of the principal collisions between us and Great Britain, in the late European wars, had arisen from measures which Great Britain had resorted to, not as legitimate by the ordinary laws of nations, but as retaliatory upon preceding excesses of her enemy. I disclaimed, of course, all disposition on the part of this Government to ask of Great Britain any disavowal, expressed or implied, of her former acts. Our object is not retrospection of the past, but forecast for the future.

The world in which we both moved is no longer the same. Her great national interests are no longer the same. They were belligerent; they are now neutral. Maritime war itself, and all the questions connected with it, must be affected by the downfall of the colonial system. Of what use, for example, will her too celebrated rule of the war of 1756 ever again be to her, when all the ex-colonies of Europe and the colonies yet existing, her own included, are open to foreign commerce and shipping in time of peace? Let her next maritime war break out with whom it will, she can no longer seize and confiscate neutral commerce with the colonies of her enemy, on the pretence that it was not allowed in time of peace. We press no disavowal upon her; but we think the present time eminently auspicious for urging upon her, and upon others, an object which has long been dear to the hearts and ardent in the aspirations of the benevolent and the wise; an object essentially congenial to the true spirit of Christianity, and, therefore, peculiarly fitting for the support of nations intent, in the same spirit, upon the final and total suppression of the slave trade, and of sovereigns who have given public pledges to the world of their determination to administer imperial dominion upon the genuine precepts of Christianity.

The object to which I allude is the abolition of private war upon the sea.

It has been remarked that, by the usages of modern war, the private property of an enemy is protected from seizure or confiscation as such, and private war itself has been almost universally exploded upon the land. By an exception, the reason of which it is not easy to perceive, the private property of an enemy upon the sea has not so fully received the benefit of the same principle. Private war, banished by the tacit and general consent of Christian nations from their territories, has taken its last refuge upon the ocean, and there continues to disgrace and afflict them by a system of licensed robbery, bearing all the most atrocious characters of piracy. To a Government intent, from motives of general benevolence and humanity, upon the final and total suppression of the slave trade, it cannot be unreasonable to claim her aid and co-operation to the abolition of private war upon the sea.

From the time when the United States took their place among the nations of the earth this has been one of their favorite objects. "It is time," said Dr. Franklin, (in a letter of March 14, 1785,) "It is high time, for the sake of humanity, that a stop were put to this enormity. The United States of America, though better situated than any European nation to make profit by privateering, are, as far as in them lies, endeavoring to abolish the practice by offering in all their treaties with other powers an article engaging solemnly that, in case of future war, no privateer shall be commissioned on either side, and that unarmed merchant ships, on both sides, shall pursue their voyages unmolested. This will be a happy improvement of the law of nations. The humane and the just cannot but wish general success to the proposition."

It is well known that, in the same year that this letter was written, a treaty between the United States and the King of Prussia was concluded, by the twenty-third article of which this principle was solemnly sanctioned in the form of a national compact. The twenty-sixth article of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain of 19th November, 1794, carries it, in some respects, still further, though in others falling short of it. The articles of the inclosed draft combine the special stipulations of both those articles, and in proposing them you will express the earnest desire of the President that they may prove acceptable to the British Government.

You will, at the same time, propose the restipulation of the tenth article of the treaty of November 19, 1794. It is, indeed, apparently the intention of that article to bind the parties to it in perpetuity, and, although the remainder of that treaty has been extinguished by the late war, or has expired by its own limitation, neither of the parties now, or at any future time, could make the seizure or confiscation forbidden by it without a breach of their faith thus pledged against any event of war, as well as of natural justice. But a renewal of the engagement, even if unnecessary to its continued validity, will be useful and honorable to the parties, as pledging again their sanction to the principle of justice and humanity to which it appeals. So far as it could affect the interest of the parties, its operation, at the time when it was first agreed to, was almost entirely to the advantage of Great Britain. It will yet be so. But in protecting, by a pledge of faith, justice and humanity against the exasperated passions and undistinguishing rapacity of war, if some sacrifice of selfish interest must be made, it can but set in clearer light the sincerity of those who consent to make it.

The stipulation in the tenth article of the treaty of November, 1794, was inserted in our treaty with France of 30th September, 1800; but the reason assigned for the engagement in the former was omitted in the latter. In proposing the renewal of the article, it is desirable that the reason should be repeated with the promise, not only because it is such as does honor to the contracting parties, but because it is applicable, with equal force, to the other article which we wish now to introduce. It is unjust and impolitic that the debts of individuals, their shares and moneys in public funds or in banks, should be destroyed or impaired by national authority, on account of national differences and discontents. But it is equally unjust and impolitic that any private property of individuals should ever be destroyed or impaired by national authority for national quarrels. The right of property is, in moral principle, equally sacred, whether it consist in debts or stocks, or in ships or houses; whether in a crop growing upon the soil, gathered in the garner, or shipped for the market; or whether in the manufacture of human industry and skill. The injustice consists in the spoliation of private property for public disputes; and the violation of confidence between individuals, committed by the confiscation of their debts, is merely an incident of aggravation to the general wrong of wreaking the public vengeance upon the property of individuals.

We wish this consideration to be pressed with earnestness upon the moral sense of the British Government. We are aware that, in the abolition of private war upon the sea, that nation, while yielding homage to the principle of general justice, must abandon the use of a weapon of offence against others which she has heretofore used much to their annoyance. But we are firmly convinced that it will ultimately prove as beneficial to her interest as to that of others; and the magnanimity displayed by her in contracting an engagement so consonant to eternal right, though partially affecting a temporary interest of her own, cannot fail to give energy to her solicitations when urging upon others the sacrifice of their special interests for the purpose of consummating the triumph of justice and humanity.

The other articles of the inclosed draft, adapted to the contingency of a war between the parties, are all dictated by the same spirit of mitigating the unnecessary rigors of hostility; they are all congenial to the temper and founded upon the reasoning of the first; all sanctioned by the main argument for the general concurrence to the suppression of the slave trade, and by the principle proclaimed as the foundation of the Holy Alliance, the application of the benevolent precepts of Christianity to the public intercourse of sovereign States.

The subsequent articles of the draft, from the seventh to the eighteenth, inclusive, are adapted to the contingency of a war in which one of the parties should be belligerent and the other neutral. Many of their provisions would become useless and inapplicable if the war should be between parties both acceding to the principle of abstaining from private war against each other upon the sea. The result of the abolition of private maritime war would be the coincident abolition of maritime neutrality. By this, the neutral nations would be the principal losers; and sensible as we are of this, we are still anxious, from higher motives than of mere commercial gain, that the principle should be universally adopted. We are willing that the world, in common with ourselves, should gain in peace whatever we may lose in profit.

But if the British Government should decline acceding to this proposal, or either of the parties should hereafter be engaged in war with a third party not bound by a similar engagement, the articles of the inclosed draft, from the seventh to the eighteenth, are intended to regulate the relations between the belligerent and the neutral party upon the points of collision which have heretofore arisen from that state of things.

The seventh is adopted from a provision already stipulated in the eighteenth article of the treaty of 19th November, 1794, with a definition of blockade, which was acceded to by the British plenipotentiaries at the negotiation of the convention of October, 1818.

The eighth is an article existing in several of our treaties with other powers. As a principle warranted by the law of nations, independent of compact, it appears to have been recognized to its full extent by the British Government in their late controversy with Spain relating to the capture of the Lord Collingwood, and in their order of reprisals issued to enforce the right of British subjects to trade with the South Americans. For, if she considers these as still de jure Spanish colonies, her subjects would still be excluded from trading with them as neutrals by her own rule of the war of 1756. But considering them as a people in a state of civil war with Spain, it is only under the principle of this article that she can maintain her right as a neutral of trading with them. A reference to the engagements of her treaty of 5th July, 1814, with Spain, will set this in a yet clearer light.

The ninth article contains the usual list of contraband of war, omitting the articles used in the construction or equipment of vessels. These articles are not included in the principle upon which contraband of war was originally founded. They are all important articles of commerce in time of peace and for purposes of commerce. Several of them are articles of ordinary export from the United States, and the produce of their soil and industry. Others are articles equally important to the commerce of other nations, particularly Russia, whose interests would be unfavorably affected by embracing them in the contraband list. The first effect of including them in a list of contraband with one nation, while they are excluded from the same list in treaties with others, is, that the belligerent with whom they have been stipulated as contraband acquires, so far as the treaties are observed, an exclusive market for the acquisition of the articles of which the other belligerent is deprived. The next consequence is, that the other belligerent, suffering under the double injury of this contradictory rule, breaks through the obligation of her own treaty, and seizes and confiscates upon the principle of retaliation upon the enemy. This observation applies to every other point of maritime law in which the neutral interest is sacrificed to the belligerent interest with one power, while the reverse is stipulated with the other. The uniform and painful experience which we have had of this should operate as a warning to the Government of the United States to introduce the harmony of one congenial system into their federative relations with foreign powers; and never to concede as maritime right to one power a principle the reverse of which they have stipulated with others.

The tenth article of the draft proposes the adoption of the principle that free ships make free goods and persons; and, also, that neutral property shall be free, though laden in a vessel of the enemy. The Government of the United States wish, for the universal establishment of this principle, as a step towards the attainment of the other, the total abolition of private maritime war. This question of free ships making free goods has been much and long debated, and, as a question of the law of nations, remains to this day unsettled. By the law of nature, undoubtedly, the right as well as the equity and humanity of the controversy is on the neutral side. By the customary law of nations it has been, with several remarkable exceptions, the practice for some ages to take enemy's property found in the vessel of a friend. To the many efforts which have been made for restoring the original pacific principle of natural law we wish now to add another. Great Britain, by the treaties of Utrecht and 1786 with France, did assent to the principle that free ships should make free goods; and in the twelfth article of the treaty with the United States of November, 1794, did promise to negotiate with them two years after the termination of the war in which she was engaged, and to endeavor to agree with them "whether in any, and in what, cases neutral vessels should protect enemy's property."

Two years after that war Great Britain was engaged in another, and the promised endeavor to agree never took effect. But the engagement itself implied that, in time of peace, Great Britain might be disposed to stipulate more favorably to neutral rights and pretensions than she would at that time; and as she has now been eight years at peace, and is at this time neutral to a maritime war between other States, there could scarcely be foreseen a more favorable time for giving substantial execution to that pledge of faith.

The 11th article of the draft is taken with a modification from the 17th article of the treaty of 1794.

The 12th and 13th articles are intended to abolish forever the practice of impressment from our merchant vessels upon the high seas, and to remove henceforth all cause and pretext for resorting to it hereafter. By the stipulation now offered of excluding, in the event of a war, and from its commencement, all natural born subjects or citizens of the belligerent party, unless naturalized by some authentic public act before the commencement of the war, from the naval service, public and private, of the neutral party, a security is given to Great Britain against the employment of her seamen in our service at the only time when it could be prejudicial to her; a security which, if not stipulated while peace continues, we shall not be able to give after the war shall have broken out. We believe it impossible that the practice of impressing men from our vessels at sea should be renewed without producing war—an event which we deeply deprecate. You are authorized even to extend the exclusion of persons who may be naturalized after the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, which, if the peace should continue a very few years longer, will be equivalent to an exclusion of all natural born subjects. But we are not willing to make of this a temporary arrangement, as was proposed at the negotiation of 1818, nor to agree to the mutual exclusions from the respective services in time of peace.

The 14th article is from the treaty of 1794, and is chiefly valuable by fixing the sum for which bonds shall be required of privateers.

The 15th, 16th, 17th, and 18th articles are also borrowed from the treaty of 1794, with some modifications, the object of which is more effectually to secure the rights and to fulfil the obligations of neutrality, and to place the belligerent parties on precisely the same footing of favor and of restriction in the neutral ports.

The 19th, 20th, and 21st articles are provisions against pirates; the 20th including cases of re-capture of a neutral by a belligerent in time of war.

The great object of the whole convention, as proposed, is to take the first step towards the eventual abolition by the law of nations of private war upon the sea, an improvement entirely congenial to that of the final and total abolition of the slave trade; and entirely coincident, or, it may rather be said, necessarily deducible from the principles declared in the autographic alliance between the sovereigns of Russia, Austria, and Prussia. In communicating the draft of these articles to the British Government, (should they agree to negotiate on the subject,) you will declare the readiness of this Government to accede to any modification of them, or addition to them, which may be promotive of the purpose and desirable to Great Britain. You will add, that we have been encouraged to present this plan for a great improvement in the law of nations and amelioration of the condition of human kind, by the proposal deliberately made by the French Government to establish the principle during their present war with Spain. That we make the first proposal to Great Britain as to the power most competent to secure its ultimate success, and to the nation which we sincerely believe would finally derive the greatest share of the blessing which its universal establishment would bestow upon the family of man. And you will observe that, as it is the intention of the President to present the same plan to the other principal maritime powers of Europe, particularly to France and Russia, it would be peculiarly agreeable to him to offer it to them in concert with Great Britain, supported by the weight of her powerful influence.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient and very humble servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

LONDON, May 20, 1824.

SIR: It is more than a month since I have had a meeting with the British plenipotentiaries, the last having been held on the thirteenth of April. The Easter holidays led to the first part of this interval, since which Mr. Huskisson's parliamentary and other engagements, added to an attack of illness which has confined him to his bed, have created the further delay. We hope now to resume our labors in the course of next week, and the British plenipotentiaries have given me reason to think that we shall make rapid progress towards a conclusion when we do resume them. Nothing whatever has yet been settled on any one point since the convention on the slave trade.

I have the honor to remain, with very great respect, your obedient servant,

RICHARD RUSH.

SIR: The negotiations in which I have been engaged with this Government have at length reached their close without any treaty or arrangement whatever having been concluded upon any one of the many subjects that I had in charge. The last meeting of the plenipotentiaries took place on the 28th of last month. My report to you of all that has passed shall be made without any delay that I can avoid; yet from circumstances, with a detail of which I need not trouble you, I am forced to add that it will not be done as soon as I could wish. I shall hope, however, to draw it up in the course of the present month if my health allows me.

I am still without any communication from this Government as to its intentions respecting the slave trade convention. It may be superfluous for me to add, that I have fully laid before Mr. Secretary Canning all the considerations and arguments derived from your instructions of the 29th May on this subject.

I have the honor to remain, with great respect, your obedient servant,

RICHARD RUSH.

LONDON, August 12, 1824.

SIR: My letter of the second of this month will have informed you that the negotiations in which I had so long been engaged with this Government had come to a close, but without any treaty or other arrangement having been concluded on any of the subjects which had been given in charge to me. This is a result which I should lament the more did I not endeavor to reconcile myself to it by the reflection that I have earnestly, though fruitlessly, striven to render it more auspicious, and by the consideration—far more important—that as several of the subjects discussed have been both of novelty and magnitude between the two nations, my Government will have the opportunity of being put in more full possession of the sentiments of this Government, prior to the conclusion, or to the proposal anew, of any definite or final stipulations.

The task of reporting to you, for the information of the President, the whole progress of the negotiation now devolves upon me. I enter upon it in the anxious hope that, whilst shunning a prolixity that might fatigue, I may nevertheless omit nothing necessary to a full understanding of all that has passed. I console myself with the recollection that the protocols and other papers that will be transmitted to you will mainly delineate every material occurrence. From these may be learned all the formal proposals that have been made on the one side or on the other; but the grounds of them, the discussions by which they were sustained or opposed, together with various explanations which the written memorials of the negotiation, wearing for the most part the character of abstracts only, do not indicate; these it becomes my duty to make you also acquainted with in every essential particular. It must be my purpose to fulfil this duty in the course of the present despatch.

It was my first intention to have made my report to you in the shape of separate communications, allotting a distinct one to each subject, that I might be able to follow, in this respect, the example of your instructions to me. But, after the discussions were opened, it was often found impracticable to keep the subjects distinct. More than one subject, or branches of more than one, would sometimes engage our conferences on the same day, superinducing the necessity of mixing them up in one and the same protocol. For this reason, and because also the British plenipotentiaries in some instances established a connexion between subjects where, as I thought, none regularly had place, and so treated them in our records in the manner I shall have occasion to describe, it has appeared to me most conducive to good order to present the whole under one view. If this unity in my report would not appear at first sight to be suggested by a view of the diversity as well as number of its subjects, it has seemed to me, upon the whole, to adapt itself best to the course which the negotiation actually took, both in the oral discussions and in the entries upon the protocols; and that it will become most intelligible, whether in its incidents or its general spirit, when exhibited as a whole. In the hope that this mode of making up my report may meet your approbation, I proceed, without more of introduction, to its proper business.

After the slave trade question had been disposed of, the subject upon which we next entered was that of the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonial ports in the West Indies and North America. Copious as this subject was found to be when examined in all its details, its mere discussion—I mean the strictly commercial part—was perhaps attended with less difficulty than that of some others. It had been familiar to the past, and even recent, discussions of the two Governments—so much so, that upon almost every point connected with it opinions had been formerly expressed by both. When, at an early stage, the British plenipotentiaries said that, after the opening of this trade to the vessels of the United States by the act of Parliament of the 24th of June, 1822, it had not been expected by Great Britain that our foreign tonnage duty and additional impost would have been continued to be levied upon their vessels, I naturally replied that to whatever other observations the policy of the United States might be open in this respect, it could scarcely be said to have been unexpected, as upon at least two occasions since I had been their organ at this court they had expressly declined acceding by compact to the very terms in regard to this trade that were afterwards moulded into the act of Parliament. Your instructions being precise and full upon this head, I caused them to be well understood. I recapitulated the history of the negotiations that led to the convention of the 20th of October, 1818, in all those parts of it which had relation to the question of commercial intercourse. I presented the review of all the legislative acts or other measures affecting this intercourse, as well prior as subsequent to that convention; on the side of Great Britain, the act of Parliament of July, 1812, the draft of the four articles submitted by Lord Castlereagh in 1817, the act of Parliament of May, 1818, and the order of council which followed it on the twenty-seventh of the same month; on the side of the United States, the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1815, (the legislative basis of their system of reciprocity,) the two acts, original and supplementary, of April 18, 1818, and May 15, 1820, concerning navigation, the act of May 6, 1822, with the President's proclamation of the 24th of August founded upon that act. To all these I referred, in connexion also with the second negotiation of June and September, 1819, when the proposals again made by the United States for regulating this intercourse by treaty were again rejected by Great Britain. The deduction, I maintained, from the whole was, that the United States had, with uniform consistency and steadiness, pursued a course in regard to this trade which aimed at placing it upon a footing of entire reciprocity; that they asked nothing more, but, in justice to their citizens, could be satisfied with nothing less.

To work out this reciprocity seemed, however, not to be an easy task, I remarked, on the side of Great Britain, whatever had been her desire. Her commercial system was of long standing, and, from its great extent, often in no slight degree complicated and intricate. It was marked out not only by a diversity in its operation upon her home and colonial empire, but by subdivided diversities in its application to her colonies. In some of her West India islands, for example, there were export duties; in others none. Some had port charges and various other local charges operating upon vessels or their cargoes not recognized in others; but what was more important than all, her ancient navigation acts still remained substantially in force, mingling their fetters with all her modern legislation upon the same subject. Her commercial and navigating system, whatever other recommendations it might possess in her eyes, had been rendered by time and her past policy deficient in the uniformity and simplicity calculated to place it, in these respects at least, upon a par with the commercial and navigating system of the United States. This broad distinction between the two countries was always necessary to be kept in mind, I said, in their commercial dealings, and whatever explanation or excuse it might furnish to Great Britain for continuing the pursuit of a course which still moved in many points in subordination to her ancient policy, it afforded to the United States neither motive nor justification for giving up their claim to the principle of an absolute and perfect equality in all their regulations of trade with Great Britain.

This brought me to the true nature of the act of Parliament of the 24th of June, 1822. I explained to the British plenipotentiaries that this statute had not, whatever might have been its intention, opened the ports of the British colonies in the West Indies and America to the vessels of the United States upon the same terms as were enjoyed by British vessels. The privileges granted by it to vessels of the United States were, that they might carry directly, but in no other way, from some port of the United States to certain specified colonial ports, certain specified articles of merchandise, whilst very high duties were to be paid on all such of those articles as could alone be the subjects of a profitable trade. British vessels, on the other hand, possessed the additional and exclusive privilege of carrying the same articles to the same colonial ports, directly or indirectly, and free from all duty whatever when carried from a British colony in North America to a British colony in the West Indies. Moreover, I observed, the vessels of the United States admitted only as above to the colonial ports were obliged, supposing they obtained a cargo, to return directly to the United States, and to give bond, under a heavy penalty, for landing it at the port for which it was entered, with the additional burden, not imposed by the act of Parliament, but existing in fact, of paying a colonial export duty of four or five per cent. upon the value of this return cargo. This burden did not fall equally upon British vessels, as they might avoid it by going, which they were free to do, to any port of the British dominions either in Europe or America, a range not allowed to the vessels of the United States. Nor were the British vessels required to give any export bond for landing the articles at the port for which entered, and producing within twelve months a certificate of this fact, a condition which was also attached to American vessels. It was evident, I insisted, from the foregoing recapitulation, that vessels of the United States had not the same privilege under this act of Parliament with British vessels, and that the former were also subject to restrictions, imposed by the act or otherwise existing, from which the latter were exempt.

I reminded the British plenipotentiaries, however, that no sooner had the knowledge of this act of Parliament reached the United States than the President, exercising, without the least delay, the authority with which by anticipation he had been invested, issued his proclamation of the twenty-fourth of August, 1822, opening the ports of the United States generally to British vessels coming from any of the ports enumerated in the British act—an exercise of authority in a high degree liberal, considering the relative state of the statutes of the two countries, then in force, for the regulation of this trade. In other respects, the proclamation of the President had done nothing more, I said, than lay British vessels coming from the colonies to the United States under the same restrictions, in regard to their cargoes, to which vessels of the United States were subject when going to the colonies. This, in necessary justice to the United States, it was obliged to do, and, by the permanent laws of the Union, British vessels continued liable to the charge of foreign tonnage and import duties. I explained to the British plenipotentiaries that, if neither the proclamation nor the permanent laws of the Union imposed burdens upon British vessels and their cargoes, which were the specific counterparts of those imposed by the act of Parliament of the 24th of June, 1822, upon American vessels, they were, nevertheless, the necessary counterparts of the burdens which did, in point of fact, exist as against American vessels. To their owners it mattered not whence these burdens originated, so long as they continued to press unequally in the competition of American with British vessels. It was to complete the intention of meeting these burdens upon a basis of reciprocity, at all points, that the act of Congress of the first of March, 1823, was finally and on full deliberation passed. Its express object I described to be to countervail all restrictions, of whatever kind they might be, in actual operation against vessels of the United States, whether enacted by the act of the 24th of June, 1822, in force under the old navigation act of Charles the Second, or recognized and permitted by colonial ordinances or local regulations in any of the British ports that had been opened. As this act of Congress could not effectuate its just object by applying to British vessels restrictions which were of the precise and corresponding nature with those operating against the vessels of the United States, it adopted, I said, such as were analogous to them, without, however, in any instance, going beyond the measure of a necessary retaliation, but rather keeping within than exceeding this limit. The act of Parliament had, it was true, proceeded upon the hypothesis of extending like privileges to American as to British vessels, but here it had stopped, without imposing upon the latter the same restrictions which had previously existed against the former. The act of Congress went further, and, in according the like privileges with the British act, imposed also restrictions equivalent to those that were really and injuriously in force against the vessels of the United States.

It was in this manner that I fully opened to the British plenipotentiaries the principles and views of my Government in relation to this interest. If I am not more minute in recounting all that I said, it is merely because I abstain from swelling this communication by a repetition of the principles, the facts, and the arguments contained in your despatch to me of the twenty-third of June, 1823. With the various matter of this despatch I had made myself familiar by frequent perusals of it, and it was alike my duty and my endeavor to exhibit it all to the British plenipotentiaries in the most perspicuous and impressive ways in my power. I went on to remark that it seemed plain, notwithstanding our countervailing restrictions, that we were still left at a disadvantage in the competition, for that, for an enumerated list of ports open to our vessels, only part of which, too, had been opened by the act of Parliament of the 24th of June, 1822, we had opened all of our ports in return to British vessels. For an enumerated list of articles which we were alone allowed to export to the colonies, we received in return all articles which the colonies found it most to their interest to send to us; and for a duty of ten per cent. on our articles imported into the West Indies, and of four or five per cent. on those that we brought away, our laws did nothing more than retain a foreign tonnage duty of less than a dollar per ton on British vessels, and of ten per cent. on the duty otherwise chargeable on the articles brought to the United States in them. It was even doubtful, I said, whether, under these circumstances, our vessels would be able to continue the trade, and it was perhaps quite as much so whether the double system of restrictions, upon which it stood, would not deprive it of all value to both countries. I used, under this branch of the subject, all the topics of illustration with which your despatch had supplied me.

The British order in council of the seventeenth of July, 1823, laying a duty of four shillings and three pence sterling per ton on our vessels going to the colonial ports, to countervail, as Mr. Secretary Canning informed me in October last, our foreign tonnage duty, having been subsequent in date to your instructions to me, no remarks upon it were, consequently, embraced in them. But I considered the duty imposed by this order open to the same animadversions as all the other burdens falling upon our vessels. If we had grounds for complaint before this measure, they were but increased by it. If we were deprived of the opportunity of fair competition in the absence of this new duty, its imposition could not but augment the inequality. If we were carrying on the trade under every prospect of disadvantage without it, a more positive and certain loss to us must be the result if it were continued. Hence, I did not scruple to say to the British plenipotentiaries that it must be considered as giving additional force to all our other objections to their regulations. I had not, I admitted, and from the cause stated, received your instructions upon the subject of it; but as our foreign tonnage duty and the additional impost had been kept up against British vessels, in necessary self-defence against all the anterior restrictions upon our vessels, and duties upon their cargoes, I took it for granted that this new British duty, if not abrogated, would, on the same principles and from the same necessity, be met by some measure of counteraction on our side. In offering such comments as these upon it, I trust that they will be thought conformable to the true nature and objects of your instructions, though not in words pointed out by them.

In the end, I offered for the entire and satisfactory regulation of this trade a draft of the two articles (marked A) annexed to the protocol of the third conference. The first of these articles, after reciting the restrictions upon the trade that existed on each side, and the desire and intention that prevailed of removing them, goes on to provide that, upon the vessels of the United States admitted by law into the colonial ports, and upon the merchandise imported in them, no other duties or charges of any kind should be levied than upon British vessels, including all vessels of the colonies themselves, or upon the like merchandise imported into the colonial ports from any other port or place, including Great Britain and the colonial ports themselves; and, reciprocally, that upon the vessels of Great Britain admitted by law into the ports of the United States, and upon the merchandise imported in them, no other duties or charges of any kind should be levied than upon vessels of the United States, including vessels of each and every one of the States, or upon the like merchandise imported into the United States from any other port or place whatever. The words last underscored were inserted only for the greater satisfaction of the British plenipotentiaries, it being explained by me, and so understood by them, that they could carry no new meaning, there being no such thing under our system with foreign nations as a vessel of any one of the States distinct from a vessel of the United States. It followed that the passage would have had the same meaning without these words. The second article provided, in fulfilment of the intentions of the first, that the trade should continue upon the footing on which it had been placed by the laws of the two countries, with the exception of the removal by Great Britain of the duties specified in the schedule C of the act of Parliament of the 24th of June, 1822, and those specified in schedule B of the act of the fifth of August of the same year; and of the removal by the United States of the foreign tonnage duty and additional impost complained of by Great Britain. The article concluded with a mutual pledge for the removal of all discriminating duties on either side, of whatever kind they might be, from the desire which operated with the parties of placing the trade, in all respects, upon a footing of perfect equality. Such was the nature of my proposals, for the more exact terms of which I beg to refer to the paper which contained them.

The British plenipotentiaries made immediate and the most decided objections to the part of these proposals which went to the abolition of the duties in the two schedules indicated. They declared that, under no circumstances, could they accede to such a principle; and they proceeded to assail it under every form. The fundamental error of their reasoning, as always heretofore upon the same point, appeared to me to lie in considering their colonial possessions as part of the entire British dominion at one time, yet treating them as separate countries at another. For her own purposes, Britain could look upon these colonies as of one and the same country with herself; for the purposes of trade with foreign States, she felt herself at liberty to consider them as detached from herself and forming a new and distinct country; as moving, in that, within a commercial orbit wholly of their own. It was to this that her rule, resolved into its true principles, came at last. However such a rule might be met and its application admitted, as between foreign States mutually possessing colonies, and therefore mutually able in their commercial intercourse with each other to act upon it, its application was manifestly unequal and incongruous towards the United States. Possessing no colonies themselves, the United States neither legislated nor acted upon a principle of subdividing their empire for any purpose of commercial advantage, or, above all, monopoly, with other nations, but held out indiscriminately to all one integral and undivided system. In strict justice, it would, hence, not be unreasonable in them to expect that all nations with which they entered into commercial stipulations should look upon their colonies, if they had any, only in the light of an extension of the territories and jurisdiction of the parent State, since this was, in effect, the aspect which the United States presented throughout the whole extent of their territories and jurisdiction to all foreign nations. The productions of Massachusetts, for example, which entered into the articles of international traffic, were, as compared with those of Louisiana, scarcely less different in their nature than were those of Britain from those of Jamaica; yet one commercial code spread itself over the whole of the United States, of which foreign nations, and Britain amongst them, had the benefit, whilst different commercial codes, and entangling commercial practices under them, were seen to exist on the part of Britain. This resulted from the mere fact—important it might be to Britain, but indifferent to the United States—of these codes and these practices being applicable to the Government of different portions of the British empire, some of which fell under the denomination of her home dominion, and some of her colonial dominion.

It was to no effective purpose, however, that I enlarged upon and endeavored to enforce, by placing in other lights, the foregoing distinctions. The British plenipotentiaries continued to combat my positions, and to insist upon their right to lay whatever duties they deemed expedient upon our productions going to their islands, in protection of the like articles exported to them from any part of their own dominions. They said that they could never part with this right, for which we offered them no equivalent concession. They likened our request for its surrender, by an analogy the force of which I could never see, to a request on the side of Great Britain, should she prefer such a request, to be admitted into a participation of our coasting trade. They alleged, also, that in laying these duties they had aimed only at making them a necessary protection to their own subjects in their North American colonies; and that they were scarcely up to this point, was shown by the fact, which they also alleged, of their subjects in those colonies not having yet been able, since the trade was opened, to obtain a proportionate share of it.

I had more than once occasion to remark, that it was not the right of either party to model its own laws as it thought proper that we were discussing; it was the terms upon which it would be best to do so that we ought rather to be desirous of settling. Here were certain colonies belonging to Great Britain on the continent of North America. It happened that some of them were in the immediate neighborhood of the United States. Their course of industry was the same, their productions the same. If the live stock and lumber from one of these colonies—from that of New Brunswick, for example—were allowed to be imported into Antigua or St. Christopher duty free, whilst similar articles from the State of Maine, bordering upon New Brunswick, labored under a duty of ten per cent. on their importation into the same islands, was not, I asked, all just competition at an end? Still more was this the case, I remarked, if, after disposing of their cargoes, the vessel from New Brunswick could take in a return cargo absolved from an export duty, and was, moreover, left at liberty to take advantage of circumstances by trading from colony to colony, whilst the vessel from Maine was obliged to depart in ballast, or, if she took in a cargo, do so subject to the export duty. How, too, under the weight of this latter duty, were the articles upon which it was charged to bear up, in the markets of the United States, against the competition of similar articles found in their markets, partly of their own produce and partly derived from islands in the West Indies, other than those belonging to Great Britain? It was thus that I endeavored to establish the reasonableness of our complaints, and to recommend our proposals to adoption. I admitted the general right which every nation had to foster the industry of its own subjects preferably to that of strangers, but controverted its justice or expediency as applicable to this trade—a trade that was anomalous in many points, and to be judged of and regulated, not so much on any general theory as under an impartial view of all the peculiarities that belonged to it. As to the expression “from elsewhere,” introduced into the act of Congress of the first of March, 1823, I insisted upon the propriety of giving it a construction that would include the British colonies themselves as well as foreign countries—the only construction that could ever satisfy the United States, because the only one that could ever be equitable. Without it, a reciprocity in words might exist, but there would be none in fact. There was obviously no foreign nation except the United States that supplied the British West Indies with the articles in which a traffic had been opened. To say, therefore, that they should be imported into the British islands subject to no higher duties than were levied on articles of the same kind coming from any other foreign country would be altogether unmeaning. The field of competition was exclusively in the North American colonies of Britain. These, by their position and all their local peculiarities, were fairly to be considered as another country in the estimate of this trade, though they were, it was true, in political subjection to Great Britain. Their being dependencies altered not those physical and geographical characteristics in them which made them the rivals in this intercourse, and the only rivals, of the United States.

The British plenipotentiaries yielded to none of this reasoning. They admitted that there were many difficulties in the way of a satisfactory adjustment of the shipping question, and of this intercourse generally, between Great Britain and the United States. These difficulties were partly colonial, partly the result of their old navigation laws, and partly springing from the nature of the British North American trade, which bore so close an affinity to some portion of the trade of the United States. But they continued to declare their determination not to admit the productions of the United States into their islands upon the same footing with the like productions from other colonies of their own; and they reiterated their allegations that, even under the present duties on our productions, the trade was in our favor. They argued, hence, that the amount of the duties, instead of being too high, seemed insufficient thus far, taken on a general scale, to balance the advantage of our proximity to the West Indies, and of the greater extent and productiveness of our soil. On this head they gave me details. They said that, by their latest accounts, full two-thirds of the flour and lumber sent to their islands from North America were ascertained to have been of the produce of the United States, and that perhaps seven-eighths of this quantity were conveyed in vessels of the United States. On the return trade, also, they declared that our vessels had a share not much below the same proportion. To these statements I could only reply, that my impressions were different; that it was true I was in possession of no returns subsequent to June, 1823, but that, up to that period, my information justified me in believing that the trade had not yielded a fair proportion of gain to our merchants. The British plenipotentiaries dwelt emphatically upon the circumstance of our vessels taking away specie from their islands in place of a return cargo in the produce of the islands as indicative of the trade being against the islands, since it left upon their hands their rum and molasses—articles which they were chiefly anxious should find a market in the United States. If it were the export duty that produced this necessity in our vessels to take payment in money for their cargoes rather than in the produce of the islands, the plenipotentiaries said that they could not repeal it, because it applied equally to British vessels. It was a duty of four and a half per cent. existing on the exportation of produce, not in all of the islands, but in some of them, viz: in Antigua, St. Christopher, Montserrat, Barbadoes, Nevis, and the Virgin Islands. In the latter it was granted for the benefit of the Crown, in 1774. In most or all of the others it had existed, for the same purpose, as far back as 1668. British vessels paid it, they said, when going from these islands, whether their destination was the mother country or any foreign country; but I did not understand them to say that it was paid if they went only from colony to colony.

To the objection of only a limited number of ports being open to our vessels, they said that they admitted them wherever custom-houses were established, and that the privilege reserved to British vessels of going from colony to colony was only the privilege of letting them enjoy their own coasting trade. They seemed to forget that, by whatever name this privilege went, it was still one which operated against the competition of vessels of the United States. On the non-admission into their islands of articles that we desired to send—as, for example, salt fish, beef, pork—these, they said, were also excluded from the direct trade between Great Britain and the United States, including all other foreign countries. Here, too, they seemed to throw out of mind that this very exclusion, in whatever principle it originated, still operated against the commerce of the United States, for that a system of positive exclusion formed no part of the regular or permanent system of the United States, and was, therefore, one of which, as long as they dealt out a different measure of commercial benefit to other nations, they had good grounds to complain.

I am saved the necessity of recapitulating any further the remarks of the British plenipotentiaries upon our proposals from their having furnished me with a summary of them in writing. This was not in the regular course of our proceedings, and, the paper not being considered as an official one, was not annexed to any protocol, or referred to in any. It was merely given to me as an informal memorandum, in which light I was willing and glad to receive it, as it protects me from all risk of not doing justice in my report to their representations. It will be found among the inclosures, marked W.

After all that I have said, it may be almost superfluous to state that this Government will decline abrogating the tonnage duty of four shillings and three pence sterling imposed upon our vessels by the order in council of July, 1823. Mr. Huskisson expressly brought this subject before the House of Commons, in the course of the last session of Parliament, with a view to give full validity to that order, doubts having arisen how far it was justified by the provisions of the act of Parliament of the preceding session, on which it was founded. By this act a general power had been given to the King in council to impose counter-vailing duties on the cargoes of foreign vessels, but not upon their tonnage. It was under this act that the order of July, 1823, affecting the tonnage of our vessels, passed, and Mr. Huskisson obtained at the last session a new act for indemnifying all persons concerned in executing this order, which, though out of the words, was conceived to be within the objects of the first act. A copy of the last act is inclosed. The two acts taken together now give to the King and council a permanent power to meet other nations on the ground of reciprocity in duties, both as to vessels and cargoes. To this ground Russia has acceded by a treaty concluded with this Government in April last, a printed copy of which I inclose that its terms may be seen. Denmark has done the same, by a treaty concluded in June. The latter is not published as yet, but I have reason to know that its terms are the same as those of the treaty with Prussia. It does not include the colonies of Denmark nor, of course, those of Britain, standing, in this respect, upon the footing of our commercial convention with Britain of 1815. Prussia having no colonies, her treaty, as far as there will be room for its operation at all, necessarily stands upon the same footing. Among the colonies of Denmark are comprehended Greenland, Iceland, and the Faroe Islands, which are enumerated as such in the treaty. It is understood that Sweden has shown a disposition to come into this reciprocity, and that there are pending negotiations between this Government and that of the Netherlands to the same effect.

After the British plenipotentiaries had finished all their remarks upon our proposals, I thought it best, seeing that they had not proved acceptable, to invite others from them in turn, to be taken for reference to my Government. These they afforded me, and they are annexed, marked L, to the protocol of the sixteenth conference. The first article, after reciting the desire of both parties to abolish, reciprocally, all discriminating duties in this trade, proceeds to effect this purpose after the British understanding of it. It pledges Great Britain to lay no higher duties on our produce than upon produce of the same kind imported, not from elsewhere, or from any other country, but from any other foreign country; using here the very term to which, in both the former negotiations, we had objected at large. The same term has place in the part of the article intended to operate against Great Britain, as she only claims, in sending her colonial produce to the United States, that it shall be received subject to the same duties as are paid on articles of the same kind when imported into the United States from any other foreign country. To this correlative provision the British plenipotentiaries referred as illustrative of the true idea of reciprocity. I again insisted upon its manifesting the very reverse. It was palpable that the term had a real substantive meaning in the one case, but might as well be omitted in the other. Like produce with that sent to the British islands from the United States the islands obtained, as we had seen, from no other foreign country, but only from the British possessions in North America; whereas, the United States did receive from Cuba, from St. Domingo, and from other foreign islands and countries, the same kind of produce as that yielded in the British islands. Surely, then, Great Britain would be benefitted by the operation of the term, whilst to the United States it must be nugatory. There was a visible sphere within which it would act in the one case, whilst in the other there was no shadow of foundation upon which it could rest. But I was always unsuccessful in obtaining from the British plenipotentiaries the admissions due to us on this cardinal principle. Their second article provides for the actual abolition, subject, of course, to the foregoing reservation, of all discriminating duties or charges of every kind, whether on the vessels or cargoes of the two powers. The third contains a stipulation that, in case the trade should prove, on trial, unduly advantageous to one of the parties, the other will examine in a proper spirit the complaint, and, on its being substantiated, adopt measures in unison with the true principles on which the parties intended to fix it. The fourth provides, that whatever advantages Great Britain may in future extend to any friendly State in Europe or America with respect to this trade shall be common to the United States; and that the United States shall extend to Great Britain whatever advantages they may at any time grant to the most favored State in any trade carried on between the possessions of such State in the West Indies or America, and the United States. The fifth and last article provides, in consideration of the foregoing arrangements, that consuls shall be admitted from the United States into the open colonial ports, and received on the same conditions as are stipulated in the fourth article of the convention of July, 1815. Upon this last article I shall have occasion to remark in another part of my communication. The others I leave, including the fourth, upon the remarks already made. The fourth, it is evident, still keeps to the British principle of considering their colonies as equivalent of themselves to the whole of the United States in the arrangements of this trade.

During the pendency of the negotiation I received a letter, which seemed to me to be of importance, from Mr. Kankey, our consular commercial agent at the island of Barbadoes. He informed me that, under directions which had been recently given to the Collector and Comptroller of the Customs of that island by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, vessels of the United States were permitted to land there a portion of their cargoes, and to carry the remainder elsewhere, if entered for exportation, paying the import duty only on so much as was landed. This regulation, he added, would be of service to our trade, provided the necessity of paying the tonnage money of four shillings and three pence sterling per ton at more than one of the colonial ports during the same voyage could be avoided, and he appealed to me to have this effected. I immediately brought the subject before the British plenipotentiaries, urging the right of our vessels to an exemption from all such double payments, on the ground of British vessels never being subject to double payments of tonnage duty in the United States during the same voyage, though they did proceed from port to port. I was asked if I had any instructions from my Government upon this point. I replied that I had not, but that I was confident in my belief that, under our laws, the fact could not be otherwise than as I had stated it. Mr. Huskisson then said that he would obtain the sanction of this Government for placing our vessels in the West Indies upon the same footing in this respect upon which British vessels were placed in the United States, and would undertake, in his official capacity of President of the Board of Trade, to see that the necessary orders were forthwith issued for the accomplishment of this object.

Mr. Kankey made another representation to me, which I also brought before the British plenipotentiaries as pertinent to the business in which we were engaged. He stated that an improper duty was charged at Barbadoes on the article of biscuit when imported in barrels from the United States, a repeal of which he had not been able to effect by remonstrating with the Collector. This article, when intended for a foreign market, is packed in barrels, such as are used to hold flour, and seldom contain, it appears, more than eighty pounds weight. But, without any reference to the weight, the Collector was in the habit of demanding on every such barrel of biscuit (the cracker) landed at Barbadoes a duty of two shillings and six pence sterling, when, by the true construction of the act of Parliament of the 24th of June, 1822, under which the duty arose, it was believed that only one shilling and six pence per hundred weight ought ever to be charged. Of this heavy overcharge on a single article, which the exporters of the Middle States were constantly sending to the British islands, I complained in the terms that Mr. Kankey's representation to me warranted. Mr. Huskisson gave me an immediate assurance that my complaint should be attended to. He subsequently informed me that, in consequence, of it the officers of the customs generally in the islands had been directed, in all cases where such biscuit was imported from the United States in barrels weighing less than one hundred and ninety six pounds, to charge the duty by the weight, and at the rate of not more than one shilling and six pence sterling per hundred weight. I am happy to think that in at least these two instances some portion of immediate relief is likely to be extended to our trade in that quarter.

From Mr. Monroe Harrison, the consul of the United States at Antigua, I also received a communication whilst our proceedings were going on, of which I apprised the plenipotentiaries of this Government.

He informed me that our citizens trading to that island, being often compelled to sell their cargoes on a credit, payable in produce when the crops came in, found it convenient, if not sometimes necessary, to make another voyage to the West Indies, in order to recover the proceeds of their cargoes so disposed of. The markets in the French and other islands being often better than in the British islands, our citizens in the predicament stated would find it, Mr. Harrison remarked, to their advantage to be able to resort to the former islands in the first instance. But this object they were precluded from coupling with that of afterwards calling at the British islands for the collection of their debts in the produce of them, since, should they only touch at the British islands, having on board any article other than of the produce of the United States, their vessels became liable to seizure. I did not receive from the British plenipotentiaries the same attention to this representation that was shown in the other cases, nor, under my present lights, did I feel altogether warranted in pressing it upon the same grounds. They informed me, in the course of our conversation upon it, that there was no objection, under the British regulations, to a vessel of the United States, bound from one of our ports to any island in the West Indies other than British, afterwards proceeding from such other island to a British island with the whole or part of her cargo, provided it had not been landed at any intermediate port, and that there had been no change in the property during the voyage. I presume that those of our citizens who are interested in knowing it are acquainted with this construction of the British laws, which, however, does not present itself to my mind in the light of any important boon.

The act of Parliament of August 5, 1822, having immediate relation to the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British continental possessions in their neighborhood, I naturally regarded it, as your instructions to me had done, in connexion with the act of June 24, 1822. This brought under consideration our claim to the navigation of the river St. Lawrence. Between this question and the questions of commercial intercourse under the act of June, 1822, the British plenipotentiaries were constantly unwilling to acknowledge any connexion; nevertheless, looking to your instructions, and as well to the reason of them as to their authority, I treated the two questions as belonging to one and the same general subject. They asked whether, taking the two acts of Parliament together, the United States did not already enjoy the navigation of this river. I said that they did; by the act of June 24, 1822, they enjoyed it from the ocean to Quebec, and by that of August 5, 1822, from any part of the territories of the United States to Quebec; but from the fact of the colonial Governments in Canada being invested with a discretionary power to withdraw the latter of these concessions, by excepting any of the Canadian ports from those to which our vessels were made admissible, it followed that our enjoyment of the navigation of this river was rendered contingent upon British permission. This was a tenure not reconcilable, in the opinion of the Government of the United States, with the growing and permanent wants of their citizens in that portion of the Union, or with the rights of the nation. It was due to both these considerations that it should stand upon a different tenure, and the time had arrived when it was desirable that the two nations should come to an understanding upon a question of so much importance.

The British plenipotentiaries next asked whether any question was about to be raised on the right of Great Britain to exclude altogether vessels of the United States from trading with British ports situated upon the St. Lawrence, or elsewhere in Canada. I replied, that I was not prepared absolutely to deny such a right in Great Britain to whatever considerations its exercise might be open. I remarked, also, that it seemed already to have been substantially exercised by this act of August 5, 1822; for, by its provisions, only certain enumerated articles were allowed to be exported from the United States into Canadian ports, and duties were laid upon these articles which might be said to amount to a prohibition. I added that, although the foregoing act had not laid any duty on the merchandise of the United States descending the St. Lawrence with a view to exportation by sea, yet that an act of the preceding year did, viz: upon their timber and lumber, which made it highly expedient that the relative rights of the parties to the use of the waters of this great stream should be ascertained. I here went into a review of the footing upon which the trade between the United States and the Canadas stood, under the stipulations of the treaty of 1794. The memorial from the inhabitants of Franklin county, in the State of New York, and the report of the committee of the House of Representatives upon that document, furnished me with the necessary lights for executing this duty, as well as for pointing out the injurious and burdensome operation of the act of August 5, 1822. The latter act had superseded all the former conditions of this intercourse. With these conditions the citizens of the United States had been, I said, content, and it was believed that they had been found, on experience, satisfactory on both sides. The treaty stipulations of 1794 were among the articles of that instrument declared, when it was made, to be permanent; and so mutually beneficial had appeared to be their operation that both parties continued, in practice, to make them the rule of their conduct for some years after the war of 1812, until, by the acts of Parliament just recited, Great Britain chose to consider the intervention of that war as putting an end to their validity. This state of things, by remitting each party to their anterior and original rights, rendered it manifestly incumbent upon the Government of the United States now to attempt to settle by convention, or in some other manner, with Great Britain, the true nature of the tenure by which they held the navigation of this stream. Such was the character of the remarks by which I illustrated the propriety of adding to the two articles which I had offered for the regulation of the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonies, whether continental or insular, a third article relating exclusively to the navigation of the St. Lawrence. A third article will be found, accordingly, in this connexion as part of our projet, already referred to as annexed to the protocol of the third conference. Its stipulations were, that the navigation of the St. Lawrence, in its whole length and breadth to and from the sea, should be at all times equally free to the citizens and subjects of both countries, and that the vessels belonging to either party should never be subject to any molestation whatever by the other, or to the payment of any duty for this right of navigation. After this unequivocal provision, it concluded with a clause that, regarding such reasonable and moderate tolls as either side might claim and appear to be entitled to, the contracting parties would treat at a future day, in order that the principles regulating such tolls might be adjusted to mutual satisfaction.

I deemed it most advisable to ingraft upon the article this principle respecting tolls, although it was not particularly mentioned in your despatch. In pursuing into their details some of the general principles which you had laid down, I was left under the impression that our title to navigate this river, independently of the consent of Great Britain, would be made out with more complete and decisive strength, under the qualified admission of the claim to toll. The writers on public law had generally so treated the subject, and in some of the modern treaties of high authority in our favor on the general question the admission was also to be seen. I refer particularly to the fifth article of the treaty of peace of the thirteenth of May, 1814, between the allied powers and France, where, after providing for the free navigation of the Rhine to all persons, it is agreed that principles should be laid down at a future Congress for the collection of the duties by the States on its banks, in the manner most equal and favorable to the commerce of all nations. In adverting to the claim of toll as a question only for future discussion, and one that might be of like interest to both parties, (the British navigation of this river being obliged in some parts to pass close to our bank,) and, moreover, where the claim, if advanced on either side, was to be made dependent on sufficient cause being shown for it, I did not believe that I was losing sight of any principle of value to the United States in this controversy. The clause, I hope, will be found to have been too guarded in its terms to be open to such a risk.

There was another point on which I felt more uncertainty. The navigation of this stream, although I believed it could be demonstrated to be the just right of the people of the United States, could not draw after it all its benefits to them without a concurrent right of stopping at some point or port where both of its banks fell within the colonial territory of Great Britain. Upon what footing was I to treat this latter and subordinate question? Your instructions had not dealt with it, and I felt myself at a loss. It could scarcely be doubted but that our right to navigate the river being established, Britain would, as matter of international comity, and as an arrangement advantageous also to herself, allow us a place of entry for our vessels, and deposit for our produce somewhere on its shores. She has so largely, of late years, been extending the warehousing system to all other nations for their convenience and her own, that it might well be presumed she would not exclude the United States from a participation in it at Quebec, or elsewhere at a suitable port in Canada. Yet I felt it to be a point of some delicacy, and therefore thought that it would be most judicious to leave it wholly untouched in my proposal. Another reason operated with me for this silence. As far as I was able to carry my investigations into the point, I found much ground for supposing that the right to the navigation of a river, under the strong circumstances which marked that of the United States to the navigation of the St. Lawrence, would involve as an incident the right of innocent stoppage somewhere on the shores, an incident indispensable to the beneficial enjoyment of the right itself. By the seventh article of the treaty of Paris, of 1763, the free navigation of the Mississippi was granted to Great Britain, but without any clause securing to British vessels the privilege of stopping at New Orleans, then a French port, or at any other port or place on any part of the shores. Yet the historical fact appears to have been that Britain did use New Orleans as a place for her vessels to stop at, and this without any subsequent arrangement with France upon the subject. The case becomes still stronger if, afterwards, when New Orleans fell into the hands of Spain, the British continued to use it for the same purpose, contrary, at first, to the remonstrances of the Spanish Governor of that town, which is also believed to have been the fact. I abstained, however, from asserting in this negotiation the subordinate right in question.

On the principal question of our equal right with the British to the entire and unobstructed navigation of this river I dwelt with all the emphasis demanded by its magnitude. I spoke of it as a question intimately connected with the present interests of the United States, and which assumed an aspect yet more commanding in its bearing upon their future population and destinies. Already the immense regions which bordered upon the lakes and northern rivers of the United States were rapidly filling up with inhabitants, and soon the dense millions who would cover them would point to the paramount and irresistible necessity for the use of this great stream as their only natural highway to the ocean. Nor was the question one of magnitude to this part of the Union alone. The whole nation felt their stake in it, the middle and the north more immediately, but all the rest by the multiplied ties and connexions which bound up their wants, their interests, and their sympathies with the middle and the north. It was under such a view of the immediate and prospective value of this navigation to us that I first presented it to the notice of the British plenipotentiaries as a question of right. I told them that they must understand this to be the sense in which I had drawn up the article upon the subject, and that it was the sense in which I felt myself bound, as the plenipotentiary of the United States, to urge its adoption.

I approach an interesting part of this negotiation when I come to make known in what manner the British plenipotentiaries received this disclosure. They said that on principles of accommodation they were willing to treat of this claim with the United States in a spirit of entire amity; that is, as they explained, to treat of it as a concession on the part of Great Britain, for which the United States must be prepared to offer a full equivalent. This was the only light in which they could entertain the question. As to the claim of right, they hoped that it would not even be advanced; persisted in, they were willing to persuade themselves, it would never be. It was equally novel and extraordinary. They could not repress their strong feelings of surprise at its bare intimation. Great Britain possessed the absolute sovereignty over this river in all parts where both its banks were of her territorial dominion. Her right, hence, to exclude a foreign nation from navigating it was not to be doubted, scarcely to be discussed. This was the manner in which it was at first received. They opposed to the claim an immediate, positive, unqualified resistance.

I said that our claim was neither novel nor extraordinary. It was one that had been well considered by my Government, and was believed to be maintainable on the soundest principles of public law. The question had been familiar to the past discussions of the United States, as their State papers, which were before the world, would show. It had been asserted, and successfully asserted, in relation to another great river of the American continent flowing to the south, the Mississippi, at a time when both of its lower banks were under the dominion of a foreign power. The essential principles that had governed the one case were now applicable to the other.

My reply was not satisfactory to the British plenipotentiaries. They combatted the claim with increased earnestness, declaring that it was altogether untenable, and of a nature to be totally and unequivocally rejected. Instead of having the sanction of public law, the law and the practice of nations equally disclaimed it. Could I show where was to be found in either the least warrant for its assertion? Was it not a claim plainly inconsistent with the paramount authority and exclusive possession of Great Britain? Could she for one moment listen to it?

I remarked that the claim had been put forward by the United States because of the great national interests involved in it; yet that this consideration, high as it was, would never be looked at but in connexion with the just rights of Great Britain. For this course of proceeding both the principles and practice of my Government might well be taken as the guaranty. The claim was, therefore, far from being put forward in any unfriendly spirit, and would be subject to a frank and full interchange of sentiments between the two Governments. I was obviously bound, I admitted, to make known on behalf of mine the grounds on which the claim was advanced—a duty which I would not fail to perform. I stated that we considered our right to the navigation of this river as strictly a natural right. This was the firm foundation on which it would be placed. This was the light in which it was defensible on the highest authorities, no less than on the soundest principles. If, indeed, it had ever heretofore been supposed that the possession of both the shores of a river below had conferred the right of interdicting the navigation of it to the people of other nations inhabiting its upper banks, the examination of such a principle would at once disclose the objections to it. The exclusive right of jurisdiction over a river could only originate in the social compact, and be claimed as a right of sovereignty. The right of navigating the river was a right of nature, preceding in point of time, and which the mere sovereign right of one nation could not annihilate as belonging to the people of another. It was a right essential to the condition and wants of human society, and conformable to the voice of mankind in all ages and countries. The principle on which it rested challenged such universal assent, that wherever it had not been allowed it might be imputed to the triumph of power or injustice over right. Its recovery and exercise had still been objects precious among nations, and it was happily acquiring fresh sanction from the highest examples of modern times. The parties to the European alliance had, in the treaties of Vienna, declared that the navigation of the Rhine, the Necker, the Mayne, the Moselle, the Maes, and the Scheldt, should be free to all nations. The object of these stipulations was as evident as praiseworthy. It could have been no other than to render the navigation of those rivers free to all the people dwelling upon their banks; thus abolishing those unjust restrictions by which the people of the interior of Germany had been too often deprived of their natural outlet to the sea by an abuse of that right of sovereignty which claimed for a State happening to possess both the shores of a river at its mouth the exclusive property over it. There was no principle of national law upon which the stipulations of the above treaties could be founded which did not equally apply to the case of the St. Lawrence. It was thus that I opened our general doctrine. It was from such principles that I deduced our right to navigate this river, independent of the mere favor or concession of Great Britain, and, consequently, independent of any claim on her side to an equivalent.

I abstain from any further recapitulation to you of the principles which I invoked, or of the authorities to which I referred, for a reason to be now mentioned. It will be seen by the first protocol that our agreement had been to carry on the negotiation by conference and protocol. This, the more usual mode at all times, was conceived to be peculiarly appropriate where the subjects to be handled were so various, and their details in some instances so extensive. It was recommended, also, and this was of higher sway with me, by the example of the negotiation of 1818, in the course of which some of the same subjects had been discussed with this Government. Nevertheless, each party had reserved, under this agreement, the right of annexing to the protocol any written statement that might be considered necessary as matter either of record or of explanation. In your instructions to me respecting this claim to the navigation of the St. Lawrence—a question wholly new as between the two nations—you had adverted to my presenting it in writing, if necessary, and I determined, under all the circumstances, that I should not properly come up to my duty unless by adopting this mode. The question was not only new, but of the greatest moment. I saw, also, from the beginning, that it would encounter the most decided opposition from Great Britain. In proportion as her plenipotentiaries became explicit and peremptory in denying it, did it occur to me that it would be proper on my part to be unequivocal in its assertion. This could be best done upon paper. This would carry the claim distinctly to the archives of this Government, rather than trust it to foundations more uncertain and fugitive. It would explain, as well as record, the sense in which it was inserted in the protocol. Another motive with me for this course, and scarcely a secondary one, was, that it would serve to draw from Great Britain in the same form a precise and full avowal of the grounds on which she designed to oppose the claim. On a question so large, and which, from all that I perceived to mark its first opening between the two Governments, could hardly fail to come under discussion again hereafter, it appeared to me that it would be more acceptable to my Government to be in possession of a written document which should embody the opinions of this Government, than to take the report of them from me under any form less exact or authentic.

I accordingly drew up a paper upon the subject, which, under the right reserved, I annexed (marked B) to the protocol of the eighteenth conference, and so it stands amongst the papers of the negotiation. The British plenipotentiaries continued to urge their animated protests against this proceeding on my part, not that they could divest me of my privilege of recording my sentiments in the shape of this written statement, but that they earnestly pressed the propriety of my abandoning altogether any claim to the navigation of this river as a claim of right which shut them out from treating of it upon other bases. But, having taken my determination under other estimates of my duty, I did not depart from it.

The paper which I drew up aimed at presenting a broad but intelligible outline of the principal reasons in support of our claim. These were such as you had set before me, and as I judged to be immediately deducible from them. Under the latter I included the argument on the Mississippi question used by an illustrious individual, then the organ of our Government in its intercourse with foreign States. I considered this argument as virtually comprehended in your instructions by the reference which they contained to it; the questions in both cases, so far as each drew support from the deep foundations of the law of nature, being the same. Of this luminous State paper I followed the track, adopting its own language wherever this could be done as the safest, the most approved, the most national. The only view of the subject not elicited on that occasion which I ventured to take up was one pointed out by the locality of the St. Lawrence. I will briefly explain it.

The exclusive right possessed by Great Britain over both banks of this river was won for her by the co-operation of the people who now form the United States. Their exertions, their treasure, their blood, were profusely embarked in every campaign of the old French war. It was under this name that the recollection of that war still lived in the United States; a war which, but for the aid of New England, New York, and Pennsylvania, if of no more of the States, would probably not have terminated when it did in the conquest of Canada from France. If these States were at that epoch a part of the colonial empire of Britain, it was, nevertheless, impossible to obliterate the recollection of historical facts, or exclude the inferences that would attach to them. The predecessors of the present inhabitants of those States had borne a constant and heavy burden in that war, and had acquired, simultaneously with the then parent State, the right of descending this stream, on the hypothesis, assumed for the moment, of their not having possessed it before; a right of peculiar importance to them from their local position and necessities. It was to this effect that I noticed a title by joint acquisition, as also susceptible of being added for the United States to the navigation of this river. There was, at least, a strong national equity in it which would come home to the people of the United States, impressing them with new convictions of the hardship of now refusing them the use of this stream as an innocent pathway to the ocean. But as I had not your elucidations of this view of the subject, I was careful to use it only in subordination to the argument of natural right. The latter I treated as sufficient in itself to make out our title, and repudiated the necessity of resorting to any other. I will own, however, that my disposition to confide in the argument founded upon joint acquisition was increased by the analogy which it appeared to me to bear to the course of reasoning pursued with Great Britain by my predecessor in this mission in relation to the fisheries. If our title to a full participation with Britain in the fisheries, though they were within the acknowledged limits and jurisdiction of the coasts of British America, was strengthened by the fact of the early inhabitants of the United States having been among the foremost to explore and use the fishing grounds, why was the analogous fact of their having assisted to expel the French from the lower shores of the St. Lawrence to be of no avail? I had believed in the application and force of the argument in the one instance, and could not deny it all the consideration that it merited in the other.

The necessity of my recounting to you the British argument in answer to our claim is superseded by my being able to transmit it to you in their own words upon paper. It is sufficiently elaborate, and was drawn up with great deliberation. It is annexed (marked N) to the protocol of the twenty-fourth conference. The intention avowed by the British plenipotentiaries at the nineteenth conference of obtaining for its doctrines, before it was delivered to me, the full sanction of their highest professional authorities on matters relating to the law of nations, may serve to show the "gravity and importance," to repeat their own expression, which the question had assumed in their eyes. I have otherwise reasons for knowing that their argument was prepared under the advice and assistance of five of the most eminent publicists of England. With all the respect due to a paper matured under such auspices, I am not able to look upon it as impugning the argument which, under your direction, and following the course of others before me, I had become the organ of making known on behalf of the United States.

In several instances the British paper has appealed to the same authorities that are to be found in mine. It is in the application of them only that the difference is seen. In other parts the difference is made to turn upon words rather than substance. But an error that runs throughout nearly the whole of their paper consists in attributing to mine a meaning which does not belong to it. This applies especially to the particular description of right which we claim; how far it is one of mere innocent utility, how far a right necessary to us and not injurious to Britain, how far a right which, if not falling under the technical designation of absolute, is nevertheless one that cannot be withheld—these are all qualifications that were not overlooked in my exposition of the doctrine, a light, however, in which the British paper does not appear to have regarded it. But as each document is now of record, and will be judged by the terms which it has used, and the construction that justly attaches to them, I will not enlarge upon this head.

The British paper deals with our claim as standing upon equal footing with a claim to the use of the roads, canals, or other artificial ways of a country, forgetting that the case in dispute is that of a natural stream forming the only natural outlet to the ocean—the stream itself being common by nature to both countries. Commenting upon the acquired title of the United States, which I had put forward under the restriction described, their paper argues that the same ground would justify a co-relative claim by Great Britain to the use of the navigable rivers and all other public possessions of the United States which existed when both countries were united under a common Government! By a like misapplication of obvious principles it argues that our claim would also justify Britain in asking a passage down the Mississippi, or the Hudson, though neither the one nor the other touch any portion of the British territories; or that it might equally justify a claim on her side to ascend with British vessels the principal rivers of the United States as far as their draught of water would admit, instead of depositing their cargoes at the appointed ports of entry from the sea. On doctrines such as these I could only say to the British plenipotentiaries that I was wholly unable to perceive their application to the argument, unless the United States had been advancing a claim to the navigation of the river Thames in England.

Their argument also assumes that the treaty stipulations of 1794 exclude all idea of a right on our side to the navigation of this river, forgetting that if under those stipulations vessels of the United States were interdicted the navigation of British rivers between their mouths and the highest port of entry from the sea, so, on the other hand, British vessels were interdicted the navigation of the rivers of the United States beyond the highest ports of entry from the sea, and also that the whole terms of the international intercourse in that quarter were, by this compact, such as at the time satisfied both parties without impairing the rights which either possessed independent of the compact, and which only remained in suspense during its existence. This observation suggests another to which their argument is open in parts which they press as of decisive weight. It alleges that because, by the general treaty of Vienna, the powers whose States were crossed by the same navigable rivers, engaged to regulate by common consent all that regarded their navigation; because Russia held by treaty the navigation of the Black Sea, and because of the many instances capable of being cited where the navigation of rivers or straits that separated or flowed through the territories of different countries was expressly provided for by treaty—that because of these facts the inference was irresistible that the right of navigation under such circumstances depended upon common consent, and could only be claimed by treaty. Here, too, it seems to have been forgotten that it is allowable in treaties, as well as oftentimes expedient for greater safety and precision, to enter into stipulations for the enjoyment or regulation of pre-existing rights; that treaties are, in fact, expressly declared by the writers upon the laws of nations to be of two general kinds: those which turn on things to which we are already bound by the law of nature, and those by which we engage to do something more. In their quotation, also, of the note from the first volume of the Laws of Congress, containing an intimation that the United States could not be expected to yield the navigation of the Mississippi without an equivalent, they seem wholly to have overlooked, besides the other points of that note, that it was made at a period when it was well known that no part of that river touched the territories of a foreign power, and when, therefore, its exclusive navigation belonged to the United States as much so as the Delaware or the Potomac.

The foregoing are some of the remarks upon the British paper which I submitted at the conference after receiving it. The first impressions that I had of my duty in regard to it, and consequently my first determination, was to reply to it at large in writing, annexing my reply to the protocol. But, on more reflection, I deemed it most proper to abstain, at present, from this step. As a view of the whole subject, given out under the immediate eye and authority of this Government, and with extraordinary care, it appeared to me that the British paper ought to come under the knowledge of my own Government before receiving a formal or full answer from any source less high. If it be thought to require such an answer, a short delay would be nothing to the advantage of its being afforded, either through me or my successor in this mission, under the light of further instructions from home. The pause seemed the more due, not only from the newness of the discussion between the two Governments, but because I may not, at this moment, be sufficiently apprised of all the modifications under which mine may desire it to be presented in a second and more full argument. I hope that this forbearance on my part will be approved as having been, under the exigency, the most circumspect and becoming course. I gave the British plenipotentiaries to understand that the written argument on the side of the United States must not be considered as closed, but, on the contrary, only as opened.

Finally, in coming to a conclusion on the general subject of our commercial intercourse with the British West Indies and their North American colonies, whether by the way of the ocean or the St. Lawrence, it may be proper in me to recapitulate what I take to be the determinations of this Government in regard to it at all points.

1. They will not give up the duty of four shillings and three pence sterling per ton imposed upon our vessels by the order in council of July, 1823.

2. They will enter into no convention or arrangement with us that does not recognize the principle embraced in the first article of their counter project annexed to the sixteenth protocol: I mean that which goes to place our produce imported into their islands upon the same footing in respect of duties as the like produce imported into them from any other foreign country. This term they adhere to on the avowed principle of protecting and encouraging the produce of their own colonial possessions in North America.

3. They will not abolish the duties specified in schedule C of the act of Parliament of June 24, 1822, or those specified in schedule B of the act of August 5, 1822.

4. They totally deny our right to the navigation of the St. Lawrence, declaring that they cannot treat of the subject upon such a basis.

5. They will be willing to repeal entirely, if not already done, all duties or charges whatever, whether imposed by act of Parliament, growing out of colonial laws or usages, or in whatsoever manner existing, which go to subject vessels of the United States to any burden not common to British vessels—the repeal to extend to all the enumerated ports, without exception.

6. Though stating that they are not satisfied with the trade on its present footing, they are willing that it should have a further experiment; that is, to let it go on, the United States retaining their foreign tonnage duty and additional impost of ten per centum, and Great Britain retaining her tonnage duty of July, 1823, and also an additional impost of ten per centum.

The protocols which have reference to the different branches of this whole subject are the third, the ninth, the fifteenth, the sixteenth, the seventeenth, the eighteenth, the nineteenth, the twenty-fourth, and the twenty-fifth. I pass to another subject.

II. BOUNDARY LINE UNDER THE FIFTH ARTICLE OF THE TREATY OF GHENT.

This subject was, throughout, coupled by the British plenipotentiaries with the one the descriptions respecting which I have just been detailing, viz: the navigation of the St. Lawrence. Their reasons for this course will be seen presently, though I did not acquiesce in their validity. I brought the subject before them by stating from the treaty of Ghent the duties which under its fifth article were to have been performed by the Commissioners of the two countries in relation to this long-unsettled boundary. I brought into view from your instructions of June 25, 1823, the many and essential points upon which the Commissioners had differed: 1. Upon where the northwest angle of Nova Scotia was situated? 2. Upon what was the northwesternmost head of the Connecticut river? 3. Upon the meaning of the words in the old treaty of 1783, "along the highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean." 4. Upon the admission of the general maps respectively presented by the agents of the two Governments, each objecting to the correctness of that presented by the other, and pressing for the reception of his own. 5. Upon a proposal by the British Commissioner to send out surveyors to ascertain the correctness of the former surveys in regard to the points objected to in the maps presented by the agents. 6. Upon a demand made by the British agent to examine upon oath the surveyors who made the maps, with regard to their correctness. 7. Upon the reception and entering upon the journals of a memorial of the British agent containing a statement of one of the British surveyors relating to the maps presented by the agents. 8. Upon the reception of a written motion by the British agent, requesting leave to exhibit a memorial containing statements of the British surveyors relating to the maps, and that the same might be entered on the journals. There were still other points upon which the Commissioners had differed, but the foregoing, as it was plain to see, embraced the chief ones. Neither of the two points, viz., the latitude and longitude of the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, or the northwesternmost head of the Connecticut river, the ascertaining of which had been the great object of the commission, having been fixed, it had become impossible, I remarked, for the Commissioners to agree upon the map and declaration which, by the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent, were conclusively to have determined the boundary, and that, consequently, there was now no such map, whilst to aggravate this difficulty the general map produced by each side had been totally discredited by the other.

I then recited those parts of the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent under which, in conjunction with the corresponding clauses of the fourth article, provision is made for carrying the differences of the Commissioners, in case they failed to arrange this boundary, before some friendly sovereign for his decision; but added, that the Government of the United States, instead of adopting this course, desired to attempt a settlement of these differences by direct negotiation between the two countries, as heretofore proposed by the United States and acceded to by Great Britain. Having thus opened our plan, I proceeded to expatiate on the topics enlarged upon in your despatch towards its elucidation and support. I pointed to the formidable embarrassments which surrounded the subject on all sides in its present actual state, regarded as one to be settled by an umpirage; to the necessity which would be devolved upon the sovereign of deciding upon a boundary of at least six hundred miles in extent, through a half-discovered country, which the parties themselves, after six years of laborious investigation, had altogether failed to fix, assisted, too, as they had been, by able surveyors, geographers, astronomers, and agents; to the various questions of construction of ancient charters, treaties, and proclamations, into which he would have to travel; to the controversies between France and England prior to the cession of Canada to the latter, with which he must become familiar; and to the immense volume of documents produced by the labors, scientific, argumentative, or practical, of the Commissioners, and those who acted in co-operation with them, which he would have to peruse. I forbear to go further with a recapitulation of the difficulties, as I omitted none that your despatch had laid before me, and, above all, did not omit to state that, to the appalling train of them would be added that of the sovereign having to choose between maps that had alike been discredited by both parties. It was to avoid all these difficulties, and the uncertain results that might and probably would hang upon them if the differences were carried before an arbitrator, that my Government had charged me, I said, with the duty of now submitting, in a distinct and formal manner, the proposal for settling them by direct negotiation. This proposal I accordingly offered in the shape of a written article, (marked D,) annexed to the protocol of the ninth conference. The article, after reciting that the Commissioners under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent for ascertaining the latitude and longitude of the northwest angle of Nova Scotia and the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, and for surveying that part of the boundary line between the dominions of the two powers which extends from the source of the river St. Croix directly north to the above northwest angle of Nova Scotia, (and so on, pursuing the words of the treaty,) had not been able to agree, and also reciting that it was the desire of the parties, instead of referring their differences to the arbitration of a sovereign, as provided by the treaty, to endeavor to settle them by negotiation between themselves, went on to stipulate that the parties would accordingly negotiate on them at Washington; and further, that in the course of such negotiation they would receive, if necessary, the maps that had been respectively submitted and used by the Commissioners of each nation, but that none that had been used on the one side should be received or used to the exclusion of those used on the other. Such were the terms of my proposal, which, I trust, will be thought to have embodied with sufficient care your directions in relation to this subject.

The British plenipotentiaries, after hearing my proposal, and the reasons that had been given in its support, though not accepting it, did not object to the principle of compromise. They declared, however, that if ever they did enter into any regular agreement to settle the question by negotiation or compromise, it must, in their view, contain a clause that, this mode of settlement failing, that by arbitration, under the treaty, was still to be retained as the right of the parties. They expressed their concurrence in opinion as to the difficulty which there might be in submitting differences of such scope and complication to the arbitration of a sovereign, and wished, if practicable, to avoid resorting to this plan. What they desired, under present circumstances, was, that Great Britain should be allowed to settle the several disputed points which had arisen under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, by going into them on principles of mutual concession, in connexion with the claim of the United States to the navigation of the St. Lawrence. They distinctly submitted this proposal to me, which, however, was not given in writing, further than as it will be seen in the seventeenth and eighteenth protocols.

To this proposal I made immediate objections, as both new and unexpected. I admitted no connexion between the two subjects. How could I consent to treat of them conjointly, on the basis of mutual concession, when the United States expressly claimed the right of navigating this river, independent of all concession. The subjects were distinct, and would not, I expressed a hope, be coupled by the intervention of a principle wholly alien to the one, and not admitted by my Government to have any application to the other.

The British plenipotentiaries, always renewing their pointed denials of our right to the navigation of the St. Lawrence, said that they had coupled these subjects, because of their affinity, under the general head of boundary, some of the disputed points under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent being, as to locality, contiguous to that part of the St. Lawrence which flows through the British territories. This was one of their reasons. Another and stronger one was, that they were prepared to make offers which they would describe as founded upon a most liberal and comprehensive view of the wishes and interests of the United States in relation to the differences under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, in connexion with offers of the same character in relation to the navigation of the St. Lawrence, provided we were prepared to treat of the latter on the footing of concession by Great Britain. By having both of the questions under our hands at the same time, they urged the greater probability of our being able to settle both, and expressed their belief that, by thus multiplying the materials of compromise, we might arrive at a speedy and satisfactory arrangement on both subjects. They therefore hoped that I would accede to their wish of coupling these two subjects together in the manner that they proposed.

I repeated my objections to their proposal, declaring that my instructions did not permit me to hesitate a moment in rejecting it. The boundary question was one that stood upon its own foundation. No other had been coupled with it by my Government, and I could not consent to treat of it with any other, where the connexion was confessedly to impair the equal ground of the United States as soon as the principle of compromise was admitted. The boundary question, too, besides being detached and independent, was, in its nature, peculiarly ample. The materials of compromise existed within its own limits, rendering it unnecessary, therefore, to seek in a new subject what was already at hand. The association of another subject with it, and that subject the navigation of the St. Lawrence, would be open to the danger of producing further collisions, full as much, perhaps, as any enhanced prospect of an easy arrangement. Besides, I remarked, was the agreement heretofore signified by Great Britain to attempt the settlement of this question of boundary by direct communication between the two Governments, without the association of any other with it being at that period so much as thought of—was this to be overlooked? Here I recalled to the British plenipotentiaries what had passed between Lord Londonderry and me upon this question, and at a subsequent conference I read to them those parts of my despatches of February 11 and April 6, 1822, which detailed it to you. It was in this manner that I met the proposal of joining the two subjects upon the terms intimated.

The British plenipotentiaries, repeating their opinion that the junction would be likely to accomplish results satisfactory to both sides, said that they had neither the desire nor intention of overlooking any past agreement upon this subject with which their Government might be chargeable. They then asked whether, in case they were willing to go at once into the boundary question as one by itself, I was prepared to make to them any specific offers for a settlement. I replied that I was not. My Government had not looked to a settlement of the question here, at the present moment, by any offers to be made through me. Nor had it at any time contemplated the submitting of offers merely to be accepted or rejected by this Government, but only to be received on the principle of negotiating, and it was to secure a negotiation upon the entire subject that I had drawn up the article that had been given to them. I had occasion to perceive that the British plenipotentiaries reverted to the same construction of their acceptance heretofore of our proposal of attempting an adjustment by direct communication, as that suggested to you by the British minister in Washington. They did not appear to consider that it charged this Government with the obligation of a regular and formal negotiation upon the point, but only with that of receiving from us, and considering an offer of a boundary line by compromise, which they still professed their readiness to do. I said that the United States were not prepared at present to make this offer, to say nothing of their objections to making it at all, under the uncertainty of whether or not it would be received on the principle of negotiating, and I labored to show the latter to have been the true spirit of the past agreement. Certainly it was that, I said, in which it had been understood on our side. But, under the turn which the question of the St. Lawrence had taken, I found the British plenipotentiaries unwilling to give to their past agreement any larger meaning than that to which they considered themselves pledged by their own understanding of its terms; and although I continued to the last to press upon them the acceptance of my proposal in the form annexed to the ninth protocol, I was not able to succeed.

They asked whether, in case they were to submit to me an offer of a boundary by compromise, I was prepared to conclude anything under such an offer. To this, too, I replied that I was not. They next inquired whether I was prepared to conclude arrangements with them which, in their opinion, must accompany any mere agreement to settle the disputed points by compromise. I answered, that this would depend upon the particular nature of the arrangements. I had already myself put forward a formal proposal intended to effectuate, through negotiation, this end. If this proposal had proved objectionable in any points where the option of modification might rest with me, I would willingly take into consideration counter proposals having in view the same end. Understanding, however, that any counter proposals from them, if submitted at this juncture, would contain at least some allusions to the question of the St. Lawrence, I said that I would decline the conclusion of any previous arrangement upon the subject.

It will be seen from all that I have said how constant and earnest a desire was manifested by the British plenipotentiaries to blend these two questions, and how constantly I felt it my duty under every aspect to keep them asunder. I have stated also, that, on the supposition of their being joined together as elements of accommodation, the British plenipotentiaries remarked that they were prepared to make offers founded (I use their own words) "on a most liberal and comprehensive view of the wishes and interests of the United States" in relation to both. Such a declaration could not fail to excite my attention. I was aware, indeed, that Britain might make offers which she would doubtless believe to wear this character of benefit to the United States, without the United States being laid under the same convictions—so different an estimate might each party form of what was its due. Yet the expressions were strong; and although I felt that I could accede to nothing whatever myself, coupled with the principle of compromise that had been avowed, I nevertheless thought that there might be some propriety in knowing, for the information of my Government, the nature of the offers which professed, and in terms so awakening, to bear upon the interests and wishes of the United States. I therefore said to the British plenipotentiaries that I should be glad to be made acquainted with them, not in a way pledging this Government to any ulterior step, but merely as offers that would have been made in case I had expressed a willingness to receive them upon the condition from which they were not to be severed. They asked, what progress I supposed would be made towards a settlement by a compliance on their part with my request. I replied, none at present, but that I would transmit their offers to my Government in the light of an incidental fact evolved in the course of the negotiation; and, so far, it might be proper and possibly useful that I should know them. They next asked whether I could undertake to give them any reasonable assurance that my Government, on receiving them, and finding them satisfactory and advantageous, would be disposed to take them into consideration under their essential condition of our claim to the navigation of the St. Lawrence, as a right, being waived. I replied that I was wholly unauthorized to give them the slightest assurance to that effect. This closed my endeavors to obtain a knowledge of their offers, which, as will be inferred, were in the end not communicated to me. In the course of the remarks to which these endeavors led, I did not scruple to express the belief I entertained that my Government looked forward with a well grounded and even confident hope to the negotiation on the boundary question alone terminating, on a principle of compromise, in a manner satisfactory to both nations.

All attempts under present circumstances to put the case into an effective train of settlement, either by direct offers of compromise or by an agreement to negotiate on that principle, having thus failed, the plan of arbitration next presented itself for consideration. I thought at one time that the British plenipotentiaries designed to press an immediate resort to this plan. I informed them, in reply to their own inquiry, that I was prepared, if they insisted upon it, to enter upon the necessary steps for the selection of a sovereign as arbitrator. I again dwelt, however, upon the extreme difficulty, not to say impossibility, which, in the opinion of my Government, there would be, under existing circumstances, in going on with an arbitration. How, I asked, was it ever to be begun? Was this Government prepared to furnish a statement of the case proper to be laid before the arbitrator, and which would at the same time invite the concurrence of the United States? In regard to the first idea, I reminded the British plenipotentiaries of the mutual complaints and recriminations, often sharp and angry, which, it was alike to be admitted and lamented, were too profusely to be found among the elaborate journals and other proceedings of the commission, and over which it might be supposed that each nation would rather desire to draw a veil than publish more largely to the world. This feature in the complicated transaction formed, indeed, one of the many reasons for not resorting to an umpirage at all, and so I had been instructed to declare. But, this objection removed, how, I asked, in the second place, would Britain prepare her statement in a manner to be acceptable to the United States? Upon what maps would it be founded? Not upon those used by the United States, for to these Britain objected; not upon her own, for to these the United States objected; and there was no common map which could reconcile these discordant opinions. My own Government, I added, would have performed the task of drawing up a statement but for this difficulty about the map, not the only one, however, but a difficulty common to both parties, and which met them at the very threshold. It was thus that I addressed the British plenipotentiaries when we spoke of arbitration.

I perceived, to my surprise, that they were under an impression, at first, that no statement at all was necessary, and, perhaps, under the treaty of Ghent, might not even be admissible. They quoted the words of the fourth article that run as follows, viz: "That, in the event of the two Commissioners differing upon all or any of the matters so referred to them, or in the event of both or either of the said Commissioners refusing or declining, or wilfully omitting, to act as such, they shall make, jointly or separately, a report or reports, as well to the Government of his Britannic Majesty as to that of the United States, stating in detail the points on which they differ and the grounds on which their respective opinions have been formed, or the grounds upon which they, or either of them, have so refused, declined, or omitted to act. And his Britannic Majesty and the Government of the United States hereby agree to refer the report or reports of the said Commissioners to some friendly sovereign or State, to be then named for that purpose, and who shall be requested to decide on the differences which may be stated in the said report or reports, or upon the report of one Commissioner, together with the grounds upon which the other Commissioner shall have refused, declined, or omitted to act." From the tenor of the article, as thus quoted, the British plenipotentiaries said that they rather inferred it to be the intention of the treaty that it was the report itself, as the authentic and official document, and not a statement framed out of the report, that was to be laid before the arbitrator. It was to the source itself that he was to look for his information, not to anything derivative.

I replied that I considered this by no means the true, certainly not as the imperative, construction of the treaty. The statement indicated by my Government as proper upon the occasion was to be nothing more than an abstract, to be made, by consent of both parties, from the report, presenting in a succinct and intelligible form to the arbitrator the points on which he was to decide, and drawing his attention to such parts of the report as might especially call for his investigation. It was not to supersede the report, but to be something in addition to it. The parties were surely competent to adopt, by mutual agreement, such a measure. It would be obviously a convenient if not an indispensable form by which to secure to their case a ready and advantageous hearing. I admitted that I would not advert to the precedent of the statement prepared when the slave question was submitted to the Emperor of Russia as governing in this instance, for, in that case, the arbitration had not taken place under any provision in the treaty; but I insisted that the cases were analogous in reason, the measure being designed chiefly, and in this light imperiously due, to smooth the labors, difficult as they must needs be with every mitigation, of the umpire.

The British plenipotentiaries, without pushing the argument on this point further, now inquired whether, if they were disposed to waive whatever right they might have under the treaty to object to the necessity of a statement, and prepare one after their own understanding of what it should contain, I was empowered to accede to it, without any reference home to my Government. Here, again, I could only give them a reply in the negative. My Government, I said, had not anticipated such a step by me. I had been fully written to on the whole subject, but was not now in possession of the multitude of documents that belonged to it. I could not, therefore, be supposed to be armed with the means of fitly judging of their statement. My sole duty respecting it would be to transmit it to my Government; and I subjoined that how far it would prove acceptable to my Government must depend, in a great degree, on the map that was used in drawing it up. Upon this point, important as it is, I was not able to obtain from the British plenipotentiaries any explicit declaration of their intentions, nor did they incline to take any steps with me towards the concurrent selection of an arbitrator. They admitted that difficulties would lie in the way of their furnishing me with any statement, at this juncture, that would be likely to be satisfactory to my Government, and thought that no time would be lost by their forbearing at present to offer one.

In the course of our conversations on the mode of carrying the arbitration into effect, I always, as I have already mentioned, held up in the strongest lights in my power the numerous, the intrinsic, the insuperable obstacles presenting themselves on every side to a practical resort to this mode of adjustment. Your despatch had abundantly supplied me with matter for doing so, and I was not sparing in the use of it. Amongst other topics which I advanced was that of the full belief of my Government that the case, from its great bulk and entanglement, would be altogether beyond the compass of the personal attention of any arbitrator. Towards deciding upon this extensive boundary in unsettled regions, and on all the points of difference involved in it, it would become, I said, a part of his duty to examine thirty folio volumes of manuscripts, at the least, made up of conflicting statements, conflicting arguments, conflicting opinions. He would have, besides, to hunt for the lines of his award, if ever he should arrive at one, by the light of three collections of conflicting maps. Would it be proper, I asked, to approach any sovereign with an enumeration of these details of duty for his own immediate personal occupation, or could his compliance, on such terms, be in candor expected? Hence the suggestion of my Government was, that the investigation, if gone into at all by an umpire, must be by delegated authority; by a person or persons commissioned by the umpire to report to him a decision founded upon a full examination of the whole case, to which decision it would be enough that the umpire annexed his formal sanction. I added that, as the simplest way of carrying this suggestion into effect, it had occurred to my Government that the minister plenipotentiary of the sovereign arbitrator, residing at Washington, should be charged with this delegated trust in such manner as would render its execution effectual. The British plenipotentiaries made immediate objections to this course. They said that if a settlement by umpirage was finally forced upon the parties, their opinion was, that it should take place at the court of the sovereign arbitrator, leaving him to seek there all such instrumentality and assistance in the case as might be proper towards its investigation and decision. From the tone in which they urged this opinion I am left under the belief that it is one from which their Government would not depart.

It will be perceived from my foregoing report that this Government has manifested a reluctance, which I was incapable of overcoming, at entering into any distinctive agreement at present upon any one of the preliminary points which you had given me in charge relative to this question. The ground of their reluctance is obviously to be sought in their disappointment at my not consenting to connect it with the question of the St. Lawrence. As they not only declined coming into all agreement for settling the former question by compromise, but also coming into any of the previous arrangements indispensable for ripening it into a state for arbitration, what, I inquired, was to be done? Was the case to stand still? Was it never to be settled? I knew of no mode by which it could be brought to a close except the two preceding. The British plenipotentiaries replied that they must not be understood as finally declining a resort to either mode of settlement; but they did not withhold an expression of their strong desire that the case should rest where it is until my Government had become apprised of the discussions relative to the St. Lawrence, the nature of which, from their being until now new between the two nations, could not as yet be known. They wanted my Government at least to be made acquainted, before proceeding any further, with their desire to treat of the two subjects in conjunction, and upon the terms which they had explained. I would not, of myself, have consented to this course, not feeling at all at liberty, but was not able to prevent it. I reconcile myself to it under the reflection that possibly something may be thought due, all the circumstances considered, to this desire of Great Britain, and under the hope that the slight additional loss of time thus incurred may bring with it no peculiar inconvenience over a question that has already been pending since the Revolution. Having put you in possession of all the discussions which passed on it, and shown you the predicament in which it now stands, unsatisfactory I must own, I go on to the consideration of another subject. The protocols relating to it are the ninth, the seventeenth, the eighteenth, and the nineteenth.

III. ADMISSION OF CONSULS OF THE UNITED STATES INTO THE BRITISH COLONIAL PORTS.

My report upon this subject will be shortened by the communications which I have already had the honor to address to you at former periods in relation to it. I allude more particularly to my despatches, number 343 and 352, of November and December, 1823, and to my official note to Mr. Secretary Canning, of the 17th of November, 1823. In that note, written after I had received your despatch of the 26th of June, 1823, I found it necessary to execute in a great degree the instructions which your despatch contained. This Government, during the negotiation, as well as when the correspondence above alluded to took place, always considered the subject of appointing consuls to reside in their colonies as connected with that of the commercial intercourse generally; and here I agreed that the connexion was a natural one. It was evident that, but for the opening of the colonial ports to our trade, we should not have asked for the privilege of appointing consuls to reside at them; and if by any circumstances they were again to be closed, it was equally evident that our claim to consular representation would be at an end.

The consular appointments made by the President, for Jamaica, St. Christopher and Antigua, Demarara, and Barbadoes, had been sufficiently explained and justified to this Government in the course of my communications above mentioned, in conjunction also with my number 349, which covered another official note from me to Mr. Canning upon the same subject. Nevertheless, I did not omit to bring before the British plenipotentiaries all the circumstances of this correspondence. They were particularly pertinent to our discussions on the question of commercial intercourse, which had hinged so entirely on the point of reciprocity, and throughout the whole course of which it had been the aim of each party to exonerate itself from any charge of deficiency in this important point, if not to fix that charge upon the other. I remarked upon the fact of our trade to the opened colonial ports having now continued for two years without a single consul on the part of the United States having, to this day, been recognized in any one of them, though at least three of those who had gone there and presented themselves for recognition had been appointed under the previous and express consent of his Majesty's Government; whilst, on the other hand, during the whole of this period, the British trade from those ports had been receiving full consular protection from the consuls of Great Britain in the ports of the United States. In this, at least, it must be admitted, there was no reciprocity. Nor was the absence of it cause of mere nominal complaint on the part of the United States; and here I brought into view, from your despatch of the 26th of June, 1823, the practical inconveniences, especially in the island of Barbadoes, to which our trade had been subjected in the opened ports on occasions which probably would not have occurred had consuls from the United States been residing there. The British plenipotentiaries met this complaint in the manner their Government had formerly done. They said that when their consent had been given for appointing consuls at three of the colonial ports, it had been given under an expectation by Great Britain that the United States would carry on the trade on terms that were reciprocal; but that afterwards, finding the terms to be such as Great Britain did not consider reciprocal, she forbore to perfect the appointments until the issue could be known, apprehending that the effect of new retaliating measures on either side would soon be, to put an end to the trade altogether. I rejoined, that whatever motive deemed by herself sufficient, though not so regarded by the United States, Britain might allege for her course of conduct in this particular, it did not destroy the broad fact, or lessen the evils arising from it, of Britain having enjoyed the advantage, during the two years of this trade, of full consular representation in the ports of the United States, whilst the United States had enjoyed none in the British ports.

On the principal question of the claim of the United States to appoint consuls for the colonial ports, I took the ground which you had laid before me and heretofore maintained in my note to Mr. Secretary Canning of November 17, 1823, as well as in the one which I first of all addressed to him on this subject on the 17th of October, 1822, namely: that our claim extended, not to any specified number of the colonial ports, but to all, without exception, that had been opened by the act of Parliament of the 24th of June, 1822. This was the ground which I pressed upon the attention of the British plenipotentiaries. It was the only ground, I said, which, in the true sense of reciprocity, and therefore in the true sense of justice, could be supposed to be satisfactory to the United States; as they gave all, so it was reasonable that they should ask all. The United States excepted none of their ports to which the British colonial vessels resorted from the residence of British consuls, and had a fair right to expect that none of the colonial ports to which American vessels resorted would be excepted from the residence of American consuls. Consular protection was an incident of trade which the United States did not feel at liberty to forego in behalf of their citizens, so long as they allowed it to be enjoyed in their ports, without limit or exception, by the subjects of Britain. It satisfied neither the real nor even the verbal meaning of the term reciprocity in this discussion to say that the residence of British consuls in the ports of the United States was matched by the residence of American consuls in the ports of Great Britain, in Europe. It was palpable that, if a British ship, whether arriving from Liverpool or Barbadoes, received consular protection at New York, and an American ship received it at Liverpool but not at Barbadoes, there was no reciprocity in fact, whatever artificial reasons might justify Britain to herself in distinguishing in this respect, too, her colonial from her home dominion. The only true match to the privilege on the one side would be the extension of it to all the ports that were open, whether home or colonial, on the other.

The United States, I continued, in claiming to appoint consuls for all the colonial ports, meant not to make an unreasonable use of the privilege, and so I was instructed to declare. But the privilege of selecting the ports must rest, I said, exclusively with the United States. Their consular system did not recognize any fixed emoluments as the standard of remuneration for their consuls, but left it to depend upon the fees produced by trade. Hence, in the ports to which trade flowed consuls were necessary, and to those where there was none it was not to be supposed they would be sent, or so much as consent to go. But as the channels of trade were liable to shift, there was a manifest convenience and propriety, on this and all other accounts, in leaving the selection of the ports to the sound discretion of the appointing power. Such were my remarks upon this subject, in addition to those that I formerly made orally and in writing to Mr. Canning. I did not, in conclusion, offer any formal article in relation to it; first, because I thought it unnecessary after the aspect which the negotiation had assumed on the primary question of the commercial intercourse itself; and, secondly, because I had been informed in your instructions that the President was not tenacious of any article relating to consuls being inserted in a commercial convention, if one had been formed. But I gave the British plenipotentiaries fully to understand the true nature of our claim, and that it could not in anywise fall short of the privilege of appointing for all the opened ports.

They consented, substantially, to this principle, as will be seen by the protocol of the twenty-fourth conference. Their expression in it that they saw no objection to the admission of our consuls into their colonies, "subject to the usual exceptions and reservations," means that both parties were to be considered as reserving to themselves the privilege of excepting from the residence of consuls such particular places as they might think proper. This they explained to be their meaning. The same reservation had place in the sixteenth article of the treaty of the 19th of November, 1794, which was pointed out to me by you as the model of an article on the present occasion, had one been framed. It also exists in the fourth article of the commercial convention of the 3d of July, 1815, which article is indicated by the British plenipotentiaries as the model in the fifth article of their own counter projet annexed to the protocol of the sixteenth conference. The two articles on this subject in the treaty of 1794 and in that of 1815 are so much alike that they might be adopted indiscriminately as models; the latter being a copy, with only slight variations, from the former. In my note to Mr. Canning of the 17th of November, 1823, I had reminded him that, in case Great Britain excluded American consuls from the ports of the colonies, the United States would have to reserve the right of excluding from consular benefit in their ports all British vessels and seamen arriving from the colonies. So, also, I reminded the British plenipotentiaries that the United States would have to protect themselves by a similar reservation, to an extent coequal with that to which Britain might use her option, of excepting from the residence of our consuls particular places in her colonies, there being no other appropriate mode by which we could countervail on our side this right of exception on hers, so far as regarded her colonies.

It will be seen from the twenty-fourth protocol that Britain continues to decline for the present receiving our consuls in any of her colonial ports. She acts, in this respect, under an impression that there is danger of the intercourse between these ports and the United States being soon wholly interrupted. She waits the disappearance of this danger before she recognizes our consuls, as its reality would, according to her way of reasoning, render their recognition of little value. It was in vain that I urged the justice of recognizing ours at once, so that we might be upon a par with Britain until ulterior events were known. * * * * * If her tonnage duty of four shillings and three pence sterling per ton on our vessels entering her colonial ports, and her additional impost of ten per cent., be met by countervailing duties on our side—as I was forced, for the reasons given in another part of this despatch, to intimate my belief that they would be—her plenipotentiaries have informed me that it will lead to fresh measures of the same character on her side, thus bringing on a state of things that can only terminate in rendering the trade no longer worth the pursuit of either country. If, on the other hand, the trade remains as at present regulated, without any alteration by either party, although Britain, as I have had occasion to remark before, alleges that she is dissatisfied with it, she will let it have a further trial, and in this event will receive our consuls on the terms mentioned in the twenty-fourth protocol. This she will do, as I understand her intentions, notwithstanding the tenor of the fifth article of her counter projet above mentioned, which would seem to make her consent to the reception of our consuls dependent upon our acceptance of her four preceding articles. I believe, moreover, that she would raise no obstacle on the score of expense, but grant to our consuls exequaturs free of all charge, as we grant exequaturs to hers. This point I mentioned to the British plenipotentiaries, and to its obvious justice they took no exception. There remains nothing further for me to impart to you on this subject. The protocols that relate to it are the twenty-third and twenty-fourth.

IV. NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERY.

This subject was thrown out of the negotiation altogether. I was not the less mindful, however, of your instructions upon it. I brought it under the notice of the British plenipotentiaries at the tenth conference. I gave them a full history of the question from its origin. I stated the grounds of complaint which the United States had against France, as shown by the bare statement of the relative rights and pretensions of the two nations to the fishery in dispute. I stated the past unwillingness of France to do us justice, and the obligations hence arising to Great Britain to interpose her friendly and efficacious offices, to the end that justice should be rendered to us. From your despatch of the 27th of June, 1823, I also stated the motives which had restrained the President until the present epoch from laying this case before the British Government—motives that I felt sure would be appreciated, and that would increase the claims which it now had to attention. The case being wholly new until now, in any formal shape, to this Government, and being one which involved also the duties and the rights of a third power, I thought that it would be most proper not to content myself with a verbal explanation of it merely. Having, therefore, gone through with this, under the lights that your instructions and my own past investigations of the subject had afforded, I finished by delivering to the British plenipotentiaries a paper embracing a written summary of its merits, and one which might serve as a memorandum to Great Britain of the true nature of our claim. This paper consists of a synopsis of the question which I had formerly made out from Mr. Gallatin's letter to me of August the third, 1822, together with a reference to the correspondence subsequently carried on by the United States and France in relation to it. It is amongst the papers of the negotiation, marked E, and annexed to the protocol of the tenth conference. It commences with references to the different treaties—that of Utrecht in 1713, of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748, of Paris in 1763, our own with Britain in 1783, that between Britain and France of the same year, and the treaty of Paris of 1814, also between Britain and France—all of which go to show that whilst France possessed the right of taking fish on the western coast of the island of Newfoundland, she did not possess it, as she now claims it, exclusively, but that Great Britain, the undoubted sovereign of the island, held it in common with her. It next recites the first article of the convention of the 20th of October, 1818, between the United States and Great Britain, by which the people of the United States are expressly allowed to take fish on the western coast (and on other parts) of this island, in common with the subjects of Great Britain. It then states the fact of the cruisers of France having, in the years 1820 and 1821, ordered American fishing vessels away from this coast even whilst they were within the acknowledged jurisdiction of the island, threatening them with confiscation if they refused. Finally, it concludes with pointing to the three-fold duty which devolved upon Great Britain under the emergency described: first, to make good the title of the United States to take fish on the coast in question, as stipulated by the convention of 1818; but, second, if she could not do that, to give the United States an equivalent for the loss of so valuable a right; and, third, to vindicate her own sovereignty over this island, already impaired and further threatened by the conduct of the French cruisers towards the fishing vessels of the United States within its jurisdiction. The paper subjoined copies of all the official notes that passed between Mr. Gallatin and Viscount Chateaubriand in January, February, and April, 1823, on the respective rights of the two nations to the fishery in controversy.

The British plenipotentiaries, after having this paper in their possession, and consulting, as they informed me, their Government respecting it, entered upon the matter of it at the next succeeding conference. They said that it was not their intention to controvert the title of the United States to participate with Great Britain in certain fishing liberties described in the first article of the convention of 1818. They said, too, that the United States might require a declaration of the extent of those liberties as enjoyed by British subjects under any limitations prescribed by treaty with other powers. The United States might also ask from Britain, as sovereign of the island of Newfoundland, support in the enjoyment of the liberties as so limited; but the plenipotentiaries went on to remark, that the nature of the question seemed, in their opinion, to be varied, by France having, as seen in the notes of Viscount Chateaubriand to Mr. Gallatin, placed her claim to exclude the United States from the fishery in dispute on engagements contracted by the United States with France prior to the convention of 1818, and also on the fact of the United States having opened discussions upon the whole subject with France. They further remarked, that they had understood from one of their own negotiators of the convention of 1818 that the American negotiators had been apprised at that period by Great Britain of the French right to fish on this coast. At all events, they said that, as the subject stood, they must decline entertaining it as one susceptible of being handled in any effective way at present in this negotiation. Whatever rights or remedies the United States were entitled to from Great Britain upon the occasion could be brought into view, if thought necessary, by a direct application to the British Government, in the usual form. With this intimation they would consider the subject, for so they concluded with saying, as no longer upon the list of those which it was the object of our endeavors to mould into a general treaty or convention between the two States.

I said to the British plenipotentiaries, in reply, that I had certainly not anticipated all the above avowals. I did not admit that the fact of the United States having opened a correspondence upon this subject with France could diminish in any degree their right to resort to Great Britain, remarking that it could scarcely have been expected that a forbearance on their part to hasten to this resort in the first instance, from considerations of delicacy both towards Britain and France, was now to be turned against them. Forbearance had been due to France, at first, to avoid the appearance of recurring, on a question between her and the United States, to the aid of a third power; and to Great Britain it had been due, as it was hoped that the case might have been settled without putting her upon her duty of interfering. As little did I admit * * * * the allegation of the French Government, that the United States were excluded from this fishery by their previous engagements to France, was entitled to any weight. These engagements, I said, had been taken under treaties long since expired, and the provisions of which were otherwise nugatory as to any just bearing upon this controversy. Here I adverted to * * * * the argument used by Mr. Gallatin in reply to the notes of the Viscount Chateaubriand relative to the operation of the tenth article of the treaty with France of 1778, and of the twenty-seventh article of the convention with her of 1800, arguments which completed the demonstration, as you had remarked in your despatch, that the pretension of France to an exclusive fishery was not to be supported. I admitted, as one of the American negotiators of the convention of 1818, that we had heard of the French right at that time, but never that it was exclusive. Such an inference was contradicted not only by the plain meaning of the article in the convention of 1818, but by the whole course and spirit of the negotiation, which, it was well known, had been drawn out into anxious and protracted discussions upon the fishery question. As regarded the arguments of Viscount Chateaubriand, I reminded the British plenipotentiaries that whilst part of them labored to give to obsolete treaties, as against the United States, a validity and extent greater than they ever could have had whilst existing, the remainder went to assert a pre-existing and exclusive right in France to fish on this coast as against all the world, and, of course, as against Great Britain. Was Britain, I asked, prepared to acquiesce in this branch of the argument? for, undoubtedly, it was that which it most concerned France to establish, and without which the other branch would be of little avail to her.

The British plenipotentiaries peremptorily asserted a right in Great Britain to participate in the fishery on the coast, and denied, in this same tone, that the French right was exclusive. But having concluded to consider the subject as no longer amongst those embraced in our negotiations, they declined pursuing any further the discussion of it, leaving me to pursue such other course as I might judge applicable and expedient. My great duty having been to place the subject explicitly before this Government with a view as well to our rights as our remedies, I said to the British plenipotentiaries that the form in which I did so was not material, and that I should therefore adopt, without delay, that of addressing an official representation in regard to the whole subject to his Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. I accordingly prepared such a note to Mr. Canning, a copy of which will be found amongst the papers which I transmit, under date of the 3d of May. I do not recapitulate its contents, as they are to the same general effect with the paper which I had previously caused to be annexed to the protocol of the tenth conference. I was careful, in pursuance of your directions, to give it an aspect as friendly towards France as was compatible with duly making known the rights of the United States. I recollect nothing further that I have to communicate in explanation of this subject. The protocols in which it is mentioned are the tenth and the fourteenth. My note to Mr. Canning, considered in the light of a first formal application to this Government, is designed to bring on explanations respecting our claim between the Governments of Britain and France. These I must hope will take place, and eventuate in a manner satisfactory to the United States. I mentioned to the British plenipotentiaries the strong intimation given to Mr. Gallatin by the French Minister of Marine, that as France had, according to her own judgment, the exclusive rights of fishery on the coast in dispute, so she ought to expel from it the fishing vessels of any nation. But I abstained from inserting this intimation in my note to Mr. Canning. I did no more than advert to the menace of seizure directed by France against our vessels.

V. MARITIME QUESTIONS.

I entered upon this subject with all the anxiousness that belongs to its deep and permanent connexion with the interests and character of the United States, with all the recollections that their past history calls up, and all the anticipations that every view of the future must awaken when it is mentioned. It was at the thirteenth conference that I brought it forward. I laid before the British plenipotentiaries the opinions and the hopes which my Government had formed upon this great branch of the relations between the two countries, and strove to do justice to the principles upon which these opinions and these hopes were founded. I said that the United States were not behind any of the powers of Europe in wishes, and, moving in their proper sphere, would never be behind them in endeavors to bring about a general melioration in the condition of mankind. That such a principle was eminently congenial to their political institutions, and had always been a maxim of their policy in the whole system of their external relations. Peace, I said, was their invariable desire, as well as policy; but war taking place, it had been as invariably their desire and their effort to do homage to those beneficent principles which serve as well to shorten its duration as mitigate its evils. I instanced, as pertinent to a negotiation with Great Britain, the stipulations of the tenth and the twenty-sixth articles of the treaty of the 19th of November, 1794, when both countries successfully engaged in the work of sacrificing to these principles belligerent rights which both in strictness might otherwise have claimed and exercised.

But in the wide maritime field, whether occupied by the belligerent or the neutral, there were, I continued, questions of the highest moment to the United States and Great Britain, which they had heretofore ineffectually endeavored to arrange. These questions the United States again desired to approach, animated by the hope that better auspices might shed themselves over another attempt to come to a satisfactory and harmonious understanding respecting them. My Government, I remarked, was not discouraged from this attempt by the failure to adjust them during the negotiations at Ghent, nor by the more recent failure at London in 1818. Even since the latest of these periods the most material changes had been witnessed in the political aspect of Europe and of America. The European alliance had been impaired by a variance in the principles or in the policy of some of its chief members, and the whole of that part of the continent of America lately dependent upon Europe had assumed a new character in itself, and was hastening to new relations with the rest of the world. The most extensive alterations, if not an entire revolution in the colonial system, would, in all probability, follow in the train of the latter of these changes. These would probably superinduce the necessity of corresponding ones in maritime interests and claims, once regarded by Great Britain as essential to her welfare. I remarked, too, that the circumstance of Britain having held towards this struggle in America an attitude of neutrality, as she had also done towards the recent war in the Spanish peninsula, had served to strengthen the belief that she might, perhaps, at the present period, be disposed to view neutral doctrines in different and more favorable lights than formerly, under circumstances so opposite. It was under the combined force of these considerations that the United States again came forward to her with an offer to negotiate on them. But if Britain still viewed them as hitherto—if she still felt herself restrained from treating of them but on her former maritime principles, my Government would prefer being so informed with candor in the outset, it being alike due to candor to say that the principles of the United States remained the same, there having been no equipollent changes in their political, commercial, or maritime position in the world. It was thus that I opened this part of the subject to the British plenipotentiaries, discouraging our entering upon any discussion of these questions upon terms that could not be productive of any beneficial results.

I then proceeded to the paramount part of your instructions of the 28th of July, 1823. I said that there was yet another object, new to all the past discussions between the two Governments, but of pre-eminent interest in the eyes of mine, by its connexion with the cause of civilization and the peace of the world, which it desired to propose to Great Britain. This object was that of totally abolishing all private war upon the ocean.

The United States, I said, from an early period of their history, aimed at bringing about among nations this great consummation of benevolence and humanity. Once they had secured it by a treaty with one of the powers of Europe—with Prussia—and now they desired to offer it to the consideration of Great Britain. They hoped that she would go hand in hand with them in giving validity and extent to the benign consequences which its general adoption must introduce into the world. The question, though of novelty between the two Governments, was one of too much magnitude, under considerations of a moral as well as political nature, to be discarded on that account. In proceeding to develop the reasoning by which you had directed me to recommend this object to the favor and acceptance of the British Government, it may be sufficient for me to say that I omitted no part of it, resorting, under this delicate head of my instructions, to the very language of them as the most appropriate and effectual for imparting the sentiments which they embodied. I need not, therefore, repeat any more at large the manner in which I executed this portion of my duty. I finished by expressing, in the name of my Government, a hope that Great Britain might be able to see her way towards a concurrence in this object, the more so as it was also to be proposed by the United States to other European nations, with whom the example of Great Britain might be of powerful, perhaps decisive influence.

The British plenipotentiaries promised to take my whole exposition of the subject into consideration, and consult their Government before giving me an answer as to the course which it might become their duty to adopt.

In speaking of the maritime questions heretofore in discussion between the two countries, I had mentioned that of impressment as of leading importance. A question was then put to me by the British plenipotentiaries which, with my answer, it is proper that I should at once state. They asked whether I would be willing to treat of the above class of questions generally, supposing impressment not to be included among the number? I had anticipated such question, and was prepared with an answer. Your instructions not having supplied me with one, it was only left for me to act upon my own discretion. I therefore declined such a course, saying that I was unwilling to enter at all upon the other points of maritime law, unless the question of impressment was received by Great Britain as part of the negotiation. It will be understood that I spoke independently of the question of abolishing private war upon the ocean.

My reasons for this determination were derived, first, from the extraordinary importance of the question of impressment, transcending, as in my judgment it did, not only the importance of any other, but the collective importance of them all. I knew of no other so closely linked in with the rights, the sovereignty, and the peace of the Republic. There was always a rational hope that the harmony of the two countries might remain undisturbed in the absence of conventional arrangements upon the other questions; but, that of impressment always carried with it the seed of dissention, was always difficult, always threatening. The question of blockade, of contraband, of the right of the neutral carrier to protect the property of an enemy, and all the maritime questions, were ones, to be sure, which it would be desirable to settle; but, upon some of them the two Governments had not always been widely asunder in their negotiations, and the whole were distinguished by this feature, that each party, when differences arose under them, could more readily appeal to the standard of principles and usages to which other nations appealed. Impressment, on the contrary, springing from a claim by Great Britain to enforce her common law upon the high seas, was not so much distinguished by its international as its exclusive character. It was a question in a great measure sui generis; peculiar in its practical operation to the two nations; remarkable for the earnestness and perseverance with which the point of right was asserted to exist on the one side, and the explicitness with which it had ever been pronounced a positive and insupportable wrong upon the other. I did not, therefore, believe that any treaty on maritime questions, admitting that one had been concluded, would have been acceptable to my Government, of which an adjustment of this subject of perpetual animosity and collision did not make a part. Another reason was, that I followed in this respect the precedent, or at least the analogy, of the negotiation of 1818. It will be recollected that in that negotiation the plenipotentiaries of the United States were instructed not to entertain the discussion of maritime topics, unless that of impressment was also brought forward, and by Great Britain. I trust that these reasons for the course which I pursued may be approved. It is alike proper for me to mention, that whilst I declined going into the field of maritime discussion, impressment being left out of it, I avowed my perfect readiness to take up impressment by itself. Its absorbing interest justified also, in my eyes, this course.

The British plenipotentiaries, on hearing this last opinion from me, immediately inquired if I had any new securities to propose on behalf of my Government against the employment of British subjects in the merchant vessels of the United States? I replied that I had none that differed essentially from those brought forward in former negotiations.

After an interval of deliberation, that was not over until the twenty-first conference, the British plenipotentiaries communicated to me the decision of their Government upon the topics which I had unfolded to them. First they spoke of impressment. They said that Great Britain anxiously desired to reconcile the exercise of this established right with the convenience and feelings of other nations; that this desire had ever actuated her heretofore, and ever would in future. It was her duty to obey its impulse, and her interest no less than her duty. But the right was, nevertheless, one essential to her highest interests, and deemed by her as incontrovertible as it was ancient. It was a right interwoven with the frame of her laws, and precious to her by its connexion with principles to which she trusted for her strength and her safety at conjunctures when both might be at stake. She could never abandon such a right; it was impossible. Nor would her duty allow her to waive it with respect to the United States, but upon conditions the most satisfactory. She could only forego it in their favor, on receiving what she could deem ample security that the objects for which it was exercised might be attained by other means. They added, that having been informed by me that I had no proposals to make on this head essentially differing from those that my Government had submitted in former negotiations, they felt themselves forced to abstain in this from entering into the subject. The sentiments of their Government with respect to the impressment of British subjects in time of war out of the merchant vessels of whatever nation, upon the high seas, remained unchanged, and they could therefore indulge no hope of any good results from a fresh discussion on only the same grounds which Great Britain had, on full deliberation, adjudged to be inadequate in all former discussions. It was to this effect that the British plenipotentiaries spoke. It was in this manner that they disposed of the question of impressment.

With regard to the other maritime questions, affecting the relations of neutral and belligerent powers, the plenipotentiaries remarked, that as I was not prepared to enter into stipulations respecting them, but in conjunction with the question of impressment, which was excluded for the reason given, the discussion of the others, in any way, could be to no useful purpose; it would therefore be declined by them.

Thus it was that the whole of this subject fell to the ground. The decision upon it will be found recorded in the protocol of the twenty-first conference.

I next said to the British plenipotentiaries that the question of abolishing privateering, and the capture of private property at sea, whether by national ships or by privateers, was one that I considered as standing apart from those on which their decision had been given to me. Upon this question, therefore, I desired them to understand that I was ready to treat as of one occupying ground wholly of its own.

They replied that they were not prepared to adopt this course. All other questions of a maritime nature having been shut out from the negotiation, there would be, they said, manifest inconvenience in going into that for abolishing private war upon the ocean. They considered it a question belonging to the same class with maritime questions, and one which, besides being totally new, as between the two Governments, contemplated a most extensive change in the principles and practice of maritime war as hitherto sanctioned by all nations. Such was their answer.

This answer was given in the terms that I state, and so entered upon the protocol. But it is proper for me to remark, that no sentiment dropped from the British plenipotentiaries authorizing the belief that they would have concurred in the object if we had proceeded to the consideration of it. My own opinion unequivocally is, that Great Britain is not prepared to accede, under any circumstances, to the proposition for abolishing private war upon the ocean.

By the preceding decisions of the British Government, in conjunction with the restrictions under which I had laid myself, discussions the most interesting, and which it might have been anticipated would have been the most ample, have been altogether precluded. My report, by necessary consequence, under this division of your instructions, becomes proportionably abridged. From your despatch of the 28th of July, 1823, I understood that I was to make no communication to the British Government of the draft of the articles which it inclosed, unless they first agreed to negotiate respecting them. As they declined doing so upon the terms which, taking into view the whole spirit of your instructions, I had deemed the only admissible ones, it follows, that I withheld altogether any offer of the draft. The negotiation on the maritime questions fell through ostensibly, and, according to my best judgment, with sufficient reason, on the point of impressment. But here, too, I have to remark, that the British plenipotentiaries said nothing to warrant the opinion of any change in the doctrines of their Government on the other points of maritime law, any more than upon that of impressment. My own opinion is, that no such change has taken place. If the altered political and commercial circumstances of the times should hereafter serve to make her rule of 1756 an exception, it will probably be found the only exception. Nor will this be a rule abandoned by her, so much as lapsed; nor even wholly lapsed, if, according to indications contained in earlier parts of this communication, there be any likelihood of her returning to her own colonial system in the West Indies, rather than of her making larger departures from it. I am aware that she would probably denominate it a coerced return; whilst all the facts would present to the United States a view of the subject so very different.

The British plenipotentiaries, after all negotiation on the maritime questions had been foreclosed, informed me that they were willing to treat of other points which, though not immediately falling under this class, were connected with the friendly intercourse between the two countries, and would aim at its improvement. I replied that I was not prepared to enter into any stipulations with them of this description, detached from all other subjects, but that I would receive and transmit to my Government whatever proposals they might have to offer of the nature stated. They accordingly gave me, at the twenty-second conference, the substance of nine articles, which are inclosed, (marked M,) as belonging to the protocol of that conference. They were not put into a formal shape, being rather the heads of subjects, than as designed to be expressed in full language.

The first of these articles relates to the mutual delivery of criminals, the subjects or citizens of either party, taking refuge in the dominions of the other, analogous to the twenty-seventh article of the treaty of November, 1794, so far as murder and forgery were concerned. The second proposes arrangements for settling the claims made by the subjects or citizens of either party to lands situated within the territories of the other in America, and arising out of grants heretofore made by authorities competent at the time to make them. The following is the explanation of this article: At the opening of the negotiation the British plenipotentiaries inquired whether I was empowered to treat of certain claims of British subjects to lands in Florida. I replied that my instructions embraced no allusion whatever to such a subject, and that if brought forward by Great Britain, all that I could do would be to refer it to my Government. It was the first mention of it that I had heard, and it was not mentioned afterwards. It is to this subject that the above article points. The third article has reference to the non-confiscation of private debts in case of war between the two countries, as the fifth has to the protection of the merchants on each side found within the dominions of the other on the breaking out of a war, as under the tenth and twenty-sixth articles of the treaty of 1794. Though fully aware of the importance attached to the principle of these articles under your instructions, I did not feel myself at liberty to conclude engagements concerning them in a detached way. After the question of impressment had been expunged, and all the other maritime questions, together with that for the abolition of private war upon the ocean, which I could not but regard as the chief question contemplated under your despatch of the 28th of July, 1823, it did not seem to me either necessary or judicious that a treaty should be entered into for the sake of these two articles alone. I was the more swayed to this opinion from the hope that may reasonably be cherished that neither nation will hereafter be disposed to depart from the principles which these articles sanctify, though not now confirmed by a new treaty, since both nations have formerly agreed to them in this manner, and are both seen at this day substantially ready to propose them again to each other's acceptance.

The remainder of their articles, as a brief recapitulation of them will show, are only of subordinate interest. The fourth provides for a previous statement of grievances and demand of redress before a resort to reprisals by either party, like the twenty-second article of the treaty of '94. The sixth relates to wrecks and salvage, as is common in treaties between commercial nations. The seventh extends hospitality to vessels of either party forced by stress of weather into ports of the other to which they would not, under other circumstances, be admissible, as is also common, and as has place in the treaty of '94. The eighth contains a provision respecting merchant vessels rescued from pirates; and the ninth, and last, a provision for mutually exempting the consuls of each nation within the territories of the other from personal service and the operation of direct taxes. It must be confessed that, under this last provision, it would be the consuls of the United States who would derive the most benefit.

On my declining, for the reasons I have given, to conclude any arrangement at present on the foregoing articles, the British plenipotentiaries lamented that whilst they made the inability to treat of impressment no obstacle to entering into stipulations concerning them, I did. To this I replied by remarking upon the obviously different ground on which the two nations stood in this particular. To the United States, the question of impressment was vital; to Great Britain, it was of little concern, further than as it might be supposed that she was desirous of rendering to the United States justice in regard to it. The British plenipotentiaries here repeated the unfeigned regret which they said they felt at our preliminary terms having precluded them from arranging, at so favorable a season of peace, this question, which they desired I would understand that they, too, considered as one of great moment. Whilst they held their right to resort to the practice of impressment to be fully sanctioned by the general voice of nations, under that maxim which entitled every nation to command the allegiance and services of its own subjects, they were not unaware that the practice itself, from peculiar and insurmountable causes, pressed heavily upon the people of the United States. Hence, they had been most anxious to come to some arrangement by which an end might have been put to this source of contention; and they declared that they would have accounted it amongst the happiest and proudest incidents of their lives had they been able to sign with me a treaty by which so imposing a bar to the harmony of our respective countries could have been effectually and permanently removed. As things had eventuated, all that they could say was, and this they desired to say in a spirit the most sincere and earnest, that whenever in future the practice might be resorted to, it would be in a manner to give the least possible inconvenience to the United States, and none that could ever be avoided consistently with what was imperiously due to the essential rights and interests of Great Britain.

I joined in the regrets expressed by the British plenipotentiaries, and, I will presume to add, in a spirit not less sincere. I lamented our failure to come to an understanding upon this formidable question—one upon which, perhaps, the peace of two powerful nations hung. I spoke of the past offers of the United States for its settlement; how far they had gone, how far they would still go, in an accommodation to the British views. They had offered to abstain from employing British seamen on board of their vessels, for they did not want them there, having seamen enough of their own; and to effect this exclusion, they offered the highest enactments and sanctions of their laws, pledges which they deemed sufficient, and which they could never help thinking might be accepted as sufficient. It was to be considered, I said, that impressment was a question in which were bound up the highest rights and interests of the United States no less than of Great Britain. The United States admitted not the doctrine of perpetual allegiance. As the rule of nations, ancient or modern, they denied its existence. It had no place in their own code; and if it had in that of Britain, it was but as a municipal rule, to be executed at home, not upon the high seas, and on board the vessels of an independent and sovereign State. The latter carried with it the assumption of a right of search for men. This, whether as a right direct or incidental, was denied by the United States to have the least sanction in public law. The bare claim was affronting to the United States in the dearest attributes of their national sovereignty. I declared that I, too, would have hailed it as the most auspicious act of my life to have been able to mark the last days of my official residence at his Majesty's court by putting my name with theirs to stipulations that would have closed up forever this fruitful and bitter source of strife between our countries. As it was, it was only left for me to deplore results under which so high and solid a satisfaction had vanished from me. By an interchange of remarks such as these, neither side had proposed to itself any discussion or review of a question already dropped from our discussions, but barely to give expression to sentiments which both sides have such good cause for feeling at the abortive issue of this new endeavor to get rid of the evils of impressment.

Before leaving this part of the subject entirely, I feel impelled to one or two extraneous observations. The practice of seizing men by force for the supply of the Navy, even as a lawful exercise of municipal authority in Britain, is one that carries with it such a disregard of the liberty of the subject, and involves such an aggravation of individual horrors, that the propriety, the humanity, and the very policy of its total relinquishment, even in her own dominions, has not escaped the thoughts of some of her considerate and enlightened men. On my first arrival in this country I had occasion to notice, and not unfrequently, evidences of the existence of this feeling, both in private life and in the discussions of the press, and was willing to give way to the hope of its further, and at no very distant day, efficient progress. I lament to say that this cheering hope has been put back by a recent and too authentic indication, the relevancy of which to the subject-matter of this part of my report will be sufficient, I trust, to excuse my allusion to it. At the late session of Parliament, and only in the month of June, Mr. Hume, an active member of the House of Commons, from Scotland, introduced into the House a motion expressly upon the subject of impressment. The purport of it was, that "the House, being well aware of the difficulty of manning the Navy in time of war, and of the evils of forcibly impressing men for that purpose, and considering that a time of profound peace would best admit of the fullest and fairest examination of that most important subject, would, early in the next session of Parliament, take it into their serious consideration, with a view to the adoption of such regulations as might prevent those evils in future, consistently with the efficiency of the Navy and the best interests of the British Empire." In giving his notice of this motion, he declared, as one motive for its claims upon the attention of the House, that it would be a part of his duty in discussing it to show that, in the event of a new war between Great Britain and any of the European powers, it would be impossible for her to continue the practice of impressment, without adding the United States to the list of her enemies. It is a fact that would be deplored in the United States, that even such a motion as this, a motion that proposed nothing more than a future and guarded consideration of a subject so full of international importance, (the light alone in which it is of any concern to the United States,) should have been scarcely listened to by a British House of Commons. It was debated to comparatively empty benches, and thrown out by a vote of one hundred and eight to thirty-eight. The most impressive part of this public fact remains to be disclosed. This motion, which, in my mere capacity as an American spectator of the deliberations of the British Parliament, I cannot hesitate to think the most momentous by far in its bearing upon the foreign relations of the country of any that has offered itself to that body during my residence of six years in England; this motion, so far as I know, was not deemed worthy to engage the attention of a single minister of the Crown. It is certain that not one of them spoke upon it. In the House of Commons, in this alleged sanctuary of knowledge, patriotism, and statesmanship, in Britain, a question implicating the highest interests of two whole nations, and most essentially their future peace, passed away with less of discussion and excitement than might have been given to a bill for laying off a new road or inclosing a sterile heath. It was a spectacle calculated to fill with pain the mind of an American citizen, and I have adverted to it in no other spirit than that of unmingled sorrow at the greater distance to which, in conjunction with the failure of my negotiation, it seems to have removed all hope of arriving at a settlement of this ever perilous and exasperating topic of international hostility.

Having nothing more to say, at present, on the maritime questions, I leave them. The protocols in which they are noticed are the thirteenth, the twenty-first, and the twenty-second.

VI. NORTHWEST COAST OF AMERICA.

I now come to the last of the subjects that the President confided to me—that contained in your instructions of the second of July, 1823, relative to the Northwest Coast of America. Although no arrangement was concluded on this subject, it is not the less incumbent upon me carefully to apprise you of the discussions by which it was marked. They will probably be found not without interest.

In one of my preliminary communications respecting the negotiation, viz: my number 356, I informed you that I had thought it necessary, yielding to events that transpired after your instructions were received, to treat of this subject of the Northwest Coast with this Government alone, without considering the negotiation as common also to Russia, as had been contemplated by your instructions. For this deviation from your instructions I assigned my reasons, which, as they weighed strongly with me at the time, and do not appear, from any lights that I possess, to have lost any of their force since, I must hope will have been approved. My duty, therefore, will now be confined to informing you of the discussions that took place in my hands with Britain, and as limited to the interests of the United States and Britain. These are the only discussions, I may add, with which I have any acquaintance, not having heard from Mr. Middleton of the nature of those that were carried on at St. Petersburg, though, through the kindness of the Russian ambassador at this court, I have very recently been apprised of their result. It is probable that it has been through some accident that I have not heard from Mr. Middleton, having apprised him of the course that I had felt myself compelled to adopt. In obedience to your instructions, I also wrote to him on the subject of the slave trade, transmitting him a copy of the convention with this Government as soon as I had signed it.

In another of my communications, written before the negotiation opened, viz: my number 358, I gave you a general intimation of what I then supposed would be the terms upon which this Government would be disposed to arrange with us the questions of boundary upon the Northwest Coast. At that time, however, I had been put in possession of nothing distinctive or final upon the subject, and was to wait the arrival of the negotiation itself for the full and authentic statement of the British claims. I am the more particular in referring back to this latter communication, as it appears that I was under important misapprehensions in it, in regard to the true nature of the British claims. They proved, on formally and accurately disclosing themselves, to be far more extensive than I had believed, and were advanced in a manner more confident than I had even then anticipated.

I opened this subject to the British plenipotentiaries at the eleventh conference. I remarked that although it had been understood in my preparatory conversations with the proper organ of his Majesty's Government that the respective territorial or other claims of the United States and Russia, as well as of Great Britain and Russia, regarding the country westward of the Rocky mountains, were to be matter of separate discussion at St. Petersburg, yet that those of the United States and Britain were now, according to the understanding in the same conversations, to be taken up for formal discussion in London. My Government was aware that the convention of October, 1818, between the United States and Great Britain, one article of which contained a temporary regulation of this interest, had still four years to run; but the President, nevertheless, was of opinion that the present was not an unsuitable moment for attempting a new and more definite adjustment of the respective claims of the two powers to the country in question. It was a country daily assuming an aspect, political, commercial, and territorial, of more and more interest to the United States. It bore upon their relations with other States, upon their fisheries as well as their commerce in the Pacific, upon their fur trade, and the whole system of their intercourse with vast tribes of the Indians. I reminded the British plenipotentiaries that, by the third article of the treaty of Washington, of February 22, 1819, between the United States and Spain, the boundary line between the two countries was fixed, in part, along the southern bank of the Arkansas, to its source in latitude 42° north, and thence by that parallel of latitude to the South Sea; and that Spain had also renounced to the United States, by the same article, all her rights north of that parallel. I then made known at this and other conferences (for from the extent of the subject I was unable even to open it all at one conference) what I understood to be the nature of the title of the United States to the whole of the country north of the parallel stated. I said, that, apart from all the right as thus acquired from Spain, which, however, was regarded by my Government as surpassing the right of all other European powers on that coast, the United States claimed in their own right, and as their absolute and exclusive sovereignty and dominion, the whole of the country west of the Rocky mountains, from the 42d to at least as far up as the 51st degree of north latitude. This claim they rested upon their first discovery of the river Columbia, followed up by an effective settlement at its mouth, a settlement which was reduced by the arms of Britain during the late war, but formally surrendered up to the United States at the return of peace. Their right by first discovery they deemed peculiarly strong, having been made not only from the sea by Captain Gray, but also from the interior by Lewis and Clarke, who first discovered its sources and explored its whole inland course to the Pacific Ocean. It had been ascertained that the Columbia extended, by the river Multnomah, to as low as 42° north, and by Clarke's river to a point as high up as 51°, if not beyond that point, and to this entire range of country contiguous to the original dominion of the United States, and made a part of it by the almost intermingling waters of each; the United States, I said, considered their title as established by all the principles that had ever been applied on this subject by the powers of Europe to settlements in the American hemisphere. I asserted that a nation discovering a country by entering the mouth of its principal river at the seacoast, must necessarily be allowed to claim and hold as great an extent of the interior country as was described by the course of such principal river and its tributary streams, and that the claim to this extent became doubly strong where, as in the present instance, the same river had also been discovered and explored from its very mountain springs to the sea. Such a union of titles, imparting validity to each other, did not often exist. I remarked that it was scarcely to be presumed that any European nation would henceforth project any colonial establishment on any part of the Northwest Coast of America, which, as yet, had never been used to any other useful purpose than that of trading with the aboriginal inhabitants or fishing in the neighboring seas; but that the United States should contemplate, and at one day form, permanent establishments there was naturally to be expected, as proximate to their own possessions and falling under their immediate jurisdiction. Speaking of the powers of Europe who had ever advanced claims to any part of this coast, I referred to the principles that had been settled by the Nootka Sound convention of 1790, and remarked that Spain had now lost all her exclusive colonial rights that were recognized under that convention, first, by the fact of the independence of the South American States and of Mexico, and next by her express renunciation of all her rights, of whatever kind, above the 42d degree of north latitude to the United States. Those new States would themselves now possess the rights incident to their condition of political independence; and the claims of the United States above the 42d parallel as high up as 60°, claims as well in their own right as by their succession to the title of Spain, would henceforth necessarily preclude other nations from forming colonial establishments upon any part of the American continents. I was, therefore, instructed to say that my Government no longer considered any part of those continents as open to further colonization by any of the powers of Europe, and that this was a principle upon which I should insist in the course of the negotiation.

It was in this manner that I first laid down, for the information of this Government, the principles contained in your despatch, or flowing from them. I combined with what you had written to me the contents of the message of the President to Congress, of the second of December last, a document which I could not but regard as of the highest solemnity towards marking out my duty. I added, that the United States did not desire to interfere with the actual settlements of other nations on the Northwest Coast of America, and that in regard to those which Great Britain might have formed above the 51st degree of latitude, they would remain, with all such rights of trade with the natives, and rights of fishery, as those settlements had enjoyed hitherto. As regarded future settlements by either of the parties, I said that it was the wish of my Government to regulate these upon principles that might be mutually satisfactory and tend to prevent all collision. I was, therefore, instructed to propose, first, the extension to a further term of ten years of the third article of the convention of October, 1818; and, secondly, that Britain should stipulate during the like term that no settlement should be made by any of her subjects on the Northwest Coast of America, or the islands adjoining, either south of the fifty-first degree of latitude, or north of the fifty-fifth degree, the United States stipulating that none should be made by their citizens north of the fifty-first degree. This proposal I drew up in form and annexed it (marked F) to the protocol of the twelfth conference. I said that these limits were supposed to be sufficient to secure to Great Britain all the benefit to be derived from the settlements of her Northwest and Hudson's Bay Companies on that Coast, and were indicated with that view.

The insertion of a limit of ten years, which I introduced as applicable to the above restriction upon future settlements, may require explanation. In your despatch to me, as I understood it, there was no such limit of time specified. But in your instructions to Mr. Middleton, of July 22, 1823, which you inclosed to me, I perceived that there was this limit introduced, and that it was under this limit the proposal was described to him as the one which I was to submit to the British Government. I concluded that it would be erring on the safe side to take, in this particular, the instructions to Mr. Middleton as my guide, and I did so accordingly.

It is proper now, as on the question of the St. Lawrence, that I should give you faithful information of the manner in which the British plenipotentiaries received my proposal, and the principles under which I had introduced it. I may set out by saying, in a word, that they totally declined the one, and totally denied the other. They said that Great Britain considered the whole of the unoccupied parts of America as being open to her future settlements in like manner as heretofore. They included within these parts as well that portion of the Northwest Coast lying between the forty-second and the fifty-first degrees of latitude as any other parts. The principle of colonization on that coast, or elsewhere on any portion of those continents not yet occupied, Great Britain was not prepared to relinquish. Neither was she prepared to accede to the exclusive claim of the United States. She had not, by her convention with Spain in 1790, or at any other period, conceded to that power any exclusive rights on that coast where actual settlements had not been formed. She considered the same principles applicable to it now as then. She could not concede to the United States, who held the Spanish title, claims which she had felt herself obliged to resist when advanced by Spain, and on her resistance to which the credit of Great Britain had been thought to depend.

Nor could Great Britain at all admit, the plenipotentiaries said, the claim of the United States as founded on their own first discovery. It had been objectionable with her in the negotiation of 1818, and had not been admitted since. Her surrender to the United States of the port at Columbia river after the late war was in fulfilment of the provisions of the first article of the treaty of Ghent, without affecting questions of right on either side. Britain did not admit the validity of the discovery by Captain Gray. He had only been on an enterprise of his own as an individual, and the British Government was yet to be informed under what principles or usage among the nations of Europe his having first entered or discovered the mouth of the river Columbia, admitting this to have been the fact, was to carry after it such a portion of the interior country as was alleged. Great Britain entered her dissent to such a claim, and least of all did she admit that the circumstance of a merchant vessel of the United States having penetrated the coast of that continent at Columbia river was to be taken to extend a claim in favor of the United States along the same coast, both above and below that river, over latitudes that had previously been discovered and explored by Great Britain herself, in expeditions fitted out under the authority and with the resources of the nation. This had been done by Captain Cook, to speak of no others, whose voyage was at least prior to that of Captain Gray. On the coast, only a few degrees south of the Columbia, Britain had made purchases of territory from the natives before the United States were an independent power, and upon that river itself, or upon rivers that flowed into it west of the Rocky mountains, her subjects had formed settlements coeval with, if not prior to, the settlement by American citizens at its mouth.

Such is a summary of the grounds taken at the very outset by the British plenipotentiaries in opposition to our claims. On my remarking immediately, and before proceeding to any discussion of them, that I had not before been aware of the extent and character of all these objections, they replied that it was also for the first time that they had been apprised, in any authentic and full way, of the nature of the claims, as I had now stated them, on behalf of the United States; claims which they said they were bound to declare at once that Great Britain was wholly unprepared to admit, and especially that which aimed at interdicting her from the right of future colonization in America.

Resuming the subject, I said that it was unknown to my Government that Great Britain had ever even advanced any claim to territory on the Northwest Coast of America, by right of occupation, before the Nootka Sound controversy. It was clear that, by the treaty of Paris of 1763, her territorial rights in America were bounded westward by the Mississippi. The claim of the United States, under the discovery by Captain Gray, was, therefore, at all events, sufficient to overreach, in point of time, any that Great Britain could allege along that coast, on the ground of prior occupation or settlement. As to any alleged settlements by her subjects on the Columbia, or on rivers falling into it, earlier or as early as the one formed by American citizens at Astoria, I knew not of them, and was not prepared to admit the fact. As to the discovery itself of Captain Gray, it was not for a moment to be drawn into question. It was a fact before the whole world. The very geographers of Britain had adopted the name which he had given to this river. Vancouver himself, undoubtedly the first British navigator who had ever entered it, admitted that he found Captain Gray there, and the very instructions to this British officer, drawn up in March, 1791, and to be seen among the records of the British Admiralty, expressly referred by name to the previous expedition in that quarter of the American sloop the Washington. Was this, I asked, to be accounted nothing? Did it lie with a foreign power, whose own archives might supply her with the essential incontestable fact of the first discovery by the vessel of another power of a vast river whose waters from their source to the ocean had remained until then totally unknown to all civilized nations—did it lie with such foreign power to say that the discovery was not made by a national ship or under national authority? The United States, I said, could admit no such distinction; could never surrender under it, or upon any ground, their claim to this discovery. The ship of Captain Gray, whether fitted out by the Government of the United States or not, was a national ship. If she was not so in a technical sense of the word, she was in the full sense of it applicable to such an occasion. She bore at her stern the flag of the nation, sailed forth under the protection of the nation, and was to be identified with the rights of the nation. The extent of interior country attaching to this discovery was founded, I said, upon a principle at once reasonable and moderate; reasonable, because, as discovery was not to be limited to the local spot of a first landing place, there must be a rule both for enlarging and circumscribing its range, and none more proper than that of taking the water courses which nature had laid down both as the fair limits of the country and as indispensable to its use and value; moderate, because the nations of Europe had often, under their rights of discovery, carried their claims much further. Here I instanced, as sufficient for my purpose and pertinent to it, the terms in which many of the royal charters and letters patent had been granted by the Crown in England to individuals proceeding to the discovery or settlement of new countries on the American continent: among others, those from Elizabeth, 1578, to Sir Humphrey Gilbert, and in 1584 to Sir Walter Raleigh; those from James I to Sir Thomas Gates, in 1606 and 1607, and the Georgia charter of 1732. All these, extracts from which I produced, comprehended a range of country fully justifying my remark. By the words of the last a grant is passed to all territories along the seacoast from the river Savannah to the most southern stream "of another great river called the Altamaha, and westward from the heads of the said rivers in a direct line to the South Seas." To show that Britain was not the only European nation who, in her territorial claims on this continent, had had an eye to the rule of assuming water courses to be the fittest boundaries, I also cited the charter of Louis XIV to Crozat, by which "all the country drained by the waters emptying directly or indirectly into the Mississippi" is declared to be comprehended under the name and within the limits of Louisiana.

If Britain had put forth no claims on the Northwest Coast, founded on prior occupation, before the Nootka sound contest, still less could she ever have established any, I remarked, at any period, founded on prior discovery. Claims of the latter class belonged wholly to Spain, and now, consequently, to the United States. The superior title of Spain on this ground, as well as others, was, indeed, capable of demonstration. Russia had acknowledged it in 1790, as the State papers of the Nootka Sound controversy would show. The memorial of the Spanish court to the British minister on that occasion expressly asserted that, notwithstanding all the attempted encroachments upon the Spanish coasts of the Pacific Ocean, Spain had preserved her possessions there entire—possessions which she had constantly, and before all Europe, on that and other occasions, declared to extend to as high at least as the 60th degree of north latitude. The very first article of the Nootka Sound convention attested, I said, the superiority of her title; for whilst by it the nations of Europe generally were allowed to make settlements on that coast, it was only for purpose of trade with the natives, thereby excluding the right of any exclusive or colonial establishments for other purposes. As to any claim on the part of Britain under the voyage of Captain Cook, I remarked that this was sufficiently superseded (passing by everything else) by the journal of the Spanish expedition from San Blas in 1775, kept by Don Antonio Maurelle, for an account of which I referred the British plenipotentiaries to the work of Daines Barrington, a British author. In that expedition, consisting of a frigate and a schooner, fitted out by the Viceroy of Mexico, the Northwest Coast was visited in latitude 45°, 47°, 49°, 53°, 55°, 56°, 57°, and 58°, not one of which points, there was good reason for believing, had ever been explored, or as much as seen, up to that day by any navigator of Great Britain. There was, too, I said, the voyage of Juan Peres, prior to 1775; that of Aguilar in 1601, who explored that coast in latitude 45°; that of De Fuca in 1592, who explored it in latitude 48°, giving the name, which they still bear, to the straits in that latitude, without going through a much longer list of other early Spanish navigators in that sea, whose discoveries were confessedly of a nature to put out of view those of all other nations. I finished by saying that, in the opinion of my Government, the title of the United States to the whole of that coast, from latitude 42° to as far north as latitude 60°, was, therefore, superior to that of Britain or any other power; first, through the proper claim of the United States by discovery and settlement; and, secondly, as now standing in the place of Spain and holding in their hands all her title.

Neither my remarks nor my authorities, of which I have endeavored to present an outline, made the impression upon the British plenipotentiaries which I was desirous that they should have produced. They repeated their animated denials of the title of the United States as alleged to have been acquired by themselves, enlarging and insisting upon their objections to it, as I have already stated them. Nor were they less decided in their renewed impeachments of the title of Spain. They said that it was well known to them what had formerly been the pretensions of Spain to absolute sovereignty and dominion in the South Seas, and over all the shores of America which they washed; but that these were pretensions which Britain had never admitted. On the contrary, she had strenuously resisted them. They referred to the note of the British minister to the court of Spain of May 16, 1790, in which Britain had not only asserted a full right to an uninterrupted commerce and navigation in the Pacific, but also that of forming, with the consent of the natives, whatever establishments she thought proper on the Northwest Coast, in parts not already occupied by other nations. This had always been the doctrine of Great Britain, and from it nothing that was due in her estimation to other powers now called upon her in any degree to depart. As to the alleged prior discoveries of Spain all along that coast, Britain did not admit them, but with great qualification. She could never admit that the mere fact of Spanish navigators having first seen the coast at particular points, even where this was capable of being substantiated as the fact, without any subsequent or efficient acts of sovereignty or settlement following on the part of Spain, was sufficient to exclude all other nations from that portion of the globe. Besides, they said, even on the score of prior discovery on that coast, at least as far up as the 48th degree of north latitude, Britain herself had a claim over all other nations. Here they referred to Drake's expedition in 1578, who, as they said, explored that coast on the part of England from 37° to 48° north, making formal claim to these limits in the name of Elizabeth, and giving the name of New Albion to all the country which they comprehended. Was this, they asked, to be reputed nothing in the comparison of prior discoveries, and did it not even take in a large part of the very coast now claimed by the United States as of prior discovery on their side? Such was the character of their remarks on this part of the title. In connexion with them, they called my attention to the report of a select committee of the House of Representatives, in April last, on the subject of the Columbia river. There is a letter from General Jesup in this report, adopted by the committee as part of the report, and which, as the British plenipotentiaries said, had acquired importance in the eyes of their Government from that fact. They commented upon several passages of this letter, a newspaper copy of which they held in their hands, but chiefly on that part which contains an intimation that a removal from our territory of all British subjects now allowed to trade on the waters of the Columbia might become a necessary measure on the part of the United States as soon as the convention of 1818 had expired. Of this intimation the British plenipotentiaries complained, as one calculated to put Great Britain especially upon her guard, arriving as the document did at a moment when a friendly negotiation was pending between the two powers for the adjustment of their relative and conflicting claims to that entire district of country. Had I any knowledge, they asked, of this document?

I replied that I had not, as communicated to me by my Government. All that I could say of it was, and this I would say confidently, that I was sure it had been conceived in no unfriendly spirit towards Great Britain, yet, I was bound unequivocally to re-assert, and so I requested the British plenipotentiaries would consider me as doing, the full and exclusive sovereignty of the United States over the whole of the territory beyond the Rocky mountains, washed by the river Columbia, in manner and extent as I had stated, subject, of course, to whatever existing conventional arrangements they may have formed in regard to it with other powers. Their title to this whole country they considered as not to be shaken. It had often been proclaimed in the legislative discussions of the nation, and was otherwise public before the world. Its broad and stable foundations were laid in the first uncontradicted discovery of that river, both at its mouth and at its source, followed up by an effective settlement, and that settlement the earliest ever made upon its banks. If a title in the United States thus transcendent needed confirmation, it might be sought in their now uniting to it the title of Spain. It was not the intention of the United States, I remarked, to repose upon any of the extreme pretensions of that power to speculative dominion in those seas which grew up in less enlightened ages, however countenanced in those ages, nor had I, as their plenipotentiary, sought any aid from such pretensions; but to the extent of the just claims of Spain, grounded upon her fair enterprise and resources at periods when her renown for both filled all Europe, the United States had succeeded, and upon claims of this character it had therefore become as well their right as their duty to insist. I asserted again the incontestible priority of Spanish discoveries on the coast in question. I referred to the voyage of Cortes, who, in 1537, discovered California; to those of Alarcon and Coronado, in 1540; to that of Cabrillo, in 1542, all of whom were prior to Drake; and the last of whom made the coast, by all the accounts that are given, as high up as latitude 44°. As to Drake, I said, that although Fleurieu, in his introduction to Marchaud, did assert that he got as far north as 48°, yet Hakluyt, who wrote almost at the time that Drake flourished, informs us that he got no higher than 43°, having put back at that point from "the extreme cold." All the later authors or compilers also who spoke of his voyage, however they might differ as to the degree of latitude to which he went, adopted from Hakluyt this fact of his having turned back from the intensity of the weather. The preponderance of probability, therefore, I alleged, as well as of authority, was, that Drake did not get beyond 43° along that coast. At all events, it was certain that he had made no settlements there, and the absence of these would, under the doctrine of Great Britain as applied by her to Spain, prevent any title whatever attaching to his supposed discoveries. They were moreover put out of view by the treaty of 1763, by which Britain agreed to consider the Mississippi as her western boundary upon that continent.

Our discussions, which grew into length, and only a condensed view of which I have aimed at presenting to you, terminated without any change of opinion on either side. Having stated the principal points which marked them, my duty seems to be drawing to a close, without the necessity of setting before you all the amplifications and details into which, on topics so copious, they would sometimes run. They were ended on the side of Great Britain by her plenipotentiaries repeating that they found it altogether impossible to accede either to the proposal of the United States or to the reasoning invoked in its support. That, nevertheless, they desired to lay a foundation of harmony between the two countries in that part of the globe—to close, not leave open, sources of future disagreement which time might multiply and aggravate. That with this view, and setting aside the discordant principles of the two Governments in the hope of promoting it, they had to propose: First, that the third article of the convention of October, 1818, should now be considered as at an end. Secondly, that instead of it, the boundary line between the territories respectively claimed by the two powers westward of the Rocky mountains should be drawn due west along the 49th parallel of latitude to the point where it strikes the northeasternmost branch of the Columbia, and thence down along the middle of the Columbia to the Pacific Ocean, the navigation of this river to be forever free to the subjects and citizens of both nations; and further, that the subjects or citizens of either should not in future be allowed to form settlements within the limits to be thus assigned to the other, with a saving in favor of settlements already formed within the prohibited limits, the proprietors or occupants of which, on both sides, should be allowed to remain ten years longer.

This proposal they annexed in form (marked P) to the protocol of the twenty-third conference. They remarked, that in submitting it they considered Great Britain as departing largely from the full extent of her right, and that if accepted by the United States it would impose upon her the necessity, ultimately, of breaking up four or five settlements formed by her subjects within the limits that would become prohibited, and that they had formed under the belief of their full right as British subjects to settle there. But their Government was willing, they said, to make these surrenders, for so they considered them, in a spirit of compromise on points where the two nations stood so divided.

I instantly declared to the British plenipotentiaries my utter inability to accept such a boundary as they had proposed. I added, at the same time, that I knew how the spirit of just accommodation also animated the Government of the United States upon this occasion. That in compliance with this spirit, and in order to meet Great Britain on ground that might be deemed middle, I would consent so far to vary the terms of my own proposal annexed to the twelfth protocol as to shift its southern line as low as 49°, in place of 51°. I desired it to be understood that this was the extreme limit to which I was authorized to go, and that, in being willing to make this change, I, too, considered the United States as abating their rights, in the hope of being able to put an end to all conflict of claims between the two nations to the coast and country in dispute.

The British plenipotentiaries, after having this modification of my first proposal a fortnight under consideration, rejected it, and they made me no new proposal in return. They did not, in terms, enter their rejection of this my second proposal on the protocol, and I did not urge it, thinking that their abstinence, as far as it could have any effect, might tend to leave the door somewhat less permanently closed against re-consideration, should the proposal as so modified by me ever be again made. But it is right for me to state that they more than once declared, at the closing hours of the negotiation, that the boundary marked out in their own written proposal was one from which the Government of the United States must not expect Great Britain to depart.

I have to add, that their proposal was first made to me, verbally, at the twentieth conference, and that it then embraced an alternative of leaving the third article of the convention of 1818 to its natural course and limit. But this they afterwards controlled by their more formal and final proposition in writing, annexed, as before described, to the protocol of the twenty-third conference.

Having made you acquainted with all that transpired on this subject, I close it by referring to the protocols in which it is mentioned. These are the eleventh, the twelfth, the nineteenth, the twentieth, and the twenty-third.

I have now gone through all the subjects, and feel it time to come to a conclusion. I have made no omissions that are material, of which at present I have any consciousness. If, on reviewing at full leisure, the private journals from which I have selected the materials of this official despatch, I discover omissions, I will take care that they shall be supplied by a supplemental communication. I have laid before you a faithful, I would hope an intelligible, account of the progress, the character, and the results of the whole negotiation. The importance, to use the appropriate words of your own despatch to me of the 29th of July, 1823, of most of its subjects; the complicated character of the considerations involved in them, and their momentous bearings in present and future ages upon the interests, the welfare, and the honor of the United States, I have felt, deeply felt, throughout the protracted period allotted to their investigation and discussion. A load of responsibility and solicitude has weighed unceasingly upon my mind. A just, I will add a painful, sense of the great duty that was confided to me has never been absent from my thoughts. If it had pleased the President to have assigned me a colleague in its exercise, I should have felt thankful, having, as I took the liberty to say before it came on, entertained an unfeigned distrust in my own unassisted endeavors. For a proper estimate of what was due from me, for zeal, for good intentions, for diligence, I must humbly hope that the confidence reposed in me has not been misplaced. For the rest I cannot answer. Now that the negotiation is over, I cannot presume to hope that the manner in which I have conducted it, under all the many aspects which it assumed—aspects unforeseen, and to me often as difficult as unforeseen—will be deemed to have been always above exception. Constantly as I looked to the guiding light of your instructions, and ample as was the light shed by them over my general path, there were, there must have been, in the progress of voluminous discussions—where not the just desires of one nation, but the clashing interests of two, were at stake—points for which they did not provide. Reposing, upon all these occasions, on their general spirit, I must seek solace in the consciousness that, however unsuccessful the issue of my endeavors, they were always well meant, and in the hope that, regarded in their general character and tendency, they will be looked at with an indulgence proportioned to the anxious desire for my country's good, in which I feel sure it will be believed they ever originated. Of the questions that it fell to my lot to discuss with this nation, those that were old were full of difficulty, and had proved baffling in hands more skilful than mine in times that are passed; those that were new were found to be encompassed with difficulties not less formidable and intrinsic. Nor will it, I hope, be reputed out of place with my duty, or with the solemnity of this communication, to close it finally by the remark that the negotiation of which it has aimed at exhibiting an authentic history has been conducted with a nation not only mighty in her power, but unbending in her pretensions. The deliberate determinations to which she appears to have come in this negotiation I have felt it an imperious duty to report, without, in any instance, abating the force of any of the considerations by which I understood her plenipotentiaries to expound and maintain them.

I have the honor to remain, with very great respect, your obedient servant,

RICHARD RUSH.

LONDON, August 12, 1824.

Protocol of the third conference of the American and British plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, February 5, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

In pursuance of previous agreement, Mr. Rush brought forward the propositions of his Government respecting the trade between the British colonies in North America and the West Indies and the United States, including the navigation of the St. Lawrence by vessels of the United States.

On concluding the statement with which Mr. Rush introduced these proposals, in explanation of the views and antecedent proceedings of his Government, he gave in the three articles which are hereunto annexed, (marked A.)

The British plenipotentiaries, in receiving the articles thus presented to them for consideration, confined themselves to stating their first impressions as to the scope and extent of the American proposals, and the extreme difficulty resulting therefrom, observing on such parts of the American plenipotentiary's statement as appeared to them to call for immediate objection, or to admit of satisfactory explanation.

Adjourned to Monday, the 16th instant, at two o'clock.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Stratford Canning.

Another original copy of the convention on the subject of the slave trade, having been prepared at the request of the American plenipotentiary, with the view of enabling him to transmit that instrument in duplicate to his Government, was read over, and, upon its proving to be perfectly correct, was signed by the plenipotentiaries on both sides.

Protocol of the ninth conference of the American and British plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, March 25, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The British plenipotentiaries stated that, not being yet at liberty, from circumstances already explained, to make a full communication with respect to the three articles proposed by Mr. Rush at the third conference, while they were disposed, in the spirit of that perfect amity and good will which subsisted between the respective Governments, to treat of the free navigation of the river St. Lawrence by American vessels, on the principle of accommodation and mutual concession, they thought it desirable that the American plenipotentiary should at once bring forward the proposals of his Government on the several questions already submitted by him for negotiation.

The American plenipotentiary readily acquiesced in the expediency of this course, on the obvious understanding that the views of the British Government would be, in turn, communicated to him. He consequently gave in the paper (D) annexed hereto, as containing the proposal of his Government for endeavoring to adjust, by compromise, the differences arising under the 5th article of the treaty of Ghent.

Mr. Rush remarked at the same time on the extreme difficulties attending an arbitration as prescribed by that treaty, and stated his conviction that his Majesty's late Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had signified to him the assent of the British Government to his proposal of endeavoring to settle the points at issue by direct communication between the two Governments.

In reply to a question from the British plenipotentiaries, Mr. Rush informed them that he was not prepared, in case of his proposal being finally accepted, to submit any particular terms of compromise for settling the disputed boundary, though he was persuaded that his Government, in proposing a negotiation on that principle, looked with confidence to its issuing in an agreement satisfactory to both parties; and also that, in the event of an arbitration being insisted on, his present instructions would enable him to proceed at once to the concurrent selection of an arbitrator, agreeably to the treaty of Ghent.

It was agreed that the next conference should be held on Monday next, the 29th instant, when the American plenipotentiary would be prepared to continue his communication of the proposals of his Government.

Protocol of the tenth conference of the American and British plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, March 29, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The American plenipotentiary entered upon the subject of the Newfoundland fishery. He stated at length the circumstances constituting the case which his Government thought it advisable to bring under the view of the British Government, and concluded by giving in as a memorandum of his statement the paper marked E, annexed to the present protocol.

The British plenipotentiaries, after making such inquiries of Mr. Rush as they deemed conducive to a thorough understanding of the points in question, agreed to meet him again in conference on Thursday, the 1st of April.

Protocol of the eleventh conference of the American and British plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, April 1, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The American plenipotentiary opened the subject of territorial claims on the Northwest Coast of America westward of the Rocky mountains. It having been understood that the pretension which had been put forward by the cabinet of St. Petersburg, respecting its jurisdiction in that quarter, was to be

* matter of separate discussion between the respective parties, he observed that, notwithstanding this circumstance, and although the convention of October, 1818, one article of which contained a temporary regulation with respect to the above mentioned claims, had still four years to continue, his Government was of opinion that the present was not an unsuitable moment for attempting a settlement of the boundary on the Northwest Coast of America westward of the Rocky mountains, and he therefore proceeded to explain the nature of the claims which his Government thought itself entitled to advance.

His statement not being completed in the present conference, Mr. Rush undertook to resume it on the following day.

The American plenipotentiary resumed the communication which he had commenced in that conference on the subject of the territorial claims on the Northwest Coast of America westward of the Rocky mountains, and concluded by giving in the paper marked F, annexed hereto, as containing the proposal of his Government on that head.

Protocol of the thirteenth conference of the American and British plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, April 5, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The American plenipotentiary stated that, in addition to the questions submitted for negotiation at the preceding conferences, he was instructed to treat with Great Britain on various subjects of maritime law heretofore in discussion between the two countries, and also on that of the abolition of privateering and the exemption from all capture of private property in merchant ships at sea. Amongst the former subjects he mentioned that of impressment as of leading importance.

He added that, as he was not authorized to assent to anything new in principle on such of these points as had been discussed on former occasions, it was right for him to premise that, unless the British Government were ready to negotiate with the understanding that the views which they had heretofore entertained on them were essentially changed, or likely, in the course of negotiation, to be materially modified, the Government of the United States would prefer, on the whole, not bringing these questions under discussion at the present time.

After stating the general political considerations which had induced his Government to make this overture, he informed the British plenipotentiaries, in reply to an inquiry on their part, that, although he was willing to treat of impressment alone, he should not feel inclined to enter on the other points of maritime law unless the question of impressment was at the same time received by his Majesty's ministers as part of that negotiation.

The British plenipotentiaries having further asked whether any additional securities would be proposed or admitted by the American Government against the employment of British natural born subjects in the merchant vessels of the United States, the American plenipotentiary replied that he had none to offer essentially differing from those brought forward in former negotiations.

Protocol of the fourteenth conference of the American and British plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, April 13, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Stratford Canning.

After the protocol of the preceding conference had been agreed to and signed, the British plenipotentiaries stated that they had invited Mr. Rush to an interview in order to inform him that, in consequence of the inquiries which they had made as to the right of fishing on the Western Coast of Newfoundland, they conceived that the case, as previously described by him, was hardly of a nature to be entertained among the subjects of the present negotiation.

The citizens of the United States were clearly entitled, under the convention of October, 1818, to a participation with his Majesty's subjects in certain fishing liberties on the coasts of Newfoundland; the Government of the United States might, therefore, require a declaration of the extent of those liberties as enjoyed by British subjects under any limitations prescribed by treaty with other powers, and protection in the exercise of the liberties so limited, in common with British subjects, within the jurisdiction of his Majesty as sovereign of the island of Newfoundland; that such declaration and protection, if necessary, might be applied for in the regular diplomatic course; but that it was to be observed that the question appeared to have been in some degree varied, first, by the line of argument pursued in the correspondence between Mr. Gallatin and Viscount Chateaubriand, the latter having rested his claim to the right of excluding the United States from the fisheries on those parts of the coast of Newfoundland to which the above mentioned correspondence applied, upon engagements contracted by the American Government towards that of France long before October, 1818, according to his construction of which engagements the United States had virtually rendered their exercise of the liberty of fishing between Cape Ray and the Quirpon islands, conceded by Great Britain, dependent on the compliance of his most Christian Majesty; and, secondly, by the consent of the American Government to open discussions on this subject, at Washington, with the French chargé d'affaires.

The American plenipotentiary, protesting wholly against the grounds assumed by France as impairing in any degree the fishing rights of the United States, held under the convention of October 20, 1818, and not admitting that any correspondence which had taken place between the Governments of the United States and France upon this subject could affect any of those rights, remarked that his main object being to bring the question which had arisen between the United States and France fully under the notice of the Government of his Britannic Majesty, with a view to the objects stated in his paper, marked E, (annexed to the protocol of the tenth conference,) he should adopt the course of addressing an official representation upon the whole subject to his Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

Protocol of the fifteenth conference of the American and British plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, June 4, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The British plenipotentiaries stated that, having received the instructions of their Government on the various important and extensive questions submitted for negotiation, they were now prepared to communicate fully and definitively thereon with the American plenipotentiary.

Beginning with the articles of colonial intercourse proposed by him at the third conference, they explained at large the sentiments of their Government, showing what insuperable objections, alike in principle as in practice, precluded Great Britain, in their estimation, from acceding to the articles in question, except with the omission of such parts as stipulated, in reference to that intercourse, for a complete assimilation of the duties on imports from the United States into the colonies, to those levied on like imported articles the produce of his Britannic Majesty's possessions.

The American plenipotentiary stated that he was not authorized to sign the proposed articles without a full stipulation to the preceding effect; but that he was instructed to invite the British plenipotentiaries, in case of the terms which he had offered not being accepted, to bring forward counter proposals which he should be ready to transmit, together with any explanations for consideration, to his Government.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The British plenipotentiaries, after further discussion in relation to commercial intercourse between the United States and certain of the British colonies, gave in the annexed counter projet on that subject, in reference to what had passed at the preceding conference, observing at the same time that the first two articles of the proposal communicated by the American plenipotentiary in their third conference with him had, in their opinion, no necessary connexion with the third, relating to the navigation of the river St. Lawrence, and that they conceived it would be more convenient to treat of them separately.

Protocol of the seventeenth conference of the American and British plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, June 15, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The British plenipotentiaries stated that, in pursuance of the proposals of the American Government, they were ready to enter into stipulations for settling by compromise the several questions which had arisen under the 5th article of the treaty of Ghent; and that, agreeably to the disposition which they had expressed in a former conference to treat of the navigation of the river St. Lawrence by vessels of the United States on principles of accommodation and mutual concession, they now proposed to negotiate on that subject in connexion with the said questions which affect the boundary of the British and American territories throughout the region contiguous to that part of the St. Lawrence which flows exclusively through his Majesty's dominions. They intimated, at the same time, that the course which they proposed in this manner to pursue was founded on the understanding that the navigation of the St. Lawrence throughout his Majesty's territories was not to be claimed by the United States as a right; and this intimation they accompanied with an exposition of the very decided opinion entertained by their Government against such an absolute, independent claim.

The American plenipotentiary said that he was not able to go into the proposed negotiation, as relating to the St. Lawrence, on the principle of concession, but, on the contrary, that his instructions imposed upon him the obligation of pressing the claim of the United States to the entire navigation of that river expressly on the ground of independent right, and that he conceived it would be his duty, in asserting that claim, to enter it so grounded on the protocol of the conferences.

It was agreed, however, that it would be convenient, on the whole, to postpone any decided step thereupon until the ensuing conference.

Protocol of the eighteenth conference of the American and British plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, June 19, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The American plenipotentiary, referring to that conference, stated that he felt himself bound to present the claim of the United States to a concurrent enjoyment of the navigation of the river St. Lawrence from its source to the sea, on the express ground of independent right. He said that he had, indeed, been left at liberty to exercise his judgment as to the time and manner of presenting that claim, but he was positively instructed to urge it in the course of the negotiations in the above decided sense of right; that otherwise, he should have been obliged to prefer the same claim by direct application to the Foreign Department. It was in discharge of the duty thus imposed upon him that he gave in the annexed paper, (marked B,) containing a distinct exposition of the views and principles on which the above mentioned claim of the American Government was sustained.

The British plenipotentiaries, on receiving this declaration and written argument from Mr. Rush, observed that it became their duty to deny, and they did therefore deny, in explicit terms, the right so claimed on behalf of the United States to navigate, in common with British subjects, that part of the river St. Lawrence which flows exclusively through his Majesty's territories. They added, that they could not conceal the surprise which they felt at learning that such a right was to be asserted by the American Government, especially as it must necessarily have the effect of tying up their hands with respect to the instructions which they had received from their Government on a very different apprehension of the subject, and which they had no hesitation in describing as founded on a most liberal and comprehensive view of the wishes and interests of the United States, with respect to the disputed points of the boundary line under the 5th article of the treaty of Ghent, no less than as touching the navigation of the St. Lawrence, which they had considered, on the principle of accommodation and mutual concession, as supplying additional means for the satisfactory adjustment of those disputed points by negotiation and compromise.

The American plenipotentiary, in supporting the claim of his Government, averred that it was not put forward in any unfriendly spirit, but with reference to such of the national interests as were immediately concerned in the question, and that it was subject, of course, to the operation of further discussion between the two Governments, and a frank communication of their respective sentiments.

Protocol of the nineteenth conference of the American and British plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, June 26, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The British plenipotentiaries stated that, having considered the declaration made by Mr. Rush in that conference concerning the independent right of the United States to the entire navigation of the river St. Lawrence, and the written argument which he had annexed to the protocol in support of that right, they felt themselves called upon to communicate, in a manner equally explicit and formal, the ground on which their Government denied a right of the description asserted on the part of the United States. They added that, although the opinions which they had already declared on that point were unchanged, they thought it due to the gravity and importance of the question not to give in their reply to the American argument until it had received the full sanction of the highest professional authorities in the country on matters relating to the law of nations. For the accomplishment of this object, an interval of some days was obviously requisite, and therefore, to delay as little as possible the progress of the negotiations, they proposed to pass on, for the present, to the questions of boundary on the Northwest Coast of America.

The American plenipotentiary said that any delay, as to the question of the St. Lawrence, did not, in his opinion, affect the points to be adjusted under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, and that he desired to proceed at once to the conclusion of an agreement by which those points should be referred to a direct negotiation between the two Governments, as before proposed by him. But, as it appeared, on discussing these matters, that Mr. Rush was authorized only to take ad referendum any counter proposals of the British Government on the above mentioned points, (whether those counter proposals conveyed any positive terms of compromise, or only such arrangements as the British plenipotentiaries conceived must necessarily accompany the mere agreement to settle the points at issue by compromise,) and that his instructions would not allow of his concluding anything at present with the British plenipotentiaries as to the various preparatory steps indispensable for carrying the disputed points of the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent before an arbitrator, if arbitration should be found, after all, to be inevitable, it was finally agreed that the plenipotentiaries should meet again on the 29th instant, in order to communicate definitively on the subject of the northwest boundary.

Protocol of the twentieth conference of the American and British plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, June 29, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The British plenipotentiaries stated and explained at length the sentiments of their Government with respect to the conflicting claims of Great Britain and the United States to the territories in North America lying between the Rocky mountains and the Pacific Ocean. They declined the proposal made on this subject by the American plenipotentiary, and annexed to the twelfth protocol, because it would substantially have the effect of limiting the claims of their Government to a degree inconsistent, as they thought, with the credit and just interests of the nation. After much discussion and mutual explanation of the claims on each side, when taken in their full extent, it was agreed that, following the example given by the American plenipotentiary in his proposal, it would be advisable to attempt a settlement on terms of mutual convenience, setting aside for that purpose the discordant principles on which the respective claims were founded. Whereupon the British plenipotentiaries stated, in general terms, that they were ready either to agree on a boundary line, to be drawn due west from the Rocky mountains along the 49th parallel of latitude to the northeasternmost branch of the Columbia or Oregon river, and thence down the middle of that river to the ocean, or to leave the third article of the convention of 1818 to its natural course. The American plenipotentiary, in remarking upon this boundary, declared his utter inability to accede to it, but, finding that the line offered in his former proposal was considered wholly inadmissible by the British plenipotentiaries, said that, in the hope of adjusting the question, he would so far vary his former line to the south as to consent that it should be the forty-ninth instead of the fifty-first degree of north latitude.

In the course of the conference the American plenipotentiary stated that he was instructed to insist on the principle that no part of the American continent was henceforward to be open to colonization from Europe. To explain this principle, he stated that the independence of the late Spanish provinces precluded any new settlement within the limits of their respective jurisdictions; that the United States claimed the exclusive sovereignty of all the territory within the parallels of latitude which include as well the mouth of the Columbia as the heads of that river and of all its tributary streams; and that with respect to the whole of the remainder of that continent not actually occupied, the powers of Europe were debarred from making new settlements by the claim of the United States as derived under their title from Spain.

The British plenipotentiaries asserted, in utter denial of the above principle, that they considered the unoccupied parts of America just as much open as heretofore to colonization by Great Britain, as well as by other European powers, agreeably to the convention of 1790 between the British and Spanish Governments, and that the United States would have no right whatever to take umbrage at the establishment of new colonies from Europe in any such parts of the American continent.

The British plenipotentiaries added, that they felt themselves more particularly called upon to express their distinct denial of the principle and claims thus set forth by the American plenipotentiary, as his claim respecting the territory watered by the river Columbia and its tributary streams, besides being essentially objectionable in its general bearing, had the effect of interfering directly with the actual rights of Great Britain, derived from use, occupancy, and settlement.

Protocol of the twenty-first conference of the American and British plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, July 3, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The questions of maritime law were taken up. The British plenipotentiaries stated, with reference to Mr. Rush's communication on this head, as recorded in the protocol of the thirteenth conference, that the sentiments of their Government respecting the impressment of British seamen in time of war were unchanged; and that however anxious they were to reconcile the eventual exercise of that right on the high seas with the convenience and feelings of other nations, they could not, consistently with their duty, agree to waive it with respect to the vessels of the United States, except on receiving a full and efficient security that the end for which it was occasionally resorted to should be substantially attained by other satisfactory means; that having been informed by the American plenipotentiary that he had to propose no measures for effecting this important object essentially differing from those which in former negotiations had been found inadequate, they could not but concur with him in the opinion that any discussion of the question at the present moment of general tranquillity would be altogether inadvisable.

With regard to the other maritime questions affecting the relations of neutral and belligerent powers, the British plenipotentiaries observed that, as the American plenipotentiary was not prepared to enter into stipulations respecting them, except in conjunction with the subject of impressment, which subject was not to be entered into for the reasons above stated, the discussion of these questions, under the present circumstances, would obviously be attended with no practical utility.

They expressed themselves willing, at the same time, to treat on other points not falling under this head, but connected with the improvement of friendly intercourse and good neighborhood already subsisting between the two countries, if the American plenipotentiary felt himself at liberty to entertain proposals founded on this principle.

The American plenipotentiary expressed his readiness to receive and transmit to his Government any suggestions of this description, but stated that he was not prepared to propose or definitively accept any stipulations of such a nature, except in conjunction with an arrangement as to the maritime questions.

Protocol of the twenty-second conference of the American and British plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, July 9, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over, and, after some discussion, signed.

The American plenipotentiary stated that the question of abolishing private war, and all capture of private property at sea, was considered by him as standing apart from the other questions of maritime law, which had been heretofore discussed between the two Governments, inasmuch as it was perfectly new, and had been proposed by his Government to other European powers as well as to Great Britain; and he wished it to be understood that he was ready to treat on that question alone, notwithstanding the decision already taken upon the other questions of maritime war.

The British plenipotentiaries said, in reply to this statement, that under the circumstances which prevented any present discussion of the questions of maritime law discussed in former negotiations, there would be manifest inconvenience in now going into a question of the same class, which, besides being totally new as an object of discussion, involved a most extensive change in the principles and practice of maritime war as hitherto sanctioned by the usage of all nations.

The British plenipotentiaries, adverting to the other points not falling under the head of maritime law, but connected with the improvement of friendly intercourse and good neighborhood between the two nations, on which, in the preceding conference, they had offered to treat independently, communicated the substance of nine articles which they had been prepared to give in if the American plenipotentiary had felt himself at liberty to conclude an arrangement on them, and on which they declared themselves still ready to enter into stipulations with the Government of the United States.

Protocol of the twenty-third conference of the American and British plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, July 13, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The British plenipotentiaries, in more complete explanation of the statement made by them in the twentieth conference, gave in an article comprising the counter proposals of their Government as to the northwest boundary in America from the Rocky mountains to the Pacific Ocean. They observed, at the same time, that, if their article were accepted in substance by the American Government, it would be necessary, on framing it into a convention, to give its details and accompanying arrangements a more distinct and expanded shape. They added that, in making the annexed proposal, they had departed considerably from the full extent of the British right, agreeably to the readiness which they had before expressed to settle the northwest boundary on grounds of fair compromise and mutual accommodation.

The American plenipotentiary, in receiving the above article from the British plenipotentiaries, remarked, that he wished it also to be understood that, in proposing a modification of the article originally submitted by him on this subject, he had been governed by the same view.

The American plenipotentiary introduced the question of allowing United States consuls to reside in the British colonial ports, and requesting to be made acquainted with the sentiments of the British Government thereon.

The British plenipotentiaries referred, in reply, to the counter proposals which they had already given in on the subject of colonial intercourse, of which proposals the reception of American consuls formed a distinct part.

Mr. Rush observed that the residence of foreign consuls in any country did not appear so much to depend on any particular set of commercial regulations as to belong essentially to trade, under whatever form it might be carried on; and he supported this observation by arguments connected with the protection of merchants trading under any lawful circumstances with a foreign country.

The British plenipotentiaries agreed to take this suggestion into consideration before the next conference.

Protocol of the twenty-fourth conference of the American and British plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, July 19, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The British plenipotentiaries gave in the annexed paper in reply to the argument relating to the free navigation of the river St. Lawrence, given in by the American plenipotentiary at a preceding conference, and, in like manner, annexed by him to the protocol.

The British plenipotentiaries, referring to what had passed at the preceding conference on the subject of receiving United States consuls in his Majesty's open colonial ports, stated that, although they saw no objection to the admission into those colonies of foreign consuls, subject to the usual exceptions and reservations, while foreign vessels were in the practice of carrying on a lawful trade with the colonial ports, they conceived that there would be inconvenience in actually recognizing such appointments there so long as it was uncertain, not only whether the proposals which they had given in on the subject of colonial intercourse would be accepted by the American Government, but even whether the trade now carried on between the United States and his Majesty's colonies would not be so clogged with additional burdens as to lead to its total interruption.

Protocol of the twenty-fifth conference of the American and British plenipotentiaries, held at the Board of Trade, July 22, 1824.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The American plenipotentiary, referring to the reply given in by the British plenipotentiaries to his argument on the navigation of the river St. Lawrence, and annexed to the protocol of the preceding conference, made observations tending, in his opinion, to sustain the view which he had before presented of that subject.

It was agreed, in consideration of the numerous and complicated questions on which the conferences had turned, that the plenipotentiaries should meet again and communicate with each other prior to sending in to the respective Governments their final reports of the present state of the negotiations, suspended by the necessity of referring to Washington on some of the subjects which had been presented for discussion.

Present: Mr. Rush, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Stratford Canning.

The protocol of the preceding conference was read over and signed.

The plenipotentiaries, after communicating with each other in pursuance of the agreement taken at the preceding conference, and persuaded that they had sufficiently developed the sentiments of their respective Governments on the various subjects of their conferences, separated under the circumstances which necessarily prevented, for the present, any further progress in the negotiations.

I. Whereas, by the trade as it now exists under the respective laws and regulations of the two high contracting parties between certain enumerated ports of his Britannic Majesty's colonies in America and the West Indies and the ports of the United States, discriminating duties and charges are reciprocally imposed and levied upon the vessels and cargoes of each nation in the ports of the other as aforesaid; and whereas it is the desire of the contracting parties, for the reciprocal advantage of their subjects and citizens, to abolish all such discriminating duties and charges: it is therefore agreed that, upon the vessels of the United States admitted by law into all and every one of his Britannic Majesty's colonial ports as aforesaid, and upon any goods, wares, and merchandise lawfully imported therein in the said vessels, no other or higher duties of tonnage or impost, and no other charges of any kind shall be levied or exacted, than upon British vessels, including all vessels of the colonies themselves, or upon the like goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the said colonial ports from any other port or place whatever, including Great Britain and the colonial ports themselves. And that upon the vessels of Great Britain admitted by law into all and every one of the ports of the United States, and upon any goods, wares, and merchandise lawfully imported therein in the said vessels, no other or higher duties of tonnage or impost, and no other charges of any kind shall be levied or exacted than upon vessels of the United States, including vessels of each and every one of the said States, or upon the like goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the United States from any other port or place whatever.

II. For the more perfect fulfilment of the intentions of the high contracting parties, as expressed in the foregoing article, it is agreed that the trade to which it has reference shall continue on the footing upon which it now stands by the laws and regulations of the two countries, respectively, with the exception of the removal by Great Britain of the duties specified in the schedule C of the act of Parliament passed on the twenty-fourth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, in the third year of his present Majesty's reign, chapter forty-four, and those specified in schedule B of the act of Parliament passed on the fifth day of August, in the same year and reign, chapter one hundred and nineteen; and of the removal by the United States of all additional duties of tonnage in the light of foreign tonnage duty, and of all additional duties of impost in the light of foreign impost, existing against British vessels and merchandise coming to the United States from any of the colonial ports aforesaid. And the high contracting parties pledge themselves to remove reciprocally the duties herein recapitulated, as well as all other discriminating duties and charges of whatever kind they may be, intended by this and the foregoing article to be removed, it being the desire and intention of the parties to place the aforesaid trade upon a footing of perfect equality in all respects.

III. It is agreed by the high contracting parties that the navigation of the river St. Lawrence shall be at all times free to the citizens of the United States as to the subjects of Great Britain, in its whole breadth and length to and from the sea, and that the vessels belonging to either party shall not be stopped, visited, or subjected to any let, impediment, or hindrance whatsoever by the other; nor shall they be liable to the payment of any duty whatever for this right of passage on the said river. But respecting such moderate and reasonable tolls as either party may claim and appear entitled to, the high contracting parties agree to treat at a future day, that the principles regulating the same may be adjusted to mutual satisfaction.

Paper on the Commercial Intercourse Question, from the British plenipotentiaries.

The British plenipotentiaries present the following remarks on the articles of colonial intercourse, proposed by the American plenipotentiary at his third conference with them:

The first two articles have no necessary connexion with the third, which relates to the navigation of the river St. Lawrence; and the British plenipotentiaries are of opinion that it is more convenient to treat of them separately.

The proposal contained in the two articles on colonial intercourse is, in substance, as follows: The trade between the United States and his Majesty's colonies in North America and the West Indies to continue, as at present, regulated by the respective acts of Parliament and Congress, except that all discriminating charges on alien vessels and their cargoes concerned in that trade should be withdrawn on both sides; and further, that all articles of United States produce should be admitted into the colonies exactly on the same terms as the like productions of the colonies themselves or of the mother country.

To all but the last clause of this proposal the British Government are willing to consent. To that condition they decidedly object.

The objectionable condition amounts to no less than a stipulation that Great Britain shall renounce, in favor of the United States, and without a return on their side, the power of protecting the staples of her own subjects by levying import duties on the like productions of a foreign country.

In principle such a proposition is evidently inadmissible. It could not be entertained with credit by any power on which it was calculated to operate exclusively. It is directly at variance with the practice of all commercial, of all civilized States. It has no precedent in the commercial relations subsisting between the British dominions in Europe and the United States.

The specific grounds alleged in support of it by the American plenipotentiary are, in the opinion of the British Government, wholly insufficient for that purpose.

They are understood to be, in effect: First. That American vessels are subject to an export duty in the British West Indies to which British vessels are not equally liable. Second. That, while all the ports of the United States are open to British vessels, only certain enumerated ports of the British colonies are open to vessels of the United States. Third. That American vessels are confined to a direct trade between the place of export and the place of import, while British vessels labor under no such restriction. Fourth. That the British vessels, though confined to the same enumerated articles as the American in the direct trade, are not so confined in trading from colony to colony or with the ports of the mother country. Fifth. That while all articles of British colonial produce are admitted into the United States, many important articles of American produce are excluded from the British West Indies; and Sixth. That on these articles of American produce which are admitted into the British colonies import duties are levied, or, at least, that higher import duties are levied than on the like articles produced in his Majesty's dominions.

These several allegations are met in detail by the following specific statements:

First. The export duty complained of is a duty of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. levied in some of the Leeward Islands on the produce of those islands, whether exported in British or in American vessels, and equally whether exported to Great Britain or to foreign countries.

Second. The colonial ports opened by act of Parliament to foreign vessels from America are all those in which custom-houses are established.

Third. The American Congress has passed an act confining British vessels to a direct trade under bond, in the very same manner as American vessels are restricted by the British act of Parliament, and even to a greater degree.

Fourth. The liberty of trading between colony and colony, as well as within the mother country, enjoyed exclusively by British vessels in this trade, is no other than a part of the coasting trade, which every Government secures to its own subjects. The Americans enjoy a like advantage on their side; and the British are not allowed, on the same principle, to carry on trade between the several ports and States of the American Union.

Fifth. The exclusion of certain articles of American produce, such as salt fish, from the West India market, is no other than what already exists in the trade between Great Britain and the United States, comprising other foreign countries. It is by no means peculiar to the colonial intercourse. The rum and molasses of the British West Indies are, in point of fact, but barely admitted to the market of the United States.

Sixth. The protecting duties levied in the British West Indies on the flour, lumber, &c., of the United States are absolutely necessary to afford the inhabitants of his Majesty's North American provinces a chance of sending their superfluous produce to market on equal terms with the citizens of the United States. These latter enjoy great natural advantages over their northern competitors by reason of the open climate and comparative vicinity of their country to the West India Islands. The sugar of the British West Indies, their principal export, has, besides, to pay in the United States an import duty proportionally higher than the duty levied on American flour in the ports of the British colonies.

On the specific grounds, then, alleged by the American plenipotentiary, the above mentioned stipulation cannot be accepted by Great Britain without injustice to her own subjects, any more than it can be accepted by her on general principles, without prejudice to her character as an independent commercial power. Much as the British Government are disposed to cherish and improve their relations of commerce and good neighborhood with the United States, such sacrifices cannot, in fairness, be expected, even for the sake of those objects.

Still less are they to be expected, when the statements of the British Government, in answer to those of the American, are fully borne out by the state, as hitherto ascertained, of the trade carried on under the respective laws of the two countries.

There is reason to suppose that about two-thirds of the flour and lumber received from North America by the British West Indies are produced by the United States; and it is not too much to say that even seven-eighths of that quantity are conveyed to the market in American vessels, while even upon the return trade it appears that American vessels enjoy a share not greatly inferior to that proportion.

Under these circumstances the British plenipotentiaries can only accept the articles on commercial intercourse tendered to them by the American plenipotentiary, with the omission of the stipulation already specified.

With every disposition to remove unnecessary obstructions from the trade, and to keep the protecting duties within fair and moderate bounds, no difference whatever being made in point of duties and charges between American and British vessels, whether belonging to the colonies or to Great Britain, it is impossible for the British Government to admit a condition which would expose their North American provinces to a total exclusion from the West India market, and that, as they conceive, without any equivalent concession being proposed on the part of the United States.

The British plenipotentiaries are ready, at the same time, to enter into stipulations, not only for removing all alien charges whatever from the vessels and their cargoes, as such, of both parties, in the United States on one side, and in the enumerated British colonies on the other, but also for extending to the United States, eventually, and in consideration of a fair return from them, any further advantages in that trade which, in the progress of events, Great Britain may find it safe or desirable to concede to any other foreign nation or State in the trade between her colonies and its possessions. In making this contingent agreement, it would be the intention of the British Government to apply, in proportion as circumstances might allow, to the trade between his Majesty's open colonies and the United States the same principle already adopted in the convention of 1815, namely, of placing each party, with respect to imports and exports, on the footing of the most favored nation; and, in the same spirit, there would be no objection to giving a suitable extension to the fourth article of the commercial convention respecting consuls.

Act of Parliament on reciprocity of duties and commercial treaty between Great Britain and Prussia.

ANNO QUINTO GEORGH IV. REGIS.

CAP. I. An act to indemnify all persons concerned in advising, issuing, or acting under a certain order in council for regulating the tonnage duties on certain foreign vessels, and to amend an act of the last session of Parliament for authorizing his Majesty, under certain circumstances, to regulate the duties and drawbacks on goods imported or exported in any foreign vessels.

MARCH 5, 1824.

Whereas, by an act passed in the last session of Parliament, intituled An act to authorize his Majesty, under certain circumstances, to regulate the duties and drawbacks on goods imported or exported in foreign vessels, and to exempt certain vessels from pilotage, his Majesty is authorized, by and with the advice of his privy council, or by his Majesty's order or orders in council, whenever it shall be deemed expedient, and under the provisions in the said act contained, to levy and charge any additional duty or duties of customs upon any goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the United Kingdom, or into any of his Majesty's dominions, in vessels belonging to any foreign country, in which higher duties shall have been levied upon goods, wares, or merchandise when imported into such foreign country in British vessels, than are levied or granted upon similar goods, wares, or merchandise when imported in vessels of such country; provided that such additional duties shall not be of greater amount than may be deemed fairly to countervail the difference of duty paid or granted on goods, wares, or merchandise imported into or exported from such foreign country in British vessels, more than the duties there charged upon similar goods, wares, or merchandise imported into or exported from such foreign country in vessels of such country; and whereas his Majesty, by and with the advice of his privy council, since the passing of the said recited act, has been pleased to order that there should be charged on all vessels of the United States of America which should enter any of the ports of his Majesty's possessions in America or the West Indies with articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the said States, a tonnage duty equal (as nearly as may be) to the difference between the tonnage duty payable by vessels of the United States, and the higher tonnage duty payable by British vessels entering any of the ports of the said United States from any ports of his Majesty's dominions in America or the West Indies; and by the said order in council the Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland were required to give the necessary directions accordingly: and whereas such tonnage duty hath been and may be levied and paid upon and in respect of such vessels accordingly: and whereas doubts have arisen how far the provisions of the said recited act extend to the levying, by the authority of the said order in council, additional tonnage duties upon the vessels aforesaid; and it is expedient that all proceedings under the said order in council should be sanctioned by Parliament; and that all persons concerned in advising, issuing, or carrying the same into execution should be respectively indemnified:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords, Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That such order in council, and any directions or warrants of the said Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury accordingly, shall be deemed and taken to be good and valid in law, to all intents and purposes whatever, as if the same had been specifically authorized by the said recited act; and that all persons concerned in advising, issuing, or carrying into execution such order in council, or in issuing, giving, or advising any such directions or warrants, and also all persons having acted, or who may act under or in pursuance of, or in obedience to any such order, direction, or warrant, shall be, and they are hereby, respectively indemnified for and on account of the same, and of any act or thing done in pursuance of, or in obedience to, or in conformity with any such order, direction, or warrant as aforesaid, as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes whatsoever, as if any such order, direction, or warrant had been given, and such acts, matters, and things had been done, in pursuance of any act or acts of Parliament; anything in the said recited act, or in any other act or acts of Parliament, to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding.

II. And be it further enacted, That if any action, suit, or prosecution hath been or shall be commenced against any person or persons for any act, matter, or thing advised or done under such order in council, or under any such directions or warrants as aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful for the defendants or defenders in such actions, suits, or prosecutions, respectively, in whatever courts such actions, suits, or prosecutions shall have been commenced, to apply to such court or courts, respectively, to stay all proceedings therein respectively, by motion, in a summary way; and such court or courts are hereby required to make order for that purpose accordingly; and the court or courts making such order shall award and allow to the defendant or defenders, respectively, double costs of suit, for which they shall respectively have the like remedy as in cases where costs are by law given to defendants or defenders.

III. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passing of this act it shall and may be lawful to and for his Majesty, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, or by his Majesty's order or orders in council, to be published from time to time in the London Gazette, (whenever it shall be deemed expedient,) to levy and charge any additional or countervailing duty or duties of tonnage upon or in respect of any vessels which shall enter any of the ports in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or in any of his Majesty's dominions, and which shall belong to any foreign country in which any duties of tonnage shall have been or shall be levied upon or in respect of British vessels entering the ports of such country higher or greater than are levied or granted upon or in respect of the vessels of such country: Provided always, That such additional or countervailing tonnage duties, so to be levied and charged as aforesaid, shall not be of greater amount than may be deemed fairly to countervail the difference of duty paid in such foreign country upon or in respect of the tonnage of British vessels more than the duty there charged or granted upon or in respect of the vessels of such country.

IV. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passing of this act it shall and may be lawful to and for his Majesty, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, or by his Majesty's order or orders in council, to be published from time to time in the London Gazette, to permit and authorize the entry into any port or ports of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of any other of his Majesty's dominions, of any foreign vessels, upon payment of such and the like duties of tonnage only as are or may be charged or granted upon or in respect of similar British vessels: Provided always, That before any such order or orders shall be issued, satisfactory proof shall have been laid before his Majesty and his Privy Council that vessels of the foreign country in whose favor such permission shall be granted are charged with no other or higher tonnage duties on their entrance into the ports of such foreign country than are levied on the entry into such ports upon the vessels of such country.

V. And be it further enacted, That such additional or countervailing tonnage duties shall be levied, recovered, and applied in such and the like manner as any duties of customs are now by law levied, recovered, and applied.

VI. And be it further enacted, That his Majesty, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, or by any order or orders in council, as aforesaid, is hereby empowered to remove or again to impose any such additional or countervailing tonnage duties whenever it shall be deemed expedient so to do.

VII. Provided always, and be it enacted, That this act may be altered, varied, or repealed by any act or acts of this present session of Parliament.

Convention of Commerce between his Britannic Majesty and the King of Prussia.

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and his Majesty the King of Prussia, being equally desirous of extending and increasing the commercial intercourse between their respective States, and of affording every facility and encouragement to their subjects engaged in such intercourse, and being of opinion that nothing will more contribute to the attainment of their mutual wishes in this respect than a reciprocal abrogation of all discriminating and countervailing duties which are now demanded and levied upon the ships or productions of either nation in the ports of the other, have appointed their plenipotentiaries to conclude a convention for that purpose, that is to say: His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Right Honorable George Canning, a member of his said Majesty's most honorable Privy Council, a member of Parliament, and his said Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and the Right Honorable William Huskisson, a member of his said Majesty's most honorable Privy Council, a member of Parliament, President of the Committee of Privy Council for Affairs of Trade and Foreign Plantations, and Treasurer of his said Majesty's Navy; and his Majesty the King of Prussia, the Baron de Werther, his said Majesty's Chamberlain, and his Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of his Britannic Majesty; who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. From and after the 1st day of May next Prussian vessels, entering or departing from the ports of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and British vessels, entering or departing from the ports of his Prussian Majesty's dominions, shall not be subject to any other or higher duties or charges whatever than are or shall be levied on national vessels entering or departing from such ports, respectively.

ARTICLE 2. All articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any of the dominions of either of the high contracting parties which are or shall be permitted to be imported into, or exported from, the ports of the United Kingdom and of Prussia, respectively, in vessels of the one country, shall, in like manner, be permitted to be imported into, and exported from, those ports in vessels of the other.

ARTICLE 3. All articles not of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the dominions of his Britannic Majesty, which can legally be imported from the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland into the ports of Prussia in British ships, shall be subject only to the same duties as are payable upon the like articles if imported in Prussian ships; and the same reciprocity shall be observed in the ports of the United Kingdom in respect to all articles not the growth, produce, or manufacture of the dominions of his Prussian Majesty which can legally be imported into the ports of the United Kingdom in Prussian ships.

ARTICLE 4. All goods, wares, and merchandise which can legally be imported into the ports of either country shall be admitted at the same rate of duty, whether imported in vessels of the other country or in national vessels; and all goods, wares, or merchandise which can be legally exported from the ports of either country shall be entitled to the same bounties, drawbacks, and allowances, whether exported in vessels of the other country or in national vessels.

ARTICLE 5. No priority or preference shall be given, directly or indirectly, by the Government of either country, or by any company, corporation, or agent, acting on its behalf, or under its authority, in the purchase of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of either country, imported into the other, on account of, or in reference to, the character of the vessel in which such article was imported, it being the true intent and meaning of the high contracting parties that no distinction or difference whatever shall be made in this respect.

ARTICLE 6. The present convention shall be in force for the term of ten years from the date hereof; and further, until the end of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its intention to terminate the same, each of the high contracting parties reserving to itself the right of giving such notice to the other at the end of the said term of ten years; and it is hereby agreed between them that, at the expiration of twelve months after such notice shall have been received by either party from the other, this convention and all the provisions thereof shall altogether cease and determine.

ARTICLE 7. The present convention shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at London within one month from the date hereof, or sooner, if possible.

In witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the same, and have affixed thereto the seals of their arms. Done at London, the second day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four.

British counter projet on Commercial Intercourse, (Sixteenth Protocol.)

His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, being desirous to regulate, by mutual agreement, and on principles of just reciprocity, the trade now open under their respective laws between the United States and the British colonies in North America and the West Indies, have appointed plenipotentiaries to negotiate and conclude a convention for that purpose: that is to say, on the part of his Britannic Majesty ———, and on the part of the United States of America ———; which plenipotentiaries, after duly communicating to each other their respective full powers, found to be in proper form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE I. The subjects of his Britannic Majesty and the citizens of the United States shall continue to have liberty to trade between the ports of those States and the open ports of his Majesty's possessions in North America and the West Indies under the existing laws and regulations of the high contracting parties.

And whereas it is considered mutually advantageous to the subjects and citizens of both parties that all discriminating duties and charges reciprocally imposed and levied on the vessels of each nation and their cargoes in the ports of the other, as aforesaid, should be withdrawn and altogether abolished, it is hereby agreed that upon the vessels of the United States admitted by law into all and every one of his Britannic Majesty's colonial ports, as aforesaid, and upon any goods, wares, or merchandise lawfully imported therein in the said vessels, no other or higher duties of tonnage or impost, and no other charges of any kind, shall be levied or exacted than upon British vessels, including all vessels of the colonies themselves, or upon the like goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the said colonial ports from any other foreign port or place whatever; and likewise, that upon the vessels of Great Britain and of her colonies admitted by law into all and every one of the ports of the United States, and upon any goods, wares, or merchandise lawfully imported therein in the said vessels, no other or higher duties of tonnage or impost, and no other charges of any kind, shall be levied or exacted than upon vessels of the United States, including all vessels of each and every one of the said States, or upon the like goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the United States from any other foreign port or place whatever.

ARTICLE II. For the more perfect fulfilment of the intentions of the high contracting parties, they pledge themselves hereby to remove, with as little delay as possible, his Britannic Majesty on his side, and the United States on their side, all additional duties of tonnage in the light of foreign tonnage duty, and all additional duties of import in the light of duties on goods imported in foreign vessels, at present existing, either against the vessels of the United States and their cargoes, admitted by law into any of the British colonial ports as aforesaid, or against British vessels and their cargoes, admitted by law into the ports of the United States, as well as all other discriminating duties and charges of whatever kind they may be, intended by this and the foregoing article to be removed and altogether abolished.

ARTICLE III. It being the desire and intention of the high contracting parties to place the trade in question on a footing of just reciprocity, they further agree that, in case of any of the existing enactments on either side regulating the navigation in this trade shall, contrary to expectation, be found, on further experience, to operate partially, and in such manner as to give to the subjects or citizens of the one party engaged therein a clear and decided advantage, to the manifest prejudice of the subjects or citizens of the other, in opposition to the intention above declared, each of the two Governments shall, in such case, and according as the case may be, receive and examine the representations made to it thereon by the other, and, the complaints being fairly substantiated, shall lose no time in adopting such additional laws and regulations as may correct the grievance complained of, in conformity with the principle herein laid down.

ARTICLE IV. The high contracting parties being further desirous to promote and extend this trade in proportion as circumstances may from time to time allow, his Britannic Majesty, on his part, engages that whatever facility or advantage may hereafter be granted to any friendly State, either in Europe or in America, with respect to any commerce, direct or circuitous, to be carried on between such State and his Majesty's colonies in the West Indies or America, shall be in like manner granted to the citizens of the United States; and the United States, on their part, engage that, under this contingency, the subjects of his Majesty shall enjoy whatever facilities or advantages may at any time be granted by them to the subjects or citizens of the most favored State in any trade carried on between the possessions of that State in the West Indies or America and the United States.

ARTICLE V. In consideration of the foregoing arrangements, his Britannic Majesty consents that the Government of the United States shall be at liberty to appoint consuls in his Majesty's open colonial ports in North America and the West Indies, and that consuls so appointed on their behalf shall be received under the same conditions as those which are stipulated in the fourth article of the convention of commerce concluded in London on the 3d July, 1815.

ARTICLE VI. The ratifications of this convention, &c., &c.

American paper on the Navigation of the St. Lawrence, (Eighteenth Protocol.)

The right of the people of the United States to navigate the river St. Lawrence to and from the sea has never yet been discussed between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain. If it has not been distinctly asserted by the former in negotiation hitherto, it is because the benefits of it have been tacitly enjoyed, and because the interest, now become so great and daily acquiring fresh magnitude, has, it may almost be said, originated since the acknowledgment of the independence of the United States in 1783. This river is the only outlet provided by nature for the inhabitants of several among the largest and most populous States of the American Union. Their right to use it as a medium of communication with the ocean rests upon the same ground of natural right and obvious necessity heretofore asserted by the Government in behalf of the people of other portions of the United States in relation to the river Mississippi. It has sometimes been said that the possession by one nation of both the shores of a river at its mouth gives the right of obstructing the navigation of it to the people of other nations living on the banks above; but it remains to be shown upon what satisfactory grounds the assumption by the nation below, of exclusive jurisdiction over a river thus situated, can be placed. The common right to navigate it is, on the other hand, a right of nature. This is a principle which, it is conceived, will be found to have the sanction of the most revered authorities of ancient and modern times; and if there have been temporary occasions when it has been questioned, it is not known that the reasons upon which it rests, as developed in the most approved works upon public law, have ever been impugned. As a general principle it stands unshaken. The dispute relative to the Schelde, in 1784, is perhaps the occasion when the argument drawn from natural right was most attempted to be impeached. Here the circumstances were altogether peculiar. Amongst others, it is known to have been alleged by the Dutch that the whole course of the two branches of this river, which passed within the dominions of Holland, was entirely artificial; that it owed its existence to the skill and labor of Dutchmen; that its banks had been reared up at immense cost, and were in like manner maintained. Hence, probably, the motive for that stipulation in the treaty of Munster, which had continued for more than a century, that the Lower Schelde, with the canals of Sas and Swin, and other mouths of the sea bordering upon them, should be kept closed on the side belonging to the States. But the case of the St. Lawrence is totally different. Special, also, as seemed the grounds which the Dutch took as against the Emperor of Germany in this case of the Schelde, and although they also stood upon a specific and positive compact of long duration, it is nevertheless known that the public voice of Europe on this part of the dispute preponderated against them. It may well have done so, since there is no sentiment more deeply and universally felt than that the ocean is free to all men, and the waters that flow into it to those whose home is upon their shores. In nearly every part of the world we find this natural right acknowledged by laying navigable rivers open to all the inhabitants of their banks; and wherever the stream, entering the limits of another society or nation, has been interdicted to the upper inhabitants, it has been an act of force by a stronger against a weaker party, and condemned by the judgment of mankind. The right of the upper inhabitants to the full use of the stream rests upon the same imperious wants as that of the lower—upon the same intrinsic necessity of participating in the benefits of this flowing element. Rivers were given for the use of all persons living in the country of which they make a part, and a primary use of navigable ones is that of external commerce. The public good of nations is the object of the law of nations, as that of individuals is of municipal law. The interest of a part gives way to that of the whole; the particular to the general. The former is subordinate; the latter paramount. This is the principle pervading every code, national or municipal, whose basis is laid in moral right, and whose aim is the universal good. All that can be required under a principle so incontestable, so wise, and, in its permanent results upon the great fabric of human society, so beneficent, is, that reasonable compensation be made whenever the general good calls for partial sacrifices, whether from individuals in a local jurisdiction, or from one nation considered as an integral part of the family of nations. This is accordingly done in the case of roads and the right of way in single communities, and is admitted to be just in the form of moderate tolls where a foreign passage takes place through a natural current kept in repair by the nation holding its shores below. The latter predicament is not supposed to be that of the St. Lawrence at this day, since it is not known that any artificial constructions, looking simply to its navigation, have yet been employed either upon its banks or in keeping the channel clear. This has been the case, in connexion with other facilities and protection afforded to navigation, with the Elbe, the Maese, the Weser, the Oder, and various other rivers of Europe that might be named, and the incidental right of toll has followed.

It may be mentioned, however, as a fact, under this head, that the prevailing disposition of Europe defeated an attempt once made by Denmark to exact a toll at the mouth of the Elbe, by means of a fort on the Holstein side, which commanded it. The Sound dues have been admitted in favor of Denmark, but not always without scrutiny, and only under well established rules. We know that, under some circumstances, and with due precautions, a right is even allowed to armies to pass through a neutral territory for the destructive purposes of war. How much stronger and more unqualified the right to seek a passage through a natural stream for the useful and innocent purposes of commerce and subsistence? A most authentic and unequivocal confirmation of this doctrine has been afforded at a recent epoch by the parties to the European alliance, and largely, as is believed, through the enlightened instrumentality of Great Britain at the negotiation of the treaties at the Congress of Vienna. It has been stipulated in these treaties that the Rhine, the Neckar, the Mayne, the Moselle, the Maese, and the Schelde, are to be free to all nations. The object of these stipulations undoubtedly has been to lay the navigation of these rivers effectively open to all the people dwelling upon their banks or within their neighborhood, and to abolish those unnatural and unjust restrictions by which the inhabitants of the interior of Germany have been too often deprived of their outlet to the sea by an abuse of that sovereignty rather than its right, which would impute an exclusive dominion over a river to any one State not holding all its shores. These stipulations may be considered as an indication of the present judgment of Europe upon the point, and would seem to supersede further reference to the case of other rivers, and, from their recent as well as high authority, further illustration of any kind. They imply a substantial recognition of the principle that, whatever may sometimes have been the claim to an exclusive right by one nation over a river, under the circumstances in question, the claim (if founded in an alleged right of sovereignty) could at best only be supposed to spring from the social compact; whereas the right of navigating the river is a right of nature, pre-existent in point of time, not necessary to have been surrendered up for any purpose of the common good, and unsusceptible of annihilation. There is no principle of national law and universal justice upon which the provisions of the Vienna treaties are founded that does not apply to sustain the right of the people of the United States to navigate the St. Lawrence. The relations between the soil and the water, and those of man to both, form the eternal basis of this right. These relations are too intimate and powerful to be separated. A nation deprived of the use of the water flowing through its soil would see itself stripped of many of the most beneficial uses of the soil itself; so that its right to use the water, and freely to pass over it, becomes an indispensable adjunct to its territorial rights. It is a means so interwoven with the end, that to disjoin them would be to destroy the end. Why should the water impart its fertility to the earth if the products of the latter are to be left to perish upon the shores?

It may be proper to advert to the footing in point of fact upon which the navigation of this river stands at present between the two countries, so far as the regulations of Great Britain are concerned. The act of Parliament of 3 Geo. IV, chapter 119, August 5, 1822, has permitted the importation from the United States, by land or water, into any port of entry in either of the Canadas at which there is a custom-house, of certain articles of the United States enumerated in a schedule, subject to the duties which are specified in another schedule. Under the former schedule many of the most important articles of the United States are excluded, and under the latter the duties are so high as to be equivalent to a prohibition of some that are nominally admitted. The foregoing act lays no impositions on the merchandise of the United States descending the St. Lawrence with a view to exportation on the ocean; but an act of Parliament of 1821 does, viz: upon the timber and lumber of the United States. Such, in general terms, is the footing upon which the intercourse is placed by the British acts, and it may be alike proper, in connexion with this reference to it, to mention the conditions of intercourse which it has superseded. To whatever observations the duties imposed on the products of the United States imported for sale into the ports of Canada may otherwise be liable, as well as the exclusion of some of them altogether, it will be understood that it is only the unobstructed passage of the river, considered as a common highway, that is claimed as a right. By the treaty stipulations of November, 1794, between the two countries, the United States were allowed to import into the two Canadas all articles of merchandise, the importation of which was not entirely prohibited, subject to no other duties than were payable by British subjects on the importation of the same articles from Europe into the Canadas. The same latitude of importation was allowed into the United States from the Canadas, subject to no other duties than were payable on the importation of the same articles into the Atlantic ports of the United States. Peltries were made free on both sides. All tolls and rates of ferriage were to be the same upon the inhabitants of both countries. No transit duties at portages or carrying places were to be levied on either side. These provisions were declared in the treaty to be designed to secure to both parties the local advantages common to both, and to promote a disposition favorable to friendship and good neighborhood. The waters on each side were made free, with the exception reciprocally at that time of vessels of the United States going to the seaports of the British territories, or navigating their rivers between their mouths and the highest port of entry from the sea, and of British vessels navigating the rivers of the United States beyond the highest ports of entry from the sea. These treaty regulations are found among the articles declared, when the instrument was made, to be permanent. Both countries continued to abide by them until Great Britain passed the acts above recited, by which it appears that she has considered the intervening war of 1812 as abrogating the whole of the treaty of November, 1794. The United States have continued to allow, up to the present time, its provisions regulating this intercourse to operate in favor of the Canadas. By the act of Parliament of 3 Geo. IV, chapter 44, taken in conjunction with the act of the same year, chapter 119, above mentioned, the right of the vessels of the United States to the whole navigation of the St. Lawrence appears to be taken for granted: by the first, from the ocean to Quebec; and by the second, from any part of the territories of the United States to Quebec. But a discretionary power is given to the colonial Governments in Canada to do away the effect of the latter permission by excepting any of the Canadian ports from those to which the vessels of the United States are by the act made admissible, whilst the duties which it imposes upon such of the exports of the United States as could alone render the trade profitable are prohibitory. But it is the right of navigating this river upon a basis of certainty, without obstruction or hindrance of any kind, or the hazard of it in future, that the United States claim for their citizens.

The importance of this claim may be estimated when it is considered that the people of at least as many of the States as Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, Vermont, Maine, New Hampshire, and the Territory of Michigan, have an immediate interest in it, not to dwell upon the prospective derivative interest which is attached to it in other portions of the Union. The parts of the United States connected directly or remotely with this river and the inland seas through which it communicates with the ocean, form, indeed, an extent of territory, and comprise, even at this day, an aggregate of population, which bespeak the interest at stake to be of the very highest nature, and one which, after every deduction suggested by the artificial channels which may be substituted for the natural one of this great stream, make it emphatically an object of national concernment and attention. Having seen the grounds of necessity and reason upon which the right of so great and growing a population to seek its only natural pathway to the ocean rests, it may be expected that they should be supported by the established principles of international law. This shall be done by the citation of passages from the writings of the most eminent publicists, always bearing in mind that the right under discussion becomes strong in proportion to the extent which the country of the upper inhabitants, in its connexion with the stream, bears to the country of the lower inhabitants. Vattel, in book 2, chapter 9, section 127, lays down the following as a general position: "Nature, who designs her gifts for the common advantage of men, does not allow of their being kept from their use when they can be furnished with them without any prejudice to the proprietor, and by leaving still untouched all the utility and advantages he is capable of receiving from his rights." The same author, same book, chapter 10, section 132, says: "Property cannot deprive nations of the general right of travelling over the earth, in order to have a communication with each other, for carrying on trade, and other just reasons. The master of a country may only refuse the passage on particular occasions where he finds it is prejudicial or dangerous." In section 134, he adds: "A passage ought also to be granted for merchandise, and, as this may in common be done without inconvenience, to refuse it without just reason is injuring a nation and endeavoring to deprive it of the means of carrying on a trade with other States; if the passage occasions any inconvenience, any expense for the preservation of canals and highways, it may be recompensed by the rights of toll." Again, in book 1, chapter 22, section 266, we are told that if "neither the one nor the other of the two nations near a river can prove that it settled first, it is to be supposed that they both came there at the same time, since neither can give any reason of preference; and in this case the dominion of each will be extended to the middle of the river." This is a principle too relevant to the doctrine under consideration to be passed over without remark. It relates, as will be seen, to dominion, and not to right of passage simply. Now, if simultaneous settlement confers coequality of dominion, by even stronger reason will simultaneous acquisition confer coequality of passage. Without inquiring into the state of the navigation of the St. Lawrence as between Great Britain and France prior to the peace of 1763, it is sufficient that in the war of 1756-63, which preceded that peace, the people of the United States, in their capacity of English subjects, contributed jointly with the parent State (and largely, it may be added with historical truth) towards gaining the Canadas from France. The right of passage, therefore, of this river, admitting that it did not exist before, was, in point of fact, opened to the early inhabitants of New York and Pennsylvania at an epoch at least as soon as to British subjects living afterwards in the newly conquered possessions. A title thus derived is not invoked as resting upon the same ground with the title derived from natural right; but it serves to strengthen it, and is of pertinent application, as against Great Britain in this instance. Let it be looked at under either of the following alternatives which present themselves. If Great Britain possessed the navigation of this river prior to 1763, so did the people of the United States as part, at that time, of her own empire. If she did not, but only first acquired it when the Canadas were acquired, the people of the United States, acting in common with her, acquired it in common, and at as early a date. It will not be said that the right which necessarily inured to the colonies, as part of the British empire, was lost by their subsequently taking the character of a distinct nation, since it is the purpose of this paper to show that the right of passage may, as a natural right, be claimed by one foreign nation against another, without any reference whatever to antecedent circumstances. But the latter, when they exist, make up part of the case, and are not to be left out of view. The peculiar and common origin of the title of both parties, as seen above, is calculated to illustrate more fully the principle of common right applicable to both now. The antecedent circumstances show that the natural right, always appertaining to the early inhabitants of the shores of this river above the Canadian line, to navigate it has once been fortified by joint conquest, and by subsequent joint usufructure. One other quotation is all that will be given from the same author. It relates to a strait and not a river; but the reasoning from analogy is not the less striking and appropriate. "It must be remarked," he says, "with regard to straits, that when they serve for a communication between two seas, the navigation of which is common to all or many nations, he who possesses the strait cannot refuse others a passage through it, provided that passage be innocent and attended with no danger to the State. Such a refusal, without just reason, would deprive these nations of an advantage granted them by nature; and, indeed, the right of such a passage is a remainder of the primitive liberty enjoyed in common." If we consult Grotius, we shall find that he is equally or more explicit in sanctioning, in the largest extent, the principle contended for. He even goes so far as to say, after laying down generally the right of passage, that "the fears which any power entertains from a multitude, in arms, passing through its territories, do not form such an exception as can do away the rule, it not being proper or reasonable that the fears of one party should destroy the rights of another."—(Book 2, chapter 2, section 13.) In the course of the same section he declares, that upon "this foundation of common right a free passage through countries, rivers, or over any part of the sea, which belong to some particular people, ought to be allowed to those who require it for the necessary occasions of life, whether these occasions be in quest of settlements after being driven from their own country, or to trade with a remote nation." The reasons which Grotius himself gives, or which he adopts from writers more ancient, for this right of innocent passage, (and he is full of authorities and examples as well from sacred as profane history,) are of peculiar force. He denominates it "a right interwoven with the very frame of human society." "Property," he says, "was originally introduced with a reservation of that use which might be of general benefit, and not prejudicial to the interest of the owner." He concludes the section in the following manner: "A free passage ought to be allowed not only to persons but to merchandise, for no power has a right to prevent one nation trading with another at a remote distance, a permission which, for the interest of society, should be maintained; nor can it be said that any one is injured by it, for though he may thereby be deprived of an exclusive gain, yet the loss of what is not his due as a matter of right can never be considered as a damage or the violation of a claim." After authorities of such immediate bearing on the point under consideration, further quotation will be forborne. The question of right is conceived to be made out, and if its denomination will be found to be sometimes that of an imperfect in contradistinction to an absolute right, the denial of it is nevertheless agreed to be an injury, of which the party deprived may justly complain. The sentiments taken from these two writers, (and they are not the only ones capable of being adduced,) though deemed sufficient, have the full support of coincident passages in Puffendorf, book 3, chapter 3, sections 4, 5, 6, and in Wolfius, section 310.

Finally, the United States feel justified in claiming the navigation of this river on the ground of paramount interest and necessity to their citizens; on that of natural right founded on this necessity, and felt and acknowledged in the practice of mankind, and under the sanction of the best expounders of the laws of nations. Their claim is to its full and free navigation from its source to the sea, without impediment or obstruction of any kind. It was thus that Great Britain claimed and had the navigation of the Mississippi, by the seventh article of the treaty of Paris of 1763, when the mouth and lower shores of that river were held by another power. The claim, while necessary to the United States, is not injurious to Great Britain, nor can it violate any of her just rights. They confidently appeal to her justice for its enjoyment and security; to her enlightened sense of good neighborhood; to her past claims upon others for the enjoyment of a similar right; and to her presumed desire for the advantageous intercourse of trade and all good offices, now and henceforth, between the citizens of the United States and her own subjects bordering upon each other in that portion of her dominions.

British paper on the Navigation of the St. Lawrence, (Twenty-fourth Protocol.)

The claim of the United States to the free navigation of the river St. Lawrence wears a character of peculiar importance when urged as an independent right.

The American plenipotentiary must be aware that a demand rested upon this principle necessarily precludes those considerations of good neighborhood and mutual accommodation with which the Government of Great Britain would otherwise have been anxious to enter upon the adjustment of this part of the negotiation.

A right claimed without qualification on the one side affords no room for friendly concession on the other. Total admission or total rejection is the only alternative which it presents.

On looking to the objects embraced by the American claim, we find them to be of no ordinary magnitude. The United States pretend to no less than the perpetual enjoyment of a free, uninterrupted passage, independent of the territorial sovereign, through a large and very important part of the British possessions in North America. They demand, as their necessary inherent right, the liberty of navigating the St. Lawrence from its source to the sea, though in the latter part of its course, which lies entirely within the British dominions, and comprises a space of nearly six hundred miles, that river traverses the finest settlements of Canada; communicates by the Sorell with Lake Champlain, and washes the quays of Montreal and Quebec.

A pretension which thus goes to establish a perpetual thoroughfare for the inhabitants, vessels, and productions of a foreign country through the heart of a British colony, and under the walls of its principal fortress, has need to be substantiated on the clearest and most indisputable grounds. It requires, indeed, an enlarged view of what is owed in courtesy by one nation to another to justify the British Government in entering at this late period on the discussion of so novel and extensive a claim.

There will, however, be little difficulty in showing that the claim asserted by the American plenipotentiary rests, as to any foundation of natural right, on an incorrect application of the authorities which he has consulted. With respect to the claim derived from an acquired title, which he has also alleged, that ground of claim will remain to be examined hereafter; but it may be observed, in the outset, that the natural and acquired title depend on principles essentially distinct; that the one cannot be used to make good any defect in the other, and, although they may be possessed independently by the same claimant, that they can in no degree contribute to each other's validity.

Proceeding to consider how far the claim of the United States may be established on either of these titles, it is first necessary to inquire what must be intended by the assertion that their claim is founded on natural right. "The right of navigating this river," says the American plenipotentiary, "is a right of nature, pre-existent in point of time, not necessary to have been surrendered up for any purpose of common good, and unsusceptible of annihilation." The right here described can be of no other than that kind which is generally designated in the law of nations a perfect right. Now, a perfect right is that which exists independent of treaty, which necessarily arises from the law of nature, which is common, or may, under similar circumstances, be common to all independent nations, and can never be denied or infringed by any State without a breach of the law of nations. Such is the right to navigate the ocean, without molestation, in time of peace.

Upon these principles, now universally received, it is contended for the United States that a nation possessing both shores of a navigable river at its mouth has no right to refuse the passage of it to another possessing a part of its upper banks, and standing in need of it as a convenient channel of commercial communication with the sea. Applying the same principles to the case of the St. Lawrence, the American Government maintain that Great Britain would be no more justified in controlling American navigation on that river than in assuming to itself a similar right of interference on the high seas.

To this extent must the assumption of a perfect right be carried, or such claim is no longer to be considered in that character; but, falling under the denomination of an imperfect right, it becomes subject to considerations essentially and entirely different.

The first question, therefore, to be resolved is, whether a perfect right to the free navigation of the river St. Lawrence can be maintained according to the principles and practice of the law of nations.

Referring to the most eminent writers on that subject, we find that any liberty of passage to be enjoyed by one nation through the dominions of another is treated by them as a qualified occasional exception to the paramount rights of property. "The right of 'passage,'" says Vattel, "is also a remainder of the primitive communion in which the entire earth was common to men, and the passage was everywhere free according to their necessities." Grotius, in like manner, describes mankind as having, in their primitive state, enjoyed the earth and its various productions in common until after the introduction of property, together with its laws; by a division or gradual occupation of the general domain. Among the natural rights, which he describes as having, in part, survived this new order of things, are those of necessity and of innocent utility, under the latter of which he classes the right of passage. Following his principle, this natural right of passage between nation and nation may be compared to the right of highway, as it exists in particular communities, between the public at large and the individual proprietors of the soil, but with this important difference, that, in the former case, commanding and indispensable considerations of national safety, national welfare, and national honor and interest, must be taken especially into the account.

It is clear that on this principle there is no distinction between the right of passage by a river flowing from the possessions of one nation through those of another to the ocean, and the same right to be enjoyed by means of any highway, whether land or of water, generally accessible to the inhabitants of the earth. "Rivers," says Grotius, "are subject to property, though neither where they rise nor where they discharge themselves be within our territory." The right to exclusive sovereignty over rivers is also distinctly asserted by Bynkershoek in the ninth chapter of his treatise "On the Dominion of the Sea." Nor is this by any means the full latitude to which the principle, if applied at all, must in fairness be extended. "All nations," says Vattel, "have a general right to the innocent use of the things which are under any one's domain." "Property," says the same author, "cannot deprive nations of the general right of travelling over the earth, in order to have communication with each other, for carrying on trade, and other just reasons." The nature of these other just reasons is explained by Grotius in the following sentence: "A passage ought to be granted to persons, whenever just occasion shall require, over any lands and rivers or such parts of the sea as belong to any nation: as, for instance, if, being expelled from their own country, they want to settle in some uninhabited land, or if they are going to traffic with some distant people, or to recover by a just war what is their own right and due."

For other purposes, then, besides those of trade, for objects of war as well as for objects of peace, for all nations no less than for any nation in particular, does the right of passage hold good under those authorities to which the American plenipotentiary has appealed. It has already been shown that, with reference to this right, no distinction is drawn by them between land and water, and still less between one sort of river and another. It further appears from Vattel that the right in question, particularly for the conveyance of merchandise, is attached to artificial as well as to natural highways. "If this passage," he observes, "occasion any inconvenience, any expense for the preservation of canals and highways, it may be recompensed by rights of toll."

Is it, then, to be imagined that the American Government can mean to insist on a demand involving such consequences, without being prepared to apply, by reciprocity, the principle on which it rests in favor of Great Britain? Though the sources of the Mississippi are now ascertained to lie within the territory of the United States, the day cannot be distant when the inhabitants of Upper Canada will find convenience in exporting their superfluous produce by means of the channel of that river to the ocean. A few miles of transport over land are of little consequence when leading to a navigable river of such extent. Even at the present time, a glance upon the map is sufficient to show that the course of the Hudson, connected as it now is with the waters of the St. Lawrence, would afford a very commodious outlet for the produce of the Canadian provinces. The comparative shortness of this passage, especially with reference to the West Indies, would amply compensate for any fair expense of tolls.

It would also be, in some instances, convenient and profitable for British vessels to ascend the principal rivers of the United States as far as their draught of water would admit, instead of depositing their merchandise, as now, at the appointed ports of entry from the sea. Nor is it probable that other nations would be more backward than the British in pressing their claim to a full participation in this advantage. The general principle which they would invoke, in pursuance of the example given by America, and a partial application of such principles, no country can have a right to expect from another, is clearly of a nature to authorize the most extraordinary and unheard of demands: as for the right of passage from sea to sea across any intervening isthmus, such, for instance, as that of Corinth, or of Suez, and more especially from the Atlantic to the Pacific by the Isthmus of Panama; that right of passage follows as immediately from this principle as any such right claimed from one tract of land to another, or to the ocean by water communication.

The exercise of a right which thus goes the length of opening a way for foreigners into the bosom of every country must necessarily be attended with inconvenience, and sometimes with alarm and peril, to the State whose territories are to be traversed. This consequence has not been overlooked by writers on the law of nations. They have felt the necessity of controlling the operation of so dangerous a principle by restricting the right of transit to purposes of innocent utility, and by attributing to the local sovereign the exclusive power of judging under what circumstances the passage through his dominions is or is not to be regarded as innocent. In other words, the right which they have described is, at best, only an imperfect right.

It is under the head of innocent utility that Grotius has classed the right of passage, as before laid down in his own expressions.

"Innocent utility," he adds, "is when I only seek my own advantage without damaging any one else." In treating of the same right, Vattel remarks that "since the introduction of domain and property, we can no otherwise make use of it than by respecting the proper rights of others." "The effect," he adds, "of property is to make the advantage of the proprietor prevail over that of all others."

The same author defines the right of innocent use or innocent utility to be "the right we have to that use which may be drawn from things belonging to another without causing him either loss or inconvenience." He goes on to say that "this right of innocent use is not a perfect right, like that of necessity; for it belongs to the master to judge if the use we would make of a thing that belongs to him will be attended with no damage or inconvenience."

With respect to the assertion of Grotius, as quoted by the American plenipotentiary, "that the mere apprehension of receiving injury from the exercise of this right is not a sufficient reason for denying it." The author, it must be observed, is addressing himself to the conscience of the sovereign through whose territories a passage may be demanded, impressing upon his mind that he cannot fully discharge his moral obligations in giving such refusal, unless he be well convinced that his fears originate in just causes. But it would be absurd, and contrary to the general tenor of his argument, to suppose that a well-founded apprehension was not to have its due effect, or that the advantage or even necessity of a foreign nation could be justly recognized by him as paramount, in the one case, to the leading interests, in the other, to the safety, of his own.

It is further to be observed that Grotius, in the argument referred to, had clearly in view an occasional liberty of passage, not of that perpetual uninterrupted kind, which the regular activity of modern commerce requires. But the doctrine of Grotius, applied to merchandise, and taken in the sense ascribed to it by the American plenipotentiary, is distinctly contradicted by other eminent writers on the law of nations. Puffendorf, for instance, in his great work on that subject, expresses himself as follows: "We may have good reasons for stopping foreign merchandise as well by land as on a river, or on an arm of the sea within our dependence. For, besides that a too great affluence of foreigners is sometimes prejudicial or suspicious to a State, why should not a sovereign secure to his own subjects the profit made by foreigners under favor of the passage which he allows them?" "I admit that, in allowing foreigners to carry their merchandise elsewhere, even without paying for the passage, we do not sustain any damage, and that they do us no wrong in pretending to an advantage of which we might have possessed ourselves before them. But, at the same time, as they have no right to exclude us from it, why should we not try to draw it to ourselves? Why should we not prefer our interest to theirs?"

The same author observes, in the next section of his work, "that a State may fairly lay a duty on foreign goods conveyed through its territory by way of compensation for what its subjects lose by admitting a new competitor into the market."

To appreciate the full force of these opinions, it must be borne in mind that Puffendorf appears to speak of a foreign nation so situated as to depend exclusively on the passage in question for the sale of its superfluous produce and the importation of supplies from abroad. This part of the subject may be closed with the following decisive words of Barleyrac, in his notes on Grotius: "It necessarily follows from the right of property that the proprietor may refuse another the use of his goods. Humanity, indeed, requires that he should grant that use to those who stand in need of it when it can be done without any considerable inconvenience to himself; and if he even then refuses it, though he transgresses his duty, he doth them no wrong, properly so called, except they are in extreme necessity, which is superior to all ordinary rules."

But the American plenipotentiary maintains that the right of passage, as understood by him in opposition to his own authorities, that is, independent of the sovereign's consent, and applied to the single predicament of the St. Lawrence, has been substantially recognized by the powers of Europe in the treaties of general pacification concluded at Paris in 1814, and in the following year at Vienna.

It is true that in the solemn engagements then contracted by them the sovereigns of the leading States of Europe manifested a disposition to facilitate commercial intercourse between their respective countries by opening the navigation of such of the principal rivers as separated or traversed the territories of several powers. This policy was applied more particularly to the Rhine, the Neckar, the Mayne, the Moselle, the Maese, and the Scheldt. But neither in the general nor in the special stipulations relating to the free navigation of rivers is there anything to countenance the principle of a natural independent right, as asserted by the American plenipotentiary. We find, on the contrary, that in the treaty concluded at Paris, between France and the allied powers, the Rhine was the only river at once thrown open to general navigation. With respect to the other rivers, it was merely stipulated that the means of extending that arrangement to them should be determined by the Congress about to assemble at Vienna. In the instance of the Rhine, it was natural for France, in giving up possessions which she had for some time enjoyed on the banks of that river, to stipulate a reserve of the navigation. The stipulations relating to river navigation in the general treaty of Vienna commence in the following manner: "The powers whose States are separated or crossed by the same navigable river engage to regulate, by common consent, all that regards its navigation." They close with an agreement that the regulations once adopted shall not be changed except with the consent of all the powers bordering on the same river.

It is evident, therefore, that the allied Governments, in concurring to favor the circulation of trade through the great water communications of continental Europe, did not lose sight of what was due to the sovereignty of particular States; and that when they referred the common enjoyment of certain navigable rivers to voluntary compact between the parties more immediately concerned, they virtually acknowledged the right of any one of those parties till bound by its own engagements to withhold the passage through its dominions from foreign merchant vessels. As freedom of navigation in favor of all nations, and not merely of those which border on the rivers thus opened by treaty, was the immediate object of the above mentioned stipulations, it must be presumed that the powers assembled in Congress, if they had felt themselves borne out by the practice or general opinion of Europe, would not have hesitated to proclaim the measure which they adopted as one of natural independent right. Their silence alone on this point might have been taken as strongly indicative of their belief that the prevailing usage of Europe would authorize no such declaration. But the principle of mutual consent is surely irreconcilable with the contrary supposition, and must at least be understood to give a special character to the engagements contracted under it, confining them to the rivers enumerated in the treaty, and, however laudable, as an example to other States whose circumstances may allow of their imitating it without danger or detriment, expressive of no obligation beyond the occasion for which the treaty was framed.

It would take up too much time to demonstrate by a detailed investigation of every case to which the American argument applies the negative proposition that no nation exercises the liberty of navigating a river through the territories of another except by permission or express concession under treaty. It is rather for the American Government to present a single instance in which the liberty claimed for the United States is exercised explicitly as a natural independent right.

The case of the Scheldt, though referred to by the American plenipotentiary, is certainly not one of this kind. The leading circumstances relating to that river were, first, that its mouths, including the canals of Sas and Swin, lay within the Dutch territory, while parts of its upper channel were situate within the Flemish provinces; secondly, that the treaty of Westphalia had confirmed the right of the Dutch to close the mouths of the river; thirdly, that the exercise of this right was disputed after a lapse of more than a hundred years by the Emperor of Germany; and, fourthly, that the dispute between that monarch and the Dutch Republic terminated in 1785 by leaving the Dutch in possession of the right which had been disputed. It is true that at the latter period the Dutch founded their claim, in part, on the expense and labor which they had undergone in improving the river; but it is true, at the same time, that they also grounded it on the general law of nations. Above all, they rested it on the treaty of Westphalia. But if the right of the Dutch Republic had been countenanced by the law and practice of nations, why, it may be asked, should it have been thought necessary to confirm that right by the treaty of Westphalia? The reply is obvious. That confirmation was the resort of the weak against the strong, of the former dependants of Spain against the encroachments of a haughty power, still sovereign of Antwerp and the neighboring provinces, and not having yet renounced its claim of sovereignty over Holland itself. It was natural for the Dutch, under such circumstances, to fortify their right by the general sanction of Europe; but it was not natural for the principal parties in the pacification of Munster to lend their sanction to a measure in direct contradiction to acknowledged principles; or if their scruples as to the admission of such a measure had been removed by special motives, it is strange that they should not have taken the obvious precaution of recording those motives. During the discussions about the Scheldt, in 1785, the Empress of Russia was the only sovereign who officially declared an opinion in favor of the House of Austria. But the United States can derive no great advantage from a declaration couched in such terms as these: "Nature herself hath granted to the Austrian low countries the use and advantage of the river in dispute; Austria alone, by virtue of the law of nature and nations, is entitled to an exclusive right to the use of the river in question. So that the equity and disinterestedness of Joseph II can only impart this right to other people, it belonging exclusively to his States."

The opinions proclaimed on this subject by the Russian Government are the more remarkable, as there is no country which has a greater interest than Russia in the disputed question. It is well known that the only approach to the Russian ports in the Black Sea, from the Mediterranean and Atlantic, is by the passages of the Dardanelles and Bosphorus. These canals are, in fact, salt water straits, communicating from sea to sea, passing, it is true, between the Turkish territories in Europe and Asia, but with no great length of course, and leading to a vast expanse of inland water, the shores of which are occupied by no less than three independent powers.

There is manifestly a wide difference between such a case and that of the St. Lawrence, nor can the marked difference in principle between rivers and straits be overlooked; and yet, as matter of fact, the navigation of the Black Sea, and the adjacent canals, is enjoyed by Russia—by that power which has so often dictated its own conditions to the Porte, in virtue of a treaty founded, like other treaties, on the mutual convenience and mutual advantage of the parties.

Even the navigation of the Danube downwards to the ocean was first accorded to Austria by the Turkish Government as a specific concession, made at a juncture when the Porte, involved in a quarrel with the most formidable of its neighbors, was compelled to propitiate the good will of other Christian powers.

The case of the Mississippi is far from presenting an exception to this view of the subject. The treaty of 1763, which opened the navigation of that river to British subjects, was concluded after a war in which Great Britain had been eminently successful. The same motives that prevailed with France to cede Canada must have restrained her from hazarding a continuance of hostilities for such an object as the exclusive navigation of the Mississippi. The agreement respecting that river makes part of the general provisions as to the western boundary of the British possessions in America, by which the whole left side of the Mississippi was ceded to Great Britain, with the exception of the town and island of New Orleans. This reservation was admitted on the express condition that the navigation of the whole channel should be open to British subjects. The very fact of its having been thought necessary to insert this stipulation in the treaty, in consequence of France having retained possession of both banks of the river at a single spot, leads irresistibly to an inference the very reverse of what is maintained by the American plenipotentiaries.

At a later period the navigation of the Mississippi became a subject of arrangement between Spain and the United States. By the fourth article of their treaty of boundary and navigation, concluded in 1795, a similar agreement to that which had before subsisted between France and Great Britain was effected between those powers, with this remarkable difference, that the liberty of navigating the river was expressly confined to the parties themselves, unless the King of Spain, to use the words of the treaty, "should extend this privilege to the subjects of other powers by special convention."

It must not be overlooked that when the clause which is here quoted, and the exclusive stipulation immediately preceding it, were drawn up, the sources of the Mississippi were still supposed to be within the British territory, and, at the same time, there was in force a treaty between Great Britain and the United States declaring that "the navigation of the river Mississippi, from its source to the ocean, should forever remain free and open to the subjects of Great Britain."

Some additional light may, perhaps, be thrown on the object of the present discussion by the quotation of a note on the fourth article of the Spanish treaty, which is printed in the collection of the United States Laws, arranged and published under the authority of an act of Congress. It is as follows:

"Whatsoever right his Catholic Majesty had to interdict the free navigation of the Mississippi to any nation at the date of the treaty of San Lorenzo el Real, (the 27th of October, 1795,) that right was wholly transferred to the United States, in virtue of the cession of Louisiana from France, by the treaty of April 30, 1803. And as the definitive treaty of peace was concluded previously to the transfer to the United States of the right of Spain to the dominion of the river Mississippi, and, of course, prior to the United States possessing the Spanish right, it would seem that the stipulation contained in the 8th article of the definitive treaty with Great Britain could not have included any greater latitude of navigation on the Mississippi than that which the United States were authorized to grant on the 3d of September, 1783.

"The additional right of sovereignty which was acquired over the river by the cession of Louisiana was paid for by the American Government; and, therefore, any extension of it to a foreign power could scarcely be expected without an equivalent."

The natural right asserted by the American plenipotentiary being thus examined, in respect both to the principles which it involves and to the general practice of nations, the acquired title, as distinct from the natural, stands next for consideration.

This title is described in the American argument as originating in circumstances which either preceded or attended the acquisition of the Canadas by Great Britain. It is said "that if Great Britain possessed the navigation of the St. Lawrence before the conclusion of peace in 1763, so did the people of the United States, as forming, at that time, a part of the British empire; but if Great Britain only first acquired it, together with the Canadas, then did the people of the United States acquire it in common with her at the same period." In both the supposed cases it is taken for granted that whatever liberty to navigate the St. Lawrence, in the whole length of its course, the inhabitants of the United States enjoyed when those States were part of the British empire, continued to belong to them after their separation from the mother country. Now, if this were so, it would also be true, and in a far stronger degree, that the subjects of Great Britain have an equal right to enjoy, in common with American citizens, the use of the navigable rivers, and other public possessions of the United States, which existed when both countries were united under the same Government. For the acquired title, be it remembered, does not affect the St. Lawrence, as a river flowing from the territories of one power through those of another to the sea, but is manifestly grounded on the supposition that an object, which had been possessed in common by the people of both countries up to the time of their separation, continues to belong, in point of use, to both, after they have ceased to be parts of the same community. If it be true that the inhabitants of the United States contributed, as British subjects, to effect the conquest of Canada, it cannot, at the same time, be denied that the United States, before their separation from Great Britain, were frequently indebted to the counsels and exertions of the parent country for protection against their unquiet and encroaching neighbors. Specifically did they owe to Great Britain their first enjoyment of the waters of the Mississippi—conquered, in part, from France by the very same efforts which transformed Canada from a French settlement into a British colony. The pretension of the American Government, as grounded on the simultaneous acquisition of the St. Lawrence, as well by the inhabitants of the adjacent, and, at that time, British provinces, as by those of the countries originally composing the British monarchy, must, therefore, if admitted even for the sake of argument, be applied reciprocally in favor of Great Britain.

The fact, however, is, that no such pretension can be allowed to have survived the treaty by which the independence of the United States was first acknowledged by Great Britain. By that treaty a perpetual line of demarkation was drawn between the two powers, no longer connected by any other ties than those of amity and conventional agreement.

No portion of the sovereignty of the British empire, exclusive to the actual territory of the United States, as acknowledged by that treaty, could possibly devolve upon the people of the United States, separated from Great Britain.

By the same instrument, the territorial boundary of the States, as recognized by their former sovereign, was carefully defined, for the express purpose of avoiding disputes in future; and the articles stipulating for a concurrent enjoyment of the North American fisheries, and of the navigation of the river Mississippi, prove that equal care was taken to determine, in the general act of pacification and acknowledgment, those objects, of which the usufruct in common was either retained or conceded by Great Britain.

Is it conceivable, under these circumstances, that the treaty of 1783 should have made no mention of the concurrent navigation of the St. Lawrence, if the claim now raised by the United States had rested on any tenable grounds?

But the commercial treaty of 1794 would afford additional proof, if it were wanted, that the channel of the St. Lawrence, from the sea to the 45th parallel of latitude, was never for a moment considered as forming any exception to the territorial possessions of Great Britain.

The third article of the commercial treaty shows most clearly that the power of excluding foreign vessels from those parts of the river which flow entirely within the British dominions was deemed to belong of right to the British Government. The leading purpose of that article is to establish a free commercial intercourse between the two parties throughout their respective territories in North America.

The same article contains a limitation of this privilege, with respect to a considerable portion of the St. Lawrence, to which it was declared that American vessels were not to have access; and the corresponding restriction against Great Britain was an exclusion of British vessels from such parts of the rivers of the United States as lie above the highest ports of entry for foreign shipping from the sea.

It necessarily results from the nature of the two clauses, thus viewed with reference to each other, that the authority of Great Britain over the part of the St. Lawrence interdicted to American vessels was no less completely exclusive than that of the United States over such parts of their interior waters as were in like manner interdicted to the shipping of Great Britain.

The former limitation is, besides, of itself inconsistent with the notion of a right to a free, uninterrupted passage for American vessels by the St. Lawrence to the ocean.

Nor is it the less conclusive as to the merits of the case when coupled with the declaration contained in the very same article, that the navigation of the Mississippi was to be enjoyed in common by both parties, notwithstanding that a subsequent article of the same treaty expresses the uncertainty which already prevailed with respect to the sources of that river being actually situated within the British frontier.

With these facts in view, it is difficult to conceive how a tacit enjoyment of the navigation, now claimed, can be stated by the American plenipotentiary to account for the silence maintained on this subject by his Government from the establishment of its independence to the present negotiation.

In the course of forty years, during which no mention whatever has been made of this claim, there has been no want of opportunities fit for its assertion and discussion. To say nothing of periods anterior to the rupture of 1812, it is strange that an interest of such vast importance should have been wholly neglected, as well on the renewal of peace in 1815 as during the negotiation of the commercial treaty which took place in the close of that year. This long continued silence is the more remarkable, as the mere apprehension of an eventual change in the regulations, under which a part of the St. Lawrence is actually navigated by foreign vessels, has been alleged by the American Government as their reason for now raising the discussion.

The regions contiguous to the upper waters of the St. Lawrence are doubtless more extensively settled than they were before the late war, and the inhabitants of those regions might at times find it advantageous to export their lumber and flour by the channel of that river. But mere convenience and the profits of trade cannot be deemed to constitute that case of extreme necessity, under the law of nations, to which the rights of property may perhaps be occasionally required to give way. It has already been shown that such interests can, at most, amount to an imperfect right of innocent utility, the exercise of which is entirely dependent on the will and discretion of the local sovereign. Of this description are the rights and accompanying duties of nations to trade with each other, and to permit the access of foreigners to their respective waters in time of peace; but will any one at the same time call in question the co-existing right of every State not only to regulate and to limit its commercial intercourse with others, but even, as occasion may require, to suspend or to withhold it altogether?

If ever there was a case which particularly imposed on a sovereign the indispensable duty of maintaining this right unimpaired, even with every disposition to consult the convenience and fair advantage of friendly nations, it is the present unqualified demand of the United States.

It cannot be necessary to enumerate the various circumstances which make this claim peculiarly objectionable; but there is no concealing that, besides the ordinary considerations of territorial protection, those of commercial interest and colonial policy are alike involved in the demand of a free, gratuitous, unlimited right of passage for American citizens, with their vessels and merchandise, from one end of Canada to the other.

Interests of such high national importance are not to be put in competition with the claims of justice; but when justice is clearly on their side, they have a right to be heard, and cannot be denied their full weight. That the right is, in this instance, undoubtedly on the side of Great Britain, a moment's reflection on the preceding argument will suffice to establish.

It has been shown that the independent right asserted by the United States is inconsistent with the dominion, paramount sovereignty, and exclusive possession of Great Britain.

It has been proved, by reference to the most esteemed authorities on the law of nations, with respect as well to the general principle as to the opinions distinctly given on this point, that the right of sovereignty and exclusive possession extends over rivers in common with the territory through which they flow.

The same principles and the same opinions have been cited to prove that those parts of the river St. Lawrence which flow exclusively through the British dominions form no exception to the general doctrine so applied to rivers.

The existence of any necessity calculated to give the United States in this case a special right, in contradiction to the general rule, has been distinctly denied, and the denial conclusively supported by a reference to known facts.

With no disposition to contest such imperfect claims and moral obligations as are consistent with the paramount rights of sovereignty and exclusive possession, it has been proved from the authorities already quoted that of those imperfect claims and moral obligations the territorial sovereign is the judge.

The title of the United States, as derived from previous enjoyment at the time when they formed part of the British Empire, has been shown to have ceased with the conclusion of that treaty by which Great Britain recognized them in the new character of an independent nation.

It has also been shown that while the American Government acknowledge that their claim is now brought forward for the first time, not only have they had, since their independence, no enjoyment under treaty of the navigation now claimed, but that the provisions of the commercial treaty concluded in 1794, and described as having been till lately in force, are in direct contradiction with their present demand.

It has finally been made to appear that the treaties concluded by European powers as to the navigation of rivers, far from invalidating the rights of sovereignty in that particular, tend, on the contrary, to establish those rights; and that the general principle of protection, essential to sovereignty, dominion, and property, applies with peculiar force to the present case of the river St. Lawrence.

American paper on the Boundary Line, under the 5th article of the treaty of Ghent, (Ninth Protocol.)

Whereas the Commissioners appointed by the high contracting parties, under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, for ascertaining the latitude and longitude of the northwest angle of Nova Scotia and the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, and for surveying that part of the boundary line, between the dominions of the two powers, which extends from the source of the river St. Croix directly north to the above mentioned northwest angle of Nova Scotia; thence along the highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river; thence down along the middle of that river to the forty-fifth degree of north latitude; thence by a line due west on the said latitude until it strikes the river Iroquois or Cataraguy, have not been able, after long and earnest endeavors, to come to an agreement; and whereas it is the desire of the contracting parties, instead of referring their differences to the arbitration of a friendly sovereign in manner as provided by the said treaty of Ghent, to endeavor to settle them by negotiation between themselves: It is therefore agreed, accordingly, that they will negotiate on these differences, at Washington, in the hope of bringing them to a satisfactory adjustment. And they also agree, that in the course of such negotiation they will receive, should they deem it necessary, the maps that were respectively submitted and used by the Commissioners as aforesaid on the side of each nation; but it is distinctly understood and agreed that the map or maps used on the one side shall not be received or used to the exclusion of that or those used on the other side.

American paper on the Newfoundland Fishery, (Tenth Protocol.)

By the thirteenth article of the treaty of Utrecht of 1713 the sovereignty of the island of Newfoundland was ceded by France to Great Britain, France being allowed the right of fishing, and of drying fish, from Cape Bonavista, on the eastern coast, to the northern extremity of the island, and thence along the western coast to the place called Pointe Riche, but on no other parts.

The provisions of this treaty were renewed and confirmed by that of Aix-la-Chapelle of 1748, and also, as far as relates to Newfoundland and the French fisheries on its coast, by the treaty of Paris of 1763.

By the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain of September 3, 1783, article third, it is stipulated that "the inhabitants of the United States shall have liberty to take fish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use, but not to dry or cure the same on that island."

By the treaty of the same date between Great Britain and France, articles fourth and fifth, the right of Great Britain to this island was confirmed, (the small adjacent islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon being excepted,) and the right of the French to fish on a certain part of the eastern coast, as above recited, was exchanged for that of fishing on the remainder of the eastern and on the whole of the western coast, as far down from the north as Cape Ray. See also the declaration and counter declaration of the plenipotentiaries of the two Governments annexed to this treaty, which are material as respects fishing rights.

By the treaty of Paris of 1814, between Great Britain and France, the former restores to the latter the colonies, fisheries, factories, and establishments of every kind which France possessed on the first of January, 1792, in the seas, or on the continents of America, Asia, and Africa, with the exception of Tobago, St. Lucia, and the Isle of France. By the nineteenth article of this treaty it is declared that, "as to the French right of fishery on the grand bank of Newfoundland, on the coasts of the island of that name, and the adjacent islands, and in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, everything shall be restored to the same footing as in 1792."

Finally, by the convention of October 20, 1818, between the United States and Great Britain, it is provided, article first, that "the inhabitants of the said United States shall have forever, in common with the subjects of his Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau islands, and on the western and northern coast from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon islands." By the same convention the United States are allowed to dry and cure fish on the southern part of the coast of this island, as above described, but not on the western coast.

From the preceding statement, it follows that the French have the right of taking and drying fish on the western coast of the island of Newfoundland. The United States claim for their citizens the right of taking fish on the same coast. But this France denies, saying that the right both of taking and drying belongs to her EXCLUSIVELY. Her cruisers have, accordingly, in 1820 and 1821, ordered off the American fishing vessels whilst within the acknowledged jurisdiction of the coast, threatening them with seizure and confiscation in case of refusal.

It may be that France will allege in support of her doctrine that by her treaty of September 3, 1783, with Great Britain, which gave her the right of fishing and drying fish on the western coast of this island, it was intended that the right should be exclusive; that the words of the treaty, and, above all, those of the declaration annexed to it, show this to have been the meaning, as France obtained the western coast in exchange for a part of the eastern coast with a view to prevent quarrels between the French and British fishermen. To this end, as it may perhaps be also alleged, the words of the declaration provide that British subjects were not to interrupt the French fishery on this coast (the western) by their competition "in any manner;" and further provide that the "fixed settlements" which had been formed there (by British subjects it is presumed) should be removed.

The United States insist, on the other hand, that Great Britain never could have intended by her treaty of 1783 with France to grant a right of fishing, and of drying and curing fish, on the western coast of the island to French fishermen exclusively, but that the right of British subjects to resort there in common must necessarily be implied. That a contrary construction of the instrument cannot be received, the sovereignty of the whole island, without any exception, having been fully vested in Great Britain, and even confirmed by this very treaty. That it can never be presumed that she intended so far to renounce or in anywise diminish this sovereignty as to exclude her own subjects from any part of the coast. That no positive grant to this effect is to be found in the treaty, any more than in the treaty of Utrecht, and that the claim of France to an exclusive right, a claim so totally repugnant to the sovereign rights of Great Britain, can rest on nothing less strong than a positive grant. That all that the words contained in the declaration to the treaty of 1783 can be construed to mean is, that British subjects should never, whilst exercising their right, improperly or injuriously "interrupt by their competition" the enjoyment of the French right. Furthermore, the United States cannot suppose that Great Britain, by the convention of October, 1818, above recited, would ever have agreed that the inhabitants of the United States should have (for a just equivalent contained in the convention) the right or the liberty to take fish on the very coast in question in common with British subjects but under the conviction that British subjects had the liberty of resorting there; and if they had, the claim of France to drive away the fishing vessels of the United States cannot stand.

The above summary may serve to present the general nature of the question which has arisen between the United States and France respecting fishing rights, and which Great Britain will doubtless desire to see settled in a manner satisfactory to the United States. It is obvious that, if Great Britain cannot make good the title which the United States hold under her to take fish on the western coast of Newfoundland, it will rest with her to indemnify them for the loss. Another question which it is supposed will also be for her consideration is, how far she will deem it proper that France should be allowed to drive or order away the fishermen of the United States from a coast that is clearly within the jurisdiction and sovereignty of Great Britain.

AUGUST, 1822.

Since the foregoing was drawn up, and which, as will be seen, was in part hypothetical, a correspondence has taken place between the minister of the United States at Paris and the French Government, that will serve to show more distinctly the grounds upon which France claims to evict the United States from so essential a portion of their fishing rights on the coast of this island. The correspondence consists of four letters from Mr. Gallatin to Viscount Chateaubriand, dated January 22, March 14, April 2, and April 15, 1823, and two from Viscount Chateaubriand to Mr. Gallatin, dated February 28 and April 5, 1823. Copies of these letters are annexed. For the articles of the treaties (no longer, however, in force) between the United States and France, to which Viscount Chateaubriand alludes, see volume 1, of the Laws of the United States, edition of 1814, pages 80 and 131.

Note to Mr. Secretary Canning on the Newfoundland Fishery.

LONDON, May 3, 1824.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States, has received the instructions of his Government to lay before Mr. Canning, his Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the following case:

By the first article of the convention between the United States and Great Britain, concluded at London on the 20th of October, 1818, it is, amongst other things, provided that the "inhabitants of the said States shall have forever, in common with the subjects of his Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau islands, on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland, from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon islands, on the shores of the Magdalen islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks from Mount Joly, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the straits of Belleisle, and thence northwardly, indefinitely, along the coast."

After the ratification of the above convention, the fishermen of the United States proceeded, according to its stipulations, to take fish on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland, between the limits of Cape Ray and the Quirpon islands, as aforesaid; but, in the course of the years 1820 and 1821, whilst pursuing in a regular manner their right to fish within these limits, and being also within the strictest territorial jurisdiction of the island, these fishermen found themselves ordered away by the commanders of the armed vessels of France, on pain of seizure and confiscation of their fishing vessels.

This measure was afterwards ascertained to rest upon a claim set up by France to an exclusive fishery upon that part of the coast of the island—a claim conceived by the Government of the United States to be without just foundation, and in violation of the rights of the citizens of the United States, as settled by the foregoing article of the convention of 1818.

The Government of the United States forbore, at first, to make any representation of the above occurrence, so injurious to the interests as well as rights of their citizens, to the Government of his Britannic Majesty, cherishing the hope that the difficulty which appeared to have arisen would be removed on a fit representation to the court of France. A correspondence accordingly took place upon the subject between the American plenipotentiary at Paris and the Minister of Foreign Affairs of his most Christian Majesty, which, however, has not terminated in a manner satisfactory to the Government of the United States, it appearing from it that France distinctly asserts an exclusive right of fishery within the limits in question. Copies of this correspondence, consisting of four letters from Mr. Gallatin, dated the 22d of January, the 14th of March, the 2d of April, and the 15th of April, 1823, and of two letters from Viscount Chateaubriand, dated February the 28th and April the 5th, of the same year, the undersigned has the honor to inclose for the more full information of Mr. Canning. It will be seen that the United States claim for their citizens the right to take fish only, not to cure and dry the same, within the limits from which France would interdict them, and that their claim is in common with the subjects and fishermen of his Britannic Majesty. The undersigned has not been furnished with any affidavits or other formal proofs to substantiate the fact of the fishing vessels of the United States having been ordered away by French vessels-of-war, as above mentioned, since it will be seen, by the notes of the French Minister of State, that no question is raised upon that point, but that the fact itself is justified under a claim of right, thereby rendering superfluous all extrinsic evidence of its existence. The grounds of justification assumed by France are believed, by the Government of the United States, to be satisfactorily refuted by their plenipotentiary in the correspondence inclosed; and although France rests her claim as against the United States upon the footing of treaties once subsisting between the two powers, it will not fail to be perceived that she also asserts, in the most unqualified manner, her anterior, unlimited, and exclusive right to the fishery in question under the treaties of Utrecht and of Paris; consequently, as pre-existent to her former treaties with the United States, and paramount to all title in any other power. In the note of Viscount Chateaubriand, of the 5th of April, it is stated that the Chargé d'Affaires of France at Washington had been instructed to enter upon explanations with the Government of the United States concerning this interest, and was then about to be written to again on the same head; yet it becomes the duty of the undersigned to say that no adjustment of the subject has taken place, and that the fishing vessels of the United States still remain under the interdiction put upon them by the cruisers of France.

The undersigned, in fulfilling the orders of his Government to bring under the official notice of Mr. Secretary Canning the circumstances of the above case, does so in full reliance that, through the friendly dispositions of his Majesty's Government, the whole subject will receive such attention as it will be seen to merit. The United States seek only the fair and unmolested enjoyment of the fishing rights which they hold at the hands of Great Britain under the convention of 1818, satisfied that Great Britain, whether as regards the guarantee of those rights, or the maintenance of her own sovereign jurisdiction over this island and its immediate waters, will take such steps as the occasion calls for, and above all, as are appropriate to the just and amicable intentions which it may be so confidently supposed will animate the Government of his most Christian Majesty, as well as that of his Britannic Majesty, towards the United States, touching the full rights of the latter under the convention aforesaid.

The undersigned prays Mr. Canning to accept the assurances of his perfect consideration.

Right Hon. GEORGE CANNING,

His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

2. Arrangement for the adoption of measures to facilitate and complete, in an equitable and satisfactory manner, the settlement of claims made by the subjects or citizens of either of the two parties, to lands situated within the territories of the other in America, and arising out of grants heretofore made by authorities competent at the time to make such grants.

3. Agreement that on neither side shall debts due from individuals of the one nation to those of the other, or moneys which they may have in the public funds, or in public or private banks, ever be confiscated

9. Finally, that the consuls and vice consuls of either party having an executur, in due form, shall be exempt from the payment of direct taxes, and from personal service of every kind, respectively, within the territories of the other.

American paper on the Northwest Coast of America, (Twelfth Protocol.)

Whereas, by the third article of the convention between the United States and his Britannic Majesty, signed at London on the twentieth of October, 1818, it was agreed that any country that might be claimed by either party on the Northwest Coast of America, westward of the Stony mountains, should, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open, for the term of ten years from the date of the said convention, to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two powers; it having been understood that such agreement was not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim which either of the parties might have to any part of the said country, or taken to affect the claims of any other power, but only to prevent disputes and differences between the parties themselves; and whereas it is desirable that the provisions of the said article should be continued for a longer term than as therein specified: It is therefore agreed by the high contracting parties that the same shall continue in force for the full term of ten years from the signature of the present convention. The high contracting parties further agree that, during the like term, no settlement shall be made on the Northwest Coast of America, or on any of the islands thereunto adjoining, by citizens of the United States, north of the fifty-first degree of north latitude, or by British subjects either south of the said fifty-first degree or north of the fifty-fifth degree of north latitude.

It is agreed that the third article of the convention concluded at London on the 20th of October, 1818, between his Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, shall cease and determine from the date hereof; and instead of the stipulations contained in that article, it is further agreed that the boundary line between the territories claimed by his Britannic Majesty and those claimed by the United States, to the west, in both cases, of the Rocky mountains, shall be drawn due west along the 49th parallel of north latitude, to the point where that parallel strikes the great northeasternmost branch of the Oregon or Columbia river, marked in the maps as McGillivray's river, thence down along the middle of the Oregon or Columbia, to its junction with the Pacific Ocean; the navigation of the whole channel being perpetually free to the subjects and citizens of both parties, the said subjects and citizens being also reciprocally at liberty, during the term of ten years from the date hereof, to pass and repass by land and by water, and to navigate with their vessels and merchandise all the rivers, bays, harbors, and creeks, as heretofore, on either side of the above mentioned line, and to trade with all and any of the nations free of duty or impost of any kind; subject only to such local regulations as, in other respects, either of the two contracting parties may find it necessary to enforce within its own limits, and prohibited from furnishing the natives with fire-arms and other exceptionable articles to be hereafter enumerated; and it is further especially agreed that neither of the high contracting parties, their respective subjects or citizens, shall henceforward form any settlements within the limits assigned hereby to the other, west of the Rocky mountains, it being at the same time understood that any settlements already formed by the British to the south and east of the boundary line above described, or by citizens of the United States to the north and west of the same line, shall continue to be occupied and enjoyed at the pleasure of the present proprietors or occupants, without let or hindrance of any kind, until the expiration of the above mentioned term of ten years from the date hereof.

ARTICLE SECOND.—With the view of preventing the rights of navigation and of fishing, exercised upon the great ocean by the citizens and subjects of the Il est également stipulé que cette restriction ne pourra jamais servir de prétexte, ni être alléguée dans aucun cas, pour autoriser soit la visite ou la détention des vaisseaux, soit la saisie de la marchandise, soit en fin des mesures quelconques de contrainte envers les armateurs ou les équipages qui feroient ce commerce; les hautes puissances contractantes s'étant réciproquement réservé de statuer sur les peines à encourir, et d'infliger les amendes encourues en cas de contravention à cet article, par leurs citoyens ou sujets respectifs.

ARTICLE SIXIEME.—Lorsque cette convention aura été dûment ratifiée par le Président des Etats Unis de l'avis et du consentement du Sénat, d'une part, et de l'autre par sa Majesté l'Empereur de toutes les Russies, les ratifications en seront échangées à Washington dans le délai de dix mois de la date ci-dessous ou plutôt si faire se peut. high contracting powers, from becoming the pretext for an illicit trade, it is agreed that the citizens of the United States shall not resort to any point where there is a Russian establishment, without the permission of the governor or commander; and that, reciprocally, the subjects of Russia shall not resort, without permission, to any establishment of the United States upon the Northwest Coast.

ARTICLE THIRD.—It is moreover agreed, that, hereafter, there shall not be formed by the citizens of the United States, or under the authority of the said States, any establishment upon the Northwest Coast of America, nor in any of the islands adjacent, to the north of fifty-four degrees and forty minutes of north latitude; and that, in the same manner, there shall be none formed by Russian subjects, or under the authority of Russia, south of the same parallel.

ARTICLE FOURTH.—It is, nevertheless, understood that during a term of ten years, counting from the signature of the present convention, the ships of both powers or which belong to their citizens or subjects, respectively, may reciprocally frequent, without any hindrance whatever, the interior seas, gulfs, harbors, and creeks upon the coast mentioned in the preceding article, for the purpose of fishing and trading with the natives of the country.

ARTICLE FIFTH.—All spirituous liquors, fire-arms, other arms, powder, and munitions of war of every kind, are always excepted from this same commerce permitted by the preceding article; and the two powers engage, reciprocally, neither to sell nor suffer them to be sold to the natives by their respective citizens and subjects, nor by any person who may be under their authority. [2D SESSION.]

PIRACY AND OUTRAGE ON COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES BY SPANISH PRIVATEERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES JANUARY 31, 1825.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred so much of the President's message to Congress, at the opening of the present session, as relates to piracy and the outrages committed upon our commerce by vessels bearing Spanish commissions, and the memorials from different quarters of the Union on the same subjects, availing themselves of the documents accompanying the President's message to the Senate, of the 13th of January, which have been printed by order of that body, present to the House the result of their deliberations upon the subject submitted to them:

From the commencement of the revolution which has terminated in the separation of Spanish continental America from Old Spain, the commerce of the United States, in common with that of all other nations, has suffered frequent outrages from the vessels of the adverse parties duly commissioned, with doubtful commissions, and from pirates who sought to conceal their true character by the use of the flag of some one of the belligerents. Constant efforts have been made by this Government to redress injuries suffered and to prevent future outrage. Congress has at all times been prepared to give, and has afforded, all the means necessary for these purposes within its province.

The act of the third of March, 1819, was passed specially to protect the commerce of the United States and punish the crime of piracy. It gave to the President power (a power, however, which the President possesses without an act of Congress) to employ the public armed vessels of the United States to protect our merchant vessels and their crews from piratical aggression and depredation; to authorize the detention, capture, and trial of any armed vessels which attempted any piratical depredation, search, seizure, or restraint of an American vessel. It authorized our merchant vessels to capture armed ships not commissioned by a friendly power, and to recapture vessels taken by them, and it directed the condemnation of the vessels so captured or recaptured; it provided for the punishment of the pirates, when convicted by the competent tribunals. This act was limited to one year, but was continued in force by the act of May 15, 1820, for two years, and the first four sections made perpetual by the act of the 30th January, 1823.

The re-establishment of the constitutional Government in Old Spain, in March, 1820, inspired the strongest hope that the contest between Spain and Spanish continental America would be soon amicably terminated in a manner satisfactory to the parties at war, to the commercial and civilized world, and to all the lovers of humanity, justice, and liberty. The first movements of the regenerated government promised a speedy realization of this hope.

The Cortes of Spain directed negotiations to be opened with Spanish America; Commissioners were appointed, but the contending parties did not take the same view of the great questions between them. Old Spain would not admit the recognition of the independence of the Spanish American Governments as the basis of negotiation; and the Spanish American Governments would not negotiate without that preliminary recognition. While these abortive attempts at negotiation were made, there was a temporary cessation of hostilities in Venezuela. The war, however, was renewed in Venezuela before the negotiations were broken off. Fortune favored the Americans, and the European Spaniards were driven from the continent. During this desperate contest, General Morales, the commander of the Spanish forces, issued his extraordinary proclamation declaring a coast of twelve hundred miles in a state of blockade, and interdicting all foreign commerce with the Spanish Main as inconsistent with the colonial law of Old Spain. This proclamation has been the fruitful source of most of the evils since suffered by all commercial nations in the West Indies and in the Gulf of Mexico. Numerous pirates and swarms of privateersmen (subsequently degenerated into pirates) have preyed upon all neutral commerce. Protection to that of the United States should have been, if it has not been, afforded against pirates by the use of all the necessary means under the control of the Executive; by a vigorous exertion of the naval power; by incessant watchfulness on the seas, and on the coasts infested by them; rigorous examination of all suspected vessels of every size; ardent pursuit of the persons found flagrante delicto, wherever they sought refuge; careful prosecution before the competent tribunals of all the accused who were taken; unrelenting severity in inflicting punishment, where guilt was judicially established, against privateersmen; by appeals to the Government of Spain, requiring immediate redress for the past and security for the future; if made in vain, application should have been made to Congress to authorize reprisals, or to declare war, as the extent of the injury and a due regard to the condition of the Spanish Government should have required. A further reference, however, to the past would not be useful. For the present and for the future, if legislative provisions are necessary, they should be made.

Piracy at present exists in the same form as in the year 1822, when a species of naval force, supposed to be particularly adapted to suppress it, was placed at the disposal of the Executive. This force was believed to have answered the expectations entertained of it, as the President at the opening of the last session of Congress announced that "it had been eminently successful in the accomplishment of its objects." If further experience has shown that this species of force is inadequate to the accomplishment of the object, and that another may be advantageously substituted, there can be no doubt of the propriety of the substitution. This is a point, however, that the committee do not consider it their duty to examine; it belongs properly to another committee, the result of whose deliberations on it has been already presented to the House. The merchants of the United States who have, with the exception of our seamen, the deepest interest in this subject, suggests the propriety of suffering the owners of vessels to arm for their own defence. There is no law forbidding such defensive armament, nor is any law required to justify it. It is, however, asserted that the restraints upon the armament of merchant vessels are inconvenient and oppressive, and that they ought to be removed. The only provision on this subject is that which requires bond and security to be given to prevent an unlawful use of the armed vessel; a provision which should not be changed—an adherence to which the best interest of commerce requires.

The propriety of authorizing by law the pursuit of the pirates on land has also been a subject of consideration. The committee do not deem an act of Congress for this purpose necessary. The rule of international law is, that fugitives from the justice of one nation are to be considered in another as strangers entitled to protection, and having a right of residence, on the common principle that no nation has a right to punish a person who has not offended itself, nor is it bound to assist its neighbor in the execution of its criminal laws. Pirates are criminals against all nations, punishable in every tribunal; the common enemies of mankind; the duty of all nations and every man is, to hunt them down, that they may be delivered up to offended justice. Fresh pursuit of enemies into the territory of a common friend is not universally admitted to be a right of war. Powerful nations never permit feeble neighbors to enter their territory for this purpose, but enter without scruple in pursuit of their enemies the territory of such neighbors, unless restrained by the apprehension that the mutual friend seeks a fair occasion to become an ally against them in war. Practically, the question is one not of right, but of relative power. The pursuit of a mutual enemy into the territory of a friendly or allied power is a right of war; it cannot be deemed a violation of the sovereignty of that power; it confers a favor, and imposes upon him an obligation of gratitude.

The common enemy cannot avail himself of the protection of the territory of the third power but by surrendering himself as prisoner of war, and in that event, if the force of the pursuer was the cause of the surrender, the pursuer might rightfully claim the benefit of the surrender. Under this rule the pursuit and capture of pirates anywhere and everywhere may be justified. The Executive has acted upon it. Instructions have been given to our naval commanders to pursue and capture on Spanish territory pirates who seek refuge or concealment there. The Government of Spain has been duly warned of the existence of these orders; it knows that they will be obeyed. No remonstrance has been made by it; no objections have, as far as the committee have been informed, been urged. The acquiescence of Spain is all that should be desired. A distinction is supposed to exist between pursuit of pirates on lands uninhabited and those inhabited; and it is imagined that the authority of Congress is necessary to justify pursuit in the latter case, while in the former the power of the Executive alone is sufficient. The committee do not admit the correctness of this distinction. Fresh pursuit is justifiable in either case, if necessary to the capture of the pirate. There is greater danger of collision with the friendly power when the object of pursuit flies into a settled country, and greater care is requisite to avoid giving offence; but the same principles apply to either case, and it is just as necessary that Congress should legislate to justify the capture of pirates as to authorize the pursuit of them into any place of refuge inhabited or unsettled.

From an attentive examination of the letters of the agent who was sent to Cuba to obtain information relative to pirates who have long infested the coast of that island, it would seem that no fresh pursuit on land will eradicate the evil. Authority must exist to search in the suspected settlements for persons believed to be guilty of piracy, and for the evidence of their guilt, and to bring them before our tribunals for trial and punishment. This authority Congress cannot give without making war upon Spain. It cannot be used without wresting from Spain her municipal jurisdiction. The evil lies too deep to be reached by any ordinary measures which foreign powers can apply to it.

The Government of Spain must give to the local authority what it is said to want—sufficient strength to prevent and to punish crimes; it must perform its duties, or those who suffer from its neglect or weakness will be driven by the necessity of the case to apply the corrective. The committee would bring more distinctly into view the only efficient remedy, and recommend a resort to it, if they believed sufficient time had elapsed since remonstrances were made by our Government to Spain to prove incontestably that she wanted either the power or the will to do her duty, although they are aware that the conduct of any Government in applying that remedy without previous concert with other nations alike interested in the question would be liable to misconception, and excite well founded jealousies. The committee cannot doubt that the Executive, applying all proper means to prevent, to detect, and to punish the crime of piracy, and pressing upon Spain and her local authorities that the honor and the interest of Spain requires their best exertions for the same purpose, will not fail to confer with the great commercial nations on the extraordinary measures to be used, if the object is not speedily accomplished by the faithful exertion of the powers of Spain.

The danger to which our commerce is exposed, and the injuries it has suffered from privateers acting under regular or irregular commissions, are of a different character, and require a different remedy. The committee understand that outrages of this kind have almost, if not entirely, ceased; for those which have been inflicted, or which may hereafter be inflicted, Spain is directly responsible. Reparation must be had, by negotiation or by the exercise of such powers as may, for that purpose, be vested in the Executive by Congress.

To guard against future injury, the safest resource is to enforce, promptly, ample redress for that which has been suffered. The committee have already referred to the injuries suffered in consequence of the proclamation of Morales. Those injuries are not yet redressed. The Government of Spain has not attempted to justify a proclamation declaring, with a naval force insufficient to shut up the smallest port on the coast, a seacoast of twelve hundred miles in a state of blockade, nor the absurd pretension that the property of all neutral nations is, under the colonial law of Spain, liable to confiscation if taken on its way to Spanish America; but the property of American citizens captured by privateers from the islands of Porto Rico and Cuba, and from Porto Cabello, is now withheld under these pretensions. The Spanish Government, having formally revoked the blockade, gives to the tribunals of Spain an excuse for the condemnation of all property seized prior to that revocation; an excuse of which they do not hesitate to avail themselves. Acting under instructions from the President, of the 28th April, 1823, the minister of the United States at the court of Spain demanded satisfaction in January, 1824, from that Government for the outrages committed from Porto Cabello and the islands of Porto Rico and Cuba upon the commerce of the United States, and for the wanton murder of one of our gallant officers in the harbor of St. John, by the officer commanding the fort at its entrance. In September of the same year Spain was again called upon to indemnify those who had suffered in person or property under the proclamation of blockade, or from the interdiction of neutral commerce to the Spanish Main. In October the just reclamations of our Government were, for the third time, formally made to the Government of Spain. No satisfaction has been given; no indemnity has been promised; nor has there been even a satisfactory excuse given for the delay to answer the just demands of the minister of the United States.

The character of the injury sustained, its origin, the period elapsed since it was inflicted, the formal and fruitless demand for reparation for more than twelve months, justify reprisals. An anxious desire not to act harshly to a Government embarrassed by internal difficulties and enfeebled by recent revolutions, the distance of the seat of the Spanish Government from the places in which the evils complained of originated, the death of the minister appointed by the Spanish Government on the eve of his departure to this country, and the recent selection of another minister, whose appointment and intended departure for the United States has been communicated in an official letter, a translation of which is herewith presented to the House, induce the committee not to propose any legislative enactment, under the firm conviction that this forbearance will give to Spain a new motive to make speedily ample reparation for the injuries sustained, and that, if it does not produce this desired effect, it will justify, in the eyes of all nations, any and every step Congress may hereafter be compelled to take.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 24, 1825.

SIR: I have the honor of inclosing herewith a translation of the only answer yet received from the Spanish Government to Mr. Nelson's notes on the subject of piracy and outrages on our commerce. It has been received since the communications to Congress of the previous documents were made.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

SAN LORENZO, November 19, 1824.

SIR: From the middle of September last, when I took possession of the appointment which the kindness of the King, my august master, deigned to entrust to me, I dedicated, by order of his Majesty, my attention to the different notes presented by you relative to the claims of the American subjects who thought themselves entitled to be indemnified by Spain for the losses which they have suffered in the seas of America. A business so complicated, in which considerable interests are involved, presented so much more difficulty, by how much there were intermingled with it other interests and other claims of Spanish subjects against the Government, and subjects of the United States.

His Majesty, desirous of preserving the friendship and good harmony which happily subsists between both nations, and that, in faithful observance of existing treaties, both Governments should terminate, in a friendly manner, this delicate question, the legitimate rights and just pretensions of both being mutually conciliated, has thought that the most proper means for gaining this desired end is to send immediately a minister plenipotentiary to reside near the American Government, who, by his information, prudence, and practical knowledge of the relations between both countries, may be, at the same time, the interpreter and the executor of the just intentions of the King. In consequence, his Majesty has been pleased to appoint Don José de Heredia his Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary in the United States of America. He will set out for his new destination as soon as possible.

I hasten to inform you of this, that you may be pleased to lay it before your Government; and I avail myself of this occasion to repeat to you the assurances of my most distinguished consideration. God preserve you many years.

Your most obedient servant,

FRANCISCO DE ZEA BERMUDEZ.

RATIFIED TREATY WITH TUNIS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE FEBRUARY 4, 1825.

To the Senate of the United States:

I communicate, herewith, to both Houses of Congress, copies of the alterations in the treaty of peace and friendship of August, 1797, between the United States and the Bashaw Bey of Tunis, concluded at the palace of Bardo, near Tunis, on the 24th of February last, and of treaties* between the United States and the Sac and Fox tribes of Indians, and the Iowa tribe of Indians, concluded at the city of Washington, on the 4th of August last, which have been duly ratified.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, February 2, 1825.

* These treaties will be found in Class of Indian Affairs.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas certain alterations in the treaty of peace and friendship of August, 1797, between the United States and the Bashaw Bey of Tunis were agreed upon and concluded between his Highness Sidi Mahmoud, the Bey, and S. D. Heap, chargé d'affaires of the United States at Tunis, on the twenty-fourth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, by the articles in the words following, to which are annexed the altered articles as they were in the treaty before the alterations:

Whereas sundry articles of the treaty of peace and friendship concluded between the United States of America and Hamuda Bashaw, of happy memory, in the month of Rebia Elul, in the year of the Hegira, 1212, corresponding with the month of August, of the Christian year 1797, have, by experience, been found to require alteration and amendment: In order, therefore, that the United States should be placed on the same footing with the most favored nations having treaties with Tunis, as well as to manifest a respect for the American Government, and a desire to continue, unimpaired, the friendly relations which have always existed between the two nations, it is hereby agreed and concluded between his Highness Sidi Mahmoud Bashaw, Bey of Tunis, and S. D. Heap, esq., chargé d'affaires of the United States of America, that alteration be made in the sixth, eleventh, twelfth, and fourteenth articles of said treaty, and that the said articles shall be altered and amended in the treaty to read as follows:

ARTICLE VI—As it now is.

If a Tunisian corsair shall meet with an American vessel, and shall visit it with her boat, two men only shall be allowed to go on board, peaceably, to satisfy themselves of its being an American, who, as well as any passengers of other nations they may have on board, shall go free, both them and their goods; and the said two men shall not exact anything, on pain of being severely punished. In case a slave escapes, and takes refuge on board of an American vessel of war, he shall be free, and no demand shall be made either for his restoration or for payment.

ARTICLE XI—As it now is.

When a vessel-of-war of the United States shall enter the port of the Gouletta she shall be saluted with twenty-one guns, which salute the vessel-of-war shall return gun for gun only, and no powder will be given, as mentioned in the ancient eleventh article of this treaty, which is hereby annulled.

ARTICLE XII—As it now is.

When citizens of the United States shall come within the dependencies of Tunis to carry on commerce there, the same respect shall be paid to them which the merchants of other nations enjoy; and if they wish to establish themselves within our ports no opposition shall be made thereto, and they shall be free to avail themselves of such interpreters as they may judge necessary, without any obstruction, in conformity with the usages of other nations; and if a Tunisian subject shall go to establish himself within the dependencies of the United States he shall be treated in like manner. If any Tunisian subject shall freight an American vessel and load her with merchandise, and shall afterwards want to unload or ship them on board of another vessel, we shall not permit him until the matter is determined by a reference of merchants, who shall decide upon the case, and, after the decision, the determination shall be conformed to.

No captain shall be detained in port against his consent, except when our ports are shut for the vessels of all other nations, which may take place with respect to merchant vessels, but not to those of war.

ARTICLE VI—As it was.

If a Tunisian corsair shall meet with an American merchant vessel, and shall visit it with her boat, she shall not exact anything, under pain of being severely punished; and, in like manner, if a vessel-of-war of the United States shall meet with a Tunisian merchant vessel, she shall observe the same rule. In case a slave shall take refuge on board of an American vessel-of-war, the consul shall be required to cause him to be restored; and if any of their prisoners shall escape on board of the Tunisian vessels, they shall be restored; but if any slave shall take refuge in any American merchant vessel, and it shall be proved that the vessel has departed with the said slave, then he shall be returned, or his ransom shall be paid.

ARTICLE XI—As it was.

When a vessel-of-war of the United States of America shall enter the port of Tunis, and the consul shall request that the castle may salute her, the number of guns shall be fired which he may request; and if the said consul does not want a salute, there shall be no question about it. But, in case he shall desire the salute, and the number of guns shall be fired which he may have requested, they shall be counted, and returned by the vessel in as many barrels of cannon powder.

The same shall be done with respect to the Tunisian corsairs when they shall enter any port of the United States.

ARTICLE XII—As it was.

When citizens of the United States shall come within the dependencies of Tunis to carry on commerce there, the same respect shall be paid to them which the merchants of other nations enjoy; and if they wish to establish themselves within our ports no opposition shall be made thereto, and they shall be free to avail themselves of such interpreters as they may judge necessary, without any obstruction, in conformity with the usages of other nations; and if a Tunisian subject shall go to establish himself within the dependencies of the United States he shall be treated in like manner. If any Tunisian subject shall freight an American vessel and load her with merchandise, and shall afterwards want to unlade or ship them on board of another vessel, we will not permit them until the matter is determined by a reference of merchants, who shall decide upon the case, and, after the decision, the determination shall be conformed to.

No captain shall be detained in port against his consent, except when our ports are shut for the vessels of all other nations, which may take place with respect to merchant vessels, but not to those of war.

The subjects and citizens of the two nations, respectively, Tunisians and Americans, shall be protected in the places where they may be, by the officers of the Government there existing; but, on failure of such protection, and for redress of every injury, the party may resort to the chief authority in each country, by whom adequate protection and complete justice shall be rendered. In case the Government of Tunis shall have need of an American vessel for its service, such vessel being within the Regency, and not previously engaged, the Government shall have the preference, on its paying the same freight as other merchants usually pay for the same service, or at the like rate, if the service be without a customary precedent.

ARTICLE XIV—As it now is.

All vessels belonging to the citizens and inhabitants of the United States shall be permitted to enter the ports of the Kingdom of Tunis and freely trade with the subjects and inhabitants thereof, on paying the usual duties which are paid by other most favored nations at peace with the Regency. In like manner, all vessels belonging to the subjects and inhabitants of the Kingdom of Tunis shall be permitted to enter the different ports of the United States, and freely trade with the citizens and inhabitants thereof, on paying the usual duties which are paid by other most favored nations at peace with the United States.

The subjects of the two contracting powers shall be under the protection of the Prince, and under the jurisdiction of the chief of the place where they may be, and no other person shall have authority over them. If the commandant of the place does not conduct himself agreeably to justice, a representation of it shall be made to us.

In case the Government shall have need of an American merchant vessel, it shall cause it to be freighted, and then a suitable freight shall be paid to the captain, agreeably to the intention of the Government, and the captain shall not refuse it.

ARTICLE XIV—As it was.

A Tunisian merchant, who may go to America with a vessel of any nation soever, loaded with merchandise which is the production of the Kingdom of Tunis, shall pay duty (small as it is) like the merchants of other nations; and the American merchants shall equally pay for the merchandise of their country which they may bring to Tunis, under their flag, the same duty as the Tunisians pay in America. But if an American merchant, or a merchant of any other nation, shall bring American merchandise under any other flag, he shall pay six per cent. duty; in like manner, if a foreign merchant shall bring the merchandise of his country under the American flag, he shall also pay six per cent.

Concluded, signed, and sealed at the Palace of Bardo, near Tunis, the 24th day of the moon Jumed-teni, in the year of the Hegira, 1239, corresponding to the 24th of February, 1824, of the Christian year, and the forty-eighth year of the Independence of the United States, reserving the same, nevertheless, for the final ratification of the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

S. D. HEAP, Chargé d'Affaires. [L. s.]

And whereas the Senate of the United States did, on the 13th of January instant, two-thirds of the senators present concurring therein, advise and consent to the ratification of the convention containing the said alterations; and whereas, in pursuance of the said advice and consent, I have ratified, on the part of the United States, the said articles:

Now, therefore, I do hereby proclaim the same, and have caused the said articles to be made public, to the end that they and every clause thereof, as they now are, may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and their citizens.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed. Done at the city of Washington, this twenty-first day of January, in the year of our Lord [L. s.] one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, and of the Independence of the United States the forty-ninth.

PIRATES IN THE ISLAND OF CUBA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES FEBRUARY 11, 1825.

Extract of a letter from Francis Adams, Commercial Agent of the United States at Matanzas, to Mr. Adams, dated December 30, 1824.

"Those piratical bands, who have become the disgrace and scourge of the island, are for the present restrained by the number and vigilance of the forces sent by the United States and Great Britain for their suppression, but that they are only restrained and not extirpated is certain, from the fact that few or none have been captured, and that depredations have recently been committed on land, by bodies of fifteen to twenty persons, by which the foreign settlers on the coast have been the sufferers. Their migratory course of life, and the various points of the coast which afford fine harbors, and are at the same time distant from any military post, or even inhabited district, renders their extirpation by the authorities of the island difficult, if not impossible; and the arming of merchant vessels to resist the attacks of small boats, and the constant presence of a naval force sufficient to prevent the egress of larger vessels, appears to be the only means of securing our trade from their depredations, until the hopelessness of their employment, or the revival of Spanish commerce, shall have induced an abandonment of their desperate course of life."

The Secretary of State, in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st of January last, directing him to communicate to that House any information he may have in this Department "showing whether the duties levied on the tonnage of the vessels of the United States entering the ports of the Kingdom of the Netherlands, and on the merchandise with which they may be loaded, exceed those paid by the vessels belonging to the said Kingdom," has the honor to submit to the House of Representatives copies of the correspondence in this Department having relation to that subject.

Respectfully submitted.

Extracts of a letter (No. 102) from Mr. Everett to Mr. Adams, datedBRUSSELS, March 17, 1823.

"I have the honor to inclose copies of two notes which I have lately had occasion to address to Baron de Nagell, and of his answer to them."

"The reply to my application in regard to the difference in the duties imposed upon goods imported in national and foreign vessels is merely an acknowledgment of the receipt of the note. As the principal object of the new financial system is to encourage the commerce and navigation of this country, it is perhaps hardly to be expected that the exception which I have suggested in favor of the United States will be admitted. If it is not, a partial repeal of the law of the 20th of April, 1818, will probably be thought necessary. But as this measure cannot be taken till the meeting of the next Congress, there will be ample time in the interval to receive the definitive answer of this Government."

"A separate discriminating duty in favor of national vessels has also been imposed since the commencement of this year upon the importation of coffee from Batavia, which is to be in force until the end of 1824."

No. 2.

Mr. Everett to the Baron de Nagell.

BRUSSELS, March 7, 1823.

Sir: The new tariff which has recently gone into operation contains several articles affecting the commercial relations between this country and the United States. I think it my duty to invite your excellency's attention to these articles, and to point out the manner in which they will operate upon the American trade.

Your excellency will recollect that the Government of the United States, by the law of the 20th of April, 1818, extended to the ships of the Netherlands arriving in the ports of the Republic nearly the same privileges that are enjoyed by our own. They pay the same tonnage duty, and also the same duties on their cargoes, as far as these consist of articles being the growth or manufacture of the Netherlands, or of such neighboring countries as usually ship their products from the Dutch ports. These privileges were granted to the commerce of the Netherlands in consequence of the adoption, in this Kingdom, of the law of October 3, 1816, which abolished the discriminating tonnage duty, and of the understanding that there was no other discriminating duties in force. If any change were to take place in the laws of this Kingdom, in either of these respects, the natural consequence would be a corresponding change in those of the United States.

I regret to find that the new financial system appears to contemplate some important alterations of this description. Several articles of the tariff establish a difference of duties in favor of goods imported in Dutch vessels; and the law of the 26th of August, 1822, creates, in the form of a drawback, a general discrimination to the same effect; the tenth article being as follows: One-tenth of the duties paid upon the importation or exportation of all goods shall be returned when the same are imported or exported in Dutch vessels, excepting those articles of which the importation and exportation in Dutch vessels are otherwise specifically favored by the tariff.

It has always been the wish of the Government of the United States to lend its aid in placing the commerce of the world upon the most liberal footing. With this view, it was proposed to all the powers of Europe, soon after the close of the late wars, to abolish, mutually, all discriminating duties on tonnage; and the proposition having been, in substance, accepted by the Government of the Netherlands, the arrangement took effect between the two countries. As it was also understood that no other discriminating duties existed, a similar regulation was established in favor of goods imported in Dutch vessels into the United States. It is obvious, however, that these privileges cannot be continued upon any other principle than that of reciprocity. It would not suit either with the honor or interest of the United States that the merchants of the Netherlands should enjoy in our ports the same advantages with native citizens, while our merchants were subjected in this country to unfavorable discriminations. If this Government is resolved to abandon the equalizing system, which led to the enactment of our law of April 20, 1818, the immediate and necessary consequence will be the repeal of that law, as far as it applies to the vessels of the Netherlands.

I must, therefore, take the liberty of requesting your excellency to inform me whether it is the intention of the Government of this country that the new principles introduced by the late tariff shall be applied to the American trade. The Government of the United States has no wish to interpose, in any way, with the policy of the Netherlands, and has never sought or accepted exclusive or onerous commercial advantages in the ports of any nation. The liberal system which has lately prevailed in the intercourse between the two countries was regarded as mutually beneficial, and as conformable to the general spirit of the administration of both. I assure your excellency that my Government would regret to find itself compelled to depart from this system, and I venture to hope that you will furnish me with such explanations as may show that a measure of that kind will not be necessary.

I have the honor to be, with high respect, sir, your excellency's obedient servant,

A. H. EVERETT.

Baron de Nagell to Mr. Everett.

[Translation.]

The undersigned, Minister of Foreign Affairs, being eager to lay before the King the note which Mr. Everett, chargé d'affaires of the United States of America, sent him, of the 7th of this month, has the honor of informing him that the observations which it contains on the new system of imposts of the Kingdom of the Netherlands, as far as it applies to the commerce of the United States, shall immediately be taken into grave consideration.

The undersigned flatters himself with being shortly enabled to give to Mr. Everett the desired explanations on this subject, and embraces this occasion to renew to him the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

BRUSSELS, March 10, 1823.

A. W. C. DE NAGELL.

No. 5.

Baron de Nagell to Mr. Everett.

[Translation.]

The new system of duties introduced in the Kingdom of the Netherlands having naturally appeared to the Government of the United States of America to produce a change in the commercial relations between the two countries, Mr. Everett had thought it his duty to demand, by the note which he had done him the honor of addressing to the undersigned Minister of Foreign Affairs, on the 7th of March last, explanations proper to tranquilize in this regard the Government of the United States, or to direct its future conduct.

The King has just authorized the undersigned to give here the explanations desired.

The 10th article of the law which precedes the new tariff of duties of entry and clearance is the argument upon which Mr. Everett founds his representations. This article grants a drawback of ten per cent. of the duties on merchandise imported or exported by the vessels of the Netherlands; now, as by an act of Congress of the United States, of April 20, 1818, all difference of treatment between the ships of the Netherlands and America has been abolished, founded upon this, that in the Kingdom of the Netherlands the flag of the United States enjoyed the same advantages as the national flag, the new disposition of the tariff appears to Mr. Everett to be in opposition to the principle of reciprocity.

The answer is found in the aim of this disposition, which does not appear to have been well understood.

By the laws of 12th June, 1821, and 10th August last, the duties remain, without distinction, the same for foreign ships and for national. This restitution of a tenth for the merchandise imported by the ships of the Netherlands, has done no more (as the 11th article of the law of the 12th July, 1821, expresses it) than to give encouragement and proper aid to the works of the nation. This restitution, therefore, supplies the place of the premiums of encouragement which the Government might have granted to every ship built in the Netherlands; a disposition which certainly never could have given room to the American Government to complain of an inequality of treatment in respect to the ships. If the Government of the United States had found it good to grant a similar premium to the American ships, surely the King could have found in that no cause of remonstrance. His Majesty would have only seen in it a bounty intended to encourage or to favor the manufactures of the nation.

Although the Government of the Netherlands might confine itself to this explanation, the undersigned has, nevertheless, been charged to take advantage of this occasion to examine the question more thoroughly. In approaching it with frankness, it will be easy to find in the conduct of the United States the justification of what is charged upon the Government of the Netherlands.

After the negotiations begun at the Hague by the respective Commissioners, for a treaty of commerce, were interrupted, the act of Congress of April 20, 1818, was passed. In the course of these negotiations, observation was made to the American Commissioners of the liberality of the Government of the Netherlands in its relations with America, and an attempt was made to convince them that at all times the American flag had been more favored here than the flag of the Netherlands had been in America.

Such are apparently the reports of the American plenipotentiaries, as well as the representations of the chargé d'affaires of his Majesty at Washington, which produced this act of April 20, 1818, by which that of March 3, 1815, concerning the general, but conditional abolition of discriminating duties, has been rendered applicable, and even amplified, to the flag of the Netherlands. As long as this state of things exists, the explanations demanded in the official letter of Mr. Everett may appear proper.

But can Mr. Everett be ignorant that his Government is upon the point of revoking the prolongation of these advantages; and that an act of the 3d of March, 1819, decrees that the two acts before cited (that of March 3, 1815, and of April 20, 1818) shall cease to be in force at the date of January 1, 1824; and that, in consequence, the equalization of duties of entry and clearance, and the duties of tonnage of vessels under the flag of the Netherlands, in the different ports of the United States, will no more continue after that time? His note would cause the presumption that he had no knowledge of it; otherwise, we may be allowed to believe that he would not have addressed it. It is, doubtless, a matter of surprise that he has not been informed of a disposition which so essentially changes the state of affairs; but, although it does not belong to this article, it is sufficient that it is impossible for the Government of the Netherlands to call in question the existence of this revocation for having a ground upon which the commercial relations with the United States are to be found, and to know which of the two Governments has made the commencement.

The discussion of the causes which can have determined the American Government to revoke, from the beginning of the following session of Congress, the act of April 20, 1818, is unknown to the Government of the Netherlands. No conjecture will be permitted if the measure, in place of being specially directed against the commerce of the Netherlands, do not rather announce a complete alteration of system.

The deliberations of Congress in the fall will resolve this problem; but, in the meantime, the certain prospect of losing the advantages assured by the act before mentioned to our commerce or to our navigation alone serves as a sufficient cause for preventing the Government of the Netherlands from establishing any exception in the new tariff in favor of the American flag.

The undersigned has the honor to renew to Mr. Everett the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

BRUSSELS, May 27, 1823.

A. W. C. DE NAGELL.

No. 6.

Mr. Everett to the Baron de Nagell.

BRUSSELS, May 31, 1823.

Sir: I have just received your excellency's answer to the note which I had the honor of addressing to you on the 7th March, upon the subject of some of the provisions of the new tariff, and learn, with regret, from this communication, that it is the King's intention to enforce these provisions against the commerce of the United States. I shall immediately transmit your reply to my Government, who will judge how far the new policy of this country is justified by the arguments you allege in its favor, and what measure it may be expedient for them to adopt under the circumstances of the case.

Without pretending to anticipate the decision of the President and Congress of the United States upon this subject, I think it my duty to add here a few short remarks, relating chiefly to the latter part of your excellency's note, in which you dwell upon the effect of the act of March 3, 1819. You appear to consider this act as a definitive repeal of the two former laws on the same subject, and looking at it from this point of view you naturally conclude that it forms of itself a complete reply to the reasoning in my note, and that, because I did not mention it, I could not be aware of its existence. The act is a document of public notoriety, and is printed in the collection of the Laws of the United States, with the other laws which I had occasion to quote. It produced no material effect upon the relations between the countries, and did not, therefore, require to be mentioned in the course of my remarks upon the subject. I rather regret, however, that I had not attended to it, and explained its operation, inasmuch as the construction given to it by your excellency, though erroneous, was natural enough in a foreigner unacquainted with the forms of our legislation, and seems to have had an unfavorable influence upon the whole tenor of your reply.

The object of this act, which wears the shape of a repeal of the two former ones, was to fix a time when the subject should be taken up again in Congress. A limitation of this sort is, with us, annexed to almost all new laws of much importance, and often makes a part of them. It furnishes, therefore, in this case, no proof of an intention to change the system; and as the laws and negotiations of the United States, subsequent to its adoption, prove, on the contrary, their disposition to adhere to it, there is little or no reason to doubt that the result of a reconsideration of the subject will be to re-enact the law, with such alterations as may appear expedient. Among these alterations will probably be the repeal of the privileges granted by the act to any powers which may have subsequently withdrawn the corresponding privileges formerly allowed by them to the citizens of the United States. Hence, the only effect of this act upon the relations between those States and the Netherlands will be to fix the time when the American Government will probably remodel their system in conformity to that which may be in force here; and if the King is really desirous to continue those relations upon their present footing, the act of March 3, 1819, instead of operating as an objection to the allowance of an exemption to American vessels from the effect of the new tariff, would serve, on the contrary, as a reason for taking such a measure with the least possible delay.

Such are the remarks which I have thought it my duty to communicate to your excellency in relation to the act of March 3, 1819. The other part of your answer, which treats more directly the points in question, would also admit of some objections. You intimate that, provided the duties levied upon foreigners and native citizens are nominally the same, a Government may allow a drawback in favor of the latter, without subjecting itself to the charge of partiality. This distinction seems, however, to be more formal than real; and if the foreigner actually pays in any way ten per cent. more than the citizen, it would be rather difficult to prove that they are placed upon an equal footing; or, in other words, that they pay the same. Your excellency also remarks, that the discrimination established by the new law, in favor of the subjects of the Netherlands, is justifiable on account of its object, which was to encourage the navigation of the country. In regard to this point, I must take the liberty to suggest that the end, supposing it to justify the means, does not change their character, nor, in this instance, prove that a discrimination in favor of citizens is consistent with perfect impartiality between citizens and foreigners. The American Government had in view the same object, viz: the encouragement of the navigation of their country, in establishing a discriminating tonnage duty in favor of our own vessels; but they certainly never thought of maintaining that the foreigners, against whom this discrimination operates, are as favorably treated in our ports as the citizens of the United States, or of claiming, under this pretence, an impartial treatment for the latter in the ports of such foreigners.

I must, however, beg your excellency, in conclusion, not to consider these new remarks as intended for the purpose of urging very strenuously upon the Government of the Netherlands a compliance with the proposition contained in my note of the 7th of March. My principal object has been to explain one or two points in that communication, which you seem to have misunderstood. The people of the United States are too well satisfied with the goodly heritage which the bounty of Providence has allotted to them, and too abundantly supplied from their own territories with the best products of almost all climates, to solicit very anxiously of any foreign power the concession of favors, commercial or political. In proposing to other nations to open to them, on a footing of equality, the immense and various resources of our vast Republic, they conceived themselves to be acting for the good of those nations and of humanity, as well as for their own. If the King does not deem it expedient for himself or his subjects to accept this offer, the Government of the United States, without complaining of his refusal, and without suffering much from it, will doubtless regret that the views of so enlightened a monarch upon a great question in political economy should be different from their own.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your excellency's very obedient servant,

A. H. EVERETT.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Everett, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States to the Netherlands.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, August 9, 1823.

Sir: Your despatches, to No. 105, inclusive, have been received, and your letters marked private, to No. 27.

The object requiring most immediate attention is your correspondence with the Baron de Nagell, concerning the law of the Netherlands, of the 26th of August, 1822, establishing a drawback of one-tenth of the duties upon merchandise exported or imported in national vessels, and referring to other favours to the national flag, in the general law, and in the tariff.

The view you have taken of both parts of the agreement, in the Baron de Nagell's note of the 27th of May, is approved, and leaves me little to say in addition to it. From the strenuous manner in which the Baron urges the act of Congress of the 3d March, 1819, in justification of the new discriminations in the law of the Netherlands, it is apparent that he places little reliance upon the other part of his note. The object of all discriminating duties is to favor the national shipping and ship-building interest; and whether in the shape of additional impost, of tonnage, of drawback, or of bounty, they are alike felt in the competition of navigation, and alike incompatible with the principle of equal privilege and burden. It will be proper, therefore, explicitly to state that the case, hypothetically stated by the Baron de Nagell, of a bounty upon ship-building, is considered by this Government as much within the principle of discriminating duties as a direct tonnage duty, and equally at variance with the system of equalization established with a mutual understanding between the United States and the Netherlands, by reciprocal acts of legislation.

The limitation prescribed by the act of Congress of March 3, 1819, was, as you have observed, no intimation of an intention on their part to abandon the system. The act of March 3, 1815, was an experimental offer, made to all the maritime nations. It was, in the course of the same year, accepted by Great Britain, confirmed in the form of a convention. A similar effort was made with the Netherlands in 1817, but without success; but the principle of equalization was established by corresponding legislative acts. The Hanseatic cities and Prussia successively acceded to the same system, and, as well as the Netherlands, required an extension of the equalizing principle offered by the act of Congress of March 3, 1815, to merchandise of the growth, produce, or manufacture of countries other than that to which the vessel should belong, but usually first exported from thence. In conceding this extension of their first offer to the cities of Hamburg and Bremen and to Prussia, after having yielded it to the Netherlands, Congress thought proper to fix a time for a deliberate revision of the whole system, and, therefore, limited the duration of all the laws relating to it to the 1st of January, 1824. But neither Congress nor the Executive Government have manifested any intention to abandon the system. The President has, on the contrary, more than once expressed the favorable view in which it is considered by him, and particularly in his message to Congress, at the opening of the session, on the 3d December, 1821.

The whole subject will undoubtedly be one of the first objects of deliberation at the ensuing session of Congress. There is no reason to doubt that the existing equalization with regard to the Netherlands would be continued, but for the change which has been made on their part. A declaration from that Government that the discriminations against which you have made representations have not been and will not be applicable to the United States so long as the vessels of the Netherlands in the ports of the United States shall continue to enjoy the equalization secured to them by the act of Congress of March 3, 1815, and April 20, 1818, will supersede, without doubt, all change of the existing regulations here favorable to the navigation of that country. It is very desirable that you should obtain such a declaration in time to forward it, so that it may be received here by the first Monday in December, when the session of Congress will commence, or as soon after as possible. The act of Congress on the revision of the system will probably pass in the course of that month.

In the Baron de Nagell's note mention is made of three laws of the Netherlands in relation to this subject, of 12th of June and 12th of July, 1821, and of the 10th of August, 1822. I will thank you to send me copies of all these acts in French, and also of the law of the 26th of August, 1822, and of the new tariff.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

BRUSSELS, November, 11, 1823.

Sir: Your despatches of the 8th and 9th of August, which came under the same cover, were received on the first of November. Agreeably to your instructions, I immediately addressed notes to the Baron de Nagell upon the subjects of both, copies of which are inclosed. I have requested an early answer respecting the discriminating duty, but there is very little chance of obtaining it in time for it to be known at Washington before the new law is passed.

The laws of July 12, 1821, and August 26, 1822, are the only ones quoted by the Baron de Nagell in his note of May 27. The appearance of a different date in one of the passages in which they are alluded to arose from an accidental error of the clerk in the original note, which, it seems, was retained, in the hurry of writing, in my copies. The beginning of the fifth paragraph should read, D'après les lois du 12

Juillet, 1821, et 26 Août dernier, instead of D'après les loix du 12 Juin, 1821, et 10 Août dernier. The law of the 12th of July and the tariff of the 26th of August were transmitted to the Department about the time of their adoption, viz: the former with my despatch No. 80, and the latter with my letter, marked "private No. 18." The general law of the 26th of August was not sent with the tariff, not being then in print. I have now the honor of sending you copies of both, bound together in a volume. I have made inquiry for the law of July 12, but have not yet been able to procure it; and the copy I have on hand is bound up in a volume with several other documents, which would be useless at the Department. As soon as I can obtain a copy I shall certainly transmit it to you. In the meantime, if you should have occasion to consult this law, you may perhaps find upon the files the copy which was sent before. It is, however, a mere statement of general principles, preliminary to the laws of August 26, 1822, and contains no regulations whatever intended for immediate practical effect.

You will observe that, besides the general drawback of ten per cent. in favor of national vessels, there are discriminations to a similar effect upon several separate articles. The principal of these are tea, coffee, and sugar. The duty on teas is raised by the present tariff; but the discrimination has existed since the year 1817, and does not appear to have been considered as inconsistent with the equalizing system, probably because the article is not of the growth of the United States. The discrimination in regard to coffee, established by the general law, article 5, section 9, is new; but being in favor of the national colonial trade, is not, perhaps, a fair subject of complaint. The additional duty on sugar, imported in foreign vessels, is however, a direct violation of the equalizing system; as are also those upon one or two other articles of less importance, such as salt, molasses, and wood for building, which, with the three mentioned above, are the only ones in which I have noticed any special discrimination.

A decree has lately been published, offering a bounty of eight florins per ton on all ships of above three hundred tons burden built within the country for three years to come. This regulation, which is intended to encourage the building of national ships, and not the trade in such ships after they are built, is, of course, no violation of the equalizing system. I have thought, since this decree made its appearance, that a bounty of this kind must have been intended by the Baron de Nagell, in his note of May 27, as the distinction between the effect of a bounty on transportation in national ships and a formal discrimination in the duties seems to be really too absurd to be taken in earnest by any man of common sense. If the Baron meant by his prime d'encouragement a bounty on ship building, it is true, as he says, that such a bounty would form no subject of complaint; but this fact does not strengthen his argument, because such a bounty has no analogy whatever to the drawback on goods imported in national ships. I should, perhaps, have introduced this idea in my note of the 5th, but I had written and transmitted it before the decree was in print.

I have the honor to be, with high respect, sir, your most obedient, and very humble servant,

A. H. EVERETT.

Mr. Everett to the Baron de Nagell.

BRUSSELS, November 5, 1823.

SIR: I have the honor to inform your excellency that I have just received the instructions of my Government in regard to the subjects treated of in my note of the 7th of last March. I am directed to communicate to you, for the information of his Majesty, the President's views respecting that affair.

My object in the note just mentioned was to remonstrate against certain parts of the new financial law, which appeared to me to infringe the system of impartiality that has formed, for some time past, the basis of the commercial relations between the United States and the Netherlands; and I specified particularly the tenth article of the law of the 20th of August, 1822, which establishes a drawback of ten per cent. of the whole amount of duties in favor of goods imported in Dutch vessels. Your excellency did me the honor to state, in reply, in your note of the 27th of May, that these distinctions were justifiable on the ground of their patriotic design, which was no other than to afford a suitable encouragement to the shipping of the country. You remarked, that a drawback in favor of the citizen was not equivalent in principle to a formal discrimination against foreigners, but rather to a bounty—a measure not inconsistent, in the view of his Majesty's Government, with a system of perfect impartiality between citizens and foreigners; and you added, in conclusion, that, supposing the article in question to be really inconsistent with such a system, the Government of the United States would still possess no right to demand their repeal, inasmuch as they had already, by their act of March 3, 1819, revoked their own former laws in favor of the commerce of the Netherlands.

As your excellency insisted a good deal upon this last point, and expressed some surprise that I had not alluded in my note to this act of 1819, I thought it my duty to inform you at the time, by my answer of May 31, that the law in question was intended merely to determine the period at which the subject should be taken up again in Congress, and that the Government of the United States had no design of abandoning the established system. I added, that the distinction pointed out by your excellency between the different modes of favoring the shipping of a country did not appear to me to be strictly just, and that, if foreigners really paid ten per cent. more than subjects, it was of little importance to them whether they did it in one form or another. Confining myself to these remarks, I referred the matter to my Government for decision, and transmitted to Washington the correspondence that had passed.

I have now the honor of informing your excellency, by direction of the President, that he has learned with much regret the intention of his Majesty's Government to alter the liberal system which has been in force for some time past, and which was considered as beneficial to both parties, and conformable to their general principles of administration.

As to the reasoning by which your excellency justifies this change in your note of the 27th of March, my Government confirms, in general, the remarks which I had made in reply to it in my communication of the 31st of the same month. The President cannot admit the correctness of the distinction between the effect of a bounty or a drawback and that of a formal discrimination. He thinks, on the contrary, that impartiality is at an end whenever the foreigner finds himself in any way less advantageously situated than the native, and is rather surprised that the Government of the Netherlands should question a principle which appears so perfectly evident. And, as your excellency seems to have taken it for granted that the Government of the United States would not have considered a bounty on the transportation of goods in Dutch vessels as any violation of the equalizing system, I am authorized to assure you explicitly that, in the view of the American Government, such a measure would be entirely inadmissible, being equivalent in principle, as it is in effect, to a formal discrimination.

The patriotic intention of his Majesty's Government in adopting these measures is highly honorable to the character of the King and his ministers, but cannot certainly be understood to reconcile contraries, or to prove that discriminations in favor of native citizens are consistent with a system of impartiality between citizen and foreigner. The encouragement of the national industry is, doubtless, with enlightened Governments, the principal object of all commercial regulations; and in seeking to effect this object each Government adopts the policy which appears to suit best with its particular position. Some nations attempt to include the competition of foreigners by [placing] them higher than citizens, and by granting bounties to the latter; while others, on the contrary, endeavor to make their dominion the marts of general commerce, and hold out every possible inducement to foreigners to frequent their ports. This latter policy was formerly preferred in the Netherlands, at the time when Bourges, Antwerp, and Amsterdam figured, in succession, with so much brilliancy, at the head of the industry and commerce in Europe; and it seems, in fact, to agree very well with the situation of a country of limited extent and dense population, watered by numerous rivers that connect it with the more productive parts of Europe, and embosomed in seas that afford an easy intercourse with all the rest of the world. Both these systems, however, have their peculiar advantages; and each supposes alike, on the part of the administration, the intention to encourage national industry and promote the public good. But, were it even admitted that the exclusive policy were more advantageous, and, consequently, more patriotic than the liberal one, it would still be not the less certain that the two are essentially different, and that partial measures, however patriotic they may be, can never be impartial. Your excellency remarks, in your note of the 27th of May, that the bounties and drawbacks allowed to the subjects of the Netherlands furnish the American Government with no just ground of complaint, because these measures are intended to protect and encourage the shipping of the country. But however just and laudable this design may be in itself, the partial measures adopted in pursuance of it are, unquestionably, fair subjects of complaint with any foreign nation which has a valid claim to be treated on a footing of impartiality.

Having submitted to your excellency, by order of my Government, these additional observations upon the first part of your note of the 27th of May, I am directed to remark further, that the President is disposed to believe and to hope that the change of system which has taken place has been owing chiefly to a misunderstanding of the act of March 3, 1819. In regard to this point, I am now authorized to assure you explicitly, in the name of my Government, as I have done before in my own, that the object of the act was simply to fix a time when the subject should be reconsidered in Congress, and that the Government has no intention whatever to abandon the system. The acts and negotiations that have taken place since its adoption, and the messages addressed by the President to Congress, in particular that of December, 1821, attest the steady disposition of the administration, in all its branches, to maintain this course. The laws which expire at the end of the year will be doubtless re-enacted with such modifications as may appear expedient; and if one of these modifications should be the omission of the name of the Netherlands from the list of privileged nations, the change will be owing entirely to the new regulations contained in the Dutch law of August 26, 1822.

The American Government is, however, inclined to hope that this retaliatory measure will not be necessary; and that, if the act of March 5, 1819, has been explained to the satisfaction of his Majesty, he will reconsider the provisional decision, announced in your excellency's note of the 31st of May, and restore to the American trade the privileges which it has heretofore enjoyed. Should this be the case, I will thank your excellency to give me as early information of the fact as may be convenient, that I may transmit it immediately to Washington. The subject will probably be taken up in Congress before the close of the year, and it is desirable that the King's final decision should be known previous to the passage of the new law.

Your excellency will permit me to remark, in conclusion, that the privilege enjoyed by the Dutch flag, of covering the products of Germany and Switzerland, has also been extended to the flags of Prussia and the Hanse Towns. As the ports of the Netherlands are more conveniently situated for shipping these products to the United States, it is believed that the greater part of this commerce now takes that direction. If, however, the privilege in question should be revoked, as respects the Netherlands, and continued to the other above mentioned powers, there would be an advantage of ten per cent. in conveying the products of the interior of Europe to the United States, through the ports of Prussia and the Hanse Towns, rather than those of this country; and this difference in the present state of commerce would decide the preference. The subjects of the Netherlands will therefore lose, by the effects of the new system, not only a considerable advantage in the carriage of their own products, but the profits of a pretty important and lucrative branch of trade which they must now nearly monopolize.

I have the honor to be, with high respect, sir, your excellency's very obedient servant,

A. H. EVERETT.

BRUSSELS, February 21, 1824.

SIR: I learn from the public papers that a new law has been enacted on the subject of the discriminating duties, and presume that I shall receive a copy of it from you, with instructions to communicate it to this Government. But as the time of my departure is now pretty near, I thought it advisable, in order to give them an opportunity to deliberate upon the matter before I go, not to wait for this, but to address a note at once to the Minister of Foreign Affairs. I have accordingly sent one, of which I have the honor to inclose a copy. If I should hereafter receive any orders from you upon the subject, I shall give them, of course, the most punctual attention, and take any further measures that they may prescribe.

I have the honor to be, with high respect, sir, your very obedient, humble servant,

BRUSSELS, February 20, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to inform your excellency that the privileges granted to the Dutch flag in the ports of the United States, by the act of the 20th of April, 1818, which expired at the close of the last year, have been renewed by the late law of January 9. As soon as I receive an authentic copy of the new act I shall take the liberty of sending it to you. You will find in the Brussels Journal of the 16th instant a French translation, which appears to be correct.

The passage of this law confirms the assurances which I gave to your predecessor, the Baron de Nagell, that the act of March 3, 1819, repealing that of April 20, 1818, was merely formal, and that the Government had no intention to abandon the system. The new act extends the privileges granted by the former one to all such foreign powers as may allow the same privileges to us in their ports, and for the same length of time. If any foreign power shall revoke these privileges, our law will cease to have its effect in regard to such power. Hence, if the Government of the Netherlands shall so modify its new regulations as to make them inapplicable to the American trade, they will thereby retain the advantages they now enjoy in the ports of the Republic. If, on the contrary, they persist in putting these regulations in force against us, the President of the United States is authorized by the law to withdraw these privileges immediately, and to place the Dutch flag upon the footing of that of the least favored nations, by subjecting it to the additional duties that are levied upon foreigners.

As the principal cause which appears to have occasioned the application of the new rules to the trade of the United States no longer exists, the American Government have, perhaps, some right to flatter themselves that the effect will cease with it, and that the King will be disposed to continue, or rather to restore, the equalizing system. Without entering now into the train of reasoning upon this subject which I have already pursued at sufficient length in my former notes, I shall content myself upon the present occasion with remarking, that the answer which I may carry to my Government, upon my return to the United States, will probably be regarded as final, and that it would give me great pleasure to be the bearer of one that should tend, by its character, to strengthen the bonds of amity and good understanding that now so happily unite the two countries.

I have the honor to be, with high respect, sir, your excellency's very obedient servant,

A. H. EVERETT.

SIR: I have taken care to communicate without delay to the Department of Public Industry the note which you did me the honor to address to me on the 20th of this month, on the subject of the law of the 7th January, by which the Government of the United States has renewed the principal dispositions in favor of the commerce of the Netherlands, from that of the 20th April, 1818, expired on the 31st December last, except the modification, in what concerns the navigation of the Republic, of articles of the new system of impositions in the Netherlands which establish discriminations against strangers.

I have likewise informed his Majesty as well of the course which you are about to pursue as of the consequence which I have provisionally given to it, and I shall not fail, sir, to inform you of the determination which shall be taken in that regard, as soon as I shall be informed of it.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit, herewith, to your excellency a copy of the new law mentioned in my note of the 20th of February. You will perceive that it secures all the privileges granted to the Dutch flag by the act of April 20, 1818, and particularly that of transporting to the United States, upon a footing of equality, the products of the interior of Europe. This provision was, I believe, omitted in the French translation of the act published by the Brussels Journal.

I have had occasion, in several preceding notes, to offer to the consideration of his Majesty's Government such remarks as I thought would place the subject in its proper light, and I deem it unnecessary to renew the discussion at present. "In the late European war the United States suffered great injury in Holland by the unwarrantable seizure, detention, and even confiscation of the property of their citizens, by the existing Government. For those acts there were, in many instances, not the slightest pretext, and in most, if not in all, no justifiable cause. A nation is, in strictness, answerable for the acts of its Government. This ought not to be pressed, though the idea may be brought into view and the claim kept open. SIR: I have the honor herewith to inclose the answer of the Baron de Nagell, Minister of State for Foreign Relations, to the note presented on the 22d of August, on the subject of certain claims of American citizens for property taken from them, and confiscated by the Government of this country in the year 1809, by which it appears that the present Government declines making restitution.

To the note of the Baron de Nagell I thought it proper to make a reply (a copy of which is also herewith transmitted) with the view of correcting the misrepresentations of my note, of preserving to the claim its proper ground, and of leaving it open to such future representation as may be judged expedient. No. 2, (a.)

Baron de Nagell to Dr. Eustis.

[Translation.]

HAGUE, October 17, 1815.

The undersigned, Minister of Foreign Affairs, has the honor of receiving the note which Mr. Eustis, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, addressed to him on the 22d of August, respecting certain claims made by the citizens of the United States upon the Government of his Majesty the King of the Netherlands.

The claim is founded upon this, that the measures which will dispose of the cargoes, the fate of which was the object of the note, were an act of violence which the French Government forced upon the Dutch Government; and, upon the principle that nations are bound by the acts of their Governments, and that this obligation always exists without diminution, whatever be the changes which otherwise take place in the Republic.

The undersigned has orders to make known that the King finds in each of these reasons causes for remaining an absolute stranger to this affair.

In fact, if the ancient Dutch Government itself could not equitably be made responsible for having yielded to an irresistible power at that time, for a stronger reason it could not be charged with its conduct, and reparation be demanded of it on the part of a Government which did not enter there for nothing.

And if the principle invoked (which the undersigned cannot forbear believing inadmissible in general, and certainly when it is applied to acts of the nature of that in question,) could be adopted in the present case, it would then be upon the Government which succeeded that which exacted the measure, that those interested should press their rights. That is to say, upon the French Government, and not upon that of the King, who, far from homologating the measures forced upon the Government which is just abolished, has constantly announced his disavowal of these systems and of these acts which have brought ruin upon so many individuals and raised up all civilized nations against them.

The undersigned seizes this occasion to have the honor of offering to Mr. Eustis the assurances of his high consideration.

Mr. Eustis to the Baron de Nagell.

HAGUE, August 22, 1815.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, is instructed by his Government to invite the attention of his excellency the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the subject of certain claims of citizens of the United States upon his Majesty's Government; the facts are as follows:

In the course of the year 1809 a number of American vessels arrived in the ports of Holland with cargoes, consisting of articles partly the growth of the United States and partly that of the colonies. The latter portion, being the more considerable, was seized by the Government, at that time in the hands of the ci-devant King of Holland, Louis Bonaparte, and detained in the royal warehouses. In the month of March of the next year a treaty was concluded at Paris between the ex-King of Holland and the ex-Emperor of the French, by virtue of which the property so detained was made over to the latter. It was soon after conveyed into France, and sold for the benefit of the French treasury; the whole amounting to about one million of dollars.

This act of iniquity, which had not the slightest pretence or shadow of right to justify it, by which many individuals have been injured and ruined, the undersigned has no doubt will be considered with just disapprobation by a Government so enlightened and upright as that of his Majesty the King, nor can it be necessary to urge that nations are responsible for the acts of their rulers, and that changes of Government cannot diminish the force of obligations and contracts.

With these impressions, the undersigned feels a confidence that the claims in question will meet with early attention and prompt redress. He has contented himself for the present with making a general statement of the case, the principal features of which, as he presumes, are not unknown to his excellency the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He will be happy to avail himself of any opportunity that may be afforded him to furnish such further details and evidence as may be necessary to a final settlement.

The undersigned takes advantage of this opportunity to offer to his excellency the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs the assurances of his high consideration.

WILLIAM EUSTIS.

His Excellency BARON DE NAGELL,
Minister of State for Foreign Affairs.

No. 3.

Mr. Eustis to Baron de Nagell.

HAGUE, October 29, 1815.

The undersigned has had the honor of receiving the note which his excellency the Minister for Foreign Affairs addressed to him on the 17th instant, informing him that his Majesty declines taking any measures respecting the claims which formed the subject of the note presented by the undersigned on the 22d of August.

As the ground of fact on which the claims in question were represented to rest appears to have been misconceived by his excellency the Minister, the undersigned takes the liberty to remark that he certainly would not have meant to found his claim on the fact, that the measures which decided the fate of the cargoes in question were an act of violence, extorted by the French Government from that of Holland; for he neither knew, nor had he any means of knowing, the motive of those measures. He relied on the fact that the seizure and confiscation were the act and deed of the Government of Holland; whether the proceeds were converted to the immediate use of that Government, or transferred, for any consideration whatever, to another power, it was not for the claimants to inquire. The Government of Holland had taken their property, and to the Government of Holland they looked for redress. Still less could they inquire into the motives which induced this act of violence on their property. If the sacrifice of this property saved the nation from a greater evil, and this is necessarily included in the supposition of compulsion, the claim to indemnity is, in that case, strengthened.

If this view of the subject be correct, and the Government of the time was bound in justice to restore or make compensation for the property, the argument grounded by his excellency the Minister on the supposition of the contrary loses its force, and the only remaining question will be, whether the present Government, in succeeding to the former, succeeded also to this obligation.

The undersigned cannot permit himself to believe that his excellency the Minister intended to question very seriously the correctness of the general principle that nations are bound by the acts of their Governments. This principle has been too long established and acted upon, and is, moreover, too consonant with equity, to admit of doubt. It is rather presumed that the Baron de Nagell intended to rest the force of his observation on the idea contained in the latter part of the sentence, namely: that the principle, however generally correct, could not be applied to acts of violence, like the one in question.

The exemption from responsibility would then be founded on the nature of the act of violence. With respect to this, the undersigned begs leave to add that, if the principle before mentioned is admitted, and the present Government succeeds to the obligations of the former, with the right to claim indemnity for injuries done to the nation under that Government, and with the obligation to repair injuries done to the subjects or citizens of foreign nations by that Government, he is unable to discern, in the nature or circumstances of the present case, a just ground of exception.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to assure his excellency the Minister of his perfect consideration and respect.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, to Mr. William Eustis, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at the Hague, dated May 20, 1816.

"From the measures taken with other powers you will see the propriety of renewing your application to the Government of the Low Countries for a similar indemnity. The claim is founded on principles universally recognized, and which have existed through all ages. The Government of Holland, by which the seizures and confiscations of which we complain were made, was in full possession of the sovereignty of the nation, and exercised all the rights appertaining to it; it was acknowledged by other powers, to many of whom it sent ministers, and from whom it received others in return. The Government de facto of any country is the competent Government for all public purposes. These facts being well known, and the principle of unquestionable authority, it is hoped and presumed that the Government which is now established there will admit the justice and see the propriety of making the reparation which is claimed. You will bring the subject again before the Government of the Low Countries in a friendly manner, indicating the reliance which is placed in a satisfactory decision, as well from the high character of the present sovereign as the justice of the claim. Should your demand not be acceded to, it will be proper to leave the affair open for further discussion. It gives me pleasure to state that the judicious manner in which you have already treated the subject has been very satisfactory to the President."

"Conformably to the instructions contained in your letter of the 21st of May, I have renewed to this Government the claims of the American merchants for the cargoes seized and confiscated by the Government of Holland, in the year 1809-10, stating two cases which appeared to me to have peculiar merit. I inclose herewith a copy of the note presented on the occasion, and as soon as an answer shall be received I shall have the honor of transmitting it."

Mr. Eustis to the Baron de Nagell.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AT THE HAGUE, July 4, 1816.

The undersigned has the honor to inform his excellency the Baron de Nagell that, having communicated to his Government the correspondence which has taken place in relation to the claims of certain American citizens for property seized and confiscated by the Government of Holland in 1809 and 1810, he has received instructions again to present that subject to the consideration of his Majesty's Government.

The claims in question are considered, as the undersigned has had the honor to state in a former note, to be founded on principles universally recognized, and which have existed through all ages.

The Government of Holland, by which the seizure and confiscation were made, was de facto the Government of the nation, in full possession of its sovereignty, exercising all the rights appertaining to it, and acknowledged by other powers with whom it had its diplomatic relations established.

These facts being verified, and the principle being of indisputable authority, the undersigned has reason to hope and expect, from the justice of the claim, and from the well known character of his Majesty, that the subject will be again taken into consideration, and that the result of the inquiry (or examination) will be more satisfactory.

The annexed cases (the particulars of which have been transmitted to the undersigned, with full confidence of indemnification on the part of the owners,) are stated to show that, in one instance, the cargo was landed in consequence of shipwreck, and, in the other, on the advice of one of the most respectable mercantile houses in Amsterdam, and by express permission of the constituted authority of the country.

"The ship Bacchus, being authorized by previous regulations, after having eluded the British blockading squadron, arrived at Amsterdam in the year 1809, with a cargo of tobacco, amounting, by appraisement, to one hundred thousand dollars. She was ordered to depart from this port, although, in so doing, she was exposed to almost certain capture. In endeavoring to get out she was wrecked. Her cargo was saved and put in store, and subsequently delivered over by the Government of Holland to the French Government."

"In the spring of 1809 the brig Baltimore, with a cargo consisting chiefly of colonial produce, amounting to upwards of forty-two thousand dollars, was ordered for Amsterdam, with instructions to the captain, on her arrival on the coast, to lay to, and send in by the pilot a letter to the consignees, Messrs. Hope & Co., to learn the state of the market, and whether the property would be safe in case he should enter. The vessel remained off the coast several days, when letters were received from the consignees, informing of the state of the market, and that, if the cargo should in the first instance be put in the King's store, it would, on being examined as to its origin, (of which satisfactory evidence accompanied it,) be delivered to the proprietors. The captain, in one of his letters, suggested his apprehension of danger of French privateers hovering about the coast. In answer to this, Messrs. Hope & Co. sent him off a protection and a license to enter, from the King of Holland. On receiving this letter, the captain proceeded through the Vlie passage to Harlingen, where the cargo was landed and put in the King's stores. After several months, that part of the cargo which was the growth of the United States was delivered to the consignees. In the month of August, 1810, the residue of the cargo was sent to Antwerp, and there sold and disposed of, with other American property, by virtue of an order from the King of Holland."

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to present to the Baron de Nagell renewed assurance of his high consideration.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Eustis to the Secretary of State, dated

THE HAGUE, October 6, 1816.

"By the Harmony, for Baltimore, whose sailing on Tuesday is announced to me this morning, I have only time to inform you that, with my letter of the 5th of August, I had the honor to inclose to you a copy of the note on the subject of the claims of certain American citizens, presented on the 4th of July, in conformity with my instructions; and to transmit a copy of the answer of the Baron de Nagell, with my reply."

No. 6, (a.)

Baron de Nagell to Mr. Eustis.

[Translation.]

In the note which Mr. Eustis, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has done him the honor of addressing, on the 4th of July, to the undersigned Minister of Foreign Affairs, he submits anew, by order of his Government, to the consideration of the King the claims of certain American citizens, respecting certain confiscations made in 1809 and in 1810 by the Government of Holland.

These claims are there represented as founded on general acknowledged principles, and Mr. Eustis therein refers, in that regard, to a preceding note.

But far from admitting these principles in all their generality, the undersigned has constantly, in his answers, attached to them and adduced divers restrictions.

These restrictions are not discussed in the new official letter; he even approaches the question under another aspect, and confines himself to maintaining that the Government of Holland, in 1809 and in 1810, was, incontestably, de facto.

But, besides that, even on this hypothesis, the modifications brought to the principles claimed should preserve all their force, the characters which the note mentions should lead to a conclusion entirely opposite; since, with the exception of the proof, so insignificant in these latter times, of the recognizing of a Government by some other powers, that of Holland, at that time, could not present any of the traits which the note gives as proofs of the sovereignty. For, admitting the correctness of the exposition transmitted by the claimants, two American ships having discharged their cargoes in Holland, without the guaranty of a formal permission and protection from the constituted authority, the ex-Emperor of the French, notwithstanding, ordered their transportation to France and their confiscation.

The history of these two seizures would be then sufficient, alone, to authorize the maintenance that the Government of Holland was not then more de facto than de jure; and that, if the absolute possession of the sovereignty, and the exercise of rights of which she is in possession, form the criterion of it, it was that of France which was de facto. It was also on this consideration that the undersigned had orders to send the claimants to the French Government for the reparation of an act of violence and power, for which the Government of Holland had never been responsible.

But the assertion that the French Government was, in 1809 and in 1810, the sole Government de facto, is supported by still stronger proofs, and the nullity of that of Holland was repeated so publicly in the face of Europe that, in fine, they obliged a phantom of a King to abdicate a ridiculous authority.

In 1809 a message to the French legislative body announced that Holland was, in reality, only a part of France, and that it was time to make her return to the natural order. An official note gave information that she was only a company of merchants, and that the ex-Emperor did not consider her as a nation. The Moniteur stated that her ports and her coasts were about to be occupied by French troops and custom-house officers, as they had been after the conquest in 1794, and that all the means for regulating the administration were about to be employed. These troops and these custom-house officers actually came, and General Oudinot took possession, in a military manner, of the country.

By a formal treaty of March 26, 1810, the weak delegate of Napoleon was obliged to consent to it. French licenses were alone declared valid; the ex-Emperor alone pronounced upon the ships in contravention; the evacuation and the independence of Holland would not be granted but when England should have withdrawn the orders in council of 1807; the tenth article decreed that all merchandise coming in American ships, entered in the ports of Holland, after the 1st of January, 1809, should be sequestered and belong to France, to be disposed of as she should judge proper; and that every store-house (magazine) of prohibited articles should be seized in their territory. A shadow of independence still existed—the French troops did not occupy the capital; the last shadow must disappear, and the troops entered Amsterdam.

The undersigned ought, therefore, to make known to Mr. Eustis that the objections opposed to the pretensions of the claimants not having been removed, and the exposition transmitted in his last note still supporting these objections; besides, that the two seizures, of which mention is therein made, took place after the term of the 1st of January, 1809, and the last even the 10th of August, 1810, that is, after the union with France, the King can only continue to regard these claims as absolutely foreign to the present Government of the Netherlands.

The undersigned has the honor to renew to Mr. Eustis the assurances of his high consideration.

No. 6, (b.)

Mr. Eustis to the Baron de Nagell.

HAGUE, September 25, 1816.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of his excellency the Baron de Nagell, Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, dated the 4th of August, wherein it is maintained that the person exercising the supreme authority by which the property of certain American citizens was seized and confiscated, in the years 1809 and 1810, was not de facto the sovereign of this nation.

In stating in his last note (what he had not believed would have been contested) that Louis Napoleon was, at the time, sovereign de facto, the undersigned conceived himself fully justified by the circumstance of his exercise of all the functions of sovereignty for several years, in the face of all Europe; his reception and acknowledgment by the States General and the other constituted authorities of the nation, civil, military and ecclesiastic; and by his official intercourse with them from the time of his arrival in the country to that of his abdication.

His diplomatic relations with other nations were adduced as corroborating the evidence of his sovereignty; and it is still believed that an interchange of public ministers with Russia, France, Denmark, Prussia, Austria, Spain, and other powers, is not considered by the most respectable nations in Europe an insignificant evidence of sovereignty, even "in these modern times."

The treaty of March, 1810, which transferred the property in question to the French Government, appears in itself to have been an act of sovereignty not bearing any evidence of violence; and if it should be alleged that it was coerced by the power or influence of France, the rights of the claimants, whose property had been antecedently seized, ought not, it is contested, to be affected by an act over which they had no control.

The message to the French legislature in 1809, announcing "that it was time to embody Holland with the mother country;" the publication in the Moniteur, stating "that her ports and stores were to be occupied by French troops," &c.; the military possession of the capital by General Oudinot, as stated in the note of his excellency the Baron de Nagell, are not at variance with the well known facts, that the abdication of Louis Napoleon, the annexation of Holland to France, and the military occupancy of the capital by General Oudinot, all took place in July, 1810; whereas the order for depositing the property in the public stores was issued by the then King of Holland in the spring of 1809. The cargoes were generally so deposited in the course of that year—two of them in the winter or spring of 1810—and the whole of them (including that mentioned by the claimant as having been removed to Antwerp so late as August, 1810,) were transferred to France by virtue of the treaty of March, 1810. Whence it follows that the annexation of Holland to France, with the other circumstances cited in the note of his excellency, cannot be construed to affect the claims.

With respect to the limitations or restrictions attached by his excellency to the principles on which the claims are founded, the undersigned has had the honor to state, in a former note, that he was unable to discover in this case a just ground of exception to those principles, and must persist in objecting to the admission of any limitations or restrictions tending to impair them.

Availing himself of this occasion, the undersigned has the honor to present to his excellency the Baron de Nagell the assurance of his high consideration.

WILLIAM EUSTIS.

No. 7.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to Mr. Alexander H. Everett, Chargé d'Affaires at the Hague, August 10, 1824.

"No principle of international law can be more clearly established than this: That the rights and the obligations of a nation, in regard to other States, are independent of its internal revolutions of government. It extends even to the case of conquest. The conqueror who reduces a nation to his subjection receives it subject to all its engagements and duties towards others, the fulfilment of which then becomes his own duty. However frequent the instances of departure from this principle may be in point of fact, it cannot with any color of reason be contested on the ground of right. On what other ground is it, indeed, that both the Governments of the Netherlands and of the United States now admit that they are still reciprocally bound by the engagements and entitled to claim from each other the benefits of the treaty between the United States and the United Provinces of 1782? If the nations are respectively bound to the stipulations of that treaty now, they were equally bound to them in 1810, when the depredations, for which indemnity is now claimed, were committed; and when the present King of the Netherlands came to the sovereignty of the country, he assumed with it the obligation of repairing the injustices against other nations, which had been committed by his predecessors, however free from all participation in them he had been himself.

"It is fully understood that the European allied powers have acted upon this principle in their support of the claims of indemnities of their subjects upon the present Government of France; and France, on her part, claims from the United States not only the advantage of every stipulation contracted by the United States with the Government of Napoleon, but, by a latitude of construction of her own, privileges which were not intended to be conceded by them.

"With regard to the facts upon which the claims of indemnity of our citizens upon the Government of the Netherlands are founded, it is supposed they are of a nature not to be contested. They are generally cases of seizure and confiscation, by decrees and orders of the Government, of the most arbitrary and unjustifiable character. Some of them were doubtless attended with circumstances of more aggravation than others. That of the St. Michael, as represented in the pamphlet herewith forwarded, is particularly recommended to your attention. In using every proper exertion in your power to obtain from the Dutch Government a recognition of the justice of these claims, and provision for them, you will carefully avoid, both in the manner and substance of your applications, every appearance of useless importunity, and every expression of an irritating or offensive character. They must understand that, although pursued with moderation and forbearance, the claims will not be abandoned or renounced."

"Sir: I have the honor to inclose a copy of the note which I have just written to Baron de Nagell, upon the subject of the confiscations of 1809-'10. I delayed writing it longer than I otherwise should have done, after my arrival here, in hopes of obtaining some further information upon the circumstances of the transaction from the consular agent at Amsterdam, to whom I wrote for that purpose, but without success. I have no documents here, besides those which I brought out, and the former correspondence. As the question, however, is at present upon the acknowledgment of a general principle, the details are of less consequence, and I fear very much that there will be no immediate necessity for entering upon them. I shall transmit to you the answer of this Government to the application as soon as I receive it."

No. 8, (a.)

Mr. Everett to the Baron de Nagell.

BRUSSELS, February 22, 1819.

The undersigned, chargé d'affaires of the United States, has the honor to inform his excellency Baron de Nagell, Minister of Foreign Affairs, that he is instructed to lay before his Majesty's Government once more the claims of those American citizens whose property was taken and confiscated in 1809-'10 by the arbitrary act of the late Government of Holland. The Government of the United States entertain a hope that, although his Majesty was not satisfied of the justice of the claim at the time when it was presented to him before, he will be induced, upon a further consideration of the subject, to adopt a different opinion, and to render that satisfaction to the claimants which, in the opinion of the American Government, they are strictly entitled to demand.

It is, perhaps, unnecessary to recapitulate in detail the various circumstances attending the several seizures that occurred under the acts in question. The undersigned will mention only one or two cases, which were marked by more than ordinary hardship, and which will show that the Government of Holland of that day not only violated the duties of hospitality and justice, but exhibited a total want of those sentiments of self-respect and common humanity that may often be found among the most barbarous nations. For example, no ruler of any people, civilized or uncivilized, is so utterly destitute of a sense of honor as to violate his own safe conduct, and employ the sacred pledge of his word as an instrument of mischief to a friendly power. If such instances have occurred once or twice in the history of modern Europe, they have been marked as an indelible stain on the character of their authors and of the age. Such, however, was the conduct of the Government of Holland, in the case of the brig Baltimore, which arrived at Amsterdam with a cargo of colonial produce, consigned to Messrs. Hope & Co., in the spring of 1809. Before she ventured to enter the port, she sent in to obtain information whether it would be safe to land her cargo, and received from her consignees a protection and license from the Government. Notwithstanding this, her cargo was deposited, as soon as landed, in the King's stores, and the greater part of it was afterwards confiscated.

Two of the cases in question are even stronger than this. They are those of the Bacchus and the St. Michaels, which were driven by stress of weather and the accidents of the sea upon the Dutch coast. The former had been destined for Amsterdam, but on her arrival off that port was informed by her consignees that it was not safe to enter. On her way out she was wrecked. Her cargo, which was saved from the violence of the elements, was immediately seized, and subsequently confiscated by the Government. The St. Michaels was bound for Tonningen, and put into the Texel in distress, not being able to keep the sea. Will it be believed that, under these circumstances, the Government of Holland took possession of her by military force, and seized and confiscated her cargo? Thus, at the present day, and on the territory of one of the first maritime nations of Europe, the wrecks of friendly vessels were plundered under the public authority of the country. A description of violence not unknown, perhaps, to the piratical inhabitants of the northern coasts of Europe in the dark ages, but altogether unheard of as the act of a civilized community.

It is understood by the Government of the United States that the facts upon which these claims are founded are not disputed, but that the objection made to the liquidation of them arises from doubts that are entertained whether the present Government is bound, by the law of nations, to make compensation for injuries done by the former; and whether, even admitting this as a general principle, the claimants ought not rather, under the circumstances of the present case, to resort for redress to the Government of France, than to that of the Netherlands. In the expectation that the claim may be objected to on these grounds, the undersigned will take the liberty of adding a few remarks in confirmation of the view taken by the American Government of the principles of the law of nations as they apply to this case.

It is regarded by the Government of the United States as a settled and unquestionable principle of public law, that the rights and obligations of nations are in no way affected by their internal revolutions in government. Political forms may be altered; different persons or families may be called to the administration; but, under every change that occurs, the new Government succeeds to all the obligations, as it does to all the rights, of the old one; or, in other words, the nation, though it has changed its rulers, continues to be bound by its own acts. If this were not the case, a nation, by changing its rulers or its form of government, could at any time release itself from all its engagements—a supposition too absurd to be refuted. Hence, the Dutch nation, having, through the agency of its public functionaries, confiscated the property of the American merchants, is bound to make reparation for this act of violence through the medium of the same rulers that committed it, while their functions continue, or of any other Government that may succeed them, since no act of the nation can discharge it from this duty except the fulfilment of it.

These principles are recognized by the great writers on national law. Grotius observes, that the debts contracted by a nation under one form of Government are binding upon it under another, and it is evident that the same reasoning applies to the reparation of an injury. The nation, he adds, cannot escape from the obligations of common honesty, however the form of Government may be altered. Whether it prefers a monarchy, an aristocracy, or a democracy, it is still bound to pay its debts. Puffendorf expresses the same opinions, in nearly the same words, and supports them at greater length: "Public debts," says he, "are not extinguished by the political changes that occur in a State. Those who maintain the contrary, have asserted that, as the State can only be bound by its own acts, it is not obliged to fulfil the engagements of an absolute monarch or an oligarchy whose authority reposes on force alone, and not on considerations of public good. But this reasoning is undoubtedly false, (sans contredit frivole.) The acts of the rulers of the State, whatever may be the source and tenure of their authority, are supposed to be the acts of the State itself."

A nation, therefore, cannot claim to be exempted from holding itself responsible for the acts of a former Government under the pretence that that Government was founded in usurpation. To do this, would be to suppose that nations possess the means and the right to decide upon each other's internal policy—a supposition which is not true in fact, and which no people that values its independence could for a moment admit. The actual rulers of every people must be received by all others as the rightful ones, and it would be not less presumptuous than injurious in foreigners to pretend to examine their title.

Accordingly, the writer last quoted extends his remarks further, to a state of things agreeing precisely with the view supposed to be taken by his Majesty's Government of the circumstances of the present claim. If the rightful sovereign succeeds in dethroning a usurper and recovering his authority, what course is to be taken in regard to the obligations contracted by the usurper during his reign? With the unerring instinct of an honest mind he decides this inquiry on principles too obviously just to be disputed. The sovereign may exercise his discretion in regard to general laws and political dispositions; but he is bound by all those acts and contracts of the usurper in which the rights of innocent third persons are concerned. Hence, on the view which is probably taken of this subject by his Majesty's Government, upon which the undersigned, as the agent of a foreign nation, is not at liberty to express an opinion, however he might otherwise be disposed to consider it as correct. His Majesty's Government is still responsible, in reason and justice, and according to the opinion of distinguished publicists, for those acts of the late Government by which the American merchants acquired a right to compensation—just as much as if the late Government were acknowledged by his Majesty to have been a legitimate one.

The undersigned will not multiply citations from written or public law to this effect. It is well known to his excellency that those which have already been quoted are the leading authorities upon these subjects. In confirmation of what has been advanced, he will, however, observe that it is believed by the American Government that the practice of nations is entirely conformable to the principles which have now been stated. On this point the undersigned begs leave to request the attention of his excellency to the following considerations:

1. In the practice of civilized nations, the stability of treaties, and other public acts of the Government, is never affected by revolutions or changes of dynasty. If this were not the case, the whole fabric of society would be unsettled at every political movement, and all the titles of private property rendered uncertain. Hence, the present Government of France has maintained, in general, the acts of the preceding one, and, amongst others, the sale of the national domains, though strongly urged by an opposite interest to the contrary; and though one of the German princes adopted a different principle, in this particular, his conduct has been publicly disapproved by the Diet of the German Confederation, which has thus given a solemn and most respectable sanction to the rule, that succeeding governments are bound by the acts of their predecessors in all cases where private interest is concerned. On this principle, the treaty concluded in 1782 between the United States of America and the United Provinces of the Netherlands is admitted by the American Government, and, it is presumed, by that of his Majesty, to be still in force. If this be the case, it was also in force in 1810, when the confiscations took place. These acts of violence were, therefore, breaches of a solemn and positive contract, as well as of justice, hospitality, and common humanity; and the present Government, with the obligation to observe the treaty which descended to them from the former one, inherited also the obligation to repair it where it had been broken.

2. It is evident that the obligation to redress a wrong is, at least, as strong, if not still more binding and positive than the obligation to pay a debt. Now, there is no rule of national conduct more firmly established and universally practiced upon in Europe than that the debts of the nation shall be held sacred, whatever changes may occur in the Government. All the countries in Europe in which, by the late occurrences, the former sovereigns have been restored to their authority, furnish instances directly in point in support of this position. Among the rest, the Government of his Majesty has complied, in this particular, with the dictates of justice and the general usage. The present Government of France has not only assumed the public debt as it stood at the period of the King's return, but has stipulated, in a convention with Great Britain, to restore to their full original value those debts due British subjects which had been reduced to one-third by the revolutionary Governments. If the pecuniary obligations of a preceding Government, founded on contract, are thus maintained without dispute by the successor, what good reason can be given why pecuniary obligations of at least an equally imperious character, because created against the will of the party injured, should be disregarded?

3. The instances just mentioned, of public acts and public debts, are analogous to the case of the present claim, and may serve to illustrate the principles upon which it is founded. But the late transactions between the present Government of France and the other nations of Europe furnish a series of cases still more nearly resembling that of the present claim, and some of a character precisely parallel. By the 19th article of the treaty of Paris of May 30, 1814, the present Government of France undertakes to liquidate private debts of various kinds due by the former Government to subjects of all the Governments that are parties to that treaty, and, it is believed, makes itself responsible for all demands that could have been made, agreeably to the law of nations, upon the former Government. It is hardly possible to imagine a more imposing authority in favor of the principle for which the American Government contends than this great transaction, to which the principal States in Europe were parties. All these powers undoubtedly considered Napoleon as a usurper, and were disposed to extend every indulgence to the present Government of France. Notwithstanding this, they gave their sanction to the arrangement by which that Government became responsible for his public and private contracts. It is presumed that the subjects of his Majesty, among the rest, enjoy at present the benefit of this arrangement, and have received payment from the present French Government of debts, to a large amount, that were due to them by the last. It would seem not unreasonable, therefore, that they should extend to other nations the same measure of justice of which they have obtained the advantage themselves.

It may be urged, however, that this arrangement cannot be brought as a precedent in the present case, because it makes no provision for spoliations and acts of violence committed by Napoleon and his agents. But this circumstance was owing to the peculiar situation of the contracting parties. They were just emerging from a state of mutual hostility. The acts of violence of which they severally had to complain were committed in time of war by declared enemies; and on that account, by the acknowledged law of nations, no satisfaction could be demanded for them, because no satisfaction could have been demanded of the party that committed them. This was the reason assigned for their exclusion, and is recorded as such by Mr. Von Schoell, the historian of these treaties. The French Government, however, went even further than this in regard to British subjects, and made reparation for confiscations and spoliations committed during the war; thus assuming a responsibility that did not properly belong, by the law of nations, to Napoleon himself. Acts of violence that did not come within the description of damages of war were provided for in these arrangements. In proof of this, the undersigned, to avoid prolixity, will mention only two remarkable instances, those of the Bank of Hamburg, and of the confiscations in the Duchy of Berg.

In May, 1813, Marshal Davoust took possession of the city of Hamburg, and imposed upon the inhabitants a contribution of forty-eight millions, which they considered it impossible to raise, and declined to pay. Disappointed in this, he placed his seals upon the bank of that place, and threatened, unless his demand was complied with, to remove the funds, and apply them to his own use. This threat he afterwards executed, and took from the bank an amount of more than fifteen millions, a great part of which was the property of foreigners and neutrals. A claim for compensation was made by the Senate of Hamburg upon the present French Government, and in 1816 a convention was concluded, by which this Government undertakes to repair the injury done by the former one, and appropriates a capital of ten millions to be applied to this purpose.

A private claim, founded on the confiscations in the Grand Duchy of Berg, is recognized by the fourth article of the convention of November, 1815, between France and the allies. A quantity of cotton and other colonial goods had been seized and confiscated in that Duchy by the agents of Napoleon, under his own immediate orders. Substitute the name of Louis Bonaparte for that of Napoleon, and this is an exact description of the case of the present claimants. What then was the course pursued by the French Government? "As soon as the allied armies had delivered France from Bonaparte and his agents," says Mr. Schoell, in his account of this transaction, "the owners claimed compensation for the damage they had sustained. The Chamber of Commerce of Cologne sent a distinguished counsellor to Paris to solicit justice from Louis XVIII. The Provisional Government, established by the allies at Dupeldorf, promised to present the claim to the Congress at Vienna, if it proved unsuccessful at Paris. It was unnecessary, however, to take this step; the cause of the claimants was too just not to be recognized by a legitimate Government. A full indemnity was granted them by France for the losses they had sustained, and interest at the rate of twelve per cent. from the date of the decree of seizure."

The undersigned indulges a hope that the authorities and examples now adduced will satisfy his Majesty's Government of the correctness of the principle upon which the present claim is founded. It is understood, however, that if this principle were admitted, the further objection will remain, that, under all the circumstances of the case, recourse should rather be had by the claimants to the Government of France than to that of the Netherlands. An opinion of this kind is supposed to be entertained by his Majesty's Government, founded on the presumption that the money resulting from the confiscations in question was finally transferred by Louis Bonaparte to Napoleon, in pursuance of an article in a secret treaty between the brothers of March, 1810, since made public.

The undersigned can hardly imagine, however, that his Majesty's Government will insist very seriously upon this objection. It is a principle too trivial even to admit of argument, that the sufferer must resort for redress to the person or power that did the wrong, and is not bound to follow his property through the several transfers that may have been made of it subsequently to the original confiscation. The Government of Holland deprived these claimants of their property, and to the Government of Holland they look for satisfaction. Whether these identical articles, or the value of them, was afterwards transferred to France for a sufficient consideration, or extorted from Holland by force, are questions upon which the claimants have no information, and do not even feel themselves at liberty to inquire. They have neither the pretension nor the right to interfere in the international concerns of the Governments of Europe.

With these remarks, the undersigned submits the claim to the justice and good faith of his Majesty's Government, and cannot but hope that, upon a consideration of it, they will be induced to regard it in the light in which it appears to the Government of the United States. That Government is so fully satisfied of the intrinsic justice of the demand that they feel it a duty to the sufferers to use all their influence with his Majesty's Government to procure them redress; and the undersigned is instructed to observe that the claim, though pursued with moderation and forbearance, can never be abandoned or relinquished.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to offer to his excellency Baron de Nagell the renewed assurance of his perfect respect.

"I have the honor to inclose a translation of the answer of this Government to my note on the claims. It is, as I feared it would be, unfavorable. I shall immediately prepare a reply to it, and will, therefore, not trouble you at present with any remarks upon the import."

No. 9, (a.)

The Baron de Nagell to Mr. Everett.

[Translation.]

BRUSSELS, June 14, 1819.

The King entertained a confident expectation that the Government of the United States would be satisfied with the answers given to the applications of Mr. Eustis, respecting the American property sequestered in Holland in 1809 and 1810, and confiscated by the French Government, and would refrain from pressing this claim any further; but it appears, from the last note of Mr. Eustis, and from the memoir which the undersigned Minister of Foreign Affairs had the honor of receiving from Mr. Everett, chargé d'affaires of the United States of America, last February, that this is not their intention.

As this note and the memoir contain a statement of the same principles and arguments with the preceding notes, only more in detail, the Government of the Netherlands might have contented itself with a simple repetition of the former answers; but, in order to give a new proof of respect for the American Government, and also of impartiality and justice, the King directed that the facts should be examined anew with the greatest attention, and that the reasoning on which the claim is founded should be analyzed in all its parts. These two heads will form the leading divisions of the present answer.

In order to have a clear view of the facts, it is necessary to recur to the state of things at the time when they happened.

The continental system was then in full vigor in Holland, as in all the countries where Bonaparte exercised his supremacy. Some attempts of King Louis to mitigate the severity of it only ended in provoking his imperious brother to still more rigorous measures. Thus, upon the remonstrance, to use no harsher term, of the French minister and his agents, King Louis was obliged to annul his decrees of March 31 and June 30, 1809, by that of July 29 of the same year; to revoke the slight modifications which they had effected in the general system; and to decree that every American vessel which did [not] exactly comply with the existing orders should be sent back without being allowed to enter the Dutch ports. By a subsequent decree of February 1, 1810, American vessels were prohibited from entering at all, and this decree was communicated to the American consul at Amsterdam.

This state of things, the dependence of King Louis upon his brother, his inability to resist his brother's orders, and the consequent danger of arriving in this country, were well known by sad experience to all the nations that still ventured to maintain any commercial relations with Holland.

After this preamble, which serves to place the facts in their true point of view, the undersigned will proceed to correct the statements by which the parties interested have permitted themselves to disfigure these facts and to surprise the religion of their Government.

On the 24th of July, 1809, and not in the spring of that year, the Baltimore, Captain J. Philips, arrived at Amsterdam. According to some of her papers, she was bound for Tonningen. Thirty bales of cotton, and the staves which formed a part of her cargo, and which were provided with a certificate from the French consul at Baltimore, were delivered to the consignees. The rest of the cargo was stored, according to law, in the King's warehouses, and afterwards delivered to the French authorities in consequence of the treaty of March 6, 1810, and not, as was represented to Mr. Eustis, carried to Antwerp and sold there, with other American property, under order from the King of Holland. The license, or pretended protection, obtained by the captain for his free entry, was not a safe conduct, but was intended merely to protect him, if possible, against the French privateers. It made no alteration in the laws of blockade, to which this ship, as well as every other, was subject.

The Bacchus, Captain R. Johnson, arrived at Amsterdam January 11, 1810. The certificates of origin of her cargo appeared suspicious, and, until further information could be obtained, her cargo was deposited in the public warehouses, where it remained till the 10th of the following February, when an order came to send the ship and cargo back to sea, according to the above mentioned decree of February 1. The ship was wrecked in going out, and the cargo saved with difficulty. It was then sequestered until, by virtue of the treaty of 1810, it was given up to the authorities of France.

The St. Michael, Captain J. Dowson, bound ostensibly to Tonningen, put into the Texel in April, 1810, but was refused an entry. The captain declined obeying the order to go to sea again, under pretence of the bad state of his ship. He was permitted to take refuge in port till it could be ascertained whether the ship was able to keep the sea or not. Although the ship arrived after the conclusion of the treaty of 1810, by the tenth article of which it was provided that "the cargoes of all American vessels entering the ports of Holland after the 1st of January, 1809, should be sequestered, and should belong to France, to be disposed of according to circumstances and the political relations with the United States," the Government of Holland ascribed the entry of the St. Michael to necessity, and interpreted the article as merely authorizing the sequester of the cargo, instead of the delivery of it to the French authorities. The cargo was placed upon the list of American cargoes still in controversy, and it was not until after the union with France that it was delivered to the director of the French customs.

Mr. Eustis was therefore misinformed when he was led to suppose that these several cargoes had been confiscated by order of the Dutch Government. It is more probable, on the contrary, from the manifest intentions of that Government, which contributed very much to hasten its fall, that the confiscation would not have taken place unless the owners or consignees had been proved by legal process to have contravened the existing and publicly notorious system of blockade which placed all cargoes under a kind of sequester, and only permitted the entry of American vessels on that condition. And, properly speaking, it was not the treaty of 1810, but the union of Holland to France, that placed these cargoes in the power of the French. This union was effected soon after the conclusion of the treaty, and abrogated it. But at this epoch the greatest part of the American cargoes were still in the public warehouses. The political existence of Holland was then terminated. The country passed under the Government of France, and the sequestered property was sold by order and for account of the "Imperial Treasury," as Mr. Eustis observes, and the proceeds were accordingly placed there. The confiscation cannot, therefore, be equitably imputed to a government which had constantly attempted to prevent it; nor can indemnity be claimed of this Government, which had already ceased to exist when the confiscation was effected under the authority and for the profit of France. More than this, among the cargoes, ostensibly American, delivered to France, there were several undoubtedly owned in Holland, and others upon which claims existed in Holland for advances made upon them to the captains. While Louis was still nominally King, the Dutch owners and creditors were, nevertheless, obliged to address themselves to the French Government with their claims of restitution and indemnity. And there is even reason to suppose that the United States themselves made application, at the time, to Bonaparte, in favor of the American owners, so natural and just did it appear to demand compensation from the Government which had taken possession of the property.

These details have been drawn from authentic sources; but even if the seizures had been made in the manner described by the parties interested, in their statements to the American Government, they would lead to a conclusion diametrically opposite to the one that has been drawn by that Government.

For, in fact, if these seizures had (to use the expressions of the memoir) borne all the marks of "a revolting breach of the first duties of hospitality and justice; a total want of those sentiments of self-respect and common humanity to be found among the most barbarous nations; the perfidious violation of a safe conduct for the purpose of doing mischief to a friendly power; the plunder of a wreck, and acts of violence of a description known only to the piratical inhabitants of the northern coasts of Europe in the dark ages," what other consequence would follow, but that Holland at this period had no Government that deserved the name; that this was a time of anarchy, when all social ties, and all the principles of the law of nations were trampled under foot; a blank in the moral existence of a people otherwise so celebrated for its hospitality, its justice, its humanity, its respect for the law of nations? And, were it even possible to admit that a legitimate Government is responsible for the acts of the usurping Government which it overthrew, it would still be necessary to except from the rule such acts as these; for it would be evidently confounding words and ideas to apply to such a period, and to such proceedings, the names and relations of Government, of social order, and of the law of nations.

But, without pushing to exaggeration the circumstances which preceded and attended the confiscation of the American property, it may easily be shown that Holland had ceased for a long time to form an independent State, under a Government acting for itself and responsible for its conduct. Vattel decides that a people which has passed under the dominion of another people no longer constitutes a State, and that the law of nations is not applicable to it. "Such," says he, "were the nations and kingdoms subdued by the Romans. Most of those even whom they honored with the name of friends and allies were not real States. They were governed within by their own laws and magistrates, but without they were compelled to obey in everything the orders of Rome." Certainly, in 1809 and 1810, Holland was obliged, not less at home than abroad, to obey in everything the orders of France.

Having thus corrected the statement of facts, the undersigned will proceed to examine the argumentative part of the memoir.

It has been somewhat difficult to discover the passages cited from the two ancient writers, which are simply quoted without reference to the places where they are found. A single observation is sufficient to destroy the force of those remarks of Grotius and Puffendorf which appear to be intended, and that is, that they relate to a matter entirely different from the one in question. Hence, it was necessary to recur to induction and analogy to make them apply. The undersigned has sought in vain for any direct decisions on the principle in controversy; and, as it may be presumed that they would not have escaped the observation of the writer of the memoir, it is fair to conclude that none exist. The quotation from Grotius appears to be taken from chapter ix, book 2, of his Treatise on the Law of Peace and War. It is sufficient to transcribe it to show that it is foreign to the question.

After quoting an obscure passage from Aristotle upon the point whether the debts of the State ought or ought not to be paid when the form of government has been changed, which, from the expressions of the philosopher, he appears to have considered doubtful, Grotius adds: "The debts contracted by a free people are not extinguished when they give themselves a King; for the people is still the same, and remains in possession of what belongs to it as a people. It even retains the sovereignty within itself" &c. But first, this chapter, with Barbeyrac's notes, clearly shows that the ancient publicists were not agreed upon this point. Besides, it is one thing to discuss whether a free people which voluntarily gives itself a King, and which still remains in possession of its property, and retains the sovereignty within itself, &c., ought to pay the public debts and perform the engagements which it acknowledges; and another, to determine whether a Government which has liberated a people that had been forced to renounce its form of government and all the attributes of independence, and to receive a King from the hands of a foreign usurper, is bound to repair all the injuries of which this people was only the involuntary instrument, and to be responsible for all the acts of the mock government which it came to destroy.

To apply to this case the reasoning of Grotius in regard to debts and contracts, acknowledged by treaties and special conventions, would be to take for granted the point in dispute. The indemnity now claimed does not belong to the class of acknowledged debts and contracts. On the contrary, the Government of the Netherlands does not admit, and has never admitted, that it was due. The memoir assumes, therefore, precisely the point in controversy, which is the existence of the obligation.

Puffendorf repeats the opinion of Grotius nearly in the same words, and admits, of course, the same answers. But, besides that, he confessed that there are differences of opinion upon the subject, and that the passage, like that of Grotius, refers to the obligation which a nation is under, notwithstanding the changes in the form of government to adhere to its treaties, contracts, and financial engagements. The argument he uses favors the opinion of the Government of the Netherlands, it being that the people still possess the property to which the debt is attached. But at the union of Holland and France the American cargoes were carried away and confiscated, so that Holland no longer possesses the property to which the debt, if it be one, is attached.

But every one knows that inductions and analogies drawn from the principles of the law of nations lead naturally to endless discussion, since it is always easy to oppose authority to authority, and citation to citation.

In proof of this remark, it would be sufficient to mention the qualifications with which the two writers who have been quoted, express their opinion even in regard to obligations apparently so evident, as those of fulfilling contracts and paying public debts. Grotius, nevertheless, declares plainly that neither the nation nor the legitimate King are bound to perform the engagements of a usurper.

Puffendorf repeats the same decision, and declares, that the legitimate sovereign, on recovering his rights, may annul the acts of the usurper, if he judges it for the public good; and he applies this remark not only to laws, but to other measures prejudicial to the State.

Martens, generally so severe in regard to the observation of treaties, acknowledges that the question whether a treaty is obligatory or not depends upon the justice or injustice of the means employed to obtain it. On the principles of the memoir, indemnities, compensations, debts, and treaties, are here synonymous categories. Let us, then, apply to them the principles by which publicists limit the obligations of the law of nations, and these restrictions will finish the answer of the Government of the Netherlands.

If it were thought proper to enlarge upon all the assertions in the memoir, it would be easy to show, by citations from the last of these writers, (whose opinions have the more authority from his being one of our cotemporaries,) under what restrictions it is necessary to receive the statement in the memoir, that the actual rulers of every country must be received by all others as the rightful ones, and that it would be not less injurious than presumptuous in foreigners to pretend to question this title. The history of almost all the great diplomatic transactions and the causes of many modern wars attest the contrary.

But, instead of entering upon this incidental discussion, the undersigned will rather proceed to examine the further arguments contained in the memoir.

The first of these is taken from the usage of civilized nations, and it is alleged that, according to this usage, the stability of treaties is never affected by revolutions or change of dynasty. But, besides that it would be easy to cite many treaties that have been abolished by revolutions, this question does not relate to treaties and stipulations; and, consequently, the remainder of the paragraph falls of itself.

The indemnities to which France was obliged to consent by the late treaties appear to the author another argument in his favor.

But if the duty of legitimate Governments, upon their restoration, to redress the wrongs and repair the injuries occasioned by the illegitimate Governments which they have abolished and succeeded, were founded upon the broad and universally acknowledged principles supposed in the memoir, the allies would not have failed to appeal to these principles in the preambles of the treaties, or special conventions, by which they thought proper to stipulate the partial restitutions here alleged as examples. These stipulations would then have been superfluous. Their introduction is, therefore, an indirect proof that the contracting parties did not consider these indemnities as incontestably due by the law of nations.

The objects of these stipulations are also worthy of remark. That of the convention with Great Britain was the payment, in their full original value, of debts due to the subjects of his Britannic Majesty, reduced (tiercés) by the French revolutionary Government.

Why did not the other nations who were equally injured by this reduction obtain the same restitution? The answer is to be found in the particular circumstances that attended the conventions. In proof of this, it is only necessary to compare the treaty of Paris of 1814 with that of 1815. So far was France from considering the indemnities demanded of her as the natural and ordinary result of the common principles of the law of nations, that the Duke de Richelieu avowed the contrary. In communicating to the House of Deputies the treaties and conventions that France had just contracted, he did not hesitate to declare publicly (and he has not been contradicted by the other contracting parties) that these stipulations were the result of extraordinary circumstances in which France found herself placed by the fatality of events. In a different position, he adds, and at other times, we should have to present to the House only one of those acts which compose the historical collection of the public law of nations, and resemble each other so nearly in character. But it is not so with the transaction we have now to lay before you. It bears—it must necessarily bear—the marks of the situation in which the contracting parties were respectively placed, as also of the interests and considerations resulting from a state of things unheard of in history, unique in its nature, and which will be so, of course, in its consequences. The nation has been obliged to satisfy not only the pretensions, but the alarms of Europe. Without the power to deny or resist the incontestable superiority which demanded painful sacrifices, it has seen in those sacrifices the only means of obtaining peace. France finds herself, by a combination of circumstances, compelled to answer for all the sacrifices that have been made, and all the losses and injuries that have been sustained. The severity of this principle might have been softened in its application by the equity and magnanimity of the sovereigns; but particular considerations influenced their decision, and the recollection of the violence and oppression by which they had suffered led the sovereigns, as it were, involuntarily to adopt measures repugnant to their private feelings, so that their determinations are marked by passions which their personal generosity disapproves.

If, then, the treaties and conventions with France furnish no precedent in this case, the other examples mentioned in the memoir are also inapplicable, because they are not at all parallel to the claim in question.

By the 19th article of the treaty of March 30, 1814, the French Government merely engaged to liquidate the debts which it should be found to owe in foreign countries, by virtue of contracts and other formal engagements, passed between individuals or private establishments and the French authorities, as well for supplies as for lawful debts; but, far from thinking, with the memoir, that it is scarcely possible to imagine a more imposing authority in favor of the principle maintained by the American Government, the Government of the Netherlands is perfectly satisfied that this article was not intended to operate in nearly so extensive a way as is supposed in this paragraph. Considering that France had received all the resources of Holland for the first ten months of the year 1813, this Government thought it just that France should pay to Holland, out of those receipts, the interest on the debt that accrued within that period. It was agreed to refer the decision of the principle to arbitrators chosen from neutral powers. The decision was in the negative.

If, according to the remark of Mr. Schoell, historian of the treaties of Paris, no satisfaction could be demanded for those who had to complain of acts of violence committed during the war, because no satisfaction could have been demanded of the party that committed them; still less can this satisfaction be demanded of a party which not only did not commit them, but which endeavored, by all means in its power, to prevent them, and has derived no advantage from them. If any Government was bound to make this satisfaction, it was the French Government, and that alone.

Mr. Everett appears, however, to find it difficult to suppose that the Government of the Netherlands will insist seriously on the propriety of appealing for redress to the French Government, it being, according to him, a principle too well known to require proof, that the suffering party must resort for redress to the author of the wrong; and that the Government of Holland having deprived the claimants of their property, it is to that Government they are to resort for satisfaction.

The undersigned has already proved, by facts, that it was not the Government of Holland, but that of France, which committed the spoliation. And he will permit himself, in his turn, to state a comparison, the application of which is too obvious to require to be pointed out. Certain turbulent neighbors compel the head of a family to quit his house, and place an intruder there. Certain strangers, notwithstanding the prohibitions and warnings of this intruder, are imprudent enough to frequent the house, and are forced to leave the property there. Soon after, the same neighbors eject the intruder, and take possession of everything they find in the house. The head of the family succeeds at length in recovering possession. Is it from him, or from the neighbors, that the strangers are to demand satisfaction?

It remains to examine two other instances—those of the Bank of Hamburg and of the Grand Duchy of Berg. But, in order to make the first of these support the principles of the memoir, it would be necessary (supposing the greater part of the money given up to Marshal Davoust really belonged to foreigners and neutrals) that these foreigners and neutrals should have addressed their claims, not to the French Government, but to the magistrates of Hamburg, who succeeded the magistrates that permitted the bank to be plundered.

The influence of the events of 1815 was the sole inducement with France to consent to a special convention on this subject, on which nothing had been stipulated in the treaty of 1814. The same force which compelled the Senate at Hamburg to permit money to be taken from the bank, had compelled the Government of Holland to permit the seizure of the American cargoes. In both cases, the French Government was the author of the spoliation.

The claim on account of the spoliations in the Grand Duchy of Berg proceeded on different grounds. Agreeably to an order of May 8, 1813, a seizure was made of colonial goods in possession of several individuals, a part of which had even been purchased of the French Government. They had been compelled to pay, a second time, duties and double duties of impost, although they had paid, at the proper time, what was lawfully due. (Treaty of 1815, Art. 4.) The petitioners demanded restitution, not of the Government which succeeded that of the Grand Duchy of Berg, but of the French Government; and it is not astonishing that so just a claim was admitted.

To conclude: The undersigned has proved that it was not the Government of Holland that deprived the claimants of their property, but that of France. Had it even been the former, the principle that the present Government of the Netherlands is responsible for all the acts of the preceding Governments, from 1795 to 1813, is one which the King cannot admit without restriction. If it might be admitted in regard to a succession of legitimate Governments, it could not be in regard to a Government established by violence, and which was not itself responsible for the acts to which it was forced by the tyranny of a foreign usurper; that the political nullity of this Government had long been a matter of public notoriety; and that if, notwithstanding daily warnings and known prohibitions, foreign merchants or navigators exposed themselves to suffer by it, and neglected to claim satisfaction at the time, in the proper quarter, they can no longer demand it from the Government of the Netherlands, which had no part in the measures imposed upon the former Governments of Holland, and derived no advantage from them.

The undersigned has the honor to renew to Mr. Everett the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

No. 10, (a.)

Mr. Everett to Baron de Nagell, dated

BRUSSELS, July 15, 1819.

In the several notes that have been presented on the part of the American Government to that of the Netherlands, on the subject of the American property sequestered and confiscated in the ports of Holland, in 1809 and 1810, it has been assumed as an acknowledged fact, that the acts by which the owners were deprived of their property were performed under the authority of the Government of Holland. In the note dated June 14, which the undersigned, chargé d'affaires of the United States of America, has had the honor to receive from his excellency the Minister of Foreign Affairs, in answer to his note upon this subject of February 22, it is stated, as one of the grounds upon which his Majesty's Government decline to admit this claim, "that it was not the Government of Holland that deprived the claimants of their property, but that of France."

This objection is preliminary in its nature to every other, and, if well founded, is of course decisive. The undersigned apprehends, however, that the difference between the views of the two Governments upon this point is more apparent than real, and that no disagreement can possibly exist respecting the material facts, since they are all matters of public notoriety. These facts are no other than that the several decrees of March, June, and July, 1809, mentioned in the answer, were promulgated by authority of King Louis; that the sequestration of the American property was effected by his officers, and that the treaty of March 16, 1810, by which this property was conveyed to France, was concluded by his minister and executed by his agents. They are all admitted in the answer, and might be proved, if necessary, by official documents. Upon these facts a question may indeed be made, whether the Government of Holland was influenced, in the adoption of these measures, by that of France in such a way as to make the responsibility for them properly devolve upon the latter; and where it is asserted in the answer that the property was in fact confiscated by France, nothing more seems to be meant than to assert the existence of such an influence. But this question, as far as it affects the case, is a question of right alone.

It is observed, indeed, in the answer, that, "properly speaking, it was not the treaty of March 16, 1810, but the union of Holland to France, which placed these cargoes in the power of the French, for that the greater part of them were still in the public warehouses at the time of the union." But as it is repeatedly admitted that these cargoes were given up to the French in consequence of the treaty, and while Louis was still King, (eut encore le nom de regne,) the former remark can only be supposed to refer to their remaining in the public warehouses, after they had been delivered to the French authorities—a circumstance which, if true, has no connexion with the merits of the case.

The material facts being agreed between the parties, the only objections made to the claim by the Government of the Netherlands are the two following: First. That the French Government was properly responsible, in the first instance, for this confiscation; and, secondly, that, supposing the Dutch Government of that day to have been responsible, the present Government has not succeeded to the obligation. Both these objections were anticipated by the undersigned in his note, and it will be his object, at present, to support the views there taken of them against the arguments contained in the answer. He will first, however, briefly notice some other points of less importance in that part of the answer which is termed a correction of the statement of facts contained in the note.

The three cases of the Baltimore, the Bacchus, and the St. Michael, mentioned in the note, were, of course, intended merely as examples of the character of the transactions upon which the claim is founded. Any errors that might have occurred in the statement of either of these cases would not, therefore, have affected the general principles of the claim. But, upon comparing the account given of them in the answer with that of the note, the undersigned is unable to perceive any considerable variation, much less any correction of such importance as to warrant the charge made upon the sufferers, of permitting themselves to "disfigure facts, and surprise the religion of their Government."

After a commentary upon these cases mentioned in the note, it is observed in the answer, that "Mr. Eustis was mistaken in supposing that these several cargoes had been confiscated by order of the Dutch Government." Of the three cases, two only had been mentioned by Mr. Eustis; and of both of these, it is expressly observed in the answer that they were delivered to the French authorities by virtue of the treaty of March 16. This was what the American Government and Mr. Eustis mean by confiscation. Again: Mr. Eustis is said to have been misinformed as to the fact, that the cargo of the Baltimore was carried to Antwerp and sold there under authority from the King of Holland. But this inaccuracy, which occurred in Mr. Eustis' note of July 4, 1816, is corrected by himself in his subsequent note of September 25, of the same year, (the one referred to in the beginning of the answer,) where he observes, that "the cargoes in general (including that mentioned by the claimants as having been removed to Antwerp as late as August, 1810,) were transferred to France by virtue of the treaty of March, 1810."

The cargo of the St. Michael, it is observed in the answer, was not subjected to the full operation of the treaty of 1810, but was regarded as a doubtful case, and not delivered to the French till after the union. In this respect, there is certainly a difference in the information given to the two Governments, since it is asserted in a statement of this case, drawn up under the direction of the sufferers, by a counsellor of New York, that the cargo was transferred to France by virtue of the treaty. But the variation, even here, is not material. The seizure of a vessel which put into port in distress, to obtain assistance, was not authorized under any pretence by the existing system or the law of nations, and, from the time it took place, gave the sufferers a just claim to restoration or indemnity, not to be affected by any subsequent transaction; so that, in this case, the mere act of seizure amounted to confiscation.

With regard to the protection granted to the captain of the Baltimore, there is no variation, in fact, between the statements in the answer and the note. The undersigned was aware that it was intended as a protection against French privateers; nor did the parties interested claim, in consequence of it, any exemption from the system established at the time the vessel arrived. Had any deficiency or irregularity been found in the ship's papers, the parties would have submitted to confiscation without complaint. But, having been furnished by the King with a special pass to protect them from dangers attending the entry, they had a right to consider the faith as well as the justice of the Government, pledged to allow them a fair trial.

The date of the arrival of the Baltimore is said, in the answer, to have been on the 24th of July, 1809, and not in the spring of that year, as stated in the note. This variation arose from an accidental substitution in the note of the time of the ship's departure from America for the time of her arrival, and is, obviously, immaterial.

These are all the differences which the undersigned has been able to discover between the two accounts. It will be seen that, without adverting to an immaterial date, the supposed errors are three in number, two of which are attributed to Mr. Eustis; that one of these had already been corrected by Mr. Eustis, and that, in regard to the other, the writer of the answer is himself mistaken by his own admission. The remaining error, attributed to the undersigned, if real, is also immaterial; were it otherwise, it would afford but little foundation for so serious a charge.

The undersigned will now proceed to consider the arguments by which the two principal objections are supported in the answer.

The first of these objections, that the Government of France, and not that of Holland, was properly responsible at the time of the confiscation, and, consequently, is so at present, is maintained on the broad grounds that, without taking into view the particular circumstances of this affair, the Dutch nation was not, at that time, responsible for any of its actions, from the state of political dependence in which it stood with regard to France. This objection is supported by the authority of Vattel, who observes, that "when a people has passed under the Government of another people, it no longer constitutes a State, and is not at liberty to make use (se servir) of the law of nations." The applicability of this principle to the present claim depends upon the time when Holland passed under the Government of France; and this point is decided in the answer, which asserts, after mentioning the epoch of the union of Holland to France, "at that time Holland passed under the Government of France." Now, the confiscations were made before this period. Holland, therefore, at the time of the confiscation, had not, by the admission of the answer, passed under the Government of France, and the remark of Vattel is consequently inapplicable.

But, without taking advantage of this admission, let us grant, with Vattel, that States nominally independent, but substantially subject, like the allies of ancient Rome, are not at liberty to make use of the law of nations. They have no right then to claim the title and privileges appertaining to independent States. Have they, therefore, a right to exemptions and privileges which independent States never pretended to claim? Have they a right to plunder individuals, and plead their insignificance in justification? Such pretensions are as much at variance with the doctrine of Vattel as with common sense; for his object is clearly to restrain, rather than enlarge, the privileges of this class of States. It may safely be asserted as a general principle, that whatever people claims the title and exercises the powers of an independent State, shall be responsible as such for its conduct. Where, on any other supposition, is the line to be drawn between dependence and independence? There are always two or three powerful States in Europe which form the central points of the political system, and influence, in a greater or less degree, the movements of all the rest. Are these, then, to be the only responsible Governments? Even if this doctrine were admitted—if it were allowed that a people might sustain, at once, the double character of an independent nation and a subject province, it would be impossible to establish the fact that this state of things really existed in Holland at the time in question. It is well known, on the contrary, that Holland was, by no means, the least independent of the different powers whose policy was then directed by that of France; and that the reign of King Louis exhibited a continual struggle between him and his brother; that all intercourse between the two countries was prohibited during the greater part of it by the decrees of both, and that the final union of Holland to France was, probably, produced by the repugnance of Louis to carry into effect the Napoleon system.

Whether we look at the general relations existing at the time between France and Holland, or at the particular circumstances of the transaction in question, it is equally evident that the Government of Holland was immediately answerable for the confiscated property. If Holland was compelled by unjust means to agree to the stipulation in the tenth article of the treaty of 1810—if, in other words, the amount of property confiscated was at that time forcibly extorted from Holland by France, Holland, no doubt, had a good claim on France for restoration; and that claim and its corresponding obligation have descended to the respective Governments now established in the two countries, and are still in force. But this circumstance can in no way affect the claim of the sufferers, whose property was taken by the Dutch Government.

Hence, there is no hardship in the responsibility which devolves upon the Government of the Netherlands, supposing even that the property passed immediately into the hands of France, and that the Dutch Government derived no benefit from the transaction. The Dutch Government and the claimants were alike, on that supposition, the innocent victims of coercion, and the claim of each for redress is good when prosecuted in the proper quarter. The claimants have a right to demand restitution from Holland, and Holland, in her turn, may require it from France. In this way complete justice will be done to both. But if justice is denied to the sufferers by the Government of the Netherlands, they have no means whatever of obtaining redress. They can have no claim on the Government of France, since the property was not taken by France from them, but from Holland. If it were admitted even that they were at liberty to follow their property through the hands of the Dutch Government, and demand restitution of it at those of France, they want the necessary means of proving their claim, because they have no knowledge of the conditions upon which this property was transferred to France. There is no privity between them and the French Government. They only know that their property was seized by Holland. They have, indeed, seen the treaty of 1810 since it was published; but neither the American Government, nor the sufferers, nor anybody but the Government of the Netherlands, possesses the information which would authorize a resort to the Government of France for redress on the ground of that treaty. If the Government of the Netherlands are entitled to make such a claim, they are able to show it; and it would be a reflection on the justice of the French Government, and the vigor of that of his Majesty, to suppose that it would not receive due attention.

Is it true, however, that the Government of Holland derived no benefit from making this seizure? Was it, then, an act of wanton and useless injustice, committed without aid or motive, for the profit of France? More probably a regard for what he thought the public good induced King Louis to agree to this measure as a less evil, rather than expose himself to a greater. He appropriated to the public service a certain amount of property belonging to individuals, to avoid some important mischief with which the body politic was threatened in the event of his refusal.

Perhaps the existence of the nation could only have been preserved on this condition. This, then, was private property taken for the public service, and this is one of the cases in which the obligation of indemnity is most strongly insisted on by the writers on public law. Admit that the policy of Louis was questionable—that he would have done better to sacrifice a precarious and degraded existence, which lasted only three months longer, rather than stain the national character by an act of such signal violence. Still, the innocent sufferers are not responsible for his political errors, and the Dutch Government, far from deriving no benefit from the transaction, were indebted to it, on this supposition, for the very being of the nation.

It follows from these remarks that the influence exercised by France in this affair has no effect on the claim; and that the French Government, if responsible at all, is responsible to the Government of the Netherlands, and not to the sufferers. The undersigned has already examined the assertion which is made in the answer in support of this objection, that the property was, in fact, confiscated by the Government of France, and not of Holland, and has shown that the contrary is repeatedly admitted in the answer itself. He does not think it necessary to notice particularly the comparison of the head of a family, expelled from his house, by which his excellency has thought proper to illustrate his views. It has no effect on the argument, since, like most other comparisons, it takes for granted the point in dispute. It would be easy to meet it by another, in which the point in controversy should, in like manner, be assumed in favor of the United States; but as this would add nothing, in reality, to the strength of the case, the undersigned will rather proceed at once to the second objection.

The responsibility of the Dutch nation at the time being established, its responsibility at present follows, of course, on the plainest principles of public law. A nation is a moral person, and responsible as such for its actions; this obligation is attached to its existence as a nation, and not to the person of its rulers. It is applicable to all the acts of the nation. It is not affected by changes of magistracy or Government, and can only be destroyed by the destruction of the body politic.

These principles appear to be admitted in the answer under certain restrictions. A distinction is attempted, in the first place, between "undisputed debts and engagements acknowledged by treaties and conventions," and those of a different character. It is denied that the passages quoted from Grotius and Puffendorf refer to any obligations but those of the former class; and the undersigned is said to have begged the question in applying them to the present claim.

This distinction, however, is entirely unsupported, both by the language of these writers and the reason of the case. It is evident that the existence of an obligation does not depend, in any degree, upon its being acknowledged, or upon the form of its acknowledgment. If the debtor, by refusing to acknowledge his debt, could release himself from the obligation to pay it, the situation of the creditor would be precarious indeed. There is no foundation in the language of these writers for this dangerous distinction. On the contrary, both their expressions, and the reasons upon which they found the obligation, apply equally to all just debts. "The people," says Grotius, "remains the same." Moral obligation is attached to national, as it is to personal identity; and is no more affected by a change in the rulers of the people, than in the agents of an individual. Nor is it correct, as stated in the answer, that this obligation is attached by Puffendorf to the possession of the identical articles of which restitution is claimed. The passage has been misunderstood by the writer of the answer. It is as follows: "The nation is not a debtor precisely in its quality of body politic, but as a holder of common property, so that the debt is attached to the possession of this property and passes with it." The property meant is the general stock of the nation. In the course of his remarks upon this subject, Puffendorf considers the case of a usurper, who has confiscated the property of individuals and transferred it to foreigners; and decides that the transaction is valid, and that the sufferers cannot follow the property through his hands, and reclaim it of the actual holders. He thus determines, expressly, that the obligation to restore is not attached to the possession of the thing taken.

Thus, both the letter and spirit of these passages are directly applicable to the present claim. Other passages may also be produced in which the doctrine of national responsibility is laid down in a still more extensive way, so as to preclude the possibility of this distinction. Vattel remarks, (book 2, chapter 18,) that "a nation is obliged to repair the damage it may have occasioned and the injuries it may have committed;" and in book 1, chapter 4, "The sovereign being invested with the public authority, and with all that constitutes the moral personality of the nation, is bound by all its obligations, and possessed of all its rights." The obligation is attached to the nation, without reference to the person of the reigning sovereign, who is, on the contrary, expressly subjected to all the obligations of the nation. These ideas are repeated in various other passages of the same writer; and authority is given to the party injured to demand reparation, and to pursue it, if necessary, by violence. Grotius, (book 3, chapter 17, section 1,) applies this principle to the particular kind of injury inflicted in this case. Nations at war are not to deprive neutrals of their property; and if they do, they are to make compensation. No reference is made to the person of the reigning sovereign. These passages contain a general statement of the principle of national responsibility, the application of which, in the particular case of a succession in the Government, and a change in its form, is made in those quoted before.

A second distinction is attempted on the ground that this obligation was contracted under the reign of a usurper, and that such obligations are not binding. Whatever may be thought of the general correctness of this principle, it cannot be applied to the present claim, because the Government under which it arose was for that purpose, at least, legitimate. Every established Government is legitimate as far as foreign nations are concerned. In such cases, therefore, there is no room for the question how far the obligations of a usurper are binding. The independence of a nation consists in its right to exclude all foreign interference in its Government, in other words, in the obligation which all foreign nations are under to recognize as legitimate the established system. Foreigners being bound to admit the legitimacy of the established system in the interest of the nation, the nation is, of course, bound to admit it in the interest of foreigners. The great diplomatic transactions, and the modern wars referred to in the answer, far from contradicting this principle, afford the strongest confirmation of it. These wars were made and these treaties concluded professedly for the express purpose of securing the exercise of the right of self-government, and are never defended on any other ground. The distinction, then, is radically vicious, or at least entirely foreign to the present claim.

These principles were advanced in a note, and supported by some authorities, particularly that of Puffendorf. It was, therefore, with some surprise that the undersigned perceived the name of this writer cited in the answer in favor of this objection. Puffendorf certainly refutes the objection at considerable length, and applies to it, as was observed in the note, the epithet "sans contredit frivoli." He lays down the principle above mentioned, that the acts of a Government, whatever may be its title, are legitimate and binding as far as they regard foreign nations, and decides several cases accordingly. It is true, as the answer remarks, that he supposes a case in which the lawful sovereign may annul the acts of a usurper. This is nothing more than the converse of his former principle, and is stated in the following terms: "As to the acts of a usurper, whose operation is wholly interior, the lawful sovereign may annul them upon his return," &c. It is only necessary to cite the passage, in order to show that, taken in connexion with the preceding remarks, it favors, instead of opposes, the views of the American Government.—(See Puf. lib., chap. 12, sect. 2.)

Grotius, says the answer, declares plainly that neither the people nor the legitimate sovereign is bound to keep the engagement of a usurper. It has already been shown that this question is foreign to the claim, and Grotius confirms this opinion by the qualification annexed to the above remark: "The King and people are bound to make restitution of what has come to their use."—(Grotius, lib. 2, chap. 14, section 14.)

The passage from Martens respecting treaties extorted by force is not applicable to the present claim. The analogy, as far as any exists, is favorable to the claimants. If treaties extorted by force are not binding, property extorted by force ought to be restored.

The views taken by the American Government of the law of nations, as applied to this claim, were supported in every point by the examples of national usage mentioned in the note. These examples were taken from the history of the latest times and the most important events. They were examples of a great nation, with the sanction of most of the other great nations of Europe, in particular of the Netherlands, making itself responsible for contracts made and spoliations committed under a foreign Government declared to be founded in usurpation. The undersigned will conclude this reply by a few remarks upon the objections made in the answer to the applicability of these examples.

The example of the indemnities granted to foreign nations by France in the late treaties of Paris is objected to on the ground that the principle of indemnity was not acknowledged by France, but that the allied powers took advantage of their situation to force upon her an arrangement which was in itself unjust, and which affords no rule for the conduct of other nations. When it is considered that the Government of the Netherlands, if not an immediate party to these treaties, was intimately allied to the powers that concluded them, and has participated largely in the pecuniary benefits resulting from this particular provision, the objection appears somewhat extraordinary. It is stated by Schoell that this Government has received from France sixty millions of francs, to be employed in the construction of fortresses, an equivalent for twenty-two millions granted as indemnity, and more than eighty millions in satisfaction of pecuniary debts contracted by the former authorities. The responsibility of the present French Government for the acts of the former one is, of course, supposed in all these payments; and the Government of the Netherlands could not possibly have consented to accept these sums, unless it had approved the principle upon which they were paid. Whatever opinion might be formed by indifferent persons of the character of these transactions, it is evident that they may safely be alleged as authority against the parties concerned, or those that derived a profit from them.

But, without insisting on this point, it may easily be shown that the principle of indemnity was, in fact, admitted by France herself. It is even admitted in the passage cited in the answer from a speech of the Duke de Richelieu in the French House of Deputies. The Duke complains, indeed, that the principle was enforced with too much severity. The rigor of it might have been alleviated by the equity and magnanimity of the sovereigns. What is this but saying that the principle in itself is just? Again, the recollections retained by the sovereigns of the violence that had been exercised by France within their territories, prevented them from giving way to those generous sentiments which they might otherwise have indulged. Was this violence, then, the act of Louis XVIII? Unless the French nation under Louis XVIII is responsible for the conduct of the French nation under Napoleon, upon what ground could the violent proceedings of the latter have irritated the sovereigns against his peaceful successor?

But the principle of indemnity is formally admitted by France in a document much more authentic than the reported speech of a minister to the House of Deputies, namely: in the official note of the French plenipotentiaries of September 21, 1815, written in answer to the note of the day preceding from the ministers of the four allied powers. It is there distinctly stated that the King admits in principle the payment of an indemnity; and in the reply of the allied ministers of the 22d they observed, "the French plenipotentiaries admit the principle of indemnity."

With regard to the 19th article of the treaty of March, 1814, to which the undersigned is said to have given too extensive a signification, he will only observe, that, under this article, claims to the amount of thirteen hundred millions of francs were presented to the French Government; that, by an amicable arrangement, a gross sum of about four hundred millions was allowed in satisfaction of the whole, and that, of this sum, as has been already observed, the Government of the Netherlands is said to have received more than eighty millions. A transaction of this kind is perhaps sufficiently extensive to warrant any language applied to it in the note. The undersigned does not perceive, however, that the principle of responsibility, supposed in the article, is affected in any degree by the extent of its application. He must be permitted to express his surprise that the principle upon which a certain class of private claims was excluded from this arrangement, namely, that they arose from damages committed by enemies in time of war, should have been considered applicable to the present claim. It can hardly be necessary to remind his excellency that the United States and Holland were not at war at the time of these confiscations.

The examples of the Bank of Hamburg and the Grand Duchy of Berg are objected to on the ground that, in order to make them support the principle of the note, satisfaction should have been demanded of the Governments of Berg and Hamburg, rather than France. Had the acts in question been performed by those Governments, the objection would be well founded. But, at the time of the spoliations at Hamburg, that city was a part of the French Empire; of course no Government of Hamburg existed; and in the Duchy of Berg the seizures were made by the French Government. It is not maintained in the note that a Government is responsible for all the acts of violence committed on its territory, but that it is responsible for its own actions.

The paragraph in which the usage of nations, in regard to treaties and other public acts, is alleged in confirmation of the claim, is said, in the answer, to "fall of itself," because this is not a question of treaties and stipulations. It was the opinion of the undersigned that the usage of nations, in this particular, was susceptible of a double application to this case; direct, because the confiscations were a breach of an existing treaty between the two countries; and indirect, because, if this had not been the case, no cause can be shown why a nation is not equally responsible for its other acts as for its treaties and stipulations. The conclusion would therefore follow, immediately, from the obligation in one case to the obligation in the other.

The claim of Holland on France, for the payment of a certain term of interest on the public debt, was not rejected on the ground that the present Government of France is not responsible for the acts of the former one, but on the ground that the treaties of Paris were a definitive arrangement of all the claims of the allies on France, and that this had not been provided for. The rejection of it by the arbitrators is, therefore, no argument in favor of the Government of the Netherlands in the present case; on the contrary, the making of it by that Government, as it supposes the principle of responsibility, may fairly be urged by the American Government as an authority in their favor.

The undersigned has thus examined, in detail, the several objections made by his excellency to the principles and authorities advanced in support of this claim, and has attempted to show that the views taken by the American Government are not affected by them. The demand made by the Government of the Netherlands, in the present case, to be relieved from the operation of the acknowledged principles of justice, to be excused from making satisfaction for an admitted injury, from paying a sum of money, the value of which has actually been received, is a pretension that derogates from common right, and, before it can be allowed, the grounds of exceptions must be established in the strictest manner. The undersigned has endeavored to prove, in confirmation of what has been advanced in his former note, that neither of those taken by the Government of the Netherlands is tenable; that the French Government, if responsible at all, is responsible to this country, and not to the United States; and that the question whether the acts of a usurper are binding on the people is foreign to the claim. If these points have been made out to the satisfaction of his Majesty's Government, it is presumed that the claim will still be considered valid, and the sufferers admitted to prove their losses and receive compensation.

The undersigned has the honor to assure his excellency Baron de Nagell of his high respect.

Mr. Everett (No. 34) to the Secretary of State, dated

THE HAGUE, November 8, 1819.

I have the honor to transmit the reply of this Government to my note of July 15, on the subject of the claims. From the tenor of this communication, as well as of the former ones, there is very little appearance of a favorable result. It would be improper, I conceive, notwithstanding, to permit the correspondence to finish abruptly with this reply, and I shall, therefore, immediately prepare an answer.

I have the honor to be, with much respect, sir, your very obedient humble servant,

A. H. EVERETT.

No. 11, (a.)

[Translation.]

Baron de Nagell to Mr. Everett, dated

THE HAGUE, November 4, 1819.

In the reply which the undersigned had the honor to make, on the 14th of June last, to the note of Mr. Everett of the 22d of February preceding, the Government of the Netherlands thought itself justified in supposing that the reasons already assigned in the replies upon the subject of the American property confiscated by the French Government would have been sufficient to have brought that matter to a conclusion; it indulged a greater confidence of this, after the arguments used in the last note of the undersigned.

The reply transmitted by Mr. Everett, on the 15th of July last, again imposes on the undersigned the ever painful task of opposing, to the opinions reproduced in that reply, others entirely different. He proceeds to perform it with every disposition to admit what the evidence requires, and with all the candor of Mr. Everett's reply.

The Government of the Netherlands has always maintained the double position, that it was not the Government of Holland, which, at the period of the acts complained of, did not exist in fact, more than in right, but that of France, which was responsible for these acts; and that, even supposing this responsibility rested on the former, it could not fall upon the present Government of the Netherlands.

The reply admits that if the first objection be valid, it is decisive against the claims, but endeavors to profit of some admissions of the answer to refute it.

Although the undersigned is persuaded that it would be easy to show, since the material facts, and not appearances, are considered, that there should be on this point no difference of opinion, yet, to avoid repetitions, and not to anticipate his intended remarks, he will here confine himself to observe that his intention was not simply to assert that, under King Louis, Holland was influenced by France, (this, too, seemed to be the sentiment of the reply,) but, also, that in 1809 and 1810 she was governed so despotically by the latter that the name of King was merely an object of derision; that Bonaparte had not a regard even for appearances; and that, at the period when the American cargoes, particularly of the vessels mentioned in the answer, were conveyed to France, the Government of Holland did [not] exist even in name. This is why he said, in terms, that it was not the treaty of 1810, but the union with France, properly speaking, which placed the cargoes of these vessels in the power of the French, and that, therefore, the Government of Holland should not be held responsible for a confiscation made by and for the profit of France, and which would not have happened, had not the Government ceased to exist; that the words, "although King Louis had still the name of reigning," relate to a circumstance omitted in the reply, which is, that King Louis, though he still retained the title, held it so entirely under the authority of a King, that he was compelled to convey to the French Government cargoes belonging to his own subjects, as owners or creditors, but reputed to be American. But, as his object is to remove all doubt, he now declares that he intended to say, by the citations of the answer, that, in general, the cargoes sequestered, and especially those of the Baltimore, the Bacchus, and the St. Michael, were not confiscated by the French till after the abdication of King Louis and the union of Holland with France. The remark consequently applies, not to their continuance in the warehouses after, but before they were delivered to the French authorities.

Before the question of the responsibility of the Government of Holland is considered, the reply first examines a point which is regarded as of the least importance.

If, by those corrections, the undersigned has rectified the incorrect statement of the claims, the relative importance of those corrections seems to him still greater. It will not be difficult to assign the reasons for this opinion. According to the reply, "any errors that might have occurred in the statement of either of these cases would not affect the general claim." If by the general principles is understood the obligation to repair the injuries, it is evident that it is necessary, in the first place, to ascertain if the injury have been committed. For, even if the present Government of the Netherlands could admit that it is responsible for the violence, injustice, and spoliations, of which the Government of Holland is accused, it should then closely examine each claim to see if its merits will allow it to be embraced by the principle. And the undersigned hesitates not to say that no one of the cases in question should have this right, because they do not sustain the description under which the claimants have represented them, that they might interest the Government in favor of their complaints.

This assertion is very strong, and the reply says that but three variations are discovered between the statement and the correction. The first is an error in date, which is pronounced to be unimportant; the second relates to the time and authority which ordered the sale and transportation of one of the cargoes to Antwerp, (which is said to have been indirectly acknowledged and corrected by Mr. Eustis;) and lastly, a third one, in which the undersigned, from his own acknowledgment, must be deceived.

Notwithstanding his close examination to discover upon what this assertion is founded, he declares it to have been impossible to perceive it.

Let us again recur to facts. The Government of the United States claims of that of the Netherlands for the arbitrary acts of the former Government of Holland. Persuaded that this claim could not be sustained, but under the circumstances that accompanied the execution of the existing laws in 1809, till July, 1810, and not under the laws themselves; for, upon the supposition of the United States, the Government of Holland, enjoying the rights of independent States, had unquestionably that of prohibiting entry into its ports, as the United States did in their non-intercourse act, (Schoell, I, ix, p. 429, et seq.) and even much more, as it was merely in retaliation of the acts of exclusion of the latter Government that Bonaparte ordered the same measure to be adopted, not only in the ports of France, but also in those of Holland, Spain, Italy, and the Kingdom of Naples; and the right of proceeding even to confiscation (supposing this may be attributed to King Louis) could no longer be denied to him, since the United States had frequently renewed similar orders of confiscation and sequestration.

The claims, it must be repeated, could only be sustained upon the accessory circumstances, and not upon the measure itself.

The notes having, in preference, denounced three cases, as particularly marked by arbitrary, unjust, and even perfidious circumstances, the Government of the Netherlands, in consequence, ordered an inquest of them to be instituted, so as to be able to judge of the subject understandingly; and as it is very common for complaints to impose upon the Government by exaggerated statements, if the cases selected and produced as those most loudly calling for justice should be found not to merit the imputations, that the rest might be decided upon more readily.

The first case is that of the Baltimore, represented to have been deceived by a license, safe conduct, or special passport, under guaranty of the sacred word of King Louis, and induced to go into Holland, where the greater part of her cargo was immediately seized and subsequently confiscated.

The examination has shown that this vessel was bound for Holland; that she arrived there on the 24th of July, 1809, and not in the spring of that year, which was consequently at a time when the exclusion laws were operative in America, for Consul Bourne had received official communication of it; that the paper solicited by her consignees, of King Louis, was not a special license, (although the claimants have persevered, strenuously, in maintaining it,) nor indeed could it be, for it is known that Bonaparte reserved to himself, exclusively, the grant of them; nor was it even a protection, properly speaking, to exempt the vessel from the operation of the laws of blockade and sequestration, but merely a means made use of at that time to enable vessels at their entry to elude the French privateers, and by which they might not, at least, be captured in our ports, before they could be assured whether their cargoes fell within the terms of the law or not.

Examination being made, that part of the cargo of the Baltimore not subject to the prohibitions was immediately returned, and the rest, according to the same laws, deposited in the warehouses.

This is, then, what the claimants are allowed to pronounce as a violation of the rights of hospitality and justice, and as exhibiting a total want of those sentiments of self-respect and common humanity to be found among the most barbarous nations; for no people, civilized or uncivilized, are so utterly destitute of honor as to violate their own safe conduct, and employ the sacred pledge of their word as an instrument of mischief against a friendly power.

By these declamations the undersigned will not say how much the claimants have committed their advocates.

The two other cases have been represented as still stronger.

To avoid repetitions, the undersigned will return to the details of his last note; they show that those two vessels received the same treatment they would have received anywhere else; that every assistance was rendered them which could have been expected by vessels in similar circumstances; that, so far from having merited the charge of the pretended pillage, at the order of the constituted authority, and of cruelties unknown to pirates, the Government of Holland sought for a pretext to relieve these vessels, and especially the St. Michael, from the severity of the stipulations of the treaty of 1810, although her entry was after its conclusion.

To these observations, made in his preceding note, the undersigned will add some particulars brought to light by the late examination. Although the present Government has assuredly no interest in making an apology for a state of things from which it considers itself perfectly estranged, justice and equity demand this testimony to be rendered to King Louis, that, if the tyranny of his brother forced upon him measures prejudicial to American merchants, his known wishes and constant efforts to prevent, as much as possible, their effects, demand for him the acknowledgment of the Government of the United States. There exist numerous proofs that, till the moment of his abdication, Louis was solicitously engaged in devising means for securing American cargoes to their owners. Respectable mercantile houses were also consulted on the subject. They confessed that, from every view of the case, under existing circumstances, sequestration was the best precaution. The veil will not be raised, but it is known that a violent letter was received by Louis from his brother, reproaching him with the emptiness of his warehouses.

The archives of 1809 and 1810 are filled with complaints and threats from the ambassador of France upon the manner in which Louis eluded the designs of Bonaparte and favored American vessels. Direct charges on this subject induced the Minister for Foreign Affairs repeatedly to solicit his dismissal.

Lastly, a circumstance of the greatest importance has been established by authentic documents. It is, that, in consequence of the precautions of King Louis, almost all the cargoes, especially those of the three vessels before mentioned, were found entire in the warehouses after the period of the abdication of Louis, and that they were not conveyed into France and confiscated by order of Bonaparte till, by the incorporation of Holland, the independence and the Government of Holland no longer existed even in name. Supposing, therefore, that the Government which succeeded to that of Louis could be rendered responsible, it is plain that this would be the Government of France, and not that of the present King of the Netherlands, who did not assuredly succeed to the ex-Emperor.

These observations might suffice, but the same reasons that induced the undersigned to follow the note of the 22d February, in all its details, operate similarly in regard to the reply.

The important remarks which the undersigned has just made, as to the time when the cargoes fell into the power of the French, answer the objection made in the reply to the application of a remarkable passage of Vattel by the undersigned.

The reply pretends that the propriety of that application depends on the time when Holland passed under the Government of France, and that this point has been decided by the undersigned himself, who fixes it at the period of the union with France; and that, as the confiscations were made previously, the remark of Vattel is therefore inapplicable.

The reasoning of the undersigned has not been preserved in the reply. After having observed that the independence of Holland ceased unquestionably at the period of the union, the undersigned, in another paragraph, showed that, for a long time before that period, Holland was in the condition wherein, according to Vattel, a State ceases to be independent and responsible. He still contends, that the more the citation is compared with what preceded and followed the union, its application will appear more perfect.

After this, it is easy to answer the many questions of the reply. They all depend on the representations which the claimants are allowed to paint in such dark colors; but this representation has been shown to be imaginary.

Have States, nominally independent, but really subject, the right to pillage individuals? It is proved that the pillage, if there ever was any, was not committed by Holland. Is not every people that claims the title, and exercises the powers of an independent State, responsible as such for its conduct? Vattel informs us that this title may be fallacious, and that, while preserving certain attributes of an independent State, it may not be so in fact; the difficulty is, moreover, here solved: Was it from the full and free will of Holland that, when bending under foreign usurpation, she exercised the functions and pursued the measures complained of? The reply itself remarks, that the design of Vattel is rather to restrict than enlarge the attributes in like circumstances. What is the line of distinction, it is asked, between dependence and independence? Vattel, in the passage cited, has drawn it. The parallel between the influence always exercised, more or less, by some powerful States cannot form a comparison with the imperious tyranny, open and irresistible, that was exercised by Bonaparte over all the States where the troops and agents of France had penetrated. Far from its being impossible to establish that Holland, even before its incorporation, whether a Republic or a Kingdom, was, in fact, but a province of France, the undersigned appeals to the judgment of Europe for the correctness of what is advanced by a modern publicist, whose authority, he presumes to say, will not be questioned—Schoell.

In 1805, Holland, that till then was obliged to preserve a certain independence in its relations with France, received a prince and a master at the hands of the master of France, but Louis was merely the instrument of a foreign usurper. Nothing characterized the dependence of Holland more than the right assumed by Bonaparte to grant licenses to its inhabitants. The convention concluded on the 16th of March, 1810, terminated the series of treaties between France and Holland, if the capitulations imposed by a conqueror upon the people whom he has reduced to live under his laws may be always so termed. Louis could not obtain any modifications thereto; those which he proposed, to moderate the measures against the United States, were rejected as imperiously as the rest. He signed the treaty as it had been dictated by the tyrant. It will be difficult to think that, after having been degraded to this point of humiliation, Louis could hope to preserve the least degree of independence. He, at least, soon proved how vain such hope would be. Bonaparte soon after abolished the Kingdom of Holland, which he himself had erected, and united it to France, by a decree of the 9th of July, 1810; thus passed away that shadow of independence under which the United Provinces had existed for fifteen years.

It is, finally, France that is accused by England, in the face of Europe, of "the perfidious seizure of all the American vessels and their cargoes, in every port subjected to French arms."

How can the assertions, that it would be impossible to establish by facts that Holland, with the name of independence, was not in reality a subject province, nor one of those States whose acts were governed despotically by France, be reconciled with the opinions so generally entertained and drawn from the history of Holland? Did not the efforts made by Louis to release himself from this despotism terminate in his disgrace; and did it not serve to give greater weight to the yoke of Holland and hasten its ruin?

Inquiry into the motives that actuated or rather propelled Louis in all this transaction, or as to the conduct he should have maintained, is foreign to the present Government, and the reply is compelled to conjecture them.

But as to the assertion that Holland has ever derived the least advantage from that transaction, it is denied in its fullest extent.

It has already been seen that the confiscation was made by France, after the extinction of the Kingdom of Holland, and, of course, was made by the French. Mr. Eustis himself has acknowledged that the product was conveyed to the Imperial Treasury. And the undersigned will add, what is notorious, that Bonaparte, putting an end to the confiscation of which his brother had used a subterfuge in regard to the American cargoes, so as to gain time and wrest from him his prey, put aside all other measures, and issued the decree of incorporation.

If, then, it was unjust to claim of the Government of Holland for an injury in which that Government had but a passive part, and from which it only derived subjection and the ruin of the national fortunes, a just and reasonable Government could not insist upon making the present Government of the Netherlands responsible, since the true state of things has been represented, and because it had nothing in common with the usurper who forced Holland to be both the witness and the victim of his decrees.

But, even supposing that the confiscations in question can be imputed to King Louis, the losses that were thereby occasioned to the owners cannot be claimed of the present Government of the Netherlands; this constitutes the second objection which the reply endeavors to confute.

The principle advanced in the notes of Messrs. Eustis and Everett, that every Government should be responsible for all the acts of the preceding, is one whose nature and consequences will not allow the Government of the Netherlands to admit it, without restrictions.

After having read with attention the remarks of the reply in this part of the last note, and the interpretation it persists in giving to the citations whose application it denies, the undersigned may be permitted to say candidly, that, notwithstanding the novel considerations advanced, those authorities appear to him to relate to a different matter; and it is only by recurring to induction and analogy, which are ever uncertain, (as he remarks,) that they can be made to apply. In a word, that the civilians cited do not furnish any direct decision upon the principles in point. But, to avoid repetitions, and that this discussion may not degenerate into a literary dispute upon the sense of controverted passages, he will select one; and as the authority of Puffendorf is regarded by the reply as most favorable to the claim, the undersigned will again analyze that passage of this author, esteemed to be so conclusive by the reply as to induce the expression of surprise that an attempt should ever have been made to use it against the principle in question.

The passage is found at chapter 12, liber 8, which treats of the changes and the decline of States.

In section 1 Puffendorf maintains that a people does not cease to be the same, although the form of its government may have been changed: thus, says he, when a free people is conquered they never cease to be the same people, provided the conqueror that has become master governs them afterwards as a SEPARATE KINGDOM, AND NOT AS A PROVINCE ANNEXED TO HIS FORMER STATES.

In section 2 Puffendorf discusses the question whether, when a people passes from the absolute Government of a monarch, or an oligarchy, to a popular Government, the State, thus become free, should observe the treaties, contracts, and other acts of the King or aristocrats under whom they formerly existed. It is on this occasion, while combatting those who maintained the negative, on the ground that the State did not properly constitute one when these obligations were contracted, that he used the phrase on which the reply rests, that it is certainly a frivolous reason. This positive decision he sustains by the aid of a comparison; a mode of argument which it seems ought not to have great force, as the reply contends it has the defect of supposing what is required to be proved.

The section concludes with this sentence: "When a people is reduced to the form of a province, and is not consequently of the body of the State, they are by no means on this account liberated"—from what? From observing all the engagements of the Government abolished, and making indemnity for all the losses it may have caused to foreign nations? No: but from paying what it may have previously borrowed; for it did not become a debtor necessarily as a part of a State, but because certain goods were possessed in common, so that the debt is attached to the property, into whatever hands it may pass. And Puffendorf adds immediately after, section 3, in the margin, how far are the acts and engagements of a usurper valid after he has been expelled; and in the text, the subject, in my opinion, presents no difficulty IN REGARD TO DEBTS CONTRACTED FOR THE NECESSITIES OF THE STATE. "But it is more difficult to decide, if this be generally correct, in regard to all the acts and engagements of an expelled usurper." This appears to me to be the most reasonable. If he who has invaded a State make an alliance with other States against a common enemy, and afterwards gives them a part of the booty to be sold, the alliance, gift, and the sale, exist even after the expulsion of the usurper. For, by virtue of these acts, the other States have acquired a valid right, since they treated with the usurper as with the chief of the State, the Government of which was in his possession, AND BECAUSE THESE ACTS TENDED TO THE ADVANTAGE OF THE PEOPLE, without implying any crime capable of annulling them.

But if the usurper have sold to another State goods extorted by means unjust to the oppressed citizens, shall they afterwards be claimed, when the time may permit? Considering the notions and customs of people, I cannot perceive by what right those who have been deprived of their goods can demand them of the purchasers. For, inasmuch as the usurper sustains himself only by force, he is esteemed as an enemy of the State, and therefore that part of his booty which has been conveyed to another State from the one he has despoiled cannot be reclaimed any more than the movable articles acquired by right of war. If the Government of the usurper is become legitimate, by consent of the citizens submitting to it, either tacitly or expressly, foreigners may then consider the goods of which he may deprive the citizens as legitimately confiscated.

It is now easy to determine if this passage, which is but the amplification of a parallel one in Grotius, favors the reply.

It is wished to use it in proof of the position that a nation is not affected by the changes of the Government, and cannot be destroyed but by the dissolution of the body politic.

Puffendorf plainly excepts the case of a State that has become the mere province of another, and this case is precisely that of Holland by its incorporation with France.

It is wished to use it in proof of the position that every Government which succeeds another, even that of an usurper, is responsible for all the acts of the preceding Government.

Puffendorf confines this obligation to the public debts contracted for the necessities of the State; and suggests, as to the rest, what appeared to him NOT OBLIGATORY but REASONABLE.

It is wished to prove from it that a people is bound to repair injuries done to strangers.

The first case proposed by Puffendorf is that where a people may keep what has been taken, bought from, or bestowed by an usurper.

Lastly, it is wished to prove by it that a people is bound to restore what has been pillaged, even if the articles have passed into the hands of others.

Puffendorf, without approaching the second question, whether the obligation to restore be attached to the possession of the thing taken, decides that, according to the ideas and usages of people, if even citizens (and not, as the vague translation, individuals)—oppressed citizens, be unjustly deprived of their goods by an usurper, they have not the right to claim these goods.

All that this passage, therefore, proves is the distinction drawn by the undersigned between public debts, the obligation and justice of which cannot be denied, and engagements whose validity remains doubtful.

The reply contends against the distinction, and condemns the doctrine as dangerous. What doctrine? That the validity of an obligation of a just debt (an important correction made by the reply a few lines below) depends on its acknowledgment, or the form of this acknowledgment? The undersigned never intended to maintain it; and without proposing difficulties as to the degrees of influence that the form of acknowledgment, or the titles of creditors, frequently have upon the validity of a claim, he will confess that the condition of creditors in that case would be as precarious as the condition of supposed debtors, were it sufficient to declare, claim, and sue for a debt, to establish its existence and justice, and the obligation to pay it. He has not wished to affect this common obligation, but merely to show that neither the letter nor the spirit of the passage adduced is applicable to the present claim.

This may be said of that passage of Grotius, (Lib. III, chap. 17,) as to the conduct towards neutrals and their reciprocal duties.

It is only necessary to read the examples drawn from Moses, John the Baptist, the Goths, Greeks, Romans, Huns, Allains, &c., on which this publicist has endeavored to establish his principles, to be persuaded how inapplicable they are to the present state of things, and especially to the point in question.

The reply again asserts, that the question whether a legitimate Government be bound by the acts of an usurper is foreign to the case; and resolves the difficulty by affirming that the Government of Holland was legitimate in regard to the object in question; for every established Government is legitimate as far as foreign nations are concerned. The undersigned, in his note, dwelled on this point as only accessory to the principal question whether a legitimate Government be responsible for all the acts of the Government it has overthrown. This was supported by some authorities, to which the reply opposed assertions which seemed to the undersigned by no means conformable with the just sense of the passages cited or the principles adopted at the time.

Before he proceeds to prove his positions, the undersigned will not deny that there may be on this subject a great incongruity between the theory and the practice.

Notwithstanding the theories which inculcate that the moral of nations is the same with that of individuals, and that the laws which regulate the conduct of an honest man should also direct the actions of a people, it is not the less true that a private person will dishonor himself in the opinion of the public, and risk his reputation and fortune by an association with villains and knaves, yet history teaches us how often interest induces nations to disregard scruples of delicacy and to contract friendly relations with usurpers and tyrants. But it is also true that the codes of the laws of nations oppose the doctrine of the reply, and that political disregard of restrictions and examples which are more operative upon the world.

Martens employs the third book of his Law of Modern Nations to exhibit and prove the reciprocal rights of States relatively to their constitutions; and he remarks (as the undersigned has said) that for centuries, and especially since the adoption of the system of the balance of power, the most of the disputes of succession have been determined by these rights.

The remarks of this publicist cannot be reconciled with the assertion that modern wars and treaties have been made from motives of asserting the right of self-government. The motives assigned by Martens are rather directed to the maintaining or re-establishing of legitimate Governments.

The undersigned, therefore, cannot but still consider the distinction established in his answer as both just and applicable to the present claim. He has already shown the true meaning of the passage of Puffendorf, (Lib. 8, chap. 12.) That which he has given to the passage of Grotius, (Lib. 2, chap. 14,) cannot be disproved by a mere assertion; and even if this author does add, that the King and the people are bound to restore what has been used to their profit, (this is the very term he uses,) this modification cannot render inappropriate the application of the passage adduced, since Mr. Eustis himself acknowledges that the product of the cargoes confiscated by the French was deposited in the Imperial Treasury; and the undersigned has, moreover, proved that all this transaction tended not to the profit but the ruin of Holland. The same thing may be said of the passage of Martens; it would be easy to apply it to the question, but difficult to discover wherein analogy renders it favorable to the claimants, at least against the present Government of the Netherlands. Is it because treaties concluded by force are not obligatory, that property taken by force should be restored? Be it so; but by whom? Undoubtedly by him who has extorted them; that is, in the present case, by the French Government.

Finally, the undersigned thinks he may safely affirm that the system now prevailing in Europe does not admit the full recognition of every Government whatsoever.

The undersigned will not pursue these reflections further. As it has been shown that the confiscations were made by Bonaparte, the question whether or not his Government was legitimate for this object, and whether foreigners are bound to admit the legality of his system, is not for the present Government of the Netherlands to decide, and has, moreover, been settled by the late treaties.

The reply next commences a more important reasoning, and supposes that proofs of its arguments are found in the late treaties and the history of modern times.

"There is here seen a great nation which, under the sanction, for the most part, of the other great nations of Europe, particularly of the Netherlands, makes itself responsible for the engagements entered into, and the spoliations committed, under a preceding Government, declared to be founded on usurpation."

The undersigned, in his last note, showed that these treaties and examples cited could not govern in the present case, because the principle advanced in the memoir did not influence the sovereigns thereto, especially the King of the Netherlands; and it would not have been recognized by France had not particular circumstances operated on the conventions and produced the treaties of Paris in 1814 and 1815. Far from having, however, the least intention of insinuating (as seen with surprise in the reply) that the allies availed themselves of their posture to impose on France an arrangement unjust in itself, neither this sentiment nor language are found in the answer.

As the discussion of this subject is more interesting than an inquiry into the opinions or theories of civilians, who had in view events that have no connexion with a state of things the possibility of which they could not even have foreseen, the undersigned will proceed carefully to examine this last species of argument. With this view he will consider the argument adduced by the reply, and that which the Government of the Netherlands opposes to it.

The position taken by the reply is, that the large sums which France was bound to pay by virtue of the treaties of Paris were the indemnifications which she ought to have paid, according to the principles of the law of nations, for the violations and spoliations of the preceding Government; for every succeeding Government is responsible for all the acts of the preceding, whether legitimate or usurped.

The position of the Government of the Netherlands, on the contrary, is, that the late treaties of Paris did not furnish any argument in favor of this doctrine.

The arguments of the reply reduce themselves to the following: That the responsibility of the French Government is properly supposed in all these payments; that the Duke de Richelieu indirectly recognized the principle in his speech to the deputies, and that it had been distinctly recognized by France in a document much more authentic than a speech—an official note of the French plenipotentiaries; that the Government of the Netherlands would not have accepted the large sums assigned to it had it not approved the principle in virtue of which they were paid; and unless the French nation under Louis XVIII be made responsible for the French nation under Napoleon, upon what principle could France and Louis XVIII be made to suffer for the violence of Bonaparte.

The undersigned will oppose to them the decisions of an impartial judge, whose authority will not be questioned by the author of the reply—Schoell.

First. Is the responsibility of the present French Government, or, in other words, the principle that every succeeding Government, whether the preceding be legitimate or usurped, naturally supposed in the late treaties of Paris?

Entirely to the contrary, if it is to be understood thereby that Louis XVIII was responsible for the acts of the preceding Government. The negotiations could not be difficult. But what was done in France twenty years ago was not by the Bourbons; they neither ordered nor approved the injuries inflicted on different people. Even they themselves were the victims of the revolutionary power.—(Schoell, Hist. Ab. of the Treaties of Paris, I, X, et 81.)

Was not the principle of the responsibility recognized, indirectly, by the Duke de Richelieu in his speech, laid down formally by the contracting powers, and admitted by the French plenipotentiaries themselves in an official note?

One explanation will suffice to refute this assertion.

"In the conference of the 2d of October, 1815, the principal bases were agreed upon. The principle of the cessions (territorial) that France was to make was here determined, as also the sum of indemnity to be paid by her for the expenses of the LATE ARMAMENTS."

This indemnity was only in reference to these LATTER, proofs of which abound in the details of the negotiation.

The Duke de Richelieu had acknowledged "that all the products of agriculture, the articles of commerce, and all sorts of property, were sacrificed by every people, alarmed at the return of Bonaparte; and more than a million of soldiers were precipitated upon the frontiers of France."

Let us consult the commentary of Mr. Schoell upon this text.

If the facility with which the inhabitants of France armed themselves against these nations gave them a right to demand a guaranty, the sacrifices they made authorizes them to claim an indemnity.

"But even this title was not without objection. After the principle was admitted that no provinces should be demanded of France under the title of guaranty, much less could such cession be demanded under title of indemnity for the expenses of the wars. The only means which then remained for the reimbursement of these expenses was the payment of a CONTRIBUTION."

This is also what the French plenipotentiaries acceded to in their note of the 21st of September, 1815.

It was, then, for the expenses of the late armaments that a contribution was paid under the title of indemnity. If there were still another proof wanting, on the sixth of November the plenipotentiaries of the four powers again drew up a representation to the Convention upon the principles by which the seven hundred millions of contribution to be paid by France should be divided. Nothing is found in that to support the hypothesis of the reply; but the partition was, on the contrary, proportioned to the part that each interested State had taken in the last campaign, considering their contingencies. It was on this account that Sweden was excluded from the partition, having from the commencement declined all active co-operation.

This is the reply to the objection that the King of the Netherlands would not have consented to receive the large sums assigned to him had he not approved the principle of responsibility, in virtue of which they were paid to him. It has been proved that this principle did not at all operate in the partition.

But unless the French nation under Louis XVIII be made responsible for the conduct of the French nation under Napoleon, upon what principle can Louis XVIII be held responsible for the outrages of Bonaparte?

Reply: "The King having been so unfortunately situated as to require the assistance of the allies, and they being obliged of themselves to terminate their enterprise, it belonged to them alone to deliberate upon what they might judge necessary to avoid like sacrifices in future."

"Will it be objected that the allies, in taking up arms against Bonaparte and his adherents, did not consider France as an enemy's country, and, consequently, could not exercise over her the right of conquest? Certainly that war should not have been one of conquest, and the allies would have acted against their principles, had they attempted to aggrandize themselves at the expense of France by profiting of her misfortunes. But it is not the less true that the conquest existed in fact; and if the powers, by declaring that they made war only upon Bonaparte and his adherents, wished to draw off the nation from the usurper, the nation having the right to claim this declaration should have separated itself from him in fact, and not favored his project either by a culpable indifference, or by bearing arms in his support."

But, what! could the pacific Louis XVIII admit these principles?

"When the alliance of March 25 was concluded he had already become a stranger to this war. Did he not also accede to that treaty by a formal act, as the other Governments did? But a simple adhesion was only required of his ministers."

The two answers made by the reply to the parts of the note that relate to examples of the Bank of Hamburg and the Grand Duchy of Berg are favorable to the principles maintained by the Government of the Netherlands. At the period of the confiscation Holland also made a part of the French empire. The modification that a Government is not responsible for all the acts of violence committed within its territory has always been held by the undersigned as a principle.

Has not the reasoning that follows the defect of proving too much? An obligation in one case to be applied by inference to another is too great an extension.

We have shown that the civilians cited in the reply have confined the obligations of a Government succeeding that of an expelled usurper to an entirely different object.

Finally, the rejection of the claim of Holland on France, a claim founded on a different basis from that of responsibility, as understood here, supports the assertion made before, that forms often determine the recognition of the most legitimate claims.—(Vide Schoell, I, XI, p. 538.)

These explanations, with those that have already been given in the preceding note, will, doubtless, place the claim in a different point of view from that under which they had been represented to the Government of the United States.

In conclusion, the undersigned will remark, that, to release the claim from the recognized principles of justice would not only be derogatory to the maxims of common law, but the mere supposition that the Government of the Netherlands would so act is what, from a sentiment of dignity, the undersigned must pass by in silence. There is no wrong acknowledged, consequently no satisfaction is due. It is of those who have received the money that a claim of restoration is to be made. It is, however, difficult to think that an ordinary tribunal would order restoration if a creditor had only the arguments of the claimants to urge, of which the reply has had the condescension to be the organ.

The Government of the Netherlands, therefore, must persist in its answer, and refer the claimants to the French Government. Have they so applied? In this case their course is plain. Have they failed to apply, and suffered the proper time to pass by? This is perhaps a tacit proof that the United States have admitted that no claim can be sustained against the result of measures which they themselves adopted.

The undersigned seizes this occasion to renew to Mr. Everett the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

No. 12.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Everett to Mr. Adams, dated

THE HAGUE, November 16, 1810.

"I received your despatch No. 4. Nos. 1 and 2 have never come to hand.

"I have the honor to inclose a copy of a note which I addressed to Baron de Nagell on the 10th, in reply to a part of his note of the 4th, on the claims. The basis of his whole argument in this long production is a loose and incorrect statement of the facts at the commencement, upon which he founds the assertion that the confiscations complained of were the acts of the French Government. This objection, if true, is of course conclusive of itself against the claim; and, although he professes to waive it in entering upon the discussion of principles, he still introduces it as an answer at every point where the argument presses. The objection was stated in his former note; but, as he admitted, notwithstanding, in detail, all the facts necessary to establish the claim, I thought myself at liberty to conclude that his general assertion was not meant to be taken in so exact a sense as to preclude all further argument. He now retracts these admissions, and states the same objection again, and again accompanies it with new admissions in detail of all the necessary facts. Under these circumstances I have thought it best to confine the discussion at present to this part of the subject, and to endeavor to come to some explicit understanding with M. de Nagell upon the facts from which it will be impossible for him to withdraw. If this can be effected, the discussion of the principles may be resumed with advantage. Should there be much delay in replying to this note, I shall converse with the Baron upon the subject, and endeavor to obtain from him verbally the necessary explanations."

No. 12, (a.)

Mr. Everett to Baron de Nagell.

THE HAGUE, November 10, 1819.

In the note which the undersigned, chargé d'affaires of the United States of America, had the honor of receiving from his excellency the Minister of Foreign Affairs, on the 4th instant, the position is still maintained that the property for the loss of which the American Government claims compensation was confiscated by the Government of France, and not by that of Holland. This objection, as was observed by the undersigned in his last note, is preliminary in its nature to the others, and with a view to avoid, as far as possible, any unnecessary discussion, he will confine his remarks at present to this part of the subject.

The facts which are considered by the American Government as necessary to the establishment of this claim are few in number and matters of public notoriety. They are no other than the seizure of the property in question by the Government of Holland, under the acts authorizing a sequester, and the transfer of this property to France by the same Government, by the treaty of March 16, 1810, which is itself the act of confiscation. The transfer is made in the following terms: Toute marchandise venant sur des batimens Americaines, entres dans les ports de la Hollande depuis le 1 Janvier, 1809, sera mise sur le sequestre et appartiendra a la France pour en disposer selon les circonstances et les relations politiques avec les Etats Unis.

It is not considered by the American Government as material whether the property thus transferred was delivered to France before or after the union. The act of transfer was the act of confiscation, and the one which justifies the claim. Whether the property was delivered before or after the union, it was still delivered by virtue of the treaty.

This view of the subject appears to be sanctioned by the authority of M. de Nagell himself. In his note of the 4th, he observes that the cargoes of the three ships which have been particularly mentioned "were still in the magazines after the epoch of the King's abdication," and were not delivered to the French till after the union; and in his note of June 14 he remarks, that "the cargo of the Baltimore was delivered to the French authorities by virtue of the treaty," and that "the cargo of the Bacchus was sequestered till, in consequence of the treaty, it was delivered to the French authorities."

The conclusion appears irresistible that the cargoes of the Bacchus and the Baltimore and the others placed in similar circumstances, and not delivered till after the union, were still delivered by virtue of the treaty.

Should the propriety of this conclusion be denied by his excellency, there will still remain the cargoes which were actually delivered to the French before the union, concerning which there can be no dispute, that all the acts attending that seizure and confiscation were performed by the Dutch Government.

The undersigned thought himself at liberty to conclude, from several passages in Baron de Nagell's note of June 14, that this portion of the property in question was admitted to be very considerable; and the following remark in particular appeared to the undersigned to determine the time of the delivery of the cargoes in general to some period while Louis retained the name of King. Among the cargoes reputed American delivered to France (says M. de Nagell) there were some which were wholly or in part Dutch property. Though Louis had still the name of reigning, the parties interested were not the less obliged to address themselves to the French Government, &c.

It appears, however, from his excellency's last note, that the undersigned was mistaken in the construction of this passage, and that M. de Nagell did not intend to admit by this remark that the cargoes were delivered to France while Louis had the name of reigning, and the undersigned is disposed to acquiesce with great readiness in any construction which his excellency may choose to put upon his own language.

But, though M. de Nagell thus declines to admit that the cargoes in question were delivered before the union, it appears to follow, from several passages in both his notes, that at least a certain part of the property was in this situation. Thus, in his note of June 14 he remarks: A l'epoque de la reunion la plus grande partie des cargaisons Américaines étoit encore dans les magasins de l'Etat; and in that of November 4, La presque totalité des cargaisons se trouvait encore dans les magasins après l'époque de l'abdication.

In both these remarks it seems to be implied that a certain portion of the cargoes had been delivered to the French before the union.

As the undersigned has had the misfortune to misunderstand, in a former case, the remarks of his excellency, he takes the liberty of requesting to be informed, in order to avoid the possibility of a similar error, whether he is correct in both or either of the above conclusions; that is, in supposing his excellency to admit that the cargoes of the Bacchus and the Baltimore and the others placed in similar circumstances, and not delivered till after the union, were still delivered by virtue of the treaty, and that a certain portion of the cargoes was delivered to the French before the union.

As the view of the undersigned, in making this request, is to avoid unnecessary discussion, he presumes that Baron de Nagell will readily comply with it, and avails himself of this occasion to offer to his excellency the assurance of his high respect.

A. H. EVERETT.

No. 13.

Baron de Nagell to Mr. Everett.

[Translation.]

THE HAGUE, December 9, 1819.

In making a detailed reply to all the arguments contained in the notes of Messrs. Eustis and Everett, especially of the latter, in favor of American property confiscated in Holland, the undersigned was assured that he entered into the views of his Government; which, supposing that these replies would be submitted to the Government of the United States, confidently believed that they would be appreciated by a Government that doubtless prefers equity to every other consideration.

The short interval between the last note of the undersigned, of the 4th of November, and that which he had the honor to receive of Mr. Everett, on the 11th of the same month, indicates that this course has not been pursued on the present occasion. This last note begins and ends by saying that, to avoid unnecessary discussions and questions, the inquiry will be confined to one object, whether the property was confiscated by Holland or by France.

This notice ought to have caused some surprise. The discussions and the questions here determined to be useless were not provoked by the Government of the Netherlands, but the repetitions of them being confined to two, in the official notes they should have been presumed to be considered as important by those who advanced them, although it will not be denied that some of them seemed to deserve the character here given of them. For example, they adduced the opinions of some ancient publicists in regard to a state of things of which they could never have had any idea; yet the undersigned thinks he should remark that this character should not be understood without reserve, and that, although the note of Mr. Everett only discusses the subject before mentioned, the Government of the Netherlands still regards a second position as no less important, which he will state, that his silence may [not] be construed as a tacit acquiescence; it is that, even if the responsibility of the Government of Holland could be established as to the confiscations of American property, the responsibility of the present Government of the Netherlands could not still be admitted.

In considering the first point as one of the most important, the undersigned, in his last notes, endeavored to establish the assertion that, from the moment appearances were disregarded, (which, for a greater part of the time, were not respected by Bonaparte,) his brother Louis no longer continued to be King in fact, more than in right; that all his measures were dictated to him imperiously; that the sequestration which he had been forced to impose on the American cargoes could not justly be confounded with the act of confiscation, since he had changed it into a measure of preservation; that the confiscations (especially of the Baltimore, the Bacchus, and the St. Michael, the three cases specified) were not made till after his abdication, and, of course, were made by the French Government; that the treaty of 1810, the clause in which relating to these cargoes he had vainly endeavored to soften in its effects, and which seemed to have been imposed as a punishment for his conduct and to force him to abdicate, was, in the opinion of Europe, but a capitulation imposed by a despot, for which he alone was responsible, but which was, in fact, abrogated by the reduction of Holland to a province of the French Empire.

No one of these arguments has been refuted in the note. It merely renews the assertion that the act of sequestration was equivalent to confiscation, and that it is indifferent whether this latter took place before or after the union to France. It also endeavors to profit of such an act as the treaty of 1811.

This tenacity of opinion would authorize the Government of the Netherlands to persist in what it maintains; and the undersigned might here terminate his answer if, besides a motive of regard, of which he is always pleased to give new proofs, he did not feel it to be his duty to undeceive Mr. Everett, who seems to have inferred from some parts of the answers that the subject was considered in the same light as he viewed it.

Before he examines the quotations to that effect, the undersigned will make two remarks.

The first is, that, originally, the Government of the Netherlands had great difficulty in ascertaining the injuries upon which the claims were founded, but has had the satisfaction of reducing to order this chaos, which was a necessary result of the events of 1810. The design of this observation is to furnish a reason for some slight shades of difference which Mr. Everett may have discovered in the successive replies of the undersigned. Thus, after having said in one note that at the period of the union with France the greater part of the cargoes were still in the State warehouses, owing to the precautions and delays of King Louis, he remarked, in a subsequent one, that almost the whole of them were in this condition; and so of some other phrases.

The second remark is, that it ought not to be surprising if, in such minute replies, some expressions or facts should have needed correction when more knowledge had been obtained on the subject. This privilege of correction the undersigned thought himself at liberty to use after the precedent established by Mr. Eustis.

The object of this remark is to give greater weight to the assurance that, in reperusing his various notes with impartiality, he has not found occasion to use it in the whole course of his remarks.

Mr. Everett, however, does not disguise that he thinks he has discovered some passages of a doubtful sense, not to say contradictory; and, among others, the following one in the note of the 14th of June:

Among the cargoes, originally American, delivered to France, there were some decidedly the property of Holland, and others on which the inhabitants of Holland had a lien; and, although Louis had still the name of reigning, the proprietors and creditors were not the less obliged to address themselves to the French Government.

From this passage it is thought the inference may be drawn that considerable parts of the cargoes were delivered by King Louis to France. But if the quotation, which relates to an incidental circumstance, could of itself admit any doubt as to its just signification, the notes in which it is found, and the object for which it was made, render this commentary improper, (inadmissible.)

The notes maintain the position that the greater part, almost the whole, of the cargoes was not confiscated till after the abdication of King Louis and the union with France. How, then, could it be said of the undersigned that he had imprudently furnished arms against himself, by making known a fact before unknown, and, what is worse, by making it follow immediately after the place where it is said that Holland had ceased to exist when the confiscation was made by and for the profit of France.

It was, moreover, designed to show how dependent Louis was at that time. But if he himself delivered the cargoes in question to France, it was but natural that his subjects should be referred to the French Government. It was, indeed, in this case, the only step that could be taken. The explanation demanded can then be readily given.
