[1st SESSION.]

THE SIX NATIONS, THE WYANDOTS, AND OTHERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE MAY 25, 1789.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

In pursuance of the order of the late Congress, treaties between the United States and several nations of Indians, have been negotiated and signed. These treaties, with sundry papers respecting them, I now lay before you, for your consideration and advice, by the hands of General Knox, under whose official superintendance the business was transacted, and who will be ready to communicate to you any information on such points as may appear to require it.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

NEW YORK, May 25, 1789.

Articles of a Treaty made at fort Harmar, the ninth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, between Arthur St. Clair, Esquire, Governor of the territory of the United States of America northwest of the river Ohio, and commissioner plenipotentiary of the said United States for removing all causes of controversy, regulating trade, and settling boundaries, between the Indian nations in the northern department, and the said United States, of the one part, and the sachems and warriors of the Six Nations, of the other part, viz.

ARTICLE 1. Whereas the United States, in Congress assembled, did, by their commissioners, Oliver Wolcott, Richard Butler, and Arthur Lee, Esquires, duly appointed for that purpose, at a treaty held with the said Six Nations, viz: with the Mohawks, Oneidas, Onondagas, Tuscaroras, Cayugas, and Senecas, at fort Stanwix, on the twenty-second day of October, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-four, give peace to the said nations, and receive them into their friendship and protection: And whereas the said nations have now agreed, to and with the said Arthur St. Clair, to renew and confirm all the engagements and stipulations entered into at the before mentioned treaty at fort Stanwix: And whereas it was then and there agreed, between the United States of America and the said Six Nations, that a boundary line should be fixed between the lands of the said Six Nations and the territory of the said United States, which boundary line is as follows, viz: Beginning at the mouth of a creek, about four miles east of Niagara, called Ononwayea, or Johnston's Landing Place, upon the lake named by the Indians Oswego, and by us Ontario; from thence southerly, in a direction always four miles east of the carrying place, between lake Erie and lake Ontario, to the mouth of Tehoseroron, or Buffalo creek, upon lake Erie; thence south, to the northern boundary of the State of Pennsylvania; thence west, to the end of the said north boundary; thence south, along the west boundary of the said State, to the river Ohio. The said line, from the mouth of Ononwayea to the Ohio, shall be the western boundary of the lands of the Six Nations, so that the Six Nations shall and do yield to the United States, all claim to the country west of the said boundary; and then they shall be secured in the possession of the lands they inhabit east, north, and south of the same, reserving only six miles square, round the fort of Oswego, for the support of the same. The said Six Nations, except the Mohawks, none of whom have attended at this time, for and in consideration of the peace then granted to them, the presents they then received, as well as in consideration of a quantity of goods, to the value of three thousand dollars, now delivered to them by the said Arthur St. Clair, the receipt whereof they do hereby acknowledge, do hereby renew and confirm the said boundary line in the words before mentioned, to the end that it may be and remain as a division line between the lands of the said Six Nations and the territory of the United States, forever. And the undersigned Indians, as well in their own names as in the name of their respective tribes and nations, their heirs and descendants, for the considerations before mentioned, do release, quit claim, relinquish, and cede, to the United States of America, all the lands west of the said boundary or division line, and between the said line and the strait, from the mouth of Ononwayea and Buffalo creek, for them, the said United States of America, to have and to hold the same, in true and absolute propriety, forever.

ARTICLE 2. The United States of America confirm to the Six Nations, all the lands which they inhabit, lying east and north of the before mentioned boundary line, and relinquish and quit claim to the same and every part thereof, excepting only six miles square round the fort of Oswego, which six miles square round said fort is again reserved to the United States by these presents.

ARTICLE 3. The Oneida and Tuscarora nations are also again secured and confirmed in the possession of their respective lands.

ARTICLE 4. The United States of America renew and confirm the peace and friendship entered into with the Six Nations, (except the Mohawks) at the treaty before mentioned, held at fort Stanwix, declaring the same to be perpetual. And if the Mohawks shall, within six months, declare their assent to the same, they shall be considered as included.

Done at fort Harmar, on the Muskingum, the day and year first above written.

In witness whereof, the parties have hereunto, interchangeably, set their hands and seals.

AR. ST. CLAIR.

[Signed by twenty-four of the sachems and warriors of the Six Nations of Indians.]

SEPARATE ARTICLE OF THE PRECEDING TREATY.

Should a robbery or murder be committed by an Indian or Indians of the Six Nations, upon the citizens or subjects of the United States, or by the citizens or subjects of the United States, or any of them, upon any of the Indians of the said nations, the parties accused of the same shall be tried, and if found guilty, be punished according to the laws of the State, or of the Territory of the United States, as the case may be, where the same was committed. And should any horses be stolen, either by the Indians of the said nations, from the citizens or subjects of the United States, or any of them, or by any of the said citizens or subjects from any of the said Indians, they may be reclaimed, into whose possession soever they may have come; and, upon due proof, shall be restored, any sale in open market notwithstanding, and the persons convicted shall be punished with the utmost severity the laws will admit. And the said nations engage to deliver the persons that may be accused, of their nations, of either of the before mentioned crimes, at the nearest post of the United States, if the crime was committed within the territory of the United States; or to the civil authority of the State, if it shall have happened within any of the United States.

AR. ST. CLAIR.

Articles of a Treaty made at fort Harmar, between Arthur St. Clair, Governor of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, and commissioner plenipotentiary of the United States of America for removing all causes of controversy, regulating trade, and settling boundaries, with the Indian nations in the Northern department, of the one part, and the sachems and warriors of the Wyandot, Delaware, Ottawa, Chippewa, Pattawatima, and Sac nations, on the other part.

ARTICLE 1. Whereas the United States, in Congress assembled, did, by their commissioners, George Rogers Clarke, Richard Butler, and Arthur Lee, Esquires, duly appointed for that purpose, at a treaty holden with the Wyandot, Delaware, Ottawa, and Chippewa nations, at fort McIntosh, on the twenty-first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, conclude a peace with the Wyandots, Delawares, Ottawas, and Chippewas, and take them into their friendship and protection: And whereas, at the said treaty, it was stipulated that all prisoners that had been made by those nations, or either of them, should be delivered up to the United States: And whereas the said nations have now agreed, to and with the aforesaid Arthur St. Clair, to renew and confirm all the engagements they had made with the United States of America, at the before mentioned treaty, except so far as are altered by these presents: And there are now in the possession of some individuals of these nations, certain prisoners, who have been taken by others, not in peace with the said United States, or in violation of the treaties subsisting between the United States and them; the said nations agree to deliver up all the prisoners now in their hands (by what means soever they may have come into their possession) to the said Governor St. Clair, at Fort Harmar; or, in his absence, to the officer commanding there, as soon as conveniently may be; and, for the true performance of this agreement, they do now agree to deliver into his hands, two persons of the Wyandot nation, to be retained in the hands of the United States, as hostages, until the said prisoners are restored; after which, they shall be sent back to their nation.

ART. 2. And whereas, at the before mentioned treaty, it was agreed, between the United States and said nations, that a boundary line should be fixed between the lands of those nations and the territory of the United States, which boundary is as follows, viz: Beginning at the mouth of Cayahoga river, and running thence, up the said river, to the portage between that and the Tuscarawa branch of Muskingum; then, down the said branch, to the forks at the crossing place above fort Lawrence; thence, westerly, to the portage on that branch of the Big Miami river which runs into the Ohio, at the mouth of which branch the fort stood which was taken by the French in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and fifty-two; then, along the said portage, to the Great Miami or Omie river, and, down the southeast side of the same, to its mouth; thence, along the southern shore of Lake Erie, to the mouth of Cayahoga, where it began. And the said Wyandot, Delaware, Ottawa, and Chippewa nations, for and in consideration of the peace then granted to them by the said United States, and the presents they then received, as well as of a quantity of goods, to the value of six thousand dollars, now delivered to them by the said Arthur St. Clair, the receipt whereof they do hereby acknowledge, do, by these presents, renew and confirm the said boundary line; to the end that the same may remain as a division line between the lands of the United States of America and the lands of said nations, forever. And the undersigned Indians do hereby, in their own names, and the names of their respective nations and tribes, their heirs and descendants, for the consideration above mentioned, release, quit claim, relinquish, and cede, to the said United States, all the land east, south, and west, of the lines above described, so far as the said Indians formerly claimed the same; for them, the said United States, to have and to hold the same, in true and absolute propriety, forever.

ART. 3. The United States of America do, by these presents, relinquish and quit claim to the said nations respectively, all the lands lying between the limits above described, for them, the said Indians, to live and hunt upon, and otherwise to occupy as they shall see fit; but the said nations, or either of them, shall not be at liberty to sell or dispose of the same, or any part thereof, to any sovereign Power, except the United States; nor to the subjects or citizens of any other sovereign Power, nor to the subjects or citizens of the United States.

ART. 4. It is agreed, between the said United States and the said nations, that the individuals of said nations shall be at liberty to hunt within the territory ceded to the United States, without hindrance or molestation, so long as they demean themselves peaceably, and offer no injury or annoyance to any of the subjects or citizens of the said United States.

ART. 5. It is agreed, that, if any Indian or Indians, of the nations before mentioned, shall commit a murder or robbery on any of the citizens of the United States, the nation or tribe to which the offender belongs, on complaint being made, shall deliver up the person or persons complained of, at the nearest post of the United States; to the end that he or they may be tried, and, if found guilty, punished according to the laws established in the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, for the punishment of such offences, if the same shall have been committed within the said territory; or according to the laws of the State where the offence may have been committed, if the same has happened in any of the United States. In like manner, if any subject or citizen of the United States shall commit murder or robbery on any Indian or Indians of the said nations, upon complaint being made thereof, he or they shall be arrested, tried, and punished, agreeable to the laws of the State, or of the territory wherein the offence was committed; that nothing may interrupt the peace and harmony now established between the United States and said nations.

ART. 6. And whereas the practice of stealing horses has prevailed very much, to the great disquiet of the citizens of the United States, and, if persisted in, cannot fail to involve both the United States of America and the Indians in endless animosity, it is agreed that it shall be put an entire stop to on both sides; nevertheless, should some individuals, in defiance of this agreement, and of the laws provided against such offences, continue to make depredations of that nature, the person convicted thereof shall be punished with the utmost severity the laws of the respective States, or territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio, where the offence may have been committed, will admit of; and all horses so stolen, either by the Indians, from the citizens or subjects of the United States, or by the citizens or subjects of the United States from any of the Indian nations, may be reclaimed, into whose possession soever they may have passed, and, upon due proof, shall be restored; any sales in market overt notwithstanding. And the civil magistrates in the United States, respectively, and in the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio, shall give all necessary aid and protection to Indians claiming such stolen horses.

ART. 7. Trade shall be opened with the said nations, and they do hereby respectively engage to afford protection to the persons and property of such as may be duly licensed to reside among them for the purposes of trade, and to their agents, factors, and servants; but no person shall be permitted to reside at their towns, or at their hunting camps, as a trader, who is not furnished with a licence for that purpose, under the hand and seal of the Governor of the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio, for the time being, or under the hand and seal of one of his deputies for the management of Indian affairs; to the end that they may not be imposed upon in their traffic. And if any person, or persons, shall intrude themselves without such licence, they promise to apprehend him, or them, and to bring them to the said Governor, or one of his deputies, for the purpose before mentioned, to be dealt with according to law: and that they may be defended against persons who might attempt to forge such licences, they further engage to give information to the said Governor, or one of his deputies, of the names of all traders residing among them, from time to time, and at least once in every year.

ART. 8. Should any nation of Indians meditate a war against the United States, or either of them, and the same shall come to the knowledge of the before mentioned nations, or either of them, they do hereby engage to give immediate notice thereof to the Governor, or, in his absence, to the officer commanding the troops of the United States at the nearest post. And should any nation, with hostile intentions against the United States, or either of them, attempt to pass through their country, they will endeavor to prevent the same, and in like manner give information of such attempt to the said Governor, or commanding officer, as soon as possible, that all causes of mistrust and suspicion may be avoided between them and the United States; in like manner, the United States shall give notice to the said Indian nations, of any harm that may be meditated against them, or either of them, that shall come to their knowledge; and do all in their power to hinder and prevent the same, that the friendship between them may be uninterrupted.

ART. 9. If any person or persons, citizens or subjects of the United States, or any other person, not being an Indian, shall presume to settle upon the lands confirmed to the said nations, he and they shall be out of the protection of the United States; and the said nations may punish him, or them, in such manner as they see fit.

ART. 10. The United States renew the reservations heretofore made in the before mentioned treaty at fort McIntosh, for the establishment of trading posts, in manner and form following; that is to say: six miles square at the mouth of the Miami or Omie rivers; six miles square at the portage upon that branch of the Miami which runs into the Ohio; six miles square upon the lake Sandusky, where the fort formerly stood; and two miles square upon each side the Lower Rapids, on Sandusky river: which posts, and the lands annexed to them, shall be for the use and under the Government of the United States.

ART. 11. The post at Detroit, with a district of land beginning at the mouth of the river Rosine, at the west end of lake Erie, and running up the southern bank of said river six miles; thence northerly, and always six miles west of the strait, until it strikes the lake St. Clair, shall be reserved for the use of the United States.

ART. 12. In like manner, the post at Michilimackinac, with its dependencies, and twelve miles square about the same, shall be reserved to the sole use of the United States.

ART. 13. The United States of America do hereby renew and confirm the peace and friendship entered into with the said nations, at the treaty before mentioned, held at fort McIntosh; and the said nations again acknowledge themselves, and all their tribes, to be under the protection of the said United States, and no other Power whatever.

ART. 14. The United States of America do also receive into their friendship and protection, the nations of the Pattawatimas and Sacs; and do hereby establish a league of peace and amity between them, respectively; and all the articles of this treaty, so far as they apply to these nations, are to be considered as made and concluded in all, and every part, expressly with them and each of them.

ART. 15. And whereas, in describing the boundary before mentioned, the words, if strictly construed, would carry it from the portage on that branch of the Miami which runs into the Ohio, over to the river Auglaize; which was neither the intention of the Indians, nor of the commissioners; it is hereby declared, that the line shall run from the said portage directly to the first fork of the Miami river, which is to the southward and eastward of the Miami village; thence down the main branch of the Miami river to the said village, and thence down that river to lake Erie, and along the margin of the lake to the place of beginning.

Done at fort Harmar, on the Muskingum, this ninth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine.

In witness whereof, the parties have hereunto interchangeably set their hands and seals.

AR. ST. CLAIR.

[Signed by the sachems and warriors of the Sac, Chippewa, Ottawa, Pattawatami, Delaware, and Wyandot tribes of Indians.]

Be it remembered, that the Wyandots have laid claim to the lands that were granted to the Shawnees at the treaty held at the Miami; and have declared, that, as the Shawnees have been so restless, and caused so much trouble, both to them and to the United States, if they will not now be at peace, they will dispossess them, and take the country into their own hands; for that the country is theirs of right, and the Shawnees are only living upon it by their permission. They further lay claim to all the country west of the Miami boundary, from the village to the lake Erie, and declare that it is now under their management and direction.

SEPARATE ARTICLE.

Whereas the Wyandots have represented, that within the reservation from the river Rosine, along the strait, they have two villages, from which they cannot, with any convenience, remove; it is agreed, they shall remain in possession of the same, and shall not be in any manner disturbed therein.

The Secretary of War to the President of the United States.

The Secretary of War, having examined the negotiations of the Governor of the Western territory, with certain Northern and Northwestern Indians, and the treaties made in consequence thereof, at fort Harmar, on the 9th of January, 1789, begs leave to report:

That the several Treaties of Peace which have been made with the Northern tribes of Indians, and those northwest of the Ohio, since the conclusion of the late war with Great Britain, are as follows, to wit:

1st. The treaty at fort Stanwix, on the 22d day of October, 1784, between Oliver Wolcott, Richard Butler, and Arthur Lee, commissioners plenipotentiary from the United States, on the one part, and the sachems and warriors of the Six Nations, on the other.

2d. The treaty entered into by the said commissioners plenipotentiary, and the sachems and warriors of the Wyandot, Delaware, Chippewa, and Ottawa nations of Indians, at fort McIntosh, the 21st day of January, 1785.

3d. The treaty at the mouth of the great Miami, the 31st of January 1786, between commissioners from the United States, and the Chiefs and Warriors of the Shawanee nation.

That the treaties of fort Stanwix and fort McIntosh were entered on the journals of the United States, in Congress assembled, June the 3d, 1785, and the treaty of the Miami, on the 17th day of April 1786.

That it may be proper to observe, that the Indians are greatly tenacious of their lands, and generally do not relinquish their right, excepting on the principle of a specific consideration, expressly given for the purchase of the same.

That the practice of the late English colonies and government, in purchasing the Indian claims, has firmly established the habit in this respect, so that it cannot be violated but with difficulty, and an expense greatly exceeding the value of the object.

That the treaties of fort Stanwix and of fort McIntosh do not state that the limits therein defined are by virtue of a purchase from the Indians.

That the said treaties have been opposed, and complained of, will appear by the representation to Congress, accompanying this report, marked No. 1.

That, in consequence of the said representation, Congress, on the 21st day of July, 1787, passed the following resolve:

“Resolved, That the Superintendent of Indian Affairs for the Northern department, inform the five nations, the Hurons, and other Indian nations, who joined in the representation made to Congress, dated the 18th day of December, 1786, that Congress, on the 13th of the present month, July, 1787, received their said representation, and have taken it into their serious consideration, and, in due time, will send them an answer.”

That, on the 5th of October following, Congress resolved:

“That a general treaty be held with the tribes of Indians within the limits of the United States, inhabiting the country northwest of the Ohio, and about Lake Erie, as soon after the first of April next as conveniently may be, and at such place, and at such particular time, as the Governor of the Western Territory shall appoint, for the purpose of knowing the causes of uneasiness among the said tribes, and hearing their complaints, of regulating trade, and amicably settling all affairs concerning lands and boundaries, between them and the United States.

“That the Governor of the Western Territory hold the said treaty agreeably to such instructions as shall be given him for that purpose.”

That, on the 12th of October, 1787, Congress resolved:

“That twenty thousand dollars be, and hereby are, appropriated for the purpose of Indian treaties, whenever the same shall hereafter be judged necessary by a majority of the United States, in Congress assembled, and that the resolutions for holding a general treaty with the Indians, passed the fifth day of the present month, be, and they are hereby, repealed.”

That on the 22d of October, 1787, Congress resolved:

“That the Governor of the Western Territory be, and he is hereby, empowered to hold a general treaty with the Indian tribes in the ensuing spring, if, in his judgment, the public good requires it; and that he be authorized to draw for such sums of money, appropriated by the resolve of Congress of the 12th instant, as may be necessary to effect this object, not exceeding the sum of fourteen thousand dollars.”

That, on the 2d of July, 1788, Congress resolved:

“That the sum of twenty thousand dollars, in addition to the fourteen thousand dollars already appropriated, be appropriated for defraying the expenses of the treaties which have been ordered, or which may be ordered to be held on the present year, with the several Indian tribes in the Northern department, and for extinguishing the Indian claims; the whole of the said twenty thousand dollars, together with six thousand dollars of the said fourteen thousand dollars, to be applied solely to the purpose of extinguishing Indian claims to the lands they have already ceded to the United States, by obtaining regular conveyances for the same, and for extending a purchase beyond the limits hitherto fixed by treaty; but that no part of the said sums be applied for any purpose other than those above mentioned.”

That the instructions to the Governor of the Western Territory, marked No. 2, will further show the sense of Congress on this subject.

That the treaties of fort Harmar, on the 9th of January, 1789, with the sachems and warriors of the Six Nations, the Mohawks excepted, and with the Sachems and Warriors of the Wyandot, Delaware, Ottawa, Chippewa, Patti-watima, and Sac nations, inhabiting parts of the country northwest of the Ohio, appear to have been negotiated by the Governor of the Western Territory, so as to unite the interests of the United States with the justice due the said Indian nations.

That the reservation in the treaty with the Six Nations, of six miles square, round the fort at Oswego, is within the territory of the State of New York, and ought to be so explained as to render it conformable to the constitution of the United States.

That, if this explanation should be made, and the Senate of the United States should concur in their approbation of the said treaties, it might be proper that the same should be ratified, and published, with a proclamation enjoining an observance thereof.

All which is humbly submitted to the President of the United States.

H. KNOX.

Speech of the United Indian Nations, at their Confederate Council, held near the mouth of the Detroit river, the 28th November and 18th December, 1786.

PRESENT—The Five Nations, the Hurons, Delawares, Shawanese, Ottawas, Chippewas, Powtewattimies, Twich-twees, Cherokees, and the Wabash confederates.

To the Congress of the United States of America:

BRETHREN OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA: It is now more than three years since peace was made between the King of Great Britain and you, but we, the Indians, were disappointed, finding ourselves not included in that peace, according to our expectations: for we thought that its conclusion would have promoted a friendship between the United States and Indians, and that we might enjoy that happiness that formerly subsisted between us and our elder brethren. We have received two very agreeable messages from the thirteen United States. We also received a message from the King, whose war we were engaged in, desiring us to remain quiet, which we accordingly complied with. During the time of this tranquillity, we were deliberating the best method we could to form a lasting reconciliation with the thirteen United States. Pleased at the same time, we thought we were entering upon a reconciliation and friendship with a set of people born on the same continent with ourselves, certain that the quarrel between us was not of our own making. In the course of our councils, we imagined we hit upon an expedient that would promote a lasting peace between us.

BROTHERS: We still are of the same opinion as to the means which may tend to reconcile us to each other; and we are sorry to find, although we had the best thoughts in our minds, during the beforementioned period, mischief has, nevertheless, happened between you and us. We are still anxious of putting our plan of accommodation into execution, and we shall briefly inform you of the means that seem most probable to us of effecting a firm and lasting peace and reconciliation: the first step towards which should, in our opinion, be, that all treaties carried on with the United States, on our parts, should be with the general voice of the whole confederacy, and carried on in the most open manner, without any restraint on either side; and especially as landed matters are often the subject of our councils with you, a matter of the greatest importance and of general concern to us, in this case we hold it indispensably necessary that any cession of our lands should be made in the most public manner, and by the united voice of the confederacy; holding all partial treaties as void and of no effect.

BROTHERS: We think it is owing to you that the tranquillity which, since the peace between us, has not lasted, and that that essential good has been followed by mischief and confusion, having managed every thing respecting us your own way. You kindled your council fires where you thought proper, without consulting us, at which you held separate treaties, and have entirely neglected our plan of having a general conference with the different nations of the confederacy. Had this happened, we have reason to believe every thing would now have been settled between us in a most friendly manner. We did every thing in our power, at the treaty of fort Stanwix, to induce you to follow this plan, as our real intentions were, at that very time, to promote peace and concord between us, and that we might look upon each other as friends, having given you no cause or provocation to be otherwise.

BROTHERS: Notwithstanding the mischief that has happened, we are still sincere in our wishes to have peace and tranquillity established between us, earnestly hoping to find the same inclination in you. We wish, therefore, you would take it into serious consideration, and let us speak to you in the manner we proposed. Let us have a treaty with you early in the spring; let us pursue reasonable steps; let us meet half ways, for our mutual convenience; we shall then bring in oblivion the misfortunes that have happened, and meet each other on a footing of friendship.

BROTHERS: We say let us meet half way, and let us pursue such steps as become upright and honest men. We beg that you will prevent your surveyors and other people from coming upon our side the Ohio river. We have told you before, we wished to pursue just steps, and we are determined they shall appear just and reasonable in the eyes of the world. This is the determination of all the chiefs of our confederacy now assembled here, notwithstanding the accidents that have happened in our villages, even when in council, where several innocent chiefs were killed when absolutely engaged in promoting a peace with you, the thirteen United States.

Although then interrupted, the chiefs here present still wish to meet you in the spring, for the beforementioned good purpose, when we hope to speak to each other without either haughtiness or menaces.

BROTHERS: We again request of you, in the most earnest manner, to order your surveyors and others, that mark out lands, to cease from crossing the Ohio, until we shall have spoken to you, because the mischief that has recently happened has originated in that quarter; we shall likewise prevent our people from going over until that time.

BROTHERS: It shall not be our faults if the plans which we have suggested to you should not be carried into execution; in that case the event will be very precarious, and if fresh ruptures ensue, we hope to be able to exculpate ourselves, and shall most assuredly, with our united force, be obliged to defend those rights and privileges which have been transmitted to us by our ancestors; and if we should be thereby reduced to misfortunes, the world will pity us when they think of the amicable proposals we now make to prevent the unnecessary effusion of blood. These are our thoughts and firm resolves, and we earnestly desire that you will transmit to us, as soon as possible, your answer, be it what it may.

OCTOBER 26th, 1787.

Instructions to the Governor of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, relative to an Indian treaty in the Northern Department.

SIR:

You are carefully to examine into the real temper of the Indian tribes, inhabiting the Northern Indian Department of the United States. If you find it hostile, and that the welfare of the frontiers, and the settlements forming in that country, demand a treaty, you will then, in conjunction with the Superintendent of Indian Affairs for the Northern Department, unless the attendance of the said superintendent shall be prevented, by any unforeseen event, hold as general a one as you can, with all the tribes.

The primary objects of the treaty are, the removing all causes of controversy, so that peace and harmony may continue between the United States and the Indian tribes, the regulating trade, and settling boundaries. For these purposes, you will do every thing that is right and proper.

The treaties which have been made, may be examined, but must not be departed from, unless a change of boundary, beneficial to the United States, can be obtained.

Although the purchase of the Indian right of soil is not a primary object of holding this treaty, yet you will not neglect any opportunity that may offer, of extinguishing the Indian rights to the westward, as far as the river Mississippi.

You may stipulate, that the East and West line ordered to be run by the ordinance of the 20th of May, 1785, shall be the boundary between the United States and the Indian tribes: provided, they stipulate that it shall run throughout, unto the river Mississippi. And you may stipulate, that any white persons going over the said boundary, without a licence from the proper officer of the United States, may be treated in such manner as the Indians shall think proper.

You will use every possible endeavor to ascertain who are the real head men and warriors of the several tribes, and who have the greatest influence among them; these men you will attach to the United States, by every means in your power.

Every exertion must be made to defeat all confederations and combinations among the tribes, and to conciliate the white people inhabiting the frontiers, towards them.

CHARLES THOMSON, Secretary.

JULY 2d, 1788.

Additional instructions to the Governor of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, relative to the treaty to be held with the Western Indians, in pursuance of the resolutions of Congress, passed in October last.

SIR:

An additional sum of twenty thousand dollars has been appropriated for the purpose of procuring a permanent peace with the Indian tribes, with which you are authorized to hold a treaty. This sum, and six thousand dollars out of the fourteen thousand heretofore appropriated for holding the said treaty, are particularly directed to be applied solely to the purpose of obtaining a boundary advantageous to the United States, between them and the said Indian tribes, and for further extinguishing by purchase Indian titles, in case it can be done on terms beneficial to the Union.

But it is not expected that any further purchases of lands will be made unless on terms evidently advantageous to the United States, or that any part of the said additional sum will be expended, but in cases apparently necessary.

In fixing a boundary between the United States and the Indian tribes, instead of the East and West line mentioned in your instructions, you will endeavor to establish an east and west line as far north as the completion of the forty first degree of north latitude.

In your negotiations with the Indians, you will make immediate payments, so far as you shall have moneys in hand; but, in case you shall find it necessary to engage any considerable part of the said additional sum, you are to stipulate, that the payments thereof be made in two or three equal annual instalments, the first to be as late in the year 1789, as can be obtained.

CHARLES THOMSON, Secretary.

NEW YORK, May 2d, 1788.

SIR:

I have the honor to lay before you the treaties concluded, in pursuance of the instructions received from Congress on the twenty sixth of October, 1787, and second of July, 1788, with several of the Indian nations, in January last. That they were not presented at an earlier period, was owing, in part, to my own indisposition; to the severity of the winter, which rendered the communication by the Ohio, for a long time impracticable; and to the circumstance that the last Congress did not assemble after it was in my power to have sent them forward.

With the treaties, I beg leave to submit the minutes of the proceedings at the different meetings, after the nations were assembled, and I have added to them, by way of appendix, all the letters and messages that passed between them and me prior to their assembling. These were communicated to the Secretary of War, from time to time, and though they will, no doubt, be submitted by him to your consideration, I thought it best, as they form a considerable part of the transactions, to connect them in that way, that the whole might be seen together.

By the instruction of July the second, I was directed to endeavor at extending the northern boundary, as far north, as the completion of the forty first degree of north latitude. Besides that it would have been extremely difficult to have made the Indians comprehend how that was to be ascertained, I found that any attempt to extend the limits at that time, would be very ill received, if not defeat entirely the settling a peace with them; it was therefore not proposed, and the boundaries remain as settled at the former treaties, except the rectifying an error about the portage at the Miami village.

The negotiation was both tedious and troublesome, and for a long time had an unpromising aspect, but it came at last to as favorable an issue as could have been expected; and I trust will be attended with consequences friendly to the frontier parts of the United States. There are, however, several nations on the Wabash, and the rivers which empty themselves into it, that are ill disposed, and from whom there is reason to expect, that a part of the frontier of Virginia, and the settlement forming on the Miami, will meet annoyance; indeed, that they have not been disturbed during the winter was not expected, either by me or the chiefs of the nations, who met me at fort Harmar. The Wyandots did appoint persons to go to them, and inform them of the result of the treaty, and insist upon their desisting from further hostilities, which may have had some effect in producing the late tranquillity.

The claim of the Wyandot nation to the lands reserved to the Shawanese, was strongly insisted upon by them, and to be made an article of the treaty—to that I could not consent; but, to satisfy them, and that it might be kept in remembrance, it is inserted at the bottom of it, by way of memorandum. It seems this is a claim that has always been held up, and the reason it was so much insisted on at this time, they said, was, that they were sure that the Shawanese, and Cherokees incorporated with them, would continue to give us trouble; that it could not be expected to be borne with much longer; that they would be driven out of the country, and then it would be claimed and held by the United States, by right of conquest; they farther added, that, if the Shawanese continued their depredations, they would themselves drive them off. They also proposed that a post should be taken by the United States, at the Miami village, as the surest means to overawe the nations on the Wabash. It is certainly well situated for that purpose, and would command the greatest part of the Indian trade. As it was very uncertain whether Congress might approve of such a measure, as a post so far inland, would with difficulty be supported, and were in no readiness to carry it into execution, if it should be approved, I desired them to consider well, whether it could be done without a contest with the Indians who live there; and whether, in that case, there was not danger of they themselves being involved, through the ungovernableness of their young men. They acknowledged they thought there was danger of both, but promised to send some of their principal men to the Miamies, and prepare them for receiving a garrison peaceably, and are to give me notice in the spring.

The reason why the treaties were made separately with the Six Nations and the Wyandots, and more westerly tribes, was, a jealousy that subsisted between them, which I was not willing to lessen, by appearing to consider them as one people—they do not so consider themselves; and I am persuaded their general confederacy is entirely broken: indeed, it would not be very difficult, if circumstances required it, to set them at deadly variance.

The great length of time that elapsed between the appointed period for the meeting, and that at which the Indians assembled, during which, numbers of them were constantly going and coming, has increased the expense in the article of provisions considerably; the utmost possible economy, however, was used through the whole of the business, and, in transacting it, I flatter myself with meeting the approbation of Congress.

With the utmost respect, I have the honor to be, &c.

AR. ST. CLAIR.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

[The three following are the treaties first referred to in the report of the Secretary of War:]

[1st SESSION.]

WABASH, CREEKS, CHEROKEES, CHICKASAWS, AND CHOCTAWS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS AUGUST 7, 1789.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The business which has hitherto been under the consideration of Congress, has been of so much importance, that I was unwilling to draw their attention from it to any other subject. But the disputes which exist between some of the United States, and several powerful tribes of Indians within the limits of the Union; and the hostilities which have, in several instances, been committed on the frontiers, seem to require the immediate interposition of the General Government.

I have, therefore, directed the several statements and papers, which have been submitted to me on this subject by General Knox, to be laid before you for your information.

While the measures of Government ought to be calculated to protect its citizens from all injury and violence, a due regard should be extended to those Indian tribes whose happiness, in the course of events, so materially depends on the national justice and humanity of the United States.

If it should be the judgment of Congress that it would be most expedient to terminate all differences in the Southern district, and to lay the foundation for future confidence, by an amicable treaty with the Indian tribes in that quarter, I think proper to suggest the consideration of the expediency of instituting a temporary commission for that purpose, to consist of three persons, whose authority should expire with the occasion.

How far such a measure, unassisted by posts, would be competent to the establishment and preservation of peace and tranquillity on the frontiers, is, also, a matter which merits your serious consideration.

Along with this object, I am induced to suggest another, with the national importance and necessity of which, I am deeply impressed; I mean, some uniform and effective system for the militia of the United States. It is unnecessary to offer arguments in recommendation of a measure, on which the honor, safety, and well-being of our country so evidently and so essentially depend. But, it may not be amiss to observe, that I am particularly anxious it should receive as early attention as circumstances will admit, because, it is now in our power to avail ourselves of the military knowledge disseminated throughout the several States, by means of the many well instructed officers and soldiers of the late army; a resource which is daily diminishing by deaths, and other causes. To suffer this peculiar advantage to pass away, unimproved, would be, to neglect an opportunity which will never again occur, unless, unfortunately, we should again be involved in a long and arduous war.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

NEW YORK, August 7, 1789.

Report from Henry Knox, Secretary of War, to the President of the United States, relating to the several Indian tribes.

WAR OFFICE, June 15, 1789.

SIR:

The time it will require to complete a full statement of the Department of War, induces me to submit to your view, in a series of numbers, such parts thereof as seem to claim an immediate attention.

As most of the nations of Indians within the limits of the United States are, at present, discontented, and some of them turbulent, I have conceived it proper to commence, by a statement of the Indian Department. In the performance of this business, I have not barely confined myself to facts, but I have taken the liberty of suggesting such measures as appear to my mind to be necessary for the happiness and reputation of the public.

By the ordinance of Congress of the 7th August, 1786, for the regulation of Indian affairs, which is herewith submitted, the department is divided into the Northern and Southern districts.

The report on the treaties of fort Harmar, submitted the 23d of May last, will shew the situation of those tribes with whom the United States have formed treaties, since the conclusion of the war with Great Britain.

I have now the honor to transmit a paper, No. 1, relative to the Wabash Indians. Were the subsisting disorders with those Indians quieted, and they attached to the interests of the United States, it is not probable that any further troubles with the more distant Indians would soon arise.

Number 2, which will be submitted shortly, will shew the situation of the Southern Indians, and contain some observations on the difficulties subsisting between them and the frontier people of the States of Georgia and North Carolina.

I have the honor to be, &c.

H. KNOX.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

No. 1.

Report from H. Knox, Secretary of War, to the President of the United States,

RELATIVE TO THE NORTHWESTERN INDIANS.

WAR OFFICE, June 15th, 1789.

By information from Brigadier General Harmar, the commanding officer of the troops on the frontiers, it appears that several murders have been lately committed on the inhabitants, by small parties of Indians, probably from the Wabash country.

Some of the said murders having been perpetrated on the South side of the Ohio, the inhabitants on the waters of that river are exceedingly alarmed, for the extent of six or seven hundred miles along the same.

It is to be observed, that the United States have not formed any treaties with the Wabash Indians; on the contrary, since the conclusion of the war with Great Britain, hostilities have almost constantly existed between the people of Kentucky and the said Indians. The injuries and murders have been so reciprocal, that it would be a point of critical investigation to know on which side they have been the greatest.

Some of the inhabitants of Kentucky, during the year past, roused by recent injuries, made an incursion into the Wabash country, and, possessing an equal aversion to all bearing the name of Indians, they destroyed a number of peaceable Piankeshaws, who prided themselves in their attachment to the United States.

Things being thus circumstanced, it is greatly to be apprehended that hostilities may be so far extended as to involve the Indian tribes with whom the United States have recently made treaties. It is well known how strong the passion for war exists in the mind of a young savage, and how easily it may be inflamed, so as to disregard every precept of the older and wiser part of the tribes who may have a more just opinion of the force of a treaty.

Hence it results, that, unless some decisive measures are immediately adopted to terminate those mutual hostilities, they will probably become general among all the Indians northwest of the Ohio.

In examining the question how the disturbances on the frontiers are to be quieted, two modes present themselves, by which the object might perhaps be effected; the first of which is by raising an army, and extirpating the refractory tribes entirely, or 2dly by forming treaties of peace with them, in which their rights and limits should be explicitly defined, and the treaties observed on the part of the United States with the most rigid justice, by punishing the whites, who should violate the same.

In considering the first mode, an inquiry would arise, whether, under the existing circumstances of affairs, the United States have a clear right, consistently with the principles of justice and the laws of nature, to proceed to the destruction or expulsion of the savages, on the Wabash, supposing the force for that object easily attainable.

It is presumable, that a nation solicitous of establishing its character on the broad basis of justice, would not only hesitate at, but reject every proposition to benefit itself, by the injury of any neighboring community, however contemptible and weak it might be, either with respect to its manners or power.

When it shall be considered that the Indians derive their subsistence chiefly by hunting, and that, according to fixed principles, their population is in proportion to the facility with which they procure their food, it would most probably be found that the expulsion or destruction of the Indian tribes have nearly the same effect: for if they are removed from their usual hunting grounds, they must necessarily encroach on the hunting grounds of another tribe, who will not suffer the encroachment with impunity—hence they destroy each other.

The Indians being the prior occupants, possess the right of the soil. It cannot be taken from them unless by their free consent, or by the right of conquest in case of a just war. To dispossess them on any other principle, would be a gross violation of the fundamental laws of nature, and of that distributive justice which is the glory of a nation.

But if it should be decided, on an abstract view of the question, to be just, to remove by force the Wabash Indians from the territory they occupy, the finances of the United States would not at present admit of the operation.

By the best and latest information, it appears that, on the Wabash and its communications, there are from 1500 to 2000 warriors. An expedition against them, with the view of extirpating them, or destroying their towns, could not be undertaken with a probability of success, with less than an army of 2,500 men. The regular troops of the United States on the frontiers, are less than six hundred; of that number, not more than four hundred could be collected from the posts for the purpose of the expedition. To raise, pay, feed, arm, and equip 1900 additional men, with their necessary officers for six months, and to provide every thing in the hospital and quartermaster's line, would require the sum of 200,000 dollars; a sum far exceeding the ability of the United States to advance, consistently with a due regard to other indispensable objects.

Were the representations of the people of the frontiers (who have imbibed the strongest prejudices against the Indians, perhaps in consequence of the murders of their dearest friends and connexions) only to be regarded, the circumstances before stated, would not appear conclusive—an expedition, however inadequate, must be undertaken.

But when the impartial mind of the great public sits in judgment, it is necessary that the cause of the ignorant Indians should be heard as well as those who are more fortunately circumstanced. It well becomes the public to inquire before it punishes; to be influenced by reason, and the nature of things, and not by its resentments.

It would be found, on examination, that both policy and justice unite in dictating the attempt of treating with the Wabash Indians: for it would be unjust, in the present confused state of injuries, to make war on those tribes without having previously invited them to a treaty, in order amicably to adjust all differences. If they should afterwards persist in their depredations, the United States may with propriety inflict such punishment as they shall think proper.

But at present, were the measure just, the Union could not command an army for coercion, but at the expense of some great national object.

In case no treaty should be held, the events which are rising in rapid succession on the frontiers, must be suffered to take their own course. Their progress and issue will deeply injure, if not utterly destroy, the interests and government of the United States in the Western territory.

The estimates of the Governor of the Western territory herewith submitted, will shew, that, in addition to the property already in his possession, a treaty with the Wabash Indians may be effected for the sum of 16,150 dollars. If additional territory should be the object, it would require the further sum of ——— dollars.

It is, however, to be remarked, that it is very possible that this sum may not effect the object intended. It can be considered only as an experiment dictated by a regard to public justice, which ought in all cases to govern the conduct of a nation.

The United States having come into the possession of sovereignty, and an extensive territory, must unavoidably be subject to the expenses of such a condition.

The time has arrived, when it is highly expedient that a liberal system of justice should be adopted for the various Indian tribes within the limits of the United States.

By having recourse to the several Indian treaties, made by the authority of Congress, since the conclusion of the war with Great Britain, excepting those made January 1789, at fort Harmar, it would appear, that Congress were of opinion, that the Treaty of Peace, of 1783, absolutely invested them with the fee of all the Indian lands within the limits of the United States; that they had the right to assign, or retain such portions as they should judge proper.

But it is manifest, from the representations of the confederated Indians at the Huron village, in December, 1786, that they entertained a different opinion, and that they were the only rightful proprietors of the soil; and it appears by the resolve of the 2d of July, 1788, that Congress so far conformed to the idea, as to appropriate a sum of money solely to the purpose of extinguishing the Indian claims to lands they had ceded to the United States, and for obtaining regular conveyances of the same. This object was accordingly accomplished at the treaty of fort Harmar, in January, 1789.

The principle of the Indian right to the lands they possess being thus conceded, the dignity and interest of the nation will be advanced by making it the basis of the future administration of justice towards the Indian tribes.

The whole number of Indian warriors south of the Ohio, and east of the Mississippi, may be estimated at 14,000. Those to the northward of the Ohio, and to the southward of the lakes, at about 5,000. In addition to these, the old men, women, and children, may be estimated at three for one warrior, the whole amounting to 76,000 souls.

It is highly probable, that, by a conciliatory system, the expense of managing the said Indians, and attaching them to the United States for the next ensuing period of fifty years, may, on an average, cost 15,000 dollars annually.

A system of coercion and oppression, pursued from time to time, for the same period, as the convenience of the United States might dictate, would probably amount to a much greater sum of money; but the blood and injustice which would stain the character of the nation, would be beyond all pecuniary calculation.

As the settlements of the whites shall approach near to the Indian boundaries established by treaties, the game will be diminished, and the lands being valuable to the Indians only as hunting grounds, they will be willing to sell further tracts for small considerations. By the expiration, therefore, of the above period, it is most probable that the Indians will, by the invariable operation of the causes which have hitherto existed in their intercourse with the whites, be reduced to a very small number.

These general reflections have arisen on considering the particular case of the Wabash Indians, respecting whom one observation more may be added.

The United States must soon possess the posts within their limits on the lakes. This circumstance will either awe the Wabash Indians, or, in case of their continuing refractory, enable the Union to operate against them with a much greater prospect of success than at present.

All which is humbly submitted to the President of the United States.

H. KNOX.

BY THE UNITED STATES, IN CONGRESS ASSEMBLED.—August 7, 1786.

An Ordinance for the regulation of Indian Affairs.

Whereas the safety and tranquillity of the frontiers of the United States do, in some measure, depend on the maintaining a good correspondence between their citizens and the several nations of Indians in amity with them: And whereas the United States, in Congress assembled, under the ninth of the articles of confederation and perpetual union, have the sole and exclusive right and power of regulating the trade, and managing all affairs with the Indians not members of any of the States; provided that the legislative right of any State within its own limits be not infringed or violated:

Be it ordained by the United States, in Congress assembled, That, from and after the passing of this ordinance, the Indian department be divided into two districts, viz. The southern, which shall comprehend within its limits all the nations in the territory of the United States who reside southward of the river Ohio; and the northern, which shall comprehend all the other Indian nations within the said territory, and westward of Hudson river: Provided, That all councils, treaties, communications, and official transactions, between the superintendent hereafter mentioned for the northern district and the Indian nations, be held, transacted, and done, at the outpost occupied by the troops of the United States in the said district. That a superintendent be appointed for each of the said districts, who shall continue in office for two years, unless sooner removed by Congress, and shall reside within, or as near the district for which he shall be so appointed, as may be convenient for the management of its concerns. The said superintendents shall attend to the execution of such regulations as Congress shall from time to time establish, respecting Indian affairs. The superintendent for the northern district shall have authority to appoint two deputies, to reside in such places as shall best facilitate the regulations of the Indian trade, and to remove them for misbehavior. There shall be a communication of all matters relative to the business of the Indian department, kept up between the said superintendents, who shall regularly correspond with the Secretary of War, through whom all communications, respecting the Indian department, shall be made to Congress; and the superintendents are hereby directed to obey all instructions which they shall from time to time receive from the said Secretary of War. And whenever they shall have reason to suspect any tribe or tribes of Indians of hostile intentions, they shall communicate the same to the Executive of the State or States whose territories are subject to the effect of such hostilities. All stores, provisions, or other property, which Congress may think necessary for presents to the Indians, shall be in the custody and under the care of the said superintendents, who shall render an annual account of the expenditures of the same to the board of treasury.

And be it further ordained, That none but citizens of the United States shall be suffered to reside among the Indian nations, or be allowed to trade with any nation of Indians within the territory of the United States. That no person, citizen or other, under the penalty of five hundred dollars, shall reside among, or trade with any Indian, or Indian nation, within the territory of the United States, without a licence for that purpose first obtained from the superintendent of the district, or one of the deputies, who are hereby directed to give such licence to every person who shall produce from the supreme Executive of any State, a certificate, under the seal of the State, that he is of good character, and suitably qualified and provided for that employment, for which licence he shall pay the sum of fifty dollars to the said superintendent, for the use of the United States. That no licence to trade with the Indians shall be in force for a longer term than one year; nor shall permits or passports be granted to any other persons than citizens of the United States, to travel through the Indian nations, without their having previously made their business known to the superintendent of the district, and received his special approbation. That, previous to any person or persons obtaining a licence to trade as aforesaid, he, or they, shall give bond in three thousand dollars to the superintendent of the district, for the use of the United States, for his or their strict adherence to, and observance of, such rules and regulations as Congress may from time to time establish for the government of the Indian trade. All sums to be received by the said superintendents, either for licences or fines, shall be annually accounted for by them with the board of treasury.

And be it further ordained, That the said superintendents, and the deputies, shall not be engaged, either directly or indirectly, in trade with the Indians, on pain of forfeiting their offices; and each of the superintendents shall take the following oath, previous to his entering on the duties of his appointment: "I, A. B., do swear, that I will well and faithfully serve the United States in the office of superintendent of Indian affairs, for the ——— district; that I will carefully attend to all such orders and instructions as I shall from time to time receive from the United States, in Congress assembled, or the Secretary of War; that I will not be concerned, either directly or indirectly, in trade with the Indians; and that, in all things belonging to my said office, during my continuance therein, I will faithfully, justly, and truly, according to the best of my skill and judgment, do equal and impartial justice, without fraud, favor, or affection." And the superintendent for the northern district shall administer to his deputies, the following oath, before they proceed on the duties of their office: "I, A. B., do swear, that I will well and faithfully serve the United States, in the office of deputy superintendent of Indian affairs, in the northern district; that I will carefully attend to all such orders and instructions as I shall from time to time receive from the United States, in Congress assembled, the Secretary of War, or the superintendent of the district aforesaid; and that in all things belonging to my said office, during my continuance therein, I will faithfully, justly, and truly, according to the best of my skill and judgment, do equal and impartial justice, without fraud, favor, or affection." And the said superintendents, and deputy superintendents, shall, each of them, give bond, with surety, to the board of treasury, in trust for the United States; the superintendents, each, in the sum of six thousand dollars, and the deputy superintendents, each, in the sum of three thousand dollars, for the faithful discharge of the duties of their office.

And it is further ordained, That all fines and forfeitures, which may be incurred by contravening this ordinance, shall be sued for, and recovered before any court of record within the United States, the one moiety thereof to the use of him or them, who may prosecute therefor, and the other moiety to the use of the United States. And the said superintendents shall have power, and hereby are authorized, by force, to restrain therefrom, all persons who shall attempt an intercourse with the said Indians, without a licence therefor, obtained as aforesaid.

And be it further ordained, That in all cases where transactions with any nation or tribe of Indians shall become necessary to the purposes of this ordinance, which cannot be done without interfering with the legislative rights of a State, the superintendent in whose district the same shall happen, shall act in conjunction with the authority of such State.

CHAS. THOMSON, Secretary.

NEW YORK, June 14, 1789.

SIR:

I have been honored with your letter of the 12th, and, in reply, have to observe, that, by the resolution of Congress, of the 29th of August, 1788, I was directed to repair to the Mississippi, in order to hold a treaty with the Indians, who inhabit the country upon that river, for the extinguishing their claims to lands, within certain limits, if any such claims existed, and to lay out certain donations of land to the ancient inhabitants. From thence, I was to proceed to Post St. Vincennes, upon the Wabash, and lay out like donations for the inhabitants there; but the instructions contained no directions to make any purchase about the post, from a presumption, I suppose, that a cession had been made there to the crown of France. With the remainder of the goods from former treaties, and the warrants I have received from the board of treasury, there is sufficient, I suppose, in my hands, to defray the expense of the treaty with the Mississippi Indians, exclusive of the provisions. What they may amount to, I cannot ascertain, as I am ignorant of the Indian numbers. They are inconsiderable; but an immediate provision for the payment of the provisions, either for that, or any other treaty, is not necessary, the contractors being obliged to furnish all rations that may be required by the United States.

Should it be thought proper to treat with the Indians of the Wabash and Miami, a further sum will be necessary, and I have enclosed an estimate of what the expense would probably amount to. It appears, indeed, of absolute necessity, that the savages should be brought to peace, either by treaty, or by force.

It is impossible for me to judge what sum would induce them to extend the northern boundary of the last cession to the Mississippi, neither is it very well known, what nations are the proprietors of the country that would be obtained by that extension. Perhaps a provisional power to make such agreements, and limiting the sum, might not be improper, as the expense of another meeting for that purpose might be avoided, if the proprietors attended at the treaty in contemplation. The stipulations could be made then, and the payment at an after period.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

Major General Knox.

AR. ST. CLAIR.

No. 2.

Report from H. Knox, Secretary of War, to the President of the United States, dated War Office, July 6th, 1789,

RELATING TO THE SOUTHERN INDIANS.

THE CREEKS.—This nation of Indians is divided into two districts, the Upper and the Lower Creeks.

The former reside chiefly on the waters of the Alabama river, in about sixty towns or villages. The latter on the waters of the Apalachicola river, in about forty towns. The Creeks are principally within the limits of the United States, but some of the most southern towns of the Lower Creeks, or Seminoles, are within the territory of Spain, stretching towards the point of Florida. The gun-men, or warriors of the whole nation, are estimated at six thousand.

Besides the chiefs of the respective towns, the Creeks appear, at present, to be much under the influence and direction of Alexander McGillivray.

The father of this person was an inhabitant of Georgia, and adhering to Great Britain in the late war, his property was confiscated by that State. His mother was a principal woman of the Upper Creeks.

He had an English education; his abilities and ambition appear to be great; his resentments are probably unbounded against the State of Georgia, for confiscating his father's estate, and the estates of his other friends, refugees from Georgia, several of whom reside with him among the Creeks. He is said to be a partner of a trading house which has the monopoly of the trade of the Creeks. The communications to the Indian country are through the Floridas, under the protection of the Spanish colonies. The profits of this commerce centre in Great Britain, and one of the Bahama islands is the intermediate place of deposit.

The State of Georgia is engaged in a serious war with the Creeks; and as the same may be so extended and combined, as to require the interference of the United States, it will be highly proper that the causes thereof should be stated and examined.

The first treaty between the State of Georgia and the Creeks, after the conclusion of the war with Great Britain, was held at Augusta, in November, 1783. At this treaty, certain lands on the Oconee were ceded by the Creeks to the State of Georgia. A copy of this treaty is not among the papers of Congress; but the purport, as it respects the boundaries then established, is recited by the Legislature of the State of Georgia, in their report on Indian affairs, hereunto annexed.

The second treaty was held at Galphinton, on the 12th of November, 1785; by which the boundary lines defined by the treaty of Augusta, in November, 1783, were confirmed, and a new boundary line obtained, to extend from the forks of the Oconee and Oakmulgee, to the source of the St. Mary's. A copy of this treaty is hereunto annexed, in the papers marked A.; also, a letter from the commissioners of the United States, and a report of a committee accepted by the Legislature of Georgia, on the 11th of February, 1786.

A third treaty was held by the commissioners of Georgia and the Creeks at Shoulderbone, on the 3d of November, 1786. At this treaty, it would appear that the Creeks acknowledged the violation of the two former treaties recognised, and ratified the former boundaries, and gave six hostages for the faithful execution of the conditions.

On the one side, the Creeks object entirely to the validity of the said treaties, stating that the cessions to the State of Georgia were made by the chiefs of two towns only; whereas, the lands ceded were the property of the whole nation, as will more fully appear by the letters of Alexander McGillivray, marked B, and numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4.

The letter of Benjamin Hawkins, Andrew Pickens, Joseph Martin, and Lach. McIntosh, Esquires, commissioners of the United States, dated at the Keowee, the 17th of November, 1785, marked A, states, that, as there were only two towns properly represented at Galphinton, instead of about one hundred, the number in the whole nation, they could not treat with them on behalf of the United States. But that, "the day after they left Galphinton, the agents of Georgia held a treaty with the few Indians then present, and obtained a cession of all the lands south of the Altamaha, and eastward of the line to be run southwest, from the junction of the Oakmulgee and Oconee rivers, till it shall strike St. Mary's, with a confirmation of the lands ceded to the State by the same towns north-east of the Oconee river, in 1783."

The letter of James White, Esq. superintendent of the United States for the southern district, and the proceedings held by him with the Lower Creeks at Cussetahs, will further show the sentiments of the said Lower Creeks, of the said treaties, marked C.

On the other side, the Legislature of Georgia, by their committee, 23d October, 1787, marked D, states that the Cherokees, by a treaty made at Augusta, on the 3d of May, 1783, and the Creeks, by the treaty of Augusta, in the succeeding November, both nations made the same relinquishment of the lands on the Oconee, on account of mutual claims which had not before been settled between them.

That it was not until a few months after the treaty of Galphinton, that uneasiness began to be fomented in the nation, and some murders were committed.

That this conduct of the Creeks was considered by the government of Georgia as an infraction of the treaties, and they demanded reparation accordingly. That commissioners were appointed, with full powers to inquire into the causes, and restore peace, but with powers, also, if unavoidable, to take eventual measures of defence.

That this proceeding of Georgia produced the treaty at Shoulderbone, whereby the violence was acknowledged, the boundaries confirmed, and hostages given.

"That the committee cannot forbear to observe, that, during the course of all these transactions, the communications were made in solemn, open, and ancient form, and the articles of the treaties were mutually respected, until the aggression posterior to that of Galphinton.

"And that, whilst it is admitted on the one hand, that there was no principle of representation of the parts of the nations known in civilized governments, it cannot be denied on the other, that it was such as had been common, and the Indians acknowledged without doubt, and regret their forming a part, and being members of the State."

The committee after stating some circumstances relative to the proceedings of James White, Esq. the superintendent, "report it as their opinion, that the ultimate causes of the war, was the too sudden interference with the treaties of the State, by which the minds of the Indians were perplexed; and the impression induced, that, in a war, they should not have the strength of the Union to fear, and that another disposition would be made of the territory, than that which considers it as part of the State. That representations to this effect should be immediately transmitted to Congress, and the support of the Union demanded."

That the papers whereon this statement is founded, and the general subject of the said dispute between the State of Georgia and the Creeks, have several times been discussed and considered in the late Congress.

That the report of the committee of Congress, as stated on the journals of the 3d of August, 1787, will show the perplexities of this case.

That the subject was further debated in Congress on June 27th, and decided on July 15th, 1788, will appear by their journals.

That, in obedience to the order of Congress of the 15th of July 1788, the Secretary of War made the report marked E.

That, in consequence of the resolve of Congress of the 26th of October 1787, commissioners were appointed by the States of South Carolina and Georgia. That the time for which the superintendent was elected, expired on the 29th of November, 1788.

That, the proceedings of the said commissioners and superintendent, as communicated by the latter, are hereunto attached, marked F.

That in addition to the information of the superintendent, it appears from the public newspaper, marked G, that the two commissioners from Georgia and South Carolina have given a further invitation to a treaty, to be held at Oconee during the present month.

But it also appears from the public newspapers, that, instead of the proposed treaty, parties of Indians have been making inroads into Georgia, and that the outrages committed by them have excited an alarm, which has extended itself to Savannah, the capital of the State.

Hence it will appear, from this general statement of facts,

1st. That, hostilities still rage between the State of Georgia, and the Creek Indians.

2d. That the cause of the war is an utter denial, on the part of the Creeks, of the validity of the three treaties, stated to have been made by them with the State of Georgia.

3d. That the United States, in Congress assembled, by their resolve of the 15th of July, 1788, have caused it to be notified to the Creeks, "that, should they persist in refusing to enter into a treaty upon reasonable terms, the arms of the United States shall be called forth for the protection of that frontier."

From this result, the following questions arise:

1st. Whether the circumstance of the commissioners not having received an answer from Alexander McGillivray to their letter of November 28th, 1788, and his letter to Andrew Moor, Esq. of the 4th of January, and to his Excellency the Governor of South Carolina the 26th of February, 1789, (letter B) together with the recent irruption of parties of Creeks into the State of Georgia, amount to a refusal to treat on reasonable terms, and of consequence form that crisis of affairs in which the arms of the Union are to be called forth, agreeably to the resolve of Congress of the 15th of July, 1788?

2d. Whether the final report of the commissioners is necessary to be received before decision can be made on the case? or,

3d. Whether, in the present state of public affairs, any proper expedients could be devised for effectually quieting the existing hostilities between the State of Georgia and the Creek nation, other than by raising an army?

All which is humbly submitted to the President of the United States.

H. KNOX.

A. No. 1.

KEOWEE, the 17th November, 1785.

SIR:

Agreeable to our appointment, we arrived at Galphinton on the 24th and 28th of October, to meet and treat with the Creeks, having previously procured every thing necessary for this purpose. By the 29th, the chiefs of two towns, with sixty men, arrived, and from them, as well as those we sent to invite the Indians to meet and treat with us, we received assurances that the chiefs of all the towns would certainly come; that they were very much pleased with the intention of Congress, and very desirous of establishing with them a permanent peace.

On the 7th of November, we were informed that some false reports had been circulated through the nation, which had created jealousies among them, and discouraged them from coming to meet us; and that we had only to expect the Tallassee king, with twenty young men, in addition to those already arrived. On the next day, we agreed to meet the Indians, and explain to them the object of our commission, at the same time remarking, we could not treat with so few of their nation, there being but two towns properly represented, instead of about one hundred—the number in the whole nation. As those towns had been always friendly to the United States, we gave them some presents and left them.

The commissioners of Georgia visited us, previous to our conference with the Indians, and delivered us the protest marked A, to which we returned the answer marked B. The day after we left Galphinton, the agents of Georgia held a treaty with the few Indians then present, and obtained a cession of all the lands south of the Altamaha and eastward of a line to be run southwest from the junction of the Ocmulgee and Oconee rivers, till it shall strike St. Mary's, with a confirmation of the lands ceded to the State by the same towns, northeast of the Oconee river, in 1783.

By various informations we have had from the Creek nation, the accounts Colonel Martin brought us from the Cherokees, and a letter wrote by McGillivray, a half breed, to General Pickens, marked C, (which we enclose to shew Congress the ability of this man, who has great influence among his countrymen,) it appears that he is forming a dangerous confederacy between the several Indian nations, the Spaniards, and British agents, with whom he is connected. His resentment is chiefly against the citizens of Georgia, who banished his father, and confiscated a capital property which he had in that State.

There is a capital British company of merchants, engaged, by licence from the court of Spain, to supply all the Indian nations to the southward, with goods, through East Florida, in which company, it is said, McGillivray is a partner, and they have their agents in all the towns from Tennessee, southwardly.

We are, with due respect, sir, your most obedient and humble servants.

BENJAMIN HAWKINS,
ANDREW PICKENS,
JOS. MARTIN,
LACH. M'INTOSH.

The Honorable CHARLES THOMSON, Esquire,
Secretary to the United States, in Congress assembled.

[NOTE.—The protest, marked A, and the answer marked B, have been taken off the files of Congress by some committee, and never returned.]

In witness whereof, the parties have hereunto affixed their hands and seals, the day and year before written.

While the commissioners of the United States were at Galphinton, the commissioners of Georgia copied their draught of the articles intended to be proposed to the Creeks, and which were afterwards the basis of the treaty with the Cherokees.

GEORGIA:

In General Assembly, Saturday, February 11, 1786.

The committee to whom was referred the proceedings of the State commissioners, appointed to attend the continental commissioners to a meeting with the Cherokees and other Indians to the southward, report:

That it appears to your committee, certain commissioners of the United States, in Congress assembled, at Galphinton, did attempt a treaty with the Creek Indians, and did also, at Hopewell, in the State of South Carolina, enter into a pretended treaty with some of the Cherokees, and some parts of other tribes therein named, which said pretended treaty, and all other proceedings that have yet transpired, are a manifest and direct attempt to violate the retained sovereignty and legislative right of this State, and repugnant to the principles and harmony of the Federal Union; inasmuch as the aforesaid commissioners did attempt to exercise powers that are not delegated by the respective States to the United States, in Congress assembled: Wherefore your committee recommend the following resolutions:

1st. That the delegates of this State be directed to make a representation of the conduct of the said commissioners to the United States, in Congress assembled, and to move and contend for an immediate abolition of their powers, as the continuation of such appointment would tend to weaken and destroy that entire confidence in the wisdom and justice of Congress, which this State wishes ever to preserve.

2d. That the delegates be requested to apply for, and immediately send to the Governor, authenticated copies of the commissioners' instructions, and all proceedings thereon of the said commissioners, in order that such measures may be taken as will most effectually preserve the sovereign, territorial, and legislative rights of this State, as well as the rights and privileges to which each citizen is entitled, by the confederation and by the laws of the land.

3d. That all and every act and thing done, or intended to be done, within the limits and jurisdiction of this State, by the said commissioners, inconsistent of the beforementioned rights and privileges, shall be, and the same are hereby declared to be, null and void.

4th. That the thanks of this House be given to the Hon. Edward Telfair, and to John King, and Thomas Glasscock, Esqrs. commissioners on the part of this State, for their patriotism and vigilance in discharging the duties required of them at the aforesaid meetings; that each of them be allowed three dollars per day, during their actual attendance on the said business; and that the Governor and Council take order accordingly.

Which was agreed to.

LITTLE TALLASSIE, September 5, 1785.

SIR:

I am favored with your letter by Brandon, who, after detaining it near a month, sent it by an Indian a few days ago. He perhaps has some reasons for keeping himself at a distance from this. He caused old Mr. McQueen to take charge of this letter in answer to yours, he being shortly to set out for Augusta.

The notification you have sent us is agreeable to our wishes, especially as the meeting is intended for the desirable purpose of adjusting and settling matters on an equitable footing between the United States and the Indian nations. At the same time, I cannot avoid expressing my surprise that a measure of this nature should have been so long delayed on your parts. When we found that the American independency was confirmed by the peace, we expected that the new Government would soon have taken some steps to make up the differences that subsisted between them and the Indians during the war, and to have taken them into protection, and confirm to them their hunting grounds. Such a conduct would have reconciled the minds of the Indians, and secured to the States their attachment and friendship, and considered them as their natural guardians and allies. Georgia, whose particular interest it was to have endeavored to conciliate the friendship of this nation, but, instead of which, I am sorry to observe that violence and prejudice had taken place of good policy and reason in all their proceedings with us. They attempted to avail themselves of our supposed distressed situation. Their talks to us breathed nothing but vengeance; and, being entirely possessed with the idea that we were wholly at their mercy, they never once reflected that the colonies of a powerful monarch were nearly surrounding us, and to whom, in any extremity, we might apply for succor and protection; and who, to answer some end of their policy, might grant it to us. However, we yet deferred any such proceeding, still expecting we could bring them to a sense of their true interest; but, still finding no alteration in their conduct towards us, we sought the protection of Spain, and treaties of friendship and alliance were mutually entered into: they to guaranty our hunting grounds and territory, and to grant us a free trade in the ports of the Floridas.

How the boundary or limits between the Spaniards and the States will be determined, a little time will show, as I believe that matter is now on foot. However, we know our own limits, and the extent of our hunting grounds; and, as a free nation, we have applied, as we have a right, and have obtained protection for, so that we shall pay no regard to any limits that may prejudice our claims, that were drawn by an American, and confirmed by a British, negotiator. Yet, notwithstanding we have been obliged to adopt these measures for our preservation, and from real necessity, we sincerely wish to have it in our power to be on the same footing with the States as before the late unhappy war; to effect which is entirely in your power. We want nothing from you but justice. We want our hunting grounds preserved from encroachments. They have been ours from the beginning of time, and I trust that, with the assistance of our friends, we shall be able to maintain them against every attempt that may be made to take them from us.

Finding our representations to the State of Georgia of no effect, in restraining their encroachments, we thought it proper to call a meeting of the nation on the matter; we then came to a resolution, to send out parties to remove the people and effects from off the lands in question, in the most peaceable manner possible.

Agreeable to your requisition, and to convince you of my sincere desire to restore a good understanding between us, I have taken the necessary steps to prevent any future predatory excursions of my people, against any of your settlements. I could wish that the people of Cumberland shewed an equal good disposition to do what is right. They were certainly the first aggressors since the peace, and acknowledged it in a written certificate, left at the Indian camp they had plundered.

I have only to add that we shall prepare ourselves to meet the commissioners of Congress, whenever we shall receive notice, in expectation that every matter of difference will be made up and settled, with that liberality and justice, worthy the men who have so gloriously asserted the cause of liberty and independency, and that we shall in future consider them as brethren and defenders of the land.

I am, with much respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

HON. ANDREW PICKENS, Esq.

ALEX. MCGILLIVRAY.

I should be sorry that your interest should suffer in the hands of Brandon, but he has committed so many thefts in horses, and to satisfy the people we have given him up to be made an example of, and I imagine his goods are gone for satisfaction. He is a very unfit person for a trader; as I have pretty well cleared the nation of such kind of people, he must not look for indulgence in these parts.

LITTLE TALLASSIE, 8th April, 1787.

SIR:

I had the pleasure to receive the letter that you favored me with by Mr. Miller, on your arrival at the Cussetahs.

It is with real satisfaction that I learn of your being appointed by Congress, for the laudable purpose of inquiring into, and settling the differences that at present subsist between our nation and the Georgians. It may be necessary for you to know the cause of those differences, and of our discontents, which, perhaps, have never come to the knowledge of the honorable body that has sent you to our country.

There are chiefs of two towns in this nation, who, during the late war, were friendly to the State of Georgia, and had gone at different times to that State, and, once, after the general peace, when the people of Augusta demanded a cession or grant of lands belonging to, and enjoyed as hunting ground by the Indians of this nation, in common, on the East of the Oconee river, which demand was rejected by those chiefs, on the plea that those grounds were hunting lands of the nation, and could not be granted by two individuals; but, after a few days, a promise was extorted from them, that, on their return to their own country, they would use their influence to get a grant confirmed. Upon these men reporting this affair, on coming home, a general convention was held at the Teickibatiks town, when those two chiefs were severally censured for their conduct, and the chiefs of ninety-eight towns agreed upon a talk to be sent to Savannah, disapproving, in the strongest manner, of the demand made upon their nation, and denied the right of any two of their country, to making any cession of land, which could only be valid by the unanimous voice of the whole, as joint proprietors, in common. Yet, these two, regardless of the voice of the nation, continued to go to Augusta, and other places within that State, continuing to make such promises, to obtain presents, our customs not permitting us to punish them for the crime; we warned the Georgians of the dangerous consequences that would certainly attend the settling of the lands in question. Our just remonstrances were treated with contempt, and those lands were soon filled with settlers. The nation, justly alarmed at the encroachments, resolved to use force to maintain their rights; yet, being averse to shedding the blood of a people whom we would rather consider as friends, we made another effort to awaken in them a sense of justice and equity; but, we found from experience, that entreaty could not prevail, and parties of warriors were sent out to drive off all intruders, but to shed no blood, only where self preservation made it necessary.

This was in May, 1786. In October following, we were invited, by commissioners of the State of Georgia, to meet them, in conference, at the Oconee, professing a sincere desire for an amicable adjustment of our disputes, and pledging their sacred honors for the safety and good treatment of all those that should attend and meet them. It not being convenient for many of us to go to the proposed conference, a few towns, say their chiefs, attended, most of whom, merely from motives of curiosity, and were surprised to find an armed body of men, prepared for, and professing hostile intentions, than peaceable commissioners. Apprehensions for personal safety, induced those chiefs to subscribe to every demand that was asked by the army and its commissioners; lands were again demanded, and the lives of some of our chiefs were required, as well as some innocent traders, as a sacrifice to appease their anger. Assassins have been employed to effect some part of their atrocious purposes. If I fall by the hand of such, I shall fall a victim in the noblest of causes—that of falling in maintaining the just rights of my country. I aspire to the honest ambition of meriting the appellation of the preserver of my country, equally with those chiefs among you, whom, from acting on such principles, you have exalted to the highest pitch of glory; and, if, after every peaceable mode of obtaining a redress of grievances having proved fruitless, the having recourse to arms to obtain it, be marks of the savage, and not of the soldier, what savages must the Americans be, and how much undeserved applause have your Cincinnatus, your Fabius, obtained. If war names had been necessary to distinguish those chiefs in such a case, the man-killer, the great destroyer, &c. would have been the proper appellations.

I had appointed the Cussetahs, for all the chiefs of the lower Creeks, to meet in convention. I shall be down in a few days, when, from your timely arrival, you will meet the chiefs, and will learn their sentiments, and I sincerely hope that the propositions that you shall offer us will be of such a nature that we can safe accede to. The talks of the former commissioners of Congress, at Galphinton, were much approved of, and your coming from the white town (seat of Congress) has raised great expectations that you will remove the principal, and almost only cause of our disputes, that is, securing to us all our possessions and hunting grounds entire, and clear them of encroachments. When we meet, we shall talk these matters over. Meantime,

I have the honor to be, with regard, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALEX. MCGILLIVRAY.

The Indians that were detained as hostages in Augusta, must speedily be liberated, or hostilities will soon commence, as their relations are uneasy on their accounts.

LITTLE TALLASSIE, UPPER CREEKS, January 4th, 1789.

SIR:

I take this opportunity to write to you, in answer to a letter which you did me the favor to write me in September last, from Seneca, in which was enclosed a proclamation issued by Congress, requiring all the whites that are settled on the lands of the Cherokees, to remove from off them immediately. This measure, together with the talk from the Governor of Virginia, appears to have given much satisfaction to the Cherokees. The Little Turkey, or Coweta King, with some warriors, relations to the Dragging Canoe, have been to consult me on these subjects, bringing with them all the talks that they had received for some time past. I gave it as my opinion to them, that the talks in question might be safely relied on; that the talk of Congress was a strong one, to their people, who would obey it, and the Governor being a principal chief and ruler, he would not speak with a forked tongue; and that, in the ensuing spring, there would be a great meeting, for the purpose of concluding a general peace, the terms of which would be very favorable to them; in the meantime, the chiefs should advise all the young warriors to attend closely to hunting during the winter, instead of risking their lives for a scalp, which, when obtained, would not purchase clothing for their families; and that, considering them as an oppressed people, I had agreed to give them assistance, to enable them to obtain a good peace; but they were not to consider me as engaged to support them in an unjust and an unnecessary war.

The people of your State, who complain of our people molesting them, are not rightly informed: for, besides that I always have endeavored to confine the excursions of our warriors to the people with whom we have ground of quarrel, the State of Virginia and its dependencies are very far distant, and I never knew that a Creek had ever been near Kentucky, at least from the nation; there are several who have wives and families among the Cherokees, and constantly reside there; those I cannot answer for, being to be reckoned as Cherokees. It is the custom of a Creek to disregard all connexions and country, and cleave to his wife; those that have wives abroad, never return to their native land.

The gentlemen, my friends, do me justice when they inform you that I am desirous of peace. I have been now five years in laboring to bring about one with the State of Georgia, but in vain; more than a twelvemonth after the general peace was spent by us in representing to them, in friendly terms, the cruelty and injustice of their proceedings, of wresting forcibly from us a large portion of our hunting lands, and which were in a great measure necessary for our support; that we were not situated as several other Indian nations were, with immense wildernesses behind us. On the contrary, we were surrounded from west to north, by the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Cumberland, and Cherokees, and on every other side by the whites, so that our hunting grounds were already very insufficient for our purposes; to all which we were always answered in haughty and contemptuous language, with threats to drive us over the Mississippi; so that, having nothing to hope from their justice or humanity, it was resolved to raise up the red hatchet for self preservation. As our cause was just, so fortune has favored our exertions in driving them from the contested ground. Though the war has reduced them to an extremity of distress, yet their stubbornness of pride is such, they take no measures to retract the conduct which has brought them to it; they have spurned every attempt that Congress has offered at, to accommodate, by its interference, the disputes between us. The new Congress will equally find them obstinate and intractable; the only method they can adopt, will be to leave the Georgians to their fate; and in another season 'tis probable that they will be brought to reason.

I shall be glad to be favored with an account, when convenient, soon after the meeting of the new Congress, and in what manner the new constitution is finally settled. Any thing that I can serve you in, pray freely command.

I remain with regard, your most obedient servant,

ALEX. MCGILLIVRAY.

HON. ANDREW MOOR, Esquire,

Commissioner for treating with the Cherokees for State of Virginia.

Little Tallassie, Upper Creek Nation, 26th February, 1789.

SIR:

Your Excellency's letter of 6th November, is just come to hand, enclosed in one from the superintendent and commissioners, by which I find that the respectable State of South Carolina, viewing with concern the continuance of the destructive contest carrying on between our nation, the Creeks, and their sister State of Georgia, have been induced, from their good intentions to both, to offer their interference to bring about an amicable adjustment of the disputes subsisting between us, which offer we can have no good reason for objecting to; and as your Excellency, as chief of the State, has stepped forward as the mediator, it is very necessary that you, in that capacity, should be informed of the real grounds of such dispute, and from the account which I shall give you of it, you will readily admit, that we had the best reasons for opposition. Directly after the conclusion of a general peace was announced to us all, the Georgians sent up an invitation to our chiefs to meet them in treaty at Augusta, professing it was with an intention of burying the hatchet, and with it the remembrance of every injury which they had sustained from us in the war of Britain. The call being at an inconvenient season, the proper chiefs not being in the way, a few people who, during the war, pretended to neutrality, attended the call at Augusta, and on conferences then held, the leading people of the upper parts of that State made a demand of a large cession of lands, comprehending our best hunting grounds, as a compensation for the injuries sustained by them in the war, and which was enforced by bands of armed men, who at the same time surrounded them, threatening them with instant death if it was refused. The two chiefs then present being of the second rank, truly told them that the demand was unexpected, and were unprepared to answer it, and being only two men, could not promise that any grant that they should be forced to consent to make, would be confirmed by the chiefs of the nation, as it was not unknown to the white people that it was necessary that the joint voice of the whole nation should make and confirm such grants. This reply not satisfying the Georgians, they persisted and renewed their threats; then these men, to escape the threatened danger, consented as far as what concerned them, but could not engage to bind the whole to their act. When these men arrived in the nation, a general convention was immediately called to deliberate on this affair; the chiefs of more than forty towns assembled, when they reprobated the transactions of the two inferior chiefs in strong terms, and refused to consent to any such cession, and desired me to inform the Georgians of the same, and to warn them that, if the threatened encroachments were made, a war would immediately ensue, which I did in a letter to Mr. Houston, the Governor.

This is a true account of the transactions of the first of three pretended treaties which the commissioners mention in their letter to me; the second invitation which we received to treat, was made by Colonel Hawkins and General Pickens, under the appointment of Congress, as they informed me, and mentioned that they had not, at that time, fixed upon any place to meet us; but, when that point was settled, they would give a second notification, and which I never received. Soon after I learned that the Georgians took up the matter, and smuggled a treaty at Galphinton, on Ogeechee, to which place they secretly invited a few of our people, whom they had bribed and secured to their interests, and who they were sure would agree to any thing that was asked of them, and there of course a cession was again asked of them, with a large addition. Sometime after, I received a letter from Col. Hawkins, desiring to know my reasons for not meeting at Ogeechee, at the same time remarking, that he did not consider the few that attended, a proper representation of the Creek nation; he said nothing to them; the authority of the commissioner of Congress, I expect, will be sufficient evidence to overturn any claim that is founded on a grant of this treaty.

Another convention protested, through me, in warm terms, to the Georgians, respecting their conduct in offering to make pretensions to cessions of land obtained from a few beggars, who only want to obtain presents. The third invitation which was sent to us to treat, was from the Georgians only, through their commissioners, at the head of whom was Mr. M. Habersham, President of the Executive Council, and he proposes the Oconee river for the place of meeting. In the letter, they "pledged their sacred honor" for the safety and welfare of every one that would attend their conferences; but I being so often threatened, and having the worst opinion of the back people, as they are called, did not go, but sent a few Coweta warriors, to report to me on their return. During the conferences of Oconee, an additional cession was demanded, which was strongly opposed by the Cowetas, and others, for which they were violently insulted by a Colonel Clark, in the presence of the commissioners, who could not prevent it; and, though their sacred honors were pledged for maintaining good order, yet several warriors, of different towns, were forcibly seized upon by armed men, and conveyed to Augusta, more as prisoners than hostages, to be kept as a pledge that my life and six more of leading men, should be taken. Such a conduct convinced the whole nation that it was full time to adopt measures for the general safety. A general convention was appointed, to be held in May for that purpose, and a few days before it was opened, a Doctor White arrived in the nation, with an appointment of Superintendent of Indian Affairs, from Congress; the chiefs assembled, shewed him every attention, and, on account of his arrival, the two men who had given the grants, as before related, were called upon to attend, (for they had not mingled themselves with the others for shame) that Doctor White should know the truth. He very minutely interrogated those men concerning the foregoing matters, and they gave him the same account of the first treaty, as it is called, and of the rest, as I have done. The Doctor used his best ability to get the chiefs in convention to consent to the disputed cession, but in vain; on the contrary, the chiefs, by their speaker, the king of the Cowetas, told Doctor White, that, before they would give more lands, they would rather risk an attempt to resume what the nation had formerly been deprived of. The Doctor, on his going away, required of me a written representation of the causes of our discontents, to be shewn to Congress, which I gave him, and am certain that it is in the possession of that honorable body; the subject of which made part of the deliberations of a committee ordered to sit upon Indian affairs, and to report the same. A printed report of that committee I have now in the house, and, from sentiments contained in it, I had great hopes that it would form the basis for accommodating matters between us and the Georgians, and which would be very satisfactory to us. I beg leave next to remark to you, that, if the Georgians, after the peace, had conducted themselves to us with moderation and humanity, we should not have fallen out with them for trifles; and they have brought the war on themselves, by manifesting, at the outset, an unaccommodating and persecuting spirit towards us. Our situation does by no means admit of our giving away our lands; we are already closely surrounded, and our hunting grounds much circumscribed. There is the State of Georgia on the east, southeast and southwest by the Spanish Floridas, west by the nations of the Choctaws and Chickasaws, on the north by the Cherokees and Cumberland. We are not situated as the western and northern nations, with immense deserts at our back; all this tells us that we must struggle hard to preserve our hunting grounds, and perish to a man in its defence: for where can we go to possess ourselves of new ones? Such forcible considerations with us, may weigh nothing in the minds of those who think that Indians are only animals fit to be exterminated; and this is a language which I know is held in many places in your country; but let us be what we may, let it be attempted when it will, it will be found no very easy enterprise. I have given your Excellency a very circumstantial account of the origin of the contest between us and the Georgians, from which you will find, that the Georgians have no well founded cause of quarrel with us, and that they can have no just claim to your assistance; for, to support them in this contest, is to side with injustice and oppression; a reproach which I firmly believe that the respectable State over which you preside will not subject its magnanimity and honor to. "Very far am I, sir, from spurning at your offered mediation; but the letter of the commissioners puts it out of my power, or rather makes it of no effect, as they declare that it is impossible for them to comply with our requisition, to restore to us the territory usurped from us by the Georgians," wishing us to "reconsider the matter, as the Georgians' claims are founded on three treaties signed by our headmen and warriors."

The treaties alluded to have been faithfully reported to you. One of the new commissioners, General Pickens, formerly by letter acknowledged to me, that he was in Augusta at the time the first treaty, as it is called, was held, and the manner in which a consent to a cession was extorted was very unfair. The General, as a gentleman, will not deny his assertion. I cannot take upon myself to engage to meet the commissioners to enter into an investigation of this subject; it will be attended with no good effect; the claims will be endeavored to be maintained, and we shall be as firm in attempting to overthrow it, and disagreeable, if not bloody consequences would be the result of such conferences. I understand your Excellency very well when you say, that you are not unprepared for a change of circumstances; that is, we shall, or must, purchase peace of the Georgians, at the expense of sacrificing our rights, properties, and life itself, or you are resolved to join that State in hostility against us. The commissioners also say that Congress is resolved to do justice to Georgia. All this has the most formidable appearance. I by no means make light of the great power which thus menaces: if 'tis determined, as I suspect it is the case, to attempt a conquest of our country, we will be found as determined to oppose it. Spain is bound by treaty to protect and support us in our claims and properties; we shan't want for means of defence, but still I hope, for I earnestly desire, that your influence and power will be used to set every matter to rights in a peaceable manner, rather than to exercise the calamities of war.

I am returned, a month or two since, from a four through the principal of the Lower towns and Seminoles, which I made for the purpose of urging them to a strict observance of the truce; and I believe I can venture to assure your Excellency, that no complaints will be made for any breaches of it throughout the winter.

I have the honor to be, with most respectful consideration,
Your Excellency's most obedient servant,

ALEX. MCGILLIVRAY.

His Excellency THOMAS PICKENS, Esq.
Governor of the State of South Carolina.

C. No. 1.

FAYETTEVILLE, May 24th, 1787.

SIR:

Being lately returned from the Creek nation, which occasioned the alarm in Georgia last summer, I do myself the honor of sending you an account of the state of those Indians.

The invasion which threatened that State had subsided ere my arrival; and first appearances seemed to promise tranquillity; for hostages had been given by some of the Indians to give satisfaction, and enlarge the boundary of the State. I soon discovered these hostages were but of imaginary consequence; they were taken from the Cusitash, a town not only without imputation of offence on this occasion, but at all times attached to the white people in a singular manner. My tour to the nation convinced me, that these men answered no other purpose by their detention, than to alienate the minds of such of the Indians as might be favorably disposed; they have since been dismissed, all but a youth, who, in his impatience of confinement, put himself to death. The further Creeks who had insulted the State, continue in the same disposition; and if their hatchet has been hitherto restrained it has been through their respect to the United States. Their dispositions had been favorably inclined by the liberal sentiments of the former commissioners from Congress, and they had got information that there was an agent now coming to them from that honorable body. This withheld their resentment to the State of Georgia. They have all along been avowedly opposed to the new settlements of the white people. The sentiments of the Lower towns seemed not so well known till I went out; but at a full meeting of these latter, they also protested against what they termed the Georgian encroachments, which they declared they would repel by force. From a sketch of the proceedings at that meeting, (paper No. 1) you may see that the very Indians, said to have made the grants, were the first to accuse the State of having extorted land from them under pretence of cessions. All their expressions, indeed, were mingled with respect for the power that had delegated the superintendent to whom they addressed their talk. "But there was a third party, (the Georgians) they said, which evidently meant injustice and oppression." The meeting, upon the whole, concluded so unfavorably, that there was room to apprehend an immediate invasion. To that, however, a temporary stop was put by an idea of their influential Chief, McGillivray. In this there was something so singular, that perhaps I may be excused for relating it circumstantially. The following, therefore, was nearly the address of that Indian Chief: "Notwithstanding that, as the guardian of the Indian rights, I prompt them to defend their lands, yet I must declare I look upon the United States as our most natural allies. Two years I waited before I would seek for the alliance I have formed. I was compelled to it. I could not but resent the greedy encroachments of the Georgians; to say nothing of their scandalous and illiberal personal abuse. Notwithstanding which, I will now put it to the test whether they or myself entertain the most generous sentiments of respect for Congress. If that honorable body can form a government to the southward of the Altamaha, I will be the first to take the oath of allegiance thereto; and in return to the Georgians, for yielding to the United States that claim, I will obtain a regular and peaceable grant of the lands on the Oconee, on which they have deluded people to settle, under pretence of grants from the Indians, you yourself have seen how ill founded. However, if this takes place, I will put this matter out of dispute for them. I will give you to the first of August for an answer."

I hope I shall be excused for relating this unexpected proposal in his own words, as nearly as I can recollect; his motives were probably inclination as well as interest. I could discover that his natural bias is not towards his Spanish allies, and he is a trader of a company that imports largely, from which the government of Pensacola exacts an exorbitant impost. On the other hand, he would not only expect a more moderate duty through the Altamaha, but the Indian country is more accessible through that way.

The strength of these Indians is about 6,000 gun-men, mostly well armed with rifles; they extend down the waters of the Alabama, and Apalachicola rivers, along to the point of Florida, through the Spanish territories; through which they could have a convenient retreat in case they were forced by an expedition against them. It is beyond a doubt that they receive every encouragement, from the jealous policy of the Spaniards, against us; from this source they are already provided with ammunition, magazines of which are dispersed through their towns, and reserved for a public occasion. I am well informed, that when the Creeks were threatened from Georgia, the Spanish influence, in favor of those Indians, was very active with the Choctaws.

With what conveniency the United States could carry on a war with the Creeks, I cannot determine; but I may be permitted to remark, that the State of Georgia, only in holding a partial treaty with some of them, last autumn, was obliged to have recourse to a paper medium, which is already depreciated 400 per cent.; and it was with great difficulty that the troops raised for this Indian business could be kept together till it terminated in the unsubstantial manner it did.

The causes that excite an unfriendly disposition in the Indians, may in part be gathered from Mr. McGillivray's letter, which comes enclosed to you. Besides, there are the following, among other causes:

The natural reluctance of the Indians to part with any of their lands: for, to use their own expression, they look on their lands as their blood and their life, which they must fight for rather than part with. 2d. Because, in obtaining the new purchase, a sufficiently general consent of the nation was wanting; and even that partial consent extorted by threats, as they pretend. 3d. The white people on the frontier continuing their encroachments; they pursue their surveys into the Indian country, and destroy the game there.

Much also of the Indian animosity may be ascribed to the instigations of Mr. McGillivray, who is said to be in Spanish pay, and entertains a personal resentment to the State of Georgia. To this may be added habits of enmity contracted during the war, and their connexion with the British. In like manner, the Spanish influence now succeeds to that.

I have sent you the letter from Mr. McGillivray, not only as it may serve to give some idea of the character of the man, but also, as it contains a state of Indian complaints.

The two papers (No. 2 and 3) from the Legislature and Executive of the State of Georgia, will help to shew in what manner that Government has received the institution of a superintendent within the claim of their jurisdiction.

Permit me to enclose, also, a letter to McGillivray, and a talk to the Lower Creeks; you will please to judge if any of the contents may be proper to offer to the attention of Congress; it appeared necessary for me to mention at least the proposal, as above, from McGillivray.

I am, with the greatest respect, sir, your obedient and humble servant,

JAMES WHITE.

The Honorable Major General KNOX.

C. No. 2.

CASSETASH, April 4, 1787.

SIR:

I flattered myself I should have been able in person to deliver you the enclosed. Unfortunately, the decline of my health has disappointed me in that expectation. It is with difficulty, indeed, that I have reached thus far; but I am encouraged by reflecting, that if our efforts are successful in removing the misunderstanding which seems to have taken place between the people of Georgia and some part of the Creek nation, we shall have rendered good offices, perhaps, equally to both. That this can be effected, I the more readily hope, as each party seems to entertain an inclination to avoid the further effusion of human blood on the occasion. I assure you, sir, the better and more moderate people among us, appear to wish there may be no cause to proceed to extremes.

As for the United States, the very nature of their Government is averse to violence; and if, through the ties of the confederation, there is a necessity to turn the force of the continent into this quarter, it will not be without regret that there is occasion for the disagreeable measure.

In like manner, it is with pleasure I perceive by your letters, that the Indians only wish their rights may not be violated. Let both parties, therefore, condescend a little. For my part, the very small share of persuasion I possess among the white people, shall be exerted for so good a purpose, as, indeed, it has not been hitherto neglected; your more powerful influence among this people cannot certainly take place to a better end; matters may be amicably settled. It will prove a mutual advantage.

I confess, among the herd of white people, there are many who may be ripe for precipitating themselves into measures as injurious to others, as destructive to themselves. The same, no doubt, among the Indians. To restrain this temper, is the duty of more sober reflection.

As for the occasion of these animosities, which I am sorry has subsisted, the territory of the State is, in my opinion, amply extensive; and this consideration is a security for the Indians, that there will be no similar ground for complaint in future; as it cannot be an object with Government to disperse its subjects still more widely, while there is so much internal room for cultivation; I can take upon me to assure you that measures are adopted with strict severity for curbing the licentiousness of any who might be disposed to give offence to this people.

On the other hand, the white people are not without heavy complaints. They allege that the assassination in cold blood of their unsuspecting fellow citizens, can scarcely be atoned for—barbarities which may, indeed, raise the indignation of a civilized people; but, as you well know, it requires a different spirit to bring them to any terms, so you will be the first to discountenance these marks, not of the soldier, but the savage.

With respect to the subject that produced these enormities, if I may be permitted to remark without the imputation of partiality, it is obvious that, as the Creeks have no written laws or customs, it was to be supposed the people of Georgia would in reason view that purchase as good which they were to make from the people who were in the indisputed possession and use—the case of your Lower towns—however, as the subject of grievances is at all times a tender one, I am sorry if I have not touched it with a finger sufficiently delicate. Let us rather turn our views to the means of future peace and happiness. For this purpose, I am anxious for an early meeting, and I hope I am not deceived in thinking you will heartily concur in endeavors of so humane a tendency.

As I propose going to the northward as soon as I see this business in any regular train, it would do me pleasure to convey any word to your correspondent Mr. H. who thinks of you with sentiments of singular esteem, and who is a man of a benevolence and philanthropy expanded beyond party and national contractedness.

I am, with great esteem, your obedient servant,

JAMES WHITE.

The Honorable ALEXANDER MCGILLIVRAY, Esq.
One of the Chiefs of the Creek nation.

At a meeting of the Lower Creeks.—April 10, 1787.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

The occasion that brings me here to see you, is, I believe, partly of the same nature as that for which you have met together. But before I enter upon the business, I cannot help expressing the pleasure I feel at seeing so many of our particular friends assembled. The Lower towns of the Creek nation have always shown a moderation and a prudence, which I feel and admire. If this disposition is continued, it will establish such a friendship and commerce, as will be infinitely better than quarrelling and bloodshed.

There are many present who are already informed that I am sent here by the great council which, in peace and war, directs the affairs of all the thirteen united nations of white men, of which the Virginians, your neighbors, make a very small part. I come now from the centre of their government; at the distance from here of a whole moon's journey, on strong horses.

BROTHERS: The Virginians of Georgia, who form one of the thirteen fires of our great council, complained, at the meeting last autumn, that their country was attacked, and their people killed by some bad men of the Creek nation. They demanded assistance, if due satisfaction was not given against the offenders. But the old and wise men of the great council, the Congress, before they would send out a strong army to assist in killing their brothers, the Indians, with whom they would rather be at peace, wished first to inquire into the matter, and see if all things could not be amicably settled. For this purpose they have sent me out.

NOW, BROTHERS, from peace may we not all reap advantage? There can be none from spilling each other's blood. The Master of Breath lends us that breath but for a little while; why then should we snatch it from one another sooner than he designs? For this reason, I hope both parties will be moderate. Perhaps it hath been a little the fault of both parties that any of the human blood hath been spilt on the occasion; I hope that now, each will yield a little to the other. When our friends of the Creek nation, who are now at Augusta, come up, they will tell you how much I inculcated this to the white people; I was happy to find them disposed to it, except a few of their mad young men, who were too apt to be disposed to war; but their nation will not be rigorous in their demands; they have presents in waiting for the Indians, who, I hope, will go down and receive the goods. I am convinced that this nation will not, in the end, lose any thing by confirming the grant of such lands as many of the respectable men of the nation have thought might be spared, and have already granted; which gift it would look unmanly to retract, if it could be done, but it cannot.

BROTHERS: I have carefully avoided to mention any old cause of quarrels, and I hope there will be none for the future. You will find that the headmen among the Virginians have lately made provision for severely punishing any of their bad folks, who shall disturb their friends the Indians.

I will not trouble you further, but to mention one thing, which concerns us all, and which I feel from my heart; the red people and the white are equally interested in it. We are countrymen; we live in the same land; we breathe the same air; we should be brothers. The Kings and people who live over the great water, will wish to subdue us all. They will use cunning and force. Perhaps at this very time there are men employed among you to set you against us. It is not so long since, but you must remember how one of these Powers made violent efforts of this kind, even upon us, the white people, their children. But to tell you what is done by others of them to people of your color, towards the mid-day sun, would fill you with horror. Ought we not, therefore, to grasp one another with a strong arm of friendship, the more easily to repel these foreigners? Go down, then, and receive the presents which are kept for you as marks of friendship, when you run the line, as you have agreed. You will be assured that every care has been taken by the Virginians to prevent your receiving any offence; as you, I flatter myself, will also do by them. For my part, when I return from whence I came, I shall have the pleasure to tell the great council of Congress this; then they, far from sending an army into the Creek nation, will exert themselves to give trade, and the comforts of life, to you and your families. This will make the chain of our friendship brighter, and, indeed, will be better for us all.

Before I make an end, I must inform you that our friend Chewocleymicho, and his companions, the hostages, are in good health and spirits. I have sent down to request they may be brought up, that it may not appear hard to keep our friends too long from their relations. But I hope the time passes away agreeably with them; for when I left them, they had nothing to do but to drink rum and be merry. If there is any just cause of complaint, I now beg it may be known, that I may use my best endeavors to find a remedy. All we have to request is, that you go and receive your presents, and attend at running the line, according to your agreement at the treaty.

Present: the principal chiefs of the lower towns; also, the Tallassee, or Half-way-house king; and from the further Creeks, Alex<sup>r</sup> McGillivray. Of the white people, besides the superintendent of Indian affairs, the two State commissioners, Messrs. Barnard and Galphin.

Mr. McGillivray opened the business, by telling the Indians “they knew for what purposes this meeting was called: he regretted it had not been earlier, that their sentiments respecting the white people's settling their lands, might have been certainly known; that the Virginians (i. e. Georgians) had falsely persuaded the rest of the white people they had purchased those lands from them; there was now a gentleman come out to inquire into this business; that he came from a different quarter, and would be a good witness to the truth. He (McGillivray) had no doubt they would treat him with the highest respect, and with every attention to what he might have to say to them." He then requested the superintendent to put any questions, or make any proposals he thought proper. During the talk of the superintendent, the Indians observed a singular decorum and attention, till he came to request them to go down and run the line; at which they interrupted, by asking if the white people wanted to make any more of them prisoners (i. e. hostages.)

In answer to the talk, the Tallassee king spoke first. He said, that "he was glad the superintendent had come out, that he might make known his complaints, of which he had many. He had always been a friend to the white people; that, after the war, he was invited to Augusta, where he expected to be treated like a friend; instead of which, the white people, their long knives in their hands, insisted on his making a cession of land, which he had no right to do; but that, after three days' importunity, he was obliged to consent, on condition the nation would agree to it."

The Hallowing king of the Cowetas seemed principally to undertake to speak for the Indians in general. He expressed their thankfulness to the superintendent for coming so great a journey, with the good intention of settling the quarrel between them and the Georgians. If the matter rested between them and Congress, no doubt it could be amicably concluded; but there was a third party, who had no mind to do justice. He gave an historical account of the progress of the white people, from even before their establishment to the southward of the Savannah, as he had seen himself, or been informed by older men. But, says he, "these last strides tell us they never mean to let their foot rest; our lands are our life and breath; if we part with them, we part with our blood. We must fight for them."

The superintendent then endeavored to show the difficulty, nay, the impossibility of evacuating the lands on which people had settled, after buying them, in the opinion that they were granted by the Indians, in atonement for the many unprovoked injuries the State had sustained. He adduced many reasons to make it probable the Tallassee king had made the grants unconstrained. He promised them every security should be given them against all future encroachments; and he offered to take off several conditions of the late treaty, that might seem to bear too hard. But they insisted, the great grievance was taking their land; and that they could not dispense with. When they were desired to declare if nothing would do but relinquishing the lands on the Oconee, they answered, that, or war.

The superintendent took his leave, assuring them of his good wishes to the nation; and that he would always use his endeavors in obtaining for them whatever might be fair and reasonable; but that he was sorry to think their demands in the present case were neither.

Mr. McGillivray's proposal was made next day.

Augusta, Geo. 15th November, 1787.

SIR:

I do myself the honor to enclose to your Excellency a report of a committee of the General Assembly of this State, respecting the Creek Indians. It so fully informs your Excellency of the unavoidable necessity there is for a war with that nation, that little is left for me to say on the subject. In my letter to our delegates, of the 9th of August, I inform them of the murders committed by the Indians, and by their answer, it appears the letter was laid before Congress, since which time our frontiers have been the scene of blood and ravages; they have killed thirty-one of our citizens, wounded twenty, and taken four prisoners; they have burnt the court house and town of Greensburgh, in the county of Greene, and a number of other houses in different parts of the country. The Assembly, fully convinced that the State never can have a secure and lasting peace with that perfidious nation, until they have severely felt the effects of war, have ordered three thousand men to be raised, and given the Executive power to call forth fifteen hundred more, should the first not be adequate. The arming and equipping these troops will be attended with such expense, that the aid of the Union will be required, in addition to our exertions, and I flatter myself the United States will grant such assistance as will enable us to prosecute the war with vigor, and establish us in the blessings of peace. I would also take the liberty of remarking, that I have reason to think the Creek Indians are supplied with arms and ammunition from the Spanish government of West Florida, and whether it may not be proper for Congress officially to remonstrate against such supplies being granted them, whilst engaged in a war with us.

I have the honor to be, with respect, &c.

GEORGE MATHEWS.

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY, TUESDAY, the 23d October, 1787.

The House proceeded to take into consideration the report of the committee, to whom was referred the message of his Honor the Governor, of the 18th instant, together with such parts of the despatches accompanying the same, as relates to the Creek Indians: and the same being read and amended, was agreed to by the House, and is as follows:

"The committee, consisting of General Clarke, Mr. Telfair, Mr. Joseph Habersham, Mr. Seagrove, and Mr. Walton, to whom were referred the papers marked No. 1, accompanying the Governor's message of the 18th instant, respecting Indian affairs, report:

"That, in examining the letters and documents committed to them, they have necessarily been led to a reference to the treaties and principal transactions with the Indians, which have taken place since the Revolution and the establishment of peace with Great Britain. And they find that, on the thirty-first day of May, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, the Cherokees, by a treaty held at Augusta, among others, agreed to and subscribed the following clause:

"Clause 3d. That a new line shall be drawn, without delay, between the present settlements in the said State, and the hunting ground of the said Indians, to begin on Savannah river, where the present line strikes it; thence, up the said river, to a place on the most northern branch of the same, (commonly called Keowee) where a northeast line, to be drawn from the top of the Oconna mountain, shall intersect; thence, along the said line, on a southwest direction, to the top of the said mountain; thence, in the same direction, to Tuegola river; thence, to the top of the Currahee mountain; thence to the head or source of the most southern branch of the Oconee river, including all the waters of the same; and thence, down the middle of the said branch, to the Creek line. And that, on the first day of November following, by a treaty also held at Augusta, among others, the Creeks agreed to and subscribed a similar clause, for establishing the same line for their hunting grounds. And both nations made the same relinquishment, on account of mutual claims which had not before been settled between them; and this boundary was again acknowledged and confirmed at another treaty, held with the Creeks at Galphinton, the 12th day of November, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, and extended from the confluence of the Oconee and Oakmulgee rivers, to the source of St. Mary's. That it is true, that, some few months after the holding of this latter treaty, some uneasinesses began to be fomented in the nation, and some murders were committed. This was considered and declared to be an infraction of the treaty, and reparation was demanded. It was made a serious object of Government, and the Legislature being convened, our domestic situation and our relative one with the Union, were considered with all possible attention and respect. Commissioners were appointed, with full powers to inquire into the causes, and to restore peace; but with power also, if unavoidable, to take eventual measures of defence. This proceeding produced another treaty, which was held at Shoulderbone, on the third of November, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, whereby the violation was acknowledged, the boundaries contained in the former treaties again recognized, and ratified, and seven hostages were pledged for the faithful execution of the condition. Your committee cannot forbear, here, to observe, that, during the course of all these transactions, the communications were made in solemn, open, and ancient form, and the articles of the treaties were mutually respected, until the aggression posterior to that of Galphinton. And that, whilst it is admitted on the one hand, there was no principle of representation of the parts of the nation known in civilized government, it cannot be denied on the other, that it was such as had been common; and the Indians acknowledged, without doubt, and regret their forming a part, and being members of the State. Peace being thus restored by the treaty of Shoulderbone, but before the articles were yet carried into full effect, the State received the appointment of a superintendent of Indian Affairs, by the Congress of the United States for the southern department, and on the 15th January, in the present year, the same was acknowledged by the following resolutions of the Legislature:

“That this House have a due sense of the attention of Congress to the affairs between this State and the Indians within its territory.

“Resolved, That his Honor the Governor be requested to communicate to the said superintendent, that the Government of this State, on the former part of the last year, received certain advice, that it was the intention of the Creek Indians to make war against the white inhabitants of the same; and that a short time after they did actually commit hostilities.

“That, in consequence thereof, and agreeably to the articles of confederation and perpetual union, which this State holds as the rule of its good faith, and as the evidence of its portion of sovereignty of the Union, measures were taken, which had for their object, the present security of the State, and the restoring of peace and tranquillity, by the most expeditious and certain means; and that, under Providence, the measures have been attended with the desired success.

“That, immediately after the measures before mentioned were determined on, the delegates of this State were directed to make full representation of the same to Congress, with the motives which compelled the State to the same, without the delay which would unavoidably have arisen from the remote distance of the State from the residence of Congress, which no doubt has been done accordingly.”

“And afterwards, a committee was appointed to confer with the said superintendent on the subject of his mission, and on the 6th of February they reported, and of which the following are extracts:

“Your committee report, that they have conferred with the honorable the superintendent of the United States, and have laid before him the papers and instructions committed to their care, to which he has been pleased to return the following answer:

“Gentlemen of the committee for Indian Affairs, accept my thanks for your polite communication of the different materials in your possession, to assist in acquiring an idea of the situation of Indian affairs in this district. The not having been engaged in this line till very lately, will hardly permit me to remark on the subject as you request. I will only express my satisfaction, in observing the moderation, as well as spirit, with which this State pursued her plan of checking the savage violence on the late occasion. The report I have to make to the United States in Congress, taking its complexion from these circumstances, will probably induce them to a more cheerful participation of the expense.

“The spirit and prudence of the State will, no doubt, farther dictate means of future tranquillity, as well as those of invigorating the hands of the superintendent of Indian Affairs, so far as is conducive to the execution of his office, within the limits this State.

“I wish to do myself the honor of assuring the honorable the Legislature, that, as they may think it advisable for me, in my official capacity, to be present at making the temporary line, I will cheerfully attend to that, or any other measure they will favor me with, pointing out in the line of my duty; and that, in every official transaction, I shall observe a most sacred respect to the rights of the State of Georgia.

“I am, with great respect, your humble servant,

JAS. WHITE.’

“The same committee having reported the expediency of new regulations for Indian Affairs, a bill was brought in for that purpose, and being carried into effect, a board of commissioners were appointed, of which the said superintendent was one. The commissioners, having convened, entered upon the duties of their office; and it was expected that the Indians would be down some time in the spring on the fulfilment of the Shoulderbone treaty. That, in the mean time, the appointment of commissaries, with some other arrangements, were made, and the superintendent determined to visit the nation. When there, he wrote to the Governor, from the Buzzard-roost, on the 12th of March, stating the appearances of mischief with some of the Indians, the probable good effects of his mediation, and of the giving up the hostages, which he recommended. It was also said, ‘there is no doubt but the Upper Creeks may be reconciled to the boundary as wished;’ and by a letter from Mr. John Galphin, one of the commissaries, written at the same time, and on the same sheet, he says ‘I saw Mr. McGillivray lately, who says he only waits for Doctor White, and, if he comes, he will have the line run between the Indians and the Georgians by the first of May;’ and he also advised that the hostages should be given up. Upon the foundation of these letters, the surrender of the hostages was agreed to, and two of the principal ones went on with the answers, and the others were to accompany the commissaries.

“But that, on the 13th of April following, another letter, from the superintendent to the Governor, dated from the Cussetahs, advises to prepare for war, in any event; adding, that his personal safety was assured to be in danger, should he threaten the nation with the force of the Union; and upon his return to Augusta, on the 23d of April, in a farther address to the Governor, he ascribes the suspension of hostilities between the Indians and the State, to propositions communicated to him by Mr. McGillivray, for a new State to be laid off, south of the Altamaha, and mentions that he had acceded to a truce until the first of August. And here ends the knowledge of your committee, of transactions with, or by, the superintendent. It was but a little while, however, before several murders were committed on our frontier, and which have been repeated, from time to time, until mutual hostilities have at length taken place on the whole length of our borders and a war, by the savages, is now raging with all its horrors.

“And here, too, the task of your committee becomes distressingly difficult. As lovers of their country, and as servants of the State, it is equally their desire, and their duty, to be true and to be just; and, while they wish to treat the servants of the Union with the strictest respect, they ought to guard our Government at home against the improper imputation of wrong. They therefore report it as their opinion, that the ultimate causes of the war were the too sudden interferences with treaties of the State, by which the minds of the Indians were perplexed, and the impression induced, that, in a war with the State, they should not have the strength of the Union to fear; and that another disposition would be made of the Territory, than that which considers it as part of the State. That representations to this effect should be immediately transmitted to Congress, and the support of the Union demanded.

“That, in the meantime, the most vigorous and decisive measures be taken, by the Government of this State, for suppressing the bloody violences of the Indians. For which purpose, your committee advise, that a law be passed, as speedily as possible, for raising and forming magazines of arms, ammunition, stores, and provision in kind, and for enlisting of men for the protection of the State.”

Extracts from the minutes.

JAS. M. SIMMONS, Clk. G. A.

E. No. 1.

The Secretary of the United States for the Department of War, in obedience to the order of Congress of the 15th instant to report a plan for the protection of the frontier of Georgia, agreeably to the principle of the resolve of Congress of the 21st of July, 1787, reports:

That he conceives it is intended the protection to be afforded the State of Georgia, should be complete, in case the Creek Indians should persist in refusing to enter into a treaty on reasonable terms, and to comprehend all operations offensive, as well as defensive, that may be deemed necessary for the full accomplishment of the object.

That unless rigorous exertions be made in the first instance, calculated to terminate effectually the contest, in one campaign, the United States will hazard the event of being drawn into a tedious, expensive, and inglorious war.

That the strength of the Wabash Indians, who were principally the object of the resolve of the 21st of July, 1787, and the strength of the Creek Indians is very different. That the said Creeks are not only greatly superior in numbers, but are more united, better regulated, and headed by a man whose talents appear to have fixed him in their confidence.

That your Secretary humbly apprehends the regular troops of the Union on the Ohio were considered as the basis of the before recited resolve, of the 21st July, 1787. That the militia intended to have been drawn forth were to have acted as auxiliaries to the said regular troops, and that all the arrangements were to have been made under the direction of the commanding officer of the said troops. That the case is widely different on the frontiers of Georgia, no troops of the United States being there, nor is it easily practicable to remove any considerable body from the Ohio, were the measure expedient in other respects.

That this difference of circumstances will require a different and more extensive arrangement for the protection of the frontier of Georgia than any that were contemplated by the aforesaid resolve of the 21st of July, 1787.

That the frontier of Georgia may be protected either by a large body of militia, detached from time to time, or by a corps of troops regularly organized and enlisted for a certain period. That a consideration of the expense and irregularity of detachments of mere militia, compared with the economy and vigor of a corps of troops properly organized, would evince the great superiority and advantage to be derived to the public by an adoption of the organized troops.

That, from the view of the object your Secretary has been able to take, he conceives that the only effectual mode of acting against the said Creeks, in case they should persist in their hostilities, would be by making an invasion of their country with a powerful body of well regulated troops, always ready to combat and able to defeat any combination of force the said Creeks could oppose, and to destroy their towns and provisions.

Your Secretary humbly conceives, that any interference on the part of the United States with less force and energy, would cherish the hostilities of the Creeks instead of extinguishing them.

That he conceives the operation herein stated would require an army of two thousand eight hundred non-commissioned officers and privates of the different species of troops, to be raised for the term of nine months.

That the said troops should be commanded by one major general, and one brigadier general, to be appointed by Congress, who should also appoint an inspector and quarter master to said troops.

That the pay and emoluments of said officers be fixed by Congress.

That the organization of the troops should be as follows:

Three regiments of infantry, of seven hundred each; one regiment of cavalry, of five hundred and sixty; one corps of artillery of one hundred and forty.

That if Congress should approve of these numbers, they might be apportioned as follows:

Georgia. —One regiment of infantry, - - - - -	700
Five companies of cavalry, of 70 each, - - - - -	350
	1050
South Carolina. —One regiment of infantry, - - - - -	700
Two companies of artillery, of 70 each, - - - - -	140
	840
North Carolina. —One regiment of infantry, - - - - -	700
Three companies of cavalry, - - - - -	210
	2800

That all the regimental officers be appointed by the said States, respectively, according to the proportions to be specified by the Secretary of War.

That the said troops should be mustered, and inspected, in the manner to be directed by the Secretary of War, which musters should be considered as essential vouchers in the settlement of the accounts of the troops.

That the said troops should be paid by the States in which they are respectively raised, according to the rates of pay established for the troops of the United States.

That suitable clothing, to the value of ten dollars, be allowed each non-commissioned officer and private, who should enlist for the said term of nine months, which, with tents, the necessary camp equipage, and wagons or other means of transportation, agreeably to the proportions to be specified by the Secretary of War, should be furnished to the troops, by the States in which they shall be raised.

That the States of North and South Carolina should also subsist their quotas respectively until their arrival at the place of rendezvous to be appointed by the commanding officer.

That the rations and forage of said army should be provided by contract by the State of Georgia, while acting within the said State, and also for the quotas of South and North Carolina until they should return to the places of dismission within the said States respectively.

That the issues of the rations of provision and forage, should be checked in the manner to be directed by the Secretary of War, and for every ration of provision allowed accordingly the United States should be charged a sum not exceeding — parts of a dollar, and for every ration of forage not exceeding — parts of a dollar.

That the amount of pay, transportation, and subsistence of said troops, should be settled in the manner and forms to be previously established by the Board of Treasury, and the same, when completed, should be passed to the credit of said States, on the existing requisitions, according to the amount they may have respectively furnished.

That as it is highly probable that the said States may be deficient in arms, accoutrements, and ammunition, the same be furnished out of the arsenals of the United States, and be transported by the Secretary of War, by water, to such ports within the said States as may be most convenient, and addressed to the executives of the same.

That ten pieces of light field artillery, with their necessary apparatus, and a suitable quantity of ammunition be also transported by the Secretary of War to Savannah in Georgia, for the purposes of the said expedition, addressed to the major general who may be appointed for the expedition.

That the expenses of every species, which would be incurred for the various objects of the said army, for nine months, may be estimated at four hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

All which is humbly submitted to Congress.

H. KNOX.

IN CONGRESS, October 26th, 1787.

Instructions to the Commissioners for negotiating a treaty with the tribes of Indians in the Southern Department, for the purpose of establishing peace between the United States and the said tribes.

GENTLEMEN:

Several circumstances rendering it probable that hostilities may have commenced, or are on the eve of commencing, between the State of North Carolina and the Cherokee nation of Indians, and between the State of Georgia and the Creek nation of Indians, you are to use every endeavor to restore peace and harmony between the said States and the said nations, on terms of justice and humanity.

The great source of contention between the said States and the Indian tribes, being boundaries, you will carefully inquire into, and ascertain, the boundaries claimed by the respective States; and although Congress are of opinion that they might constitutionally fix the bounds between any State and an independent tribe of Indians, yet, unwilling to have a difference subsist between the General Government and that of the individual States, they wish you so to conduct the matter that the States may not conceive their legislative rights in any manner infringed, taking care, at the same time, that whatever bounds are agreed upon they may be described in such terms as shall not be liable to misconstruction and misrepresentation, but may be made clear to the conceptions of the Indians, as well as whites.

The present treaty having for its principal object the restoration of peace, no cession of land is to be demanded of the Indian tribes.

You will use the utmost care to ascertain who are the leading men among the several tribes—the real head-men and warriors; these you will spare no pains to attach to the interest of the United States, by removing, as far as may be, all causes of future contention or quarrels; by kind treatment, and assurances of protection; by presents of a permanent nature; and by using every endeavor to conciliate the affections of the white people inhabiting the frontiers towards them.

You will encourage the Indians to give notice to the superintendent of Indian affairs of any designs that may be formed by any neighboring Indian tribe, or by any person whatever against the peace of the United States.

You will insist that all prisoners, of whatever age, sex, or complexion, be delivered up, and that all fugitive slaves belonging to citizens of the United States be restored.

F. No. 1.

WINNSBOROUGH, 25th June, 1788.

SIR:

I beg leave to lay before you the steps taken by the commissioners to bring about a treaty with the Creek Indians, agreeably to the resolves of Congress.

A talk was sent to that nation the 29th of March last, addressed to Mr. McGillivray, and the head men and warriors, urging the necessity there was to treat, and in the most pointed terms insisting, as a first principle, that every hostile procedure should instantly cease. A Mr. Whitfield was the bearer; he is a respectable character, and has formerly traded with them; he writes us that the Indians are highly pleased with what Congress has done, and willing to treat on the principles of justice and equity; on that ground they will meet the superintendent and commissioners; in the interim, all hostilities to cease. This, I have the pleasure to inform you, is the case at present, and the sooner it can be effected the better, as it is the wish of the Indians that the treaty be held as speedily as possible.

The above accounts I laid before the Executive of the State of Georgia, who agreed with me in opinion, that the 15th September next is as early as this matter can be begun on. The reason is obvious; the State of North Carolina not complying with the resolves of Congress, in forwarding the needful, nor is it to be expected that they intend it, (see a copy of the Governor's letter enclosed) and even supposing they had, upon a general calculation the sum allowed by Congress would have been too small to carry into effect a treaty with the Creeks alone, considering the greatness of their nation; presents, I make no doubt, are expected by them. The goods on hand from the last treaty amount to not more than £400, and many of them consist of perishable articles, which of course have suffered.

The two commissioners, Generals Pickens and Matthews, with myself, made an estimate a few days ago at Augusta, a copy of which you have herewith. As these gentlemen, as well as myself, calculated on the lowest scale, I make no doubt you will think with me, that a further supply is necessary; there is every reason to believe there will be present from one thousand to fifteen hundred Indians, and each Indian, General Pickens (who has been on similar occasions of this kind before) assures me, at such a time, which cannot well be denied them, expects double rations. Upon the whole, I trust, on a matter of such consequence to the States, Georgia in particular, that Congress will give it a reconsideration, and make such provision as they conceive best on this business. The treaty, as I before mentioned, will take place on the 15th September next, therefore no time ought to be lost.

I beg leave further to observe, that my commission as superintendent expires the 29th of August; it will be necessary to prolong the time, if it is the wish of Congress to continue to be represented in the southern department. I shall conclude, with assuring you, that the States of South Carolina and Georgia will contribute every thing in their power towards facilitating the treaty under the auspices of Congress; before whom I beg you will lay the purport of this without delay. They may depend on my utmost exertions in forwarding a plan so highly necessary.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

RICHARD WINN.

EDENTON, 19th March, 1788.

SIR:

The resolution of Congress of 26th October, to which you refer in the letter you did me the honor of addressing to me on the 18th day of February last, did not come to me till after the adjournment of the Assembly; and as I considered that the settling the boundary between this State and the Indians a subject of too much importance for me to act in, without the direction of the Legislature, I laid aside the consideration of it till since I had the honor of receiving your Excellency's letter.

I yesterday laid all the papers relating to this business before the Council of State, for their consideration, who concurred with me in opinion that the powers of the Executive department of this State did not extend so far as to comprehend all the objects contained in the instructions sent forward by Congress, for the government of the commissioner to be appointed by this State, and though the resolution of Congress, passed as early as the 26th of October, no hostilities have hitherto been committed on the inhabitants of this State by the Cherokees, nor have we any intimation from the inhabitants of the frontier that any such hostilities are at present apprehended. I have not, therefore, appointed a commissioner to treat with the Cherokees. Should the States of South Carolina and Georgia be of opinion that the co-operation of this State can, in any manner, facilitate the negotiation with the Creeks, we will be ready to adopt any measure that may have a tendency to promote the peace and security of the State of Georgia, at any time when they may think proper to favor us with an intimation in what manner we can be useful to them.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration and respect, sir, &c.

WINNSBOROUGH, August 5, 1788.

SIR:

By talks received from the head men and warriors of the Cherokee nation, dated the 30th June last, I am given to understand, that a party from North Carolina (called Franklin State) with Servier at their head, came over and destroyed several of their towns, killed near thirty of the Indians, made one prisoner, and obliged the remainder to fly with their families to some of the Lower towns for protection. Notwithstanding these outrages, there are, at this present time, near thirty of their towns in friendship with the white people, whose wish is to remain so, as their talks run continually, for a lasting peace to be established between them and the whites. The Overhills, the other part of the nation, where the above affair happened, seem determined for war, of which I shall make the Governor of North Carolina acquainted. The daily encroachments made on the territories of this set of people, is such as to induce them, through me, to lay their distressed situation before Congress, which this opportunity gives me the honor of now doing, presuming they will see with me, the real necessity there is for an accommodation taking place with this nation, and order the necessary supplies accordingly, for carrying the treaty into effect. I must beg leave to add, that, could I have been supplied with the needful, I should have called this nation to a permanent treaty long ere this.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

RICHARD WINN.

SIR: This moment General Pickens' letter came to hand, which I have taken the liberty to enclose to you.

WINNSBOROUGH, August 8, 1788.

SIR:

The gentleman who was sent to the Creek nations, with talks from the commissioners, has returned with answers which appear to be friendly. The Indians are willing to come to a treaty next month, therefore, the 15th day is set for that purpose; the meeting will be held on the Tugelo river, at the house of a Mr. Lachland Cleaveland, on the Georgia side, in consequence of which, hostilities have ceased on both sides.

I make no doubt the wish of Congress will be fully answered, provided the Assembly of Georgia repeal a law, which, in some measure, militates against the resolves of Congress, in carrying into effect the treaty with that nation. The Assembly are now sitting on the business, which, I hope, will have the desired effect.

I have the honor to be, sir, your humble servant,

WINNSBOROUGH, October 14, 1788.

SIR:

I have had the honor of receiving your several letters, with the duplicates of each, enclosing the different resolves of Congress, of July 15th, August 4th, and 14th, respecting Indian affairs, and shall at all times be happy, through you, to lay before that honorable body such information as offers in that department.

From several conferences with the commissioners, relative to the Creek Indians, and opening a correspondence with McGillivray, who is their head man, we were led to believe, that our negotiations would terminate in a peace between that nation and the State of Georgia; and agreeably to what I before informed you, had actually appointed the time and place for holding a treaty, not doubting, when we met, to get over every obstacle in bringing it to an issue. However, not having the supplies necessary in time, and receiving a letter (see No. 1, enclosed) from the Governor of Georgia, we wrote to McGillivray, and the head men and warriors, to postpone the treaty until the spring of next year; to this we have had no answer as yet, but have received a letter from him (see No. 2, enclosed) wherein he insists, as a leading principle, upon having the boundaries the same as they were when the State of Georgia was a British province; these terms of treaty he mentions in his first letter to the commissioners, but neither they nor myself imagined this would operate in his breast, or with the Indians, as a barrier to the treaty, when we produced the different articles of peace entered into since, with the bounds prescribed, and mutually agreed to by both parties. (See a copy of our letter, to which No. 2 is an answer.) It evidently appears by his last, if we are to expect peace with these Indians, it must be on his own terms. From these considerations, we may think it our duty to reply in a different manner to what we have; as soon as we have an answer to our last, respecting the postponing the treaty, I shall do myself the honor of transmitting you a copy of it.

Before I quit the subject of the Creek Indians, it will be necessary to inform you (in order to make the Governor of Georgia's meaning appear more clear) that the Georgians have, at this time, a law existing, wherein they have given as bounty land to their soldiers, a large tract of country which belongs to the Indians.

This I remonstrated to the Executive of that State; and this was another motive for the treaty's being postponed, as such a law should be repealed before an accommodation could take place.

With due respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

RICHARD WINN.

The Honorable General KNOX, Secretary of War.

F. No 8.

AUGUSTA, (GEORGIA) August 14, 1788.

GENTLEMEN:

The disagreeable and unhappy situation of our State affairs is such, that I am sorry, on this occasion, to be under the necessity to declaim against their inability of carrying into effect the business fully, of the proposed treaty with the Creek nation of Indians.

In order to obviate the many difficulties and insufficiency that appeared in the operation of the said treaty, I did, with the advice of the Executive, call the Legislature to convene in Augusta, the 22d ultimo, but without effect; and the Executive have it not in their power to make any appropriations. I have, and will continue to exert myself, in endeavoring to obtain a credit from the mercantile line, either on public or private faith, and, if successful, will give you early notice thereof. But in this I doubt.

I would, therefore, (if Congress does not appropriate a further sum for carrying on the said treaty, as the superintendent, I presume, represented the whole to that honorable body) most seriously recommend, that you endeavor all in your power to have the said treaty postponed if possible. I promise you the sight of the business shall not be put off, but every preparation in our power shall be exerted. You have to urge, on your parts, the reason for postponing the treaty to be, that of the change of Government, and of other matters; that I dare say would be sufficient, particularly to Mr. McGillivray, who is a sensible, intelligent man. If possible that the same could be postponed until the spring of the next year, it would be well; but at any rate, for two or three months. This matter would be best managed by the person you appoint to go to the nation, who ought to be a sensible man. I shall engage that peace be observed by the citizens of this State, against the Creek nation, as far as is in my power to enforce; you will please, also, to urge the observance of the same on their parts, against the citizens of this State.

I flatter myself, gentlemen, taking a review of our situation, that you will do all in your power to obtain peace with the Indians within your district, and the citizens of the United States.

I have the honor to be, with every sentiment of respect, your most obedient humble servant,
GEO. HANDLEY.

Hon. RICHARD WINN, Esq. Superintendent, and
The Hon. GEO. MATHEWS and ANDREW PICKENS, Esqrs.
Commissioners of Indian Affairs.

F. No. 9.

FORT CHARLOTTE, July 16, 1788.

To Alexander McGillivray, Esquire, and others, the Chief Men and Warriors of the Creek nation.

This day your letter was opened, which you were pleased to address to us, as also the talks of the Hallowing King, of the Lower, and Mad Dog, of the Upper Creeks, in answer to the one sent you by Mr. Whitfield.

We are happy to find that you are willing to meet us in treaty, so as to convince the world that your conduct, and the leading men of the Indians, is such as to dispose you to do that which is right and just. On such grounds, we are equally willing to meet.

You mention you expect a requisition will be made by us to the people of Georgia, to retire from the Oconee river, within the bounds claimed under the British Government. This we are not authorized to do, but will write to the Governor of Georgia, requesting him to issue his proclamation that no further trespasses be committed, and that all hostilities do cease. We make no doubt you will lose sight of all matter of little weight, and bring fully into view the grand object of the treaty, agreeably to the resolves of Congress, so as to restore peace and harmony once more between the citizens of Georgia and the Creek Indians, on the principles of justice and humanity; as we do firmly assure you 'tis what we ardently wish.

As to the time and place for holding the treaty, this power was fully vested in the superintendent and the Executive of Georgia, and they had, previous to any advice received from Mr. Whitfield, (except his letter of May 15th) appointed the 15th September next, the day on which the treaty is to begin, on the river Tugulo, the dividing line between South Carolina and Georgia, at the house of Lachland Cleaveland, on the Georgia side, at which time and place we hope to meet you and the Creek chiefs as brothers. We wish to see every thing conducted in the greatest friendship.

We conclude, thanking you for your polite attention to Mr. Whitfield, and shall be disposed to make you a like return in future.

We have the honor to be, your obedient servants,

ANDREW PICKENS, Commissioner for South Carolina.
GEORGE MATHEWS, Commissioner for Georgia.

F. No. 10.

GENTLEMEN:

I have received your letter of the 16th July, this day. It is with equal surprise and concern, that I learn from you that the honorable the Congress has not authorized you, its commissioners, to give us a full redress of our complaints, and to give us full satisfaction in what concerns our territory, which the Georgians are attempting to wrest from us forcibly; all which we were taught to expect from the justice and humanity of that honorable body, from the measure adopted by them in sending Doctor White among us, to be fully and truly informed of the cause of the war between us and Georgia. We had great expectations that we should soon experience the good effects of it, in having the causes of our discontents removed; and more particularly, on Mr. Whitfield's coming here, we did so firmly believe that we were on the point of obtaining a satisfactory peace, that we were eager to meet you and conclude one; but your letter discovers to me that nothing has been done, and all is yet to do.

It was expected that the requisition which I made to you for removing the Georgians from the disputed lands, was to be considered by you as it was meant by us, as an indispensable preliminary to form the basis on which the treaty of peace was to be concluded.

I feel much pleasure in your approving of the leading sentiments as expressed in my letter by Mr. Whitfield, and it is with regret that I remark, that our enemy does not manifest an equal disposition with us, to terminate the war, by agreeing to equitable terms of peace; and, as we ask no concession from them as the price of peace, so they ought not to demand any on our side.

When I next meet the chiefs, which will be early in September, I will explain to them the contents of your letter.

Meantime I answer you, as well knowing that they will not consent to treat, unless they see their requisition enforced.

I have the honor to be, with most respectful consideration, your most obedient servant,

ALEX'R MCGILLIVRAY.

To the Hon. Generals RICHARD WINN, ANDREW PICKENS, and GEORGE MATHEWS, Commissioners appointed by the honorable the Congress, to treat with the Southern Nations of Indians.

F. No. 11.

WINNSBOROUGH, 8th December, 1788.

SIR:

I do myself the honor to enclose you a copy of McGillivray's last letter to the commissioners and myself, together with our answer, by which you will discover, if the Indians evade coming to a treaty, they mean war, and will, in my opinion, come down in great force against the State of Georgia.

On the receipt of his letter, which never came to hand till the 13th of last month, though dated so early as the 15th of September, I immediately directed a meeting of the commissioners at Hopewell, when it was agreed on, that the treaty could not take place sooner than next May, or June, as it was thought necessary the Indians should have time to consult, and finally determine on the last talk sent them, which is the answer alluded to, wherein we expressly request their reply to be pointed and decisive, and that it be despatched to us as soon as possible. Should they do this, it will give Congress and the Georgians timely notice to prepare for the worst, or otherwise, as it may happen.

Not long since, a fort, between French Broad and Holston rivers, was taken by the Cherokees and Creeks. Ten persons were killed, and about thirty were made prisoners. The war is still carried on between North Carolina and the Cherokees. By a talk I lately held with one of the chiefs of that nation, he says, "notwithstanding what has happened between them, their principal men wish for peace; that they are now holding a great talk among their head men and warriors, the result of which was not determined, but he thinks they would gladly bury the hatchet."

I have every reason to believe that McGillivray is trying to unite the two nations, the Creeks and Cherokees. The South Carolina and Georgia commissioners think, with me, that, if the State of North Carolina would send forward their commissioner with the supplies, a treaty might be effected with the Cherokees, before a junction with the Creeks could take place.

Sir, with regard, I have the honor to be, your most obedient servant,

RICHARD WINN.

The Honorable Major General KNOX, Secretary of War.

F. No. 12.

LITTLE TALLASSEE, 15th September, 1788.

GENTLEMEN:

I have received your letter of 28th of August, wherein you desire that the proposed treaty between us may be deferred until the spring of the next year; the reasons you give us for that measure are good, and to which we do agree, hoping that a new Congress, acting on the principles of the new constitution of America, will set every thing to rights between us on the most equitable footing, so that we may become real friends to each other, settling on the same land, and having but one interest.

We expected that, upon Mr. Whitfield's return, a truce of arms would have been directly proclaimed in Georgia, and can't account for the delay of that measure; and in fact, there has been no observance of it on their part, from June till now. They have been driving and plundering our hunting camps of horses and skins, &c. and it is only lately, that a Coweta Indian brought me a paper, which he found fastened to a tree near to Flint river, which, upon a close examination, I find to be a threatening letter directed to me. It is wrote on the back of an advertisement, with gunpowder; a part of it rubbed out as it dried, and with the carriage. The writing says something of the war, and your savage subjects, and an establishment of peace you must "not expect, until all our damages are made good at the treaty, and satisfaction we will have for our grievances," from all which, I foresee great difficulty in the attempt to preserve strict suspension of hostility. I can only assure you, that we shall regulate ourselves by the conduct of the Georgians, and act according to circumstances. The writing I mention, is signed Jan. Alexander, 5th August, 1788. The Cherokees are daily coming in to me, complaining of acts of hostility committed in the most barbarous manner by the Americans, and numbers are taking refuge within our territory, who are permitted to settle and build villages under our protection. Such acts of violence, committed at the time that the Congress, through you, is holding out to the whole nations and tribes, professions of the most friendly nature, makes it appear to all, that such professions are only deceitful snares to lull them into a security, whereby the Americans may the more easily destroy them.

Be not offended, gentlemen, at the remark; 'tis true that it is universal through the Indians.

I am, with great respect, gentlemen, your humble servant,

ALEX. M'GILLIVRAY.

The Honorable Generals RICHARD WINN, ANDREW PICKENS, and GEORGE MATHEWS, Commissioners for treating with the Southern Nations of Indians.

F. No. 13.

HOPEWELL ON KEOWEE, Nov. 28th, 1788.

SIR:

Your letter of the 12th August and 15th September are now before us. With regard to the former, wherein you mention nothing has been done, and all is yet to do, give us leave to tell you, that every thing in our power has been done, in order to bring forward a treaty, and, under the authority of Congress, to give you full and ample redress in what concerns your territory. At the same time we must observe, that that honorable body will not lose sight of doing equal justice to the State of Georgia, whose claim to what you call the disputed lands, is confirmed by three different treaties, signed by your head-men and warriors. Therefore, we earnestly recommend you and the chiefs seriously to consider, under these circumstances, how impossible it is for us to comply with your requisition, relative to removing the people from the Oconee lands; this can only be the business of the treaty, after a full investigation of the right of claim.

In answer to your last, where you so pointedly attack that body under whom we have the honor to act, we cannot be silent, least it should be tortured into a conviction of guilt. Narrow and illiberal indeed must be that mind, that could for a moment suppose, that Congress, after withstanding one of the greatest Powers of Europe, with her allies, together with almost the whole of the Indian tribes combined, should at this day have recourse to base artifice, in order to accomplish the ruin of a few Indian tribes, while she is enjoying the blessings of peace at home, and an honorable name among the nations of the world.

We have already enclosed you the Governor of Georgia's proclamation, dated July the 31st, last, for a truce of arms, which has been as strictly adhered to as possible; and any thing that has happened in violation of it, had you been more explicit, and mentioned the time and place where the Indians' horses and skins were plundered, strict inquiry might have been made, and the offenders punished.

If we take a view of the conduct of the Indians on your part, we have more right to complain: we daily hear of the most cruel depredations, committed by the Creeks on the Georgians; the man you allude to, (Alexander) we are credibly informed, was in pursuit of a party of Creeks that had stole twelve horses from Green county, and notwithstanding we have had every assurance given us, that hostilities should cease. The Governor of Georgia has lately handed us a list of the different counties that have recently suffered, to wit:

Liberty County, between 25 and 30 negroes, and several large stocks of cattle.

Effingham, one man killed.

Wilkes, from 6 to 10 horses plundered.

Greene, from 21 to 27 horses do.

Washington, 6 horses do.

Franklin, from 16 to 20 horses do. One man wounded.

We must add to the above list, a pair of fine dun geldings, taken from General Martin, about a mile from his plantation, by some of the Coweta Indians, while he was acting under Congress as agent for the Cherokees and Chickasaws.

The Seminolean Indians are likewise doing a deal of mischief; we know not whether they belong to any part of the Creeks, but wish to be informed. From these violations committed, what can the Union expect, unless a stricter compliance on your part is observed in putting a stop to hostilities? We are well assured, Congress will not look on in silence, and see any part of the Union robbed of its citizens. Enclosed you will find a late resolve of Congress, and a proclamation relative to the Cherokees.

It is our sincere wish that you will meet us the eighth day of June next, at the place appointed before; but should this appear to you at too distant a period, a month sooner will be no object with us in holding a treaty. In the interim, we fully assure you nothing shall be wanting on our parts, in the observance of a strict suspension of arms, on a presumption that you will act in like manner. We request that you will consult the head men and warriors, on this occasion, and send us a pointed and decisive answer, signed jointly, as soon as possible.

We are, sir, with due respect, your obedient servants,

RICHARD WINN,
ANDREW PICKENS,
GEORGE MATHEWS.

WINNSBOROUGH, Dec. 19th, 1788.

SIR:

Since I had the honor of writing you last, I have received by express, from the Governor of North Carolina, that the Legislature of that State has appointed a John Steele, Esq. commissioner on Indian Affairs, and voted their quota, agreeably to the resolves of Congress. They have also requested the Governor to issue his proclamation, that hostilities do cease against the Cherokees, and to send a talk to Mr. McGillivray, that it is their wish to be at peace with the Creeks. These steps being taken on the part of North Carolina, there is not the least doubt of a friendly treaty taking place with the Cherokees, which persuades me will lead to one with the Creeks. The Executive of that State think the last of May the best time for holding a treaty.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

RICHARD WINN.

Hon. Maj. Gen. KNOX.

WINNSBOROUGH, March 1, 1789.

SIR:

I think it necessary to inform you, that a treaty will take place with the Cherokee Indians, the third Monday in May next, at the upper war-ford on French broad river, in the neighborhood of Swananno, State of North Carolina.

The Creek Indians, 'tis supposed, will also treat; they are now holding a great talk in their nation, the result of which is not yet come to hand.

I have the honor to subscribe myself, your most obedient servant,

RICHARD WINN.

The Honorable Major General KNOX.

A talk, lately sent by the Commissioners of Indian affairs in the Southern Department, to the Creeks' correspondent.

TO THE HEAD-MEN, CHIEFS, AND WARRIORS, OF THE CREEK NATION.

We last year appointed a time and place for holding a treaty with you, to establish a lasting peace between you and us, that we might again become as one people; you all know the reasons why it was not held at that time.

We now send you a talk, inviting you to a treaty on your bank of the Oconee river, at the rock landing. We wished to meet you at that place on the 8th of June, but, as that day is so near at hand, you might not all get notice. We therefore shall expect to meet you on the 20th of June.

We have changed the place of meeting from that of the last year; so that none of you should have reason to complain; it is your own ground, and on that land we wish to renew our former trade and friendships, and to remove every thing that has blinded the path between you and us.

We are now governed by a President, who is like the old King over the great water; he commands all the warriors of the thirteen great Fires. He will have regard to the welfare of all the Indians; and, when peace shall be established, he will be your father and you will be his children, so that none shall dare to do you harm.

We know that lands have been the cause of dispute between you and the white people; but we now tell you that we want no new grants; our object is to make a peace, and to unite us all under our great chief warrior and President, who is the father and protector of all the white people. Attend to what we say: Our traders are very rich, and have houses full of such goods as you used to get in former days; it is our wish that you should trade with them, and they with you, in strict friendship.

Our brother, George Galphin, will carry you this talk; listen to him; he will tell you nothing but truth from us. Send us your answer by him.

ANDREW PICKENS,
H. OSBORNE,

AUGUSTA, August 9, 1787.

GENTLEMEN:

From a wish that you may be informed, and through you the honorable the Congress of the United States, of the situation of this State with the Creek Indians, I do myself the pleasure to enclose you two talks I have received from that nation, with my answers thereto, from which it appears there is reason to expect this State will be compelled to engage in a war with them. It would ill become a free people, and more particularly those of Georgia, to give satisfaction for the warriors that have been killed for murders committed on our peaceable inhabitants, in violation of the most solemn treaties entered into with us, as this State had experienced many and repeated injuries from that nation, during the late war with Great Britain, such as killing our inhabitants and plundering us of our property, all of which we were willing to sacrifice rather than continue the war a day longer than the United States wished to crown the Union with peace.

That you may be as well informed as the nature and situation of matters will admit, it is needful that I should inform you, that, from letters I received from James White, Esq. agent for Indian affairs for the southern department, dated last March and April, there was some reason to think the Indians were not perfectly for peace; and, on his return to the State, he informed me that they had assured him that no hostilities should be committed or injury done to this State before August, or until they received an answer from Congress or him; but, in direct violation of this promise, they did, on the 29th day of May, in the county of Greene, kill and scalp two of our men, and carried off a negro and fourteen horses. A party of militia crossed the Oconee river in pursuit of the murderers fell in with some Indians of that nation, and killed twelve, which, from the first talk I received, appear to be of the Lower towns, and the murderers from the Upper Towns, which is the distinction they make. From their talk I thought we were to have peace; as they remark, it was impossible for us to tell whether it was the Upper or Lower Creeks that had done the murder, or been killed by our men. Their talk of the 27th of July insolently demands the officer that commanded the party, and as many of his men to be delivered to them as will make satisfaction for the twelve warriors they have lost. Candor compels me to say, when I think of this insolent demand, the repeated alarms they have given our frontiers, and the injury the State sustains from them, that I feel my blood run warm in my veins, and a just impulse to chastise them for their insolence and perfidy, and think it my indispensable duty, if they commit hostilities on this State, to take the most effectual means in my power for the defence of the same, by carrying the war into their country, or such other measures as may be most for the safety and happiness of the inhabitants of this country.

I have the honor to be, with much respect and real esteem, gentlemen, your most obd't serv't,

GEO. MATHEWS.

CUSSETAHS, June 14, 1787.

The beloved man from Congress was here, and we had talk with him; what was agreed upon there, did not answer; then Mr. McGillivray came over here, and matters were settled. Mr. White and Mr. McGillivray came upon terms, and it was told to them, and they agreed to it, till such time as Col. White sent an answer back. We then thought that matters were settled, and we did nothing but mind our business. Mr. McGillivray promised to acquaint the Upper Towns of this, and for them to lie still. We then expected that Mr. White would inform the State of Georgia of this, and tell them that we were their friends. We minded nothing but our hunting; we always talk together, and always agreed, and promised that if any thing happened we would not go on rashly, but let one another know our grievances. You always promised that the innocent should not suffer for the guilty. You certainly knew us; we were always among the houses; we did not know of the Upper Towns doing any mischief, nor did we think that our friends would kill us for what other bad people did. You could not think that it was any of the Lower Towns did you any mischief, when we were at your houses and living with you in a manner that you might be sure it was not us. We knew nothing of these bad people going out to do any mischief, or we would have sent you word; and we don't think but you must have known that we were your friends, or we should not have been among you a hunting; and hope you will send us an answer, and tell us the reason that you have killed your friends for what other people did. It is not the rule of the Indians to acquaint you of this, but to take satisfaction; but we were always your friends, and we will not take rash steps, unless you will throw us away and not have us for friends. We always were your friends, and will be, let what will happen, is the reason we lie still, although we have lost nine of our people innocently; but still we wont take rash steps. We must have an answer immediately, that we may know what to do. Hope you will consider us, the Lower Towns, to be your friends. We look upon all white people as one, and suppose you look upon all Indians as one, is the reason you have killed your friends, who were your friends in the time of war, and are yet. We have had a meeting lately with the Northward Indians. We told them, and so did Mr. McGillivray, that we had settled matters with the Virginians, and could not go to war. The Oakgees went, unknown to any of the rest of the towns, and killed some of your people: not as many as you killed of your friends; but we wont take rash steps, as we are your friends; and we would be glad of an answer, to know what to do. We have told you the number killed; we have a number of people out a hunting; we don't know but there is more killed innocently; but we will lie still, and hope you will send us an answer: it shall be received as friends to us still, as we look upon you as friends still. We are sure that you must have been sensible that it was not the people that was among you did the murder. It was your rule that the innocent should not suffer for the guilty. Hope you will send an answer, that we may know what to do. We speak the voice of the whole Lower Towns, and hope you will consider us as friends. We hope you will send us an answer, and a white flag with it, that we may still be friends; and we will have all the towns together, and hear your answer; and then we will be friends again. No person need be afraid to come up, as the whole nation will be acquainted with this. Who brings an answer will bring a white flag, upon a pole, in his hand. We shall wait for an answer, and nothing shall be done to you, no hurt whatever. The talk you sent to Mr. Barnard, by John Galphin, he delivered to Mr. Barnard a good while ago, two days after he arrived, which we have not yet heard, nor seen Mr. Barnard, as he has not come to town yet to tell us the talk. We hope you will consider us as friends, as you are sensible we are your friends: for, when the English offered us great presents to go and kill you, we told them we would not; that you were our friends and brothers; we were born in one land, and we were your friends and brothers, and will be to the last day, though you have not treated us as friends; but it might be a mistake; and hope, my friends, that you will not delay an answer, but let it come up with speed. There is a fellow down there belonging to our town, the Cussetahs, we hope he wont be hurt, but let him and John Galphin's negro, that he went down with, if you are afraid to send up, if you will send up the talk by John Galphin's negro and the Indian that is there, if you will be so good as to send them safe over the Oconee, then we shall be good friends, and try to keep the path white between us. You will likewise appoint somebody to give out the talks up here, and let a man be here constantly, that when there are any bad people who wants to do mischief, that they can send word down to alarm the settlements, so that we may then live like brothers; and let us try to keep peace, for peace is better than war. We can't blame you for taking satisfaction, if you had not taken satisfaction from those people who were at the houses with you every day; and if it is done in a mistake, we must try and take satisfaction from those bad people that went down and did the first mischief. However, I hope you will send us a good talk as soon as possible; the sooner it comes the better for both parties, that we may take one another by the hand again, and see one another once more in friendship, as we always will.

By the request of the Lower Creeks, the two chiefs, the Hallowing King of the Cowetas, and the Fat King of the Cussetahs.

JOHN GALPHIN.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

Your friendly talk we have just received by our commissary, Mr. Barnard, and are very sorry to be informed that some of your people, our friends, should have been killed through mistake by our warriors, to revenge the murders of some of our peaceable inhabitants. Yourselves must be fully convinced that our people have not been the aggressors in this instance. As soon as the murders were committed by the Indians, our warriors crossed the river, and unfortunately fell in with your people. It was impossible then to distinguish whether you were our friends or enemies. We never knew, until we received your talk, by whom our people were murdered, whether by Upper, or whether by Lower Creeks. We have repeatedly assured you it was our desire to be at peace with the whole of your nation. We still have the same wish, notwithstanding what has passed.

BROTHERS: Remember the caution we now give you: should any acts of hostilities be in future committed against our people, or should any property be taken from them, be assured it will be impossible to prevent our warriors from doing themselves justice. Our great council are to meet in a day or two, previous to which, had we not received your talk, a large army would have been sent into your nation. What consequences would have attended this, you are capable of judging. We have sent orders to our warriors not on any pretence to cross the Oconee river. We wish you to give your people the same instructions. This will be the means of preventing any disputes in future.

BROTHERS: Should the conduct of the Upper Creeks render it necessary to march an army into the nation, be assured we will consider your towns as friends and brothers, and treat you as such.

BROTHERS: If you have the friendship for us you express, it is your duty to keep a watchful eye on the conduct of those who you may suppose have a wish or desire to disturb our friendship. Mr. Barnard or Mr. Galphin are always among you. If you hear of any mischief intended against our settlements, it is your duty to inform one or both of them of it immediately. This you are particularly bound to observe by an article of the last treaty, entered into with our commissioners at Shoulderbone.

You acknowledged that the beloved man of the Upper creeks, Mr. McGillivray, made a promise to our beloved man who was sent from the White town, that no mischief whatever should be done. After having this assurance, our people considered themselves safe, and looked upon all the Indians of your nation as friends and brothers. Have you not often entered into the most solemn engagements with us? And have not you as often violated them? What had our people to expect, when they saw their peaceable countrymen murdered? They determined to take satisfaction for the repeated injuries they had received, and it was with great difficulty that we, the grand council, could prevent our young warriors from marching in a body into the heart of your nation. From your late conduct, and the assurance you have given us in your talk, rest satisfied that we consider you, the Lower towns, as our best friends and brothers; and if you do not long continue to hold fast the chain of our friendship, it will not be the faults of the white people.

You express a wish in your talk to have one of your people, who has been some time at Mr. Galphin's, sent to you. We have inquired for him, and find he has been gone several days, and hope he is now safe among you. Mr. Barnard, who is always with you, will carefully attend to all talks that we may send, and deliver them out to you as soon as they arrive among you.

BROTHERS: We really regret the loss of your innocent people who have lately been killed. It is your duty as men and warriors to do yourselves justice, by taking satisfaction of the persons who were the cause of it. In doing this, we shall be fully convinced of your brotherly love and friendship towards us.

BROTHERS: It is our wish to see you and the Upper Creeks one people; but should they continue to create differences between you and us, and you should think yourselves unable to take satisfaction, we will, as all friends and brothers ought to do, be ever ready to give any assistance you may require.

In a meeting of the Lower Creeks in the Cussetahs, 27th July, 1787.—Talk of the Fat King to his honor Governor Matthews and the Council.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

The talk you sent us in answer to ours, by your commissary, Mr. Barnard, we have seen this day; and, as that talk is not satisfactory to our people, we have agreed upon to send you this one more.

FRIENDS: 'Tis not we that have forgot the talks at Shoulderbone, but you. Among other things, it was proposed by you, and agreed to by us, that no hasty revenges should be taken in future by either side; and in the late affairs 'tis you that have been rash: for when the injury was done to you, you did not wait but for a little while and look around you to find out from whence the blow came, but fell directly upon our people, your real friends, who were daily among your houses, and whose persons you well knew, and some that were taken, declared themselves and towns to you, which you disregarded; it might have been from people of another nation for what you knew at that time.

FRIENDS: You ought not to think of making us accountable for any measures of the Upper towns, our brothers. They had two men killed last summer, and they can answer for themselves. They went against you unknown to Mr. G. or us, and he did not mean to break the promise he made to Mr. White, as he had declared to the whole nation, and a talk from him is still expected by us.

FRIENDS: You must give us immediate satisfaction, life for life, an equal number for twelve of our people destroyed by you. The leader of these mad people that did the mischief, and so many of his people, should fall for satisfaction; ('tis our custom to give it) then the tears of the relations of the dead will be dried up, and our hearts not continue hot against you: for it is in vain that you call us friends and brothers, and don't consider and treat us as such; and as you wish the chain of friendship to be kept bright between us, we expect you will not fail to give us the desired satisfaction, as we should have given you had we been in fault.

When you do this, you will then send a gentleman into our land to renew friendship, as we have often gone into yours for such purposes.

A. MCGILLIVRAY.

In twenty days from the date that Mr. Galphin sets out, we shall expect the return of Mr. Galphin.

To the Fat King and other head-men of the Lower Creeks.—7th August, 1787.

When we received your talk by Mr. Barnard, our commissary, we considered you as friends and brothers. In the one you now send us, there appears to be much reason to suspect you of deceit, and that you were then, as well as now, secretly our enemies. Whether this sudden change has been owing to the duplicity of your beloved man Mr. Gillivray, or whether you assume this conduct, it matters not. On what principle can you demand satisfaction? Your warriors were killed for the murder of our innocent inhabitants, committed by your nation, in direct violation of the most solemn treaties entered into with us. We wished, and still do wish, we could forget the many and repeated injuries you have done us during and since the late war with Great Britain. It is in vain to talk of satisfaction. Did you not, last summer, kill six of our peaceable frontier inhabitants? and did you not, at Shoulderbone, engage to have an equal number of your men put to death for them? Have you done this? No! Did you not, just before we received your last talk, murder two of our people on the Oconee? And did you not, also, at the very time Mr. Barnard was down from you, kill two white men? Have you complied with a single article of the treaties of Augusta, Galphinton, and Shoulderbone? No! Instead of complying with your several engagements, you have repeatedly murdered our innocent people, burned their houses, and carried off their property. All these outrages we have submitted to, rather than enter into a war with you. Your conduct towards us long since has authorized our putting flames to your towns, and indiscriminately killing your people; but a wish to be at peace with you, and to spare the effusion of human blood, has prevented this. Now open your ears wide, and hear what we tell you: Should any act of hostility, or depredations, be committed on our people by your nation, be perfectly assured we will not hesitate to do ourselves ample justice, by carrying war into your country, burning your towns, and staining your land with blood. You will then be compelled to fly for refuge to some other country.

It now rests with you, whether we engage in war or not; if we do, remember yourselves are answerable for the consequences. The hatchet once lifted is not easily buried.

WAR OFFICE, July 28th, 1789.

SIR:

Having examined the report of the commissioners for treating with the Southern Indians, dated the 30th of June last, and the papers accompanying the same, I have the honor to observe:

That it is the opinion of the said commissioners, that the Creek nation of Indians are, generally, disposed to enter into a treaty with the United States, for the purpose of establishing a permanent peace.

That it is of great importance that the favorable dispositions of the said Creek nation should be embraced immediately, in order to terminate, by an equitable peace, the disturbances and hostilities which have for some years past existed on the Southern frontiers.

That the said commissioners having been appointed by the States of South Carolina and Georgia, in consequence of the resolves of the late Congress, of the 26th of October, 1787, it may be considered that their powers expired with the late confederation.

That, therefore, it may be proper to institute a commission, to consist of three persons, to be appointed conformably to the constitution, who should be invested with full powers to inquire into, and decide on, all causes of complaint between the citizens of the United States and the Southern nations and tribes of Indians, and to negotiate and conclude with them, firm treaties of peace, on principles consistent with the national justice and dignity of the United States.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

H. KNOX.

The President of the United States.

GEORGIA, ROCK LANDING, ON THE OCONEE RIVER, June 30th, 1789.

SIR:

Agreeably to the appointment of the Executive of North Carolina, under the act of Congress of the 27th of October, 1787, we attended at the Upper War-ford, on French Broad river, from the 25th of last month, to the 7th instant, in order to meet, in treaty, the chiefs and head men of the Cherokee Indians, but as they did not attend on or before that day, we found it necessary to repair to this place, as the Executive of the State of Georgia had appointed the 20th of this month for treating with the Creek Indians. A treaty with the Creeks appearing to us to be of the greatest importance, we sent to the Cherokees a talk, No. 1. A.

On our way to this place, we met several of the Cherokee head men, at Seneca, who gave us the fullest assurances that no hostilities or depredations should be committed by any of their people, against the citizens of the United States, until a treaty should be held; and we have every reason to confide in their promises.

Some late depredations which were committed by the Creeks on the frontiers of this State, so alarmed their chiefs, that they returned home after having been a few days on their journey to this place. The talks No. 1, and 2; Mr. McGillivray's letter, No. 3; Mr. George Galphin's letter, No. 4; Mr. John Galphin's letters, No. 5, 6 and 7; and Mr. McGillivray's letter, No. 8; will explain to your excellency their reasons.

We have now with us, Mr. John Galphin, a chief speaker of the Lower Creeks; the White Bird King, or the Great King; with sixteen other Indians. They will return to the nation to-morrow, with our general talk, No. 9, and our letter to Mr. McGillivray, No. 10.

The great scarcity of corn, for upwards of eighty miles around us, was our principal reason for postponing the Creek treaty so long; by the middle of September we shall be aided with the new crop.

We are happy to inform your Excellency, from good authority, that the Creeks are, very generally, disposed for peace. We are well assured, that all the head men of that nation, with upwards of two thousand Indians, will attend the treaty in September, and we have the fairest prospects of establishing a permanent peace with the Creeks, on such terms as will be pleasing to the Indians, satisfactory to the State of Georgia, and honorable to the Union.

In justice to the State of Georgia, we cannot conclude this letter without expressing our entire satisfaction in the conduct of her government; they have cheerfully advanced several thousand dollars, to enable us to meet so large a body of Indians, in a manner suitable to the importance of the occasion.

We have the honor to be, your Excellency's most obedient and very humble servants.

ANDREW PICKENS,
H. OSBORNE.

To the Head-men, Chiefs, and Warriors, of the Cherokee Nation.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

Agreeable to our appointment with you, we met at this place, expecting to have the pleasure of meeting you, to settle all disputes that have subsisted between you and the white people. We have waited here for you twelve days, and we are now obliged to go and meet the Creeks, on the Oconee, on the 20th of this month, so that we can stay no longer. We are, therefore, under the necessity of postponing the treaty with you till some other time that will be appointed and made convenient for both parties.

We are sorry to find that the people of Cumberland have reason to complain; many of those people have been killed by the Indians. You all know that the people of Cumberland make no encroachments upon your lands; the line was settled at Seneca, and the people of Cumberland do not go over it. We hope none of your people are concerned in such mischief, as it would interrupt the good intentions of Congress towards your people. We expect you will put a stop to all such proceedings against any of our people, until we meet you in treaty, when we have no doubt of settling all matters to your satisfaction. In token of our friendship, we send you a string of white beads.

A talk from the Head-men and Chiefs of the Lower Creek nation, to the Commissioners of the United States, of Indian affairs, in the Southern Department.—May 23d, 1789.

We received your talk by Mr. George Galphin, but at that present time we were not able to give you an answer, in consequence of a great meeting and a talk being concluded by Mr. McGillivray, and the whole nation, in consequence of the encroachments of the Georgians on our hunting grounds. Orders were given out for our warriors to be in readiness to turn out in respect to their lands. We then first sent runners every where to stop and turn back all parties they could come up with, until we could hear from Mr. McGillivray, and have his advice in the matter. There are some people, we believe, gone on, the consequence of which we cannot be accountable for, as they were gone before your talk came in; but I hope there will be no blood spilt; your delay in not sending up your talk sooner, is the reason of it: had your talk come a little sooner, it might have been a great deal better. We have been informed you would send a talk to us, but its not coming, we did not know what to do. Now we have sent to Mr. McGillivray to know when he will appoint the time for setting off to meet you at the place you appointed. Mr. Galphin is gone to settle this matter with him; he will bring you word when it will be agreed on by the chiefs of the Lower Creek nation.

The day is coming at last, that I hope we shall see you our fathers, friends, and brothers again, as we used in friendship, and renew all our former friendships. It was never our intention to be against any white people. We now come to take you by the hand, with a clear and willing mind, and with an intent to remove all things that had shut our path so long, and to renew our former trade in friendship once more.

We have always received your talks friendly, and sent you our talks again; letting you know always our grievances, and the reasons why this long dispute; but we now hope all will be forgot, and we now come to make our talks firm again, as we did when we first took white people by the hand. As we were all made by one master of breath, although put in different parts of the earth, he did not make us to be at variance against each other; but it has happened, by the bad doings of our mad people, on both sides. When we first met the white people, at the sea side, we did not meet in arms, but with a desire of being further acquainted with each other; until the great encroachments of our lands raised us, which has occasioned the late troubles among us. You are sensible that, at our first meeting at the sea side, for the benefit of trade, we gave our land as far as the water ebbed and flowed, and, by frequent request, granted as far as possible, reserving our hunting grounds: for what will be the use of goods brought amongst us, if our young men have not hunting ground to kill game, to purchase the goods brought to us?

We never met together yet to explain our grievances, but we told them to the beloved man, Col. White, who came here to us, and he promised to lay all our talks, that we gave him, before the Congress, and that we should have redress and justice done us. Now we rest with hopes that you will do the same by us, as we expect you have the same talks.

We received your invitation, and do expect that, when we meet, all past grievances will be forgot, and laid a-one side, and then renew our friendship once more, to the satisfaction of all our people. Mr. George Galphin will acquaint you of every particular. This is all we have to say, until we shall take you by the hand, as our fathers, friends, and brothers.

LITTLE TALLASSEE, 18th May, 1789.

DEAR SIR:

I have this moment received your letter, enclosing a talk of invitation to the chiefs and warriors of the nation to meet the commissioners of Congress the 20th June next.

I wish that you could have been up, while I was in the Lower towns; the great fatigue which I have undergone this spring, prevents my seeing the Lower chiefs on the occasion.

I have received a letter from the commissioners and superintendent last winter, in which they declared, in the most pointed and unequivocal terms, that it was impossible to make the restitution of territory the basis of a peace between us and Georgia, which we demanded as a first measure to be complied with by them, to lead the way to a lasting peace.

At our late convention, I explained the letter to the chiefs, who were much dissatisfied at the declaration, and observed, that it was in vain to talk of peace while an obstacle of such magnitude was suffered to remain in the way of it, on the part of the Georgians; and the warlike preparations, which you notice in your letter, are carrying on to make another trial to accomplish by force, what can't be obtained by peaceable methods. Our excursions, hitherto, have been made with no other view than to warn the Georgians to desist from their injustice, and to induce them to listen to reason and humanity. It is well known, that, if any other was our motive, that our force and resources are equal to effect their destruction.

On the present occasion, the chiefs, having sent for my opinion and advice, I have wrote to them, to be explained by Mr. Derezeaux. I have left the matter to their own choice; if they agree to meet, I will likewise go, though I have the best reasons against it. Yet apprehensions for personal security shall not deter me from fulfilling the duty which I owe my country.

I am, sir, your humble servant,

ALEX. MCGILLIVRAY.

MR. GEO. GALPHIN, at Cussetahs.

LOWER CREEKS, May 27, 1789.

GENTLEMEN:

I have to acquaint your honors, that, on my arrival in the Creek nation, I found it in a very bad situation to bring about a treaty. I at first began to despair of having it in my power to effect any of the business I came on, as the whole Upper and Lower Creeks, down as far as the Seminoles, were ready fitted off to go out to war; and would have been started, if I had been but four days later, on the frontiers of Georgia. Upwards of three thousand would have been out, and intended to have drove Ogechee from the mouth to the head, which I fear they would have effected, after viewing the frontiers in such an unprepared state, and the Indians going on at such a surprise.

I was told, by many of the Indians, that, if any one else had come at such a time but myself, they never should have returned back. The cause of their setting out on such a general excursion, was by consent of Mr. McGillivray, after a general meeting of the chiefs and head men of the whole Upper and Lower Creeks; and, being informed by him that they were not to have their lands on the Oconees restored to them again, he acquainted them that the Spaniards had provided for them, for the purpose of defending their rights to their lands, fifteen hundred stand of arms, and forty thousand weight of ammunition. This, he told me, was what the Governor or commandant at Pensacola told him, was what they had orders to do by orders from their king. On hearing of this great supply, the Indians were much exalted, and, I believe, would have turned out to a man, except the Cussetahs, who seemed much against it, which was happy for me on my business, or I could have done nothing.

On my arrival at the Cussetahs, I met with Mr. Barnard, who had been at Mr. McGillivray's talk, and had been trying all he could to put a stop to their rash proceedings, till an express was sent down, with an offer of peace on any conditions, as any thing that could be done to prolong the time, until news could have been got down, to have warned the frontiers from such a destruction as must have ensued, would have been better than to have it gone on. Mr. Barnard's offers could not avail, as the Indians seemed determined to prosecute what they begun. Mr. Barnard's life and property were immediately threatened, and every exertion possible made use of, to prevent his going off, or sending down news to Georgia of what was going forward. At my meeting Mr. Barnard at the Cussetahs, I handed him his honor the Governor's letter, likewise General Twiggs', and communicated the whole of my business to him. He acquainted me with every matter respecting the present situation of affairs, and gave me every advice he thought necessary to effect my business, and then left me to my brother John to complete it, as he told me he dared not be seen to concern with me, at that time, at the risk of his life, which I found to be the truth.

My brother, having a good deal of influence in the Cowetas, through our connexion there, which was the most strenuous for mischief, I set him to work on them, and myself with the Cussetahs. We, in two days, got them to stop all that were on the move, till we could write Mr. McGillivray. They agreed to wait till they heard his answer. After finding out the true situation of affairs, and, according to my instructions from you, I wrote a letter acquainting him fully with my business with the chiefs of the nation, and from whom I was sent; and, as head of the nation, gave him every security, if he attended the treaty, that no molestation would by any means take place, but that every respect would be shown him, which I hope your honors will take every step to secure, that my promises to him and the rest of the heads may not be violated. After my letter, he left the determination of the business on hand to the heads of the Cussetahs and Cowetas, who, after seeing his answer, consented to treat. He, at the same time, gave them to understand, that, if they were inclined to a treaty, he would likewise attend, and, by what I can plainly see, there is no measure to be fallen upon, to settle the present cause of dispute, without his voice. Even if a treaty could be called without his consent, it could not be a general one; therefore it would only be leaving matters in the same disagreeable situation that they are now in, and leaving the frontiers still open to perpetual violation. His attendance will put the matter effectually out of every kind of jeopardy, one way or other.

I am now at Mr. Barnard's, on Flint river, forwarding to you this express. I likewise sent my brother off, before I left the town, to Mr. McGillivray, to know exactly when he and the rest of the heads would wish to meet. I set off again for the Cussetahs to-morrow, and, on the return of my brother, I shall, in a few days, set out for Augusta, where I hope, by the time I get there, you will nearly effect every preparation necessary for a treaty at the Rock Landing.

I shall be particular in ascertaining every necessary intelligence, which I hope in a short time to be able to communicate to your honors in Augusta. Till then I remain, with due respect,

Your honors' most obed't humble serv't,

GEO. GALPHIN.

P. S. I have enclosed Mr. McGillivray's answer to me for your perusal, and likewise a talk from the whole of the Lower Creeks.

No. 5.

COWETAS, 23d May, 1789.

SIR:

I take the liberty of writing to your honor of the situation of this our country. When my brother arrived here, we had just had a full meeting of all the chiefs, and had long waited for talks, but never received any. A John Tarvin arrived from Augusta, who we expected we should have some talks by, but had none; there were a few private letters for Mr. McGillivray, but nothing of consequence. The chiefs then thought it was not the Georgians' intention to make a peace, on which many turned out; and the day my brother arrived, there were not less than two thousand under arms. I gave him my assistance, and stopped all; and immediately sent to Mr. McGillivray, who acted the same. There might be small parties out that were gone so far, that it was out of our power to stop them: they turned out before your talks came up to this country. I hope that the small damages, which may be done by them, will be overlooked; if not, perhaps we shall not agree, as it cannot be accounted for, when they were in the woods before your talks came to this country, and I hope all will be looked over. I am sorry it was not more in my power to assist my brother, owing to a bad state of health I have been in for some time past; but, finding that he must fall through with his business, if I did not assist him, though I rode about with him in great pain; and yesterday had a meeting of the Lower towns, from which you will see the talks. I found it necessary to go up to the Upper towns, and see Mr. McGillivray, as it was needless to have a treaty with part of the nation, and not the whole. It may, perhaps, detain the time longer; but the business will be well done. I had been told that his honor the Governor wrote to Mr. Barnard; am surprised that his honor is not more acquainted with business of this country, than to think that Mr. Barnard's influence could be of any service to that country. I believe him to be a friend of the State of Georgia, but I must take the liberty to acquaint you that Mr. Barnard cannot do any thing here more than a trader, nor is it in his power. You will get the fullest information of this country by my brother George, and a treaty, you may rely on, we will try, if possible, to be at the time appointed; but, if we should not, you must wait a few days longer, as this is an extensive country, and business cannot be done in a day or two. It will be necessary that every preparation be made, for we will try to make a lasting peace; and, for that intention, I will try to bring the chiefs of the whole nation. We may be in number, that will come down, about two or three thousand, and hope that you will be in readines for the reception of that number.

I must now give some small remarks of the usage I have had in the State of Georgia. When I was only seventeen, the Assembly, under some pretence, robbed me of better than forty thousand acres of land, a precedent not to be equalled in all the annals of history. I then settled store on the Oconee river, and, being alarmed that the Indians were likely to do mischief, Captain Kemp, with several of the neighbors, requested I would go to the nation to know the certainty, and, if possible, to prevent so shocking a scene. On my way up, I met and passed them; no sooner out of sight, I got round them, and gave the inhabitants timely notice, though my horse tired, and had to travel on foot forty miles, a fatigue I was but little accustomed to. They might, had they been possessed of one spark of gratitude, reckoned that information a temporal salvation. I leave the judicious part, for I think there must be some, to judge their gratitude, when, at that very juncture, they burned my house, robbed me of better than two hundred pounds sterling, to induce me to believe it was the Indians; and repeatedly threatened my life, from no motive, I know of, but of saving them. Had the men who made application the smallest idea of justice, they would not have suffered me to be treated as I was. Soon after, the commissioners made application to me to bring the Indians to a treaty; it was hardly possible for me to be zealous to serve a people who had so unjustly injured me, and were continually declaring they would take my life. However, to induce me to undertake it, and exhaust the remains of my shattered fortune, they seemed so point out steps that would retrieve my lands, and my own foolish credulity once more permitted me to comply with their request. The inhabitants were still swearing vengeance against me. I then did not think my life safe; I was then obliged to seek refuge in this, my own country, where I was in some safety; and I have laid out of my own pocket better than eighty pounds sterling in purchasing the prisoners that were brought here, and risque my life to save theirs. All this I have done to serve the Georgians. I will write you more satisfactory than at present, as I am now in a great hurry. You may be in preparation for a treaty; and have the honor to be, sir,

Your most obed't servant,

JOHN GALPHIN.

The Hon. HENRY OSBORNE, Esq.
Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Augusta.

COWETAS, June 1st, 1789.

SIR:

In my last letter to you, I mentioned where I was going; to the Upper towns, in order to see Mr. McGillivray, and have just arrived, and completed the business that my brother came on, which he must have fallen through with, had I not assisted him. I have settled every matter for him, and will be ready to start from this place, with all the Lower towns, the 13th of this month. I expect to be joined with all the Upper Creeks, and our chief speaker, Mr. McGillivray, the tenth of this month. We shall have all the chiefs of the whole nation with us. I can just tell your honor, that there will be more chiefs at this treaty, than ever was at a treaty yet, in order to settle every dispute. Matters may be settled on good terms, but we cannot come upon any terms unless every dispute is settled on a good footing; particularly that of mine, concerning my lands, which were taken from me when I was under age. I should once have thought myself happy of being a citizen in the State of Georgia, but it was withheld, and I must now look upon myself a chief in the whole of the lower towns, as they have now given me the honor of settling their business for them. In my last, I gave you my reason for leaving the State of Georgia, but I would still wish every matter could be settled on good terms for a peace: for no man has taken more pains than I have.

I make no doubt there have been some people on the frontiers killed lately, but we have lost twelve in number; I think that may be upon a balance for what are lost on the frontiers.

I will try to be down by the time appointed; it will be very necessary that all white people, who have no business, should be ordered away, as they generally give more disturbance than any others; and for no person to come on this side of the river, as the Indians are a jealous people, and hope every method will be taken to keep people back that have no business there, if not we shall return: for the people of Georgia always bully than treat with the Indians, but I hope such steps will not be taken now.

I remain sir, your obed't servant,

JOHN GALPHIN.

ROCK LANDING, 24th June, 1789.

GENTLEMEN:

I arrived here yesterday, and meeting Mr. Brian, the interpreter, this morning, he informed me of seeing a Mr. Whitehead on his way from the nation, who did not altogether give him a true account of us, but I can assure you that I have it in my power to settle every matter amicably and satisfactorily to both parties.

I shall wait at this place until I get an answer to return with, as your honors will find, by my instructions, that I can settle every thing agreeably.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your most obedient servant,

JOHN GALPHIN.

No. 8.

COWETAS, 16th June, 1789.

SIR:

Upon receipt of this letter, you are requested by the chiefs to proceed to the proposed place of meeting at the Rock-landing, on the Oconee river, where, if you meet with the commissioners, you are to inform them, that the chiefs have resolved to put off the meeting for the present, for the following reasons:

That when the talk of invitation arrived here, the whole body of warriors were in arms, owing to the commissioners' letter of last winter, ready to turn out, but the chiefs being ever ready to listen to just terms of peace, they agreed to meet the commissioners to treat as they requested; but some parties having early gone out, could not be stopped, and they having returned within a few days of the appointed time for the chiefs setting out for the Rock Landing, and having done mischief in killing several people, the body of the people stopped the chiefs from proceeding to the Oconee, apprehensive that they might sustain injury and insult from the people of that country.

The chiefs are willing to treat at a time when, a few months having passed over, each other's minds will be more cool, and can talk over matters with calmness and temper; mean time they wish to have an answer from the commissioners, upon what grounds they intend to conduct the treaty on. They apprehend that some demands will be made, to which they cannot agree, and they don't wish to meet them to quarrel, but rather desire, when they do meet, to treat of peace, to do it in a peaceable manner, and to conclude a peace on terms that may make it a lasting one.

Wishing you a good journey, remain with esteem and regard,

Your most obedient servant,

ALEX. M'GILLIVRAY.

P. S. Assure the commissioners that every exertion will be made by the chiefs to keep things quiet, which may be depended on.

ROCK LANDING, on the Oconee, June 29th, 1789.

BROTHERS:

We came to this place expecting to meet you agreeably to our invitation, which we sent to you by Mr. George Galphin. We are sorry any thing should have happened to prevent your coming. We have heard your reasons from your chief speaker, Mr. McGillivray, with which we are satisfied. We have consulted your beloved man, Mr. John Galphin, and have fixed the time for meeting you all at this place, to be the 15th of September next. We hope you will be punctual in coming, that all disputes may be settled, and we may again take you by the hand as friends and brothers.

As a mark of your good intentions, we shall expect all the prisoners in the nation, both whites and blacks, will be sent to this place as soon as possible, where one of us will remain to receive them.

We have strictly charged our people not to cross over to your side of the Oconee, and we expect your people will not come on this side, except at this place, before the time for holding the treaty.

We shall expect that all your people will be prohibited from committing any kind of depredations against ours, so that peace may be preserved, and all of us meet at the appointed time, as friends and brothers.

ROCK LANDING, June 30th, 1789.

SIR:

We have received your letter to Mr. John Galphin, and are very sorry we could not have the pleasure of seeing you at the time appointed; but as we have fixed a time agreeable to your wish, we hope nothing will prevent your being present on the 15th of September next. It is our wish and desire to make a firm and lasting peace, on liberal terms, with all the chiefs of the nation. One of us will remain at this place to have every thing prepared for the treaty, and to receive as many of the prisoners as can be sent down before that period. You will oblige us much by using your influence on this subject, as it will have a very happy effect in this country, and tend to promote a good understanding between the Indians and our people; we expect all the prisoners that cannot be sent immediately, will be brought to the treaty.

There are few things vex the people of this country so much, as having their horses stolen; we wish, and have no doubt, but you will put a stop to that practice in future, and that you will order as many of the stolen horses as can be found in the nation, to be sent to us.

Mrs. Girardeau, a widow lady of Liberty county, was plundered by a party of your nation in August last, and eight negroes taken off. She has five young children, and the negroes were the bulk of her and their property; feeling for the widow and orphans, we have granted her eldest son permission to accompany Mr. Galphin to the nation. We recommend him to your humanity in the strongest terms, and request you to afford him every necessary assistance in regaining the property; he will return by this route, and we shall be happy to have an opportunity of rendering you a similar service, either in a public or private capacity.

We have spoken very freely to Mr. Galphin, he will give you every necessary information, and do away any doubts that may have remained on your mind. It would give us great satisfaction to have some private conversation with you and him, prior to the public talks; we doubt not but all matters may be so settled between us, as will make the treaty both easy and agreeable to all parties.

For your satisfaction, we enclose you a resolve of the Executive of this State, and an order of the Governor thereon. It is our wish that no people whatever, belonging to the United States, should be disturbed or injured either in their persons or property, till all matters are finally settled between us.

We are, sir, your obedient and very humble servants,

ANDREW PICKENS,
H. OSBORNE,
Commissioners.

To ALEXANDER MCGILLIVRAY, Esq.,
Chief Speaker in the Creek Nation.

IN COUNCIL, AUGUSTA, June 19th, 1789.

To the end that no interruption or personal interference may take place, between the honorable the commissioners and the Indians, in the progress of the treaty at the Rock Landing, it is unanimously ordered, in the most express terms, that no person or persons whatsoever, do approach the treaty ground, or cross over the Oconee to the south side, during the time of holding the same, or within ten days thereafter, without special permission from the commissioners, for that purpose; and any breach of this order will be punished with the utmost severity.

Extract from the minutes.

J. MERIWETHER, S. E. C.

COUNCIL CHAMBER, June 19th, 1789.

In pursuance of the above order of Council, the Governor and Commander-in-chief orders and directs, that the officers of the militia, guard to the commissioners, and of the State troops, do see, at their respective stations, that the same be not violated: and any neglect herein, will be deemed a breach of duty, and punished accordingly.

GEORGE WALTON.

No. 3.

General Knox, Secretary of War, to the President of the United States.

THE CHEROKEES.

This nation of Indians, consisting of separate towns or villages, are seated principally on the head waters of the Tennessee, which runs into the Ohio. Their hunting grounds extend from Cumberland river along the frontiers of Virginia, North and South Carolina, and part of Georgia.

The frequent wars they have had with the frontier people of the said States, have greatly diminished their numbers. The commissioners estimated them, in November, 1785, at 2,000 warriors; but they were estimated, in 1787, by Colonel Joseph Martin, who was well acquainted with them, at 2,650; but it is probable they may be lessened since, by the depredations committed on them.

The United States concluded a treaty with the Cherokees, at Hopewell, on the Keowee, the 28th of November, 1785, which is entered on the printed journals of Congress, April 17th, 1786. The negotiations of the commissioners on the part of the United States, are hereunto annexed, marked A.

It will appear, by the papers marked B, that the State of North Carolina, by their agent, protested against the said treaty as infringing and violating the legislative rights of that State.

By a variety of evidence which has been submitted to the late Congress, it has been proved that the said treaty has been entirely disregarded by the white people inhabiting the frontiers, styling themselves the State of Franklin.

The proceedings of Congress on the first of September, 1788, and the proclamation they then issued on this subject, will show their sense of the many unprovoked outrages committed against the Cherokees.

The information contained in the papers marked C, from Colonel Joseph Martin, the late agent to the Cherokees, and Richard Winn, Esq. will further evince the deplorable situation of the Cherokees, and the indispensable obligation of the United States to vindicate their faith, justice, and national dignity.

The letter of Mr. Winn, the late superintendent, of the first of March, informs, that a treaty will be held with the Cherokees on the third Monday of May, at the Upper War-ford, on French Broad river.

But it is to be observed, that the time for which both he, and Colonel Joseph Martin, the agent to the Cherokees and Chickasaws, were elected, has expired; and, therefore, they are not authorized to act on the part of the Union. If the commissioners appointed by North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, by virtue of the resolve of Congress of the 26th of October, 1787, should attend the said treaty, their proceedings thereon may soon be expected.

But as part of the Cherokees have taken refuge within the limits of the Creeks, it is highly probable they will be under the same direction, and, therefore, as the fact of the violation of the treaty cannot be disputed, and as the commissioners have not power to replace the Cherokees within the limits established in 1785, it is not probable, even if a treaty should be held, as stated by Mr. Winn, that the result would be satisfactory.

All which is humbly submitted to the President of the United States.

H. KNOX.

WAR OFFICE, July 7th, 1789.

A. No. 1.

HOPWELL, ON THE KEOWEE, 2d December, 1785.

SIR:

We enclose to your Excellency a treaty which we entered into on the 28th ultimo, with all the Cherokees at this place. We had invited the Chiefs only of the respective towns, but they having some reason to expect ill treatment from some disorderly people in that part of the westward of North Carolina, where the exercise of an independent government has lately been assumed, were under the necessity of bringing their young warriors, their wives and children, who were most exposed, to be protected, so that from this nation we have had nine hundred and eighteen.

Previous to entering into the treaty, we, with interpreters who understood the Cherokee language well, explained the occurrences of the late war, with the extent of territory ceded to us by the King of Great Britain. We also explained every article of the treaty, so that they could comprehend it perfectly. After it was signed, they expressed their obligations to the United States of America for taking them under protection, and treating them with such unexpected justice.

The agents of Georgia and North Carolina attended the treaty, as will appear by their protest, herewith enclosed. The commissioners, in establishing the boundary which is the chief cause of all the complaints of the Indians, were desirous of accommodating the southern States, and their western citizens, in any thing consistent with the duty we owed to the United States.

We established the line from forty miles above Nashville on the Cumberland, agreeable to the deed of sale to Richard Henderson & Co. as far as the Kentucky ford; thence to the mountain six miles south of Nolichucky, agreeable to the treaty in 1777, with Colonel William Christie, William Preston, and Evan Shelby, on the part of Virginia; and Waitstill Avery, attorney general, Colonel Robert Lanier, William Sharp, and Joseph Winston, on the part of North Carolina; thence by agreement, south, to the North Carolina line, and to the South Carolina Indian boundary; thence to the Tugelo river, the treaty at Dewit's corner in 1777, with States of South Carolina and Georgia; thence, over the Currahee mountain, to the south fork of Oconee, the treaty at Augusta, of 1783. The line from Duck river is now given by the Cherokees to accommodate the people of Nashville, and others, south of the Cumberland, (which river is the southern boundary of the lands sold to Richard Henderson & Co.) as it would be difficult to remove them, as well as very distressing to the citizens.

There are some few people settled on the Indian lands, whom we are to remove, and those in the fork of French Broad and Holston, being numerous, the Indians agreed to refer their particular situation to Congress, and abide their decision. We told them there were too many for us to engage positively to order off, although they had settled expressly against the treaty entered into by Virginia and North Carolina with the Cherokees in 1777.

The commissioners know not what is best to be done in this case. They see that justice, humanity, and good policy, require that some compensation should be made to the Indians for these lands; but the manner of doing it probably would be difficult. However, a small sum we think could be raised on the unlocated lands, as well as from those already settled; and which, if appropriated to the purpose of teaching them some useful branches of mechanics, would be of lasting advantage. Some of the women have lately learnt to spin, and many of them are very desirous that some method should be fallen on to teach them to raise flax, cotton, and wool, as well as to spin and weave it.

We have required the aid of the agent of North Carolina, and the commissioners of Georgia, in the execution of the treaty, and we foresee that difficulties will frequently arise, and, indeed, render it ineffectual, if these two States should refuse their co-operation. We have given the Indians some presents, but our stock was so small, compared with the number of Indians, and their naked distressed condition, that the dividend was trifling indeed. We told them that we invited and expected the head-men and warriors only; that the object of our commission was altogether for their benefit, and we had made provision accordingly.

The Spaniards and the French from New Orleans are making great efforts to engross the trade of the Indians; several of them are on the north side of the Tennessee, and well supplied with proper goods for the trade. The Governor of New Orleans, or West Florida, has sent orders to the Chickasaws to remove all traders from that country, except those who had or should take the oath of allegiance to the Catholic King; and also, had appointed ten traders, who were down after goods, when our informant, a man of respectability, left that country.

We sent a very intelligent, honest man, with our invitation to the Choctaws and Chickasaws, to treat with us, and he brought us assurances from them, that they would attend the treaty; and some of the former set out before he left the Chickasaw nation, but none of them have as yet arrived, and we cannot account for it, unless we give credit to reports, which contradict, expressly, all assurances of their attachment to the United States, and joy on the first notification of the resolution of Congress, appointing commissioners to treat with them, and receive them into the favor and protection of the United States. The Cherokees say that the Northern Indians have their emissaries among the Southern tribes, endeavoring to prevail on them to form an alliance offensive against the United States, and to commence hostilities against us in the spring, or next fall, at the farthest; they also say, that, not only the British emissaries are for this measure, but that the Spaniards have extensive claims to the southward, and have been endeavoring to poison the minds of the Indians against us, and to win their affections, by large supplies of arms, military stores, and clothing.

We are at a loss what to do, to complete the object of our commission; the sum to which we are limited, is already, by our disappointments and expenses attendant thereon, so diminished, that we are unable to fix on any place, and therefore must await the further order of Congress.

We have, for the information of Congress, collected, as near as may be, the number of Indians in the four Southern States, and we find the gun-men of the Cherokees,

The Upper and Lower Creek nation, from an agent who resided seven years in their towns, and employed	2,000
by John Stewart, for the purpose,	5,400
The Chickasaws,	800
The Choctaws,	6,000
	14,000

There are, also, some remains of tribes settled among these, as Shawanees, Eutchees, &c. &c.

At a moderate calculation, we may reckon the women, the children, and the old men, unfit for hunting, to four times the number of gun-men.

We have the honor to be, with due respect, &c.

ANDREW PICKENS,
JOSEPH MARTIN,

KEOWEE, 28th of November, 1785.

A. No. 3.

HOPEWELL ON KEOWEE, the 18th November, 1785.

The commissioners of the United States, in Congress assembled, to treat with the Cherokees, and all other Indians southward of them, within the limits of the United States, assembled.

Present: Benjamin Hawkins, Andrew Pickens, Joseph Martin, and Laughlin McIntosh; from the State of North Carolina; the honorable William Blount, Esq. who produced his commission, as agent for that State.

The commissioners ordered a return to be made of the Indians, and there were five hundred. The head-men and warriors having informed, that the present representation of their tribes was not complete, but would be so in a few days, it was agreed to postpone treating with them until the whole representation should arrive.

November 21.

The head-men and warriors of all the Cherokees assembled. Ordered, that the interpreters inform the Indians that commissioners will meet them to-morrow at 10 o'clock, under the bower erected for that purpose.

November 22.

The commissioners assembled. Present: Benjamin Hawkins, Andrew Pickens, Joseph Martin, and Laughlin McIntosh. From the State of North Carolina, William Blount, agent. From the State of Georgia, John King and Thomas Glasscock, commissioners. From all the tribes or towns of the Cherokees, the head-men and warriors. James Madison, Arthur Coody, interpreters.

The commissioners delivered the following address to the Indians:

HEAD-MEN AND WARRIORS OF ALL THE CHEROKEES: We are the men whom you were informed came from Congress to meet you, the head-men and warriors of all the Cherokees, to give you peace, and to receive you into the favor and protection of the United States; and to remove, as far as may be, all causes of future contention or quarrels. That you, your people, your wives and children, may be happy, and feel and know the blessings of the new change of sovereignty over this land, which you and we inhabit.

We sincerely wish you to live as happily as we do ourselves, and to promote that happiness as far as is in our power, regardless of any distinction of color, or of any difference in our customs, our manners, or particular situation.

This humane and generous act of the United States, will no doubt be received by you with gladness, and held in grateful remembrance, and the more so, as many of your young men, and the greatest number of your warriors, during the late war, were our enemies, and assisted the King of Great Britain in his endeavors to conquer our country. You, yourselves, know, that you refused to listen to the good talks Congress sent you; that the cause you espoused was a bad one; that all the adherents of the King of Great Britain are compelled to leave this country, never more to return.

Congress is now the sovereign of all our country, which we now point out to you on the map.* They want none of your lands, or any thing else which belongs to you; and as an earnest of their regard for you, we propose to enter into articles of a treaty perfectly equal, and conformable to what we now tell you.

If you have any grievances to complain of, we will hear them, and take such measures, in consequence thereof, as may be proper. We expect you will speak your minds freely, and look upon us as the representatives of your father and friend, the Congress, who will see justice done you. You may now retire, and reflect on what we have told you, and let us hear from you to-morrow, or as soon as possible.

November 23.

Present as yesterday. After sitting some time in silence, the Tassel of Chota arose, and addressed the commissioners as follows:

I am going to let the commissioners hear what I have to say to them. I told you yesterday I would do this to-day. I was very much pleased at the talk you gave us yesterday; it is very different from what I expected when I left home; the head-men and warriors are also equally pleased with it.

Now, I shall give you my own talk. I am made of this earth, on which the great man above placed me, to possess it; and what I am about to tell you, I have had in my mind for many years.

This land we are now on, is the land we were fighting for, during the late contest,† and the great man made it for us to subsist upon. You must know the red people are the aborigines of this land, and that it is but a few years since the white people found it out. I am of the first stock, as the commissioners know, and a native of this land; and the white people are now living on it as our friends. From the beginning of the first friendship between the white and red people, beads were given as an emblem thereof: and these are the beads I give to the commissioners of the United States, as a confirmation of our friendship, and as a proof of my opinion of what you yesterday told us.—[A string of white beads.]

The commissioners have heard how the white people have encroached on our lands, on every side of us that they could approach.

I remember the talks I delivered at the Long Island of Holston, and I remember giving our lands to Colonel Christie and others, who treated with us, and in a manner compelled me thereto, in 1777. I remember the talks to Colonel Christie, when I gave the lands at the mouth of Cloud's creek, eighteen springs past. At that treaty, we agreed upon the line near the mouth of Lime Stone. The Virginia line, and part from the mouth of Cloud's creek to Cumberland mountain, near the gap, was paid for by Virginia.

From Cloud's creek, a direct line to the Chimney-top mountain, thence, to the mouth of Big Lime Stone, on Noli-chuky, thence, to the first mountain about six miles from the river, on a line across the sun, was never paid for by the Carolina which joins the Virginia line. I wish the commissioners to know every thing that concerns us, as I tell nothing but the truth. They, the people of North Carolina, have taken our lands for no consideration, and are now making their fortunes out of them. I have informed the commissioners of the line I gave up, and the people of North Carolina and Virginia have gone over it, and encroached on our lands expressly against our inclination. They have gone over the line near Little River, and they have gone over Nine-mile Creek, which is but nine miles from our towns. I am glad of this opportunity of getting redress from the commissioners. If Congress had not interposed, I and my people must have moved. They have even marked the lands on the bank of the river near the town where I live; and from thence, down in the fork of the Tennessee and Holston.

I have given in to you a detail of the abuse and encroachments of these two States. We shall be satisfied if we are paid for the lands we have given up, but we will not, nor cannot, give up any more—I mean the line I gave to Colonel Christie.

I have no more to say, but one of our beloved women has, who has born and raised up warriors.—[A string of beads.]

The War-woman of Chota then addressed the commissioners:

I am fond of hearing that there is a peace, and I hope you have now taken us by the hand in real friendship. I have a pipe and a little tobacco to give the commissioners to smoke in friendship. I look on you and the red people as my children. Your having determined on peace is most pleasing to me, for I have seen much trouble during the late war. I am old, but I hope yet to bear children, who will grow up and people our nation, as we are now to be under the protection of Congress, and shall have no more disturbance.—[A string, little old pipe, and some tobacco.]

The talk I have given, is from the young warriors I have raised in my town, as well as myself. They rejoice that we have peace, and we hope the chain of friendship will never more be broke.—[A string of beads.]

THE COMMISSIONERS TO THE TASSEL.—We want the boundary of your country; you must recollect yourself and give it to us, particularly the line between you and the citizens, with any information you have on that subject. If necessary, you may consult your friends, and inform us to-morrow, or as soon as possible with conveniency.

TASSEL.—I will let you know the line to-morrow. I have done speaking for this day.

UNSUCKANAIL, of New-Cusse, in the middle settlement.—I speak in behalf of Kowé, New-Cusse, and Watoge. I am much pleased with the talks between the commissioners and the Tassel, who is the beloved man of Chota. I remember the talks given out by you yesterday. I shall always, I hope, remember, that if we were distressed in any manner, we should make our complaints to the commissioners, that justice may be done. There are around us young men and warriors, who hear our talks, and who are interested in the success of this treaty, particularly as their lands are taken from them, on which they lived entirely by hunting. And I hope, and they all anxiously hope, it is in the power of the commissioners to do them justice. The line mentioned by the beloved man of Chota, is in truth, as he expressed it; I remember it, and it was formerly our hunting grounds.

The encroachments on this side of the line have entirely deprived us of our hunting grounds; and I hope the commissioners will remove the white people to their own side. This is the desire of the three towns I speak for; the settlements I mean are those on Pigeon river and Swananno. It was the desire of the commissioners that the Indians should tell all their grievances, and I hope they will do justly therein. When any of my young men are hunting on their own grounds, and meet the white people, they, the white people, order them off and claim our deer.—[A string of white beads.]

CHESCOENWHEE.—I am well satisfied with the talks of this day; I intended to speak, but as the day is far spent, I will decline it till to-morrow. I will go home and consider on it.

* We used McMurray's map, and explained, with great pains, the limits of the United States, as well as the occurrences of the late war; and we believe they comprehend us. Some of the Indians had visited the Six Nations; some had been up the Wabash and down the Miami, to lake Erie; and others had been at fort Pitt, the Natchez, Pensacola, St. Augustine, Savannah, Charleston, and Williamsburg.

B. H.

† Hopewell is fifteen miles above the junction of the Keowee and Tugalo; it is a seat of General Pickens, in sight of Seneca, an Indian town at the commencement of the late war, inhabited by one hundred gun-men, but at present a waste. Dewit's corner is forty miles east of this, and that was the eastern Indian boundary, till the treaty of 1777.

B. H.

November 24th, 1785.

Present as yesterday:

TUCKASEE.—I remember the talks when I made peace. I have appointed Chescoenwhee to speak for me to-day.

CHESCOENWHEE.—I rejoice that the commissioners have delivered their talks to the head-men of the different towns. I am in hopes that these our talks will always remain unbroken. What you hear from the representatives of the towns, the young warriors will invariably adhere to. I am in hopes it is now in the power of the commissioners, from their talks of yesterday and the day before, to see justice done to us; to see that we may yet have a little land to hunt upon; I was sent here to settle all matters respecting my country, and being under the protection of the United States, I shall return satisfied: we have been formerly under the protection of Great Britain, and then, when I saw a white man, I esteemed him a friend, and I hope that the commissioners of Congress will see that times may be as formerly. I wish what I say may be deemed strictly true, for so it is, and that I may be always looked on as a friend to the thirteen United States, and that they will see justice done me.

The talks of the commissioners are the most pleasing to us, as they do not want any lands. Formerly, when I had peace talks, the first thing the white people expressed, was a desire for our lands. I am in hopes you will adjust and settle our limits, so that we may be secured in the possession of our own I will abide by what hitherto has been said on this subject, but cannot cede any more lands.—[A string of beads.]

I am in hopes the commissioners will deliver to us our prisoners who are in their lands. Neither the commissioners, nor any of the citizens of the United States, can suppose that we can be at peace on their account; they are our own flesh and blood, and we desire them out of your country. I am in hopes of seeing them with the assistance of the commissioners, they have been long detained, and we often were promised by colonel Martin that we should see them. One of them was taken from Talksoa, three girls and one boy from Erejoy, and one boy from Tuckareechée; we do not know how old they are; we are a people who do not know how to count by years; they are in North Carolina, and were taken by an army from thence.

OONANOOTEE.—I am to deliver the talks in answer to what I heard at Oostanawie. I was sent down from different towns to receive the talks of the commissioners, and to be governed by them. I do expect, by the time I return home from the commissioners, the young men of the towns of our nation will be there to hear me repeat what you have or shall say to me. I was told by all of them, when I set out, that they expected I would return with good talks. It was the desire of the commissioners, that we should tell all our grievances; the encroachment on our hunting grounds is the source of all ours, and I hope they can and will take measures to see justice done in our land. I have attended to the talks of the commissioners, and our beloved men, and I sincerely wish they may always abide by them. I am in hopes it is in your power to see our distresses redressed, and that you will order off the people who are settled on our lands, and protect for us our hunting grounds.—[A string of beads.]

I wish the commissioners to take in hand the case of the traders in our country, and settle what respects them during the late war, so that they may not be seized on and plundered by bodies of armed men as they pass to and from the nation. I am come down as one to make peace with the commissioners of the United States of America, and I hope the traders may pass through the country. I wish the commissioners would prevent such acts of injustice as robbing the traders; several of them have been plundered in Georgia and South Carolina, and their lives endangered if they should attempt to recover their property. As for my part; I mean to keep the path clear for the traders, as far as our line, and I hope the commissioners will do the same on their part. Here are the chiefs of all our nation, who hear me; the traders have been out for goods, and returned without any, having been robbed, and I hope it will not be the case again. I sincerely desire that our talks and complaints may go up to Congress, that they may know how we are distressed about our country. I have delivered the talks to the commissioners, and laid the beads on the beloved table, and as to my part of the country, I will keep the path clear.

TASSEL.—We have said all we intend to day if the commissioners; have any thing to say, we will hear it, and answer them.

COMMISSIONERS.—We want the boundary of your country, particularly to the northward and eastward; this we told you yesterday; when we can agree upon the bounds of the lands, we mean to allot to you, we will prepare the draught of a treaty on the plan we mentioned to you in our address.

TASSEL.—I expected to give the bounds of our country, but it is too late in the day, and I will do it to-morrow.

November 25.

Present as yesterday.

The head-men, after some conversation together, requested the commissioners to give them some paper and a pencil, and leave them to themselves, and they would draw the map of their country.

November, 26.

Present as yesterday.

The head-men produced their map, and the TASSEL addressed the commissioners as follows:

I will give the bounds of the land as far as I claim. Colonel Martin is present, and heard our talks at the long island of Holston, and he knows every thing I shall say to be true. The line which I have marked, beginning on the Ohio, above Kentucky, and running thence to where the Kentucky road crosses Cumberland River, thence to the Chimney-top mountain, and by the mouth of Big Limestone to the mountain, six miles south of Nolichucky, is justly our boundary with the white people. The Indians from the middle settlements will extend the line, and shew their claim.

I know that Richard Henderson says he purchased the lands at Kentucky and as far south as Cumberland, but he is a rogue and a liar, and if he was here I would tell him so. He requested us to let him have a little lands on Kentucky river, for his cattle and horses to feed on, and we consented, but told him at the same time, he would be much exposed to the depredations of the Northern Indians, which he appeared not to regard; provided we gave our consent. If Attacullaculla signed his deed we were not informed of it; but we know that Oconestoto did not, and yet his name we hear is to it; Henderson put it there, and he is a rogue.

COMMISSIONERS.—You know Colonel Henderson, Attacullaculla, Oconestoto, are all dead; what you say may be true; but here is one of Henderson's deeds, which points out the line, as you have done, nearly till it strikes Cumberland, thence it runs down the waters of the same to the Ohio, thence up the said river as it meanders to the beginning. Your memory may fail you; this is on record, and will remain forever. The parties being dead, and so much time elapsed since the date of the deed, and the country being settled, on the faith of the deed, puts it out of our power to do any thing respecting it; you must therefore be content with it, as if you had actually sold it, and proceed to point out your claim exclusive of this land.

TASSEL.—I know they are dead, and I am sorry for it, and I suppose it is now too late to recover it. If Henderson were living, I should have the pleasure of telling him he was a liar; but you told us to give you our bounds, and therefore we marked the line; but we will begin at Cumberland, and say nothing more about Kentucky, although it is justly ours.

COMMISSIONERS.—You must also make provision, if practicable, for the people settled at Nashville, and for such other bodies of people, if numerous, as may be within what you have pointed out as your claim. Our object in treating with you is to fix a permanent boundary, and to keep our faith in whatever we promise you; and you must not expect from us any promise, which we know cannot be done but with great inconvenience to our citizens. The Chickasaws, we are informed by Colonel Martin and the agent of North Carolina, claim the lands at Nashville, and they are content that the people should live there, and you must mark a line for them.

TASSEL AND TUSKEGATAHEE.—We understand you perfectly; we wish to postpone this matter if the Chickasaws would come; it is a kind of common right in all the Indians, and they had no right of themselves to give it.

COMMISSIONERS.—We have now no expectations that the Chickasaws will meet us, and you know the necessity of having the treaty completed, that we may, as early as possible, put a stop to the encroachments you complain of, if they do exist.

TASSEL AND TUSKEGATAHEE.—We know the necessity of completing the treaty, and we will mark a line for the white people; we will begin at the ridge between the Tennessee and Cumberland, on the Ohio, and run along the same till we get around the white people, as you think proper. We will also mark a line from the mouth of Duck river to the said line, and leave the remainder of the lands to the south and west of the lines, to the Chickasaws; we will, from the ridge, go to Cumberland, and up the same to where the Kentucky road crosses the same. Colonel Christie run the remainder of the line with us, as we have marked it, and he said we were at liberty to punish, or not, as we pleased, any person who should come on our side to violate the treaty; but this we have not done, and the white people have come over it a great way, as we have told you. In the fork of French Broad river and Holston, there are three thousand souls. This is a favorite spot of land, and we cannot consent to their having of it; and they must be removed. There are some few settled on other parts, whom the commissioners, we hope, will remove. We cannot mark a line round the people on French Broad; those lands are within twenty-five miles of our towns, and we prize them highly. The people have settled there several springs past, and they ought to be removed.

COMMISSIONERS.—We expect some sort of provision will be made for these people, and you had better think seriously of it; they are too numerous for us to engage to remove. You say they have been there for a long time, and ought to have been removed: while you were under the protection of the King of Great Britain, he ought to have removed them for you, but he neglected it, and we cannot stipulate positively to do any thing respecting them, unless you choose to mark around them; for the present they must remain as they are; all the others you mention shall be removed.

TASSEL.—I have shown you the bounds of my country on my map which I drew in your presence, and on the map of the United States. If the commissioners cannot do me justice in removing the people from the fork of French Broad and Holston, I am unable to get it of myself. Are Congress, who conquered the King of Great Britain, unable to remove those people? I am satisfied with the promises of the commissioners to remove all the people from within our lines, except those within the fork of Holston and French Broad; and I will agree to be content, that the particular situation of the people settled there, and our claims to the lands, should be referred to Congress, as the commissioners may think just, and I will abide by their decision.

UNSUOKANAIL.—I and my people are to extend their line, and, although our claims are well founded to a large portion of the mountains, which are of little advantage to any but hunters, and of great value to them, yet I am willing to extend the line to the southward until we come to the South Carolina Indian boundary; and we have a right, formed on the treaties at Dewit's corner, and at Augusta, to make that line, as far as the south fork of Oconee, our boundary against the white people.

The commissioners assembled.

Present: Benjamin Hawkins, Andrew Pickens, Joseph Martin, and Laughlin McIntosh.

From the State of North Carolina, William Blount, agent.

From the State of Georgia, John King and Thomas Glasscock, commissioners.

The head-men and warriors of all the Cherokees.

James Madison and Arthur Coody, sworn interpreters.

Major Samuel Taylor, Major William Hazzard, Captain-commandant John Cowen, John Owen, and George Ogg, merchants, with several other reputable characters.

The commissioners produced a draught of a treaty, on the plan they originally proposed to the Indians, which was read, and interpreted to them with great attention, so that they agreed that they perfectly understood every article, and would with pleasure unanimously sign the same; accordingly, two copies were signed by the commissioners and all the head-men, the one for the United States, and the other for the Cherokees.

Previous to signing, the agent from North Carolina, and the commissioners of Georgia, delivered their protests against the same.

After the treaty was signed, sealed, and witnessed, the commissioners told the head-men that Congress, from motives of humanity, had directed some presents to be made to them for their use and comfort; and that, on the next day, they would direct the presents to be distributed accordingly.

Present as yesterday.

The commissioners ordered a return of the Indians, and there were nine hundred and eighteen, and goods to the amount of $1,311 10-90 were distributed among the head-men of every town.

The Indians having expressed a desire to say something farther to the commissioners, they attended accordingly.

TASSEL.—I will now inform you of some farther complaints against your people. I remember the treaty with Colonel Christie, and in all our treaties, that we reserved the Long-island of Holston for ourselves, as beloved ground, to hold our treaties on. I remember the commissioners yesterday, in an article of the treaty, demanded all their property and prisoners. I am now going to make my demand: I desire that Colonel Martin may be empowered to find and get our prisoners; he is our friend, and he will get them for us. I am now done my talks, and I hope the commissioners will be as good as their promise yesterday in the treaty. The white people have taken so much of our lands, we cannot kill as many deer as formerly. The traders impose on us greatly, and we wish our trade could be regulated, and fixed rates on our goods. Our traders are frequently robbed when coming to, and going from, our nation. John Benge was, among others, robbed of about £150 sterling's worth of leather, in the State of Georgia.

TUSKEGATAHEE.—I am not a chief, but will speak for my country; I shall always pay great regard to what I have heard respecting the treaty, as well as what may be sent us from Congress hereafter; and as I am within the limits of the United States, I shall always expect their protection and assistance. Our young men and warriors have heard what is passed. I expect, as our boundaries are ascertained, Congress may be informed of them; and that, as peace is now firmly established, and we are all friends, we may be allowed to hunt on each other's lands without molestation. On my part, being in peace and friendship with you, I shall feel myself safe wherever I go. Many of your people on Cumberland and Kentucky lose their horses in our lands, and, should we find them, I wish Colonel Martin to receive them.

NOWOTA.—I am fond to hear the talks of the beloved men of Congress, and of ours. You commissioners remember the talks, and I shall always endeavor to support the peace and friendship now established. I remember your talks by Colonel Martin, and I promised to be attached to America; but, until the present, I was afraid to be in your country. I am now perfectly happy, as you are to protect us. Your prisoner at Chickamoga, I will deliver you. Formerly, Captain Cammeron saw justice done to us in our land; he is gone, and I now depend on the commissioners. If any thing depends on me to strengthen our friendship, I will faithfully execute it. You are now our protectors. When I go and tell to those of our people who could not come to hear your talks, what I have seen and heard, they will rejoice. I have heard your declarations of a desire to do us any service in your power; I believe you, and in confidence shall rest happy.

COMMISSIONERS.—We will give you provisions for the road, and wish you may be happy. We will send up to Congress all our talks.

HOPEWELL ON KEOWEE, November 22, 1785.

GENTLEMEN:

Having yesterday had the honor to lay before you my commission, as agent on the part of North Carolina, I now consider it my duty to call your attention to the following extract from the constitution of that State, which was agreed to and published to the world on the eighteenth day of December, in the year 1776.

"The property of the soil in a free government, being one of the essential rights of the collective body of the people, it is necessary, in order to avoid future disputes, that the limits of the State should be ascertained with precision; and as the former temporary line between North and South Carolina was confirmed and extended by commissioners appointed by the Legislatures of the two States, agreeable to the order of the late King George the second, in council, that line, and that only, should be esteemed the southern boundary of this State, that is to say; beginning on the sea-side, at a cedar stake at or near the mouth of Little River (being the southern boundary of Brunswick county) and running from thence a northwest course, through the boundary house which stands in thirty-three degrees fifty-six minutes, to thirty-five degrees north latitude, and from thence a west course so far as is mentioned in the charter of King Charles the second, to the late proprietors of Carolina. Therefore, all the territory, seas, waters, and harbors, with their appurtenances, lying between the line above described, and the south line of the State of Virginia, which begins on the sea-shore in thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude, and from thence runs west, agreeable to the said charter of King Charles, are the right and property of the people of this State to be held in sovereignty."

And to remark to you, that, years after, the State of North Carolina was received into, and signed the articles of confederation.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient humble servant,

WM. BLOUNT,
Agent for North Carolina.

BENJAMIN HAWKINS, ANDREW PICKENS, JOSEPH MARTIN, and LAUGHLIN McINTOSH, Esquires,
Commissioners for negotiating with the Southern Indians.

B. No. 2.

HOPEWELL ON THE KEOWEE, November 28, 1785.

GENTLEMEN:

The State of North Carolina have at this time a law in force and use, allotting the lands contained in the following bounds to the Cherokee Indians: "Beginning on the Tennessee river, where the southern boundary of the State of North Carolina intersects the same nearest the Chickamoga towns; thence, up the middle of the Tennessee and Holston rivers, to the middle of French Broad river; thence, up the middle of the said French Broad river; (which lines are not to include any island to the mouth of Big Pigeon river) thence, up the same, to the head thereof; thence, along the dividing ridge between the waters of Pigeon river and Tuckasegee river, to the said southern boundary; thence, west with the said boundary, to the beginning."

Should you, by treaty, fix any other boundaries than the before mentioned, within the limits of the said State of North Carolina, between the said Cherokee Indians and her citizens, that State will consider such a treaty a violation and infringement upon her legislative rights. The lands contained within the limits of Davidson county, which begins on Cumberland river, where the northern boundary of the said State of North Carolina first intersects the same; thence, south forty-five miles; thence, west to the Tennessee river; thence, down the Tennessee, to the said northern boundary; thence, east with the said boundary to the beginning, have been appropriated by the State of North Carolina, to the payment of the bounties of land promised to the officers and soldiers of the continental line of that State; and it is said that the militia in that county are in number about seven hundred; and the State of North Carolina have sold to her citizens, for a valuable consideration, several millions of acres of the land, situate, lying, and being between the Mississippi, and the line as fixed by Colonel Christie, and others, in the year 1777, and without the limits of Davidson county, on which land several thousands of people are settled.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient humble servant,

WM. BLOUNT,
Agent for North Carolina.

BENJAMIN HAWKINS, ANDREW PICKENS, JOSEPH MARTIN, and LAUGHLIN McINTOSH, Esquires,
Commissioners for treating with the Southern Indians.

COPY OF COLONEL BLOUNT'S PROTEST.

HOPEWELL ON KEOWEE, November 28, 1785.

The underwritten agent, on the part of the State of North Carolina, protests against the treaty, at this instant, about to be signed and entered into, between Benjamin Hawkins, Andrew Pickens, Joseph Martin, and Laughlin McIntosh, commissioners on the part of the United States, and the Cherokee Indians on the other part, as containing several stipulations which infringe and violate the legislative rights of the State.

WM. BLOUNT.

A COPY OF THE COMMISSIONERS' ANSWER TO COLONEL BLOUNT'S LETTERS AND PROTEST.

HOPEWELL ON KEOWEE, 28th November, 1785.

SIR:

We received your letters, of the 22d of November, with an extract from the constitution of your State, declarative of the limits thereof; of the 28th, enclosing an abstract of an act allotting certain lands to the Indians of the Cherokee nation, and your protest of the same date, against the treaty entered into between the commissioners of the United States of America and all the Cherokees; which we shall transmit to Congress.

We enclose two articles of the treaty to you, which, we hope, as agent of the State of North Carolina, you will take measures to see executed, so far as the same respect the citizens of that State, or the faith of the commissioners pledged for the restoration of the prisoners now held there. We are informed that the late Governor Martin made an unsuccessful effort to restore them, and that there are five, three girls and two boys, in the possession of General McDowel and Colonel Miller. We are certain that a steady adherence to the treaty alone, can ensure confidence in the justice of Congress, and remove all causes of future contention or quarrels. The local policy of some States is certainly much opposed to federal measures, which can only, in our opinion, make us respectable abroad and happy at home.

We are, with due respect, sir, your most obedient and most humble servants,

B. HAWKINS,
A. PICKENS,
J. MARTIN,
L. McINTOSH.

The Honorable WILLIAM BLOUNT, Esquire,
Agent for North Carolina.

N. B. The two articles enclosed are the second and fourth.

C. No. 1.

WINNSBOROUGH, October 13, 1788.

Sir:

I do myself the honor of writing you the different occurrences respecting the people on the frontiers of North Carolina, and the Cherokee Indians, transpired since my last.

In consequence of hearing that several outrages had been committed by the people of Franklin, (formerly called the new State) upon the Cherokees, I despatched a letter to the Governor of North Carolina, to put a stop to any further hostilities, as it was the wish of Congress to carry into effect a treaty with that nation. Not receiving an immediate answer from him, and having reason to believe these depredations continued, I sent a copy of the enclosed, addressed to the officers commanding on the frontiers of that State, which I hope will be attended with every good consequence. You will also find enclosed a copy of a letter I have lately received from the Governor; on comparing these, it will point out to you the similarity of our ideas relative to the establishment of peace in that quarter, previous to the late resolution of Congress coming to hand.

I shall avail myself of the earliest opportunity of making known to the Executive of North Carolina, the further supplies granted by Congress for carrying the treaty into effect, which I hope may take place without the trouble and expense of marching troops from the northward, urging the Governor to send on their commissioner with the needful, and to name the time and place. The answer, with their determination, you may rely on having transmitted you as soon as possible. I beg leave further to observe, I have enclosed to the Cherokees the proclamation of Congress, and at the same time, requested a suspension of hostilities should take place.

I have the honor to be, with esteem, sir, your most humble servant,

RICHARD WINN.

The Honorable General Knox,
Secretary of War.

P. S. Your favor of the 4th September, enclosing the proclamation of Congress, with the duplicate, I have to acknowledge, since writing the above.

C. No. 2.

WINNSBOROUGH, 29th August, 1788.

FRIENDS AND BROTHER SOLDIERS:

I write this to you in behalf of the United States, to intreat you to desist from any further hostilities against the Cherokees, as it is the wish of Congress to be at peace with every tribe of Indians whatever; and as they have directed me to secure that peace by a permanent treaty, your own good sense must convince you how impossible it will be for me to effect it while these outrages on both sides exist. Besides, what have we not to apprehend, if it is not put a stop to? A junction may take place with the Southern Indians, and, both united, may involve the innocent lives of thousands; perhaps when, by a well-timed peace, nothing of the kind could ever happen.

I have daily expected an interference between you and the Indians would have taken place, from the Governor of North Carolina; but as I have received no accounts from him of that nature, I cannot, consistent with my duty to the Union, hear of these unhappy dissensions continuing, without emotion; therefore, let me again, in the most friendly manner, exhort you to a suspension of arms till such times as I hear from Congress, to whom I have wrote for further supplies to facilitate a treaty as soon as possible, at which time, I am convinced, all grievances will be adjusted. The Indians I shall write to, to the same purport, and as I have been at a deal of pains to get proper persons to bear to both parties my ideas on the matter, I hope it will be attended with every good consequence, by your religiously observing, on both sides, a strict neutrality till the treaty is brought about. Any further information you can receive from Captain Baker, who is the bearer of this, and who is a gentleman I particularly recommend to your notice. Wishing to hear from you as soon as possible,

I am, friends and brother soldiers, your obedient servant,

RICHARD WINN.

To General MARTIN and others,

C. No. 3.

EDENTON, 31st August, 1788.

Sir:

The information which you did me the honor to favor me with in your letter of the ninth, had reached me some time past. I had given orders for a process to issue to apprehend Sevier, and had directed the commanding officer on the frontier to pursue a line of conduct similar to that pointed out in your letter. It gives me pleasure to find that your ideas in this particular so intimately correspond with the measures I have adopted to restore and preserve the peace of the frontier.

I am, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

SAMUEL JOHNSTON.

To RICHARD WINN, Esquire,

C. No. 4

WINNSBOROUGH, December 13th, 1788.

Sir:

Notwithstanding I have received no late accounts from Congress, I judge it necessary to continue giving every information that occurs, relative to the Indians of this department.

Since I wrote you last, the enclosed talk from the head-men and warriors of the Cherokee nation, came to hand, which fully points out their disposition to come to a friendly treaty. I have urged the same to the State of North Carolina, trusting they will send forward their commissioner and supplies. Should this step not be taken, and that State still continue to do them injury, I fear the disappointment of the Indians will be attended with bad consequences, as, in all probability, the Union may be involved in a bloody and unnecessary war, whereas a well timed peace would prevent it.

Sir, I have the honor to be, with respect, your obedient servant,

RICHARD WINN.

The Honorable Major General H. Knox, Secretary of War.

C. No. 5.

A talk from the head-men and warriors of the Cherokee nation, at a meeting held at Ustinair, the beloved town, 20th November, 1788, addressed to the honorable Richard Winn, Esquire, superintendent of the southern department, in answer to a talk sent by him, dated the 12th October, 1788.

FRIEND AND BROTHER: We received your talk, likewise the resolves of Congress, dated 1st September, 1788, likewise a copy of a letter from the Governor of North Carolina to you, and the proclamation from Congress, all which affords us much satisfaction that we have in you a real friend, who tells us the truth, and endeavors to do us justice. It likewise gives us much satisfaction to hear from Congress and Virginia.

BROTHER: You have opened our eyes and likewise our hearts. The talks we received from you, pleases us much; that Congress is determined to have our hunting grounds open, so that our young men may hunt and kill deer to purchase goods of our traders, to clothe ourselves and families. Our hunting grounds were very small, now it gives us the greatest satisfaction that they will be soon enlarged, as appears by the proclamation from Congress. It likewise gives us much satisfaction, that we have a view of returning from the woods where we have been driven, and once more settling again in our old towns, which we propose to do, when we are certain that the white people have quitted our hunting grounds.

BROTHER: It affords us much satisfaction that a friendly talk will soon take place. You inform us you have wrote to the Governor of North Carolina, to fix a time and place for that purpose; at that time we will talk over all matters and smoke the pipe of friendship.

The head-men and warriors from the middle settlement, were on their way to Ustinaire, but being informed that it was good talks, and that white beads and tobacco were sent from Ustinaire to all the towns in the nation, they went back, fearing that some of their young men might go out again and do mischief: the headmen are determined to put a stop to all hostilities, and for the time to come, to live like brothers and friends as long as the sun shines and water runs.

The following talk comes from the Little Turkey;

FRIEND AND BROTHER: Your talk I have heard, which gives me the greatest satisfaction, likewise all our beloved men in my part of the nation. It is a talk from you, our great beloved brother, who, I am informed, is appointed by Congress to see justice done us: we have now heard from our beloved brother from New York, likewise from Virginia, which now opens our eyes and our hearts, for they are the men we must abide by. Your talks are good, and your friendships we look on sincere, for the good of our land. I have seen the resolves of Congress, likewise the proclamation, for all the white people settled on our hunting grounds to go off without loss of time.

FRIEND AND BROTHER: I have the satisfaction to inform you, that Alexander McGillivray, chief of the Creek nation, has taken your talks, likewise the talks from Congress and Virginia, and means to hold them first, and when they meet, will take his white brothers by the hand as we do, and hopes to live in peace and friendship as long as the grass grows and the water runs.

A copy of this talk you will please to send to Congress and Virginia; it will be two moons before every thing can be settled to your entire satisfaction, because some of our beloved men are out a hunting. As for the prisoners, it is impossible to send them to Seneca at this time, because they are scattered through the nation, but they shall be restored to their friends as soon as possible; we shall have all of them collected together; orders are given out that they may be used well, that my people should not be reflected upon hereafter for using their prisoners ill: this you will please to acquaint their friends, and hope they will make themselves easy for a short time.

FRIEND AND BROTHER: We must inform you that we look upon the white people that live in the new State, very deceitful; we have experienced them, and are much afraid of them; we are now obliged to keep spies out continually on the frontiers, fearing they will return and do us an injury as they did before.

FRIEND AND BROTHER: We must inform you, that there are some Creeks out and some of our people, that are not yet come in; if any mischief should be done, that is contrary to our desire; but on their return will all be stopt, and all hostilities cease against the white people, and the path made white. We must inform you that several talks that have been directed to the head-men and warriors at Ustinaire, have been opened before we received them. Your last talk came under cover to Mr. Gegg, and by him delivered in the square at Ustinaire, to our beloved men. We do not approve of any person opening any talks that come from our white brothers, except Mr. Gegg, who explains them to us, or our linguister, James Carry. The boy we had prisoner at Coosawatchee, we are informed, is delivered to Jesse Spears, in order that he may be conveyed down to Seneca; the girl is not yet come to her friends, but we presume she is in the land. We now have finished our talk; in token of friendship and peace, we have enclosed a string of white wampum.

C. No. 6.

LONG ISLAND, HOSLTON RIVER, 15th January, 1789.

SIR:

I had the honor to receive two letters from your office, bearing date the 22d of August last past, one by way of Virginia, the other North Carolina, enclosing sundry resolves of Congress, also proclamations: they came to hand the 9th day of October last—that day being appointed by the field officers of Washington district, to meet and concert some plan for carrying an expedition against the Cherokee Indians, which was agreed on in the following manner: Resolved, That fifteen hundred men be immediately draughted out of Washington district; that each captain of a company see their men well armed, and ten days' provision for each man. Before the council rose, your despatches came to hand, which I immediately laid before them, which put a final stop to any further proceeding on that head.

The next morning I sat out for my plantation in South Carolina, where some of the Indians had retreated to, in order to escape Mr. Sevier, with a view to send some runners of them through their nation and collect their chiefs together; that I would meet them at any place they might desire, and lay before them several resolves of Congress, which would be very satisfactory to them, also a letter from the Governor of North Carolina. But on my way thither, at Major Taylor's, at Seneca, was informed, a few hours before my arrival there, two gentlemen from Virginia, by order of Government, had called two of the Indian chiefs there, and had done some business with them, and the Indians set out for their nation. On which, I despatched a runner after them, and brought them back, and read to them the resolves of Congress, and the proclamation. On which, the Hanging Maw rose up and took me by the arm, and said, by this hold, I will settle all further quarrels; you and myself are always the men that make peace. When our young men differ, we are the men that make every thing straight; I will instantly go to my nation, and put a stop to war; you shall shortly hear from me. The talks we then had together, I sent them with a copy, which I expect has come to your hand long before now. The next talk I had, I enclosed you, No. 1. I then despatched a messenger to Eastwley, requesting some of the chiefs, of my acquaintance, to come to my plantation, where we might talk face to face. They attended accordingly. I then and there read to them the several resolves of Congress, to me directed, also the proclamation, and impressed on their minds the justness of Congress for their safety, also the consequence that might attend to those regardless of that power. After which, William Elders, one of their chief warriors, rose up and spoke, which you will see in No. 2. After he had finished his talk, he tells me his nation was for peace, and was desirous of returning to their old towns; but that they had no way of sustenance; that while they lived out in the hunting ground, they could get meat, and those that went to the Creeks could yet corn; that he feared they must all join the Creek Indians or perish. I then asked him if they could get corn if they all would return to their old towns? His answer was, they most certainly would, if the white people were moved off their lands. I then told him I would, at my own expense, furnish Citico, a town I formerly lived in, and would lay a statement of their distressed situation before Congress: perhaps they might take pity on them, which seemed to have a wonderful effect on this warrior. In a short time after, several old women from that town, applied to me for salt to purchase corn with from other towns. All of whom I furnished, and sent them back well pleased. In the intermediate time, I went over to a plantation I had in Georgia; the evening of my arrival at that place, I was attacked by a party of Creek Indians. In the skirmish, my overseer was badly wounded; I was obliged to take to the house, leaving them masters of the field; they took off my horses, with several others, leaving one of their warriors dead on the ground.

I am well assured that, with prudent means, we may have the Cherokee Indians our friends; but it is to be feared there is a party that has such a thirst for the Cherokee lands, they will take every measure in their power to prevent a treaty. You will observe, in the talks sent on in October last, that the Hanging Maw said, all hostilities should cease. Before he reached the nation, 400 Creek Indians were come out, were joined by 1200 Cherokees, had marched against the frontiers, and had stormed a fort and took 23 prisoners before the runners overtook them. The whole frontier country seemed then to be in their power. The then hostile Indians had several companies of horse, equip from the Creek nation, commanded by white men from that quarter. As soon as runners overtook them, and informed that Congress had sent to them, they returned, leaving a letter addressed to Mr. Sevier and myself, saying they were then on their own ground, and did not intend to go any farther; that the prisoners they should take care of; that they did not wish to spill any more blood; that they would allow the people thirty days to move off their lands. After which the superintendent sent to them to meet him at Hopewell or Keowee, which they did; two of the commissioners met also, who gave the Indians the greatest reasons to believe all hostilities between them and the white people would cease; the Indians went off well pleased; but, a few days after, when all the Indians were ordered out by their warriors to make their winter's hunts, that war was no longer to be dreaded by them, being well assured by the commissioners of the same, Mr. Sevier went to one of their towns, took off 29 prisoners, and plundered the town; which actings of Mr. Sevier made great confusion again, but by the early interposition of General Pickens and some others, that affront was allayed, alleging those Indian prisoners taken by Mr. Sevier were to exchange for those taken by them. Another misfortune happened shortly after that: a party of men went to where some Indians were hunting, under a color to trade with them for furs, which they had at their camp, took an advantage, and shot two of the Indians dead, and plundered their camp.

I fear no regulations to confirm a peace, so much the desire of the well-disposed citizen, will take place with the arrival of the troops ordered by Congress.

I have promised to see the Indians again some time in April next; if Congress thinks proper to send on any talks to them, I think it will be of essential service towards forwarding the treaty.

Any commands you will honor me with, will meet me at my seat at fort Patrick Henry, Long Island, Holston river, Sullivan county, North Carolina.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient and most humble servant,

JOS. MARTIN.

The Hon. H. Knox, Secretary of War,
or, in his absence, the next in command.

A Talk from the Head-men and Warriors of the Cherokees, now met at their beloved town of Ustinaire, 1st November, 1783, addressed to Brigadier General Martin.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

We hear that you are at Tascola, and that you are the great warrior of North Carolina and the new State. Your people provoked us first to war, by settling on our lands and killing our beloved men; however, we have laid by the hatchet, and are strongly for peace. Now we have heard from our brother, also from Congress, likewise the Governor of Virginia, who tells us that the people settled on our hunting grounds shall be removed without loss of time, which gives us great satisfaction. As we told you before, we are strongly for peace; we do not want any more war; we hope you will keep your people now at peace, and not to disturb us as they have done. When these people move, we shall all be friends and brothers. There are a great many Creeks out; if they should do your people any injury we hope you will not lay the blame on us, for all our head-men and warriors will prevent our young people for the future to do the white people any injury, but they expect they will move off their land.

The talk from Congress, and the talk likewise from the Governor of Virginia, we have taken fast hold of, and will remember, because they are good, and strongly desirous to live in the greatest friendship with their red brothers. We should be glad to receive a talk from you, if it is a good one, and for hereafter to live in peace and friendship. We desire you will let our friends and brothers in North Carolina hear this talk, which we hope will be the means to procure that peace and friendship we so strongly desire. We are your friends and brothers.

DEAR SIR: I send you a talk from the head-men and warriors met at Ustinaire, on the 1st instant, which I hope will give you satisfaction, and prevent a war. I should always be glad to receive a line from you.

I am, dear sir, your most obedient humble servant,

C. No. 8.

BROTHER:

We have been long acquainted with you, and know you to be our friend; but what is the reason Congress has not moved those people from off our lands before now? You were one of the beloved men that spoke for Congress at Keowee three years ago; you then said the people should move off in six moons from that time; but near forty moons are past and they are not gone yet. We well remember, whenever we are invited into a treaty, as observed by us at that time, and bounds are fixed, that the white people settle much faster on our lands than they did before. It must certainly be the case, they think we will not break the peace directly, and they will strengthen themselves and keep the lands. You know this to be the case. You told us at the treaty, if any white people settled on our lands we might do as we pleased with them. They come and settle close by our towns, and some of the Chicamoga people came, contrary to our desire, and killed a family; and the white people came and drove us out of our towns, and killed some of our beloved men, and several women and little children, although we could not help what the Chicamoga people does. You know that well. We are now like wolves, ranging about the woods to get something to eat. Nothing to be seen in our towns but bones, weeds, and grass. But, for all this, we will lie still; we will not do any more mischief if the white people will stop. I am but a boy, but my eyes are open, and wherever I turn them, many young men turn with them. I here give you this string of white beads, as a token of my friendship to you; also I present you with a string in the name of your brother John Watts; he says he holds you fast by the hand, but he cannot see you yet, as he is in great trouble about his uncle. But the Corn-tassel will come to your house towards the spring, and stay a great while with you, as it will be very hungry times with him then.

WILLIAM ELDERS.

FORT PATRICK HENRY, Sullivan Co. N. Carolina, February 2, 1789.

SIR:

I have certain accounts that some designing men on the Indian lands have assembled themselves to the number of fifteen, and call themselves a convention of the people, and have entered into several resolves, which they say they will lay before Congress; one of which resolves is, to raise men by subscription to defend themselves, as the Legislature of North Carolina refuses to protect them on the Indian lands, but, on the contrary, have directed and ordered those people off the Indian lands. A certain Alexander Outlaw by name, I am informed, is to wait upon Congress on behalf of this new plan. I think it my duty to say the truth of him: Shortly after the murder of the Corn-tassel and two other chiefs, this said Outlaw collected a party of men and went into an Indian town called Citico, where he found a few helpless women and children, which he inhumanly murdered, exposing their private parts in the most shameful manner, leaving a young child, with both its arms broke, alive, at the breast of its dead mother. These are facts well known and cannot be denied in this country. Mr. Outlaw has done every thing in his power to drive the Indians to desperation, although I find some complaint by the said Outlaw against me, for carrying on an expedition against the Cherokee Indians without orders from Government. I have once stated that matter to you, but, least that may not have come to hand, I beg leave to state the facts to you. In the month of May last, a boat, richly laden, was going down Tennessee to Cumberland, the crew were decoyed by the Chicamoga Indians and Creeks together, all of which crew were killed and taken prisoners; after which doings, the Corn-tassel informed me of the cruel murder they had committed, also the repeated murders and robberies they were constantly committing on the frontiers of Cumberland and Kentucky, also on the Kentucky road, in company with the Creeks. There was not the least hopes of reclaiming them as long as they lived so far detached from their nations. That the Corn-tassel had talked to them until he found it was of no use; that he, with the other chiefs, advised and thought it best to go against them and burn their towns, by which means they would return to their allegiance; that then they would have it in their power to govern them. This the Indian chiefs urged in the strongest terms, which account I laid before the Executive of North Carolina, who advised that peace should be offered them, and, if refused by the Indians, that then the principal officers of Washington district should pursue such measures as to them should appear most likely to put a stop to those merciless Indians on the frontiers and roads. It was unanimously agreed to march against Chicamoga, but by no means to give offence to the Cherokees, which has been a means of uniting the Chicamoga Indians to the other Indians. It will now be our own faults if we do not make all that race of Indians our friends.

So great the thirst for Indian lands prevails, that every method will be taken by a party of people to prevent a treaty with the Indians. They are now laboring to draw some of the Indians to a treaty, as they may purchase their country: this party say, if they can purchase of the Indians, they will have it without the consent of any other power; that the Indians have an undoubted right to it, and not Congress; that if they could only prevail on a few of the lower class to come into their scheme, they would get conveyances made and contend for the right. This I have heard from them.

I this moment have received a talk from the Chickasaw Indians, which I enclose you.

I have the honor, with much respect, to be, your most humble and most obedient servant,

JOS. MARTIN.

The Honorable H. KNOX, Secretary of War,
or, in his absence, the next in command.

WINNSBOROUGH, March 1, 1789.

SIR:

I think it necessary to inform you, that a treaty will take place with the Cherokee Indians, the third Monday in May next; at the Upper War-ford, on French Broad river, in the neighborhood of Swananno, State of North Carolina.

The Creek Indians, 'tis supposed, will also treat; they are now holding a great talk in their nation, the result of which is not yet come to hand.

I have the honor to subscribe myself, your most obedient servant,

RICHARD WINN.

No. 4.

Gen. Knox, Secretary of War, to the President of the United States.

THE CHICKASAWS.

This nation of Indians were estimated by the commissioners, in 1785, at 800 warriors; other opinions make them amount to 1200.

The lines of their territory between the Cherokees and Choctaws, do not appear precisely fixed. Their limits, established by the treaty hereafter mentioned, are bounded on the north by the ridge which divides the waters running into the Cumberland, from those running into the Tennessee. The Mississippi on the west, the Choctaws and the Creeks on the south, and the Cherokees on the east.

The United States formed a treaty with the Chickasaw nation, at Hopewell, the 10th of January, 1786, which was entered on the journals of Congress, April 17th, 1786.

By this treaty, they acknowledge themselves to be under the protection of the United States, and of no other sovereign whatsoever. A tract of land is reserved for a trading post, to the use and under the Government of the United States, of a circle of five miles diameter, at the lower post of the Muscle Shoals, at the mouth or junction of the Ocochappo with the Tennessee. The land transportation from the head of the Ocochappo, to the head of the most northerly part of the Mobile river, is said not to exceed thirty-five miles.

The distance of this nation from the frontier settlements being so great, is the principal reason that no complaints have been made of the encroachments of the whites.

In the year 1787, they sent one of the warriors of their nation to Congress, to represent the distressed situation of the Cherokees; and that, unless the encroachments of the whites were restrained, they should be obliged to join the Cherokees; and, also, to enforce the establishment of trade agreeably to the treaty.

THE CHOCTAWS.

This nation of Indians were estimated by the commissioners of the United States, at 6,000 warriors; other opinions state them at 4,500 or 5,000.

Their principal towns or villages are on the head waters of the Pascagoula and Pearl rivers. They are mostly to the northward of the 31st degree of latitude; but some of them are to the southward of it, within the territory of Spain.

Both the Chickasaws and Choctaws are represented as candid, generous, brave, and honest, and understanding each other's language.

The commissioners of the United States concluded a treaty with the Choctaws at Hopewell, on the 3d of January, 1786, and the same is entered on the journals of Congress, the 16th of April, 1786.

By this treaty, the Choctaws acknowledged themselves to be under the protection of the United States, and of no other sovereign whatsoever. And three tracts, or parcels of land, each of six miles square, for the establishment of trading posts, are reserved to the use of the Government of the United States, at such places as they shall think proper.

The distance of the Choctaws has also prevented, hitherto, those encroachments which have been complained of by the Cherokees.

In the year 1787, they sent Tobocah, one of their great medal chiefs, to Congress, principally in order to solicit the establishment of trade.

All which is humbly submitted to the President of the United States.

H. KNOX.

WAR OFFICE, 7th day of July, 1789.

SENEGA ON KEOWEE, December 30, 1785.

SIR:

The commissioners have been much longer executing the duties of the commission, than they at first had any idea of. As I informed you from Charleston, of the last of September, we were under the necessity of postponing the time of meeting, both at Galphinton and this place, one month later than the original appointment, that the Indians might have full time, and that all delays be avoided. Accordingly, the commissioners, Mr. Perry excepted, met at Galphinton, the 24th and 28th of October; and although we had had assurances that the chiefs of the Creek nation would meet us there, yet, from some cause, not clearly known, we were met only by the representatives of two towns who had been friendly to us. This disappointment was the more unexpected, as we knew a majority of the nation to be pleased with our invitation, and very anxious of establishing with us a permanent peace; perhaps I might attribute it to the intrigues of the neighboring Spanish officers, and to Alexander McGillivray, a half breed, of great abilities and consequential rank in his nation, and who has lately had permission to form connexions with, and establish British commercial houses for the supply of the Indians. He is also an agent of Spain, with a salary of six hundred dollars per annum, paid monthly.

We did not think proper to enter into a treaty with the heads of these towns only, and after explaining to them the object of the United States, we dismissed them, with a few presents, as they had been friendly to us most of the late war.

The commissioners of Georgia attended, and protested against every thing we had done, or should do, founded on our commission, "except in such cases only, as may, or shall lead to continue principles of friendship, and to explain the great occurrences of the late war." And after we left Galphinton, the agents of that State entered into a treaty with the Indians then present, and obtained from them a cession of all the lands south of the Altamaha, and eastward of a line to be run southwest from the junction of the Oconee and Oakmulgee, until it shall strike St. Mary's, with a confirmation of the cession northeast of the Oconee in 1783.

The 17th November we arrived here, and were met in a few days by nine hundred and eighteen Cherokees, with whom, on the 28th, we entered into a treaty. They were anxiously desirous of being under the protection of the United States, thereby to be secured in the possession of their hunting grounds from the avidity of land speculation. They had for some time past lost all confidence in promises made them by the neighboring States, as well as the citizens thereof. They saw their situation with despondency, until they were informed of the humane and liberal views of Congress; and then, with joy and gladness, they embraced the protection we offered them, and I believe would have submitted their fate to the decision of the United States without a negative. Colonel William Blount, as agent for North Carolina, is with us, and he has entered a protest against the treaty, and the commissioners of Georgia were present, and gave us a second protest, which, with the treaty, and all our proceedings thereon, I shall send forward as early as practicable.

The 4th instant, the commissioners agreed to adjourn, and report their proceedings; and Joseph Martin and Laughlin McIntosh set out for their respective homes, leaving Mr. Pickens and myself to discharge the Indians, to wind up every thing, and close the report. The ninth, we received advice from Captain Woods, that the chiefs of the Choctaws were on the way, and would be here in this month. Mr. Martin hearing of it, returned on the 27th; but Mr. McIntosh was so far on his way home, as to prevent his having advice in time, although I wrote for him immediately on the receipt of the information. The Choctaws arrived on the 26th, after a fatiguing journey of seventy-seven days, the whole of them almost naked. The Creeks endeavored all they could to prevent their coming, by false information, stealing of horses, &c.; but they have apparently a rooted aversion to the Spaniards and Creeks, and are determined to put themselves under the protection of the United States. This day, we shall commence our negotiations with them; we should have done it sooner, but the Chiefs told us they were so naked, they must first receive some clothing; and we yesterday gave to eighteen, coats in the uniform of the late army, with other necessaries to dress them, and we foresee that there are no difficulties to oppose; but that in a few days we shall finish our treaty with them. Some of the Chickasaws are here, and the representation from the nation expected to arrive every day; and the same spirit actuates them as the Choctaws, so that, in a few days, our negotiations will be complete, except with the Creeks, and all difficulties respecting them removed.

On the article of expense, we have had our fears, and knowing the sum to which we were limited would be exhausted too soon, unless we contracted our original plan, we were under the necessity of dismissing our guard three weeks past, and do our business without one. This opportunity does not admit our writing farther.

We are, with due respect, sir, your most obedient servants,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS,
ANDREW PICKENS,

The Honorable CHARLES THOMSON, Esq.

No. 2

HOPWELL, 4th of January, 1786.

SIR:

The 28th of November, we had the honor to enclose your Excellency the treaty we entered into with the Cherokees, and all the papers respecting the same. At that period, we did not suppose we should be able to meet any other of the tribes this winter. A few days after, we received an express from Colonel John Woods, informing us of the approach of the Choctaws, and they arrived here on the 26th. They had been on the path from the 16th of October, and had experienced great difficulties from the badness of the way, the scarcity of clothing and provisions, and the frequent interruptions of the Creeks by stealing their horses, and we were, from motives of humanity, at their arrival, under the necessity of clothing the whole of them, as the weather was very cold, and they were nearly naked, before we commenced our negotiations with the chiefs. The third instant, we concluded a treaty with them, which we enclose to your Excellency, with our journal and other papers respecting the same.

The Indians seem to comprehend very well every article, and we have taken great pains to explain it to them, as well as the humane views of Congress towards all the tribes of Indians within the United States of America.

We had some difficulty in finding out how we should ascertain the bounds of the lands allotted to the Choctaws, and could not fix them other than as in the third article; and knowing the avidity of land speculation would take any possible advantage, we fixed on the 29th of November, 1782, the day before the signing of our preliminary articles with Great Britain, that being, as we conceived, the earliest period in our power.

The Indians were well satisfied with the treaty, and with the treatment they met with, and expressed their gratitude for it. But we could perceive their strong hankering after presents could not be abated, by the prudent method we adopted of clothing them comfortably, or by our liberality in the treaty. They are the greatest beggars, and the most indolent creatures we ever saw, and yet honest, simple, and regardless of any situation of distress. Their passion for gambling and drinking is very great; we have had instances of their selling blankets at a pint of rum each, and gambling them away, when they had no prospect of replacing them, and knew they must return this winter five hundred miles to their nation with a shirt only. They were very little accustomed to travelling, and we should not have had them here, had we not supplied them with provisions on the road. And that they may return without starving, through indolence, we were necessitated to pack up some proper goods, and put them under the care of the interpreter and the four chiefs, for the purpose of procuring provisions.

The Spaniards were desirous of preventing them from meeting us; and Mr. McGillivray, by their order, took pains to stop them as they passed through the Creeks. But they were determined to go to Congress, rather than not form some connexion with us. They have strong regard for the British, and an exalted idea of the military prowess of the United States; and they urge, that as the latter conquered the former, they are the fittest persons on earth for them to apply to for protection.

The chiefs produced their medals and commissions, and were very desirous of exchanging for those under the United States. They were also desirous of having three stand of colors, for their upper and lower towns, and six villages, and an agent to superintend their business. Captain John Woods is recommended by two of their chiefs, and he is a man of some enterprise and ability, but much addicted to strong drink. He came in with the Indians, and has been at much trouble with them.

We have appointed John Pitchlynn our interpreter of the Choctaw tongue. We have told him that we did not know whether Congress would annex any salary to such an appointment; he is a very honest, sober young man, and has lived twelve years in the nation, and is much respected by the chiefs as an interpreter.

The presents we have given the Indians, and the goods for the purchase of provisions, amount to 1,181 dollars.

We have the honor to be, with sincere esteem, sir, your Excellency's most obedient humble servants,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS,
ANDREW PICKENS,
JOS. MARTIN.

No. 3.

HOPEWELL, 14th January, 1786.

SIR:

We have the honor to enclose to your Excellency, a treaty we entered into with the Chickasaws on the 10th instant. They had been as long on the path as the Choctaws; but coming through the Cherokees, were better supplied with provisions, and experienced less difficulties, except from the villanous practice of horse stealing, which has taken deep root among them as well as the Creeks.

We found no difficulty in our treaty with these Indians, who are the most honest and well informed, as well as the most orderly and best governed of any we have seen. The trading posts reserved to the use of the United States, are situated in the most convenient place within the whole of their lands. It is within sixty miles of their towns, and one hundred of the Choctaws' upper towns. The lands on the north side of the river are very fit for cultivation and for grazing.

Through the whole of our negotiations, we have paid particular attention to the rights and interests of the United States, as far as our abilities could comprehend them, regardless of the protests of the adjoining States against us. Finding, from the delays of the Indians, and the particular circumstances attending the negotiations, that our expenses would exceed the sums we had provided for, and even the sum to which we were restricted by Congress, and without completing the object of our commission, we were necessitated to discharge our guard early in December, and meet the Indians without them, and curtail every expense that could possibly be avoided; and yet, after all, they have exceeded our wishes.

By this treaty, the boundary of the lands allotted to the respective tribes is closed on every side, from the south fork of Oconee, around northerly and westwardly; and we verily believe, that, if the adjoining States were disposed to carry the treaties into effect, the Indians would be happy in the new change of sovereignty, and in constant amity with us.

The Chickasaws will leave us to-morrow. We have given them presents amounting to six hundred and thirty-nine and three-fifths dollars, including some goods for the purchase of provisions. The Choctaws left us on the 12th.

The commissioners of Georgia returned home after the treaty with the Cherokees. The agent of North Carolina continued with us, and we enclose his letter and protest.

We have the honor to be, with sincere esteem, sir, your Excellency's most obedient humble servants,

BENJAMIN HAWKINS,
ANDREW PICKENS,
JOS. MARTIN.

HOPEWELL, the 7th January, 1786.

The Commissioners Plenipotentiary of the United States in Congress assembled, appointed to treat with the Cherokees, and all other Indians southward of them, within the limits of the United States, assembled. Present: Benjamin Hawkins, Andrew Pickens, and Joseph Martin. From the State of North Carolina, William Blount, Esq. Agent, and James Cole, Interpreter.

The commissioners were informed that the leading chiefs of the Chickasaws, with their followers, had arrived, and were desirous of seeing the commissioners and entering upon their business as early as practicable. That they had been long on the path, and detained by the villany of the Cherokees, some of whom had stolen several of their horses. They were introduced, and expressed a most friendly disposition towards the United States, and an earnest desire of entering into a treaty of peace and protection with them. The commissioners, after explaining the object of their commission, informed the chiefs that they would, on Monday, or as early as would be convenient for them, enter upon the business.

9th of January.

Present as on the 7th.

The leading chiefs attended at 10 o'clock, and, after some friendly conversation, the commissioners addressed the leading chiefs as follow, viz:

LEADING CHIEFS WHO REPRESENT THE CHICKASAWS: We are the commissioners plenipotentiary from the United States, in Congress assembled, who sent an invitation to you, the leading chiefs, who represent the Chickasaws, to meet us at this place, to give you peace, and to receive you into the favor and protection of the United States, and to remove, as far as may be, all causes of future contention or quarrels. That you, your wives, and your children, may be happy, and feel and know the blessings of the new change of sovereignty over this land which you and we inhabit.

This humane and generous act of the United States will, no doubt, be received by all the Chickasaws with joy and gladness, and held in grateful remembrance, particularly as it flows unsolicited from their justice, their humanity, and their attention to the rights of human nature.

On our own parts, we sincerely wish you to live as happily as we do ourselves, and to promote that happiness as far as in our power, regardless of any distinction of color, or of any differences in our customs or manners, or particular situation; and as a proof of the sincerity of our declarations, we propose to enter into articles of a treaty, as equal as may be, conformable to what we now tell you.

After this address, the chiefs were told, that, at some future period, the occurrences of the late war, and the extent of territory within the United States, would be fully explained to them. To which Piomingo replied, he wished to hear every thing intended to be communicated to him, prior to his talks. The whole was accordingly explained, and, apparently, to their satisfaction and comprehension. The draught of the treaty was also explained, with which they seemed to acquiesce most heartily.

The leading chiefs then, in turn, addressed the commissioners.

PIOMINGO.—The period has arrived that I have visited you to see you, and to regulate every thing that respects us. These beads are our credentials of peace and friendship, and two of us have come to bring the talks of the nation. These white beads are of little value but in our nation, where they are kept even by our children, with veneration, as tokens of peace and friendship. When I take you by the hands, the day will never come, that discord will break my hold. Although I may not be eloquent, yet I wish my talks to be as much esteemed as if I was, it being my sincere desire that what I say should be construed most friendly. My talks are not long, and I hope, when you see these beads, you will remember my friendship.—[Eight strands of beads.]

MINGATUSHKA.—The day is come when I have met you to talk with you, and I am well pleased; and now you shall hear what I have to say.

I have come to see you, and you are not strangers to us; you are a white people I claim as our eldest and first brothers. These beads in my hand are a token of friendship, and I hope friendly ideas will arise in your minds whenever you see them. My predecessor loved you white people in his time, and I mean to do the same. Our two old leading men are dead, and we two come as their successors in business, with the same friendly talks as they had, which were always friendly. Although our old king and leading man is dead, we wish their friendly talks may live, and be remembered with you as with us, and for that purpose we come to renew them. I hope, when your children and our children grow up, they will remember the old peace and friendship of this day, and strictly adhere to it. This is the day I have come to see you, and I have been informed of the peace of the United States of America with all nations, and I am glad of it, and wish sincerely it may long continue. The substance of my talks is done, and when we red people talk, we give beads as a proof of friendship, and I give these. My talks are short and true; when people are prolix, they sometimes are false.—[A string of beads.]

PIOMINGO.—I now represent Satopoa. He is a particular man; when he gives his word or acquiescence, he never lets go, and this is his belt: he and I are related; our sentiments are the same; our talks are short, but his token of friendship is great.—[A broad belt of wampum.] Our talks are done, our predecessors are dead, and we come and give in our talks; and now we will hear further from you.

MINGATUSHEA.—The great man of our nation who wore this medal I show you, is dead, and I am his nephew and a leader. On the death of this great man, he left a daughter, who took care of this medal, and she judged it was proper, when I came, that I should bring it, that you might see it, and know such a thing belonged to our family; and accordingly, she and her mother sent it.

PIOMINGO.—You see this now, (pointing to the medal) it was worn by our great man; he is dead; his daughter sent it for you to see it. I take place, as head leading warrior of the nation, to treat with all nations.

COMMISSIONERS.—We are glad you remember with pleasure the virtues of your old and worthy predecessors; and we are pleased that the daughter of one of them has sent us this medal, with the reasons for so doing; in return, we will give you some present for her.

As you are well pleased with the draught of our treaty, we shall prepare two copies thereof, to be signed to-morrow, the one for you, and the other for the Congress.

When the first article was read, the chief Piomingo said he had no prisoners of ours in his nation, or property of any kind. To the reservation in the third article, he at first seemed much opposed, but, on being assured by the commissioners, that they were not desirous of getting his land, and that all that would be necessary for the United States, as a trading post, would be five or six miles square, he readily acquiesced, and marked the article in the map, describing its diameter to be five miles, and remarked, at the same time, that the lands on the north of the river were fine for cultivation and grazing, and he would have no objection to our using what we might think proper for the convenience of traders.

The commissioners produced two copies of the draught agreed on, and a map of the lands in question, partly drawn by themselves, and partly by the Indians, and, instead of agreeing to the line between the respective tribes, they dotted only with black ink, which the chief observed, and said he wished Congress would point out his lands to him; he wanted to know his own. The line was then extended, as in the third article, and the commissioners told the chiefs that they must agree with the neighboring tribes respecting their boundary, and that then Congress would send a white man to be present with the Indians, and see them mark it.

The treaty was then read over again, and every article explained with great attention, and the Indians acquiesced with them; and, at the close, the commissioners asked if they comprehended the whole, and were willing to sign; they answered yes, and that it was all straight, meaning it was proper and satisfactory to them. It was then signed; but, previous thereto, the agent of North Carolina delivered a letter to the commissioners, referring them to his former letters to them, respecting the constitutional claims of North Carolina, to all the lands within the bounds described in their bill of rights. He also gave in his protest against the treaty.

The commissioners informed the chiefs, that, on to-morrow, in pursuance of the humane and liberal views of Congress, they would make them some presents for their use and comfort.

10th of January.

11th of January.

It being very wet and rainy, the chiefs postponed receiving the presents till to-morrow. In the evening, the principal warrior, Piomingo, visited the commissioners, and addressed them as follows, viz: "I am now going to inform you of the situation of the white people in our land. There are a great many of them who have numerous stocks of cattle and horses, and they are not traders, or of any advantage to us; and, when a white man comes, they, without our permission, or even asking of it, build a house for him, and settle him among us. I do not wish to be cross to them, or do them any injury; and I desire they may go in peace with their stocks to their own lands. Such people as they, are of no use to us; on the contrary, very injurious. If they were traders, I should be pleased at their being with us. They are not those in our towns only, who have stocks, but some are settled out thirty or forty miles, who keep cattle and horses; and, if an Indian horse or colt should get among their stocks, they brand him, and claim him, to the injury of the owner. Some pedlars come, also, to us, who are a pest, as they steal more than they purchase of our horses. If we had merchant traders, who would set down with us and trade properly, I should be pleased with it; such men would be a valuable acquisition to us, as they would supply us our necessary wants, in exchange for our property. You, the commissioners, have told me that we shall be properly supplied with goods, and I depend on their promise; such men as come properly to trade with us, will be very welcome, and any thing we have is at their service. But the class of settlers we now have are a pest, and I wish they would go with their property to their own lands, and enjoy it."

COMMISSIONERS.—Your remarks are very proper, and we have, in an article of the treaty, provided against a repetition of the abuse, and you will have the right to punish these, if you think proper. We shall send the treaty, and all our talks with you, to Congress, and they will issue a proclamation, warning the white people of their danger, and this will be, by some person, communicated to the chiefs of all the Southern tribes. When you return, you may, by our interpreter, communicate the article of the treaty respecting these people, that they may see their situation.

12th of January.

Present as yesterday.—Piomingo addressed the commissioners as follows:

The people I complained of last night, I imagine will not pay attention to what I say respecting their removal; and I wish that Colonel Martin would come and see them removed. My talk is a short one. I am only desirous that Colonel Martin may come and adjust every thing between the red people and white people.

The Chickasaw chiefs had also informed the commissioners that, on the way hither, they saw two companies of Creeks going to Cumberland to plunder the citizens, and, very probably, to get some scalps. That Piomingo represented to them the injustice of the act, as well as their folly, and expressly told them that the white people on Cumberland and their property were equally dear to him with his own; and that, although the Creeks were numerous, compared with the Chickasaws, yet, if they continued to rob and plunder on his lands, his own, or the hunters and traders of the white people, he would take such steps as would be proper.

The commissioners then distributed presents among the chiefs and Indians, amounting, including the goods to purchase provisions, to _____ dollars. They were perfectly satisfied with the presents, and the treatment they met, and expressed their gratitude for it, and prepared to set out to their own nation. In the evening the Cherokees gave the chief a proof of their ingenuity in robbing of packs as well as stealing horses. Two of them robbed the chief of all his presents, and the goods given to purchase provisions, and within sight of the Chickasaws. The commissioners issued a proclamation, offering a reward for the goods and the robbers, and sent runners to the neighboring towns to proclaim the same, as well as to call on the chiefs to interpose immediately, and apprehend the robbers, and send them to Hopewell to be punished.

The chief of Chetugoh, with three young men, brought the goods, and informed the commissioners that they had pursued the robbers, and endeavored to apprehend them, but could not. They came up with them, and fired at them, and wounded one.

The commissioners paid the reward, and told the chief that they had done very properly, and that, in future, he should be noticed for his attention to this order, and prompt execution of it.

Gen. Knox, Secretary of War, to the President of the United States, in continuation.

The report of the 23d of May, 1789, on the treaties at fort Harmar, by the Governor of the Western Territory, and the paper Number 1, of the Indian Department, contain such a general statement of the circumstances relative to the Indian tribes, within the limits of the United States, northwest of the Ohio, as will probably render their situation sufficiently understood.

The numbers two, three, and four, comprehend a general view of the nations south of the Ohio.

But the critical situation of affairs between the State of Georgia and the Creek nation, requires a more particular consideration. In discussing this subject, it will appear that the interest of all the Indian nations south of the Ohio, as far as the same may relate to the whites, is so blended together as to render the circumstance highly probable, that, in case of a war, they may make it one common cause.

Although each nation or tribe may have latent causes of hatred to each other, on account of disputes of boundaries and game, yet when they shall be impressed with the idea that their lives and lands are at hazard, all inferior disputes will be accommodated, and an union as firm as the six Northern nations may be formed by the Southern tribes.

Their situation, entirely surrounded on all sides, leads naturally to such an union, and the present difficulties of the Creeks and Cherokees may accelerate and complete it. Already the Cherokees have taken refuge from the violence of the frontier people of North Carolina within the limits of the Creeks, and it may not be difficult for a man of Mr. McGillivray's abilities to convince the Choctaws and Chickasaws that their remote situation is their only present protection; that the time must shortly arrive when their troubles will commence.

In addition to these causes, impelling to a general confederacy, there is another, of considerable importance—the policy of the Spaniards. The jealousy that Power entertains of the extension of the United States, would lead them into considerable expense to build up, if possible, an impassable barrier. They will, therefore, endeavor to form and cement such an union of the Southern Indians.

Mr. McGillivray has stated that Spain is bound by treaty to protect the Creeks in their hunting grounds. Although it may be prudent to doubt this assertion for the present, yet it is certain that Spain actually claims a considerable part of the territory ceded by Great Britain to the United States.

These circumstances require due weight in deliberating on the measures to be adopted respecting the Creeks.

Although the case of the Creeks will be a subject of legislative discussion and decision, it may be supposed that, after due consideration, they will, in substance, adopt one or the other of the following alternatives, to wit:

1. That the national dignity and justice require that the arms of the Union should be called forth in order to chastise the Creek nation of Indians, for refusing to treat with the United States on reasonable terms, and for their hostile invasion of the State of Georgia; or,

2. That it appears to the Congress of the United States that it would be highly expedient to attempt to quiet the hostilities between the State of Georgia and the Creek nation of Indians, by an amicable negotiation, and for that purpose there be a bill brought in to authorize the President of the United States to appoint three commissioners to repair to the State of Georgia, in order to conclude a peace with the said Creek nation and other nations of Indians to the southward of the Ohio, within the limits of the United States.

Supposing that any measure similar to either of the said alternatives should be adopted, it may be proper to examine into the manner which they are to be executed.

The most effectual mode of reducing the Creeks to submit to the will of the United States, and to acknowledge the validity of the treaties stated to have been made by that nation with Georgia, would be by an adequate army, to be raised and continued until the objects of the war should be accomplished.

When the force of the Creeks is estimated, and the probable combinations they might make with the other Indian nations, the army ought not to be calculated at less than 5,000 men. This number, on paper, would not, probably, afford, at the best, more than 3,500 effectives. The delays and contingencies inseparable from the preparations and operations of an army, would probably render its duration necessary for the term of two years. An operating army of the above description, including all expenses, could not be calculated at less than one million five hundred thousand dollars annually.

A less army than the one herein proposed, would probably be utterly inadequate to the object, an useless expense, and disgraceful to the nation.

In case the second alternative should be agreed upon, the negotiation should be conducted by three commissioners, with an adequate compensation for the trouble of the business, as an inducement for proper persons to accept the trust.

The commissioners should be invested with full powers to decide all differences respecting boundaries, between the State of Georgia and the Creek Indians, unconstrained by treaties said to exist between the said parties, otherwise than the same may be reciprocally acknowledged.

The commissioners also should be invested with powers to examine into the case of the Cherokees, and to renew with them the treaty made at Hopewell in November 1785, and report to the President such measures as shall be necessary to protect the said Cherokees in their former boundaries.

But all treaties with the Indian nations, however equal and just they may be in their principles, will not only be nugatory but humiliating to the sovereign; unless they shall be guaranteed by a body of troops.

The angry passions of the frontier Indians and whites, are too easily inflamed by reciprocal injuries, and are too violent to be controlled by the feeble authority of the civil power.

There can be neither justice or observance of treaties, where every man claims to be the sole judge in his own cause, and the avenger of his own supposed wrongs.

In such a case, the sword of the republic only, is adequate to guard a due administration of justice, and the preservation of the peace.

In case, therefore, of the commissioners concluding a treaty, the boundaries between the whites and Indians must be protected by a body of at least five hundred troops.

The post which they should occupy should be without the limits or jurisdiction of any individual State, and within the territory assigned to the Indians, for which particular provision should be made in the treaties.

All offences committed by individuals, contrary to the treaties, should be tried by a court martial, agreeably to a law to be made for that purpose.

By this arrangement, the operation of which will soon be understood, the Indians would be convinced of the justice and good intentions of the United States, and they would soon learn to venerate and obey that power from whom they derived security against the avarice and injustice of lawless frontier people.

Hence it will appear, that troops will be necessary in either alternative—an army in case of an adoption of the first; and, after all the success that could reasonably be expected, by means thereof, a corps to be continued and stationed on the frontiers, of five hundred men. In case of the adoption of the second, the corps of five hundred only will be wanted, provided proper treaties can be effected.

But, in any event of troops, the subject must necessarily be considered and determined by Congress.

The disgraceful violation of the treaty of Hopewell, with the Cherokees, requires the serious consideration of Congress. If so direct and manifest contempt of the authority of the United States be suffered with impunity, it will be in vain to attempt to extend the arm of Government to the frontiers. The Indian tribes can have no faith in such imbecile promises, and the lawless whites will ridicule a government which shall, on paper only, make Indian treaties, and regulate Indian boundaries.

The policy of extending trade, under certain regulations, to the Choctaws and Chickasaws, under the protection of military posts, will also be a subject of Legislative deliberation.

The following observations, resulting from a general view of the Indian department, are suggested with the hope, that some of them might be considered as proper principles to be interwoven in a general system, for the government of Indian affairs.

It would reflect honor on the new Government, and be attended with happy effects, were a declarative law to be passed, that the Indian tribes possess the right of the soil of all lands within their limits, respectively, and that they are not to be divested thereof, but in consequence of fair and bona fide purchases, made under the authority, or with the express approbation, of the United States.

As the great source of all Indian wars are disputes about their boundaries, and as the United States are, from the nature of the government, liable to be involved in every war that shall happen on this or any other account, it is highly proper that their authority and consent should be considered as essentially necessary to all measures for the consequences of which they are responsible.

No individual State could, with propriety, complain of invasion of its territorial rights. The independent nations and tribes of Indians ought to be considered as foreign nations, not as the subjects of any particular State. Each individual State, indeed, will retain the right of pre-emption of all lands within its limits, which will not be abridged; but the general sovereignty must possess the right of making all treaties, on the execution or violation of which depend peace or war.

Whatever may have been the conduct of some of the late British colonies, in their separate capacities toward the Indians, yet the same cannot be charged against the national character of the United States.

It is only since they possess the powers of sovereignty, that they are responsible for their conduct.

But, in future, the obligations of policy, humanity, and justice, together with that respect which every nation sacredly owes to its own reputation, unite in requiring a noble, liberal, and disinterested administration of Indian affairs.

Although the disposition of the people of the States, to emigrate into the Indian country, cannot be effectually prevented, it may be restrained and regulated.

It may be restrained, by postponing new purchases of Indian territory, and by prohibiting the citizens from intruding on the Indian lands.

It may be regulated, by forming colonies, under the direction of Government, and by posting a body of troops to execute their orders.

As population shall increase, and approach the Indian boundaries, game will be diminished, and new purchases may be made for small considerations. This has been, and probably will be, the inevitable consequence of cultivation.

It is, however, painful to consider, that all the Indian tribes, once existing in those States now the best cultivated and most populous, have become extinct. If the same causes continue, the same effects will happen; and, in a short period, the idea of an Indian on this side the Mississippi will only be found in the page of the historian.

How different would be the sensation of a philosophic mind to reflect, that, instead of exterminating a part of the human race by our modes of population, we had persevered, through all difficulties, and at last had imparted our knowledge of cultivation and the arts to the aboriginals of the country, by which the source of future life and happiness had been preserved and extended. But it has been conceived to be impracticable to civilize the Indians of North America. This opinion is probably more convenient than just.

That the civilization of the Indians would be an operation of complicated difficulty; that it would require the highest knowledge of the human character, and a steady perseverance in a wise system for a series of years, cannot be doubted. But to deny that, under a course of favorable circumstances, it could not be accomplished, is to suppose the human character under the influence of such stubborn habits as to be incapable of melioration or change—a supposition entirely contradicted by the progress of society, from the barbarous ages to its present degree of perfection.

While it is contended that the object is practicable, under a proper system, it is admitted, in the fullest force, to be impracticable, according to the ordinary course of things, and that it could not be effected in a short period.

Were it possible to introduce among the Indian tribes a love for exclusive property, it would be a happy commencement of the business.

This might be brought about by making presents, from time to time, to the chiefs or their wives, of sheep and other domestic animals; and if, in the first instance, persons were appointed to take charge, and teach the use of them, a considerable part of the difficulty would be surmounted.

In the administration of the Indians, every proper expedient that can be devised to gain their affections, and attach them to the interest of the Union, should be adopted. The British Government had the practice of making the Indians presents of silver medals and gorgets, uniform clothing, and a sort of military commission. The possessors retained an exclusive property to these articles; and the Southern Indians are exceedingly desirous of receiving similar gifts from the United States, for which they would willingly resign those received from the British officers. The policy of gratifying them cannot be doubted.

Missionaries, of excellent moral character, should be appointed to reside in their nation, who should be well supplied with all the implements of husbandry, and the necessary stock for a farm.

These men should be made the instruments to work on the Indians; presents should commonly pass through their hands, or by their recommendations. They should, in no degree, be concerned in trade, or the purchase of lands, to rouse the jealousy of the Indians. They should be their friends and fathers.

Such a plan, although it might not fully effect the civilization of the Indians, would most probably be attended with the salutary effect of attaching them to the interest of the United States.

It is particularly important that something of this nature should be attempted with the Southern nations of Indians, whose confined situation might render them proper subjects for the experiment.

The expense of such a conciliatory system may be considered as a sufficient reason for rejecting it;

But, when this shall be compared with a system of coercion, it would be found the highest economy to adopt it.

The commanding officers of the troops on the frontiers of the Southern and Northern districts, as they possess the sword, should be the Indian agents, and for which they should have a consideration.

Every article given to the Indians should be accounted for, and witnessed by two commissioned officers.

The commanding officer should not receive any presents from the Indians, but, in every respect, conduct towards them in the most friendly and just manner.

All which is humbly submitted to the President of the United States.

THE SIX NATIONS, THE WYANDOTS, AND OTHERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE AUGUST 12, 1789.

The committee to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, of the 25th of May, 1789, with the Indian treaties, and papers accompanying the same, report:

That the Governor of the Western territory, on the 9th day of January, 1789, at fort Harmar, entered into two treaties; one with the sachems and warriors of the Six Nations, the Mohawks excepted, the other with the sachems and warriors of the Wyandot, Delaware, Ottawa, Chippewa, Pattawatima, and Sac Nations; that those treaties were made in pursuance of the powers and instructions heretofore given to the said Governor by the late Congress, and are a confirmation of the treaties of fort Stanwix, in October, 1784, and of fort McIntosh, in January, 1785, and contain a more formal and regular conveyance to the United States, of the Indian claims to the lands yielded to these States by the said treaties of 1784 and 1785.

Your committee, therefore, submit the following resolution, to wit:

That the treaties concluded at fort Harmar, on the 9th day of January, 1789, between Arthur St. Clair, Esq. Governor of the Western territory, on the part of the United States, and the sachems and warriors of the Six Nations, (the Mohawks excepted) and the sachems and warriors of the Wyandot, Delaware, Ottawa, Chippewa, Pattawatima, and Sac Nations, be accepted, and that the President of the United States be advised to execute and enjoin an observance of the same.

THE SOUTHERN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE AUGUST 22, 1789.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES came into the Senate Chamber, attended by General Knox, and laid before the Senate the following statement of facts, with the questions thereto annexed, for their advice and consent:

To conciliate the powerful tribes of Indians in the Southern district, amounting probably to fourteen thousand fighting men, and to attach them firmly to the United States, may be regarded as highly worthy of the serious attention of Government.

The measure includes, not only peace and security to the whole southern frontier, but is calculated to form a barrier against the colonies of an European Power, which, in the mutations of policy, may one day become the enemy of the United States. The fate of the Southern States, therefore, or the neighboring colonies, may principally depend on the present measures of the Union towards the Southern Indians.

By the papers which have been laid before the Senate, it will appear, that, in the latter end of the year 1785, and the beginning of 1786, treaties were formed by the United States with the Cherokees, the Chickasaws, and Choctaws. The report of the commissioners will show the reasons why a treaty was not formed at the same time with the Creeks.

It will also appear by the papers, that the States of North Carolina and Georgia protested against said treaties, as infringing their legislative rights, and being contrary to the confederation. It will further appear by the said papers, that the treaty with the Cherokees has been entirely violated by the disorderly white people on the frontiers of North Carolina.

The opinion of the late Congress respecting the said violation, will sufficiently appear by the proclamation which they caused to be issued on the first of September, 1788.

By the public newspapers it appears, that, on the 16th of June last, a truce was concluded with the Cherokees, by Mr. John Steele, on behalf of the State of North Carolina, in which it was stipulated that a treaty should be held as soon as possible, and that, in the mean time, all hostilities should cease on either side.

As the Cherokees reside principally within the territory claimed by North Carolina, and as that State is not a member of the present Union, it may be doubted whether any efficient measures in favor of the Cherokees could be immediately adopted by the General Government.

The commissioners for negotiating with the Southern Indians may be instructed to transmit a message to the Cherokees, stating to them, as far as may be proper, the difficulties arising from the local claims of North Carolina, and to assure them that the United States are not unmindful of the treaty at Hopewell; and as soon as the difficulties which are at present opposed to the measure, shall be removed, the Government will do full justice to the Cherokees.

The distance of the Choctaws and Chickasaws from the frontier settlements, seem to have prevented these tribes from being involved in similar difficulties with the Cherokees.

The commissioners may be instructed to transmit messages to the said tribes, containing assurances of the continuance of the friendship of the United States, and that measures will soon be taken for extending a trade to them agreeably to the treaties of Hopewell.

The commissioners may also be directed to report a plan for the execution of the said treaties respecting trade.

But the case of the Creek nation is of the highest importance, and requires an immediate decision. The cause of the hostilities between Georgia and the Creeks, is stated to be a difference in judgment concerning three treaties made between the said parties, to wit: at Augusta, in 1783; at Galphinton, in 1785; and at Shoulderbone, in 1786. The State of Georgia assert, and the Creeks deny, the validity of the said treaties.

Hence arises the indispensable necessity of having all the circumstances respecting the said treaties critically investigated by commissioners of the United States, so that the further measures of Government may be formed on a full knowledge of the case.

In order that the investigation be conducted with the highest impartiality, it will be proper, in addition to the evidence of the documents in the public possession, that Georgia should be represented at this part of the proposed treaty with the Creek nation.

It is, however, to be observed, in any issue of the inquiry, that it would be highly embarrassing to Georgia to relinquish that part of the lands, stated to have been ceded by the Creeks, lying between the Ogeechee and Oconee rivers, that State having surveyed and divided the same among certain descriptions of its citizens, who settled and planted thereon until dispossessed by the Indians.

In case, therefore, the issue of the investigation should be unfavorable to the claims of Georgia, the commissioners should be instructed to use their best endeavors to negotiate with the Creeks a solemn conveyance of the said lands to Georgia.

By the report of the commissioners, who were appointed, under certain acts of the late Congress, by South Carolina and Georgia, it appears that they have agreed to meet the Creeks on the 15th of September ensuing. As it is with great difficulty the Indians are collected together at certain seasons of the year, it is important that the above occasion should be embraced, if possible, on the part of the present Government, to form a treaty with the Creeks. As the proposed treaty is of great importance to the future tranquillity of the State of Georgia, as well as of the United States, it has been thought proper that it should be conducted, on the part of the General Government, by commissioners whose local situations may free them from the imputation of prejudice on this subject.

As it is necessary that certain principles should be fixed previously to forming instructions for the commissioners, the following questions, arising out of the foregoing communications, are stated by the President of the United States, and the advice of the Senate requested thereon:

1st. In the present state of affairs between North Carolina and the United States, will it be proper to take any other measures for redressing the injuries of the Cherokees, than the one herein suggested?

2d. Shall the commissioners be instructed to pursue any other measures respecting the Chickasaws and Choctaws than those herein suggested?

3d. If the commissioners shall adjudge that the Creek nation was fully represented at the three treaties with Georgia, and that the cessions of land were obtained with the full understanding and free consent of the acknowledged proprietors, and that the said treaties ought to be considered as just and equitable: in this case shall the Commissioners be instructed to insist on a formal renewal and confirmation thereof? And, in case of a refusal, shall they be instructed to inform the Creeks that the arms of the Union shall be employed to compel them to acknowledge the justice of the said cessions?

4th. But, if the commissioners shall adjudge that the said treaties were formed with an inadequate, or unauthorized representation of the Creek nation; or that the treaties were held under circumstances of constraint or unfairness of any sort, so that the United States could not, with justice and dignity, request, or urge, a confirmation thereof: in this case, shall the Commissioners, considering the importance of the Oconee lands to Georgia, be instructed to use their highest exertions to obtain a cession of said lands? If so, shall the Commissioners be instructed, if they cannot obtain the said cessions on better terms, to offer for the same, and for the further great object of attaching the Creeks to the Government of the United States, the following conditions:

1st. A compensation in money or goods to the amount of — dollars, the said amount to be stipulated to be paid by Georgia, at the period which shall be fixed, or in failure thereof, by the United States.

2d. A secure port on the Altamaha, or St. Mary's rivers, or at any other place between the same, as may be mutually agreed to by the commissioners and the Creeks.

3d. Certain pecuniary considerations to some, and honorary military distinctions to other influential chiefs, on their taking oaths of allegiance to the United States.

4th. A solemn guarantee, by the United States, to the Creeks, of their remaining territory, and to maintain the same, if necessary, by a line of military posts.

5th. But, if all offers should fail to induce the Creeks to make the desired cessions to Georgia, shall the commissioners make it an ultimatum?

6th. If the said cessions shall not be made an ultimatum, shall the commissioners proceed and make a treaty, and include the disputed lands within the limits which shall be assigned to the Creeks? If not, shall a temporary boundary be marked, making the Oconee the line, and the other parts of the treaty be concluded?

In this case, shall a secure port be stipulated, and the pecuniary and honorary considerations granted?

In other general objects, shall the treaties formed at Hopewell, with the Cherokees, Chickasaws, and Choctaws, be the basis of a treaty with the Creeks?

7th. Shall the sum of twenty thousand dollars, appropriated to Indian expenses and treaties, be wholly applied, if necessary, to a treaty with the Creeks? If not, what proportion?

RICHMOND, August 5th, 1789.

Sir:

Two chiefs of the Cherokee nation of Indians arrived here a few days ago, accompanied by Mr. Bennet Ballew, who has full powers from a number of towns, to lay before you their grievances, and to make some proposals, which may eventually preserve harmony between the citizens of the United States and the Indians, and perhaps be productive of considerable advantages to both parties. It is at the particular request of these unfortunate people, that I introduce them to you. They appear to me to have been much oppressed; should you view them in this light, your well known regard to public, as well as private justice, will ensure to them every exertion of your power in their behalf. I am unacquainted with Mr. Ballew, but I think I owe it to him to inform you, that he is strongly recommended to me by the honorable William Fleming, as an honest, upright, intelligent man.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect,

Your obedient servant,

BEVERLY RANDOLPH.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States.

To the President of the United States of America.

The memorial of Bennet Ballew, agent plenipotentiary from the chiefs and head warriors of the Cherokee nation, resident and living in the towns of Chota, Toquoh, Cotties, Little Telliquo, Timotly, Nioh or the Tassel's town, Coettee, Chilhowah, Tallassee, Big Telliquo, Big Highwassa, Cheestowa, Eastanolee, Chatanuga, Chickamaugh, Stuckoee, Ottilletaraconah, Catatogah, Nicogachee, Tuskeegah, and Cheesoehcha, lying on and being on the great rivers Tenasee, Telliquo, Highwassa, Ammoah, &c. respectfully sheweth:

That your memorialist, sensible of your past exertions, and pleased with the thoughts of your continued efforts, for the welfare and happiness of the United States in particular, and of mankind in general, and that nothing which concerns them will be thought beneath your attention; your memorialist is encouraged to lay before you a brief account of the present unhappy and distressed situation of the Cherokee Indians, notwithstanding his want of abilities to do justice to a cause of such difficulty and importance. From his long residence among them, and other Indian nations, on the southwestern frontiers of the United States, he hath in some measure become acquainted with their language, manners, and politics; and more particularly, with their hardships and sufferings, from the unrighteous and cruel war lately waged against them. Your memorialist, being importuned by the distressed chiefs of the nation, to lay their grievances before the beloved President of the United States, and solicit redress, being deeply impressed with compassion for their sufferings, and impelled by the apparent advantages that must accrue to the United States, should a firm and lasting peace and union be effected, he was, from these considerations, induced to undertake the arduous though pleasing task, relying chiefly on the providential influence of the Supreme Ruler of the Universe; on the justice and energy of the Federal Government; and on the magnanimity and benevolence of its first magistrate, for success in his feeble, though earnest endeavors, to rescue a nation from the deepest imaginable distress, and to make them a prosperous and a happy people.

They thought that they had a well grounded hope, that they might quietly and peaceably have enjoyed all their lands within the boundary lines established by the treaty of Hopewell, in the year 1785; but, to their great mortification and distress, the white people, chiefly from North Carolina, have made daily encroachments upon them; and there are now upwards of three thousand families settled within those boundary lines. After receiving reiterated insults and injuries from some of those settlers, a few of the young warriors killed a family of white people within those boundaries, and soon after, the nation in general experienced the most dreadful calamities that refined cruelty could devise, or the vindictive arm of vengeance inflict. Their flourishing fields of corn and pulse were destroyed and laid waste; some of their wives and children were burnt alive in their town houses, with the most unrelenting barbarity; and to fill up the measure of deception and cruelty, some of their chiefs, who were ever disposed to peace with the white people, were decoyed, unarmed, into their camp, by the hoisting a white flag, and by repeated declarations of friendship and kindness, and there massacred in cold blood. Among these, were the old Tassel and his son, who were characterised by their kind offices to the white people, and veneration for the American flag, inasmuch that, for many years, it was constantly flying at their door.

When your memorialist came to French Broad river, in January last, he found that part of the country in great confusion, and the war carried on with all its horrors, between a party of the North Carolinians and the Cherokees; the former, as it would appear, were determined to extirpate the Indians, and to claim the sole property in their lands. Many prisoners being taken on both sides, and an exchange being earnestly wished for by the Carolinians concerned, they chose your memorialist, as a neutral person, and one who was formerly acquainted with that nation, (having lived long among them as a prisoner, during part of our war with the British) to bring about the exchange. Your memorialist cheerfully undertook, and happily effected it, although strongly opposed by Messrs. Dromgoole and Martin, of North Carolina, whose scheme was apparently to draw the Indians into a treaty, with a view to extort their lands from them, though expressly contrary to a proclamation of Congress.

The Carolinians, to give a color to the war, allege that the Cherokees broke the treaty of Hopewell, in 1785; but this the Cherokees positively deny, and declare that their intention, even since that time, has uniformly been to preserve peace and a good understanding with the white people; and which they earnestly wish to have once more restored: and after engaging your memorialist to assist them with his best endeavors, as far as is consistent with his duty as a citizen of the United States, they in a grand council of the nation, after long and mature deliberation, came to the following resolutions:

"1st. That we will immediately treat with all nations with whom we are at war, and procure peace and reconciliation, if possible." Which has been happily effected.

"2d. That we will petition Congress to obtain a mutual, perfect, and strict alliance with the United States, and abide by their instructions in all matters of peace and war, provided they secure to us the lands of our forefathers, as bounded by the treaty of Hopewell, in the year 1785.

"3d. That the part of the nation lying adjacent to the French Broad and Holston rivers, be incorporated with the white people, and become subjects of the United States, living under the same laws with them."

These resolves, the Cherokee nation most ardently wish may be, by your memorialist, (accompanied by two of their chiefs, Nontowakee and Kasohanse) laid before you sir, as chief Magistrate of the United States, and through you, communicated to the Congress; as some acts of the Legislature may perhaps be necessary to carry their system into full effect, and complete their wishes.

If your memorialist can be, but in a small degree, instrumental in obtaining for those unfortunate people, and their posterity, the inestimable blessings of peace, liberty, and safety, he will feel himself one of the happiest of mankind.

BENNET BALLEW.

NEW YORK, 22d August, 1789.

We, the warriors, chiefs, and representatives, of the Cherokee nation, resident and living in the following towns of Chota, Toquoh, Cottico, Little Telliquo, Timotly, Nioh or the Tassel's town, Coettee, Chilhowah, Tallassee, Great Telliquo, Big Highwassa, Cheestowa, Eastanora, Chatanugh, Chickamaugh, Stuckhoe, Ottilletaraconah, Catatogah, Nicogachee, Tuskeegah, and Cheesoehcha, our said towns, lying and being on the great rivers of Tenasee, Telliquo, Highwassa, Ammoah, &c.

We, the said warriors, representatives, and chiefs, being met at our ancient and beloved town of Chota on Tena-see, at our council fire, having considered the nature and circumstance of our country and nation, are sorry to inform our elder brother, General Washington, and the great council of the United States, that, from the bad conduct of some of our young and inconsiderate men, too much encouraged by bad white men, who too often frequent our nation under pretensions of doing us good service, and keeping peace between us and our elder brothers, the Americans, have darkened our land with war, and stained our white chain of friendship with blood; but to our great joy the Great Spirit above has removed the cloud, and permits the sun to shine again in friendship upon each party, though the darkness has lasted so long that our country and towns have been spoiled, ourselves become naked, and suffer much with hunger.

We now make known to the great Congress of America, that our desire and intention is to live in the most perfect and strict friendship and alliance with our elder brothers, the Americans; that we shall forever listen to, and abide by, their instructions, advice, and determination, placing the strongest confidence that the great council is composed of such who have eyes of pity and hearts of humanity and compassion; that they will not divest us of our rights and possessions, which our ancient fathers and predecessors have enjoyed time out of mind.

We still remember and abide by the treaty held with your commissioners in South Carolina in the year 1785; and though our hunting grounds and towns north of Tennessee and Holston rivers is sold unto white people for to settle upon without our consent, we still hope Congress will have mercy upon us: for if our country is all taken from us, we shall not be able to raise our children, neither is there any place left for us to remove to.

We rejoice much to hear that the great Congress have got new powers, and have become strong. We now hope that whatever is done hereafter by the great council will no more be destroyed and made small by any State.

We shall always be ready to listen, with open ears and willing hearts, to you or any one joined with you, and to no other, for protection, and regulating all matters.

We beg leave to make it known to your great and beloved council, that we have appointed and constituted our beloved brother, Bennet Ballew, to be our chief and representative in and over all that part of the Cherokee nation comprehending the towns lying on the aforesaid rivers Tenasee, Highwassa, Telliquo, and Ammoah, and all lying north and northwest of said rivers and towns; that we have given and granted unto the said Bennet Ballew full powers and authorities to transact and negotiate all manner of things in any wise touching, appertaining, or relating to the aforesaid towns and that part of our nation, in our behalf, and in our name and stead, in the same manner and form as though we were personally present ourselves, in as full and ample manner, to all intents and purposes; and in testimony of which we have sent our great and beloved warrior and chief, the Rising Fawn Keenuhteetah of Great Highwassa, to accompany our beloved chief and representative, Bennet Ballew, to Congress, then and there to make known to your great beloved council the truth and sincerity of this our instrument and writing, touching the premises, and to do whatever the said Bennet Ballew may think for the good, tranquillity, and safety of our nation, trusting that the great council and elder brothers will do us justice, quiet us in our possessions, particularly our lands lying north of the river Tennessee and Holston; it is our hunting grounds, and we have no other to get our living on.

Done in Council, at Chota, the 19th day of May, 1789.

Signed and acknowledged before us.

At a great talk held by the warriors and chiefs of the Cherokee nation, assembled in council at the great and beloved town of Chota, the 19th day of May, 1789, addressed to his Excellency the President of the United States:

GREAT BROTHER: The great Being above has directed our hearts to listen to the talks of peace, and sorry that ever any misunderstanding arose between us and our white brothers. Our last troubles have been occasioned by our rash inconsiderate young men, who, we doubt, have been too much encouraged by white men in our towns, that pretend you have sent them among us to do us justice and to direct our nation how to manage.

There are a great many towns of us that live on Tennessee, Highwassee, Telliquo, and Ammoah, who are near neighbours to the white people, and we wish to live in peace with them.

We hope that Congress has not forgot the treaty last held at Hopewell, South Carolina. We intend to abide by it, and hope Congress will do us justice, as we look up to them for it, and intend to hear their good talks, and also the talks of all them that are joined with them, but will not listen to any others.

BROTHER: At our last treaty, held in South Carolina, we gave up to our white brothers all the land we could any how spare, and have but little left to raise our women and children upon, and we hope you wont let any people take any more from us without our consent. We are neither birds nor fish; we can neither fly in the air, nor live under water; therefore we hope pity will be extended towards us. We are made by the same hand, and in same shape with yourselves.

We send some of our head-men and warriors to you with talk, and to represent the case and circumstance of our nation; and we hope you will settle matters with them to all our satisfaction, and that they may return home to our country with good tidings of peace and friendship; and any thing done by Congress and our representatives will be held safe by us, and fast by us.

We hear that Congress have got strong powers now, and nothing can be spoiled that you undertake to do; this we hear from our elder brother, John Sevier, which makes us glad and rejoice at the news.

We wish you to appoint some good man to do the business between us and our elder brothers. Let us have a man that don't speak with two tongues, nor one that will encourage mischief or blood to be spilt. Let there be a good man appointed, and war will never happen between us. Such a one we will listen to; but such as have been sent among us, we shall not hear, as they have already caused our nation to be ruined, and come almost to nothing.

WABASH.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE SEPTEMBER 16, 1789.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

'The Governor of the Western territory has made a statement to me of the reciprocal hostilities of the Wabash Indians, and the people inhabiting the frontiers bordering on the river Ohio, which I herewith lay before Congress.

The United States, in Congress assembled, by their acts of the 21st day of July, 1787, and of the 12th of August, 1788, made a provisional arrangement for calling forth the militia of Virginia and Pennsylvania, in the proportions therein specified.

As the circumstances which occasioned the said arrangement continue nearly the same, I think proper to suggest to your consideration, the expediency of making some temporary provision for calling forth the militia of the United States, for the purposes stated in the constitution, which would embrace the cases apprehended by the Governor of the Western territory.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

September 16th, 1789.

NEW YORK, September 14, 1789.

SIR:

The constant hostilities between the Indians who live upon the river Wabash, and the people of Kentucky, must necessarily be attended with such embarrassing circumstances to the Government of the Western territory, that I am induced to request you will be pleased to take the matter into consideration, and give me the orders you may think proper.

It is not to be expected, sir, that the Kentucky people will, or can, submit patiently to the cruelties and deprivations of those savages; they are in the habits of retaliation, perhaps without attending precisely to the nations from which the injuries are received. They will continue to retaliate, or they will apply to the Governor of the Western country (through which the Indians must pass to attack them) for redress; if he cannot redress them, (and in present circumstances he cannot) they also will march through that country, to redress themselves, and the Government will be laid prostrate. The United States, on the other hand, are at peace with several of the nations; and, should the resentment of those people fall upon any of them, which it is likely enough may happen, very bad consequences will follow: for it must appear to them that the United States either pay no regard to their treaties, or that they are unable or unwilling to carry their engagements into effect. Remonstrances will probably be made by them also to the Governor, and he will be found in a situation, from which he can neither redress the one, nor protect the other. They will unite with the hostile nations, prudently preferring open war to a delusive and uncertain peace.

By a resolution of the late Congress, the Governor of the Western territory had power, in case of hostilities, to call upon Virginia and Pennsylvania for a number of men to act in conjunction with the continental troops, and carry war into the Indian settlements. That resolution, it is now supposed, is no longer in force; the revival of it might be of use, as it would tend to conciliate the Western People, by shewing them that they were not unattended to; and would, in some measure, justify me in holding a language to the Indians which might obviate the necessity of employing force against them. The handful of troops, sir, that are scattered in that country, though they may afford protection to some settlements, cannot possibly act offensively by themselves.

I have the honor to be, sir,

Your obedient and most humble servant,

AR. ST. CLAIR.

THE SIX NATIONS, THE WYANDOTS, AND OTHERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE SEPTEMBER 17, 1789.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

It doubtless is important that all treaties and compacts, formed by the United States with other nations, whether civilized or not, should be made with caution, and executed with fidelity.

It is said to be the general understanding and practice of nations, as a check on the mistakes and indiscretions of ministers or commissioners, not to consider any treaty, negotiated and signed by such officers, as final and conclusive, until ratified by the Sovereign or Government from whom they derive their powers. This practice has been adopted by the United States, respecting their treaties with European nations, and I am inclined to think it would be advisable to observe it in the conduct of our treaties with the Indians: for though such treaties, being on their part made by their chiefs or rulers, need not be ratified by them, yet, being formed on our part, by the agency of subordinate officers, it seems to be both prudent and reasonable, that their acts should not be binding on the nation, until approved and ratified by the Government.

It strikes me that this point should be well considered and settled, so that our national proceedings in this respect may become uniform, and be directed by fixed and stable principles.

The treaties with certain Indian nations, which were laid before you with my message of the 25th May last, suggested two questions to my mind, viz: 1st. Whether those treaties were to be considered as perfected, and consequently as obligatory, without being ratified; if not, then 2dly. Whether both, or either, and which of them ought to be ratified; on these questions, I request your opinion and advice.

You have indeed advised me "to execute and enjoin an observance of;" the treaty with the Wyandots, &c. You, gentlemen, doubtless, intended to be clear and explicit, and yet, without further explanation, I fear I may misunderstand your meaning; for if, by my executing that treaty, you mean that I should make it (in a more particular and immediate manner than it now is) the act of Government, then it follows, that I am to ratify it. If you mean by my executing it, that I am to see that it be carried into effect and operation, then I am led to conclude, either that you consider it as being perfect and obligatory in its present state, and, therefore, to be executed and observed; or, that you consider it as to derive its completion and obligation from the silent approbation and ratification which my proclamation may be construed to imply. Although I am inclined to think that the latter is your intention, yet it certainly is best that all doubts respecting it be removed.

Permit me to observe, that it will be proper for me to be informed of your sentiments relative to the treaty with the Six Nations, previous to the departure of the Governor of the Western territory; and, therefore, I recommend it to your early consideration.

INDIAN TREATIES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE SEPTEMBER 18, 1789.

Mr. CARROLL, to whom was referred a message from the President of the United States of the 17th of September, 1789, made the following report:

That the signature of treaties with the Indian nations has ever been considered as a full completion thereof; and that such treaties have never been solemnly ratified by either of the contracting parties, as hath been commonly practised among the civilized nations of Europe: wherefore, the committee are of opinion, that the formal ratification of the treaty concluded at fort Harmar, on the 9th day of January, 1789, between Arthur St. Clair, Governor of the Western territory, on the part of the United States, and the sachems and warriors of the Wyandot, Delaware, Ottawa, Chippewa, Pattiwatima, and Sac Nations, is not expedient or necessary; and that the resolve of the Senate, of the 8th September, 1789, respecting the said treaty, authorizes the President to enjoin a due observance thereof.

That, as to the treaty made at fort Harmar, on the 9th of January, 1789, between the said Arthur St. Clair, and the sachems and warriors of the Six Nations, (except the Mohawks) from particular circumstances affecting a part of the ceded lands, the Senate did not judge it expedient to pass any act concerning the same.

THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE JANUARY 11, 1790.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Having advised with you upon the terms of a treaty to be offered to the Creek nation of Indians, I think it proper you should be informed of the result of that business, previous to its coming before you in your legislative capacity.

I have therefore directed the Secretary for the Department of War to lay before you my instructions* to the commissioners, and their report in consequence thereof.

The apparently critical state of the southern frontier will render it expedient for me to communicate to both Houses of Congress, with other papers, the whole of the transactions relative to the Creeks, in order that they may be enabled to form a judgment of the measures which the case may require.

SOUTHERN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS JANUARY 12, 1790.

and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you a statement of the Southwestern frontiers, and of the Indian Department, which have been submitted to me by the Secretary for the Department of War.

I conceive that an unreserved, but confidential communication of all the papers relative to the recent negotiations with some of the Southern tribes of Indians, is indispensably requisite, for the information of Congress. I am persuaded that they will effectually prevent either transcripts or publications of all such circumstances as might be injurious to the public interests.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 12, 1790.

The Secretary of War to the President of the United States.

WAR OFFICE, January 4th, 1790.

SIR:

I humbly beg leave to submit to your consideration, a general statement of the Indian Department, and of the Southwestern frontiers, the same being intimately blended together.

The invitation of the United States to the Creek nation of Indians, to treat of peace on terms of mutual advantages, has not been accepted.

The report of the commissioners, A, will fully shew the precarious state of this business.

The assurances, given by some of the chiefs, of the peaceable intentions of the Creek nation, are too uncertain in their nature, even if sincere, for the United States to rely upon.

The case seems to require an adequate provisional arrangement, which, on the commission of any further depredations by the Creeks, should be called into activity. After the solemn offer of peace which has been made, and refused, it is incumbent on the United States to be in a situation to punish all unprovoked aggressions.

In case the conduct of the Creeks should render coercion indispensably necessary, policy requires that it should be undertaken with a force adequate to the speedy accomplishment of the object.

An army of sufficient strength should be raised to march into their country, and destroy their towns, unless they should submit to an equitable peace.

The warriors of the Creeks have been stated at various numbers, from four to six thousand, and are said to be generally well armed, and furnished with ammunition.

To march into the country of the Upper and Lower Creeks, so as to be superior to all opposition, would require an army to be raised of five thousand men. This number, after making the necessary deductions, for sickness, establishment of posts of communication, and convoys of provision, would probably be reduced to three thousand five hundred effectives.

The troops to be employed on this service ought to be enlisted for the occasion, subject, however, to be sooner discharged, if necessary.

I have formed an estimate of the expense of such an army, which is hereunto annexed, marked No. 1, on the supposition that the pay of the non-commissioned officers and privates may be reduced to the sums therein specified.

But, in either event of peace or war, with the Creeks, the establishment of a line of military posts on the South-western frontier, appears to be highly requisite. No peace with the Indians can be preserved, unless by a military force.

The lawless whites, as well as Indians, will be deterred from the commission of murders when they shall be convinced that punishment will ultimately follow detection.

The situation of the Cherokee nation, looking up to the United States for protection, in consequence of the treaty of Hopewell, demands attention.

Although existing circumstances may require that the boundaries stated in the said treaty should be more accommodated to the inhabitants who cannot be removed, yet, the other general principles thereof ought to be preserved, and particularly the stipulated protection of the United States. This cannot be afforded but by troops. The friendship of the Chickasaws and Choctaws cannot be cultivated, and the trade stipulated by treaty cannot be extended to them but by means of the protection of troops.

The present military arrangement of the United States consists of one battalion of artillery, of two hundred and forty non-commissioned and privates; and one regiment of infantry, of five hundred and sixty non-commissioned and privates. This force, for the following objects, is utterly inadequate: to prevent the usurpation of the lands of the United States; to facilitate the surveying and selling the same, for the purpose of reducing the public debt; and for the protection of the frontiers, from Georgia to lake Erie. If it should be decided to erect a line of posts of that extent, and to leave small guards for the public arsenal, the following establishment would be required:

A battalion of artillery, of two hundred and forty non-commissioned officers and privates, and two regiments of infantry, of seven hundred non-commissioned officers and privates, each.

The total of the artillery and infantry amounting to sixteen hundred and forty non-commissioned officers and privates.

The estimate hereunto annexed, marked No. 2, will exhibit the annual expense of such an establishment. It is to be observed, that the estimate is formed on the principle, that the present pay of the non-commissioned officers and privates may be considerably reduced. But the pay of a lieutenant-colonel-commandant is enlarged from fifty to seventy-five dollars per month, and the pay of the major-commandant of artillery to fifty dollars per month. This occasions an increase for the lieutenant-colonels and major-commandant of sixty dollars per month.

When the duty and expense of a commanding officer of a regiment or battalion be considered, it is presumed that the proposed additional pay in these instances will promote the economy and good of the service. Although the proposed reduction of the pay cannot affect the existing stipulations to the troops now in service, yet, as they are liable to be discharged, at any period, it is highly probable that, in preference thereto, they would accept the reduced pay.

The several representations herewith submitted, marked B, of the depredations committed by the Indians, on the people along the south of the Ohio, and upon Cumberland river, show the exposed situation of those settlements. It seems the posts northwest of the Ohio do not afford the necessary protection, and the people claim the employment of their own militia, at the expense of the United States—a similar arrangement having been in operation until the organization of the General Government, at the expense of Virginia.

If it shall be decided to afford the protection requested, the propriety of employing the militia of the country for that purpose may be doubted.

The economy of disciplined troops is always superior to militia, while their efficacy is at least equal; hence, if troops are employed within the district of Kentucky, as patrols or otherwise, they ought to be detachments from the regular troops of the United States, under the orders of the commanding officer on the Ohio. About four companies, acting as patrols or scouts, would afford all the satisfaction to the settlements which could be derived from defensive measures; but it is only from offensive measures that full security could be obtained.

The various tribes seated on the Wabash river, extending up to the Miami village, and the several branches of that river, are the Indians from whom the settlements of Kentucky principally receive injury.

But these depredations, although perhaps effected with impunity as to the actual perpetrators, are not so to the Indians generally: for, the whites frequently make incursions into the Wabash country northwest of the Ohio, and it is probable that indiscriminate revenge is wreaked on all bearing the name of Indians.

Hence a difficulty arises on the part of the United States, which requires a serious consideration.

That the people of Kentucky are entitled to be defended, there can be no doubt. But, as there seems to have been such a prevalence of hostilities as to render it uncertain who are right or who are wrong, the principles of justice, which ought to dictate the conduct of every nation, seems to forbid the idea of attempting to extirpate the Wabash Indians, until it shall appear that they cannot be brought to treat on reasonable terms.

If, after a treaty should be effected with them, it should be violated, or, after an invitation to a treaty, it should be refused, and followed by hostilities, the United States will clearly have the right to inflict that degree of punishment which may be necessary to deter the Indians from any future unprovoked aggressions.

If this statement be just, it would follow that the Governor of the Western territory should be instructed to attempt to effect a general treaty with the said Wabash tribes, on terms of mutual advantage. If they should refuse, and continue, or suffer a continuance, from any of their neighboring tribes, of the depredations upon the district of Kentucky, the arms of the Union ought to be exerted to chastise them.

The statement hereunto annexed, No. 3, will shew the application of the sum appropriated during the last session of Congress to Indian treaties and Indian expenses; the sum remaining unexpended might be applied to a treaty with the Wabash Indians.

Provisions must be furnished the Indians during the treaty. Whether any presents shall be added thereto, will depend on the decision of Congress.

It seems to have been the custom of barbarous nations, in all ages, to expect and receive presents from those more civilized, and the custom seems confirmed by modern Europe, with respect to Morocco, Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli. The practice of the British government and its colonies, of giving presents to the Indians of North America, is well known.

They seem to have been convinced that it was the cheapest and most effectual mode of managing the Indians.

The idea of fear, or purchasing a peace, is not to be admitted, in the cases above stated, but the conduct appears to have been dictated by wise policy. A comparative view of the expenses of a hostile or conciliatory system towards the Indians, will evince the infinite economy of the latter over the former.

The question then, on the point of presents, must be simply this:

Is the situation of the United States such, with respect to the neighboring European colonies, as to render it good policy at this time to annihilate the Indian customs, and expectations of receiving presents, and thereby disgusting them in such a manner as to induce them to connect themselves more closely with the said colonies?

If it should be decided to the contrary, the estimate of the Governor of the Western territory for the object of the Wabash Indians, No. 4, would shew the sum required, from which, however, must be deducted the balance remaining from the appropriation of the last year.

Although the information is not sufficiently accurate whereon to form a decided opinion of the number of the Indian warriors within the limits of the United States, yet the evidence seems sufficient to warrant the supposition that they amount nearly to twenty thousand. If to this number we should add, for every warrior, three old men women and children, the total number would be eighty thousand.

Since the United States became a nation, their conduct, and some of the States, towards the Indians, seems to have resulted from the impulses of the moment. Until the treaty effected at fort Harmar in January, 1789, it seemed a prevailing opinion that the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain, instead of the pre-emption only, actually invested the United States with the absolute right to the Indian territory, and in pursuance of this idea, treaties were made and boundaries allotted to the Indians. But, by the directions of Congress, of the 2nd of July, 1788, to the Governor of the Western territory, to extinguish the Indian claims to lands they had ceded to the United States, and to obtain regular conveyances of the same, it would appear, that they conceded the Indian right to the soil.

The various opinions which exist on the proper mode of treating the Indians, require that some system should be established on the subject.

That the Indians possess the natural rights of man, and that they ought not wantonly to be divested thereof, cannot be well denied.

Were these rights ascertained and declared by law; were it enacted that the Indians possess the right to all their territory which they have not fairly conveyed, and that they should not be divested thereof, but in consequence of open treaties, made under the authority of the United States, the foundation of peace and justice would be laid.

The individual States claiming or possessing the right of pre-emption to territory, inhabited by Indians, would not be materially injured by such a declarative law; the exercise of their right would be restrained only when it should interfere with the general interests.

Should any State, having the right of pre-emption, desire to purchase territory, which the Indians should be willing to relinquish, it would have to request the General Government to direct a treaty for that purpose, at the expense, however, of the individual State requesting the same.

But as Indian wars almost invariably arise in consequence of disputes relative to boundaries or trade, and as the rights of declaring war, making treaties, and regulating commerce, are vested in the United States, it is highly proper they should have the sole direction of all measures for the consequences of which they are responsible.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the highest respect, your most obedient humble servant.

H. KNOX,

Secretary for the Department of War.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

NOTE. The relative value of a Colonel, in a tariff for the exchange of prisoners during the late war, being much higher than a Lieutenant Colonel, and there being but few of the rank of Colonel in the British army employed in America, occasioned the present arrangement of field officers to a regiment, consisting of a Lieutenant Colonel Commandant and two Majors.

But, as the troops on the frontiers may act with militia commanded by Colonels, the Lieutenant Colonels may be superseded in their command by militia officers, to the extreme prejudice of the service.

The idea, therefore, is submitted, to recur to the former arrangement of field officers to a regiment, to wit: a Colonel, a Lieutenant Colonel, and a Major.

The only difference of expense will be fourteen dollars per month to the Lieutenant Colonel, in addition to the pay and emoluments of a major, as the Lieutenant Colonels Commandant were entitled to the pay and emoluments of a full Colonel.

Instructions to the Commissioners for treating with the Southern Indians.

TO BENJAMIN LINCOLN, CYRUS GRIFFIN, and DAVID HUMPHREYS, Esq's.
Commissioners Plenipotentiary for negotiating and concluding treaties of peace with the independent tribes or nations of Indians within the limits of the United States, south of the river Ohio.

GENTLEMEN:

The United States consider it as an object of high national importance, not only to be at peace with the powerful tribes or nations of Indians south of the Ohio, but, if possible, by a just and liberal system of policy, to conciliate and attach them to the interests of the Union.

In order, therefore, that you may be possessed of all the information relative to the Southern Indians contained in the public documents, you have herewith delivered to you, copies of the following papers, to wit:

The several statements which have been made on the subject from the war office, to which are added, copies of the treaties which have been made by the United States with the Cherokees, Chickasaws, and Choctaws, and the commissioners' reports thereon; the proceedings and reports of James White, Esq. superintendent for the Southern district; the reports of Messrs. Winn and Martin, temporary superintendents; the resolves of Congress, under which commissioners have been appointed by the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, and the said commissioners' reports; and, also, certain papers transmitted by Georgia against Joseph Martin, one of the aforesaid temporary commissioners.

The first great object of your mission is to negotiate and establish peace between the State of Georgia and the Creek nation. The whole nation must be fully represented, and solemnly acknowledged to be so by the Creeks themselves.

You will find the ostensible, and probably the real cause of hostilities between Georgia and the Creeks, to consist in a difference of judgment of three treaties, stated to have been made between the said parties, to wit: At Augusta, in 1783; at Galphinton, in 1785; and at Shoulderbone, in 1786: copies of which you have herewith delivered to you.

It is a circumstance of the highest consequence, to investigate thoroughly all the facts under which the said treaties were made. The official papers will afford you great information on this subject.

On the one side, the objections against the justice of said treaties, are stated in the several communications of Mr. McGillivray, and the communications of the Lower Creeks to Mr. White, the superintendent.

On the other side, the statement made by the Legislature of Georgia, contains the reasons in support of the treaties.

The opinion of the commissioners of the United States of the treaty of Galphinton, is contained in their reports; and the communications of James White, Esq. the superintendent, will show his judgment on the case.

But, in addition to all these written evidences, it may be proper, in order that the investigation be conducted with the most perfect impartiality, to have such viva voce testimony as can be obtained.

For this purpose, you will request the Governor and Legislature of Georgia, if in session, to authorize such person or persons to attend the treaty as he or they may think proper, in order to give you such information as you may request, from time to time, of the transactions relative to said treaties.

You will also endeavor to ascertain the facts relative to the said treaties, from the Creeks.

And you will further endeavor to obtain information, on oath, of the manner in which the said treaties were held, from such unprejudiced respectable private characters, who were present at the said treaties, as you shall be able to find.

The main points to be ascertained, are—

1st. Whether all the lands belonging to the Upper and Lower Creeks are the common property of the whole nation? Or,

2d. Were the lands stated to have been ceded to Georgia by the three treaties, or either of them, acknowledged by the Upper Creeks to be the sole property of the Lower Creeks?

3d. Were the acknowledged proprietors of the lands, stated to have been ceded to Georgia, present, or fully represented, at the said three treaties?

4th. Did the Creeks, present at the said treaties, act with a full understanding of the cessions they are stated to have made?

5th. Were the said treaties and cessions freely made on the part of the Creeks, uninfluenced by any threats or implication of force?

These circumstances, and all others connected therein, must be critically examined into, in order that you may form your judgment on the said treaties with the greatest accuracy.

If the result of your investigation should be, that the said three treaties, and the cessions of land therein contained, were made by a full and authorized representation of the Creek nation, or that the cessions of land was obtained with the full understanding and free consent of the acknowledged proprietors, and that there were no circumstances of unfairness or constraint of any sort, used to induce the Creeks to make the cessions to Georgia, in this case precisely, you are to insist on a formal renewal and confirmation of the said cessions to Georgia, or such parts thereof as you shall find just. If the Creeks, after hearing all your arguments for the renewal of the said treaties, so far as the same may respect the confirmation of such parts of the cessions of land contained therein, as you shall have adjudged just and equitable, should obstinately refuse to confirm the same to Georgia, then you are to inform them that the arms of the Union will be called forth for the protection of Georgia, in the peaceable and just possession of said lands; and in case the Creeks attempt any molestation or injury to Georgia, that they will be deemed the enemies of the United States, and punished accordingly.

But if it should result from your inquiries, that the said treaties and cessions were obtained, on the part of Georgia, under such circumstances as to preclude the interference of the United States, consistently with their justice and dignity, you are not to urge or persuade the Creeks to a renewal or confirmation thereof.

It is, however, to be observed, that Georgia has proceeded on the principle that the cession stated to have been made at Augusta, in 1783, was fairly obtained; and that the said State has surveyed and divided the lands between the Ogechee and Oconee among certain descriptions of its citizens; that the said citizens have settled and planted on said lands in great numbers. Should, therefore, the result of your investigation be unfavorable to the claims of Georgia, it would be highly embarrassing to that State to relinquish the said lands to the Creeks.

Hence it will be an important accommodation to Georgia to obtain from the Creeks a regular conveyance of the said lands lying between the Ogechee and Oconee.

To accomplish this object, therefore, you are specially required to use your highest exertions with the Creeks. On your success materially depends the internal peace of Georgia, and probably its attachment to the General Government of the United States.

If the prejudices of the Creeks against the United States are not too deeply rooted, it is presumed that such advantages to that nation can be stipulated as to induce them not only to relinquish to Georgia the lands in question, but to attach them sincerely and permanently to the United States.

The disputed lands being entirely despoiled of their game by the settlements, are therefore no longer valuable to the Creeks as hunting grounds. If they have not been fairly purchased of the real proprietors by Georgia, it ought to be done. In case the Creeks, therefore, would be willing to make a proper conveyance for a given sum, you will stipulate that the same shall be paid by Georgia at a certain period, or, in case of failure, by the United States.

While negotiating the price to be given for the said land, you will have due regard to the sums which Georgia actually paid at the treaty of Augusta, to the present value of the lands as hunting grounds, and to the other considerations hereafter specified.

In this part of the negotiation, it would be desirable that the persons who may be appointed by the Governor or Legislature of Georgia to attend the treaty, should concur with you as to the sum which, in case of purchase, shall be stipulated to be given.

In addition to the purchase money for the lands, and for the further great purpose of attaching the Creeks to the United States, provided the same, in your mature judgments, should be necessary, you are hereby empowered to make the following stipulations:

1st. A secure port to the Creeks, or their head men, [on the Altamaha, St. Mary's, or any place between the said rivers, into which, or from which, the Creeks may import or export the articles of merchandise necessary to the Indian commerce, on the same terms as the citizens of the United States. The number of arms and quantity of ammunition, however, to be regulated by the quantity that shall be regarded as necessary for the hunters.

If any apprehension should be entertained on the part of the Creeks on account of the safety of the goods which they might so import or export, it may be stipulated that the same should be protected by a company of the regular troops of the United States.

The trade of the Creeks is said at present to be engrossed by a company of British merchants, stationed at one of the Bahama islands, who have connected Mr. McGillivray with them as a partner. The Spaniards have permitted some of the rivers which empty into the Gulf of Mexico to be the channel of this trade for a certain number of years. Some impediments or impositions of duties appear to have disgusted Mr. McGillivray with the Spaniards, or with the communication, and renders him desirous of a port in the United States. If these circumstances could be the means of breaking his connexion with the Spanish colonies, it would be wise policy to afford the Creeks a port, and to protect them in every thing relative thereto.

2ndly. Gifts in goods, or money to some, and, if necessary, honorary military distinctions to others, of the influential chiefs.

The presents will be regulated by your judgment. The idea of military distinction arises from the information that Mr. McGillivray possesses a commission of Colonel, or Lieutenant Colonel from the King of Spain.

If he could be induced to resign that commission by the offer of one a grade higher, the offer ought to be made and substantiated, on his taking a solemn oath of allegiance to the United States.

Mr. McGillivray is stated to possess great abilities, an unlimited influence over the Creek nation, and part of the Cherokees. It is an object worthy of considerable exertion to attach him warmly to the United States.

The measure could be attempted and urged with great propriety, as it respects his fidelity to the Creeks, and the continuance of his own importance in that nation.

The United States do not want the Creek lands; they desire only to be friends and protectors of the Creeks, and to treat them with humanity and justice.

In case you should be satisfied of his compliance with your desires, you will deliver him the presents which are particularly designated for him, and also give him assurances of such pecuniary rewards from the United States as you may think reasonable, consequent on the evidence of his future favorable conduct.

3rdly. If you should find the measure necessary, in order to accomplish the before recited objects, you will further stipulate a solemn guarantee of the United States to the Creeks of their remaining territory, to be supported, if necessary, by a line of military posts.

This measure will, most probably, be highly satisfactory to the Creeks, as it will entirely prevent any attempts to purchase any part of their lands, and it will, at the same time, impress them with the moderation and justice of the General Government.

If these offers, with all the benefits resulting therefrom, should be insufficient to induce the Creeks to agree, voluntarily, to relinquish the disputed lands between the Ogeechee and Oconee rivers, you cannot, with propriety, make a tender of more favorable conditions.

In this event, however, you may endeavor to conclude a treaty, and establish therein a temporary boundary, making the Oconee the line—to stipulate the secure port, and the pecuniary and honorary considerations before recited.

You will establish the principle, in case of concluding a treaty, that the Creeks, who are within the limits of the United States, acknowledge themselves to be under the protection of the United States of America, and of no other sovereign whosoever; and, also, that they are not to hold any treaty with an individual State, nor with individuals of any State.

You will also endeavor, without making it an ultimatum, to establish such direct trade as the Government of the Union shall authorize. This point, however, is to be managed with the greatest delicacy, for the before recited reasons.

In the general objects of the restoration of prisoners, negroes, &c. you will conform to the treaties of Hopewell with the Cherokees, Chickasaws, and Choctaws.

You will, also, endeavor to obtain a stipulation for certain missionaries, to reside in the nation, provided the General Government should think proper to adopt the measure. These men to be precluded from trade, or attempting to purchase any lands; but to have a certain reasonable quantity, per head, allowed for the purpose of cultivation. The object of this establishment would be the happiness of the Indians, teaching them the great duties of religion and morality, and to inculcate a friendship and attachment to the United States.

If, after you have made your communications to the Creeks, and you are persuaded that you are fully understood by them, they should refuse to treat and conclude a peace, on the terms you propose, it may be concluded that they are decided on a continuance of acts of hostility, and that they ought to be guarded against as the determined enemies of the United States.

In this case, you will report such plans, both for defensive and offensive measures, so as best to protect the citizens of the United States on the frontiers, from any acts of injury or hostility of the Creeks. Although the policy of attaching influential chiefs by pecuniary or honorary considerations, may not be doubted, yet it has been otherwise, with respect to making presents to the commonalty among the Indians. In case, therefore, you find that the Creeks are willing to relinquish the land between the Ogeechee and Oconee, on further payments for the same, you will endeavor to stipulate, that the mass of the goods you have in charge for the treaty, should be received by the Indians as part, or the whole of the consideration for the conveyance of the said lands, as you shall judge proper.

Messrs. Osborne and Pickens have, in their report of the 30th June last, stated, that they have agreed to hold a general treaty with the Creeks at the Rock Landing, on the Oconee river, in the State of Georgia, on the 15th of September next ensuing; you will make every exertion to be there at that time. Immediately on your arrival at Savannah you will arrange the transportation by land or water, of the goods and provisions under your direction, to the place of treaty, or towards the same, so as to arrive with all possible expedition. At the same time, you will despatch expresses to the Governor, notifying him of your commission and arrival, and also to Messrs. Osborne and Pickens; and as soon after as possible, you will repair to the place affixed for treating. The troops and the goods may follow agreeably to your directions. Perhaps you may change the place of treaty, to some place to which your goods might be transported with greater facility than the Rock Landing on the Oconee river.

But, notwithstanding your greatest exertions, it may happen that your arrival may be so retarded, that Messrs. Pickens and Osborne may have held a treaty, and the Indians may have departed to their own country.

In this case you will carefully enquire, whether there were present at the treaty, a full representation of the whole Creek nation, and particularly Mr. McGillivray, and whether the treaty was made under such circumstances as to be consistent with the justice of the United States, and conformable to the spirit of their instructions. If so, you will confirm and ratify the same, in as full a manner as if you had been actually present. But, if an inadequate representation only should have been present, or any circumstances should have been adopted, of which the United States could not with justice and dignity approve, in this case you will use your best endeavors to persuade the Creeks to attend a new treaty, at such place and at such time as you may judge proper. You will observe the same conduct to collect the Creeks, in case it should appear that they, from any circumstances, are disinclined to attend generally the treaty on the 15th of September, or provided your arrival should be posterior to that period, and you shall learn they did not attend, agreeably to the invitation of Messrs. Pickens and Osborne.

During your negotiations with the Creeks, you will endeavor to ascertain the following points:

- 1st. The number of warriors in the whole nation, including Upper and Lower Creeks and Seminoles.
- 2d. Whether they are armed with common and rifle muskets, or in any other manner, and how furnished with ammunition.
- 3d. The number of each division of Upper Creeks, Lower Creeks, and Seminoles.
- 4th. The number of women and children and old men in each district.
- 5th. The number of towns in each district.
- 6th. The names, characters, and residence, of the most influential chiefs; and, as far as the same may be, their grades of influence.
- 7th. The kinds of government, if any, of the towns, districts, and nations.
- 8th. Whether they are hunters only, or whether they cultivate and possess cattle, if so, the degree of cultivation and number of cattle.
- 9th. The usual hunting grounds of the whole nation and their districts.
- 10th. The kinds and value of furs taken annually, and how disposed of.
- 11th. The amount of the European goods annually consumed.
- 12th. Whether ginseng abounds in that country; if so, whether it is gathered in any considerable quantities.
- 13th. To ascertain the nature of the country west from Georgia to the Mississippi; whether mountainous, hilly, level, or abounding with low grounds and morasses—the nature of the soil and growth.
- 14th. To ascertain particularly, how far northward the waters of the Mobile, Apalachicola, and Altamaha rivers, are navigable for boats, and the nearest land portages from the northern navigable streams of said rivers, to the southern navigable waters or streams of the Tennessee river.

The accurate knowledge of this subject is of considerable importance, but the inquiries thereto should be circuitously conducted.

15th. To ascertain with great precision the nature of the connexion of the Creeks with the Spaniards, and, if practicable, to obtain copies of any treaties between them; whether the predominating prejudices of the Creeks are in favor, or against the Spaniards, and particularly the state of Mr. McGillivray's mind on this subject.

16th. You will endeavor, as far as your opportunities will admit, to ascertain similar facts relative to the Cherokees, Chickasaws, and Choctaws, as are contained in the before recited requests relative to the Creeks.

In case of your concluding a treaty with the Creeks, and it should be your judgment that a line of military posts would be necessary to the due observance thereof, and also as a security of the peace of the Cherokees, you will report a plan for the stations which should be taken, and the number of troops which should occupy each.

The people who are settled on Cumberland river have just cause of complaints against the Creeks, who have, during the present year, murdered several families within that district. The Creeks can have no cause of complaint against that settlement.

This circumstance is to be strongly stated to the Creeks, and in case of a continuance of their murders, the vengeance of the Union is to be denounced against them.

The peculiar case of the Cherokees seems to require the immediate interposition of the justice of the United States. But as that nation of Indians are principally resident within the territory claimed by North Carolina, which is not a member of the present Union, it may be doubted whether any efficient measures in favor of the Cherokees could be adopted immediately.

By the public newspapers it appears, that, on the 16th June last, a truce was concluded with the Cherokees by Mr. John Steele, on behalf of the State of North Carolina. In this truce a treaty was stipulated to be held as soon as possible; and in the mean time, all hostilities should cease on both sides.

In the event of North Carolina adopting the constitution of the United States, it will be incumbent on the General Government to take every wise measure to carry into effect the substance of the treaty of Hopewell; in the mean time, you will send a message to the Cherokees, stating to them the difficulties arising from the local claims of North Carolina, as far as the same may be proper. That, when these shall be removed, the United States will convince the Cherokees of their justice and friendship.

You will also transmit a message to the whites in the neighborhood of the Cherokees, enjoining an observance of the truce made by Mr. Steele, until a general treaty shall take place, when justice shall be administered to all parties.

The two Cherokees who have lately come to this city, with their conductor, Mr. Bennet Ballew, are to go under your direction to the place of treaty. Good policy requires that they should be kindly treated, although there are suspicions that the conduct of Bennet Ballew has not been very proper with respect to the lands of the Cherokees. You will endeavor to ascertain his real character and designs, and make such use of him as you shall think proper. You have delivered to you copies of the papers which Mr. Ballew presented from the Cherokees.

The treaties with the Choctaws and Chickasaws will inform you of the stipulations of the United States to extend trade to those nations. You will report a plan for carrying into effect the said stipulations, and you will also transmit to the said nations messages containing assurances of the continuance of the friendship of the United States, and of the intentions of the General Government of extending the trade to them, agreeably to the treaties of Hopewell. You will have regular invoices of all articles delivered to you for the proposed treaty, and you will keep fair accounts of all your disbursements, which you will regularly settle at the treasury of the United States.

And in all cases where the same may be proper, consistently with the secrecy necessary to be observed, the delivery of the goods ought to be attested by the commissioned officers of the troops, who should attend the commissioners.

You will also keep a regular journal of your transactions, and report the same.

It is presumed that you will conduct all your disbursements by that proper economy so necessary to be observed in all transactions of the General Government. You will learn, by the papers delivered to you, that certain goods were left by the commissioners after the treaties at Hopewell, in the commencement of the year 1786. It is probable that these goods may have been delivered to Messrs. Pickens and Osborne; you will, therefore, apply to said gentlemen for regular invoices of all the goods in their possession, for the treaty, distinguishing the means by which they became possessed thereof.

You will also request of them an account of the moneys or goods they may have received of the States of South Carolina and Georgia, in consequence of the resolves of Congress, of the 26th October, 1787, and August 14, 1788.

As the said Messrs. Pickens and Osborne will most probably be at the proposed place of treaty, with the expectation of conducting the same, you will deliver them the letter containing the reasons of Government for appointing new commissioners.

Were there any services at the treaty, in which you could employ them, it might be proper so to do.

You will endeavor to avail yourselves, as far as may be, of any arrangements which may have been taken by Georgia, for the supplies of provisions during the holding of the treaty, or for furnishing the means of transportation, for which the said State will have credit on the before recited requisitions of Congress, of the 26th October, 1787, and the 14th of August, 1788.

You will please to observe, that the whole sum that can be constitutionally expended for the proposed treaty with the Creeks, shall not exceed the sum of twenty thousand dollars—the goods and money which have been delivered to you, and the expenses which will arise, by the removal and return of the troops, and your own pay, will amount to —

You will, therefore, see the necessity of economizing your means, and that the same cannot be extended.

It is, however, to be observed, that the sums you shall think proper to stipulate to the Creeks, for the cessions of the lands between the Ogechee and Oconee, is to be considered additional to the said twenty thousand dollars.

You will, from time to time, communicate your progress to the Secretary of the War Department, and receive such further directions from him, as the case may require.

The company of artillery, commanded by Captain Burbeck, will accompany you to the place of treaty, and be under your orders. As soon as the treaty shall be finished, you will take the proper measures for the return of the company to this place, as the time of service will soon expire. The company will receive one month and a half's pay, and be furnished with three months' rations, which you will cause to be transported as the service may require. These instructions will be the governing principles of your conduct, and they are to be regarded as secret.

But many circumstances may arise, which may render some degree of modification necessary. In every event, however, you will please to remember, that the Government of the United States are determined, that their administration of Indian affairs shall be directed entirely by the great principles of justice and humanity.

As soon as you have concluded your negotiations with the Creeks, and forwarded your messages as herein directed, you will return to this place, and make a full report of all your transactions to the Secretary of the War Department.

Given under my hand, at the city of New York, this 29th of August, 1789.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

By command of the President of the United States:

H. KNOX.

A.

Report of the Commissioners for treating with the Southern Indians.

NEW YORK, 17th November, 1789.

SIR:

We have kept a regular journal of our negotiations with the Creek nation, and now make a full report of the mission to you, as Secretary of the War Department.

We are, sir, with great respect, your most obedient humble servants,

B. LINCOLN,
CYRUS GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

To the Honorable HENRY KNOX, Esq.

A report of the proceedings of the Commissioners of the United States of America, for restoring and establishing peace and amity, between the United States and all nations of Indians situated within the limits of the said States, southward of the river Ohio.

On the 31st day of August last, we sailed from New York, and arrived at Savannah in the night of the 10th of September.

In conformity to our instructions on the 11th, we wrote the following letters, to the Governor of the State of Georgia, and to Messrs. Pickens and Osborne, the commissioners then at the Rock Landing.

“SAVANNAH, 11th September, 1789.

“SIR:

We have been honored by the Supreme Executive of the United States, with the appointment of commissioners plenipotentiary for negotiating and concluding a treaty of peace with the independent tribes or nations of Indians, within the limits of the United States, south of the river Ohio; and in consequence thereof, it becomes our duty, by the earliest opportunity, to communicate this information to your honor. In our negotiations, many subjects important to the interests of the State of Georgia will probably be discussed. Your honor will, therefore, if you should think the measure necessary, appoint some person or persons, the best informed in the nature of our business, to attend the commissioners, that they may, from time to time, receive from them such information as may be necessary on the subject of their negotiations. The commissioners expect to leave this town on the morrow, and to be at Augusta with all possible despatch.

In expectation that a large number of the natives would be at the Rock Landing, and lest there might not be a full supply of provisions to be obtained in the vicinity thereof, a very considerable quantity of salted provisions and flour were put on board of our vessels, the transportation of which, we find will be attended with great delay and expense.

We shall, therefore, store a considerable proportion of it here, until your honor's opinion can be known, whether there are high degrees of probability that fresh beef and Indian corn can be had at, or convenient to, the Rock Landing, sufficient to answer the great demands which, it is very certain, will be made for those articles. If such a probability shall not exist which shall fully satisfy your honor, the commissioners in that case have to beg, that an express may be immediately forwarded to Major Habersham, requesting him to forward the whole of the flour in his hands, or such parts as you may think necessary, by water, to Augusta.

As it is important that we should, as soon as possible, know the state of the supplies on which we are to rely while on the negotiation, and as we have been taught to expect that we should be aided essentially by this State, we must beg that your honor would order to be made out, for our own use, an invoice of such stores, the property of Georgia, as will be placed in our hands.

We have the honor to be, sir, your honor's most obedient servants,

B. LINCOLN,
C. GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

His honor the GOVERNOR of the State of Georgia.”

Having been appointed commissioners plenipotentiary by the Supreme Executive of the United States of America, for concluding treaties of peace and amity with the Indian nations, south of the Ohio, we thought proper to give you the earliest possible notice of our appointment. The reasons why it was deemed necessary that the characters employed in the execution of this business should not belong to any of the States bordering on those tribes of Indians with whom the treaties are proposed to be formed, will be fully, and, we trust, satisfactorily explained to you by the letter from the Secretary of War, which we shall have the honor of delivering into your hands.

We have also to inform you that we shall set off from this place as early as we can possibly make the necessary arrangements, and reach you as soon as may be. In the mean time, we earnestly hope and expect that you will not remit your endeavors to have every thing in readiness to give despatch and success to the negotiations; and you will please to communicate every necessary information to the Creek nation on the subject. We are convinced this will be the case, because the interest and happiness of the State of Georgia, not less than the dignity and honor of the United States, seem to require it.

On our part, you will be assured, gentlemen, that we shall always take a particular pleasure in doing justice to your merits by making the most favorable representations of your public services,

Being, with the greatest respect and esteem, gentlemen, your most obedient humble servants,

B. LINCOLN,
C. GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

The Honorable ANDREW PICKENS and H. OSBORNE, Esquires, Rock Landing.

Immediately after writing these letters, we proceeded to make the necessary arrangements relative to the transportation of ourselves, and also a part of the goods and provisions under our direction, to the place of treaty. We then despatched the subsequent communication to the Secretary of War:

“SAVANNAH, 12th September, 1789.

We arrived here the night before last, after an unusually rough passage; the transport with the troops (all well) had been in port nearly two days. We learned upon our arrival, that Mr. McGillivray was actually on his way to the place for holding the treaty, and on the second day of this month, at a short distance from it. The number of the Indians who attend him, is said to be between three and four thousand.

Our first care was to send an express to the Governor and the late commissioners, announcing our mission, and suggesting such arrangements as we deemed indispensable; particularly, we gave information to the Governor, that, from the difficulty of procuring the means of transportation, we should leave the greatest part of the provisions which we had brought with us, at this place, unless in his judgment they should be absolutely necessary for supporting the Indians during the continuance of the treaty; in this case, he was requested to send back an express to Major Habersham, that consequent measures might be taken instantaneously.

We found it impossible to hire horses, and, therefore, have been obliged to purchase five to carry us forward. It was with great difficulty that we have obtained a few poor teams to transport the most essentially necessary articles; with the troops who will march by the route of Augusta to-morrow morning, the greater part of the remaining stores will at the same time proceed by water to that place: for which place we shall also commence our journey early in the morning.

Mr. Ballew, and the Indians with him, having expressed an earnest inclination of returning to their own country from hence, and as it would save a travel of at least two hundred miles, we have furnished them with the means of doing it, and have sent friendly messages to the Chickasaws, Choctaws, and Cherokees, by them. We have likewise sent an address to the white people of the State of North Carolina, bordering on the country inhabited by the latter.

The captains of the sloops which came with us to this place having insisted upon receiving their money here, we have accordingly paid them.

We have the honor to be, sir, your obedient humble servants,

B. LINCOLN,
C. GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

The Honorable the Secretary of War.”

From Savannah we transmitted friendly talks to the Cherokees, Chickasaws, and Choctaws, expressed in the following words:

“A message to the Cherokee nation of Indians, from the commissioners plenipotentiary for restoring and establishing peace and amity between the United States of America and all the Indian nations situated within the limits of the said States, southward of the river Ohio:

BROTHERS OF THE CHEROKEE NATION!

We have been made very happy, by receiving information from the public newspapers, that, on the 16th of June last, a truce was concluded with your nation by the commissioner of North Carolina, on behalf of that State, and that, in this truce, a treaty was stipulated to be held as soon as possible; and in the mean time, that all hostilities should cease on both sides.

Whereupon, we, the commissioners plenipotentiary aforesaid, do think proper to confirm the said truce, and to give the strongest assurances of the friendly dispositions of the United States towards the Cherokee nation; and we have made the same known to all those whom it might concern, and particularly to all the inhabitants of the frontiers bordering on the Cherokee towns and settlements; declaring, in consequence of the full powers vested in us by the Supreme Executive of the United States of America, that it is the sincere intention of the said States to cultivate a friendly intercourse between our citizens and your people, and strictly enjoining an observance of the truce aforesaid upon the former.

HEAD-MEN AND WARRING CHIEFS OF ALL THE CHEROKEES, hearken to what we have to say to you!

Notwithstanding there are some difficulties, arising from the local claims of North Carolina, which prevent us at present from writing to you, so fully as we could wish; yet we would not omit so good an opportunity to assure you, by the return of your beloved man Mr. Bennet Ballew, and your beloved chief, Nontowaky, that, when those difficulties shall be removed, the General Government of the United States will be desirous of taking every wise measure to carry into effect the substance of the treaty of Hopewell, as well as to convince you of their justice and friendship.

Now, BROTHERS! we have nothing more to add at this time, except that we wish you all the happiness which we wish to the most dear of our own fellow-citizens; and that we will send to you another message on the subject of public affairs, before we shall return to the beloved city of Congress, from whence we came.

Done at Savannah, under our hands and seals, this 13th day of September, in the year of our Lord 1789, and in the 14th year of the independence of the United States of America.

B. LINCOLN,
C. GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

Attest, D. S. FRANKS, Sec'y.”

“A Message to the Chickasaw nation of Indians, from the commissioners plenipotentiary for restoring and establishing peace and amity between the United States of America and all the Indian nations situated within the limits of the said States, southward of the river Ohio:

BROTHERS OF THE CHICKASAW NATION:

We are glad, by the return of your beloved man, Mr. Bennet Ballew, into your country, to assure you of the continuance of the strong friendship of the United States of America for your nation.

We hope that the peace which was established between the commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States of America and the commissioners plenipotentiary of all the Chickasaws, at Hopewell on the Keowee, the tenth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty six, will last as long as the sun shall shine in the Heaven, or the rivers run into the ocean.

BROTHERS: We rejoice to inform you of many good things which have happened to our nation since that treaty; we have been fast recovering from the wounds that were made upon us by the British in the late war.

Our people are increasing in number every day. The white men in the other great continent begin more and more to respect us; we are at peace with all the world; a new and great council fire is kindled at our beloved city of New York, where the old and the wise men, from all our States, come to consult and promote the prosperity of all America.

Our union is strong: for, BROTHERS, we think and act like one man; our great warrior, General Washington, who, you very well know, drove our enemies all beyond the great water, is now the head-man of all our councils, and the chief of all our warriors; he, by the advice of his wise counsellors, has commanded us to tell you, that the United States regard the red men with the same favorable eye that they do the white men, and that justice shall always be maintained equally between them.

NOW, HEAD-MEN AND WARRING CHIEFS OF ALL THE CHICKASAWS, listen to us! We are the mouth of the Union for you, and say that we are perfectly satisfied with your conduct since the treaty of Hopewell, and trust we have given you reason to be satisfied with ours. All that remains for both nations, is to continue to act the same open and friendly part. You, Brothers, may rest assured that your interests are always near to our hearts, and that, in conformity to the true intent and meaning of the eighth article of the said treaty, the General Government of the United States will, as soon as the circumstances may conveniently admit, take measures for extending more fully to the Chickasaws, the benefits and comforts arising from a well regulated and mutually advantageous trade.

BROTHERS, farewell: we wish you all the happiness and prosperity which we wish to our fellow citizens, the white men of the United States.

Done at Savannah, under our hands and seals, this 13th day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, and in the 14th year of the independence of the United States of America.

B. LINCOLN,
C. GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

Attest, DAVID S. FRANKS, Secretary."

A similar message, with the necessary alterations, was sent to the Choctaws.

We also gave to Mr. Ballew, a copy of an address to the white inhabitants contiguous to the Cherokee nation, accompanied by the letter which follows it:

"To all those whom it may concern.

"The commissioners of the United States of America, for restoring and establishing peace and amity between the United States and all nations of Indians situated within the limits of the said States, southward of the river Ohio, send greeting:

Forasmuch as we have been given to understand, that a truce hath lately been concluded at the War-ford, between the commissioners of the State of North Carolina, on the one part, and the head-men of the Cherokees on the other; in expectation that a further negotiation for the purpose of establishing permanent peace and tranquillity will take place, as soon as the circumstances may admit: and whereas we have sent an official message to the Cherokee nation, with full assurances of the continuation of the good disposition and friendly intentions of the United States towards them:

Now, therefore, we the commissioners plenipotentiary aforesaid, do think proper to make the same known to all the inhabitants of the frontiers; bordering on the towns and settlements of the said Cherokee nation; and we do declare, in virtue of the full powers vested in us, by the Supreme Executive of the United States of America, that it is the sincere intention of the said United States to cultivate a friendly intercourse and perpetual harmony between the citizens of the United States and the Southern Indians on their frontiers, upon terms of perfect equality and mutual advantage.

We therefore enjoin an observance of the truce aforesaid, and further declare, that any infraction of the tranquillity now subsisting between the said contracting parties, would directly contravene the manifest intention, and highly incur the displeasure, of the supreme authority of the United States of America.

Done at Savannah, under our hands and seals, this 13th day of September, in the year of our Lord 1789, and in the 14th year of the independence of the United States of America.

B. LINCOLN,
C. GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

Attest, DAVID S. FRANKS, Secretary."

"SAVANNAH, 13th September, 1789.

"SIR:

We have thought proper to entrust to your care, friendly messages from us, the commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States of America, for restoring and establishing peace and amity between the United States and all the Indian nations, situated within the limits of the said States, southward of the river Ohio, to the Cherokee, Chickasaw, and Choctaw nations of Indians, which you will be pleased to deliver to the great councils of their several nations. We have also given to you, for the satisfaction of the Cherokees, a copy of the address which we propose to transmit to the white inhabitants contiguous to the Cherokee nation. Relying upon your diligence and zeal to execute, with despatch and fidelity, the business that we have committed to you, we wish you a prosperous journey, and are, with due consideration,

Sir, your most obedient humble servants,

B. LINCOLN,
C. GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

Mr. BENNET BALLEW."

On the 13th we left Savannah, and on the 17th arrived at Augusta. We announced our arrival to the Governor the same evening, and the next morning addressed to him the following note:

"AUGUSTA, 18th September, 1789.

SIR:

We are extremely unhappy to find that your honor was so much indisposed as to prevent you from receiving company at the time of our arrival last evening. We did not, therefore, trouble you with the letters we had in charge for your honor, until this morning. We now take the earliest moment of laying them before you, with our best wishes for the re-establishment of your health.

We have the honor to be, with sentiments of the highest consideration and esteem,

Sir, your most obedient humble servants,

B. LINCOLN,
C. GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

His Honor the Governor of the State of Georgia."

To which his Honor was pleased to reply:

"AUGUSTA, 18th September, 1789.

"SIRS:

I am happy that you are arrived thus far on the business with which you are charged. Whilst we had flattering expectations that the proposed treaty would have taken place with the Creeks, we feel an additional consolation in your appointment, from the knowledge you will derive, by the incidents of your negotiations, of all the causes of our complaints.

Not having recently heard from the Rock Landing, I could not farther act on that part of your despatch of the 11th, respecting provisions, than by sending for the State agent to meet you at this place, whose arrival I expect every moment.

Upon the other parts of that, and the whole of those of this morning, I shall be happy to see you before I go into council; and, as far as lies in my power, and I may respond for the Executive council, you may rely on the support of the Government, in the accomplishment of the objects of your mission:

I have the honor to be, sirs, with much consideration, your most obedient humble servant,

GEORGE WALTON.

The Honorable the Commissioners Plenipotentiary for } negotiating with the Indians south of the Ohio." }

After a free conversation with the Governor, on the objects of the mission, he wrote us a note, enclosing an act of the Council of the same date.

" AUGUSTA, 18th September, 1789.

" SIRs:

I do myself the honor of enclosing to you a proceeding of the Executive authority of this day. Those details, which it shall be necessary to go into on the same ground, shall be communicated to you by express, through,

Sirs, your most obedient servant,

GEORGE WALTON.

The Honorable the Commissioners for Indian Affairs."

" IN COUNCIL, Augusta, 18th September, 1789.

" The letter of the honorable the commissioners for negotiating treaties with the Indians south of the Ohio, of the 11th instant, dated at Savannah, being taken up, and another letter of the 18th, announcing their arrival at Augusta, and enclosing a despatch from the War Office, of the 29th of August last, being read and considered:

It is ordered, that the said commissioners be assured, that every assistance in the power of the State shall be given, which may be necessary to give facility and effect to their negotiations with the Creek Indians.

Extract from the minutes.

J. MERIWETHER, Sec'y E. C."

An answer to our letter of the 11th, to Messrs. Pickens and Osborne, was received at this place:

" ROCK LANDING, 16th Sept. 1789.

" GENTLEMEN:

We had, this day, the honor to receive your joint letter of the 11th instant. Every arrangement that was in our power to make, preparative to the treaty, has been completed for two weeks past, and the Indians have been encamped at the distance directed by the Secretary of War, during the same period.

We have used every exertion to keep the Indians together, and in good humor, which has hitherto been done with great difficulty. The same zeal and industry shall be continued on our part, for their continuance, but at the same time it is necessary to give you the earliest information, that the Indians will not remain after Friday next, unless you arrive here before the expiration of that day; this Mr. McGillivray informed us yesterday, though it is his wish to remain longer.

We have the honor to be, gentlemen, with due respect, your obedient servants,

ANDREW PICKENS,
H. OSBORNE.

The Hon. B. LINCOLN, C. GRIFFIN, D. HUMPHREYS, Esqrs."

To which we made the following reply:

" AUGUSTA, 18th September, 1789.

" GENTLEMEN:

We have just been honored by the receipt of the letter which you addressed to us on the 16th instant, and are inexpressibly astonished at the information which you have given, as it is so diametrically contrary to the ideas which his honor the Governor of this State had a few moments before held out to us.

Trusting, gentlemen, that you will still continue your utmost exertions to keep the Indians together, and that, in all events, you will have the goodness to forward the letter which accompanies this to Mr. McGillivray, with the utmost despatch,

We have the honor to be, with great respect, gentlemen, your most obedient humble servants,

B. LINCOLN,
C. GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

To Messrs. PICKENS AND OSBORNE, Rock Landing."

By the same express we wrote to Mr. McGillivray:

" AUGUSTA, September 18th, 1789.

" SIR:

We left New York eighteen days ago, invested with full powers, from the Supreme Executive of the United States of America, to conclude a treaty of peace and amity with the Creek nation of Indians. For the accomplishment of an object of so much importance, we have pressed our journey with uncommon expedition. We arrived here last evening, and, after making the necessary arrangements for our luggage to follow, we propose departing from this place for the Rock Landing this afternoon.

Being this moment greatly astonished by information from Messrs. Pickens and Osborne, that the Indians would certainly disperse, unless we should arrive within three days after the very day which was originally appointed for the meeting, we shall accelerate our journey as much as possible. We therefore send an express with this letter, to let you know that we shall be at the Rock Landing the day after to-morrow, and to assure you, that, if a lasting peace and friendship shall not be established, between the United States and the Creeks, it will not be owing to the want of the best dispositions on the part of the former.

We are, sir, with due respect, your obedient humble servants,

B. LINCOLN,
C. GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

The Hon. ALEXANDER MCGILLIVRAY, Esq."

On the afternoon of the 18th we pursued our journey, and two of the commissioners reached the Lock Landing on the 20th, at evening, the other being unavoidably detained on the road. The following note was immediately sent to Mr. McGillivray, to which he replied early the next morning:

“ROCK LANDING, 20th September, 1789.

“The commissioners present their most respectful compliments to Mr. Alexander McGillivray, chief of the Creek Nation, and have the pleasure to announce that a majority of them, a few moments since, arrived at this place, and that, without delay, they shall be ready to proceed to business.

ALEXANDER MCGILLIVRAY Esq. Great Chief of all the Creeks, &c.”

“Alexander McGillivray, and the rest of the chiefs, are very glad to hear of the arrival of the honorable the commissioners of the United States of America at the Rock Landing. A few principal chiefs intend to visit them this forenoon.

The Honorable the Commissioners of the United States of America, at the Rock Landing.”

About 11 o'clock, the following note from Mr. McGillivray was received:

“GENTLEMEN:

Some of the principal chiefs, accompanied by an interpreter, named Derezeau, go over to pay you a visit this forenoon. I beg leave to suggest to you, that a private conversation between us will be necessary, previous to the opening of the treaty; and this camp I think the most convenient place for the purpose. I could therefore wish to be honored with the company of one or two of you this evening. In suggesting this measure, I intreat, gentlemen, that you will not consider it as proceeding from a want of the proper attention in me, which is due to the very respectable characters that compose the present commission.

I am, very respectfully, gentlemen, your most obedient servant,

ALEXANDER MCGILLIVRAY.”

The Cussetah king, the Tallasee king, and the Hallowing king, attended the commissioners accordingly, as a deputation from the whole nation, to congratulate them on their arrival.

After the customary ceremony, they all expressed the most ardent wishes to establish a lasting peace with the United States, and declared their extreme joy that the day was come, which afforded a fair opportunity for accomplishing an object so interesting and desirable to their nation.

Soon after this interview, the following talk was sent to the Indian camp:

“To the Hon. Alexander McGillivray, great chief, and all the other head men and warring chiefs of the Creek Nation:

“BROTHERS:

Having been honored with a commission by the Supreme Executive of the United States of America, to conclude a treaty of peace and amity with your nation, we think it expedient, in the first instance, to show you our full powers; on the other part, we desire to be favored, by you, with such evidence as the nature of the case may admit, of the fullness and authenticity of the representation of the Creek nation which is now present.

These preliminaries being satisfactorily settled, so that hereafter there may be no complaints of partial or defective representations, we shall be ready to make our further communications, as soon as the Honorable Mr. Griffin, our colleague, shall arrive, which will probably be to-morrow.

B. LINCOLN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

21st September, 1789.”

Much conversation was had with Mr. McGillivray upon the subjects of our negotiation, at the camp of the Indians, on the evening of the 21st, and at the quarters of the commissioners, the 22nd, where Mr. McGillivray and a number of the other chiefs passed the day.

Early in the morning of the 23d, a letter was sent to Mr. McGillivray, and the day was employed by the commissioners in completing the draught of a treaty, and other communications to be laid before the great council of the nation.

“SIR:

We have the pleasure to inform you that the honorable Mr. Griffin arrived here the last evening. We are now engaged in preparing the communications we intend to make to your nation, which, if agreeable to you, will be delivered to-morrow morning. General Lincoln and General Pickens will have the pleasure of attending this forenoon at your black drink.

We have the honor to be, &c.

B. LINCOLN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

ALEX. MCGILLIVRAY, Esq. Chief of the Creek nation.”

At the conference between General Lincoln and Mr. McGillivray, it was agreed that the Creeks should attend the commissioners the next day at 11 o'clock, to hear what they had to communicate. However, late in the same evening, it was understood that it would be a matter of convenience for the Indians to receive the talks on the west side of the Oconee, and the commissioners accordingly wrote the subsequent letter:

“ROCK LANDING, 23d September, 1789.

“SIR:

As we are disposed to do every thing in our power to accomplish the objects of our mission, without an undue regard to matters of form, and as we understand it would be a matter of convenience for your people, that we should attend on your ground for the purpose of making our communications to-morrow, we have no objections to passing the river to your camp upon that occasion. You will therefore be pleased to consider this letter as designed to take away all cause of jealousy, and to put it in your option to arrange the time and place of conference in such manner as shall be most satisfactory to the Creeks. We shall expect your answer by the bearer, and, in the mean time, we have the honor to be,

Sir, your obedient servants,

B. LINCOLN,
C. GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

ALEX. MCGILLIVRAY, Esq. Chief of the Creek nation.”

To which Mr. McGillivray replied the next morning:

"INDIAN CAMP, Oconee River, 24th September, 1789.

"GENTLEMEN:

I have this morning received your letter, which I explained to the chiefs, who appear satisfied to find that you are disposed to make your communications to them on this side of the river. They therefore desire that they may be favored with your company this morning, at the ceremony of their black drink; when that is over, they wish immediately to proceed to business with you.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ALEX. MCGILLIVRAY, C. C. N.

The Hon. the Commissioners of the United States of America, &c. &c. Rock Landing."

At the time appointed, the commissioners attended the ceremony of black drink, and were conducted to the great square of the encampment by all the kings, chiefs, and warriors, in solemn pomp, and much apparent friendship. The commissioners then proceeded to business, and having read and explained their commission, gave the following talk:

"KINGS, HEAD-MEN, AND WARRIORS OF THE CREEK NATION: This parchment which we hold in our hands, and a copy of which we now deliver, has informed you that we are appointed by the President of the United States of America, with the advice of his old counsellors, commissioners plenipotentiary for restoring and establishing peace and amity between the United States and all the nations of Indians within the limits of the United States, southward of the river Ohio.

BROTHERS OF THE CREEK NATION, ATTEND! We trust that the great master of breath who formed us all brothers, whether white men or red men, has created this day to be the time for preventing our people and your people from taking away that breath which none but he can give, or should take away. We appeal to you, and ask, are not the pains and the miseries of the human race naturally severe enough, without their endeavoring, by unkindness, to increase the portion of bitterness and sorrow which must, of necessity, fall to the lot of man? Let us try to make each other happy, and not wretched. It is in this way that the General Government of the United States of America intend to act with all the world.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS: We will first speak of the present state and policy of our nation; and we will speak next of the reasons which ought to induce you to be in alliance with us, rather than with any other people whatever.

Although, Brothers, we cannot entirely forget the calamities we suffered in the late war with Great Britain, yet we have buried all resentments for the part which the allies of Britain acted in that bloody scene. That war left many of our cities, villages, and towns, in a ruinous condition; but we obtained liberty and independence. Our country has recovered from desolation. We are at peace with all the nations of the world. We are increasing every day in numbers. We have the means of happiness in our power, and wish to communicate them to you. Our lands are so extensive that they enjoy all seasons, and yield all productions. Our great ships are made to go in every part of the world, where goods and merchandise can be obtained. Our Union, which was a child, is grown up to manhood; so that it can speak with a louder voice, and strike with a stronger arm, than ever it has done before: for you must know, that a happy change has taken place in our national Government. One great council is established, with full powers to promote the public good. General Washington, who led our armies to conquest wherever he turned his face, is now the head-man of all our councils, and chief of all our warriors. You know him, and he never speaks the thing which is not. He has commanded us to tell you, that, while the General Government of confederated America will vindicate the right of every member of the Union, it will also see that justice shall be done to the nations of Indians situated within the limits of the United States. And we are authorized to declare and make known, that the United States will guaranty and defend to you, all the lands of your nation within the limits aforesaid, and which shall not be clearly ceded to any part of the Union.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS OF THE CREEK NATION: A few words only are necessary to prove to you, that it will be more natural for you to be allied with us, than with any other people. You are under the necessity of being connected with the white men, because you want their goods and merchandise. We can make a reasonable profit, by your articles of export, and afford such imports as you may want, at rates cheaper than they can be obtained in any other place. A secure port in our country will be much more convenient for you than a port in any other country. Thus both of us will be gainers by being friends. The promotion of our mutual interest will promote our mutual friendship. This will be found the only sure method to make a peace happy and lasting.

BROTHERS: We have nothing more to say to you at present; but, if you like this talk, and are possessed of the same good disposition for us which we entertain in good faith for you, we are ready to propose to you the draught of a treaty, which we think may be the foundation of a permanent treaty of peace and amity."

The talk having been received with strong marks of approbation, the commissioners then presented the representatives of the nation the draught of a treaty, as follows:

"Articles of peace and amity agreed upon between the President of the United States of America, in behalf of the said States, by the undersigned commissioners plenipotentiary, on the one part, and the undersigned kings, head-men, and warriors, of all the Creeks, in behalf of themselves and the Creek nation, on the other.

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a perpetual peace and friendship between all the citizens of the United States of America, and all the towns, tribes, and individuals, of the Upper and Lower Creeks.

ART. 2. The boundary between the citizens of the said United States and the Creeks, is, and shall be, from where the former line strikes the river Savannah; thence, up the said river, to a place on the most northern branch of the same, commonly called the Keeowee, where a northeast line, to be drawn from the top of the Occunna mountain, shall intersect; thence, along the said line, in a southwest direction, to Tugaloo river; thence to the top of the Currahee mountain; thence, to the head of the most southern branch of the Oconee river, that is to say, the river Apalachy, including all the waters of the same; thence, down the said river, to the confluence of the Oakmulgee; thence, on a southwest direction, to the most southern part of the river St. Mary; thence, down the said river, to the old line.

ART. 3. The Supreme Executive of the United States solemnly guaranties to the Creeks all their remaining territory, against all aggression or unjust usurpation whatever, and will support the said guarantee, if necessary, by a line of military posts.

ART. 4. The said Indian chiefs, for themselves, and their respective towns and tribes within the limits of the United States, do acknowledge the Creeks to be under the protection of the supreme authority of the United States, and of no other sovereign whosoever; and, also, that they are not to hold any treaty with an individual State, or with individuals of any State.

ART. 5. If any citizen or citizens of the United States shall presume to settle upon the lands guarantied to the Creek nation by this treaty, he or they shall be put out of the protection of the United States, and the Creeks may punish him or them if they shall think proper.

ART. 6. For the mutual advantage of the contracting parties, it is stipulated, that a free trade and friendly intercourse shall always be maintained between them; and, for the particular benefit of the said Creek nation, it is farther stipulated, that a secure post shall be established, at a place known by the name of Beard's Bluff, on the river Altamaha, or, if that shall be found inconvenient, at such other place as shall hereafter be agreed upon; into which, or from which, the Creeks may import or export all the articles of goods and merchandise necessary to the Indian commerce, on the same terms as the citizens of the United States: Provided, That the number of arms, and quantity of ammunition, shall not exceed their annual necessary supply for hunting. And if any just apprehension should be entertained by the Creeks, for the safety of the goods and merchandise, so imported or exported, the Supreme Executive of the United States will take effectual measures for protecting the same, by stationing a body of regular troops at the said post.

ART. 7. The General Government of the United States having the sole and exclusive right of regulating the trade between their citizens and the Indians, within the limits of their territories, will, as soon as may be, adopt an equitable system for the prevention of injuries and oppressions on the citizens or Indians; and, in the mean time, all traders, citizens of the United States, shall have liberty to go to any towns or tribes of the Creeks to trade with them, and they shall be protected in their persons and property, and kindly treated.

ART. 8. If any Indian or Indians, or persons residing among the Creeks, or who shall take refuge in their nation, shall commit a robbery or murder, or other capital crime, on any citizen of the United States of America, or person under their protection, the tribe to which such offender may belong, or the nation, shall be bound to deliver him or them, to be punished according to the laws of the United States: Provided, The punishment shall not be greater than if the robbery or murder, or other capital crime, had been committed by a citizen on a citizen.

ART. 9. And if any citizen of the United States of America, or person under their protection, shall commit a robbery or murder, or other capital crime, on any Indian, such offender shall be punished in the same manner as if the robbery or murder, or other capital crime, had been committed on a citizen of the United States of America, and the punishment shall be in presence of some of the Creeks, if any will attend; and that they may have an opportunity so to do, proper notice, if practicable, of the time and place of such intended punishment, shall be sent to some one of the tribes.

ART. 10. It is understood that the punishment of the innocent, under the idea of retaliation, is unjust, and shall never be practised on either side.

ART. 11. The kings, head-men, and warriors, of the Creek nation, will restore to their liberty all prisoners, citizens of the United States, now in that nation; and they will also restore all negroes, and all other property taken from citizens of the United States, during the late hostilities, to such person or persons as shall be appointed by the Governor of the State of Georgia to receive them.

ART. 12. The Creeks shall give notice to the citizens of the United States, of any designs which they may know, or suspect to be formed, in any neighboring tribe, or by any person whosoever, against the peace, free trade, and interest, of the United States.

ART. 13. All animosities for past grievances shall henceforth cease; and the contracting parties will carry the foregoing treaty into full execution, with all good faith and sincerity."

After some conversation with Mr. McGillivray, and the other chiefs, upon the business of the day, the commissioners returned to their quarters, and received the next morning the following note, which was immediately answered:

"GENTLEMEN:

The chiefs were in council until very late last night. The result appears to be, that they are not entirely satisfied with all parts of your talk; they object principally to the boundary marked out in the talk; however, it was my decision to let the matter stand as it was for the present—the hunting season being at hand. The chiefs should take care to prevent every act of hostility or depredation on the part of the warriors during the winter, and until we heard farther from you on the part of the United States. They resolve to break up to depart; it would be proper to give some presents, that they may not complain of losing their time, &c. &c.

I have the honor to be, your obedient humble servant,

ALEX. MCGILLIVRAY.

Hon. the Commissioners of the United States of America."

"ROCK LANDING, 25th September, 1789.

"SIR:

We have received your note of this morning, informing us that the chiefs were in council until very late last night; that it appeared they were not entirely satisfied with some parts of our talk; that they principally objected to the boundary line marked out in it; that, however, it was your decision to let the matter stand as it was for the present, establishing, in the mean time, a certain kind of a truce, until you should hear farther from us on the part of the United States. As the chiefs object to some part of our propositions, we have to ask, that they will give us in writing the only terms upon which they will enter into a treaty with us. We hope and trust that they will not separate without affording us this satisfaction, since we are as well prepared for concluding a treaty now, as we shall be at any other time. It is by no means probable, that the United States will send another commission to them. We are not authorized to make any presents whatever, unless a treaty of peace shall be concluded.

We have the honor to be, your most obedient humble servants,

B. LINCOLN,
C. GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

The Hon. A. MCGILLIVRAY, Chief of the Creek Nation."

During this stage of the business, Mr. McGillivray solemnly promised that he would pass the Oconee, and have a full and free conference with the commissioners upon the subject of the negotiations; and not more than an hour before his abrupt departure, he repeated the promise to one of them, that he would state his objections to the draught of the treaty, either in conversation or writing, the same afternoon. Very soon after this, he sent a verbal message, that he was constrained to fall back four or five miles, for the purpose of obtaining better forage for his horses; and that he hoped that the commissioners would not misconstrue his intentions. Yet, to their astonishment, they afterwards found that he had retreated to a greater distance, under the false pretext mentioned in his subsequent letter from Oakmulgee. On the 26th, the following letter was written to Mr. McGillivray. The honorable Mr. Few, appointed by the Executive of Georgia to communicate with the commissioners, General Pickens, and Colonel Saunders, of Georgia, going at the same time to Mr. McGillivray's encampment, to convince him of his error, and to persuade him to return; the Hallowing king going also, on the part of the Indians.

"ROCK LANDING, 26th September, 1789.

"SIR:

We had, on the 24th, the pleasure of presenting to you the sketch of a treaty, which appeared to us such an one as you could, in justice to yourselves, all circumstances considered, have subscribed to. In your observations thereon, you say, that there are some parts to which you object—principally to the boundary marked out in the talk. In answer to these observations, we informed you that it was our wish you would give us, in writing, the terms only upon which you would enter into a treaty with us. And we requested, at the same time, that you would not separate without affording us the satisfaction of receiving your final terms. We waited with anxious expectation, during the afternoon of yesterday, hoping we should be favored with them; but, as they have not come to hand, and we are informed that you have removed your camp to the distance of fifteen miles, without any intention of returning, not remarking on that conduct of yours, which has too much the appearance of a studied neglect of the commissioners, we go on to observe, that, had you given us your objections to the boundaries, that would have brought into discussion the validity of former treaties; had it appeared to us, upon a full investigation of this interesting matter, that all had not been right, and that full and perfect justice had not been done to the Indians, we should have been disposed to have adopted such measures as would have removed all reasonable grounds of complaint. If you should depart without this inquiry and full discussion of the whole business, it cannot be considered in any other point of light, than a refusal to establish any terms of peace whatever.<sup>4</sup>

We have the honor to be, &c.

B. LINCOLN,
C. GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

The Hon. ALEX. MCGILLIVRAY,
Chief of the Creek nation."

In the mean time, all the other kings and head-men, attending at the quarters of the commissioners, addressed them through the White Bird king, in the following talk:

"You are the great men whom we look upon as our brothers, and here are the great men of my nation, who are come to speak to you. We have been here a long time, and we met with you over the river in friendship; but all our people have got tired; our horses are strayed, and a good many of our people are gone; yet I have persuaded several to stay, to have, once more, a talk with you.

All the men here, at present, are come to take a peaceable leave of you. As our hunting time is coming on very soon, we are come over to hear what you have to say to us. Some of our people are gone up the river to hunt, in their way home. I have given orders for them to behave themselves well. If they go on this side the river, not to take off any of the white people's horses. I hope the whites will also behave themselves well, and not take our horses. If our people do not observe these orders, they shall be seized and sent down to the whites.

Although nothing should be done at this time about the treaty; I hope that it may be done hereafter, and that, in the mean time, peace and quietness will be kept on both sides.

When we get home, all our nation will hear the talks; and they will be peaceable and quiet, for that is the wish of them all.

I have little more to say at present, but that we are not going off affronted, but in peace and friendship.

It was the intention of our people to do something for our wives and children, and I think it was also the intention of the white people. I have nothing more to say, but that, when we part, I hope to shake hands in peace; and all our young people are come, that they may shake hands with you also."

Then the Cussetah king arose, and lighting a pipe, presented it to the commissioners, and said, "I look upon you as fathers and elder brothers, and wish to smoke a pipe with you."

To which the commissioners answered:

"FRIENDS AND BROTHERS: In answer to your friendly talk, we would say, that, having come from a long distance, we expected to smoke the pipe of peace and friendship with you, and to bury the hatchet of war forever.

We hear that your great chief and beloved man, Mr. McGillivray, is gone from his former camp, for which we are very sorry.

The other day we made some propositions for a long peace and friendship. If they were not agreeable to you, why did you not tell us? and then something else might have been proposed.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS: We are sent to make a peace, which shall be good for all parties. Persuade your great chief and beloved man, Mr. McGillivray, to come back and hear us again, that all things may be explained. We thank you for your good talk, and we hope you will not return to your nation until we have taken each other by the hand, and concluded a lasting peace with all our people, in friendship and good faith. We have no more to say to you at present."

On the 27th, we received the following answer from Mr. McGillivray, and on the next day we wrote him our last letter:

"CAMP, OAKMULGEE RIVER, 27th September, 1789.

"GENTLEMEN:

I am favored with your letter of yesterday, by Weatherford. I beg to assure you, that my retreat from my former camp, on the Oconee, was entirely owing to the want of food for our horses, and at the earnest entreaty of our chiefs. Colonel Humphreys and myself, at different interviews, entered minutely and deeply into the subject of contest between our nation and the State of Georgia. I observed to him, that we expected ample and full justice should be given us, in restoring to us the encroachments we complained of, in which the Oconee lands are included; but finding that there was no such intention, and that a restitution of territory hunting grounds was not to be the basis of a treaty of peace between us, I resolved to return to the nation, referring the matter, in full peace, till next spring. Many of the principals having gone hunting, nothing farther can now be done. I am very unwell, and cannot return. We sincerely desire a peace, but we cannot sacrifice much to obtain it. As for a statement of our disputes, the honorable Congress has long ago been in possession of, and has declared that they would decide on them in the principles of justice and humanity. 'Tis that we expect.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ALEX. MCGILLIVRAY.

The Hon. the Commissioners of the United States of America, Rock Landing."

"ROCK LANDING, 28th September, 1789.

"Sir:

We are extremely sorry that you would neither give us your objections to our propositions for forming a treaty, nor propose such terms as would be acceptable to the Creek nation, if acceded to by us. Colonel Humphreys asserts, that he neither told, nor intimated to you, that we had offered any articles in our project of a treaty, as an ultimatum: all our proceedings evince the same thing. You could not avoid having understood, from our letter of the 25th, (which you received previous to your departure from the Oconee, and which you have not yet answered) that we were desirous of receiving the terms upon which you and the chiefs of the Creek nation would enter into a treaty with us; you will also be pleased to recollect, that we expressed, at the same time, an earnest hope and expectation, that they would not separate without giving us this satisfaction.

These overtures on our part clearly indicated that we were disposed to make a peace upon any conditions not incompatible with the dignity and justice of the United States. Our last letter to you, of the 26th, explained our ideas and wishes, if possible, still more unequivocally, and informed you that, if you should depart without our having an opportunity of inquiring into the validity of former treaties, and fully discussing the whole business, it could not be considered in any other point of light than a refusal to establish peace upon any terms whatever.

Your not having done this, leaves it only in our power to return and report a state of facts to the Supreme Executive of the United States. To obtain still further information, we shall remain till Monday of next week, at Augusta, to which place we invite you to repair, either in person, or by some agent or agents of the Creek nation, in order to be present at the time when we shall attempt to procure farther documents, for establishing facts, as well as to give, on your part, all such intelligence, relative to past transactions, as shall be deemed expedient. We pledge our public faith and sacred honor for the safe conduct of yourself, or such agent or agents as may be employed by your nation, to and from the proposed place of conference. Should you conclude to come yourself, or send an agent or agents to the conference at Augusta, the person or persons under that description will be pleased to apply for a safeguard to the commanding officer at the Rock Landing, who has our instructions on the subject. In the mean time, we have to inform the Creeks, that the people settled on Cumberland river have just cause of complaint against them, because some of them have, during the present year, murdered several families within that district; and as the Creeks can have no cause of complaint against that settlement, we insist that effectual measures should be taken, on your part, to prevent all acts of hostility and plunder in that quarter.

With due consideration, we have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servants,

B. LINCOLN,
C. GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

The Honorable ALEXANDER MCGILLIVRAY, Chief of the Creek nation."

On the 28th, we gave a short account of our proceedings to the Secretary of War.

"ROCK LANDING, 28th September, 1789.

"SIR:

We have the mortification to inform you that the parties have separated without forming a treaty. The terms which were offered by us at the commencement of the negotiation, were not agreeable to Mr. McGillivray, but neither would he come forward with written objections, or propose any conditions of his own. His verbal communications were inadmissible, upon the spirit or words, of our instructions.

We shall have the honor of stating this business very fully at a future day, and are, with the greatest respect and esteem, your most obedient humble servants,

B. LINCOLN,
C. GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

The Honorable the Secretary of War, New York."

Having made all the necessary arrangements concerning the goods and stores belonging to the public, we departed from the Rock Landing, and arrived at Augusta on the 2d of October! The same evening, and early the next day, we wrote the following letter to the Governor of the State of Georgia:

"AUGUSTA, 2d October, 1789.

"SIR:

We make use of the first moment after our arrival to acquaint your honor that we have not been able to conclude a treaty of peace between the United States and the Creek nation. However, positive and repeated assurances were given to us by Mr. McGillivray, and all the chiefs of the Creeks present, that the tranquillity which now prevails, shall be inviolably preserved on the part of their people. Being much fatigued with our journey, we cannot have the honor of waiting upon you until to-morrow morning, when we shall do ourselves the pleasure of stating such further particulars as may be interesting to the State over which you preside.

We have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servants,

B. LINCOLN,
C. GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

His Honor the Governor of Georgia."

"AUGUSTA, 3d October, 1789.

"SIR:

As a variety of reports have been circulated throughout the United States, relative to the circumstances under which the treaties of Augusta, in 1783, at Galphinton, in 1785, and at Shoulderbone, in 1786, were formed; and as it is highly important that facts should be ascertained, we take the liberty of requesting your honor that you will be pleased to assist us in obtaining the information necessary for that purpose.

The principal points to which our attention has been attracted, are: whether all lands belonging to the Upper and Lower Creeks are the common property of the whole nation: or, whether the lands stated to have been ceded to Georgia by the three treaties, or either of them, were acknowledged by the Upper Creeks to be the sole property of the Lower Creeks?

Whether the acknowledged proprietors of the lands stated to have been ceded to Georgia were present or fully represented at the said treaties?

Whether the Creeks present at the said treaties did act with a full understanding of the cessions they are stated to have made?

And whether the said treaties and cessions were freely made on the part of the Creeks, uninfluenced by any threats or implication of force?

It is also desirable that any other interesting circumstances connected with the object of these inquiries should be made known to us: for example, whether the Indians did, for any considerable length of time, acquiesce quietly in the location and settlement of the lands in question?

What value in goods has been given at the several treaties, as presents or compensations for the cessions? And, in effect, whatever other matters may serve to place the conduct of the State of Georgia, on this subject, in its true point of light.

After being possessed of the written and official documents, we wish to receive oral information from private characters who were present at the several transactions before alluded to.

We have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most humble servants,

B. LINCOLN,
C. GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

His Honor the Governor of Georgia."

To the preceding letters the Governor was pleased to send the following answer; also, a return of depredations committed by the Indians, and other documents:

"AUGUSTA, October 4th, 1789.

"SIRS:

The communications which you were pleased to make to me first after your return from the Rock Landing, on the 2d instant, shall be laid before Council, and made the foundation of a proclamation, the object of which shall be to meet and reciprocate the assurances of the chiefs of the Creek Indians, for preserving of peace.

With respect to the further particulars stated in your favor of the 3d, I am sorry that so many persons who were privy to the transactions to which they allude, are, at this time, engaged in their attendance on the general election, whose testimony, were they present, would point to the truth of facts, through all that variety of report which originated equally from private speculation and personal disappointment. I have, however, directed such documents as are immediately within my power, to be made out for your present information.

From all the evidences which have or shall be collected, it will be found, that the lands between the mountains and the old Ogeechee line, north of the Oconee, were ever equally claimed by the Cherokees and the Creeks; and that, by a convention had before the Revolution, the lands comprehended within the limits afterwards called the ceded lands, and now Wilkes county, were ceded at the same time, by the heads of the two nations.

That, during the progress of the late war, the State had been, alternately, attacked by either, and that, at the close of it, they were respectively called upon to make some satisfaction. Accordingly, in the spring of 1783, the Cherokees, attended by a few Creeks, came down to Augusta, talked the matter over, avowed their claims to the lands in question; agreed to and signed a treaty; and, in the autumn of the same year, the Creeks, chiefly of the Lower towns, also came down; talked their matter over; avowed their claim; and agreed to and signed a treaty on their part, whereby the state obtained the relinquishment of the right, or claim of right, of both nations, to the lands therein described and bounded. These treaties were laid before the Legislature, with all that order of business and deliberation required by public and fair proceedings, and the lands were divided into counties. The offices were opened, and the lands surveyed, granted, felled, settled, and cultivated, in perfect peace.

The writer was present at both these conventions. The first he wrote from principles previously agreed upon, and which were made the foundation of the propositions to the Creeks in the fall.

At neither were there any men in arms, or the smallest coercion used; the conduct of the Indians was voluntary, and while, on their part, they were rendering satisfaction, they also received valuable considerations in presents.

When the treaties were over, it is within his most lively recollection that the commissioners, the chiefs, the citizens, and the Indians, ate, drank, and reciprocated all the usual marks of friendship, satisfaction, and peace; nor was it until a considerable time afterwards, that any umbrage was taken by the Upper Creeks, when a new motive and principle of direction appeared to have sprung up in the nation, which pretended, for the first time, an equal claim to the hunting grounds on the Oconee.

At the treaty of Galphinton, in the year 1785, it is said, some new opinions were disseminated; be that as it may, the treaty, and the testimony respecting the conduct of it, shew plainly, the good intentions of the State upon the occasion. The writer can say but little thereupon, as his engagements were then in a different line, which left no surplus attention to the other departments. In the year 1786, he was of the Legislature, when the arrangements took place for the convention at Shoulderbone. To doubt the validity of treaties, had become familiar to the Indians, as well as to think triflingly of the power of the State. To settle a substantial peace, and to remove these impressions, formed the objects of Government. The commissioners employed were respectable men, and the officers attending were of service and distinction. A sacrifice of their fame was not to be expected, and it evidently appears, that no unworthy use was made of the force which was sent upon the ground.

In the year 1787, their attacks were renewed, and repeated on almost all our frontiers. These we resisted, and called upon the Union for support.

A superintendent and commissioners were appointed, and all their endeavors have not been effectual to remove the cause of the untowardness of that nation, and our citizens have continued to be killed and plundered in the most cruel and distressing manner, until the late efforts for peace; even the new commission, which the States themselves so highly respected, have been treated with an indifference which ought not to have been expected.

I have the honor to be, sirs, with much estimation, your most obedient servant,

GEORGE WALTON.

"OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF COUNCIL, 5th October, 1789.

"I do hereby certify, that the above estimate of losses sustained by the Indians, since the commencement of hostilities, is taken from the returns made on oath, and filed in this office.

J. MERIWETHER, Secretary E. C."

From Augusta, we sent a second message by General Pickens, to the Cherokees, accompanied by a duplicate of our first; we also forwarded many printed copies of the address to the inhabitants bordering on the towns and settlements of the Cherokee nation, by the same conveyance.

"HEAD-MEN AND WARRIORS OF ALL THE CHEROKEES: We sent to you a friendly talk from Savannah, about one moon past. But lest that should not have reached you all, we now repeat it. We farther inform you, that, although a formal treaty of peace has not been concluded with the Creek nation, yet we have received positive and repeated assurances from them, that the same tranquillity which now prevails, shall be faithfully preserved on their part.

BROTHERS: Had not the hunting season commenced, so as to prevent us from finding you at home, we should have been happy in seeing you personally, before we returned to the far distant ue town of Congress. As that will now be impossible, we conclude by cautioning you to beware of listening to bad men, in such manner as to interrupt the truce concluded between you and the commissioner of North Carolina.

Now, BROTHERS, in assuring you that the General Government of the United States will always do you strict justice, we bid you farewell.

Done at Augusta, this 5th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1789, and in the 14th year of the independence of the United States of America.

B. LINCOLN,
C. GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

Attest, D. S. FRANKS, Secretary."

On the 6th of October we left Augusta, and arrived at Richmond on the 29th, where we had the satisfaction to meet with Piomingo, the second great chief of the Chickasaws, attended by other Indians. With him we had frequent talks, at which he gave us the strongest assurances of the good disposition of that nation towards the United States, and also of the rooted aversion of the Chickasaws to the whole Creek nation. By this chief, we sent a duplicate of our messages to the Chickasaws and to the Choctaws. On the 10th of November, we returned to New York. Thus stating the facts in a journal of their transactions.

The commissioners are decidedly of opinion, that the failure of a treaty at this time with the Creek nation, can be attributed only to their principal chief, Mr. Alexander McGillivray—

1st. From the repeated declarations and apparent good disposition of all the kings, head-men, and warriors, to establish a permanent peace with the United States.

2d. From the proposed boundary being offered to the great council of the nation, only as the basis of amicable negotiation.

3d. From the deception and precipitate retreat of Mr. McGillivray, without stating his objections to the draught of a treaty, either verbally or in writing.

4th. From many inquiries concerning this man, and from Mr. McGillivray's own declarations: that, without obtaining a full equivalent for the sacrifice, he would not renounce the close connexion which he had formed with the Spanish Government in the hour of distress—a connexion honorable and lucrative to himself, and advantageous to the Creek nation.

5th. From his frequent intimations that no treaty could be formed with the commissioners, unless a free and exclusive port should be granted to him upon the Altamaha, or the river St. Mary; and

6th. From the most positive refusal to acknowledge the Creek nation to be within the limits, or under the protection of the United States; although in express contradiction to a former letter, written by him, on the 5th of September, 1785, to General Pickens.

The commissioners beg leave further to report, that, after the most accurate investigation in their power to make, after consulting the best documents, and having recourse to creditable depositions, they are unable to discover but that the treaty of Augusta, in the year 1783, the treaty of Galphinton, in the year 1785, and the treaty of Shouderbone, in the year 1786, were all of them conducted with as full and authorized representation, with as much substantial form, and apparent good faith and understanding of the business, as Indian treaties have usually been conducted, or perhaps can be, where one of the contracting parties is destitute of the benefits of enlightened society. That the lands in question did of right belong to the Lower Creeks, as their hunting grounds; have been ceded by them to the State of Georgia, for a valuable consideration; and were possessed and cultivated for some years, without any claim or molestation by any part of the Creek nation.

As Mr. M'Gillivray, and all the other chiefs, head-men, and warriors, have given strong assurances in their talks, and by writing, that no further hostilities or depredations shall be committed on the part of their nation; and as the Governor of Georgia, by issuing proclamations, and by other effectual measures, will prevent the commission of hostilities and depredations upon the Creek nation, on the part of Georgia, the commissioners, in the best of their judgment, report, that all animosities with the Creek nation should henceforth cease.

That some person should be despatched to the said nation, with the ultimate draught of a treaty, to establish perpetual peace and amity. That, when such a draught of a treaty shall be properly executed by the leading men of the nation, all the presents intended for the Indians, and now in the State of Georgia, should be distributed among them. That, if the Indians shall refuse to execute such draught of a treaty, the commissioners humbly submit—

That the arms of the Union should be called forth for the protection of the people of Georgia, in the peaceable and just possession of their lands; and in case the Creeks shall commit further hostilities and depredations upon the citizens of the United States, that the Creek nation ought to be deemed the enemies of the United States and punished accordingly.

B. LINCOLN,
CYRUS GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

The Commissioners to the Secretary of War.

NEW YORK, November 20, 1789.

SIR:

We made our communications to the Creek nation, and they have refused to conclude a treaty of peace with the United States; and, as in this case, we are directed by our instructions to report such plans, both for defensive and offensive measures, as may be thought best to protect the citizens of the United States on the frontiers, in obedience to those instructions we offer the following particulars to your consideration:

For defensive measures, a line of six posts ought to be established on the frontiers of Georgia, and two at least to guard the settlements upon the Cumberland river. The posts to consist of one complete company in each, to be covered by works of sufficient strength to resist any sudden impressions of the Indians, and to serve as places of deposit, if magazines should hereafter be formed. To them, also, the exposed inhabitants of those countries might retire upon the alarm of danger; by this experiment, we should be satisfied how far a line of posts would be adequate to give complete protection to the citizens of the United States living on the frontiers.

The stations in Georgia should be as follow: One upon the navigable waters of St. Mary; one at Beard's Bluff, upon the Altamaha; one at the junction of the Oconee and Oakmulgee; one at the Rock Landing; one at the Middle Trading Path; and one at the Upper Trading Path; the two latter at such positions as will be found the most convenient to protect the frontiers.

If the offensive plan shall become indispensable, in that case we beg leave to recommend the most vigorous and effectual operations, by carrying the arms of the Union into the very heart of the Creek country. By this proceeding, the Creek nation will be taught to feel the weight and superiority of the United States, and the measure would be consistent with the honor and dignity of the republic.

The forces necessary upon this occasion should consist of five regiments of infantry, seven hundred men to each regiment; one regiment of cavalry of five hundred men, and a corps of artillery of two hundred and forty men; the whole amounting to 4,250. That two regiments of infantry be enlisted from the States of Georgia, South Carolina, and North Carolina, if that State should accede to the new constitution—the cavalry from the States of Virginia and Maryland, and the remainder of the forces from the other States indiscriminately. We are induced to recommend only two regiments to be raised from the more southern States, because such a measure would probably comprehend all that class of men, whose inclinations might lead them into the field against such an enemy; and because, if the troops should be drawn altogether, or principally from these States, and a defeat should unfortunately take place, it might involve that country for a time in disagreeable consequences; besides, great injury might be experienced by calling forth, in the first instance, a large proportion of that body of men, which, from their local situation, ought to remain as a reserve.

From the best intelligence, and from observation, we think that Augusta, in the State of Georgia, ought to be the place of rendezvous. To that town the military and quartermaster's stores might be transported from Savannah, by water, in 15 days. A full supply of wagons can be obtained at no great distance from thence, and upon the road, towards the Ogechee, which might bring with them a load of corn, or flour, each. The route from Augusta to the Creek nation is a good one, little more than 200 miles to their first towns, and about 300 miles to their western settlements.

Two other routes to the Creek nation present themselves. From Beard's Bluff, on the Altamaha, to Flint river, the distance about 150 miles, and 70 miles from the Flint river to the Cowetas.

From Bryant's trading-house, on St. Mary's river, to the Flint river, and from thence to the Cowetas, is nearly the like distance as from Beard's Bluff. The navigation is good from the ocean to Beard's Bluff, and to Bryant's trading-house—from either of them a tolerable good wagon road may be had into the Creek nation; yet both of these routes, particularly while the boats shall be going up the river St. Mary's, on the Altamaha, would be attended with considerable embarrassment and danger to the troops from the enemy; and the difficulties, and long distance for the wagons, to reach Beard's Bluff, or Bryant's trading-house, would be almost insurmountable.

In addition to the foregoing reports, we were commanded, if possible, to ascertain the following points: Those points have been ascertained, from the best information in our ability to procure.

1. The number of warriors, in the whole Creek nation, does not exceed 4,500.
2. They are armed pretty generally with good rifles; they receive their ammunition in presents, and by purchase from the Spaniards.
3. The Lower Creeks and Seminoles are about equal to the Upper Creeks, in number; the Lower Creeks rather more numerous than the Seminoles.

4. The number of old men, women, and children, in the proportion as four to one of the warriors.
5. The number of towns in each district, could not be ascertained, probably about eighty in the whole, of which about forty-five are in the upper country. The towns are very different in magnitude; and a few, of what are called the mother towns, have the principal direction in national affairs: that is to say, the war towns in war, and the white towns in peace.
6. Mr. McGillivray, of the half breed, is the most influential chief throughout the nation. Among the Upper Creeks, the White Lieutenant has the ascendancy, and is considered, in some respects, as the rival of Mr. McGillivray; the Mad Dog is next in authority. Among the Lower Creeks, the Hallowing king, and the Cussetah king—the former commanding the war towns, the latter commanding the white towns—towns unstained with blood, and which are towns of refuge; add to these the Talassee king, the White-bird king, the Fat king, the king of the Seminoles, and the king of the Euchees.
7. Their kinds of government approach the qualified monarchy. In the towns, they have head-men, who are much respected, and have authority, both in peace and war, in their respective towns; in the districts, they have kings or chiefs, and warriors; the former have their influence in time of peace, and the latter in time of war. Upon all important occasions they meet in great council, and deliberate with freedom, particularly once a year, at the ceremony of the first fruits, called the bushing, when they punish great delinquents, regulate internal policy, and form plans for hunting or war the ensuing season.
8. They are, in a great measure, hunters; however, they cultivate some Indian corn, and potatoes, possess cattle and horses, a few slaves, and, lately, in some instances, have introduced the plough.
9. Of late years, they are not rigidly confined to particular districts for hunting, but are permitted to go, in small parties, throughout the whole nation; yet, pretty generally, they find it convenient to keep within their respective divisions.
10. The kinds of furs are the beaver, otter, mink, fox, squirrel, and some others, together with deer, and other skins, the whole amounting, annually, to somewhat more than £10,000 sterling. They are principally sold to the Indian traders in the nation, and exported through the Spanish settlements.
11. The amount of the European goods, annually consumed, is about £12,000 sterling, furnished, principally, by the commercial house of which Mr. McGillivray is a partner.
12. Ginseng abounds in that country, but is not yet gathered in any considerable quantities.
13. The country of the Lower Creeks and Seminoles is level, sandy, and piney. The country of the Upper Creeks much broken, with a good soil and growth; farther to the west, and even to the Mississippi, the lands are rich, and rather low and marshy, abounding with good streams of water, and excellent timber, such as the oak, hickory, bucks-eye, elm, and large gum, &c. &c.
14. The waters of the Mobile are navigable for large boats: the one branch 270 miles from the ocean, to the Hickory settlement, where Mr. McGillivray resides, and the western branch is about 320 miles into the Choctaw and Chickasaw country, and within 50 miles of the great bend of the Tennessee. The waters of the Apalachicola, particularly the Flint river and Catahekee, and the waters of the Altamaha, particularly the rivers Oconee and Oakmulgee, are navigable for boats some hundred miles. From the northern navigable streams of these rivers to the southern navigable waters of the Tennessee, there are no established portages, but the country is level; good roads might easily be made, and the greatest distances not more than one hundred miles.
15. We could not ascertain with precision the nature of the connexion which the Creeks have formed with the Spaniards, but, from intelligence somewhat to be relied on, we believe that connexion to consist principally in paying less duties upon the goods imported than the Spaniards themselves pay, by a guarantee of all the Creek possessions, and by military distinctions and presents to Mr. McGillivray and other considerable chiefs. We could procure no copy of any treaty subsisting between them. The predominating prejudices of the Creeks are certainly adverse to the Spaniards, particularly Mr. McGillivray has often mentioned and declared, that a connexion with the United States would be more natural to the Creek nation, if they could obtain such conditions of interest and friendship as would justify and induce them to break with the Spanish Government.
16. We had but little opportunity to ascertain similar facts with respect to the other Indians, from our small lights upon this article of instruction. We think the Cherokee nation will be found to contain about 600 gun-men; the Chickasaws about 700, and the Choctaws about 3,000. Their arms are bad, scarcely any ammunition, and themselves naked. The Cherokees and Chickasaws cultivate the ground more than the other Indians, and possess cattle, proportionally, in greater numbers. The Choctaws hunt only, are brave and hardy people in the woods, but indolent to a great degree at home.

In order to preserve the attachment of the several Indian nations bordering upon the United States, it appears to us expedient that some adequate means of supplying them with goods and ammunition, at moderate prices, should immediately be adopted. With our best endeavors to obtain information concerning the internal state of the Choctaws and Chickasaws, we have not been able to succeed fully, so as to justify us in giving any positive opinion upon the best mode of effecting this desirable object; however, in conformity with our instructions, we respectfully suggest, that some uniform plan of granting permits to those who may be employed in the Indian commerce should be established by the supreme authority of the United States. This would be a part of the duty imposed upon the superintendent, agent, or commissary, of Indian affairs, in the Southern department. The fees of office for granting such permits ought to be moderate, and might be applied towards the payment of salary. An expedient of this sort is highly requisite to prevent persons of bad character from defrauding the Indians, from making still more unfavorable impressions upon the inimical tribes, and from alienating the affections of the friendly tribes from the United States. This superintendent, agent, or commissary, by going through the Indian towns of all the different nations, would be able to collect such information as might be extremely useful in forming definite plans of trade with those people; and, in case of war with the Creek nation, he might be of solid advantage in bring the Choctaws and Chickasaws to co-operate with the arms of the United States.

We have rendered to the treasury of the United States a full account of all our disbursements. The books No. 1. and 2, we now deposit in your office. They contain invoices of all the articles delivered to us for the proposed treaty, and will clearly account for the whole of them by ascertaining those articles which were necessarily expended, and those which now remain in the State of Georgia.

While we sincerely regret that our negotiations with the Creek nation have not terminated in a treaty of peace, we hope it will be found that the commissioners have been as diligent and attentive to the subjects of their mission, and as economical in the expenditures of the public money, as the nature of things would permit.

We have the honor to be, with sentiments of respect, sir, your most humble servants,

B. LINCOLN,
CYRUS GRIFFIN,
D. HUMPHREYS.

The Hon. The Secretary of War.

N. B. The commissioners wrote the following letter to Messrs. Pickens and Osborne, during their stay at Rock-landing, and received their answer, with sundry papers enclosed, which they deposit in the War Office.

ROCK LANDING, September 26, 1789.

"GENTLEMEN: We have received the following articles of instruction from the President of the United States, which we do ourselves the honor to communicate to you, and wish to be favored with an answer.

We are, with great respect, your most obedient servants,

[EXTRACT.]

"You will learn, by the papers delivered to you, that certain goods were left by the commissioners, after the treaties of Hopewell, in the commencement of the year 1786. It is probable that these goods may have been delivered to Messrs. Pickens and Osborne. You will therefore apply to the said gentlemen for regular invoices of all the goods in their possession for the treaty, distinguishing the means by which they became possessed thereof.

"You will also request of them an account of the moneys or goods they may have received of the States of South Carolina and Georgia, in consequence of the resolves of Congress, of the 26th of October, 1787, and August 14, 1788."

"ROCK LANDING, September 26, 1789.

"GENTLEMEN: In answer to your letter of this date, we do ourselves the honor to enclose a copy of our letter to Mr. Gervis, of Charleston, dated the 20th April last, with a copy of his answer, dated the 6th of June last. We do not know of any goods being left at Hopewell. The accounts of moneys received from the States of South Carolina and Georgia, together with an account of the appropriation and expenditures of the same, we have also the honor to enclose; the vouchers of all which are ready for your inspection.

THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, AUGUST 4, 1790.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

In consequence of the general principles agreed to by the Senate in August, 1789, the adjustment of the terms of a treaty is far advanced, between the United States and the chiefs of the Creek Indians, now in this city, in behalf of themselves and the whole Creek nation.

In preparing the articles of this treaty, the present arrangements of the trade with the Creeks have caused much embarrassment. It seems to be well ascertained, that the said trade is almost exclusively in the hands of a company of British merchants, who, by agreement, make their importations of goods from England, into the Spanish ports.

As the trade of the Indians is a main mean of their political management, it is therefore obvious, that the United States cannot possess any security for the performance of treaties with the Creeks, while their trade is liable to be interrupted or withheld, at the caprice of two foreign Powers.

Hence it becomes an object of real importance, to form new channels for the commerce of the Creeks through the United States. But this operation will require time, as the present arrangements cannot be suddenly broken, without the greatest violation of faith and morals.

It therefore appears to be important, to form a secret article of a treaty, similar to the one which accompanies this message.

If the Senate should require any further explanation, the Secretary of War will attend them for that purpose.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, August 4, 1790.

The President of the United States submitted the following question, for the consideration and advice of the Senate:

If it should be found essential to a treaty, for the firm establishment of peace with the Creek nation of Indians, that an article to the following effect should be inserted therein, will such an article be proper? viz.

SECRET ARTICLE.

The commerce necessary for the Creek nation shall be carried on through the ports, and by the citizens of the United States, if substantial and effectual arrangements shall be made for that purpose, by the United States, on or before the first day of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two. In the mean time, the said commerce may be carried on through its present channels, and according to its present regulations.

And whereas the trade of the said Creek nation is now carried on wholly, or principally, through the territories of Spain, and obstructions thereto may happen by war, or prohibitions of the Spanish government,

It is therefore agreed between the said parties, that in the event of any such obstructions happening, it shall be lawful for such persons as the President of the United States shall designate, to introduce into, and transport through, the territories of the United States, to the country of the said Creek nation, any quantity of goods, wares, and merchandise, not exceeding in value in any one year, sixty thousand dollars, and that free from any duties or impositions whatsoever; but subject to such regulations, for guarding against abuse, as the United States shall judge necessary; which privilege shall continue as long as such obstruction shall continue.

THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, AUGUST 6, 1790.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Considering the circumstances which prevented the late commissioners from concluding a peace with the Creek nation of Indians, it appeared to me most prudent, that all subsequent measures for disposing them to a treaty should in the first instance be informal.

I informed you on the 4th inst. that the adjustment of the terms of a treaty with their chiefs, now here, was far advanced; such further progress has since been made, that I think measures may at present be taken for conducting and concluding that business in form. It therefore becomes necessary that a proper person be appointed and authorized to treat with their chiefs, and to conclude a treaty with them. For this purpose, I nominate to you Henry Knox.

THE CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, AUGUST 7, 1790.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I lay before you a treaty between the United States and the chiefs of the Creek nation now in this city, in behalf of themselves and the whole Creek nation, subject to the ratification of the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

While I flatter myself that this treaty will be productive of present peace and prosperity to our southern frontier, it is to be expected that it will also, in its consequences, be the means of firmly attaching the Creeks and the neighboring tribes to the interests of the United States.

At the same time it is to be hoped, that it will afford solid grounds of satisfaction to the State of Georgia, as it contains a regular, full, and definitive relinquishment, on the part of the Creek nation, of the Oconee land, in the utmost extent in which it has been claimed by that State, and thus extinguishes the principal cause of those hostilities, from which it has, more than once, experienced such severe calamities.

But, although the most valuable of the disputed land is included, yet there is a certain claim of Georgia, arising out of the treaty made by that State at Galphinton, in November, 1785, of land to the eastward of a new temporary line, from the forks of the Oconee and Oakmulgee, in a southwest direction to the St. Mary's river, which tract of land the Creeks in this city absolutely refuse to yield.

This land is reported to be generally barren, sunken, and unfit for cultivation, except in some instances on the margin of the rivers, on which, by improvement, rice might be cultivated; its chief value depending on the timber fit for the building of ships, with which it is represented as abounding.

While it is thus circumstanced on the one hand, it is stated by the Creeks, on the other, to be of the highest importance to them, as constituting some of their most valuable winter hunting ground.

I have directed the commissioners, to whom the charge of adjusting this treaty has been committed, to lay before you such papers and documents, and to communicate to you such information relatively to it, as you may require.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, August 7, 1790.

[NOTE. The papers that may have been communicated, were returned; but are believed to be substantially the same with those of No. 9 of this series.]

A Treaty of peace and friendship, made and concluded between the President of the United States of America, on the part and behalf of the said States, and the undersigned kings, chiefs, and warriors, of the Creek nation of Indians, on the part and behalf of the said nation.

The parties being desirous of establishing permanent peace and friendship between the United States and the said Creek nation, and the citizens and members thereof, and to remove the causes of war by ascertaining their limits, and making other necessary, just, and friendly arrangements, the President of the United States, by Henry Knox, Secretary for the Department of War, whom he hath constituted with full powers for these purposes, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and the Creek nation, by the undersigned kings, chiefs, and warriors, representing the said nation, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be perpetual peace and friendship between all the citizens of the United States of America, and all the individuals, towns, and tribes, of the Upper, Middle, and Lower Creeks and Seminoles, composing the Creek nation of Indians.

ART. 2. The undersigned kings, chiefs, and warriors, for themselves, and all parts of the Creek nation within the limits of the United States, do acknowledge themselves, and the said parts of the Creek nation, to be under the protection of the United States of America, and of no other sovereign whatsoever; and they also stipulate, that the said Creek nation will not hold any treaty with an individual State, or with individuals of any State.

ART. 3. The Creek nation shall deliver, as soon as practicable, to the commanding officer of the troops of the United States, stationed at the Rock Landing on the Oconee river, all citizens of the United States, white inhabitants or negroes, who are now prisoners in any part of the said nation. And if any such prisoners or negroes should not be so delivered, on or before the first day of June ensuing, the Governor of Georgia may empower three persons to repair to the said nation, in order to claim and receive such prisoners and negroes.

ART. 4. The boundary between the citizens of the United States and the Creek nation, is, and shall be, from where the old line strikes the river Savannah; thence, up the said river, to a place on the most northern branch of the same, commonly called the Keowee, where a northeast line, to be drawn from the top of the Occunna mountain shall intersect; thence, along the said line, in a southwest direction to Tugelo river; thence, to the top of the Currahee mountain; thence to the head or source of the main south branch of the Oconee river, called the Appalachee; thence, down the middle of the said main south branch and river Oconee, to its confluence with the Oakmulgee, which form the river Altamaha; and thence, down the middle of the said Altamaha, to the old line on the said river; and thence, along the said old line, to the river St. Mary's.

And in order to preclude forever all disputes relatively to the head or source of the main south branch of the river Oconee, at the place where it shall be intersected by the line aforesaid, from the Currahee mountain, the same shall be ascertained by an able surveyor, on the part of the United States, who shall be assisted by three old citizens of Georgia, who may be appointed by the Governor of the said State, and three old Creek chiefs, to be appointed by the said nation; and the said surveyor, citizens, and chiefs, shall assemble for this purpose on the first day of October, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, at the Rock Landing on the said river Oconee, and thence proceed to ascertain the said head or source of the main south branch of the said river, at the place where it shall be intersected by the line aforesaid, to be drawn from the Currahee mountain. And in order that the said boundary shall be rendered distinct and well known, it shall be marked by a line of felled trees at least twenty feet wide, and the trees chopped on each side, from the said Currahee mountain to the head or source of the said main south branch of the Oconee river; and thence, down the margin of the said main south branch and river Oconee, for the distance of twenty miles, or as much farther as may be necessary to mark distinctly the said boundary. And in order to extinguish forever all claims of the Creek nation, or any part thereof, to any of the land lying to the northward and eastward of the boundary herein described, it is hereby agreed, in addition to the considerations heretofore made for the said land, that the United States will cause certain valuable Indian goods, now in the State of Georgia, to be delivered to the said Creek nation; and the said United States will also cause the sum of one thousand and five hundred dollars to be paid annually to the said Creek nation. And the undersigned kings, chiefs, and warriors, do hereby, for themselves and the whole Creek nation, their heirs, and descendants, for the considerations above-mentioned, release, quit claim, relinquish, and cede, all the land to the northward and eastward of the boundary herein described.

ART. 5. The United States solemnly guaranty to the Creek nation, all their lands within the limits of the United States, to the westward and southward of the boundary described by the preceding article.

ART. 6. If any citizen of the United States, or other person, not being an Indian, shall attempt to settle on any of the Creeks' lands, such person shall forfeit the protection of the United States, and the Creeks may punish him or not, as they please.

ART. 7. No citizen or inhabitant of the United States shall attempt to hunt or destroy the game on the Creek lands; nor shall any such citizen or inhabitant go into the Creek country, without a passport first obtained from the Governor of some one of the United States, or the officer of the troops of the United States commanding at the nearest military post on the frontiers, or such other person as the President of the United States may, from time to time, authorize to grant the same.

ART. 8. If any Creek Indian or Indians, or person residing among them, or who shall take refuge in their nation, shall commit a robbery or murder, or other capital crime, on any of the citizens or inhabitants of the United States, the Creek nation, or town, or tribe, to which such offender or offenders may belong, shall be bound to deliver him or them up, to be punished according to the laws of the United States.

ART. 9. If any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, or of either of the territorial districts of the United States, shall go into any town, settlement, or territory, belonging to the Creek nation of Indians, and shall there commit any crime upon, or trespass against, the person or property of any peaceable and friendly Indian or Indians, which, if committed within the jurisdiction of any State, or within the jurisdiction of either of the said districts, against a citizen or white inhabitant thereof, would be punishable by the laws of such State or district, such offender or offenders shall be subject to the same punishment, and shall be proceeded against in the same manner, as if the offence had been committed within the jurisdiction of the State or district to which he or they may belong, against a citizen or white inhabitant thereof.

ART. 10. In cases of violence on the persons or property of the individuals of either party, neither retaliation nor reprisal shall be committed by the other, until satisfaction shall have been demanded of the party of which the aggressor is, and shall have been refused.

ART. 11. The Creeks shall give notice to the citizens of the United States, of any designs which they may know or suspect to be formed in any neighboring tribe, or by any person whatever, against the peace and interests of the United States.

ART. 12. That the Creek nation may be led to a greater degree of civilization, and to become herdsmen and cultivators, instead of remaining in a state of hunters, the United States will, from time to time, furnish gratuitously the said nation with useful domestic animals, and implements of husbandry. And further, to assist the said nation in so desirable a pursuit, and at the same time to establish a certain mode of communication, the United States will send such, and so many persons, to reside in said nation, as they may judge proper, and not exceeding four in number, who shall qualify themselves to act as interpreters. These persons shall have lands assigned them by the Creeks for cultivation, for themselves and their successors in office; but they shall be precluded exercising any kind of traffic.

ART. 13. All animosities for past grievances shall henceforth cease; and the contracting parties will carry the foregoing treaty into full execution, with all good faith and sincerity.

ART. 14. This treaty shall take effect, and be obligatory on the contracting parties, as soon as the same shall have been ratified by President of the the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

In witness of all and every thing herein determined, between the United States of America and the whole Creek nation, the parties have hereunto set their hands and seals, in the city of New York, within the United States, this 7th day of August, 1790.

In behalf of the United States:

H. KNOX,

Secretary of War, and sole Commissioner for treating with the Creek nation of Indians.

ALEX. MCGILLIVRAY,

And twenty-three chiefs and warriors, in behalf of themselves and the whole Creek nation of Indians.

THE CHEROKEES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, AUGUST 11, 1790.

Although the treaty with the Creeks may be regarded as the main foundation of the future peace and prosperity of the southwestern frontier of the United States, yet, in order fully to effect so desirable an object, the treaties which have been entered into with the other tribes in that quarter, must be faithfully performed on our parts.

During the last year, I laid before the Senate a particular statement of the case of the Cherokees. By a reference to that paper, it will appear that the United States formed a treaty with the Cherokees in November, 1785: That the said Cherokees thereby placed themselves under the protection of the United States, and had a boundary assigned them:

That the white people settled on the frontiers had openly violated the said boundary by intruding on the Indian lands:

That the United States, in Congress assembled, did, on the first day of September, 1788, issue their proclamation, forbidding all such unwarrantable intrusions, and enjoining all those who had settled upon the hunting grounds of the Cherokees, to depart with their families and effects without loss of time, as they would answer their disobedience to the injunctions and prohibitions expressed, at their peril.

But information has been received, that, notwithstanding the said treaty and proclamation, upwards of five hundred families have settled on the Cherokee lands, exclusively of those settled between the fork of French Broad and Holston rivers, mentioned in the said treaty.

As the obstructions to a proper conduct on this matter have been removed since it was mentioned to the Senate on the 22d of August, 1789, by the accession of North Carolina to the present Union, and the cessions of the land in question, I shall conceive myself bound to exert the powers entrusted to me by the constitution, in order to carry into faithful execution the treaty of Hopewell, unless it shall be thought proper to attempt to arrange a new boundary with the Cherokees, embracing the settlements, and compensating the Cherokees for the cessions they shall make on the occasion. On this point, therefore, I state the following questions, and request the advice of the Senate thereon:

1st. Is it the judgment of the Senate that overtures shall be made to the Cherokees to arrange a new boundary, so as to embrace the settlements made by the white people since the treaty of Hopewell, in November, 1785?

2d. If so, shall compensation, to the amount of — dollars, annually, or of — dollars, in gross, be made to the Cherokees for the land they shall relinquish, holding the occupiers of the land accountable to the United States for its value?

3d. Shall the United States stipulate solemnly to guaranty the new boundary which may be arranged?

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, August 11, 1790.

The Senate thereupon adopted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate do advise and consent, that the President of the United States do, at his discretion, cause the treaty concluded at Hopewell, with the Cherokee Indians, to be carried into execution according to the terms thereof, or to enter into arrangements for such further cession of territory, from the said Cherokee Indians, as the tranquillity and interest of the United States may require: Provided, The sum which may be stipulated to be paid to the said Cherokee Indians, do not exceed one thousand dollars annually; and Provided further, That no person who shall have taken possession of any lands within the territory assigned to the said Cherokee Indians, by the said treaty of Hopewell, shall be confirmed in any such possessions, but by compliance with such terms as Congress may hereafter prescribe.

Resolved, In case a new, or other boundary than that stipulated by the treaty of Hopewell, shall be concluded with the Cherokee Indians, that the Senate do advise and consent solemnly to guaranty the same.

[3d SESSION.

NORTHWESTERN INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS ON THE 9TH OF DECEMBER, 1790,

And referred to by the President of the United States in his speech to Congress of December 8, of which the following is an extract:

“It has been heretofore known to Congress, that frequent incursions have been made on our frontier settlements by certain banditti of Indians from the northwest side of the Ohio. These, with some of the tribes dwelling on, and near, the Wabash, have of late been particularly active in their depredations; and, being emboldened by the impunity of their crimes, and aided by such parts of the neighboring tribes as could be seduced to join in their hostilities, or afford them a retreat for their prisoners and plunder, they have, instead of listening to the humane invitations and overtures made on the part of the United States, renewed their violences with fresh alacrity, and greater effect. The lives of a number of valuable citizens have thus been sacrificed, and some of them under circumstances peculiarly shocking; whilst others have been carried into a deplorable captivity.

“These aggravated provocations rendered it essential to the safety of the western settlements, that the aggressors should be made sensible that the government of the Union is not less capable of punishing their crimes, than it is disposed to respect their rights and reward their attachments. As this object could not be effected by defensive measures, it became necessary to put in force the act which empowers the President to call out the militia for the protection of the frontiers; and I have, accordingly, authorized an expedition, in which the regular troops in that quarter are combined with such draughts of militia as were deemed sufficient: the event of the measure is yet unknown to me. The Secretary of War is directed to lay before you a statement of the information on which it is founded, as well as an estimate of the expense with which it will be attended.”

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 8th, 1790.

SIR:

In obedience to the orders of the President of the United States, I have the honor respectfully to submit to the Senate, a statement of the information on which the expedition against the Indians northwest of the Ohio has been founded, and also the instructions to the Governor of the Western territory, and the commanding officer of the troops relative to the same object; together with an estimate of the expense with which the expedition will probably be attended.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient and very humble servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The Honorable the PRESIDENT of the Senate of the United States.

INFORMATION RELATIVE TO DEPREDACTIONS OF THE INDIANS NORTHWEST OF THE OHIO.

John Evans, Lieutenant of the county of Monongalia, to the Executive of Virginia, 25th April, 1789.

On the 23d instant the Indians committed hostilities on the frontiers of this county, killed a captain William Thomas, Joseph Cornbridge and wife, and two children on Dunker's Creek, which has alarmed the people in such a degree as to occasion them to apply to me for assistance.

MORGANTOWN, 25th April, 1789.

An express came here this morning with the disagreeable news of the Indians having committed hostilities on one of our frontier settlements on the 23d instant; two parties attacked, nearly about the same time, two families on Dunkard Creek, about twenty to twenty-five miles from this place, and killed one man out of one, and the man and his wife and two children, which was the whole of the other family; the alarm given to the frontier of this county generally by this murder, hath become very serious, and unless some speedy assistance is given, I am something of opinion, that the Monongahela river (which runs by this place) will be our frontier line in a short time.

I am also unhappy to find that the Executive have received no official information respecting the disposition of the Indians westward of the Ohio; but let their disposition be what it may, they, or some Indians to us unknown, since my last, by Mr. Renick, have killed and taken ten prisoners from the settlement on Clinch, and also several persons at the mouth of Great Sandy, and I have reason to expect their blows hourly on Kenhawa.

DISTRICT OF KENTUCKY, 22d August, 1789.

About the 10th instant, two men were fired on by a party of Indians, but no damage sustained; only one of the horses the men rode was killed; the Indians took the saddle and bridle, and the night following, they stole eleven horses; our men pursued them, next day came up with them, and retook all the horses, together with the said saddle and bridle, and killed two (one of which was a white man.) On Sunday, the 16th, six negroes were taken by a party of Indians in ambuscade, about three quarters of a mile from my house; they carried them about one quarter of a mile, where they were surprised by the noise of some people riding near them; they tomahawked four, two of which died, two were left for dead, which are now in a hopeful way of recovery; the other two made their escape while they were murdering the rest. The day following, the party was seen twice, and the evening or night of the sixteenth they stole some horses from Captain Buford; we pursued them as quick as possible, with about forty men, to the Ohio, about twenty-five miles below the mouth of Big Miami, where twenty-six volunteers crossed the Ohio after them; we came to a large camp of them, early in the morning of the 20th, about twelve miles from the Ohio; we divided our party, and attacked them opposite, on each side; they fought us a short time in that position, until they got their women and children out of the way, and then gave back to a thick place of high weeds and bushes, where they hid very close; we immediately drove up about forty of their horses, and made our retreat across the Ohio. We lost three men and two wounded. The Indians wounded one of our men as we returned. Thus they are going on from time to time in this country.

We can assure your Excellency that the militia of Kentucky, from their hardiness, alertness, and bravery, are able to render essential service to the inhabitants of the district, if they are employed in its defence.

And we beg leave further to observe, that, from the present station of the federal troops, it is absolutely impossible to give the commanders notice, so as to enable them, even if their force was sufficient, to render any service whatever.

The hostile acts of the savages are so frequent in our country that it becomes troublesome to write you on every occasion. On the 10th of this instant, a party fired on a young man in this county, near the settlement, killed the horse, and took the saddle and bridle, and stole some horses, the night following. We were in motion, early next morning, and soon found their trail, and came up with them and retook the horses, and killed two of them, one of which was a white man; the 16th following, a party took six negroes within a mile of my house, killed two, wounded two with their tomahawks, and left them for dead, and the other two made their escape while they were murdering the rest. The second night after, they stole some horses. About forty men followed them to the Ohio, and twenty-six crossed the river and followed them over the Ohio, about twelve miles, where we came up with a party at a large camp, making salt at a salt spring; we divided the party, and attacked them on each side; they soon gave back; we took some of their horses, and returned to the Ohio, where we crossed. We lost three men killed and two wounded.

IN JEFFERSON COUNTY, on Floyd's fork, two men killed; near the same time and place, two persons were killed and three taken prisoners. On Brashear's creek, two killed and two taken prisoners. On the 17th July, Chinoweth's station was attacked by a number of Indians, who entered Chinoweth's house, while the family was at supper. Three of Chinoweth's family were killed and seven wounded. Three of the wounded are since dead, and several others yet dangerous. The Indians plundered the house of every thing they could carry away. There was at the same station, before this date, one man killed and one wounded. The number of horses stolen from this county exceeds twenty.

NELSON.—Two men killed and two wounded, and a number of horses stolen, to the amount of about twenty.

LINCOLN.—One man and one child killed and two women wounded; about twenty-five horses stolen.

MADISON.—On the first day of June, the Indians broke into the house of Edmond Stephenson, and wounded one person; they have stolen a number of horses from this county.

BOURBON.—Two men have been badly wounded, and about fifteen horses stolen.

MASON.—Two men killed and forty-one horses stolen.

WOODFORD.—One boy killed and several horses stolen.

HARRISON COUNTY, 4th October, 1789.

On the 19th of September last, a party of Indians killed and scalped four persons, and captured four; the family of a certain William Johnston, within about nine miles of Clarksburg. On the 22d, the Indians killed John Mauk's wife and two of his children, and burnt his house; the same evening, burnt Jacob Flotzer's house; the family hardly escaped. On the 23d, burnt Jethro Thompson's house; and on the 26th, burnt John Simm's house; and on the 28th, stole from Randolph county, ten or eleven horses. The number of horses taken from this county, is not yet truly ascertained: but certain, five horses taken—cattle, sheep, and hogs killed. Some part of this mischief done eleven or twelve miles in towards the interior parts of this county. Sir, be assured, the people of this part of the county are much alarmed and much confused; and in my humble opinion, if something more than treaties made with part of the Indian tribes, is not done shortly, it will be with difficulty the frontiers of this county can be kept from evacuating their settlements. This opinion I have gathered from my having taken a tour amongst the people, whilst the mischief was doing.

RICHMOND, 27th December, 1789.

The Indians have, in the county of Kenhawa, committed many hostilities, some of which, I beg leave to enumerate. They killed a man near Point Pleasant; took a young man, and a negro fellow, prisoners; have shot at others, who made their escape; and have taken between twenty and thirty head of horses, together with many other outrages, to the manifest injury and distress of the inhabitants.

If protection is not immediately given, I am sure the greater part of our frontier will be compelled to leave their homes, and either live in forts or move into the strong settled parts of the neighboring counties, which I conceive would do great public injury, as well as distress, in a great degree the inhabitants that are thus exposed, who are situated in a part of the country not only to become respectable but very useful.

Address of the General Assembly of Virginia to the President of the United States.

It has been a great relief to our apprehensions for the safety of our brethren on the frontiers, to learn from the communications of the Secretary of War, that their protection against the incursions of the Indians has occupied your attention.

Knowing the power of the Federal Executive to concentrate the American force, and confiding in the wisdom of its measures, we should leave the subject unnoticed, but from a belief that time has been wanting to give the proper intelligence, and make the necessary arrangements of defence, for a country so far remote from the seat of Government.

Many members of the General Assembly now present, have been either witnesses of the recent murders and depredations committed by the savages, or have brought with them information; the truth of which cannot be questioned. It is unnecessary to enter into a detail of those hostilities. Permit us only to say, that those parts of Kentucky, and the southwestern and northern counties, lying on the Ohio and its waters, which have generally been the scene of Indian barbarity, are now pressed by danger the most imminent.

We have been induced to suppose it possible, that, for the purpose of affording effectual relief, it may be found expedient to carry war into the country of the Indian enemy. Should this be the case, we take the liberty of assuring you, that this Commonwealth will cheerfully sustain her proportion of the expenses which may be incurred in such an expedition.

RICHMOND, 12th December, 1789.

In addition to the address of the General Assembly on Indian Affairs, we, the representatives of the counties of Ohio, Monongalia, Harrison, and Randolph, are constrained to take the liberty of stating to you the defenceless situation of those counties, in order that you may be able to direct such measures as may be necessary for their defence, as we have every reason to expect that the Indians will break in upon our settlements as soon as the weather will permit them in the spring. First, from the northern boundary line, where it crosses the Ohio river at the mouth of the Little Beaver creek, down the said river to the mouth of Big Sandy creek, distant about three hundred miles, we lay open to the ravages of the Indians, who may attack our settlements in any quarter they may choose. It may here be supposed, that the troops stationed at Muskingum would check their progress in this business; but experience hath taught us, that they are of very little use, for we find, that the Indians cross the river Ohio, both above and below that garrison, undiscovered either on their way to our country or returning to their own.

And indeed, such will always be our fate, until more effectual measures are adopted for our defence. It may be further supposed, that General St. Clair can grant all the relief that is necessary for our safety. In answer to which, we beg leave to observe, that, although we have the highest opinion of that gentleman's integrity and goodness, yet, from his necessary calls to visit the different posts on the Ohio river, even as low down as the Rapids, we fear it will be out of his power to render us the necessary aid; besides, it is impracticable for us to find him in the hour of distress. We further beg leave to suggest, that, whilst our operations were confined to a defensive plan only, we have ever found the greatest degree of safety to our country arising from keeping out scouts and rangers on our frontiers. Indeed, it was owing to that plan, and that only, that large tracts of our country have not, long ere now, been depopulated. These scouts and rangers were composed of our own militia, on whom our people could, with confidence, depend, as they are well acquainted with our woods, and with the paths the Indians use to come in upon our settlements. Whilst we were thus covered, we lived in perfect security, but as soon as they were withdrawn last spring, we immediately felt the effects of Indian cruelty: for, from the month of April last, to the month of October, at which time we left home, there were killed and captured twenty persons—a considerable number of horses and other property carried off, and several houses burnt in our country. All military regulations being submitted to you, we therefore beg leave to suggest our wishes, that you would continue to us the aforesaid mode of defence, should you approve of it, or direct such other measures as you, in your wisdom, may think more advisable to be continued in our country, until it may be thought necessary to carry on offensive war into the enemy's country, to bring about a lasting peace. Suffer us further to assure you, that we, on the behalf of our bleeding country, look up to you, and to you only, for that assistance that our necessities require, and shall conclude with praying that the great Parent of the universe may conduct you under the eye of his special providence, enabling you to fill that exalted station to which he hath called you, as well for the good of your fellow citizens, as also for the happiness of mankind, so far as they come within the bounds of your administration.

We have the honor to be, with very great regard and esteem, your Excellency's most ob't servants,

FORT STEUBEN, 26th January, 1790.

By a note this moment received from Louisville, I am informed that the Indians have killed three men, within twelve miles of Danville, at Carpenter's Station, and three more, and broke the settlement up, upon Russell's creek, about forty miles from the same place; some people who had been hunting on this side the river, about six miles below Limestone, were fired upon by Indians, and one man killed; just almost at the time Major Doughty was passing; he landed and pursued them, but in vain.

DANVILLE, 13th March, 1790.

In the month of January; a boat with ten persons were cut off, about sixteen miles above Limestone; nine found dead in the boat, and one woman missing; during the massacre, a boy, who was a prisoner, made his escape; he was up Licking, being out with two men on a hunting party, who were killed. Three men were killed about the same time in the wilderness, between Rickland creek and Stinking creek; on the road two escaped. Old John Sloan and his son, were killed on the head of the Rolling fork; one man killed on Holin. A station on Russell's creek was attacked about the 25th of the month; Isaac and Nathan Farris, a son of Isaac Farris, John Painter, and one other man, killed; a negro woman, and white woman wounded, and a number of horses have been taken, but I can't enumerate them. One Harper was killed on State creek.

In February, one man killed at the Mudlick; one killed at the mouth of Kentucky, and the people have evacuated the station from fear. In this month I have only heard of one man killed and one wounded on the Rolling fork; but from various reports, there is too much reason to fear they will be hostile this spring.

Although I wrote you a few days ago; I feel a propensity to hand you every intelligence in my power. The Indians have again made a capital stroke on the Ohio; they, to the number of about fifty, are encamped near the mouth of the Scioto, and have, by means of a white prisoner, who they have with them, taken three boats and a perigou; the perigou contained six men, who were going up the river from Limestone; one of the boats belonged to Mr. John May; the six men, together with Mr. May, and the whole crew, were put to instant death by the savages. The other two boats, one of them belonged to families, the other was the property of Colonel Edwards, of Bourbon, and Mr. Thomas Marshall and others, who, the day after May was taken, were at the same place attacked by the savages; they in the first instance attempted to induce the boats to come to shore, by means of the prisoner, who was the only person exposed to view, and who affected the utmost distress and anxiety, in order that he might be received on board and brought to Limestone; but finding their stratagem would answer no purpose, they immediately exposed themselves, and began to fire on the boats, but without effect; the devils then, to the number of about thirty, jumped into May's boat, and gave chase; by which means, being better supplied with oars, they would soon have overtaken Marshall and the family boat, if it had not been for Colonel George Thompson, who was owner to a third part in the same company; he threw out all the horses he had in his boat, and received Colonel Edwards' crew, and the families all into his boat, together with their oars, by which means the whole of the people escaped after sustaining a chase of about fifteen miles. The loss of property in the two boats, was seventeen horses, about fifteen hundred pounds worth of dry goods, and a considerable quantity of household furniture. It is not known what May had on board, as no person was left alive.

I have also heard to-day, that the Indians have taken a boat on Salt river, which was laden with salt, and killed a John Prior, and two others who belonged to the boat's crew.

These are the most material outrages that I now recollect. The consequences are truly alarming; no preparation is yet made, neither can there be by us, who are not authorized to cross the river.

CAHOOKIA, 1st May, 1790.

The Major (Hamtramck) understanding that there was some private difference between that Indian and the person who served as interpreter to the messenger, did, on the first of April, send forward another messenger, and he has enclosed to me a letter from him from Quitpicomuais, fifteen miles above Ouisconsin, of the 15th of that month, a translation of which is sent with this. By that letter you will observe that every thing is referred to the Miamies, which does not indicate a peaceable issue. The confidence these have in their situation, the vicinity of many other nations, either much under their influence, or hostilely disposed towards the United States, and pernicious counsels of the British traders, joined to the immense booties obtained by their depredations on the Ohio, will most probably prevent them from listening to any reasonable terms of accommodation, so that it is much to be feared that the United States must prepare effectually to chastise them; and the consequence of not doing it, may very probably be the defection of those who are now at peace, and would remain so, with the entire alienation of the affections at least of the people of the frontiers.

N. B. Gamelin's information being unimportant, is not copied.

VIRGINIA, HARRISON COUNTY, February 2d, 1790.

SIR:

The alarming predicament in which this country now stands, as touching the state of Indian affairs, and the small prospect of protection from his Excellency Arthur St. Clair, hath moved us the subscribers to meet this day in council, in order to concert measures as, far as in our power, to calm the minds of our exposed frontiers, who expect early in the Spring to be again harassed by the savages.

It appears to us, by the address of the General Assembly of Virginia, dated the 30th of October, 1789, that official information has been given to your Excellency of the Indians' wanton barbarity on the frontiers of this State. We also have the strongest assurance that the members of the General Assembly from the western district did apply, by a subsequent address, separate and apart from the said address sent by the General Assembly, which we trusted would have fell into your hands before Governor St. Clair left New York, which now appears to us not to be the case; therefore, the frontiers are left defenceless; the people, who lay exposed, are complaining that they are neglected; that the interior parts of the United States have enjoyed peace since the year 1782; that Government has got thoughtless about the lives of their citizens, &c.

We would undertake to give a full detail of the various incursions made on the frontiers of this country, but expect our county lieutenant will hand this petition to your Excellency, who, we believe, will better satisfy your inquiries than our detail.

We presume the aforesaid address of our legislative body, and the separate address sent by the members of this western district, fully take in our wishes as touching the mode of present and future relief.

Therefore, in the name and behalf of our suffering fellow-citizens, over whom we preside as field officers of the militia, pray that your Excellency would take our distressed situation under your parental care, and grant us such relief as you in your wisdom shall think proper, and we, in duty bound, will pray, &c.

BENJAMIN WILSON, Colonel,
GEO. JACKSON, Lieut. Colonel,
WILLIAM ROBINSON, Major.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

Extract of a letter from the Lieutenants of the counties of Fayette, Woodford, and Mercer, to the Secretary of War, dated 14th April, 1790.

We almost every day receive accounts of their horrid murders on our defenceless frontiers, (which entirely surround us) and the taking of horses and other property, to the ruin of a number of families. It is painful to repeat particulars, but some recent acts of the savages demand our representation.

Several boats have, within a few weeks past, been attacked and taken on the Ohio river, and one in Salt river, by strong parties of Indians, and their unhappy crews murdered or carried into captivity.

We have reason to believe that there is a combination of several tribes, and their numbers pretty numerous.

Major Hamtramck to Governor St. Clair.

POST VINCENNES, May 22, 1790.

I now enclose the proceedings of Mr. Gamelin, by which your Excellency can have no great hopes of bringing the Indians to a peace with the United States. The 8th of May Gamelin arrived, and on the 11th some merchants arrived, and informed me, that, as soon as Gamelin had passed their villages, on his return all the Indians had gone to war; that, a large party of Indians from Michilimackinack and some Pattawatamies had gone to Kentucky; and that, three days after Gamelin had left the Miami, an American was brought there and burnt.

On the 20th of March, 1790, going down the river Ohio, in company with John May, Esq. of Virginia, with four other persons in our boat, (two of whom were women) we were attacked by a party of fifty-four Indians, consisting chiefly of Shawanese and Cherokees. In this attack, Mr. May and one of the women were killed, the rest of us made prisoners.

The day following, a canoe coming up the river, with six men in it, were fired upon and all killed.

In a few hours afterwards, two boats (the owners of which had abandoned them and got on board a third boat that was in company) were taken by the savages, with goods and other property in them, which, in my opinion, must have amounted to several thousand pounds value.

Two days afterwards the Indians divided themselves into several parties, when they set off to this town, and arrived in about five or six weeks at Sandusky, where the nation of Wyandot or Huron Indians live.

Whilst in the Indian country, I was informed that one of our party, whose name was William Flin, and whom, on a division, had fallen to the Cherokees, was carried to the nation of Miamies, there tied to a stake, and, in the most inhuman manner, was roasted alive.

I further understood that there are a number of Americans who have been made prisoners by the Indians, and are now in the Shawanese and Miami nations, languishing under slavery and all its bitter appendages.

As I presume you have not heard of the late mischief, I shall just beg leave to inform you, that, about six weeks ago, two men were taken off Cabin Creek, who have been made use of to decoy boats ashore, by which means six men in a canoe, going up the river, attempting to escape, after they found themselves ensnared, were murdered; Mr. May's boat taken, himself and one other killed, the rest of the crew made prisoners; two boats, in which was a considerable amount of property, belonging to Col. John Edwards, of Bourbon, Capt. Thomas Marshall, and a number of other gentlemen taken; the gentlemen themselves forced to crowd into Col. George Thompson's boat, and row for life, the Indians having pursued them in Mr. May's boat, armed for that purpose, with unparalleled avidity.

Two men were also killed and seven more, one woman, and five children, taken prisoners, about six weeks ago, in Kennaday's Bottom, on the Ohio, 20 miles above Limestone, where they were engaged in erecting a new settlement. All this mischief has been done by the same party of Indians, who are still on the river, and, from information, about the same place where the boats and canoe were taken, six or seven miles above the mouth of Scioto. And we are informed, by the two men above mentioned, who have escaped and come in, that they have sent the plunder to their town by a party, and expect a reinforcement. A party of men was raised in this settlement on the first intelligence of the disturbance, but a dispute arising among them respecting the object in view, they split, and returned without doing of any service, except bringing away a boat which the Indians fitted up for their offensive operations. However, such generally is the consequence of expeditions where the officers who conduct them have only power to advise and persuade; and it is much to be lamented that the Government under which we live wants power, or they who are at the helm a disposition, to protect its citizens.

I have this moment received further intelligence of the depredations of those cursed devils. A boat from Greenbrier, in which was Colonel Ward, Mr. R. Madison, and three or four other boats from Monongahela, were yesterday afternoon attacked, at or near the place mentioned above; a Mr. Richards was killed, and the Monongahela people were obliged to abandon one of their boats, with about one hundred gallons of whiskey, some other property, besides several horses and cattle: a number of horses were killed and wounded in the other boats.

DANVILLE, May 13th, 1790.

That you may have an idea of our unhappy situation, I beg leave to refer you to a letter I wrote on the 20th ultimo, to the Hon. John Brown; since which the Indians have killed two white men and two negroes in Jefferson county; in Nelson two girls, scalped one woman, and made one other woman prisoner.

I have been intimately acquainted with this district from November, 1783; I can with truth say, that in this period of time, the Indians have always been the aggressors; that any incursions made into their country have been from reiterated injuries committed by them; that the depredatory mode of war and plundering carried on by them, renders it difficult, and almost impossible, to discriminate what tribes are the offenders; that, since my first visit to this district, which was the time above named, I can venture to say, that above 1500 souls have been killed and taken in the district, and migrating to it; that upwards of 20,000 horses have been taken and carried off, and other property, such as money, merchandise, household goods, and wearing apparel, have been carried off and destroyed by these barbarians, to at least £15,000.

Repeated informations have been given of these injuries, which continue to be daily perpetrated, and yet we have no satisfactory account of the intention of Government for our relief; the consequences to the district are of a serious and important nature; by them do we see the population of our country decreased, by the murders committed on the emigrants and actual settlers, and by them do we find people intimidated from migrating to our country, which lessens our rising strength; by them is the wealth of our citizens diminished, and the value of our lands decreased. What will be the result?

Volunteer expeditions will be carried on into the Indian countries, upon the principle of revenge, protection, and self-preservation, and Government will not be able to counteract them; the consequences will be, that the volunteers who may thus embody will not discriminate between the Indians who are hostile and those who have treated; they will consider all as enemies that come in their way, and the supposed amicable Indians will no longer have any faith in Government; it will not only prevent the intended views of Government, but undo what hath been done.

I will, sir, be candid on this subject, not only as inhabitant of Kentucky, but as a friend to society, who wishes to see order and regularity preserved in the Government under which I live. The people say they have long groaned under their misfortunes. they see no prospect of relief, they are the strength and wealth of the Western country; all measures which have been attempted, are placed (for execution) in the hands of strangers, who have no interest among them: they are the general sufferers, and yet have no voice in the business; they are accused as the aggressors, and have no representative to justify. These are the general sentiments of the people, and they begin to want faith in the Government, and appear determined to revenge themselves: for this purpose a meeting was lately held in this place, by a number of respectable characters, to determine on the propriety of carrying on three expeditions this fall. From a more general representation of the district, the business was postponed until the meeting of our convention, which is about the 26th instant, at which time there will be a very general meeting of influential characters of the district; and unless some information is received before that time, that will be satisfactory, I fully expect one or more expeditions will be determined on.

Impressed with the idea that the foregoing observations will not be unacceptable to you as an officer of Government, through whose Department it may be properly communicated to the President; if worthy your attention, I shall make no apology for the length of my letter.

I have, this day, received a letter from Governor St. Clair, dated the 5th inst. "at the Rapids of Ohio;" he says, "that the expectations of peace which I much wished, cannot be realized with the people on the Wabash, and in consequence I have come here sooner than I should otherwise have done, to prepare for operating against them." He has requested me to apprise the field officers of the district, that he shall call for the proportions of the militia they are to furnish, in consequence of the orders he has received from the President.

I now embrace the first opportunity which offers, of informing you, that a man was wounded near Mr. Joseph Hite's plantation, about a fortnight ago. I mention this instance as the last of several which have appeared this spring, of mischief done by the Indians in this country.

We, the under writers, inhabitants of Jefferson county, on the waters of Brashear's creek, do certify, that, in the latter end of March last, the Indians took a negro woman prisoner, the property of Anderson Long, two young men at work at the said Long's, in his field, on Clear creek and branch of Brashear's creek.

That, on Tick creek, a branch of Brashear's creek, in April, the Indians killed two men at work in their field.

That, in May, two boys were made prisoners from Loudon's station, on the head of Drennon's Lick creek.

That, on the 23d instant, a party of Indians fired on a company of people, on Clear creek, as they were returning from meeting, killed one man on the spot, and took a young woman prisoner, who they carried about ten miles, and then tomahawked and scalped her.

That, on the 25th instant, as a company were bringing home the corpses of the man and woman, they were alarmed by their dogs, and sent a party out to reconnoitre, who discovered the trail of some Indians.

Given under our hands, this 28th day of May, 1790.

There was no magistrate, to be conveniently found, when this certificate was given, or I would have had an affidavit made of the facts.

NELSON COUNTY, May 12th, 1790.

On Tuesday morning, about eleven Indians attacked the house of Miles Heart, on Valley Creek, a fork of Nolelin, and killed Heart and one of his children; and his wife and two more, which includes the whole family, were made prisoners.

MERCER, ss.

Samuel Winter came before me, a justice for the said county, and being sworn, saith: That he is an inhabitant of Nelson county, and resides on Nolelin creek, that a certain Miles Heart, who lived on Valley creek, about six miles from the deponent, was murdered in his house, on Tuesday, the 11th instant, and that the wife and two children of the said Heart were taken prisoners; that two of Heart's horses are missing, which are supposed to be carried off by the Indians, who did the mischief.

About four days ago, the Indians stole four horses from Mr. Meaux, a considerable distance within the inhabitants; this might have been prevented had there been scouts.

About the seventh of March last, the Indians came to the Rolling fork, and stole a number of horses, to the amount of sixteen; they were pursued by Captain Wilson, and a small party, who came up with them, in about forty miles; but, being overpowered, they were obliged to retreat; Capt. Wilson was killed upon the spot.

I send you two depositions, containing an account of some mischief done lately by the savages in this county, to wit: the killing McBride and McConnel, in April last, and also taking a son of Mr. Tanner's (on the Ohio) a prisoner, &c. I also inform you, that, last fall, two men were killed by the savages, one of the name of Brown, whose wife and children live now in Lexington, as I was with the men who brought the corpse into the neighborhood I live in; besides this, there hath been another party, last winter, who stole a number of horses from the neighborhood I live in, and carried them off.

WOODFORD COUNTY, ss.

John Garnett, of full age, being duly sworn, saith: That he was at Mr. John Tanner's station, on the Ohio, in said county, about five miles below the mouth of the Big Miami, and that said Tanner informed him, that, about the last of April, or first of May, five Indians came and lay in ambush, a little over one hundred yards from his house, between the house and his field, and took a son of said Tanner's, about nine years old, and carried him off, across the Ohio; and further saith, that Indians have been, since, within about two miles of said station, and this deponent further saith not.

Deposition of Samuel Stephenson, taken before Robert Johnson, M. for W. C'ty, May 12, 1790.

WOODFORD COUNTY, ss.

Samuel Stephenson, of full age, being duly sworn, saith: That, about the 12th of April, 1790, being called on to go out to bring James McBride and ——— McConnel, who were killed by the Indians on the road or path from the mouth of Licking, to the settlement on Elkhorn; and this deponent further saith, that he assisted to bring two men which were both scalped; one was much cut with a tomahawk, and the other was shot through the hips, and he believes them to be said McBride and McConnel; and this deponent further saith not.

BOURBON COUNTY, May 12, 1790.

This morning was killed, within six or seven miles of this place, by the Indians, a certain Lewis Parker, who was at his work. It will be unnecessary for me to say any thing more with respect to the murder, as I have enclosed you an affidavit; and, as to the murder of two more men, I am satisfied of its certainty, but have had no opportunity of finding the man, who was with them when they were killed, nor those who have since buried them; the names of the men were McBride and McConnell.

This day came before me, one of the commonwealth's justices for said county, the subscribers, and made oath, that, on the 12th of May, inst. they saw Lewis Parker lying dead; he had received several wounds, with balls, tomahawks, and knives; (he was scalped) that they found him, the said Parker, about one hour after he was killed, and that they verily believe he was thus murdered by Indians, and further say not.

Certificate of Benjamin Harrison.

Although I did not see the Indians kill Parker, I do verily believe they did do it; I saw his body about two hours after he was killed; it happened at Michael Hogg's, not quite three miles from my house, and I followed the trails of those who committed the murder, near ten miles; their direction was towards the Big-bone Lick. The Indians have stole two horses from Mr. Coleman, lately. There is no person, in this quarter, that knows any thing of McBride and McConnell's being killed, only from hear-say; but it is a matter of fact.

BOURBON, May 12, 1790.

I am sorry to inform you, since my last letter, that a man was killed, by a party of Indians, in his cornfield, about seven miles from my house, on Thursday last; also a boat was taken, about eight or ten miles above Limestone, where five persons were found killed on the shore. I think we need no greater proof of the intentions of those savage barbarians, to distress us.

Henry Lee, Lieutenant Mason County, to Judge Innes.

MASON COUNTY, May 16th, 1790.

On the night of the 11th instant, four boats (one of which contained an officer and eight men of the United States' troops) landed about nine miles above Limestone, and about 12 o'clock was fired on by a party of Indians, supposed to be fifteen or twenty in number; three boats made their escape without damage, the other, containing sixteen souls, fell into possession of the enemy; five of those persons were killed and most horribly massacred; three made their escape, one of which was wounded, the balance taken prisoners; and from every discovery I have been able to make, they have not yet re-crossed the river. On the 15th instant, a trail of a party of Indians, supposed to be about fifteen, was discovered crossing the Ohio within the bounds of our lower settlements, and directed their course towards the Blue Licks; this notice has put the neighborhood in that quarter, on their guard; I have had no further intelligence, but am under apprehensions every hour of the fatal consequences; our surveyors and hunters have all retired from the woods, the frequent signs of Indians render it unsafe for them to pursue their business.

LINCOLN, May 17th, 1790.

Friday morning the 14th instant, a company was defeated on the other side Ingle's station; six of said company are missing, supposed to be killed. About ten or fifteen Indians took possession of all their horses and goods, ready packed up to start.

I can assure you, sir, that the frontier of this county (which is about forty miles) have considered themselves in imminent danger all the last spring; but their fears are much increased, since the last hostilities committed on the wilderness road, and Indian signs discovered very lately upon Station Camp.

The mischief above referred to was in Madison county, about forty miles from the inhabitants; four killed, two wounded, 10 or 12 horses, with valuable property.

NELSON COUNTY, ss.

This day came Joseph Barnett, Esq. before me, a justice of the peace for said county, and made oath, on the holy evangelists of Almighty God, that on the eighteenth of April last past, (being Lord's day) about the hour of five in the evening, a party of Indians fell upon a few defenceless people, who were returning from Hartford town, on Rough creek, to a station at the house of this deponent, being two miles distant, killed a girl of twelve years old, and a boy of eight years old, cutting them in a cruel manner, with tomahawks supposed; cut an ancient lady of both respectable family and character, in her right arm, head and back, in a cruel manner, with a scimitar, and after having scalped her alive, left her, and his scimitar with her, and carried off the daughter of this deponent, a girl near eleven years old, into captivity. They were pursued by a party till night, which gave them an opportunity of escaping. The above mentioned boy lived till Tuesday morning following, having his skull split with a tomahawk, and a great part of his brains on the outside of his wounded scalped skull; and the old lady is yet alive, notwithstanding all the misery she has endured; further this deponent saith not.

Observe that the above persons were returning from sermon.

MARCH 24th, 1790.

The Indians still continue to murder and plunder the inhabitants, especially the boats going up and down the Ohio river. About the beginning of this month, they broke up Kenton's station, a small settlement of fifteen miles above Limestone, killing and capturing the whole of the people, supposed to be ten or twelve in number.

Buckner Thruston, Esq. has just arrived here, who informs me of a capital stroke of plunder which they made from the boats, one of which he was on board, a small distance above the Scioto river. This gentleman is a member of the Virginia Legislature, and has given me the enclosed written report of the attack, by which you will please to observe, that the property captured by the savages was estimated at four thousand pounds.

He supposes them to have been Shawanese. No calculation will answer, but raising a sufficient force to effectually chastise the whole of those nations who are known to be hostile.

MARCH 24th, 1790.

On the 21st of March, about 12 o'clock, we discovered on the Indian shore a flat bottomed boat, which appeared to be crowded with Indians; we were fortunately near the Virginia shore at the time we discovered the savages. On our coming opposite them, a white man ran down on the beach and hallooed to us, for God's sake, to surrender; that there were fifty Indians, and if we made resistance, we should be massacred. We refused to surrender, and immediately they fired on us for a considerable time, perhaps to the number of one hundred guns, which gave us time to pass by them; they then embarked all hands aboard their boat, (commonly called a Kentucky boat, which they had taken a day or two before from Mr. John May, who, with four other men, it is supposed are either killed or taken) and gave chase to us; upon finding that we could not escape, there being three boats in company, we chose out the strongest boat, turned the horses adrift, and embarked therein; all the people belonging to the three boats cut holes in her sides, and put in the oars of the three boats, and made the best way we could for fifteen or twenty miles, the Indians pursuing us with great earnestness. They left us after a chase of between two and three hours, and we arrived without further impediment at Limestone. We lost twenty-eight horses, fifteen hundred pounds value of merchandise, (as I am informed) besides private property of passengers and others, to a considerable amount. We supposed the Indians to be fifty or sixty in number. We had about twenty-eight men, and sixteen or seventeen guns, a family of women, and a few negroes, women and children. The principal sufferers among the passengers, were Colonel Thompson, Colonel Edwards, Mr. Abner Field, Mr. Thomas Marshall.

At the solicitation of the inhabitants of Kentucky, (copies of which are enclosed) I was induced to endeavor to break up a nest of vagabond Indians, who had infested the river, and seemed to make it an object to establish themselves near the mouth of the Scioto, in order to interrupt the navigation of the Ohio, and to plunder and murder the emigrants. I am sorry that my endeavors were unsuccessful, as the villains had retreated; wolves might as well have been pursued; every exertion in my power was made without effect.

Having settled our plan of operations, which was to make a circuitous route, and strike the Scioto pretty high, and from thence march down to its mouth, in hopes to intercept some of their parties, we took up our line of march on the same day, (18th April) and gained about twelve miles. On this first day's march, four moccasin tracks were discovered. General Scott detached a small party of horsemen, who fell in with the savages, killed them, and brought the four scalps into Limestone.

Ensign Hartshorne's convoy of boats was attacked at midnight on the 12th, (May) about nine miles above Limestone, from the Virginia side, and several of the emigrants killed; I have enclosed a copy of his report.

FORT WASHINGTON, May 30th, 1790.

SIR:

I beg leave to report as follows: On the 12th instant, as I was coming down the Ohio, in company with five other boats, in the evening, before we came to Limestone, by the request of the company, we put to shore, in order to stay until 2 o'clock, so that we might land at Limestone in day-light. I landed nine miles above Limestone, and the other boats landed about one hundred yards below me. About 12 o'clock the Indians attacked the lowermost boat; after a number of shot they left it, and fell on the other above them, which they took—in this time my men fired five or six shot at the flash of their guns. I had much to do to keep the men in the boat from cutting her loose, and leaving my men on shore, so I thought proper to order my men on board; for, by every circumstance, I thought them too strong for me with so few men; and it being very dark, I ordered the boat off from the shore, and fell down into their fire, where we received a number of shot; and when I found that all the boats were not taken, I ordered them to go ahead in case the Indians did pursue us, that I might check them. We arrived at Limestone at 3 o'clock in the morning; I immediately wrote to the county lieutenant upon the matter; he, with twenty men, came down: at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, myself with five men went up to the place where we were attacked; we found one man, one woman, and three children, killed and scalped, which we put into the boat, with their property, to Limestone. There are eight missing; the whole killed and missing is thirteen souls; they took none of the property but one horse.

I am, sir, your most humble servant,

LEXINGTON, 7th April, 1790.

I write to you at the public request, on a subject deeply interesting to Kentucky, our national honor, and to humanity.

For more than one month past a party of savages has occupied the Northwestern bank of the Ohio, a few miles above the mouth of Scioto, from whence they make attacks upon every boat which passes, to the destruction of much property, the loss of many lives, and the great annoyance of all intercourse from the northward.

By very recent accounts, we are apprized that they still continue in force at that point, and that their last attack was made against five boats, one of which they captured. It is the general, and I conceive a well founded opinion, that if this party is not dislodged and dispersed, the navigation of the Ohio must cease. In a case so very critical, the people of this district conceive themselves justified in appealing to arms, because their dearest interests, and the lives of their brethren, are at hazard; but being extremely unwilling to proceed, except in a legal, regular, and authorized way, they call upon you for your advice, succor, and assistance, in the hope and the expectation, that you will be able to co-operate with a detachment of the troops under your command, and carry an immediate expedition against the before mentioned party of savages, from Limestone, where it is proposed to rendezvous a body of militia volunteers.

Colonel Patterson waits upon you on this occasion to know your determination, and to make such adjustments as may be deemed expedient.

FAYETTE, 7th April, 1790.

Within a few days past a party of Indians, who have taken post on the Ohio, near the mouth of the Scioto, have captured four boats, killed and taken several people, and much property; for the particulars I refer you to Colonel Patterson, who, I expect, will hand you this. From circumstances we may conclude this practice will be continued, unless they are dislodged. The unhappy consequences which will result, are too obvious to every discerning man, and too distressing to be borne. A party of men from the counties north of Kentucky river, are preparing to remove these troublesome fellows from their station. They will rendezvous at Lexington, on Thursday, the 15th instant; at Limestone, the Saturday following. The inhabitants of this district flatter themselves they will meet with every encouragement and protection from the officers in the Western Government, in every plan that will tend to secure their persons and property, and to protect in the enjoyment of those rights, for which we have so often risked our persons, and expended property. I flatter myself that, in the present instance, we shall not only meet the approbation of his excellency General St. Clair, but with such instructions and assistance from you, as you may judge best calculated for the execution of the intended design, that a peaceable emigration may be preserved to the Western country.

I flatter myself that an account of the hostilities that are committed in the Western country will, by the earliest opportunity, be transmitted to the President of the United States.

LICKING, 9th April, 1790.

I was very desirous of handing you General Wilkinson's and Colonel Todd's letters, but our interruption on the way, and my business at home, puts it out of my power. Mr. Lemond, who I expect will hand this with others, can inform you particularly. I do not know that my personal attendance would have answered any purpose, only to have informed you of our intention. We do not wish to infringe on the rights of the Federal Government; it is well known that the Indians occupy both sides of the river. We know that it is not infringing to drive the enemy from our own door, but that will not answer any purpose in this case. We rest assured that we will not only meet with your approbation, but your assistance. You need not doubt, but that, on Saturday, the 17th instant, there will be at Limestone, five hundred men at least, to co-operate with your troops, and your directions. Our men will be furnished with twelve day's provisions, expecting to continue out that time.

NEW YORK, August 23d, 1790.

"The letter from Major Hamtramck, and journal of Mr. Gamelin, copies of which accompany this, were received by me at Kaskaskias, after my return from Cahokia; and when I was on the point of setting out for the Wabash. From the information that journal contained, and the intelligence which the Major had received afterwards, as stated in the letter, it appeared to me, that there was not the smallest probability of an accommodation with the Indians of that river, and of the Miami, and that, from the manner in which the proposal of an accommodation had been received by them, and their subsequent conduct, it would not be proper for me to go to Post St. Vincennes; I therefore took the resolution to return by the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, to the head quarters of the troops, in order to concert with General Harmar upon the means of carrying into effect the alternative contained in my instructions from the President—that of punishing them; and accordingly embarked on the eleventh day of June, and arrived at fort Washington on the 13th day of July.

Before my departure from Kaskaskias, I put a letter into the hands of Major Sargent, informing him of my intended journey, and that, as soon as I had embarked, he was to consider me as absent, and in consequence, the government devolved upon himself, and desired him to proceed to the post, lay out a county there, establish the militia, and appoint the civil and military officers. I was led to proceed in this manner from the little time there would be to digest the business, and bring the necessary force together from so many and distant parts, before it would be necessary that they should move, and the certainty there appeared to be that, if I went to the post, the consuming a good deal of it would be unavoidable, and the season for operation be lost.

From the falls of Ohio, I took Mr. Elliot, one of the contractors, with me to head quarters, that he might, in person, give General Harmar information with respect to the certainty of supplies, without being assured of which, it would be vain to think of the matter.

The number of militia I was empowered to call for, was one thousand from Virginia, and five hundred from Pennsylvania, to act in conjunction with the continental troops; these the General estimated at four hundred effective. The manner of employing this force, which was concluded upon, is this: three hundred of the militia of Virginia are to rendezvous at fort Steuben, and with the garrison of that fort, to march to Post St. Vincennes and join Major Hamtramck; the remaining twelve hundred of the militia to assemble at fort Washington, under the orders of General Harmar, which, with the troops to be collected there, will form a body of fifteen hundred: these are intended to march directly across the country to the Miami village, while Major Hamtramck moves up the Wabash to attack any of the villages on that river to which his force may be equal; but, as it is not so respectable as I could wish it, I took it upon myself to give him authority to call for aid from the militia of Post St. Vincennes.

It would, perhaps, have been better that the whole should have been drawn together, and one solid effort been made; but it was next to impossible to form a junction of all the parts at any one proper place, in time, and we were not without hopes that, as the movements will be made in concert, the success of both may be forwarded by each other: for that up the Wabash will, certainly, I think, make those nations uneasy for themselves, and prevent them from aiding the Miamies, while the direct movement to their village will have the same effect upon them.

I could indeed have wished that the force in both quarters had been more respectable, as far as it is possible their success should be put out of the chance of accidents; for a failure will be attended with the very worst consequences. I believe, sir, that, if the President approves the business, and should think proper to add to the numbers, it is not yet too late, being of opinion that many more men might be obtained from that part of Virginia from whence the others are called, on very short notice. You will observe, sir, by my letter to the county lieutenants, that the rendezvous at fort Washington is fixed for the 15th of next month. Their assembling there, however, was not counted upon before the 20th, and that they would be in readiness to march by the first of October. Before that time, I hope I shall be able to join them.

Mr. Elliot made very little hesitation about the provisions, though it will be impossible to furnish flour. Corn, however, it seems, is still abundant in Kentucky, and with that General Harmar is satisfied.

I am very apprehensive that some disappointment will be met with in the quota of Pennsylvania: for I found that, in two of the four counties from which that militia is to be drawn, they have not had an officer for upwards of two years, and there was a general complaint for want of arms. I represented that matter to the Executive of the State, and they think the first difficulty will be obviated by a voluntary enlistment, and have ordered a quantity of arms to be sent forward. As a disappointment there would be fatal, perhaps the President may think proper to make some conditional provision against it.

I hope it will not happen, but I fear it; and am extremely anxious about it, on account of the expense that will have been incurred to no purpose, and more so from the injury the reputation of the Government would sustain.

I request the favor of you, sir, to lay this letter before the President as soon as possible: for it is of importance that I should return without loss of time, as the assembling the militia of Pennsylvania is appointed on the 3d, and their being in motion not to exceed the 10th of September.

I have added a copy of my letter to the county lieutenants, and to the senior officer of the Pennsylvania militia.

MR. GAMELIN'S JOURNAL.

Memorandum of sundry speeches held by Anthony Gamelin to the chiefs of the Wabash and Miami nations.

I, Anthony Gamelin, by order of Major Hamtramck, set off from fort Knox the 5th April, to proceed to Miami town, with the speeches of his Excellency Arthur St. Clair, and to receive the answer of the Wabash and Miami nations.

The first village I arrived to is called Kikapouguoi. The name of the chief of this village is called Les Jambes Croches. Him and his tribe have a good heart, and accepted the speech.

The second village is at the river du Vermillion, called Piankeshaws. The first chief, and all the chief warriors, were well pleased with the speeches concerning the peace; but they said they could not give presently a proper answer, before they consult the Miami nation, their eldest brethren. They desired me to proceed to the Miami town, and, by coming back, to let them know what reception I got from them. The said head-chief told me, that he thought the nations of the lakes had a bad heart, and were ill disposed for the Americans: that the speeches would not be received, particularly by the Chaouanons,* at Miami town.

The 10th of April I met thirteen Kickapoo warriors; I asked them the purpose of their journey. We are for war, said they, not against the white people, but against the Chichashas. I told them to be friends with white people: I gave them a letter for the commanding officer of Post Vincennes, desiring them to go and shake hands with him. They promised to do it.

The 11th of April, I reached a tribe of Kickapoos: the head chief and all the warriors being assembled, I gave them two branches of white wampum, with the speeches of his Excellency Arthur St. Clair, and those of Major Hamtramck (it must be observed that the speeches have been in another hand before me.) The messenger could not proceed further than the Vermillion, on account of some private wrangling between the interpreter and some chief men of the tribe. Moreover, something in the speech displeased them very much, which is included in the third article, which says, "I do now make you the offer of peace; accept it or reject it, as you please." These words appeared to displease all the tribes to whom the first messenger was sent. They told me they were menacing, and, finding that it might have a bad effect, I took upon myself to exclude them, and, after making some apology, they answered that he and his tribe were pleased with my speech, and that I could go up without danger; but that they could not presently give me an answer, having some warriors absent, and without consulting the Oujatanons, being the owners of their lands. They desired me to stop at Quitepiconnae, that they would have the chiefs and warriors of Oujatanons, and those of their nation, assembled there, and would receive a proper answer; they said that they expected by me a draught of milk from the great chief, and the commanding officer of the post, for to put the old people in good humor; also some powder and ball for the young men for hunting, and to get some good broth for their women and children; that I should know a bearer of speeches should never be with empty hands; they promised me to keep their young men from stealing, and to send speeches to their nations in the prairies for to do the same. One of the chiefs desired me to listen to his speech. "Is it true that a man called Lewis Loder has, in last summer, carried a letter, wrote with red ink upon black paper, directed to the chief of the Falls, by the French and American people of the post, inviting him for to furnish his young men for to destroy the Kickapoos? Yourself, Gamelin, you wrote the said letter, without giving notice to the chiefs of that place, as reported to us. But the chief of the Falls answered: I dont understand the meaning of writing a letter with vermilion; dont you know that the Kickapoos are my children, as well as other nations? Instead of destroying them, I want to contract a solid peace with them. That is a proof of a good heart of the great chief, and we sincerely believe that what you say concerning the peace is very true. Another proof of his good heart: we heard that Ducoign applied to the commanding officer of the post for to go against us, with the French people, his brethren; but he got a refusal."

The 14th April the Oujatanons and the Kickapoos were assembled. After my speech, one of the head chiefs got up and told me: "You, Gamelin, my friend, and son-in-law, we are pleased to see in our village, and to hear by your mouth, the good words of the Great Chief. We thought to receive a few words from the French people, but I see the contrary; none but the Big-knife is sending speeches to us. You know that we can terminate nothing without the consent of our elder brethren, the Miamies. I invite you to proceed to their village, and to speak to them. There is one thing in your speech I do not like: I will not tell of it: even was I drunk, I would perceive it; but our elder brethren will certainly take notice of it in your speech. You invite us to stop our young men. It is impossible to do it, being constantly encouraged by the British." Another chief got up and said: "The Americans are very flattering in their speeches: many times our nation went to their rendezvous. I was once myself. Some of our chiefs died on the route, and we always came back all naked, and you, Gamelin, you come with speech, with empty hands." Another chief got up and said to his young men: "If we are so poor, and dressed in deer skins, it is our own fault: our French traders are leaving us and our villages, because you plunder them every day, and it is time for us to have another conduct." Another chief got up and said: "Know ye that the village of Oujatanon is the sepulchre of all our ancestors. The chief of America invites us to go to him, if we are for peace; he has not his leg broke, having been able to go as far as the Illinois: he might come here himself, and we should be glad to see him at our village. We confess that we accepted the axe, but it is by the reproach we continually receive from the English and other nations, which received the axe first, calling us women; at the present time, they invite our young men to war: as to the old people, they are wishing for peace." They could not give me an answer before they received advice from the Miamies, their elder brethren.

The 18th April I arrived at the river à l'Anguille. The chief of the village, and those of war, were not present. I explained the speeches to some of the tribe; they said they were well pleased, but they could not give me an answer, their chief men being absent; they desired me to stop at their village coming back, and they sent with me one of their men for to hear the answer of their eldest brethren.

The 23d April I arrived at the Miami town; the next day, I got the Miami nation, the Chaouanons, and Del-awares, all assembled. I gave to each nation two branches of wampum, and began the speeches, before the French and English traders, being invited by the chiefs to be present, having told them myself I would be glad to have them present, having nothing to say against any body. After the speech, I showed them the treaty concluded at Muskingum, between his Excellency Governor St. Clair, and sundry nations, which displeased them. I told them that the purpose of this present time was not to submit them to any condition; but to offer them the peace, which made disappear their displeasure. The great chief told me that he was pleased with the speech; that he would soon give me an answer. In a private discourse with the great chief, he told me not to mind what the Chaouanons would tell me, having a bad heart, and being the perturbators of all the nations. He said the Miamies had a bad name, on account of mischief done on the river Ohio, but he told me it was not occasioned by his young men, but by the Chaouanons, his young men going out only for to hunt.

The 25th of April, Blue Jacket, chief warrior of the Chaouanons, invited me to go to his house, and told me, "My friend, by the name and consent of the Chaouanons and Delawares, I will speak to you. We are all sensible of your speech, and pleased with it; but, after consultation, we cannot give an answer without hearing from our father at Detroit, and we are determined to give you back the two branches of wampum, and to send you to Detroit to see and hear the chief, or to stay here twenty nights for to receive his answer. From all quarters, we receive speeches from the Americans, and not one is alike. We suppose that they intend to deceive us—then take back your branches of wampum."

The 26th, five Pattawatamies arrived here with two negro men, which they sold to English traders; the next day I went to the great chief of the Miamies, called Le Gris; his chief warrior was present. I told him how I had been served by the Chaouanons; he answered me, that he had heard of it; that the said nations behaved contrary to his intentions. He desired me not to mind those strangers, and that he would soon give me a positive answer.

The 28th April, the great chief desired me to call at the French trader's, and receive his answer. "Don't take bad," said he, "of what I am to tell you; you may go back when you please. We cannot give you a positive answer; we must send your speeches to all our neighbors and to the Lake nations; we cannot give a definitive answer without consulting the commandant of Detroit." And he desired me to render him the two branches of wampum refused by the Chaouanons; also, a copy of speeches, in writing. He promised me that, in thirty nights, he would send an answer to Post St. Vincennes, by a young man of each nation; he was well pleased with the speeches, and said to be worthy of attention, and should be communicated to all their confederates, having resolved among them not to do any thing without an unanimous consent. I agreed to his requisitions, and rendered him the two branches of wampum, and a copy of the speech. Afterwards, he told me, that the Five Nations, so called, or Iroquois, were training something; that five of them and three Wyandots were in this village with branches of wampum; he could not tell me presently their purpose, but he said I would know of it very soon.

The same day Blue Jacket, chief of the Chaouanons, invited me to his house for supper, and, before the other chiefs, told me that, after another deliberation, they thought necessary that I should go myself to Detroit, for to see the commandant, who would get all his children assembled for to hear my speech. I told them I would not answer them in the night—that I was not ashamed to speak before the sun.

The 29th of April, I got them all assembled. I told them that I was not to go to Detroit; that the speeches were directed to the nations of the river Wabash and the Miami, and that, for to prove the sincerity of the speech, and the heart of Governor St. Clair, I have willingly given a copy of the speeches, to be shown to the commandant of Detroit; that his excellency will be glad to hear that his speeches have been sent to Detroit, and, according to a letter wrote by the commandant of Detroit to the Miamies, Chaouanons, and Delawares, mentioning to you to be peaceable with the Americans. I would go to him very willingly, if it was my directions, being sensible of his sentiments. I told them I had nothing to say to the commandant, neither him to me. You must immediately resolve, if you intend to take me to Detroit, or else I am to go back as soon as possible. Blue Jacket got up and told me, "My friend, we are well pleased with what you say; our intention is not to force you to go to Detroit: it is only a proposal, thinking it for the best. Our answer is the same as the Miamies. We will send, in thirty nights, a full and positive answer, by a young man of each nation, by writing to Post St. Vincennes." In the evening, Blue Jacket, chief of the Chaouanons, having taken me to supper with him, told me, in a private manner, that the nation Chaouanon was in doubt of the sincerity of the Big-knives, so called, having been already deceived by them.

That they had first destroyed their lands, put out their fire, and sent away their young men, being a hunting, without a mouthful of meat; also had taken away their women, wherefore, many of them would, with great deal of pain, forget these affronts. Moreover, that some other nations were apprehending that offers of peace would, may be, tend to take away, by degrees, their lands, and would serve them as they did before; a certain proof that they intend to encroach on our lands, is their new settlement on the Ohio. If they don't keep this side clear, it will never be a proper reconciliation with the nations Chaouanons, Iroquois, Wyandots, and perhaps many others. Le Gris, chief of the Miamies, asked me, in a private discourse, what chief had made a treaty with the Americans at Musingum. I answered him, that their names were mentioned in the treaty; he told me that he had heard of it some time ago, but they are not chiefs, neither delegates, who made that treaty; they are only young men, who, without authority and instruction from their chiefs, have concluded that treaty, which will not be approved. They went to that treaty clandestinely, and they intend to make mention of it in the next council to be held.

The 2d of May, I came back to the river à l'Anguille. One of the chief men of the tribe being witness of the council at Miami town, repeated the whole to them; and whereas the first chief was absent, they said they could not for present time, give answer; but they are willing to join their speech to those of their eldest brethren. "To give you proof of an open heart, we let you know that one of our chiefs is gone to war on the Americans, but it was before we heard of you; for certain they would not have been gone thither." They also told me, that a few days after I passed by their village, seventy warriors, Sautaux and Outawais, from Michilimackinac, arrived there; some of them were Poux, who, meeting in their route the Sautaux and Outawais, joined them. "We told them what we heard by you; that your speech is fair and true. We could not stop them from going to war. The Poux told us, that, as the Sautaux and Outawais were more numerous than them, they were forced to follow them."

The 3d of May, I got to the Ouais; they told me that they were waiting for an answer from their eldest brethren. "We approve very much our brethren for not to give a definitive answer, without informing of it all the Lake nations; that Detroit was the place where the fire was lighted; then it ought first to be put out there; that the English commandant is their father, since he threw down our French father; they could do nothing without his approbation."

The 4th May I arrived at the village of the Kickapoos; the chief, presenting me two branches of wampum, black and white, said: "My son, we cannot stop our young men from going to war; every day some set off clandestinely for that purpose; after such behavior from our young men, we are ashamed to say to the great chief at the Illinois and of the Post St. Vincennes, that we are busy about some good affairs for the reconciliation; but be persuaded that we will speak to them continually concerning the peace, and that, when our eldest brethren will have sent their answer, we will join ours to it."

The 5th of May I arrived at Vermillion; I found no body but two chiefs; all the rest were gone a hunting; they told me they had nothing else to say but what I was told going up. They told me that the Grosse Tête, a warrior absent, appears to have a bad heart.

HEAD QUARTERS, FORT WASHINGTON, July 15th, 1790.

SIR:

The interests of the United States dictating a peace with the Indian nations on the Wabash, if it could be obtained upon reasonable terms, I was directed by the President to give them information of the disposition of the General Government on that subject, and to try to effect it; at the same time, I was instructed by him to take measures for the security of the frontier country, in case of their continuing hostile. The following is extracted from his instructions to me on that head (here was inserted that part of my instructions relative to the militia.) I have now to inform you that there is no prospect of peace with the said Indians at present; on the contrary, they continue very ill disposed towards the United States in general, and to Virginia in particular; and many parties are, from information lately received, now actually gone to war. The commanding officer of the troops and myself have, therefore, concerted a plan of offensive operations against them, and in conformity with the above recited instructions, I now call upon you, in the name of the President of the United States, for ——— men, rank and file, and properly officered, according to the legal establishment of the militia of your State, to act in conjunction with the federal troops, against the said Indians; and that they be at ———, on the ——— day of September next, armed, accoutred, and equipped, for a service of sixty days or more, after they shall have joined the troops, unless the object in view shall be sooner accomplished.

The laudable desire, and ardent spirit, to repress incursions of the savages, by which the militia have been actuated, upon all occasions, leave not room for a doubt but the present opportunity to punish them for the many injuries and cruelties they have committed, will be embraced with zeal. But allow me to observe, that it is of the utmost importance that they be punctually at the rendezvous.

I have the honor to be, &c.

AR. ST. CLAIR.

The counties of Virginia were called upon in the following proportion, which were assigned them from the best information I could get, of their respective strengths:

The county of Nelson,	125	} To rendezvous at Fort Steuben, on the 12th September.
Lincoln,	125
Jefferson,	50
	300
Madison,	125	} To rendezvous at Fort Washington, September 15th.
Mercer,	125
Fayette,	200
Bourbon,	125
Woodford,	85
Mason,	40
	700

The counties of Pennsylvania, the proportions of which were assigned them by the number of their representatives in Assembly, which being governed by the number of people, from time to time, appeared an equal rule, and was the only one I had to go by, having been able to meet with but one of the Lieutenants.

Washington county,	220	} To assemble at McMahan's creek, four miles below Wheeling, on 3d Sept.
Westmoreland,	110

PITTSBURGH, August 7th, 1790.

SIR:

As soon as the detachments from the different counties are arrived, you will proceed, without loss of time, to fort Harmar, at the mouth of the Muskingum, and there join the Federal troops under the command of Major Doughty, who will either conduct you to head quarters, or direct the manner in which you are to proceed to that place. I do hope, and expect, that nothing will prevent the whole quota of Pennsylvania from being assembled at the appointed place and time; after which, you will remain on that ground not a moment longer than is necessary; at all events you must be in motion from thence, on, or before, the 10th of September: for the delaying beyond that period, even for one day, might create difficulties and embarrassments that would not be easily got over, if it did not render the expedition altogether abortive.

I have mentioned the 10th as the utmost period, but you are by no means to delay it to that time, if the different detachments are sooner arrived. Should it happen that any of them are not got up when you move, leave directions for them to follow you with all possible expedition to Fort Washington, without halting at Muskingum. You will be sure to take the necessary measures for the security of your camp, while you remain at the rendezvous, and on your way down the river; possibly you may see no Indians, or none that are hostile, but a surprise is ever to be guarded against, so that you will never encamp without establishing proper guards and patrols, nor even go ashore, for ever so short a time, without the same precaution.

You will please to observe that many of the friendly Indians with whom the United States are engaged by treaty, may be in the neighborhood of McMahan's creek, and that they have a right to hunt in that country. It is of great consequence that no injury be done to any of them, both for the sake of public faith, which has been pledged to them, and to keep them detached from those who are inimical.

You will therefore impress the necessity of treating those Indians with kindness, should any of them be met with, upon the minds of the people under your command, in the most forcible manner. Indeed, the success of the expedition, in some measure, depends upon it. They are the Wyandots and Delawares. If you see any of them, assure them no harm is intended them, if they continue in peace.

MARIETTA, 19th September, 1790.

The depredations on the Ohio and the Wabash still continue; every day, almost, brings an account of some murder or robbery, and yesterday a number of horses were taken from this settlement. Not long ago, a boat belonging to Mr. Vigo, a gentleman of Post St. Vincennes, was fired upon near the mouth of Blue River. This person, the United States have been very much obliged to on many occasions, and is, in truth, the most disinterested person I have almost ever seen. He had three men killed, and was obliged in consequence to fall down the river. This party, it seems, had been designed to intercept me: for they reported that they had had three fair discharges at the Governor's boat, and expected that they had killed him. In descending the river, Mr. Vigo's boat fell in with Mr. Melchor's, returning from Tennessee, and attempted, in company with him, to ascend the Wabash. Here they were attacked again. Melchor escaped, and fell down, it seems, to the Ance de la graisse, but the savages possessed themselves of Vigo's boat, which they plundered of all his and the crew's personal baggage and arms; but as she was navigated by Frenchmen, they suffered them to depart with the peltries, telling them that, if she had not been in company with Americans, they would not have injured them, and that, if they found them in such again, they would put them to death. Captain McCurdy likewise was fired upon between Fort Washington and this place, and had five or six men killed and wounded.

"I am directed to write to the commanding officer at Detroit. I have enclosed a copy of that letter."

MARIETTA, 19th September, 1790.

SIR:

As it is not improbable that an account of the military preparations going forward in this quarter of the country may reach you, and give you some uneasiness, while the object to which they are to be directed is not perfectly known to you, I am commanded by the President of the United States to give you the fullest assurances of the pacific disposition entertained towards Great Britain and all her possessions, and to inform you explicitly that the expedition about to be undertaken, is not intended against the post you have the honor to command, nor any other place at present in the possession of the troops of his Britannic Majesty, but is on foot with the sole design of humbling and chastising some of the savage tribes whose depredations are become intolerable, and whose cruelties have of late become an outrage, not on the people of America only, but on humanity, which I now do in the most unequivocal manner. After this candid explanation, sir, there is every reason to expect, both from your own personal character, and from the regard you have for that of your nation, that those tribes will meet with neither countenance nor assistance from any under your command, and that you will do what in your power lies, to restrain the trading people, from whose instigations there is too good reason to believe, much of the injuries committed by the savages has proceeded. I have forwarded this letter by a private gentleman, in preference to that of an officer, by whom you might have expected a communication of this kind, that every suspicion of the purity of the views of the United States might be obviated.

FORT WASHINGTON, 9th October, 1790.

On the 23d ultimo, I arrived at this place, and found every thing in a better state of preparation than I had flattered myself with, owing to the prudent care and attention of General Harmar, and the indefatigable application of Captain Ferguson. The militia that had been ordered from Kentucky, appeared on the day appointed, all except one hundred and forty, who have since come forward, and marched to join the army. Major Wyllis, with the troops from the falls, got up on the 22d, and Major Doughty, with part of the garrison of fort Harmar, arrived on the 25th. From the failure on the part of Pennsylvania, the corps would have been rather too weak, and General Harmar was of opinion with me, that it would be proper to ask for a reinforcement from Kentucky, and in virtue of the powers granted to me by the President, I immediately called for five hundred from the counties of Fayette and Woodford, which were the nearest, and also the most populous, and requested that, if it could be done, they might all be mounted; but as the other militia had been for some time here, and were beginning to grow impatient, it was thought best not to wait for the arrival of the reinforcement, and accordingly the corps under the immediate command of Colonel Harding, was put in motion on the 27th, with orders to advance about twenty miles, and to open a road from their camp to this place, for the passage of the artillery. By the accounts we have of the country, after the first twenty miles are passed, it becomes level, and so thinly covered with wood, that there will be little occasion to open roads. On the 30th, General Harmar moved with the troops, three pieces of artillery, and the provisions for the campaign, the cattle and horses for the transportation of the flour having arrived in due season. On the 2d instant, Mr. Frothingham, arrived with the remainder of the garrison of fort Harmar, and proceeded to join the army on the third.

I have not heard from General Harmar since his second day's march. The country was then hilly and difficult for the artillery; but some persons who had been viewing the country came in two days ago, who confirm the account of its very soon becoming level and open. They fell in upon the trace of the army about seven miles from Mud river, and returned upon it. In that distance, there had been occasion to make only one very small causeway with logs. They must be up with Chillicothe before now, and if they have not been opposed there, which I do not expect, as it is situated in a plain prairie. The Indians will be found assembled at the Miami village. Major Hamtramck had orders from General Harmar to move on the 25th of the last month, and the militia would join him in time for him to comply with the orders within a day or two at farthest.

The intelligence I received shall be communicated from time to time, by every opportunity, and by express, if any thing occurs of sufficient importance.

The little army moved in high spirits, and have had excellent weather ever since, one day's rain excepted.

14th October, 1790.

In consequence of orders received from General Harmar, dated the 15th of July, which we engaged to comply with by the 1st of October, we have, before the 18th of September, furnished and equipped for the use of the army, in the intended expedition against the savages, one hundred and eighty thousand rations of flour, two hundred thousand rations of meat, eight hundred and sixty-eight pack and artillery horses, equipped with pack saddles, bags, ropes, &c. and one horse-master general, eighteen horse-masters, one hundred and thirty pack-horse drivers, all of which could not have been done upon so short a notice as we have had, if we had not employed all our funds, and pledged our credit to the extent, to the people of the Western country, where the supplies were principally furnished.

The expedition, we trust, cannot fail from any default of ours, for we have forwarded supplies in greater quantities than were required of us; and even more than our most sanguine expectations, at the commencement of the business, encouraged us to promise.

TO ARTHUR ST. CLAIR, Esq.

Governor of the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio, and Superintendent of Indian Affairs for the Northern district:

SIR:

Congress having, by their act of the 29th of September last, empowered me to call forth the militia of the States, respectively, for the protection of the frontiers from the incursions of the hostile Indians, I have thought proper to make this communication to you, together with the instructions herein contained.

It is highly necessary that I should as soon as possible, possess full information, whether the Wabash and Illinois Indians are most inclined for war or peace. If for the former, it is proper that I should be informed of the means which will most probably induce them to peace. If a peace can be established with the said Indians on reasonable terms, the interests of the United States dictate, that it should be effected as soon as possible.

You will therefore inform the said Indians of the dispositions of the General Government on this subject, and of their reasonable desire that there should be a cessation of hostilities as a prelude to a treaty. If, however, notwithstanding your intimations to them, they should continue their hostilities, or meditate any incursions against the frontiers of Virginia and Pennsylvania, or against any of the troops or posts of the United States, and it should appear to you that the time of execution would be so near as to forbid your transmitting the information to me, and receiving my further orders thereon, then you are hereby authorized and empowered, in my name, to call on the lieutenants of the nearest counties of Virginia and Pennsylvania, for such detachments of militia as you may judge proper, not exceeding, however, one thousand from Virginia and five hundred from Pennsylvania.

I have directed letters to be written to the Executives of Virginia and Pennsylvania, informing them of the before recited act of Congress, and that I have given you these conditional directions, so that there may not be any obstructions to such measures as shall be necessary to be taken by you for calling forth the militia agreeably to the instructions herein contained.

The said militia to act in conjunction with the federal troops, in such operations, offensive or defensive, as you, and the commanding officer of the troops, conjointly, shall judge necessary for the public service, and the protection of the inhabitants and the posts.

The said militia, while in actual service, to be on the continental establishment of pay and rations; they are to arm and equip themselves, but to be furnished with public ammunition if necessary, and no charge for the pay of said militia will be valid unless supported by regular musters, made by a field or other officer of the federal troops, to be appointed by the commanding officer of the troops.

I would have it observed forcibly, that a war with the Wabash Indians ought to be avoided by all means consistently with the security of the frontier inhabitants, the security of the troops, and the national dignity. In the exercise of the present indiscriminate hostilities, it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to say that a war without further measures would be just on the part of the United States.

But, if, after manifesting clearly to the Indians, the dispositions of the General Government for the preservation of peace, and the extension of a just protection to the said Indians, they should continue their incursions, the United States will be constrained to punish them with severity.

You will, also, proceed, as soon as you can, with safety, to execute the orders of the late Congress, respecting the inhabitants at St. Vincennes, and at the Kaskaskias, and the other villages on the Mississippi. It is a circumstance of some importance, that the said inhabitants should, as soon as possible, possess the lands to which they are entitled, by some known and fixed principles.

I have directed a number of copies of the treaty made by you, at fort Harmar, with the Wyandots, &c. on the 9th of January last, to be printed and forwarded to you, together with the ratification, and my proclamation enjoining the observance thereof.

As it may be of high importance to obtain a precise and accurate knowledge of the several waters which empty into the Ohio, on the northwest, and of those which discharge themselves in the lakes Erie and Michigan, the length of the portages between, and nature of the ground, an early and pointed attention thereto is earnestly recommended.

Given under my hand, in the city of New York, this 6th day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, and in the thirteenth year of the sovereignty and independence of the United States.

The information contained in your letter of the 24th of March last, relative to the depredations of the Indians, is corroborated by several other letters, with considerable additions. The reports of these several events, have excited much disquietude in the public mind generally, and, more particularly, in all men whose views or interests are westward.

A letter from Judge Symmes, dated at Lexington, the 30th of April last, mentions, that you, with some continental troops, and General Scott, with some volunteers from Kentucky, had made an expedition up the Ohio, against the Indians, at or near the Scioto, who had annoyed the boats in descending the Ohio, but without any considerable effect, having killed only four Indians.

The recent hostilities, according to the information, seems to have been committed by the remnants of the Shawanese, and the banditti from several tribes associated with them. Although the said Shawanese, and banditti, aggregately, may not amount, at the excess, to two hundred fighting men, yet they seem sufficient to alarm the whole frontier lying along the Ohio, and, in a considerable degree, injure the reputation of the Government.

To extend a defensive and efficient protection to so extensive a frontier, against solitary, or small parties of enterprising savages, seems altogether impossible. No other remedy remains, but to extirpate, utterly, if possible, the said banditti.

The President of the United States, therefore, directs, that you, and the Governor of the Western Territory, consult together upon the most practicable mode of effecting this object, in such manner as not to interfere with any treaties he may be about forming with any of the regular tribes of Indians on the Wabash.

At this distance, and under the information received, it would seem that an expedition of the nature herein described, might, if conducted with great address and rapidity, be attended with the desired effect.

The troops to be employed on this occasion, to be composed of one hundred continental, and three hundred militia, non-commissioned officers and privates, all picked men, and properly officered.

The militia to be drawn from the nearest counties of Kentucky, to rendezvous at fort Washington, or the mouth of the Great Miami, or such other place as you may judge more proper, to be engaged for thirty days from their arrival at the rendezvous.

The continental troops and militia to be mounted on horseback, and if, in the judgment of the Governor and yourself, that mode of transportation would most probably ensure success, and horses could be obtained in a reasonable distance.

The militia to be on continental pay, according to the establishment, passed the 30th April last; and rations from the time of their arrival at the place of rendezvous.

A continental officer, to muster and inspect the militia on their arrival, and none to be inserted in the pay abstracts, which must be certified by you, unless so mustered. The militia to find their own arms and accoutrements, but to be furnished by the public, with ammunition, if necessary.

The militia officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, to be allowed for the hire and risk of their horses, and horse accoutrements, such a sum, per day, as the Governor and you shall certify that the nature of the service required; provided, however, such sum shall not exceed half a dollar per day.

The horses to be hired for continental troops, to be on the same terms, or less, in proportion to the risk of the horses, which, perhaps, ought to be on account of the United States, according to the value of the horses, which, in that case, ought to be appraised.

It is presumed, that each horse, besides the rider, ought to carry thirty days bread and pork, or bacon, and about a bushel of corn, or one quart per day, as fodder for the horses.

The Shawanese, and banditti associated with them, are said to reside on the eastern branches of the Wabash river, towards its head. I have learned from Major Doughty and Captain Ferguson, that the Wabash has a more easterly course than is laid down in Hutchin's map. If this be so, the distance from the mouth of the Great Miami, over, cannot greatly exceed the distance from the rapids over to Post St. Vincennes. But, suppose the distance should be one hundred and thirty or forty miles, it could be marched on horseback, in four days, at furthest.

It would be unnecessary to enter into any further details. To the judgment of the Governor and you, the expedition may justly be confided. Efficacy, and the peace of the frontiers, are the great objects; with these are to be blended due economy. But, all future depredations of the Indians from the southwest of the Ohio, in considerable numbers, must, if possible, be prevented; and, for this purpose, the orders now given, or even an extension of them, one or two hundred men, must be considered as a standing order, until the object of extirpating the murderous banditti before mentioned, be effected.

It is, however, strongly to be observed, that the highest precautions must be taken in all incursions into the Indian country, that the friendly, or even neutral tribes, be uninjured, but, that the strongest assurances be given to such tribes, of the pacific and just dispositions of the United States, and, at the same time, of their firm intentions of inflicting severe punishment upon all those of a contrary nature.

Although these orders are to be considered as addressed, conjointly to the Governor and yourself, yet, in case of his absence, and a conviction, in your own mind, that an expedition of the beforementioned description would not interfere, or impede his negotiations, you are to undertake it as if he were present.

THE CONTINENTAL TROOPS.

Additional expense of subsistence and rations to the continental troops, during the same period.
This expense arises from the contract; the price of the ration at fort Washington is stated at six and a half ninetieths of a dollar; but, from that post to the places of operation, the price will be sixteen-ninetieths,	4,146

One half of this sum may be necessary to be advanced immediately, to enable them to perform effectually the services required.

23d August, 1790.

I have submitted to the President of the United States, your letter of this date, and the papers therein referred to, containing the reasons on which you have founded the proposed operation against the Wabash Indians.

While the President regrets exceedingly the occasion, he approves the measures you have taken, for preventing those predatory incursions of the Wabash Indians, which, for a considerable period past, have been so calamitous to the frontiers lying along the Ohio.

The offers of peace, which have been made upon principles of justice and humanity, to the Wabash Indians, and refused, will fully justify the conduct of the United States in the operations which have been directed for the prevention of future murders and robberies.

It is the earnest desire of the President that the operation should be effectual, and produce in the Indians proper dispositions for peace. He therefore confides in your judgment and abilities, as being perfectly acquainted with the force of the Indians, the nature of the operation, and all the circumstances of the case, whether any further force shall be added to that already ordered. If, upon due deliberation, you should be of opinion that the force you have directed should be inadequate to the end proposed, and that an additional number of militia should be requisite, he consents to the measure, and hereby authorizes you for that purpose.

In this case, the additional number of militia should be taken from the frontier counties of Virginia, on account of their vicinity to fort Washington, the place of rendezvous.

And, if you should be of the judgment that two hundred of the militia should be mounted on horse-back, he also consents to such arrangement, under the regulations prescribed in my letter to Brigadier General Harmar, of the 7th day of last June.

It may not, however, be improper to observe, in all the arrangements for the expedition, that, while energy is the first principle to be observed, it must be blended with a just economy.

There are existing jealousies in the minds of the British officers, in Canada, of the designs of the United States respecting the posts to have been relinquished by the last peace. It will be a point, therefore, of delicacy, that you should take measures, by sending some officer or messenger, at a proper time, to assure the commanding officer of the real object of the expedition. That the Shawanese, and some others joined with them, have committed such enormous offences against the citizens of the United States, as are any longer insupportable; but, to assure him of the entire pacific disposition of the United States towards Great Britain and its possessions.

You will also find it, at some certain moment, highly proper to inform the Indians, with whom you have formed treaties, of your pacific dispositions towards them.

And it may also be proper, under certain circumstances of humiliation of the Indians, to conclude with them treaties of peace, provided it can be done on proper security of their good behavior, and consistently with the dignity and interest of the United States.

The President has directed me to observe, that many important circumstances concur to press, that the operation should commence immediately after the assembling of the militia; and as the main force will march from fort Washington, it is his opinion, as far as an opinion can be formed from the maps, that the march of the troops from that post, should commence two or three days previous to those from Post Vincennes.

The militia employed must be mustered previously to their march, and on their return before they are discharged, by a field officer of the continental troops, agreeably to your instructions from the President, dated the 5th of October, 1789, and to Brigadier General Harmar, dated the 7th of June last.

I have made an estimate for the object of the expedition, and transmitted it to the Secretary of the Treasury, and I have requested him to advance a sum of money to the contractors, in order to enable them to furnish the requisite supplies of provision and articles in the quartermaster's department.

I have also written to Mr. Hodgden, commissary of military stores in Philadelphia, to forward, immediately, by the way of Red Stone and Wheeling, two tons of best rifle and musket powder, four tons leaden bullets, cartridge-paper, case shot for 5½ inch howitzers, and for three and six pounders.

I have written to Lieutenant Ernest, at fort Pitt, directing him to repair to Red Stone, in order to receive said stores, and to have them transported down the Monongahela, by water, to fort Harmar, or to Wheeling, by land, and thence to fort Harmar, as he shall find most convenient.

AUGUST 24, 1790.

I now acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 15th of last month, by Governor St. Clair, who has stated to me the plan of the proposed expedition against the Indians, and the same has been submitted to the President of the United States, who has approved thereof.

My letter to the Governor, of yesterday, which he will communicate to you, contains some circumstances which may not be necessary to repeat.

The expedition you are about to undertake is not only of great importance in itself, but it may be attended with extensive and remote consequences. Every consideration, therefore, of a public nature, as well as personal to yourself, require that it should be conducted in the most perfect manner; that there should not be any omissions, but all just arrangements made to produce a due execution of every plan and order.

A knowledge of your enemy's strength, situation, and designs, must be essential to your success; you will, therefore, make the best arrangements for obtaining intelligence.

While, on the one hand, your movements and execution should be so rapid and decisive as to astonish your enemy, so, on the other, every possible precaution in the power of human foresight should be used to prevent surprise. To enter into the details of the measures you ought to take to effect the former, or prevent the latter, would be to attempt to preclude the exercise of your abilities. The President of the United States is impressed with the conviction that you are aware of the importance of your command, and that you will endeavor to make the best arrangements to ensure success, and particularly that you will avail yourself, on all occasions, of the mature experience and judgment of Governor St. Clair.

I have, agreeably to Major Doughty's report, directed Mr. Hodgden to forward two tons of the best rifle and musket powder, lead in proportion, cartridge paper, flints, and the medicines you wrote for, the capital articles of which are doubled.

I have transmitted you, by Governor St. Clair, one thousand dollars for contingent money, for which you will forward me triplicate receipts.

As it is probable that most of the militia may be armed with rifles, which are certainly not good arms in a close fight, it may, perhaps, be proper for you to attempt to persuade some of them to arm themselves with the spare muskets you have in store.

P. S. It will be necessary that you communicate the time of your setting out, the number of your command, the progress and termination of the expedition, and the various events proper for the President to know.

SEPTEMBER 2, 1790.

Governor St. Clair has, in person, laid before the President the plan of the proposed operation against the Wabash Indians, which has been approved.

It being the anxious desire of the President that the expedition should be effectual, and not require a repetition, all the arrangements are made to accomplish so desirable an end. For this purpose, Governor St. Clair has been further empowered to require, if necessary, an additional number of men. If, therefore, there are any measures necessary to be taken by your Excellency and the council, in order to facilitate an additional number of men, the President of the United States hopes they will be expedited with all possible despatch.

It has been suggested that the expedition may be liable to miscarriage, from a jealousy of the militia and regular troops. It is devoutly to be wished that such suggestions may be entirely unfounded. But, if jealousies should exist, it would be highly important that they should be entirely removed, or suspended during the season of activity. I shall write particularly on this point to Governor St. Clair and to Brigadier General Harmar, to adopt the most conciliatory conduct.

It has also been mentioned as a circumstance of considerable importance to the success of the expedition, that Colonels Logan and Shelby should be induced to accompany the militia on the expedition, even as volunteers, great confidence being placed in the characters of these gentlemen. Could your Excellency, therefore, influence those gentlemen to go forth on this occasion, it would be highly acceptable, and might tend greatly to the accomplishment of the public good. The expense of the expedition will be great, and if it should fail by any circumstances whatever, the public injury and disappointment will be in proportion.

It is thought proper, for particular and political reasons, to give the expedition the appearance of being levelled only at the Shawanese.

SEPTEMBER 3, 1790.

Your friend, Colonel Samuel Smith, has been here, and has made such arrangements with the Secretary of the Treasury, respecting advances, as are entirely satisfactory to him. You will, therefore, not find yourselves any ways restrained in your preparations for want of pecuniary assistance.

I am persuaded that you will endeavor, by every possible exertion, to make adequate preparations, both in the commissary and quartermaster's line, for the proposed expedition.

On your making adequate and seasonable supplies, the whole success of the expedition may depend. You will see, therefore, the urgent necessity of every thing being in perfect readiness.

The Secretary of War to Governor St. Clair.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1790.

I have not been unmindful of the suggestion you made at the moment of your departure from this city, relative to the establishment of a post at the Miami village, in the event of the proposed expedition's succeeding in a certain degree. I have had a full communication on the subject with the President of the United States, to whom you had previously made the same suggestion, and the following ideas are the result thereof, and will serve for the direction of yourself and Brigadier General Harmar on the occasion.

In contemplating the establishment of military posts northwest of the Ohio, to answer the purposes of awing the Indians residing on the Wabash, the west end of Lake Erie, St. Joseph's, and the Illinois, as much as Indians can be awed by posts, and at the same time exhibiting a respectable appearance to the British troops at Detroit and Niagara, the Miami village presents itself as superior to any other position, excepting the actual possession of the posts on the lakes, which ought to have been given up conformable to the treaty of peace. This opinion was given to me by the President in the year 1789, and has several times been held forth by me to Brigadier General Harmar.

But, at the same time, it must be acknowledged that the measure would involve a much larger military establishment, than, perhaps, the value of the object, or the dispositions of the United States would justify, and that it would be so opposed to the inclinations of the Indians generally, even with the tribes with whom we have made treaties, as to bring on inevitably an Indian war of some duration. In addition to which, it may be supposed that the British garrisons would find themselves so uneasy with such a force impending over them, as not only to occasion a considerable reinforcement of their upper posts, but to occasion their fomenting, secretly at least, the opposition of the Indians.

The proposed expedition is intended to exhibit to the Wabash Indians our power to punish them for their hostile depredations, for their conniving at the depredations of others, and for their refusing to treat with the United States when invited thereto. This power will be demonstrated by a sudden stroke, by which their towns and crops may be destroyed. The principal means used will be the militia.

Let us suppose the expedition to be successful, as I pray God it may, and let us estimate the force which would be fully required for establishing a post at the Miami Village.

From the mode of Indian fighting, it will not be reasonable to conclude their force will be greatly reduced in the skirmishes they may have with Brigadier General Harmar, or Major Hamtramck. If, therefore, eleven hundred warriors, according to your judgment, delivered to me, could be brought into activity from the Wabash and its vicinity, to which may be added a much greater number, if we should suppose that the Wyandot, Delaware, St. Joseph's, and Illinois Indians should be combined with them, the post to be established ought not to have a less garrison than 750 men; were it inferior to this number, it would always be liable to be invested and to have its supplies cut off, even when arrived in its vicinity. Whether the posts of communication essentially necessary to the existence of the Miami post, should be up the Wabash, up the Miami of the Ohio, or the Miami of lake Erie, they would require at different places, at least 500 men.

To establish the post in the first instance, so as to render it superior to the Indian force in the neighborhood, would require all the troops employed in the expedition, to wit, 2,000: for if a sudden stroke, by which the attention and force of the Indians should be divided, would require that number, the notoriety of establishing a post and erecting fortifications at the Miami village, in the heart of the Indian country, would require the same or a superior number; as the Indians would then have one object of their attention and exertion.

To complete the works at the post, and the essential communications to it, would probably require two months. Would the militia stay for that period? If so, would part of them remain in garrison afterwards, for six months? for the four hundred continental troops to be employed on the expedition, would be utterly inadequate for all the services required.

Besides, the post could not be established, unless it had a number of pieces of cannon, and a proper quantity of stores, and also three months' provision in the first instance. The transportation of these articles, would require considerable time and a great apparatus.

It might be added, further, that, although the establishment of a strong post, at the Miami Village, would awe the Indians, yet experience has demonstrated that posts will not prevent the depredations of small parties against the frontiers.

To render the measure entirely effectual, and at the same time to guard the public lands from intrusion, the regular force to be employed, northwest of the Ohio, ought to be increased to 1,800 men. This establishment would not be compatible either with the public views or the public finances, unless it should result from mere necessity; a due consideration, therefore, of these several circumstances, renders the measure at this period inexpedient, and, therefore, not to be undertaken.

The expedition will either incline the Indians to treat of peace, or it will induce them to wage open war in the ensuing spring. A further time is also required, to know the intentions of the British court, respecting the delivery of Niagara and Detroit. The decision of this point has an intimate connexion with the peace of the frontiers.

The ultimate determination of Government must, therefore, depend on the result of the arrangements which have been directed and which are in operation. It would not be wise to direct a measure which would give a wrong bias to affairs.

The President will be exceedingly desirous to learn the measures taken by yourself and Brigadier General Harmar, from time to time, and above all, he is exceedingly anxious that every arrangement should be made to render the proposed expedition entirely effectual.

14th September, 1790.

The expense of the proposed expedition will be great; but, I have that confidence in your economical arrangements, that you will not order more pack-horses than shall be absolutely necessary, consistent with efficacy. The pack-horses for provisions, will be at the contractor's expense. It is true they will have an additional price for the rations; but, as you will not take tents, and, in all other respects, will be unincumbered, and as light as possible, I do not conceive that you will want pack-horses for other objects than your provisions. I have written to the Governor by this conveyance, respecting the Miami village, which will be considered as a joint letter. The President of the United States will be anxious to hear of the arrangements and success.

Since the departure of Governor St. Clair, I have been informed, that there may be an aversion in the minds of the militia to act with the regular troops. If this should really be the case, and any jealousies should arise, to impede the success of the expedition, it would indeed be an unfortunate circumstance. Every precaution therefore should be taken by the Governor and yourself, either to remove such dispositions, if existing, or to prevent them arising among the militia.

It has been suggested, that, could Colonels Logan and Shelby, of Kentucky, be induced to accompany the expedition as volunteers, they would have a powerful influence over the conduct of the militia. I therefore submit the idea, that the Governor and you invite those characters to accompany you in the expedition, and that you treat them with the greatest cordiality.

To Governor St. Clair, or Brigadier General Harmar.

WAR OFFICE, March 3, 1790.

SIR:

In pursuance of powers vested in the President of the United States, by the act of Congress, passed the 29th day of September, 1789, he authorized you, by his instructions, dated the 6th of October following, in certain cases, and in the proportions therein specified, to call forth the militia of Virginia and Pennsylvania, for the protection of the frontiers against the depredations of the Indians.

Since transmitting you the aforesaid instructions, he has received several applications for protection, from the inhabitants of the frontier counties of Virginia, lying along the south side of the Ohio. These applications are founded on the depredations of small parties of Indians during the last year, who, it seems, have murdered many of the unguarded inhabitants, stolen their horses, and burned their houses.

Until the last year, an arrangement of the following nature existed at the expense of Virginia. The lieutenants of the exposed counties, under certain restrictions, were permitted to call forth a number of active men as patrols or scouts, as they are generally termed, and parties of rangers; but the government of that State thought proper to discontinue that arrangement on the organization of the General Government, to which the inhabitants of the said counties now apply for protection.

All applications of this nature have been placed before the Congress for their information, and in order that they may adopt such measures as the case may require. But as the season is fast approaching in which the inhabitants are apprehensive of a repetition of the injuries suffered the last year, they seem to be of an opinion, that their situation requires some conditional security, previously to the measures which may result from the deliberations of Congress.

The President of the United States has, therefore, so far conformed to their apprehensions on this point, as to refer the case to you, or in your absence to Brigadier General Harmar, and to give you the authority herein described.

1st. That if, from good and sufficient information, it should be your judgment, or, in your absence, the judgment of the commanding officer aforesaid, that any of the frontier counties of Virginia, lying along the south of the Ohio, are, under existing circumstances, threatened immediately with incursive parties of Indians, that you or the said commanding officer, under your hands and seals, empower the lieutenants of such exposed counties to call forth a particular number of scouts, in proportion to the danger of the said counties, not, however, exceeding, for one county, the number of eight men. The said scouts to be continued in service no longer than the danger shall exist, according to the judgment of the county lieutenants.

2d. That, when the said service shall be performed, the following evidence thereof shall be required:

1st. A return of the names, ages, and residence, of the said scouts.

2d. An abstract of the pay of the said scouts, specifying the exact days in which they were so employed. The pay to be regulated by the lowest price in the respective counties in which the service may be performed; and on this point, you and the commanding officer will be particularly accurate. I have been informed, that 5s. Virginia currency per day, has been given to each of the scouts. If this high price has been given, it must form the excess to be given on the part of the United States.

3d. An account of rations, each ration being stated at not a higher rate than 6d. per ration.

4th. All these papers might be signed and certified on oath by the county lieutenants, or commanding officer of each county, and transmitted to Brigadier General Harmar, in order to be delivered to the paymaster of his regiment, who will have the accounts passed, and draw the money for the same. The money so drawn, to be paid by him to the county lieutenants, who must produce to him the receipts of the individuals for whom the money was so drawn.

The commanding officer will also issue a reasonable quantity of powder and ball, for the said scouts, to the county lieutenants.

It is, however, to be strongly remarked, that all measures of this nature are uncertain, opposed to the principles of regularity, and to be adopted only in cases of exigence, and to cease the moment the said exigencies shall cease. That, therefore, you, or the commanding officer aforesaid, will not confer the authority herein contained, but in cases of the most conspicuous necessity; and that, when such cases do arise, that you or he transmit to this office, a particular detail of the evidences whereon you have formed your judgment. H. K.

To the Lieutenants of the counties of Harrison, Randolph, Ohio, Monongalia, and Kenhawa; and also to the Lieutenant of Russell county, April 29th, 1790.

WAR OFFICE, April 13, 1790.

SIR:

The President of the United States, on the 3d of last month, directed me to authorize the Governor of the Western territory, or, in his absence, the commanding officer of the troops, in certain cases, to empower the lieutenants of the counties lying along the Ohio to call forth, for the protection of said counties, certain patrols, denominated scouts, at the expense of the United States. Colonel Duval, lieutenant of Harrison county, was charged with these orders to the Governor, or Brigadier General Harmar, and from the particular interest he took in the affair, no doubt can remain, but that he exerted himself to have the said orders carried into full effect.

But, as it is possible that some delays may have been occasioned, by your distance or other circumstances, and as the President of the United States is exceedingly desirous that the exposed counties may avail themselves of the provision intended in said orders, he has directed me to write to the lieutenants of the counties of Harrison, Randolph, Ohio, Monongalia, and Kenhawa, in Virginia, and in case their situation required the benefit of the said provision, that they should be empowered for that purpose.

Therefore, sir, I do, in the name of the President of the United States, hereby authorize and empower you, if in your judgment the appearances of danger are such as to require the measure, to call forth the scouts herein mentioned, and under the regulations described.* H. K.

To Harry Innes, Esq. District Judge of Kentucky.

WAR OFFICE, April 13, 1790.

SIR:

By some recent information from the Ohio, it appears that the Indians still continue their depredations on the frontiers.

A general arrangement relative to the frontiers has been contemplated, but, not having been finally concluded upon by Congress, and the season of activity approaching, the President of the United States was induced, from the particular situation of the counties lying along the Ohio, to direct, on the 3d of last March, that the Governor of the Western territory, or, in his absence, Brigadier General Harmar, should be invested with a conditional authority, of which the enclosed is a copy.

These orders were transmitted by Colonel Duval, lieutenant of Harrison county, who would undoubtedly, as he was much interested in the business, convey expeditiously the same to the commanding officer.

But, as it is possible, notwithstanding, that some delays may have taken place, and as the President of the United States is exceedingly desirous that the inhabitants of the frontier counties should experience the benefits of the provision contained in the said orders to the commanding officer, he has directed me to make this communication to you; and he has further directed me to empower you, that, in case any of the counties of Kentucky should not have already availed themselves of said provision, and should, in your judgment, stand in need thereof, that you should, under your hand and seal, authorize the lieutenants of such counties to call forth the scouts, precisely as to the numbers and under the regulations directed in the instructions to the Governor of the Western territory, or, in his absence, the commanding officer of the troops.

The information of the wages paid for the scouts, was given by Colonel Duval. It exceeds greatly all calculations of pay to be given persons for performing military service, and, were it carried to a considerable extent, no government on earth could support it.

But as this measure is regarded merely as a temporary expedient until further measures are taken, the President of the United States consents to the usual sums being given, which hitherto have been given by Virginia for the same services; at the same time, he reposes entire confidence in your character, that you will (if arrangements should not have been made by the commanding officer) guard in this respect the interests of the United States.

It is the opinion of some gentlemen, well acquainted with Kentucky, that four scouts, or men, to each county, would be satisfactory. If this should also be your judgment, you will limit the arrangement to that number, or at least to the usual number heretofore employed. But as the information was different from that whereon the instructions to the Governor and commanding officer of the 3d of March were founded, it has been concluded best to make no alteration in that discretionary arrangement.

H. K.

Copy of a letter written by the Secretary of War to the Lieutenants of the counties of Washington, in Pennsylvania, Harrison, Randolph, Ohio, Monongalia, and Kenhawa, in Virginia, Mason, Bourbon, Woodford, Madison, Lincoln, Mercer, Nelson, and Jefferson, in Kentucky.

WAR OFFICE, July 17, 1790.

SIR:

I had the honor, on the 13th day of April last, to address you on the subject of the incursions of small parties of Indians on the western frontiers. In that letter I authorized you, in the name of the President of the United States, in certain cases of imminent danger, to call out, for the protection of the county, certain species of patrols, denominated scouts, at the expense of the United States.

I have now the honor, by the direction of the President of the United States, to inform you, that the authority contained in said letter relative to said scouts, is to be considered as having ceased and terminated upon your receiving this letter, duplicates of which I have written and transmitted to you.

The representations of the then deplorable situation of the frontier counties, and the high estimation the said scouts were held in by the inhabitants, were the inducements of the President of the United States to consent to calling forth that expensive species of militia as a temporary measure for the protection of the exposed counties.

But, as experience has demonstrated the inefficiency of defensive measures for an extensive frontier, against straggling parties of Indians, and as conditional orders have been transmitted to the Governor of the Western territory and the commanding officer of the troops of the United States, to act offensively against the Shawanese and out-cast Cherokees joined with them, inhabiting northwest' of the Ohio, who are probably the banditti which has for some time past committed depredations on the counties lying along the Ohio; and as the militia or rangers hereafter described will, in cases of necessity, be permitted, at the expense of the Union, in lieu of the scouts, it is presumed that no injury will be sustained by revoking the authority for calling into service so expensive a species of troops as the said scouts.

The President of the United States is anxiously desirous of effectually protecting the frontiers, and he will take all such reasonable measures as, in his judgment, the case may require, and for which he shall be, by the constitution or by the laws, authorized.

He has, therefore, directed me to inform you, that, in addition to the general measures aforesaid, which have been ordered, he has empowered the Governor of the Western territory and Brigadier General Harmar, or either of them, to make the arrangement hereafter described for the internal security of the exposed counties.

The said Governor and commanding officer, or either of them, will, under their hands and seals, empower the lieutenants of such counties lying along the Ohio, as they shall judge necessary, to call forth the number of militia or rangers hereafter mentioned, and under the regulations prescribed.

1st. The said militia, or rangers, shall not exceed, for the internal defence of any county, one subaltern, one sergeant, one corporal, and twelve privates, but such less number may be ordered as the said Governor and commanding officer, or county lieutenant, may judge requisite.

2d. The said militia, or rangers, shall, during the time of their actual service, receive the following rates of pay, which are the same as is by law established for the regular troops of the United States and the militia, viz:

Lieutenant, twenty-two dollars	} per month.
Ensign, eighteen dollars
Sergeant, five dollars
Corporal, four dollars
Privates, three dollars

3d. The said rangers shall be furnished with rations, in such manner as the lieutenants of the county shall think proper. The United States will allow for each ration sixpence, Virginia currency, or eight and one-third hundredth parts of a dollar; the subaltern to have two, and the non-commissioned and privates one ration each.

4th. The lieutenant of each county will be responsible, on oath, that the said rangers shall be called into service only in cases of imminent danger, and that they be discharged as soon as the danger shall cease.

That, when any service shall have been performed by said rangers, the following evidence thereof will be required:

1st. A return of the names, rank, ages, residence, and times of service, of each of the said rangers.

2d. A pay abstract, or account of the number of said rangers, agreeably to the aforesaid returns.

3d. An abstract of the rations, agreeably to the aforesaid return.

4th. These papers to be signed and verified, upon oath, by the lieutenant of the county, or commanding officer of the militia, who will transmit the same to Brigadier General Harmar, or the commanding officer of the troops of the United States on the Ohio.

5th. Brigadier General Harmar, or the commanding officer of the troops, will certify on the said return, that the said rangers were ordered into service in pursuance of his authority, or the authority of the Governor of the Western territory.

6th. The paymaster of the regiment of regular troops will receive the amount of the said abstracts from the treasury or pay office of the United States, and pay the same to the county lieutenants, and the said county lieutenants will pay each of the rangers, respectively, taking triplicate receipts for the payments, two of which he must transmit to the paymaster aforesaid, within two months from the time he shall have received the money from the said paymaster; and, until these said receipts shall be transmitted to the said paymaster, the lieutenants of the counties will be held responsible for the sums they may have received, or such proportions thereof for which they shall not have produced receipts from the individual rangers (or their attorneys) who performed the service.

And whereas some of the counties may be involved in such immediate danger as not to permit the county lieutenants sufficient time to obtain the authority herein mentioned from the said Governor or commanding officer, in such case the county lieutenants may order out the rangers herein mentioned, under the regulations prescribed, on condition that, as soon as may be, the said lieutenants of the county and two magistrates make a statement to the said Governor and commanding officer of the reasons which induced them to order out the said rangers.

This statement will be considered as essential, in order that General Harmar, or the commanding officer, may ground thereon his certificate on the pay abstracts, without which, payments will not be made.

It may perhaps be considered as unnecessary, after stating the vouchers before mentioned, to add any further precautions against unnecessarily calling out the rangers before described, but, as the said service is at best only to be viewed as an expedient, rather temporary and desultory, than permanent and regular, it is the earnest desire of the President of the United States that it should be conducted with the highest economy. He therefore has desired that the county lieutenants may be strongly impressed with this idea, as well from a personal regard to themselves as to the common welfare of the Western country and the United States.

If the permission now given be used with great discretion, and only in cases of real necessity, every consideration will, in future, justify a more extensive and perfect protection, should the situation of the frontier require the same.

I shall beg, that, immediately upon your receiving this letter, you will inform me thereof.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

H. KNOX,

Secretary for the Department of War.

NORTH WESTERN INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 14, 1790.

and of the House of Representatives:

Having informed Congress of the expedition which had been directed against certain Indians, northwest of the Ohio, I embrace the earliest opportunity of laying before you the official communications which have been received upon that subject.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 14th, 1790.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 14th, 1790.

SIR:

Lieutenant Denny arrived last evening from fort Washington, on the Ohio, charged with letters from Governor St. Clair and Brigadier General Harmar, copies of which I have the honor herewith to submit, and also extracts from the orders issued during the late expedition; also a return of the killed and wounded.

Lieutenant Denny reports verbally, that, after he left fort Washington, he saw, in Kentucky, several men of the militia of that district, who had been out with Major Whitly, under Major Hamtramck, of the federal troops, who commanded a separate expedition.

The said militiamen informed Lieutenant Denny, that Major Hamtramck had destroyed several of the hostile Indian towns, on the Wabash, and had returned to his garrison, at Post Vincennes, without having met any opposition.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

Governor St. Clair to the Secretary of War.

FORT WASHINGTON, November 6th, 1790.

SIR:

On the 29th of last month, I had the honor to inform you generally of the success that attended General Harmar. I could not then give you the particulars, as the General's letters had not reached me; (the officer however who had them in charge got in a few days afterwards) it is not now necessary, because he writes himself. One thing, however, is certain, that the savages have got a most terrible stroke, of which nothing can be a greater proof than that they have not attempted to harass the army on its return. They arrived at this place on the 3d instant, in good health and spirits. There is not yet any account from Major Hamtramck; I trust he also has been successful; but this I think is certain, that no great misfortune can have happened to him: for in that case we should certainly have heard of it.

Mr. Denny, the gentleman who takes General Harmar's despatches, I beg leave to mention to you in a particular manner; and if you will be pleased to do so to the President in his favor, you may be assured he will not disappoint any expectations that may be formed. He has every quality that I could wish a young man to possess, that meant to make the army his profession. There are, however, some traits in his character as a man, that are not generally known, that would endear him. Out of the little pittance he receives, he has maintained two aged parents for a long time.

HEAD QUARTERS, FORT WASHINGTON, November 4th, 1790.

SIR:

I have the honor to inform you, that, on the 30th September, I marched with 320 federal troops, and 1,133 militia, total 1,453. After encountering a few difficulties, we gained the Miami village. It was abandoned before we entered it, which I was very sorry for. The villainous traders would have been a principal object of attention. I beg leave to refer you to my orders, which are enclosed. The substance of the work is this, our loss was heavy, but the head quarters of iniquity were broken up. At a moderate computation, not less than 100 or 120 warriors were slain, and 300 log-houses and wigwams burned. Our loss about 180. The remainder of the Indians will be ill off for sustenance; 20,000 bushels of corn, in the ears, were consumed, burned, and destroyed, by the army, with vegetables in abundance. The loss of Major Wyllys and Lieutenant Frothingham, of the Federal troops, and a number of valuable militia officers, I sincerely lament.

The bearer, Lieut. Denny, is my adjutant. It will afford me great satisfaction to know that some mark of honor will be shown to him. His long and faithful services merit it. There is a vast deal of business in this Western world. If there is no impropriety in giving me an aid-de-camp, I wish him to be the person.

In my next despatches I shall enter into the minutiae of business, and give you a particular description of each day's march, with all the occurrences and observations.

N. B. My adjutant is really and truly an officer.

EXTRACTS FROM THE ORDERS.

NOTE. The orders issued previously to the march of the troops and militia from fort Washington, and until they arrived at the Miami village, relate to the arrangement of the troops, the order of march, of encampment, and of battle, and the discipline necessary to be observed, all of which are particularly detailed.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Camp at the Miami Village, about 170 miles from Fort Washington, October 17th, 1790.

The General is highly pleased with the zeal and alacrity shown by the army, (particularly the corps which was detached under the command of Colonel Hardin) to come up with the savages, although it was impracticable, as they had evacuated their favorite towns before the light corps could possibly reach them.

Leaving behind them such a vast quantity of corn and vegetables, is a certain sign that they decamped in the utmost consternation, and dare not face the enemy.

The army is to remain in its present position until further orders; in the mean time, Quartermaster Pratt is to have the corn brought in and deposited in one place, or in as many houses as he can find, and a guard is to be placed over it for its security. He will receive directions how it is to be distributed.

The superintendent of the horse department (Mr. Caldwell) is to be responsible that his pack saddles are repaired and put in as good order as possible, ready for the next movement of the army.

The General calls upon the commanding officers of battalions not to suffer their men to straggle from the encampment, otherwise they will certainly stand in danger of being scalped.

The guards are to be extremely vigilant; to which the field officer of the day is to pay the most pointed attention.

A detachment, under the command of Lieut. Col. Com. Trotter, consisting of

Federal troops,	-	-	-	-	-	30
Major Fontaine's light horse,	-	-	-	-	-	40
Active riflemen,	-	-	-	-	-	230
Total,	-	-	-	-	-	300, are to march tomorrow early.

Lieut. Col. Com. Trotter will receive his orders from the General.

JOS. HARMAR, Brig. General.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Camp at the Miami Village, October 18th, 1790.

The General is much mortified at the unsoldier-like behavior of many of the men in the army, who make it a practice to straggle from the camp in search of plunder. He, in the most positive terms, forbids this practice in future, and the guards will be answerable to prevent it. No party is to go beyond the line of sentinels without a commissioned officer, who, if of the militia, will apply to Colonel Hardin for his orders. The regular troops will apply to the General. All the plunder that may be hereafter collected, will be equally distributed amongst the army. The kettles, and every other article already taken, are to be collected by the commanding officers of battalions, and to be delivered to-morrow morning to Mr. Belli, the quartermaster, that a fair distribution may take place.

The rolls are to be called at troop and retreat beating, and every man absent is to be reported. The General expects that these orders will be pointedly attended to—they are to be read to the troops this evening.

The army is to march to-morrow morning early for their new encampment at Chillicothe, about two miles from hence.

JOS. HARMAR, Brig. General.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Camp at Chillicothe, one of the Shawanese towns, on the Omee river, October 20th, 1790.

The party under command of Captain Strong is ordered to burn and destroy every house and wigwam in this village, together with all the corn, &c. which he can collect.

A party of 100 men (militia) properly officered, under the command of Colonel Hardin, is to burn and destroy effectually, this afternoon, the Pickaway town, with all the corn, &c. which he can find in it and its vicinity.

The cause of the detachment being worsted yesterday, was entirely owing to the shameful cowardly conduct of the militia, who ran away, and threw down their arms, without firing scarcely a single gun. In returning to fort Washington, if any officer or men shall presume to quit their ranks, or not to march in the form that they are ordered, the General will, most assuredly, order the artillery to fire on them. He hopes the check they received yesterday will make them in future obedient to orders.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Camp at Chillicothe, October 21st, 1790.

The army having completely effected the object for which they were ordered, viz. a total destruction of the Maumee towns, as they are generally called, with the vast abundance of corn and vegetables, &c. in them, and their vicinity, are now to commence their march, and to return to fort Washington.

The General was in fond hopes that he should be able to break up the Wea towns on his return, but the weak state of the pack horses, and several other circumstances, conspire to render it impracticable at present.

The generale is to beat at nine, the assembly at half past nine, and the whole army to take up the line of march precisely at ten this morning.

It is not improbable but the savages will attempt to harass the army, on its return, particularly the rear and flanks; it is therefore incumbent upon every officer to attend to the duties of his station, and, by no means, to quit their ranks, or create the least confusion; but, on the contrary, to keep silence and good order, otherwise the artillery (agreeably to the orders of yesterday) shall certainly be ordered to fire upon such men as are so lost to every principle of honor, as to run away in the time of danger.

The cattle and pack horses are to be kept up in the most compact order, and the officer, commanding the rear battalion, is to be responsible with the field officer of the day, that these orders are strictly carried into execution. Such horses as Mr. Caldwell may absolutely stand in need of, are to be taken from the mounted militia, not attached to Major Fontaine's corps, for public service; if these should be found insufficient, the remainder must come from Major Fontaine's corps.

JOS. HARMAR,
Brig. General.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Camp, eight miles from the ruins of the Maumee Towns, on the return to Fort Washington, October 22, 1790. }

The army is to remain at the present encampment until further orders.

AFTER ORDERS.

The General is exceedingly pleased with the behavior of the militia in the action of this morning. They have laid very many of the enemy dead upon the spot. Although our loss is great, still it is inconsiderable in comparison of the slaughter made amongst the savages. Every account agrees that upwards of one hundred warriors fell in the battle; it is not more than man for man, and we can afford them two for one. The resolution, and firm determined conduct of the militia this morning, has effectually retrieved their character, in the opinion of the General. He now knows that they can and will fight.

The loss of Major Wyllis (with so many of the federal troops) and Major Fontaine, two gallant officers, he sincerely and deeply laments; but it is the fortune of war.

The General begs Col. Hardin, and Major McMillan, and Major Hall, of Lieutenant Colonel-commandant Trotter's regiment, together with the officers and privates of the militia, under their command, to accept his thanks for the bravery displayed by them upon this occasion.

The army is to march to-morrow morning at eight o'clock, precisely.

JOS. HARMAR,
Brigadier General.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Camp, about 24 miles from the ruins of the Maumee Towns, on the return to Fort Washington, October 23, 1790. }

The General did not know, in time last evening, of the good conduct of Brigade Major Ormsby, in rallying a party of the militia and firing upon the savages, whereby he destroyed several of them, otherwise he should then have returned him his thanks. He now begs him to accept them for his cool and gallant behavior at that time.

Although the enemy were so sorely galled, in the action of yesterday, they may still take it into their heads to hover about our encampment. The General, therefore, orders that the same vigilance and caution, which has hitherto taken place with the guards, must constantly be observed, to which the field officer of the day is to pay the strictest attention.

The wounded militia are all to be collected into one place. Dr. Allison and Dr. Carmichael are to attend them, dress them, and give every necessary direction concerning them.

The army is to march to-morrow morning, at eight o'clock, precisely.

JOS. HARMAR, Brigadier General.*

GENERAL ORDERS.

HEAD QUARTERS, FORT WASHINGTON, 4th November, 1790.

The Kentucky and Pennsylvania militia are to be mustered this afternoon, at 2 o'clock, by Captain Zeigler. The order and regularity which the militia observed on their return to the Ohio river, was highly commendable. Upon the whole, the General is exceedingly pleased with their conduct during the expedition. Notwithstanding our loss was great, yet, when they reflect that the army, in five weeks, not only effected the capital object of destroying the Miami village, and the Maumee towns, as they are generally called, with the vast quantity of corn and vegetables therein, but, also, killed upwards of one hundred of their warriors, it must afford every man the greatest satisfaction. The militia from Kentucky are to receive pay until the 10th instant; provisions are to be drawn for them until that time, and to-morrow morning they are to march to their respective homes.

The General returns his thanks to every officer and private for their good conduct, and hereby discharges them with honor and reputation. The wounded men are to be left under the care of Doctor Allison and his mates, who will take all possible care of them.

JOS. HARMAR, Brigadier General.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 24, 1791.

Gentlemen of the Senateand of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you a statement relative to the frontiers of the United States, which has been submitted to me by the Secretary for the Department of War.

I rely upon your wisdom to make such arrangements as may be essential for the preservation of good order, and the effectual protection of the frontiers.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 24, 1791.

The Secretary of War, to whom the President of the United States was pleased to refer a letter of his Excellency the Governor of Virginia, dated the 10th of December last, enclosing the joint memorial addressed to him, of the delegates of Ohio, Monongalia, Harrison, Randolph, Kenhawa, Greenbriar, Montgomery, and Russell counties, on the Ohio, reports:

That the said memorial states, that the said counties form a line of nearly four hundred miles along the Ohio; exposed to the hostile invasions of their Indian enemies, and destitute of every kind of support.

That, notwithstanding all the regulations of the General Government in that country, the memorialists have reason to lament that they have hitherto been ineffectual.

That the arrangements and regulations for their defence, as declared by the Secretary of War, are impossible to be complied with.

That the old experienced mode of keeping out scouts and rangers, for the information and protection of the inhabitants, is exploded, as the memorialists are informed, because the new plan is less expensive.

That there is reason to fear the defeat of the army on the frontiers will be severely felt, as there is no doubt but the Indians will, in their turn, flushed with victory, invade the settlements.

That the memorialists, therefore, for the reasons assigned, think the only measure which will establish the confidence of the frontier people in the Government, and also bring about the proposed end, to wit, their safety and protection, is to empower the county lieutenants, in each of those counties, to send out a few scouts to watch the passes of the enemy when the winter breaks up, and to place some rangers on the outside of the settlements.

That this arrangement be temporary, until more effectual measures are adopted for the protection of the country.

That the expense of the scouts and rangers be settled by the auditor of Virginia, and the Government debited with the amount thereof.

That, if the Executive Council of Virginia should not possess sufficient power to extend to the memorialists that relief which their necessities require, that the Governor would lay the complaints before the proper tribunal, where they may be redressed.

On the subject of this memorial, the Secretary of War observes, that, on the 26th of February, 1790, a report upon the subject of scouts, and an estimate thereof, was submitted to the President of the United States; who was pleased to lay the same before Congress; a copy of which, with the estimate, is herewith submitted, No. 1.

That, as the danger of some of the frontier counties was imminent, the President of the United States was pleased to permit a certain number of scouts to be called forth, under the regulations described in paper marked No. 2.*

That, as it did not appear to be the judgment of Congress to authorize the scouts upon any higher rate of pay than the militia, and as offensive measures were directed on the 7th of June, the President of the United States directed that the employment of the scouts should be discontinued, and, in lieu thereof, that the militia should be employed as rangers, under the regulations described in the paper herewith annexed, No. 3.*

It, however, appears, from the memorials, that the permission has been rendered nugatory by the regulations prescribed, and that the memorialists propose, in lieu of the former arrangement, that the county lieutenants should be invested with discretionary power, on the occasion, to call forth scouts and rangers.

It is to be observed, that no partial measures can be adopted by the Government. That any arrangement for the eight counties to which the memorialists belong, must also comprehend the county of Washington, in Pennsylvania, eight counties in Kentucky, the exposed parts of Cumberland settlements, and the settlements lying upon, and between, the Holston and French Broad rivers; making in all, districts or divisions equal to twenty-two counties.

That it is to be observed, that the scouts, so called, are the most active hunters or woodsmen, well acquainted with the paths by which Indians enter the country; that experience of their utility seems to have stamped an extraordinary value upon their services, in the opinion of the frontier people. They seem, however, from information, to have received an exceeding high pay, and greatly disproportioned to any known compensation for military services.

But, considering the confidence of the frontier people in the said scouts, the Secretary of War is inclined to the opinion, that it might be proper to indulge them therein; provided, their services could be obtained for a reasonable pay, and regulated in such manner as to prevent abuse. The pay allowed by Virginia was five-sixths of a dollar per day, for each person or scout, but no rations.

The Secretary of War is of opinion that pay, at the rate of ten or twelve dollars per month, and one ration per day, to be given for each person acting as a scout, would be as high a sum as ought to be given for any military service; that no greater number than six or eight should be allowed to any county, and, in no instance, a greater number than have heretofore been allowed by Virginia.

That, conformably to these ideas, the estimate is herewith submitted, No. 4, in order to show the greatest aggregate expense of this business.

That this measure be adopted only as a temporary expedient, and be continued no longer than the President of the United States shall judge necessary.

It ought, however, to be observed, that, while the pay of the troops is greatly reduced, and the pay of this species of militia greatly advanced, it may have the effect to prevent the recruiting of the regular troops, on the established pay, and to create discontents in the minds of those already in service on the frontiers. But it is conceived, that, although this objection may occur, yet, perhaps, it is not of sufficient importance to prevent the adoption of such reasonable measures as may conciliate and attach the people of the frontiers to the General Government.

If, therefore, it should be the judgment of the President of the United States, that it would be proper to adopt the scouts, it will be necessary to lay the subject before the Congress, for their consideration and approbation: for, if a species of troops are to be adopted at a higher rate of pay than the rate established by law, it will be necessary to make the provision for that purpose, by a special act.

The rangers are a species of militia, for which a higher rate of pay does not seem to be necessary.

All which is humbly submitted to the President of the United States.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 5th January, 1791.

WAR OFFICE, February 26th, 1790.

SIR:

In obedience to your order, I have received the communications of Colonel John Pierce Duvall, Lieutenant of Harrison county in Virginia, the result of which I have the honor to submit to you.

The paper No 1, is a representation from the field officers of the said county, on the subject of their exposed situation.

Colonel Duvall states, that there are five counties of Virginia, lying on the western waters, exposed to the incursions of the Indians; all of which are to the east of the Kentucky line, to wit: Monongalia, Ohio, Randolph, Harrison, Kenhawa.

That these counties have been permitted to keep out, for their own immediate protection, at the expense of Virginia, certain parties of scouts and rangers.

That, during the last year, the Governor of Virginia directed the said scouts and rangers to be discharged, in consequence of a letter from the President of the United States, a copy of which, with the letter from the said Governor, is herewith submitted, marked No. 2.

That, since the discharge of the said scouts and rangers, the said counties have suffered great injury from the Indians; and that Harrison county, in particular, has had fifteen persons killed, besides houses burnt and horses stolen.

That the object of the said Colonel Duvall is, that he should be permitted to call into service again, the said scouts and rangers, at the expense of the United States.

That the expense of the said scouts and rangers would, according to his information, for the ensuing season, and for Harrison county only, amount to three thousand four hundred and forty dollars, agreeably to the estimate herewith submitted, marked No. 3.

That this arrangement would give perfect satisfaction to the inhabitants of said county.

On this information, it may be observed, that an arrangement of this nature for one county, involves a similar arrangement, not only for the other four counties of Virginia, but for the nine counties of the district of Kentucky, all of which are exposed, in greater or less degree, as Harrison county.

That it would be proper, that this representation from Harrison county, together with the memorial of the representatives of the counties of the district of Kentucky, dated the 28th of November, 1789, requesting a post to be established at Great Bonelick, and the petition from the inhabitants of Miro settlement, dated the 30th of November, 1789, should be laid before the Congress, for their information, in addition to other papers of the same nature, which you were pleased to lay before them, on the 4th of January last.

No. 1.

An estimate of the expense of a guard of one captain and thirty rangers, and eight men, termed scouts, for the period of seven months, required by the Lieutenant of Harrison county, for the protection of the same, against the deprivations of parties of Indians—the estimate being formed from information given the subscriber by Colonel Duvall, the Lieutenant of said county.

40 rations, at 6d. per day,	£214
The pay of 1 captain for 7 months, at 35 dollars per month,	73 10
The pay of 2 sergeants for 7 months, at 6 dollars per month,	25 4
The pay of 28 privates for the same period, at 4½ dollars per month,	264 12
The pay of 8 scouts for 7 months, say 214 days, at 5s. 7d. per day,	428
Powder and lead furnished by Government, suppose	30
	£1,035 6, or $3,451.

If protection be given to the other four counties of Virginia, and the nine counties of the district of Kentucky, and the same be estimated on the above scale, the expense would amount to 48,314 dollars.

WAR OFFICE, February 26th, 1790.

The Secretary of War, to whom the President of the United States was pleased to refer a letter from his Excellency the Governor of Virginia, of the 4th instant, transmitting certain papers, stating the measures which the Legislature and Executive of Virginia have adopted, for the temporary defence of the western frontier of that State, reports:

That it appears, from the said papers, that, upon the 20th day of December last, the Legislature of Virginia authorized the Executive of said State to direct such temporary defensive operations in the frontier counties of said State, as would secure the citizens thereof from the hostile invasions of the Indian enemy.

That, at the same time, the said Legislature also requested the Executive to transmit to the President of the United States, the memorial from the representatives of the frontier counties, and communicate to him such defensive measures as they may think proper to direct, in consequence of the authority vested in them, for the sole purpose of affording defence to the frontier citizens, until the General Government can enter into full and effectual measures to accomplish the said object.

That the memorial of the representatives of the frontier counties alluded to by the said Legislature, was transmitted by the said Governor to the President of the United States, the 10th day of December last, and the same was reported upon, by the Secretary of War, the fifth instant.

That the measures directed by the Executive of Virginia, in consequence of the before recited power vested in them by the Legislature, are detailed in No. 2, and amount to ten lieutenants, ten ensigns, and five hundred and eighteen non-commissioned and privates, at the same rate of pay allowed by the law of the United States, besides a brigadier general, who shall be allowed the pay and rations of lieutenant colonel when in actual service.

That it does not appear, that any denomination of troops, termed scouts, at a higher rate of pay than the militia, have been ordered out by the Executive of Virginia.

That the expense of the said defensive system, for nine months, would, if the same should be necessary for so long a term, amount to thirty-six thousand seven hundred and forty-seven dollars and sixty cents, as per estimate herewith submitted, No. 5.

That the total of the estimate submitted on the 5th instant, amounts to thirty-eight thousand six hundred and sixty-nine dollars and forty cents. But, about four-twenty-second parts are to be deducted from the said estimate, for the county of Washington in Pennsylvania, and the districts, amounting to about three counties, for the settlements upon Cumberland and between the forks of Holston and French-broad. This would leave about eighteen parts of the said estimate for the expense of the counties of Virginia and the district of Kentucky, amounting to thirty-one thousand six hundred and thirty-eight dollars and sixty cents. Comparing, therefore, the expense of the plan suggested in the report of the 5th instant, with the system directed by the Executive of Virginia, the difference will be five thousand one hundred and nine dollars greater for the latter than the former plan.

But, in the plan suggested in the said report of the 5th instant, only the number of three hundred and fifty-four non-commissioned officers and privates were stated to be employed, besides commissioned officers. The number directed by Virginia, amounts to five hundred and eighteen non-commissioned officers and privates, besides the commissioned officers. The reason that the difference of the expense is not proportioned to the difference of numbers, is, that the species of militia termed scouts, are not ordered in the system directed by Virginia.

From this statement, the following questions arise:

1st. Is the exposed situation of the frontier counties of Virginia such as to require that they should be protected at the expense of the United States?

2d. If so, is the system, directed by the Executive of Virginia, of such a nature as to be confirmed by the General Government and ordered into execution at the expense of the United States?

3d. If not, shall a regular and efficient plan be devised for the same object, and put into execution at the expense of the United States?

On the first question, the Secretary of War is of opinion, that the existing circumstances relative to the Indian hostilities are such as to cause just apprehensions for the safety of the frontier settlers during the approaching season. That principles of sound policy, therefore, as well as of justice, require that the said settlers should be afforded all reasonable protection at the expense of the United States.

On the second question, the Secretary of War is of opinion, that, however proper the system of defence directed by the Executive of Virginia may have been, considering the circumstances under which it was ordered, yet, there are several well founded objections against its being confirmed by the General Government, and ordered into execution at the expense of the United States.

First—Because it is too uncertain as to any material effect to be produced thereby.

Secondly—Because it is destitute of those principles of unity and responsibility, essentially necessary to guard the public from abuse.

Thirdly—Because the detachments ordered out for the other counties besides Kentucky, are evidently designed for local service only, and not to be drawn into one body, however necessary the measure may be.

Fourthly—Because it is evident the Legislature of Virginia considered the arrangement which should be made by the Executive of the said State, as a temporary measure of affording defence to the frontiers, until the General Government could enter into full and effectual measures to accomplish the said object.

On the third question, the Secretary of War is of opinion, that the following plan for defence of the frontiers, in addition to the regular troops, would be the most proper for the ensuing season.

For the defence of the exposed counties of Virginia and Kentucky, and the Cumberland and Holston settlements, one regiment of rangers, to consist of one lieutenant colonel-commandant, two majors, ten captains, and fourteen subalterns, and seven hundred and thirty-eight non-commissioned and privates.

That these rangers be enlisted on the continental establishment of pay, rations, and clothing; to serve from the first day of March next, until the 30th of November, unless sooner discharged.

That a proportion of clothing, equal to the annual allowance to the federal troops, be issued to the said rangers.

That, if an expedition be formed against the Indian towns, the rangers raised for the counties of Virginia and Kentucky should be assembled for that purpose; that, in other cases, they should be employed in ranging the frontiers most liable to inroads.

That the expense of the said corps for nine months would amount to forty-nine thousand four hundred and fifty-four dollars, as per estimate herewith submitted. But the Secretary of War conceives the efficacy and service of said corps would amply compensate for the difference of expense between the same and the system directed by Virginia.

That the expense of defending the frontiers for the ensuing year, seems to be inevitable. But there is a choice in the manner of defence. The regular troops are inadequate to afford that extensive protection required from the county of Washington, in Pennsylvania, down the Ohio, to the settlements on the Cumberland river, and the other settlements in the southwestern territory of the United States. They must be assisted by auxiliaries, in order to defend the frontiers effectually.

The question seems to be reduced to one point: whether the defence shall be afforded in a regular efficient manner, with full proof of the service having been rendered, or whether it shall be performed in a manner less efficient, and neither regular or certain?

The Secretary of War submits the idea, that the whole business of the defensive protection afforded the frontiers, during the last year, by the General Government, the system directed by the Executive of Virginia, and the plan herein proposed, should be laid before the Congress of the United States for their information and decision.

The Secretary of War will, in another report, which he will shortly submit to the President of the United States, take the liberty of suggesting some observations respecting the issue of the late expedition against the Miami towns, and of the circumstances which may require another and more effectual expedition against the Wabash Indians. But, in case of another expedition, it is conceived that the defensive provision should be made: for, although, while the expedition will be in operation, the Indians will not probably make incursions, yet, their predatory parties may be expected on the frontiers both before and after the expedition.

All which is humbly submitted to the President of the United States.

Secretary of War.

COUNCIL CHAMBER, January 4th, 1791.

SIR:

In conformity to a resolution of the General Assembly of this State, herewith enclosed, I do myself the honor to transmit a memorial from the representatives of the frontier counties, and the proceedings of the Executive, respecting a temporary system of defence for the western frontier. I beg leave also to lay before you, copies of two other resolutions of the General Assembly, together with the petition of sundry officers of the Virginia line on continental establishment, on the subject of the bounty lands allotted to them on the northwest side of the Ohio.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, your obedient servant,

BEVERLEY RANDOLPH.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

No. 2.

IN COUNCIL, December 29th, 1790.

The Board resumed the consideration of a resolution of the General Assembly, authorizing the Executive to direct such temporary defensive operations in the frontier counties of this State, as will secure the citizens from the hostile invasions of the Indian enemy.

Whereupon, the Board are of opinion, that the best system of defence which can be established under the present circumstances, will be to order into service in the different western counties, a small number of men, proportioned to the degree in which they are respectively exposed.

That the officers commanding these parties be instructed constantly to range the frontiers most open to invasion, and either to alarm the inhabitants upon the approach of a large body of the enemy, or repel the incursions of predatory parties.

It is, therefore, advised, that a lieutenant, two sergeants, and forty rank and file, be allowed to the county of Harrison; an ensign, two sergeants, and thirty rank and file, to Monongalia; a lieutenant, an ensign, three sergeants, and fifty rank and file, to Ohio; a lieutenant, an ensign, three sergeants, and fifty rank and file, to Kenhawa; an ensign, two sergeants, and twenty rank and file, to Randolph; an ensign, three sergeants, and thirty-two rank and file, to Wythe; and a lieutenant, an ensign, three sergeants, and fifty rank and file, to Russell. The rangers to be ready for service by the first day of March next; to be stationed at such places as in the opinion of the commanding officer of each county, respectively, shall be most convenient, to enable them, by ranging the frontiers, to give effectual protection.

That the commanding officers of the several counties be directed to procure, by voluntary engagements, the complement of men allowed for the defence of their counties, respectively; but, should they be unable to obtain the required number by this means, that they detach them, with the necessary officers, by detail and rotation of duty, agreeable to the act to amend and reduce into one act, the several laws for regulating and disciplining the militia, and guarding against invasions and insurrections.

That, for the defence of Kentucky, it is advised, that a brigadier general be appointed to command the whole militia of the district, who shall be allowed the pay and rations of a lieutenant colonel when in actual service.

That the said brigadier general do immediately endeavor to procure, by voluntary engagements, two hundred and twenty-six men, to range the most exposed parts of the frontiers of the district, to be so stationed as will, in his judgment, afford the best protection to the inhabitants; but, should he be unable to obtain the required number by voluntary engagements, that he direct the commanding officer of the respective counties composing the district, to detach their just proportion, with the necessary officers, by detail and rotation of duty, agreeable to the militia law, to be ready for service by the first day of March next.

That, in the execution of this business, he be not considered as in actual service, nor have authority to appoint the staff and other officers allowed by law, but shall be reimbursed all such reasonable expenses as he may necessarily incur.

That the said rangers be furnished with rations in such manner as the brigadier general of Kentucky, and the officers commanding the several counties without that district shall think proper; six pence to be allowed for each ration; a subaltern to be allowed two, and the non-commissioned and privates one ration, each. The pay and rations of both officers and privates to be the same as is allowed by law to the continental troops.

That the following evidence of the service of the rangers be required:

1st. A return of the names, rank, and time of service, of each of the said rangers.

2d. A pay abstract or account for the number of said rangers, agreeable to the aforesaid return; these papers to be verified by the oath of the officers commanding the several detachments, and by the signature of the brigadier general in Kentucky, or by that of the commanding officers of the several counties without that district.

3d. An abstract of the rations agreeably to the aforesaid return, to be signed by the officer receiving them, and countersigned by the brigadier general in Kentucky, or by the commanding officers of the several counties without that district.

And it is further advised, that Charles Scott, Esquire, be appointed brigadier general of Kentucky.

All which matters, so advised, the Governor orders accordingly.

The joint memorial of the Delegates of Ohio, Monongalia, Harrison, Randolph, Kenhawa, Greenbriar, Montgomery, and Russell counties, humbly represents:

That the defenceless condition of those counties, forming a line of nearly four hundred miles along the Ohio river, exposed to the hostile invasions of their Indian enemies, destitute of every kind of support, is truly alarming; for, notwithstanding all the regulations of the General Government in that country, we have reason to lament that they have been hitherto ineffectual for our protection; nor, indeed, could it happen otherwise: for the garrisons kept by the continental troops on the Ohio river, if they are of any use, it must be to the Kentucky settlements, as they immediately cover that country; to us they can be of no service, being from two to four hundred miles below our frontier settlements.

We further beg leave to represent, that, agreeably to the last arrangement for our defence, as declared by the Secretary of War, a subaltern officer, a sergeant, a corporal, and twelve privates, were allotted to some of the above mentioned counties, for their defence, and them only to be continued in service when the continental commanding officer in the Western country may approve of it, they at the same time to be under such regulations as it is impossible for the inhabitants of our country to comply with, the communication betwixt him and us being cut off by a distance of two to four hundred miles, and that through an uninhabited country, exposed to the Indians, having entirely exploded our old experienced mode of defending our frontiers, by keeping out scouts and rangers for their information and protection, owing, as we are informed, that it is supposed that the new plan is less expensive; but surely, if our operations must be on the defensive, a small saving (for a small saving it must be) ought not to be deemed a good reason to alter from a known measure to one that is only supposed to be as good, when the lives of so many of your citizens are exposed to the enemy. We further beg leave to observe, that we have reason to fear that the consequences of the defeat of our army by the Indians on the late expedition, will be severely felt on our frontiers, as there is no doubt but that the Indians will, in their turn, (being flushed with victory) invade our settlements, and exercise all their horrid murder upon the inhabitants thereof, whenever the weather will permit them to travel. Then is it not better to support us where we are, be the expense what it may, than to oblige such a number of your brave citizens, who have so long supported, and still continue to support, a dangerous frontier, (although thousands of their relatives in the flesh have, in the prosecution thereof, fallen a sacrifice to savage inventions) to quit the country, after all they have done and suffered, when you know that a frontier must be supported somewhere?

Permit us, therefore, to assure you, that we think the only measure that will establish the confidence of your frontier people in the Government, and also be the means of bringing about the end proposed, to wit: their safety and protection, will be to empower the county lieutenants in each of those counties to send out a few scouts to watch the passes of the enemy, and when the winter breaks up, to place some rangers on the outside of the settlements. This we mean only as a temporary matter, to continue until more effectual measures are adopted for the protection of that country, the expense of which scouts and rangers, to be settled with your auditor, and paid by Virginia, and the General Government to be debited with the amount thereof, for which the State of Virginia ought to be credited in her accounts with that Government. And we hope and trust that Congress will comply therewith, until they extend to us that protection that we, as citizens of Virginia, have a right to expect. And we further trust and hope that the State of Virginia will never quietly rest inactive until peace is restored to all her citizens, be their situation ever so remote. Under these impressions, we have taken the liberty to address you upon this subject, praying that, should not the Executive Council of Virginia possess power sufficient to extend to us that relief which our necessities require, you will, in that case, lay our complaints before the proper tribunal, where we may be redressed.

We have the honor to be, with great respect, &c.

H. KNOX,
Secretary of War.

WAR OFFICE, January 15, 1791.

The Secretary of War, to whom the President of the United States referred the consideration of various papers and information, relative to the frontiers of the United States, respectfully reports:

That the frontiers, from several causes, are, at present, so critically circumstanced, as to claim an immediate consideration, and such arrangements as may, upon investigation, be found indispensably necessary for the preservation of good order, and the protection of the inhabitants exposed to the hostilities of certain Indian tribes.

That, in order to obtain a clear view of the existing circumstances of the frontiers, the following summary statement is submitted; and, also, that a judgment may be formed of the measures necessary to be adopted on the occasion.

That, in the first place, it may be proper to explain the relative situation of the Government of the United States, with the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Cherokee nations of Indians. It will appear by the Journals of the late Congress, and the paper herewith submitted, Marked A, No. 1,* that the United States did, in November, 1785, and in January, 1786, form treaties with the Cherokee, Choctaw, and Chickasaw nations of Indians, by which their boundaries were defined.

That the State of Georgia claims the right of pre-emption to nearly all the lands belonging to the said Indian nations.

That it will appear by the act of Legislature of the said State, passed the 21st day of December, 1789, a copy of which is herewith submitted, marked A, No. 2, that the said Legislature has granted and sold to three private companies, its said right of pre-emption to almost the whole of the lands of the Choctaws and Chickasaws, and part of the Cherokees, amounting in all to 15,500,000 acres.

That, although the right of Georgia to the pre-emption of said lands should be admitted in its full extent, yet, it is conceived, that, should the said State, or any companies or persons, claiming under it, attempt to extinguish the Indian claims, unless authorized thereto by the United States, that the measure would be repugnant to the aforesaid treaties, to the constitution of the United States, and to the law regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes.

That the President of the United States, apprehensive that individuals belonging to said companies might, from ignorance, or otherwise, pursue a line of conduct derogatory to the United States, caused the said treaties, and the law to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, to be published on the 25th day of August, 1790, together with his proclamation, requiring all persons to govern themselves accordingly.

But, notwithstanding this warning, it appears, from the information contained in A, No. 3, that certain persons, claiming under the said companies, are raising troops for the purpose of establishing, by force, one or more settlements on the lands belonging to the aforesaid Indian nations.

The authority of the United States is thus set at defiance; their faith, pledged to the said Indians, and their constitution and laws, violated, and a general Indian war excited; on principles disgraceful to the Government.

But, there is another point of view in which this subject may be placed. It is said, the Spanish officers stationed on the Mississippi, alarmed at the proposed settlements, have decided to prevent them by force. Although the settlements should be made in opposition to the Government of the United States, yet, the interference of the Spaniards, would start a new subject of discussion, which merits some consideration.

Hence arises the following question: Is not the General Government bound, by the indispensable obligations of its own rights and dignity; by the principles of justice and good faith to the aforesaid Indian nations; by the principles of humanity, as it respects the innocent inhabitants of the frontiers, who may fall victims to an unjust Indian war; to interpose its arm, in an effectual manner, to prevent the intended settlements?

That, in the second place, the protection to be afforded the frontiers, during the ensuing year, requires an immediate arrangement.

That it is to be apprehended, the late expedition against the Miami Indians will not be attended with such consequences as to constrain the said Indians to sue for peace; but, on the contrary, that their own opinion of their success, and the number of trophies they possess, will, probably, not only encourage them to a continuance of hostilities, but may be the means of their obtaining considerable assistance from the neighboring tribes. In addition to which, they will, probably, receive all possible assistance in the power of certain malignant whites, who reside among them.

That it, therefore, appears, from the examination of this subject, to be incumbent on the United States to prepare immediately for another expedition against the Wabash Indians, with such a decided force as to impress them strongly with the power of the United States.

That the objects of the expedition will, in a considerable degree, regulate the nature and number of troops to be employed.

That, if the measure of establishing a strong fortification and garrison at the Miami village, should be decided upon as proper and necessary, a considerable increase of the regular force for that and the other objects mentioned in this report, would be requisite.

That a strong post and garrison, at the said Miami village, with proper subordinate posts of communication, have always been regarded as but little inferior to the possession of the post at Detroit. But, while there were existing hopes of obtaining the latter, it did not appear proper to incur the expense of an establishment at the former place. Those hopes, however, having vanished for the present, it seems to be a point of real importance to effect an establishment at the Miami village.

That a post established at the said place, as the consequence of a successful expedition, would curb and overawe not only the Wabash Indians, but the Ottawas and Chippewas, and all others who might be wavering, and disposed to join in the war. The said post would more effectually cover the line of frontier along the Ohio, than by a post at any other place whatever.

That it would, therefore, of consequence, afford more full security to the territory of the United States, north-west of the Ohio. In this point of view, it would assist in the reduction of the national debt, by holding out a security to people to purchase and settle the public lands. The purchasers of land from the Government will have a right of protection, and there will be no doubt of their claiming it forcibly.

The regular force, upon the frontiers, seems utterly inadequate for the essential purposes of the United States.

The frontiers, from the northeast to the southwest, are nearly enclosed by the possessions, garrisons, and claims of two formidable foreign nations, whose interests cannot entirely coincide with those of the United States.

Numerous Indian tribes reside in the vicinity, whose hostilities are easily excited by their jealousy of the encroaching settlements and rapid population of the frontiers.

Bold and unprincipled adventurers will arise, from time to time, who, in advancing their own schemes of avarice, or ambition, will be incessantly machinating against the public peace and prosperity.

These several circumstances, and the distance from the seat of Government, require that a wise and vigorous system should be adopted and executed, as well to protect effectually the inhabitants of the frontiers, as to curb the licentious, and prevent the evils of anarchy, and prevent the usurpation of the public lands.

But, besides these considerations, it would appear, from information, that the State of Georgia is desirous that more troops should be placed on its frontiers. There are at present three companies in Georgia, and another is raising there. Those four companies amount to one quarter part of the establishment.

The paper marked B, No. 1, will show the number and stations of the troops, at present in service, and the numbers wanting to complete the establishment of one thousand two hundred and sixteen non-commissioned officers and privates.

If the intended settlements upon the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Cherokee lands are to be effectually prevented, and the Government enabled to place troops upon the Tennessee, which would at once awe the Creeks, if turbulent, and thereby comply with the desires of Georgia, and prevent the projected settlement on the Muscle Shoals, and if an establishment should be made at the Miami village, it would require that the establishment should be augmented, so as to form a legionary corps of two thousand one hundred and twenty-eight non-commissioned officers and privates.

If this augmentation should take place, two modes present themselves, by which the object could be effected, both of which, and estimates thereon, are contained in the paper marked B, No. 2, the one amounting to 101,466 40 dollars, and the other to 98,542 40 dollars.

The question, which arises on this subject, is,

Whether the objects, proposed to be accomplished by the troops, will fully compensate for the additional expense?

The United States have come into existence, as a nation, embarrassed with a frontier of immense extent, which is attended with all the peculiar circumstances before enumerated and even with others, which are obvious, but which are unnecessary to recite.

The population of the lands lying on the Western waters is increasing rapidly. The inhabitants request and demand protection; if it be not granted, seeds of disgust will be sown; sentiments of separate interests will arise out of their local situation, which will be cherished, either by insidious, domestic, or foreign emissaries.

It therefore appears to be an important branch of the administration of the General Government, to afford the frontiers all reasonable protection, as well in their just rights as against their enemies; and, at the same time, it is essential to show all lawless adventurers that, notwithstanding the distance, Government possess the power of preserving peace and good order on the frontiers. It is true economy to regulate events instead of being regulated by them.

But, whether the regular establishment be increased or not, it seems indispensable that another expedition be made against the Wabash Indians. Affairs cannot remain where they are. Winter imposes peace for the present; but, unless the attention of the Indians be called to their own country, they will, upon the opening of the spring, spread general desolation on the frontiers by their small parties.

That the said Wabash Indians amount to about eleven hundred warriors; to this number may, perhaps, be added, of other more distant Indians, one thousand.

If this should be the case, the army, for the campaign, ought to consist of three thousand well arranged troops, in order to be superior to all opposition, and to prevent the trouble and expense of being repeated.

That the reports, herewith submitted, marked C, No. 1, will exhibit the species of defensive protection permitted, during the last year, by the General Government; the system directed by the Executive of Virginia, during the month of December, 1790; and the plan of a regiment of rangers, proposed to be raised on the frontiers, to answer the same purpose, and an estimate of the expense thereof.

That, in case the said plan of a regiment of rangers should be adopted, the same would furnish five hundred non-commissioned officers and privates for the proposed expedition.

That the other force, necessary to complete the number of three thousand, might be raised under the term levies, to serve for the expedition, which, it is presumed, would not exceed four months.

That, to induce the men to engage voluntarily for the said object, it is respectfully suggested, that it might be proper to appoint the best and most popular officers in Kentucky, and the frontier counties, to superior commands, with delegated authority to appoint their subordinate officers; and the idea is also submitted, how far a bounty of five dollars in money, or clothing, would be proper.

That the result, therefore, of the ideas suggested herein, and in the report marked C, No. 1, are,

1. That the situation of the frontiers requires an additional defensive protection, at least until offensive measures shall be put into operation. The plan of a regiment of rangers is therefore submitted.
2. That the peculiar situation of the frontiers requires the augmentation of one regiment of regular troops, to consist of nine hundred and twelve non-commissioned officers and privates.
3. That another expedition, which shall effectually dispose the Wabash, and other hostile Indians, to peace, seems indispensable.

That the army, for the said expedition, might be thus composed:

Regular troops , if the same should be augmented,	-	-	-	-	1,200
Rangers , if the same should be adopted,	-	-	-	-	500
Levies , so called for the sake of distinction,	-	-	-	-	1,300

But, if the regulars should not be augmented, nor the rangers adopted, then the number of levies ought to be proportionably increased.

That a corps of levies, raised for the expedition, whose officers should be selected by the General Government, and who should possess a pride of arrangement and discipline, would be more efficacious, and more economical, than draughting the militia, cannot be well questioned.

It is to be observed, that the engagements of four hundred and twenty of the troops, on the frontiers, expire during the present year; and that, by the last accounts, only sixty of that number had re-enlisted on the new establishment.

As the reduced pay of the late establishment has therefore discouraged the recruiting service, the idea is suggested, that a bounty of eight dollars should be given to all the recruits who have, or shall re-enlist for three years, on the said establishment. Were Congress to authorize this bounty, the subscriber is of opinion, that all the recruits required would be immediately obtained.

That the paper marked B, No. 3, contains an estimate of the expense of the proposed number of levies.

That the paper marked B, No. 4, contains in one view the extraordinary expense, which would be incurred by the rangers, levies, and other objects of the proposed expedition.

All which is humbly submitted.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

A, No. 2.

Whereas divers persons from the States of Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina, have made application for the purchase of certain tracts and parcels of land, lying and bordering on the Tennessee, Tom or Don Bigby, Yazoo, and Mississippi rivers, within this State, and have offered to engage to settle the same, a part of which territory has been already settled, on behalf of some of the applicants, under and by virtue of an act of the General Assembly of this State, bearing date the seventh of February, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, at Savannah, entitled "An act for laying out a district of land situated on the river Mississippi, within the limits of this State, into a county to be called Bourbon:" Now, therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Georgia, in General Assembly met, That all that tract or part of territory of this State, within the following limits, to wit: Beginning at the mouth of Cole's creek, on the Mississippi, continuing to the head spring or source thereof; from thence a due east course to the Tom or Don Bigby river; thence, continuing along the middle of the said river, up to the latitude thirty-three; thence down along the latitude thirty-three, bounding on the territory of the Virginia Yazoo company, a due west course to the middle of the Mississippi; thence, down the middle of the Mississippi, to the mouth of Cole's creek aforesaid; and containing about five millions of acres; shall be reserved as a pre-emption for the South Carolina Yazoo company, for two years, from and after the passing of this act; and if the said South Carolina Yazoo company shall, within the said term of two years, pay into the public treasury of this State the amount of sixty-six thousand nine hundred and sixty-four dollars, then it shall be lawful for the Governor, at the time being, and he is hereby empowered and directed, to sign and deliver a grant, in the usual form, to Alexander Moultrie, Isaac Huger, William Clay Snipes, and Thomas Washington, Esquires, and the rest of their associates, and to their heirs and assigns forever, in fee simple, as tenants in common, all the tract of land included in the aforesaid boundaries.

And be it further enacted, That all that tract or part of territory of this State, included within the following limits, that is to say; beginning at the mouth of Bear creek, on the south side of the Tennessee river, running thence, up the said creek, to the head or source; thence a due west course, to the Tom or Don Bigby, or Twenty-mile creek; thence down the same, to latitude thirty-three; thence, along the said latitude, bounding on the South Carolina Yazoo company's line a due west course, to the middle of the Mississippi; thence, up the said river in the middle thereof, to the northern boundary of this State; thence, along the said boundary line a due east course, to the Tennessee river; thence, up the middle of the said river, to the beginning thereof, and containing seven millions of acres; shall be reserved as a pre-emption for the Virginia Yazoo company, for the term of two years from and after the passing of this act; and if the said company shall cause to be paid into the public treasury of this State, within the said term of two years, the amount of ninety-three thousand seven hundred and forty-one dollars, then it shall be lawful for the Governor, at the time being, and he is hereby empowered and required, to sign and deliver, in the usual form, a grant of the aforesaid tract of land, to Patrick Henry, David Ross, William Cowan, Abraham B. Venable, John B. Scott, William Cock Ellis, Francis Watkins, and John Watts, Esquires, and the rest of their associates, and to their heirs and assigns forever, in fee simple, as tenants in common of all the tract of land included in the aforesaid boundaries.

And be it further enacted, That all that tract or part of the territory of this State, included within the limits following, to wit: Beginning at the mouth of Bear creek, on the south side of the Tennessee river, in the latitude of thirty-four degrees forty-three minutes; running thence, up Bear creek, to the head or source; thence a due west course, to the Tom Bigby, or Twenty-mile creek; thence, down the said Bigby, or Twenty mile-creek, to the latitude thirty-four degrees; thence, a due east course one hundred and twenty miles; thence, a due north course, to the northern boundary line of this State; thence, a due west course, along the northern boundary line, to the great Tennessee river; thence, up the middle of the said river Tennessee, to the place of beginning, and containing three millions and a half acres; shall be reserved as a pre-emption for the Tennessee company, for the term of two years, from and after the passing this act; and if the said company shall cause to be paid into the public treasury of this State, within the said term of two years, the amount of forty-six thousand eight hundred and seventy-five dollars, then it shall be lawful for the Governor, for the time being, and he is hereby empowered and required, to sign and deliver, in the usual form, a grant of the aforesaid tract of land to Zachariah Cox, Thomas Gilbert, and John Strother, Esquires, and to the rest of their associates, and to their heirs and assigns forever, as tenants in common of all the tract of land included in the aforesaid boundaries: Provided, That the said grantees of each separate grant, shall forbear all hostile attacks on any of the Indian hordes, which may be found on or near the said territory, if any such there be, and keep this State free from all charge and expenses which may attend the preserving of peace between the said Indians and grantees, and extinguishing the claims of the said Indians under the authority of this State: And provided further, and it is hereby expressly conditioned, That this State, and the government thereof, shall at no time hereafter be subject to any suit at law or in equity, or claim or pretension whatever, for, or on account of, any deduction in the quantity of the said territory, by any recovery which may or shall be had on any former claim or claims.

And, for the better direction of the Governor, Be it enacted, That the treasurer of this State shall, on application of any agent of either of the said companies, within the said term of two years, receive the sum or sums of money, which they are hereby respectively directed to advance; a certificate or certificates of which payments, under the hand of the treasurer, shall be a sufficient voucher for the Governor to issue the grants to the respective companies as aforesaid.

And be it further enacted, That all the remaining vacant territory belonging to this State, shall be disposed of as this or a future General Assembly shall direct, and in no other manner whatever.

A, No. 3.

Extract of a letter from Lieutenant John Armstrong to the Secretary of War, dated

PHILADELPHIA, January 20, 1791.

SIR:

Being a public officer, I shall take the liberty of communicating to you some conversation that passed between a Doctor O'Fallon and myself a few days before I left Kentucky, with some other circumstances relative to a settlement about to take place at the Yazoo, on the Mississippi, under the direction of that gentleman. Having seen a proclamation published by the President of the United States, I observed to Doctor O'Fallon that I thought the sanction of Government was necessary in order to give the color of success to his undertaking. He replied, it was immaterial; that Congress were concerned with him; offered to read a letter from one of that honorable body, but who he was I don't recollect. In the course of conversation, he assured me that many of the gentlemen of Congress were concerned in the business. I was also informed that a Mr. Mitchell had raised a company of adventurers in the district of Kentucky. I saw a Mr. Christy, who informed me that he had an appointment, and expected in a little time to fill a company also.

I understood from him that the business of those men was to protect the settlement; they were to be fed, and have a bounty of land. O'Fallon had also contracted with a Mr. Kirby, at the rapids of Ohio, to frame several houses, and have them ready to raft down the river early in the spring.

On my way to this place, travelling through a part of North Carolina, I was there informed that an extensive settlement would be formed at the Big Bend of the Tennessee. This was the general subject of conversation in the back parts of Virginia also, and, from an advertisement, a copy of which I gave you, a number of families were to, and I doubt not but they did, meet on the 10th instant, on French Broad river, in order to proceed to the place above mentioned.

AUGUSTA, Geo. September 2, 1790.

This is to inform those who wish to become adventurers to the Tennessee Company's purchase, that the said company will embark, from the confluence of Holston and French Broad rivers, on the tenth day of January next, for the purpose of forming a settlement on the said purchase at or near the Muscle Shoals. And, for the encouragement of migration to the aforesaid intended settlement, the said Tennessee Company have thought proper to set apart four hundred and eighty thousand acres of land in the said purchase, to lie in a true square, on the south side of the Tennessee river; which said tract of country, so set apart for the encouragement of migration, will be first laid off into bounties of five hundred acres of land each: and to every family who may become adventurers to the aforesaid settlement will be allowed a bounty, as aforesaid, of five hundred acres each, and to every single man, half a bounty; that is to say, two hundred and fifty acres each, until the whole of the land so set apart is appropriated.

Preference to the adventurers will be given by ballot. It is desired that those who wish to become adventurers will rendezvous, at the place appointed for setting out, time enough previous to the tenth of January to have their boats and necessary provisions prepared to embark.

ZACHARIAH COX,
THOMAS CARR,
Agents to the Tennessee Company.

Those who wish to be further interested in land on the Tennessee river may be supplied on reasonable terms, by applying at the abovementioned place of rendezvous, on the first of January next, at which time and place the proprietors of the Tennessee Company purchase (as holding the land on the north side of the Tennessee river, commonly called the Bent) will open an office for the sale of the same. The said office will continue at the confluence of Holston and French Broad rivers until the tenth of January, and after, at the intended settlement of the Tennessee, until the whole of the land, or that part of the Bent (included by the Tennessee Company purchase) is sold, amounting, in the whole, to about six hundred thousand acres of the most valuable part of the said Bent.

Undoubted titles, in fee simple, to adventurers and purchasers, for land in the Tennessee Company, will be given. Given under our hands, as proprietors to the Tennessee Company, this second day of September, 1790.

ZACHARIAH COX,
THOMAS GILBERT,
JOHN STROTHER,
Proprietors Tennessee Company.

LEXINGTON, September 25, 1790.

SIR:

Having, since the sealing up of the despatches herein enclosed to your Excellency, noticed a clause in the late Creek treaty, and another in an act of the Legislature of the United States, of Monday, January (the 4th, of this year, and a third in the same act, respecting persons passing into Indian nations, holding treaties on the subject of lands, and trade with them; and as, in my present agency, I may occasionally have from the Spanish and Indian borders intelligence of vital import to transmit to your Excellency, to the Governor of Georgia, to the Company, to the new ally of the States, Mr. McGillivray, through the Choctaws and Chickasaws, and may likewise have to determine on the trading intercourse between these nations and the people of my colony, so remote from your Excellency, or your Excellency's Indian superintendent, and may further have to purchase more lands within the company's State charter, from the Choctaws, I, in consequence, submit it to your Excellency, whether or not it would comport with your Excellency's arrangement and official plans to extend to me, as the agent general of the company, sufficient authority in the premises, and to transmit it as speedily as may be. Your Excellency may depend on my discretion in the uses of such authority, and that your confidence will, in no one instance, be abused; without such trust, evils may happen.

In regard to trade and purchases of the Choctaw tribes, it would perhaps be better to place this authority in the hands of the company; but the power of passing expresses from one, in the directions just mentioned, ought, I should presume, to be speedily invested in the acting general agent of the colony. These are submitted to your Excellency's better judgment, with becoming diffidence, and am, your Excellency's most devoted and respectful humble servant,

JAMES O'FALLON,

Agent General for, and proprietor with, the South Carolina Yazoo Company.

P. S. By persons just now arrived from General Harmar's army, it is handed about, very confidently, that the expedition against the Northern Indians must prove abortive. The militia (then about half ways to the Indian towns) began to mutiny for want of meat. They had not at the time more beeves than would last the army five days, nor were any ordered on. They lost near one hundred in the woods. This disgusts the people here, because they think it will inspire the savages to greater hostility. The expedition, it is said, has been, by General St. Clair, too precipitately taken up, and hastily provided for. The country abounds with every supply, and the people, if called on, are willing to support the expedition. But, they are not called on. If it fails, a new uproar, I foresee, will be set up against the Governor.

Military Articles of contract, &c. entered into between the South Carolina Yazoo Company and their troops, of the Yazoo Battalion.

Military articles, proposals, and terms of contract, hereby offered, made, and solemnly entered into, for and on behalf of the South Carolina Yazoo Company, (as proprietors of that extensive territory on the Mississippi, and adjoining to the Natchez district, now proposed for populous colonization, by them, under a grant from the State of Georgia, and a deed of gift from the Choctaw nation) by the underwritten, who himself is a co-proprietor, and likewise the said company's general agent in and over their affairs, throughout the whole of the Western territory of the United States, and in New Orleans and Pensacola, on the one part, and the officers and privates, as undersigned, on the other. And this for the sole purpose of raising, recruiting, and enlisting, and for that of placing on the spot of settlement, a well appointed, well armed, and well accoutred military corps, in full form and organization of a regular battalion, aptly detailed and apportioned into one troop of cavalry, one company of artillery, and eight companies of infantry riflemen, as in order arranged, at foot; enlisted, or to be enlisted for the space of eighteen months certain; to be computed from the time of the battalion's arrival at the place destined and appointed by the company, or their agent general, for the first establishment of the colony, capital, and fort; or for a shorter time, if the said company shall have thought proper: these troops being intended, although no danger is, at present, apprehended, to ensure the greater security of the company's rights, and their own; as well as to the rest of their fellow settlers' lives, liberties, and properties.

In addition to the stipendiary allotments of plantation rights, as above mentioned, each private as well as officer is to have one town lot of half an acre, and one out lot of five acres, adjoining to the capital.

The plantation lands are to be laid out and drawn for, consonant to rank, in enumerated sections of 400, 350, 300, 250, and 200 acres; all in the vicinage of the said capital, where, it is presumed, the land must, in quality, be excellent. The town lots are, likewise, to be enumerated and drawn for, in half acre sections, and the out lots in sections of five acres, the company drawing lot for lot, alternately, with each officer and private, so that the troops (with respect to the quantity of their lands) will be on an equal footing with the company. These military lots within the town, may exist in any of the streets thereof, saving one; which the agent, in behalf of the company, shall reserve for such uses as the said company may, hereafter, have them applied to.

The battalion is still additionally to be maintained by the company, in the subsistence of daily rations, so long as the troops shall have been retained in the service of the said company.

All others,	- - - - -	1 do.

RATIONS TO CONSIST OF—

Bacon, salted pork, flour, or Indian corn meal,	- - - - -	$\frac{3}{4}$ of a lb.
Or, if Bread, instead of flour,	- - - - -	1 lb.
Corn, instead of these,	- - - - -	1 quart,
Salted beef, instead of bacon, or salted pork,	- - - - -	1 lb.
Fresh meat or fish, instead of either of these,	- - - - -	1 $\frac{1}{2}$ lb.

One gill of whiskey, or half a gill of taffia, per day, shall accompany each ration.

The company engages to receive of the hunters and fishermen, all the fresh meat, fish, and peltry, which they shall bring into the garrison, at the customary price. The troops are to have their plantation lots and lands laid out for them, as soon after their arrival as may be; but not to receive their grants or final titles for the same, before they shall have been honorably discharged, at or before the expiration of eighteen months, as the company shall optionally determine on. The time of enlistment, then, is to be for eighteen months certain; or for so long (within that period) as the company shall judge this military establishment of defensive force absolutely necessary. The company is to exact no other services of the troops, but such as shall be purely military. Should a soldier labor for the company in any other respect, it shall be voluntarily, and for a stipulated compensation. No soldier whatsoever is, in any wise, to be punished, as such, for any crime, under a military tribunal, but by a forfeiture of his stipendiary lands and lots, for the greater crimes, and this by the solemn trial of a court martial; or, for the lesser ones, by an abridgment of his rations of whiskey or taffia, as his proper captain shall adjudge, in conjunction with the subalterns of the same company, or a majority of them.

The greater crimes are, murder, or any act tending to the same; disobedience; desertion; cowardice; mutiny; neglect of appointed duty; drunkenness, while on duty; striking an officer; insult to his authority; and theft.

The lesser crimes are, all else beside the above, which tend to unmilitary or immoral examples.

The colonel-commandant (or, in his absence, the next to him in command) shall, with his corps of commissioned officers, possess the exclusive authority of arranging the system of discipline, and of directing that of duty, as well of the officers as of the private men; and of adjusting the mode and the manner of holding courts martial. They shall, likewise, be invested with a similar authority respecting the regulation, inspection, and issuing military stores and provisions.

The — is to have the command of the battalion. The lieutenant colonel shall command under him; and in the absence of these, the command of the battalion shall devolve upon the senior officer in rank, then present. The captain of the cavalry is to hold precedence of him of the artillery; and he, of those of the infantry-riflemen. The same preference in rank is to hold good in regard to the lieutenants of horse and artillery, as well with respect to each other, as to those two, and those also of the infantry. The cornet of dragoons is to rank above the oldest lieutenant of infantry. All the infantry officers are to rank, in their respective grades, by priority, consonant to the priority of the dates of their commissions. Forfeiture of lands and lots (for the greater crimes) shall equally affect the officers as the soldiers, with the superadded ignominy of cashierment, by sentence of court martial. No officer, however, shall be put under arrest, but by a senior one, who shall not be the complainant; and all such complaints shall be in writing.

The troops, whether of the horse, artillery, or infantry, shall procure their respective manual arms and accoutrements. The cavalry are to have themselves furnished with good horses, and with competent equipment for the same; and all are to find their own uniform and habiliments. The arms of the horse are, swords, or cutlasses, pistols, or carbines. Their uniforms are to consist of a light-horseman's cap, covered with bearskin; a short skirted coat of blue, faced with buff, and yellow metal buttons. The arms of the artillery are to be swords, or cutlasses, and their uniforms are to consist of yellow hunting-shirts, bound about the waist with broad, black, leathern belts; of a hat, with its leaf flapped up behind, and the crown thereof covered with a piece of bearskin; with overalls of blue. The infantry-riflemen are to wear the same uniform with the artillery: and their arms are to be, each, a good rifle, or musket, shot or bullet-pouch, and powder-horn. All military stores and ammunition, for duty, are to be furnished by the company.

Should any person demise, while in service, his stipendiary lands are to revert to his heirs, or to pass over to his assigns, as fully, absolutely, and legally, as if he had duly served out the whole period of his enlistment.

The company will grant (as a bounty of encouragement to female adventurers, who shall have enterprised into this territory, at the time the battalion moves to it) five hundred acres of land to the first woman who shall land there; and five hundred more to her who shall bring forth in it the first live child, bastard or legitimate.

All those, of whatever class or rank, who shall take provisions of solid food, or whiskey, down with them to this settlement, shall be paid for the same in cash, or in goods, on the delivery of these provisions to the agent's orders. Every woman, married or marriageable, who shall accompany the troops to the place of settlement, shall have one hundred acres of land.

The articles being obligatory on the company, and on their troops, the one to the other, are to be signed, for the company, by the agent general, and, for the battalion, by the officers and privates thereof; as hereinafter specified by their signatures, respectively.

But if the principle of the augmentation should be agreed to, but not the foregoing mode, then the following plan is submitted:

The whole establishment of infantry and artillery to consist of 20 companies, each company of 108 non-commissioned, and privates, amounting in total, to 2,160.

Each company, in consideration of the augmentation from 76 to 108, to have an additional lieutenant, 2 sergeants, and 2 corporals, and to be formed as follows:

1 Captain,	6 Corporals,
2 Lieutenants,	2 Musicians,
1 Ensign,	94 Privates.
6 Sergeants,

The infantry to be formed into two regiments, each of two battalions of four companies.

The artillery to remain formed into one battalion of four companies.

In this case, the following statement would be the precise number of the augmentation, and an estimate of the expenses thereof:

CLOTHING.
512 Non-commissioned and privates, at $20 - - - - -			10,240 00
			98,542 40
By this plan the additional non-commissioned officers and privates would amount to 944
By the first mode, to - - - - -		912
	Difference, - - - - -	32

It appears that the difference of expense would be greater for the former than the latter mode, by the sum of $2,924. But the Secretary of War submits it as his opinion, that the additional regiment of three battalions would be the best formation, considering the nature of the service to be performed on the frontiers.

But if the augmentation should take place in either mode, or, indeed, if it should not take place, it seems essential for the public interests, that an officer of high rank and responsibility should command on the frontiers: the public interest in that quarter requires the best security to be obtained. The idea is, therefore, hereby suggested, that a Major General should be appointed to the command of the troops on the frontiers. In this case, the following expense would be incurred:

The pay of a major general, $166 per month, - - - - -		$1,992 00
Subsistence, 15 rations, per day, - - - - -	5,475 rations, at 12 cents, - - - - -	657 00
Forage, $24 per month - - - - -		288 00
		2,937 00
QUARTERMASTER.
Pay, $60 per month, - - - - -		720 00
Subsistence, 6 rations is 2,190, at 12 cents, - - - - -		262 80
Forage, $12 per month, - - - - -		144 00
		$1,126 80

The articles in the quartermaster's department are at present supplied by the contractors. But, it is apprehended, that a quartermaster to the troops would be more economical. The idea is, therefore, submitted, that a quartermaster should be appointed, who should govern himself by such regulations, respecting his said duty, as the President of the United States should, from time to time, direct. It is proposed that the quartermaster should have the pay, rations, and forage, of a lieutenant colonel-commandant.

In order that the levies should be on a footing with the regular troops, they ought to have, for the four months' service, one-third part of the clothing of the said regulars, but subject to a proportional deduction. The clothing, so given, should be of the most useful kind, so as to enable the levies to render the most service. It is to be observed, that many of the militia are soon rendered unfit for service by want of clothing.

The clothing, therefore, for the aforesaid 1,500 non-commissioned and privates, amount, at $6 2-3, to $10,000

From which the following deductions are to be made, agreeably to law:

If only 1,300 levies should be raised, then 2-15th parts of the above sum would be deducted. On the contrary, if the levies should be augmented to 2,000, then the aforesaid estimate to be increased one-fourth part, viz.

If 1,300, there is to be deducted,	7,962 00
If 2,000, there is to be added,	14,954 00

[3d SESSION.

INDIAN DEPREDACTIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY, 27, 1791.

and House of Representatives:*

In order that you may be fully informed of the situation of the frontiers, and the prospects of hostility in that quarter, I lay before you the intelligence of some recent depredations, received since my message to you upon this subject, of the 24th instant.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 27, 1791.

Rufus Putnam, Esq. to the President of the United States.

MARIETTA, January 8, 1791.

SIR:

The mischief which I feared, has overtaken us much sooner than I expected. On the evening of the 2d instant, between sunset and daylight-in, the Indians surprised a new settlement of our people, at a place on the Muskingum, called the Big-bottom, nearly forty miles up the river, in which disaster eleven men, one woman, and two children, were killed: three men are missing, and four others made their escape. Thus, sir, the war, which was partial before the campaign of last year, is, in all probability, become general: for I think there is no reason to suppose that we are the only people on whom the savages will wreak their vengeance, or that the number of hostile Indians have not increased since the late expedition. Our situation is truly critical: the Governor and Secretary both being absent, no assistance from Virginia or Pennsylvania can be had. The garrison at fort Harmar, consisting at this time of little more than twenty men, can afford no protection to our settlements, and the whole number of men, in all our settlements, capable of bearing arms, including all civil and military officers, do not exceed two hundred and eighty seven, and these, many of them, badly armed. We are in the utmost danger of being swallowed up, should the enemy push the war with vigor during the winter; this I believe will fully appear, by taking a short view of our several settlements, and I hope justify the extraordinary measures we have adopted, for want of a legal authority in the territory to apply for aid in the business. The situation of our people is nearly as follows:.

At Marietta are about eighty houses, in the distance of one mile, with scattering houses about three miles up the Ohio. A set of mills at Duckcreek, four miles distant, and another mill two miles up the Muskingum. Twenty two miles up this river is a settlement, consisting of about twenty families; about two miles from them, on Wolf Creek, are five families and a set of mills. Down the Ohio, and opposite the little Kenhawa, commences the settlement called Belle Prairie, which extends down the river, with little interruption, about twelve miles, and contains between thirty and forty houses. Before the late disaster, we had several other settlements, which are already broken up. I have taken the liberty to enclose the proceedings of the Ohio company and justices of the sessions on this occasion, and beg leave, with the greatest deference, to observe, that, unless Government speedily send a body of troops for our protection, we are a ruined people. The removal of the women and children, &c. will reduce many of the poorer sort to the greatest straits; but if we add to this the destruction of their corn, forage, and cattle, by the enemy, which is very probable to ensue, I know of no way they can be supported; but, if this should not happen, where these people are to raise bread another year, is not easy to conjecture, and most of them have nothing left to buy with. But my fears do not stop here; we are a people so far detached from all others, in point of situation, that we can hope for no timely relief, in case of emergency, from any of our neighbors; and, among the number that compose our present military strength, almost one half are young men, hired into the country, intending to settle by and by; these, under present circumstances, will probably leave us soon, unless prospects should brighten; and, as to new settlers, we can expect none in our present situation; so that, instead of increasing in strength, we are like to diminish daily; and, if we do not fall a prey to the savages, we shall be so reduced and discouraged as to give up the settlement, unless Government shall give us timely protection. It has been a mystery with some, why the troops have been withdrawn from this quarter, and collected at the Miami; that settlement is, I believe, within three or four days' march of a very populous part of Kentucky, from whence, in a few days, they might be reinforced with several thousand men, whereas, we are not within two hundred miles of any settlement, that can probably more than protect themselves.

But, I forbear suggestions of this sort, and will only observe further, that our present situation is truly distressing; and I do, therefore, most earnestly implore the protection of Government, for myself and friends inhabiting these wilds of America: To this we conceive ourselves justly entitled; and so far as you, sir, have the means in your power, we rest assured that we shall receive it in due time.

I have the honor to be, with the highest possible respect, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

RUFUS PUTNAM.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States of America.

Rufus Putnam, Esq. to the Secretary of War.

MARIETTA, January 8th, 1791.

DEAR SIR:

I snatch a moment's time, to tell you, that, on the 2d instant, the Indians surprised a block-house of ours, about 40 miles up the Muskingum, killed 14 persons, and carried off three others; these last lodged in a hut, about 50 rods from the block-house; 4 others, who also lodged a distance from the block-house, made their escape. This event clearly proves that the expedition against the Shawanese will not produce peace, but, on the contrary, a more general and outrageous war; in which case there is with us but one alternative; Government must either give us some troops, or we must eventually be obliged to quit the country; our numbers are too small to make head against a host of savages, without aid from the General Government. Being confident that we deserve, we endeavor to believe that we shall obtain their protection; and, in the mean time, are taking all possible measures in our power for our own preservation, and shall endeavor not only to defend the town of Marietta, but the most considerable out-settlements that remain, till such time as Congress shall take their measures respecting the war, which has been blown into a flame by the expedition against the Shawanese. I hope Government will not be long in deciding what part to take: for, if we are not to be protected, the sooner we know it the better—better for us and better for Government; better that we withdraw ourselves at once, than remain to be destroyed by piecemeal; and better that Government disband their troops now in the country, and give it up altogether, than be wasting the public money in supporting a few troops, altogether inadequate to the purpose of giving peace to the territory.

I have the honor to be, with very great respect, sir, your very humble servant,

RUFUS PUTNAM,

Hon. H. Knox, Esq.

Captain David Zeigler to Governor St. Clair.

FORT HARMAR, January 8, 1791.

SIR:

I have the mortification to inform your Excellency, that, on the 2d instant, in the evening, the settlements called Big Bottom, consisting of 16 men, one woman, and two children, were destroyed by the savages, and only two men escaped, and three supposed taken prisoners, as the bodies were not found. As soon as I got acquainted, assisted Colonel Sprout to make a detachment with as many men as I possibly could spare, towards that settlement; the Indians were gone before the party arrived.

Since your departure, no Indians had made their appearance here, and they are, to a great number, at the Great Rock, and White Woman's creek, and do not seem to be inclined to come in. The 4th instant was the day I had appointed for George White-Eyes, the old, which is amongst us, to go as far as said place, but now he is apprehensive of danger, not only from them, but, also, from his own people, which obliged me to save him from trouble. Polly, the Wyandot woman, is also here, and informed me, the 1st instant, in a crying manner, that she apprehended all the savages were hostile inclined; when being in their town, numbers of the Chippewas and Ottawas have passed to join those banditti; with their usual mode of singing, by giving farewell to their nation for some time. To give credit to all that, I let your Excellency judge.

Since this unhappy affair happened, the Ohio company voted troops to be raised for their defence, and for such time, until more troops will be sent on to this post. They also voted three block-houses to be erected; the troops so raised, to have the same pay and rations (but no clothing), as the troops got last war in the service of the United States; this I am afraid will hurt the establishment.

Upon application from the directors of the Ohio, in giving them assistance, shall order Ensign Morgan, with fifteen men, on his return, to guard one of those block-houses, and any other aid possible on my part, they shall have. All our settlements must become more careful, otherwise they may meet with the same fate.

The French families, I expect, will take shelter in this garrison, so quartered at Campus Martius, as by their law made. The women and children in the different settlements will repair to said place.

No new commissary has made his appearance as yet, and of course no provision.

I have the honor to be, with the highest esteem, your Excellency's most ob't. and most humble serv't,

DAVID ZEIGLER, Capt. 1st United States' regt.

His Excellency ARTHUR ST. CLAIR, Governor Western Territory.

ONEIDAS AND TUSCARORAS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 8, 1791.

WAR OFFICE, February 26th, 1791.

The Secretary for the Department of War, to whom was referred the petitions of several Oneida and Tuscarora Indians, by their attorney, Cornelius Vanslyck, reports:

That, on the 3d of April, 1779, Congress resolved, "That twelve blank commissions be transmitted to the Commissioners of Indian Affairs for the Northern Department, and that they, or any two of them, be empowered to fill them up with the names of faithful chiefs of the Oneidas and Tuscaroras, giving them such rank as the said commissioners shall judge they merit; the names and ranks to be by the commissioners reported to the Board of War."

That, in pursuance of the said resolve, the following named chiefs or Indians, of said nations, were commissioned, and returns transmitted to the Board of War, viz:

Hansjurie Tewahongrahkon, Tewaghtahkotte, James Wakarontharan, John Otaawighton,	} Captains.
Christian Thonigwenghsoharie, John Sagoharasic, Joseph Banaghsatirhon, Cornelius Okenyota, Cornelius Kakiktoton, Hansjoost Thaosagwat, Totyaneahani, Nicholas Kayhnatho,		} Lieutenants.

That the commissions granted as aforesaid, appear in the usual form of commissions granted to officers of the line of the army, and specify that the individuals beforementioned should take rank from the 6th June, 1779.

That, on the 5th of June, 1779, Congress resolved, "That one more blank commission be sent to the Commissioners of Indian Affairs in the Northern Department, to be filled up with the name of such faithful chief, as they shall deem worthy of that honor."

In pursuance of this act, it appears a like commission of Lieutenant Colonel in the Army of the United States was granted to Louis Atayataronghta, giving the said Louis rank from the 15th June, 1779.

That, on the 11th of February, 1785, Congress resolved, "That it be, and it is hereby, recommended to the State of New York, to settle with Captains Hansjurie Tewahangahtan, John Olaawighton, James Wakarontharan, and Lieutenants Nicholas Kayhnatho, Cornelius Kakiktoton, Cornelius Okenyota, Indians of the Oneida and Tuscarora nations, late officers in the service of the United States, and pay their accounts in like manner as other officers in the line of that State."

In consequence of said act, the State of New York made good the depreciation of pay of the said Indians to the 1st August, 1780, and settled with them for their pay to the 1st January, 1782.

That, of the Indians who were commissioned by the acts of Congress of the 3d April and 5th June, 1779, the following now appear, by their attorney, to claim the benefits arising from the said commissions, viz:

Louis Atayataronghta,	Lieutenant Colonel.
Hansjurie Tewahongrahkon, James Wakarontharan, John Otaawighton,	} Captains.
John Sagoharasic, by his widow Margaret Oginghtronte, Cornelius Hakiktoton, Hansjost Thaosagwat, by his widow Elizabeth Shentijo.		} Lieutenants.

It appears by the evidence of Edward Johnson, that Hansjost Thaosagwat, was killed on the western expedition under General Sullivan, and from verbal information obtained from Captain Michael Connolly, of the late New York line, it appears that John Sagoharasic died some time in 1781, and that Lieutenants Christian Thonigwenghsoharie, Joseph Banaghsatirhon, and Totyaneahani, deserted to, and exchanged their commissions with, the British.

That Lieutenant Colonel Louis Atayataronghta, has been settled with by the United States for his commutation, and for pay, to the same period that the State of New York settled with those under the act aforesaid.

On this statement, the Secretary of War remarks, that, however it may be supposed to have been the intention of Congress that the aforesaid Indians should receive the half-pay and the same rewards as the officers of the late army, that the claim is now precluded by the resolves of limitation, excepting as to the lands to which it appears they are entitled, and which it is conceived they may receive without any act of Congress.

All which is humbly submitted to the House of Representatives.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

CHEROKEES, SIX NATIONS, AND CREEKS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, OCTOBER 26, 1791.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I have directed the Secretary of War to lay before you, for your consideration, all the papers* relative to the late negotiations with the Cherokee Indians, and the treaty concluded with that tribe, on the 2d day of July last, by the superintendent of the Southern district; and I request your advice, whether I shall ratify the same.

* These papers are not on file.

I also lay before you the instructions to Colonel Pickering, and his conferences with the Six Nations of Indians. These conferences were for the purpose of conciliation, and at a critical period to withdraw those Indians to a greater distance from the theatre of war, in order to prevent their being involved therein. (1)

It might not have been necessary to request your opinion on this business, had not the commissioner, with good intentions, but incautiously, made certain ratifications of lands, unauthorized by his instructions, and unsupported by the constitution.

It, therefore, became necessary to disavow the transaction explicitly, in a letter written by my orders to the Governor of New York, on the 17th of August last.

The speeches to the Cornplanter, and other Seneca Chiefs, the instructions to Colonel Proctor, and his report, and other messages and directions, (2) are laid before you for your information; and, as evidences that all proper lenient measures preceded the exercise of coercion.

The letters to the Chief of the Creeks are also laid before you, to evince that the requisite steps have been taken to produce a full compliance with the treaty made with that nation, on the 7th of August, 1790.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, 26th October, 1791.

A Treaty of peace and friendship, made and concluded between the President of the United States of America, on the part and behalf of the said States, and the undersigned chiefs and warriors, of the Cherokee nation of Indians, on the part and behalf of the said nation.

The parties being desirous of establishing permanent peace and friendship between the United States and the said Cherokee nation, and the citizens and members thereof, and to remove the causes of war by ascertaining their limits, and making other necessary, just, and friendly arrangements: the President of the United States, by William Blount, Governor of the territory of the United States of America south of the river Ohio, and superintendent of Indian affairs for the Southern district, who is vested with full powers for these purposes, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States; and the Cherokee nation, by the undersigned chiefs and warriors, representing the said nation, have agreed to the following articles, namely:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be perpetual peace and friendship between all the citizens of the United States of America and all the individuals composing the whole Cherokee nation of Indians.

ART. 2. The undersigned chiefs and warriors, for themselves, and all parts of the Cherokee nation, do acknowledge themselves and the said Cherokee nation to be under the protection of the United States of America, and of no other sovereign whosoever; and they also stipulate that the said Cherokee nation will not hold any treaty with any foreign Power, individual State, or with individuals of any State.

ART. 3. The Cherokee nation shall deliver to the Governor of the territory of the United States of America, south of the river Ohio, on or before the first day of April next, at this place, all persons who are now prisoners, captured by them from any part of the United States; and the United States shall, on or before the same day, and at the same place, restore to the Cherokees, all the prisoners now in captivity, which the citizens of the United States have captured from them.

ART. 4. The boundary between the citizens of the United States and the Cherokee nation is, and shall be, as follows: Beginning at the top of the Currahee mountain, where the Creek line passes it; thence a direct line to Tugelo river; thence northeast to the Occunna mountain, and over the same, along the South Carolina Indian boundary, to the North Carolina boundary; thence north, to a point from which a line is to be extended to the river Clinch, that shall pass the Holston at the ridge which divides the waters running into Little river from those running into the Tennessee; thence, up the river Clinch, to Campbell's line, and along the same to the top of Cumberland mountain; thence a direct line to the Cumberland river, where the Kentucky road crosses it; thence, down the Cumberland river, to a point from which a southwest line will strike the ridge which divides the waters of Cumberland from those of Duck river, forty miles above Nashville; thence, down the said ridge, to a point from whence a southwest line will strike the mouth of Duck river.

And in order to preclude forever all disputes relative to the said boundary, the same shall be ascertained, and marked plainly, by three persons appointed on the part of the United States, and three Cherokees on the part of their nation.

And in order to extinguish forever all claims of the Cherokee nation, or any part thereof, to any of the land lying to the right of the line above described, beginning as aforesaid at the Currahee mountain, it is hereby agreed, that, in addition to the consideration heretofore made for the said land, the United States will cause certain valuable goods to be immediately delivered to the undersigned chiefs and warriors, for the use of their nation; and the said United States will also cause the sum of one thousand dollars to be paid annually to the said Cherokee nation. And the undersigned chiefs and warriors do hereby, for themselves and the whole Cherokee nation, their heirs and descendants, for the considerations abovementioned, release, quit claim, relinquish, and cede, all the land to the right of the line described, and beginning as aforesaid.

ART. 5. It is stipulated and agreed, that the citizens and inhabitants of the United States shall have a free and unmolested use of a road from Washington district to Mero district, and of the navigation of the Tennessee river.

ART. 6. It is agreed, on the part of the Cherokees, that the United States shall have the sole and exclusive right of regulating their trade.

ART. 7. The United States solemnly guaranty to the Cherokee nation, all their lands not hereby ceded.

ART. 8. If any citizen of the United States, or other person, not being an Indian, shall settle on any of the Cherokees' lands, such person shall forfeit the protection of the United States; and the Cherokees may punish him or not, as they please.

ART. 9. No citizen or inhabitant of the United States shall attempt to hunt or destroy the game on the lands of the Cherokees; nor shall any citizen or inhabitant go into the Cherokee country, without a passport first obtained from the Governor of some one of the United States, or territorial districts, or such other person as the President of the United States may, from time to time, authorize to grant the same.

ART. 10. If any Cherokee Indian or Indians, or person residing among them, or who shall take refuge in their nation, shall steal a horse from, or commit a robbery or murder, or other capital crime, on, any citizens, or inhabitants of the United States, the Cherokee nation shall be bound to deliver him or them up, to be punished according to the laws of the United States.

ART. 11. If any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, or of either of the territorial districts of the United States, shall go into any town, settlement, or territory, belonging to the Cherokees, and shall there commit any crime upon, or trespass against, the person or property of any peaceable and friendly Indian or Indians, which, if committed within the jurisdiction of any State, or within the jurisdiction of either of the said districts, against a citizen or white inhabitant thereof, would be punishable by the laws of such State or district, such offender or offenders shall be subject to the same punishment, and shall be proceeded against in the same manner, as if the offence had been committed within the jurisdiction of the State or district to which he or they may belong, against a citizen or white inhabitant thereof.

ART. 12. In case of violence on the persons or property of the individuals of either party, neither retaliation nor reprisal shall be committed by the other, until satisfaction shall have been demanded of the party of which the aggressor is, and shall have been refused.

ART. 13. The Cherokees shall give notice to the citizens of the United States of any designs which they may know or suspect to be formed in any neighboring tribe, or by any person whatever, against the peace and interest of the United States.

(1 & 2) These, with other papers, were transmitted to Congress, on the 11th January, 1792. Vide No. 23.

ART. 14. That the Cherokee nation may be led to a greater degree of civilization, and to become herdsmen and cultivators, instead of remaining in a state of hunters, the United States will, from time to time, furnish gratuitously the said nation with useful implements of husbandry. And further, to assist the said nation in so desirable a pursuit, and at the same time to establish a certain mode of communication, the United States will send such, and so many, persons to reside in said nation, as they may judge proper, and not exceeding four in number, who shall qualify themselves to act as interpreters. These persons shall have lands assigned them by the Cherokees for cultivation, for themselves and their successors in office; but they shall be precluded exercising any kind of traffic.

ART. 15. All animosities for past grievances shall henceforth cease; and the contracting parties will carry the foregoing treaty into full execution, with all good faith and sincerity.

ART. 16. This treaty shall take effect and be obligatory on the contracting parties, as soon as the same shall have been ratified by the President of the United States with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

In witness of all and every thing herein determined, between the United States of America and the whole Cherokee nation, the parties have hereunto set their hands and seals, at the treaty ground on the bank of the Holston, near the mouth of the French Broad, within the United States, this second day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one.

WILLIAM BLOUNT,

Governor in and over the territory of the United States of America, south of the river Ohio, and Superintendent of Indian affairs for the Southern district.

[Signed by forty-one of the chiefs and warriors of the Cherokee nation of Indians.]

Extracts from a letter from the Secretary of War to Major Richard Call, commanding officer of the troops of the United States posted in the State of Georgia, dated the 25th of May, 1791.

SIR:

I request that you will immediately take the proper arrangements for transporting such parts of Burbeck's and Savage's companies as are fit for the service, and can with propriety be detached from their respective stations, to the Rock Landing, or such other place of the Oconee as shall be healthy and proper to collect the troops at, for the purpose of marking the line, next October, mentioned in the treaty of the Creeks.

The contractors must furnish the provisions, and they must also furnish the wagons to transport the baggage of Smith and Burbeck's companies to the Rock Landing, and thence, with a detachment of Savage's, and all Rudolph's recruits, along the line described in the treaty.

You will notify his Excellency the Governor of Georgia of the time the troops will be assembled, and the purpose for which they are designed, and request him, if he shall judge proper, to notify three of the citizens of Georgia to attend the running of the line according to the treaty; and you will, also, in due season, transmit the same information to Mr. McGillivray, and request him to send the three Creek Chiefs to attend the running the line as stipulated by the treaty.

It is a circumstance of great importance, that the force of the United States, in Georgia, should be directed with the highest prudence and circumspection.

The great object of their continuance in that State, since the treaty with the Creeks, is to preserve the peace by conciliating to each other the Creeks and the frontier citizens of that State, and by being posted so as to afford a real security to those settlers, who had been driven by hostilities from their possessions.

While, therefore, every effectual measure should be adopted for the entire security of the troops beyond the possibility of surprise or contingency, and also for the protection of the country, all hostile parade or threatening appearances are to be avoided. On the contrary, the most cordial conduct is to be observed to all well-behaved and friendly Indians. And as on this head some expenses will be necessarily incurred, an account is to be kept thereof, and all that is reasonable and just shall be paid, on being previously audited in this department.

You will also transmit to this office regular information, with the returns of all occurrences to the troops under your command; and upon any extraordinary cases, you are to take such measures as shall relate to the defence of the troops, or the immediate protection of the country. But you are carefully to avoid every step which may involve the Union in hostilities with the Indians.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 31st May, 1791.

Instructions to John Heth, an Ensign in the first American regiment.

SIR:

Reposing special trust and confidence in your prudence, fidelity, and industry, I hereby authorize and instruct you in the objects herein specified, in pursuance of powers vested in me for that purpose, by the President of the United States.

You have herewith delivered to you, a letter to Brigadier General McGillivray, the beloved chief of the Creek nation of Indians, and also, the sum of two thousand nine hundred dollars, with which you are to proceed to the said Creek nation of Indians.

The letter addressed to Brigadier General McGillivray, which you have perused, will point out the objects of your mission, which are—

1st. To be the bearer of the sums, which, by treaty, the United States are annually to pay to the Creek nation and its chiefs.

2dly. To impress upon Mr. McGillivray, by the most conciliating methods, the necessity of the Creeks delivering up all prisoners, whether whites or negroes, agreeably to the treaty.

3dly. To impress upon him the necessity of his appointing the three old Creek chiefs, agreeably to the treaty, to attend at the Rock Landing, on the Oconee, on the first day of October, in order to run the boundary line agreeably to the treaty, an authentic copy of which you have herewith delivered to you.

And, in order that you may have sufficient time to render yourself acceptable to Brigadier General McGillivray, so as to accomplish the objects of your mission, you are hereby directed to stay in the Creek nation with him until the first of October next, at which time you will take your departure, and return to this city.

As your objects will be conciliation, you will embrace every opportunity or means which may present itself, for that purpose. You will of course avoid every thing of an irritating nature.

You will soon perceive that Brigadier General McGillivray is the soul of the Creek nation, and that, by cultivating his esteem, you will succeed with the rest.

Omit no opportunity of speaking of the cordial views of the General Government towards the Indians, and how much it desires to impart to them the blessings of civilization.

Consult Mr. McGillivray on this point, and obtain from him, in writing, his opinion, how this important object can be best effected.

Let him know the preparations that are making for the campaign; but that they are solely destined for the object of peace. That the Government has taken every measure to place before the Wabash, and other hostile Indians, their true situation, and that the United States require nothing of the Indians inconsistent with justice and humanity. That, if they will be quiet, the General Government will protect them in their just rights against all lawless white adventurers.

That the United States disapprove entirely of the projected settlements upon the Mississippi and Tennessee lands, by a number of adventurers under the Yazoo companies, who purchased of the State of Georgia the pre-emptive right.

You have herewith delivered the evidence of this disapprobation, being two proclamations of the President of the United States upon the subject.

Assure Mr. McGillivray, that, if the said companies proceed, in defiance of the said proclamations, to make their threatened settlements, they will be considered, to all intents and purposes, entirely without the protection of the United States.

You will obtain the money in gold at Baltimore, by virtue of treasury warrants which the paymaster has delivered to you. This money you will deliver to Mr. McGillivray, taking triplicate receipts on the accounts herewith given you, all of which you are, upon your return, to deliver to the paymaster.

You will proceed, by the way of Richmond, to the territory of the United States south of the Ohio. I herewith deliver you a letter to Governor Blount, who will provide you a guide and an escort of some faithful Cherokees, to Brigadier General McGillivray.

The paymaster has also delivered you the further sum of five hundred dollars. This sum is to defray your necessary expenses during your absence. You will keep an exact account of such expenses, supported in all practicable cases with accurate vouchers.

And in order that you should explicitly understand the compensation you shall receive for the services herein specified, it is hereby stipulated that your reasonable expenses shall be borne during your absence, and that the compensation for your services shall be at the rate of two dollars per day, including your pay and subsistence as an ensign, and that your rank shall be preserved to you.

The business with which you are charged, is confidential and honorable. Upon the due execution of it, will, in some degree, depend your future political expectations.

You will keep your business a secret, and communicate it only to Governor Blount.

You will write me on all safe occasions, and inform me of your progress. Besides the letter to Governor Blount, I deliver you one for General Sevier, which it is important he should receive.

You may return the way you think most proper, either by the Holston or Georgia, and from thence by water.

Wishing you a pleasant journey, and all prosperity, I am, sir, with esteem, your humble servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

Ensign JOHN HETH.

Letter from the Secretary of War to Brigadier General McGillivray.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 31st May, 1791.

Sir:

I received your letter by Mr. Swan, who arrived here in March last. I should have replied to it immediately, had a safe opportunity occurred. I have been seeking for a proper character to send to you upon the business mentioned in this letter, but I have not been able to procure one until this time.

The bearer, Ensign John Heth, I introduce to you as a gentleman well worthy of your confidence and esteem, and I am persuaded you will show him all the kindness which his situation may require, and yours admits.

The treaty made between the United States and the Creek nation, being founded on principles of mutual advantage, ought to be inviolably observed on both sides. It is, therefore, unfortunate, that any events should happen to cloud or interrupt that harmony which ought to prevail. The murder of the Cussetah, by some lawless whites, before your return, and the revenge taken for the same, after your return, were both wrong, and circumstances from which excessive evil might have arisen.

Whenever parties assume to be judges and executioners in their own cause, the justice of the decision may be justly questioned, independent of the political evils flowing from the measure.

For any mischiefs committed against the treaty by the whites, complaint ought to be made to the President of the United States, whose power is competent to render satisfaction for the injury. If revenge shall be taken for any real or supposed injury by the Indians, unless the previous necessary statements are made to the supreme authority, all the arrangements for peace which have been made, may be broken up, and unlimited confusion ensue.

That you are fully impressed with the immense benefits to the Creeks, from an entire pacification and friendship with the United States, there can be no doubt. This conviction brought you from your own country to New York, influenced your conduct there, and, I am persuaded, pervades your reflections at this time.

Your perceptions are too good for you not to see the ruinous effects of suffering the Creeks to exercise an indiscriminate revenge. As, therefore, you value the preservation of the treaty, and friendship of the United States, prevent every conduct on the part of the Creeks which would tend to interrupt the system of cordial intercourse, the foundations of which were so happily laid in the treaty.

Inculcate on all the chiefs, the purity, humanity, and justice, of the system towards the Indians, adopted by the President of the United States and the General Government.

Remember that the time has arrived that all the prisoners in the nation are to be given up, and that it is of the highest importance that this measure be faithfully fulfilled in all respects, and that there be no cause of complaint.

I have forwarded by Mr. Heth, the sum of two thousand nine hundred dollars, which will complete the sums stipulated by the treaty of the seventh of August, agreeably to the enclosed schedule. You will receipt for these sums in the manner pointed out in the enclosed.

A proper distribution of this money will enable you to recover all the prisoners, whether whites or negroes. On a punctual and entire compliance with the treaty, in the restoration of the prisoners, every thing will depend. I know they are not many. But, if a single person, black or white, should be kept back, it will be considered as a violation of the treaty, and a germ productive of abundant evil.

You will remember that, on the first of October, the boundary is to be marked according to the treaty. The President of the United States has made choice of an able and impartial surveyor to execute this business, and I have directed the troops to be in readiness at the Rock Landing to accompany him, and to run the line as specified in the treaty.

I earnestly request that you will have three discreet chiefs, whom you shall have previously and perfectly instructed upon the subject of the boundary, so that there be neither delay or mistake in the affair.

I have instructed Major Call, the commanding officer of the troops, to write to the Governor of Georgia to choose and direct three surveyors of their State to be present at running the boundary, besides which, I shall, upon the return of the President of the United States, write particularly to the Governor upon the subject.

I am, &c.

H. KNOX.

This letter will be delivered to you by Mr. John Heth, who is sent to the Creeks for the purposes contained in his instructions, which he will communicate to you.

I request that you would provide Mr. Heth guides, and a party of friendly and faithful Cherokees, to escort him to Mr. McGillivray.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 13th July, 1791.

Sir:

Yesterday I received your Excellency's letter of the sixth of the last month, containing four papers, from No. 1 to 4, relative to some recent discussions with the Creeks, all of which have been submitted to the President of the United States.

I am commanded to inform you that the President of the United States, judging from the information which you have transmitted, conceives that it would have been improper to have complied with the request of the four Creeks, as expressed in their message of the eighteenth of May last.

But, at the same time, it is his earnest desire that every possible measure should be taken to avert the evil consequences which may arise from this refusal.

The President of the United States considers it unnecessary to reiterate the considerations which press for a full and entire pacification with the Creeks, and all the other Southern Indians; he is persuaded that your Excellency, and all the citizens of Georgia, will concur in promoting the general interests of the United States in this respect.

I am further commanded to inform you, that Mr. Heth, a military officer of the United States, is now, probably, with Mr. McGillivray, to urge the delivery of the prisoners, and the marking the boundary, next October, agreeably to the treaty with the Creeks. I have also the honor to transmit you a copy of a letter to Mr. McGillivray, on the late event; duplicates of which are forwarded by Governor Blount, and the other by the Rock Landing.

Your Excellency will please to observe, by adverting to the Creek treaty, that the boundaries therein described, were to be ascertained by an able surveyor, on the part of the United States, assisted by three old citizens of Georgia, who may be appointed by the Governor of the said State, and three old Creek chiefs, to be appointed by the said nation.

Mr. Andrew Ellicott has been appointed surveyor for this purpose, and the President of the United States has directed me to request your Excellency to appoint three citizens of the State of Georgia, of the description before mentioned, to assist in ascertaining said boundary.

I have directed the commanding officer in Georgia to assemble the troops duly for the above purpose, and to notify your Excellency thereof.

I have the honor, &c.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

Letter from the Secretary of War to Brigadier General McGillivray.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 13th July, 1791.

Sir:

His Excellency the Governor of Georgia has transmitted to the President of the United States, the papers herein enclosed, relative to some recent discussions with part of the Creeks.

The message of the Lower Creeks, of the eighteenth of May, to the Governor, appears to have been formed and transmitted without any agency of yours.

The President of the United States persuades himself, that, had you been consulted on this occasion, the message would have been of a different aspect. But, as the affair stands, that you will exercise your influence to prevent every measure, on the part of the Creeks, which would have the complexion of retaliation.

While the stealing of horses from the citizens of the United States must be reprobated by you and every other well intentioned member of the Creek nation, you cannot be uninformed that an act so atrocious merits high and prompt punishment, when committed by one white against another, and that, therefore, the Creek who was killed, must be considered as bringing his own punishment upon himself.

It is of the utmost consequence that so nefarious a practice should be discountenanced by all the well-disposed part of the Creeks; and that, when punishment is inflicted, as in the case herein alluded to, such characters should openly and avowedly approve thereof.

The President of the United States is most sincerely desirous, that the treaty with the Creeks should not only be fully executed in all its parts, but that it should be the ground work of a more intimate union, and the means of farther happiness to the Indians. He therefore views, with concern, any event which has a tendency to a breach of the peace so happily established.

Notwithstanding it may be concluded that the death of the Indian was the consequence of his own unjustifiable conduct, yet, perhaps, it may be proper, in a degree, to pay regard to the habits of the Indians, on such an event.

It has been understood, that, among the Indian nations, when one Indian kills another, the offence is not considered so much a public as a private evil, for which the family of the deceased is bound to obtain satisfaction. That this satisfaction is various, sometimes by blood, and at others, by pecuniary considerations; if this idea is just, the family of the Indian who was killed may perhaps be satisfied with some pecuniary compensation.

In this case, therefore, to prevent the personal and national evils arising from indiscriminate retaliation, the President of the United States desires that you would make such reasonable compensation to said family, as you may judge proper, and to inform me thereof; and immediate disbursement shall be made to your order.

It is to be hoped that Mr. Heth, who was sent to you on the thirty-first of May, has safely arrived. But, lest it should be otherwise, I enclose a copy of the letter of which he was the bearer.

Brigadier General ALEX. MCGILLIVRAY.

I am, sir, &c.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

Instructions to Joseph Ellicott, Esq.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 8th September, 1791.

SIR:

Your brother, Andrew Ellicott, having been appointed by the President of the United States to run the boundary line between the United States and the Creek nation of Indians, agreeably to the treaty made at New York, August 7th, 1790, but he being prevented setting out on this, by other public employment, and you having been deputed by him to commence this business, and the same having been approved by the President of the United States, you will accordingly depart hence, with all expedition, to Richmond, in Virginia, and from thence, by the most direct route, to Augusta, and the Rock Landing, in the State of Georgia.

When you shall arrive at the Rock Landing, you will immediately proceed to run the line up the south branch of the Oconee; by the time you shall have finished which, it is presumed your brother will have joined you; but, if he should be prevented, you will proceed to run the line to the Currahee mountain, and the continuance thereof, as stated in the treaty.

You will endeavor to obtain the best documents and maps of the old surveys, and the fullest information from oral testimony, whether from whites or Indians, in order that the business may be well and truly executed.

You will mark the line by means of the troops, as described in the treaty, and report to me, from time to time, your progress. If there should be any impediment in the prosecution of this service, you will, without delay, let me know the nature thereof, and the means of removing the objections.

You have, herewith, delivered to you, letters for Governor Telfair, Brigadier General McGillivray, Major Call, commanding officer at the Rock Landing, and the contractors who are to furnish the supplies of provisions.

The paymaster, Mr. Howell, has furnished you with one thousand dollars in advance, to defray the expenses of this business, for which you are held accountable.

I am, sir, &c.

GENTLEMEN:

I request that you will furnish Mr. Ellicott, the surveyor, and his attendants, with provisions, to enable him to run the boundary line between the United States and the Creek nation, agreeably to the treaty. You will keep a separate account of the supplies with which you shall furnish him, and procure regular vouchers of their delivery.

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 8, 1791.

SIR:

The bearer, Mr. Joseph Ellicott, brother to Andrew Ellicott, Esq. who is appointed by the President of the United States to run the boundary line between the United States and the Creek Indians, agreeably to the treaty, is deputed, with the approbation of the President, to commence the running of the line up the south branch of the Oconee, and from thence to the Currahee mountain; and to continue the survey until the arrival of his brother, who is detained a few days on public business.

As it is contemplated that the troops should run and mark the line, you are hereby directed to afford Mr. Ellicott every aid of which you and the troops are capable.

I am, sir, &c.

Letter from the Secretary of War to the Governor of Georgia.

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 8, 1791.

SIR:

I have the honor to inform you, that Andrew Ellicott, Esq. has been appointed, by the President of the United States, to run the boundary line between the United States and the Creek nation of Indians, agreeably to the treaty of the 7th of August, 1790, but that he is prevented by other public business from attending this duty immediately. But he has, with the approbation of the President of the United States, appointed his brother, Joseph Ellicott, the bearer, to commence the business, and proceed to run the line up the south branch of the Oconee, and to continue the business until his brother shall join him, who is detained a few days on public service.

I wrote to your Excellency on the 13th of July, duplicates of which were transmitted, informing, that the troops in Georgia had been ordered to assemble for this object.

I am persuaded your Excellency will have directed such citizens of Georgia as are mentioned in the treaty to be in readiness to accompany the surveyor; and it is much desired that there be no sort of impediment to the immediate establishment of the boundary.

I have the honor to be, your Excellency's, &c. &c.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

Letter from the Secretary of War to Brigadier General McGillivray.

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 8, 1791.

SIR:

Agreeably to my letter by Mr. Héth, of the 31st May last, duplicates of which were transmitted, I have the honor to inform you, that Andrew Ellicott, Esq. has been appointed by the President of the United States, to run the boundary line between the United States and the Creek nation of Indians, agreeably to the treaty of the 7th of August, 1790; but being prevented from setting out on this business in the first instance, he has appointed his brother, Joseph Ellicott, the bearer, with the express approbation of the President, to commence the operation, and to run the line up the south branch of the Oconee, and thence to continue the line to the Currahee mountain, until his brother shall join him, who is detained a few weeks on public service.

As the establishment of the line, according to the treaty, is a matter of the highest importance to prevent future dissensions, it is relied upon with confidence, that you, and all the well-disposed part of the Creeks, will give every facility to the measure.

The President of the United States directs me to express his firm expectations, that the Creek nation will take every opportunity to carry the treaty into effect—a measure with which their happiness, and the tranquillity of the southwestern frontiers are intimately blended.

Brigadier General MCGILLIVRAY.

No. 20.

WABASH INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, OCTOBER 27, 1791.

and of the House of Representatives:

I have directed the Secretary of War to lay before you, for your information, the reports of Brigadier General Scott and Lieutenant Colonel-commandant Wilkinson, the officers who commanded the two expeditions against the Wabash Indians, in the months of June and August last; together with the instructions, by virtue of which the said expeditions were undertaken. When the operations now depending shall be terminated, the reports relative thereto shall also be laid before you.

UNITED STATES, 27th October, 1791.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

Instructions to Brigadier General Charles Scott, dated 9th March, 1791.

SIR:

The issue and consequent effect of the expedition against the Miami towns, and the situation of affairs between the United States and the Wabash, and other hostile Indians, northwest of the Ohio, are well known to you, and the inhabitants of Kentucky, generally.

The President of the United States, in order that provision should be made for the protection of the frontiers, adequate to the occasion, laid before the Legislature a full statement of the recent Indian depredations.

The result of the deliberations of Congress will be communicated to you by the honorable Mr. Brown.

It would afford high satisfaction to the President of the United States, could a firm peace be established, without further effusion of blood; and, although he conceives the sacred principles of humanity, and a regard to the welfare of the country, dictate that he should take every proper arrangement to bring the deluded Indians to a just sense of their situation, yet he is apprehensive that all lenient endeavors will be fruitless.

He is, therefore, constrained to calculate his ultimate measures, to impress the Indians with a strong conviction of the power of the United States, to inflict that degree of punishment which justice may require.

That, for this purpose, he avails the public of the offers which you and the delegates of Kentucky, and the other frontier counties of Virginia, made, by your memorial of the fourth of December last, to combat the Indians according to your own modes of warfare.

It is the result of information, from men of reputation in Indian affairs, that a body of five hundred picked men, mounted on good horses, by rapid incursions, would be equal to the assault of any of the Indian towns lying on the Wabash river, and that the probability would be highly in favor of surprising and capturing at least a considerable number of women and children.

In this view of the object, and also estimating the consequent impressions such a successful operation would make upon the Indians, by demonstrating to them that they were within our reach, and lying at our mercy; and also, considering from the before recited memorial and other information, that such an opportunity of acting by themselves in an Indian expedition, would be highly gratifying to the hardy and brave yeomanry of Kentucky; the President of the United States hereby authorizes an expedition of the magnitude, and upon the conditions, hereinafter described.

First. The troops for the said expedition to be choice men, voluntarily engaged for the purpose, whose bravery and skill could be entirely relied upon; to consist of such numbers, as you, and the persons hereinafter named, may think proper; provided the number should not exceed seven hundred and fifty, officers included. But if the whole number could not be voluntarily completed with said characters, for the time hereinafter mentioned, then you are to obtain the deficiency by draughts of the militia or otherwise, in the manner that you and the persons hereinafter named may direct.

Secondly. The officers of the said expedition to be selected and appointed in the manner that you, Harry Innes, the honorable John Brown, Benjamin Logan, and Isaac Shelby, may judge proper.

Thirdly. The said volunteers or militia are to be mounted on horses, and armed and equipped in all respects as you, in conjunction aforesaid, may direct; and they are, during the period of their engagements, to be subject to the rules and articles of war of the United States.

Fourthly. That the sole conducting of the said expedition, excepting as hereinafter mentioned, shall be under your immediate orders, as brigadier general, provided you accept the same. But if you should decline the command, then you and the before mentioned persons are to appoint the commander in the manner you, jointly, or the majority of you, may judge proper.

Fifthly. That the pay to be allowed to the said mounted volunteers or militia, for themselves, horses, provisions, arms, and accoutrements, all risks included, (excepting for disability by wounds, in which case the commissioned officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, will receive such compensation, in their respective grades, as the law provides) will be, for the privates, sixty-six cents and two-thirds of a cent per day, and the pay of the commissioned officers added thereto, according to the schedule of the rates herewith enclosed. The principle of this schedule involves in the said sixty-six and two-thirds cents, the pay of the privates at three dollars per month, which three dollars are deducted from the grades, as they proceed from the privates to the highest officer.

Sixthly. The said mounted volunteers are to be engaged as soon as possible, after receiving these instructions, so that the expedition may commence from the Ohio by the tenth day of May next. Secrecy in forming, despatch in obtaining the men, and celerity in the movement, are indispensable; without which the Indians may be apprised of the design, and the consequences may be fatal. The particular point of departure from the Ohio, to be agreed upon with the commanding general or officer at Fort Washington; and the said mounted volunteers, of all descriptions, are to be mustered by an officer of the regular troops previously to their marching for the Ohio; provided, however, that if the commanding general of the troops on the Ohio should, previously to the said tenth day of May, think proper for public service to suspend the further operation of the said mounted volunteers, you and they are hereby directed to obey him accordingly.

Seventhly. But, in case no such order should be received from the said commanding officer by the tenth of May next, then the said mounted volunteers, or militia, are to proceed to the Wea, or Ouatanon towns of Indians, there to assault the said towns, and the Indians therein, either by surprise, or otherwise, as the nature of the circumstances may admit, sparing all who may cease to resist, and capturing as many as possible, particularly women and children. And on this point it is the positive orders of the President of the United States, that all such captives be treated with humanity; and that they be carried and delivered to the commanding officer of some post of the United States upon the Ohio.

Whether the assault upon the said Wea, or Ouatanon towns, should succeed or fail, the commanding officer will proceed to such other Indian towns or villages, upon the Wabash, or other place, to the destruction of which, he shall judge his force adequate.

Eighthly. After having effected by surprise, rapid marches, and attacks, all the injury to the Indian enemy to which the force shall be equal, the said mounted volunteers, or militia, will return either by the way of Post Vincennes, or some other post or place on the Ohio, which shall be agreed upon with the commanding officer of the troops of the United States. At this post, the troops of the said expedition will be again mustered, by an officer of the regular troops, in the same manner as when the troops of the said expedition commenced their march from the Ohio. It is expressly stipulated, that any volunteer or militia man, who shall desert, shall be precluded from all claims for pay or emoluments for any services upon the expedition, performed prior to his desertion. That four copies of each muster be made out, one to be retained by the mustering officer, another by the commanding officer of each company, the third to be delivered to the commanding officer of the party, and a fourth transmitted by the paymaster of the said mounted volunteers, to the War Office of the United States.

Ninthly. The officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, of said expedition, shall be allowed the pay of three days to repair to the Ohio, and three to return from thence, which six days shall be added to the number of days actually employed in the expedition, northwest of the Ohio; and the pay abstracts are to be made out accordingly.

The commanding officer will, upon his return, make a full report to the commanding general, of all the occurrences of the expedition, and also state his opinion at large, and the reasons on which it is founded, of the proper mode of chastising the Indians on future occasions.

As surprise and sudden attacks will be the objects of the expedition, it is presumed that all proper precautions will be taken; that each man carry with him a due quantity of provisions.

Tenthly. Without limiting or impeding the effectual operations which may be found practicable, it is presumed, from information and the nature of the supplies, that the mounted volunteers may be employed northwest of the Ohio, for a time not exceeding from twenty to thirty days. This intimation is clearly to be understood not to prevent the execution of any considerable object, should it require an extension of time. You must make an effectual arrangement with the commanding officer at Fort Washington, for an adequate supply of powder and lead, which is to be furnished at the expense of the United States.

Eleventhly. That the said corps of mounted volunteers, being left entirely free from any restrictions in the manner of its executing the objects proposed, its reputation, and the reputation of all concerned, will be involved in its being perfectly conducted, and in its ultimate success.

Twelfthly. In order that the preparations essential to the said expedition should not languish for a want of proper provisions, or other essential means, the sum of two thousand dollars has been delivered to the honorable John Brown, for the purposes of said expedition.

This sum is to be placed by you, and the before mentioned persons, or any three of you, in the hands of some person of character and known integrity, as paymaster of the said expedition, he giving bonds, with sufficient securities, for the faithful appropriation thereof, and all other sums he may receive for the purposes of the said mounted volunteers or militia.

Thirteenthly. But it is to be expressly understood, and it is hereby stipulated, that the said sum, or any part thereof, is not to be distributed, until it shall be certain the said expedition is to proceed and be carried into effect, according to the orders herein mentioned. In this case, the money is to be distributed in the manner you and the before mentioned persons may direct, under your signatures, or any three of you, on the sole and express condition, that the amount thereof shall be deducted from the pay abstracts for the services of the troops upon the said expedition.

But if circumstances should prevent the expedition from proceeding as herein suggested, then the said honorable John Brown will cause the said sum of two thousand dollars, without any let or hindrance whatever, to be delivered to the orders of the commanding officer of the troops of the United States.

And it is hereby understood, that the President of the United States authorizes a second operation of the same nature as the foregoing, provided the major general, or commanding officer of the troops on the Ohio, should judge the public interests should require the measure, and should direct the same under his hand and seal, directed to you and the persons aforesaid. The said second operation to be directed against such objects on the Wabash, and at such time, as the commanding general may direct. It is to be understood, that the first of the said operations may take place about the tenth day of May next, and that the second may take place on, or before, the tenth day of June; provided, however, that the said second operation shall not exceed five hundred non-commissioned officers and privates.

And if the said commanding general should direct a third expedition, either before or at the time proposed for the main expedition, the President of the United States will authorize the expenses thereof, under the restrictions contained in the rules for the first and second.

And in case of a second or third expedition, of the nature herein specified, you and the persons beforementioned, or the majority of you, are to appoint the commanding officer and the other officers thereof, in the manner before pointed out.

And if the said three expeditions should take effect, or any of them, and you should command all, or any of them, you will be allowed the pay and emoluments of a brigadier general during your actual services. And any other officer who may be appointed to the command shall be allowed the pay and emoluments of a lieutenant colonel-commandant.

The President of the United States is well aware of the high trust committed to you, in conjunction with the gentlemen aforesaid; but the confidence he reposes in your characters, persuades him you will use the said powers for the public benefit at large, without regard to local prejudices or local affections.

[L. s.] Given under my hand, and the seal of the War Office of the United States, this ninth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 9th, 1791.

LEXINGTON, 28th June, 1791.

SIR:

I have the honor to inform you that the detachment of mounted volunteers under my command, authorized to be raised by your letter of the 9th of March last, arrived at the mouth of Kentucky on the morning of the 19th of May, from which time to the 23d, I was employed in transporting the troops across the Ohio river, in having them mustered, and in issuing to them provisions and ammunition. The delay at the river was greater than I wished, yet, I trust, justifiable, as it was, in part, occasioned by the request of General St. Clair, which you will find by referring to the extract of his letter, contained in No. 1.

In prosecution of the enterprise, I marched four miles from the banks of the Ohio, on the 23d; and on the 24th, I resumed my march, and pushed forward with the utmost industry, directing my route to Ouiatanon, in the best manner my guides and information enabled me, though I found myself greatly deficient in both.

By the 31st I had marched one hundred and thirty-five miles, over a country cut by four large branches of White river, and many smaller streams, with steep muddy banks; during this march, I traversed a country alternately interspersed with the most luxuriant soil and deep clayey bogs, from one to five miles in width, rendered almost impervious by brush and briars.

Rain fell in torrents every day, with frequent blasts of wind and thunder storms. These obstacles impeded my progress, wore down my horses, and destroyed my provisions.

On the morning of the 1st instant, as the army entered an extensive prairie, I perceived an Indian on horse-back, a few miles to the right; I immediately made a detachment to intercept him, but he escaped; finding myself discovered, I determined to advance with all the rapidity my circumstances would permit, rather with the hope than the expectation of reaching the object sought that day: for my guides were strangers to the country which I occupied. At one o'clock, having marched, by computation, one hundred and fifty-five miles to the Ohio, as I penetrated a grove which bordered on an extensive prairie, I discovered two small villages to my left, at two and four miles distance.

My guides now recognised the ground, and informed me, that the main town was four or five miles in my front, behind a point of woods, which jutted into the prairie. I immediately detached Col. John Hardin, with sixty mounted infantry, and a troop of light horse under Capt. McCoy, to attack the villages to the left, and moved on briskly with my main body in order of battle, towards the town, the smoke from which was discernible. My guides were deceived with respect to the situation of the town: for, instead of standing at the edge of the plain, through which I marched, I found it in the low ground, bordering on the Wabash; on turning the point of woods, one house presented in my front; Capt. Price was ordered to assault that, with 40 men. He executed the command with great gallantry, and killed two warriors.

When I gained the summit of the eminence which overlooks the villages on the banks of the Wabash, I discovered the enemy in great confusion, endeavoring to make their escape over the river in canoes; I instantly ordered Lieutenant Colonel-commandant Wilkinson to rush forward with the first battalion; the order was executed with promptitude, and this detachment gained the bank of the river just as the rear of the enemy had embarked, and, regardless of a brisk fire kept up from a Kickapoo town, on the opposite bank, they, in a few minutes, by a well directed fire from their rifles, destroyed all the savages with which five canoes were crowded.

To my great mortification, the Wabash was many feet beyond fording at this place; I therefore detached Colonel Wilkinson to a ford two miles above, which my guides informed me was more practicable; in No. 2, you will find his report on that occasion.

The enemy still kept possession of the Kickapoo town; I determined to dislodge them, and for that purpose ordered Captain King's and Logsdon's companies to march down the river below the town, and cross, under the conduct of Major Barbee; several of the men swam the river, and others passed in a small canoe. This movement was unobserved, and my men had taken post on the bank, before they were discovered by the enemy, who immediately abandoned the village. About this time word was brought me, that Col. Hardin was incumbered with prisoners, and had discovered a stronger village, further to my left, than those I had observed, which he was proceeding to attack. I immediately detached Captain Brown, with his company, to support the Colonel; but the distance being six miles, before the Captain arrived, the business was done, and Colonel Hardin joined me a little before sunset, having killed six warriors, and taken fifty-two prisoners. Captain Bull, the warrior who discovered me in the morning, had gained the main town, and given the alarm a short time before me; but the villages to my left were uninformed of my approach, and had no retreat. The next morning, I determined to detach my Lieutenant Colonel-commandant, with five hundred men, to destroy the important town of Kethipecanunk, at the mouth of Eel river, eighteen miles from my camp, and on the west side of the Wabash; but, on examination; I discovered my men and horses to be crippled, and worn down by a long laborious march, and the active exertions of the preceding day; that three hundred and sixty men only, could be found in a capacity to undertake the enterprise, and they prepared to march on foot. Colonel Wilkinson marched with this detachment at half after five in the evening, and returned to my camp the next day at one o'clock, having marched thirty-six miles in twelve hours, and destroyed the most important settlement of the enemy in that quarter of the federal territory. In No. 3, you will find the Colonel's report respecting the enterprise.

Many of the inhabitants of this village were French, and lived in a state of civilization; by the books, letters, and other documents, found there, it is evident that place was in close connexion with, and dependent on, Detroit: a large quantity of corn, a variety of household goods, peltry, and other articles, were burned with this village, which consisted of about seventy houses, many of them well finished.

Misunderstanding the object of a white flag, which appeared on an eminence opposite to me, in the afternoon of the first, I liberated an aged squaw, and sent with her a message to the savages, that, if they would come in and surrender, their towns should be spared, and they should receive good treatment. It was afterwards found, that this white flag was not intended as a signal of parley, but was placed there to mark the spot where a person of distinction among the Indians, who had died some time before, was interred. On the 4th, I determined to discharge sixteen of the weakest and most infirm of my prisoners, with a talk to the Wabash tribes, a copy of which you will find enclosed in No. 4. My motives to this measure were, to rid the army of a heavy incumbrance, to gratify the impulsions of humanity, to increase the panic my operations had produced, and, by distracting the councils of the enemy, to favor the views of Government; and I flatter myself these objects will justify my conduct, and secure the approbation of my country.

On the same day, after having burned the towns and adjacent villages, and destroyed the growing corn and pulse, I began my march for the rapids of Ohio, where I arrived the 14th inst. without the loss of a single man by the enemy, and five only wounded, having killed thirty-two, chiefly warriors of size and figure, and taken fifty eight prisoners.

It is with much pride and pleasure I mention, that no act of inhumanity has marked the conduct of the volunteers of Kentucky on this occasion; even the inveterate habit of scalping the dead, ceased to influence.

I have delivered forty-one prisoners to Captain Asheton, of the 1st United States' regiment, at Fort Steuben, for which I have his receipt, as per the enclosed copy in No. 5.

I sincerely lament that the weather, and the consequences it produced, rendered it impossible for me to carry terror and desolation to the head of the Wabash. The corps I had the honor to command was equal to the object, but the condition of my horses, and state of my provisions, were insuperable obstacles to my own intentions and the wishes of all.

It would be invidious to make distinctions in a corps which appeared to be animated with one soul, and where a competition for danger and for glory inspired all ranks.

I, however, consider it my duty to mention Colonel John Hardin, who, in the character of a volunteer without commission, had command of my advanced party, and the direction of my guides from the Ohio river, for the discernment, courage, and activity, with which he fulfilled the trust I reposed in him. And I cannot close this letter, in justice to the merits of General Wilkinson, who went out my lieutenant colonel-commandant, without acknowledging my obligations for the faithful discharge of the several duties depending on him, and the able support which he gave me in every exigency.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

CHARLES SCOTT, B. G.

The Honorable HENRY KNOX, Secretary of War.

Extract of a letter from Major General St. Clair to Brigadier General Scott, dated

FORT WASHINGTON, May 18th, 1791.

I mentioned to you, that I did not wish, at that moment, to press the commencement of your march, but rather that a few days should be whiled away, provided it could be done without its being discovered that the delay was an affected one. I am sensible that it is a delicate point, and that, if it was discovered, the effect would be either to increase, in your troops, an impatience for moving, or to discourage them. The same reasons, however, exist now, as at the time I had the pleasure to communicate them, and as you are sensible of the weight of those reasons; I am sure of your managing it so as to avoid both these consequences. Without detailing them to Colonel Mentges, I have requested him not to press the muster, until a distribution has been made of your provisions and ammunition, and have mentioned that it was my wish your march should not be taken up before the 24th instant.

OULATANON, June 2d, 1791—4 o'clock P. M.

SIR:

Agreeable to your order; I moved the first battalion up to the ford above this place, but unfortunately found it impassable—the low grounds being overflowed three feet, a strong current running among the timber, and the bed of the river not in view. Under these circumstances, I considered the attempt unwarantable, because it would expose both the men and horses to be drowned, without the smallest probability of succeeding. I have, therefore, marched the detachment back to this place, and have the honor to be,

Sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES WILKINSON

Brigadier General Scott.

CAMP OULATANON, June 3d, 1791—1 o'clock P. M.

SIR:

The detachment under my command, destined to attack the village Kethipecaunuk, was put in motion at half after five o'clock last evening. Knowing that an enemy, whose chief dependence is in his dexterity as a marksman, and alertness in covering himself behind trees, stumps, and other impediments to fair fight, would not hazard an action in the light, I determined to push my march until I approached the vicinity of the villages, where I knew the country to be champaigned. I gained my point without a halt, 20 minutes before 11 o'clock; lay upon my arms until 4 o'clock, and half an hour after, assaulted the town at all quarters. The enemy was vigilant; gave way on my approach, and, in canoes, crossed Eel creek, which washed the northeast part of the town; that creek was not fordable; my corps dashed forward with the impetuosity becoming volunteers, and were saluted by the enemy with a brisk fire from the opposite side of the creek. Dauntless, they rushed on to the water's edge, uncovered to the moccason, and finding it impassable, returned a volley, which so galled and disconcerted their antagonists, that they threw away their fire without effect. In five minutes, the savages were driven from the covering, and fled with precipitation. I have three men slightly wounded. At half past five the town was in flames, and at six o'clock I commenced my retreat. I want language to do justice to the courage and good conduct of the gentlemen who composed my detachment. In neither could they be exceeded by veteran troops.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES WILKINSON.

Brigadier General Scott.

No. 4.

To the various tribes of the Piankeshaws, and all the nations of Red People, lying on the waters of the Wabash river.

The sovereign council of the thirteen United States have long patiently borne your depredations against their settlements on this side of the great mountains, in the hope that you would see your error, and correct it, by entering with them into the bonds of amity and lasting peace. Moved by compassion, and pitying your misguided councils, they have frequently addressed you on this subject, but without effect; at length, their patience is exhausted, and they have stretched forth the arm of power against you; their mighty sons and chief warriors have at length taken up the hatchet; they have penetrated far into your country, to meet your warriors, and punish them for their transgressions. But you fled before them, and declined the battle, leaving your wives and children to their mercy; they have destroyed your old town Ouiatanon and the neighboring villages, and have taken many prisoners. Resting here two days, to give you time to collect your strength, they have proceeded to your town of Kethipiconuck, but you again fled before them, and that great town has been destroyed. After giving you this evidence of their power, they have stopped their hands, because they are merciful as strong, and they again indulge the hope, that you will come to a sense of your true interest, and determine to make a lasting peace with them and all their children, forever. The United States have no desire to destroy the red people, although they have the power; but, should you decline this invitation, and pursue your unprovoked hostilities, their strength will again be exerted against you; your warriors will be slaughtered, your towns and villages ransacked and destroyed, your wives and children carried into captivity, and you may be assured that those who escape the fury of our mighty chiefs, shall find no resting place on this side the great lakes. The warriors of the United States wish not to distress or destroy women and children, or old men, and, although policy obliges them to retain some in captivity, yet compassion and humanity have induced them to set others at liberty, who will deliver you this talk. Those who are carried off will be left in the care of our great chief and warrior, General St. Clair, near the mouth of Miami and opposite the Licking river, where they will be treated with humanity and tenderness. If you wish to recover them, repair to that place by the first day of July next, determined, with true hearts, to bury the hatchet, and smoke the pipe of peace; they will then be restored to you, and you may again set down in security at your old towns, and live in peace and happiness, unmolested by the children of the United States, who will become your friends and protectors, and will be ready to furnish you with all the necessaries you may require. But, should you foolishly persist in your warfare, the sons of war will be let loose against you, and the hatchet will never be buried until your country is desolated, and your people humbled to the dust.

Given under my hand and seal, at the Ouiatanon town, this 4th day of June, 1791.

FRANKFORT ON KENTUCKY, August 24, 1791.

SIR:

Having carried into complete effect the enterprise which you were pleased to direct against a l'Anguille, and having done the savages every other damage on the Wabash, to which I conceived my force adequate, I embrace the first moment's recess from active duty, to detail to your Excellency the operations of the expedition entrusted to my conduct.

I left the neighborhood of fort Washington, on the 1st instant, at one o'clock, and agreeably to my original plan, feinted boldly at the Miami villages, by the most direct course the nature of the ground, over which I had to march, would permit; I persevered in this plan, until the morning of the 4th inst. and thereby avoided the hunting ground of the enemy, and the paths which lead direct from White river to the Wabash, leaving the head waters of the first to my left; I then being about 70 miles advanced of Fort Washington, turned northwest; I made no discovery until the 5th, about nine o'clock A. M. when I crossed three much frequented paths, within two miles of each other, and all bearing east of north; my guides were urgent for me to follow these paths, which betrayed their ignorance of the country, and convinced me I had to depend on my own judgment only. In the afternoon of that day I was obliged to cross a deep bog, which injured several of my horses exceedingly, and a few miles beyond, I struck a path bearing north by west, marked by the recent footsteps of five or six savages. My guides renewed their application to me to follow this path, but I pursued my course, which had been north 60 west, since 2 o'clock. I had not got clear of my encampment next morning, before my advance reported an impassable bog in my front, extending several miles on either hand, and the guides asserted that the whole country, to the Wabash, was cut by such bogs, and that it would be impossible for me to proceed, unless I followed the Indian paths, which avoided these bogs, or led through them at places where they were least difficult. Although I paid little regard to this information, as delay was dangerous, and every thing depended on the preservation of my horses, I determined to turn to the right, and fall into the path I had passed the evening before, which varied in its course from north by west to northeast. The country had now become poney in every direction; I therefore resolved to pursue this path until noon, in the hope that it would conduct me to better ground, or to some devious trace, which might lead to the object sought. At seven o'clock I crossed an east branch of Calumet river, about 40 yards wide, and about noon my advanced guard fired on a small party of warriors, and took a prisoner; the rest ran off to the eastward. I halted about a mile beyond the spot where this affair happened, and on examining the prisoner, found him to be a Delaware, living near the site of the late Miami village, which he informed me was about 30 miles distant; I immediately retrograded four miles, and filed off by the right over some rising ground, which I had observed between the east branch of Calumet river, and a creek four or five miles advance of it, taking my course north 60 west. This measure fortunately extricated me from the bogs and ponds, and soon placed me on firm ground; late in the afternoon, I crossed one path running from north to south, and shortly after fell into another, varying from northwest to north by west; I pursued this about two miles, when I encamped; but finding it still inclined northward, I determined to abandon it in the morning. I resumed my march on the 6th, at 4 o'clock, the Calumet being to the westward of me; I was fearful I should strike the Wabash too high up, and perhaps fall in with the small town which you mentioned to me, at the mouth of the former river; I therefore steered a due west course, and at 6 o'clock A. M. crossed a road much used, both by horse and foot, bearing due north. I now knew that I was near a Shawanese village, generally supposed to be on the waters of White river, but actually on those of the Calumet, and was sensible that every thing depended on the celerity and silence of my movements, as my real object had become manifest. I therefore pushed my march vigorously, leaving an officer and 20 men in ambush, to watch the road, in order to intercept or beat off any party of the enemy which might be casually passing that way, and thereby prevent, as long as possible, the discovery of my real intentions. At eight o'clock I recrossed Calumet river, now eighty yards wide, and running down N. N. W. and pursuing my course, I crossed one path near the western bank of the river, taking the same course, and at six miles distance another, bearing to the northeast. I was now sensible, from my reckoning, compared with my own observations during the late expedition under General Scott, and the information received from your Excellency and others, that I could not be very distant from à l'Anguille. The party left at the road soon fell in with four warriors encamped half a mile from the right of my line of march; killed one, and drove the others to the northward. My situation had now become extremely critical, the whole country to the north being in alarm, which made me greatly anxious to continue my march during the night; but I had no path to direct me, and it was impossible to keep my course, or for horsemen to march through a thick swampy country in utter darkness. I quitted my camp on the 7th, as soon as I could see my way, crossed one path at three miles distance, bearing northeast, and at seven miles I fell into another, very much used, bearing northwest by north, which I at once adopted, as the direct route to my object, and pushed forward with the utmost despatch; I halted at twelve o'clock to refresh the horses, and examine the men's arms and ammunition, marched again at half after one, and at fifteen minutes before five I struck the Wabash, about one and a half leagues above the mouth of Eel river, being the very spot for which I had aimed from the commencement of my march. I crossed the river, and following the path a north by east course, at the distance of two and a half miles, my reconnoitering party announced Eel river in front, and the town on the opposite bank. I dismounted, ran forward, and examined the situation of the town as far as was practicable, without exposing myself; but the whole face of the country, from the Wabash to the margin of Eel river, being a continued thicket of brambles, black jacks, weeds and shrubs of different kinds, it was impossible for me to get a satisfactory view, without endangering a discovery. I immediately determined to post two companies on the bank of the river, opposite to the town, and above the ground I then occupied, to make a detour with Major Caldwell and the second battalion, until I fell into the Miami trace, and by that route to cross the river above, and gain the rear of the town, and to leave directions with major McDowell, who commanded the first battalion, to lie perdué until I commenced the attack, then to dash through the river with his corps and the advanced guard, and assault the houses in front, and upon the left. In the moment I was about to put this arrangement into execution, word was brought me that the enemy had taken the alarm, and were flying; I instantly ordered a general charge, which was obeyed with alacrity; the men, forcing their way over every obstacle, plunged through the river with vast intrepidity. The enemy was unable to make the smallest resistance. Six warriors, (and in the hurry and confusion of the charge) two squaws, and a child, were killed, thirty-four prisoners were taken, and an unfortunate captive released, with the loss of two men killed and one wounded. I found this town scattered along Eel river for full three miles, on an uneven, scrubby oak barren, intersected alternately by bogs almost impassable, and impervious thickets of plum, hazle, and black jacks; notwithstanding these difficulties, if I may credit the report of the prisoners, very few who were in town escaped. Expecting a second expedition, their goods were generally packed up and buried. Sixty warriors had crossed the Wabash, to watch the paths leading from the Ohio. The head chief, with all the prisoners and a number of families, was out digging a root which they substitute in the place of the potato; and about one hour before my arrival, all the warriors, except eight, had mounted their horses, and rode up the river, to a French store, to purchase ammunition; this ammunition had arrived from the Miami village that very day, and the squaws informed me was stored about two miles from the town. I detached Major Caldwell in quest of it, but he failed to make any discovery, although he scoured the country for seven or eight miles up the river. I encamped in the town that night, and the next morning I cut up the corn, scarcely in the milk, burnt the cabins, mounted my young warriors, squaws, and children, in the best manner in my power, and leaving two infirm squaws and a child, with a short talk (a copy of which I have the honor to enclose you) I commenced my march for the Kickapoo town in the prairie. I felt my prisoners a vast incumbrance, but I was not in force to justify a detachment, having barely 523 rank and file, and being then in the bosom of the Ouia-tonon country, one hundred and eighty miles removed from succor, and not more than one and a half day's march from the Pattawatamies, Shawanese, and Delawares.

Not being able to discover any path in the direct course to the Kickapoo town, I marched by the road leading to Tippecanoe, in the hope of finding some diverging trace which might favor my design. I encamped, that evening, about six miles from Kenapacomaqua, the Indian name of the town I had destroyed, and marched next morning at 4 o'clock; my course continued west, till nine o'clock, when I turned to the northwest, on a small hunting path, and, at a short distance, I launched into the boundless prairies of the West, with the intention to pursue that course until I could strike a road, which leads from the Pattawatamies of lake Michigan, immediately to the town I sought; with this view I pushed forward, through bog after bog, to the saddle-skirts, in mud and water; and after persevering, for eight hours, I found myself environed, on all sides, with morasses, which forbade my advancing, and, at the same time, rendered it difficult for me to extricate my little army. The way by which we had entered was so much beat and softened by the horses, that it was almost impossible to return by that route, and my guides pronounced the morass, in front, impassable. A chain of thin groves, extending in the direction of the Wabash, at this time presented itself to my left; it was necessary I should gain these groves, and, for this purpose, I dismounted, went forward, and leading my horse through a bog, to the arm-pits in mud and water, with great difficulty and fatigue I accomplished my object; and, changing my course to south by west, I regained the Tippecanoe road at 5 o'clock, and encamped on it at 7 o'clock, after a march of 30 miles, which broke down several of my horses. I am the more minute, in detailing the occurrences of this day, because they produced the most unfavorable effects. I was in motion at 4 o'clock next morning, and at 8 o'clock my advanced guard made some discoveries, which induced me to believe we were near an Indian village. I immediately pushed that body forward in a trot, and followed with Major Caldwell and the 2d battalion, leaving Major McDowell to take the charge of the prisoners. I reached Tippecanoe at 12 o'clock, which had been occupied by the enemy, who watched my motions and abandoned the place that morning. After the destruction of this town, in June last, the enemy had returned, and cultivated their corn and pulse, which I found in high perfection, and in much greater quantity than at P'Anquille. To refresh my horses, and give time to cut down the corn, I determined to halt till the next morning, and then to resume my march to the Kickapoo town, on the prairie, by the road which leads from Ouiatanon to that place. In the course of the day, I had discovered some murmurings and discontent amongst the men, which I found, on inquiry, to proceed from their reluctance to advance farther into the enemy's country; this induced me to call for a state of the horses and provisions, when, to my great mortification, 270 horses were returned lame and tired, with barely five days' provisions for the men. Under these circumstances, I was compelled to abandon my designs upon the Kickapoo of the prairies, and, with a degree of anguish not to be comprehended but by those who have experienced similar disappointments, I marched forward to a town of the same nation, situate about three leagues west of Ouiatanon; as I advanced to that town, the enemy made some show of fighting me, but vanished at my approach. I destroyed this town, consisting of thirty houses, with a considerable quantity of corn in the milk, and the same day I moved on to Ouiatanon, where I forded the Wabash, and proceeded to the site of the villages, on the margin of the prairie, where I encamped, at 7 o'clock. At this town, and the villages destroyed by General Scott, in June, we found the corn had been replanted, and was now in high cultivation, several fields being well ploughed, all which was destroyed. On the 12th I resumed my march, and, falling into General Scott's return trace, I arrived, without any material incident, at the rapids of the Ohio, on the 21st instant, after a march, by accurate computation, of 451 miles from fort Washington.

The volunteers of Kentucky have on this occasion acquitted themselves with their usual good conduct; but, as no opportunity offered for individual distinction, it would be unjust to give to one the plaudits to which all have an equal title. I cannot, however, in propriety, forbear to express my warm approbation of the good conduct of my Majors, McDowell and Caldwell; and of Colonel Russel, who, in the character of a volunteer, without commission, led my advance; and I feel myself under obligations to Major Adair and Captain Parker, who acted immediately about my person, for the services they rendered me, by the most prompt, active, and energetic exertions.

The services which I have been able to render, fall short of my wishes, my intention, and my expectation; but, sir, when you reflect on the causes which checked my career and blasted my designs, I flatter myself you will believe every thing has been done which could be done in my circumstances. I have destroyed the chief town of the Ouiatanon nation, and made prisoners of the sons and sisters of the king. I have burnt a respectable Kickapoo village, and cut down at least 430 acres of corn, chiefly in the milk. The Ouiatanons, left without houses, home, or provision, must cease to war, and will find active employ to subsist their squaws and children during the impending winter. Should these services secure to the country which I immediately represented, and the corps which I had the honor to command, the favorable consideration of Government, I shall infer the approbation of my own conduct, which, added to a consciousness of having done my duty, will constitute the richest reward I can enjoy.

Mr. Charles Vancouver will have the honor to deliver this letter to your Excellency, who attended me as quartermaster to the expedition, and rendered me important services. He is able to give you a satisfactory idea of the situation of the country over which I passed, and can ascertain with precision the course and distance to any point of my route. I recommend him to you as a gentleman of worth.

With the warmest and most perfect respect, I have the honor to be, your Excellency's obliged, obedient, and most faithful servant,

JAS. WILKINSON.

His Exc'y Maj. Gen. St. CLAIR, Fort Washington.

To the Indian nations living on the river Wabash, and its waters:

The arms of the United States are again exerted against you, and again your towns are in flames, and your wives and children made captives; again you are cautioned to listen to the voice of reason, to sue for peace, and submit to the protection of the United States, who are willing to become your friends and fathers, but, at the same time, are determined to punish you for every injury you may offer to their children. Regard not those evil counsellors who, to secure to themselves the benefits of your trade, advise you to measures which involve you, your women and children, in trouble and distress. The United States wish to give you peace, because it is good in the eyes of the Great Spirit that all his children should unite and live like brothers; but, if you foolishly prefer war, their warriors are ready to meet you in battle, and will not be the first to lay down the hatchet. You may find your squaws and your children under the protection of our great chief and warrior General St. Clair, at fort Washington. To him you will make all applications for an exchange of prisoners or for peace.

Given under my hand and seal, at Kenapacomaqua, the 9th day of August, 1791.

JAS. WILKINSON, Lt. Col. Com'dt

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, NOVEMBER 9, 1791.

Mr. HAWKINS, from the committee to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, of the 26th of October last, transmitting a treaty recently made with the Cherokee Indians, reported:

That they have examined the said treaty, and find it strictly conformable to the instructions given by the President of the United States;

That these instructions were founded on the advice and consent of the Senate, of the 11th of August, 1790;

That the stipulations in the 14th article are similar to those gratuitously promised to the Creeks; and, although they form an excess to the sum limited in the resolution aforesaid, yet, from the beneficial effects likely to be produced thereby, cannot be objectionable.

That a new boundary has been arranged, which embraces the people settled to the south of French Broad, and between the same and the ridge which divides the waters running into Little river, and from those running into the Tennessee. That the boundary, in other respects, is nearly the same as that established at Hopewell.

The committee are therefore of opinion, that the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of said treaty.

ST. CLAIR'S DEFEAT BY THE INDIANS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS,] DECEMBER 12, 1791.

Gentlemen of the Senateand of the House of Representatives:

It is with great concern that I communicate to you the information received from Major General St. Clair, of the misfortune which has befallen the troops under his command.

Although the national loss is considerable according to the scale of the event, yet it may be repaired without great difficulty, excepting as to the brave men who have fallen on the occasion, and who are a subject of public as well as private regret.

A further communication will shortly be made of all such matters as shall be necessary to enable the Legislature to judge of the future measures which it may be proper to pursue.

FORT WASHINGTON, October 6th, 1791.

SIR:

I have now the satisfaction to inform you, that the army moved from fort Hamilton, the name I have given to the fort on the Miami, on the 4th, at eight in the morning, under the command of General Butler. The order of march and encampment I had regulated before, and on the 3d returned to this place to get up the militia; they marched yesterday, and consist of but about three hundred men, as you will see by the enclosed abstract of the muster. I have reason to believe, however, that at least an equal number will be up here by the 10th, and I have left orders for their following us. The monthly return should have accompanied this letter, but it was not ready when I left camp, and has not been forwarded since. I have hitherto found it impossible to reduce the officers commanding corps to punctuality with respect to their returns, but they are mending; our numbers, after deducting the garrisons of this place and fort Hamilton, are about two thousand, exclusive of the militia. I trust I shall find them sufficient, and should the rest of the militia come on, it will make the matter pretty certain; but the season is now so far advanced, that I fear the intermediate posts, which would indeed have been highly necessary, it will be impossible to establish. In that, however, I must be governed by circumstances, of which I will take care that you shall be apprised in due time. Should the enemy come to meet us, which seems to be expected, and be discomfited, there will be no difficulties; but if they expect us at the Miami villages, the business will wear another face, and the intermediate posts become more essential. Since the quartermaster has been here, and got into his gears, which it took him a little time to do, I am very well satisfied with him, and do believe that he will answer the description you were pleased to give me of him. His business seems now to be well arranged.

In order to communicate with some degree of certainty with your office, I have directed Captain Buell, when he arrives, to send a sergeant and twelve men to a house that has been newly erected half way between this place and Lexington, to each of which two men are to be sent off on every Monday morning to carry despatches; those for the War Office, or any other public letters, to be put into the hands of Mr. Charles Wilkins, merchant of Lexington, who has engaged to forward all I have occasion to send, regularly once a fortnight; and should you, sir, think proper to use the same route for any of yours, if they are sent to his care he will forward them to me. I have been led to prefer this channel of communication to that of the river, because it appears to be rather the more certain of the two, though it may be a little more tedious, and because desertion continues to prevail among the troops, and the sending small parties to such a distance gives great opportunity to effect it. General Butler informs me that no less than twenty-one went off the night before the army moved from fort Hamilton. I am this moment setting out for the army, which I hope to overtake to-morrow evening, and will write to you again as soon after as may be.

With great regard and respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your very humble servant,

ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

The Hon. Major General KNOX, Secretary of War.

P. S. The officers have it in their power to receive a part of their rations, or the whole, and where they take a part only, to be paid for what is retained, at the contract price. The contractor's agents say they have no money to pay for retained rations, and where they have given certificates, or what they call due bills, refuse to discharge them, unless what they think proper to give, and at what price they think proper, is taken in place of them. Some means to prevent this abuse should be fallen upon. The whole rations are made up in the abstracts; were those to be accompanied with a list of the certificates given in the period of the abstract, which they should be obliged to give, the money might be stopped at the treasury, and the officers would be sure of it. At present, it is very hard upon them. This instant I hear of two hundred men, militia, about fifteen miles off.

SIR:

Since I had the honor to write to you on the 21st instant, nothing very material has happened; and, indeed, I am at present so unwell (and have been so for some time past) that I could ill detail it, if it had happened. Not that that space of time has been entirely barren of incidents, but, as few of them have been of the agreeable kind, I beg you to accept a sort of journal account of them, which will be the easiest for me.

On the 22d, the indisposition that had hung about me for some time, sometimes appearing as a bilious cholic, and sometimes as a rheumatic asthma, to my great satisfaction changed to a gout in the left arm and hand, leaving the breast and stomach perfectly relieved, and the cough, which had been excessive, entirely gone. This day, Mr. Ellis, with sixty militia from Kentucky, joined the army, and brought up a quantity of flour and beef.

23d.—Two men taken in the act of deserting to the enemy, and one for shooting another soldier and threatening to kill an officer, were hanged upon the grand parade, the whole army being drawn out. Since the army has halted, the country around this and ahead for fifteen miles, has been well examined; it is a country which, had we arrived a month sooner in it, and with three times the number of animals, they would have been all fat now.

24th.—Named the fort Jefferson, (it lies in lat. 40° 4' 22" north,) and marched, the same Indian path serving to conduct us about six miles, and encamped on good ground and an excellent position—a rivulet in front, and a very large prairie, which would, at the proper season, afford forage for a thousand horses on the left. So ill this day, that I had much difficulty in keeping with the army.

25th.—Very hard rains last night; obliged to halt to-day, on account of provision: for though the soldiers may be kept pretty easy in camp, under the expectation of provision arriving, they cannot bear to march in advance, and take none along with them. I received a letter from Mr. Hodgdon by express; thirteen thousand pounds of flour will arrive on the 27th.

26th.—A party of militia, sent to reconnoitre, fell in with five Indians, and suffered them to slip through their fingers; in their camp, articles to the value of twenty-five dollars were found and divided. The Virginia battalion is melting down very fast, notwithstanding the promises of the men to the officers; thirteen have been discharged by Colonel Dark to-day.

27th.—Gave orders for enlisting the levies, with the condition of serving out their time in their present corps. Piomingo arrived in camp with his warriors; I was so unwell, I could only see him and bid him welcome, but entered on no business; considerable dissatisfaction among the levies about their enlistments.

28th.—Some clothing sent for to fort Washington, for the recruits, arrived; was begun to be distributed, and will have a good effect; but the enlisting the levies does not meet with the encouragement that might have been expected. It is not openly complained of by the officers, but it is certainly, privately, by some of high rank, and the measure of tempting them with warm clothing condemned. Mr. Hodgdon writes me that he is sending forward a quantity of woollen overalls and socks, by General Butler's orders. I have ordered them to be deposited at fort Jefferson. Some few Indians about us, probably those the militia fell in with a day or two ago. Two of the levies were fired upon about three miles off: one killed, two of the militia likewise, one of them got in, the other missing, supposed to be taken.

29th.—Piomingo and his people, accompanied by Captain Sparks and four good riflemen, gone on a scout; they do not propose to return under ten days, unless they sooner succeed in taking prisoners and scalps.

31st.—This morning about sixty of the militia deserted; it was at first reported that one half of them had gone off, and that their design was to plunder the convoys which were upon the roads; detached the first regiment in pursuit of them, with orders to Major Hamtramck to send a sufficient guard back with Benham, whenever he met with him, and follow them about twenty-five miles below fort Jefferson, or until he met the second convoy, and then return and join the army.

Benham arrived last night, and to-day, November 1st, the army is halted to give the road-cutters an opportunity of getting some distance ahead, and that I might write to you. I am this day considerably recovered, and hope that it will turn out what I at first expected it would be, a friendly fit of the gout, come to relieve me from every other complaint.

Yesterday I was favored with yours of the 28th and 29th September. I have enclosed my communications with the old and new contractors, and their answers. My orders for the posts to them are not yet definite, but they will be very soon; in the mean time, I expect they are both at work.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, &c.

AR. ST. CLAIR.

The Hon. Major General Knox, Secretary of War.

Your letters for General Wilkinson and General Scott, Mr. Innes and Mr. Brown, are sent back, and the public thanks, in the name of the President, presented to General Wilkinson, agreeably to your directions.

Copy of a letter from Major General St. Clair to the Secretary for the Department of War.

FORT WASHINGTON, November 9th, 1791.

SIR:

Yesterday afternoon, the remains of the army under my command got back to this place, and I have now the painful task to give you an account of as warm and as unfortunate an action as almost any that has been fought, in which every corps was engaged and worsted, except the first regiment. That had been detached upon a service I had the honor to inform you of in my last despatch, and had not joined me.

On the 3d instant, the army had reached a creek about twelve yards wide, running to the southward of west, which I believe to have been the river St. Mary, that empties itself into the Miami of the lake at Miami village, about four o'clock in the afternoon, having marched near nine miles, and were immediately encamped upon a very commanding piece of ground, in two lines, having the above mentioned creek in front. The right wing, composed of Butler's, Clarke's, and Paterson's battalions, commanded by Major General Butler, formed the first line, and the left wing, consisting of Bedinger's and Gaither's battalions, and the second regiment, commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Dark, formed the second line, with an interval between them of about seventy yards, which was all the ground would allow. The right flank was pretty well secured by the creek; a steep bank, and Faulkner's corps, some of the cavalry, and their picquets, covered the left flank. The militia were thrown over the creek, and advanced about one quarter of a mile, and encamped in the same order. There were a few Indians who appeared on the opposite side of the creek, but fled with the utmost precipitation, on the advance of the militia. At this place, which I judged to be about fifteen miles from the Miami village, I had determined to throw a slight work, the plan of which was concerted that evening with Major Ferguson, wherein to have deposited the men's knapsacks, and every thing else that was not of absolute necessity, and to have moved on to attack the enemy as soon as the first regiment was come up. But they did not permit me to execute either: for, on the fourth, about half an hour before sun-rise, and when the men had been just dismissed from the parade, (for it was a constant practice to have them all under arms a considerable time before day-light) an attack was made upon the militia. Those gave way in a very little time, and rushed into camp through Major Butler's battalion, which, together with part of Clark's, they threw into considerable disorder, and which, notwithstanding the exertions of both those officers, was never altogether remedied, the Indians following close at their heels. The fire, however, of the front line, checked them, but almost instantly a very heavy attack began upon that line, and in a few minutes it was extended to the second likewise. The great weight of it was directed against the centre of each, where the artillery was placed, and from which the men were repeatedly driven with great slaughter. Finding no great effect from our fire, and confusion beginning to spread from the great number of men who were falling in all quarters, it became necessary to try what could be done by the bayonet. Lieutenant Colonel Dark was accordingly ordered to make a charge with part of the second line, and to turn the left flank of the enemy. This was executed with great spirit. The Indians instantly gave way, and were driven back three or four hundred yards; but for want of a sufficient number of riflemen to pursue this advantage, they soon returned, and the troops were obliged to give back in their turn. At this moment they had entered our camp by the left flank, having pushed back the troops that were posted there. Another charge was made here by the second regiment, Butler's and Clarke's battalions, with equal effect, and it was repeated several times, and always with success; but in all of them, many men were lost, and particularly the officers, which, with so raw troops, was a loss altogether irremediable. In that I just spoke of, made by the second regiment and Butler's battalion, Major Butler was dangerously wounded, and every officer of the second regiment fell except three, one of which, Mr. Groaton, was shot through the body. Our artillery being now silenced, and all the officers killed except Captain Ford, who was very badly wounded, and more than half of the army fallen, being cut off from the road, it became necessary to attempt the regaining it, and to make a retreat, if possible. To this purpose, the remains of the army was formed as well as circumstances would admit, towards the right of the encampment, from which, by the way of the second line, another charge was made upon the enemy, as if with the design to turn their right flank, but in fact, to gain the road. This was effected, and as soon as it was open, the militia took along it, followed by the troops; Major Clarke, with his battalion, covering the rear. The retreat, in those circumstances, was, you may be sure, a very precipitate one. It was, in fact, a flight. The camp and the artillery were abandoned; but that was unavoidable: for not a horse was left alive to have drawn it off, had it otherwise been practicable. But the most disgraceful part of the business is, that the greatest part of the men threw away their arms and accoutrements, even after the pursuit, which continued about four miles, had ceased. I found the road strewn with them for many miles, but was not able to remedy it: for, having had all my horses killed, and being mounted upon one that could not be pricked out of a walk, I could not get forward myself; and the orders I sent forward, either to halt the front, or to prevent the men from parting with their arms, were unattended to. The rout continued quite to fort Jefferson, twenty-nine miles, which was reached a little after sun-setting. The action began about half an hour before sunrise, and the retreat was attempted at a half an hour after nine o'clock. I have not yet been able to get returns of the killed and wounded; but Major General Butler, Lieutenant Colonel Oldham, of the militia, Major Ferguson, Major Heart, and Major Clarke, are among the former; Colonel Sargent, my Adjutant General, Lieutenant Colonel Dark, Lieutenant Colonel Gibson, Major Butler, and the Viscount Malartie, who served me as an aid-de-camp, are among the latter, and a great number of captains and subalterns in both.

I have now, sir, finished my melancholy tale—a tale that will be felt sensibly by every one that has sympathy for private distress, or for public misfortune. I have nothing, sir, to lay to the charge of the troops, but their want of discipline, which, from the short time they had been in service, it was impossible they should have acquired, and which rendered it very difficult, when they were thrown into confusion, to reduce them again to order, and is one reason why the loss has fallen so heavy upon the officers, who did every thing in their power to effect it. Neither were my own exertions wanting; but, worn down with illness, and suffering under a painful disease, unable either to mount or dismount a horse without assistance, they were not so great as they otherwise would, and perhaps ought to have been. We were overpowered by numbers; but it is no more than justice to observe, that, though composed of so many different species of troops, the utmost harmony prevailed through the whole army during the campaign.

At fort Jefferson, I found the first regiment, which had returned from the service they had been sent upon, without either overtaking the deserters, or meeting the convoy of provisions. I am not certain, sir, whether I ought to consider the absence of this regiment from the field of action, as fortunate or otherwise. I incline to think it was fortunate: for, I very much doubt whether, had it been in the action, the fortune of the day had been turned; and if it had not, the triumph of the enemy would have been more complete, and the country would have been destitute of every means of defence.

Taking a view of the situation of our broken troops at fort Jefferson, and that there was no provision in the fort, I called upon the field officers, viz. Lieutenant Colonel Dark, Major Hamtramck, Major Zeigler, and Major Gaither, together with the adjutant general, for their advice what would be proper further to be done; and it was their unanimous opinion, that the addition of the first regiment, unbroken as it was, did not put the army on so respectable a foot as it was in the morning, because a great part of it was now unarmed; that it had been then found unequal to the enemy, and should they come on, which was probable, would be found so again. That the troops could not be thrown into the fort, both because it was too small, and that there were no provisions in it. That provisions were known to be upon the road, at the distance of one, or at most two marches; that, therefore, it would be proper to move, without loss of time, to meet the provisions, when the men might have the sooner an opportunity of some refreshment, and that a proper detachment might be sent back with it, to have it safely deposited in the fort. This advice was accepted, and the army was put in motion again at ten o'clock, and marched all night, and the succeeding day met with a quantity of flour. Part of it was distributed immediately, part taken back to supply the army on the march to fort Hamilton, and the remainder, about fifty horse loads, sent forward to fort Jefferson. The next day, a drove of cattle was met with for the same place, and I have information that both got in. The wounded who had been left at that place, were ordered to be brought here by the return horses.

I have said, sir, in a former part of this letter, that we were overpowered by numbers. Of that, however, I have no other evidence but the weight of the fire, which was always a most deadly one, and generally delivered from the ground—few of the enemy shewing themselves afoot, except when they were charged; and that, in a few minutes, our whole camp, which extended above three hundred and fifty yards in length, was entirely surrounded, and attacked on all quarters.

The loss, sir, the public has sustained by the fall of so many officers, particularly General Butler and Major Ferguson, cannot be too much regretted; but it is a circumstance that will alleviate the misfortune in some measure, that all of them fell most gallantly doing their duty. I have had very particular obligations to many of them, as well as to the survivors, but to none more than to Colonel Sargent. He has discharged the various duties of his office with zeal, with exactness, and with intelligence, and on all occasions, afforded me every assistance in his power, which I have also experienced from my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Denny, and the Viscount Malartie, who served with me in the station as a volunteer.

With every sentiment of respect and regard, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,
AR. ST. CLAIR.

The Honorable Major General KNOX, Secretary of War.

P. S. Some orders that had been given to Colonel Oldham over night, and which were of much consequence, were not executed; and some very material intelligence was communicated by Captain Hough to General Butler, in the course of the night, before the action, which was never imparted to me, nor did I hear of it until after my arrival here.

No. 23.

[1st SESSION.

NORTHWESTERN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 11, 1792.

*Gentlemen of the Senate
and of the House of Representatives:*

I lay before you, in confidence, two reports made to me by the Secretary for the Department of War, relatively to the present state of affairs on the Western frontiers of the United States.

In these reports the causes of the present war with the Indians; the measures taken by the Executive to terminate it amicably; and the military preparations for the late campaign, are stated and explained; and also a plan suggested of such further measures on the occasion as appear just and expedient.

I am persuaded, gentlemen, that you will take this important subject into your immediate and serious consideration, and that the result of your deliberations will be the adoption of such wise and efficient measures as will reflect honor on our national councils, and promote the welfare of our country.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, *January 11th, 1792.*WAR DEPARTMENT, 26th December, 1791.

SIR:

I have the honor to submit to your consideration, two reports, relatively to the Western frontiers of the United States.

The report A is accompanied by official documents, and is intended to exhibit the measures taken by the Executive to induce the hostile Indians to peace, without the necessity of using force against them; and also the measures of the Executive relative to the objects and preparations of the campaign of 1791, and in some degree an explanation of the causes of its failure.

The report B contains a general, but summary review of the conduct of the United States towards the Indians northwest of the Ohio, since our separation from Great Britain.

And it also contains an opinion, delivered with great diffidence, of such further measures as the nature of the case, and the public interests, seem to require.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

H. KNOX, *Secretary of War.*The PRESIDENT of the United States.

A.

A summary statement of facts, relatively to the measures taken, in behalf of the United States, to induce the hostile Indians, northwest of the Ohio, to peace, previously to the exercise of coercion against them; and also a statement of the arrangements for the campaign of 1791.

That the measures of the Executive of the United States, relatively to Indian affairs, since the operation of the General Government, have been calculated to produce a peace with all the Indian tribes, upon the terms of justice and humanity, may be evinced by having recourse to the records of the Indian department.

That, as the former proceedings have generally been laid before the Legislature, the present statement commences with the close of the campaign of the year 1790.

That the Cornplanter, a war-captain of the Senecas, and other Indians of the same tribe, being in Philadelphia, December, 1790, measures were taken to impress them with the moderation of the United States, as it respected the war with the Western Indians; that the coercive measures against them had been the consequence of their refusal to listen to the invitations of peace, and a continuance of their depredations on the frontiers.

That, at the same time, the Senecas were warned to restrain their young men from taking part with the hostile Indians; upon which point, assurances were made by the Cornplanter, that he, and the Indians under his influence, would not only be friends to the United States, but that they would endeavor to prevent the further hostilities of the Western Indians. Arrangements were accordingly made, that the Cornplanter, with other friendly Indians, should proceed to the Western tribes, and endeavor to influence them to peace.

That, in addition to this measure, Colonel Thomas Procter, on the 10th of March, was sent to the Cornplanter to hasten his departure, to accompany him to the Miami villages; and messages were sent to the Indians, declaratory of the sentiments of the United States towards them.

That both the Cornplanter and Colonel Procter met with difficulties, in the due execution of their orders, which were insurmountable.

That further measures were taken, in the month of April, to draw the Six Nations to a conference, at a distance from the theatre of war, in order not only to prevent their joining therein, but, also, if necessary, to obtain some of their young men to join our army, in case of hostilities being inevitable.

That the said conference was accordingly held at the Painted Post, in the month of June, by Colonel Pickering.

That, besides these, measures were taken for holding a treaty with the Cherokees, which was concluded on the second of July; and also other pacific measures were pursued with the Chickasaws and Creeks.

That Major General St. Clair was instructed, in addition to the measures immediately taken by the Executive, to devise and execute further expedients to endeavor to quiet the hostile Indians, without a further effusion of blood. That he accordingly forwarded messages to the Delawares and Wyandots, and through them, to the hostile Indians, expressive of the pacific and humane dispositions of the United States towards them.

That he also endeavored to tranquilize the Wyandots and Delawares, relative to some of their members having been killed in March, who had been trading at a block-house at Big Beaver creek.

That, although the Governor of Pennsylvania, at the request of the Secretary of War, issued his proclamation to bring the offenders to justice, yet it does not appear to have been done.

That the preparations of the campaign commenced while the subject was under the consideration of Congress.

That two thousand arms and accoutrements, and a proportional quantity of ammunition, were transported to fort Pitt, during the months of February, March and April.

That eight pieces of artillery, and stores, were also arranged, repaired, and transported to fort Pitt.

That the corps of two thousand levies, authorized by the act of Congress of the 3d of March, were organized into two regiments, each of three battalions; that one battalion was raised in New Jersey, two in Pennsylvania, one in Maryland, one in Virginia, and one in the territory of the United States, south of the Ohio; the latter being intended to be armed entirely with rifles.

That each battalion consisted of four companies, and each company of eighty-three non-commissioned officers and privates, amounting, in all, to the number of one thousand nine hundred and ninety-two.

That of the levies, there were raised and marched, from their respective rendezvous, during the months of April, May, June, and the beginning of July, one thousand six hundred and seventy-four non-commissioned and privates.

That of the first and second regiments of the more permanent troops of the United States, there were recruited, and marched to the frontiers, during the months of April, May, June, and the beginning of July, seven hundred and eighteen; and of the battalion of artillery, forty-five, making, in the whole, seven hundred and sixty-three non-commissioned and privates.

That the total of the regulars and levies, who actually marched from their respective rendezvous, appear to have been two thousand four hundred and thirty-seven; and to which is to be added, two hundred and sixty-two of the first regiment and artillery, previously at fort Washington, which will make the whole to amount to two thousand six hundred and ninety-nine, non-commissioned and privates.

That, of these, there appear to have been at fort Washington, and different parts of the Ohio, in the month of September last, as per abstract of musters, two thousand five hundred and eighty-seven privates.

That the continental troops, consisting of regulars and levies, artillery, and cavalry, for the expedition, as appears by Major General St. Clair's letter of 6th of October, amount to about two thousand.

That, besides the aforesaid number of two thousand six hundred and ninety-nine troops on the Ohio, there have been enlisted and marched, of the second regiment, three hundred and seventy-three non-commissioned and privates, of whom two companies, consisting of one hundred and fifty-six, have been at fort Pitt until lately, when they descended the Ohio to Fort Washington. Another company, of fifty-nine, have been detached to Georgia, which, with the troops already there, and a company recruited in South-Carolina, which is also ordered there, will amount to five hundred and ninety-two non-commissioned and privates; besides which, there is a small detachment at West Point, of seventeen men.

That thus it will appear, that, of the troops authorized by the acts of Congress, amounting to four thousand one hundred and twenty-eight non-commissioned and privates, only the number of three thousand three hundred and eight, are, and have been raised.

That the deficiency, of eight hundred and twenty, have not been enlisted, appears to have been in consequence of the low pay, and perhaps the nature of the service.

That, previously to the enlistment of the levies, to-wit: on the tenth day of March, in consequence of irruptions of the Indians on the frontiers, the county lieutenants of the frontiers, lying along the Ohio, and in the southwestern parts of Virginia, and in the territory of the United States south of the Ohio, were empowered to call forth the militia for the defensive protection of said counties, respectively.

That this measure was dictated by the necessity of the case, and under the laws authorizing the President of the United States for the purpose.

That, besides this species of defensive protection afforded the frontiers, during the preparing the army for a forward movement, two desultory operations were directed, at the expense of the United States, from the district of Kentucky, and both of which succeeded in a considerable degree. These expeditions were intended as well to prevent the Indians from spreading themselves on the frontiers, by calling their attention to their own safety, as to shew our power to chastise them.

That Major General St. Clair, besides his troops of regulars and levies, had authority to call for militia from Kentucky, to supply any deficiencies of new levies, and that such militia should be of such species as he should judge proper. That the said Major General St. Clair called for one thousand one hundred and fifty militia, but of these, only the number of four hundred and eighteen joined him, as appears by the abstract of the musters; but, by his letter of the first of November, there appears sixty to have joined him on the march, and about as many deserted.

That the detention of his troops in the upper parts of the Ohio, and afterwards the lowness of the waters in that river, were considered by him as truly unfortunate circumstances.

That the instructions of Major General St. Clair contain the plan of the campaign. That the said instructions, and the other papers on which this statement is formed, whether relative to the Indian department, or the preparations for the campaign, are hereunto annexed.

All which is humbly submitted to the President of the United States.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 26th, 1791.

The speech of the Cornplanter, Half-Town, and the Great-Tree, Chiefs and Councillors of the Seneca nation, to the Great Councillor of the Thirteen Fires.

FATHER:

The voice of the Seneca nation speaks to you, the great councillor, in whose heart the wise men of all the Thirteen Fires have placed their wisdom. It may be very small in your ears, and we therefore entreat you to hearken with attention: for we are about to speak of things which are to us very great. When your army entered the country of the Six Nations, we called you the town destroyer; and to this day, when that name is heard, our women look behind them and turn pale, and our children cling close to the necks of their mothers. Our councillors and warriors are men, and cannot be afraid; but their hearts are grieved with the fears of our women and children, and desire it may be buried so deep as to be heard no more.

When you gave us peace, we called you father, because you promised to secure us in the possession of our lands. Do this, and, so long as the lands shall remain, that beloved name will live in the heart of every Seneca.

FATHER: We mean to open our hearts before you, and we earnestly desire that you will let us clearly understand what you resolve to do. When our chiefs returned from the treaty at fort Stanwix, and laid before our council what had been done there, our nation was surprised to hear how great a country you had compelled them to give up to you, without your paying to us any thing for it. Every one said that your hearts were yet swelled with resentment against us for what had happened during the war, but that one day you would reconsider it with more kindness. We asked each other, What have we done to deserve such severe chastisement?

FATHER: When you kindled your thirteen fires separately, the wise men that assembled at them told us, that you were all brothers, the children of one great father, who regarded, also, the red people as his children. They called us brothers, and invited us to his protection; they told us that he resided beyond the great water, where the sun first rises; that he was a king whose power no people could resist, and that his goodness was bright as that sun. What they said went to our hearts; we accepted the invitation, and promised to obey him. What the Seneca nation promise, they faithfully perform; and when you refused obedience to that king, he commanded us to assist his beloved men in making you sober. In obeying him, we did no more than yourselves had led us to promise. The men who claimed this promise told us that you were children, and had no guns; that when they had shaken you, you would submit. We hearkened to them, and were deceived, until your army approached our towns. We were deceived; but your people, in teaching us to confide in that king, had helped to deceive, and we now appeal to your heart—Is the blame all ours?

FATHER: When we saw that we were deceived, and heard the invitation which you gave us to draw near to the fire which you kindled, and talk with you concerning peace, we made haste towards it. You then told us that we were in your hand, and that, by closing it, you could crush us to nothing, and you demanded from us a great country, as the price of that peace which you had offered us; as if our want of strength had destroyed our rights; our chiefs had felt your power, and were unable to contend against you, and they therefore gave up that country. What they agreed to, has bound our nation; but your anger against us must, by this time, be cooled; and, although our strength has not increased, nor your power become less, we ask you to consider calmly, Were the terms dictated to us by your commissioners reasonable and just?

FATHER: Your commissioners, when they drew the line which separated the land then given up to you from that which you agreed should remain to be ours, did most solemnly promise, that we should be secured in the peaceable possession of the lands which we inhabited east and north of that line. Does this promise bind you?

Hear now, we beseech you, what has since happened concerning that land. On the day in which we finished the treaty at fort Stanwix, commissioners from Pennsylvania told our chiefs that they had come there to purchase from us all the lands belonging to us, within the lines of their State, and they told us that their line would strike the river Susquehanna below Tioga branch. They then left us to consider of the bargain till the next day; on the next day we let them know that we were unwilling to sell all the lands within their State, and proposed to let them have a part of it, which we pointed out to them in their map. They told us that they must have the whole; that it was already ceded to them by the great king, at the time of making peace with you, and was their own; but they said that they would not take advantage of that, and were willing to pay us for it, after the manner of their ancestors. Our chiefs were unable to contend, at that time, and therefore they sold the lands up to the line, which was then shewn to them as the line of that State. What the commissioners had said about the land having been ceded to them at the peace, our chiefs considered as intended only to lessen the price, and they passed it by with very little notice; but, since that time, we have heard so much from others about the right to our lands, which the king gave when you made peace with him, that it is our earnest desire that you will tell us what it means.

FATHER: Our nation empowered John Livingston to let out part of our lands on rent, to be paid to us. He told us, that he was sent by Congress, to do this for us, and we fear he has deceived us in the writing he obtained from us.

For, since the time of our giving that power, a man of the name of Phelps has come among us, and claimed our whole country northward of the line of Pennsylvania, under purchase from that Livingston, to whom, he said, he had paid twenty thousand dollars for it. He said, also, that he had bought, likewise, from the council of the Thirteen Fires, and paid them twenty thousand dollars more for the same.

And he said, also, that it did not belong to us, for that the great king had ceded the whole of it, when you made peace with him. Thus he claimed the whole country north of Pennsylvania, and west of the lands belonging to the Cayugas. He demanded it; he insisted on his demand, and declared that he would have it all. It was impossible for us to grant him this, and we immediately refused it. After some days, he proposed to run a line, at a small distance eastward of our western boundary, which we also refused to agree to. He then threatened us with immediate war, if we did not comply.

Upon this threat, our chiefs held a council, and they agreed that no event of war could be worse than to be driven, with their wives and children, from the only country which we had any right to, and, therefore, weak as our nation was, they determined to take the chance of war, rather than to submit to such unjust demands, which seemed to have no bounds. Street, the great trader to Niagara, was then with us, having come at the request of Phelps, and as he always professed to be our great friend, we consulted him upon this subject. He also told us, that our lands had been ceded by the king, and that we must give them up.

Astonished at what we heard from every quarter, with hearts aching with compassion for our women and children, we were thus compelled to give up all our country north of the line of Pennsylvania and east of the Genesee river, up to the fork, and east of a south line drawn from that fork to the Pennsylvania line.

For this land, Phelps agreed to pay us ten thousand dollars in hand, and one thousand a year for ever.

He paid us two thousand and five hundred dollars in hand, part of the ten thousand, and he sent for us to come last spring, to receive our money; but instead of paying us the remainder of the ten thousand dollars, and the one thousand dollars due for the first year, he offered us no more than five hundred dollars, and insisted that he agreed with us for that sum, to be paid yearly. We debated with him for six days, during all which time he persisted in refusing to pay us our just demand, and he insisted that we should receive the five hundred dollars; and Street, from Niagara, also insisted on our receiving the money, as it was offered to us. The last reason he assigned for continuing to refuse paying us, was, that the king had ceded the lands to the Thirteen Fires, and that he had bought them from you, and paid you for them.

We could bear this confusion no longer, and determined to press through every difficulty, and lift up our voice that you might hear us, and to claim that security in the possession of our lands, which your commissioners so solemnly promised us. And we now entreat you to inquire into our complaints and redress our wrongs.

FATHER: Our writings were lodged in the hands of Street, of Niagara, as we supposed him to be our friend; but when we saw Phelps consulting with Street, on every occasion, we doubted of his honesty towards us, and we have since heard, that he was to receive for his endeavors to deceive us, a piece of land ten miles in width, west of the Genesee river, and near forty miles in length, extending to Lake Ontario; and the lines of this tract have been run accordingly, although no part of it is within the bounds which limit his purchase. No doubt he meant to deceive us.

FATHER: You have said that we are in your hand, and that, by closing it, you could crush us to nothing. Are you determined to crush us? If you are, tell us so, that those of our nation who have become your children, and have determined to die so, may know what to do.

In this case, one chief has said he would ask you to put him out of pain. Another, who will not think of dying by the hand of his father or of his brother, has said he will retire to the Chateaugay, eat of the fatal root, and sleep with his fathers, in peace.

Before you determine on a measure so unjust, look up to God, who made us as well as you. We hope he will not permit you to destroy the whole of our nation.

FATHER: Hear our case; many nations inhabited this country; but they had no wisdom, and, therefore, they warred together. The Six Nations were powerful, and compelled them to peace; the lands, for a great extent, were given up to them; but the nations which were not destroyed, all continued on those lands, and claimed the protection of the Six Nations, as the brothers of their fathers. They were men, and when at peace, they had a right to live upon the earth. The French came among us, and built Niagara; they became our fathers, and took care of us. Sir William Johnston came and took that fort from the French; he became our father, and promised to take care of us, and did so, until you were too strong for his king. To him we gave four miles round Niagara, as a place of trade. We have already said, how we came to join against you; we saw that we were wrong; we wished for peace; you demanded a great country to be given up to you; it was surrendered to you, as the price of peace, and we ought to have peace and possession of the little land which you then left us.

FATHER: When that great country was given up, there were but few chiefs present, and they were compelled to give it up, and it is not the Six Nations only that reproach those chiefs with having given up that country. The Chippewas, and all the nations who lived on those lands westward, call to us, and ask us, Brothers of our fathers, where is the place you have reserved for us to lie down upon?

FATHER: You have compelled us to do that which has made us ashamed. We have nothing to answer to the children of the brothers of our fathers. When, last spring, they called upon us to go to war, to secure them a bed to lie upon, the Senecas entreated them to be quiet, till we had spoken to you. But, on our way down, we heard that your army had gone toward the country which those nations inhabit, and if they meet together, the best blood on both sides will stain the ground.

FATHER: We will not conceal from you, that the great God, and not men, has preserved the Cornplanter from the hands of his own nation. For they ask, continually, Where is the land which our children, and their children after them, are to lie down upon? You told us, say they, that the line drawn from Pennsylvania to lake Ontario, would mark it forever on the east, and the line running from Beaver creek to Pennsylvania, would mark it on the west, and we see that it is not so. For, first one, and then another, come, and take it away, by order of that people which you tell us promised to secure it to us. He is silent, for he has nothing to answer.

When the sun goes down, he opens his heart before God, and earlier than that sun appears again upon the hills, he gives thanks for his protection during the night: for he feels that, among men, become desperate by their danger, it is God only that can preserve him. He loves peace, and all he had in store, he has given to those who have been robbed by your people; lest they should plunder the innocent to repay themselves. The whole season which others have employed in providing for their families, he has spent in his endeavors to preserve peace; and, at this moment, his wife and children are lying on the ground, and in want of food; his heart is in pain for them, but he perceives that the great God will try his firmness, in doing what is right.

FATHER: The game which the Great Spirit sent into our country for us to eat, is going from among us. We thought he intended that we should till the ground with the plough, as the white people do, and we talked to one another about it. But before we speak to you concerning this, we must know from you whether you mean to leave us and our children any land to till. Speak plainly to us concerning this great business.

All the lands we have been speaking of belonged to the Six Nations; no part of it ever belonged to the King of England, and he could not give it to you.

The land we live on, our fathers received from God, and they transmitted it to us, for our children, and we cannot part with it.

FATHER: We told you that we would open our hearts to you. Hear us once more.

At fort Stanwix, we agreed to deliver up those of our people who should do you any wrong, that you might try them, and punish them according to your law. We delivered up two men accordingly, but instead of trying them according to your law, the lowest of your people took them from your magistrate, and put them immediately to death. It is just to punish murder with death; but the Senecas will not deliver up their people to men who disregard the treaties of their own nation.

FATHER: Innocent men of our nation are killed one after another, and of our best families; but none of your people who have committed the murder have been punished.

We recollect that you did not promise to punish those who killed our people, and we now ask, was it intended that your people should kill the Senecas, and not only remain unpunished by you, but be protected by you against the revenge of the next of kin?

FATHER: These are to us very great things. We know that you are very strong, and we have heard that you are wise, and we wait to hear your answer to what we have said, that we may know that you are just.

Signed at Philadelphia, the first day of December, 1790.

The reply of the President of the United States to the speech of the Cornplanter, Half-Town, and Great-Tree, Chiefs and Councillors of the Seneca nation of Indians.

I, the President of the United States, by my own mouth, and by a written speech, signed with my own hand, and sealed with the seal of the United States, speak to the Seneca nation, and desire their attention, and that they would keep this speech in remembrance of the friendship of the United States.

I have received your speech with satisfaction, as a proof of your confidence in the justice of the United States, and I have attentively examined the several objects which you have laid before me, whether delivered by your own chiefs at Tioga Point, in the last month, to Colonel Pickering, or laid before me in the present month, by the Cornplanter, and the other Seneca chiefs now in this city.

In the first place, I observe to you, and request it may sink deeply into your minds, that it is my desire, and the desire of the United States, that all the miseries of the late war should be forgotten, and buried forever. That, in future, the United States and the Six Nations should be truly brothers, promoting each other's prosperity by acts of mutual friendship and justice.

I am not uninformed, that the Six Nations have been led into some difficulties, with respect to the sale of their lands, since the peace. But I must inform you that these evils arose before the present Government of the United States was established, when the separate States, and individuals under their authority, undertook to treat with the Indian tribes respecting the sale of their lands. But the case is now entirely altered; the General Government, only, has the power to treat with the Indian nations, and any treaty formed, and held without its authority, will not be binding.

Here, then, is the security for the remainder of your lands. No State, nor person, can purchase your lands, unless to some public treaty, held under the authority of the United States. The General Government will never consent to your being defrauded, but it will protect you in all your just rights.

Hear well, and let it be heard by every person in your nation, that the President of the United States declares, that the General Government considers itself bound to protect you in all the lands secured to you by the treaty of fort Stanwix, the 22d of October, 1784, excepting such parts as you may since have fairly sold, to persons properly authorized to purchase of you. You complain that John Livingston and Oliver Phelps, assisted by Mr. Street, of Niagara, have obtained your lands, and that they have not complied with their agreement. It appears, upon inquiry of the Governor of New York, that John Livingston was not legally authorized to treat with you, and that every thing that he did with you has been declared null and void, so that you may rest easy on that account. But it does not appear, from any proofs yet in possession of Government, that Oliver Phelps has defrauded you.

If, however, you have any just cause of complaint against him, and can make satisfactory proof thereof, the federal courts will be open to you for redress, as to all other persons. But your great object seems to be, the security of your remaining lands; and I have, therefore, upon this point, meant to be sufficiently strong and clear, that, in future, you cannot be defrauded of your lands; that you possess the right to sell, and the right of refusing to sell, your lands; that, therefore, the sale of your lands, in future, will depend entirely upon yourselves. But that, when you may find it for your interest to sell any part of your lands, the United States must be present, by their agent, and will be your security that you shall not be defrauded in the bargain you may make.

It will, however, be important, that, before you make any further sales of your lands, you should determine among yourselves who are the persons among you, that shall give such conveyances thereof as shall be binding upon your nation, and forever prevent all disputes relative to the validity of the sale.

That, besides the before mentioned security for your land, you will perceive, by the law of Congress for regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, the fatherly care the United States intend to take of the Indians. For the particular meaning of this law, I refer you to the explanations given thereof by Colonel Timothy Pickering, at Tioga, which, with the law, are herewith delivered to you.

You have said in your speech that the game is going away from among you, and that you thought it the design of the Great Spirit, that you should till the ground; but before you speak upon this subject, you want to know whether the Union mean to leave you any land to till. You now know, that all the lands secured to you, by the treaty of fort Stanwix, excepting such parts as you may since have fairly sold, are yours, and that only your own acts can convey them away. Speak, therefore, your wishes, on the subject of tilling the ground. The United States will be happy in affording you every assistance, in the only business which will add to your numbers and happiness. The murders that have been committed upon some of your people, by the bad white men, I sincerely lament and reprobate; and I earnestly hope, that the real murderers will be secured, and punished as they deserve. This business has been sufficiently explained to you here, by the Governor of Pennsylvania, and by Colonel Pickering, on behalf of the United States, at Tioga. The Senecas may be assured, that the rewards offered for apprehending the murderers, will be continued, until they are secured for trial; and that, when they shall be apprehended, they will be tried and punished as if they had killed white men.

Having answered the most material parts of your speech, I shall inform you that some bad Indians, and the outcasts of several tribes, who reside at the Miami village, have long continued their murders and depredations upon the frontiers lying along the Ohio. That they have not only refused to listen to my voice, inviting them to peace, but that, upon receiving it, they renewed their incursions and murders, with greater violence than ever. I have, therefore, been obliged to strike those bad people, in order to make them sensible of their madness. I sincerely hope they will hearken to reason, and not require to be farther chastised. The United States desire to be the friends of the Indians, upon terms of justice and humanity; but they will not suffer the depredations of the bad Indians to go unpunished. My desire is, that you would caution all the Senecas, and Six Nations, to prevent their rash young men from joining the Maumee Indians: for the United States cannot distinguish the tribes to which bad Indians belong, and every tribe must take care of their own people. The merits of the Cornplanter, and his friendship for the United States, are well known to me, and shall not be forgotten; and, as a mark of the esteem of the United States, I have directed the Secretary of War to make him a present of ——— dollars, either in money or goods, as the Cornplanter shall like best; and he may depend upon the future care and kindness of the United States; and I have also directed the Secretary of War to make suitable presents to the other chiefs in Philadelphia; and also, that some further tokens of friendship be forwarded to the other chiefs, now in their nation.

Remember my words, Senecas! Continue to be strong in your friendship for the United States, as the only rational ground of your future happiness, and you may rely upon their kindness and protection. An agent shall soon be appointed to reside in some place convenient to the Senecas and Six Nations. He will represent the United States. Apply to him on all occasions. If any man bring you evil reports of the intentions of the United States, mark that man as your enemy: for he will mean to deceive you, and lead you into trouble. The United States will be true and faithful to their engagements.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the United States, at Philadelphia, this twenty-ninth day of [L. s.] December, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety, and in the fifteenth year of the sovereignty and independence of the United States.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

By the President:

TH: JEFFERSON.

By command of the President of the United States of America:

H. KNOX, Secretary for the Department of War.

The speech of the Cornplanter, Half-Town, and the Great-Tree, Chiefs of the Seneca nation, to the President of the United States of America.

FATHER: Your speech, written on the great paper, is to us like the first light of the morning to a sick man, whose pulse beats too strongly in his temples, and prevents him from sleep. He sees it, and rejoices, but he is not cured.

You say that you have spoken plainly on the great point. That you will protect us in the lands secured to us at fort Stanwix, and that we have the right to sell or to refuse to sell it. This is very good. But our nation complain that you compelled us at that treaty to give up too much of our lands. We confess that our nation is bound by what was there done; and, acknowledging your power, we have now appealed to yourselves against that treaty, as made while you were too angry at us, and, therefore, unreasonable and unjust. To this you have given us no answer.

FATHER: That treaty was not made with a single State, it was with the thirteen States. We never would have given all that land to one State. We know it was before you had the great authority, and as you have more wisdom than the commissioners, who forced us into that treaty, we expect that you have also more regard to justice, and will now, at our request, reconsider that treaty, and restore to us a part of that land.

FATHER: The land which lies between the line running south from lake Erie to the boundary of Pennsylvania, as mentioned at the treaty at fort Stanwix, and the eastern boundary of the land which you sold, and the Senecas confirmed to Pennsylvania, is the land on which Half-Town and all his people live, with other chiefs, who always have been, and still are, dissatisfied with the treaty at fort Stanwix. They grew out of this land, and their fathers' fathers grew out of it, and they cannot be persuaded to part with it. We therefore entreat you to restore to us this little piece.

FATHER: Look at the land which we gave to you at that treaty, and then turn your eyes upon what we now ask you to restore to us, and you will see that what we ask you to return is a very little piece. By giving it back again, you will satisfy the whole of our nation. The chiefs who signed that treaty will be in safety, and peace between your children and our children will continue so long as your land shall join to ours. Every man of our nation will then turn his eyes away from all the other lands which we then gave up to you, and forget that our fathers ever said that they belonged to them.

FATHER: We see that you ought to have the path at the carrying place from lake Erie to Niagara, as it was marked down at fort Stanwix, and we are all willing it should remain to be yours. And if you desire to reserve a passage through the Conewango, and through the Chataugue lake and land, for a path from that lake to lake Erie, take it where you best like. Our nation will rejoice to see it an open path for you and your children while the land and water remain. But let us also pass along the same way, and continue to take the fish of those waters in common with you.

FATHER: You say that you will appoint an agent to take care of us. Let him come and take care of our trade; but we desire he may not have any thing to do with our lands: for the agents which have come amongst us, and pretended to take care of us, have always deceived us whenever we sold lands; both when the King of England and when the States have bargained with us. They have by this means occasioned many wars, and we are therefore unwilling to trust them again.

FATHER: When we return home, we will call a great council, and consider well how lands may be hereafter sold by our nation. And when we have agreed upon it, we will send you notice of it. But we desire that you will not depend on your agent for information concerning land: for, after the abuses which we have suffered by such men, we will not trust them with any thing which relates to land.

FATHER: We will not hear lies concerning you, and we desire that you will not hear lies concerning us, and then we shall certainly live at peace with you.

FATHER: There are men who go from town to town and beget children, and leave them to perish, or, except better men take care of them, to grow up without instruction. Our nation has looked round for a father, but they found none that would own them for children, until you now tell us that your courts are open to us as to your own people. The joy which we feel at this great news, so mixes with the sorrows that are passed, that we cannot express our gladness, nor conceal the remembrance of our afflictions. We will speak of them at another time.

FATHER: We are ashamed that we have listened to the lies of Livingston, or been influenced by threats of war by Phelps, and would hide that whole transaction from the world, and from ourselves, by quietly receiving what Phelps promised to give us for the lands they cheated us of. But as Phelps will not pay us even according to that fraudulent bargain, we will lay the whole proceedings before your court. When the evidence which we can produce is heard, we think it will appear that the whole bargain was founded on lies, which he placed one upon another; that the goods which he charges to us as part payment were plundered from us; that, if Phelps was not directly concerned in the theft, he knew of it at the time, and concealed it from us; and that the persons we confided in were bribed by him to deceive us in the bargain. And if these facts appear, that your court will not say that such bargains are just, but will set the whole aside.

FATHER: We apprehend that our evidence might be called for, as Phelps was here, and knew what we have said concerning him; and as Ebenezer Allen knew something of the matter, we desired him to continue here. Nicholson, the interpreter, is very sick, and we request that Allen may remain a few days longer, as he speaks our language.

FATHER: The blood which was spilled near Pine creek is covered, and we shall never look where it lies. We know that Pennsylvania will satisfy us for that which we spoke of to them before we spoke to you: The chain of friendship will now, we hope, be made strong as you desire it to be. We will hold it fast; and our end of it shall never rust in our hands.

FATHER: We told you what advice we gave the people you are now at war with, and we now tell you that they have promised to come again to our towns next spring. We shall not wait for their coming, but will set out very early, and shew to them what you have done for us, which must convince them that you will do for them every thing which they ought to ask. We think they will hear and follow our advice.

FATHER: You give us leave to speak our minds concerning the tilling of the ground. We ask you to teach us to plough and to grind corn; to assist us in building saw mills, and to supply us with broad axes, saws, augers, and other tools, so as that we may make our houses more comfortable and more durable; that you will send smiths among us, and, above all, that you will teach our children to read and write, and our women to spin and to weave. The manner of your doing these things for us we leave to you, who understand them; but we assure you that we will follow your advice as far as we are able.

The speech of the President of the United States to the Cornplanter, Half-Town, and Big-Tree, chiefs of the Seneca nation of Indians.

BROTHERS:

I have maturely considered your second written speech.

You say your nation complain that, at the treaty of fort Stanwix, you were compelled to give up too much of your lands; that you confess your nation is bound by what was there done, and acknowledging the power of the United States; that you have now appealed to ourselves against that treaty, as made while we were angry against you, and that the said treaty was, therefore, unreasonable and unjust.

But, while you complain of the treaty of fort Stanwix, in 1784, you seem entirely to forget that you, yourselves, the Cornplanter, Half-Town, and Great-Tree, with others of your nation, confirmed, by the treaty of fort Harmar, upon the Muskingum, so late as the ninth of January, 1789, the boundary marked at the treaty of fort Stanwix, and that, in consideration thereof, you then received goods to a considerable amount.

Although it is my sincere desire, in looking forward, to endeavor to promote your happiness, by all just and humane arrangements, yet I cannot disannul treaties formed by the United States, before my administration, especially, as the boundaries mentioned therein have been twice confirmed by yourselves. The lines fixed at fort Stanwix and fort Harmar, must, therefore, remain established. But Half-Town, and the others, who reside on the land you desire may be relinquished, have not been disturbed in their possession, and I should hope, while he and they continue to demean themselves peaceably, and to manifest their friendly dispositions to the people of the United States, that they will be suffered to remain where they are.

The agent who will be appointed by the United States, will be your friend and protector. He will not be suffered to defraud you, or to assist in defrauding you of your lands, or of any other thing, as all his proceedings must be reported in writing, so as to be submitted to the President of the United States.

You mention your design of going to the Miami Indians, to endeavor to persuade them to peace. By this humane measure you will render those mistaken people a great service, and, probably, prevent them from being swept from off the face of the earth. The United States require, only, that those people should demean themselves peaceably; but they may be assured, that the United States are able, and will, most certainly punish them severely for all their robberies and murders. You may, when you return from this city to your own country, mention to your nation my desire to promote their prosperity, by teaching them the use of domestic animals, and the manner that the white people plough, and raise so much corn. And if, upon consideration, it would be agreeable to the nation at large to learn these valuable arts, I will find some means of teaching them, at such places within your country as shall be agreed upon.

I have nothing more to add, but to refer you to my former speech, and to repeat my wishes for the happiness of the Seneca nation.

Given under my hand, and seal of the United States, at Philadelphia, this nineteenth day of January,

GEO. WASHINGTON:

The speech of Cornplanter, Half-Town, and the Big-Tree, Seneca Chiefs, to the Great Councillor of the Thirteen Fires.

FATHER:

No Seneca ever goes from the fire of his friend, until he has said to him, "I am going." We therefore tell you, that we are now setting out for our own country.

FATHER: We thank you, from our hearts, that we now know there is a country we may call our own, and on which we may lie down in peace. We see that there will be peace between your children and our children; and our hearts are very glad. We will persuade the Wyandots, and other Western nations, to open their eyes, and look towards the bed which you have made for us, and to ask of you a bed for themselves, and their children, that will not slide from under them.

We thank you for your presents to us, and rely on your promise to instruct us in raising corn, as the white people do; the sooner you do this, the better for us. And we thank you for the care you have taken to prevent bad men from coming to trade among us: if any come without your license, we will turn them back; and we hope our nation will determine to spill all the rum which shall, hereafter, be brought to our towns.

FATHER: We are glad to hear that you determine to appoint an agent that will do us justice, in taking care that bad men do not come to trade amongst us; but we earnestly intreat you that you will let us have an interpreter in whom we can confide, to reside at Pittsburgh: to that place our people, and other nations, will long continue to resort; there we must send what news we hear, when we go among the Western nations, which, we are determined, shall be early in the spring. We know Joseph Nicholson, and he speaks our language so that we clearly understand what you say to us, and we rely on what he says. If we were able to pay him for his services, we would do it; but, when we meant to pay him, by giving him land, it has not been confirmed to him; and he will not serve us any longer unless you will pay him. Let him stand between, to intreat you.

FATHER: You have not asked any security for peace on our part, but we have agreed to send nine Seneca boys, to be under your care for education. Tell us at what time you will receive them, and they shall be sent at the time you shall appoint. This will assure you that we are, indeed, at peace with you, and determined to continue so. If you can teach them to become wise and good men, we will take care that our nation shall be willing to receive instruction from them.

The speech of the Secretary of War to the Cornplanter, Half-Town, and Big-Tree, chiefs of the Seneca nation of Indians.

The subscriber, the Secretary of War, has submitted your speech, of yesterday, to the President of the United States, who has commanded him to assure you of his good wishes for your happiness, and that you may have a pleasant journey to your own country.

The Governor of the Western territory will appoint you an interpreter whenever one shall be necessary. The President of the United States does not choose to interfere on this point.

The President of the United States thinks it will be the best mode of teaching you how to raise corn, by sending one or two sober men to reside in your nation, with proper implements of husbandry. It will, therefore, be proper that you should, upon consultation, appoint a proper place for such persons to till the ground. They are not to claim the land on which they shall plough.

The President of the United States, also, thinks it will be the best mode of teaching your children to read and write, to send a schoolmaster among you, and not for you to send your children among us. He will, therefore, look out for a proper person for this business.

As soon as you shall learn any thing of the intentions of the Western Indians, you will inform the Governor of the Western territory thereof, or the officer commanding at fort Washington, in order to be communicated to the President of the United States.

Message from the Cornplanter, New-Arrow, Half-Town, and Big-Tree, chiefs of the Seneca nation of Indians, to the President of the United States.

PITTSBURG, March 17, 1791.

SIR:

When we raised from the great council of the Thirteen Fires, we mentioned that we meant to have a council with the chiefs of the bad, angry Indians.

Through the whole Quaker State, as we came up the road, we were treated well, and they took good care of us until we came here. One misfortune happened only, that one of our wagons is not yet arrived here, the one we first engaged, with the goods you presented to us.

FATHER: Your promise to us was, that you would keep all your people quiet; but, since we came here, we find that some of our people have been killed—the good honest people who were here trading.

FATHER: We hope you will not suffer all the good people to be killed; but your people are killing them as fast as they can. Three men and one woman have been killed at Big Beaver creek, and they were good people, and some of the white people will testify the truth of this. When we heard the news, we found one boy had made his escape, and got to the trader's house, who saved his life; we now wait to see him.

FATHER: We have been informed that twenty-seven men came from another State, and murdered these men in the Quaker State, and took away nine horses, and all the goods they had purchased from the trader. Our father, and ruler over all mankind, now speak and tell us, did you order these men to be killed?

FATHER: Our word is pledged to you that we would endeavor to make peace with all warrior nations. If we cannot do it, do not blame us: you struck the innocent men first. We hope you will not blame us, as your people have first broke good rules; but, as for our people, they are as friendly and firm as ever.

FATHER: We must now acquaint you with the men's names who did this murder at Beaver creek: Samuel Brady, formerly a captain in your army, and under your command, also a Balden, were persons concerned in this murder.

FATHER: We can inform you little more, therefore will conclude with asking you how we should have come to the knowledge of this, or how we could have informed you, had it not been for our good friend Joseph Nicholson? Therefore beg you may grant him an appointment as interpreter: for we cannot see how we will do without him. We know of no other man that speaks your language and ours so well as him.

CORNPLANTER, his + mark,
NEW-ARROW, his + mark,
HALF-TOWN, his + mark,
BIG-TREE, his + mark.

P. S. The boy who made his escape at Beaver creek has arrived at this place, and I have taken him under my protection. Father, your despatches for Detroit have been unavoidably detained, heretofore; but to-morrow Big-Tree and one other shall set off with them, and will also take the boy mentioned here, and deliver him to his relations. We part to-day at this place: Big-Tree is going amongst the cross Indians, to see if they will make peace and I go to my own people, to call them to council.

CORNPLANTER.

Message from the Secretary of War to the Cornplanter, and all the chiefs of the Six Nations of Indians.

BROTHERS: Your message of the seventeenth of the present month has been received, in which you complain that a number of friendly Indians were killed at Big Beaver creek, by Samuel Brady and others, who came from another State to commit this murder; and you ask whether the President of the United States ordered the said men to be killed. In answer to your message, I inform you, that the President of the United States has not, and will not, order any friendly Indians to be killed. That he did not order the men at Big Beaver to be killed; and that he will be very angry indeed when he shall hear of it. Major General St. Clair, the great warrior of the United States on the Ohio, will inquire into this matter, and will comfort the friends and relations of the persons who were killed, and will make them compensation for the horses and other property that were taken at Big Beaver.

BROTHERS: You may be convinced that the President of the United States will do all in his power to bring the murderers to justice; and that he will consider the crime as bad, exactly, as if it had been committed against so many white people, and will use the same endeavors to bring them to justice.

BROTHERS: Hold fast the chain of friendship between you and the President of the United States. Do not suffer the conduct of bad men to create any coolness or disgust, and all will be well yet. By this time, it is to be hoped that Colonel Procter will have set off for the Miami Indians. Take care of him, and assist him in the good work of peace. Brothers, farewell; may no more accidents arise from the conduct of bad people to interrupt the friendship of the United States and the Six Nations.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the War Office, this twenty-eighth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

Instructions to Colonel Thomas Procter.

SIR: Having offered to you the execution of a mission, on the part of the United States, to the Miami and Wabash Indians, and you having accepted of the same, you are to receive these instructions as the rule of your conduct.

The great object of your long journey is, to impress the said Miami and Wabash Indians with the candor and justice of the General Government. That the United States require only that they would demean themselves peaceably.

That, if they should refuse to listen to this invitation, they only will be liable for the evil which will fall upon and crush them.

This invitation is not made in consequence of any principles of fear, but from a desire to pluck them, if possible, out of the fire, which is already enkindled.

The message which is herewith delivered you, will show you the sentiments expressed to them, and you; and the Indians who may accompany you, are to say all that may be proper to enforce said sentiments.

You have been informed of the measures taken with the Cornplanter, Big-Tree, and Half-Town, and other Senecas, who were in this city lately, to go to the said Miami and Wabash Indians, with messages from their own nation, of similar import with the one with which you are charged.

You will, therefore, immediately repair to the Cornplanter's residence, which is upon a branch of the Alleghany river, near the creek called Oil Creek, and make known to him your intentions, and deliver him the speech herewith delivered you for the Senecas, and others of the Six Nations.

It is possible he may not be, at home, in which case it will be important to despatch, instantly, runners for him; or in case he should be counselling at Buffalo creek, with the other parts of the nation, it may be proper for you to repair thither.

You are to endeavor, by all possible means, to induce the Cornplanter, and as many other of the chiefs as possible, to go with you upon your mission to the Miami and Wabash Indians; and you will remember, that it is of the highest importance that you should set off without the least delay.

Having obtained, as companions, the chiefs of the Senecas, and others, you will proceed by land or water, as shall be judged best, to Sandusky, upon lake Erie, where reside the Wyandot and Delaware tribes of Indians. These tribes are our friends, and in treaty with us, which, as far as is known, has been well observed by them.

You have also herewith delivered to you, two messages, one to each of the said tribes, written by General St. Clair, who made the treaties with them at Fort Harmar, in January, 1789.

You will inform them of the object of your journey, and desire that they will appoint some of their chiefs to accompany you, agreeably to the general desire in his messages.

You will proceed from the Wyandots and Delawares, directly to the Miami town, where you will assemble the Indians together, and speak to them in the style beforementioned.

If you succeed in persuading them to accompany you to fort Washington, you will set out immediately with them, sending Captain Houdin, and such chiefs of all the tribes present, as shall be agreed upon; to the Wea or Ouiatanon towns, on the Wabash, and to the other tribes on that river and its vicinity, in order to persuade them also to repair to a treaty at fort Washington.

But, if, after using all your arguments to induce the Miami Indians to repair to fort Washington, you should fail, you must leave them, and with the friendly Indians who may accompany you, repair to fort Washington.

Let it be strongly impressed upon your mind, that every moment after you set out upon your journey must be most industriously employed: for you must, if within the limits of possibility, be at fort Washington by the 5th of May next, whether you succeed or not. This is of the highest importance, as it is connected with collateral arrangements.

The great retardment to be apprehended, will be at the Cornplanter's residence, or other parts of the Seneca nation; but you will endeavor to render your stay as short as possible.

A knowledge of your character induces a confidence, that you will execute the high trust reposed in you with all due despatch and address.

Your mission requires an acquaintance with human nature, and the art of managing the hopes and fears of an uncivilized race of men. You will be careful not to promise more than is reasonable to the Indians who may accompany you, and all your promises of that sort shall be complied with.

Your business with the Miami and Wabash Indians will be to persuade them to repair to fort Washington, where they shall be treated kindly and justly; but you are not authorized to particularize to them any terms.

Considering the nature of the service, it is proper to be explicit as to the terms you are to receive from the public, which are as follows:

1st. Your reasonable expenses shall be borne by the public, and upon this point you will be careful to set down your expenses daily, in order that a judgment may be formed thereon, when your accounts are to be settled.

2d. As a reward for your services, you shall be allowed the sum of five dollars for each day, while you are actually employed on this business.

3d. If you succeed in bringing the real chiefs of the Miami and the Wabash Indians to a treaty at fort Washington, you shall receive the further sum of five hundred dollars.

4th. In case you should, in the course of the business, be wounded, or disabled from obtaining a livelihood by your personal exertions, attempts will be made to obtain for you a pension of a lieutenant colonel-commandant, wounded in the service of the United States.

5th. And in case you should unfortunately lose your life in the course of this business, the same attempts will be made to obtain the pension of seven years' half-pay of a lieutenant-colonel commandant, to your orphan children.

Captain Michael Gabriel Houdin, a French officer of reputation, who served in the late war in the Massachusetts line, will accompany you in the prosecution of this business; and in case of any misfortune to you, by sickness or otherwise, he is to take these instructions, and pursue them, as if given to himself.

Captain Houdin is to be allowed his expenses, and two dollars per day, as a reward for his services. And in case he should be wounded or disabled, endeavors shall be used to obtain him a pension of a captain, wounded in the military service of the United States.

I have issued my warrant upon Joseph Howell, to pay you six hundred dollars, on account of your and Captain Houdin's expenses, and for which sum you are regularly to account.

Your route will be from this city to Sunbury, and thence, either directly for that part of the Alleghany where the Cornplanter lives, or to Tioga Point, as you may find best. If you go through Wyoming, inquire for a Captain Baldwin, who has agreed to keep school among the Senecas, on account of the United States.

You will consider your business as a secret, and enjoy the same on Captain Houdin.

Provided you should bring the Indians to fort Washington, you will stay there no longer than the treaty shall be accomplished; upon which, you and Captain Houdin will return with all convenient speed to this city.

You will keep a journal of your daily occurrences, and deliver me a copy thereof, when you shall deliver the report of your proceedings.

Given at the War Office of the United States, in the city of Philadelphia, this 11th day of March, 1791.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

Message from the Secretary of War to the Miami Indians.

To the Head-men and Warriors of the tribes of Indians of the Miami town, and its neighborhood, and inhabiting the waters of the Miami river of lake Erie; and to the tribes inhabiting the waters of the river Wabash.

BROTHERS:

The President of the United States, General Washington, the great chief of the Thirteen Fires, speaks to you by this address. Listen attentively to him, for he speaks of things of the highest importance to your future welfare. The white men and the red men inhabit the same country, and ought to be good friends; but the contrary has been the case; injuries and hostilities have subsisted, and the last year many lives were sacrificed on both sides. This address to you is the offering of a desire to save you from ruin; it is, therefore, of the last consequence, that you should understand and receive it aright. It is unmixed with fear, and dictated by the pure principles of humanity.

The President of the United States is anxious that you should understand your true situation, and the consequences of your persisting any longer in the exercise of hostilities. The United States are powerful, and able to send forth such numbers of warriors as would drive you entirely out of the country. It is true, this conduct would occasion some trouble to us, but it would be absolute destruction to you, your women, and your children.

The United States require nothing of you but peace. Nay, they are desirous of making you understand the cultivation of the earth, and teaching you how much better it is for human kind to have comfortable houses, to have plenty to eat and drink, and to be well clothed, than to be exposed to all the calamities belonging to a savage life. The offer of peace now made to you is for your good, and the Great Spirit above will approve it.

Reflect that this is the last offer that can be made; that, if you do not embrace it now, your doom must be sealed for ever.

Receive, then, the bearers, Colonel Procter, Captain Houdin, and our Indian allies who accompany them, with open arms.

After having pondered well upon the contents of this address, and what may be further said to the same purpose, call in your parties, and fly, with all your head-men, to fort Washington, at the Miami of the Ohio. Also, send messengers to all the neighboring tribes to come to the same place, and there make and ratify a firm peace with General St. Clair, the great officer of the United States on the Western waters.

You will find the terms he shall dictate will be full of justice, moderation, and humanity.

You are now the only tribes with whom the United States have any disputes. The powerful Indian nations south of the Ohio, are our allies; the Six Nations of Northern Indians are at peace with us, and we are desirous of receiving you into the number of our friends, and to forget all the evil which has passed. If you refuse, all the nations will approve and justify your punishment.

Given at the War Office of the United States, this 11th day of March, 1791.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

Message from the Secretary of War to the Senecas.

BROTHERS:

Upon a late visit of the Cornplanter, and others of your nation, to the President of the United States, the Great Chief of the Thirteen Fires, it was agreed, that some of the chiefs of the Six Nations should repair immediately to the Miami and Wabash Indians, in order to explain to them the danger of their situation.

That the United States desired of the said Indians only a peaceable conduct, and a regard to their own welfare. That it would be well-pleasing to the President of the United States, to embrace all the surrounding Indian nations as brothers, and to promote their happiness by acts of kindness.

That, while this was the sincere desire of the President of the United States, he was determined, that all future murders and invasions of the Indians should be punished severely.

The President of the United States is persuaded, that, if the Indians generally could see the kindness of his heart to them, and of his intentions to do them justice, they would, one and all, bury the red hatchet forever. He will, therefore, if obliged to chastise the disorderly Indians, feel all the pain that a kind father feels in chastising his disobedient children.

In order, therefore, that the Miami and Wabash Indians shall be without excuse, in the minds of the Six Nations, and other Indian tribes, the President of the United States has determined to send them a solemn warning of their fate, in case they continue their hostilities; and he has, for this purpose, sent Colonel Procter, the bearer, with whom you are acquainted.

The President requests that you will immediately set out with Colonel Procter, either by land or water, as shall be judged best. That you would call upon the Wyandots, and Delawares, our friends, and take some of them along with you to the Miami and Wabash Indians.

That you would endeavor to persuade the said Miami and Wabash Indians to accompany Colonel Procter and you, to General St. Clair, the great chief of the United States on the Ohio, and there settle all disputes, on terms of reciprocal justice and humanity.

That, on your faithful performance of this business, you will be entitled to the approbation, friendship, and rewards, of the United States.

Given at the War Office of the United States, in the city of Philadelphia, this 10th of March, 1791.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

Message from Governor St. Clair to the Half-king, and the Chiefs of the Wyandots.

BROTHERS:

When I was last at fort Harmar, I left a message for you, and one for the Ottawas and Chippewas. I hope you have received them, and found an opportunity to send them forward.

BROTHERS: It would have given me great pleasure to have seen you at fort Harmar, and to have taken you by the hand, in testimony of that friendship which the United States bear to your nation.

BROTHERS: I informed you last summer, that the continual depredations of the Shawanese, and the Miamies, had roused the resentment of the United States, and that they would no longer bear them. You know, my brothers, that evil did befall them. But, because they were not destroyed entirely, it has had no effect upon them; and they have since done mischief, and killed a number of defenceless women and children.

BROTHERS: The United States did not wish to destroy them; why should they? Is not the country large enough for both of us? But they hoped a little correction would have brought them to their senses, and that they might again have been received into friendship.

BROTHERS: Notwithstanding all the mischief those foolish nations have done, and some of those on the Wabash, they do not wish to destroy them now, and, upon proper submission, we might still be friends; and it is to let them know precisely the situation in which they stand, and the disposition which the United States are in towards them, that Colonel Procter, who will deliver this to you, is now sent to them. If they will hearken to him, well; if they will not, their blood be upon their own heads. The United States will no longer suffer their depredations, and, if they bring utter destruction upon them, they will be justified before the Great Spirit, and all the world.

BROTHERS: Colonel Procter is the messenger of peace to all nations. If they hearken to him, the tree we planted at the Muskingum will grow and flourish, and they may sit under its shade. If they will not hearken to him, keep yourselves at a distance, for ruin will surely overtake them.

BROTHERS: I recommend Colonel Procter to your friendship and good offices, and request that you will send some of your discreet people with him, and to interpret for him, if he should be in need of an interpreter.

Farewell: I am your assured friend,

AR. ST. CLAIR,

Governor of the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio.

PHILADELPHIA, March 8, 1791.

Message from Governor St. Clair to Capt. Pipe, and the other Chiefs of the Delaware Nation.

MY FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

Conformably to the engagement we mutually entered into at fort Harmar, to give notice to each other of any hostile parties entering our respective countries, I informed you last summer, that a force would march against the Shawanese and Miamies.

BROTHERS: You very well know, that these nations had been doing us continual mischief; that we had borne them (in hopes that, through good counsel, they would come to their senses) as long as it was possible to bear them; but those hopes were disappointed: the longer that revenge was delayed, the worse they became.

BROTHERS: You know how they suffered last fall, but it has not had the proper effect upon them. They still continue to do mischief, and have since killed a number of defenceless women and children.

BROTHERS: In the last message I sent you, you were told that the United States did not hate the Shawanese and Miamies; that if they would return to their senses, and do what was just and right, they would be taken into friendship. I now tell you again, that the United States are not averse to them; they do not wish to destroy them, and it is to carry that information to them, that Colonel Procter is now going. If they listen to him, well; the evil that awaits them, may yet be avoided. If they will not listen to him, their blood be upon their own heads. The United States will be justified, before the Great Spirit, who loves all his children, red as well as white, and to all the world, in bringing that destruction upon them, which they merited long ago.

BROTHERS: Relying upon your friendship and good faith, I recommend Colonel Procter to your good offices; he is the messenger of peace, if he shall be so received; and if the nations to whom he is sent are wise, they will hearken to him. The United States, my brothers, hold fast by the chain they made with you, and as long as you hold it fast, neither spot nor rust shall be suffered to appear upon it.

Farewell: I am your assured friend,

AR. ST. CLAIR,

Governor of the territory of the United States Northwest of the Ohio.

PHILADELPHIA, March 8, 1791.

That, in pursuance of these instructions, Colonel Procter and Captain Houdin departed from Philadelphia on the 12th of March; that he arrived at the Cornplanter's the sixteenth day of April; that the Cornplanter conceiving, according to custom, that he must consult the rest of his nation, Colonel Procter and Captain Houdin, with the Cornplanter and his Indians, accordingly repaired to Buffalo creek, near fort Erie, on the lake of that name.

That, after various councils and difficulties, from the twenty-seventh of April, to the twenty-first of May, the council agreed to send a deputation of Indians with Colonel Procter, provided he could obtain a vessel; that he accordingly applied to Colonel Gordon, the commanding officer of Niagara, to be permitted to freight a vessel to transport himself, and the Indians who should accompany him, to Sandusky, on the west side of lake Erie.

That copies of his letters and the answers thereto, are as follows:

BUFFALO CREEK, 5th May, 1791.

SIR:

Although I have not the honor of a personal acquaintance, I am, notwithstanding, emboldened to address you by letter, and through the same, to inform you, that I am the person charged with certain messages, from his Excellency the Secretary of War for the United States, to the Six Nations and other tribes of Indians, residing near lake Erie, &c. One of those messages is particularly sent to the tribes now unhappily at war with the Americans, and with whom it is the ardent desire of General Washington, the President, that peace should be established, on the most lasting terms of equity and justice to them. My mission is, therefore, to invite them to a treaty with Governor St. Clair, on the Ohio, not far from the country they inhabit. The better to effect so desirable an object, proposals were made to the President, in January last, by certain chiefs, who came, on business of the Six Nations, to Philadelphia, viz: that they would appoint in their councils, certain of their head-men; to accompany such gentlemen as might be sent into the country of those misguided people, to bring them to terms of amity with the thirteen States. This, sir, you will discover, on reading the Secretary of War's letter to the Six Nations, and committed to my care. It will be handed you by the Young King, with other public papers, which were delivered Captain O'Beel, for the better information of the nations concerned.

I have therefore to entreat you to conceive the most favorable sentiments on the meaning and intent of those public instruments of writing, as they are founded on the principles of humanity, and a regard for the well doing of our fellow men.

And I cannot doubt, but the same motives will invite you to assist in so laudable an undertaking. The effects of which will establish happiness to the British subjects of Canada, &c. as well as to the United States. The favor that I here request at your hand, is to permit me to charter one of your vessels in the lake, for such number of Indians &c. who may accompany me to Sandusky, on lake Erie. So far as my request meets your approbation, I shall receive much pleasure by your signifying the same by a few lines to, sir,

Your most humble servant,

THOMAS PROCTER.

Colonel A. GORDON, Commandant of Fort Niagara, &c. &c.

BUFFALO CREEK, 15th May, 1791.

SIR:

The fifth instant I had the pleasure of addressing my first letter to you, and delivered the same to the care of Captain William Print, an Indian, to be presented by him; but having received no answer since, I presume it has miscarried through neglect.

The purport of it was, to be permitted to have a passage in one of the vessels on lake Erie, for such number of Indians and white men, destined to accompany me to some convenient port on the west end of the lake. The mission that I am charged with, is directed to the Indians now unhappily at war with the United States, with desires to reclaim them to a peaceable demeanor, before that certain destruction overtakes, which is now pending over them. Mr. Horatio Jones will deliver you my letter, and wait your answer, which I hope will be the granting of my request; and whatsoever expenses may accrue upon this occasion, I shall most cheerfully satisfy the same with the commander; and subscribe myself, sir,

Your most obedient and most humble servant,

THOMAS PROCTER.

Col. A. GORDON, Commandant at Fort Niagara, &c.

NIAGARA, May 18, 1791.

SIR:

A few days ago, I had your letter of the 5th instant, to which I should have returned an immediate answer, had I not waited for some public papers, which you wrote were to be handed to me by the Farmer's Brother, and other chiefs, who were to wait upon me, to receive my advice on business of importance.

I think it but proper to give you this explanation of my not having sooner replied to your letter; but, as there is no document, which places you in any other light than a private agent, I cannot enter on any discussion of a public nature. Whenever any of the chiefs of the Seneca, or others of the Six Nations, apply to me for counsel, I shall give them such advice as I conceive best suits with the present state of affairs. As to that part of your letter, which requests to be permitted to freight one of the vessels on lake Erie, to carry you, and such Indians as may be inclined to accompany you, to Sandusky, on the west side of the lake. I beg leave to inform you that I am not authorized to comply with your requests.

I am, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

A. GORDON.

Colonel PROCTER.

That thus failing in obtaining a vessel, the object of his mission also failed, and he returned to Philadelphia, after having exerted himself honorably to proceed forward.

His report is lengthy, and minute, according to his instructions.

NARRATIVE OF COLONEL THOMAS PROCTER.

PHILADELPHIA, July 9th, 1791.

SIR:

In the following narration, I fear to have transgressed, in blending any matters of opinion or of observation but of that which immediately had relation to business committed me to transact. I have, therefore, to request, that you will pass over such parts as are light and immaterial—this being the only copy taken from the original entry; and, when you may think proper to return the same, I will, with pleasure, transcribe the most material parts, and present it as my report, should you think proper to lay the same before his Excellency the President.

I am, your Excellency's most obedient servant,

THOMAS PROCTER.

To the Hon. Secretary of War.

To the Hon. Major General H. Knox, Secretary of War.

The following Diary is respectfully submitted for his inspection, being transacted under his commission, granted to Thomas Procter, Esq., of the city of Philadelphia, bearing date March 10th, 1791, accompanied with messages from him to the several Indian nations inhabiting the waters near Lake Erie, the Miamies, and the Wabash. The same being intended to the establishment of peace and friendly intercourse between the said nations and the United States of America.

March 11th.—Received a draft from the Secretary of War, on Joseph Howell, Esq., paymaster, for the sum of 600 dollars. Purchased a horse from Richard Hunt, for the use of Captain Houdin, sent as my companion into that country—price £25 4s. Purchased saddlery from I. Polk, the equipment of two horses, as per bill rendered, £16 11s. Money advanced Captain Houdin, to be accounted for by him, £16 17s. 6d. McFadden's draught of North America, &c. 12s. 6d.—pocket compass, best kind, 16s. 8d.—fin box and oil case, 11s. 3d. as also two small books and one quire of paper, 9s. 4½d.

March 12th.—Left the city of Philadelphia, accompanied by Captain M. G. Houdin, under a heavy rain, fully evidencing our intention to stop at no difficulties, until we should gain the settlement of Cornplanter, alias Capt. O'Beel, one of the chiefs of the Seneca nation, residing on the head waters of the Alleghany river.

Our first setting out was big with difficulties, and foreboded some extraordinary events: for, on crossing the Perkiomen, Captain Houdin's horse, after tasting of the water, (which is customary with him) laid down in the same, and were both nearly covered. On the horse's rising immediately afterwards, the Captain's foot being fast in the stirrup, the horse made several lashes at him with his hind feet, before he could disengage himself, but happily received no other injury. Dined this day at Norrington—paid 9s. 9d.—other contingent expenses, 12s. Staid this night with Major Swaine.

March 13th.—Laying on double soles on a pair of boots, 4s. 9d.—shoeing a horse, 4s.—horse feed, wine, and bitters, 4s. 6d.—dinners, &c. at Pottsgrove, 9s. 4½d. Halted for the night at Cimleses' tavern, 13s. 10d.

March 14th.—Breakfasts, &c. at Reading, 9s. 4d.—purchase of a tomahawk, 3s. 9d.—straps of a saddle. Proceeded from thence to Caraher's town, in company with Mr. Potts and Mr. Baird; the latter of which gentlemen informed me, that he was engaged to attend General St. Clair to fort Washington, whither the General was immediately to proceed, in order to prepare for a campaign against the Miami and other Indians, who are daily committing of murders on the defenceless inhabitants on the frontier settlements.—Expenses this night, 15s. 10d.

March 15th.—Set forward this morning on our journey by daylight: breakfasted at Orwick's tavern, 6s. 9d.—Hallers do. refreshment, 5s. 7½d. Halted for the night at Treshers' tavern—expense 13s. 6d. The roads from Philadelphia hither, nearly impassable, occasioned by the heavy rains that had fallen for several days past; and with some danger we forded the little Schuylkill; and, on this day's journey, we crossed the Blue mountain.

March 16th.—Dined at Leidenburgh's tavern, and was informed, that the 1,200 acre tract of land that I purchased of Daniel Rees, in Northumberland, was situated three miles from his house, watered by the Cattawissey, and joining lands of Captain Mason, of Philadelphia. Dinners, and for horses, 11s. 3d. Lay this night at Hughesburgh, at the house of George Knefferbergher. By him I was informed of twenty-five tracts of land I have on Big Fishing creek, which empties into the east branch of the Susquehannah, about two miles above Hughesburgh. Expenses this night 18s. 10½d.

March 17th.—Crossed the east branch of the Susquehannah, fed our horses, &c. at Miller's tavern, and paid, including ferrriages over Fishing creek, and shoeing a horse, 17s. 3d. Lay this night at Berwick, a small town, situate on the west side of the Susquehannah. Expenses of the night, 17s. 10d.

March 18th.—Proceeded on our journey up the west side of the Susquehannah, above twelve miles; and, in endeavoring to go through the narrows, the river being exceeding high and rapid, had a narrow escape of drowning myself and horse, as was the case with Captain Houdin. With great difficulty we mounted the summit of a steep precipice, being unable to return by the same defile we had attempted to pass through. From this, I endeavored to go round the mountain, which lay along the river; and, after having travelled one hour and a half, over the most rugged ground, and seeing no end to the ridge of mountains, we shaped our course through the woods, to the place from whence we departed in the morning; and, by the entreaty of our host, the ferryman, on the opposite shore of the Susquehannah, was prevailed upon to venture over the river with his flat, which he did, with the assistance of four other men, and conducted us across, for which I paid him 15s. Dinners, and putting one new shoe on a horse, with other repairs, 13s. 1d. From thence we proceeded on the road for Wilksburgh, by the way of the mountain path, as dangerous for man and horse as was possible to encounter with; and at 9 o'clock in the night we reached the first house in the settlement of Wyoming; but, there being no feed for our horses, I hired a guide to conduct us to a place to lodge in. Paid for a night's fare, 13s. 6d.

March 19th.—Arrived at Wilksburgh about eleven o'clock; halted here for the night, in order to rest our horses, which were much fatigued and jaded. I should have mentioned in its place, that I did not open the instructions I had received from the Secretary of War, before my arrival at Reading, owing to an intention with me, that no person—not even any of my family—should know what errand I was sent upon. This threw me exceedingly out of my road, and by the worst way: for, had I known that Wilksburgh was my route to Cornplanter's, I should have went through Bethlehem, which would have been fifty miles nearer than the way I went. Spent the afternoon at our lodgings with Colonel Butler and Captain Grubb. The former was an officer in the Connecticut line, and stationed here during the late war, for the protection of the frontier inhabitants against the British and Indians, in which station he proved to be a vigilant and brave officer. The latter part of the evening I accompanied Colonel Pickering, prothonotary of the county, and late adjutant general of the armies of the United States. Here we equipped ourselves with a tinderbox, flints, steel, &c., paid 4s. 6d.; and for helving a tomahawk, and leather sling for the same, 4s. 9d. Expenses at Mr. Fell's, part of two days, 41s. 8d.; and for powder and horn, 5s. 7½d. Much snow fell while we remained at this place. Weather extremely cold.

March 20th.—This day we set forward for Captain Waterman Baldwin's, arrived there in the evening, halted for him part of two days, as I had orders to take him with me to the residence of the Cornplanter, at which place he was intended to act as instructor of the Indian youth, as also a director in the mode and management of agriculture, for the use and benefit of the Indians. This gentleman was made prisoner by Cornplanter, during the late war, and was treated by him with remarkable tenderness, until legally exchanged. Paid for two bushel of oats and two bags, 13s. 1½d.; washing, 2s. 6d.; expense at Baldwin's, 30s.

March 22d.—Ferriage to Captain Jenkins, passing the first narrows of Susquehannah, 7s. 6d. Paid for gammon, bread, and spirits, 32s. 6d. to John Davis. Encamped this evening in the woods, thirteen miles from Lahawanock, on the waters of the Buttermilk falls. This cataract has a beautiful appearance from the river. It falls upwards of eighty feet; and the place it issues through, on the top of the mountain, is about six feet in width, and its torrent is so strong that it is sufficient to serve many mills at one time.

This place I had the opportunity of examining minutely, when going on the expedition with General Sullivan against the savages, in the year 1779, at which time I had the command of 214 vessels, on the Susquehannah, taking with me the provisions and stores of 6,000 men. We anchored off this cataract in the afternoon of the 1st August, and I landed and passed to the top of the mountain to review so great a curiosity.

March 23d.—The Susquehannah being so extremely high, and all the waters leading thereto, compelled us to quit the river road and go by that lately cut (though not cleared) by John Nicholson's, Esq., comptroller general of the State of Pennsylvania. We reached the settlement called the Haybottom, which consisted of about fourteen families, the land exceeding rich—inferior to none about the city of Philadelphia; but the lands between this place and our last encampment were chiefly covered with hemlock timber, cold soil, and unfit for culture, and one continued rise for nearly thirteen miles, with little intermission. Took dinner at the house of Ebenezer Stephens, and purchased from him two bushels of oats, which he had for seed; and, having brought it afar off, charged for the same 3s. 9d. per bushel. Paid for three persons eating, and feed for the horses, 12s. 6d.; one horse bell, 4s. 6d.; three cakes sugar, 4s. 6d. Encamped this evening with some sugar boilers, in a hut not finished. The promoter of this manufactory, which appeared to be very extensive, from the number of kettles and apparatus belonging thereto, is the comptroller of the State of Pennsylvania; and the conductor of the works, Mr. John Jones, of Northumberland county. They were unfortunate enough, two days before, to lose most of their provision, by the oversetting of a canoe, in the main branch of the Lahawanock; but, of the provisions we had, we gave to them what we could spare, preserving what we thought would take us to Tioga Point—supposed 86 miles. The taking of this road, which is cut about 20 feet in width, the trees lying across the same, and in every direction, was not a matter of choice, but necessity: for the river road was impassable. By the taking of this we escaped some deep waters.

24th.—We arrived at the cabin of Richard McNemara, fed our horses with the corn that we brought with us, for he had none but about two quarts for his own use: they however provided us with a dish of rye coffee, made fine with the pole of an axe on a smooth stone, and maple sugar as bright and as well tasted as the best 8d. sugar in Philadelphia; and as they deemed it would be charity to us, they gave of the juice of the maple, which appeared as clear as the limpid stream, and pleasant to the taste, and deemed very wholesome: paid for eating, 3s. 9d. We were obliged to encamp early this afternoon under a very heavy storm of rain, thunder, and lightning, and, what is very remarkable, the snow was in general fifteen inches deep on the ground.

25th.—We still travelled by the way of Nicholson's road, till we reached the one cut by Mr. Ellicott, geographer to the United States, which leads to the great bend on the east branch of the Susquehannah, and to describe the same, it is hardly possible, but, to say the least of them, there is none can equal them for height of mountains, and swampy valleys. Encamped this night ten miles from Tioga Point; heavy rain as usual, our horses worn down, and ourselves more than commonly fatigued; had naught to eat ourselves or for our horses; and I may say with propriety, that, until we arrived at Tioga, to save our horses, we travelled on foot more than half of the way from the town of Reading.

26th.—We arrived at the ferry at Tioga Point, crossed to the flats, paid ferriage 5s. 9d.; the river still very high; took refreshment for ourselves and horses, paid 12s. 9d.; repair of horse shoes, 5s. From thence we proceeded on our way to Newtown Point, and lodged at the house of Mr. William Wynkoop. At Tioga Point I was compelled to purchase a pack horse, as the route we had to take from the Painted Post to the Genesee, was not inhabited, which, by computation, was 99 miles. Captain Baldwin also purchased another horse, the better to enable him to carry on the farming business for the Cornplanter, and for which I advanced him 75s., to be accounted for by him in his settlement with the Secretary of War. From hence I also took a guide, named Peter, in his own language Cayantha, there being nothing but a blind path to the Genesee river, so that my retinue, at this time, amounted to three white men, one Indian, and five horses. The horse designed as a pack horse, I received on the order of Colonel Hollinbeck, on Mr. Guy Maxwell, his partner in trade at Tioga, for which I drew in favor of them, on my daughter in Philadelphia, £15 for the horse, and for a saddle and bridle, value £3: took up our quarters this night in company with Mr. Jabez Colloor, a dissenting minister, at the aforesaid Wynkoop's, with whom we spent a most agreeable evening, and, during our conversation together, he enjoined me, in a very becoming manner, should I at any time see the honorable Major General Sullivan, late the commander in chief against the Indians, in the year 1779, to tender to him the grateful thanks of himself and his parishioners, inhabitants of the district of Tioga, for opening a way into the wilderness, under the guidance of Providence, to the well doing of hundreds of poor families for life.

Sunday, March 27th.—Dined at Mr. Isaac Baldwin's, and halted for the night, and reviewed the ground on which the British and Indians were entrenched, for better than a mile, against the forces under the command of Major General Sullivan. I also saw many traces made by our round and grape shot against them, and a large collection of pieces of 5½ inch shells, which I had the pleasure of formerly causing to be exploded amongst them. Expenses at Mr. Baldwin's for present diet, provisions, and forage, 53s. 10d.

28th.—Took breakfast at William Dunn's; for four persons, 6s.; oats and spirits, 4s. 7½d.; also one chain halter for a horse, 20s. From thence we proceeded to the Painted Post, or Cohocton, in the Indian language; dined, and refreshed our horses, it being the last house we should meet with ere we should reach the Genesee river; addition of stores for ourselves and horses, 36s. 11d.; present dining, 14s. 3d.; four new horse shoes, &c. 6s. 9d.; spirits, 1s. 10½d. Here I was joined company by a Mr. George Stocum, who followed us from Wyoming, to place himself under our protection and assistance, until we should reach the Cornplanter's settlement, on the head waters of the Alleghany, to the redeeming of his sister from an unpleasing captivity of twelve years, to which end he begged our immediate interposition. On the leaving the Painted Post, we entered the warrior's path, lying on the northeast side of the Tioga river. We had not gone above five miles up the same, before we fixed our encampment, having completed thirty-five miles this day, which was more than we had done any one day within seventeen days since we left the city, it having rained or snowed every day since, and the worst of roads to encounter with: for, as we passed over mountains and valleys, the frosts were just mellowed enough to admit our falling through in some places, knee depth to the horses: rained this night as usual.

29th.—Continued our route by the aforesaid path this day, through level land, covered chiefly with hemlock timber, and interspersed with sugar tree bottoms, and through which we frequently encountered with deep sloughs and morasses. In one of them, which had the appearance of a long pond, variegated with shrubbery, Captain Baldwin, while leading our forage horse, was, by a sudden check, brought backwards from the horse he was riding, and immersed in the water, so as to be entirely covered. The same fate had nearly happened to myself, by my horse's feet fastening between two trees which lay on the bottom, of which he fell. All this night we had rain, and with much difficulty could light a fire; at the same time piercing cold.

30th.—We began our journey before sunrise, the usual time of our moving, and, on the way, we discovered, in many places, fine land; the timber chiefly sugar tree maple and beech, and on this day, we passed three principal mountains, the last of which the Alleghany, that divides the Tioga river from the Coshequa. The latter river runs through a fine flat, resembling much the flats below Tioga: here Captain John resides, and one white family only. I did not see the chief, he being from home a hunting. I should have premised that the course of the warrior's path gives a traveller a sight of the river Tioga, upwards of sixty miles, and, by such a way, I would never desire to travel again. The next principal water we crossed, is called, in the Indian language, Connesserago, from whence it is called twelve miles to the Genesee river, where we were conducted by our Indian guide to the house of Captain Ebenezer Allen, about ten o'clock at night. Having rode hard and constant to reach it, both our horses and ourselves much fatigued. I purchased from an Indian squaw one and a half bushels corn, at the rate of one dollar and a half per bushel, and refused to let me have any more at a less price; adding that the white people had made them pay more the last year, when a scarcity of corn was among them; and that at this place there was neither hay nor grass for our horses to exist upon.

31st.—This morning I found myself in a settlement of Indians, called the Squawkey tribe, but a branch of the Seneca nation; having no interpreter with me, I wrote a letter directed to Captain Allen, or Horatio Jones, and sent it by a runner by the way of Connewago, or at such a place where he could meet with either of them, requesting that whosoever received it should repair to Squawkey hill to meet me; and, should they meet any Indian chiefs or warriors, to invite them to meet me also, having business of importance from General Washington, the President of the United States, to lay before their nation. I at the same time despatched two other runners, one to go to the several sugar camps adjacent, to give them the like information, and the other to repair to the habitations of Captain Big Tree and Little Beard, who resided about seven miles from hence, and deemed to be principal chiefs. To each I paid one dollar for their services. By the middle of the afternoon, and in the evening, several Indian warriors and chiefs arrived at Mr. Allen's habitation; amongst the latter, Captain Little Beard, Stump Foot, and the Black Chief. Said Stump Foot being the leader of the Squawkey settlement, residing on the high lands above the Genesee river, and from which bluff commands a beautiful landscape of the great flats on the Genesee, being in width about four miles, and the length from Carahaderra about forty-seven miles towards lake Ontario, where the said river empties into it; the soil exceedingly rich, the land as level as a bowling green, beautifully interspersed with groves of trees, some of three acres, and not more than five.

April 1st.—Mr. Horatio Jones, Indian interpreter, arrived this morning, and about eleven o'clock there were thirty odd Indians collected agreeable to my invitation. And shortly afterwards, I convened them into council, and introduced my message by some prefatory sentiments, touching on the candor and justice of the United States, and of the unexampled conduct of his Excellency the President, in the late interview he had with the Cornplanter, and others, who appeared as representatives in behalf of the Six nations, by restoring unto them all their lands, which they feared were held from them by the power of the United States; by which act of his goodness, their situations in life were made comfortable, and as lasting as they should demean themselves as faithful friends to the United States; and by such a becoming deportment, it would entail lasting happiness to their children's children. This simple introduction being ended, I read the message to them from the honorable Secretary of War; having ended the same, they signified their full approbation, in their accustomed manner. For the particulars of their answer, which was delivered by Captain Little Beard, their principal speaker, see a subsequent page.

Captain Little Beard, in the close of his speech, acquainted me that their great warrior, Captain O'Beel, or Cayantawanka, in the Indian language, had arrived at Pittsburg from Philadelphia, and sent out runners from thence to summon the chiefs and warriors of the Six Nations at Buffalo, where he desired that the great council fire might be kindled, and where he should lay before them all the business that had been done by him at Philadelphia, and the public papers and documents which he had received for the Six Nations, from the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and from the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania. This information induced me to prepare myself for going to Buffalo in the morning, instead of continuing my route to O'Beel's town, and urged it upon them in a very pressing manner that they would accompany me on this deserving errand to Buffalo, as its design was big with advantages to every Indian on the continent. Five of them immediately offered to attend Captain Houdin and myself, and chiefs of the first notoriety in this settlement, and accordingly appointed a sugar camp, eight miles distant, the place of meeting in the morning, where they must go and acquaint their people of this hasty departure.

I now made the necessary inquiry whether it was easy to obtain a good interpreter at Buffalo, or otherwise; and being informed that there were no interpreters there but those under British pay and establishment, I conceived it a duty incumbent on me to engage Mr. Jones, as being a proper person for my business, from the reputation he bore from inquiries I had made, and I accordingly agreed with him in the behalf of the United States, to pay him the customary wages so long as I should find occasion for his services.

Having for the best part of two days caused provisions to be provided for myself and people, and for several Indians who lived at a considerable distance from here, and at a considerable expense to Mr. Allen, and much trouble to his family, I proposed to make him restitution by payment, which he modestly refused, adding, that I was going into a country where I would have occasion for my money. I therefore treated his politeness in that manner which I thought would least offend him, by saying he must receive at my hand in Philadelphia a best beaver hat, and four dollars' worth in any thing Mrs. Allen should chuse to send for, estimating the whole at eleven dollars, for which I hold myself in honor bound to perform. Paid for  $2\frac{1}{2}$  bushels corn to Mr. Forrest, 12s. 1d.; amount of Jno. Jones' bill, flour, spirits, and stores laid in for O'Beel's town, 35s. 7d.

April 2d.—Departed from the council fire at Squawkey Hill to proceed by the way of Tanawandy, to Buffalo, presumed distance between 90 and 100 miles; but, agreeable to my promise to the chiefs yesterday, I had to call for them at their sugar encampment. On my way thither, I stopped at the hut of Stumpfoot, with the Black Chief, who accompanied me, just at the instant that a runner had arrived there from Buffalo creek, who brought the information that the council fire at that place had been quenched by the direction of the chiefs who had lighted the same, at the instance of O'Beel's message to them, and the same fire was to be covered for one moon, in the words following, which he received from the great council, directed to the chiefs and warriors in this settlement, viz:

“BROTHERS: We know from our former intimation to you to meet us here, that you are just now rising from your seats, with your backs bent, bearing your loaded hoppers; but on hearing us speak, you must sit down again on your seats, and remain there for one moon, until you shall hear that our great warrior, O'Beel, (alias Cayantawanka, in the Indian) shall arrive at Buffalo and light it again.”

Upon this sudden information to me, and their determination to continue as above directed, I concluded to change my route from this place, and go for the Oil Springs, near which the Corn Planter has his residence, and of which intention of mine, I immediately informed them, and added, that should I be so happy as to meet him at home, I would use every possible endeavor to bring forward, to Buffalo, Captain O'Beel and his chiefs, in order to rekindle the council fire, as my intended interview with the chiefs of the Six Nations would have the most happy effect, by being instrumental in preserving the lives of many hundreds of our fellow men, when, staying one moon longer, might prove forever too late. On these remarks we parted, and I proceeded with my people to a village eight miles distant, called Nondas, and halted for the night at the hut of a white woman, who had been with the savages from her infancy, and had borne to one of them nine children, all of whom were living. Two of her daughters I have seen, possessing fair features, bearing the bloom upon their cheeks, and inclining to the side of beauty; and her second son had lately been adopted a sachem, and styled the promoter of peace. Paid for 2 cakes sugar, and Indian bread, 7s. 6d. Snow this day, and excessive cold.

Sunday, April 3.—Arrived this day at an Indian village called Canaseder, situated on a high bluff of land, overlooking the Genesee river. It consisted of about 30 houses, and some of them done in a way that showed some taste in the workmen. The town was vacated by its inhabitants principally, save only one squaw and a young girl, who were left as guards to the interest of others, who were out providing sugar for their general stock. In this place was erected a wooden statue, (or deity) fashioned like a fierce looking sage. This form they worship by dancing before it on certain festive occasions or new moons, looking on it as through a veil or assistant, whereby they pay adoration to the Supreme Spirit, as knowing it hath a form, but not a substance. This day we were compelled to swim our horses three times over the Genesee river; and at one of the crossings, Captain Houdin's horse took down the current with him, and could not steer him to the intended shore, having crossed the reins of his bridle at mounting, and were it not that he had left the horse to his own management, (by our entreaties) and our Indian guide rushing into the water to his assistance, and the horse turning for him, the Captain must have certainly drowned in the current, which was excessively rapid a little lower down.

April 4th.—This morning we again swam our horses over the same river, and had the assistance of a canoe, for which I paid 3s. 9d., and crossed it again 10 miles higher up, near the emptying of a small lake. Here, likewise, we had the assistance of a canoe to carry over our saddles, &c. Paid for the same 3s. 9d. At this village resides a Mr. James Latta, a trader, from whom I purchased bread and sugar, the latter to answer the end of meat, as likewise some spirits, for which I paid him 16s. 11d. From this place we had scarcely the trace of a path, and took up our encampment for the night at an old Indian encampment, where the covering of their wigwags served to shelter us from the inclemency of the weather.

April 5th.—We gained an Indian settlement called Ohhishéu, situate on the waters of Oil creek, the emptying of which, into the Alleghany, about two hundred yards below the huts, in crossing the Oil creek at a very steep shelving place, my horse fell backwards into the water. I happily disengaged myself from falling under him, but got wet through all my clothes. We then entered the cabin of an old Seneca chief, who called himself Captain Joseph Hays. I knew him well, thirty-two years before, at fort Pitt, and he professed having some small recollection of me. He spoke English well, and finding him to be conversant, I gave him to understand the business I was on to the Six Nations, and of the assistance I expected to receive from them as friends to the Thirteen Fires. He seemed very cheerful upon the occasion, and assured me that I should see him at Buffalo as soon as the council fire should be lighted by O'Beel. From him I bought two hams of fresh venison, and Indian bread without any salt, for we had none in our possession, not dreaming of it being so scarce and precious an article in this country. We encamped this night at the great bend of the Alleghany, (so called) on a tract of fine level land, covered with plum trees in abundance. At this place we discovered the ruins of a number of Indian huts, forming regularly with each other like a streetway. This place was formerly called by the Indians Dunewangua.

April 6th.—This morning, having advanced about 4 miles, we met two Indian runners going with belts and speeches from the Cornplanter, alias O'Beel, to the Indians resident in the upper towns, at the head waters of the Alleghany, to inform them that several of the Delaware Indians were killed by the white people, said to be a recruiting party of Virginians, near fort Pitt. The said Indians informed us, that the Indians who had escaped the catastrophe that their brothers had fallen into, turned their resentment for the injury their nation had received on the white inhabitants who resided on the Alleghany, some miles above Pittsburg, and killed and scalped 17 in number; that several of the bodies were partly destroyed by fire; that at the same time this mischief happened, Captain O'Beel, the New Arrow chief, and several other chiefs of the Senecas, as also the commanding officer of Venango, coming up in the garrison boat, and in canoes from Pittsburg, were overtaken by a party of militia, who threatened them with instant death, which was happily prevented, but forcibly carried back the garrison boat and canoes, with all the property purchased by Cornplanter for his nation.

Having at this time no path to go by, and having to keep by the meanders of the Alleghany, made the way lengthy and disagreeable. I therefore desired my interpreter to request that one of them would return with me to O'Beel's town, and as they would by that means be separated, I would give to each one dollar, as a consideration for their trouble. They having acceded to my desires, I paid them 15s., and our guide conducted us in safety, at about 10 o'clock at night, to O'Beel's town, called, in the Indian language, Tenachshegouchtongee, or the burnt house. This town is pleasantly situated on the north side of the river, and contains about 28 tolerable well built houses; and the one which they had selected for me and my followers to reside in, was commodiously fitted up, with birthstalls to sleep in, and uncommonly clean, and provided us for the night with plenty of provisions, such as boiled venison and dumplings. Matters were no sooner arranged than I desired my interpreter to have the chiefs collected where I could speak to them. Upon which we found that all the chiefs and warriors of the town had gone on to Venango, hearing that their head warrior, O'Beel, and their sachem, the New Arrow, were forced to take sanctuary in fort Franklin, (one of our garrisons) for the protection of their lives; that none remained in the town on this account, but three very old men, the women, and children.

That, such were their fears, as we were approaching this town, of which they had information, that they all assembled at their place of worship, believing it was near the hour of their dissolution, and they had called on their God to help them. But being happily informed by our guide of the good intentions we were come upon, they came to make us welcome. I then desired that they would furnish me with a canoe and a guide, to conduct me to the place where I could meet with O'Beel and his people, being desirous of going forward immediately; and that I should, without doubt, be the instrument of bringing their chiefs and warriors to them in a few days. Upon which, they sent five miles to procure me a canoe, and by day light, two young Indians attended me, with whom my interpreter and Captain Baldwin went for French creek, distant about one hundred and thirty miles, and arrived on the 8th day of April, about four in the afternoon, as we worked our canoe by turns all night. Cash paid at New Arrow town, corn for horses, fifteen shillings; hire of a canoe and Indians to carry me to French creek, thirty-seven shillings and six pence; provisions, &c. thirteen shillings and one penny.

I no sooner arrived at the garrison on French creek, than I received a visit from Cornplanter, and those Indians who accompanied him at Philadelphia, who professed the greatest happiness to see me, being under the greatest anxiety of mind for the safety of the New Arrow, who was carried in the garrison boat to Pittsburg, in the forcible manner before related; saying, at the same time, that the whole of their goods were taken from them, which they never expected to recover; that, in this distressed situation, they had not a second shirt to put on. I, hereupon, used every argument I was master of, to appease the fears they entertained on account of the absence of the New Arrow, as I could not believe that the inhabitants of Pittsburg would offend, or suffer him to be ill treated; and should any, or the whole of their goods be squandered, by the unwarranted conduct of the militia, that I should make it my duty to present the same to the Secretary of War, who would cause most ample justice to be done them; that, on the morrow, I would write to the commanding officer at Pittsburg, to have their sachem, the New Arrow, conducted in safety to this place, as, also, their goods, as I could not possess a belief that any waste would be committed upon them. I therefore desired him, without loss of time, to bring with him into the garrison all the head-men of the nations then present, so that I might inform them of the message I was charged with, from his Excellency the Secretary of War to the Six Nations; by which means they would be the better able to understand what I had to say to them, before my meeting them in general council to-morrow. Upon this Captain O'Beel left me, and soon after summoned the chiefs present, eleven in number, who met me in the garrison by permission of Lieutenant Jeffers, and, in the fullest manner, I gave them the necessary information. After some time spent on this business, I adjourned, and proposed meeting them again in their encampment over French creek, early in the forenoon, and of which I desired that they might inform their people, so that none might be absent.

April 9th.—I crossed French creek to their encampment, about eleven o'clock, where I found them prepared to receive me, about seventy-five in number, exclusive of women, children, and youth; in the whole, one hundred and eighty. I read first the message to the Seneca nation, from the Secretary of War, and, after explaining the principles upon which it was founded; I read to them the messages from Governor St. Clair to the Wyandot and Delaware tribes, who were deemed and observed to be friends to the United States. Here I thought it my duty to explain to them the force of my message to the Indians, who were carrying on their wanton depredations and cruelties on the defenceless inhabitants resident near the Ohio; assuring them that it was the last solemn warning, should they refuse to accept the terms of peace now proffered to them, that they could lay hold of, until done by a decisive stroke of a superior army, just ready to go forward to conquest, and be rooted out of a country which they might otherwise possess and enjoy in undisturbed tranquillity.

That, with this present council, it rests to save those misguided people on the Miamies and Wabash from the destruction that is just ready to fall upon and crush them; and the better to effect so laudable an undertaking, let there be selected, from amongst you, any number of your chiefs and warriors, not more than fifteen, nor less than five, to guide and accompany me to the Miamies; as, by our going from hence, we shall save the distance of four hundred miles, if not compelled to go to Buffalo creek; and, by this act, you will fully complete the end of my message to the Seneca nations, and for your services you shall receive ample rewards from the United States, and due honor to your nation.

Hereupon they requested of me to retire from them, and those white persons who attended me, so that what I had said might be the more fully digested by them. We left them for about one hour and a half, when a chief came to inform me that they were desirous of seeing me again at their fire. I accordingly attended, and Captain O'Beel was appointed to acquaint me with the determination of their council; which briefly was, that they could not agree to my request of going directly to the Miamies, as they must determine on that business in full council of the Six Nations, at Buffalo creek. Seeing, therefore, that I had no other alternative, but by going to Buffalo, I requested, then, that they would prepare themselves to leave this place, and proceed for Buffalo on to-morrow, which they readily complied with; and for Cornplanter's address to me, upon this occasion, see subsequent page.

I immediately from hence retired to the garrison, to prepare a letter for his Excellency Governor St. Clair, through which I gave, in detail, a circumspect account of every material transaction since my arrival in the Indian country; enclosing to him the speeches of Little Beard and Cornplanter, thereby to enable him to judge of the obstructions that had fallen in my way, which, with others that I might probably have to encounter, would be a means of exceeding the time limited by the Secretary of War for my meeting him at fort Washington, on the Ohio, after passing through the country of the Miamies and Wabash Indians, to which nations my mission was principally intended, to the restoration of peace between them and the United States.

During the time I remained at fort Franklin, I received every mark of attention and respect from the commandant, Lieutenant John Jeffers, of the Connecticut line; and I think it but proper to name it in this place. A few days previous to my arrival at this fort, the inhabitants, resident at Conneycatt, and on French creek, were driven into the garrison, as also those at Cassawaga, and obliged to leave behind them their habitations and effects, possessed of every requisite for the comforts of life. David Mead, Esq. formerly of Wyoming settlement, with three of his brothers, and their families, were of the number of these unfortunate people. At Venango I was called upon by a white prisoner, named Nicholas Deamhoat, to give him a blanket, as he wanted one much. I did so, and paid for the same, 18s. 9d. He was dressed in the Indian garb, and, what I was grieved to see, his ears were cut round, and each hung with a considerable weight of lead, designed to stretch them to a proper length. He acquainted me that his friends lived in Schenectady; his father lately dying, left him a considerable sum of money. I urged him to go round with me on my tour, and, on our arrival in Philadelphia, I would give him decent apparel, and subsistence, while going to his relatives; but he declined it, saying, that he could not live so agreeable with the white people as with the Indians. Contingent expenses, mending my sword, two pair moccasins, washing bill, &c. 34s. 4d. hire of two Indians, from hence to O'Beel's town, 45s.

April 10th.—Agreeably to the arrangement made by me at the general council yesterday, we set out from French creek, to go up the Alleghany river, with thirty canoes, leaving, at the same time, with Lieutenant Jeffers, for the defence of the garrison, fifteen Indians, to act as scouts for the garrison, as occasion should require—the garrison being very weakly manned at this time, only for the addition made to it by the inhabitants, neither had they any flour, on account of the detention of the garrison boat, before spoken of, but what was supplied by David Mead, Esq. who had brought from his mills at Conneycatt a sufficient quantity, as, likewise, some hundred gallons of whiskey, which he dealt out to the garrison and inhabitants, as they required it. Halted this night at Oil creek, about eight miles from the garrison. Lieutenant Jeffers came to us at this place, about twelve o'clock at night, and brought with him certain letters that he had received from Pittsburg that evening, with verbal messages he had received through the express, by which means the Indians were informed, that some of their canoes were plundered of what they contained, but that the garrison boat was returning with their chief, the New Arrow, &c. under the escort of Major Hart, with a proper guard. The news of the canoes being plundered, gave rise to apparent disgust in most of the countenances of the Indians, saying that of Cornplanter's, who received it with that composure that he was usually wont to do. Upon the whole it gave me to fear, that this rude piece of conduct of our militia had damped the zeal of those whom I yesterday conceived were engaged to serve agreeable to my desires. I, however, undertook to give them assurances, that, even should their goods have been plundered, as verbal report gave it, I would use every possible means to have every article replaced; and that, therefore, I earnestly entreated them to dispel those fears for a few days, having, in their presence, enjoined Lieutenant Jeffers to forward an express to me, at the castle of O'Beel, and to write me, fully, every matter that took place; and to obtain another letter from Major Hart, with whom they were well acquainted, to authenticate the same; and that, whatsoever the result should prove, I would faithfully communicate the contents to them. Upon this promise, about ten o'clock in the forenoon of Monday, the 11th of April, we silently began to load our canoes, and, shortly after, took up the line of march, O'Beel taking the lead. I held it proper to take my place next to his canoe, to stimulate him to press forward on his journey. Ere we could reach Buffalo creek, we arrived this evening at an old Indian settlement, called Hog's town; we had much rain this night, and very cold.

April 12th.—I was invited this morning to breakfast with Captain O'Beel, his squaw, &c. Our repast, boiled chestnuts, parched meal, sweetened; his daughter made us some tea, also, which she put into an open kettle, when the water was cold, and being boiled in that manner, without any cover to the kettle, it became very dirty, and disagreeable to the taste; but, of the chestnuts, I partook sufficiently. Finding, this morning, by an Indian who had lately left the garrison, that several canoes loaded had deserted our little fleet, the Indians, being under much intoxication, had returned there again; in consequence thereof, I wrote the commanding officer, by an express, requesting him to cause the Indians, who were designed to go forward with O'Beel, to quit the garrison and proceed. To express, 11s. 3d. This day, about one o'clock, we arrived at the Munsee settlement, where all the canoes came to at, in order to rest, and prepare our dinners. Immediately after we had landed, and what appeared very strange to me, several Indian women came forward with kettles full of boiled corn and bear's meat, and placed it before Captain O'Beel, whom they had heard was approaching with his people. This being done, each family of a canoe, (as in each were women and children) approached with their kettles, without any signal being made, to receive their stipend; and, to do which, an old squaw was appointed to act as an issuing commissary, who dealt it out in proportions so justly, that each went away fully satisfied. Captain O'Beel requested of my interpreter to inform me, it was expected that I would partake of what was prepared; I did so accordingly, to prevent displeasure, but with the weakest appetite. Expenses at this place for eatables, 22s. 6d.; one gallon of whiskey for O'Beel, and his people who accompanied me, 15s. After the whole had refreshed themselves, O'Beel informing the Delawares the business I was on, I was invited to their council fire, of which council Captain Snake was the principal; about thirty of the Delawares were present. I spoke a few words to them, introductory to my reading Governor St. Clair's message to their nation, residing on the waters near Lake Erie; the same message being directed to Captain Pipe, as the principal chief of that tribe. Shortly after this discourse was ended, Captain Snake spoke through his interpreter to mine, as the person I had could not speak the Delaware tongue, and its contents are as follows:

"BROTHER: We are thankful to God for the safe arrival of our brother amongst us; and we are glad to see him with such good intentions, and of the good news he brings. It makes us feel warm in our hearts, and easy in our minds, that such confidence is placed in our nation. But the request he makes of us, to go with him to Buffalo, we cannot give an immediate answer too, as all our head-men are not present; moreover, we want to talk with him and them together; and now we give him the kind invitation of your staying with us all night; and it is likely we shall then help him to the council fire, where he now asks us to go to, and our chiefs shall be sent for." Here O'Beel spoke, and aided my proposition; and, as I was fully sensible of his friendship, I took his counsel, before I should determine on staying in this town. And, finally, judging of it to be a sure means of securing them, to go to Buffalo with us, I consented; and of which they being informed, they sent off runners for their chiefs and warriors, while we still remained in the council-house.

12th.—At 9 o'clock at night, Capt. O'Beel, the Delaware chiefs, and Senecas, called me into council, when Captain Snake's, interpreter gave his speech, as follows: "Uncle, (for that is the term given by the Delawares to the Senecas) God has been good to us this day: for we have each heard the good talk sent from the Great Chief of the Thirteen Fires; and we have ever said, that we would advise each other of every thing that we heard that was bad; or that was like to befall either of our nations. Now, uncle, we have determined to go with you, and our brother, who brings to us these good tidings, to Buffalo, and there meet our nations at the great council fire. Blood may fall upon us while we are going, but now we give you our hands as we promised, and we will lie down and will rise together." [Here a belt of wampum was given, consisting of five strings, which Capt. O'Beel viewed in his hand a short time, and then presented it to me.] Captain Snake again repeated: "Uncle, in three days we move our women and children, and all that we have, to your towns; they are to remain with your women until our return." In the course of his speech he also mentioned, that their people expected to receive a stroke from the Messasagoes, a part of that nation who were led to war by their brothers.

13th.—Our fleet set out from Hickory town, and reached Log-trap creek, 10 miles distant, and encamped. Rained the whole night, and not a dry thread of clothes on myself or companions.

14th.—Proceeded up the river this day, took up our encampment near the mouth of Casyouandang creek, it being the place where Colonel Broadhead, in the year 1779, had fought against the savages; and, in which action, Joseph Nicholson, his interpreter, was wounded.

15th.—Being very unwell this morning, and overtaken with rheumatism pains, and to such a degree that I was obliged to have assistance to convey me from my canoe to the fire; same time being cold and rainy, I informed Cornplanter that I should leave his fleet and proceed to his lower town, to procure some assistance; and I arrived there, some time in the night, after a very laborious day's work to the Indians; the current of the river being so very much against us, at this place, I applied to an Indian doctor, who prepared poultices of roots and herbage, and applied it to my foot, the power of which, over the parts affected, threw it into my knee, which produced the most exquisite pain; and I perceptibly felt that it shortened the sinews under my ham, upon which I applied it no more; fearing the consequences might be fatal to me for life. About eight miles above the encampment, where I left O'Beel, I came to a large river, called the Conawango; and, at its emptying into the Alleghany, is said to contain as much water as flows in the other river, above it. At the confluence of those two rivers, the government of Pennsylvania have laid out a manor of 3,000 acres, and up the said river (Conawango) to an Indian town called Cayantha, or the Corn-fields, are extraordinary rich lands, of which a survey was made, by David Rittenhouse, Esq. of the city of Philadelphia, some time since. The Indians whom I hired at Venango, to bring me to O'Beel's town, (there being two called by his name) drew so nice a distinction, that they chose the first, or lower town, and insisted that this was the town they intended to come to, and not the other; and should I require their assistance to go to the upper town, I must pay to each one dollar (fifteen shillings.) The terms being agreed upon, we proceeded to the upper town aforesaid, by some called the New-Arrow's town, being the name of the head sachem of that place. At this town I left Captain Houdin, Indian Peter, the guide which I brought from near Tioga Point, also, our horses, when I departed from thence to Venango, on the 7th of April, and found the Captain in an enfeebled state of health, owing entirely to the hardships he underwent before his arrival at this place.

16th.—At this town I met, in company with Capt. Houdin, a French gentleman from Montreal, by the name of Dominick de Barge, who had followed the Indian trade, in this country, for six years past, and who lost by the same, a considerable fortune, by the credits he had given to some of the Indians, &c.; with them I found, also, a Mr. Culbertson, a trader from Genesee; and it gave me pleasure to find that the Captain was not altogether alone, he seeming to have an aversion, in general, to the company of Indians.

17th.—This day the canoes, which I left on the 15th, arrived here, and brought news which they had received from an Indian runner, that, on Wednesday last, the 13th, the New-Arrow, and his associates, with the garrison boat, arrived at Fort Franklin; having suffered no damage in their persons, nor loss of their merchandise, as was reported, which belonged to Cornplanter, and other Indians, but two or more cases of gun, taken by the militia, for which Squire Wilkins, of Pittsburg, caused restitution to be made them. Settled with Mr. James Culbertson, for supplies for my people and horses, during my absence, 44 shillings York, Pennsylvania, 41 $\frac{1}{2}$ .

18th.—An express arrived here from the New-Arrow, advising that they must send down to him, at fort Franklin, a certain number of canoes, sufficient to carry the goods brought forward by Cornplanter, from Philadelphia. Finding, from experience, that the Indians were exceeding slow in putting matters in motion, which I held to be important, and slothful to the last degree, I wrote immediately by the return of the canoes to Franklin, to request that the commanding officer would lend them every assistance necessary to their being forwarded to this place; as I was well informed, by a person that I employed upon the occasion, to know the general intentions of the chiefs, that not one of them would go for Buffalo, with me, until they should see his safe return. This afternoon the canoes, which had loitered on the way, arrived; and by which I was informed, that the Delaware and Munsee Indians, at Hickory town, were moving with their stock, &c. to Cattaraugus.

19th.—O'Beel and chiefs arrived here from the lower town, and ordered their conch shell to be sounded through the village, to summon their head-men into council. After some time spent therein, the whole of them adjourned to my hut, being confined, to pay me and my friend Capt. Houdin their compliments, as having come to visit them in their settlements, under such friendly intentions. Nothing more material this day. But dancing was carried on the major part of the night, assisted by drumming, songs, &c.

20th.—An express arrived from Buffalo creek, informing, that the fire of the Six Nations had been lighted, by a number of chiefs and warriors; and that they had been stirring it long, to keep it alive, waiting for the sachems of the Senecas, and their brothers, who were sent by the Great Chief of the Thirteen Fires, whom we want to hear speak with us. It is, likewise, our desire, that all writings received at Philadelphia, from the great chief, Honondaganius, (General Washington) may be brought forward with them, so that the great council may hear the contents. On receiving this public message, I was requested by O'Beel, and the other chiefs, to write an answer to this message, on their behalf, as hearing that Colonels Butler and Brandt were at Buffalo, waiting our coming. I complied, agreeable to their request, and directed the same to the Farmer's Brother, Kuyasutta, and Red Jacket, chiefs of the Six Nations, at Buffalo creek.

21st.—This morning, the whole of the town were preparing to have a grand feast, to return thanks to the Great Keeper of all men, for their being spared to meet once more together; several of the chiefs called upon us to give us the invitation to be present, while they should perform divine worship in their way; adding, that Indians worshipped one Supreme head, the Preserver of all, both white and red men. Their speaker advised us, also, to be prudent while they worshipped, and not to be guilty of laughing, or gestures, though the manner of it might differ, widely, from our own mode of worship; he likewise told us, that we must bring with us our ear, (the interpreter) to testify that they taught the true principles, by moral precept, and that their teachers, both men and women, admonished their hearers against thieving, lying, and speaking lightly of one another.

The manner of their preparing for worship is, that, in every house, they provide large quantities of such provisions as they think proper to bring with them, and the more varied the better, so that they may have a little of every sort, and none of the same returns to that house again, their method being to exchange their victuals on the ground, eating that which was brought by their neighbor; thus prepared, they proceed to the statue, which was erected in the centre of the village, bearing some proportion to a man, and justly painted, as the Indians are in common, but having no weapon of war about him; intimating that he was the maintainer of peace. This figure is about nine feet in height, and stood on a pedestal of about twelve feet, having on breech-clout, leggings, and a sash over its shoulders, and a very terrible appearance. Under this statue were placed two chiefs, termed the women's speakers; each of these held in their hands the shell of a large tortoise, the belly part covered with a thin skin, stretched on very tight, having, in the inside, several small stones, which shells being struck upon a deer skin, which is stretched between them, beating time together, accompanying the same with their voices, they made such melody that the whole of the assembly were delighted. The old and the young women dance round in a circle, the image in the centre, the men following them, using gestures that would have made a saint laugh, had he forgotten that he was in a place of worship; but the women looked meek and humble, while they moved in concert in the dance, sliding their feet sideways, and folding their hands before them, in a half circle, looking, at the same time, steadfastly on the ground, inclining their heads to the left. The last of worship was performed to what they call a brag dance; the young warriors retire to a house adjacent, where are paints, feathers, and red clay; with the two former they ornament their heads with feathers, and their faces with paint, and their bodies with reddish clay, that give their skins all the same cast; some with one half their face black, and the other red, in order to look the more terrible: for in this manner they go to war. When all matters are thus adjusted, and ready to sally from their showbox, their leader gives a long yell, such as when a scalp is taken; and on the third being given, it is re-echoed by the whole, rushing forward, at the same time, to the place of worship, while they dance round the statue, throwing their bodies and heads in every curious attitude, and brag, alternately, of all the cruelties they had exercised in war, of prisoners taken, and of thefts committed on their enemies, and of many other exploits never performed. In the evening of the day, Captain O'Beel, and other chiefs, told me that they would be ready to go with me to Buffalo Creek in the morning, if I thought proper; the information gave me the most heartfelt satisfaction; and I acquainted him, that I was ready to depart at any hour they should agree to go, as much precious time had been wasted since my arrival at this place from the Genesee country.

22d.—I closed my letters this day for his Excellency the Secretary of War, and a second letter for Governor St. Clair, (having wrote him the first from Venango) and forwarded the same by a white prisoner named Nicholas Deamhont, and for which I drew on the commandant at fort Franklin to pay him to the value of 37s. 6d. in such articles as could be spared from the garrison; paid Indian Peter for services from Newtown Point to O'Beel's town, 22s. 6d.; to mess expense from the 16th to the 23d, including horse feed, £6 18s. 3d.; to cash paid Francis Slocum, a white prisoner, 7s. 6d.; do. a white prisoner at Cattaragus, 11s. 3d.; she informs me that she is a sister to Henry Kepple, in Market street, born in Germany; her husband, a Lieutenant Groves of the Royal Americans, was killed at Venango in the year 1761; had been prisoner ever since, but too old and enfeebled to leave them; she informed me that she was truly poor, which I had apparent reason to believe, and I mean to inform her friends of the same, which is the cause of my making this minute, as knowing her brother was under wealthy circumstances. Hire of a horse for my servant to Buffalo, and loss of a bell, 15s.; to house and fire wood expense, at New Arrow's town, 15s.; Indian doctor's bill, 11s. 3d.; one pair old shoes and buckles, 11s. 3d.; cash for an Indian kettle taken away by some of the Indians, 7s. 6d.

23d.—We left O'Beel's town about 12 o'clock, and proceeded with a few chiefs and warriors, (the whole not being ready to depart with us) taking the route for Buffalo, through a village called Cattaragus, which we did not reach before the 25th, in the evening; and on our way thither passed through a settlement of the Delaware or Munsee Indians, in which was about twenty houses. In this place I saw a number of active young men; they being playing the game of bandy wicket, gave me the fairer opportunity of judging. The town of Cattaragus contains in or near about fifty tolerable houses, bordering on a beautiful river, and about two and a half miles from Lake Erie, surrounded by a most beautiful country and excellent land; but the water they have to drink, taken from a pond, is very indifferent. We had arrived but a short time when I caused the chiefs to be summoned into council, and, as in other instances, I made them fully acquainted with the business that led me into their country; and in answer thereto, a sentimental speech was delivered by Thyogachee. [See subsequent page.] While we remained in this town, they were preparing to bury the daughter of a great chief, and in the house that I was placed, there was a number of the mourners, who appeared under the greatest distress, by their cries; during which time, all their heads were covered with their shrouds, but when they had uncovered themselves I did not discover that they had shed one tear. This brought to my recollection the manner of attending wakes in the old country, with the native Irish, where the rich hire old women to lament the loss of the deceased, and to recount all the valuable actions of their past life.

26th.—We took up our journey towards Buffalo, and in about five miles going from thence, we came in upon the verge of Lake Erie, which had a beautiful appearance, it being a pleasant morning, and the waters were very serene, and looking over the lake we could just perceive the land at the other side. We travelled along the sandy beach for some miles, but were obliged, at three or four different places, to leave the shore and take to the woods, the rocks having come bluff up to the deep water; from small springs that appeared upon the face of the rocks, it shewed that it passed over bodies of mineral, from the hue that it gave; but the greatest curiosity that I had seen was alum lying on the surface of the rocks, off which we might have gathered a pound in a quarter of an hour.

27th.—We arrived at Buffalo creek, having travelled through a country of exceeding rich land, from our last encampment, the extent of which I had not been able to ascertain. The pre-emptive right to this valuable country was vested in the State of Massachusetts, but at present the property of the Hon. Robert Morris, of the city of Philadelphia, by a late purchase. The principal village of Buffalo belongs to the Seneca nation, and in it the young king, the Farmer's brother, resides, as also Red Jacket, the great speaker, and prince of the Turtle tribe. On my entering the town, there were numbers of Indians collected at the hut where we alighted from our horses, and on taking a general view of them, I found that they were far better clothed than those Indians were in the towns at a greater distance, owing entirely to the immediate intercourse they have with the British, being but about thirty-five miles distance from Niagara, and but six miles from fort Erie, situate on the north side of the lake; from which places they are supplied yearly with almost every necessary they require, so much so as to make them indifferent in their huntings. And the chiefs, who are poor in general, have to look up to them for almost their daily subsistence, not only of provisions, but for apparel: for the Farmer's Brother, the Young King, was fully regimented as a colonel, red faced with blue, as belonging to some royal regiment, and equipped with a pair of the best epauletts. So that, from his after conduct, it may not appear extraordinary, where the king has thrown in his opposition to my errand, he being paid so well for his influence over the Indian nations as to carry his favorite point in question. I had not been long in the village before I was invited to the great council house, with my companion, attended by Red Jacket, O'Beel, and other chiefs. Just as we approached the porch of the council house, they had a two pounder swivel gun, which they had loaded very high, having put into her an uncommon charge, which the acting gunner being sensible of, stood within the door, and fired it from the end of a long stick, which he passed between the logs; which being done, the explosion upset the gun and its fixture. This, they said, was done as a treat for our safe arrival through the dangers that we had encountered, and for which they were thankful to the Great Keeper. The speech, as an introduction, given by Red Jacket, being ended, he came forward to me to the seat I had been ushered to in the centre of the council, and presented me with four strings of wampum, which he had held in his hands while speaking; for the particulars of which see another page. Capt. O'Beel having been particularly named by Red Jacket, he rose and returned the compliment, in behalf of us that were strangers. Being at this time just sun setting, I apprised the council, through my interpreter, that I had messages from General Washington, the great chief of the Thirteen Fires, which were particularly addressed to the notice of the Six Nations, the representatives of which nations I presumed were principally present; but, as it was drawing late, I requested leave to postpone the introduction till the morning, which was consented to. Upon this, Red Jacket rose to remark, that many persons had occasionally come into their country, who said that they had also come in by the authority of the Thirteen Fires, but of the truth of which they were not always convinced. This information opened the door that I expected; being informed by a French gentleman, a trader amongst them, that these sentiments had fallen from Colonels Brandt and Butler, about seven days previous to our arrival at this place, who desired of the chiefs, in private council, to pay no attention to what should be said to them by me; and, as they knew the purport of my mission, from the chiefs whom I had held council with at the Genesee river, the Colonels advised them not to assist me in going to the Miamies, as the consequence would be fatal to those that should attend me, and consequent death to me and my companion. From these suggestions, which had fallen from Red Jacket, I mentioned, in open council, that I was desirous that they might call forward any gentleman of veracity, whom they had confidence in, to be present while I should deliver myself to them, and overlook any writings that I was directed to lay before the Six Nations, as by that means proof would be made that my commission was founded on the authority of the United States of America. They then agreed upon sending for the commanding officer of fort Erie, and despatched a runner for the purpose. Soon after the council broke up, Captain John, of the Onandagos, came to my hut, and informed me, in private conversation, that no scruple was made of the authority I came under to them, being well informed by the chiefs of the Genesee, who had given that information some considerable time before my reaching Buffalo. Captain John, from his manners, appeared to be a man of veracity, and had received a Mohawk education, and understood himself very well, and during my stay at Buffalo attached himself to me in person, and promoted, all that lay in his power, the business that I had before the council; but the reasons, he said, they were so particular with me, was on account of a certain William Ewing, a resident from the Connedesago lake, who had come in behalf of the Hon. Robert Morris, whom he called the second greatest man in the Union; that he had convened a council the day previous to my arrival, informing those of the Six Nations present, that the pre-emptive right to the lands in this country, as belonging to the State of Massachusetts, were now the property of the said Robert Morris; whensoever the Six Nations of Indians were disposed to sell any part of the same; that, the better to authenticate this business that he had to perform, he produced his instructions, under the hands and seals of the Hon. Robert Morris and the Hon. — Ogden, both of the State of Pennsylvania, adding, that the chain of friendship now stretched between the said gentlemen and the Six Nations, the centre of which was to be supported by him; that in consequence thereof, he desired their permission to traverse the several courses of the lands granted by their agent, — Livingston, of New York, to the said State of Massachusetts.

28th.—The council being convened within the house, there appeared to be about one hundred and fifty in number. Mr. Ewing began to open and continue his business, which he had introduced the day before; upon which, I rose to inform him that he must desist from going on any farther, as it was an interference with my mission, that was of the utmost consequence to the United States, and to the Indian nations in general; and that, as soon as the same was completed, agreeable to the purport of my coming here, that then I would lend him such assistance as was in my power, and through which I would evidence my respect for the gentlemen who sent him.

The commanding officer of fort Erie sent word to the council this morning, that he could not leave his garrison without the express permission of the commandant of Niagara, (Col. Gordon) but that he had sent Captain Powell, of the Indian Department, as a suitable person to superintend their business.

As a proper introduction to my mission, and by the consent and desire of O'Beel, I began by reading his address to the Governor and Council of the State of Pennsylvania, as also his several letters to the President of the United States, and his Excellency's answer to them, in order, and a third letter to the same, from the Secretary of War. The reading of these several papers, and the deed from his Excellency the President, for the restoration of their lands in the Six Nations, and the interpreting the same, took up the whole of the day, upon which I concluded to adjourn till to-morrow, leaving them to digest what had been said, and to judge of the great attention that had been paid to them by the Great Chief of the Thirteen Fires. I thought it proper to give the invitation to Captain Powell, to take up his abode at my hut for the night, which he very willingly accepted of. After we had taken a little refreshment, we entered into a general conversation, and spoke on many matters, the consequences of the late war. The captain, being free in conversation, gave me to understand, that Colonels Butler and Brandt, himself, and several other officers from Niagara and fort Erie, had been at Buffalo some time, waiting my coming, as they had advice that I was on the way hither; that while there, Brandt received private instructions, from head quarters, to set out for the Grand river, and from thence to Detroit. This business, Captain Powell judged, was to carry instructions of some kind to the Indians, at war with the United States. It had the appearance of truth, from what had fallen from the lips of Butler and Brandt, some days since, with the chiefs of the Onandagos and Senecas, as it had the tendency of their joint advice, when they spoke in the great council, viz: that they should not determine on any matter of consequence with me without their concurrence. These injunctions being laid upon them, (as I received it from my informant) the British officers retired to their different posts.

Friday, April 29th.—The business which I postponed yesterday, I opened in a much larger council than had appeared before; and, after I had read the Secretary of War's message by me to the Six Nations, I continued to read those also directed to the Delawares, Wyandots, the Miamies, and to the Indians inhabiting the Wabash; and closed the whole with an address to them, clearly explaining the greatness and power of the United States, and of their trade and commerce; as also of their being at peace and amity with many of the powerful nations of Europe: and though we were once angry with Great Britain, with whom we had fought for eight returning seasons, and having compelled them by force and arms to quit our country, the red hatchet between them and the United States was buried deep under the earth.

I also went into and explained the treaty, held at New York, between his Excellency the President and Colonel McGillivray, the political chief of the Creek nations, and the most numerous body of Indians on the continent, and at this interview there were thirty-two of the most principal chiefs. Every thing being most amicably adjusted at this treaty, they are now become the established friends of the United States, and have firmly engaged themselves to act as our allies in offensive and defensive wars, as the nature of the case will require. Moreover, as they had journeyed far from their own country, not less than sixteen hundred miles, that, to save them the trouble of returning the same way, an American vessel was properly equipped for their accommodation, and conducted them, fully satisfied, to their own country.

And here I was happy to have it in my power to give a more recent proof to the Six Nations, of the great justice done them, by the President of the United States, in the late negotiation had with him by Cornplanter, and others, at Philadelphia; to evidence which, no greater testimony can be given than what I have produced this day, in the hearing of this large assembly. And that nothing more remained, at this time, to be done, but for the chiefs of the Six Nations to evidence their attachment to the United States, by their speedily proceeding forward with me to the unfriendly Indians, and assisting me by the same to inform their minds, to reclaim them from the murders and thefts which they were daily committing upon the defenceless inhabitants near the Ohio, &c. &c. By this, they might have an early caution what must be the consequence, should they refuse to accept the terms of peace, and the proffered mercy of the United States, before that a decisive blow be levelled at those misguided people, and which cannot be far off, if they persist in their cruelties. Moreover, that it is a business worthy the attention of the Six Nations, nay, of all good men, both of the Indians and of the whites; and the speedier their determination might be made known to me the better, so that we might go on to the accomplishment of this good work, thereby to preserve hundreds of our fellow men on both sides. The reply of Red Jacket to the foregoing, as it will come more proper in this place, I here insert it at its full length:

“ BROTHER FROM PENNSYLVANIA:

“ We have heard all that you have said to us, and by which you have informed that you are going to the bad Indians to make peace with them, and that you are sent to us to receive our assistance. Now we must consider the matter thoroughly, and to choose which way we must go, whether by land or by water. You likewise tell us, that you have messages to the Wyandots, and to Captain Snake, of the Delawares; and that they are to take hold of you and us by the hands, and go to the bad Indian nations with us; and this, also, we must consider of thoroughly: for we find that all our Six Nations are not present; and, as our brother, Captain Powell, of the British, is here, and true to us, for he is with us at every treaty, we must let you know that we shall move our council-fire to Niagara with him, and that you must go with us to-morrow, as far as Captain Powell's house. And, as soon as we can know what time we can reach Niagara, we will send runners off to the fort, to acquaint the commanding officer of the garrison. And now the council want to have your answer.”

I did not long hesitate to make answer, in what I deemed a very unwarrantable request; and particularly so from a people that have received so many marks of gratitude, and attention from the Government of the United States.

I therefore addressed myself to the council, and acquainted them that I had the honor of receiving my instructions and messages for the Six Nations of Indians from the honorable the Secretary of War of the United States of America, by the advice of his Excellency the President thereof; that, by those instructions, I was ordered to proceed to the council-fire of the Six Nations, where it should be deemed proper and advisable to light the same. This is, therefore, the place I have been led to by some of your principal chiefs; and upon my account, and the messages I have for your nations, this council-fire has been lighted; this being truly the case; and that my errand here was to invite you to send with me some of your head-men and warriors into the nation of the unfriendly Indians, as proposed at Philadelphia to the Secretary of War, by your chiefs who are present. That, on my coming thus far, I am certain to be in the line of my duty; but to move from hence, with this council-fire, to Niagara, a British garrison, there to transact important business, in which the United States were concerned, is of such a nature, that neither my principles nor commission would warrant me in such a transaction. Therefore I should decline to accompany them; adding, that, if the Six Nations were so far obligated that they must have the particular counsel and advice of any person or persons at Niagara, let them be sent for to this council, so that the result of such deliberations might be done openly at this place; and that my desires were, that this fire should not be quenched until the intentions of the Six Nations were fully made known to me, so that I might lay the same in form before the Secretary of War, by him to be laid before General Washington, the Chief of the Thirteen Fires.

A silence for some time pervaded the whole of the council; after which, Red Jacket and the Farmer's Brother spoke to the council by turns; the result of it being, that a runner must be immediately sent to Niagara, to request the attendance of Colonel Butler, &c. to meet them in their council as soon as he could make it convenient. The foregoing speech of Red Jacket, as done by the advice of the Young King and Fish Carrier, (for they sat on either side of him, and prompted) plainly demonstrates, that the most of the chiefs of the Six Nations are under the influence of the British; as no business of consequence will be undertaken, to the advantage of the United States, but what must first be sifted by British counsel. These suggestions, which were pressed on my mind at this time, gave me to fear that I should not meet the wished for assistance that I had a right to expect from the Six Nations; but fully determined to persevere in my endeavors, till I should gain the summit of difficulty, which I saw arranged before me.

April 30th.—No business this day, but private counselling among themselves. In the evening, Captain Powell invited me to go with him to a store, about four miles distant, in which he was interested, and his partner who kept it a Mr. Cornelius Winney, of Fish Kills. With the last named gentleman I staid till the Monday following, through a very pressing and polite invitation, which at length I accepted of, being lame, and much indisposed, through fatigue and change of diet, such as from poor, to exceeding poor indeed; but with him there was plenty of every necessary, and given with so good a grace that I shall seek occasion to return the compliment.

May 2d.—No further business with me, but the Indians still continue their councils, keeping their fire burning, waiting the arrival of Colonel Butler, and, by information which I received, that leaked out of the cabinet of the Sachems, the council were much divided upon my account. About two in the afternoon, a messenger arrived from Niagara, informing them, that Colonel Butler &c. had set out from Niagara, for this place. Among other circumstances in their private council, by the friends of the British interest, that the place where I was desirous they should accompany me, was on the verge of the ocean; that it would take them twelve months to reach the place of treaty; but those falsities were soon explained to my friends, and through which, I plainly shewed them, by my draughts, that the distance from hence, to fort Washington, did not amount to six hundred miles, and that half that distance we should go by the waters of lake Erie, and that, when I was satisfied of their going with me, I would charter one of the trading vessels on the lake for that purpose.

May 3d.—Finding, upon inquiry, that there was no general council to be held this day, waiting the coming of Colonel Butler, I sent the interpreter to invite the chiefs to my cabin, as I had some matters to communicate to them, previous to their going to general council. They soon attended me, and I took the opportunity to open my map before them, and showed, from our situation at Buffalo, the trace we should make into the Miami nation; from thence to fort Washington, on the Ohio; the first, by a transport on lake Erie, to the mouth of the Miami, which, with any thing of a fair wind, could be completed in less than two days and two nights. From the mouth of the Miami to the Messasago nation, situate on the same, and from thence to the Miami and Wabash tribes, at such place where they might generally be assembled; plainly demonstrating, to their satisfaction, that the whole tour could be performed in a short time; and, therefore, enjoined them, under the friendship which they professed to bear to the Thirteen Fires, that they would, in their next council, promote and further my business, that I came to receive their assistance to perform; so that I might go on my journey, without farther hesitation, as my orders were, not to remain at any council longer than two or three days, if I could possibly do otherwise; so that it might be reasonably expected, that my stay here could not be much longer, this being the seventh day since my arrival. I hoped, therefore, they would not be silent with me longer, as I plainly saw that they were not to exercise their own opinions but on the opinion of the British agent. These remarks I made, with intention that they should feel the force of my observations; upon which, Red Jacket desired that I should hear him speak; as I had been speaking a long time. "Tell him, said he, (speaking to the interpreter) that some of his language is soft, but that other parts of it are too strong; for the danger that is before us is great, and our enemies are drunk; and they will not hear what we say, like a man that is sober, and we consider that, whatever number of the Six Nations accompany him, will be in the same danger with himself, and it is likely that we shall not live long, when the bad Indians shall see us. Therefore, as it is a business of such great weight to us, we must take counsel, in order to save ourselves, and him, from falling by their hands. Moreover, the Indians are not like white men: for they must think a great while. He must therefore attend our councils, and look and hear till we shall speak on his business; and to-morrow our head-men will meet together, and try what can be done." While we were in conversation together, a runner came to the Young King, acquainting him that Colonel Butler, with several officers, from Niagara, had arrived at the store house, on lake Erie, where, Colonel Butler desired, that the sachems and head-men of the nations should meet him in the morning; but did not advise that I should attend with them. This, the Young King desired, might be told to me, that I might know that Colonel Butler had called them together. The circumstance of their moving the council fire from hence to lake Erie, had never been attempted before, and may with propriety be said, that, their being called together without my being to be present, was intended to answer some private purpose; perhaps to damp the ardor of such friends as I might have gained among the Indians, through the fair and honorable statements which I had laid before them in their councils. Since the dusk of the night, Captain O'Beel has called a meeting of the chiefs, at the cabin of Cayassutta, as I understood it, to advise them not to do any thing to injure me, in the business I had to do with them. In the course of this day, Captains Half-Town and Big-Tree, and several of the head-men and warriors from O'Beel's town, and Cattaragus, about sixty in number, and Captain Snake, with about forty of the Delawares, arrived, attended by many of their women, youth &c. By invitation, I dined this day (in company with Captain Houdin,) with the principal chief of the Onandago nation, named Big Sky. His castle lay about three mile east of Buffalo, near which were about twenty eight good cabins, and the inhabitants appeared, in general, to be decent, and well clothed, particularly their women, some of which were dressed so richly with silken stroud &c. and ornamented with so many silver trappings, that one suit must be of the value of at least thirty pounds; some of the latter attended the feast, which principally consisted of young pigeons, some boiled, some stewed, and the mode of dishing them up was, that a hank of six were tied with a deer's sinew round their necks, their bills pointing outwards; they were pluck'd, but of pen-feathers there plenty remained: the inside was taken out, but it appeared from the soup made of them, that water had not touched them before. The repast being the best I had seen for a long time, late of it very heartily, and the entertainment was given with the appearance of much hospitality. Returned about sunset to Buffalo.

May 4th.—The whole of the head-men and warriors repaired to the place, yesterday appointed by Colonel Butler, to open that council they intended holding at the British garrison of Niagara. I pressed my friend O'Beel to go forward with them, by all means, lest the United States should not be represented. About eleven o'clock, an Indian runner delivered me a letter from Colonel Butler, through which Captain Houdin and myself received a polite invitation to dine with him and his officers, viz. Captain Burrows, commandant of fort Erie, Colonel Street, Captain Johnson, Captain Powell, and Captain Butler Shane; most of which gentlemen appeared to speak the Indian language fluently, and all appeared to be busily engaged with the parties, holding converse with them. The tenor of which was, as I since understood it, that they must be cautious what they should undertake to do, in such matters as I had laid before them; and before they might determine, they must repair to Niagara, and receive the instructions of Colonel Gordon. Colonel Butler speaking to them, in my hearing, to the same effect, also mentioning, that, as Colonel Brandt, of Grand river, and Mr. M'Gee, agent for Indian affairs for Detroit, were now preparing to go among the Indians at war with the Americans, to know what their intentions were, whether for war or for peace; advising them by all means to wait the information that would be received from them, and, should it not come as early as might be expected, they should not go without it, as thereby they would draw war upon their own nations; for they were very angry with them already, and would be more so on finding an American among them; and that, notwithstanding his going among them was to establish peace, they would kill them all, without waiting to hear what errand he had come upon. This, and the like conversation, from Colonel Butler, beside what were doing by his officers of the Indian department, then present, lasted till late dinner time, and previous to their going away to their castle at Buffalo. The Young King and Red Jacket remarked to Colonel Butler, that the speech intended for the Miami and Wabash Indians contained threatening sentences, which would be more likely to irritate them, than soften them into a compliance. Upon this information being given, I undertook to show them to Colonel Butler, and others that were present; that, on the same being read publicly, they acknowledged, that they had not understood it so well before, and appeared satisfied that a mistake rested with them. A considerable conversation took place with Colonel Butler and myself, in presence of the Young King and other chiefs, entirely on the subject of a peace, and of my intended progress through the Miami country, which were severally interpreted to them, the tenor of the Colonel's advice being, to leave the whole of the treaty, and adjustment of the same, to the chiefs of Buffalo, Colonel Brandt, and M'Gee, whom he should engage for, to accommodate the disputes between the Indians at war and the United States, and on no account to attempt the undertaking myself, as he was well aware what must be the consequence.

Colonel Butler having given his opinion so fully, gave me the opportunity to explain myself, by saying, that, if I possessed weakness enough to submit to a negotiation on the terms he had introduced, that a peace could not be confirmed with the thirteen States, but with his Britannic Majesty's subjects, in their behalf; that, on the completion of this business, due honor would rest with the negotiators, and, by such a passive procedure in me, I should justly entail on myself lasting disrepute. That, for those reasons, the chiefs of the Six Nations must be decisive in their answers to me, within a few days, being compelled, by my duty, to seek assistance by other expedients, which are in my power—perceiving in some of their chiefs, an indifference of conduct in matters which I held to be of the utmost importance. These expressions having been interpreted to them, they severally retired to their villages, and I received the invitation of continuing the night with those gentlemen, and complying with the same, I received the utmost civility and agreeable conversation till one o'clock in the morning.

May 5.—This morning, Col. Butler and his suite took boat from hence, which was rowed by six British soldiers across the lake, for fort Erie; and previous to their departure, as before mentioned, I saw that each, and every public paper, received by Cornplanter at Philadelphia, together with the message that I brought to the Six Nations, were safely put under the care of Col. Butler, and by him to be presented to the commanding officer of Niagara, as concluded upon by the council of the Six Nations, so that the counsel of Col. Gordon might be obtained by them. In the afternoon of this day, I wrote a letter to obtain permission from the commanding officer of Niagara, to freight one of the schooners upon the lake, to conduct me, and such Indians as were willing to go with me, to Sandusky, in order that no time might be lost when I should gain their concurrence, and forwarded the same by an Indian, being unwilling to trouble either of the officers with its carriage, to Col. Gordon: paid him 15s. [See the letter to Col. Gordon.]

May 6.—Red Jacket and Captain O'Beel came to see me, when the former acquainted me with the reason why no council would be held this day, to wit: That it was their pigeon time, in which the Great Spirit had blessed them with an abundance; and that such was his goodness to the Indians, that he never failed sending them, season after season; and although it might seem a small matter to me, the Indians will never lose sight of those blessings. This is, therefore, the reason why our men, women, and children, are gone from their towns; but on to-morrow, our headmen will return, and your business again shall be taken up. 'Tis a matter worthy of observation, that at some convenient distance from every of the Indian settlements, the pigeons hatch their young in this season of the year, and the trees which they commonly light on, are low, and of the bushy kind, and they are found in such great abundance, that, exceeding a hundred nests, a pair of pigeons in each are common to be found in a single tree; so that I have seen in one house, belonging to one family, several large baskets full of dead squabs; these they commonly take when they are just prepared to leave their nests, and as far as is possible for them to be made; when, after they are plucked and cleansed a little, they are preserved by smoke, and laid by for use.

May 7.—Captain O'Beel called the chiefs together on business concerning themselves; to take into consideration where land should be selected for the accommodation of certain tribes and families, who had put themselves under the protection of the Six Nations, being compelled to leave their former situations, dreading the rage of the Shawanese and Miami Indians. To Captain Snake, and the Delawares under his immediate care, the place appointed for them to plant in, was near the village of Cattaragus; to the families of Connondoghta, a chief of the Messasagoes, and to the Bear Oil Chief and his family, who fled from their settlement, Conyatt, all of the same nation, had their planting grounds assigned to them near the village of Buffalo. On the arrival of the Bear's Oil chief and Connon-dochta at this place, they acquainted me, that, from their friends, they had intelligence, that large bodies of Indians were assembled at the Miamis, preparing for a descent on some part of our settlements, or garrisons, on or near the Ohio; and that many white people had lately fallen by the hands of the Indians; in which attack, two warriors were lost; and by the same information they received accounts that war traces were seen leading to fort Pitt. They professed to be very happy in seeing of me, as they had heard it in their own country, the business I had come upon. At this meeting advice was received that the Squawky Indians, those of Carrahadeer, and Hishhue, were in fear of our white people, and about to leave their settlements and repair to Buffalo. This account several of the chiefs came to make me acquainted with. Upon which, I told them that such a report had not the least shadow of truth, for it was a well known subject to the inhabitants of the Genesee, that, by my mission, I was sent to the Six Nations as a pledge for the friendship of the Thirteen Fires to them; that whosoever was the author of this bad report, was a great enemy to the Indians, as well as to the whites inhabiting the frontiers, and that, therefore, without loss of time, they should send messengers to advise the Indians of those settlements not to stir from their property, but to go on with their planting as usual, and that neither our army, nor our militia, dare to disturb the quiet. This my advice was communicated to the council, and Cornplanter was active in forwarding the despatches to them. During this day's business in their council, it was moved that some of their chiefs, attended by the Farmer's Brother, should go to Niagara to obtain the counsel and assistance of Colonel Gordon; but nothing was determined upon. Mr. Joseph Smith arrived this day from the Genesee, with a message from Col. Pickering, intimating to the Six Nations that he had received presents for them from the United States, desiring their attendance at the Painted Post, on the Tioga river, on the 16th day of June next. The introductory part of his address pointed out to them the interview that he had had with their chiefs at Tioga Point, two years since; that there the mutual friendships between the United States and the Six Nations were entered into; that he was happy to inform them that the chain between them was held fast by the States, and kept free from rust. In his next position, he recommended to them to keep peaceable in their towns, and by no means to join the Indians who were carrying on a war against the United States. I seconded the purport of his speech to them, and advised, in a particular manner, that the whole of their chiefs and warriors, with their women, would present themselves at Cohocton, on the day, or as near it as possible, and receive the benefits which would be bestowed upon them by the Thirteen Fires; and this the chiefs promised should be attended to.

Council this day, as usual, without my meeting amongst them. Nothing more material.

May 8.—A great dance was performed here this day, and worship, by the Six Nations present; but in the fore part of the day they held council, and I was present. For the particulars, see the speech of Fish Carrier, a chief of the Cayugas, and the right hand man of Brandt and Butler.

May 9.—The council being convened, I replied to the speech of Fish Carrier, delivered yesterday, in which I gave them to understand, that I thought it useless for me to stay any longer with them at Buffalo, seeing that those who were in the interest of the British had deterred others of them from serving in the cause of the United States; and that, whatsoever they might have conceived of their conduct throughout this business, that I would lay it in its true colors before General Washington, the President of the United States, that he might be the judge how far the Six Nations deserved his future attention and care. And here I must inform the chief and head men of the Six Nations, that I have, by your desire, from time to time, overstaid the period limited me to be at fort Washington, being the thirteenth day since my arrival. I therefore call upon you for your final answer to my message, and I cannot doubt but it will be such that will remove all those troubles from my mind that it has labored under for many days past; and this you must receive as the last talk I have to make to you, unless that something worthy of my attention shall be publicly declared by your head-men, that can alter the opinion I now possess. And shall only add, in this place, that it is my fervent desire that the Great Spirit may always preside over the councils of the Six Nations, and direct all their doings for their lasting happiness.

Previous to my leaving the council, Red Jacket and the Young King desired that I would wait their future deliberations, and from a few words which were afterwards spoken to me by Red Jacket in council, gave me the first reason to expect their assistance.

May 10.—Worship was performed this day, as usual.

May 11.—The great dance that succeeded was attended with a very drunken entertainment, from the Young King to the meanest subject, Corn Planter and some of the elders of the women excepted; but not the least insolence was offered to me, or any of my people.

May 12.—There was a general alarm took place in all the villages near this quarter, the cause of it I had judged proceeded from the enemies of the United States; but report gave it that there was a large number of Indians approaching the castle of Buffalo, and that one of them had come to a woman the last evening, and showed her two fresh scalps, one of which was a white man's, and the other an Indian's; the last scalp so large, that the ears, with its bobs, remained to it; and that the main object was, to make demand of the white persons among them, and of me, in particular, to be surrendered; and should it be denied, they would commence an open war against them. Capt. O'Beel on this feigned alarm: sent out, early in the morning of the 13th, a number of his Indians, to discover if there were the appearance of an enemy's track; but returned in the afternoon, and reported that there had been no Indians where it had been said they were seen in numbers. Some time in the day, the Young King went to the encampment of the Bear's Oil chief, and, in conversation with him, and many others of the Indians, told them to prepare going for Niagara in the morning, with him and others, to consult with Col. Gordon what was necessary to be done, as I had required an immediate answer from the Six Nations, on my messages to them, and to determine whether they should take the advice of the United States, or the advice of the British. This information I received from Captain Print, an Indian chief, and one of those who accompanied Gen. Sullivan, speaking the English language sufficiently well to be understood. He told me farther, that the British were the main instigation of my not succeeding hitherto. This led me to call a meeting of the chiefs at my cabin, this evening, and particularly the Young King to be of the number. Captain Print was present; as also O'Beel. Before them I recounted many principal objects, as the end of my mission to them; and in the clearest and most becoming manner, I showed them where they had failed to perform, in many instances, all that I required at their hands; and if such had been attended to by them, the United States would be the more liberal in their rewards; but the contrary having taken place, the more straitened their gifts would be in future; and that the reasons they were now called to the Painted Post, to receive clothing, &c. at the hand of Col. Pickering, were under the firmest belief of the President of the Thirteen Fires, that we are, at this time, far advanced in the country of the unfriendly Indians, proceeding on our way to the treaty at fort Washington, which is to be held by Gen. St. Clair, Governor of the Western territories. What passed at this interview between me and them, was soon carried for the information of the elders of the women, and was the cause of the awakening the whole of them from their lethargy. Mess expense for four persons, and feed for our horses, commencing 27th April, to 13th May, both days included, £12 16s. 7d.

Information received this day of Mr. Joseph Smith, interpreter, as he had the same from a Mr. John Knowles, of Detroit, and formerly of the city of Philadelphia, silversmith, viz. that, after the battle which was fought last fall, between Colonel Harmar and the Wabash Indians, &c. great quantities of provisions, ammunition, and other necessaries, were sent to the seat of war, to supply the Indians, and conducted by a Simon Gerty, and some other persons, from the garrison of Detroit, said to be of more notoriety than said Gerty. This being a fact, founded on truth. Quere. Is it not as likely that they are constantly supplied by the same process with every article they stand in need of to carry on war with the United States? And can this be a principle, comporting with the reputation of a brave Briton? I think not.

14th.—Private council this day with the Indians, as usual, in which they strongly debated on the principles under consideration between me and Colonel Butler; the particulars of which are more fully explained in the speech of the Young King, assisted by Fish Carrier, which he delivered in my hut after candle light. [See subsequent page.] The afternoon of the 9th instant, about 5 o'clock, my interpreter came to inform me, that Mr. William Ewing had called the chiefs to his hut, (as was his custom, unknown to me, almost every afternoon) and that a council fire was lighted in the front of the same; that Fish Carrier, the Farmer's Brother, and several other chiefs, were present, consulting on the business I have before alluded to. It gave me some concern, that the imprudence of this young man had compelled me to come forward, to silence him; as I saw plainly, and received information also, that the Indians were not able to decide what purpose was intended, by sending two extraordinary messengers to them at one time; being led to believe, that the authority of each was nearly similar. I proceeded to the council fire, and in a short manner introduced my business to the chiefs, of what was the cause that brought me forward to interfere in the business of their council.

Upon this, I turned to Mr. Ewing, and charged him with having insidiously thrown obstructions in my way, and was one of the principal causes of my not having succeeded in the purpose of my message to the Six Nations. In consequence of which, I commanded him, in the presence of the chiefs, at his peril to proceed any farther, in either their public, or their private councils, until my mission was fully decided upon by the chiefs of the Six Nations; and should he attempt it after this caution, that I should be unpleasingly compelled to commit him to the first prison that could be come at within the United States, and prosecute him, on the obvious reasons before recited. The purport of this conversation with Mr. Ewing, I desired my interpreter to communicate to the chiefs, and upon which I left them to regale themselves with liquor, placed before them for the occasion.

On the Young King's closing his conversation with me for the night, and roundly denying that they would accompany me in person to the Miamies, &c. I took this as the last occasion I should have, to tell those who accompanied him the sentiments of my mind, and assuring them, at the same time, that whatever I should say to the Secretary of War on my return, should be identically to the same effect that I had upon all occasions accosted them; and that, as I scorned deception, I must generously tell them, that I was displeased with their delays, and of the little respect they had paid to the message that I was charged with to their nations. That if the same was well received by the Secretary of War, it would tend to their future advantage; but that I could not persuade myself would be the case; and closed our conversation for the night.

15th.—Early this morning the elders of the Indian women resorted to my hut, (present a number of chiefs.) Having heard the general conversation that took place between me and the Young King the evening before, addressed me in the following manner.

“BROTHER: The Lord has spared us until a new day to talk together: for, since you came here from General Washington, you, and our uncles, the sachems, have been counselling together. Moreover, your sisters, the women, have taken the same into great consideration, because that you and our sachems have said so much upon it. Now, that is the reason why we have come to say something to you, and to tell you, that the Great Spirit hath preserved you, and you ought to hear and listen to what we women shall speak, as well as to the sachems; for we are the owners of this land—and it is ours; for it is we that plant it, for our and their use. Hear us, therefore, for we speak of things that concern us and our children, and you must not think hard of us, while our men shall say more to you; for we have told them." The above speech being ended, I acceded to a request they made, that I would attend their sachems in council this day, and hear what should be said by the women's speaker, the young prince of the Turtle tribe, (Red Jacket.) Soon after their departure the alarm gun was fired; which was their signal to call their head-men into council. They were soon assembled from their adjacent villages, and sent some of their sachems to usher me and my colleague into their assembly. Being arrived, the first matter unusual that presented itself, were the elders of the women seated near their chiefs. When, after a short silence, the speech of the women was continued by Red Jacket, agreeably to the terms entered into between them, and the whole of the leading sachems of the six nations, as follows.

"BROTHER FROM PENNSYLVANIA:

You that are sent from General Washington, and by the Thirteen Fires; you have been sitting side by side with us every day, and the Lord has appointed us another pleasant day to meet again.

Now, listen, Brother: You know what we have been doing so long, and what trouble we have been at; and you know that it has been the request of our head warrior (O'Beel) that we are left to answer for our women, who are to conclude what ought to be done by both sachems and warriors. So hear what is their conclusion. Brother, the business you have come on is very troublesome, and we have been a long time considering on it, ever since you came here; and now the elders of our women, considering the greatness of your business, have said that our sachems and warriors must help you over your difficulties, for the good of them and their children. Moreover, you tell us, since the treaty at Tioga with us, the Ameritans are strong for peace.

Now, all that has been done for you has been done by our women, and the rest will be a hard task for us: for the people at the setting sun are bad people, and you have come on us in too much haste for such great matters of importance. And now, brother, you must look when it is light in the morning until the setting sun, and you must reach your neck over the land, and take all the light you can, to show the danger. And this is the words of our women to you, and the sachems and warriors who shall go with you. And now we shall name them, as they have first presented themselves in this full council, viz: Our first great sachem Kuyascetta, Red Jacket, the young prince of the Turtle tribe, Captain John, of the Onandageos, the Grand Carrier, Avangogathe. [The foregoing are four chiefs of six, who were appointed to conduct me into the country of the unfriendly Indians. The names of the other two grand chiefs were at the same time given, but, by some accident, not inserted.] And now we will name our chief warriors, viz: Sawishua, Cuyanddoas, Unundastheuous, Thenachqua, Conneague, Tenanquachqua, Othanjohngottang, Hottendeyoucke, and Attwanika.

Now, brother from Pennsylvania and from General Washington, I have told you what has been directed. Let us, therefore, throw all care on the mercy of our Great Keeper, in hopes that he will assist us. You now know that Col. Butler, of the British, told us that he must take our writings down to Col. Gordon, as he is a very wise man, and perhaps he may have something to say to us that is for our good. And we also want his assistance, as he is the man that keeps all the vessels that is on the lake.

Therefore, my brother, make your mind easy, for your request is granted, and when we hear from our brothers the British, then we shall know what time we can start. And you must not be uneasy that our brother O'Beel does not go with you, for he is very tired, and he must rest awhile, and take charge of our young warriors while they are playing, (hunting) to keep them in peace, for fear of danger. And now, while we are speaking, more of our young warriors have given their names to go with you."

Having received this welcome information, and so firmly authenticated by so complete a council, I undertook to write a second letter to Col. Gordon, commandant of Niagara, making request of him to grant me a passage in one of the merchant or other vessels on lake Erie, for a certain number of Indians, and others, intended to accompany me to the Miamies, and from thence to fort Washington, on the Ohio; and, the better to prevent any miscarriage or delay, I sent it by Mr. Horatio Jones, my interpreter, on the morning of the 16th, enjoining him by all means to present it to the colonel himself, and to return with an answer to me as speedily as possible. [See the letter.]

Early on the morning of the 17th he crossed the river St. Lawrence to Niagara, and, being well acquainted there, he went through any part of the garrison he thought proper, until about ten o'clock, when he went to the commandant to present my letter. Mr. Jones informed me, that, as soon as it was known that he was charged with a public message from me, the town major had orders to put an orderly non-commissioned officer to attend him, and to prevent his going through the garrison, or of holding any particular conversation with the inhabitants. And, as soon as Col. Gordon sent to him the answer of my letter, he was ordered to return to Buffalo by the same route he had came; and the orderly conducted him to the ferry where he had crossed in the morning, and returned, on the 19th, to me at Buffalo.

The answer which Col. Gordon sent in his letter was, that, as he had not seen those public documents that I had wrote him of, therefore he could not enter into a discussion with me on matters of a public nature, viewing me only in the line of a private agent; nor was he authorized to permit me a passage for the Indians I proposed carrying to Sandusky, in any of the vessels on the lake. [See his letter.] This unfriendly denial puts a stop to the further attempting to go to the Miamies, as the Indian chiefs who proposed to accompany me were unable to walk the distance required, and it was held by them unsafe to go in a large Albany boat I had contracted for, fearing disappointments: as, to gain a harbor for such a boat in case of rough water, it could not be met with at times, under going the distance of twelve or fifteen miles, and all winds from the northeast and northwest and northerly, made the lake very turbulent, and the waters as rough as the ocean.

While Mr. Jones continued at Niagara, six engineers and twenty-five or more artificers arrived there from Quebec, being sent by Lord Dorchester for the purpose of carrying on some works of fortifications. He likewise saw that fresh work had been done to the face of the garrison, &c.

I have likewise been informed that the British have laid the foundation of a new fortress on the north side of lake Erie, at some distance higher up the rapids, and, I presume, (beyond the range of thirteen inch shells) from the present garrison; it being very evident they cannot, in justice, maintain it much longer.

The reason of their establishing of new garrisons on the lakes is very obvious, they being intended for the support of the fur trade, which produces abundance of wealth yearly to Great Britain. But this revenue will, I hope, very soon be decreased, on the surrender of the fort of Detroit, the key of the fur trade by the lakes, and such posts as may be established by the United States in the Western territory, near the Mississippi, and also in the Wabash country, and by the Government of Pennsylvania, at the old French garrison of Presque Isle; which will invite most of the trade from the Grand river, that empties itself into lake Erie, on the north side, and at a small distance from that beautiful station of as fertile lands as America produces, of a pure air, and a healthful climate.

During the absence of my interpreter, twelve of the chiefs, headed by the Young King, came to the store-house on the lake, (at which place I was writing my despatches for the Secretary of War) and informed me that they understood that I had intentions of going away secretly from them in the night, and that I had proffered an extraordinary price for a horse for that purpose, and had likewise offered a large sum of money to an Indian to carry my letters to Pittsburg. I then inquired who was their informant that I had communicated these things to. They answered that John Berry, an Indian, who interpreted for Mr. Ewing, had told them so, and they had come to know my reason for so doing. I replied, that such a thought had not passed my mind; and that, if I had had such intentions, why should I have sent my interpreter to Niagara, to obtain a vessel to conduct me and them to the place. I so earnestly and so constantly had solicited them to accompany me? And that, were I disposed to leave them in that manner, I should not have sold my horse yesterday to their trader, Mr. Winney; and the sole reason of my having sold him, was, that we could not take a horse by water to Sandusky: for, when there, we should have the utmost occasion for them, having to travel a long distance on foot. But the mistake or wrong interpretation rested on this point: My intentions of going by water, as above related, prompted me to engage one of O'Beel's Indians, whom I believed to be an honest man, to carry my letters to fort Franklin; and, as well as having offered him certain payment for his services, I had proposed to him a horse to carry him to the New Arrow's town, where the horse belonged, and the rest of the way he might go by water, if he chose to do so. Moreover, to speak in their own language, I was more of a man than to leave my friends in that manner; and that, whenever I was about to go from them, I should tell them so, and take my leave of the Six Nations. Having so said to them, I gave them a treat, and they returned to the towns fully pleased and satisfied.

May 17.—Red Jacket and other of the chiefs informed me that my friends in the different towns expected that I would give them something to drink, as they were going to have a great dance before they should leave their women. I readily accepted his proposition, and ordered eight gallons of the best spirits to be presented them for the entertainment, and I desired that the women should be attended to particularly, for their valuable conduct in the last great council.

18th and 19th.—I was engaged in preparing my despatches for the Secretary of War, and other letters of the same import, for Governor St. Clair, and I proposed to forward them by the way of New Arrow's town, thence to fort Franklin and Pittsburg, and appointed Captain Stingfish, of New Arrow's town, to be the bearer, whose wife was the principal governess and leader of the chiefs among the women, and the principal promoter in gaining the sachems over to my interest. It is well known to every person entrusted with a public commission among the Indians, that they are expected to possess a liberal hand. Red Jacket, whom we have often spoken of, waited on me this morning, to tell me that his house wanted a floor; that, as he was going with me, and desirous to leave his family more comfortable in his absence, he expected that I would have it done for him. Moreover, he wanted some rum for his wife and his mother; and, that he might drink with them before he set out on his intended journey, he wanted a little for himself. The first request, of laying his floor, I promised to have done immediately before our going on board the vessel; and to make him and his wife cheerful at parting, gave orders to present him with one gallon of rum. The Young King was not less pressing in his request for rum, on various occasions; and although he did not behave so well in their councils as I desired, I did not send them away empty handed, sound policy having dictated my motives. And, as I perceived that Captain O'Beel's modesty prevented his calling on me in that way, to him and Cuyaratta I was not less liberal. To a Shawanee Indian, named Chafudet, (or Hot Sun) one of the chiefs appointed to conduct me into the Shawanee country, I gave a blanket, being entreated by him in a particular manner to furnish him, for which I gave 18s. 9d. This afternoon, and immediately after Mr. Jones' arrival from Niagara, the Young King, and the major part of the chiefs, came to be acquainted what was the result of Colonel Gordon's answer to me, upon which I informed them to meet me in general council in the morning, being desirous of communicating some matters of consequence to them, and then they should be informed of the contents of his letter. About this time, I received information, that, about eight days since, Colonel Brandt had set out from the Grand river, with about forty warriors, to touch at Detroit, to take with him Mr. McGee, agent for Indian affairs in that district, from thence, to proceed to the great encampment of those Indians at war with the United States; and by those who are professed friends of the British family, believed that his motives were not to pacify them, but to inflame their minds to a more vigorous opposition.

20th.—According to my proposals of yesterday, I met them in general council, introduced and explained the substance of Colonel Gordon's letter to me, apprising them that I was sensible of the cause that led him to give me such a denial; that it was replete with envy in him towards the United States. And it spoke no great affection in him towards the Indians, and that, ultimately, it must reflect on his name and station, the unfavorable epithet of a discernible public, as preferring to cherish the rage of the desolating sword of war, to the happiness which flows in such abundance through the channels of peace. And perceiving from those causes, that nothing farther can be done by us at this time, I must take my leave of the Six Nations, and return with my information to the chiefs that sent me, to whose attention I will recommend them, seeing that no fault at this time lays at their door. Having placed the whole of our disappointment to the fount from whence it came, and to-morrow being the day I propose moving hence, I have now to desire that the chiefs will prepare to deliver me their farewell speech, which I will duly communicate to the Great Chief of the Thirteen Fires, and hope that it may be done soon to-morrow.

21st.—The whole of the chiefs resorted to my cabin, and the Young King, by appointment, gave their farewell speech, but not without the aid of Fish Carrier, whose physiognomy, when speaking, put me in remembrance of the old Roman senators, possessing so much keen gravity in his manner. [For the conclusive speech of the Farmer's Brother, see subsequent page.] Settled with Mr. Cornelius Winney, for liquors, &c. had for the Indians occasionally, £26 5s, deducting 32 dollars for a horse sold to him, bought of Mr. Maxwell, at Tioga. Also, gave a white prisoner that lived with said Winney, 9s. 4½d.

Having now all matters arranged, I delivered to Captain Houdin all the public writings I had prepared for his Excellency the Secretary of War, and sent him by the Genesee, in company with Messrs. Smith and Ewing, residents of said place, (in the several villages adjacent to the castle of Buffalo, to wit: the Senecas, the Cayugas, the Onandagos, &c. there are more than 170 tolerable well-built huts,) and proceeded by the verge of the lake for Cattaraugus, with my interpreter and servant, where we arrived on the 22d. Paid for the hire of two horses hither, and time for returning, 45s. The reason of my taking the route for Pittsburg, was, that I was apprehensive that my letters might have been intercepted, had I put them into the hands of the Indian before named, and taken to a British garrison for inspection; and that my conducting them myself, might give me the opportunity of meeting with General St. Clair, or Colonel Butler, and giving them personal information of such matters as might not have been treated on in my letter. Having found myself fully disposed to make a forced march to Pittsburg, though late in the afternoon, I hired fresh horses, and an Indian, to go to New Arrow's town and to return, for which I paid eight dollars; and for a supply of stores from a British trader, 16s. 10½d. I arrived at the New Arrow's town on the 24th, in the evening, (distance 80 miles) having encamped out in the woods the two preceding nights. I had no sooner arrived, than the chiefs were summoned to council by the sound of a conch shell, which was intended for nothing more than to take their leave of me.

Here I parted with my interpreter, for him to return to the Genesee country, the place of his residence, and accounted with him for sixty-one days services, allowing him six days to return, at 10½s. per day, a balance appearing in his favor of £24 13s. 1½d. I gave him my obligation to pay the same at sight, in Philadelphia; and at a late settlement with the paymaster-general of the United States, I left the same, together with £18 payable to Messrs. Hollinbeck & Maxwell, for a small horse received of them at Tioga Point, and £7 10s. to the payment of my draft on the Secretary of War, to Joseph Smith, Indian interpreter. Previous to my leaving this town, 23d of April last, I was obliged to send my own riding horse to the Genesee settlement, it being impossible to procure forage or corn for him, and at which place he has remained ever since, at expenses. Not having it in my power of doing otherwise, and whether the same will be allowed for to me, I must submit to the judgment of the Secretary of War.

Being in private conversation this evening with Captain O'Beel, and sitting between him and the New Arrow sachem, I hinted to Captain O'Beel, that if he would go and join General St. Clair with 35 or 40 of his warriors, as well equipped as he could make them, purely to counterbalance the force that Brandt had taken with him to the unfriendly Indians, I would use endeavors with the Secretary of War to procure him a commission that should yield to him and his people a handsome stipend. He replied that the Senecas had received a stroke from the bad Indians, by taking two prisoners, a woman and a boy, from Conyatt, and that, should the hatchet be struck into the head of any of his people hereafter, he would then inform me what he would undertake to do. I hired a canoe and two Indians this evening, to carry me to fort Franklin, and should have set out immediately, but for a heavy rain that fell. I agreed to pay them $4 30, and a proportion of whiskey, when we should reach the garrison, and provisions to bring them back. I arrived the next morning by daylight at fort Franklin, took breakfast with Lieutenant Jeffers, had a canoe prepared with four fresh hands put into it, and after having adjusted my engagements with the Indians brought from New Arrow's town, pushed off as speedily as lay in our power for fort Pitt, (distance about 156 miles by water) and gained the same in 25 hours, the men having worked hard all night to complete it, and assisted myself, for which I paid extra to each, one dollar, and one dollar for entertainment at Pittsburg, having completed in five days and two nights, going by land and water from Buffalo to this place, 411 miles. Expenses at Pittsburg to the 29th, 40s. 4d. To servant's wages, engaged at Venango, April 8th, 52 days, at 3s. 9d. per day, as per receipt, is £9 15s. To Horatio Jones' expenses going to Niagara with my letter, and returning, 46s. 10½d.

Set out from Pittsburg to Philadelphia, on the evening of the 29th of May, and arrived the 7th day of June. PHILADELPHIA, June 8, 1791.

SIR:

I left the castle of the Six Nations of Indians, at Buffalo creek, the 21st of the last month, in the afternoon, the forepart of the day being spent in council with the chiefs of the above nations, of which there were a full representation; and, by the following, as delivered by the Young King and the Farmer's Brother, will evidence their friendly disposition towards the United States, in maintaining with them an inviolable peace; as, also, with the British, as, from the situation of their nations, they are centrally placed between them.

The same day I sent forward my despatches for your Excellency, under the care of Captain Houdin by the route of Wyoming, while I should proceed by the way of forts Franklin and Pittsburg, with the letters I had written for the information of General St. Clair, and arrived here yesterday afternoon. It is also with pleasure I inform you that, as to the several posts on the Alleghany river, &c. they were under no apprehensions of danger from the unfriendly Indians, and were in good health and high spirits.

I am your Excellency's most obedient servant,

THOMAS PROCTER.

The Honorable SECRETARY OF WAR.

The speech of Little Beard, April 1st, 1791.

BROTHER OF THE THIRTEEN FIRES, HEAR WHAT WE HAVE TO SAY TO YOU: The Lord has spared us this day to meet together, and for you to let us know what has been done at Philadelphia, a few days ago, for our nation.

You say our lands are secured for us, and that the grant given by the Great Chief, General Washington, will last as long as the sun goes over us.

That is the reason why we give you great thanks, our lands being secured to our children's children. And great reason we have for doing so.

Every one of us will wish well to your Great Chief Honandaganius, (or General Washington) and our women and our children will thank him, and will look up to him as a strong sun for protecting of the right of their lands to them forever. And you tell us that there is a great paper in the hands of O'Beel for us. Now we want you to shew with your finger how large the lands are which are given to us. [Here I named to them certain grants to lands which they had made to the States of Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania, &c.]

Captain O'Beel's speech at Fort Franklin, April 9th, 1791.

We have met our brother here, and I believe he remembers what we said at Philadelphia: that we would try our friends once more, viz. the Wyandotts; as there were bad people among them, advising to use the hatchet.

There we said it would be well for one man to go with us from the United States, in order to hear what we should say to them.

Now the Lord has spared us to this day, to meet our brother, that has been sent from the Thirteen Fires, and to join our hands with his to have justice done. And we should have been glad that he were with us on our way to Pittsburg, for then our wagons would not have been stopped, our goods taken, and our liquors drank, and that by people whom we thought to be our friends.

And when we had got to Pitt, more and great trouble began on us by the bad men of the Big Knife. For when we had started from Pitt, with all our goods and writings with us, to shew what we had done for our nation, the white people and our friends seized upon the garrison boat, belonging to French creek, which had our goods in, and several canoes, and forcibly took them back to Pittsburg, and there deprived us of all that was necessary for the comfort of our women and children; and we are sick for them. And now we wait here to know from our runners, if any thing is left for us; and then we are ready to shew you the road.

In one part of General Washington's speech to us, he gives us to choose whether we will go by land or water; and it affords us great pleasure, as we shall choose for the best and safest, as there are bad men on the way.

Now the chiefs of our nations here have made their choice, and we must go to Buffalo, where our head-men are waiting for us, and where the council fire has been long lighted and put out again. And we must light it the next, and that will be soon.

There we shall finish our minds, and have good plain faces wheresoever we turn against those bad men, and we shall be strong. Our friend sent by General Washington must not think hard by our requesting of him to wait for us. For this is the last speech the unfriendly people can have. And it is a heavy matter. And we must take time to do the business well and sure.

Now we shall send a runner right off, where the great fire is to be lighted at Buffalo, so that our great men of the different tribes may assemble all their people. And when there, we shall be able to tell you what number of Indians are going to accompany you to the Miamies. And he can write to General Washington of every particular of which our brother wishes to send.

And now we have determined to start from here in the morning, although we have left all our papers behind us. But we shall leave some of our young men to bring them after us to the council at Buffalo creek.

This is all we have to say at this time, but to leave the business we have here to do with our brother and the commanding officer of the fort, to obtain our goods, &c. which your people have deprived us of. And we hope you will now send for them, as we are now going away.

Now we want to know if our speech is pleasing to our brother, who will shew what we have said to General Washington: for we again say we must go by water. And with all our friends being with us we shall be strong.

BUFFALO CREEK.

Speech of Thyogasa, Chief of the Senecas, at Cattaraugus, near Lake Erie, as delivered 25th April.

Some time ago there came messages into our country, that our people should meet at Buffalo creek, and then they should hear of our head-men from Philadelphia, what they had from the council of the Thirteen Fires.

About this time they had got to fort Pitt. And we heard there was a great man, and a Frenchman coming, also from Philadelphia, in great fear, trying to make peace. Then we thanked God. The next express said that our head-men and those from Philadelphia were coming on the waters together, to have the great council fire lighted at Buffalo, and we that live here sent on the express, and gave great thanks to our Great Keeper.

Now that you and they have arrived here, and have shewed your faces at our council fire in trouble and fear, we give great thanks again to the Great Spirit for keeping you and our chiefs from the trouble that befel others coming o this place. Now tell the man from Philadelphia to pity us children, for we are fearful. And we say to you, that will open your throats, that you may speak fair and clear to us without any hard thoughts, when you get to our great council fire of the full nations, that you may deliver any message you are sent upon, from the great chiefs at Philadelphia. Besides, now we open your ears to hear any thing which may be said by us, and hear the same in peace.

БРОТНЕР: These are the few words we have to make known to you. And give thanks to God for our safe meeting this day together, our brothers and our chiefs. [This speech being ended, Thyogasy handed to me a belt of wampum of three strings, and then continued his discourse as follows:]

БРОТНЕР: This is our custom, to make a small speech on seeing our friends, but Buffalo is the place where you must speak, and at that place matters must be talked over in peace and quietness, and of which tell all people to be careful. Now wipe the tears from your eyes, and make your throat clear, so that you may be understood.

The speech of Red Jacket before the Great Council at Buffalo, April 27th, as an introduction to the business of the day, addressing himself to me.

БРОТНЕР: Listen! It is usual for us to speak; and to you we do it as to a brother that has been absent a long time. Now we all speak to you, and to our head warrior that left us last fall: and we thank the Great Spirit for his and your safe arrival here, as you are together, hand in hand, from Honandaganius, (General Washington) upon great business.

You have travelled long, with tears in your eyes, upon account of the bad roads, and bad season of the year. Besides the disturbances between the bad Indians, and our brothers, the white people, every thing has been trying to prevent your coming, and to stop your business, and to lose the way.

Thus the big waters might have stopped your coming, and the wars might have stopped you, and sickness might have stopped you: for we cannot know what is to happen us until it comes upon us. So, therefore, we thank the Great Spirit who has preserved you from such dangers that might have hindered us from hearing of the good news which you and our head warrior have opened to us. But how could it be that any thing bad could have happened to you, while you have such important business to transact, as we understand you have come on?

You must now wipe away those fears occasioned by all the great dangers you have come through. And now we set you upon a seat where you can sit up strait—on a seat where you are secure from the fears of your enemies; where you can look round and see all your friends and brothers in peace. Besides, you have come along, with your heart and your throat stopped up, to secure all that you had to say in your body. But now we open your heart with your brother's hands, and we run our fingers through to open your mouth, to speak clear, and not to be molested. Your ears also have been stopped by Honandaganius until you should see your brothers at this place, being spared by the Great Spirit to arrive safe.

Now open your ears to hear what your brothers may say after you have made your speech. This is, therefore, the compliment of the chiefs and head-men of Buffalo creek, to you and our great warrior (O'Beel) and you may, each of you, go on safely with your business.

Monday, May 8th.—In full council. The speech of Fish Carrier, a chief of the Cayugas, and the right hand man of Butler and Brandt, as may appear from the following, addressed to me:

БРОТНЕР: This day you have met again with your brothers in peace; a day provided by the Great Spirit for you and them to sit together, and talk over the business you have been sent to perform by General Washington, the Thirteen Fires, and for which you are to come to our council; and likewise, to hear us with regard to the people (the bad Indians) on the other side of your body, toward the setting sun.

Here you have made your business known, and to all the chiefs and warriors, who met every day; and now they understand the same, because they have taken due notice. Therefore, you shall hear what we have determined upon by all of us, for we all had a hand in it, or it would not be strong.

Now, БРОТНЕР: We shall say more to what General Washington sent you for, and to tell you, that our head warrior (O'Beel) our nephew, has done things which we know nothing of; and it seems to us, that he has requested that this business should go forward without our consent. Neither do we know you in this matter; and were we to undertake to help you, we do not know what might happen before we went far with you, as that might be the cause of our country being destroyed, or broken up by the mad people.

Now we tell you, as we told you before, that we have met on your business, and that the one-half is not for peace. So we look at the man that has been sent to the Shawanese (Brandt) and we have sent to see how matters go at their council fire. We must, therefore, see his face, for we can't determine until we know what they are about.

So we beg of you to grant our request; to keep your mind easy; for we who do this business, look on you, and hold ourselves to be slaves in making of peace. Now we all say, you must look for C. Brandt's coming, to hear the words that come from his mouth, for then we can say to you, what towns will be for peace; and this is all we have to say to you at this time.

Upon this I told the council, that, in the morning, I would give them my talk, in answer to what had been said this day, and immediately return, with what they had spoke in their council, to the Great Chief that had sent me. Captain O'Beel then told them, in council, what would be the consequence to the Five Nations, and publicly declared to accompany me, if no other chiefs would attempt it. For further particulars, I beg leave to refer to the continuation of my letter of the 4th of May.

The speech of Conyandoeta, an Onandago Chief, addressed to the council of the Six Nations, through which he explained the dangers which attended on him and his people, should they remain at Coneyat.

БРОТНЕРS: There is a great deal of danger at this place, for we are told by the enemy, the Missesagoes, that we must come to their side, or else we won't live long. But, said I, we turned our face once, and you did not pay us the compliment to call us to council with you, or even to shake hands with us. Now, we turn our face to this council, and you must prepare a place for us when we come; for we mean to be true to the promise we make to you. [On the close of this speech, four strings of wampum were presented, a mixture of black and white.]

The speech of Bear's Oil, a Chief, to the same effect as the above, who, with his people, are in danger of the Messasagoes.

БРОТНЕРS: Now hear me a little. I am a Messesago chief, belonging to the Six Nations. I, and my people, are in great danger, because I have been the entire instigation of saving the white settlers at Coneyat and Cassago: for I told them of the danger they were in, as I heard the Red Indians say they were bound for that place, and that they intended to murder them. Moreover, that if I did not come away to them, I should die, for that was the only way to save my life; and that, should I attempt to go to the Six Nations, they would meet me on the way and kill me. For they say, if they meet with any of the Six Nations, they will strike them. But I have not listened to them. I have come to you, and you must have a place ready for me to sit down when I come with my people.

These matters, I take the liberty of communicating to your Excellency, in order to shew you, the Six Nations themselves profess, that they are not secure from the anger of the Indians who are unfriendly to the United States.

BUFFALO CREEK, May 5, 1791.

SIR:

Although I have not the honor of a personal acquaintance, I am, notwithstanding, emboldened to address you, by letter, and through the same to inform you, that I am the person charged with certain messages from his Excellency the Secretary of War, for the United States, to the Six Nations, and other tribes of Indians, residing near Lake Erie, &c. One of those messages are particularly sent to the tribes now unhappily at war with the Americans, and with whom, it is the ardent desire of General Washington, the President, that peace should be established, on the most lasting terms of equity and justice to them. My mission is, therefore, to invite them to a treaty with Governor St. Clair, on the Ohio, not far from the country they inhabit.

The better to effect so desirable an object, proposals were made to the President, in January last, by certain chiefs, who came on business of the Six Nations to Philadelphia, viz: That they would appoint in their councils, certain of their head-men, to accompany such gentlemen as might be sent into the country of those misguided people, to bring them to terms of amity with the thirteen States. This, sir, you will discover, on reading the Secretary of War's letters to the Six Nations, and committed to my care. It will be handed to you by the Young King, with other public papers, which were delivered Captain O'Beel, for the better information of the nations concerned.

I have, therefore, to entreat you, to conceive the most favorable sentiments on the meaning and intent of those public instruments of writings, as they are founded on the principles of humanity, and a regard for the well-doing of our fellow men; and I cannot doubt, but the same motives will invite you to assist in so laudable an undertaking; the effects of which, will establish happiness to the British subjects of Canada, &c. as well as to the United States.

The favor that I here request at your hand, is to permit me to charter one of your vessels, in the lake, for such number of Indians, &c. who may accompany me to Sandusky, on Lake Erie. So far as my request meets your approbation, I shall receive much pleasure, by your signifying the same by a few lines to,

Sir, your most humble servant,

THOMAS PROCTER.

Col. A. GORDON, Commandant of Fort Niagara.May 14th, 1791. The Speech of the Farmer Brother, or the King.

BROTHER:

The last summer was the time we had our last talk with the Shawanese, and then we tried to make peace in their minds, but they would not listen to us. They named to us their great chief of the Shawanese, called the Little Hoope, who told them; that all the nations beyond them to the setting sun, being in number forty-eight large towns, were all under arms, and that Little Hoope said they would be at peace with the Long Knife. So that when peace was put in their heads, and that we had returned home, then the great fight was had between them and the Virginians, the Long Knife, and that made their determinations stronger for war than ever, because they had killed many of their people, and hurt their nations. And after this, we tried and told the Americans to be at peace and quietness. So we concluded to send some body again, to know what they were doing among the bad Indians, so that we might judge, and we consented to send a chief to them, with whom they were acquainted. And upon that determination, as we told you before, we sent Capt. Brandt, so that he might know how many people were bent for war, or how many nations were not so hard for war, so that we might judge whether it was worth while to try again to make peace. That is the reason why we asked you, the other day, to attend our council fire, until you should see his mouth yourself, when he should tell us all that was doing in that country. And that is the reason why we are afraid of our brother, for we know that they wont receive you in peace, for it is their determination as we hear. We tell you again, that one of the same mind with us is gone to speak to those people, and we want to hear him as much as General Washington does, and we pay all attention to what he has laid before us; and now our opinion is, we must go alone and try to make peace ourselves; and that is the reason we dont want you to go with us; for this is the outermost edge of the bad people's settlement; and were we to take you by the hand, and go together, we must instantly meet with a great loss, which would make war on both sides, and we should be killed. Now we will tell you the reason why they refuse to make peace, is, that General St. Clair struck the bad Indians, while they were thinking of making peace with the Americans; and this is the reason to try ourselves, to make them hear by our chief, that is gone before us; and that will be the time for General Washington to light his fires, when he knows they are determined for peace, and we, the Six Nations, are strong for it. Therefore, tell General Washington to hold back his warriors a little, and let his intention be strong for peace, and God will assist the Americans to make it up.

Now the Six Nations give great thanks to General Washington, that his mind is so strong for peace, and the Six Nations look to him for peace. Therefore, the sachems and head-men of our nations have come to you this evening, to tell you that you shall not go with them into the towns of the enemy Indians.

BUFFALO CREEK, May 15, 1791.

SIR:

The 5th instant I had the pleasure of addressing my first letter to you, and delivered the same to the care of Capt. W. Print, an Indian, to be presented by him, but having received no answer since, I presume it has miscarried through some neglect. The purport of it was, to be permitted a passage in one of the vessels on Lake Erie, for such number of Indians and white men, destined to accompany me to some convenient port on the west end of the lake. The mission I am charged with, is directed to the Indians, now unhappily at war with the United States, with desires to reclaim them to a peaceable demeanor, before certain destruction overtakes, which is now pending over them.

Mr. Horatio Jones will deliver you my letter, and wait your answer, which I hope will be to the granting of my request. And whatsoever expense may accrue upon this occasion, I shall most cheerfully satisfy the same with the commander; and subscribe myself,

Sir, your most obedient, and most humble servant,

THOMAS PROCTER.

Col. A. GORDON, *Commandant of Fort Niagara, &c.*NIAGARA, May 18, 1791.

SIR:

A few days ago I had your letter of the 5th instant, to which I should have returned an immediate answer. had I not waited for some public papers, which you wrote were to be handed to me by the Farmer's Brother, and other chiefs, who were to wait upon me, to receive my advice on business of importance. They have, however, as yet, never made their appearance at this post.

I think it but proper to give you this explanation of my not having sooner replied to your letter; but as there is no document which places you in any other light than a private agent, I cannot enter into any discussion of a public nature. Whenever any of the chiefs of the Senecas, or others of the Six Nations, apply to me for counsel, I shall give them such advice as I conceive best suits with the present situation of affairs.

As to that part of your letter which requests to be permitted to freight one of the vessels on Lake Erie, to carry you, and such Indians as may be inclined to accompany you, to Sandusky, on the west side of the lake, I beg leave to inform you, that I am not authorized to comply with your request.

I am, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

A. GORDON.

Colonel PROCTER.

The speech of the Young King of the Six Nations, on my leaving of Buffalo Creek, May 21, 1791.

BROTHERS:

We are called together this day by the appointment of yesterday, to hear what answer has been sent to your letter, from the commanding officer of Niagara. And the same having been made known to us, we find that you are disappointed in your expectations of getting a vessel, in which we were to go with you toward the unfriendly Indians; and that, therefore, you would return by the way of Fort Pitt.

You have also said, that you do not blame us, but that you blame the British; and that, therefore, we should be easy in our minds, and be at peace with the United States.

You have also mentioned a letter, which came from General St. Clair to us, and what answer we should give to the same, so that Colonel Butler, at Pittsburg, might be informed by you.

The answer of our fighting, as requested by General St. Clair: On seeing how your troops should act against the enemy Indians, you must listen, and hear what is the full determination of all the sachems and warriors of the Six Nations; what they have determined upon, and that in a few words, for Col. Butler, to be sent to General St. Clair.

Now, the answer is, that we are desirous of complying with the instructions of his first letter, sent to Cuyasatta, our great chief for the Six Nations; namely, that we must sit still, and not to mind any other business but peace; and those were the words of his letter. Moreover, last fall it was told to us by Col. Pickering, that the Six Nations must take no notice of any thing, but what tended to be peaceable; for that would be an advantage to our nations, and nothing else. So that, ever since, we have conformed to these instructions, in not interfering in any matter that has another tendency: for with the British we are at peace, according to their request of us; and we are the same with the Americans. And should the unfriendly Indians come forward to seek peace by us, we will help to do so; and we are desirous ourselves of remaining peaceable.

The reason why we now tell you these things, is, that we are neither on the one side, or on the other; whether of the British, or of the Americans; for we desire to be still, and to be at peace with both.

Here, brother, we speak to you on another matter, that has respect to the Six Nations. General Washington, the great chief, has kindled a fire at the Painted Post; and this, we expect, is done for the sake of peace: for he has called all the nations, from the Grand river to the Oneidas. And it is our desire to attend the same, at the time proposed.

Therefore, tell Colonel Butler, at Pittsburg, that we cannot attend, according to the request of General St. Clair: for we shall attend the treaty at the Painted Post, where the fire is lighted by General Washington, and at that place all matters we here related shall then be talked over again. In this, brother, you have heard the sense of the Six Nations, and our sentiments are firm and strong: for, amongst us, there is not one deficient. This is, therefore, the close of this speech, as we want to talk over other matters which concern the errand that you have come to us upon, and which we can't go through with, because we can't speak to the Indians, that reside towards the setting sun. But we have told you, that we have sent Captain Brandt, to know their opinion; and we have always wanted you to stay with us until his return, to know what is the minds of those people towards the Thirteen Fires.

We have also told you, that we shall take the same into consideration, as we want to speak to them once more, on terms of peace: for our mind is the same as when you first came amongst us, and we are desirous of seeing Captain Brandt return; and when we hear that those people will incline to peace, we will help it, and try to bring the same to effect. And should Captain Brandt be here before we go for the Painted Post, whatever their intentions are, we shall make the same known; and if for peace, the one half of our chiefs shall go to the unfriendly Indians, and the other half, with our women and children, shall attend the treaty before named; and the same information shall be sent to Fort Pitt, for the information of Col. Butler, as you have requested of us.

This, therefore, is all that we have to say to you at this time, and are desirous that you may go whither you intended.

SIR:

Thus far, I have attempted to delineate the several events and progress of my tour, among the Six Nations of Indians, &c. And although the commissions you were pleased to honor me with were not so completely accomplished as wished for, I nevertheless enjoy a conscious evidence, that, in no instance, have I omitted to put in practice such means as I conceived to be the most conducive to that end.

I have the honor to be, your Excellency's most humble servant,

THOMAS PROCTER.

Major General H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

Instructions to Colonel Timothy Pickering.

SIR:

The Vice President of the United States, and the Heads of the Departments of State, who are empowered thereto by the President of the United States, having determined it to be expedient, at this time, that the Six Nations of Indians, so termed, should be assembled together, for the purpose of cementing the existing friendships, and that this business should be performed by you, I have the honor of giving you the instructions herein contained, which are to serve as the general rules of your conduct.

In order that you may comprehend clearly the present relative situation of the United States with the Six Nations, I herewith deliver you copies of certain written speeches which were delivered by the Cornplanter, a chief of the Senecas, and his companions, who were lately on a visit to this city, to the President of the United States, and the answers thereto. Two of these answers were signed with due form by the President of the United States, and the first engrossed on parchment, and also the instructions to Colonel Thomas Procter, and a letter to Governor Clinton.

It would be proper that you should repeat to the said Six Nations, all that has been stated by the President of the United States, as the foundation of their future expectations.

It being the sincere desire of the General Government that the Indians, on all occasions, should be treated with entire justice and humanity, you may give the strongest assurances on this point.

The great object of the proposed meeting will be, to impress on the minds of the Indians that their interest and happiness depend upon the protection and friendship of the United States, and to conciliate their affections, for which purpose you will use your highest exertion.

That the war in which we are involved with the Western Indians is highly disagreeable to the United States, and would be speedily terminated, were the Indians to manifest pacific dispositions; but, if they persist in hostilities, their destruction must be the consequence, as may be easily proved to them by a comparative view of the respective force.

That, if the Six Nations shall be convinced that the United States are desirous of peace, on terms of moderation and justice, and that any further opposition of the Western Indians, after receiving information of the humane dispositions of the United States, will be entirely unjustifiable; in this case, it is the expectation of the President of the United States that the Six Nations do not only abstain from joining the enemy, but that they manifest their friendship by sending their young warriors to join our army, for which they shall be well paid.

It will be important to dwell much upon this point. It will be difficult, if not impracticable, for the chiefs to restrain the young men from indulging their passion for war. They will, therefore, probably join the Western Indians, unless they join us. If this should be the case, the United States will consider the Six Nations as responsible for the conduct of their young men. To avoid, therefore, so dangerous a situation, they had better join our forces than remain liable to join the enemy. In case of their compliance with your request, it would be proper that you make a decisive arrangement on this point, so that a number of their warriors, not exceeding fifty or sixty, join the troops at fort Harmar, or fort Washington, by the fifteenth or twentieth of July. If the Cornplanter should head this party, it would be most acceptable, as his attachment and fidelity could be relied upon.

You will observe the contents of the letter to Governor Clinton. If, therefore, you should see Captain Brandt at the meeting, you will endeavor, by all reasonable methods, to attach him to the United States; and, if you should think proper, you may invite him to repair to this place, when the President of the United States shall be present, together with such other important characters as you may judge proper; but none but such characters ought to be invited, on account of the expense. In case of their accepting the invitation, the proper time of their visit would be during the next session of Congress.

That the General Government are not insensible to the improper conduct of some lawless whites on the frontiers, to the friendly Indians. That every measure shall be taken to make atonement to the Indians aggrieved, by making liberal compensation for the loss of property, upon which subject General St. Clair is fully instructed, and that, also, the States have been applied to for the punishment of the aggressors.

You will, also, inform the Indians how desirous the President of the United States is, that the Indians should have imparted to them the blessings of husbandry, and the arts, and of his willingness to receive the young sons of some of their principal chiefs, for the two-fold purpose of teaching them to read and write, and to instruct them fully in the arts of husbandry.

If they should readily accede to this proposition, you may receive the children to be educated, either at the time of the treaty, or at such other time and place as you may agree upon.

You have delivered to you certain goods, agreeably to the invoices hereunto annexed, in order to be presented at the treaty, according to your judgment; and, if it should be your opinion, that pensions, not exceeding one hundred dollars each, bestowed, annually, on four or five of the principal chiefs, would greatly tend to create or increase an attachment to the United States, you will please to intimate the same to them, on condition of being hereafter confirmed by the President of the United States.

You will conduct your business journal-wise, in the manner you observed at Tioga, keeping written copies of all speeches delivered to, or received from, the Indians; and you will report every part of your proceedings, in order to be submitted to the President of the United States.

You will keep all your accounts accurately, and present them after the treaty, supported, in all cases, by proper vouchers; and, on this point, the delivery of the goods to the Indians to be witnessed by the most respectable white characters who may be present.

The rate of your compensation for your services shall be the same as the President of the United States stipulated in your former employment of this nature, at Tioga.

Given at the War Office of the United States, in the city of Philadelphia, this second day of May, 1791.
H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

To Colonel TIMOTHY PICKERING.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 18, 1791.

SIR:

I have received yours of the 8th of May. The report of the Jersey men to Colonel Abraham Miller, as delivered to you, relative to the Oneidas, Tuscaroras, Cayugas, and Onondagas, joining the Western Indians in hostilities against the United States, is, most probably, ill founded. In order that you may possess all the information relative to the objects of your mission, in my power to afford, I transmit you, herein enclosed, a letter from Colonel Brandt, dated 20th February, 1791, which I have not yet answered; a letter from Mr. Kirkland, of the 22d of April, and my answer thereto; and, also, my letter to General Schuyler, of the 11th instant; Brandt's letter to Mr. Kirkland, of the 8th of March; Governor Clinton's letter to me of the 27th of April, and my answer thereto, of the 11th instant. You will see by the letter to Governor Clinton, the turn that the idea of employing Brandt has taken, and you will please entirely conform thereto. It is sincerely to be desired that every effort be made to establish peace with the Indians on a solid basis, and, if possible, previously to an active campaign against them. But, if force must be exercised to prevent their depredations, it is to be hoped that it will be administered in such a manner as to bring them to terms, so as to prevent the necessity of another campaign. You will, therefore, to the utmost of your power, give every facility to all the messages of peace, and impress all the Indians who shall come within your sphere of action, with the justice and humanity of the General Government.

The goods for your treaty were sent off by Mr. Hodgdon, on the — instant.

I am, &c. &c.

Colonel TIMOTHY PICKERING.

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 13th, 1791.

I have received yours of the 12th ultimo, with its enclosures for General Chapin.

Colonel Procter has returned to this city, without effecting the object of his mission. He was at Buffalo creek from the 29th of April, until the 21st of May. Brandt's interest was against any of the chiefs going forward with him to the Western Indians. But he finally carried the point, that a number of the chiefs and warriors would accompany him, provided he could obtain a vessel for their transportation from Niagara. But they absolutely refused to proceed either in canoes or by land, from, as they said, an apprehension of the Western Indians.

Brandt had gone to the Western Indians, about the 12th of May, with a design, as the Indians said at Buffalo creek, of endeavoring to make peace.

Indeed it would appear, from the imperfect information I at present possess, that the British have made use of Brandt, with a view to peace, intending to make a merit of it, in some future time. You will see by the speech of the Farmer's Brother, which I enclose, the ultimate intentions of the Indians who were assembled at Buffalo creek. This is the only written document which I have yet received from Colonel Procter, he having sent his despatches by Captain Houdin, by the way of Wyoming. I expect that he will wait on you, and I hope you will conceive it to be proper to open his despatches to me. But if you should not, and there should be any thing of real importance for you to know, I shall despatch an express to you.

I believe your treaty will be pretty generally attended. Mr. Morris will not attempt to purchase any lands at present, although one of his sons will be present at the treaty. Mr. Morris does not approve of the conduct of Mr. Ewing, and informs me he has ordered Ewing to be discharged. General Butler, in a letter of the 2d instant, mentions that he was taking some steps with the Six Nations, to induce them to send some of their warriors to join our army, and that he would inform me further thereon by the next post. He was informed by Colonel Procter of your treaty, and has not been directed by me upon the subject. And I have also recently informed him of the treaty, and that he must not take any measures which would interfere with it.

If you should persuade the Indians to send a party to join our troops, the route should be from Cornplanter's town to fort Franklin, on the junction of French creek with the Alleghany.

Lieutenant Jeffers and a party of the continental troops would join them, and proceed as General Butler should direct. Lieutenant Jeffers is well known to the Indians, and is really an intelligent and sensible man. If more than sixty should offer for this service, it would not be material. But unless they could be at fort Franklin by the 20th July at farthest, the arrangement would be useless.

I enclose you a copy of my last letter, lest you should not have received the original.

Since writing the above, Captain Houdin has arrived, and brought your letter of the 5th instant, and, also, Col. Procter's despatches. But as they confirm the above ideas without containing any thing further, it is not necessary to send you copies of the several species. The Cornplanter may be depended upon; through all the changes of policy, we must cultivate and elevate him. Brandt, the Farmer's brother, and all the rest of them, ought to be treated with great kindness, and attached to us if possible. But the Cornplanter is our friend from the solid ties of interest, and we must rivet them by all ways and means in our power. Houdin's receipt will be credited to your account.

I am, &c. &c.

Colonel TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Letter from the Secretary of War to Governor Clinton.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 12th April, 1791.

SIR:

I have the honor to inform your Excellency in confidence, that the present view of affairs upon the frontiers, indicates strongly, that all the Indian tribes northwest of the Ohio, will, in the course of the ensuing campaign, be combined in hostilities against the United States.

The President of the United States has been exceedingly desirous of avoiding an Indian war, and to establish a general peace with all the tribes, on liberal terms, and measures have been taken for that purpose, but the effect is extremely doubtful. The involved state of things, arising from circumstances not under the control of the General Government, have proceeded from one stage to another, until it seems but too probable that force only can decide the contest.

As it is to be apprehended that the Six Nations may be brought to act against us, it has been conceived important to assemble them together, particularly the Senecas, at as early a period as possible, in order to brighten the chain, and to remove all causes of discontent.

Accordingly, Colonel Timothy Pickering, who resides at Wyoming, and who had a meeting the last autumn with the Senecas at Tioga Point, has been requested to invite the Six Nations generally, to a meeting at such place as shall be most convenient to them, and at as early a period as they could conveniently be assembled.

Aware of your Excellency's influence over Captain Joseph Brandt, I have conceived the idea, that you might induce him, by proper arrangements, to undertake to conciliate the Western Indians to pacific measures, and bring them to hold a general treaty. This measure would be abundantly more compatible with the feelings and interest of the United States, than to extirpate the Indians, which seems to be the inevitable consequence of a war of long continuance with them. You are entirely able to estimate Brandt's talents, and the degree of confidence which might be placed in him on such an occasion. It ought not, however, to be concealed from your Excellency, that Captain Abeel or the Cornplanter, has undertaken this object, and that, most probably, he is actually employed at this time on the business with Colonel Procter, who was sent from this city for the purpose. And it is also proper, that you should understand, that a mortal enmity exists between Brandt and the Cornplanter.

In this situation of things, if your Excellency should entertain the opinion strongly, that Brandt might be used with good effect, and consistently with the Cornplanter's mission, and that they would not clash in the business, I earnestly request that you would take the necessary measures for the purpose, according to your own judgment.

Perhaps Colonel Willet, of whose talents in managing the minds of men I have a high opinion, might accept of an agency on this occasion, as it might respect Brandt.

He will be on the spot, and if you should consider the idea practicable, you could give him such information and instructions as would tend to success. After which, the Colonel might repair to this city, in order to make the further necessary arrangements. Your Excellency could despatch an express to Brandt, to meet Colonel Willet, either at Colonel Pickering's place of meeting, or such other as you should judge proper.

Your Excellency will please to hold out such inducements to Brandt as you may judge most proper, with respect to money. The arrangement for Colonel Willet's services should be made satisfactory to him.

Any sum of money which you should conceive necessary to put this affair in motion, shall be paid to your order.

I beg your Excellency to be persuaded, that nothing but a solid conviction of your regard for the public welfare, could have constrained me to trouble you on this occasion; and I take the liberty of requesting a line from you immediately, in answer to these suggestions: for, should you judge them practicable, not a moment's time should be lost.

With great respect &c.

His Excellency Governor CLINTON.

The Secretary of War to Governor Clinton.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 28th, 1791.

SIR:

Having had the honor to write to your Excellency, on the 12th instant, upon a subject of considerable importance to the welfare of the United States, and not having received an answer thereto, I am induced to believe, that my letter may, by some accident, have miscarried; I therefore transmit your Excellency a copy of it, and as Colonel Pickering is now in this city, I beg the favor of an answer as soon as possible.

His Excellency Governor CLINTON.

Copy of a letter from the Governor of the State of New York to the Secretary for the Department of War.

NEW YORK, 27th April, 1791.

SIR:

I have received the letter, which you did me the honor to write on the twelfth instant; and by the tenor of the communication therein contained, I am led to conclude, that the President has given you discretionary powers in regard of the objects upon which you have been pleased to confer with me.

I observe, with some regret, that the measure of attempting a convention of the whole six nations, hath been resolved and acted upon. It cannot be unknown to you, that those nations are at present disunited by private animosities; that there subsists not among them, mutual intercourse and confidence, sufficient to lead to a general combination, or to effect (without the interposition of the agents of the United States) a general congress of those nations, even for the purpose of deliberation; that this disunion produces impotency and secures inaction, and that, if we should revive their importance, by renewing their union, we may give power and vigor, which we cannot with certainty direct, and over which we shall, with much trouble and expense, have an uncertain control. But, having heretofore communicated to the President my sentiments upon the policy of that measure, I shall not now further obtrude them upon you; and I entreat you to be assured, that, how muchsoever I may differ as to the means, I will, with the utmost cheerfulness and assiduity, concur with you in endeavors to attain the ends, which you justly consider as momentous and interesting to the Union.

I have communicated to Colonel Willet, your confidence in his talents, and desire for the interposition of his influence with Brandt, but have it not in my power to inform you of his explicit answer; I could wish that your application might be made to him directly, if you should continue in the opinion of the importance of his personal exertions on this occasion.

I had, in June last, appointed an interview with Brandt, contemplating the danger you appear to apprehend from his address and his influence with several of the Indian nations, (which I am persuaded is very considerable) and from different letters I have since received from him, I have reason to hope he will give me the opportunity of a personal conference with him at this place, the beginning of the ensuing summer, if the proposed convention, to which I will not venture to say he may not be opposed, should not prevent it; but the good understanding between us, and the friendly and familiar intercourse I have successfully endeavored to preserve, will, I doubt not, predominate over any transient disgust that the measures of the Union may have heretofore excited in his mind, and enable me to procure an interview with him, at any time and place not particularly inconvenient. To accomplish this, however, with certainty, it may require the personal application of some one expressly delegated, and in whom he will confide. As your wishes appear to be confined to Colonel Willet, I shall not, without your farther advice, undertake to exercise a discretion on this subject. Your knowledge of the views of government enable you to determine the importance of this measure. I can only add, that the most perfect reliance may be had in my exertions to carry those views into effect, when the particular mode of co-operation shall be defined, and connected with competent authority.

With sentiments of the highest respect and esteem, I am, your most obedient servant,

GEO. CLINTON.

The Honorable HENRY KNOX, Esq.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of War to the Governor of the State of New York, in answer to his Excellency's of the 27th of April.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 11th May, 1791.

SIR:

I had the honor, on the fifth instant, to receive your Excellency's favor, dated the twenty-seventh ultimo, being an answer to my letter of the twelfth of the same month.

I am sorry that you do not approve the convention of the Six Nations, at this particular crisis. The measure appeared highly expedient, in order not only to prevent their joining the Western Indians, but, if possible, to induce them, as a security to the continuance of their friendship, to join some of their young warriors to the troops of the United States.

Although the Senecas were the principal object of the meeting, that tribe constituting the main body of the Six Nations resident within the general limits of the United States, yet it was conceived that it would have been impolitic to omit inviting the other tribes, eastward of the Senecas, to the meeting.

My having seen your letter to the President of the United States, relative to Captain Joseph Brandt, and knowing also from repeated personal communications with your Excellency, the confidence Brandt reposed in your character, together with a persuasion of your cordiality to pacific measures with the Indians, were my inducements to address you on the twelfth ultimo.

My authority on the occasion, was founded on the circumstances, that the business of Indian affairs had been established by law, as a branch of the Department of War, and that the President of the United States had instructed me upon the objects of the Department during his absence.

I am not enough acquainted with the character or views of Captain Brandt, to be able to conclude whether he would work cordially in the design of peace, upon such principles as may not hereafter create greater embarrassments. This was a point which I submitted to your Excellency's decision.

I am fully possessed with the information of his enmity to the Cornplanter, who, I am of opinion, is greatly attached to the United States, upon the solid conviction of the measure being the only one by which he and the other Indians shall be secured from utter destruction.

The Cornplanter has been actively employed to persuade the Senecas to send forward a powerful deputation, under his direction, to escort Colonel Procter to the Miami Indians, in order to induce them to peace. This information has been lately received, and from circumstances, I am inclined to believe, that Colonel Procter, protected by the Senecas, may be at this time, either actually with, or very near the hostile Indians.

Your Excellency may remember Captain Brandt's exertions, in the year 1786, to form a grand confederation of all the Indians northwest of the Ohio, the Six Nations included.

By a late letter which he has written to Mr. Kirkland, and which I received yesterday, it appears that he still should like that measure, if he could find it practicable. But such an event could not be for the interest of the United States: for, although justice, policy, and humanity, dictate a liberal treatment of the Indians, it cannot be for the public interest to consolidate them in one body, which would be liable to a single impulse.

Therefore, although it would be wise to conciliate Captain Brandt, and if within the power of a reasonable sum of money, to attach him warmly to the United States, yet, considering the train of the business, under the Cornplanter's management, and the designs of Brandt relative to a general confederation of Indians, it would not, probably, be good policy to employ him actively, at present, with the Western Indians.

It appears to me, judging from experience, that the United States may entirely depend on the Cornplanter's abilities, fidelity, and his active exertions. Brandt's attachment may be doubted, and his views may be dangerous.

But, as it may be concluded that Brandt's visit to your Excellency ought to be encouraged by all means, and that the result of the impressions you may make upon him, would be highly favorable to the public interest, I shall instruct Colonel Pickering not to obstruct, but facilitate his visit.

Colonel Pickering has appointed the Painted Post as the place, and the 17th of June next as the time, of his meeting with the Indians.

I am persuaded that the President of the United States, upon his arrival in this city, about the beginning of July, would be much gratified to receive a visit from Captain Brandt.

It may be proper, also, to intimate to your Excellency, that any pecuniary engagements you shall judge proper to enter into with Captain Brandt, to secure his attachment to the United States, will be paid without delay by the General Government.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your Excellency's obedient humble servant,

H. KNOX.

His Excellency the Governor of the State of New York.

Letter from the Secretary of War to the Honorable General Schuyler.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 11th May, 1791.

DEAR SIR:

I was in hopes to have heard from you relative to your idea of employing the chief Old Peter, of the Oneidas. Mr. Kirkland has written relative to the same objects, for Captain Hendricks, of whom he speaks well.

The Cornplanter continues firm, and most probably has gone forward to the hostile Indians before this time.

If you think proper to employ Captain Hendricks, and Peter, whom you mentioned, and furnish them with the necessary means for the purpose, I will instantly make the re-imbursments to your order.

I request the favor of you to forward the enclosed letter to Mr. Kirkland.

I am, sir, &c.

The Honorable General SCHUYLER, Albany.

*Letter from the Secretary of War to the Rev. Samuel Kirkland.*WAR DEPARTMENT, May 11th, 1791.

SIR:

I have just received your letter of the 22d of April, for which I sincerely thank you. I highly approve of Captain Hendricks being employed, and will make good any reasonable allowance to him for his services. Let him call on Colonel Pickering, at Wyoming, who will furnish him with clothing and necessaries for the purpose. General Schuyler also mentioned an Oneida chief of great respectability, who I wish would also accompany the others. But, I imagine the Cornplanter has already anticipated the others, and gone forward.

Colonel Brandt is right as to the principles of the boundaries. The idea, in future, of conquest, ought to be relinquished, and fair purchase and optional sale take place.

I shall be glad to hear that you have pushed forward Captain Hendricks, and the Chief Peter.

I am, sir, &amp;c.

To the Rev. SAMUEL KIRKLAND.

*Letter from the Secretary of War to Governor Clinton.*WAR DEPARTMENT, August 17th, 1791.

SIR:

The President of the United States has commanded me to transmit to your Excellency, an extract of the report of Colonel Timothy Pickering, who acted as the commissioner of the United States, at a late council held with the five nations of Indians at the Painted Post, on the Susquehannah.

The object of the said council was, to conciliate the said Indians, and attach them to the United States; to prevent them listening to, or being combined with, the Western hostile Indians. The more effectually to carry this design into execution, it was thought proper to draw them to a greater distance from the theatre of war, and at a critical period to hold out an object of employment for the minds of their young men, who are with difficulty restrained from indulging their ruling passion for war.

These objects appear to have been executed with ability and judgment, and good consequences may be expected to flow from the council.

But it appears, that the commissioner's desire to accomplish the objects of his commission in the greatest degree, has led him incautiously, at the earnest request of the Cayugas present, to ratify and confirm a certain lease of lands, belonging to the Cayuga nation of Indians, to John Richardson, and to certify that a certain assignment of the Seneca Indians, to the daughters of Ebenezer Allen, was done at a public treaty, held under the authority of the United States. No copies, however, of either instruments, have been retained, or produced by the said commissioner.

The right of the State of New York, to the pre-emption of the Cayuga lands, is unquestioned, and also, that the said right embraces all possible alienations of said lands by the Indians, with the concurrence of the United States, according to the constitution and laws.

Therefore, I do, by command of the President of the United States, hereby transmit to your Excellency an explicit disavowal of the conduct of the said commissioner, relative to the said lease of the Cayuga lands to John Richardson, and also of the certificate relative to the Senecas' assignment of lands, to the children of Ebenezer Allen; and I am further ordered to inform your Excellency, that the said acts of the said commissioner were unauthorized by his instructions, and will be considered as entirely null and void by the United States.

But if, however, the State of New York should judge that it would derive any benefit from the due execution of said lease, the Executive authority of the United States will do every thing which may be proper, upon the occasion.

Colonel Pickering, who is going to New York, will personally wait upon your Excellency, to give you any further explanations which you may request.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

H. K.

His Excellency Governor CLINTON.

Queries proposed by Captain Hendrick Aupamut, Chief of the Muhheconnuck (or Stockbridge) tribe of Indians, and the answers to those queries, by Timothy Pickering, Commissioner in behalf of the United States for holding a treaty with the Six Nations of Indians, at Newtown, in the State of New York, June 27th, 1791.

1st. Query.—Whether, if he makes a visit to the hostile Indians, he may assure them that the United States are sincerely desirous of making peace with them?

Answer.—The most solemn assurances may be given: for the United States are sincerely desirous of making peace; and I have received pointed orders to give every possible facility to the messengers of peace.

2d. Query.—Whether, if the Western Indians consent to make peace, the United States will not, as a condition of peace, oblige them to give up part of their lands?

Answer.—The United States will require no such condition. The Western Indians will retain all their lands, agreeably to the treaties of peace subsisting between them and the United States, until of their own will and choice they shall fairly sell them; unless they should obstinately persevere in their hostilities, until the United States shall drive them from their country; and, in that case, their lands will never be restored to them.

3d. Query.—If the hostile Indians should be disposed to make peace, and be willing immediately to commence the negotiation, how shall the knowledge thereof be communicated so speedily as to suspend the operations of the army of the United States? Should messengers from those Indians, or he himself, attempt to go directly to the nearest post of the United States, they might be in the utmost danger of being killed by the scouting parties of white men.

Answer.—Should the hostile Indians be sincerely disposed to make peace, I have no doubt but they will hit on proper means of communicating a knowledge of it to General St. Clair, or the commanding officer of the troops of the United States in the Western territory; perhaps by sending some of their warriors, accompanied by one more of the white men living among them, with a white flag, or by getting some of those white men to come along with their message, and a letter from you. A direct communication in some such way is most to be desired; lest, if a circuitous route be pursued, our troops should begin to operate before the messengers of peace should meet them; and that a letter from you (who are not known to the officers commanding the troops of the United States) may be properly received, I will write to General St. Clair, informing him of your character and business, and assuring him that he may perfectly rely on the intelligence you shall give him; and that General St. Clair, or the commanding officer, may distinguish your letter of intelligence from a counterfeit, it may be proper for you, with your own hand, to write me a request to communicate a specimen of it to him, and underneath I will write the letter above proposed. This specimen I will transmit to General St. Clair, and a duplicate to the Secretary of War, to forward to General St. Clair without delay, so that when your letter of intelligence shall reach him, a comparison of the hand-writing may supersede or remove all doubts of its authenticity; and as you may be obliged, or find it expedient, to send runners to the Alleghany river with your intelligence for General St. Clair, I will write to Lieutenant Jeffers, or officer commanding at fort Franklin, (which is near the junction of French creek with the Alleghany river) desiring him to forward, without delay, any letters which you shall transmit to his care. This letter I will send by Captain Baldwin, who is now here, but who resides with the Cornplanter, in the neighborhood of fort Franklin.

4th. Query.—What treaties have been made with the Western Indians, relative to their lands?

Answer.—For your full information on this subject, and other concerns with the Western Indians, I will furnish you with copies of the treaties made by the United States, with the Wyandots, Delawares, Shawanese, Ottawas, and Chippewas, in the years 1785 and 1786. I will also give you a copy of the treaty made last year with the great Creek nation of Indians, by which you will see, strongly manifested, the good will of the United States towards the Indian nations: for, the benevolent spirit conspicuous in that treaty truly marks the kind disposition of the United States towards all the Indian nations within their limits.

These queries and answers I will transmit to the Secretary of War, and request him to give the necessary orders corresponding with these arrangements. With the same view, I will write to General St. Clair, by the way of fort Franklin.

Copy of a letter from Colonel Timothy Pickering to the Secretary of War.

PHILADELPHIA, 16th August, 1791.

SIR:

In addition to the information given in my report of the proceedings at the late treaty with the Six Nations of Indians, relative to the land assigned by the Seneca nation to the children of one of their women, by Ebenezer Allen, and to the Cayuga reservation, leased to John Richardson for twenty years, it may be expedient for me to mention more particularly the grounds and inducements to a public ratification of both at that treaty.

It appeared to be understood by the Senecas, that Messrs. Morris and Ogden, as the grantees of Massachusetts, had the right of pre-emption of all their lands. But, at the same time, there existed nothing to bar a division of their whole country among themselves; and if they could divide the whole, they could certainly set off a part to two individuals of their nation as their share. This is the object of their deed to Allen's children, whom they called their children, agreeably to the rule of descent among them, which is in the female line; and in this deed, the land assigned is declared to be in full of those two children's share of the whole Seneca country. Here was the ground of my ratification.

Now, you will be pleased to recollect, that before this matter was opened in council, I had repeated the law of the United States relative to the Indian lands, and the solemn declaration of the President, last winter, to the Cornplanter, that they (the Indians) had the right to sell, or to refuse to sell, their lands, and that, in respect to their lands, they might depend on the protection of the United States; so that on this head they had now no cause of jealousy or discontent. This being by them well understood, I saw no way of avoiding the ratification of the assignment to their two children, without reviving, or rather exciting, their utmost jealousy, as it would have been denying the free enjoyment of their own lands, by some members of the nation, according to the will of the nation; and a denial, I was apprehensive, would lead them to think that the solemn assurances of the President were made but to amuse and deceive. Here you see my great inducement to the ratification. Let me now remark, that every proposition made by me to the Six Nations, for introducing among them the primary and most useful improvements of civil life, (propositions grounded on the President's declarations to the Cornplanter, which I was enjoined to repeat, and on your particular instruction on this point) leads to a separate occupancy and enjoyment of land. The introduction of the art of husbandry, in its improved state, was the great object; but improvements in husbandry could not take place without exclusive property, that the improver might enjoy the fruit of his labor. Neither could the improving husbandman exist without the smith and the carpenter; and his flax and wool would furnish employment to the spinner and weaver. These were all the manual arts I mentioned. Instruction in the arts of reading and writing was at least equally desirable to the Indians; some of the chiefs have even manifested an anxiety to obtain such instruction for their children; and on this head the President was explicit, that they should receive the necessary aid. The obvious consequence of such improvements is the separate enjoyment of lands; the nature and advantages of such improvements were explained, and appeared to have been fully understood by the Five Nations, and they have explicitly agreed to adopt them. They only wait for that assistance which they were assured the United States were ready to afford them. Should that assistance prove successful, (for at this stage of the business I cannot entertain a suspicion that such assistance will not be furnished) it will tend to defeat the pre-emption right altogether, unless those improvements, by showing the Indians how small a portion of their lands, under proper cultivation, will suffice for their ample support, should induce them to part with the residue in exchange for a full supply of domestic animals, implements of husbandry, and other necessaries adapted to their improving condition; and this, as I some time ago intimated to Mr. Morris, appeared to me to afford the only chance of extinguishing the Indian title to any of the lands he had bought of Massachusetts.

With respect to the Cayugas' reservation, I had determined to give no countenance to a lease of it. John Richardson applied to me about it before the Indians arrived. I told him that the pre-emption right was with the State of New York; that, if the Cayugas could lease it for five years, they might for ten, twenty, a hundred, or a thousand, and thus defeat the pre-emption right of the State. I heard no more of it until a few days before the treaty was closed. Then the Cayuga chiefs and Richardson made their applications, and then I was informed that a law of the State (passed as suggested, in consequence of the long lease obtained of the Indians by John Livingston and others) allowed of leases for any term not exceeding twenty-one years; and that, at the treaty last year, at fort Stanwix, Governor Clinton expressly assured the Cayugas that, if they pleased, they might lease their lands. The chiefs discovered much anxiety, and were importunate (the Fish-carrier, their head chief, in particular) to have the lease accomplished. I asked for the law referred to; the statutes were produced, but those at Newton did not reach down to that session of the Legislature in which it was said the law had been enacted. I was further informed, that, at a late session of the York Legislature, (I think the last winter) a petition had been preferred in behalf of a lessee from the same Cayugas, for the ratification of a lease of a small tract of land lying on the water communication of the Seneca and Cayuga lakes, for the term of fifteen years, and that the Assembly said a Legislative sanction was not necessary, the lease being for a term less than twenty-one years. All this information was repeated to me in such a manner as to afford a strong presumption of its truth; yet, that I might have all the evidence which the case would then admit of, I made inquiry of Colonel Brinton Paine, one of the judges of the county court at Newton, and he generally confirmed the information above recited. I then ratified the lease, as stated in my report, grounding the date on the information, and expressly referring to it. I have not a copy of the lease or of the ratification; the latter I wrote when I was in a very great hurry. I believe the last day I was on the ground; and, in transcribing it from my rough draught, I made divers alterations, which rendered the rough draught useless. The inducements to this ratification were similar to those in the case of the assignment to Allen's children. The ratification of that assignment I subjoin, as copied from my rough draught, in which I do not remember that any alterations were made.

The foregoing detail I have given as the matters rest upon my mind. I wished to have avoided meddling with them, but I could devise no way of doing it without exciting or confirming jealousies, which it was the great object of my mission to prevent or remove.

I have the honor, &c.

TIMO. PICKERING.

P. S. I might have mentioned, that Mr. Allen declared that he would make to Messrs. Morris and Ogden a reasonable compensation for their pre-emption right to the lands assigned to his children.

Ratification of the deed of assignment executed by the chiefs of the Seneca nation, to the two Indian children of Ebenezer Allen; by Timothy Pickering, Esq. commissioner in behalf of the United States for the purpose of holding a treaty with the Six Nations of Indians.

I certify that the instrument of writing contained in this sheet, and in the sheet of paper annexed to it, (on which also I have written my name) being an assignment made by the Seneca nation to their two children, Mary Allen and Chloe Allen, therein named, of the tract of land therein described, as their full share of the Seneca lands, was yesterday particularly explained by me, in full council of the said Six Nations; and, after I had explained the same, I asked them if they understood it: the sachems and chiefs of the Seneca nation answered, that the whole was well understood. The instrument having been thus agreed to, in full council, as aforesaid, was then signed, sealed, and delivered, in my presence, by all the sachems and chiefs, whose names appear in my hand writing, being the fifteen whose names are subscribed in the right hand column and one in the left hand column, save that the chief So-ne-aw-do-wau only signed and sealed the instrument in my presence.

In witness whereof, &c.

Instructions to Major General Arthur St. Clair.

SIR:

The President of the United States having, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appointed you a major general in the service of the United States, and of consequence invested you with the chief command of the troops to be employed upon the frontiers during the ensuing campaign, it is proper that you should be possessed of the views of the Government respecting the objects of your command. I am, therefore, authorized and commanded, by the President of the United States, to deliver you the following instructions, in order to serve as the general principles of your conduct.

But, it is only general principles which can be pointed out. In the execution of the duties of your station, circumstances which cannot now be foreseen may arise to render material deviations necessary. Such circumstances will require the exercise of your talents. The Government possesses the security of your character and mature experience, that your judgment will be proper on all occasions.

You are well informed of the unfavorable impressions which the issue of the last expedition has made on the public mind, and you are also aware of the expectations which are formed of the success of the ensuing campaign.

An Indian war, under any circumstances, is regarded by the great mass of the people of the United States as an event which ought, if possible, to be avoided. It is considered that the sacrifices of blood and treasure in such a war far exceed any advantages which can possibly be reaped by it.

The great policy, therefore, of the General Government, is to establish a just and liberal peace with all the Indian tribes within the limits and in the vicinity of the territory of the United States.

Your intimations to the hostile Indians, immediately after the late expedition through the Wyandots and Delawares; the arrangements with the Senecas who were lately in this city, that part of the Six Nations should repair to the said hostile Indians, to influence them to pacific measures; together with the recent mission of Colonel Procter to them for the same purpose, will strongly evince the desire of the General Government to prevent the further effusion of blood, and to quiet all disturbances. And when you shall arrive upon the frontiers, if any other or further measures to effect the same object should present, you will eagerly embrace them, and the reasonable expenses thereof shall be defrayed by the public. Colonel Procter's instructions, and the messages to the Miamies, &c. are annexed, marked A.

It is, however, important to be remembered, that all persons employed on this account, must, if practicable, return to fort Washington, on or before the 5th of May next, for the reasons which will hereafter appear.

But, if all the lenient measures taken, or which may be taken, should fail to bring the hostile Indians to a just sense of their situation, it will be necessary that you should use such coercive means as you shall possess, for that purpose.

You are informed that, by an act of Congress, passed the 2d instant, another regiment is to be raised, and added to the military establishment, and provision made for raising two thousand levies, for the term of six months, for the service of the frontiers.

The plan for raising the said levies is hereunto annexed, marked B.

The 2d regiment of regulars will be recruited in the four New England States, excepting one company, to be recruited in South Carolina, and another in the State of Delaware.

Recruits will be raised to complete the first regiment in the States from Maryland to New York, inclusively.

The recruits for the regulars, as well as levies, will, as soon as they shall be raised, be mustered by companies and marched to Fort Pitt, there to receive your further orders.

It is contemplated that the mass of the regulars and levies may be recruited and rendezvous at fort Washington, by the 10th of July. In this case, you will have assembled a force of three thousand effectives at least, besides leaving small garrisons on the Ohio, in order to perform your main expedition, hereinafter mentioned.

But, in the mean time, if the Indians refuse to listen to the messengers of peace sent to them, it is most probable they will, unless prevented, spread themselves along the line of frontiers, for the purpose of committing all the depredations in their power.

In order to avoid so calamitous an event, Brigadier General Charles Scott, of Kentucky, has been authorized by me, on the part of the President of the United States, to make an expedition against the Wea, or Ouianon towns, with mounted volunteers, or militia from Kentucky, not exceeding the number of seven hundred and fifty, officers included.

That you may perfectly comprehend this subject, copies of the instructions given Brigadier General Scott, and the powers vested in him, in conjunction with John Brown, Harry Innes, Benjamin Logan, and Isaac Shelby, and dated the 9th instant, are hereunto annexed, marked C.

You will perceive by the said instructions, that, if the said expedition be not prevented, by you, on or before the 10th of May next, it is to proceed according to the instructions.

The period of the 10th of May has been fixed, in order to afford time for Colonel Procter, and the other messengers, to return, before the commencement of the said expedition. You will observe, that Colonel Procter's instructions are pointed, as to the time of his return.

You will also perceive, by the instructions to Brigadier General Scott, that it is confided to your discretion, whether there shall be more than one of the said expeditions of mounted volunteers or militia.

Your nearer view of the objects to be effected, by a second desultory expedition, will enable you to form a better judgment than can at present be formed, at this distance. The propriety of a second operation would, in some degree, depend on the alacrity and good composition of the troops of which the first may have been formed; of its success; of the probable effects a second similar blow would have upon the Indians, with respect to its influencing them to peace; or, if they should be still hostilely disposed, of preventing them from desolating the frontiers by their parties.

It is to be observed, that, in case of a second or third desultory operation, that you will limit the numbers to be employed, to five hundred.

The manner of their being mustered, both before and subsequent to their march, are stated in Brigadier General Scott's instructions.

And you will also judge, how far a desultory operation, made at the time of the main expedition, would conduce to the general success of the service; or, if a party of mounted volunteers, or regulars, or levies, were to form part of your main force. In case two such desultory operations should be formed, from Kentucky, and you should decide upon a third, of the same nature, to support, collaterally, the main expedition, I suggest the propriety of your employing Brigadier General John Sevier for the purpose.

If circumstances should lead you to decide in favor of employing him, you could send an express to him, between the forks of Holston and French Broad, so that he should have three weeks, or a month, to raise men; or perhaps it would be the best plan, to mount the battalion of levies, which is to be raised in the territory of the United States, south of the Ohio, and with such additions as you should order, put them under the orders of Brigadier General Sevier.

It is, however, proper to remark, that, as the expense of an expedition of a mounted corps would be very considerable, the probable advantages ought far to outweigh the risk and expense.

If such operations should be successful, and a considerable number of prisoners should be taken, particularly women and children, it would have the certain effect of humbling the Indians, and inducing them to sue for mercy.

You will observe, in the instructions to Brigadier General Scott, which are to serve as a basis for the instructions of the commanders who may succeed him, that all captives are to be treated with great humanity. It will be sound policy to attract the Indians by kindness, after demonstrating to them our power to punish them, on all occasions.

While you are making such use of desultory operations as in your judgment the occasion may require, you will proceed vigorously, in every preparation in your power, for the purpose of the main expedition; and having assembled your force, and all things being in readiness, if no decisive indications of peace should have been produced, either by the messengers, or by the desultory operations, you will commence your march for the Miami village, in order to establish a strong and permanent military post at that place.

In your advance, you will establish such posts of communications with fort Washington, on the Ohio, as you may judge proper.

The post at the Miami village is intended for the purpose of awing and curbing the Indians in that quarter, and as the only preventive of future hostilities. It ought, therefore, to be rendered secure, against all attempts and insults of the Indians. The garrison which should be stationed there ought not only to be sufficient for the defence of the place, but always to afford a detachment of five or six hundred men, either to chastise any of the Wabash, or other hostile Indians, or to secure any convoy of provisions.

The establishment of said post is considered as an important object of the campaign, and is to take place in all events. In case of a previous treaty, the Indians are to be conciliated upon this point, if possible; and it is presumed, good arguments may be offered, to induce their acquiescence.

The situation, nature, and construction of the works you may direct, will depend upon your own judgment. Major Ferguson, of the artillery, will be fully capable of the execution.

He will be furnished with three five and a half inch howitzers, three six-pounders, and three three-pounders, all brass, with a sufficient quantity of shot and shells, for the purpose of the expedition. The appropriation of these pieces will depend upon your orders.

Having commenced your march, upon the main expedition, and the Indians continuing hostile, you will use every possible exertion to make them feel the effects of your superiority; and after having arrived at the Miami village, and put your works in a defensible state, you will seek the enemy with the whole of your remaining force, and endeavor, by all possible means, to strike them with great severity.

It will be left to your discretion whether to employ, if attainable, any Indians of the Six Nations, and the Chickasaws or other Southern nations. Most probably the employment of about fifty of each, under the direction of some discreet and able chief, would be advantageous, but these ought not to be assembled before the line of march is taken up, because they are soon tired, and will not be detained. The force contemplated for the garrisons of the Miami village, and the communications, has been from a thousand to twelve hundred non-commissioned officers and privates. This is mentioned as a general idea, to which you will adhere, or from which you will deviate, as circumstances may require.

The garrison stationed at the Miami village, and its communications, must have in store, at least six months' good salted meat, and flour in proportion.

It is hardly possible, if the Indians continue hostile, that you will be suffered quietly to establish a post at the Miami village; conflicts, therefore, may be expected; and it is to be presumed that disciplined valor will triumph over the undisciplined Indians. In this event it is probable that the Indians will sue for peace; if this should be the case, the dignity of the United States will require that the terms should be liberal.

In order to avoid future wars, it might be proper to make the Wabash, and thence, over to the Miami, and down the same to its mouth at lake Erie, the boundary, excepting so far as the same should relate to the Wyandots and Delawares, on the supposition of their continuing faithful to the treaties. But, if they should join in the war against the United States, and your army be victorious, the said tribes ought to be removed without the boundary mentioned.

You will also judge whether it would be proper to extend the boundary, from the mouth of the River au Panse of the Wabash, in a due west line to the Mississippi. Few Indians, besides the Kickapoos, would be affected by such a line; this ought to be tenderly managed.

The modification of the boundary must be confided to your discretion, with this single observation, that the policy and interest of the United States dictate their being at peace with the Indians. This is of more value than millions of uncultivated acres, the right to which may be conceded by some, and disputed by others.

The establishment of a post at the Miami village will probably be regarded, by the British officers on the frontiers, as a circumstance of jealousy; it may, therefore, be necessary that you should, at a proper time, make such intimations as may remove all such dispositions. This intimation had better follow than precede the possession of the post, unless circumstances dictate otherwise. As it is not the inclination or interest of the United States to enter into a contest with Great Britain, every measure tending to any discussion or altercation must be prevented. The delicate situation of affairs may therefore render it improper at present to make any naval arrangement upon lake Erie.

After you shall have effected all the injury to the hostile Indians of which your force may be capable, and after having established the posts and garrisons at the Miami village and its communications, and placing the same under the orders of an officer worthy of such a high trust, you will return to fort Washington on the Ohio.

You will please to inform me of all the occurrences of your expedition, in order to be submitted to the President of the United States, together with such observations as may be necessary to form a comprehensive and precise judgment of the campaign, and of the further measures proper to be pursued by Government.

You will observe, by the treaties with the Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Cherokees, heretofore annexed, marked D, that the President of the United States directed the observance thereof in his proclamation of the 26th of August, 1790.

This proclamation became necessary, as information had been received that certain companies had purchased of the State of Georgia the pre-emption to the almost entire lands of the said Indian nations, and that measures were taking, in pursuance thereof, to effect settlements on the said lands, in direct violation of the said treaties, and the peace of the United States.

And information has lately been received, that a certain Doctor O'Fallon is levying troops in Kentucky, and issuing commissions in an illegal manner, for the purpose of making certain establishments upon the said lands.

The conduct of the said Doctor O'Fallon is considered of such a nature as that the attorney of the district of Kentucky has been directed to commence a prosecution against him, according to law and the nature of his offence; and, in order that all concerned under him should be warned of their situation, the President of the United States has issued another proclamation, which is heretofore annexed, marked E.

It is presumed the arrest of Doctor O'Fallon, and the issuing of the proclamation, will operate to prevent the execution thereof; but, if they should not, and the party proceed in the execution of their plan, it becomes an important consideration whether the military shall interfere to prevent them. This point is now under consideration of the legal department, and you shall be informed of the result.

A military post at Bear's Creek, called Occochappo, below the Muscle Shoals, upon the Tennessee, has been considered as proper to prevent the usurpation of the Indian land, and, also, at some proper place upon the Mississippi.

But, the approbation of the Indians is essential to the establishment of either. Governor Blount is to hold a treaty with the Cherokees in May next, and it is part of his instructions to render that nation cordial to the measure of establishing the proposed post upon the Tennessee. The post upon the Mississippi is attended with some difficulties, relative to the Spanish claims, and is not to be attempted at present.

Indeed, the force required for the main expedition will prevent the establishment of either post, until after the termination of said expedition. The object is now brought to your view, in order that you may, upon consideration, suggest such further measures, arising from information, as may be necessary to be adopted on the occasion.

It is proper to observe, that certain jealousies have existed among the people of the frontiers, relative to a supposed interference between their interest, and those of the marine States: that these jealousies are ill founded, with respect to the present Government, is obvious. The United States embrace, with equal care, all parts of the Union; and, in the present case, are making expensive arrangements for the protection of the frontiers, and partly in the modes, too, which appear to be highly favored by the Kentucky people.

The high stations you fill, of commander of the troops, and Governor of the Western territory, will afford you frequent opportunities to impress the frontier citizens of the entire good disposition of the General Government towards them in all reasonable things, and you will render acceptable service, by cordially embracing all such opportunities.

The discipline of the troops, and their economy in all respects, will come under your consideration.

Arrangements will be made for forwarding, with the first company which shall march, the arrearages of pay for the last year, as far as the same can be ascertained without the muster rolls.

The recruits, which shall be engaged for the first regiment and the artillery, will depend upon the surplus clothing on hand upon the frontiers. Reliance will be made upon the said surplus clothing for about five hundred and fifty complete suits. One-quarter part of the recruits of the first regiment and the artillery will be clothed, and all will have blankets. From the quarter part, which shall be completely clothed, the officers will make arrangements for rendering all the men comfortable. The second regiment will be clothed.

For the blankets which shall be issued here, of the number of which you shall be informed, a deduction must be made from the clothing for the troops on the frontiers, and the transfer thereof made to the Indian Department, for the purpose of the proposed treaty.

The goods necessary for a treaty shall be furnished, and your estimates upon this subject shall be duly regarded.

Medicines, instruments, tents, and ordnance stores, and all other articles necessary for the proposed expedition, will be forwarded.

Samuel Hodgdon, who has been appointed the quartermaster, under your directions, will repair to the frontiers as soon as he shall have made the necessary arrangements here of the supplies.

He will be entirely under your orders, in all respects; and he must produce your orders for all the general objects of expenditures—such as boats, horses, and other arrangements for transportation.

The provisions will be transported at the expense of, and by the means to be provided by, the contractors.

To the quartermaster's department will belong the transportation of the troops from Fort Pitt to the rendezvous, and the return transportation of the levies; the transportation by land of the ordnance stores, hospital stores, and such essential baggage as you may direct upon the expedition.

It would be unnecessary to be particular, to an officer of your experience, on the article of a great quantity of baggage. The nature of the service in which you will be employed will preclude the idea of all baggage which shall not be indispensable for the existence of the officers and soldiers.

The horses, therefore, that you may require for such objects, may not exceed the number of ——. As you will probably want them for several months, it will be more economical to purchase, than to hire them, and, after the expedition, to sell them again.

As Mr. Mentges, the inspector, will be upon the spot, you will direct him to muster and inspect all the troops as regularly as the service will permit. But the regulars and levies must be mustered on their first arrival at fort Washington.

You will please to appoint some skilful person to make actual surveys of your march, to be corrected, if the case will admit of it, by proper astronomical observations, and of all posts you may occupy, and transmit them to this office.

The paymaster will place in your hands the sum of three thousand dollars. This money will be for such contingencies as shall arise, either for intelligence or the objects of the Indian Department, and for which you account.

Besides the desultory operations before recited, for the protection of the frontiers, the President of the United States has been pleased to direct, that the lieutenants of the several frontier counties of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Kentucky, should be invested with the temporary authority, and under the restrictions contained in their instructions, of which the paper, marked K, is a copy.

You will perceive, that the authority given to the said county lieutenants has been great.

The continuance of the said authority will depend upon you. Although the protection to be afforded must be equal to the occasion, yet the expense ought not to be unnecessarily continued: you will, therefore, upon being convinced that the rangers which the county lieutenants may call out, in pursuance of the said authority, would not any longer be necessary for the protection of the inhabitants, direct the said lieutenants to discharge the same, on account of the United States.

It would be proper that, when you issue such orders, it should be done by some responsible character, who will certify to you the time of the delivery, in order that the public should not pay the expenses of the said rangers, after such notification.

You will judge how far a similar protection is to be extended to the settlements in the territory of the United States, northwest of the Ohio. The said copy has been transmitted, officially, to the secretary of the said territory.

Horses and equipments will be provided for the mounting of one hundred cavalry, for the purpose of the main expedition.

At the termination of the expedition, you will direct the quartermaster to sell the horses, excepting such a small number as you shall consider as indispensably necessary for the communication of the posts.

Although it is expected that you will have assembled at fort Washington, by the tenth of July next, a force of three thousand effectives, consisting of regular troops and levies, besides a sufficient number for the occupancy of the posts on the Ohio and Wabash, yet circumstances may possibly arise to prevent the expectation from being realized.

In this event, the expedition must not languish. In order, therefore, to supply the numbers essential for the expedition, you must call forth, in the name of the President of the United States, the militia of Pennsylvania, Virginia, or the district of Kentucky, for the purpose.

You will ground your orders, issued upon this occasion, upon the act of Congress, of the thirtieth of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, and of the third of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, and direct them to the lieutenants of such of the counties as will most readily afford the militia required, agreeably to the following form:

“SIR: The President of the United States has been authorized, by the two following acts, to call into service the militia of the several States, for the purpose of protecting the frontiers, to wit: An act, entitled ‘An act for regulating the military establishment of the United States,’ passed the thirtieth day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety;' and an act, entitled 'An act for raising and adding another regiment to the military establishment of the United States, and for making further provision for the protection of the frontiers, passed the third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one.'

"And the President of the United States has, by his instructions to me as the commanding general of the troops of the United States, bearing date the twenty-first day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, and communicated to me by the Secretary for the Department of War, invested me with full authority in the premises. I do hereby require you, as the lieutenant of the county of ———, forthwith to detach, of the militia of said county, ——— non-commissioned officers and privates, and the following commissioned officers, to wit: ———. The said officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, to serve for ——— months, unless sooner discharged, and upon the same pay and rations as the troops of the establishment."

It will be important that the most perfect communication should be kept up between you and this office. The regular post proceeds from this city to fort Pitt every other Friday. An arrangement will be made, after the fifteenth or twentieth of next month, to obtain a rider to proceed to fort Pitt on the Fridays which the post omits, so that the communication will be weekly. I earnestly request that you would make an efficient arrangement from garrison to garrison on the Ohio, so that I may receive correspondent information from you of the state of affairs.

Mr. Duer, the contractor for provisions, is now in this city, making the arrangements with the Secretary of the Treasury for the furnishing of the provisions for the troops under your orders.

The number of rations will be estimated, after you leave fort Washington, at four thousand per day.

The contractor promises the highest exertions in order to furnish the rations which may be required in due season. As your arrangements and success will greatly depend upon his punctuality, it will be important that you should afford him all the facility which the public interests may require.

Such objects relative to the troops, or the proposed operations, as may not have been touched upon in the foregoing instructions, and which may hereafter occur, will be contained in future letters.

In the mean time I have the honor, with the greatest sincerity, to wish you all possible success.

Given at the War Office of the United States, in the city of Philadelphia, this twenty-first day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 28th, 1791.

SIR:

I enclose you a representation of the Cornplanter, a chief of the Seneca Indians, to the President of the United States, complaining of the murder of some friendly Indians, on the 9th instant, who had been trading at Big Beaver creek.

This matter will be attended with the most pernicious consequences, unless instantly averted by decisive measures. I have stated the case to the Governor of this State, suggesting the propriety of demanding the accused for trial, of the State of Virginia, and such other steps as the occasion may require.

But, as the measures to be expected for a legal process will be both slow and uncertain, it is important that the General Government should do all in their power to express a marked disapprobation of the act, and to heal, if possible, the wound which the friendship of the Indians has received on this unfortunate occasion.

You will therefore please to inquire into the facts, and finding them as stated in the representation of the Cornplanter, you will, in a message to the aggrieved Indians, reprobate the murder in the strongest terms, and assure them that every legal step shall be taken to bring the accused to condign punishment.

You will also write the friends and relations of the deceased, together with the principal chiefs of the tribe to whom the deceased belonged, to meet you immediately at the place you shall mention. You will there repeat the abhorrence of the transaction, and the assurances of justice, and you will convince them of your sincerity by making liberal compensation to the relations for the loss of property sustained by the deceased Indians.

You will also transmit the enclosed answer to the Cornplanter's message, together with such further observations as you may think proper.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

General ST. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 29th, 1791.

SIR:

In addition to my letter of yesterday, respecting the murder of the Indians at Big Beaver, on the 9th instant, I wish you would suggest to the proper magistrates, an inquiry upon oath, relative to the transaction; to be taken immediately, and forwarded to the Governor. This mode of procedure appears necessary, in order that the Governor should ground thereon the legal steps of demanding the accused of the State of Virginia.

With great respect, I am, &c. &c.

General ST. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 7th, 1791.

SIR:

I have nothing in particular to add to my letters to you of the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth ultimo. I enclose you several of the Governor's proclamations.

As far as my information extends, the recruiting service, both in the regulars and levies, succeeds well. I hope in the beginning of May you will have some companies of levies at fort Pitt.

It will be important, if possible, to conciliate the relations of the friendly Indians, who were killed the 9th of last month at Big Beaver; and it will also be important that Colonel Procter should, if possible, be charged by you with conciliatory propositions relative to this subject.

We have learned accidentally of your being detained at Pott's Grove by the gout; but it is to be hoped that you will have it no more.

General Butler will set off to-morrow for Maryland and Virginia, to complete the arrangements for raising these battalions.

I am, &c.

General ST. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 19th, 1791.

SIR:

I have not had the pleasure to hear directly from you since your departure on the twenty-third ultimo. I was sincerely sorry to learn casually you were detained by sickness on the road.

One act of violence of the lawless inhabitants of the frontiers seems to succeed another against the friendly Indians, until all the tribes will be constrained, from principles of self defence, to unite against us.

I am informed by a letter from fort Pitt, of the eleventh instant, that a party of militia, under one Major Gutrie, of Westmoreland county, in this State, has plundered a boat belonging to the contractor, which was on its way with a supply of provisions, to the garrison at Venango, and which also had on board the goods which the United States and the State of Pennsylvania presented to the Cornplanter and his party.

The direct consequence of this atrocious crime appears to be the loss of the garrison and post of Venango, and the enmity of the Senecas.

If Major Gutrie was called into service under the authority and at the expense of the United States, it would seem that he is liable to a trial by a court martial for his conduct, and to be punished capitally if convicted under the tenth article of the thirteenth section of the rules and articles of war.

If you should be of opinion that he is liable to a trial and capital punishment by a court martial, you will direct that he be secured for that purpose.

At any rate, you will take instant measures to give the most satisfactory assurances to the Cornplanter and his party, of complete indemnification for every article lost, and that proper lists for that purpose be forwarded to me immediately.

I hope, between the twenty-fifth instant and the first of May, that we shall march one company of levies from Trenton, and another from Carlisle; and two companies of regulars, one from Delaware, and the other from this city.

One hundred suits of clothing, for the upper battalion of the levies of this State, have this day been forwarded to fort Pitt; clothing for a company at Carlisle was forwarded seven days ago.

I shall write further by the post which will depart to-morrow.

I am, &c. &c.

General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 21st, 1791.

SIR:

The post arrived to-day, by which I have not received any information from fort Pitt, excepting two letters from the lieutenants of the counties of Washington and Ohio.

I have the honor to enclose you the copy of a letter, which I yesterday forwarded by the Viscount Malartie.

The information which I mentioned, not having been confirmed by the post, raises some doubts of its authenticity. I really hope that it has not been as stated. But, if it should have been as represented, I am persuaded you will take every legal measure, which the nature of the case may require, to bring the offenders to justice by a court martial. You have my letter of the tenth of March, and I now enclose the copy of a letter from Colonel Campbell to me, of the thirty-first of the same month.

It is proper I should mention to you, that, being strongly impressed with the importance of attaching the Five Nations to us in the approaching contest, I have desired Colonel Pickering to assemble them together, in order to take effectual measures to brighten the chain, and remove all causes of difference.

I expect him in this city every hour, when I shall be informed of the time and place of his meeting. If I receive any further information of the goods lost by the Cornplanter, I shall take arrangements for replacing the articles immediately, through Colonel Pickering.

One hundred of the Jersey levies will march from Trenton on the twenty-fifth or twenty-sixth instant, by way of Reading and Carlisle, for fort Pitt. About the same time, Armstrong's and the Delaware companies of regulars will also march.

I shall also hasten all the levies which shall be assembled at Carlisle.

I shall write you further by the next conveyance, which will probably be by Major Ferguson. The quartermaster will set out by the first of May, having put all the stores in motion before him.

I pray you to observe that, after the first of May, a post will regularly, once every week, set out from this place for fort Pitt, and so from that to this city.

I am, &c.

General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 22d, 1791.

SIR:

The bearer, Mr. Mentelle, has been recommended to me by Mr. Marbois, the consul of France in this city, as a young gentleman of good connexions, and one who is desirous of serving under your auspices as a volunteer.

As we have not any establishment for volunteers, I cannot do more than to recommend him to your protection, and such employment as you may think proper to give him, consistently with the establishment.

I have the honor to be, &c.

General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 28th, 1791.

SIR:

I have received your two letters, dated at Greensburg, the fifteenth instant. I lament sincerely the sickness and detention which you have suffered.

I write this by the chaplain, who will probably not travel very fast, and therefore I shall not be very particular. A detachment of one hundred and one levies, under Captain Snowden, marched yesterday from Trenton for fort Pitt, and, on the same day, Captain Armstrong's company from this city, and Lieutenant Platt's from Delaware, to the amount of about one hundred and fifty men. I have ordered all the levies assembled at Carlisle to march; and Colonel Gibson assures me there will be about two hundred and fifty of them. If so, these several bodies will make up the number of five hundred men, besides the number of the upper battalion, of which I have received no returns.

I have received nothing precise, either from Maryland or Virginia, but I understand the recruiting service goes well there.

The Jersey battalion probably will all march before the fifteenth of May.

None of the companies of the Eastern States are yet nearly completed; but I hope they will soon begin to forward some companies.

As soon as these detachments arrive upon the frontiers, I pray you to make such decisive arrangements of them as that the militia may be dismissed, at least as far as it respects the United States.

I shall write you by the post next week, and will make the arrangement that a post shall regularly set out from this place and fort Pitt.

I am, &c.

General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 5th, 1791.

SIR:

My last to you was of the twenty-eighth ultimo, a duplicate of which is enclosed. By a return of the levies at Carlisle, I find Colonel Gibson overrated the two hundred and fifty, there being only about one hundred and eighty in readiness to march. These had been inspected by Major Ferguson, and would move forward about the fourth.

By a letter from Major Craig, he informs me that you have gone down the river.

I have no specific report from Virginia relative to the levies; but General Butler writes me, from Baltimore, that the Virginia battalion would be completed by the tenth instant. The Maryland battalion will not be so forward, but I hope they will be at fort Pitt by the fifteenth of June.

As the county lieutenants have ordered out so great a number of men, it will be best to dismiss them all, but a small party of rangers, and substitute some of the levies, for the protection of the upper part of the Ohio. I presume you have directed this measure; but, lest it should be otherwise, I shall direct General Butler, if consistent with your orders to him on this point. This I pray you not to consider as interfering in the interior of your command, which is by no means my intention.

Upwards of one hundred more of the levies will march from Trenton, in a day or two, under Captain Piatt. The remainder of the Jersey levies will probably be completed, and march before the twentieth, at farthest; before which I hope two hundred more regulars will be moving forward.

The recruiting service in Massachusetts has not been any ways equal to my expectations; but I hope it will soon be better.

Colonel Pickering's treaty is appointed to be held at the Painted Post, above Tioga, on the seventeenth of June next.

I shall, after this period, write you weekly; and, by the next post, I shall fully reply to all that may be necessary in Brigadier General Harmar's letter.

The inhabitants, who have been compelled to abandon their settlements, will be so far entitled to the public attention, as to receive provisions at Venango, to carry them to the more interior settlements; but it cannot be expected that the public should maintain women and children, at an advanced post, with rations at a high price. This cannot be done.

I have the honor to be, &c.

General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 12th, 1791.

SIR:

I have received your several letters of the 19th, 21st, 22d, and 25th of April, from Pittsburg, with several letters enclosed, which have been forwarded according to their directions.

The present view of the force marching, and about marching, is pretty much the same as is contained in the duplicate of my letter enclosed, dated the 5th instant.

The upper battalion of levies of this State, does not appear to succeed. The lower battalion will be completed. The Jersey battalion will be full, and march, I hope, by the 25th. One hundred and ninety-six are already pushed forward. By the 20th, a very considerable portion of the Virginia battalion will be on the march; and I hope, a respectable detachment from the Maryland battalion.

The battalion south of the Ohio, to be raised under the direction of Brigadier General Sevier, will be retarded by his sickness, he having been confined at Richmond until the 20th ultimo; but as the clothing and all the equipments for that battalion moved forward on that day from Richmond, he writes me that he hoped to have the battalion completed by the 1st of June, so that it will be the 15th or 20th before it will reach fort Washington. It is to be remembered, that the said battalion is to consist of riflemen. But lest there should be any difficulty about arming them in that manner, I have directed Major Ferguson to transport arms and accoutrements for them from fort Pitt.

I hope that General Butler will be able soon to dismiss the militia of the counties, all but a few guards. The artillery, medicines, and the principal part of the stores, have been sent forward to fort Pitt, and the quartermaster will follow in a few days.

The cavalry horses will be purchased, and sent down the Ohio under an escort. The equipments, which are excellent, have been sent forward. The horses will be good.

Upon the formation of this corps, much will depend; and the sooner it shall be formed, the more it will be disciplined.

It will depend upon your judgment, whether to make the cavalry to consist entirely of regulars as to officers and men, or whether to make a mixture of regulars and levies. As you will require an efficient corps, you will undoubtedly pick all the officers, non-commissioned and privates, from the whole army. If you take any levy officers, I would recommend Captain Snowden, who was of Lee's legion; he is brave, and, by reputation, judicious.

I have heard nothing further from Colonel Procter, than was contained in your last letter of the 25th ultimo. As, in all probability, it will at least be the latter end of July, or beginning of August, before your force shall be assembled for the main expedition, it may be proper to arrange more than one expedition from Kentucky, provided the Indians continue their depredations. But of this you will judge from your nearer view of the subject.

A quantity of Indian goods shall be soon forwarded, in order to enable you to hold a treaty with effect, if you should be so fortunate as to have the opportunity.

I shall continue to write you weekly.

I am, &c.

General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 19th, 1791.

SIR:

I have this moment received your favor of the 1st instant.

The information the Wyandot Indian woman gave you of the disposition of the Wyandots and Delawares, seems probable. If it should be true, and the Cornplanter's and Colonel Procter's mission not be obstructed, the prospect of peace with the Indians, on proper terms, is not so hopeless as many people expect.

I am persuaded that you will leave no rational measures for that purpose unattempted.

The conclusion you seem to draw from the tranquillity of the frontiers at the time you wrote, seems to be just, to wit: that the Indians are not united among themselves, or decided upon their measures. They will not receive any countenance from the British; but it is probable they may receive ammunition from the traders.

I instructed Major General Butler, on the 12th, to make arrangements for the dismissal of the militia, consistently with your orders to him relative to the disposition of the levies; and I shall repeat the same to him by this post, as he is now about arriving at fort Pitt.

Colonel Sproat's services appear to be of such a nature as to deserve compensation. I will give the representations relative to his services mature consideration, and if I can, with perfect propriety, I will make some arrangements on that subject: if not, it must remain as it is, until the arrival of the President of the United States, to whom the affair shall be communicated.

My enclosed letter will inform you of the prospect of the recruiting service on the 12th instant.

The present prospects are, including the regulars and levies, that there will have marched from the respective rendezvous, about twelve hundred and fifty recruits, on or before the first day of June next, agreeably to the schedule annexed.

By the next post, I shall hope to be able to be more precise as to the expectations you may justly entertain of the subsequent force. But, independent of the regulars of the Eastern States, I do not foresee any material deficiency. The time of their arrival at fort Washington, will, however, be late in the month of July.

Orders are given for the purchase of a considerable part of the cavalry horses, which, with their equipments, shall be forwarded to fort Washington in the course of the month of June.

I am persuaded the arrangements you have made at Muskingum, will be just and proper.

I enclose you a list of Indian goods which will be forwarded to fort Pitt in the course of this month, and to be forwarded to fort Washington, to be in readiness for a treaty.

I have not heard any thing of Colonel Procter, but I entertain the opinion that he has gone forward under a strong escort of Indians, headed by the Cornplanter.

I am, &c.

General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 26th, 1791.

Sir:

Nothing material has occurred necessary for me to write you upon, since my last of the 19th instant, a copy of which is enclosed.

The frontiers of this State have, since the beginning of the present month, been much infested by predatory parties of Indians; but the arrival of the troops will probably push them to a greater distance.

The tardiness of the recruiting service will occasion some deficiency of the regular troops. But I do not foresee any deficiency of the levies, excepting of the upper battalion of this State. I flatter myself that the battalion raising under General Sevier, will join you at fort Washington before the 1st of July.

I have not heard any thing of Colonel Procter. If Major General Butler should hear any thing of him, he will communicate it of course.

I have the honor, &amp;c.

General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 1st, 1791.

Sir:

I have the honor to transmit you a duplicate of my letter to you of the 26th ultimo, since which nothing material has occurred.

On the 20th ultimo, marched from Winchester one hundred and seventy levies, and ninety followed from the same place on the 22d. One hundred and fifty levies were to march on the 28th from Hagerstown; the 30th, eighty-three levies from Trenton; and yesterday, Captain Shailer, with seventy-six regulars of the second regiment, marched from New Brunswick.

I am, &amp;c.

General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 9th, 1791.

Sir:

As I have mentioned to you in my former letters, I have not received any of your favors since the first of May.

I have written you weekly since the nineteenth of April, always enclosing a copy of the letter of the preceding week.

Colonel Procter arrived here on the seventh instant, by the way of fort Pitt; from that place he says he informed you fully of the failure of his object and the reasons thereof.

This obstruction being removed to the advance of the troops of General Scott, you will of course give them free scope.

I enclose you a schedule of the troops who have marched, and who will probably march in the course of the present month. Although a considerable number of regulars will probably be recruited in the Eastern States, after the present month, yet I do not estimate that they will be of service to your main expedition. They will, however, serve as a reinforcement, and to garrison the posts you may assume.

The force, contemplated in your instructions of the twenty-first of March last, was about three thousand effective for the expedition, besides the garrisons, which might be estimated at about three hundred more. From the present view of the subject, you will have about two thousand eight hundred troops, Sevier's battalion included, in addition to the old troops on the Ohio, which may amount to about three hundred and fifty. In this view, there would be a deficiency of one hundred and fifty. In order to supply this, I have authorized Major General Butler, who seems to be of opinion that a company could be raised in Fayette, to raise it, and three others, if he should be of opinion that they could be raised by the twentieth of next month.

He will communicate with you upon this subject, and you can take measures to supply any deficiency of numbers, by raising companies of levies in Kentucky, or calling out the militia of the district, or to call out a mounted corps to act collaterally with the main expedition, as you shall judge most proper. In case you should raise levies, you may take some of the continental clothing, in the store at fort Washington, for the same.

I am persuaded the force marched from their respective rendezvous will not exceed twenty-eight hundred men, and it may possibly fall short of that number two hundred; but that will not happen, according to present prospects.

All the ordnance, powder, lead, and quartermaster's stores, have been forwarded, and Indian goods, particular lists of which shall be forwarded by the next post.

The quartermaster, Mr. Hodgdon, did not set out until the fourth instant; he will be at fort Pitt about the twelfth. Besides the stores sent from hence, he takes with him the sum of twenty thousand dollars, to pay for boats, pack horses, and other articles for the campaign; one half of the sum necessary for the cavalry horses was before forwarded. Besides this sum, not more than fourteen thousand dollars of which being appropriated, the other six being for contingencies not foreseen, he has orders to draw for such further sums as you may certify to be necessary for the service.

The quartermaster will forward, from the upper parts of the Ohio, hardy horses, which have been used to the woods, for the cavalry.

According to Colonel Procter's verbal report, there will be a pretty general attendance of the Six Nations, at the Painted Post, the seventeenth instant.

It would also appear by the Colonel's statements, that Brandt has gone to the Western Indians, with the concurrence of the British officers, and that his design is peace; that they expect him back before the seventeenth instant, in which case part of the chiefs will attend at the Painted Post, and part go forward to persuade the Western Indians to peace.

I shall be extremely anxious to hear from you before the arrival of the President of the United States, who will be here about the twenty-fifth instant.

I cannot again too strongly mention the importance of frequently hearing from you.

I am, &amp;c.

P. S. I enclose for your information a copy of my letter to Major General Butler, of this date.

Major General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 16th June, 1791.

Sir:

I enclose you a copy of my letter to you by the last post, dated on the ninth instant. Your letter of the first of May is still the last I have received from you.

I presume Major General Butler informs you, by every opportunity, of the troops which arrive at fort Pitt, and of his disposition of them.

Captain Doyle has marched from this city, for Lancaster, and Captain Beatty will march to-morrow, or next day, from New Brunswick. These two detachments will make about one hundred and fifty. About the same number of regulars are at this time moving forward from New England, and will probably be at New Brunswick about the twenty-second instant.

I enclose you copies of the returns of ordnance and military stores, medicines, and hospital stores, and goods for the Indian Department, which have been forwarded to fort Pitt.

I have received Colonel Procter's written communications.

I think it appears pretty evident, that Brandt has gone to the hostile Indians, accompanied by Girty and McGee, with the concurrence of the British officers at Niagara; and that the object of his mission probably is to attempt a peace between the said Indians and the United States. You will be able, by some signs or information, to judge of the effect of this interference.

The Virginia battalion of levies is completed, and the remainder marched from Winchester on the fourth instant, excepting about thirty, who are deficient by desertions, but who will be replaced.

The first division of the Maryland battalion, of which one hundred and eighty-eight marched on the twelfth from Hagerstown.

The eastern battalion of this State, and the Jersey battalion of levies, are still deficient about a company each, which will not probably be completed and marched until the latter end of this month.

The upper battalion of this State is about two hundred recruited, according to General Butler's information.

The President of the United States has not yet returned, but will be expected from the twenty-fifth to the thirtieth instant.

I am, sir, &c.

Major General ST. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 23d, 1791.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose a duplicate of mine to you of the sixteenth instant, and also a copy of mine to Major General Butler of this date. I enclose you the last, for your information, and to avoid repeating the same things to you.

Captain Beatty marched from Trenton this morning, with about ninety regulars and twenty levies. He has under his charge, seventeen thousand eight hundred and forty-four dollars and fifty cents, which he is to deliver to Mr. Hodgdon, the quartermaster. This money is intended as a sort of military chest, and to be issued from thence by your warrants. It would require about five thousand dollars to pay the old troops up to the thirty-first of March last, which you will do if you judge proper. The remainder would form one month's pay for your army. This you may issue at such times or seasons as your judgment shall direct.

In my next, I shall be precise as to the number of the regular troops, who are on the way from the Eastward, which will not exceed two hundred. But it is possible, that one hundred more of regulars may be drawn from that quarter, for the purpose of the expedition, provided you do not move until the first of September. But I do not depend upon them. The recruiting service shall, however, be continued, and the recruits forwarded as fast as possible.

It is now pretty well ascertained, that, levies and regulars included, exclusive of the old troops on the Ohio, there will not be forwarded to you more than twenty-five hundred at the extent, and that some may be deducted from that number for sickness and desertion. You will know the number of old troops: for such additional numbers, then, as you may judge the campaign to require, you must depend on the frontiers. You will fix the number of additional, taking care to have a force adequate to the object. And you will also decide upon the species of troops, agreeably to my letter to you of the 9th instant.

If you could obtain them, it would seem, at this distance, that a corps of five hundred, or seven hundred and fifty Kentucky mounted volunteers or militia, would tend to give more efficacy to your operations, than any other species of troops.

Not having lately heard from Brigadier General Sevier, I cannot inform you any thing of the battalion he was to raise. I sincerely hope and believe, that he has effected the object, and that the advanced guard of his battalion are now with you.

Brigadier General Harmar having, by his letter to the President of the United States, dated the 23th of March, 1791, requested that a board of officers might be instituted for the purpose of inquiring into his conduct on the late expedition against the Miami Indians, the President of the United States, in a letter of the 17th instant, from Mount Vernon, has commanded me to direct, that such a board be instituted accordingly.

You will, therefore, sir, as soon as the public interests shall permit, direct, that a court of inquiry, constituted agreeably to the articles of war, assemble for the purpose of inquiring into the conduct of Brigadier General Harmar, the commanding officer upon the late expedition against the Miami Indians; and, that they report to you, a full statement of facts, with their opinion thereon.

The court ought to consist of characters of the highest rank in the service, and of the greatest impartiality; and the evidence ought to be delivered from the different species of troops who served on the expedition.

In the course of the investigation, it will be necessary to comprehend all the circumstances of the campaign, from the time the army departed, until it returned to fort Washington. This will embrace the personal conduct of the General, the organization of the army, the orders of march, encampment, and battle. The motives which influenced the detachments of the fourteenth, nineteenth, and twenty-first of October; and whether the said detachments were duly supported, and if not, the reasons which prevented the said support.

The articles of war specify, that courts of inquiry shall not give their opinion on the merits of the case, excepting they shall be specially thereto required. But this seems to be one of the cases in which an opinion seems requisite, as well for the reputation of Brigadier General Harmar, who has requested the court, as for the satisfaction of the public mind, and I presume he will fully concur in this idea.

Since writing the above, and in this moment, I have received a letter from General Sevier, dated the Ceded Territory, the fifth instant, who informs me, that "about three companies of the levies are raised, and will march for fort Washington in a few days."

I have the honor, &c.

General ST. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 30th, 1791.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose you a duplicate of mine to you, of the 23d instant, enclosing a copy of mine of the same date, to Major General Butler; and I also enclose a copy of mine to Major General Butler of this date, by which you will observe the measures directed, relative to the additional battalion of levies, and the other objects therein mentioned. Your letter of the first of May is still the last of your communications.

I hope, before this time, that the battalion raised by Brigadier General Sevier, has principally, or entirely joined you.

As all the troops, (excepting a small deficiency of the Jersey, and the lower battalion of levies of this State, and perhaps a deficiency of the levies of Maryland,) are now to move forward, it seems highly proper that the troops, already arrived at the upper parts of the Ohio, should rendezvous at head quarters; and I have, as you will observe, written to Major General Butler accordingly.

I shall hope, by the next post, to transmit you a return of all the troops who have actually marched, but I am persuaded they will not exceed the number I have mentioned, to wit: twenty-five hundred.

Aware that your regular force may be inferior to the demands, I shall continue the recruiting service, and forward the recruits to head quarters.

But I depend much, that you will be able to obtain from the levies, upon or before the expiration of the service, a considerable accession to your regular regiments; probably you may make use of the moneys in Mr. Hodgdon's hands, for the bounties.

Judge Innes, and the other commissioners at Kentucky, have informed me of the departure of General Scott on the twenty-third ultimo, and that it was expected he would make a stroke about the thirtieth ultimo; we shall be anxious to hear of the result.

You will judge, from the effect of this expedition, and from the view of the time of your general operations, whether to form another such desultory expedition. If, to you, it should appear to have a decidedly good effect, to humble the Indians and prepare them for peace, I am persuaded the expenses thereof will be cheerfully borne by the public.

The President of the United States will arrive here about the 4th of July.

I am, &c.

General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 7th, 1791.

SIR:

I have the satisfaction to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the twenty-sixth of May to Captain Pratt.

I have written you regularly by the post, every Thursday, and I flatter myself you have received them.

I am sorry that Brigadier General Harmar should take the resolution to resign, as, with you, I esteem him to be a good officer, notwithstanding the loss sustained on the late expedition. I sincerely hope he will reconsider that resolution, and continue in service at least for the campaign.

The copies of my letters to Major General Butler, will inform you of the measures which have been executed for the discharge of the militia, and of the guards which he will call out after the troops shall descend the Ohio. I enclose you a copy of mine to him of this date. And I also enclose you a schedule of the troops who have marched, and who will march, in the course of this month. I think this schedule may be depended upon as the extent, excepting such additions as Major General Butler may raise; of the number of which, I confess I am not very sanguine.

If, therefore, from your own view of the object, you should require additional force, you will obtain it in the manner, and of the species of troops, you may judge proper. If General Scott's expedition should be successful, and satisfactory to the people of Kentucky, there could be no doubt of your raising such another body of mounted volunteers; although a less number, perhaps five hundred, would be sufficient.

I mean that this body is to make up deficiencies, to form part of your army, and act under your immediate orders. With such a body of light troops, well commanded, and mixed with your regular cavalry, it would appear that your movements would be irresistible. I should think, at this distance, the expense would be amply repaid by the services of such a corps. They might be engaged for such time, and be discharged when you shall judge proper.

But of this, or any other effective arrangement, you will be the judge. I will write to the Governor of Virginia, that, if there should be any collateral orders to be issued by him, he will please issue them immediately.

I am not satisfactorily informed of the means the contractor has prepared for the transportation of the rations on the expedition; but, if there should be any deficiencies of any sort in his department, you will not suffer the service to be delayed thereby, if in the power of the quartermaster to remedy them. You will also take care not to interpose but in case of necessity, in which cases you will have a full statement of the circumstances transmitted, so that the contractor may be properly accountable for the deficiencies at the treasury.

The President of the United States arrived here yesterday, in perfect health.

I have the honor to be, &c.

General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 14, 1791.

SIR:

On the eleventh of this month, I had the satisfaction to receive your favor of the first of June.

The fate of General Scott's incursion must have been decided long ere this, but we are in the dark as to the result. It was reported at fort Pitt, on the seventh instant, that he had succeeded greatly, but the particulars of the report were not transmitted to me.

The letters from Major General Butler, at fort Pitt, are encouraging as to the supplies, the state of the river, and the general tranquillity of the frontiers.

General Butler has, most undoubtedly, transmitted you Rhea's affidavit. Although some things contained therein may be doubted, yet there are strong causes to believe that others are true. I transmit you a copy of my letter to General Butler, on receiving Rhea's information.

We must, by all means, avoid involving the United States with Great Britain, until events arise of such quality and magnitude as to impress the people of the United States, and the world at large, of the rank injustice and unfairness of their procedure. But a war with that Power, in the present state of affairs, would retard our power, growth, and happiness, beyond almost the power of calculation.

The information of Rhea will serve to guide your measures, and seems to strengthen and rivet the propriety of assuming the position with a strong hand, mentioned in your instructions.

I enclose you duplicates of my letters to you and Major General Butler, of the 7th instant, a duplicate of the schedule therein enclosed, a duplicate of mine to General Butler, of the 12th, and of mine to him of this date.

The hundred regulars, mentioned in the schedule to march by the first of August, will, I hope, be increased to one hundred and fifty. I judge from appearances, but it may be doubted whether these will arrive in time for the expedition, which I presume you will be in readiness to commence, at the furthest, the first of September.

I shall, with the approbation of the President of the United States, continue the recruiting service in the Eastern States until the first of October, during which time it may be expected we may obtain two hundred and fifty, or three hundred regulars, in addition to those specified in the enclosed schedule.

I hope, however, that you will be able, with the bounty of six dollars, to fill up your regular regiments from the levies. You will please let me have your opinion of the probability of this event.

I am, &c.

General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 21, 1791.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 13th of June, by the post of this morning, and I enclose you a duplicate of mine of the 14th inst. the copy of the contract of provisions, and a letter from the President of the United States to the marshal of Kentucky, a copy of mine to Major General Butler, of the fourteenth, and of mine to him of this date.

By my letter to Major General Butler, combined with those written to you, you will observe the progress of your force, and the orders I have given him from time to time.

As Captain Phelon will probably be the last of the troops who will march from the eastward of fort Pitt, so as to be of service in your expedition, you will, before this, have formed your judgment of the auxiliary force you will require from Kentucky, and have made your arrangements for obtaining it accordingly.

I have urged Mr. Duer repeatedly, to take all the necessary steps relative to an ample supply of provisions, and to obtain the means necessary for the transportation thereof, and I am given to understand that he has made the arrangements accordingly. I sincerely hope this to be the case. But as he is not personally present, some doubts arise as to the arrangements of his substitutes.

At this distance, I only repeat the observation which I have had the honor to make to you before, that, in the present stage of public credit, the public interests must not suffer in any wise; that, if the contractor's agents shall not have provided the articles necessary in his department, you will make effective arrangements to supply the deficiencies. That, in all cases of this nature, you will, of course, transact the requisitions upon the contractor's agents in writing, and obtain their answers in the same manner. That you will transmit these several papers, in order that they may be properly acted upon at the treasury.

I omitted, in my last, to reply to your observation relative to Colonel Sargent.

The office of adjutant general is not provided for by the laws. In case, therefore, of an officer of that description being appointed, as seems to be indispensably necessary, he must depend upon an after provision being made for him by Congress, of which there will be very little doubt. It must be left to your view of the subject, to determine the rank and pay which shall be offered such an officer for the expedition, but they certainly ought not to exceed that of a lieutenant colonel.

We have had, for a week past, reports, by the way of fort Pitt, and of Kentucky, of the favorable issue of General Scott's expedition, but nothing to be entirely depended upon.

If Colonel Edwards, lieutenant of Bourbon, should go upon the expedition you mention, it is to be hoped he will meet with some marked success. I have no information of Colonel Pickering's treaty yet being closed. It was attended by about eight or nine hundred of the different tribes, men, women, and children; as he has nothing to request of them but to be quiet, there is little doubt but his mission will be successful.

I enclose you a copy of De Bartzchi's information, which has been sent by Major General Butler, who may not have taken a copy of it. This information and the speech appear to be such as to deserve some credit. I therefore enclose it, that it may be associated and compared with other information.

The President of the United States has commanded me to urge, that, as soon as your troops are assembled, or such portion thereof as you may judge proper, that you commence the establishment of such of your posts of communication, to which your force may be adequate.

He is greatly anxious that the campaign be distinguished by decisive measures, so that the expense incurred may be manifestly useful and important.

I am, &c.

General Sr. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 21st July, 1791.

SIR:

The bearer, Doctor Grasson, is one of the emigrants from France, who has decided to incorporate himself among our citizens.

He is recommended to me as a gentleman of science, and professional knowledge as a surgeon.

I have recommended him to Major General Butler, to have him examined by professional characters, and, if the report should be favorable, to appoint him to one of the vacant battalions of levies. In case the said vacancies should be filled up, I recommend him to you for such temporary employment in the medical line, as you may with propriety employ him.

I am, sir, &c.

General Sr. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 4th of August, 1791.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter by the post this morning, of the 6th of July, covering a duplicate of yours of the 26th of June, containing Brigadier General Scott's enclosures. Your letter of the 23d of June, and the first of yours, of the 26th of June, have not yet been received.

Brigadier General Scott's despatches were received by Lieutenant Belli, on the 26th ultimo.

The success of his expedition will probably be attended with exceedingly beneficial consequences, and prepare the minds of the Indians for that peace, which only can save them from destruction.

I should hope, by the time you can receive this letter, you will also receive the whole of your force from fort Pitt, Phelon's detachment included.

I have not heard from General Sevier since the fifth of June; he then informed me that nearly three companies were completed, and would march in a few days. As he was furnished with money for all objects, and clothing, I hope there will not be any failure.

But, as Phelon is considered as the rear guard of your troops, for the expedition, of which you have been informed; as you possess all the information of your force which is in my power to afford; and as you embrace the objects to be performed, and the difficulties to be surmounted; you will be entirely competent to decide upon the additional force to be required; and I am persuaded that you have taken efficient arrangements to obtain such additional numbers from Kentucky, and of such species, as you shall judge adequate to make up all deficiencies.

Captain Newman marched from this city, with eighty-three non-commissioned and privates, regulars, on the thirtieth ultimo, and Captain Buell will march from Brunswick, on the tenth instant, with detachments from New England, and such numbers as are in this city, to make up, probably, about one hundred and twenty regulars more. But neither of these detachments will arrive in time to make part of your army.

In addition to these detachments, I presume there will be about two hundred and fifty, or three hundred more regulars enlisted and marched, between the tenth instant and the first of October, after which it is probable the recruiting service will be suspended during the winter season.

But, as I have before intimated, it is most probable you will be able to fill up your regular regiments by recruits from the levies.

The powder and lead which you request, were early forwarded from this city to fort Pitt, and ought to have formed part of Major Ferguson's convoy. The quartermaster will forward them. The five and a half inch shells and the shot you request, shall be forwarded immediately; but it is not possible for them to arrive in time for your expedition. The quantities you have on hand will probably be sufficient in the first instance for your posts, and as many as you can carry.

On the seventeenth of March, I ordered two hundred shot and shells to be forwarded for each piece of artillery, then directed for the posts. Mr. Hodgdon depended on a furnace at fort Pitt for these articles, by which the transportation would be saved.

He on the twenty-eighth of July writes me word they cannot be had.

You mention that you have directed the contractor's agent to make a provisional agreement for eight hundred pack-horses, to transport the provisions for the army. I am persuaded that you will direct no more than shall be requisite to give efficacy to your movements, and your judgment must be definitive on the case. But I am apprehensive, from a conversation between you and the contractor in my office, that he has calculated on a far less number. The idea was then entertained that posts of communication were to be established, and the supplies carried from one to the other.

I shall inform him of your opinion, and request him to extend his arrangements to the number you may direct.

As you will take as little baggage with you as possible, the number I have contemplated in the quartermaster's department will not exceed three hundred pack-horses; but I have directed him to comply with your orders, for such further numbers as you may direct.

Major General Butler writes, that Lieutenant Jeffers is arranged at fort Franklin, agreeably to your orders.

Major General Butler will inform you particularly of the arrangements he has made for the defensive protection of the upper counties of the Ohio. The liberal provision he has made will most probably be satisfactory to the people of that part of the frontiers. You will also please to state particularly the arrangements you may think proper to make on the parts of the Ohio below the Kenhawa.

It will be highly proper to check the spirit of desertion which you mention, by some early and decided examples.

The rules and articles of war will probably undergo a revision at the next session of Congress, and, if possible, some grades of punishment be obtained, between one hundred lashes and death, which, as you justly observe, are almost infinitely disproportionate.

It is said, and it is probably true, that Brandt has returned to Niagara from the Miami town, and that he has brought some Western Indians with him; if so, and their designs are for peace, we shall soon hear from them.

The Indians at Buffalo creek, and those at Colonel Pickering's treaty, asserted that Brandt went forth for the purpose of peace, and intimations to that effect are also constantly given in this city by a gentleman in the confidence of Lord Dorchester: and it is said, that Sir John Johnson is to assemble the Five Nations at Buffalo creek immediately. The indications which shall result from this council and Brandt's messages will probably give a decided complexion, for the present, to Indian affairs.

If the British policy frowns upon Indian hostilities, and the Six Nations keep quiet, your operations, and your intimations of the disposition of the United States to be at peace with all the Indian tribes, will, in the course of the season, effect the object, and you will probably be suffered to establish your posts without opposition.

I enclose you duplicates of Col. Pickering's letter to you, of the 8th ultimo, and of the queries and answers of Captain Hendricks.

The treaty closed the fifteenth, and the Indians returned satisfied. Colonel Pickering did not attempt to persuade any of them to join our army, as he found such a proposal would be very disagreeable to them. But Big Tree came from O'Beel's town with a proposition to assist our army to make peace. This was debated and refused.

The President of the United States still continues anxious that you should, at the earliest moment, commence your operations.

I enclose the copy of a letter to Major General Butler, of this date, which I presume will be the last he will receive for the present at fort Pitt.

Major General St. CLAIR.

I am, sir, &c.

WAR DEPARTMENT, August 11th, 1791.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose you a duplicate of my last letter to you of the 4th instant, and a copy of mine to Major General Butler of the same date, and of the one to him of this day.

The President of the United States is exceedingly anxious that the troops upon the upper parts of the Ohio should be assembled at fort Washington, at as early a period as possible, so that you may commence and effect your operations in due season.

Nothing occurs as necessary or proper to be given you as additional instructions. You are fully informed of the objects to be accomplished, the means furnished you for that purpose, and authority to supply all deficiencies.

The President of the United States is convinced that you are deeply impressed with the national importance of the force entrusted to your direction, and that you will use it in such a seasonable and decisive manner as shall at once reflect honor on yourself and the army, and the public character of the United States.

I have received a letter from Governor Blount and General Sevier, of the 15th July, which mention that great difficulties had arisen in raising the corps in the Ceded Territory; that two hundred had marched under Major Rhea, and were then probably at fort Washington; and that the remainder would be forwarded immediately.

Governor Blount, on the 2d of July, concluded a satisfactory treaty with the Cherokees; all is, therefore, quiet at the southward, excepting a few rascally Indians, probably Creeks, have been committing some depredations on the Cumberland settlements.

I am, sir, &c.

General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, August 18th, 1791.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose a duplicate of mine to you of the 11th instant, and also a duplicate of mine to Major General Butler, of that date, and of this day.

I presume Captain Newman will not arrive at fort Pitt until the 25th instant, and Captain Buell about the 10th of September. No other troops are on their march excepting a party of about thirty from New Hampshire, who have not yet arrived at Brunswick. Buell's detachment consists of about ninety-two regulars.

All the stores which have been written for have been forwarded, either from fort Pitt or this place, excepting the 5½ inch shells, which cannot be obtained in season for the campaign; as the most expeditious mode, I have sent for some to West Point, and expect them here hourly; when they arrive they shall be forwarded.

Some reports have recently been raised in this city, as if the powder furnished Mr. Hodgdon, by Mr. Joseph Miller, was not of a good quality, especially that made by his foreman, Jacob Keyser. I have had some powder of Jacob Keyser's make proved, by taking one ounce of each sort, to wit: cannon, musket, and rifle, and projecting a 24 lb. ball out of a 5½ inch mortar, elevated at 45° placing the powder in the chamber of the mortar loose, and putting a piece of paper over the mouth of the chamber; the powder to be well dried in the sun. This is the surest possible mode of proving powder, and the powder so proved had been manufactured from damaged public powder, and was found upon trial to be equal to the best proof powder. It is considered, that, if one ounce will, under the above circumstances, project a 24 lb. ball thirty yards, it is sufficiently strong. Most of the powder which was tried as above, projected the ball, on an average, forty yards.

Mr. Miller has made an affirmation that the powder furnished the public was made of refined salt-petre, and was at least equal, if not superior, to that which has been proved here.

I mention this circumstance to you lest the report may have reached you by some other channel; you will, of course, direct the powder to be proved in the manner stated by Major Ferguson; I have no doubt that you will find it full proof.

You will readily perceive that this is a sort of suspicion which must be kept carefully from the troops; for unless they rely with confidence on the goodness of the powder, no dependence can be placed on their exertions.

The report here I am pretty confident originated in a jealousy of some dealers in the same article.

I sincerely hope that you will have received your whole force, and have commenced your operations by the time you will receive this letter, which I consider as the last you will receive at fort Washington.

I cannot easily express to you the anxiety of the President of the United States, that the campaign should be entirely successful, and issue in a just and honorable peace with all the tribes: he is persuaded you will brace to exertion every nerve under your command, and that you will establish a sure mode of communication with this office, while you are on the expedition.

With great respect, &c.

Gen. St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, August 25th, 1791.

SIR:

I enclose you a duplicate of my letter of the 18th instant, and of one to Gen. Butler, of the same date, and also of mine to him, of this date.

The President of the United States laments exceedingly, the unfortunate detention of the troops on the upper parts of the Ohio, for which no reasons sufficiently strong have been assigned.

This detention will undoubtedly retard the commencement of the operations, and require the highest exertions to accomplish the objects of the campaign.

The President reiterates his confidence in your activity, and that every thing will be put in motion, on the arrival of the rear of your troops, under Major General Butler.

The quartermaster will give you horses for the cavalry and baggage; and, if you require more than he has provided, he must obtain them.

I have repeatedly written to you, that, if the contractor's arrangements, either in his supplies of provisions, or the transportation of them, should be deficient, that such deficiency must be supplied by your orders, and the contractor made answerable. The public service cannot be retarded or injured by any deficiencies in that line.

I have also written you several times relative to any deficiency of troops, in order that you might make such seasonable arrangements for supplying such deficiency as you should think proper. All of which, no doubt, has been done on your part.

I have the honor, &c.

Major General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 1st, 1791.

SIR:

I transmit you a duplicate of my last to you, of the 25th ultimo, and to Gen. Butler, of the same date, and of mine to him, of the present date.

A company of regulars will march from this place and Brunswick by the 10th instant; either Captain Haskell or Cushing will command it.

I have nothing to add to my former communications, excepting that the anxiety of the President of the United States still continues exceedingly great for the success of the campaign; he is fully aware, that vigor of operation, and the success of the campaign, will reflect honor on you, your troops, and the Government; and that languor and want of success will be attended with consequences directly the reverse. He therefore enjoins you, by every principle that is sacred, to stimulate your operations in the highest degree, and to move as rapidly as the lateness of the season, and the nature of the case, will possibly admit. Pray establish a mode by which we shall be regularly informed of your movements, and the events of your operations.

I have the honor, &c.

Major General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 9th, 1791.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose you a duplicate of the Secretary of War's letter to you, dated the 1st instant, and also a duplicate of his letter to Major General Butler, of the same date.

I am, &c.

JOHN STAGG, Chief Clerk.

Major General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 22d, 1791.

SIR:

I have received your letters of the 8th of August, from fort Washington, and of the 24th, from Danville; but yours of the 3d of August, and the one you mention from Lexington, are both missing.

Captain Haskell marched, two days ago, with eighty men, for fort Pitt, and thence to descend to fort Washington; about the same number are on their way from New England, and more will follow.

As this letter will not reach you at fort Washington, I have done no more than to acknowledge your letters.

I have the honor, &c.

Major General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 29th, 1791.

SIR:

I have received from Brigadier General Wilkinson, a copy of his report to you, relatively to his expedition against l'Anquille.

As his conduct and his services on the occasion merit public thanks, I have transmitted him a letter, of which the following is an extract:

"I have, by this post, instructed Major General St. Clair to thank you, if he had not already performed that pleasing duty, in the name of the President of the United States, for the zeal, perseverance, and good conduct, manifested by you in the command of the expedition, and for the humanity observed towards the prisoners whom you captured; and also to thank the officers and privates of the volunteers, for their activity and bravery while under your command; and to express his hope, that you and they may enjoy, in future, entire peace, as a reward for your services."

If you should not have previously thanked him, you will please to do it according to the ideas expressed to him.

I have the honor, &c.

General St. CLAIR.

Per post, to the care of Major Craig, at Pittsburg. Duplicates forwarded the 6th of October, 1791.

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 29th, 1791.

SIR:

I enclose you a duplicate of mine, of the 22d inst. since which I have received your letters with their several enclosures: July 6th, a duplicate; August 3d and 8th, both duplicates; August 17th and 29th; all of which have been duly considered.

But as it is highly probable that you are not at fort Washington, and that it will be some time before you will receive this letter, I shall not particularly reply to your several communications.

But if, by circumstances, this letter should reach you, I beg leave to express an entire reliance, that you will endeavor to fill the companies of the first regiment, and corps of artillery, which are with you, at a proper season, out of the levies. Captain John Smith and Captain Pratt are recruiting their companies, and will probably have them completed by the first of November; and by the same period I hope the companies of the second regiment will also be completed. But, lest it should be otherwise, I think it would be proper, if convenient, that you should also enlist one hundred men on account of the second regiment.

It is presumed that you have made a perfect arrangement for the quantity of provisions, which is to remain as a stock in the garrisons you shall establish.

I have the honor, &c.

General St. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 30, 1791.

SIR: I omitted, in my letter of yesterday, to state, that, on the 15th July, I wrote a letter to the Governor of Virginia, to instruct the county lieutenants of Kentucky to obey your call for militia, of which the enclosed is a copy. I was in hopes General Scott would have received these orders from the Governor, so that you would have experienced no difficulty in obtaining the additional militia you might require.

I am, sir, &c.

General St. CLAIR.

Delivered to Lieut. Belli. Duplicate forwarded 6th October, to Major Craig, at Pittsburg.

WAR DEPARTMENT, October 13, 1791.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, of the 18th ultimo, from fort Washington, by the contractor's light canoe, which refers to a former letter, by some other conveyance, not yet come to hand.

Captain Haskell will have arrived at fort Pitt by this time; Captain Cushing will probably march from Brunswick, with at least ninety men, on the 18th instant.

We shall be exceedingly anxious to hear from you while upon your expedition, which I pray God may succeed in all its parts.

As you will not probably receive this letter, until your return from the expedition, I shall not enter into details. The President of the United States is absent in Virginia, and will not be here until the 20th.

I am, sir, &amp;c.

General ST. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, October 20, 1791.

SIR:

The President of the United States having long since received an application from the Baron de Steuben, relative to a young man by the name of George Demelar, who went from New York to the Ohio, some time past, where he has been employed in surveying lands, I request that you will please to make inquiry respecting this person; and, if his character is good, you will appoint him an ensign in the second regiment of infantry, and notify me of the same. As Mr. Demelar has been absent a considerable time, the Baron solicits that this inquiry, relative to his conduct, should be made, before the appointment is decisive.

I have the honor, &amp;c.

General ST. CLAIR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 2, 1791.

SIR:

My last letter to you was dated the 20th of October, duplicates of which have been transmitted. I have not written since, as it was presumed you had departed upon your expedition; and, also, because nothing occurred of any considerable importance.

But as the period has arrived when your operations may be drawing to a close, and you about to return to fort Washington; and having a safe opportunity, by the troops hereinafter mentioned, about to descend the Ohio, which will be the last for the season, on account of the probable difficulty of navigating the river, it seems proper that a full communication should be made to you, at this time, of such circumstances as the public service may require.

I have conceived it important, as well for the comfort of the levies and militia, acting under your orders, as for the reputation of the Government, that the said troops should have their accounts adjusted at fort Washington, and each man paid the balance that may be found due to him before his discharge.

I have therefore sent Mr. Caleb Swan, of this office, to perform the business of settling the said accounts, and making the payments; and he is accordingly furnished with fifty thousand dollars, which is estimated as sufficient for this object.

Mr. Swan is well used to accounts of this nature, having been employed in the pay office upwards of five years; and he is furnished by Mr. Howell, acting as paymaster, with the necessary information.

Mr. Swan will report to you the balances, and receive your warrants for the payments, and he will take a number of blank warrants for your use.

I have entire confidence in Mr. Swan's integrity. But it will be proper that every check be devised and executed to render the business perfectly clear. I enclose you a copy of his instructions; and if there should be any additional guards proper, I pray you to use them.

It will be proper that the levies and militia, although discharged at fort Washington, have such additional allowance, both of pay and rations, as shall be sufficient to carry them to their respective battalion rendezvous at which they were recruited, estimating each day at one ration and fifteen miles; the commissioned officers to be allowed their full rations. The levies and militia will of course be mustered to the time of their leaving fort Washington, to which must be added such further time as the aforesaid fifteen miles per day will entitle them to.

Mr. Swan, besides the aforesaid sum, estimated as sufficient for the levies, has the further sum of ——— dollars, judged sufficient, with the 17,000 dollars which were entrusted in Mr. Hodgdon's hands, for this object, to pay the artillery, and the parts of the two regiments of infantry, their full pay to the first of January, 1792.

But if the said seventeen thousand dollars, or any part of it, should have been distributed to the troops, it will lessen, according to its amount, the sum to be paid out of the sums now sent by Mr. Swan.

I have but little doubt, from the estimates, that the money on hand, and now forwarded, will be ample for all the payments to be made to the levies and militia, and most probably complete the payments of the regulars for the present year.

I estimate that you have enlisted, or will enlist, at least five hundred of the levies. But, if there should be any deficiency, it must fall on the regulars and not on the levies, who ought to be entirely paid up at the time of their discharge, with such additional allowances, both of pay and rations, as will serve them to the rendezvous at which they were recruited: to wit, Trenton, in New Jersey; Carlisle and fort Pitt, in Pennsylvania; Hagerstown, in Maryland; Winchester, in Virginia; and Jonesborough, in the Southwestern territory.

The levies, originally, were to have had only one pair of linen overalls, and two pair of shoes, which would have borne a proportion to the clothing of a continental soldier, as the six months, the time for which the levies were engaged, would to the twelve months clothing for the continental soldiers. But, at a subsequent period, two thousand additional overalls, and two thousand additional pairs of shoes, were forwarded for the levies, with the intention of charging them therewith. But, as the said troops have undergone considerable hardships, and as they probably will be detained longer in service than the six months, it would, perhaps, be rather more rigid and economical than politic, and, perhaps, unjust, to charge them with the said articles.

The said articles will not, therefore, be deducted from the pay due the levies.

As the levies will, most probably, have to return by the way of the wilderness, it will depend upon your judgment as to the manner of their return. You will, without doubt, order them up the Ohio, if the weather and state of the river will permit, at least as far as Marietta or Wheeling. It would, most certainly, more comport with good order, that they should preserve their military consistence and organization, until they should reach their respective battalion rendezvous; and that each major should command his battalion. But there might be inconveniences in this arrangement, independent of the expense, and loss of arms and accoutrements; provided circumstances of danger, in returning, should be such as you should direct that they should retain their arms and accoutrements, or a proportion thereof, until they should arrive at the battalion rendezvous.

It will be proper, and important, that you should not permit more arms to be taken, by the discharged troops, than shall be necessary for their safety; and, for such, the field officers ought to be responsible, and to receipt to you for the same, and their receipts to be transmitted to me. But the officers ought, by all means, to command the men until they arrive at their respective rendezvous. To this end, the officers should possess the discharges of the men, and not to deliver them until a suitable time; and it might, also, be proper, that some of the pay should be delivered to an officer, of each battalion, to be delivered to the men at the place of their dismissal.

But in this case, the men ought to appoint the officer who is to be their agent; each individual to know the precise sum he was to receive. The public, by this arrangement, would be exonerated from any demands, in case of deficiency. But, upon more mature reflection, it will be the least exceptionable to pay the men, at fort Washington, their whole arrears.

But, if you should judge that the discharged levies should preserve a military form, it will be necessary that the contractors should make an arrangement to furnish them with provisions on their route, and also to pay any small contingencies of their march, such as straw, fuel, &c.

In case of the levies returning in military form, they must have a proportion of tents, delivered under the same guards and restrictions as the arms and accoutrements.

The orderly and comfortable dismissal of the levies, is a point of some importance; I am persuaded, therefore, that you will take such arrangements upon the subject, as shall at once be regular, convenient, and economical.

Permit me to urge you, in the strongest terms, to direct that all the spare arms and accoutrements be collected, repaired, and put in such situation, as to be fit for immediate use, and a return thereof to be made to this office.

No doubt can be entertained, but that you have, agreeably to your original instructions, furnished the post you may have established at the Miami village, and its communications, with six months' salted meat, and a due quantity of flour. This circumstance omitted, the safety of the said posts must be considered as extremely precarious. If there should have been any defects in the contractor's department, it is to be hoped that you have remedied them, according to my several letters to you upon that subject.

Upon the return of the troops at fort Washington, you will, I am persuaded, have made the best possible arrangement of the sale of the spare cavalry and pack-horses, so that the public may sustain as little injury upon that subject as possible.

The expense of the quartermaster's department has far exceeded my estimates. But I flatter myself, that the excess has been dictated by such sound principles, that, when they are developed, they will appear not only reasonable, but inevitable.

A new contract for the supply of provisions, for the year 1792, has been entered into by the Secretary of the Treasury, with Elliot and Williams, the former contractors, a copy of which is herein enclosed.

I enclose you a list of the officers as they now stand. In this, you will perceive, that General Wilkinson is appointed the lieutenant colonel-commandant of the second regiment of infantry. I hope he will merit your approbation, and that his conduct will reflect honor on his country and the troops.

It is the expectation of the President of the United States, that, at the expiration of the campaign, the necessity of an adjutant general will cease, and that the duty may be performed consistently, by the inspector; and it is also his expectation, at the expiration of the campaign, that Major General Butler will retire with the levies. He was appointed specially for them, and under the law by which they were raised; and however desirous the President of the United States might be to retain him in service, he would not have the power, without a new law for the purpose. You will, therefore, intimate to him, in handsome terms, this order. His pay and emoluments will, however, be continued him, until his arrival at fort Pitt.

I have detained Captain Haskell's company for some time past at fort Pitt, as a substitute for the dismissal of the militia. But Cushing's company having arrived at that place, they will be detained no longer than the arrival of Mr. Swan, who will, with his money, be under their protection. Either Major Trescott, or Major Burnham, will command these two companies.

There are recruits, to the amount of two other companies, ready to march, to wit: Captain Mills, from this city, and Captain Cass, with detachments from New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Connecticut; but they cannot possibly arrive in time to descend the Ohio this winter. I have, therefore, caused a provisional arrangement to be made for them at fort Pitt, for the winter.

Captain Hunt's company will be raised during the winter, in Massachusetts; Captain Pratt's, in Connecticut; and Captain John Smith's, in New York. I had ordered Captain Hughes to join his company, but it is probable he will be ordered to recruit a full company this winter.

These four companies will probably be in readiness to join you early in the spring.

Some disturbances have lately been excited among the Creeks, by one Bowles, styling himself General William Augustus Bowles. He has set himself up in opposition to M'Gillivray, and has prevented running the line, agreeably to the treaty at New York. It seems probable, that either M'Gillivray or Bowles must fall. The United States will support the former, who appears to have conducted with propriety and sincerity.

Brigadier General Harmar has arrived, and the proceedings of the court of inquiry are in the press. He has intimated his intention of resigning, but has not yet executed it.

Since mine of the 20th of October, I have received your several letters of the 4th, 15th, 16th, 23d, and 25th of September; and we have heard of you and the army, on the 8th of October.

As those several letters contain information only, it is unnecessary to reply particularly thereto.

Your anxiety at the detention of the troops, at the upper part of the Ohio, must indeed have been great, to whatever cause it was owing.

The arrangements you made in Kentucky, relatively to the calling out the militia, were highly judicious, and extremely satisfactory to all the people of that district. Every such instance of conciliating and proper conduct, is extremely gratifying to the President of the United States, who is desirous of the utmost harmony subsisting between all parts and branches of the Government.

The bills which Mr. Ludlow drew for the pack-horses, have been protested by Mr. Duer, he stating, that Mr. Ludlow had no authority from him for the purpose, and that he made another arrangement, for the purchases of the said horses. But these bills were endorsed by you, in behalf of the United States, and they have been regularly paid. The affair has been stated to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the business will be adjusted by the Comptroller, upon proper principles.

I sincerely hope, by the time this letter arrives, you will have returned to fort Washington, crowned with success, having made an equitable and lasting peace with the poor Indians, and entirely fulfilled all the objects of the campaign.

But although entire confidence is reposed in your talents and arrangements, we shall entertain a painful anxiety until we shall be relieved by your despatches.

I have the honor to be, with very great respect, your most obedient, &c.

Major General ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

Instructions to Major General Butler.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 5, 1791.

SIR:

The public service requires that you should immediately set off for the States of Virginia and Maryland, in order to put into immediate operation the measures necessary for the raising of the two battalions of levies assigned to said States.

The first object demanding your attention will be the appointment of the officers. Colonel Henry Lee having declined the command of the first regiment, it has been, by order of the President of the United States, offered to Colonel Josias Carvell Hall, residing near Baltimore. If he should accept, you will, with him, make a perfect arrangement of the officers for the Maryland battalion. I herewith deliver you a list of officers suggested to the President of the United States by his Excellency the Governor of Maryland. This list must be respected, and the appointments conformed to it, so far as the officers may reside near to, and have influence within, the local districts of Maryland most likely to afford the recruits.

Colonel Rawlings, of Fredericktown, has had the offer of being major of the battalion, but I have received no information of his acceptance or otherwise.

It has been decided that Hagerstown should be the principal rendezvous in Maryland, with one or more subordinate rendezvous for the companies; but it is to be observed that numerous rendezvous create additional expense, and therefore ought to be avoided.

As soon as the arrangements are made in Maryland, you will proceed to Virginia, and there appoint the officers of the battalion; any lists or intimations you may receive upon this subject from the President of the United States, you will, of course, obey.

Winchester is to be the principal rendezvous in Virginia, with a subordinate rendezvous or two if necessary.

Joseph Howell, the paymaster, will deliver you two thousand one hundred and seventy-two dollars and eighty cents, for each of the battalions, being for the objects specified in the enclosed schedule, (marked A) and also the sum of one hundred and forty-four dollars and forty cents, being for the lieutenant colonel-commandant and surgeon.

In case Colonel Josias C. Hall should decline the appointment of lieutenant colonel-commandant, the offer of it is to be made to Colonel Moses Rawlings, unless you should be otherwise directed by the President of the United States.

Mr. Duer, who has contracted to furnish the rations and supplies which may be required in Maryland and Virginia, and thence to the Ohio, has engaged to send a suitable person to Winchester and Hagerstown, to make the proper arrangements, and at such subordinate places as you shall judge requisite.

You will direct the major who shall be appointed to each of the battalions, as soon as a sufficient number of recruits shall be assembled, either at Hagerstown or Winchester, to form a company, that it be marched to Redstone, there to embark for fort Pitt.

This measure may, for a time, occasion some intermixture of companies, but a more perfect arrangement will take place when the levies shall be assembled together.

The company officers to be commissioned on condition of each recruiting the number of twenty-eight non-commissioned and privates, on or before the first of June next.

This condition is essential, as the deficiency of the levies must then be made up by draught of the militia.

The clothing for the Maryland and Virginia battalions is now preparing, and a sufficiency for the half of each battalion will be forwarded in about fourteen days hence, from this place.

The arms, ammunition, and accoutrements, for the said battalions, are lodged at fort Pitt, and will be delivered at that place.

You have herewith delivered to you the arrangement of the battalions, for the levies, by which you will observe the number and rank of the officers to be appointed for each battalion. (marked B.)

You have also herewith delivered, the establishment of pay, rations, and forage, for the levies, which is the same as to the troops of the United States.

You have also herewith delivered, twelve copies of the Baron Steuben's instructions, thirty Articles of War, thirty recruiting instructions, and thirty blank bonds, which the officers are to sign upon receiving their recruiting money.

To you, who are sensible of the urgency of affairs which requires the highest possible despatch, it would be unnecessary to say any thing to give vigor to your measures; but you will urge the officers whom you may appoint, by the most cogent arguments, to use the greatest diligence and activity.

The lieutenant colonel-commandant must be alternately at both rendezvous of Winchester and Hagerstown; but each major must constantly superintend at the rendezvous of his battalion, and stimulate the exertions of the officers.

The majors must weekly report to this office the state of the recruiting service. In short, that nothing must be omitted which would give a spring and vigor to the recruiting service.

You will write to me twice a week of your proceedings.

With great respect, I am, sir, &c.

Major General BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 8, 1791.

SIR:

Since writing the foregoing letter, I have received the enclosed letter from the President of the United States, dated the 4th instant, by which you will observe, that he has taken measures for the appointment of the officers of the Virginia battalion, and has directed the major to call upon me for orders.

You will endeavor, in your journey, to find out this person, and give him the money and orders necessary for his battalion; in which case you need not proceed to Virginia.

I have received an answer from Colonel Rawlings, declining to accept the Maryland battalion. Although he declines the battalion, yet probably he would accept the regiment, in case Colonel Hall should decline accepting it. On this point you will consult him personally, before any offer of the lieutenant colonel-commandant shall be made to any other person.

But, in case he should entirely decline, you will endeavor to find some suitable character of the late war, either from Virginia or Maryland, to accept the regiment.

When you shall have finished the business in Virginia and Maryland, you will please to repair to Carlisle, in this State, and complete any deficiencies which may be in either of the battalions or levies to be raised within the State; and, as soon after as possible, you will repair to the frontiers, there to take the command of Major General St. Clair.

You will keep me constantly informed of all public objects necessary for me to know.

I have issued my warrant on the paymaster, in your favor, for the sum of two hundred dollars, on account of your extra expenses, incurred in travelling to Virginia and Maryland; for which sum you will account.

I am, sir, &c.

Major General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 15, 1791.

SIR: Colonel Hall declines: Colonel Darke, of Shepherdstown, therefore, must be appointed, agreeably to the letter of the President of the United States of the 7th instant.

As you are the pivot upon which all things turn relative to raising the two battalions in Maryland and Virginia, I flatter myself that you will urge every part of the business with a vigor which will delight and surprise the public.

I am, sir, yours, &c.

Major General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 21, 1791.

SIR: I write you this letter to meet you by hazard. Lieutenant-colonel Darke accepts the command, which you probably know.

One hundred and thirteen suits of clothing, and tents for one company, were sent from this city yesterday, by land, to Winchester, in Virginia, and the same quantity necessary to Hagerstown, and the quantities necessary to complete each battalion will be forwarded in ten days, hence.

I have not received any information of the levies of this State; part of the clothing has been forwarded, and the remainder will follow in quick succession.

One hundred levies of the Jersey battalion will march from Trenton, on the 25th or 26th instant, and about the same time, the companies of Armstrong, and of the State of Delaware; and I shall, to-morrow, send some person to march those who shall be at Carlisle. Much injury has arisen for want of a major at that place.

I pray you to make every arrangement in Virginia and Maryland entire, and enjoin on the commanding officers a correspondence with me.

With great respect, I am, sir, &c.

Major General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 5th, 1791.

SIR:

I have received your letter from Baltimore, of the 30th ultimo. The clothing and tents, for upwards of two hundred men, have been forwarded to Hagerstown, and the same to Winchester, and the remainder, to complete the Virginia battalion, will be forwarded to-morrow, together with camp kettles and some canteens.

As I presume you have made a perfect arrangement relative to both the Virginia and Maryland battalions, I shall say nothing further upon that subject, excepting that I have received no more information, either from you or Colonel Darke, than is contained in your letter.

Mr. Swan, from my office, will set out from hence the next day after to-morrow, to inspect and muster the companies as they shall assemble at the rendezvous of Winchester and Hagerstown.

Captain Snowden marched from Trenton on the 27th ultimo, with one hundred and one levies; Captain Armstrong, from this city, and Lieutenant Platt, from Christiana bridge, on the same day; and Major Ferguson informs me that one hundred and sixty levies will immediately march from Carlisle.

Captain Piatt will march from Trenton in a day or two, with upwards of one hundred more of the levies of Jersey; and I have but little doubt of the battalion of that State being completed and on its march before the 20th instant.

I pray you to urge the completion of the battalions of this State.

Major General St. Clair, I am informed, has descended the Ohio. It is to be presumed he has left orders for you at fort Pitt. In these orders, I hope he has directed part of the levies to be posted for the covering of the upper parts of the Ohio, so that the militia who have been called out by the county lieutenants, under the directions of the President of the United States, as contained in my letter of the 10th of March, should be discharged. But, if he should not have instructed you upon this point, and has left it discretionary with you, as to the disposition of some of the levies, and it should be your judgment that they may be used for the temporary purpose of covering the frontiers on the upper parts of the Ohio, I pray you to dispose of them accordingly.

In this case you will instantly despatch the most pointed orders to all the county lieutenants of Pennsylvania and Virginia, so protected by the levies, to discharge all the militia called out by virtue of the President's directions contained in my letter of the 10th of March last, except such small parties as you may judge indispensable to serve as scouts or rangers, to give the alarm.

The great expense incurred by the militia, renders it necessary that this object should be attended to, as soon as the arrival of the levies will render it proper.

In the temporary disposition of the levies, you will pay a just regard to the protection of the settlements of Marietta, and the French settlements below, both of which are entitled to protection in the same manner as the inhabitants on the south of the Ohio.

I suppose General St. Clair will have directed that all the regulars, and probably part of the levies, descend the Ohio to head quarters. It is far from my intention of interfering in the least degree with his orders. My object is to discharge the militia consistently with the other objects of the troops.

I shall expect to hear from you every opportunity, until you descend the Ohio.

I am, sir, &c.

Major General RICHARD BUTLER.

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 12th, 1791.

Your letter of the 30th of April, is the last I have received from you.

I have sent Mr. Swan to Hagerstown, in Maryland, and Winchester, in Virginia, in order to muster, inspect, and march all the levies at those places.

He is furnished with money and orders to supply any defects which may have arisen on the part of the contractors, either with respect to rations or transportation, and he has, also, all the commissions for the Virginia and Maryland battalions.

I have information from Captain Freeman, whom I despatched upon other public business, that the recruiting of the Virginia battalion has succeeded well, and from his information, I should hope that the greater part of that battalion will be in readiness to march from Winchester on or before the 20th instant.

Tents, clothing, and knapsacks, have been forwarded complete, for the Virginia, and the same articles have gone forward, or are about setting out, for the Maryland battalion at Hagerstown.

I have, therefore, the persuasion in my mind, that you have completed all the arrangements with which you are charged, relative to the said Virginia and Maryland battalions, and that they will be completed in due season.

The Jersey battalion will probably be completed and marched before the 20th or 25th. Captain Pike marched with a detachment from Trenton on the 9th, which makes one hundred and ninety-six non-commissioned and privates of that battalion, which have already marched.

The completion of the battalions of this State will claim your highest exertions. The lower battalion, it is to be presumed, will be completed in due season; but the upper battalion does not succeed so well; pray urge the business by all possible inducements.

The battalion to be raised under the orders of Brigadier General Sevier, will not be so forward as I expected, owing to his falling sick at Richmond.

But as the clothing, and all equipments for it, had gone forward on the 25th ultimo, he writes me he had no doubt of the battalion being completed by the 1st of June.

The recruiting in the Eastern States, for the regular troops, has not succeeded well, but I hope, from the measures taken, it will soon be better. Captain Shaylor, with a company from Connecticut, will, I expect, be shortly at Brunswick, in New Jersey, on its way to Fort Pitt, and I expect, in the course of this month, that Beatty and Doyle's companies will be completed.

I enclose you a duplicate of my letter to you of the 5th instant.

I pray your immediate attention to the objects contained in it, relative to the dismissal of the militia of the frontier countries, as soon as the arrival of the levies will admit of the measure.

If you have not orders from Major General St. Clair, relative to the time of your going down the Ohio, I wish it might be delayed, conceiving your presence will be essentially necessary at fort Pitt, in order to arrange and forward the service. As soon as the major of the Carlisle detachment shall be appointed, you will order Colonel Gibson to Fort Pitt.

I am, sir, your's, &c.

Major General RICHARD BUTLER.

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 19th, 1791.

I have received your favor, dated at Carlisle, the 11th instant.

Mr. Swan will be able to remedy all defects in Maryland and Virginia, either with respect to provisions or transportation.

I depend upon your appointing the major to the Carlisle battalion.

I am well satisfied you have gone forward to fort Pitt. The Indians have lately committed some depredations on Westmoreland county; the mischief most probably has been committed by a few Indians, but the people seem greatly alarmed.

The Governor of this Commonwealth has again applied to me for arms and ammunition, and I have directed Major Craig to furnish two hundred arms and accoutrements, with a proportionate quantity of ammunition, to the orders of Colonel Biddle, quartermaster general of the State.

I have furnished to the order of Major Smith, of Carlisle, the further sum of one thousand dollars, on account of Mr. Duer, the contractor.

I have not received any precise information relative to the upper battalion of this State. I have written to Major Clark for information, and shall hope to receive it either from him, but more especially from you.

I have been informed that, as no men were called from Fayette county, it is unfortunate that one company had not been raised in that county. I trust that, if there is still a deficiency in other places, you will immediately attempt to raise men in Fayette.

I depend greatly on your presence to give a due stimulus to the upper battalion.

I am persuaded, were a proper distribution to be made, by posting a company of levies at fort Franklin for the present, and until they would be wanted for the active operations of the campaign, and by dismissing the Westmoreland militia, all but a few, who might act as rangers for quieting the minds of the inhabitants, that Major Clarke's battalion would immediately feel the good effects of the measure.

I trust you will take decisive measures, as soon as the nature of the case will admit, consistently with the protection of the frontiers, to dismiss all the militia called out by the county lieutenants, as far down the Ohio as the Great Kenhawa. General St. Clair will take care of all below the Kenhawa.

The dismissal of the militia must be entrusted to you, who will be upon the spot. The expense is a grievous circumstance, and ought to be terminated as soon as possible, consistently with the security of the inhabitants.

When the levies shall arrive, if you shall have the disposal of them by the general's orders, (for I wish not to interfere with the disposition of the troops after their arrival at fort Pitt) it will be important that they should be arranged so as to cover the counties for the present, in order that the militia may be discharged.

The troops which have marched, and which will march, from the respective rendezvous, for fort Pitt, before the first of June, will probably amount to twelve hundred, besides Captain Montfort's company of North Carolina, which amounts to upwards of sixty, and which has marched from Staunton by the Great Kenhawa.

Mr. Hodgdon has employed Colonel Marshall, of Washington county, to purchase fifty horses for the cavalry, and he has or will make arrangements for the purchase of the other fifty. All the stores for the campaign, together with the quartermaster, will set out before the first of June.

I enclose a duplicate of my letter to you of the 12th instant.

I earnestly request that I may hear from you by every post.

I am, sir, with great respect, &c.

Major-General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 22d, 1791.

SIR:

I have the honor to inform you that the bearer, James Woodhouse, is appointed a surgeon's mate to Major Clarke's battalion of levies, and, by order of the Secretary of War, repairs to fort Pitt to join his corps, and to receive any further directions from you that may be necessary.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN STAGG, Chief Clerk.

Major-General RICHARD BUTLER.

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 26th, 1791.

I have received yours, dated at Turtle creek, thirteen miles east of Pittsburg, on the 19th instant.

As the Virginia levies are marching without arms, and, as it appears from your last letter there may be some danger on the route to Pittsburg, it will be all important that you use the armed troops in such manner as to prevent a possibility of injury to the unarmed levies, or the stores, which are on the way to fort Pitt. You could detach arms, accoutrements, and ammunition, to meet the levies before they arrive upon dangerous ground.

I have directed arms, accoutrements, and ammunition, to be forwarded to the Maryland levies, and I would do so by the Virginia levies, but it appears, from the information from Mr. Swan and Colonel Darke, that all the Virginia levies would be in motion before the first of June. One hundred and thirteen were to march from Winchester on the 18th, so that they will arrive at fort Pitt previously to this letter. The levies from Carlisle and Trenton will also be armed.

I enclose you a schedule of the troops which have actually marched, and which will probably march, before the first of June.

By the 10th of June, I expect we shall march one hundred and fifty regulars, under Beatty or Doyle, and, by that time, the remainder also of the Jersey battalion, which will probably be about sixty.

The recruiting service at the Eastward is exceedingly dull: we shall probably fall short in that quarter. In a few days I shall be able with certainty to estimate the force which will march in the course of June.

Besides the request herein contained, relative to the safety of the unarmed parties, I shall write to Colonel Gibson to make use of Purdy's company, which is about marching for the upper post.

I am anxious to hear of Colonel Procter. You will please to give me, and Major General St. Clair, the earliest information you shall have relative to him. And you will also keep me constantly informed of every thing necessary for me to know.

I am, sir, yours, &c.

Major-General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 1st June, 1791.

SIR:

This will be delivered to you by Mr. Hodgdon, the quartermaster to the army. You will please to give him your advice and directions for such preparations as shall be essential to the campaign.

I am, &c.

Major-General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 2d June, 1791.

SIR:

The Secretary of War being absent for a day or two, I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter to him, dated the 22d ultimo, with its enclosures.

Mr. Hodgdon, the quartermaster, sets out this morning for Pittsburg, and will hasten his journey, in order to make whatever arrangements may be found necessary in his department, and to receive your further commands. By the next post, the Secretary of War will write you more particularly.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN STAGG, Jun. Chief Clerk.

Major-General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 9th June, 1791.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letters of the 22d and 29th ultimo, and of the 1st instant. The clothing and canteens for Clarke's battalion must have all reached fort Pitt on or about the 1st instant.

Sheet iron was sent forward, in order to make the camp kettles at fort Pitt. Camp kettles, ready made, would have been rendered useless by the transportation.

The knapsacks were neither painted nor strapped, but the quartermaster was to forward both paint and straps. But, in order to remedy this matter entirely, I have directed a sufficiency to be painted and strapped here, and they will be forwarded in a few days.

The quartermaster says, that he consulted good judges on the articles of the pack saddles; but I believe, from your representation, that he has been mistaken.

I am satisfied that you have employed some persons to make trees for other saddles. If the materials you mention, to make up the pack-saddles, have not been already forwarded, which I believe is the case, it shall be done immediately.

The quartermaster made an arrangement for boats and the cavalry horses. I have conceived that Kentucky was the proper place to purchase the pack-horses, and have directed it accordingly. Mr. Hodgdon, the quartermaster, set out from Carlisle on the 7th instant, and will be at fort Pitt by the 12th or 13th. He is amply furnished with the means of obtaining every thing that shall be wanting for the campaign, and I have directed him to take your advice upon such preparations as you may deem essential, and which have not already been done.

As the representative of the public in the preparations of the campaign, I feel it my duty, and it is most certainly my inclination, that every article, however minute, should be furnished, and I have given the directions accordingly.

From the activity of Mr. Hodgdon, and his ample funds, I have no doubt that all things in the quartermaster's department will be prepared in due season.

By the returns of the provisions which you transmitted me, it appears that such a quantity of flour is already purchased, that no apprehensions may be entertained on that account. Until the expedition shall take place, and during the operations of the troops, dependence must be placed on live cattle. The posts to be established will require six months' salted meats, and the other parts of the ration in proportion. This object the contractor has promised to attend to, and from his information there will be no disappointment.

There are no light fuzees for the levy officers. The French arms which have been forwarded, are not heavy; and I should presume would answer the purpose of all the officers very well.

As the parties of levies, excepting the Virginians, who are yet to march forward, will be armed, the arms requested by the State might have been delivered.

The colors for the levies have not been deemed essential; but at your request, they shall be forwarded.

There are plenty of tents gone forward, but there are no marquees; the nature of the campaign will render it very improper that heavy tents should be used on the expedition. But the quartermaster can modify those already gone, according to the directions of the general officers.

I am well satisfied that Major Butler has been appointed to the command of the eastern battalion of levies in this State. I hope the remaining company will be soon filled and marched.

The object of Colonel Procter's mission having failed, of which he informed you, General St. Clair will no longer restrain the expedition under Brigadier General Scott.

I am persuaded that you transmitted to General St. Clair the whole of Colonel Procter's despatches, because, on his early receipt thereof, much will depend.

You will not retain more troops on the upper parts of the Ohio than shall be necessary for the defensive protection of the frontiers. All beyond that number you will order down the river to head quarters.

You will also make a perfect arrangement for the collection of those who shall be employed in the defensive protection, at the time they shall be required for the expedition.

I enclose you, in confidence, an estimate of the troops who have marched, and who will march during the present month.

The recruiting service has been very dull in New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island. In Connecticut it has been better. I hope, however, to march about five hundred regulars, or three years' men, in the course of the present month; but this includes Doyle and Beatty's, and all others to the eastward. This number is contemplated in the number of the enclosed estimate.

As we shall not have all the three years' men I was induced to hope, and as you seem to think that a company of levies could be raised in Fayette, I hereby authorize you to raise one, two, three, or even four companies, or a battalion of levies, provided the object could be certainly accomplished by the 15th or 20th of July, in the upper counties of Pennsylvania and Virginia.

If you go into this measure, you will immediately inform me and General St. Clair thereof. For the bounties and advance pay, you will draw upon the paymaster. A great part of the clothing is ready made, and shall be immediately forwarded upon your notification.

You could appoint the officers, and, as soon as the President of the United States shall arrive, which will be about the 23d instant, the commissions shall be forwarded upon the names of the officers being certified by you.

I am afraid of the instability of gentlemen volunteers, and therefore cannot give any encouragement to the idea. The organization of the corps of cavalry is with Major General St. Clair, who will take regulars or levies, or both, as he shall judge proper.

The equipments are excellent, and I hope the corps will be of that description. I have suggested Captain Snowden, who was of Lee's corps, as an officer of horse.

I consider that all the troops mentioned in the enclosed schedule will be at head quarters by the 15th of July at farthest, the greater part long before, as I presume that two thousand three hundred will have marched from their respective rendezvous on or before the 22d instant. But this includes Sevier's battalion.

There is no frontier battalion of Virginia. Sevier's battalion is of the territory of the United States south of the Ohio. There are six battalions of levies only, to wit: Sevier's, Virginia, Maryland; these compose the first regiment of levies; the second is composed of the two battalions from this State, and one from New Jersey.

You mention your taking some measures with the Six Nations. This must not interfere with the treaty which is to take place at the Painted Post, to be held there by Colonel Pickering on the 17th instant.

I am of your opinion, that the Indians must join one side or the other, and that the Senecas and others had better join ours than the enemy. Colonel Pickering is instructed upon this point.

You will, I am persuaded, join at head quarters at fort Washington, so soon as that you shall judge that the service does not longer require your presence at fort Pitt, or as soon as you receive the orders for that purpose from General St. Clair. In this case you will undoubtedly give the necessary orders to be observed relative to the collection and transportation of the troops.

But, as I have before mentioned to you, it is my desire to avoid the least interference with the orders of Major General St. Clair; his orders are therefore to be obeyed in all respects.

I am, &c.

Major General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 16th June, 1791.

SIR:

I have received your letter of the 9th instant. It may be expected that your arrangements will give protection to the upper parts of the Ohio. I am persuaded you constantly inform General St. Clair of your arrangements.

The circumstance of the want of beef is a strange and unlooked for event, as the contractor has given me assurances of a full supply of provisions. Lest his agents should omit to give him full information upon the subject, I have written him, and enclosed a copy of your letter, and urged him to take the necessary measures for a full supply.

The quartermaster is furnished with a sum of money for exigencies. The troops must not suffer for want of provisions while he has money or credit.

The contractor entered into engagements with the Secretary of the Treasury for to supply the troops with rations of provisions, for which he is responsible. He says his arrangements are adequate to the end. I am not informed of the details, but should suppose that General Neville could inform you of the arrangements for the supplies.

I generally knew that it was not intended that the troops should remain a long time in the upper parts of the Ohio, and that the main part of the supplies were supposed to be required at or near fort Washington.

But the arrangement of keeping the troops a short time on the upper parts of the Ohio, must occasion some change in the contractor's arrangements.

I shall apply to the postmaster to order that the post rider may stay longer at fort Pitt.

It is not probable that your letter to the Five Nations will be received at Niagara, unless you have entrusted it to a special messenger. Colonel Pickering's treaty is to be held the 17th, at the Painted Post. I hope your arrangements will not interfere with him.

Neither of the remaining companies of the Jersey and eastern battalions of this State are completed, nor will they be, in less than the latter end of the month.

I am assured that all the tents and clothing for Clarke's battalion, and canteens, have gone forward some time ago; the painted knapsacks will be sent forward to-morrow.

As Captains Hannah and Darke's companies marched the 4th instant from Winchester, they must have arrived by this time at fort Pitt.

Only a few now remain to complete the Virginia battalion, the deficiency being occasioned by desertions.

The first division of the Maryland battalion, consisting of one hundred and eighty-eight, marched about the 12th instant.

Captain Doyle has marched for Lancaster, and Captain Beatty will march from Brunswick to-morrow or next day. These two will make about one hundred and fifty.

Two companies of regulars are about embarking from the Eastern States, and will, I hope, be at Brunswick about the 20th, to commence their march forward.

Hospital stores, and other articles necessary for the campaign, are about being sent forward to fort Pitt. I enclose you a copy of my last letter.

I am, &c.

Major General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 23d June, 1791.

Sir:

I have received your letter of the 16th instant, and I am very sorry to learn that you were unwell, but which I sincerely hope will be of short continuance.

I have communicated to Mr. Duer, the contractor, the embarrassments relative to beef. From the liberal supplies of the treasury, I flatter myself he will instantly take effectual measures to prevent a repetition of any cause of complaint on this head.

It affords me great satisfaction to learn from you that every other part of the preparations are going on well.

I have communicated to Major General St. Clair, the power entrusted to you of raising another company of levies, or another battalion, if necessary. All the troops who are to be depended upon for the campaign, are, or soon will be, in motion forward. The recruiting service in New England has lately taken a spring, which may, perhaps, afford us another company, or perhaps one hundred more than as mentioned in my last. But it is my judgment, that, if we could raise another battalion of levies to supply deficiencies, it had better be done. If it could not be done within your sphere, it might be done lower down, under the immediate direction of Major General St. Clair.

I shall immediately forward about two hundred additional suits of clothing for the levies, to fort Pitt, for the above purpose of additional companies. You will judge what part of these to retain, or what to forward.

I shall also direct two thousand pairs of large shoes to be forwarded as soon as possible, which, however, must be deducted from the pay of the levies. If they should not arrive in time for the campaign, I judge there are a sufficiency on hand at fort Washington.

The colors for the levies will be forwarded next week.

The Quartermaster will inform you of the additional supplies forwarded, among which are the boots and spurs for the cavalry.

Colonel Pickering, who is at this time holding a treaty with the Six Nations at the Painted Post, has directions to aim at the same thing that you are attempting, to wit: to obtain a body of their warriors to join the army. If he shall be successful, I have directed that the route of the Indians be from the Cornplanter's town to fort Franklin, and that Lieutenant Jeffers would there join them, and proceed as you shall direct. A party of sixty Indians has been contemplated; but I have mentioned to Colonel Pickering, that, if more should offer, would not be material. But, unless they could be at fort Franklin by the 20th of July at farthest, the arrangement would be useless.

I pray you to attend to this point particularly, and to give such orders relative thereto, as to preclude a possibility of the Indians, in case they join us, being injured by our own citizens: for, if such an event should happen, the Six Nations must and will be our enemies.

I am satisfied that Mr. Hodgdon will answer the public expectation as quartermaster, and that, by his actual supplies, credit, and resources, there will not be a deficiency of any sort or kind.

Before you receive this letter, it is probable that you will have received ultimate orders from Major General St. Clair, relative to forwarding the troops. His orders you will obey. But in case you should not receive them, it will be proper that you should forward the troops down to fort Washington. The collection of them at that point, will awe the Wabash Indians, and prevent their striking the upper parts of the Ohio; and they will probably have the same effect on the Wyandots and Delawares, if they should continue refractory.

Before the troops depart, it will be highly proper that an arrangement should be made for the defensive protection of the exposed counties; you, being on the spot, will be the judge of the proportions each county ought to be permitted to have, at the expense of the United States. But the number ought to be limited to the state of things; and all those called out under the authority of the United States, must be regulated according to my letter of the 10th of March last, written by order of the President of the United States.

This matter of the defensive protection, therefore, is hereby confided to you, and you are requested to make the arrangements accordingly. For the detachments which shall be so called out, and belonging to counties not before supplied with ammunition, it would be proper to issue a reasonable quantity of powder and ball.

The contractor who carries the mail to Pittsburg agrees that the mail shall arrive there at ten o'clock in the morning, and stay until three in the afternoon, and that, upon your special request, he shall stay until five o'clock. I enclose you a copy of my last letter, dated 16th instant.

I am, &c.

Major General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 30th June, 1791.

Sir:

I enclose you a duplicate of my letter dated the 23d instant, and transmitted by the last post, and I have the honor to acknowledge your favor of the 23d instant.

I am satisfied at your opinion, that an additional battalion can be raised upon the frontiers. I have directed Mr. Howell, by this post, to forward Mr. Hodgdon a month's pay for the commissioned and non-commissioned officers and privates, and the bounties for the non-commissioned and privates of a complete battalion. This money will be paid to your order.

The two hundred powder horns, and two hundred bullet or shot pouches, which you request, shall be forwarded immediately. The four bugle horns are gone forward.

As the clothing for nearly two hundred levies is in store, it shall be completed to that number; and as it may be uncertain whether you obtain a full battalion, I shall forward no more clothing. But if you should be fortunate in raising a full battalion, you will be able to get them clothed at fort Washington, out of the clothing of the regulars, of which there are at that place several hundred spare suits.

I mention this as a resource; but, perhaps, if you succeed, it may, upon further consideration, be proper to procure here an additional quantity, which may be done in a few days.

Two thousand pair of large shoes are in hand, and will be forwarded as soon as finished.

You mention the levies have only one pair of overalls; this was indeed the original arrangement; but afterwards, an additional pair was furnished, of sheeting, to be deducted from the pay of the men. Please to inquire of Mr. Hodgdon upon this subject.

Apprehending that the levies might require some more pay, I had directed a sum, equal to a month's pay, to be forwarded by Captain Beatty to Mr. Hodgdon, to be by him issued, as Major General St. Clair may direct. This money will, therefore, be delivered at head quarters. I should apprehend some embarrassment if it should be delivered before; but if it should, in your judgment, be indispensable to advance some small sum on account, and you can arrange it with Mr. Hodgdon, so as to avoid confusion, I shall have no objection.

Arms and accoutrements for the additional battalion, are at fort Pitt. I leave the one hundred riflemen to your judgment. The arrangement you make of paying for the rifles in case of being lost, and also of their being repaired, is right; but each person ought to have something for the use of it.

I shall have no objection to your taking some shoes from the parcel you mention, belonging to Mr. Duer, if they are good, and at a reasonable price; but they must be deducted from the pay of the levies.

Brigadier General Sevier writes me on the 5th instant, that three companies of the Southern battalion were raised, and about to march. These were all riflemen.

The arrangement of your force appears highly judicious for the object; and I am persuaded, you will not suffer a moment to elapse, longer than necessary, before you make the troops descend the Ohio; but the time has arrived, which renders the collection of the force, at head quarters, necessary.

The regulars and levies are designed for active and offensive operations; and are, therefore, excepting a few guards at the posts, all to descend the Ohio to fort Washington. If the frontiers, on the upper parts of the Ohio, require defensive protection, the militia of the respective counties must perform that service. On this point, I wrote you fully on the 23d instant, the duplicate being herein enclosed, and constituted you the judge of the number to be permitted at the expense of the Union. I am persuaded the public will find sufficient security in your character, and in your intelligence, that this power will be exercised with entire discretion and judgment.

For the militia, who shall be so called out for guards, it will be proper that the county lieutenants make arrangements to furnish the rations, agreeably to my letter of the 10th of March last.

I have informed Mr. Duer, regularly, of the complaints relating to the beef. He is expected here daily, when, it is to be presumed, he will make more perfect arrangements.

About one hundred and seventy-five regulars, from New England, have probably arrived at Brunswick, and about commencing their march. I have no information from Major Butler by this post, relative to the deficiency of the Carlisle battalion of this State. There is, also, a deficiency of the Jersey battalion, of about fifty, which are recruiting slowly. I have not heard of the last part of the Maryland battalion being forwarded.

Brigadier General Scott, with a body of about eight hundred mounted volunteers, crossed the Ohio, on the 23d of last month, and was expected to strike the Ouatanon towns, on or about the 30th of May; we may, therefore, expect to hear from him hourly.

I am, sir, &c.

Major General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 7, 1791.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge your favor of the 30th ultimo, and enclose a duplicate of mine of the same date.

I am happy to learn the state of the Ohio, as I am persuaded it will be improved to the utmost.

I enclose you a schedule of the troops, which you will keep to yourself. Captain Phelon, with nearly two hundred regulars, will march from Trenton this day. The deficiencies of the levies, and the one hundred regulars, will all, I hope, move forward in a few days. This schedule does not include the additional levies which you are authorized to raise; but pray make it certain that you can raise the additional levies, before you incur any expense. If they cannot be raised, and Major General St. Clair should think proper, he will raise a corps of volunteers, from Kentucky, to join, or act collaterally with the main expedition; therefore, pray inform him of the certainty of the prospects, relative to the additional levies, as his measures will depend upon your information.

I have regularly stated to Mr. Duer, the deficiencies, and urged him to take the proper measures to remedy the defects. A Mr. Mitchell passed through here a day or two ago, and informed me, that he was charged with money, to a large amount, for the contractor's agents; and I have learned, that a Mr. Wilkie is charged with the transportation of the provisions, and that he is furnished by the contractor with the means of purchasing or hiring the pack-horses, for that purpose.

I have forwarded a copy of the contract for provisions to Mr. Hodgdon, agreeably to his request, by which it will appear, that the contractor is to furnish, at the places therein mentioned, the rations specified. If he executes it well, it will be for his interest; if he does not, he must sustain the consequences. But the public service must neither be delayed or injured, for want of provisions, and I have written to the quartermaster to this effect; but any interposition on his part, or of any of the generals, must be only in cases of extremity.

I am highly satisfied, that Mr. Hodgdon meets your approbation; I am persuaded, from long experience of him, that he will amply fulfil the expectations formed of him.

The colors are not sufficiently dry to send yet, but they will be forwarded very soon. The clothing, and all the other supplies, are forwarded.

I have received a letter from Major General St. Clair, dated the 26th May. But I have not yet heard of the issue of General Scott's expedition.

It has now become important that the troops should immediately descend the Ohio. I depend upon your executing the transportation of them as fast as possible; and that you make the arrangements for calling out the guards for the counties, as mentioned in my former letters.

In order that every part of the arrangements may harmonize, and to avoid repetitions, I transmit to Major General St. Clair copies of my letters to you.

Major Patterson is about setting out for fort Pitt. Major Butler I have ordered to go on as soon as possible.

I am, sir, &c.

Major General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 12, 1791.

SIR:

Yesterday morning, at eight o'clock, I received your favor of the 2d instant, by the express, James McClellan.

The information of Thomas Rhea, whose affidavit you transmitted, was, indeed, of the importance to justify a special express. It has been submitted to the President of the United States, who will take it into his most serious consideration. To quarrel, and come to an open rupture with the crown of Britain, would, in the present situation of this country, be a very serious affair, and to be avoided, if possible, consistently with national honor and dignity. There is a time for all things; and it may happen, hereafter, that the conduct of the British, in the present case, will amount to a heavy charge, which must be paid with interest. Indeed, it is hardly to be doubted, if the facts alleged by Rhea be true, but this instance of aid to the Indians, will be followed by others, which must also be minuted down: for it cannot be supposed that the aid has been dictated by the spontaneous impulse of the commanding officer.

It will be proper, that you obtain attestations of Rhea's credibility, from respectable and known characters. It must be our duty to mind our business, and accomplish the objects of the campaign; which, if as successful as all things promise, will give a new aspect to the security of the frontiers.

Captain Phelon, with about two hundred men, mostly regulars, is at Reading, and will move on steadily to join you.

Continue to forward the troops with all possible despatch, to head-quarters. I presume you have communicated Rhea's information to Major General St. Clair, to whom, I pray you, send also a copy of this letter.

I shall write you more particularly by the post, on the 14th instant. In the meantime,
I am, sir, with great respect, yours, &c.

Major General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 14, 1791.

Sir:

I have received your two letters of the 7th instant. I am happy to learn, that all arrangements are in the promising train you state.

You will report, particularly, the arrangements you make with the county lieutenants, during the absence of the army.

The defects relative to beef, I am assured, have been remedied.

I hope the reports relative to General Scott's success may be true to the utmost extent; but I am ignorant of what they are, not having received any information upon the subject.

Captain Phelon did not march on the day I expected; he will probably halt to day at Reading, and move on to-morrow. He will take under his orders, at Carlisle, all the levies who may be there. Any deficiencies in Major Butler's battalion must be attempted to be completed by Captain Smith, who may continue recruiting until the 25th, when he must march.

I write by this post to Major Butler to repair immediately to fort Pitt.

Major Patterson having left this city some days ago, will be at fort Pitt before this letter.

About one hundred recruits of the regulars from the eastward, are directed to move on. But they cannot arrive at fort Washington much before the first of September, therefore I do not estimate them for the expedition. The deficiency must be made up by the general, from the district of Kentucky, of such species of troops as he shall judge proper.

All the Jersey levies who shall be recruited by the 25th, shall, at that time, move forward; perhaps they may amount to twenty-five or thirty.

Doctor Slough having resigned, you will appoint a successor, and inform me thereof. I really believe Dr. Brown, one of the mates, would well answer the purpose.

I presume the Maryland and Virginia battalions have mates.

I am, sir, &c.

Major General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 21, 1791.

Sir:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th instant, and to enclose a duplicate of mine of the same day.

I have also received a letter from Major General St. Clair, of the 13th of June, at which time no troops had arrived. But, on the 14th and 15th, Major Ferguson, with Kirkwood's and Armstrong's companies, and also Montfort's, from North Carolina, arrived.

It affords me great satisfaction to learn of the detachment's descending the river, under Major Gaither, on the 13th instant.

I most earnestly request that all the troops be instantly collected and embarked for head quarters, with all possible despatch.

Captain Beatty will have reached you by this time. Captain Phelon, with about two hundred and fifty regulars and levies, will leave Carlisle to-morrow.

Captain Newman, with about sixty regulars and levies, will leave this city on or about the 25th, and about one hundred more will arrive at Brunswick in a few days. But I do not estimate that these will arrive in time for the expedition.

Major Heart will set out from this city to-morrow. The shoes and colors will also leave this to-morrow.

I have urged Mr. Duer, the contractor, to take all necessary measures relative to provisions, which I have been assured has been done. Major General St. Clair, in his letter of the 13th, writes thus:

The contractors have got forward about a thousand barrels of flour, and Elliott and Williams have likewise about a thousand at this place, which, should it be wanted, I consider as so much in the hands of the public, and the contractor's agent is gone to Kentucky to purchase beef, in which he will meet with no difficulty. How they propose to transport the flour, by and by, I know not, nor have they any person here who can inform me.

Major Heart has informed me that John Rhea's character is truly infamous, and no dependence to be placed thereon. Were one to form a judgment of the conduct of the British, by what appears to be their true interest, they cannot urge the Indians to a war with the United States, and their agent here is pretty strenuous in asserting the contrary of Rhea's information.

De Bartzchi's information, as transmitted by Captain Slough, appears probable; there cannot be any doubt, from Colonel Procter's information, but that Brandt went to the Miami towns, and probably for the object of peace; and it is not improbable but Sir John Johnson's proposed treaty is to the same effect.

Colonel Pickering informs me, that, as it would be impossible for the Indians to be at fort Franklin by the 20th instant, he shall not attempt to influence any of them to join our army, and that he has understood that any such attempt would be ill received.

The great object of Colonel Pickering's treaty was, to keep the Six Nations quiet, and to prevent their joining the opposite side, by drawing them a different way.

It was, indeed, added, that it might be an additional cement to obtain a party of sixty or seventy of their young warriors, who could with difficulty be restrained from joining one side or the other.

We have yet no official news from Scott; the reports from Kentucky are, that he has succeeded, which I sincerely hope may be the case.

I am persuaded you will descend the Ohio at the earliest moment the service will require. Indeed, it will be proper that both you and the quartermaster should be at head-quarters as soon as possible. Colonel Gibson or Colonel Darke may be left to superintend the remaining embarkation. But every sort of stores for the campaign, which shall be arrived at fort Pitt, must precede or accompany Captain Phelon.

The President of the United States, to whom I have submitted your letter of the 14th instant, is exceedingly anxious that Major General St. Clair should commence his operations at as early a period as possible; and he has commanded me to urge that you, and all the troops within your orders, descend the Ohio immediately.

I have heard nothing from Brigadier General Sevier since the 5th of June, when he informed me of three companies being raised, and soon to march.

I am, sir, yours, &c.

Major General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 21st, 1791.

SIR:

The bearer, Doctor Grasson, is one of the emigrants from France, and is recommended to me as a gentleman of science and professional knowledge.

I request that you would be pleased to cause him to be examined by professional characters, and if the report should be favorable, that you would appoint him a surgeon's mate to any of the vacant battalions; and if there should not be any vacancy, that you would permit him to repair to head-quarters.

I am, sir, &amp;c.

Major General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, August 4, 1791.

SIR:

This morning I have been honored with the receipt of yours of the 28th ultimo. It affords great satisfaction to learn that all the troops and stores are in readiness, and will descend the Ohio immediately.

The President of the United States is extremely anxious that the troops should be immediately assembled at fort Washington. I am persuaded, from your former letter, that they have all descended the Ohio; and, therefore, I shall be very brief in this letter.

I calculate that Captain Phelon will be at fort Pitt about the 6th or 8th.

Captain Newman marched, with about eighty-three non-commissioned and privates, from this city, on the 30th ultimo; and Captain Buell will probably march from New Brunswick on the 8th or 10th instant. But neither of these are estimated for the campaign. The recruiting service for the regulars will still be continued, and the recruits forwarded by companies.

I enclose you the certified list you request. As a board of officers will adjust the rank of all the officers, I conceive it would be improper to give any opinion relative to the rank of Colonels Darke and Gibson.

I hope you have taken effectual measures to suppress the officious interference of De Bartzchi, the Frenchman, or any other person, with the Indians; such conduct is pernicious, and no good can result therefrom.

Colonel Pickering's treaty is finished satisfactorily. I have not received the particulars, but I expect him in town daily.

Colonel Pickering did not propose that any of the warriors should accompany our army; he found that such proposition would not be acceptable.

It is probable Sir John Johnson has called the Indians to a treaty at Buffalo creek. The object we shall endeavor to learn.

It is well Brandt has returned; and if it be true, he has brought some Western Indians with him, it is most probable we shall soon hear from them.

With great respect, sir, &amp;c.

Major General BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, August 11th, 1791.

SIR:

I have received your letter of the 4th instant. It is considered by the President of the United States as an unhappy omen, that all the troops for the campaign had not descended the Ohio at the time you wrote.

No retardment of the essential objects of the campaign should be permitted under the idea of defensive protection of the frontiers, against a few straggling Indians. The counties are sufficiently strong for that purpose.

If you should, therefore, be still at fort Pitt, it is the decided orders of the President of the United States that you repair to head-quarters with all possible despatch, together with all the troops, officers, and stores, destined for the campaign.

It has been constantly intimated that Captain Phelon was the rear of the troops for the campaign; and that no dependence would be placed on those who should arrive after him.

Captain Newman will be at fort Pitt in less than fifteen days from the present time, and Captain Buell in not less than one month, as he only marched from Brunswick this day. Colonel Gibson, therefore, cannot have any object at fort Pitt, and he must instantly repair to head-quarters.

If there should be any deficiencies, the commanding general has the authority for supplying them.

Any levies raised by Captain Falkner, or any other person, after the present moment, will not be of any service, and are, therefore, to be suspended. I send a commission for Doctor Brown.

Three blank commissions shall be prepared and forwarded by the next post.

The same sort of defensive protection is to be provided for Marietta and Gallipolis, in proportion to their numbers, as the other exposed places.

I am, sir, &amp;c.

Major General BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, August 18th, 1791.

SIR:

I have received your letter of the 11th instant, and which has been submitted to the President of the United States. I enclose a duplicate of mine to you of the same date.

You will receive, herewith, the commissions for Major Clarke's battalion, according to the list you sent, of which the enclosed is a copy; and also, the blank commissions for the additional company which, it is presumed, has gone down the Ohio with you.

As you will probably receive this at head quarters, I shall not have any thing to add to my former communications.

The information you transmitted in your last, of the harmony among the troops, is highly pleasing, and, it is to be hoped, will pervade all the army. I most sincerely hope that the campaign will be conducted with the highest vigor and success, so as to cover all concerned, from the General, down to the private, with glory and satisfaction.

I have the honor to be, sir, &amp;c.

Major General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, August 25, 1791.

SIR:

I have received your letter of the 18th instant, which has been submitted to the President of the United States, and I am commanded to inform you that he is by no means satisfied, with the long detention of the troops on the upper parts of the Ohio, which he considers as unnecessary and improper.

And, that it is his opinion, unless the highest exertions be made by all parts of the army, to repair the loss of the season, that the expenses which have been made for the campaign, will be altogether lost, and that the measures, from which so much has been expected, will issue in disgrace.

I have the honor, &amp;c.

Major General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 1st, 1791.

SIR:

I have received your favor of the 25th ultimo, and I now enclose you a duplicate of mine of the same date. As Captain Newman marched from Bedford, on the 20th of August, it is a little surprising that he had not arrived at fort Pitt, the time your letter was written; but it is presumed he would arrive before your departure from that place.

The several objects of your letter will be attended to, and the name of your nephew will be placed on the list, and submitted to the President of the United States, with the other candidates.

It is devoutly to be hoped, that you will have a speedy passage down the Ohio, so that the remaining part of the season may be embraced for effective operations.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

Major General BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 9th, 1791.

SIR:

In the absence of the Secretary of War, I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 30th of August; and I now transmit you a duplicate of his letter of the 1st instant.

I have the honor, &amp;c.

JNO. STAGG, Jun. Chief Clerk.

Major General RICHARD BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 22d, 1791.

SIR:

I acknowledge to have received your letter of the 5th of September, but, as this letter will not reach you for some time, I shall not add any thing more.

I am, &amp;c.

Major General BUTLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT, October 13th, 1791.

SIR:

I have received your favor of the 18th ultimo. I am happy that you all have arrived safely, and I pray God that the operations of the army may be adequate to the object proposed, which is, the establishment of a peace upon the terms of moderation and justice.

The President of the United States has been exceedingly apprehensive, that the detention of the troops on the upper parts of the Ohio, might frustrate the campaign. It is hoped, however, that the army will have sufficient time to make the necessary establishments.

I am, sir, with great respect, &amp;c.

Major General RICHARD BUTLER.

Instructions to Samuel Hodgdon, Quartermaster to the troops of the United States.

SIR:

You, having forwarded the most material articles in the quartermaster and ordnance departments, are immediately to repair to fort Pitt, in order to prosecute all further preparations in the quartermaster's line.

The first great objects which must engross your attention, are, the completion of the hundred horses for the cavalry, with an overplus of ten, making, in all, one hundred and ten cavalry horses; the boats, for the transportation of the troops, and ordnance, and military stores, down the Ohio; the pack-horses for the campaign. From all the information I have received, Kentucky will be the most proper place in which to purchase these horses. The number which I have estimated as necessary for the transportation of the baggage of the army, the artillery, and the hospital stores, may amount to about three hundred. But this number is independent of the transportation of provisions, which will be provided for by the contractor. But, if, in the opinion of the General, it should be too small, the number ought to be increased accordingly to his directions.

For all the other objects of the quartermaster, or other staff departments, the duties of which are assigned to you by the commanding officer of the troops on the Ohio, you will receive his directions.

It will, therefore, be necessary that you should descend the Ohio from fort Pitt, as soon as effective arrangements shall be made for the transportation of the troops and stores from that place.

You will keep all your accounts in a fair and clear manner, so that they may be settled after the campaign, in a manner entirely satisfactory to the public, and honorable to your own character. You will, therefore, constantly bear in your mind, that the greatest economy must be observed in all expenditures.

The important station in which you are placed, of Quartermaster to an army destined to great activity in a wilderness, will call for the exercise of your highest exertions, and all your talents for resource. The moving the army in due season, and its ultimate success, will depend materially upon your arrangements; and your reputation for ever stands pledged for the perfect performance of your duty.

The money which is placed in your hands, being the sum of twenty thousand dollars, will be sufficient, it is presumed, for the purposes of the campaign; if, however, it should be otherwise, you will be enabled to draw for such further sums as the general commanding the troops shall certify, taking care, always, to specify the objects for which all sums, so drawn for, shall be required.

Your bills on the paymaster to be drawn at ten days sight.

Given at the War Office of the United States, this thirty-first day of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one.

H. KNOX, *Secretary of War.*WAR DEPARTMENT, 9th June, 1791.

SIR:

I received yours from Carlisle, dated the sixth instant. I pray you to revise all the preparations for the campaign, before you descend the Ohio. If there should be any deficiencies, inform me thereof, and the articles wanting shall be forwarded.

I shall order a sufficient number of knapsacks, for all the troops marched forward, to be painted and strapped. General Butler complains much upon this article.

I shall also send forward, port wine, sugar, tea and coffee, as hospital stores.

Hasten the collection of the cavalry horses, and send them to head quarters, with cavalry equipments, under a safe escort.

Consult Major General Butler upon the objects of the preparations, and as soon as possible repair to head quarters.

I am, sir, &amp;c.

SAMUEL HODGDON, Quartermaster.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 23d June, 1791.

SIR:

I have received yours of the sixteenth from Pittsburg. Acquainted, as you are, with the objects of the campaign, and furnished as you are with the means, I possess the highest confidence that no part of the necessary preparations will languish.

Every thing which you have written for, and which may not have been anticipated, shall be forwarded.

I enclose a list of articles, which have lately been transported, as given by your assistant. We have had made one hundred common and twenty horsemen's tents additional; and also the boots for the cavalry.

I shall send to you Captain Houdin, for employment. He is a very honest man; was a Captain in the service during the late war, and has suffered greatly. You will avail the public of his services in the ordnance, or quarter master's departments, at a moderate rate of pay. Let me know when you descend the Ohio.

I am, sir, &amp;c.

SAMUEL HODGDON, Quartermaster.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 30th June, 1791.

SIR:

I have received your letters by the post of this day, dated the seventeenth, nineteenth, and twenty third of June, for which I thank you.

You will find that the post is arranged as you desired.

All the Indian goods are to be forwarded to head quarters.

The contractor is to transport the provisions upon the expedition.

I have not calculated that you will have to furnish more than three hundred pack and artillery horses at the extent. If you do purchase more, they must be for the transportation of provisions in case of the failure of the contractors. But for this you must have the special warrant of the commander-in-chief.

The paymaster has forwarded to you a large sum of money, for the pay of the troops, to be paid to the warrants of the commanding General. General Butler requests that the levies may have some money advanced them on account. I am apprehensive of confusion in this business, unless it be issued at head quarters; but I have informed him, that, if he conceives it indispensable to advance a small sum on account, and can arrange it with you, so as to avoid confusion, I cannot have any objection.

The paymaster has also by this post forwarded two thousand two hundred and twenty-four dollars and sixty cents, being intended for the bounty of three dollars and the advanced pay of an additional battalion of levies. This money you will pay to the officers who may be appointed, to the order of Major-General Butler.

As soon as Mr. Swan shall return from Maryland, I shall direct him to repair to head quarters, as an auditor to the army accounts, and to settle the advances which have been made. He will report to the commanding officer of the troops, and you will act as paymaster, paying only on the warrants of the commanding General. This arrangement will save you trouble and avoid confusion.

I am, sir, &amp;c.

SAMUEL HODGDON, Quartermaster.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 7th July, 1791.

SIR:

I have received your letter of the twenty-eighth of June, which is highly satisfactory. I enclose you a copy of my last, of the thirtieth, and also, agreeably to your request, a copy of the contract for provisions.

I am decisively of opinion, that the purchase of the pack-horses is greatly preferable to the hiring of them, having no doubt on this point, from having weighed the subject. I request you, with the approbation of the commander-in-chief and Major-General Butler, while you are at fort Pitt, to proceed accordingly.

The contractor is to deliver the provisions for the time which the army shall operate; of course, he must be at the expense and trouble of the transportation.

I hope, for the public interests, as well as his own, that there will be no deficiencies of his agents, from any cause whatever. But in case there should be, I rely upon it that you will administer the proper remedies. But there must not be any interposition on your part, unless in cases of extremity; you will then interfere upon the orders of the commander-in-chief; and the advances you make must be settled at the treasury, with the contractor, according to the contract.

I learn that a Mr. Wilkie is to furnish the pack-horses for the contractor, and that he is provided with the means for that purpose.

The price of rations of forage is fixed by law; on the expedition it will be furnished by the public, or not at all; in the first case, the public will pay for the forage, and in the other, the officers will be paid by the paymaster.

I am highly pleased that Major General Butler entirely approves your conduct. I am persuaded it will be the same with the commander-in-chief and the public.

I am, sir, &amp;c.

SAMUEL HODGDON, Quartermaster.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 14th July, 1791.

SIR:

I have received your letter of the seventh instant. The information which you transmit is peculiarly satisfactory. I am confident all things will be well arranged in your department.

The clothing has gone forward, and I believe every other thing; the additional shoes and colors excepted, which will be in motion in a few days.

Mr. Swan has not yet returned from Maryland, but I expect him daily; upon his arrival, if the employment is agreeable to him, he soon will join you. Captain Houdin will set out to-day.

I hope all good reports respecting General Scott may prove true, but I am ignorant of what they are.

As you soon will descend the Ohio, if the pack-horses should be deficient, the General will direct you to furnish the number which shall be necessary.

I am, sir, &amp;c.

SAMUEL HODGDON, Quartermaster.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 21st July, 1791.

SIR:

I have received yours of the fourteenth instant. The advances you have made to the contractor's agent must be repaid to you again; all payments are made for provisions at the Treasury. One Mr. Mitchell passed through here, time enough to have been at fort Pitt, when you wrote your last, with money for the contractor's agent.

The point is simply this: the contractor has entered into engagements with the Secretary of the Treasury, to furnish provisions to the troops on the frontiers. If he executes it well, he will be paid the sum stipulated; if he does not, he will be subjected to the consequences of the penalty.

But the public service must not be delayed or injured by the contractors' deficiencies. But any interference must be by the express orders of the General, to whose charge the public interests are committed.

I shall hope next post to learn, that all the troops arrived at fort Pitt, have descended to fort Washington.

I have written to Major General Butler that it will be necessary for him, and you also, to repair to head quarters, as soon as the public interest will admit.

You will make arrangements, before you leave fort Pitt, for the transportation of Captain Phelon's detachment, which may consist of about two hundred and fifty. He will leave Carlisle to-morrow. In addition to his detachment, there may be transportation to be provided for about three hundred more troops; Major Craig will, I presume, be empowered by you on the subject.

SAMUEL HODGDON, Quartermaster.

I am, sir, &c.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 4th August, 1791.

SIR:

I have received your letter of the twenty-eighth ultimo, by the post, and also yours of the ninth ultimo, which has been lately received. The bills for twelve hundred dollars, which you have drawn, shall be duly paid. It is an unfortunate circumstance, to be sure, that any additional stores should be required at this time. The shells cannot be obtained in season for the campaign, but every thing possible shall be attempted. The dependence upon Turnbull & Marmie's furnace has turned out ill.

I shall be unhappy if you receive this letter at Pittsburg. The President of the United States, the commanding general, and the public service, all unite in requiring that all the troops and stores shall have descended the Ohio. Captain Phelon, I expect, will arrive about the eighth or tenth at fort Pitt.

SAMUEL HODGDON, Quartermaster.

I am, sir, &c.

WAR DEPARTMENT, August 11th, 1791.

SIR:

I enclose you a duplicate of my letter to you of the fourth instant. I have nothing material to write. It will afford me the greatest pleasure to hear of your safe arrival at head quarters, and that the stores have descended the Ohio, to fort Washington, without any accident.

I need not repeat to you, that much is expected from your exertions and activity, and that the greatest reliance is placed upon the good dispositions to be made in your department.

SAMUEL HODGDON, Quartermaster.

I am, sir, &c.

WAR DEPARTMENT, August 18th, 1791.

SIR:

I have received your two favors of the 6th and 11th instant. I have nothing material to add to my former communications, excepting that all the stores have been ordered on which have been written for, agreeably to the within schedule. (a.) But it is extremely doubtful whether any 5½ inch shells can be obtained, on this side West Point, from which place I expect some hourly, and they shall be forwarded instantly, but they cannot be in readiness for the campaign.

WAR DEPARTMENT, August 25th, 1791.

SIR:

I have received your letter of ——. The troops were detained on the upper parts of the Ohio too long; they arrived in readiness to descend, and would require nothing but boats and provisions.

If boats have been wanting, it will be unfortunate for you, as well as the public. I have ventured to assert, that nothing has been delayed in your department, and I hope it will prove so, but you ought personally to have been at head quarters long ago, and of which, the commander-in-chief complains.

SAMUEL HODGDON, Quartermaster.

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 1st, 1791.

SIR:

Your letter of the 25th has been received. Your bill, in favor of Major Craig, shall be paid; but, for all bills, estimates ought to be forwarded, in order that a judgment should be formed of the expenses, which seem to exceed the previous estimates. I hope in God that the troops may not have been detained at fort Pitt, for want of boats or any other thing in your department.

WAR DEPARTMENT, *December 26th, 1791.*H. KNOX, Secretary of War.Narrative of Mr. Thomas Rhea, who arrived at Pittsburg, from captivity, the 30th of June 1791.

On the 5th day of May, 1791, I was taken prisoner at a place called Cussawaga, and plundered of seven horses, by a party of five Indians, partly Delawares, partly Munsees, among whom was one called Captain Peter, a Munsee, and one called Jacob Philips, who both talk English; Philips is well known at Detroit as a Delaware.

They also took, at the same time, Cornelius Van Horne, and two horses, part of the above seven, and killed and scalped William Gregg. They proceeded with us to Sandusky, by the way of the mouth of Cayahoga river, and the Moravian town, which is evacuated, and the people moved beyond the Detroit river, to a spot near one Captain Elliott's, of the Indian department, where they have planted corn. We arrived at Sandusky the 12th day, which made it the 16th of May. At this town was a Captain Coon, with from one hundred and fifty to two hundred Indians, beside some war parties, who had brought in negroes, horses, and other property, also a white prisoner, who was left at a village seven miles up the Sandusky. During my stay at Sandusky, which was seven days, I was chiefly employed in planting corn; the eighth day, which was the 24th of May, an Indian came in with the news-halloo, and information that a large body of troops were discovered, moving, he said, towards the Miami towns, in three columns; on which the Indians were much alarmed, and immediately destroyed the corn which had been planted, burned their houses, and moved to the great crossing of the Miami or Ottawa river, called Roche-de-boon, where we arrived the fourth day. This made it the 28th of May. During the eight days I was at Sandusky, several war parties came in with prisoners and scalps. At this place, the Miami, were Colonels Brandt and McKee, with his son Thomas; and Captains Bunbury and Silvie, of the British troops. These officers, &c. were all encamped on the south side of the Miami, or Ottawa river, at the rapids above lake Erie, about eighteen miles; they had clever houses, built chiefly by the Pattawatamies and other Indians; in these they had stores of goods, with arms, ammunition, and provision, which they issued to the Indians in great abundance, viz: corn, pork, peas, &c. The Indians came to this place in parties of one, two, three, four, and five hundred at a time, from different quarters, and received from Mr. McKee, and the Indian officers, clothing, arms, ammunition, provision, &c. and set out immediately for the Upper Miami towns, where they understood the forces of the United States were bending their course, and in order to supply the Indians from other quarters collected there. Pirogues, loaded with the above mentioned articles, were sent up the Miami river, wrought by French Canadians. About the last of May, Captain Silvie purchased me from the Indians, and I staid with him at this place till the 4th of June, (the king's birth day) when I was sent to Detroit. Previous to leaving the Miami river, I saw one Mr. Dick, who, with his wife, was taken prisoner near Pittsburg, in the spring—I believe by the Wyandots. Mr. McKee was about purchasing Mr. Dick from the Indians, but found it difficult. Mrs. Dick was separated from him, and left at a village at some distance from this place. I also saw a young boy, named Brittle, who was taken in the spring, from near a mill, (Captain O'Hara's) near Pittsburg; his hair was cut, and he was dressed and armed for war; could not get speaking to him. About the 5th June, in the Detroit river, I met from sixty to one hundred canoes, in three parties, containing a large body of Indians, who appeared to be very wild and uncivilized; they were dressed chiefly in buffalo and other skin blankets, with other skin and other fur breech cloths, armed with bows, and arrows, and spears; they had no guns, and seemed to set no store by them, or know little of their use, nor had they any inclination to receive them, though offered to them. They said they were three moons on their way. The other Indians called them Mannitoos. About this time there was a field day of the troops at Detroit, which I think is from five to six hundred in number; the next day a field day of the French militia took place, and one hundred and fifty of the Canadians, with some others, turned out volunteers to join the Indians, and were to set off the 8th for the Miami village, with their own horses, after being plentifully supplied with arms and ammunition, clothing, and provision, &c. to fit them for the march. While I was at the Miami, or Ottawa river, as they call it, I had mentioned to Colonel McKee, and the other officers, that I had seen Colonel Procter, on his way to Fort Franklin; that I understood he was on his way to the Miami, or Sandusky, with some of the Senecas, and that he expected the Cornplanter would accompany him, in order to settle matters with the hostile nations; and that he expected to get shipping at Fort Erie, to bring him and these people to the Miami, or Sandusky, &c. That the officers, in their conversation with each other, said, if they were at fort Erie, he should get no shipping there, &c. That the Mohawks and other Indians, that could speak English, declare that if he, (meaning Colonel Procter) or any other Yankee messenger, came there, they should never carry messages back. This was frequently expressed by the Indians; and Simon Girty, and a certain Patt Hill, declared Procter should not return, if he had a hundred Senecas with him; and many other such threats were used, and every movement, appearance, and declaration, seemed hostile to the United States. And I understood that Colonel McKee, and the other officers, intended only to stay at the Miami till they had furnished the war parties of Indians with the necessaries mentioned above, to fit them for war, and then would return to Detroit. That Elliott had returned to Detroit, and Simon Girty, and that Girty declared he would go and join the Indians, and that Captain Elliott told him he was going the next day, with a boat load of goods, for the Indians, and that Girty might have a passage with him. That, on the 7th of June, the ship Dunmore sailed for fort Erie, in which I got a passage. We arrived there in four days. About the 12th June, I saw taken into this vessel, a number of cannon, eighteen-pounders, with other military stores, and better than two companies of artillery troops, destined, as I understood, for Detroit and the upper posts; some of the artillery-men had to remain behind, for want of room in the vessel. I have just recollected that, while I was at the Ottawa river, I saw a party of warriors come in with the arms, accoutrements, clothing, &c. of a sergeant, corporal, (and they said) twelve men, whom they had killed in some of the lower posts on the Ohio; that a man of the Indian department offered me a coat, which had a number of bullet and other holes in it, and was all bloody, which I refused to take, and Colonel McKee then ordered me clothes out of the Indian store.

Statement relative to the Frontiers Northwest of the Ohio.

In obedience to the commands of the President of the United States, the Secretary of War respectfully submits the following statement relatively to the frontiers northwest of the Ohio; and also a plan of such further measures as the existing state of affairs, and the national interest, seem to require. That, in order to obtain a general knowledge of this subject, it would be proper to review, in a summary manner, the conduct which the United States have observed to the neighboring Indian tribes, both during the late war, and since the peace with Great Britain. This inquiry seems necessary, to enable the mind to form a judgment how far a further prosecution of hostilities against the Indians would comport with that justice and dignity, which ought to be the pride and ornament of every free government.

That it will appear by the journals of Congress, in the earliest stages of the late war, how solicitous the United States were to live upon terms of peace and friendship with all the bordering Indian tribes.

That, although the public endeavors were then unsuccessful in preventing the depredations which desolated the frontiers, from Georgia to Canada, yet, as soon as circumstances would permit, those endeavors were revived, with great ardor and better effect.

That, in the year 1784, a treaty was formed with the hostile part of the Six Nations, at fort Stanwix.

That, in the commencement of the year 1785, a treaty was formed at fort McIntosh, with the Wyandots, Delawares, Ottawas, and Chippewas; that, during the same year, treaties were formed at Hopewell, on the Keowee, with the Cherokees, Chickasaws, and Choctaws, to the southward: and that, in the early part of the year 1786, a treaty was formed with the Shawanese, at the mouth of the Great Miami of the Ohio.

That it appears that certain malignant and turbulent characters excited uneasiness and complaints among some of the Northern and Western Indians, against the said treaties of fort Stanwix and fort McIntosh.

That it appears that Congress, in order to accommodate all differences satisfactorily to the said Northern and Western Indians, did, in 1788, direct that another treaty should be held, to which all the said Indians should be invited.

That a new treaty was accordingly held and concluded at fort Harmar, in January, 1789, with a representation of all the Six Nations, the Mohawks excepted, and with the representatives of the Wyandot, Delaware, Ottawa, Chippewa, Pattiwatima, and Sac nations, in which nearly the same boundaries, stipulated by the prior treaties, were recognised and confirmed. That it is, however, to be understood, that, although the Miami and Wabash Indians were invited to this treaty, they did not attend. That, notwithstanding the said Wabash and Miami Indians, with certain other banditti, formed of the remnants of the Shawanese, with some outcast Cherokees, still continued their depredations, they were warned, by directions of the President of the United States, to abstain from any further violence, and invited to repair to a place appointed by the Governor of the Western territory, in order to adjust all differences, in an amicable manner. At the same time, the people of Kentucky, who, in consequence of repeated depredations, were meditating a blow against the said Indians, were prohibited from crossing the Ohio.

That the invitations of the United States, which were delivered to all the tribes residing upon the river Wabash, and the Miami towns, were treated not only with neglect, but outrages were renewed with still greater violence than ever, and, in some of their towns, the most shocking cruelties were exercised upon their prisoners. In this state of things, it became necessary to make an experiment of the effect of coercion. Accordingly, the operation under Brigadier General Harmar was directed, but without having the desired success. A larger force was raised for the year 1791, and the command thereof given to Major General St. Clair, to be employed (all other means failing) to bring the said Indians to a just sense of their situation.

That pacific measures were attempted, and strong assurances given, through the Cornplanter, an influential chief of the Six Nations; by the intended mission of Colonel Procter; and the instructions to General St. Clair; that we wanted nothing from them but peace, and were disposed to do them strict justice. But, being unable to succeed in this object, and the event of this expedition having also proved unfortunate, it may be proper to inquire into its object, the cause of its failure, and the probable consequences thereof.

It will appear, by a reference to report A, which accompanies this report, that the great object of the late campaign was to establish a strong military post at the Miami village, lying upon the river of that name, which communicates with lake Erie; and that subordinate posts were also to be erected, as well on the Wabash as on the said river Miami.

That, by an examination of the position of the said Miami village, and its contiguity to, or connexion with, the waters of the river St. Joseph's of Lake Michigan, and the river Illinois, and thereby the Mississippi; the Wabash, and, thereby, with the Ohio; the Miami, and, thereby, lake Erie; its short distance from the Miami of the Ohio, which, at times, may afford considerable facility to transportation; it will appear that the said position, with its proper communications, is greatly superior to any other, in order to serve as a barrier to protect essentially a frontier of upwards of eleven hundred miles, stretching from the upper parts of the Alleghany to the lower parts of the Ohio.

That it was intended to garrison the said post at the Miami village and its communications with one thousand or twelve hundred troops, and have it always well stored with provisions, &c. That, from the said number, a detachment generally might be spared, of sufficient magnitude to chastise any of the neighboring villages or tribes, separately, who might have dared to commit depredations; or be a place to which mounted militia might suddenly repair, draw supplies, and act in conjunction, in case of a combination of the several towns or tribes in acts of hostility.

That, by having such a force, so circumstanced, and always in readiness to fall upon the refractory tribes, it was conceived that it would awe, and mostly, if not entirely, restrain, any further depredations.

That the principal causes of the failure of the expedition appear to have been as follows: 1st. The deficient number of good troops, according to the expectation, in the early part of the year. 2d. Their want of sufficient discipline, according to the nature of the service. 3d. The lateness of the season.

That these several causes are explained in the aforesaid collateral papers accompanying the report A.

That, in addition thereto, another cause may be added, which was not originally estimated, to wit: an increased number of Indians: for information has been received, by three separate channels, that the Indian warriors who opposed our army may be estimated at a number somewhere about three thousand.

The hostile Indians were before estimated at twelve hundred, and to them it was possible might be added the Wyandots, Delawares, and Pattiwatimies, in all amounting to about one thousand more. The excess of these two numbers probably came from the waters of lakes Superior, Michigan, and Huron, and are denominated Ottawas and Chippewas.

That, in contemplating the probable consequences of the late defeat, the situation of the Southern tribes deserves consideration. The number of warriors of the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Cherokees, are about fifteen thousand. The hostile Indians can easily, and will, probably, repeat their invitations to the Southern tribes during the present winter. It is true, the United States have treaties with all the Southern tribes, and that all of them appear at present tranquil, except the Creeks.

This nation has lately had disturbances excited among them by an adventurer of the name of Bowles, who has acquired a sufficient influence to prevent the boundary being marked, agreeably to the treaty.

It is at present difficult to conjecture the turn which Bowles' interference at this crisis may give to the affairs of the Southern frontier.

But, although the United States have treaties with the Southern tribes, yet, it is to be remembered, that the flames of war have been but recently extinguished with the Creeks and Cherokees.

That the new peace is irksome, not only to the young warriors, whose education and habits make them pant ardently for war, but also to a number of malignant whites, who either reside among the Indians or upon our frontiers, and who are, from some sinister motives, ever desirous of confusion.

That the emissaries of the hostile Indians will be disseminated among all the Southern tribes. Councils will be held, and the passions of the young men will be inflamed with the tales of prowess and glory acquired by the hostile Indians. If these ideas be just, it may become extremely difficult, if not impracticable, to restrain the young warriors of the south from aiding directly or collaterally with the hostile Indians of the West.

To the danger of the Southern tribes joining the hostile Indians, may be added the danger from part of the Northern, or Six Nations. The danger from the latter, however, is far less than from the former; and, besides, is under circumstances more manageable.

These circumstances are mentioned in this place as evils which will probably spring out of the late disasters, and for which a remedy will be mentioned hereafter.

Hence, it will appear that an Indian war, of considerable extent, has been excited, not only contrary to the interests and intention of the General Government, but by means altogether without its control.

That it is the public interest to terminate this disagreeable war, as speedily as possible, cannot be doubted; and it will be important to devise and execute the best means to effect that end. That, upon due deliberation, it will appear that it is by an ample conviction of our superior force only, that the Indians can be brought to listen to the dictates of peace, which have been sincerely and repeatedly offered to them. The pride of victory is too strong at present for them to receive the offers of peace on reasonable terms. They would probably insist upon a relinquishment of territory, to which they have no just claim, and which has been confirmed by the several before recited treaties.

The United States could not make this relinquishment, under present circumstances, consistently with a proper regard to national character.

But, considering the dignity and superior intelligence, as well as power of the United States, compared with the said Indian tribes; weighing the probable opinion of the disinterested, but perhaps uninformed part of mankind upon this subject, who may be apt to consider the Indians as oppressed, it is submitted, that every reasonable expedient be again taken to induce the said hostile Indians to peace, that the nature of the case, and a just regard to the national reputation, will admit. But, at the same time, it is suggested, that it would be altogether improper to expect any favorable result from such expedients.

That the United States, having a frontier of immense extent, surrounded by barbarous Indians, are bound, by all the sacred obligations of sovereignty, to protect effectually their exposed citizens against the cruel inroads of such an enemy.

That defensive measures only, in the present case, appear utterly inadequate to such protection, but that it would require a strong coercive force.

That previously, however, to any conclusion upon the policy of raising such a force, it may be necessary to examine whether the prosecution of the war with the Indians is supported by the principles of justice.

It will appear clearly, by a recurrence to the severally before-recited treaties, and the documents relatively thereto, that neither the Miami, Wabash, or banditti Indians, composed of some Shawanese and outcast Cherokees, had, or have, any just claim to the land contained within the boundaries recapitulated and confirmed by the treaty of Fort Harmar, in January, 1789. Nor does it appear, by any information possessed by the subscriber, that any such claim has been urged by the said Wabash, Miami, or banditti Indians.

That, instead of a claim of boundaries, it will appear that the source of the present hostilities originated in the war with Great Britain; and that the said hostilities have continued, in different degrees, from that to the present time, and that, in no instance, have we passed the boundaries ascertained by the aforesaid treaties; that ever since the peace with Great Britain, there has been an unceasing train of depredations upon the frontiers lying along the Ohio; that these have generally been committed by the Wabash and Miami Indians and the aforesaid banditti; that the plunder and trophies acquired (generally with impunity) by the said Indians, have gradually drawn the other neighboring tribes, who had formed treaties with us, into a participation of the sweets and guilt of their incursions.

Hence it would appear, that the principles of justice as well as policy, and, it may be added, the principles of economy, all combine to dictate, that an adequate military force should be raised as soon as possible, placed upon the frontiers, and disciplined according to the nature of the service, in order to meet, with a prospect of success, the greatest probable combination of the Indian enemy.

Although the precise manner in which the force to be raised should be employed, cannot be pointed out with propriety at this time, as it will depend on the circumstances of the moment, yet it may not be improper to observe, that, upon a review of the merits of the main object of the late campaign, to wit: the establishment of a strong military post at the Miami village, with the necessary posts of communication, the necessity and propriety thereof remain the same; that this necessity will probably continue until we shall be possessed of the posts upon Lake Michigan, of Detroit, and Niagara, withheld from us by Great Britain, contrary to treaty. Without remarking upon the principles of this conduct, it may be observed generally, that every arrangement in the power of the United States, for establishing the tranquillity of the frontiers, will be inferior to the possession of said posts. That it is, however, considered, that, if the said posts were in our possession, we ought also to have a strong post at the Miami village, in order to render the protection effectual, and that the posts above-mentioned will require garrisons whensoever they shall be given up.

The subscriber having deliberately contemplated the present state of affairs upon the frontiers, from the south to the north, having recurred to the past in order to estimate the probable future events, finds himself constrained, by his public duty, although with great reluctance, to state, as the result of his judgment, that the public service requires an increase of the military force, according to the following arrangement:

THE PLAN.

That the military establishment of the United States shall, during the pleasure of Congress, consist of five thousand one hundred and sixty-eight non-commissioned, privates, and musicians.

That the said non-commissioned officers and privates shall be enlisted to serve three years, unless sooner discharged.

That the pay of the said non-commissioned and privates shall be as follows, clear of all deductions, to wit:

A sergeant-major and quartermaster sergeant to each battalion,	- - -	$6 per month.
A sergeant and chief musician, each,	- - -	5 do
Corporal,	- - -	4 do
Private,	- - -	3 do
Musician,	- - -	3 do

That the said troops be organized as follows:

One squadron of cavalry, of four troops, each of 76 non-commissioned and privates,	- - -	304
It should be a stipulation in the engagements of these men, that they should serve on foot whenever the service requires the measure.
One battalion of artillery, of four companies each, to consist of 76 non-commissioned and privates,	- - -	304
Each company of artillery to have, as part of its composition, ten artificers each, including the pay of artillerists to have 10 dollars per month.
Five regiments of infantry, one of which to be riflemen entirely, each of three battalions; each battalion of four companies; each company of 76 non-commissioned and privates; amounting, for each regiment, to 912,	- - -	4,560
		5,168

The annual expense of pay, clothing, subsistence, and forage, for such an army, according to the estimate hereto annexed:

No. 1 would be	- - -	$782,197 42
That for the extraordinary expense of equipments, transportation, &c. for the campaign, would amount, as per estimate No. 2, to	- - -	244,279 63
		$1,026,477 5
That from these sums are to be deducted for appropriations to the War Department, for the year 1792,	- - -	350,526 97
		Balance, - - - $675,950 8

That, in addition to the foregoing arrangement, it would be proper that the President of the United States should be authorized, besides the employment of militia, to take such measures, for the defensive protection of the exposed parts of the frontiers, by calling into service expert woodsmen, as patrols or scouts, upon such terms as he may judge proper. That he be further authorized, in case he should deem the measure expedient, to engage mounted militia for defensive operations, for such time, and on such terms, as he may judge equitable. That he be further authorized, in case he should deem the measure expedient, to employ a body of Indians belonging to tribes in alliance with the United States, to act against the hostile Indians; and that he be authorized to stipulate such terms as he shall judge right.

That it does not seem essential, at this time, that there should be any special appropriations for the defensive protection, the mounted militia, or the employment of Indians, although the actual expenses for those objects may amount to considerable sums, because the estimates, before mentioned, comprehend the entire expense, for one year, of the proposed establishment as complete. But, let the exertions to complete it be ever so great, yet it is probable a deficiency will exist, which will of course occasion a less expense. The moneys, therefore, which may be appropriated to the establishment, and not expended, may be applied to the extra objects above mentioned. If, however, there should be a deficiency, it may hereafter be provided for. That the nett pay of the private soldier, at present, free of all deductions, is two dollars per month. But, as the experience of the recruiting service, of the present year, evinces that the inducement is insufficient, it seems necessary to raise the pay to three dollars per month, free of all deductions; and the non-commissioned officers in proportion. The rifle corps will require more. But whether, under present circumstances, even the additional pay, and an extension of bounty to eight dollars, would give such an impulse to the recruiting service, as to fill the battalions immediately, remains to be tried. Nothing has been said upon an increased pay to the commissioned officers, because a memorial upon that subject has been presented to Congress. But it cannot be doubted that a small increase would be highly grateful to the officers, and probably beneficial to the service. The mounted militia is suggested to be used during the preparation for the main expedition, (and afterwards, if circumstances should render it indispensable.) The effect of such desultory operations upon the Indians will, by occupying them for their own safety, and that of their families, prevent their spreading terror and destruction along the frontiers. These sort of expeditions had that precise effect during the last season, and Kentucky enjoyed more repose, and sustained less injury, than for any year since the war with Great Britain. This single effect, independent of the injury done to the force of the Indians, is worth greatly more than the actual expense of such expeditions. But, while it is acknowledged that mounted militia may be very proper for sudden enterprises, of short duration, it is conceived that militia are utterly unsuitable to carry on and terminate the war in which we are engaged, with honor and success. And besides, it would be ruinous to the purposes of husbandry, to keep them out long, if it were practicable to accomplish it. Good troops, enlisted for a considerable period, armed and well disciplined in a suitable manner, for the nature of the service, will be equal, individually, to the best militia; but, when it is considered to these qualities are added, the obedience, the patience, the promptness, the economy of discipline, and the inestimable value of good officers, possessing a proper pride of reputation, the comparison no longer holds, and disciplined troops attain in the mind, and in actual execution, that ascendancy over the militia, which is the result of a just comparative view of their relative force, and the experience of all nations and ages. The expediency of employing the Indians in alliance with us, against the hostile Indians, cannot be doubted. It has been shown before, how difficult, and even impracticable, it will probably be, to restrain the young men of the friendly tribes from action, and that, if we do not employ them, they will be employed against us. The justice of engaging them would depend upon the justice of the war. If the war be just on our part, it will certainly bear the test of examination, to use the same sort of means in our defence, as are used against us. The subscriber, therefore, submits it as his opinion, that it would be proper to employ judiciously, as to time and circumstances, as many of the friendly Indians as may be obtained, not exceeding one thousand in number.

All which is submitted to the President of the United States.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

CHEROKEES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 18, 1792.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I lay before you the communications of a deputation from the Cherokee nation of Indians, now in this city, (Philadelphia) and I request your advice whether an additional article shall be made to the Cherokee treaty, to the following effect, to wit:

That the sum to be paid annually by the United States to the Cherokee nation of Indians, in consideration of the relinquishment of lands, as stated in the treaty made with them on the second day of July, 1791, shall be one thousand five hundred dollars, instead of one thousand dollars, mentioned in the said treaty.

UNITED STATES, January 18, 1792.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

On the 20th January, it was

Resolved, Two-thirds of the Senators present concurring, that they advise and consent to the additional article in the form above proposed.

The following Cherokee chiefs and warriors arrived at Philadelphia on the 28th of December, 1791, by the way of Charleston, South Carolina, bringing with them evidence from Governor Pinckney and General Pickens, of the authenticity of their mission, to wit:

NENETOYAH, or Bloody Fellow,
CHUTLOH, or King Fisher,
NONTUAKA, or the Northward,
TEESTEKE, or the Disturber,
KUTHAGUSTA, or the Prince,
GEORGE MILLER, and
JAMES CAREY, Interpreter.

Having been clothed, they were, on the 4th of January, 1792, introduced to the President of the United States, who desired them to communicate their business to the Secretary of War. They were assembled for this purpose, at his house, on the fifth, when the Secretary of War addressed them in the following manner—(Colonel Thomas Procter and Constant Freeman, being present, besides James Carey, and a young Indian warrior named George Miller, who jointly acted as interpreters.)

CHIEFS AND WARRIORS OF THE CHEROKEE NATION:

As you are now recovered from the fatigues of your long journey and voyage, we will proceed to business. But before you mention the objects of your journey, it is proper that I should inform you, that the President of the United States gives you a hearty welcome to this city. He has commanded me to assure you, that your arrival makes him glad; that he will kindly hear every thing you have to say; and he hopes that you will open your hearts fully, and conceal nothing from him, as it is his desire that the white and red people should become one people, and live together like brothers, on the same land. Speak, therefore, without reserve: for you speak to your real friends.

THURSDAY, January 5th.Conference of the Chiefs of the Cherokee nation with the Secretary of War.

BLOODY FELLOW.—I am come a long journey, by the direction of my whole nation, and others our neighbors, to take the President of the United States and yourself by the arm. But I am not prepared at present, to make a full communication of my business. One of the councillors is sick, and left behind. I cannot, therefore, before the next day after the morrow, Saturday, make you acquainted with my particular business.

It was the wish of my nation, when I left it, that all speeches, both on their part, and the answers thereto by the President of the United States or yourself, should be committed to writing and transmitted to them.

I will explain myself fully, agreeably to the desire of my nation, and I hope so fully to your and their satisfaction, that an everlasting white cloud will be over them.

[The Bloody Fellow then presented the Secretary of War with two silver medals.

These medals were presented by Colonel Martin, about four or five years ago, but as some disturbances have since happened, they are now returned, to obtain others from the United States. Medals are valuable to the Cherokees, and when accompanied with speeches, are monuments of friendship to their nation.

As the Bloody Fellow and the other chiefs had [nothing more to communicate on this day, it was agreed that they should again meet at the house of the Secretary of War, at 11 o'clock on Saturday morning.]

SATURDAY, 7th January.

BLOODY FELLOW.—On Thursday last, I was not prepared to enter upon business, as one of the chiefs was then sick. I am now desirous of entering upon business.

About two years ago, Nontuaka was chosen by his nation to go to New York, to the great beloved man, at the great white house. When he was there, he had not a good interpreter, and not well understanding the English language, he could not receive so much advantage from his journey as his nation expected. When he returned, the whole nation was assembled, and were disposed to enter upon the business of peace between them and the United States.

I shall now enter upon the business in behalf of my own and other nations.

[The Bloody Fellow then produced a string of white wampum, which he held in his hand until the business of the day was finished.]

I wish you, if you are not already, to be made acquainted with the use and value of these beads, which, among the Cherokees, answer the same purpose as letters with you, and are held in the highest estimation.

George Miller, one of our own people, has been brought to attend this treaty, both as a witness, and that he might assist the interpreter in explaining our talks, as he understands the English language.

It was early in the summer, soon after the treaty with Governor Blount, that the whole Cherokee nation was assembled, and we delegated on this treaty. The whole nation were assembled at the great beloved town, Estanaloee, (on the waters of the Mobile) when it was agreed on to send an embassy to Philadelphia, to see the President of the United States and yourself.

The talks to Nontuaka, delivered by the President and you, are now in the beloved town, Estanaloee, and these talks have induced us to come to this place. In these talks, you informed us, that, as North Carolina had not joined the Union, our business could not be attended to. But, as that State has since joined, we hope our business may be now accomplished.

Before I left my nation, it was determined that a stop should be put to the further effusion of blood, and that they should take the United States by the arm with a warm heart.

The talk which I am now delivering to you, is the talk of the beloved men of my nation, with a desire that their children might grow up on the land in peace, and this is the talk of our beloved men.

Among us, we have two kings to look up to, but you have only one; who, we hope, will extend his eye over all, both red and white. We have put ourselves under the protection of the United States, and from them only do we expect justice, and we wish to become as one people. We wish our talks may be attended to, and we have that justice which is the portion of all.

We remember the talks of our forefathers, who told us of the first coming of the white people over the great waters; that they were few in number, and settled on the lands of the red people; they have now become so numerous as to be able to overpower them; but we still expect we shall have justice done us.

Last summer we received talks from Governor Blount, informing us that he was authorized to hold a treaty with us; we accordingly repaired to the place appointed.

When we left our country, we all rejoiced in the expectation of having something done for us in regard to our lands, but when we arrived at the treaty ground, we were sorry to find it was not the case.

Very soon after we opened our business, Governor Blount informed us that he was authorized by Congress, to purchase our lands of us, which being contrary to our expectations, afflicted us exceedingly.

When I found Governor Blount wanted to purchase our lands, I told him that I loved my lands, and would not part with them; that I came there not to treat of selling land, but on public business of friendship between the white and red people. I tell you truly what I said to Governor Blount, and I am come to ask of you whether he was authorized to purchase our lands.

We remained seven days at the place of treaty on this business, and Governor Blount still urging us to sell our lands, the thoughts of which made tears to come into my eyes daily.

On the seventh day, finding Governor Blount still urging the sale of lands, I told him I was desirous of going to General Washington and Congress, to see whether I could not obtain better satisfaction; to which Governor Blount replied, that he was fully authorized for the purpose, therefore, it would be unnecessary for any Indians to go.

I however persevered in my wishes to go to Philadelphia; when Governor Blount asked me whether I had money to defray the expenses of my journey; this struck me forcibly, and reflecting that our people, young and old, were in his power, I then told him that, if he would not demand so much land of us, we would give him a small piece, without any consideration whatever, if he would let us and our children return to our own country in peace and safety.

In answer to this, Governor Blount told me he had goods in his house to pay for the lands, besides which, one thousand dollars should be paid yearly. I told him that I would not think of taking it; that it would not buy a breech clout for each of my nation.

When the treaty was first fully opened, Governor Blount asked of us lands at the Muscle Shoals; I told him that we could not give them up, as they were not clearly our property, but belonged to the four nations, and were the common hunting grounds for them.

Governor Blount told me that he had already purchased these lands of the State of Georgia, but was desirous of making a fuller purchase of our nation. That he intended to erect store houses on these lands, from which we could be supplied with goods, and smiths' shops, where our guns could be repaired.

After which, Governor Blount proposed a line upon the upper parts of the Tennessee, to go from that river upon a ridge, which divides the waters of Nine-mile creek from Little river. This line I also refused.

Governor Blount then proposed another line, at the fork below Chota, to run to the aforesaid ridge, which he said he wanted to settle on himself, for the purpose of being near our nation, and that he might more readily confer with us on public business, and he said none others than himself should settle there. The fork I rejected.

Governor Blount said he would quit the fork, but wished that the line might be on the aforesaid ridge, which divides the waters of the Tennessee from those of Little river, and that this line should be a lasting line, in order to divide the white from the red people. On which I complained to him that the white people had settled on our lands there without our permission.

After a good deal of dispute with Governor Blount, I proposed that, from the fork down of the Long island of Holston, should be the boundary, (he having before mentioned a water course) but he still insisted upon the ridge before mentioned, observing that the game on that ground was all destroyed, the land settled, and, therefore, could be of no use to us.

As Governor Blount still insisted upon the before mentioned line, I asked him whether the handful of goods was all he meant to give us for the lands, and if so, it was nothing equal to the value of them. To which Governor Blount replied, that the few goods he had were not intended to pay for the lands, but as presents; the yearly payment of one thousand dollars was to pay for the lands.

It is my desire that you should understand, that John Watts and myself were the principal speakers at the treaty, being appointed for that purpose by our nation. That we repeatedly told Governor Blount that we considered the sum of one thousand dollars per year as too small a price for our lands; and not near as much as Mr. McGillivray had obtained for a worse tract. He replied that he was not authorized to offer more, but that he would write to Congress upon the subject; and let us know whether more would be granted.

John Watts told Governor Blount, that he knew the North Carolina people to be headstrong; and that they had, under the sanction of a flag of truce, laid his uncle, The Old Corn Tassel, low; it was therefore in vain to contend about a line at this time, as he knew that they would have their own way, and that they would not observe the orders of Congress or any body else.

Watts further told Governor Blount, that he wondered that he should be appointed for this business, being a North Carolinian; but, that he would, notwithstanding, make him an offer of a line. Whenever you North Carolinians make a line, you tell us it shall be a standing one; but you are always encroaching upon it; and, therefore, we cannot depend upon what you say.

Governor Blount replied to Watts, that these lands, on the lines now contested, were taken from the Cherokees in time of war, and that he did not, therefore, consider the settlements made on them as encroachments. This is all that Watts said upon the subject. He told me, privately, that the death of his uncle so affected him, that he could not speak any more, and desired me to finish the business.

After Watts retired, Governor Blount repeated to me the observation about the country's having been conquered; he told me that I knew the Americans had driven the English out of the country, and that the land had been purchased with American blood. On this I observed, that, although it was true the English were driven from the country, they had come a great way to fight the Americans, and that the Americans had been assisted in this war by the French; that no good purpose could be answered by bringing them up now, and therefore such things ought to be buried forever.

[The Bloody Fellow, and the other Chiefs, then agreed to meet again at the Secretary's house, on Monday, the 9th instant, at noon.]

MONDAY, January 9th.

THE BLOODY FELLOW.—I shall explain myself fully, and hide nothing from you.

When we were assembled at Estanaloe, before we left our nation, as I mentioned the other day, just as we began our business, arrived Chinabee, the chief of the Natchez, and one of the Creek nation; we were glad that he arrived at that moment, as he was sent by his nation. He spoke to us and said, that he was glad to find us assembled, as he was sent by the chiefs of his nation with a talk to the President, recommending to him the chiefs of the Cherokees who should go to Philadelphia.

He said, we are near neighbors, and ought to be as one people. We have been to Congress and settled our business to our satisfaction; but you have still a deficiency; go then to Congress, and have your affairs settled, as ours are.

He further desired us to believe what the President should say to us, and that he would attend to us, because we were recommended by him, (Chinabee) so that our children might grow up in peace, and that the red and white people should hereafter be as one. Chinabee also said, I look upon the Cherokees as our elder brothers. I judge that they will be fully satisfied with the success of their journey; that, upon their return, I shall hear all this in a talk from them, and I shall come for that purpose.

[CREEKS.—Chinabee desired, particularly, that we should say that Bowles' arrival had excited disturbances in the minds of the Creeks, who wished to know, from General Washington, what authority Bowles had for this conduct. That this answer was earnestly requested upon our return, in order that the Creeks might know how to conduct themselves against Bowles in the affair. This is an important point, on which we desire full information. This is all the talk from the Creeks. And, as a proof of the truth of it, we give you a string of beads from them, in token of their friendship.

[The Bloody Fellow then presented the Secretary of War with a single string of white wampum.]

[CHICKASAWS AND CHOCTAWS.]—Hear now the talk from the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations. This talk was brought by Chenowie, and another Chickasaw, and two Choctaws, who came together to Tatokie, or the Town of the Springs, below Chickamauga, on the Tennessee, in the month of September last. They said:

"We were sorry, our elder brothers, that we could not come while you were sitting upon business with Governor Blount, but we were informed of the matter too late. But understanding that you are about setting out for General Washington, we desire that he would hear what you should say in our behalf, and, on your return, we will again attend upon you to learn the news.

"Tell General Washington, that the Carolina people ought not to be appointed to hold talks with the Indians, as they always ask for lands; and that we desire a person to be appointed by him who will not ask for our lands, but do justice, both to the white and red people. We have proved that we have regarded General Washington's words; and we now desire that he will make the white people equally quiet, and not breed disturbances."

Here ends the talk of the Chickasaws and Choctaws, which is confirmed by this string of beads. [The Bloody Fellow then presented a string of white wampum, and said,]

When Nontuaka returned from General Washington, two years ago, he sent good talks to all the nations, of the kindness with which he was treated, and of the intentions of General Washington to do justice to the red people about their lands. We hope General Washington has not forgotten the good talks to Nontuaka; we desire nothing more.

Having now fully explained my business, I will tell you what our beloved men and warriors told us when we left our country.

They told us to make haste, to finish our business, and to return as soon as possible, so that by fully informing them of the good dispositions of General Washington, measures might be taken to restrain the young warriors, whose minds are greatly disturbed by the proceedings of last summer.

THE KING FISHER.—We have fully explained every thing; I am a witness to it. I hope all things will be finished well. I have never been for shedding the blood of our elder brothers, and I hope we shall always live in peace and friendship.

THE BLOODY FELLOW.—We now mention a small circumstance for your consideration; a young man, of the name of George, who is now with us, and who served your troops, has complained to us that he never received any pay; think of this.

We earnestly entreat that General Washington would now send a man with us who shall protect us in our lands, and be our friend; and who will explain all things, and at all times. He shall reside with us, and we will take care of him. If two men were now to be sent, it would be better than one.

NONTUAKA.—I have attended to the talks of the President, delivered two years ago, in New York, and, always believing in his words, I have persuaded our warriors to repair again to the President, knowing we should have justice done us fully, and it makes my heart glad to find myself under the roof of my friend, who treated me so kindly when in New York.

We are now here, and have explained ourselves upon our business. I hope all things will be done to our satisfaction, and that we shall be sent away with the good news, so that all our people may be made glad upon our return home.

[The chiefs having thus explained themselves, it was agreed that they should meet the Secretary of War, at his house, on Wednesday, the 11th instant, to receive his answer.]

WEDNESDAY, 11th January.

The Secretary of War addressed the chiefs and warriors of the Cherokee nation, as follows:

BROTHERS: I am heartily glad that you have disburthened your hearts in your own way; because I am sure, when the red people see the hearts of the great chief, General Washington, and the Congress, that we should become as one people, each living in peace and safety with our families.

You have mentioned some uneasiness about the treaty with Governor Blount; but the President, and the Senate of the United States, who are his council on this business, believing that this treaty was a good and satisfactory treaty, as well for the red as the white people, have confirmed it, printed it as you here see, and it has become the law of the land; and, if any bad white people should encroach upon your grounds, or do any thing contrary to that treaty, they would be immediately punished.

It is therefore for your good that the treaty should be punctually complied with in all its parts, as well by you as by us. Perhaps you may not clearly understand some parts of the treaty; if so, speak, for we wish to remove all possible causes of difference, and obstacles to our becoming one people.

BLOODY FELLOW, in reply.—What you have said is true and just; and you shall now hear all I have to say, so that nothing may hereafter lay heavy upon the hearts, either of the red or white people.

I have heard your talk with satisfaction, but I am afraid every thing has not been fully explained from the treaty ground. I have considered well on our business, and shall unfold all to you.

We are now together upon important business to us; I wish, therefore, to see the line Governor Blount has mentioned to you.

[A map was accordingly produced, with the lines mentioned thereon, to which no material objection was made, as it was stated that the lines were to be run by commissioners from each side.]

BLOODY FELLOW.—At the time of the treaty, we objected to giving up so much land; but, for the sake of peace and quietness, we did it. But we object to the little money given for so much land. We request, therefore, that something further may be done in this matter, so that all our people may be quiet in their minds.

Instead of one thousand dollars a year for our lands, give us half as much more; that is, fifteen hundred dollars a year, and we shall be perfectly satisfied.

If this could be obtained for us, we do not require it in money, but in goods, bought in Philadelphia, where they are cheapest; and to be sent to General Pickens, by the way of Charleston.

We should be happy that our business could be soon finished, that we might take one year's goods with us; that you might send a man with us, so that you may learn the satisfaction which we shall spread on our return.

The treaty mentions ploughs, hoes, cattle, and other things for a farm; this is what we want; game is going fast away from among us. We must plant corn and raise cattle, and we desire you to assist us. If these things could be sent us the next season, it would be a great service to us.

We wish you to attend to this point. In former times we bought of the traders goods cheap; we could then clothe our women and children; but now game is scarce and goods dear, we cannot live comfortably. We desire the United States to regulate this matter.

I shall now speak upon a point of great importance. The ridge, which divides the waters of Little river from the Tennessee, is the boundary fixed by the treaty. But the white people are already over it, and their numbers have increased since the treaty. Remove these back, or our people will not be quiet. We speak strongly on this point.

We came to Philadelphia with our eyes full of tears. But since we have seen General Washington, and heard him speak through you, our tears are wiped away, and we rejoice in the prospect of our future welfare, under the protection of Congress.

Governor Blount spoke very much to us, that a trading house should be established at Bear creek, below the Muscle Shoals, on the Tennessee. We could not consent to this. After we returned home we talked among ourselves on this matter, and it would be very disagreeable to our nation. But we have heard that this matter is still going on. We desire that the man you send with us should prevent this settlement at the Muscle Shoals.

I have now explained all I had to say, and hid nothing from you.

I now speak of the private affairs of our party, who are now here. You will see that, being upon the business of our nation, we could not go a hunting, and, therefore, our families will be unclad, unless you will do it, and we hope you will.

All which is humbly submitted.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 17th January, 1792.

2d CONGRESS.]

No. 25.

[1st Session.]

SENECAS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 27, 1792.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the speeches of the Seneca Chief, Cornplanter, of the 9th December, 1790; 10th January, 7th February, and 17th March, 1791; made the following report:

That Oliver Phelps, of whom Cornplanter makes mention, produced some affidavits, and other papers, relating to the purchase of lands, made by him of the Indians, which your committee examined, and are of opinion that the said affidavits, and other papers, should be filed in the Secretary's office; and that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of this subject.

The following are the papers referred to:

The speech of the Cornplanter, Half-Town, and the Great-Tree, Chiefs and Councillors of the Seneca nation, to the Great Councillor of the Thirteen Fires.

FATHER:

The voice of the Seneca nation speaks to you, the great councillor, in whose heart the wise men of all the Thirteen Fires have placed their wisdom. It may be very small in your ears, and we therefore entreat you to hearken with attention: for we are about to speak of things which are to us very great. When your army entered the country of the Six Nations, we called you the Town Destroyer; and to this day, when that name is heard, our women look behind them and turn pale, and our children cling close to the necks of their mothers. Our councillors and warriors are men, and cannot be afraid; but their hearts are grieved with the fears of our women and children, and desire that it may be buried so deep as to be heard no more. When you gave us peace, we called you father, because you promised to secure us in the possession of our lands. Do this, and, so long as the lands shall remain, that beloved name will live in the heart of every Seneca.

FATHER: We mean to open our hearts before you, and we earnestly desire that you will let us clearly understand what you resolve to do. When our chiefs returned from the treaty at fort Stanwix, and laid before our council what had been done there, our nation was surprised to hear how great a country you had compelled them to give up to you, without your paying to us any thing for it. Every one said that your hearts were yet swelled with resentment against us for what had happened during the war, but that one day you would reconsider it with more kindness. We asked each other, What have we done to deserve such severe chastisement?

FATHER: When you kindled your thirteen fires separately, the wise men that assembled at them told us, that you were all brothers, the children of one great father, who regarded, also, the red people as his children. They called us brothers, and invited us to his protection; they told us that he resided beyond the great water, where the sun first rises; that he was a king whose power no people could resist, and that his goodness was bright as that sun. What they said went to our hearts; we accepted the invitation, and promised to obey him. What the Seneca nation promise, they faithfully perform; and when you refused obedience to that king, he commanded us to assist his beloved men in making you sober. In obeying him, we did no more than yourselves had led us to promise. The men who claimed this promise told us that you were children, and had no guns; that when they had shaken you, you would submit. We hearkened to them, and were deceived, until your army approached our towns. We were deceived; but your people, in teaching us to confide in that king, had helped to deceive us, and we now appeal to your heart—Is the blame all ours?

FATHER: When we saw that we were deceived, and heard the invitation which you gave us to draw near to the fire which you kindled, and talk with you concerning peace, we made haste toward it. You then told us that we were in your hand, and that, by closing it, you could crush us to nothing, and you demanded from us a great country, as the price of that peace which you had offered us; as if our want of strength had destroyed our rights. Our chiefs had felt your power, and were unable to contend against you, and they therefore gave up that country. What they agreed to, has bound our nation; but your anger against us must, by this time, be cooled; and, although our strength has not increased, nor your power become less, we ask you to consider calmly, Were the terms dictated to us by your commissioners reasonable and just?

FATHER: Your commissioners, when they drew the line which separated the land then given up to you from that which you agreed should remain to be ours, did most solemnly promise, that we should be secured in the peaceable possession of the lands which we inhabited east and north of that line. Does this promise bind you?

Hear now, we entreat you, what has since happened concerning that land. On the day in which we finished the treaty at fort Stanwix, commissioners from Pennsylvania told our chiefs that they had come there to purchase from us all the lands belonging to us, within the lines of their State, and they told us that their line would strike the river Susquehannah below Tioga branch. They then left us to consider of the bargain till the next day; on the next day we let them know that we were unwilling to sell all the lands within their State, and proposed to let them have a part of it, which we pointed out to them in their map. They told us that they must have the whole; that it was already ceded to them by the great king, at the time of making peace with you, and was their own; but they said that they would not take advantage of that, and were willing to pay us for it, after the manner of their ancestors. Our chiefs were unable to contend, at that time, and therefore they sold the lands up to the line, which was then shewn to them as the line of that State. What the commissioners had said about the land having been ceded to them at the peace, our chiefs considered as intended only to lessen the price, and they passed it by with very little notice; but, since that time, we have heard so much from others about the right to our lands, which the king gave when you made peace with him, that it is our earnest desire that you will tell us what it means.

FATHER: Our nation empowered John Livingston to let out part of our lands on rent, to be paid to us. He told us, that he was sent by Congress, to do this for us, and we fear he has deceived us in the writing he obtained from us: for, since the time of our giving that power, a man of the name of Phelps has come among us, and claimed our whole country northward of the line of Pennsylvania, under purchase from that Livingston, to whom, he said, he had paid twenty thousand dollars for it. He said, also, that he had bought, likewise, from the council of the Thirteen Fires, and paid them twenty thousand dollars more for the same. And he said, also, that it did not belong to us, for that the great king had ceded the whole of it, when you made peace with him. Thus he claimed the whole country north of Pennsylvania, and west of the lands belonging to the Cayugas. He demanded it; he insisted on his demand, and declared that he would have it all. It was impossible for us to grant him this, and we immediately refused it. After some days, he proposed to run a line, at a small distance eastward of our western boundary, which we also refused to agree to. He then threatened us with immediate war, if we did not comply.

Upon this threat, our chiefs held a council, and they agreed that no event of war could be worse than to be driven, with their wives and children, from the only country which we had any right to, and, therefore, weak as our nation was, they determined to take the chance of war, rather than submit to such unjust demands, which seemed to have no bounds. Street, the great trader at Niagara, was then with us, having come at the request of Phelps, and as he always professed to be our great friend, we consulted him on this subject. He also told us, that our lands had been ceded by the king, and that we must give them up.

Astonished at what we heard from every quarter, with hearts aching with compassion for our women and children, we were thus compelled to give up all our country north of the line of Pennsylvania and east of the Genesee river, up to the fork, and east of a south line drawn from that fork to the Pennsylvania line. For this land, Phelps agreed to pay us ten thousand dollars in hand, and one thousand dollars a year for ever. He paid us two thousand and five hundred dollars in hand, part of the ten thousand, and he sent for us to come last spring, to receive our money; but instead of paying us the remainder of the ten thousand dollars, and the one thousand dollars due for the first year, he offered us no more than five hundred dollars, and insisted that he had agreed with us for that sum, to be paid yearly. We debated with him for six days, during all which time he persisted in refusing to pay us our just demand, and he insisted that we should receive the five hundred dollars; and Street, from Niagara, also insisted on our receiving the money, as it was offered to us. The last reason he assigned for continuing to refuse paying us, was, that the king had ceded the lands to the Thirteen Fires, and that he had bought them from you, and paid you for them.

We could bear this confusion no longer, and determined to press through every difficulty, and lift up our voice that you might hear us, and to claim that security in the possession of our lands, which your commissioners so solemnly promised us. And we now entreat you to inquire into our complaints and redress our wrongs.

FATHER: Our writings were lodged in the hands of Street, of Niagara, as we supposed him to be our friend; but when we saw Phelps consulting with Street, on every occasion, we doubted of his honesty towards us, and we have since heard, that he was to receive for his endeavors to deceive us, a piece of land ten miles in width, west of the Genesee river, and near forty miles in length, extending to lake Ontario; and the lines of this tract have been run accordingly, although no part of it is within the bounds which limit his purchase. No doubt he meant to deceive us.

FATHER: You have said that we are in your hand, and that, by closing it, you could crush us to nothing. Are you determined to crush us? If you are, tell us so, that those of our nation who have become your children, and have determined to die so, may know what to do. In this case, one chief has said he would ask you to put him out of pain. Another, who will not think of dying by the hand of his father or of his brother, has said he will retire to the Chateaugay, eat of the fatal root, and sleep with his fathers in peace.

Before you determine on a measure so unjust, look up to God, who made us as well as you. We hope he will not permit you to destroy the whole of our nation.

FATHER: Hear our case; many nations inhabited this country; but they had no wisdom, and, therefore, they warred together. The Six Nations were powerful, and compelled them to peace; the lands, for a great extent, were given up to them; but the nations which were not destroyed, all continued on those lands, and claimed the protection of the Six Nations, as the brothers of their fathers. They were men, and when at peace, they had a right to live upon the earth. The French came among us, and built Niagara; they became our fathers, and took care of us. Sir William Johnston came and took that fort from the French; he became our father, and promised to take care of us, and did so, until you were too strong for his king. To him we gave four miles round Niagara, as a place of trade. We have already said, how we came to join against you; we saw that we were wrong; we wished for peace; you demanded a great country to be given up to you; it was surrendered to you, as the price of peace, and we ought to have peace and possession of the little land which you then left us.

FATHER: When that great country was given up, there were but few chiefs present, and they were compelled to give it up, and it is not the Six Nations only that reproach those chiefs with having given up that country. The Chippewas, and all the nations who lived on those lands westward, call to us, and ask us, Brothers of our fathers, where is the place which you have reserved for us to lie down upon?

FATHER: You have compelled us to do that which has made us ashamed. We have nothing to answer to the children of the brothers of our fathers. When, last spring, they called upon us to go to war, to secure them a bed to lie upon, the Senecas entreated them to be quiet, until we had spoken to you. But, on our way down, we heard that your army had gone toward the country which those nations inhabit, and if they meet together, the best blood on both sides will stain the ground.

FATHER: We will not conceal from you, that the great God, and not men, has preserved the Cornplanter from the hands of his own nation. For they ask, continually, Where is the land which our children, and their children after them, are to lie down upon? You told us, say they, that the line drawn from Pennsylvania to lake Ontario, would mark it forever on the east, and the line running from Beaver creek to Pennsylvania, would mark it on the west, and we see that it is not so: for, first one, and then another, come, and take it away, by order of that people which you tell us promised to secure it to us. He is silent, for he has nothing to answer.

When the sun goes down, he opens his heart before God, and earlier than that sun appears again upon the hills, he gives thanks for his protection during the night: for he feels that, among men, become desperate by their danger, it is God only that can preserve him. He loves peace, and all that he had in store, he has given to those who have been robbed by your people, lest they should plunder the innocent to repay themselves. The whole season which others have employed in providing for their families, he has spent in his endeavors to preserve peace; and, at this moment, his wife and children are lying on the ground, and in want of food; his heart is in pain for them, but he perceives that the great God will try his firmness, in doing what is right.

FATHER: The game which the Great Spirit sent into our country for us to eat, is going from among us. We thought he intended that we should till the ground with the plough, as the white people do, and we talked to one another about it. But before we speak to you concerning this, we must know from you whether you mean to leave us and our children any land to till. Speak plainly to us concerning this great business.

All the lands we have been speaking of belonged to the Six Nations; no part of it ever belonged to the King of England, and he could not give it to you. The land we live on, our fathers received from God, and they transmitted it to us, for our children, and we cannot part with it.

FATHER: We told you that we would open our hearts to you. Hear us once more.

At fort Stanwix, we agreed to deliver up those of our people who should do you any wrong, that you might try them, and punish them according to your law. We delivered up two men accordingly, but instead of trying them according to your law, the lowest of your people took them from your magistrate, and put them immediately to death. It is just to punish murder with death; but the Senecas will not deliver up their people to men who disregard the treaties of their own nation.

FATHER: Innocent men of our nation are killed one after another, and of our best families; but none of your people who have committed the murder have been punished. We recollect that you did not promise to punish those who killed our people, and we now ask, Was it intended that your people should kill the Senecas, and not only remain unpunished by you, but be protected by you against the revenge of the next of kin?

FATHER: These are to us very great things. We know that you are very strong, and we have heard that you are wise, and we wait to hear your answer to what we have said, that we may know that you are just.

The speech of the Cornplanter, Half-Town, and the Great-Tree, Chiefs of the Seneca nation, to the President of the United States of America.

FATHER:

Your speech, written on the great paper, is to us like the first light of the morning to a sick man, whose pulse beats too strongly in his temples, and prevents him from sleep. He sees it, and rejoices, but he is not cured.

You say that you have spoken plainly on the great point. That you will protect us in the lands secured to us at fort Stanwix, and that we have the right to sell or to refuse to sell it. This is very good. But our nation complain that you compelled us at that treaty to give up too much of our lands. We confess that our nation is bound by what was there done; and, acknowledging your power, we have now appealed to yourselves against that treaty, as made while you were too angry at us, and, therefore, unreasonable and unjust. To this you have given us no answer.

FATHER: That treaty was not made with a single State, it was with the thirteen States. We never would have given all that land to one State. We know it was before you had the great authority, and as you have more wisdom than the commissioners, who forced us into that treaty, we expect that you have also more regard to justice, and will now, at our request, reconsider that treaty, and restore to us a part of that land.

FATHER: The land which lies between the line running south from lake Erie to the boundary of Pennsylvania, as mentioned at the treaty at fort Stanwix, and the eastern boundary of the land which you sold, and the Senecas confirmed to Pennsylvania, is the land on which Half-Town and all his people live, with other chiefs, who always have been, and still are, dissatisfied with the treaty at fort Stanwix. They grew out of this land, and their fathers' fathers grew out of it, and they cannot be persuaded to part with it. We therefore entreat you to restore to us this little piece.

FATHER: Look at the land which we gave to you at that treaty, and then turn your eyes upon what we now ask you to restore to us, and you will see that what we now ask you to return is a very little piece. By giving it back again, you will satisfy the whole of our nation. The chiefs who signed that treaty will be in safety, and peace between your children and our children will continue so long as your land shall join to ours. Every man of our nation will then turn his eyes away from all the other lands which we then gave up to you, and forget that our fathers ever said that they belonged to them.

FATHER: We see that you ought to have the path at the carrying place from lake Erie to Niagara, as it was marked down at fort Stanwix, and we are all willing it should remain to be yours. And if you desire to reserve a passage through the Conewango, and through the Chataugue lake and land, for a path from that lake to lake Erie, take it where you best like. Our nation will rejoice to see it an open path for you and your children while the land and water remain. But let us also pass along the same way, and continue to take the fish of those waters in common with you.

FATHER: You say that you will appoint an agent to take care of us. Let him come and take care of our trade; but we desire he may not have any thing to do with our lands: for the agents which have come amongst us, and pretended to take care of us, have always deceived us whenever we sold lands; both when the King of England and when the States have bargained with us. They have by this means occasioned many wars, and we are therefore unwilling to trust them again.

FATHER: When we return home, we will call a great council, and consider well how lands may be hereafter sold by our nation. And when we have agreed upon it, we will send you notice of it. But we desire that you will not depend on your agent for information concerning land: for, after the abuses which we have suffered by such men, we will not trust them with any thing which relates to land.

FATHER: We will not hear lies concerning you, and we desire that you will not hear lies concerning us, and then we shall certainly live at peace with you.

FATHER: There are men who go from town to town and beget children, and leave them to perish, or, except better men take care of them, to grow up without instruction. Our nation has long looked round for a father, but they found none that would own them for children, until you now tell us that your courts are open to us as to your own people. The joy which we feel at this great news, so mixes with the sorrows that are passed, that we cannot express our gladness, nor conceal the remembrance of our afflictions. We will speak of them at another time.

FATHER: We are ashamed that we have listened to the lies of Livingston, or been influenced by threats of war by Phelps, and would hide that whole transaction from the world, and from ourselves, by quietly receiving what Phelps promised to give us for the lands they cheated us of. But as Phelps will not pay us even according to that fraudulent bargain, we will lay the whole proceedings before your court. When the evidence which we can produce is heard, we think it will appear that the whole bargain was founded on lies, which he placed one upon another; that the goods which he charges to us as part payment were plundered from us; that, if Phelps was not directly concerned in the theft, he knew of it at the time, and concealed it from us; and that the persons we confided in were bribed by him to deceive us in the bargain. And if these facts appear, that your court will not say that such bargains are just, but will set the whole aside.

FATHER: We apprehend that our evidence might be called for, as Phelps was here, and knew what we have said concerning him; and as Ebenezer Allen knew something of the matter, we desired him to continue here. Nicholson, the interpreter, is very sick, and we request that Allen may remain a few days longer, as he speaks our language.

FATHER: The blood which was spilled near Pine creek is covered, and we shall never look where it lies. We know that Pennsylvania will satisfy us for that which we spoke of to them before we spoke to you. The chain of friendship will now, we hope, be made strong as you desire it to be. We will hold it fast; and our end of it shall never rust in our hands.

FATHER: We told you what advice we gave to the people you are now at war with, and we now tell you that they have promised to come again to our towns next spring. We shall not wait for their coming, but will set out very early, and shew to them what you have done for us, which must convince them that you will do for them every thing which they ought to ask. We think they will hear and follow our advice.

FATHER: You give us leave to speak our minds concerning the tilling of the ground. We ask you to teach us to plough and to grind corn; to assist us in building saw mills, and supply us with broad axes, saws, augers, and other tools, so as that we may make our houses more comfortable and more durable; that you will send smiths among us, and, above all, that you will teach our children to read and write, and our women to spin and to weave. The manner of your doing these things for us we leave to you, who understand them; but we assure you that we will follow your advice as far as we are able.

The speech of Cornplanter, Half-Town, and the Big-Tree, Seneca Chiefs, to the Great Councillor of the Thirteen Fires.

FATHER:

No Seneca ever goes from the fire of his friend, until he has said to him, "I am going." We therefore tell you, that we are now setting out for our own country.

FATHER: We thank you, from our hearts, that we now know there is a country we may call our own, and on which we may lie down in peace. We see that there will be peace between your children and our children; and our hearts are very glad. We will persuade the Wyandots, and other Western nations, to open their eyes, and look toward the bed which you have made for us, and to ask of you a bed for themselves, and their children, that will not slide from under them.

We thank you for your presents to us, and rely on your promise to instruct us in raising corn, as the white people do; the sooner you do this, the better for us. And we thank you for the care you have taken to prevent bad men coming to trade among us: if any come without your license, we will turn them back; and we hope our nation will determine to spill all the rum which shall, hereafter, be brought to our towns.

FATHER: We are glad to hear that you determine to appoint an agent that will do us justice, in taking care that bad men do not come to trade amongst us; but we earnestly intreat you that you will let us have an interpreter in whom we can confide, to reside at Pittsburg. To that place our people, and other nations, will long continue to resort; there we must send what news we hear, when we go among the Western nations, which, we are determined, shall be early in the spring. We know Joseph Nicholson, and he speaks our language so that we clearly understand what you say to us, and we rely on what he says. If we were able to pay him for his services, we would do it; but, when we meant to pay him, by giving him land, it has not been confirmed to him; and he will not serve us any longer unless you will pay him. Let him stand between us, we intreat you.

FATHER: You have not asked any security for peace on our part, but we have agreed to send nine Seneca boys, to be under your care for education. Tell us at what time you will receive them, and they shall be sent at the time you shall appoint. This will assure you that we are, indeed, at peace with you, and determined to continue so. If you can teach them to become wise and good men, we will take care that our nation shall be willing to receive instruction from them.

PITTSBURG, March 17, 1791.

SIR:

When we raised from the great council of the Thirteen Fires, we mentioned that we meant to have a council with the chiefs of the bad, angry Indians.

Through the whole Quaker State, as we came up the road, we were treated well, and they took good care of us until we came here. One misfortune happened only, that one of our wagons is not yet arrived here, the one we first engaged, with the goods you presented to us.

FATHER: Your promise to me was, that you would keep all your people quiet; but, since I came here, I find that some of my people have been killed—the good honest people who were here trading.

FATHER: We hope you will not suffer all the good people to be killed; but your people are killing them as fast as they can. Three men and one woman have been killed at Big Beaver creek, and they were good people, and some of the white men will testify the truth of this. When I heard the news, I found one boy had made his escape, and got to the trader's house, who saved his life; I now want to see him.

FATHER: We have been informed that twenty-seven men came from another State, and murdered these men in the Quaker State, and took away nine horses, and all the goods they had purchased from the trader. Our father, and ruler over all mankind, now speak and tell me, did you order these men to be killed?

FATHER: Our words are pledged to you that we would endeavor to make peace with all warrior nations. If we cannot do it, do not blame us: you struck the innocent men first. We hope you will not blame us, as your people have first broke good rules; but, as for our people, they are as friendly and as firm as ever.

FATHER: We must now acquaint you with the men's names who did this murder at Beaver creek: Samuel Brady, formerly a captain in your army, and under your command, also a Balden, were persons concerned in this murder.

FATHER: I can inform you little more, therefore will conclude with asking you how I should have come to the knowledge of this, or how I could have informed you, had it not been for our good friend Joseph Nicholson? I therefore beg you may grant him an appointment as interpreter: for we cannot see how we will do without him. I know of no other man that speaks your language and ours so well as him.

P. S. The boy who made his escape at Beaver creek has arrived at this place, and I have taken him under my protection. Father, your despatches for Detroit have been unavoidably detained, heretofore; but to-morrow Big-Tree and one other shall set off with them, and will also take the boy mentioned here, and deliver him to his relations. We part to-day at this place: Big-Tree is going amongst the cross Indians, to see if they will make peace, and I go to my own people, to call them to council.

CORNPLANTER.

To all People to whom these presents shall come, greeting: Know ye, that we, the sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the Five Nations of Indians, for, and in consideration of, the sum of two thousand one hundred pounds, lawful money of the State of New York, paid, and received by us, to our full satisfaction, of Oliver Phelps, of Granville, in the county of Hampshire, and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Esquire, and Nathaniel Gorham, of Charlestown, in the county of Middlesex, in the Commonwealth aforesaid, and of which we do hereby release and discharge them, the said Oliver and Nathaniel; and particularly, in consideration of the covenant and engagement made and executed by the said Oliver Phelps, in behalf of the said Nathaniel and himself, by deed of even date with these presents, have given, granted, ceded, bargained, sold, aliened, conveyed, and confirmed, and by these presents do hereby give, grant, cede, bargain, sell, alien, convey, and confirm, unto them, the said Oliver Phelps and Nathaniel Gorham, and to their heirs and assigns, forever, all that territory or country of land lying within the State of New York, contained within, and being parcel of, the lands and territory, the right of pre-emption of the soil whereof, from the native Indians, was ceded by the State of New York aforesaid, to the Commonwealth aforesaid, by deed of cession, executed at Hartford, by commissioners for that purpose, on the sixteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, within the following limits and bounds, that is to say: Beginning in the north boundary line of the State of Pennsylvania, in the parallel of forty-two degrees north latitude, at a point distant eighty-two miles west from the northeast corner of Pennsylvania, on Delaware river, as the said boundary line hath been run and marked by the commissioners appointed by the States of New York and Pennsylvania, respectively; and from said point or place of beginning, running west upon said line to a meridian which will pass through that corner or point of land made by the confluence of the Shanahasgwaikoreehi (so called) with the waters of the Genesee river; thence, running north along the said meridian to the corner or point last mentioned; thence, northwardly along the waters of the said Genesee river, to a point two miles north of Shanawageras village, so called; thence, running in a direction due west, twelve miles; thence, running a direction northwardly, so as to be twelve miles distant from the most westward bends of said Genesee river, to the shore of the Ontario lake; thence, eastwardly along the shores of said lake, to a meridian which will pass through the first point or place of beginning abovementioned; thence, south along said meridian to the first point or place of beginning, aforesaid; together with all and singular the woods, houses, streams, rivers, ponds, lakes, upon, within, and in any wise appertaining to, said territory; to have and to hold the above granted and bargained premises, together with all the appurtenances and privileges thereunto belonging, or in anywise appertaining, to them the said Oliver Phelps and Nathaniel Gorham, and to their heirs and assigns forever. And we, the underwritten sachems, chiefs, and warriors, do hereby covenant and engage, to and with the said Oliver Phelps, Nathaniel Gorham, and their heirs, executors, and administrators, that we will warrant and defend the above granted and bargained premises to them, said Oliver, Nathaniel, and their heirs and assigns, against all claims whatsoever.

In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands and seals, this eighth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight.

Pursuant to a resolution of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, passed March the 30th, 1788, I have attended a full and general treaty of the Five Nations of Indians, at the chief village in their territory, on Buffalo creek, alias Teyoheghscolea, when the foregoing instrument or deed of conveyance, made to the Honorable Nathaniel Gorham, and Oliver Phelps, Esqrs. of a certain part of the lands belonging to the said Five Nations, the description and boundaries thereof being particularly specified in the same, was duly executed, signed, sealed, and delivered, in my presence, by the sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the above mentioned Five Nations, being fairly and properly understood and transacted by all the parties of Indians concerned, and declared to be done to their universal satisfaction and content.

And I do therefore certify and approve of the same.

SAMUEL KIRKLAND,

Missionary, superintendent in behalf of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS:

I, Henry Alline, notary and tabellion public, by lawful authority duly admitted and sworn, dwelling and practising in Boston, within said Commonwealth, do hereby certify all whom it may concern, that the foregoing instrument or deed of conveyance, and caption thereon, are true copies from the originals, which were carefully examined and compared by me the said notary. Thus done at Boston aforesaid, this twentieth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and affixed my notarial seal.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS:

By his Excellency JOHN HANCOCK, Esquire, Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

I do hereby certify, that Henry Alline is a notary public, within and for the county of Suffolk, in the said Commonwealth, duly constituted and sworn, and that, to his acts and attestations, as on this paper, full faith and credit is, and ought to be given, both in and out of court.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the public seal of the Commonwealth aforesaid to be hereto affixed, this twentieth day of October, Anno Domini 1790, and in the fifteenth year of the independence of the United States of America.

We, the sachems, chiefs, and warriors, of the Mohawk, Onondago, Cuyahuga, and Tuscarora nations, for ourselves, and in behalf of the four nations aforesaid, have heard read and explained, in public council at this place, the papers passed between Oliver Phelps, Esq. and the Five Nations of Indians, in full and public council, at our great council fire, at Buffalo creek, in July, 1788; and find said papers conformable to the agreement then and there made, between said Phelps and the said Five Nations, and do hereby ratify and confirm said agreement, as being fairly and properly done, agreeable to the ancient customs of our forefathers; and having given up to the Seneca nation, our several proportions of the payment now due and offered to the said Five Nations by said Phelps, in a just and proper manner, in a full council of the Five Nations, viz: two thousand five hundred dollars in cash, and two thousand five hundred dollars value in goods, we hereby quit all claims, right, title, or demand, whatsoever, to all that certain tract, parcel, land, and territory, purchased from the Five Nations, by said Phelps, agreeable to the deeds given him, the said Phelps, by the Five Nations aforesaid, at Buffalo creek; and to all moneys, goods, or other payments whatsoever, due by said Phelps for said lands, except always reserving our just share and proportion of five hundred dollars, the annual rent to be paid on said lands forever.

Given under our hands and seals, at Canadqua, this 4th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine.

In presence of

NEWTON POINT, in the State of New York, July 7th, 1791.

At the request of Oliver Phelps, Esq. I questioned the Onondaga chief, Sharonyowanen, and the Cayuga chief, Ojagegte, (usually called the Fish Carrier) relative to the contents of the foregoing written paper, to which their names are subscribed. They said they did not remember what were the papers therein mentioned to have been read and explained to them; but they well remember the bargain made between Mr. Phelps and the Five Nations, for the land he purchased of them at the treaty at Buffalo Creek, was this: that Mr. Phelps was to pay five thousand dollars for the purchase, and five hundred dollars every year forever. That this is well known to the other chiefs of their two nations, and that they never heard one of them say any thing to the contrary. Then, when at Kon-naudaugua about two years ago, they, with other chiefs of their nation, and of the Mohawks and Tuscaroras, signed a paper to confirm the bargain which had been made with Mr. Phelps, at Buffalo Creek.

Joseph Smith and Jasper Parrish, my interpreters, inform me, that the Onondaga chief and the Fish Carrier, above named, are the head chiefs of their two nations.

TIMOTHY PICKERING,

Commissioner in behalf of the United States, for holding a treaty with the Six Nations.

Timothy Pickering's certificate.

I certify that Oliver Phelps, Esq. has shewn me a number of depositions of gentlemen of reputation, who were present at the treaty held by him at Buffalo creek, with the Six Nations of Indians, in the year 1788, when he purchased of them a tract of land, since called the purchase of Phelps and Gorham; and from their testimony, it appears that the bargain made with the Indians was for five thousand dollars purchase money, and five hundred dollars annual rent; that the papers exhibiting the bargain were openly interpreted by Mr. Kirkland, Mr. Dean, Colonel Butler, and Captain Brandt; and that the Indians then appeared entirely satisfied.

I further certify, that, at the request of Mr. Phelps, I examined the Fish Carrier and Sharonyowanen, (the two head sachems of the Cayuga and Onondaga nations, now attending the treaty, held by me, with the Six Nations at this place) relative to the same bargain; and they declared that it was as above stated; that the other chiefs of their two nations knew it; and that they never heard one of them say any thing to the contrary.

I further certify, that yesterday the principal sachems and chiefs of the Seneca nation came to my quarters, and declared that they were entirely satisfied in respect to the bargain they had made with Mr. Phelps for their lands; and that all they now asked of Mr. Phelps was, that he would perform his engagements with them, as the writings now stand.

Upon the whole, though from the complaints made last fall by the Seneca chiefs at Tioga, and by the Cornplanter last winter at Philadelphia, there appeared some room for believing that the bargain was for ten thousand dollars purchase money, yet I am now entirely convinced that they were under a mistake; and that the writings shewing that the purchase money was five thousand dollars, and the annual rent five hundred dollars, are exactly agreeable to the bargain made with them in their full council.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

PHILADELPHIA, Wednesday evening, January 18th, 1792.

Mr. Phelps asks me if I remember some conversation which I had with Big Log (otherwise called Great Tree) last July, at the treaty held by me with the Five Nations of Indians at Newtown, relative to the Cornplanter's complaints made last winter to the President, respecting his purchase of Seneca lands? I do. I repeated the substance of it to-day to Mr. Sherman and Mr. Wingate, upon their saying that the Cornplanter's speech had been read in the Senate, and Mr. Wingate's noticing that part of it which referred to Mr. Phelps.

I asked Big Log if he was present with the Cornplanter when he spoke to the President? He answered that he was. I asked him if the Cornplanter, in his speech, said that Mr. Phelps had threatened his nation with immediate war, if they did not let him have their lands? Big Log, with apparent surprise in his countenance, answered, No! but that John Livingston had threatened them.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

The Cornplanter, in his speech to the President, says the annual rent which Mr. Phelps agreed to pay the Senecas, was one thousand dollars. The Seneca chiefs, at the treaty which I held with them in the fall of 1790, at Tioga, complained of their being wronged by Mr. Phelps, and said that he agreed to pay them ten thousand dollars purchase money, but that the annual rent was to be but five hundred dollars. So the matter rests on my mind. Their speeches (which I reported to the President a year ago) will ascertain the facts.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

The deposition of James Dean.

The deposition of James Dean, of lawful age, testifieth and saith, that this deponent attended a treaty which was held by Oliver Phelps, Esq. with the Indian nations at Buffalo creek; that this deponent officiated at the said treaty as an interpreter; that the Senecas, as far as this deponent had an opportunity to discover their sentiments, did unanimously agree to dispose of part of their country to the above mentioned Oliver Phelps, Esq.; that this deponent, although he does not perfectly recollect the particulars of the contract made between the said Phelps and Senecas, yet conceives that the said Phelps engaged to pay to the said Senecas the sum of five thousand dollars the first year after the date of the said contract, and five hundred dollars per year forever; that, as far as this deponent was concerned in negotiating said contract, he conceives that every matter and thing respecting the same was fully and clearly explained to the said Senecas; and that the writings respecting the said contract were deposited in the hands of Colonel John Butler. And further this deponent saith not.

JAMES DEAN.

Whitestown, November 25th, 1790.

MONTGOMERY, November 25th, 1790.

Personally appeared James Dean, signer to the foregoing deposition, and after being duly examined, and cautioned to testify the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, made solemn oath that the foregoing deposition, by him subscribed, was the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

Before me,

EPHRAIM BLACKMER, Justice of the Peace.

Judge Hollenback's deposition.

Matthias Hollenback, Esq. of Wilkesbrough, in the county of Luzerne, and State of Pennsylvania, of lawful age, testifies and says, that, in July, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, he was present at a treaty held by Oliver Phelps, Esq. with the Six Nations of Indians, at Buffalo creek; that he, with a number of gentlemen, attended every public council held during said treaty; that, after some time was spent in determining the quantity of lands to be sold, it was agreed that the said Oliver Phelps, Esq. should pay the Indians (for their lands) the sum of five thousand dollars, and the sum of five hundred dollars yearly, as a receipt; that the writings were made according to said contract, and were read and explained in public councils by Colonel Butler, Captain Brandt, Messrs. Dean, and Kirkland; and that the Indians appeared perfectly satisfied with the contract as explained to them.

MATTHIAS HOLLENBACK.

Tioga County, ss.

Personally came before me, Brinton Paine, Esq., M. Hollenback, Esq., signer to the above deposition, and made solemn oath to the truth of the same on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God. Taken and sworn before me, this 14th day of July, 1791.

BRINTON PAINE.

N. B. The question being put to the above deponent, whether he heard the said Oliver Phelps, Esq. use any threatening words to the Indians, whereby he has any reason to think the Indians sold their land through fear to him? "I did not."

MATHIAS HOLLENBACK.

Question asked by me.

BRINTON PAINE.

Elisha Lee, of Sheffield, in the county of Berkshire, and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Esquire, of lawful age, testifieth and saith: That he accompanied the Hon. Oliver Phelps, Esq. to a treaty holden with the chiefs and warriors of the Six Nations, at Buffalo Creek, in July, 1788—the object of the treaty being the purchase of lands within the Massachusetts pre-emption district. The Indians were very generally there. Various propositions were made by Mr. Phelps, in their public council, relative to the quantity of land which he inclined to purchase. To fix upon the quantity, limits, and boundaries, of such lands as they would sell, and which Mr. Phelps was inclined to purchase, was a work of some difficulty, and was the business of the council for a number of days successively. The business was at length amicably effected, at a council in which Captain O'Beel, and a select number of the Indian chiefs, were present on the part of the Indians, and in the presence of the Rev. Samuel Kirkland, the superintendent appointed by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Mr. Dean, Colonel Butler, and Captain Brandt, who understood both the English and Indian languages, and of Ezekiel Gilbert, Esq. Dr. Benton, and myself. The limits of the intended purchase being agreed, and a request from Captain O'Beel, to know what compensation Mr. Phelps would make for it, being made, it was agreed by Mr. Phelps and the said Indians, to refer the consideration of the compensation which ought to be made them to Col. Butler, Mr. Kirkland, and Capt. Brandt. Agreeably to their opinion thereupon, Mr. Phelps offered and proposed to pay them, in satisfaction for the lands agreed to be conveyed, the sum of five thousand dollars, to be paid in some convenient time after the treaty, and an annuity of five hundred dollars forever afterwards. This proposal was interpreted to them by Mr. Kirkland, Mr. Dean, or both of them; and, after a due time given them for deliberation, was accepted by them. After the business was so far settled, Mr. Phelps, agreeably to a request of the Indians, further agreed to make them a present of some cattle and rum. On the day subsequent to their agreeing to the proposals of Mr. Phelps, relative to the compensation, the necessary writings and instruments to carry into execution the aforesaid agreements of the parties were draughted by the deponent, at the request of Mr. Phelps; and, agreeably to notice given to the said Indians by him. These writings were truly and honestly made for that purpose, and were executed by the respective parties in a public meeting of the Six Nations, at which were present the gentlemen beforementioned, as well as a Mr. Johnson, and several British officers from Niagara. At the time of their being executed, they were publicly read and interpreted to the Indians, by C. Butler, Mr. Kirkland, Captain Brandt, and Mr. Dean. And the deponent further saith, that there neither was nor could be any fraud, deceit, or unfair management, in the whole of this business; the bonds and obligations given to them by Mr. Phelps being fully and completely written, and no blanks left therein, and seen to be in this situation by the deponent, immediately previous to their execution by Mr. Phelps.

ELISHA LEE.

Taken and sworn before me, this 4th day of July, 1791.

BRINTON PAINE,

One of the Judges of the county of Tioga, in the State of New York.

During Mr. Phelps's negotiation with the Indians for the purchase of the lands referred to in the foregoing deposition, did he use any threats to intimidate the Indians, to induce them to agree to a sale of the lands, and on the terms proposed by Mr. Phelps? Particularly, did he threaten them with immediate war if they did not comply?

Answer. Mr. Phelps did not use any threats of any kind to intimidate the Indians, to my knowledge; and I was present at all the public councils that were holden with them.

The above question was asked by the Hon. Timothy Pickering, Esq. and the answer given by Mr. Lee, in my presence, this 4th day of July, 1791.

BRINTON PAINE, Judge.

Question asked by Brinton Paine, Esq. Was you, at the time of the purchase made by Mr. Phelps, interested, either directly or indirectly, in the purchase of said lands?

Answer. I was not.

BRINTON PAINE.

Thomas Rees, of Northumberland, in the State of Pennsylvania, of lawful age, testifies and says: That he accompanied the Seneca nation of Indians from the treaty held at Newtown Point, to the Genesee river, and, at the request of the said Indians, he, together with Messrs. Thomas and William Morris, received a thousand dollars of Oliver Phelps, Esq. (rising of seven hundred dollars of which sum was in cash, and the residue in calicoes and linens, estimated at a reasonable price) and delivered the same to the chiefs of the Seneca nation, in the presence of their nation, and a number of white people; and, on the receipt of said cash and goods, the chiefs delivered to Mr. Morris and myself an obligation, given by said Oliver Phelps, Esq. payable to the Seneca nation, dated at Buffalo Creek, July, A. D. 1788, promising to pay five hundred dollars per annum to the Five Nations forever.

Mr. Thomas Morris, in my presence, by the order of the chiefs, endorsed on said obligation, "one thousand dollars, in full, for two years rent;" which the said Indians then declared to be in full of all demands against said Phelps to that time. And the chiefs departed in great harmony, appearing to be well satisfied with the payment they had received. And the deponent further says, that, soon after the above payment, he was at Buffalo creek and other Indian towns, and that the Indians appeared well satisfied with the said Oliver Phelps, Esq. and much attached to him. Further the deponent saith not.

THOMAS REES, Jr.

Sworn before

PHILADELPHIA, January 20, 1791.

James Wadsworth, of the town of Genesee, in the county of Ontario, and State of New York, of lawful age, testifies and says: That he was present when the payment was made by Oliver Phelps, Esq. to the Seneca nation of Indians, some time in the month of August last, at Genesee river, and that he saw Messrs. Thomas Rees, Thomas and William Morris, count out the money, estimate, and deliver the goods to the chiefs of the Seneca nation. And the deponent further says, that, on Oliver Phelps, Esq. informing the chiefs that he was about to leave the country for the winter, the chiefs and other Indians gathered around him, expressed their attachment to him, declaring that they ever applied to him for advice and instruction, and requested him to appoint a chief of the white people in his absence. The deponent further saith, that he continued at the Genesee river until some time in the month of September, and that he never heard any one of the Indians express any mark of disapprobation, but, on the contrary, appeared pleased with the payment they had received of Oliver Phelps, Esq.

JAMES WADSWORTH.
JOHN BARCLAY, Mayor.

Sworn before me.

PHILADELPHIA, January 21, 1791.

I was present at the payment made by Oliver Phelps, Esq. on account of himself and Nathaniel Gorham, Esq. to the Seneca nation of Indians, in the month of July last, at the Genesee river. This payment consisted of the sum of one thousand dollars, (two annual payments being then due) the greater part in money, and the remainder in goods, (which goods were valued by a Mr. Reese, who was appointed by the Indians as their agent.) I assisted in counting out the money and in distributing the goods, and signed the endorsement on the bond as a witness of the payment. The Indians appeared universally well satisfied with the payment. There was some little difference among themselves, with respect to their proportions, but they declared, more than once, that, with respect to Mr. Phelps, they had nothing to complain of, but were perfectly satisfied that he had paid them honestly. In this opinion they went home, and separated in much harmony with Mr. Phelps.

WM. W. MORRIS.

January 18th, 1792.

I, Eleazer Lindley, of lawful age, testify and say, that I was present at Canandaigua some time in August, 1789, and that the chiefs of the Six Nations were assembled for the purpose of receiving their pay for the purchase of their lands in the Genesee country, which purchase I understood was made by Oliver Phelps and Nathaniel Gorham, Esqrs. and that the chiefs then appointed five agents (to receive their money and goods for them) to wit: Jones, Smith, Rozee-ranty, Jack Berry, and one Matthews, who acted as an interpreter for the Cornplanter; that the agents counted the money, and appraised the goods, and then declared to the chiefs that it was right; that they had laid off money and goods to the amount of five thousand dollars, according to the form of the bond, and that the chiefs came forward and received the money and goods, and expressed their entire satisfaction; that then the Cornplanter gave up the bond to Oliver Phelps, and said they had received the full amount thereof. I further say, that, after the goods were appraised, and the money counted by the above mentioned agents, the said Oliver Phelps, Esq. insisted that the chiefs should examine the money and goods for themselves, to see that they had received the full consideration of the bond; which they accordingly did, and appeared satisfied.

And further say not.

Extract from the proceedings of Colonel Timothy Pickering with the Seneca Indians, held at Tioga Point, November 21st, 1790.

[Then Red Jacket rose and spoke as follows:]

BROTHER:

Now you begin to hear of the situation of our lands. Mr. Phelps and Doctor Benton came on to rake open the fire again at Canedesago. After they were come there, Mr. Phelps passed on to Niagara, and went to our old friend Colonel Butler, whom he met at a tavern. Colonel Butler asked him of his business. He answered that he came to kindle a fire at Canedesago. Then Colonel Butler told him that Canedesago was not a fit place at which to kindle a fire; and that our old custom was to kindle a fire at our own castle. Colonel Butler told him that he thought he must build a fire at Buffalo creek; and if he did, that he believed he should attend the treaty. Mr. Phelps expressed his fears, that if he held the treaty there, he should meet some difficulty. Then, I, Billy, and Cajeagayonh, (Heap of Dogs) went to Canedesago, took Mr. Phelps by the hand, and led him to our council fire at Buffalo creek. All these people here know what speech Mr. Phelps sent us—(then pointing to the Farmer's Brother, Billy, and others, said)—these went to Canedesago, to see what the business was. These all know, and Mr. Street knows, that Mr. Phelps held up a long paper, with a seal as big as my hand. When he opened his mind to us, we took it hard. We wanted to keep a large piece of land, but it was not in our power. Mr. Street, (pointing to him on the bench) you know very well, a treaty was held all night, to fix the boundary, and the price of the land. These men (Mr. Smith, the Farmer's Brother, O'Beel, Little Billy, Heap of Dogs, China Breast-plate, and I, were there) know very well, the proposal was, that Mr. Phelps should give us ten thousand dollars for the purchase, and five hundred dollars annual rent. That was the agreement made that night. The bargain was not finished till morning; and just as we went out of the house, the sun rose. Then we sought for persons to draw the writings. The persons chosen were Mr. Kirkland, Colonel Butler, and Captain Brandt. Mr. Street was not then present. After this, the bargain being completed, Mr. Street took our papers with him to Niagara. And, last summer a year ago, we came to Canandaigua, expecting to receive ten thousand dollars; but then we found we had but five thousand to receive. When we discovered the fraud, we had a mind to apply to Congress, to see if the matter could not be rectified: for, when we took the money and shared it, every one here knows, that we had but about a dollar a piece, for all that country. Mr. Street! you very well know, that all that our lands came to, was but the price of a few hogsheads of tobacco. Gentlemen who stand by, (looking round, and addressing himself to the white people who were present,) do not think hard of what has been said. At the time of the treaty, twenty broaches would not buy half a loaf of bread, so that when we returned home, there was not a bright spot of silver about us. The last spring, again, General Chapin stretched out his hand to us to open a little fire at Big Tree Flats; and then I had a little talk with him; and finding we had but a shilling a piece to receive, we desired him to shut up his hand again. This is all we have to say of that time. Mr. Street knows how hard it was for us to part with our land. And this we have said, because we wish the President to know how we have been treated.

Now, BROTHER—the Thirteen States: you must open your ears. You know what has happened respecting our lands. You told us, from this time the chain of friendship should be brightened. Now, brother, we have begun to brighten the chain of friendship, and we will follow the steps of our forefathers. We will take those steps, that we may sit easy, and choose where and how large our seats should be. The reason we send this message, is, that the President, who is over all the thirteen States, may make our seats easy. We do it that the chain of friendship may be brightened with the thirteen States, as well as with the British; that we may pass from one to the other, unmolested. Brother, this is what your brothers, chiefs, and warriors, have to say to you, relative to brightening the chain of friendship. We wish to be under the protection of the thirteen States as well as of the British.

[Then he delivered me the belt, after which, taking up a parcel of papers, he proceeded thus:]

BROTHER: You know all relating to our lands; you know the whole affair. We have just told you it was two years that we have wanted to have a conference with Congress. Mr. Phelps did not purchase, but he leased the land. We opened our ears, and understood that the land was leased. This happened to us from our not knowing papers. Here they are, and you may see what they contain.

[He then handed me the papers. They were Mr. Phelps's bond for the 500 dollars annual rent of the land he bought of them, some copies of it, and a copy of their deed to him. He then proceeded.]

BROTHER: We have a little more to say to you. Here are Billy, and some others, who were at the treaty at the Ohio. They brought with them these papers, which we wish you to see. It is the mind of the Six Nations to keep these papers, that we may show them at treaties held by the thirteen States. It is our mind that you should know it. This belt came with these papers, and on the parchment annexed to it is mentioned the price of the land.

[He then handed to me the papers. One contained articles entered into between them and General St. Clair, describing certain boundaries between their lands and those of the United States. The subject of the other paper I do not recollect. The parchment label annexed to the belt, showed that it had been delivered by Richard Butler and John Gibson, whose names were written upon it; but nothing about the price of any land. The Indians desired of me information of the nature of the papers, which I gave them in general terms.]

NORTHWESTERN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 30, 1792.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, pursuant to the directions of the President of the United States, copies of the official communications which have passed between the Executive of the United States and the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, upon the subject of the temporary defensive protection of the frontiers of that State.

No. 1.

Letter from the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania to the President of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 22d December, 1791.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose, for your information, a copy of a representation which has been made to me by the inhabitants of the town of Pittsburg, expressing their apprehensions of an invasion by the hostile Indians; of the accumulation of the enemy's numbers; and stating the defenceless condition of the frontiers of Pennsylvania.

I am, sir, &amp;c.

THO. MIFFLIN.

Representation from the inhabitants of the town of Pittsburg, dated

PITTSBURG, 11th December, 1791.

SIR:

In consequence of the late intelligence of the fate of the campaign to the Westward, the inhabitants of the town of Pittsburg have convened, and appointed us a committee, for the purpose of addressing your Excellency. The late disaster of the army must greatly affect the safety of this place. There can be no doubt but the enemy will now come forward, and with more spirit, and greater numbers, than they ever did before, for success will give confidence, and secure allies.

We seriously apprehend that the Six Nations, heretofore wavering, will now avow themselves; at least, their young men will come to war. Be that as it may, the Indians at present hostile, are well acquainted with the defenceless situation of this town. During the late war there was a garrison at this place, though, even then, there was not such a combination of the savage nations, nor so much to be dreaded from them. At present, we have neither garrison, arms, nor ammunition, to defend the place. If the enemy should be disposed to pursue the blow they have given, which it is morally certain they will, they would, in our situation, find it easy to destroy us; and, should this place be lost, the whole country is open to them, and must be abandoned. The safety of this place being an object of the greatest consequence, not only to the neighboring country, but to the United States, as it is the point of communication to the Westward, and the proper depository of their magazines, it must be of the greatest consequence to preserve it.

We state these things to your Excellency as the executive authority of the Government, that, if any thing can be done by your Excellency towards our immediate defence, it may be done; if not, your Excellency will communicate our situation to our State Legislature, or to the General Government, as it may seem expedient or proper. Having the highest confidence in your Excellency's good disposition towards the citizens of this State in general, and those of this place in particular,

We are, your Excellency's obedient humble servants,

A. TANNEHILL,
JAMES O'HARA,
JOHN McMASTERS,

The President of the United States to the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania.

December 23, 1791.

SIR:

I have received your Excellency's letter of yesterday, enclosing a copy of a representation to you from the inhabitants of Pittsburg, relatively to their apprehensions in consequence of the late defeat of the troops under Major General St. Clair.

I can, with great propriety, assure your Excellency, that it is my earnest desire that all the exposed parts of the frontiers should be as effectually protected, at the general expense, as the case may require.

I shall direct the Secretary of War to confer with your Excellency upon this subject, and to inform you of such measures as have been directed, and are in train of execution.

I have the honor, &amp;c.

No. 3.

The Secretary of War to the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania.

26th December, 1791.

SIR:

I have the honor, in pursuance of the orders of the President of the United States, to state to your Excellency the measures which are at present in train of execution, for the defensive protection of the western parts of Pennsylvania, to wit:

First. That, on the sixteenth day of the present month, orders were issued to Major Craig to construct, immediately, a block-house at fort Pitt, and to surround it with palisadoes, so as to contain about one hundred men.

Secondly. On the same day directions were given, that a party, of a commissioned officer and thirty-four non-commissioned and privates, should remain at fort Pitt, from two companies, part of which had been stationed at fort Pitt, from the twentieth of October to the fifteenth instant, at which time they were under orders to descend the Ohio. That it is, however, to be expected, that the said two companies may have departed from fort Pitt previously to the receipt of this order, unless prevented by the ice.

Thirdly. That, on this day, will march from this city, a detachment of about one hundred and twenty non-commissioned officers and privates, besides commissioned officers. Part of these will be stationed at fort Pitt, and detachments posted at such other places, on the Ohio and upper parts of the Alleghany, as to be most conducive to the general safety of these parts.

Fourthly. The lieutenants of the counties of Westmoreland, Alleghany, and Washington, will be authorized to call out such a number of scouts, or patrols, at the expense of the General Government, as they shall judge proper; not, however, exceeding eight in number to each of the said counties. These scouts are to be of the best hunters, or woodsmen, and, as an inducement to such to perform the service, they will be allowed the high pay of five-sixths of a dollar per day, the price usually given on the frontiers of Virginia for said service.

I hope, sir, that these arrangements will be satisfactory to your Excellency, and effectually answer the purpose for which they are designed.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

No. 4.

The Governor of the State of Pennsylvania to the President of the United States.

29th December, 1791.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose, for your information, a copy of a second memorial, which has been transmitted to me by the inhabitants of the frontier counties of Pennsylvania.

In my communication to the Legislature, upon this subject, I have suggested the propriety of furnishing the militia with an immediate supply of arms and ammunition; and my instructions to the Lieutenants of the several exposed counties will be, to co-operate, in case of an emergency, with the officers of the Federal Government, conformably to the plan of defence which the Secretary of War has described to me by your directions.

I am, with perfect respect, &amp;c.

To his Excellency THOMAS MIFFLIN, Esq. Governor of the State of Pennsylvania:

SIR: We have the honor to address you, in behalf of the counties of Westmoreland, Washington, Fayette, and Alleghany, respecting the present defenceless state of their frontiers, now exposed to the cruel ravages of a powerful and savage foe. The late defeat of the army under General St. Clair, has given rise to the most serious apprehensions to the inhabitants of those counties, who, being entirely unprotected, as well as destitute of arms and ammunition for defending themselves, now look up to your Excellency as the Executive arm of the Government, to ward off those dangers which threaten them, as well as the Commonwealth in general.

Your Excellency is well aware of the great extent of our frontier; and, when you consider the high degree of spirit which the savages, animated by two successive victories, entertain, you may more easily conceive, than we can describe, the fears which pervade the breasts of those men, women, and children, who are more immediately subject to their barbarities and depredations. Had the people a sufficiency of arms in their hands, they might, in some measure, defend themselves until the General Government, to whose care the common defence is entrusted, should adopt efficient steps for that purpose. At the same time, we beg leave to state to your Excellency, what occurs to us as the most speedy and effectual mode. When the extent of country to be protected is taken into view, we conceive that eight hundred effective men will not be deemed more than sufficient. They should be active partisans, under experienced officers, and provided with good rifles, to suit the grand object of meeting the enemy upon equal terms; of scouting, and giving the alarm when needful. Such a body should have encouragement proportioned to the price of common labor in this country, which averages at fifty shillings per month, as the pay allowed to the troops of the United States would not be a sufficient inducement to able bodied men, possessing the requisite qualifications. We suggest these general ideas from our knowledge of local circumstances, which they who are at a distance, unacquainted with the actual situation of the Western country, cannot so well perceive. It is not our wish to enter into a minute detail, being convinced that your Excellency is not only fully acquainted with, but feelingly alive to, those impressions, which a state such as ours must give rise to; nor can we apply to any person more proper than yourself, to procure that assistance which it requires.

In the mean while, we hope, from your attention, that a quantity of arms and ammunition, of good quality, will be forwarded to the several county lieutenants, to be distributed among the most active men of the militia of these counties, who at present can make but a partial and feeble defence if attacked. They have been draughted throughout the last summer, and those of Westmoreland even until now. This is attended with great inconvenience, and is particularly harassing to this part of the State; and the officers, as well as men, taking their tour promiscuously, are not as well adapted to an active and hazardous service, as a select corps who have confidence in one another.

If nothing else can be done, we trust your Excellency will give orders for calling out the militia of the other counties, which, at least, may afford a temporary relief.

We have the honor to be, sir, with the greatest respect, your Excellency's humble and obedient servants,

The Secretary of War to the Lieutenants of the counties of Westmoreland, Alleghany, and Washington, in the State of Pennsylvania—29th December, 1791.

Sir:

The President of the United States, having duly considered the present apprehensions of the counties lying upon the Ohio, and the just causes thereof, arising from the late disaster to the troops under Major General St. Clair, is desirous of affording, at the expense of the United States, all the protection which the nature of the case may require, and the public means will admit.

A considerable detachment of recruits, for the regular troops, has marched for fort Pitt. These troops will be posted in such a manner, on the upper parts of the Ohio, as will best conduce to the safety of the inhabitants.

But, in addition to this arrangement, you, as lieutenant of the county of —, will be permitted to call into service, such a number of the most expert hunters or woodsmen, to serve as scouts or patrols, in order to alarm the inhabitants on the approach of any danger, not exceeding, however, eight in number, for the county of —. It will depend upon you to make a proper choice of these scouts, for which you will be both responsible with your character to the people of your county, who may be exposed by an injudicious choice, and to the United States, who will pay the money.

And, as an inducement for suitable characters to perform the service, the United States will pay such scouts the great pay of five-sixths of a dollar per day, in lieu of all charges or expenses whatever.

The service of said men must be proved in the manner hereinafter mentioned, to wit:

On their entrance into service, they must be mustered in your presence by a justice of the peace, and sworn to the faithful discharge of their duty. In the muster then taken, the ages, names, and residence, of the said scouts, must be taken, and whether married or single. At the expiration of their services, they must be again mustered, and sworn that they have faithfully performed service for the number of days mentioned, and in the district specified.

An account is then to be made by you, of the said service, which account must be supported by the muster rolls aforementioned, certified by you, and transmitted to this office for examination and payment, accompanied by a power from you to receive the money.

You will please to acknowledge the receipt of this letter, and transmit me an account of your proceedings thereon.

The Secretary of War having, in obedience to the orders of the President of the United States, taken into consideration the memorial of the inhabitants of the frontier counties of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, to the Governor thereof, dated the 21st ultimo, together with the letter of the Governor thereon, respectfully reports:

That, in the present case it is unfortunate, and it may be equally or more so in others which may arise, that the United States are destitute of a general militia law. The frontiers require protection, and ought to have it amply imparted to them in the present moment. But no other expedient presents itself in this exigence, but requesting the Executives of the States, that have exposed counties, to call out such numbers of militia as may afford the the necessary aid. If the militia, so to be called out, should be for a short period, a considerable portion of the time would be wasted in repairing to, and returning from, the places to be defended, unless all should be taken from the frontier parts, which would be unequal and oppressive.

It would seem, therefore, most proper, then, that the militia to be called out at the general expense, should be for a period of six months, unless discharged sooner, if circumstances should permit. That the existence of these circumstances would depend upon the despatch that regular troops should be raised and marched to the frontiers, and upon other considerations at the time of their arrival, relative to the enemy.

That the following arrangement seems necessary for the frontiers of Pennsylvania:

1st. That, in addition to the detachment of regular troops now on their march to fort Pitt, and the scouts permitted to the counties of Westmoreland, Washington, and Alleghany, it might be proper to add, if the Governor should judge the measure essential, such a number of scouts for the county of Fayette, as he may deem proper, not exceeding the proportion to the other before mentioned counties, their relative situations being duly considered.

2dly. That the Governor be further allowed, if he judge the measure expedient and essentially necessary, to organize and call into service, for a period of six months, a certain number of militia, at the expense of the General Government, in the same manner as the Governor of Virginia has called into service militia, for the protection of the frontiers of said State.

That these militia be paid and subsisted at the expense of the United States, under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall direct, in order to prevent irregularities.

That the number so to be called into service, be such as may be equal on an average, to about one company for each of the frontier counties, so as to correspond as nearly as may be, to the defensive protection of Virginia.

The increased pay, however, cannot be allowed, unless by a special act of Congress; and no good reasons exist, for urging a higher pay for mere militia, than for the regular troops. Indeed, as the latter have clothing allowed, and the former none, it would appear reasonable, that the militia employed under the General Government should have an allowance for this object. But in order thereto, it would be necessary that Congress should first make a law for the purpose. Should they think proper so to do, the monthly cost of clothing for a regular soldier might be added to the pay of the militia, which would increase it nearly to five dollars per month, which, perhaps, is fully sufficient for any species of militia, excepting the scouts.

It is presumed that Governor St. Clair will make an arrangement for the protection of the French settlements at Gallipolis. The settlement at Marietta will be protected by a company of regular troops.

All which is humbly submitted to the President of the United States.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 3d January, 1792.

SIR:

The President of the United States has received and considered the memorial of the inhabitants of certain western counties, dated, Pittsburg the 21st ultimo, which you transmitted to him on the 31st of last month.

I am again directed, sir, to assure your Excellency, that it is the desire of the President of the United States that all reasonable and effectual protection be afforded the exposed parts of the frontiers, which the nature of the case may require.

That, if it should be your judgment, to the measures already ordered, and of which I informed you on the 26th ultimo, that an arrangement of the following description should be added, he will consent thereto, in behalf of the United States.

That scouts be permitted to Fayette county, in such proportion to the other exposed counties, as you shall judge proper.

That a number of such militia of the State, not exceeding two hundred and twenty-eight, non-commissioned and privates, and commanded by such officers as you shall think proper, be called into service, on the pay and rations established by the United States, and stationed at such places on the Alleghany and Ohio, and other parts of the frontiers, so as best to defend the exposed parts, according to your judgment and the county lieutenants'.

That these militia be organized into three companies, and a captain, lieutenant, and ensign, and four sergeants, four corporals, two music, and sixty-six privates.

That they be engaged for as many months as you shall judge proper, not exceeding six months, to be discharged sooner, if circumstances shall permit.

That these militia be under the orders of the respective county lieutenants, being designed for defensive protection only.

That such persons as you shall direct, furnish the rations, provided the same do not exceed eight cents.

That the proofs, both of the supplies and services, to be such as shall be prescribed by me, in order to prevent either irregularity or abuse.

That, for both the services and supplies, payment will be made by the United States, upon the adjustment of the accounts, according to the forms which may be directed.

I request your Excellency's opinion on this additional arrangement, which, if satisfactory, may be carried into immediate execution.

I have the honor to be, &c.

PHILADELPHIA, 3d January, 1792.

SIR:

In consequence of the distressed situation of the western counties of this Commonwealth, and with a view to co-operate in the design of the Federal Government, which you observe, in your letter of the 10th of March, 1791, was, to make the most effectual provision for the defensive protection of the frontiers, by calling into service, at the expense of the United States, such proportions of the militia as the nature of the case might require, I issued instructions to the lieutenants of the counties of Washington, Westmoreland, Alleghany, Fayette, and Huntingdon, for draughting a competent force from the militia under their respective commands, to act as rangers against the hostile Indians. The expense incurred upon this occasion, has, in part, been defrayed out of a sum appropriated by an act of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania. But I think it proper at this time to inquire, how far the State will be re-imbursed from the treasury of the Union, as the object seems clearly to be comprehended within the idea of general defence. You will be pleased, therefore, sir, to favor me with an explanation on this ground, that I may be enabled to render an accurate statement to the Legislature, as well respecting the past, as future expenditures, in the same service.

I am, sir, your most obedient, &c.

SIR:

In answer to you Excellency's letter of this date, I have the honor to observe, that I conceive the General Government are responsible for the pay and subsistence of the militia, called out in pursuance of the authority of the President of the United States, vested in certain county lieutenants of this State, by the letter to them of the 10th of last March, provided, that the rules therein prescribed, as well for the proofs of the service and the price of the ration, shall have been observed, and the accounts thereof duly settled at the pay office of the Department of War. And as appropriations therefor have been made by Congress, no further delay of payment will take place, than may be required for the settlement of the accounts.

SIR:

I have received your letter of the 3d instant, containing a proposition from the President of the United States, respecting additional measures to be pursued under the authority of the State Government, but at the expense of the Union, for the more effectual defence of the frontiers of Pennsylvania; and I beg you to assure the President, that, for the attainment of so desirable an object, I shall be happy to carry into effect the arrangement which is suggested, and which I have, with that view, submitted to the consideration of the General Assembly, whose interposition will be requisite to render the powers of the Executive commensurate with the plan. As soon as a legislative decision takes place, I will again address you upon the subject; and, in the mean time, I shall take the preparatory steps, conformably to the ideas which you have expressed, and of which you will be pleased to communicate my approbation to the President.

PHILADELPHIA, 23d January, 1792.

SIR:

The General Assembly of this Commonwealth having passed an act for the immediate defence of our western frontiers, I have enclosed, for the information of the President of the United States, a copy of that law, together with a copy of the instructions which I have transmitted to the lieutenants of certain counties, on the subject. As it is my intention, on this occasion, to conform, as nearly as possible, to the propositions that are contained in your letter of the 3d instant, and the explanation which you afterwards gave of their meaning and extent, you will be pleased to furnish me with a statement of the proofs which will be sufficient to establish the claim for supplies and services, and the forms that will be required in the adjustment of the accounts at your office.

I shall, from time to time, communicate to the Executive of the Federal Government, any important information that I may receive from the frontiers; and it will afford me sincere pleasure, if, upon a plan, strictly defensive, the corps of militia engaged under the authority of the State shall be found a useful auxiliary to the force employed under the authority of the Union, for the general purposes of the war.

I am, Sir, &c.

An Act to provide for the immediate defence of the frontiers of this Commonwealth.

Whereas it appears necessary, at this time, to make some effectual provision in aid of the measures of the Federal Government, for the protection of the frontiers of this Commonwealth, which are exposed to imminent danger from the Indians now at war with the United States:

Sec. 1. Be it therefore enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in General Assembly met, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That the Governor shall engage, for the term of six months, unless sooner discharged, a number of active and experienced riflemen of the militia of this Commonwealth, not exceeding two hundred and twenty-eight non-commissioned officers and privates, and station the same at such places, and in such proportions, as shall, in his judgment, be best calculated to protect and defend the western frontiers of this Commonwealth; and he shall organize the men, so to be engaged, into three companies, over which he may, if need be, appoint and commission one major; and each company shall consist of one captain, one lieutenant, and one ensign, to be appointed and commissioned by the Governor, four sergeants, four corporals, two musicians, and sixty-six privates, to be engaged as aforesaid.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the pay of the commissioned officers, respectively, shall be the same as the pay allowed to the commissioned officers of corresponding rank in the service of the United States; and there shall be allowed to such of the militia as shall be engaged as aforesaid, a bounty, which, being added to the amount of the pay allowed, or to be allowed, by the United States, to non-commissioned officers and privates in their service, as shall render the pay of the said militia equal to the sum of sixty shillings per month to each sergeant, fifty-five shillings per month to each corporal, and fifty shillings per month to each private and musician.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the sum of four thousand five hundred pounds be appropriated for carrying into effect the foregoing objects of this law, of providing the necessary arms and ammunition, and of defraying the other necessary incidental expenses for the defence of the frontiers aforesaid; which sum shall be paid by the State treasurer, upon the warrants of the Governor, out of the funds appropriated by law to pay the expenses of Government; and an account of the disbursements thereof, or of any part thereof, shall be laid by the Governor before the General Assembly, at the next ensuing session.

Circular letter from the Governor of Pennsylvania to the Lieutenants of the counties of Westmoreland, Washington, Fayette, and Alleghany, dated January 20, 1792.

GENTLEMEN:

Upon the repeated applications of the inhabitants of the western frontiers of Pennsylvania, the Executive of the Federal Government was induced to propose to me, a plan of defensive operation, for the protection of the counties which are exposed to immediate danger; and the Legislature having given their sanction to the proposal, agreeably to the terms of the enclosed act, it becomes my duty, as well as disposition, to carry it into effect with all possible energy and despatch.

You will perceive that the general militia law has been suspended, in some respects, in order to answer the present emergency, particularly in the mode of raising the intended force, which is by engaging active and experienced riflemen, wherever they can be obtained, and not by draughting in classes from the militia of the respective counties; in the mode of appointing the officers, which is immediately by the Executive, and not upon the election of the people; in the period of service, which is for six months, and not for two; and in the rate of pay, which is liberally estimated by the price of labor, and not by the military allowance established for the troops of the Federal Government.

I am desirous, however, that, as far as it is practicable, the men engaged under the authority of this law should still be considered, and act as a select corps of militia, and therefore I shall, from time to time, convey duplicates of my instructions to the commanding officer, through the medium of the lieutenants of the several counties comprehended in the description of the western frontiers.

As the first step towards organizing the proposed corps, I now transmit commissions for the officers, which you will be pleased immediately to deliver, with instructions to engage seventy-six men, of the description, and upon the terms mentioned in the act, for each of the companies to which they are respectively appointed, making, in the whole, two hundred and twenty-eight active and experienced riflemen of the militia, and to deliver regular weekly returns to the major, (whose commission is likewise transmitted) until the number of engagements shall be completed.

The men, it is to be observed, must be engaged for the period of six months, unless sooner discharged, commencing on the first day of March next; and it may be stipulated, that each man, armed with his own rifle, such as the captain of the company may approve, shall be allowed two dollars for the use of it, during the period of his engagement, and a reasonable equivalent if it is lost or destroyed in the public service. The companies being filled, are to be stationed, in the first instance, under the general direction of the major, at the following places:

1st Company.—The first company shall be stationed at the southwest corner of Washington, between the heads of Wheeling and Duncard creeks, ranging thence to the Ohio.

2d Company.—The second company shall be stationed at the mouth of Great Beaver, and ranging thence to fort Crawford, by the heads of Pine Creek.

3d Company.—The third company shall be stationed at the Kittaningranging, thence up and down the river.

Under the inspection and management of Colonel Clement Biddle, who acts on this occasion as quartermaster general for the State, a competent supply of arms and ammunition will be immediately forwarded to Pittsburg; at which place a proportionate distribution will be made and sent to the respective frontier counties. It is expected that great care will be taken to ensure the return of the arms at the expiration of the present service, and to prevent the loss or waste of ammunition.

I have also entered into a contract with John Wilkins, jun. for supplying the corps with rations, at the rate of eight cents per ration, and I am persuaded he will do honor to the confidence which is reposed in him.

You will be pleased, gentlemen, to maintain a punctual correspondence with the commanding officer of the proposed corps, and to render him every aid in your power, consistent with a plan of defensive operation, which you will remember is the sole purpose of these arrangements; though, if any unforeseen emergency should occur, they are not to preclude the general exertion of the militia for repelling actual hostilities, agreeably to the instructions contained in my letter of the 18th March, 1791.

The proofs that will be sufficient to establish the claim for supplies and services, and the forms that will be required in the adjustment of the accounts at the office of the Secretary of War, will be stated to you in the course of a few days; and, in the mean time, relying upon your zeal, discretion, and patriotism, I deem it unnecessary to add more than an earnest wish that you would, by every means, facilitate the engagements of the men for the present service; and render the interference of the Government honorable and effectual.

I am, gentlemen, &c.

[1st SESSION.]

NORTH WESTERN TRIBES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 8, 1792.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying certain communications with the Executive of Virginia, relative to the existing temporary defensive protection of the exposed frontiers of that State, pursuant to the orders of the President of the United States.

No. 1.

From the Secretary of War to the Governor of Virginia.

WAR DEPARTMENT, October 28, 1791.

SIR:

The President of the United States has directed me to inform your Excellency that he has received your letter of the 20th instant, enclosing the letter of the 4th instant, written by the commanding officer of Russell county, stating the depredations thereon by the Indians.

The President of the United States begs leave to confide the defence of Russell county to your Excellency; that, if you should judge that the situation of the said county demands the services of a full company from the interior counties of Virginia, you will please to order the same from such places and for such time as you shall judge proper.

That the United States will pay for the services of such a company of militia as your Excellency shall so order, according to the rates established by law; a schedule of which is enclosed: [See the act for regulating the military establishment of the United States, passed 30th April, 1790.] Provided, that the said militia shall be mustered by some impartial and competent officer of the militia upon the commencement and termination of the services of the said militia.

Your Excellency will please to appoint some suitable character to furnish the said company with rations by contract, the price of a ration of the description specified in the schedule No. 2, [See the said act.] not to exceed eight cents, unless the most formal and authentic evidence be produced to your Excellency that the ration is not attainable for such price, in which case your Excellency will allow a sum conformable to the price of the ration.

If your Excellency should call into service the company of militia herein contemplated, I request you will have the goodness to notify me of the same, specifying its numbers and time of service.

No. 2.

From the Secretary of War to the Governor of Virginia.

WAR DEPARTMENT, November 16, 1791.

SIR:

Upon the statement of Mr. Moore, a Representative for Virginia in Congress, it appears that some doubts exist whether the protection authorized by the President of the United States on the 28th ultimo, and transmitted to the Governor of Virginia, should be extended to the exposed parts of the counties of Wythe, Montgomery, and Washington.

I am authorized by the President of the United States to assure your Excellency that it is his desire that the defensive protection for the abovementioned counties should be as effectual as the defence of Russell county; and further to inform your Excellency, that the expense of any measures which you may think necessary on the occasion, proportioned to the object, and consisting of the militia, and to be supported with provisions in the manner as pointed out in my said letter of the 28th of last month, will be paid by the General Government, on the accounts and vouchers of the services and supplies being produced at this office.

No. 3.

Governor Randolph to the Secretary of War.

COUNCIL CHAMBER, RICHMOND, 24th November, 1791.

SIR:

Agreeable to your request, I do myself the honor to transmit to you the act of the Executive providing for the defence of the county of Russell.

You will observe that a company of men is to be recruited and continued in service until the first of December, 1792. This measure was adopted because it was considered as a more effectual defence, and was more economical, inasmuch as the frequent changes of militia in the course of such length of service, would, at certain periods, make it necessary to have double the number in pay.

There was no difficulty in procuring a proper person to undertake the contract for supplying rations, on condition of striking off from the articles composing the ration, vinegar, candles, and soap, which articles would be useless to troops engaged in this kind of service.

The ammunition which has been advanced by this State, will, I hope, be reimbursed, together with that formerly furnished the Chickasaw Indians.

If there be any thing in the arrangements which have been made for the defence of Russell county which may be contrary to the wishes or intention of the Federal Executive, we beg that you immediately communicate it, that the error be corrected.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

BEVERLEY RANDOLPH.

IN COUNCIL, November 17th, 1791.

The Governor laid before the Board a letter from the Secretary of War of the 28th ultimo, authorizing the Governor to provide for the defence of the county of Russell, together with a resolution of the present General Assembly, on the subject of the Western defence: Whereupon, it is advised,

That a company of men be raised for the defence of Russell county, consisting of sixty-six rank and file, with the proper proportion of non-commissioned officers; to be recruited and commanded by Andrew Lewis, as captain, James Hawkins, as lieutenant, and Robert Robertson, as ensign; that two and a half dollars per month be paid by this State to the non-commissioned officers and privates in addition to the allowance made by the General Government; that the 15th of March next be the time, and the court-house of Russell county the place, of rendezvous; and that the service terminate on the 1st of December, 1792, unless the company be sooner discharged; that Colonel Cowan be appointed to muster the men at the time of their assembling, and when they shall be discharged, and report, on oath, the actual number present at each muster.

That Mr. Joseph Kent be appointed contractor to supply the men with rations, each ration to consist of one pound of beef, or three quarters of a pound of pork, one pound of bread, or flour, half a gill of rum, brandy, or whiskey, and one quart of salt for every hundred rations; the price of the ration to be eight cents; and it is further advised, that two hundred pounds of powder, and eight hundred pounds of lead, be furnished from the post at the point of Fork, to the order of Captain Lewis, for the service aforesaid.

The Governor orders accordingly.

Attest,

A. BLAIR, C. C.

The Secretary of War to the Governor of Virginia.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 5th December, 1791.

SIR:

The letter of his Excellency Governor Randolph, dated Council Chamber, 24th November, 1791, was received by the last post, and submitted to the President of the United States.

And I am directed, sir, by the President, to inform you, that having confided the defence of the exposed counties of the Southwestern parts of Virginia to the Executive thereof, he feels satisfied that the defence will be proportioned to the object, and that the means to be employed will be such only as he is authorized by the laws to use for the defensive protection of the frontiers.

In raising, therefore, the company of militia mentioned in the aforesaid letter of the 24th of November, the President of the United States requests that it may be clearly understood, that he conceives the law passed the 30th of April, 1790, authorizes him to call out mere militia, who shall be entitled to receive the same pay and subsistence only as the troops of the United States, which are specified in the said law. To this may be added, such means of transportation as shall be indispensable; but he cannot promise either bounty, clothing, or any other compensation than the pay and subsistence before mentioned.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

H. KNOX.

No. 5.

Governor Lee to the Secretary of War.

COUNCIL CHAMBER, RICHMOND, December 12th, 1791.

SIR:

My predecessor transmitted to you, in his letter of the 24th of November, the act of the Executive providing for the defence of the county of Russell, and stated the reasons which induced a departure from the mode designated in your letter of the — of October.

I flatter myself, sir, you will not hesitate to sanction the system adopted, as it combines protection with order and economy.

Since information reached this place, announcing the late signal defeat of our army, various applications have been made to this government for temporary aid, from the representatives of those counties which lay exposed to Indian hostility.

We waited for many days, in the expectation of being honored with your reply, to Governor Randolph's letter of the 24th; as then we should have explicitly known your opinion, with respect to that mode of defence which had been established by the Executive, and might have accommodated our future measures thereto. Being disappointed in this expectation, and longer delay inadmissible, as the General Assembly would soon adjourn, we have adopted our arrangements for the defence of the district of Monongalia and the counties of Greenbriar, Kenhawa, Wythe, and Montgomery, on the same principles which regulated the Executive, in their act providing for the defence of the county of Russell, with the addition of a patrol to each county, consisting of two men, for the purpose of procuring and communicating intelligence.

This expensive species of troops, you will discover, sir, are reduced to a very small number, nor would they have been employed in any degree, but from a conviction, on the fullest information, that they are indispensably requisite.

Vain, indeed, would be military preparations, if the means of knowing were inhibited. And really I must consider troops systematically without these means, who are not allowed the only mode of procuring intelligence practicable in the country in which they are to act.

When you compare the military events of this year with those of the last, the temporary aid now given to that furnished then, you will agree, that, although our prospects are more gloomy, our preparations for defence have not been so expensive, and yet we trust will be found equally effective, from the alterations introduced.

In so extensive an empire, occasions will occur, where the councils and money of the members of the confederacy, in their State capacities, will necessarily be used for the accomplishment of objects belonging constitutionally to the General Government; nor will the happiness and safety of the people, in certain events, permit that delay which must otherwise result, were this beneficent instrumentality denied.

From the evident necessity of such temporary efforts on the part of the Commonwealth, with respect to the defence of our citizens, whose safety seems to continue precarious, notwithstanding the zealous and formidable military exertions of the United States, did the General Assembly, during the last and present sessions, authorize the Executive to take such measures for the defence of our frontier counties, as in their judgment might be deemed necessary.

Under this authority was the money of the Commonwealth expended last year, in defensive operations, which terminated in obedience to the directions received from the Secretary of the Department of War.

The expenses accruing from these measures have been discharged in part by the General Government, and some remain yet to be paid. A claim has lately been exhibited from the county of Randolph, against this Commonwealth, a copy of which is enclosed, wherein the second of May is fixed as the period from which the General Government considers itself properly chargeable with the disbursements issuing from the system of defence above mentioned.

I profess, sir, I must consider this distinction resulting from misinformation, and hope that the explanations which I now do myself the honor to make, will conclude this business in a manner just and satisfactory.

The Commonwealth of Virginia is certainly, in the first instance, liable for moneys stipulated to be paid for the services performed during the last year, under the authority of the Executive, previous to the commencement of the operations of the General Government, and being the only judge of the justice of such claims, propriety demands that they should be presented here for settlement. But, at the same time, I trust it will not be denied, that the moneys thus disbursed, being applied in the execution of a duty belonging to the General Government, constitute a proper charge against the United States; inasmuch as the protection, of the people from an enemy to which they were exposed, was the only end of such expenditures, and that protection from the then existing circumstances, could not be afforded in due time, without the interposition of the Legislature of the State.

Under these impressions, I have directed the proper officer to prepare an account of these expenses, which I will do myself the honor to forward to you with the requisite documents, and confidently hope, that you will, as soon as convenient, inform me where, and in what manner, the expected restitution will be made.

Permit me, sir, to say, that the Executive of this Commonwealth take very great pleasure to contribute, by any efforts in their power, towards the successful execution of the measures of the General Government, and more especially when those measures comprehend the safety of a part of this community, in whose welfare we are so deeply interested.

I herewith transmit the act of the Executive of this date, the resolution of the General Assembly, copies of letters from the lieutenant of the county of Harrison, and my instructions to the commandants of the troops to be raised, for your further information.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

HENRY LEE.

From the Representatives of the county of Ohio to the Governor of Virginia.

SIR:

The alarming intelligence lately received, of the defeat of the army in the Western country, fills our minds with dreadful fears and apprehensions, concerning the safety of our fellow-citizens in the county we represent, and we confidently hope will be an excuse to your Excellency, whose zeal has been so frequently evinced in behalf of the distressed frontier counties, for the request we are now compelled to make. In the course of last year, upwards of fifty of our people were killed, and a great part of our country plundered, notwithstanding the aid afforded by the Pennsylvanians, who joined the Virginians in our defence. The success of the Indians in their late engagement with General St. Clair, will, no doubt, render them more daring and bold in their future incursions and attacks upon our defenceless inhabitants; those adjoining the county of Harrison, extending a hundred miles, covering the county of Monongalia; and we conceive that not less than sixty or seventy men will be sufficient to defend them. Through you, sir, we beg leave to request this assistance.

WILLIAM McMACHEN,
BENJAMIN BIGGS,
Representatives from Ohio county.

An Act of the Executive of the State of Virginia, providing for the defence of the frontiers.

IN COUNCIL, December 12, 1791.

The Governor laid before the Board, sundry letters from the Representatives of the Western counties, urging the necessity of making more extensive provision for the defence of the frontiers, as the late defeat of the federal troops, under command of General St. Clair, will render them more exposed to the ravages of the Indian enemy.

Whereupon, in pursuance of the resolution of the General Assembly, authorizing the Executive to direct such temporary defensive operations in the county of Russell, or other of the Western frontier counties, (not extending to the district of Kentucky) as will secure the citizens thereof, from the hostile invasions of the Indians, it is advised—

That an additional company, consisting of a captain, lieutenant and ensign, four sergeants, four corporals, and sixty-six privates, be allowed for the defence of the counties of Wythe, Russell, and Montgomery.

That two companies be allowed for the defence of the counties of Ohio, Harrison, Monongalia, and Randolph; the men to be distributed as follows: a captain, ensign, two sergeants, two corporals, and forty-one privates, for the county of Ohio. The same for the county of Harrison. A lieutenant, two sergeants, two corporals, and twenty-five privates, for Monongalia. The same for the county of Randolph.

That one company be allowed for the defence of the counties of Greenbriar and Kenhawa.

That the men be entitled to the same pay and rations (the rations to be of the same quality, and at the same price) as were allowed the company heretofore ordered for the defence of Russell county, and their service to commence the fifteenth of March, and terminate the first of December, 1792, unless sooner discharged; that they be regularly mustered at the time of their rendezvous, and when they shall be discharged, by persons hereafter to be appointed, who shall report, on oath, the number actually present at each muster.

That two scouts be allowed for each of the aforesaid counties, with the allowance of five shillings per day each, as full compensation for their pay and subsistence. The scouts to be appointed by the commanding officers of the respective companies, and subject to their orders.

That John Preston be appointed and commissioned Captain, Robert Crockett, Lieutenant, and William Preston, Ensign, of the additional company to be raised, for the Southwestern defence. William McMahon, and William Lowther, Captains, Matthias Whiteman and John Evans, jr. Lieutenants, John Brown, jr. and Joseph Biggs, Ensigns, of the two companies allowed for Ohio, Harrison, Monongalia and Randolph. William Clendinning, Captain, Leonard Cowper, Lieutenant, and John Young, Ensign, of the Kenhawa company.

That Robert Sayers be appointed to muster the additional Southwestern company, and Joseph Kent to supply them with provisions; John P. Duvall to muster the two companies for Ohio, Harrison, Monongalia, and Randolph, and George Jackson to supply them with provisions; Thomas Lewis to muster the Kenhawa company, and Daniel Boon to supply them with provisions.

That the evidence of the services, herein specified, be the same as was required by the regulations of the twentieth of December last, for the Western defence; and,

It is further advised, that the Superintendent at the point of Fork be directed to furnish, from the public stores, two hundred weight of powder, and eight hundred weight of lead, for the use of each of the aforesaid companies.

The Governor orders accordingly.

Attest,

A. BLAIR, C. C.

From the Lieutenant of the county of Harrison to the Governor of Virginia.

RICHMOND, 27th November, 1791.

Sir:

The exposed situation and the frequent depredations which are committed in the county of Harrison by the savages, constrain me to lay before your Excellency the distressed situation of the frontiers of the said county. On the fourth day of the last month, a party of Indians fired on a party of men who were driving a drove of cattle to the Muskingum settlements; and, within five or six miles thereof, they killed four persons, took one prisoner, and wounded one. One of the party only escaped, who had several balls shot through his clothes. A few days before they fell on this party they killed a man near the Hockhocken, and took a negro boy from the little Kenhawa, who, at the time of the attack on the drivers, made his escape.

Sir, we have frequent information of hostilities being committed on some part of the Ohio, or other; our situation is distressing indeed, as there appears no protection is to be had from the Federal Government, they supposing the present expedition to be a protection to us, which is a mistaken idea, as I conceive it as an injury, rather than a protection at this time; as, no doubt, but they may suppose that we are off our guard, depending on the success of the campaign; which is truly the case. There is, at this time, a number of scouts in service, although without any authority; but your Excellency will see the necessity of the measure by the enclosed papers. I must beg leave further to inform you, that, in February, 1790, I was called on, by the frontiers of the county, for protection, as there appeared great danger at that time; and, for my own justification, I called a council of the officers of the militia, whose result was, that I should order out eight scouts, which I accordingly did; and, at the same time, the council requested of me to go in person to the President at New York, which I also did, but received no instructions from the Board of War, until the second of May, therefore can receive no pay from the United States, prior to that date, for the said scouts; so that there is from the first of March until the second of May which I could wish your interference, in order to get them paid.

The favor will be greatly acknowledged, by, sir, &c.

JOHN P. DUVALL,
County Lieutenant.

From the same, to the Governor of Virginia.

RICHMOND, 8th December, 1791.

Sir:

The late murder committed by the savages, on the 4th of October last, near to Muskingum, as well as the frequent depredations on the Western frontiers, and, in particular, the county of Harrison; and, also, the defeat of General St. Clair, which will encourage them to persist in their cruelties; I do, therefore, in behalf of my constituents, take the liberty to request of your Excellency to grant, for the protection of the said county, a sufficient number of men, which may be thought necessary to answer the purpose. Sir, as to the idea held out, that the federal troops are a protection to us, is but a mere shadow without substance; and, am sure, that your own knowledge, and experience of a military life, is sufficient to satisfy you that it is the case. I should suppose that a company of men, from the county, would be sufficient; and that the counties of Ohio and Kenhawa are in extreme danger.

I am, &c.

JOHN P. DUVALL.

From the Secretary of War to the Governor of the State of Virginia.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 24th December, 1791.

Sir:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's letter of the 12th instant, together with its enclosures, all of which have been submitted to the President of the United States.

The letter of the 24th of November, written, sir, by your predecessor, was received, by the post, on the third, and answered on the fifth instant.

The President of the United States has directed me to assure your Excellency, he considers the United States responsible for the necessary expense to be incurred, at this time, for the defensive protection of the frontiers. That the arrangement, which has been ordered by the Executive of Virginia, by their act of the 12th instant, appears judicious, and as economical as the state of the case will admit; and that it will, therefore, be paid by the General Government, according to the restrictions stated in my letter to your Excellency of the 5th instant.

It is, however, to be observed, that the employment of the scouts were not contemplated in my letter of the 5th instant; but, as they are considered essentially necessary, and as Congress have, within a few days past, made appropriations for their pay on a former occasion, the President of the United States assents fully to their adoption; at the same time, it is conceived, that the number for Ohio county are not sufficient, it having such an extended frontier.

The county lieutenant, therefore, will be permitted to call out a number, not exceeding eight, for the said county; and if your Excellency should conceive an additional number necessary to any other county, you will please to direct the same and inform me thereof.

As Major General St. Clair is empowered on the subject, it is presumed he will make an arrangement with Brigadier General Scott for the temporary defensive protection of Kentucky.

I take the liberty to request that your Excellency would be pleased to direct the county Lieutenants to make monthly returns to this office, of all militia, or scouts, employed at the expense of the United States.

When the accounts of the expenses, for the defensive protection of the past year, mentioned in your Excellency's letter, shall be received, they will be examined, and the result thereof transmitted to you.

The expenses for the scouts of Randolph county, which you enclose, shall be paid to the order of the lieutenant of the said county.

The President of the United States has directed me to thank your Excellency for your assurance of the ready concurrence of the Executive of Virginia, in the measures of the General Government, taken for the defence of the frontiers. Although this assurance had been wanting, he should have entirely relied upon the patriotism of the Executive, of which you are the head, to support every proper measure for the common good of our country.

No. 7.

From the Secretary of War to the Lieutenant of Ohio county, Virginia.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 29, 1791.

SIR:

His Excellency the Governor of Virginia has transmitted information to this office, that he had made an arrangement for two scouts for the county of Ohio. The President of the United States, having considered of the extended frontier of your county, has directed me to inform you, that, if it should be your judgment, that the scouts should be increased to any number, not exceeding, in all, eight, that the expense thereof shall be borne by the General Government, according to the regulations hereinafter mentioned.

It will depend upon you to make a proper choice of these scouts, for which you will be both responsible, with your character, to the people of your county, who may be exposed by an injudicious choice, and to the United States, who will pay the money.

And, as an inducement for suitable characters to perform the service, the United States will pay such scouts the great pay of five sixths of a dollar per day, in lieu of all charges or expenses whatever.

The service of such men must be proved in the manner hereinafter mentioned, to wit:

On their entrance into service they must be mustered, in your presence, by a justice of the peace, and sworn to the faithful discharge of their duty.

In the muster, then taken, the ages, names, and residence of the scouts must be taken, and whether married or single; at the expiration of their services, they must be again mustered, and sworn that they have faithfully performed service for the number of days mentioned, and in the distance specified.

An account is then to be made by you of the same service, which account must be supported by the muster rolls aforementioned, certified by you, and transmitted to this office for examination and payment, accompanied by a power from you to receive the money.

You will please to acknowledge the receipt of this letter, and transmit me an account of your proceedings thereon.

No. 8.

Extract of a letter from the Governor of Virginia to the Secretary of War, dated

COUNCIL CHAMBER, RICHMOND, January, 5th, 1792.

SIR:

Your letter of the 24th of last month I had the honor duly to receive; and feel myself peculiarly pleased in being told, that the system of temporary defence, adopted by the Executive of this Commonwealth, meets with the approbation of the President.

I will avail myself of his permission to enlarge the patrol allowed to the county of Ohio; a regard to whose extent of front was had, in my directions heretofore given to the commanding officer of the company to be raised for its defence, although not specified in my letter to you: and will, also, if it shall appear necessary, make a proportionate increase to the patrol allotted any other county, whose situation may require the same.

You will find, sir, by reference to our late arrangements, that the Executive have confided the protection of the frontiers solely to the captains of the volunteer militia, ordered to be levied, and not to the county lieutenants, as before.

This change they considered as a melioration. I enclose you a list of the officers appointed to the district of Monongalia, and the counties of Greenbriar and Kenhawa, lest it may so happen that yourself or General St. Clair may have occasion to write to them. I will give orders to the captains to make the monthly returns you require, and will direct the county lieutenants to forward their claims for moneys expended during the past year, in order to bring to conclusion that business.

But, sir, I fear, notwithstanding the very agreeable tenor of your letter, that this matter cannot be concluded justly, unless a change take place in the laws of Congress.

You will observe, that the Executive have been obliged to allow the pay, granted by the laws of this Commonwealth, to her militia, or to have abandoned the plan of voluntary enlistment, and relied on the disagreeable and fallacious system of legal compulsion.

This extra pay being absolutely necessary to answer the end, I consider it as a proper charge against the United States; and, although the President may be pleased to view it in the same light, unless the law above mentioned be amended, or special provision be made by Congress for the purpose, the object of my requisition will remain unfulfilled.

Our Southwestern frontier lying contiguous to the territory under the care of Governor Blount, I thought proper to advise that gentleman (having had an occasion to write to him) of the measures adopted on the part of this Commonwealth, for the temporary defence of that quarter of the State, and asked his communication to the commandant of our volunteer militia, of every relevant information which might occasionally occur.

FIVE NATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 26, 1792.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

At the conferences which Colonel Pickering had with the Five Nations at the Painted Post, the last year, ideas were then held out of introducing among them some of the primary principles of civilization. In consequence of which, as well as more firmly to attach them to the interests of the United States, they have been invited to the seat of the General Government.

As the representation now here is respectable for its characters and influence, it is of some importance that the chiefs should be well satisfied of the entire good faith and liberality of the United States.

In managing the affairs of the Indian tribes, generally, it appears proper to teach them to expect annual presents, conditioned on the evidence of their attachment to the interests of the United States. The situation of the Five Nations, and the present crisis of affairs, would seem to render the extension of this measure to them highly judicious. I, therefore, request the advice of the Senate, whether an article shall be stipulated, with the Five Nations, to the following purport, to wit:

The United States, in order to promote the happiness of the Five Nations of Indians, will cause to be expended, annually, the amount of one thousand five hundred dollars, in purchasing for them clothing, domestic animals, and implements of husbandry, and for encouraging useful artificers to reside in their villages.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, March 23d, 1792.

It was, thereupon,
Resolved, (Two-thirds of the Senate concurring) that they advise and consent to the stipulation above recited.

GENERAL VIEW.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES ON THE 7TH, AND TO THE SENATE ON THE 21ST NOVEMBER, 1792.

WAR DEPARTMENT, November 7, 1792.

SIR:

In obedience to the directions of the President of the United States, I have the honor to submit to the Senate and House of Representatives, the following papers, on the subject of Indian Affairs, to wit:

1st. A statement of the measures taken, and the overtures made to procure a peace with the Indians, northwest of the Ohio.

2d. Information received relatively to the pacific overtures, and the dispositions of the Indians northwest of the Ohio.

3d. A statement of the measures which have been taken to conciliate and quiet the Southern Indians.

4th. Information received relatively to the dispositions of the Southern Indians, and the causes of the hostilities of part of the Cherokees and Creeks.

5th. A statement of the troops in the service of the United States.

It is humbly suggested, that the public good requires that a number of these papers be considered as confidential.

I have the honor to be, with great respect,

Your most obedient humble servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

[Addressed to the presiding officers of both Houses of Congress.]

No. I.

A Statement of the measures taken, and the overtures made, to procure a peace with the Indians Northwest of the Ohio.

The Secretary of War to the Rev. Samuel Kirkland.—December 20, 1791.

SIR:

At a conference held by Colonel Pickering with the Senecas, and all the other Six Nations (excepting the Mohawks) at the Painted Post, in the month of June last, it was agreed that certain chiefs should repair to Philadelphia, during the time of Congress being in session, in order to carry into execution certain principles, tending to the civilization of the said Indians.

Colonel Pickering now writes to those chiefs at Buffalo Creek, and other places, inviting them to repair here.

In his invitation, he has invited Captain Brandt; perhaps this may not be a sufficient inducement for him to come. You will, therefore, write to him in your own name, assuring him that you will pledge yourself for his safety and welcome reception.

Immediately on your return to Oneida, you will send Indian runners to the several chiefs who are named by Colonel Pickering.

You are explicitly to understand, that the presence of a few of the principal chiefs is desired.

You will appoint Geneseo as the place for you to meet the said chiefs, with whom you will proceed directly to this city, by way of Tioga and Luzerne county.

Your knowledge of the language and customs of the Indians, a confidence in your character and integrity, induces me to place an entire reliance on you relatively to this business.

That you will send faithful and intelligent messengers, particularly to Captain Brandt, from whom you will endeavor to obtain an explicit answer.

That you will meet the said Indians at Geneseo, at the time you shall appoint, which ought to be as soon as convenient.

That you will make suitable provision for them at Geneseo, and thence on the route to this city.

That you will take all due care that they are not insulted on the road, but kindly received.

That you will inform me, in due season, of their number, and when they will arrive in this city, in order that suitable accommodations may be provided for them.

That you will keep the accounts of the expenditures upon the road, in a fair and clear manner; taking receipts for every expenditure, so that every shilling may have a proper voucher annexed thereto.

In order to enable you to execute this business in a proper manner, I have directed that the sum of three hundred and fifty dollars be placed in your hands, for which you will be held accountable.

Besides defraying your necessary expenses, while in the actual execution of this business, you shall have a reasonable compensation for your trouble, which shall be settled and paid upon the issue of the business in this city. I shall depend upon receiving your communications upon all necessary occasions; and particularly, I shall wish to obtain as early information as possible of the effect which the late defeat of our army has had upon the minds of the Six Nations, particularly the Senecas.

You will not fail, upon all proper occasions, to impress on the minds of all Indians, so that the sentiment may be diffused far and wide, that the President of the United States and Congress are highly desirous of being the protectors, friends, and ministers of good, to all peaceably disposed Indians; and, at the same time, they will punish all murderers and disturbers of the peace of the frontiers.

Message from the Secretary of War to the Cornplanter, and other Seneca chiefs, January 7th, 1792, under cover to Lieutenant Jeffers, per post to Pittsburg.

To the Cornplanter, and other chiefs of the Seneca nation, on and near the waters of the Alleghany river.

BROTHERS:

Open your ears and hear the words of your friend, for it is by General Washington's order, the Great Chief of the United States, I speak to you.

The unfortunate defeat of our troops at the Westward, does not dishearten the United States, and I hope it does not you. It is true, we lament the blood that has been spilt in a war, which you know we wished to avoid. You know this, as well from the mouth of our great chief, General Washington, as from the endeavors of Colonel Procter, whom I sent to you last spring.

But the number of men we have lost, we can easily replace; and, therefore, although the continuance of the war will be troublesome, yet, in the long run, we must conquer.

The United States have wished to be at peace with the Miami and Wabash Indians; but they have refused to listen to our invitations, and have continued to murder our people.

BROTHERS: The United States must, and will protect their frontier inhabitants; and if much evil befall the bad Indians, they will have brought it upon themselves.

General Washington regards you as our fast friend, and he will take care of you. Lieutenant Jeffers tell us you have been threatened by the bad Indians; if this should be the case, had you not better remove near his garrison? or shall we build a fort near where you are, to which you may resort in case of danger? Speak, for we wish to consider you and your people as part of ourselves.

I have sent you a few presents, to replace those things which some bad people plundered you of last spring. Receive them as an earnest of the good will of the United States; and let us know what other articles you wish, and they shall be sent you.

Let nothing shake your friendship: for, be assured, we only seek to do that which is right and just.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The Secretary of War to the Rev. Samuel Kirkland, January 9th, 1792.

SIR:

I have received a letter from General Schuyler, dated the 1st instant, informing me that he had persuaded Good Peter and French Peter to return with you; I therefore expect this letter will reach you at Geneseo. I hope this ardently, because Captain Hoops, who left Geneseo lately, saw there the Farmer's Brother, with whom he had much conversation.

The Farmer's Brother informed me of a great council about to be held at Buffalo creek, the decrease of the present moon. It is all important to know the object of this council; I conjure, you, therefore, to spare no pains nor expense to gain this information, and let me know the result by an express. I hope you will go to that council; and knowing the kindness of the General Government, that you will exert yourself that no wrong measures be taken.

I hope, earnestly, that you will succeed in bringing the chiefs to this city with you. I consider this as highly important at this time. I know, when the Indians are persuaded of the good intentions of the United States to them, that they will use their highest exertions for peace. Let me hear from you as early as possible.

I am, sir, yours, &c.

Instructions to Captain Peter Pond and William Steedman, January 9th, 1792.

GENTLEMEN:

Having verbally acquainted you with the general causes of the existing hostilities between the United States and certain Western tribes of Indians, it will not be necessary to recapitulate, particularly, the same to you in writing.

This war is irksome to the President and General Government, as well as to the people, generally, of the United States. It has, however, been brought on by events which the Government could not control.

Governor St. Clair, early in 1790, sent messages to all the tribes inhabiting the Wabash river and the Miami villages, inviting them to peace. These messages were delivered by two Frenchmen, by the name of Gamelin.

But, the invitations being disregarded, and the outrages renewed with greater violence than ever, Brigadier General Harmar, with some regular troops and militia, was sent forth, the last year, with the intention of chastising the refractory Indians, the issue of which is well known.

Immediately after this affair, Governor St. Clair sent messages to the Wyandots and Delawares.

In February last, the Cornplanter, a Seneca chief, then in this city, was informed by a written speech, signed by the President's own hand, that the United States wanted nothing of the Miami Indians, excepting peace. The Cornplanter, impressed with a conviction of the truth of these declarations, offered to go to the Miami village. But, as some disturbances happened about the time of his arrival at fort Pitt, he was delayed.

Colonel Procter, March 12th, 1791, having in company Captain Houdin, was sent to push forward the Cornplanter, and to accompany him to the hostile Indians, with the speech No. 1, together with the speeches from Governor St. Clair, No. 2. But, on his arrival at the Cornplanter's, he found him indisposed to go forward to the Miami village, unless accompanied by some more of his tribe, residing at Buffalo creek. The colonel and the Cornplanter, therefore, repaired to Buffalo creek, and assembled the Indians. But the councils were tedious, although they finally agreed to accompany Colonel Procter, provided a vessel could be obtained to carry them across the lake; but, this being impracticable, the object failed.

In addition to these measures, Colonel Pickering assembled the Six Nations, at the Painted Post, in June last, for the purpose of conciliation; and Captain Hendricks was sent forward to the Miami Indians, but was frustrated in his object by causes unnecessary to be detailed.

All conciliatory measures, therefore, failing, it became necessary to try the effect of coercion; but this, too, proved abortive, and the army under General St. Clair was defeated.

As the sentiments of the United States remain the same, the efforts for peace are again to precede other measures.

Our forces have been defeated, and we have lost a number of brave men. But the numbers so defeated were indeed small, compared with the numbers we are able to send. No doubt can exist that our strength and our resources are abundant to conquer, and even extirpate the Indians, northwest of the Ohio. But this is not our object. We wish to be at peace with those Indians—to be their friends and protectors—to perpetuate them on the land.

The desire, therefore, that we have for peace, must not be inconsistent with the national reputation. We cannot ask the Indians to make peace with us, considering them as the aggressors: but they must ask a peace of us. To persuade them to this effect is the object of your mission.

Repair to Niagara and Detroit, without suffering your business to escape you, until the proper time. When at Detroit, assume the characters of traders with the Indians—a business Mr. Pond is well acquainted with. Mix with the Miami and Wabash Indians. Find their views and intentions, through such channels as your discretion shall direct. Learn the opinions of the more distant Indians. Insinuate, upon all favorable occasions, the humane disposition of the United States; and, if you can by any means ripen their judgment, so as to break forth openly, and declare the readiness of the United States to receive, with open arms, the Indians, notwithstanding all that is past, do it. If such declaration should be made, at the Miami or Wabash, and be well received, you might persuade some of the most influential chiefs to repair to our posts on the Ohio, and so, from post to post, to this place.

But, if you should be so fortunate as to succeed in persuading the chiefs of the Miami and hostile, and any other neighboring tribes, to repair here, every possible precaution must be taken by you, and by the commanding officer of the troops, who is hereby required to afford the necessary escorts, in order to guard the Indians from being injured by the whites.

While among the Indians, or at Niagara, or Detroit, endeavor to find out the numbers and tribes of the Indians who were in the attack of General St. Clair, and their loss, killed and wounded; what number of prisoners they took; and what they did with them; what disposition they made of the cannon taken, arms, tents, and other plunder; what are their intentions for the next year; the numbers of the association; how they are supplied with arms, ammunition, and provisions.

You will readily perceive, that the information required must be given me at the earliest period possible. You will, therefore, let me know, by some means which you must devise, your arrival at Niagara, Detroit, and the Miami village; and, if possible, from thence, what are your prospects.

You have herewith delivered you eight hundred dollars—for this sum you will be held accountable, and for which you must produce vouchers. It is intended to defray your expenses, and to facilitate the great object of your mission. Your reputation will stand pledged that it be applied only on proper occasions.

Besides your reasonable expenses, while employed in this mission, you shall be paid, on your return, a liberal compensation for your services, by the United States. It is unnecessary, at this time, to say what the sum shall be; but, you may be assured, in any event, it shall be in proportion to the hazard and fatigue of the business; and, if successful, also in proportion to the services you may render.

You are hereby informed, that I have employed the Reverend Mr. Kirkland to persuade some of the chiefs of the Six Nations to repair to this place. You will probably see him at Genesee. But, although you may obtain as much information from him as possible, yet you must not discover the object of your mission to him, or any other mortal, until the proper time of its execution: if you do, you will ruin the plan, and, perhaps, lose your lives too.

I have been informed, that, at the decrease of this moon, there is to be a great council of the Senecas assembled at Buffalo creek, near fort Erie. It is important I should know the object of this council; endeavor, therefore, to find it out, and let me know, by an express: provided, however, that Mr. Kirkland should not be able to inform you. I have written to him upon this subject, which I deliver to you.

Your route will be from hence to Wyoming; thence to the Painted Post, and to Genesee, where you will obtain runners to go with you to Niagara.

Given, &amp;c.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.To Captain Waterman Baldwin.—10th February, 1792.

SIR:

You have herewith delivered to you a message from me to the New Arrow, Cornplanter, and other chiefs of the Seneca Indians, residing on the Alleghany, which you are to deliver and explain to them.

The standing object of the United States, is, to be at peace with all the Indian tribes; but the bad conduct of the Western Indians renders it impracticable at present. In this situation of affairs, the Seneca Indians, at Buffalo creek, have been invited, and are expected in Philadelphia. As we depended on the attendance of the New Arrow, Cornplanter, and other chiefs, at the Alleghany, we did not send messages to them at the same time, more especially, as we understood that they had gone to the council at Buffalo. But, as they may possibly conceive themselves neglected, they are now invited. It is doubtful, however, whether they may think their families safe, during their absence, and therefore decline to come.

If this should be the case, you may assure them of the decided friendship of the United States. That, if they can be answerable for their young men not joining at all the war, they had better remain quiet. But if they think the young men will join one side or the other, they had better join ours; which conduct will cement our friendships, and render us one people. In this case, we will furnish them with arms, ammunition, provisions, and, besides, will pay them as shall be agreed upon.

But it is my desire that, if possible, the chiefs, Captain Snake included, should repair to this city, in order to make a general arrangement; if they will consent to this measure, you are to accompany them, together with Joseph Nicholson, the interpreter, to whom I have written.

If the said chiefs come here, you will pay their expenses on the road; and, in order to enable you so to do, I shall direct that, upon your return at fort Pitt, Major Craig shall furnish you with two hundred dollars, and I now give you one hundred dollars for your expenses. As soon as you get the answer, you are to return here to me with all possible despatch.

You will call at fort Pitt for Joseph Nicholson, and at fort Franklin, to let Lieutenant Jeffers know your business.

But you are to keep your business a secret from all other persons, excepting Captain Cass, at fort Pitt, to whom you are to communicate it in confidence.

Your activity and fidelity have been approved, your discretion and judgment are now to be tried. I hope they will be equal to the duty assigned you.

Message from the Secretary of War to the New-Arrow, Cornplanter, Big-Log, and other Seneca chiefs, to repair to Philadelphia—per Captain W. Baldwin. 10th February, 1792.

BROTHERS: I sent a message to you on the 7th day of last March, by Lieutenant Jeffers. I hope you received that message, and the goods therein mentioned.

Your situation is such, and the bad Indians are so hostile, that it is the desire of the President of the United States, that the New-Arrow, the Cornplanter, and two other principal chiefs, should immediately repair to Philadelphia, in order to decide on the measures which shall best promote the common good of the Senecas and the white people. This invitation is to extend to Captain Snake, and one or two other influential chiefs of his tribe, residing on the Alleghany.

We have invited the Farmers' Brother, and other chiefs, who reside at Buffalo creek, to repair here, in order to convince them how much it will be for their interest to consider themselves as the fast friends of the United States.

Although we have a full conviction of the friendship of the New-Arrow, the Cornplanter, and the other chiefs and warriors residing on the Alleghany, yet we should like them to be present at the proposed meeting with the chiefs from Buffalo creek, so that all our proceedings may be marked with the highest openness and truth.

But you are to judge how far you may with safety leave your families, for the time you must necessarily be absent, in order to repair here.

If you should judge your families would not be safe, then we will concur in the best arrangements to secure them, as we should to secure our own women and children.

Let us know, immediately, your intention, because, if you cannot come and receive the words which I have to speak to you in the name of the President of the United States, I must commission some person to repair to you with another message, and some further propositions concerning your own safety, and to cement our friendship.

I send you this message by Captain Waterman Baldwin, who will accompany you to this city; or who, in case of your declining to come, will be the bearer of your message.

Given, &c.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

To Captain Joseph Brandt—per Mr. James M. Reed, express. 25th February, 1792.

SIR:

Colonel Pickering, who had some communications with the Senecas, and others of the Six Nations, during the two last years, was duly authorized to invite you to visit this city, in order to consult you upon the best means of civilizing and advancing the happiness of the Indians. Some information has been recently received from Mr. Kirkland, intimating your disposition to perform the visit, but declining to do it upon the former invitation, as not being sufficiently explicit.

I now repeat to you this invitation, accompanied with a wish that you would repair to this city, which is the seat of the General Government; and I can assure you that the President of the United States will be highly gratified by receiving and conversing with a chief of such eminence as you are, on a subject so interesting and important to the human race.

This invitation is given to you from the fairest motives. The President of the United States is conscious of the purest dispositions to promote generally the welfare of the Indians, and he flatters himself that proper occasions only are wanting to impress them with the truth of this assertion. He considers your mind more enlightened than theirs, and he has hopes that your heart is filled with a true desire to serve the essential interests of your countrymen. The United States, much against the inclination of the Government, are engaged in hostilities with some of the Western Indians. We, on our parts, have entered into it with reluctance, and consider it as a war of necessity; and not, as is supposed and industriously propagated by many, for the purpose of accumulating more land than has been ceded by the treaty with the Indians, since the peace with Great Britain. We are desirous of bringing it to a conclusion, not from any apprehension as to a favorable result, because, by a comparison of forces and resources, however troublesome a perseverance therein may be to us, it must be utter destruction to the hostile Indians. We are desirous, for the sake of humanity, of avoiding such a catastrophe.

This is the main business which will be mentioned to you on the part of the United States; and it is an object worthy of the best cultivated head and heart. If you should enter into this view, Mr. Kirkland has directions to concert with you the most satisfactory mode of your performing the journey. The nature of the case will show the necessity of your coming without delay, if you incline to accept this invitation.

To the Rev. Samuel Kirkland—per Mr. James M. Reed, express. 25th February, 1792.

SIR:

I have received your letter of the 13th, with its enclosures, by Mr. Reed.

I transmit you a letter for Captain Brandt, whose presence here is considered of great importance. You will, of course, spare no pains in endeavoring to induce him to come; the means you will carefully devise.

In case of his compliance, you will arrange with him the most satisfactory mode of travelling, which ought to be as flattering to him as may be; and you will accompany him.

It will be important that the Buffalo and Genesee Indians also come, particularly the former. In case of their journey, you will inform me duly thereof, and send them under the care of General Chapin, or such other person as you shall judge proper, with suitable interpreters, while you accompany Captain Brandt.

I have ordered Mr. Reed three hundred dollars; agreeably to your request.

The Secretary of War to the Rev. Samuel Kirkland—per Colonel Procter and Lieutenant Sedam.—7th March, 1792.

Sir:

I have received your favor of the 25th ultimo. I am heartily glad you have succeeded in obtaining the chiefs to come with you. I am sensible the number, with some people, will be considered as objectionable, but I am induced to believe that your prudence has been properly exercised on this point.

In order to secure the Indians from any insult, I have persuaded Colonel Procter and Lieutenant Sedam to meet and conduct you to this city.

It would be proper that I should be acquainted, at least a week before your arrival, how they are to be lodged, whether in one house, or any distinction made in the manner of their accommodation.

I would have them satisfactorily treated on the road; in order to this end, I have sent you, by Lieutenant Sedam, seven hundred dollars.

You will remember that duplicate vouchers must be produced for all expenditures.

It is the desire of the President of the United States that no pains, or even reasonable expense, should be spared to obtain a visit from Captain Brandt. You will therefore arrange this matter on the best possible footing, on receiving my letter of the 25th ultimo.

Speech of the President of the United States to the chiefs and representatives of the Five Nations of Indians, in Philadelphia.—23d March, 1792.

SACHEMS AND WARRIORS OF THE FIVE NATIONS: It affords me great satisfaction to see so many of you, who are the respectable chiefs and representatives of your several tribes; and I cordially bid you welcome to the seat of Government of the United States.

You have been invited to this place by Colonel Pickering, at my special request, in order to remove all causes of discontent, to devise and adopt plans to promote your welfare, and firmly to cement the peace between the United States and you, so as that, in future, we shall consider ourselves as brothers indeed.

I assure you that I am desirous that a firm peace should exist, not only between the United States and the Five Nations, but also between the United States and all the natives of this land; and that this peace should be founded upon the principles of justice and humanity, as upon an immovable rock.

That you may partake of all the comforts of this earth, which can be derived from civilized life, enriched by the possession of industry, virtue, and knowledge; and I trust that such judicious measures will now be concerted to secure to you, and your children, these invaluable objects, as will afford you just cause of rejoicing while you live.

That these are the strong and sincere desires of my heart, I hope time and circumstances will convince you. But, in order that our peace and friendship may forever be unclouded, we must forget the misunderstandings of past times. Let us now look forward and devise measures to render our friendship perpetual.

I am aware that the existing hostilities with some of the Western Indians have been ascribed to an unjust possession of their lands by the United States. But be assured, that this is not the case; we require no lands but those obtained by treaties, which we consider as fairly made, and particularly confirmed by the treaty of Muskingum, in the year 1789.

If the Western Indians should entertain the opinion that we want to wrest their lands from them, they are laboring under an error. If this error could be corrected, it would be for their happiness; and nothing would give me more pleasure, because it would open to both of us the door of peace.

I shall not enter into further particulars with you at present, but refer you to General Knox, the Secretary of War, and Colonel Pickering, who will communicate with you upon the objects of your journey, and inform me thereof.

As an evidence of the sincerity of the desires of the United States for perfect peace and friendship with you, I deliver you this white belt of wampum, which I request you will safely keep.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

[On the 13th of March, a deputation of the Five Nations, consisting of fifty, arrived in Philadelphia. They were invited through the agency of Mr. Kirkland, for the purpose of attaching them to, and convincing them of, the justice and humanity of the United States; and also, to influence them to repair to the hostile tribes, in order to use their efforts to bring about a peace. These objects appeared to be effected, and they departed to carry them into execution. Besides abundant presents, fifteen hundred dollars, annually, were stipulated to these Indians by the President and Senate of the United States, for the purpose of attempting to civilize them.

All the various speeches, to and from them, have not been deemed necessary to be here inserted. The speeches of the President of the United States to them, of the 23d of March, soon after their arrival, and of the 23d of April, before their departure, together with Colonel Pickering's speech to them, of the 30th of April, will show the general aspect of this conference.

They arrived at Buffalo creek in the beginning of June, but, owing to their frequent counselling, and dilatory manner of conducting business, they did not set out from fort Erie for the hostile Indians until the middle of September, when they were accompanied by the firm friend of the United States, the Cornplanter.

The result of their interference is not yet known, but may, with the determination of the hostile Indians, be daily expected.]

Instructions to Captain Alexander Trueman, of the First United States' Regiment.—3d April, 1792.

Sir:

Confiding in your judgment and abilities to execute the mission herein designated, I hereby request you, in the name of the President of the United States, to enter upon the duties thereof, with all possible despatch.

You will, therefore, immediately repair to Pittsburg. I have herewith given you an order to Captain Hughes, to furnish you with an escort, and a boat to transport you to fort Washington. On your arrival at that place, you will disclose to Lieutenant Colonel-commandant Wilkinson the object of your mission, and concert with him the proper means for carrying it into execution.

I have directed him, in a letter herewith delivered to you, to afford you all possible facility in pursuance of your orders.

I have also, herewith delivered you a speech for the Western Indians, with which you will repair to the Miami village, accompanied by such Indians, men or women, or both, as shall be judged best by you and Lieutenant Colonel Wilkinson. This speech is also accompanied by a belt. It will be of the highest importance that you shall have an interpreter capable fully of explaining your ideas.

You will observe that the speech is designed to effect a peace with the hostile Indians, on the terms of humanity and justice; your language must all, therefore, be to the same effect.

As the confederacy of Indians is supposed to be extensive, it will require time to bring your negotiations to a favorable issue. Your patience, your fortitude, and your knowledge of the human character, will all be tested by the objects of your mission.

It may be said on all occasions, and the issue will justify the assertion, that nothing is more desired than to remove all causes of discontent, and to establish a peace upon a firm foundation.

But, that, in order to bring about an event so pregnant with happiness to the Indians, they must instantly abstain from all further hostilities, recall their parties if they have any out, as we shall do, and let every thing be settled amicably.

If the chiefs of the hostile tribes can be induced to repair here, it is conceived the view of the population of the country, and the improvements of all sorts, will exhibit to their minds, in strong colors, the futility of their continuing the war. As a further inducement to repairing here, presents of clothing and silver ornaments may be stipulated. The Creek treaty, the treaty with the Cherokees, and the present manner in which the deputation of the Six Nations, now in this city, are treated, may be cited as strong proofs of the pacific and liberal intentions of the General Government.

Impressed verbally, as you have been, of the importance of a peace being concluded with the hostile Indians, little more need be added. I shall only say, that it is an event most devoutly desired by the President of the United States, and the people generally. If you shall be the instrument of effecting it, much personal reputation and honor will be the result; besides which, I am authorized by the President of the United States, that your expenses, while in the employment, shall be supported by the public, and that you shall be liberally rewarded in a pecuniary manner.

It will be important that you take with you some white, or other persons, to serve as messengers between you and the commanding officer, so that he may be informed, and through him, me, of your prospects, from time to time. If you should succeed, you will please to accompany the chiefs to this place; but if you should fail, you will join the army under the commanding officer, after stating in the most ample manner the progress and result of your proceedings.

I am, sir, &c.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

Speech from the Secretary of War, to all the Sachems and Warriors of the tribes inhabiting the Miami river of Lake Erie, and the waters of the Wabash river, the Wyandots, Delawares, Ottawas, Chippewas, Pattawatamies, and all other tribes residing to the southward of the lakes east of the Mississippi, and to the northward of the river Ohio, 4th April, 1792—per Captain Alexander Trueman.

BROTHERS:

The President of the United States, General Washington, the Great Chief of the nation, speaks to you by this address. Summon, therefore, your utmost powers of attention, and hear the important things which shall be spoken to you concerning your future welfare; and after having heard and well understood all things, invoke the Great Spirit above to give you due deliberation and wisdom, to decide upon a line of conduct that shall best promote your happiness, and the happiness of your children, and perpetuate you and them on the land of your forefathers.

BROTHERS: The President of the United States entertains the opinion, that the war which exists is founded in error and mistake on your parts. That you believe the United States want to deprive you of your lands and drive you out of the country. Be assured this is not so; on the contrary, that we should be greatly gratified with the opportunity of imparting to you all the blessings of civilized life, of teaching you to cultivate the earth, and raise corn; to raise oxen, sheep, and other domestic animals; to build comfortable houses, and to educate your children, so as ever to dwell upon the land.

BROTHERS: The President of the United States requests you to take this subject into your serious consideration, and to reflect how abundantly more it will be for your interest to be at peace with the United States, and to receive all the benefit, thereof, than to continue a war which, however flattering it may be to you for a moment, must in the end prove ruinous.

This desire of peace has not arisen in consequence of the late defeat of the troops under Major General St. Clair; because, in the beginning of the last year, a similar message was sent you by Colonel Procter, but who was prevented from reaching you by some insurmountable difficulties. All the Senecas at Buffalo creek can witness the truth of this assertion, as he held, during the month of April last, long conferences with them, to devise the means of getting to you with safety.

War, at all times, is a dreadful evil to those who are engaged therein, and more particularly so where a few people engage to act against so great numbers as the people of the United States.

BROTHERS: Do not suffer the advantages you have gained to mislead your judgment, and influence you to continue the war; but reflect upon the destructive consequences which must attend such a measure.

The President of the United States is highly desirous of seeing a number of your principal chiefs, and convincing you, in person, how much he wishes to avoid the evils of war for your sake, and the sake of humanity.

Consult, therefore, upon the great object of peace; call in your parties, and enjoy a cessation of all further depredations; and as many of the principal chiefs as shall choose, repair to Philadelphia, the seat of the General Government, and there make a peace, founded upon the principles of justice and humanity. Remember that no additional lands will be required of you, or any other tribe, to those that have been ceded by former treaties, particularly by the tribes who had a right to make the treaty of Muskingum in the year 1789.

But, if any of your tribes can prove that you have a fair right to any lands, comprehended by the said treaty, and have not been compensated therefor, you shall receive full satisfaction upon that head.

The chiefs you send shall be safely escorted to this city; and shall be well fed and provided with all things for their journey; and the faith of the United States is hereby pledged to you for the true and liberal performance of every thing herein contained and suggested; and all this is confirmed, in your manner, by the great white belt, hereto attached.

Captain Trueman, the bearer, will show you the treaties which the United States have made with the powerful tribes of Indians south of the Ohio—the Creeks, Cherokees, Chickasaws, and Choctaws. You will there have the most decisive proof of the justice and liberality of the United States towards the Indian tribes.

At present, there is in the city of Philadelphia, a deputation of fifty of the principal chiefs of the Five Nations, to wit: The Oneidas, Tuscaroras, Onondagas, and Senecas. Were you to see, with your own eyes, the kind manner in which these chiefs are treated, you would never more think of lifting the hatchet against the United States, who are desirous of being your best friends.

Come, then, and be convinced for yourselves, of the beneficence of General Washington, the Great Chief of the United States, and afterwards return and spread the glad tidings of peace and prosperity of the Indians to the setting sun.

H. KNOX,

Secretary for the Department of War, and Director of Indian Affairs.

The Secretary of War to Captain Joseph Brandt, 23d April, 1792, per Doctor Deodat Allen.

SIR:

I have received your letter of the 27th of March, postponing your visit to this city until a period of thirty days after that date.

I regret exceedingly the existence of any circumstance which suspended your visit. But as the dispositions of the President of the United States remain the same, as to the objects mentioned in my former letter, I can with great truth assure you, that your visit at the time you proposed, will be cordially received.

General Chapin, who is appointed an agent to the Five Nations, will either accompany you to this city, or he will obtain some other person for that purpose, as shall be agreed upon between you and him.

The Secretary of War to General Israel Chapin, 23d April 1792, per Doctor Deodat Allen.

SIR:

I have the pleasure to inform you, that the President of the United States appoints you a deputy temporary agent to the Five Nations of Indians, until further directions, at the rate of five hundred dollars per annum.

It will be necessary that you should take the oaths which are herein enclosed, before a magistrate, and transmit the same to me.

I herewith transmit you, by the hands of Doctor Deodat Allen, the sum of four hundred dollars.

The main object in placing this sum in your hands at present, is to enable you to make a suitable provision for Captain Joseph Brandt, who it is expected will shortly make a visit to this city, and to request that you would either accompany him to this city, or that you would otherwise provide for his journey in a manner perfectly agreeable to him; and that you would give me due notice of his approach at least five days previously to his arrival here.

I shall shortly transmit you particular rules for your conduct in this office.

In the meantime I observe that it is the firm determination of the President of the United States, that the utmost fairness and kindness shall be exhibited to the Indian tribes within the United States.

That it is not only his desire to be at peace with all the Indian tribes, but to be their guardians and protectors against all injustice.

You will please to observe, that a due accounting of all moneys or goods, placed in your hands, will be rigidly exacted, and that you must always produce vouchers for every dollar expended.

The Secretary of War to Doctor Deodat Allen, 25th April, 1792.

SIR:

I request that you will please to proceed with the letter herewith delivered to Captain Brandt, who is again invited to repair to this city.

I have written to General Israel Chapin, at Genesee, who is appointed deputy agent, to make a suitable provision for Captain Brandt's journey, and to accompany him to this city. If General Chapin should not be able to perform the journey, I should hope you will do it; for which I shall compensate, as well as for the performance of the business herein requested.

I have also delivered herewith, a letter to General Chapin, and a warrant for four hundred dollars, on which you will receive the money and deliver the same to General Chapin.

Message from the President of the United States to the delegation from the Five Nations of Indians in Philadelphia, 25th April, 1792.

MY CHILDREN OF THE FIVE NATIONS! You were invited here at my request, in order that measures should be concerted with you, to impart such of the blessings of civilization as may at present suit your condition, and give you further desires to improve your own happiness.

Colonel Pickering has made the particular arrangements with you, to carry into execution these objects, all of which I hereby approve and confirm.

And in order that the money necessary to defray the annual expenses of the arrangements which have been made, should be provided permanently, I now ratify an article which will secure the yearly appropriation of the sum of one thousand five hundred dollars, for the use and benefit of the Five Nations—the Stockbridge Indians included.

The United States having received and provided for you as for a part of themselves, will, I am persuaded, be strongly and gratefully impressed on your minds, and those of all your tribes.

Let it be spread abroad among all your villages, and throughout your land, that the United States are desirous not only of a general peace with all the Indian tribes, but of being their friends and protectors.

It has been my direction, and I hope it has been executed to your satisfaction, that during your residence here, you should be well fed, well lodged, and well clothed; and that presents should be furnished for your wives and families.

I partake of your sorrow on account that it has pleased the Great Spirit to take from you two of your number by death, since your residence in this city. I have ordered that your tears should be wiped away according to your custom, and that presents should be sent to the relations of the deceased.

Our lives are all in the hands of our Maker, and we must part with them whenever he shall demand them; and the survivors must submit to events they cannot prevent.

Having happily settled all your business, and being about to return to your own country, I wish you a pleasant journey, and that you may safely return to your families after so long a journey, and find them all in good health.

Given under my hand, &c.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

Instructions to General Israel Chapin, deputy temporary agent to the Five Nations of Indians—the Stockbridge Indians included, 28th April, 1792, per Joseph Smith.

SIR:

Having transmitted you the original of the enclosed duplicate on the 23d instant, by Doctor Deodat Allen, I now transmit you, by Mr. Joseph Smith, the following general rules and orders, for your government as deputy temporary agent for the Five Nations.

Enclosed you have a law of Congress relative to Indian affairs, and certain regulations which have been delivered to the superintendents; all of which you will observe, as far as the same shall be applicable to you as deputy agent.

Arthur St. Clair, Esq. the Governor of the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio, is the superintendent for the Northern district. You being, therefore, under him, will correspond with, and inform him of all general occurrences in your agency, and receive and obey his orders in all things relative thereto; and at the same time you will constantly correspond with me as Secretary of War, and receive and obey all orders I shall transmit to you, as the orders of the President of the United States.

It being important for the regular administration of the Departments of Government, that every transaction should be made with due form; you will, therefore, please to observe, that, for all sums and effects you receive, you must credit the United States, by the department through which you have received the said sums and effects. That for all your deliveries you will debit the United States, noticing the cause of such deliveries, and to whom; and in all practicable cases, you will take receipts for the articles and sums delivered; and for all other cases, you will have certificates of respectable witnesses, of the deliveries.

By adhering to these general principles, and keeping your accounts in a perspicuous manner, they will be passed with ease, and much perplexity prevented on your part.

That it is the most ardent desire of the President of the United States, and the General Government, that a firm peace should be established with the neighboring tribes of Indians, on such pure principles of justice and moderation, as will enforce the approbation of the dispassionate and enlightened part of mankind.

That it is the intention of the President of the United States, that an adherence to this desire, as to a well founded maxim, shall be the leading feature in the administration of Indian affairs, while he is at the head of the government.

That he shall lament, exceedingly, all occasions which shall either suspend or impede the operations of those principles, which he considers essential to the reputation and dignity of the republic.

That in pursuance of these ideas, he endeavored that a genuine state of their situation, and of the general dispositions of the United States, upon this subject, should be brought home to the minds of the Western Indians, before any coercion was attempted.

That, although the essays to this end were then ineffectual, yet it has been his directions, that similar intimations shall be continued.

That, therefore, every effort is making, in order to impress the hostile Indians with their past errors. That the United States require nothing of them but peace, and a line of conduct tending to their own happiness.

That all which is passed, shall still be buried in oblivion, provided they will immediately agree to a treaty of peace, in which they will obtain all they can possibly desire, and relinquish nothing; for we demand none of their lands.

That we are not sensible the hostile Indians, that is, the Miami and Wabash Indians, have any just claims to lands comprehended in the former treaties. But, notwithstanding, if they show they possess a fair right to any of those lands, they shall receive a liberal compensation for the same.

It is presumed, if these sentiments could be fully impressed on the minds of the hostile Indians, (and measures are taken for that purpose) that the establishment of tranquillity on the frontiers, would be the probable consequence.

But if the hostile Indians should, after having these intentions of the government laid fully before them, still persist in their depredations on the frontiers, it will be considered as the dictates of humanity, to endeavor to punish, with exemplary severity, so incorrigible a race of men, in order to deter other tribes, in future, from a like conduct.

In pursuance of these friendly sentiments, the United States have stipulated with the Five Nations the following article, and have thereon made the arrangements contained in your special instructions of this date:

“GEORGE WASHINGTON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

“To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

“Whereas an article has been stipulated with the Five Nations of Indians, by, and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, which article is in the words following, to wit:

““The President of the United States, by Henry Knox, Secretary for the Department of War, stipulates, in behalf of the United States, the following article, with the Five Nations of Indians, so called, being the Senecas, Oneidas, and the Stockbridge Indians, incorporated with them the Tuscaroras, Cayugas, and Onondagas, to wit: the United States, in order to promote the happiness of the Five Nations of Indians, will cause to be expended, annually, the amount of one thousand five hundred dollars, in purchasing for them clothing, domestic animals, and implements of husbandry, and for encouraging useful artificers to reside in their villages.

“In behalf of the United States:

[L. s.] H. KNOX,

Secretary for the Department of War.

“Done in the presence of TOBIAS LEAR,
NATHAN JONES.”

“NOW, KNOW YE, That I, having seen and considered the said article, do accept, ratify, and confirm the same.

“In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed, and signed the same with my hand. Given at the City of Philadelphia, the twenty-third day of April, in the year of our Lord [L. s.] one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, and in the sixteenth year of the sovereignty and independence of the United States.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

“By the President:

THOMAS JEFFERSON.”

You will clearly understand, that the United States have, under the constitution, the sole regulation of Indian affairs, in all matters whatsoever. You will, therefore, receive no orders but from me, in the name of the President, and from the superintendent.

In all your transactions, your conduct must be marked with economy, and a due regard to the public interests. Your permanent appointment and your reputation, will materially depend on your attention to this order.

It will, therefore, be your duty, not only to guard the public property from waste or embezzlement, but to prevent any other person from doing the same. Your accounts will be rigidly examined, and any deviations from this order will be in your own wrong.

You are to understand, that any improper assembling of the Indians, will be considered as a violation of your orders, and will be severely censured, besides the expenses disallowed.

It will be proper, that you establish some certain mode of communicating with me, by confiding your letters to some persons of reputation, on the route from Canandaigua to Philadelphia.

Colonel Pickering is of opinion that Matthias Hollenback, of Wilkesbarre, Guy Maxwell, Esquire, at Tioga Point, and Mr. John Morris, at Newtown Point, would be proper persons for this purpose; I shall, accordingly, direct my letters to you through them, until I receive your further communications on the subject.

Given, &c.

H. KNOX,

Secretary for the Department of War.

The speech of Timothy Pickering, commissioner, to the Sachems and Chiefs of the Five Nations.

As some of you propose to attend the great council of Western Indians, soon to be held near the west end of Lake Erie, you are hereby authorized to assure those Indians of the sincere disposition of the United States to make peace with them. That there has been, probably, an unhappy mistake prevailing among them, relative to the claims of the United States to the lands northwest of the Ohio, as though we extended them even to the Mississippi, and to all the country between the lakes Erie, St. Clair, Huron, and Michigan. As you have in your hands the map of the country, you can explain it to them; and show what parts the United States have purchased at the treaties at fort McIntosh and Muskingum, and at the mouth of the great Miami, which runs into the Ohio. That we claim no lands but what belong to the nations who sold to us, that we claim not a foot of the lands of any nation, with whom we have yet held no treaties. That if, at the treaties held with other nations, there has been any wrong doing, the United States will do what is right, and make ample compensation. That, if they are disposed to treat with the United States, in order to make peace, and settle all matters in dispute, and they will send runners to give notice thereof, to the commanding officers of any of our posts, orders will be given for their friendly reception, and measures taken to conduct the chiefs and all others, who shall come to the treaty, to fort Washington, on the Ohio, near the mouth of the little Miami, where provisions in abundance will be ready for their support. And as the long continued hostilities may have rendered them jealous, the United States will deliver into their hands a proper number of officers, as hostages for the safety of the chiefs, and all who shall attend them at the treaty. Fort Washington is proposed as the most suitable place for the treaty, because it is but a few steps from the country of the Western Indians; because provisions can be got there in plenty; and because there will be commissioners on the spot, to treat with them.

If they enter into a treaty, the Western Indians will experience the friendship of the United States, as you have done; and those who are the instruments in bringing about a peace, will be liberally rewarded, while they will receive the thanks and blessings of many nations.

In behalf of the United States:

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Commissioner.

Dated at Philadelphia, the thirtieth of April, 1792.

[The Five Nations, especially the Senecas, manifesting great uneasiness at the proposal of holding a treaty at fort Washington, whither they said the hostile Indians would not come, the passage here written, was added:]

"Although the Western Indians would be perfectly safe, in attending a treaty at fort Washington, yet, if they are unwilling to go to that place, we will meet them at some other, convenient to them and to us; as on the Muskingum, or Big Beaver creek, or twenty or thirty miles up French creek, above Venango, at places where there are no forts."

The Secretary of War to Colonel Timothy Pickering.—May 3d, 1792.

SIR:

I have received your letter of this date, relatively to the presents designed for the Oneidas, Tuscaroras, and Stockbridge Indians; all which shall be complied with.

Will you be so good as to stipulate with Captain Hendricks, and his brother, a satisfactory compensation for his journey? If the object shall be effected conspicuously by his means, he shall, in addition to the compensation, have five hundred dollars, his brother two hundred, and the Delaware the same.

Pray have the goodness this day to inform Colonel Louis, explicitly, of the intentions of the Government, and of the measures which will be proper for him to pursue in concurrence therewith. He ought to be well clothed, and have money, so that he may return immediately.

The Secretary of War to General Israel Chapin.—8th May, 1792.

SIR:

Captain Hendricks, the bearer, and his brother, having been themselves convinced of the moderation and justice of the intentions of the United States towards the hostile Indians, propose attempting to display the same to the said Indians.

Captain Hendricks proposes obtaining a passage in a canoe from Buffalo creek. He will show you his instructions. As it is of great importance there should be no delay or impediment in his going forward, I request that you would accompany him to Buffalo creek, and stimulate his instant departure.

The horses which Captain Hendricks and his brother ride will be delivered to you, together with the saddles and bridles, all of which you will sell for the most they will fetch, and charge yourself with the proceeds, and inform me of the amount thereof.

Instructions to Captain Hendrick Aupamut, Chief of the Stockbridge Indians.—8th May, 1792.

You having agreed to repair to the great council of Indians, soon to be held at the Miami river of lake Erie, in order to convince them of the moderation, justice, and desire of the United States for peace, are to regard this letter as the general rule of your conduct.

You will immediately repair to General Israel Chapin, in the Genesee country, having the charge of Indian affairs in that district. He will accompany you to Buffalo creek, or such other place upon lake Erie as shall be agreed upon, and make arrangements for your immediate departure for the Miami river.

Upon your arrival at the assembled council, you will, in the manner you shall judge best, inform the said Indians of the desire of the United States for peace; that they claim no Indian lands but those purchased at a fair treaty.

That all the stories they have heard to the contrary must be disbelieved. You having been informed upon this subject, and being furnished with a map of our claims, will be able to be precise upon this subject.

They must be sensible, if they will reflect, that our desires of peace do not arise from any fear of a war, but for the sake of humanity.

Inform them that we have also despatched officers from the Ohio to them, in order to give them the same information, and that they must treat these officers kindly.

You will also inform them that General Putnam will be sent by the President of the United States to conclude a truce, and in order to this end, he will be at fort Jefferson, our advanced post, to which place they must send an escort to receive him, which escort you will accompany.

That, if they are desirous of peace, they must instantly despatch runners to call in all their war parties; and that, until the issue of these offers are made known, they may not be apprehensive of our striking their towns.

As General Putnam will be waiting at fort Jefferson, it will be absolutely necessary that you go personally and inform him of the dispositions of the council of Indians, whether favorable or otherwise.

The business on which you are employed is of high importance to the United States, and honorable to yourself. In order to execute it properly, will well deserve your highest exertions and perseverance. Let nothing, therefore, be wanting on your part, but push forward with all your might.

Given, &c.

H. KNOX.

The Secretary of War to Mr. John Heckenwelder.—18th May, 1792.

SIR:

I have the honor to inform you that the United States have for some time past been making pacific overtures to the hostile Indians northwest of the Ohio. It is to be expected that these overtures will soon be brought to an issue, under the direction of Brigadier General Putnam, of Marietta, who is specially charged with this business.

He is now in this city, and will be in readiness to set out on Monday next; and being acquainted with you, he is extremely desirous that you should accompany him in the prosecution of this good work.

Being myself most cordially impressed with respect for your character and love for the Indians on the purest principles of justice and humanity, I have acquiesced cheerfully in the desire of General Putnam.

I hope sincerely it may be convenient for you to accompany or follow him soon, in order to execute a business which is not unpromising, and which, if accomplished, will redound to the credit of the individuals who shall perform it.

As to pecuniary considerations, I shall arrange them satisfactorily with you.

The Secretary of War to Mr. John Heckenwelder, at Bethlehem.—21st May, 1792.

SIR:

I was very much satisfied to receive your letter of the 19th. But, by some mistake, General Putnam was not informed of it until to-day. He will set out for Pittsburg to-morrow, and as he will travel slowly, he hopes you will arrive there about the same time with him. But, if not, he will wait for you.

Any sum you may require as an advance, shall be paid to your order.

The Secretary of War to Major Alexander Trueman.—22d May, 1792.

SIR:

This will be delivered you by Brigadier General Putnam. He has been charged by the President of the United States with a similar commission to the one given to you. This has not been done from any distrust of your zeal or exertion. But the importance of the object, and the contingencies to which the persons employed in the business are subject, have induced the President of the United States to employ General Putnam in addition to you. If you shall have succeeded, it will be a fortunate circumstance for you. If you should have entered upon the business, you will find great satisfaction in assisting General Putnam in its prosecution and termination.

It will ever afford me satisfaction to reflect on the patriotism and cheerfulness with which you undertook the mission, and I hope will redound greatly to your honor.

Instructions to Brigadier General Rufus Putnam.—22d May, 1792.

SIR:

As you have, at the request of the President of the United States, agreed to attempt to be present at the general council of the hostile Indians about to be held on the Miami river of lake Erie, in order to convince the said Indians of the humane dispositions of the United States, and thereby to make a truce or peace with them, it is proper that you should receive all due information and instructions relative to your mission.

You have herewith delivered to you—

First. A copy of the treaty of fort Stanwix, made on the 22d day of October, 1784.

Secondly. A copy of the treaty of fort McIntosh, made the 21st January, 1785.

Thirdly. A copy of the treaty with the Shawanese, made at the Miami, in January, 1786.

Fourthly. And of the treaties with the Six Nations, and with the Wyandots, &c. concluded at Fort Harmar on the 9th of January, 1789.

These last mentioned treaties confirm nearly the bounds of the treaties made at fort Stanwix, in 1784, and fort McIntosh, in 1785.

And, that there should be no mistake as to the boundaries claimed by the United States, by virtue of the said several treaties, you have herewith delivered to you a map, whereon the boundaries are clearly marked. You will observe that there are several reservations to the United States marked within the Indian lands. Information has been received that the Indians consider these reservations with great uneasiness. If, upon your bringing this subject to view at the council, it should appear to be the case, you may express your opinion, that, upon an ultimate adjustment of differences, the said reservations may be relinquished by the United States, excepting for those parts about the fort at Detroit, which will be necessary for the garrison.

The chiefs of the Five Nations of Indians, who were so long in this city, lately, were astonished at the moderation of our claim of land, it being very different from what they have been taught, by designing people, to believe.

It would seem that the Indians have been misled with respect to our claims, by a certain map, published in Connecticut, wherein are laid out ten new States, agreeably to a report of a committee of Congress.

The United States are desirous, in any treaty which shall be formed in future, to avoid all causes of war, relatively to boundaries, by fixing the same in such a manner as not to be mistaken by the meanest capacity. As the basis, therefore, of your negotiation, you will, in the strongest and most explicit terms, renounce, on the part of the United States, all claim to any Indian land which shall not have been ceded by fair treaties, made with the Indian nations.

That we conceive the treaty of fort Harmar to have been formed by the tribes having a just right to make the same, and that it was done with their full understanding and free consent.

That if, however, the said tribes should judge the compensation to have been inadequate to the object, or that any other tribes have a just claim, in both cases they shall receive a liberal allowance, on their finally settling all disputes upon the subject.

That, with respect to the lands ceded or retained by the treaty with the Shawanese of the Miami of the Ohio, doubts are entertained of any rights possessed by the said Shawanese, excepting those of sufferance, by the tribes who justly claim the same. But, if the rights to the Shawanese should be conceded by the other neighboring tribes, who should think proper to confirm the boundaries marked for the said Shawanese, the United States will abide thereby.

As the United States have never made any treaties with the Wabash Indians, although the said Indians have been repeatedly invited thereto, their claims to the lands east and south of the said Wabash have not been defined.

This circumstance will be a subject of your inquiry with the assembled Indian tribes; and you may assure the parties concerned, that an equitable boundary shall be arranged with them.

You will make it clearly understood, that we want not a foot of their land, and that it is theirs, and theirs only; that they have the right to sell, and the right to refuse to sell, and that the United States will guaranty to them their said just right.

That all we require of the Indians is a peaceable demeanor; that they neither plunder the frontiers of their horses, or murder the inhabitants; that the United States are bound to protect the inhabitants at the risk of every inconvenience of men and money.

You will represent to them, that a new state of things has taken place in the United States; that, formerly, we were an association of several separate States, like their several separate tribes, and that there was no portion of union and strength sufficient to regulate the several parts, as belonging to the same machine.

But, that now we have a General Government, embracing all parts of the Union, as it respects foreign nations and Indian tribes. That General Washington is placed at the head of this government, and that he, or some person immediately authorized by him, must make all treaties with the Indian tribes.

That, therefore, in future, all the Indian nations may rest with great confidence upon the justice, the humanity, and the liberality of the United States.

That it is not only the sincere desire of the United States to be at peace with all the neighboring Indian tribes, but to protect them in their just rights, against lawless, violent white people. If such should commit any injury on the persons or properties of a peaceable Indian, they will be regarded equally as the enemies of the General Government, as the Indians, and will be punished accordingly.

Let the Indians at the said council know fully, that the United States are friends with the Creeks, to whom we give fifteen hundred dollars annually; with the Cherokees, (excepting a few outcasts, who have been leagued with the Shawanese) to whom we also give fifteen hundred dollars annually. That we have treaties of peace with the Choctaws and Chickasaws, to whom we shall probably assign an annual allowance, as they have proved themselves our friends.

That we have, also, lately allowed the Five Nations, to wit: the Senecas, Cayugas, Oneidas, including the Stockbridge tribe, Onondagas, and Tuscaroras, the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, annually.

That the United States are highly desirous of imparting to all the Indian tribes the blessings of civilization, as the only mean of perpetuating them on the earth.

That we are willing to be at the expense of teaching them to read and write, to plough, and to sow, in order to raise their own bread and meat, with certainty, as the white people do.

In short, that the United States, willing to believe that the conduct of the hostile Indians hitherto, has been more the effect of misrepresentation of bad people, than any hardened malignity of the human heart, are desirous of forgetting, and burying deep forever, all the evils which have passed, and to administer such good things to the said Indians, as will make them rejoice forever, at the annual return of the day on which they may conclude a treaty with the United States.

You will inform the hostile Indians, that these sentiments are not the offspring of the defeat of the 4th of November last; but that they arise from the purest desires to avoid the further effusion of blood.

That our dispositions for peace are not the consequence of any apprehensions of the issue of the war, may be made apparent to the Indians by a comparison of the strength and resources of the United States and the Indians.

That we entertained these dispositions for peace early in the last year, and attempted to send various messengers accordingly, but who were prevented by unforeseen circumstances.

The Senecas, whom Colonel Procter persuaded to accompany him to the Miami village, will be a good witness to the truth of this; as will Captain Hendricks, the chief of the Stockbridge Indians, who also made considerable progress in his journey, but was stopped at the Grand river, north of lake Erie.

Two persons were engaged, in January last, to repair to the Miami village, and actually proceeded as far as Niagara, where they were stopped—their business not being known.

February 10th.

Brigadier General Wilkinson was directed, as you will particularly observe by the extract (A) of my letter, herewith delivered, to intimate, by himself and Major Hamtramck, our desire for peace.

Doctor Brown was chosen to repair to the Miami village, for this purpose, and it is probable that he is on his mission accordingly.

Major Hamtramck, in his letter of the 31st of March, a copy of which you have delivered you, states, that besides making peace with the Wea and Eel River Indians, he has despatched agents to most of the hostile Indians west of the Wabash and Omee rivers.

You have, also, herewith delivered you, copies of the instructions to Major Trueman, and the speech with which he was charged to the hostile Indians, dated the 3d of April. Every thing which can be effected by an ardent zeal, may be expected from the major's mission; and you will please to confide in, and employ him in your business, agreeably to my letter to him, herewith delivered to you.

The chiefs of the Five Nations who were lately in this city, have agreed to repair to the Great Council about being held. They departed this city, apparently well impressed with the justice and humanity of the United States, and stipulated to use their highest exertions to effect a peace.

Colonel Louis ———, of the Caynawagas, also came here to inform the Government that the Seven Castles, so called, in Canada, had been invited to the council to be held at the Miami river of lake Erie. He being also convinced of the justice of the United States, promised to use his influence towards a peace.

Captain Hendrick Aupaumut, chief of the Stockbridge Indians, and his brother, have also gone specially charged to prepare the way for your reception, and to meet you at fort Jefferson. His instructions you have also delivered to you.

The recital of these several measures are made, in order to show you that the business is in a considerable degree matured.

I have written to Mr. John Heckenwelder, of Bethlehem, to accompany you, which he has promised to do, but he cannot set out from Bethlehem until the 25th instant; but he will probably overtake you at Pittsburg or Marietta. This person superintended one of the Moravian towns in the Muskingum, and has a general acquaintance with, and influence over, the Wyandots and Delawares.

Much good may be expected from the agreement made by Major Hamtramck with the Wabash Indians. It is hoped it will be a happy introduction to a general peace. Their influence and agency may be expected with the other Indians; and you may obtain from them escorts and messengers to the hostile Indians.

You have herewith delivered to you an invoice of Indian goods, at fort Washington, and an order for the same. These goods, or part thereof, may be presented to the Wabash Indians, who have agreed with Major Hamtramck, provided it should be the joint judgment of Brigadier General Wilkinson and yourself, but under such restrictions as to preclude all abuses.

Besides these goods, you have delivered to you twenty sets of silver ornaments for such of the principal chiefs as shall come to a pacific agreement, and also nose and ear jewels.

Besides the above, a further provision of goods will be made immediately, and forwarded to fort Pitt, to a considerable amount; the disposition of which will be hereafter directed.

Your first great object, upon meeting the Indians, will be to convince them that the United States require none of their lands.

The second, that we shall guaranty all that remain, and take the Indians under our protection.

Thirdly. They must agree to a truce, and immediately to call in all their war parties. It will be in vain to be negotiating with them while they shall be murdering the frontier citizens.

Having happily effected a truce, founded on the above assurances, it will then be your primary endeavor to obtain from each of the hostile and neighboring tribes two of the most respectable chiefs, to repair to the seat of the Government, and there conclude a treaty with the President of the United States, in which all causes of difference should be buried forever.

You will give the chiefs every assurance of personal protection while on their journey to Philadelphia, and, should they insist upon it, hostages of officers for the safe return of the chiefs, and, in case of their compliance, you will take every precaution by the troops for the protection of the said chiefs, which the nature of the case may require.

But if, after having used your utmost exertions, the chiefs should decline the journey to Philadelphia, then you will agree with them on a plan for a general treaty.

In considering upon this plan, perhaps Pittsburg, or its vicinity, would be as proper a place as could be decided upon. Provisions could be procured in abundance, and it would be the point to which the goods could be easily transported.

In this event, it will be necessary that I should be informed by the earliest opportunity, in order that the principles of, and arrangements for, the treaty, should be fixed.

It will also be of the highest importance that you keep General Wayne constantly informed of your progress and prospects, as his movements will be governed by your information.

As it may be necessary for you to conciliate some chiefs by money, and also to obtain runners, you have delivered you a warrant on the treasurer for one thousand dollars, for which you will be held accountable.

Of all your disbursements, either of money or goods, you will keep fair accounts, supported by vouchers, in all possible cases, or of witnesses as evidences of the delivery of goods.

As this will be considered as an extra service from your military employment, your expenses will be paid by the public; and, if you succeed in effecting a peace, you are hereby promised, in behalf of the United States, a handsome pecuniary reward.

In case any accident should happen to you, while employed in this mission, you may rest assured the Government will make a suitable provision for your family.

It has been conceived, that, were you to repair to fort Washington, and thence to fort Jefferson, you would, more readily than from any other point, find a communication with the hostile Indians. Upon a nearer approach, you will form your own judgment, and take your own measures. Having given you a view of the object, and the train in which things are, the rest must be left entirely to your discretion.

But I cannot close these instructions without urging you to the highest possible exertions in bringing the war to a close, and of devising every proper means for that purpose.

An Indian war is destructive to the interests of humanity, and an event from which neither dignity or profit can be reaped. It has been imposed on the Government by strong causes, which it could not control or prevent; and the sooner it is terminated the better.

You may be assured that all the stipulation of rewards you make shall be fully complied with, and they ought to be liberal.

On your arrival at fort Washington, all the women and children belonging to those tribes with whom Major Hamtramck has made peace, are to be well clad, and released from their captivity; the women to have some of the silver ornaments presented to them.

Enclosed you have a letter to Brigadier General Wilkinson, on the subject of the release of the above described prisoners.

These instructions are given by the authority of the President of the United States, and are to be regarded accordingly.

Given, &c.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

“The objects on which I now write, are of great importance.

“In the first place you will instruct Major Hamtramck that he send intelligent and confidential agents of the French inhabitants, as well as the friendly Indians among the hostile Indians, to endeavor to impress these sentiments on them: that the United States require nothing of them but to be at peace; that we wish for none of their lands; that we should be happy if they would afford us the opportunity of convincing them of the truth of these assertions. But, in order thereto, they must manifest sincere dispositions on their part, by a proper representation of all their tribes, who will be permitted to repair to fort Washington, to state any grievances under which they labor, or suppose they labor, from the United States.

“That, if they fail to give this proof of their desire for peace, the United States will be compelled to raise a sufficient force, to punish them for their past, and to prevent their future crimes.

“In order to enable the major to execute this business with effect, you will send him, with the instructions upon the subject, one thousand dollars, for which he will be held accountable. I have enclosed an order on Mr. Swan for this sum, and a further order for the same sum, to be delivered to you, for similar objects. You will endeavor, either by your prisoners, or such other means as you may devise, to send similar messages, independent of the messages through Major Hamtramck.

“I have, by the way of the lakes, also, sent similar messages, by two persons, whose names I am unwilling to commit to paper; but, if they come within your command, they will be sufficiently able to demonstrate the authenticity of their mission.

“The public mind has received strong impressions in favor of peace with the Indians, and a prejudicial clamor has been raised against the war. It is, therefore, the direction of the President of the United States, that every possible expedient be devised, to place before the hostile Indians their true situation.

“I rely, with great confidence, upon your endeavors on this head, so that the most unequivocal evidence may, hereafter, be exhibited, that every proper measure has been taken to produce a peace without further conflict.”

The Secretary of War to Captain Joseph Brandt.—27th June, 1792.

SIR:

You have been invited to the seat of the General Government as a chief of the Six Nations, and one who has a general interest in the soil and the welfare of the Western Indians.

The main purpose of the invitation is to explain to you the humane disposition of the President of the United States, as well in regard to the hostile Indians as to the Indian tribes generally; hoping from your general character for intelligence and attachment to the Indian interest, that you will fully and truly unfold to them those things which may conduce to their happiness.

There are many circumstances which induce the opinion, that some of the hostile Indians are entirely mistaken as to the object of the war, and that they have joined therein from an apprehension and belief that the United States have formed the design of wresting their lands from them. As you have been fully informed on this subject, and as you have agreed to repair to the assembled nations at the Miami river of lake Erie, you may be able to convince them of the contrary.

The present Indian war commenced with the Miamies and Wabash Indians, and the Shawanese. With the two former nations the United States have never been able to form any treaties. Partial hostilities seem to have existed, without intermission, from the year 1776 to the present time.

You may truly assure the hostile Indians—

1st. That the United States are willing to bury the red hatchet forever, and to forget all past evils

2d. That the United States require no Indian lands but those which have been ceded by treaties, made with the full understanding and free consent of the chiefs, and will restrain the whites from settling upon them.

3d. That we have thus estimated the treaty of Muskingum, herewith delivered to you, made and concluded on the 9th day of January, 1789, agreeably to the map herewith delivered to you.

4th. That if, however, it should hereafter be made to appear, either that the compensation then given was inadequate, or that other than the parties who made it have any just claims on the lands ceded thereby, that we shall be willing to give them a just compensation.

5th. That any compensations which shall be agreed upon shall be furnished annually, in such goods as shall be most for the comfort of the Indian families.

6th. That the United States will make arrangements to teach the Indians, if agreeable to them, to raise their own bread and cattle, as the white people do.

But it will be necessary to have a treaty, at some place to be agreed upon, where these points, and all others, shall be examined and amicably adjusted. As Major Trueman and Brigadier General Putnam will probably repair to the assembled council of Indians at the Miami river, it is probable some place suitable will be agreed upon by the Indians.

But it is conceived that it would be more satisfactory to the Indians were the chiefs to repair to this city, and here conclude a treaty: provided they could be convinced of their safety while upon the business. On this point we shall be ready to afford them the most solid satisfaction, either by giving them hostages or any escorts necessary for their safety.

If the treaty should be had at the seat of the General Government, all claims or points of dispute could be adjusted as they arise. But if commissioners should be appointed to go a considerable distance, their authority must be limited, and, of course, claims which may arise from the Indians, either could not be granted, or much time must be expended in obtaining new instructions from the Government. Besides, if a treaty should be made in Philadelphia, the President would have the satisfaction of forming an acquaintance with the chiefs, and of knowing that the treaty should be adjusted exactly according to his wishes.

But, in case of agreeing upon a place of treaty, either at any spot northwest of the Ohio, or in this city, it will be indispensably necessary that there be a complete representation of all the parties, so that whatever shall be then concluded, shall be binding upon all concerned.

If the hostile Indians listen, and agree to a treaty, then they must call in all their war parties. We have restrained our warriors until the effect of our pacific overtures be known, and they must do so likewise.

To you, who possess the information, it would be unnecessary to say, that these overtures are the offspring of pure humanity, and not from any apprehension for the consequences of the war. Your own observation of our numbers will have convinced you, that, in a long and continued contest with the United States, the Indians must be utterly ruined.

But the President of the United States is anxiously desirous, for the sake of humanity, of avoiding so great an evil. He cannot but hope, that, when the Indians fully understand that all their lands not fairly ceded are their own, and that they cannot be dispossessed thereof, excepting by a fair and voluntary sale, made under the authority of the United States, they will accede to a treaty which will secure them the blessings of the earth.

I am well aware of the labor and trouble the request herein contained will create. But it is fairly inferred, from the interest you discovered in the year 1786, and at subsequent periods, for the welfare of the Western Indians, and from your being impressed that their happiness is materially involved in making peace with the United States, that you will zealously concur in accomplishing so just and so benevolent an object.

I am, &c.

*The Secretary of War to General Israel Chapin, deputy temporary agent to the Five Nations of Indians.
June 27th, 1792—per his son.*

SIR:

I have received your letter of the second instant, by your son, who, with Doctor Allen and Captain Joseph Brandt, arrived in this city on the 20th instant.

Captain Brandt's visit will, I flatter myself, be productive of great satisfaction to himself, by being made acquainted with the humane views of the President of the United States.

It was well judged to deliver Captain Brandt's son the horse you mentioned.

Doctor Allen's account will be settled and paid here. For the sums you advanced him you will be credited.

No horses have been purchased on the way to this city, as the journey was mostly performed by water.

For the sums your son expended down here, you will be credited two hundred dollars. He has been paid here for his services from the time of his setting out until his return home, at the rate of two dollars per day. And he has advanced to him, on your account, the further sum of six hundred dollars, for which you will be held accountable. About two hundred dollars of this sum, at the excess, may be expended, in order to defray their expenses back; which will leave the sum of four hundred dollars in your hands, to be appropriated as the public interests may require.

I am sorry you did not find it convenient to repair to this city, as certain sentiments of economy and modes of management of the Indians, might have been more successfully impressed than may be done by letter.

But I beg leave to observe strongly, that the system of the Indian expenses and allowances are by no means to be measured by the helter-skelter conduct which was observed under the late management, which, in several instances, were unjustifiably expensive.

None but discreet men, having a proper regard to their own characters, and who will be content with reasonable compensations, are to be employed in the Indian department under your direction.

As you at present are regarded favorably, as well for your zeal as your economy, it will be important to you that these principles be manifest in all your future conduct; and while you continue to make the public good the rule of your action, you may proceed with confidence, as you may depend upon support.

As to your being allowed a clerk, there is no such establishment. You may, however, be allowed occasional assistance, at a reasonable compensation; but at present no fixed assistant can be allowed.

Messrs. Pierce and Danforth have no exclusive right to trade with the Indians. If they assert any such thing, they do no honor to their recommendations, and exhibit themselves in the first instance as unworthy of confidence.

This will be manifest when the enclosed copies of the permission be examined, and when you are informed that Governor Clinton has also recommended for the same trade Abraham Fowler, and John Kane, to whom permissions are also given.

I am, &c.

The Secretary of War to Israel Chapin, Junior.—27th June, 1792.

SIR:

The sum of six hundred dollars has been delivered to you, on the account of your father, Israel Chapin, deputy temporary agent to the Six Nations.

Out of this sum, you are to defray the expenses of Captain Brandt, his servant and two horses, from this city to Niagara; and, also, of yourself and Doctor Deodat Allen, with this exception, that Doctor Allen has received an allowance for horse hire, or the transportation of himself from this city to the Genesee country.

Captain Brandt will take two horses from this city. Upon your arrival at Albany or Schenectady, you will for yourself purchase a low priced horse to take you home, and deliver him to your father.

I am, &c.

The Secretary of War to his Excellency the Governor of the State of New York.—27th June, 1792.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's letter of the 19th instant. Captain Brandt appears to be a judicious and sensible man. I flatter myself his journey will be satisfactory to himself and beneficial to the United States.

He appears anxious that his friend, the Fish Carrier, of the Cayugas, may be satisfied about their reservation. I have informed him that this affair is entirely under your Excellency's direction, who, I was persuaded, would do every thing in your power to accord to the reasonable desires of the Fish Carrier and his people. I have only to add that the Fish Carrier and his party seem at this moment to be a little ticklish, and that they, as a reason for their discontents, mention the affair of the reservation. It is well ascertained that a party of them were in the action of the fourth of November last.

I am, &c.

The Secretary of War to Brigadier General Rufus Putnam, Fort Washington, via Pittsburg.—August 7th, 1792.

SIR:

I have had the honor to receive your communications of the fifth, eighth, and ninth of July. I have no doubt but that poor Trueman has been sacrificed by savage barbarity! But it is still questionable, whether the motive thereto has been the blood-thirstiness of an individual; the desire of the Shawanese, and other inveterate tribes, to frustrate a peace; or a dictate of the general council. If either of the two former, peace may be yet attainable.

Captain Hendricks, accompanied by three friendly Indians, probably set out from Buffalo for the Omee river about the eighteenth of June. The Senecas would be later; and Captain Brandt would probably be at au Glaze about the twentieth of the present month. It would be an uncommon assemblage of unfortunate circumstances, if all our overtures fail.

You will cultivate and make peace with the Wabash tribes, to the utmost of your power: and you will judge how far your going to Post Vincennes, or any other place, will facilitate the object. Extend your treaties with one tribe after another, as far as possible, always subjecting them to the ratification of the President and Senate of the United States.

The United States require no lands of the Wabash Indians, not heretofore ceded. Impress this idea upon all the tribes. Apply the goods at fort Washington to the purposes of the said treaties.

If it should so happen, that, in pursuance of your instructions, you should have an immediate opportunity of repairing to the hostile Indians, you will appoint such time for assembling, to the Wabash tribes, and all their connexions, as not to militate with the first object.

I will endeavor to have more Indian goods transported to fort Washington; and I hope that an opportunity, by a peace, will be presented you, of bestowing them to the benefit of the United States.

I have communicated a copy of your letter of the 8th ultimo to the President of the United States.

The advancement of the public interests being the sole object of my pursuit, and not the establishment of any particular opinions, I am sincerely obliged to you for the propositions relative to a different route by the Cayahoga.

No. II.

Information received relative to the pacific overtures, and the disposition of the Indians Northwest of the Ohio.

Letter from General Rufus Putnam to the Secretary of War.

FORT WASHINGTON, July 5th, 1792.

SIR:

My last letter was from Marietta, of the 23d ultimo. I was not able to leave that place until the 26th. I halted at Gallipolis one day, and arrived here the 2d instant, in the morning.

Soon after my arrival, General Wilkinson returned from Fort Jefferson, with the disagreeable news, that, on the 25th ultimo, about one hundred Indians made an attack on a party of our men, who were cutting hay, near fort Jefferson; that sixteen of our people were killed and missing; that four dead bodies only had been found. It is observable, that this happened the day (or at most but one day after the time) I had appointed to be at fort Jefferson, as notified to the Indians, in my speech sent them from Pittsburg, dated the 5th June.

It is said the Indians had three horses along; that they are generally dressed in white shirts, (one having a scarlet coat on;) that they came from, and returned towards, the lower part of the Tawa river.

On the 3d instant arrived here, Mr. Vego, and two other gentlemen from Vincennes, who report that, about the 28th of June, some Wea chiefs, sent by Major Hamtramck to Eel river, returned with news, that four men, going from some of our forts, with a flag, had been fired on by a party of Indians; that three of the men were killed on the spot; that the man who had the flag and papers was taken, and after keeping him one day they killed him also; that the Indians took the papers to some white man who could read; that the papers contained a long and good talk from a great chief; which, when the Indians understood, they were sorry for what they had done. If this account be true, there is little reason to doubt but Major Trueman, (if not Colonel Harden) has fallen a sacrifice, soon after they left fort Washington. These circumstances leave it very doubtful, in my mind, whether friend Hendricks will be permitted to come to fort Jefferson, or not; however, I think the matter will be reduced to a certainty in a short time.

With Mr. Vego came the Wea chief, whose wife and children are prisoners here; and with him three or four men whose relations are also prisoners. For the want of an interpreter, the affairs of these people have not been attended to yet; but an express is gone to Kentucky, for a man who understands their language, and expect him here in two days or three.

From Major Hamtramck's letter to General Wilkinson, and information by Mr. Vego, and others, the real intentions of the Wea and Eel river Indians appear to me very doubtful; to get back their prisoners, in the opinion of some gentlemen from Vincennes, is the principal object with them. But whatever their intentions may be, I think measures should be taken, as soon as possible, to complete a treaty with them, agreeably to the stipulations made with them by Major Hamtramck: for, however desirable an object it may be to bring their chiefs to Philadelphia, I believe it is at present altogether impracticable.

I am informed that they object strongly against the proposition made to them by Major Hamtramck, of coming to fort Washington; they say it is too far, and they were promised a treaty at fort Knox. It is my opinion that a person should be authorized to hold a treaty with them at fort Knox, (or at this place, if they will consent to come thus far) and complete the business as far as a commissioner can do it, agreeably to the articles stipulated with Hamtramck.

That some goods be given them, as an evidence of the ability and disposition of Government to serve them. That the boundaries of their lands be defined, but no proposition of purchase be made at present. That Government having by her justice (and a few acts of liberality, which will cost little) gained their confidence, their chiefs may afterwards be willing, and probably will be desirous, to make a visit to the seat of Government, and pay their respects to the Great Chief of the nation; and as to purchasing of their lands, you will find they will offer them for sale before the United States can have any occasion for them.

Beginning in this way with the tribes nearest to Vincennes, there is no doubt but others will soon follow their example; and probably in this way, most, if not all the tribes, westward of the Wabash, may be prevented joining, or soon detached from the more hostile nations.

The person to be employed on this business should be one well disposed towards the Indians, and against whom they entertain no particular prejudice; and it would be better still, if one can be found with whom they are acquainted, and for whom they have a particular kindness. But to return among the more hostile tribes: I do not yet despair of success; for although I have no doubt but many of the Shawanees, and others, at present shut their ears against, and reject every idea of peace; that they have murdered Major Trueman, and probably all the other white men that have been sent out; that it was a party of those fellows who came to fort Jefferson to take me off; yet I much doubt if those measures are countenanced by the chiefs in general; I rather believe they are the work of a few, who, by such means, endeavor to distract the councils of the more moderate, and thereby prevent a treaty's taking place, while a great majority are wishing for such an event. The same account that gives us reason to believe that Major Trueman, and others, are murdered, informs us, that the President's speech was preserved, and considered as a good one; and, if to murder me was the object of those who were lately at fort Jefferson, it proves that my speech had reached the Tawa river. Add to this, the influence that Captain Hendricks, with that of the deputy from the Six Nations, Colonel Lewis, and the deputies from the Seven Castles, may probably have when they arrive, and I think there is reason to hope the nations will yet consent to treat of peace.

I have the honor to be, with great respect and esteem, sir, your obedient servant,

RUFUS PUTNAM.

Major General Knox, Secretary of War.

From the same to the same.

FORT WASHINGTON, 26th July, 1792.

SIR:

I herewith enclose a duplicate of my letter to you of the 22d instant, (which I forwarded by way of the wilderness, with copies of some speeches, which are connected with the business of that letter. Despatches to Major Hamtramck, on the subject, went off yesterday by express. I have requested him to send the speech, a copy of which you have enclosed, to the Wabash Chiefs, and similar ones, in my name, to as many other tribes as he shall think proper. I have considerable expectations from this business. Mr. Wells, the interpreter, whom I mentioned to you in a former letter, tells me that Kaweahatta is a very sensible man; that the British account him the best speaker among all the Indian nations; that he is the greatest chief, and has more influence than any other man in the Wabash country; that when he, Mr. Wells, left Eel river, in June last, this chief was gone to the council on the Omee; but Mr. Wells thinks he is disposed for peace, although he declined to come down to the Post when invited by Major Hamtramck. He has two sisters, and other relations among the prisoners, and Mr. Wells thinks there is no doubt but on this message he will come down. Through the influence of this man, I am yet in some hopes to be admitted to speak with their high mightinesses the Shawanese, and other hostile chiefs.

I have the honor to be, with great respect,

RUFUS PUTNAM.

Major General Knox, Secretary of War.

From the same to the same.

FORT WASHINGTON, 22d July, 1792.

SIR:

Jean Krouch, the principal Wea chief, who arrived here the 3d instant with Mr. Vego, on a visit to his family, died on the 16th. The prisoners I mentioned in my letter of the 14th instant, having made their escape from the Indians, and being then at fort Hamilton, have since arrived here; and by the information they give, especially Schaffer, whose deposition General Wilkinson forwards to you by this conveyance, there is the highest reason to believe, that Freeman, Trueman, and Hardin, are all murdered, with all the people who went with them, except one, who they considered as a servant, or person of no consequence, and for that reason spared. And if the squaw told true, it appears that Trueman must be murdered by order of the council, as a confirmation of their resolution not to make peace. When I add to this the circumstance that I hear nothing of Captain Hendrick, I conclude the Indians met on the Omee, or Tawa river, have rejected the overtures made them by the United States, in the several speeches sent to them; and that the prospect of my speaking with them through the channel first proposed, is now at an end. That, from the information received from the Wabash, mentioned in my former letters, together with the information received from Mr. Wells, the interpreter, and the two old Wea men, who came with Jean Krouch on a visit to their families, I conceive there is very little reason to expect any more of the chiefs from that quarter; or if any should arrive, it will be only such as have relations among the prisoners, who are of the inferior grades, and a treaty with them will be of no consequence; wherefore, I conceive that my tarrying here much longer, can be of no service whatever, except to receive your further orders, which I should certainly wait for, or return up the river, but for the following reasons, viz: It appearing highly probable that the principal chiefs from nearly all the Western tribes, with a great number of warriors, and others, may be collected at Post Vincent, if the business is seasonably attended to, that by a proper management, there is a prospect that most, if not all the Western tribes, may be detached from those nations who have originated the war, and return to, or be kept in a state of peace. That this is the only remaining channel by which there is the least prospect of my being able to speak with the more hostile tribes. That it is essential to the success of the business, that these Western Indians be met as soon as possible; at all events, before their hunting season commences. That, if the day should not be fixed on, and the Indians advertised of it, without waiting your further orders, so much time will probably elapse before an answer to my letters on this subject, or any orders in consequence of them, can arrive in this quarter, as may render the whole business abortive.

For these reasons, sir, I have been induced to form the resolution of going to Post Vincent, for the purpose of holding a treaty with the Western tribes, about the 20th of September, and shall take measures to have them invited to meet there for the purpose about that time.

Having communicated my resolution to General Wilkinson, and requested that an escort might be provided, and other arrangements made to enable me to prosecute the object, he has very politely assured me, that he "shall, with the utmost alacrity, make every practicable exertion for the accommodation of the movement."

I propose to leave this with Indian goods, Indian prisoners, &c. about the 15th of August. This delay is partly on the idea of a bare possibility that Captain Hendrick, or some other messengers of peace, may yet arrive from the north, and partly from the probability that some new orders may arrive from the War Office, as I find by some letters from Pittsburg, that you have been advertised of the murder of Trueman, and by a Pittsburg paper, I find Mr. Brandt has been with you in Philadelphia.

I hope that an answer to my letters respecting the business of the Wabash Indians, will arrive before the time proposed for holding the treaty; in which case, if Major Hamtramck is appointed the commissioner, I shall feel myself perfectly satisfied in being excused, and, at the same time, shall cheerfully afford him all the assistance in my power. But if I should be disappointed, and no further instructions or commission arrive, I shall, notwithstanding, prosecute the business of a truce, or peace, as far as circumstances and my present instructions will warrant me.

I have the honor to be, with the highest possible esteem and respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

RUFUS PUTNAM.

Major General Knox, Secretary of War.

Indian Speech to General Putnam, and his answer.

The following speech was delivered by one of the Wea men to General Putnam, at fort Washington, July 19th, 1792:
COMPANION, OR CONFIDENT FRIEND:

I call you so, because brothers may sometimes differ, but companions never do. I am no chief, nor do I know well how to speak. This man (pointing to one sitting by) is a chief, but not a great chief; nor can he speak. The man who is dead was a chief, but not the greatest chief, and could speak well.

I fear these women and children will all die, if they remain here much longer. I pray you will take us along to the O. Post as soon as possible. I fear very few of our chiefs, if any, will come to this place; but a great many chiefs will meet you there, who can speak well. I pray, therefore, that you will go along with us to the O. Post as soon as possible.—[A string of wampum with two branches.]

On the 20th of July, General Putnam made the following speech in answer to the foregoing:

BROTHER:

You call me confident friend, which name is very good, but I wish us to retain the name of brother, since we were born on one island, and are of one family. 'Tis true, brothers sometimes differ, yet they soon unite again.

BROTHER: I feel very sorry for the loss of your chief, who was a great man, and a good speaker, and who was to transact the business between you and me. You spoke to me yesterday with tears in your eyes; yet I understood you. I can't say all to you at this time that I wish to say; but when our mourning shall have ceased a little, I shall be able to speak cheerfully.

BROTHER: I wish to make you happy in every respect; your women and children are under my care and protection, and I am making the necessary arrangements for our journey to the O. Post, where I hope and expect to see all your chiefs and great men, there to consult on, and make a lasting, peace between the Indian tribes inhabiting the Wabash country, and the people of the United States (or the Thirteen Great Fires.)

In thirty days I shall be ready to set out with you.—[A string of wampum of two branches.]

The speech of Rufus Putnam, agent of the Great Chief, General Washington.

To Kaweahatta, the Great Chief on the Eel river, and to all the chiefs and warriors of the Wyachtenos, and other Indian tribes living on the waters of the Wabash river.

BROTHERS: I am on my way to you from the great council fire of the United States, where the great and good chief, General Washington, resides. I am coming with the wishes of his heart to you, which are very good, and which I hope will make your hearts rejoice, when you hear them.

BROTHERS: Out of love to you I am come this long way. I wish you to become a happy people; and, believe me, nothing is wanting to make you so, but that you and the United States might once see and hear one another, and remove such obstacles against which we hitherto have stumbled. In order to obtain this end, I have appointed the twentieth day of September for us to meet each other at Post Vincent, there to consult each other in a friendly and brotherly manner: to wipe off all tears, to set our hearts aright, and to establish a lasting peace and friendship, taking one another by the hand as true brothers, and loving one another from all our hearts.

BROTHERS: You see something very good preparing for you; make yourselves ready, and come and see what it is. I expect to see you on the day appointed; your friends and relations I shall bring with me.—[A string of wampum with three branches.]

RUFUS PUTNAM, Agent.

FORT WASHINGTON, July 24th, 1792.

Letter from General Putnam to the Secretary of War.

FORT WASHINGTON, August 16, 1792.

SIR:

My last letter was dated July 26th, with which I enclosed a duplicate of one of the 22d of the same month, with copies of some speeches connected with the business of treating with the Indians at Post Vincent. I have been in anxious expectation to receive some information from you or General Wayne, before this time, that should have removed every doubt with respect to Major Trueman and the other messengers being murdered; as I conceive Captain Hendrick would ascertain that matter, and have it in his power to report to you or General Wayne, although he might not have it in his power to give me any information on the subject; but hearing nothing from Captain Hendrick, or any other quarter, to contradict the measure, I shall leave this to-morrow for Post Vincent, in pursuit of the object I wrote you in the letter above referred to.

The Indian prisoners, and goods for the treaty, started down the river this morning.

I flatter myself that a pretty large number of Indians will assemble, and accordingly have sent forward goods sufficient to supply about seven hundred, of different sexes and ages, with a blanket, stroud, or breech-clouts, leggins, and a shirt to each, besides thirty coats and thirty hats for chiefs, knives, looking glasses, and some other small articles; and I take with me some of the medals, arm and wrist-bands, and other jewels.

I feel exceedingly embarrassed on the occasion, lest, possibly, Captain Hendrick or some other friendly messenger should arrive from the north, in my absence, or that some instructions from the War Office may be issued, with which my visit to Post Vincent should be inconsistent. But the moral certainty of the murder of our flags, and so much time having elapsed without any intelligence relative to the primary object for which I came out, together with the prospect of rendering essential service to Government, by taking advantage of existing circumstances, which would probably be lost forever, if the present moment should not be embraced, I trust will render my conduct excusable, at least, if not commendable.

I mean such circumstances as these: That the chiefs have expressed a willingness to come to Post Vincent to treat, but no further; and if they are not soon gratified in this, they are every moment in danger, through the influence of bad neighbors, of forming worse resolutions; that, from the agreement of Major Hamtramck, they expect to be treated with at that place, and should Government not comply with that agreement, in what they consider as a reasonable time, the mischief might not easily be remedied. That the prisoners being taken along, will probably influence many to come to the treaty which otherwise would not.

And when they shall see these prisoners well clothed, and generously given up to their friends, with the report which they will make of their good usage whilst prisoners, it must have a very great and good effect with all who shall be present—a circumstance, this, which may never exist again. Besides, I am well assured, that some of the first characters among the Wabash chiefs refused to come in on Major Hamtramck's invitation, because he was no more than a war captain; and the further I have inquired into this business, the more I am convinced it is a matter of considerable consequence, and ought to be attended to: for I find they have no idea of war captains treating of peace—this province belongs to other characters, and it was for this reason that Kaweahatta, the great Eel river chief, refused to see Major Hamtramck last winter, but told his brother, who was a war captain, that he might go; that it was proper one war captain should speak with another.

To avoid this prejudice, and, also, that they might have an idea of the business I wish to speak with them upon, from their correspondence with the British, I have, in my speech sent among them, taken the character of agent of the great chief, General Washington, and that I may be consistent throughout, I have thrown by my uniform, and taken the habit of a citizen.

Such circumstances are trivial with us, and, perhaps, with some, may be thought laughable; but with this barbarous people, they are considered as matters of great moment; and if we mean to make a peace with them, we ought to accommodate ourselves to their ideas of propriety, especially those which they consider as essential to a treaty that is binding on them.

I shall make every possible exertion, in persuading these Western tribes to send a deputation to Philadelphia, and am not without hopes of prevailing with them on that head.

I presume that my letters, as late as the eleventh of July, must have reached you by the tenth instant, and if your answer is forwarded by express from Pittsburg, the despatches will reach fort Washington by the first of September, and General Wilkinson will immediately forward them to me at Post Vincent, where they cannot fail of arriving by the tenth or fifteenth of September. I made this calculation when I appointed the treaty, and I still hope to receive your instructions before the time of opening it.

August 17th.—I enclose you an abstract of Indian goods still remaining at fort Washington; some of these goods are much damaged, and, in my opinion, ought to be sold, and some others are not suitable for Indian purposes; there are four hundred and thirty-four and a half yards of lindsey, which is a darkish striped cloth, and which would answer very well for making into overalls and hunting shirts, to supply the riflemen and other scouting parties occasionally, when sent into the woods, as it is much more healthy than linen, and lighter than the common woollen, and, from the color, will serve for concealment much better than the common uniform.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Major General Knox, Secretary of War.

RUFUS PUTNAM.

From the same to the same.

RAPIDS OF OHIO, August 21st, 1792.

SIR:

The escort with the Indian prisoners, &c. arrived here yesterday, without any accident. The low state of the water obliges us to haul the goods, provisions, and baggage, by the rapids in wagons, which will occasion some expense, and cause two or three days' detention.

I enclose an extract from Major Hamtramck's letter to me of the 9th instant.

I wrote you very particularly on the 16th instant, from fort Washington, and have nothing new to add, except, that I hear that a person by the name of Harden, who lives some where near the Ohio, on this side of Cumberland river, is meditating a stroke at the Indians, in some quarter or other. I am told, from good authority, that he advertises publicly for volunteers on the occasion. He is said to be the same man who murdered a number of friendly Indians near Post Vincent, about three years ago. Should this wretch be successful in raising his party, and fall on the Wabash Indians at this time, it must undoubtedly put an end to all prospect of peace in that quarter; and all expenses which Government are at on this occasion, will be worse than thrown away.

It is thought by some, that few men will join Harden in his proposed expedition, and that he will not be able to strike any blow of consequence. But shall the United States suffer an individual thus to insult her authority with impunity? I hope not; but that proper measures may be adopted to punish every one who shall endeavor to set on foot an expedition against any Indians whatever, without proper authority therefor.

I have the honor to be, &c.

RUFUS PUTNAM.

Major General KNOX, Secretary of War.

[ENCLOSURE.]

Extract of a letter from Major Hamtramck to Rufus Putnam, dated Fort Knox, Post Vincennes, August 9th, 1792.

"I have to acknowledgè your letter of July 24th. Every arrangement to promote the public service will be attended to, with all possible exactness; but I am afraid that the lowness of the water will make it difficult for any boats or pirogues to ascend the Wabash. Your speech to the Wabash Indians has already been delivered to two nations, and will be delivered to the others as soon as possible. They appeared to be well pleased, and every thing will work right, if they are but sincere. I have also sent your speech to the Pattawatamies, by the son to the first king to that nation, who has been with me for some time, (I suppose as a spy) and he assures me that he will bring his nation to see you, as they sincerely wish to be at peace with the United States. I shall have some difficulty to send to the Illinois country, owing to the extravagant price they ask. However, it must be done. If all the Indians attend, they will draw about seven or eight hundred rations per day."

Indian speech to Major Hamtramck.

MY FATHER: Me, Lagesse, the first and great chief of the Pattawatamies, take upon myself to answer for all the nation here represented. We are very glad to hear from you, but sorry we cannot comply with your request; the situation of our affairs in this country prevents us. We are every day threatened by the other Indians, that if we do not take a part with them against the Americans, they will destroy our villages. This alone, my Father, makes it necessary for all the chiefs to remain at home.

Was we called to Post Vincennes, it might be done with ease and safety; but to go to Rocky river, on the Ohio, (meaning head-quarters) is at too great a distance from us.

MY FATHER: You tell us you are ignorant why the red people makes war on your white people; we are as ignorant of it as you are: for, ever since the beginning of the war, we have laid still in our villages, although we have repeatedly been invited to go to war; but, my Father, the confidence we have in you has prevented us from making war against you, and we hold you by the hand with a stronger gripe than ever.

MY FATHER: Keep up your spirits more than ever, for you have this year more red people to fight than you have had yet. Do your best to chastise the nation this year: for, if you do not, we shall have no more hopes, and we will be obliged to abandon our villages to the prey of our enemies.

If I could give you a hand I would do it, but I cannot; and I am glad if me and my people can have a quiet life this summer. If I had been disposed to believe all the reports I have heard, I would have made your messengers prisoners; for we are told they are spies, and that you have an army coming against us; but I am deaf to every thing that comes from the Miami. Every day we receive messengers from those people, but we have been deaf to them, and will remain so.

MY FATHER: It would be very necessary that you should have a garrison at Kahokia; it would be a convenient place for all the Indians of this country to speak at. A Father should be near his children, and it would give terror to the bad Indians.

We now all of us take you by the hand, and wish you success.

LAGESSE.

General Israel Chapin to the Secretary of War.

CANANDAQUA, July 17th, 1792.

Sir:

Agreeably to the directions I received for the purpose, I set out for Buffalo creek the 9th ultimo. It was out of my power to despatch Captain Hendricks as soon as I could have wished.

The chiefs of the Five Nations at first peremptorily insisted on his waiting to accompany them, and it was not without difficulty that they were induced to relinquish the point. After a council, which was protracted for several days, they, however, gave their consent. He set out in a bark canoe on the eighteenth, with suitable attendants and provisions. It was the opinion of the Indians, he would reach the place of destination in eight days. As I had possessed myself with all the information I expected, I would have returned home after the departure of Captain Hendrick, but the chiefs would by no means consent to my leaving them, while the treaty continued. And, indeed, I have not since been sorry, as I have reason to believe that my continuance has been the means of more perfectly reconciling the Onondagas and Cayugas. The far greater part, of both nations, have resided at Buffalo creek, ever since the last war. On my first arrival, the principal chief of the Cayuga nation, commonly known by the name of the Fish Carrier, and, indeed, the whole of both nations, were extremely disaffected. For the grounds of their disaffection, I must refer you, sir, to the speeches delivered to me on the occasion, which I ordered to be taken down in writing on the spot, and transmit to you by this despatch. After several conferences with the Fish Carrier, in which I was greatly assisted by several chiefs who attended Congress, he gradually relaxed in his severity, and at last became perfectly friendly. A number of young warriors had gone off in the spring, to join the hostile Indians: the Fish Carrier promised me that he would not only recall the party, but would go in person to the Southern treaty, and use every exertion to bring about a general pacification between Congress and the Southern Indians. That, after he had been useful, he would go and see General Washington; and could then take him by the hand with confidence and pleasure. Few Indian chiefs have a more extensive influence than the Fish Carrier. The alteration, therefore, of his sentiments, could not but afford me the highest pleasure. I can only express it as my private wish, that all his reasonable requests might be gratified. You have no doubt heard, sir, that a number of the Senecas were concerned with our people in cutting off a scout of hostile Indians. This event has occasioned a good deal of uneasiness among the Five Nations. Their resentment is peculiarly excited against the commander of fort Jefferson. They say, that, contrary to the advice he has received from Congress, he has excited some of their thoughtless young men to strike the tomahawk into the heads of their brothers; that it has occasioned an uneasiness towards the whole of their nation, and thrown obstacles in the way of their influence in favor of their friends. The chiefs from Oneida did not arrive during the council: I should otherwise have been able to have despatched the chiefs of the Five Nations to the Southern treaty, previously to my leaving Buffalo creek. Two of the Massasoiga chiefs attended council with the Five Nations: their appearance was perfectly friendly. They expressed a wish to be made acquainted with our great men. The Mohawks were sent for from the Grand river; but, as Captain Brandt was absent, and their principal chief sick, they did not attend. Colonel Butler, the British superintendent of the Six Nations, was also requested to attend. He came as far as the garrison: the commanding officer would not permit him to proceed further. He, however, sent a speech to the Indians, in which he told them they were in the right path, and advised them to continue in it. I was visited by several British officers and gentlemen from the settlement of Niagara; they behaved with a politeness that seemed nearly to approach to real friendship. On the whole, every circumstance that respects the Six Nations, wears, at present, a most flattering appearance. The chiefs that went to Congress are our zealous friends: they particularly explained to the nations, who convened for the purpose, the speeches they had made and received while absent; the reception and treatment they received at Philadelphia: and I had the pleasure of observing, that they met with universal approbation.

From the best intelligence I could procure, the Southern nations rest in quiet, except the Delawares and Shawanese: neither can I learn that they at present have any thoughts of sending out war parties; but are very attentive lest an enemy should surprise their villages. The grand council of Indian nations are now convening at the falls of the Big Miami. It is thought it will be the largest ever known. The Indians from Canada are invited, and every day expected at Niagara. No offensive step will be probably taken until after the general deliberation; and, from the number of friends we shall have there, I am induced to expect a favorable issue. The Five Nations manifested gratitude to Congress for their intention of erecting schools among them, and providing them with blacksmiths. I would, however, inform you, sir, that it will be out of my power to do either, except greater encouragement is given; and, if I may be permitted to give my private judgment, if Congress would establish at present only one school to the west of Genesee river, and endow it with a stipend that would make it an object for a gentleman of character, it might prove of infinite service, both in conciliating the affections of the Indians, and in laying a foundation for their civilization. I would wish, sir, some direction, how far I am to distribute to the Indians. I am continually surrounded by a crowd of them, since my appointment. They all expect to be fed from my table, and made glad from my cellar. Some instances, too, of clothing, I have not been able to deny. I would suggest the idea, whether a small store of provisions and goods, to be distributed on necessary occasions, might not be a saving to the public.

I am, with respect, your most humble servant,

ISRAEL CHAPIN.

CANANDAIGUA, August 14, 1792.

SIR:

Since I had the honor to write you, on the 17th instant, Captain Brandt, together with Doctor Allen and my son, have arrived at this place. The former appeared highly gratified with the attention paid him during his stay in Philadelphia, and appears to speak of it with pleasure; and I flatter myself his visit to that place will produce the desired effect. He made but a short stay at this place, being very unwell. He was anxious to proceed on his journey with as much speed as possible, and was desirous to have Doctor Allen accompany him as far as Niagara: and I wishing to have a continuance of his friendly disposition readily complied, and they arrived at Niagara the 24th ultimo, as Captain Brandt has informed me by letter, a copy of which I do myself the honor to enclose.

Doctor Allen proceeded on to fort Erie, at which place he was taken with a violent bilious fever, and at present remains there very sick. I think it may be depended on, that the Canada Indians, to the number of fifty or sixty, have gone on to the Miamis to attend the general council; and by the latest information I have obtained, the chiefs of the Six Nations were at fort Erie, waiting for a vessel to carry them on to attend the council with their brethren, and I sincerely hope the result of their deliberations will be a general and lasting peace.

The Governor of Upper Canada, after perusing the papers the Indians brought from Philadelphia, encouraged them to pursue the good work they had begun, and he would grant them every assistance in his power.

From the same to the same.

CANANDAIGUA, 24th September, 1792.

SIR:

I wrote you on the 14th and 25th ultimo, to which letters I have not received any answer, neither have I received any despatches from you since the 27th of June. Nothing material has transpired in this quarter, except the intelligence received from the Farmer's Brother is so considered. He informs, that, on his arrival at Detroit, he despatched two of the Seneca Indians who had accompanied the Canada Indians to that place, to Buffalo creek, (where they arrived about the 16th instant, and on the 22d two others arrived at this place, with a string of wampum from him) and informed that the Canada Indians, after their arrival at Detroit, saw a large collection of the hostile Indians; they remained at that place some days, without having any conference with them; that two of the Canada Indians went to the camp of the hostile Indians, and related to them the business which had brought them into their country. The hostile Indians informed them that their requests would not be granted, and any overtures for peace they would not listen to.

On the return of the Canada Indians to Detroit, the conversation among them was as follows:

What shall we do? We expected we were sent for to attend a treaty of peace. Why did they not, when they sent for us, request us to bring our guns with us? We should then have known what they wanted of us.

The next morning, the Canada Indians left Detroit, to repair to the place appointed to kindle the council fire at the rapids of the Miami. On their route they met an Indian on horseback, who informed them that he was sent to call all the Western nations to war, and was directed to call them timely, as they complained of being neglected, and that timely notice had never been given. At the rapids of the Miami, they were told, by Colonel Magee, the British agent, that it was unfortunate for them they had come so far from home to attend the council which was intended to have been held at that place; but that it was determined it should be removed to the mouth of the river Muskingum; that the Shawanese and Delaware tribes were the cause of a removal, and all his influence could not prevent it. Had it been held at that place he intended to have supplied all the Indians bountifully with provisions and clothing, but it would not now be in his power.

They also inform, that scouts were daily going out and returning with prisoners, scalps, &c.

That the hostile Indians reported, that the American army were within three days' march of the rapids of the Miami; that, on the return of the two Senecas to Detroit, they had met the Farmer's Brother, who had that day arrived with the other chiefs of the Five Nations, amounting to forty-two, at that place.

That Simon Girty addressed them thus: You suppose you have come to attend a treaty of peace; you are mistaken—the tomahawk will be presented to you. The Farmer's Brother then directed the two Senecas abovementioned to return to Buffalo creek, and give particular information to the tribes at that place; and likewise to give me information of their reception in that country, where he would remain, and should any thing of consequence take place, he would despatch another runner.

I have not heard any thing of Captain Hendrick since he left Buffalo creek; hope he is safe. Captain Brandt is recovering his health, and, from information, I think it will be re-established in a short time.

I leave this place this day for the Oneida and Stockbridge villages; and should nothing extraordinary take place, I intend being in Philadelphia by the 20th of next month, unless I should receive your directions to the contrary.

I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

ISRAEL CHAPIN.

NIAGARA, July 28th, 1792.

SIR:

I arrived here on the 24th instant, without any thing remarkable occurring on the way, and only have to say that the Seven Nations of Canada and the Senecas are now waiting at fort Erie for the arrival of a vessel to take them to Detroit, on their way to the Miamis, at which place numbers of Indians are already collected, and others joining daily. From every information I can get, they all seem determined upon a new boundary line, without which I am apprehensive difficulties will be found before a peace will be established. From some conversation with the Fish Carrier and the Onondaga Chief, they wish much that justice may be done relative to the lands, which business has already been explained, and to you they look as a person in authority. I expect to be able to go up by the next return of the vessel, and hope the route will in future be taken that I pointed out as the safest for messengers in future to be sent. Major Trueman, I am sorry to have to say, is no more; being going with a message, was met by an Indian man and boy a hunting, the latter of whom killed him; a circumstance I much regret.

I am, &c.

PITTSBURG, ss.

Personally appeared before me, a certain William May, a private soldier belonging to Captain Armstrong's company, of the late first regiment; was born at Dover, in the State of Delaware, aged about thirty-one years, who, upon oath, saith: That, on or about the 13th of April, he was sent from fort Hamilton, with orders to follow on the trail of Trueman, who, with a French baker, and another man, were sent as a flag to the Indians. That, after passing Four-mile creek, he steered a north course, by a pocket compass, to General Harmar's route, which he reached the seventh day, and followed it about eleven miles, where he discovered Trueman, and the two other men, lying dead, scalped and stripped. He then steered west for General St. Clair's route. After travelling twelve or fourteen miles on that course, he fell in with three Mingoes, and soon after with eleven Chippewas, who took him prisoner about eleven o'clock the same day; and the next, at three o'clock, reached Gen. St. Clair's field of battle, where they remained two or three hours, and took a straight course, frequently falling in with the same Indian path which Gen. St. Clair followed. He knows it to be the same; and that, from the field of battle to a little village, burned by General Harmar, situate on the St. Josephs, is fifty-seven miles; from thence, they struck across the country for about fifty miles, when they fell in with a Delaware town, on the Tawa river, where he was much beat; from thence he was carried down the side of the said river, passing through several little villages, about ten miles, to a trading town, where many of the principal traders live, among whom are Messrs. McKenzie and McDonald, Robert Wilson, and two by the name of Abbet, to whose father, and to Simon Girty, it is said, Major Trueman had letters, which mentioned his name, as Captain Armstrong had requested the major to make inquiries after him in particular, which had nearly occasioned his being put to death. At this place the river Glaze forms a junction with the Tawa, and is the principal town, or Indian head-quarters, where there were 3,600 warriors. These men draw daily rations to that amount, which is sent them from Detroit. That he was employed three months in the transport service, on board of a schooner that carried about 160 barrels. That he made a trip generally once in eight, ten, or twelve days. That he had often loaded the vessel, and had the direction of her. That he had formerly followed the sea, and shalloping, and made the sails for the schooner. That from his knowledge of shalloping, &c. he was purchased by Mathew Elliot. That Alexander McKee is the principal Indian agent, and keeps his stores at the rapids, sixteen miles above the mouth of the river. From the mouth of the river to Detroit is one hundred and eight miles, or ninety miles along the lake, and eighteen miles up the river to Detroit. That he was condemned to die, but saved by Simon Girty, and sent to war with twenty-two Indians, on or about the beginning of May, and reached fort St. Clair in eight days, where they killed one man, and returned through the field of battle, where he discovered the cannon, two of them in Hiskee creek, one of them a six-pounder; that he put his hand into it; the other three are under a fallen hollow tree, on the opposite side of the creek from the field of battle. Just at the rising of the hill there is a hollow tree standing close by the fallen tree; these three were given to Simon Girty by the Wyandots, whom he commanded on the day of battle. The Shawanese did not behave well on the day of action, and were called cowards by the Wyandots and Mingoes; but that the Wyandots made them a present of two cannon in the creek. That in the latter end of June, some Indians came on board the vessel for provisions; among whom was one who had two scalps upon a small stick, one of them he knew to be William Lynch, Major Trueman's waiter, with whom he was well acquainted; he had light hair. That he mentioned at once whose scalp it was, the other they said was Major Trueman's; it was darker than Lynch's; the manner in which Trueman was killed, was mentioned by the Indian who killed him, to an Indian who used to go in the vessel with May, in his presence, and immediately interpreted, viz: This Indian, and an Indian boy, having met with Trueman, his waiter Lynch, and the interpreter, William Smally, that Major Trueman gave the Indian a belt; that after being together three or four hours, the Indians were going to leave them. Trueman inquired the reason from the interpreter, who answered, that the Indians were alarmed, lest, there being three to two, they might injure them in the night. Upon which, Trueman told them they might tie both his servant and himself. That his boy Lynch was first tied, and then Trueman. The moment Trueman was tied, the Indian tomakawked and scalped him, and then the boy. That the papers in possession of Major Trueman were given to Mr. McKee, who sent them by a Frenchman, called Captain Le Motte, to Detroit, on board the schooner of which he, May, had the charge. That upon his return from Detroit, to the rapids, he saw a scalp said to be Captain Hardin's; that he also saw a flag by the route of Sandusky, and that the hair was dark brown, but don't know by what nation he was killed; these papers were also sent to Detroit, on board the schooner, by Mr. Elliott; that a Captain Brumley, of the fifth British regiment, was in the action, but did not learn that he took any command; that Lieutenant Sylvy, of the same regiment, was on his march with three hundred Indians, but did not get up in time to participate in the action; that Simon Girty told him, there were twelve hundred Indians at the place, but three hundred of them did not engage, who were taking care of the horses, exclusive of the three hundred with Lieutenant Sylvy, in all fifteen hundred. That the hostile Indians say they are to be joined by seventeen nations, in case of war, among whom are now at the Glaze, the Pattawatames, Shawanese, Miamies, Tawas, Wyandots, Delawares, Munsees, Ottawas, and Chippewas; that ten chosen Indians were sent to accompany three Creeks, to the Creek nation, with seven horses loaded with presents, among which, were a great many suits of gold and silver laced clothes, sent on board the schooner from Detroit; that these Creeks were in the late action, and it was expected they would be joined by great numbers from the Creek nation.

That it was the common opinion, and the common conversation, that no peace would take place, unless the Ohio river be established as the boundary line, between the Indians and Americans; that this was the general and unanimous sentiments of all the Canada and other Indian nations, who were assembled and assembling at au Glaze, to hold the grand treaty; and that all the Indian nations are determined to join the confederacy against us, unless we consent to that boundary, nor would they return till they compelled the Americans to agree to it; having brought their families with them or sent for them. That he arrived at fort Erie about the 5th of September, where the Cornplanter, with about three hundred and eleven Indians, from Canada and the Six Nations, were, about one hundred of whom were Senecas; he don't think they will let the Cornplanter return, unless he agrees to join them, should they determine for war.

That Captain Brandt returned from fort Erie to Niagara in a chair; that he went to fort Erie, with a view of going to the treaty, but said he was too sick to go on; that he met Brandt at Niagara, two days after he returned from fort Erie; that he did not look like a sick man, and that it was the opinion of the people at Niagara, that he never intended to go to the council; that he was afraid of the hostile Indians.

That on Saturday, the 25th of September, Simon Girty, with two hundred and forty-seven Wyandots and Mingoes, and two guides, Darling of Captain Strong's company, and William Smalley the interpreter, with an intention to strike at the pack-horses, at a place called the Fallentimber, between forts St. Clair, and Hamilton; that if he missed them he would go to Columbia, and do every mischief in his power, before the meeting of the Council; that he would raise hell to prevent a peace; that Girty was sent upon that business by Colonel McKee, the Indian Agent. That he returned to Detroit on Sunday evening, and got a pass from the commandant of the fort, and sailed next day for fort Erie, where he arrived on the 5th of September as aforesaid; on the ninth he got a pass from the commandant of Niagara, and on the seventeenth from General Chapin.

Sworn before me, at Pittsburg, this 11th day of October, 1792.

WILLIAM MAY.

ANTHONY WAYNE.

Information given by Sergeant Reuben Reynolds, of Connecticut, belonging to Captain Buel's company of the second regiment.

He says he was sent by General Wilkinson to visit the hostile tribes of Indians, in quality of a deserter, to explore the waters in the country, and make what observations he could.

That he left fort St. Clair on the 12th of May last; that on the third day after, he reached the old Miami towns, which he conjectures to be about eighty or ninety miles from fort St. Clair; that he tarried at these towns three nights, and then set off towards the river St. Josephs, and after travelling three days more, in which he supposes he went about fifty miles, he fell in with a hunting party of Miami Indians, consisting of fourteen families; these at first threatened to kill him, but afterwards laid aside that intention, and treated him well. The place where he met with these Indians, was on a branch of the river St. Josephs, between two towns of the Miami Indians, about thirty miles from that river as the branch runs; but not more than eight miles in a direct line.

That after being with these Indians about three weeks, he was sold to a family of Wyandots, with whom he continued but three days, when he was again sold to the Miamies, and returned to the party by which he was first taken. He descended the St. Josephs with them to a town of the Pattawatamies, about one hundred and fifty miles from where he entered the St. Josephs, and about sixty or seventy from its mouth.

At this place he stayed about fourteen or fifteen days, and from thence went to the British post, called fort Michilimackinac, where he continued twenty days, and lived in capacity of a kitchen servant, in the family of a Mr. Champion.

Observations made from the time of leaving fort St. Clair, till he reached fort Michilimackinac.

He left fort Jefferson about one mile and a half on the left hand, and fell into the track from that fort to the ground on which the battle was fought on the fourth of November; crossed that ground, and went to the old Miami towns; the travelling very good. From these towns to the place where he fell in with the Indians, the travelling not so good, interrupted by swamps, and the country level and the lands good. The nearest village to the Miami towns, forty-five or fifty miles.

The width of the branch on which he met the Indians, was about six rods, and about two or three feet deep; the navigation tolerable to the St. Joseph, and after entering the latter river, the navigation is good to its mouth for canoes and large flat bottomed boats, and the St. Josephs is likewise navigable for the like craft, fifty miles above the mouth of the creek on which he met with the Indians.

The St. Josephs is about as wide as the branch mentioned above, and holds about the same width to its mouth, but it is much deeper than the branch.

The British fort, Michilimackinac, is garrisoned by a company of sixty men, commanded by Captain William Doyle, of the twenty-fourth regiment. The fortification is of stone, and of a circular form, with two bastions at each corner of the front. He was not allowed to go within the fort.

Indians were daily coming in and going from the forts; he saw arms, ammunition, scalping knives, provisions, &c. given to them; but whether sold as from the traders, or given on other accounts, he could not learn.

The soldiers of the garrison appeared to be inveterate against the Indians; he heard nothing of the grand council to be held. Fourteen chiefs went down to Canada, it was said, for the purpose of consulting the Governor with respect to the war with the Americans. After remaining at Michilimackinac twenty days, as before noted, he had a passport given him, by Captain Doyle, to go to Montreal in a boat of Mr. Champion's; and, accordingly, he set out, and went along lake Huron, two hundred and forty miles to the French river, from thence into a lake, called, by the French, lake Nipsang, afterwards into the Grand river, and down to Montreal, from which place he came through Vermont to the city of Philadelphia.

He observes, that the Grand river is nearly half a mile broad, and very rapid; that it has many carrying places, one of three miles; that some parts of the river are broad, and appear like lakes, and other parts narrow.

That the trade from Montreal is carried through that river by bark canoes; that there are several trading parts along the Grand river, and the nearest settlements to Montreal, about eighty miles, &c.

He knew not the strength of the different tribes which he was among. The Indians, living about lake Superior, had joined the hostile tribes; and it was said that there had never before been known such a confederacy of Indians against any nation; that they expected to have three thousand or three thousand five hundred Indians in the field against the Americans. He saw several of the prisoners, taken on the fourth of November; they were slaves; some were treated well, others ill. He could get no information, from these prisoners, of the designs of the Indians, as they could not speak their language.

The Indians which he met with, in the course of his tour, were the Miami, Sciota, Chippewas, Wyandots, Ottawas, Nipsang, from the French name of the lake mentioned above.

PHILADELPHIA, October 19th, 1792.

The foregoing information of Sergeant Reynolds was taken by Mr. LEAR.

Captain Joseph Brandt to the Secretary of War.

NASSAU, 27th March, 1792.

SIR:

Yours, of the 25th of February, I have the pleasure of acknowledging the receipt of, and entertain the highest sense of the honor done me by the invitation, and flattering compliment contained therein. It is a visit I have long been desirous of making, and the time now seems not to be far distant, when that desire will be accomplished. Visiting you, as an individual, would be by no means tending to the accomplishing any good end; as those meetings must show, that have hitherto been held with people not deputized by the nations, in general, to transact business. I should, therefore, wish to visit you vested with some power that will enable me to speak with certainty to what I may assert, and not assert what I, at the same time, must well know would be by no means approved of. This has been too much the case, of late years, and, in my opinion, principally the cause of the present disturbances.

An explanation of grievances, it is absolutely necessary should be made, and that to the head of the United States, from whom, I entertain not the smallest doubt, but justice will be given when due. To accomplish such desirable ends as civilization and peace-making, no exertions on my part shall be wanting; and though circumstances render it impossible for me to do myself the honor of accepting the invitation at present, as I cannot say whether the Western nations would approve of it, I shall, therefore, despatch messengers immediately to the Miamis, with your invitation, to have the opinion of the people there, who I have no great reason to suppose otherwise than that they will approve of my going, and, very possibly, invest me with such powers as will give energy to what I may do.

My messengers, I suppose, will return here in about thirty days, until when, I shall remain at home; if visiting you, after that, would not be too late to answer the good end intended, I shall endeavor to accomplish my wished for journey, at least if I may hear from you, in answer to this, ere that period.

I am, sir, with esteem, yours, &c.

JOSEPH BRANDT.

NIAGARA, 26th July, 1792.

SIR:

Since my arrival here, I am sorry to have to say, that intelligence respecting Major Trueman's being killed, by an Indian boy, who met with him a hunting, has arrived. This will induce you to recollect what passed between us, relative to messages being sent. The route, Presqu' Isle, I again recommend as the most eligible, from thence, keeping along the lake to Miamis, at which place the chiefs are aptest to be met with, and, when once there, they are safe; sending such a number of messages, rather makes the Indians suspicious of your intentions; and, by any other route, they are much more liable to meet with hunters. There are now great numbers of Indians collected; and, from all their councils, seem determined upon a new boundary line. In short, they are all sensible, that what has hitherto been done, which I fully explained to you, was unfair; and, I am of opinion, peace will not be easily established, without relinquishing part of your claim. The purchases were all made from men who had no right to sell, and who are now to be thanked for the present difficulties. The Senecas, and Seven Nations of Canada, are now waiting at fort Erie for a passage for Detroit, on their way to the Miamis. I shall be able to go up, by the next trip of the vessel; my intention and wish is still for the accomplishment of peace; 'tis a business will require time; things, too rashly or hastily agreed upon, seldom have the effect of those seriously and coolly reflected on; knowing the foundation to be just, and the benefits that will arise therefrom, afford a greater space for forwarding the business. After leaving your place, until my arrival here, I had a tedious journey; the fatigue is done away by the recollection of the politeness and attention shewn me by your officers of Government, for which I cannot but return my warmest thanks, and request you to communicate the same. If any return should be in my power to make, I shall think myself particularly happy, and am, sir,

Your most ob't servant,

JOS. BRANDT.

Statement of the measures which have been taken to conciliate and quiet the Southern Indians.

The Secretary of War to Governor Blount.—31st January, 1792.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 25th of December, by Mr. Allison, and enclose a duplicate of mine to you, of the 10th December last.

The militia must not be called out, excepting in cases of real danger. I am confident, that this power will be used by you with a just regard to the interest of the United States.

It is important that the line should be run; but, perhaps, as there may be some misconception on that head, although I know of none, yet, as we may want the assistance of the Cherokees in our military operations, perhaps there may be a greater degree of delicacy in having the line ascertained previously than subsequent to the campaign.

I am impressed with the importance of having some of all the Southern tribes with our troops in the field; because, I am apprehensive, that their passion for war will constrain them to join the other side, if they do not ours. However, both the point of time, and the characters you propose for running the line, will be left to your discretion.

Captain Roberts will not be with you, and, therefore, the money intended for his rations, you will be at liberty to apply to the use of the Indian department. I presume your accounts are altogether satisfactory, and that they have passed the offices. Mr. Allison, who is an amiable and interesting character, will take with him the money for the militia guard, who attended at the treaty, and, also, the amount for the rangers of the county of Sumner; the money for the counties of Davidson and Hawkins shall also be paid, as soon as they shall be received and passed. We have been surprised with a visit of the following Cherokees: Nenetooyah, or Bloody Fellow, Chutloh or King Fisher, Nontuaku, or the Northward, Teesteke, or the Disturber, Kuthagusta, or the Prince, Schucwegee, or George Miller, the squaw Jane Dougherty, and James Carey the Interpreter. They have stated the following objects as their business, the most material of which will be complied with, especially the additional annuity.

1st. To obtain a higher compensation for the lands they relinquished by the treaty with Governor Blount, on the 2d July, 1791.

2d. That the white people, who are settled southward of the ridge which divides the waters of the Tennessee from those of Little River, should be removed; and, that the said ridge should be the barrier.

3d. That a person of reputation should be commissioned, in behalf of the General Government, to reside in the Cherokee nation, who should at once be their counsellor and protector.

4th. That the projected settlement of the Tennessee company at the Muscle Shoals, should be prevented.

5th. That the annual allowance of goods should be now furnished, together with some ploughs and other implements of husbandry, as mentioned in the treaty.

6th. That James Carey, and such other person as the nation shall hereafter choose, shall be appointed interpreters.

They will return in a few days, enriched with presents, personally, and carrying with them fifteen hundred dollars' worth of goods. They will return by the way of Charleston, by which route they came. It would appear, that General Pickens endeavored to prevent their journey, but in vain. They will be accompanied, on their return, by a worthy young gentleman, Mr. Leonard Shaw, who has been educated at Princeton college, and who, from the purest motives, is desirous of being employed in the Indian department. He is to reside with the Cherokees, and correspond with you regularly. I shall broach to the Cherokees the idea of their joining our army, but I have not yet fully done it.

I have been extremely desirous that all the proceedings which have taken place with these Indians, should have been transmitted to you, by Mr. Allison. But the particular circumstances which compel him to return by a given day, will prevent. But I shall do it, as soon as possible. You will then find, what you will always find, that, although this particular affair has been, and others which may occur hereafter may be, transacted separately from you, yet, that the whole will tend to induce a more perfect confidence on the part of the Indians, in your character, and, of course, will confirm you in an entire reliance upon the candor and uprightness of the Executive of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Secretary of War to Governor Blount.—16th February, 1792.

SIR:

I wrote you on the 31st ultimo, by Mr. Allison, who, I hope, safely arrived. At that time, it was contemplated that the Cherokees should either embark at this place or New York. But, upon more mature consideration, it has been concluded to return them to their own homes, by the way of your government, and, accordingly, they will set out in a wagon, accompanied by James Carey, the interpreter, and Mr. Leonard Shaw, who is to reside in the nation as a deputy agent. This young gentleman is amiable and well informed, and has been educated at Princeton college. He possesses a strong desire of being useful in the Indian department, and this opportunity has been given him for the exercise of his talents. He will shew to you the communications of the Indians with the Government, the messages to the Creeks, the Choctaws, and the Chickasaws, and his particular instructions. But, independent of this information, I shall endeavor to have copies of all the papers transmitted by him, for your use. You will perceive the desire to employ the Southern Indians, and the motives which have led thereto. The President of the United States desires, that you will cordially exert yourself in pursuit of this design. James Seagrove, Esq. is, probably, with the Creeks at this time, and he will urge the same measure.

It will be absolutely necessary that I should be informed, at the earliest moment, of the decision of any of the Southern tribes to take up the hatchet; you will, therefore, please to send an express as soon as a resolution should have been entered into by any of the tribes, to join our troops, stating the time when they would join, and their numbers.

The first of June would be the best time for them to arrive at fort Washington, prepared to operate during the campaign.

It will be of the highest importance that the Indians, about to set out from this city, be shielded from all insult or injury, on their journey to your government; you will, therefore, please to take the most effectual measures on this head, by sending some influential characters at public expense to meet them on their journey from Staunton to Holston. This point is so essential at this moment, that you will not omit any measure to render the protection perfect.

Besides the goods for the Cherokees, it has been thought proper to send you a wagon load of strouds and blankets, wherewith you may, from time to time, conciliate the natives under your direction. The invoices are herewith included, amounting to seven hundred and three dollars and ninety-three cents.

For the delivery of these articles you will render proper vouchers at the treasury, when you will be exonerated from the charge.

You will perceive that we are about presenting the Choctaws and Chickasaws with goods from fort Washington; large quantities have been forwarded to the Creeks, by way of the Rock Landing, and the Cherokees have been well furnished at this time. I shall gladly receive the information from you of the safe arrival of these Cherokees, and the best consequences are to be expected from their visit, which, upon the whole, has been not a little expensive.

James Carey, the interpreter, appears to be desirous, and even zealous, to promote a good understanding between the United States and the Cherokees, and, therefore, he is to be encouraged, and his interest promoted.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Secretary of War to Brigadier General Alexander McGillivray.—17th February, 1792.

SIR:

Your several letters of the 15th and 25th of September, and of the 4th of October, were received by Lieutenant Heth; they would have been replied to earlier, had not information been received of your departure for Pensacola, or New Orleans, with the intimation that you would probably return to the Tallassee, about the first of March. The ostensible reason of your leaving the Creek nation at this critical period, is said to have been the disturbances excited by Bowles' appearance, and the countenance given him by a great part of the Lower towns. If this should have been the true reason, then he must have gained ground rapidly soon after your letter of the 4th October: for you must probably, by a comparison of the dates, have set out from Tallassee somewhere about the first of November. Your knowledge of the Creeks, and the proper modes of managing them, induces a reliance upon your judgment. But whatever may have been the reason of your journey, it would appear that Bowles has availed himself of it, describing it as a flight; it is, however, probable, impressed as you were, that he, being an impostor, you were willing to give him time to verify your predictions concerning his being such; and that the Indians would, upon being convinced thereof, drive him out of the nation. You may rest perfectly assured, and assert the same with full confidence, that Mr. Hammond, the British minister to the United States, has, in the most unequivocal language, in writing to the Secretary of State, disclaimed, on the part of his court, the least countenance or support to Bowles. He is a bold adventurer, attempting to push his fortune by your destruction, and ought, therefore, to be developed, and expelled the nation. The United States will support you in any proper measures which you may think proper to pursue on this occasion. Captain Roberts' and Captain Mills' companies, of the second regiment, have been added to the troops at the Rock Landing, partly with a view to relieve any of the convalescents, and partly to be at hand to afford countenance to you and your measures, taken in pursuance of the treaty with the United States. James Seagrove, Esq. has been appointed by the President of the United States to communicate with you on the present state of affairs, and it will be important that you take immediate measures to have an interview with him, for the purpose of quieting the disturbances excited by Bowles, and running the line agreeably to the treaty of New York. The amiable manners of Mr. Seagrove, and his general character, which cannot be unknown to you, will probably render him highly acceptable to you; you will, therefore, mutually concert measures for the restoration of peace and good order; and to this end, he is furnished with goods and money, to a considerable amount. It is to be hoped, that, by a proper distribution of these articles, and judicious arguments impressed on the Indians, of the great advantages of connecting themselves closely with the United States, that you will gain a great ascendancy in the minds of the Creeks, and dissipate the cloud which has hung over you lately.

The expulsion of Bowles will probably be the first object of your attention, and it would seem to be a point on which there should be no unnecessary delay. The second will be the running of the line agreeably to the treaty. This is of great importance, as on it rests all the advantages expected from the treaty. The intimation, in your letter of the 15th of September, of a departure from that line, cannot be admitted; and when you reflect upon the injurious consequences which would result from an attempt to deviate, in the least degree, from the line established by the treaty, it is presumed you will exert yourself to the utmost to have it fulfilled. The treaty, upon both sides, is sacred, and must be complied with, in all its parts. The President of the United States and the General Government are responsible for its execution on our side, and you and the chiefs are responsible on yours. Your reputation, and all dependent thereon, will be blasted forever, if the line be not run as soon as the disturbances are quiet. The troops of the United States have been waiting at the Rock Landing for this purpose, since the first of October, together with Mr. Ellicott, the surveyor, and any further delays, without strong reasons, will excite general dissatisfaction, as well in the people at large, as the Government. I urge you, therefore, by the common interest of the United States and the Creeks, by your own reputation, and by a contemplation of the ruinous consequences of a deliberate and wanton breach of the treaty, that you agree with Mr. Seagrove upon an early day when the Indians mentioned in the treaty shall attend, and the line be run in precise conformity thereto.

Mr. Seagrove will inform the Governor of Georgia of the time which shall be agreed upon, so that the commissioners may attend from that State.

You have no doubt heard of the disaster of the troops northwest of the Ohio. Although we regret the blood spilt on this occasion, we are not discouraged from pursuing the war; and accordingly, a more adequate force will be sent the ensuing season.

The United States are desirous of peace, and they intimated the same even before you were in New York, and before the Government had taken any offensive measures. But the Wabash Indians refused to listen, and still continued their murders. The Government were constrained to take the measures for coercion, which, however, as yet, have been very unsuccessful. I enclose you a printed statement of this business.

The apprehension is, that you may not be able to keep your young men from joining one side or the other. In this case, you and all the chiefs well know, that it is your interest to join us.

Confident of your attachment, and remembering your intimations upon the subject, I have asserted, that dependence may be placed upon a number of Creek warriors joining our army the next campaign.

I am persuaded you will exert yourself to accomplish this point. Select a party of three hundred, and put them under experienced leaders, and let them pass down the Tennessee river into the Ohio, and thence, up that river, to fort Washington, so as to be there about the 1st of June, prepared to operate for four or five months. It will be necessary to know your decision speedily, so as to inform the people of Kentucky.

The warriors who shall join our army shall be well paid, well armed, and, after the campaign, well rewarded. The same propositions are made to the Cherokees, and the Chickasaws and Choctaws. Piamingo, the mountain leader of the Chickasaws, acted with our troops the last campaign, and he will probably join the army the next campaign, with a body of three hundred of his warriors. Please to let me hear from you soon and explicitly on this head, as well through Mr. Seagrove, as Governor Blount, which will perhaps be the best route, if you should be at the Little Tallassee. The Bloody Fellow, and five other chiefs and warriors, have been here on a visit, and returned well pleased. They have obtained fifteen hundred dollars a year, instead of one thousand, mentioned in the treaty. Mr. Leonard Shaw, an amiable young gentleman, returns with them, to reside in the Cherokee country. He will probably pay you a visit, and I shall depend on your kindness to him. With an entire reliance upon your activity and attachment in the cause of the United States,

I am, sir, yours, &c.

Instructions to Leonard Shaw, temporary agent to the Cherokee nation of Indians.—February 17, 1792.

SIR:

The President of the United States is desirous that you should accompany the Cherokee chiefs, who are at present in this city, to their own nation, for the objects hereinafter particularly stated, as well as for the general purpose of attaching the said Indians, and all the Southern Indians, whom you may occasionally see, to the interests of the United States. It is the sincere desire of the United States to be at peace with all the Southern tribes, and all others within their general limits. Treaties were made at Hopewell on the Keowee, in 1785, and 1786, with the Cherokees, Choctaws, and Chickasaws, and in the year 1790, with the Creeks, all of which treaties you have herewith delivered you. Some dissatisfaction having occurred upon the treaty with the Cherokees, a new treaty was formed with that tribe, on the second day of last July, by Governor Blount, of the Tennessee government. The chiefs whom you are to accompany, were delegated for the purpose of endeavoring to obtain a higher annual compensation for their lands than was stipulated in the treaty, and to obtain satisfaction on other points, all of which have been freely granted by the President of the United States, and they are returning apparently well satisfied. The communications they have made, and the answers thereto, by the President of the United States, together with my answers, are contained in a book made for that express purpose, which is committed to you. Upon their return to their own country, it is highly probable that all the said communications will be duly considered at the public councils. Mr. James Carey, who has been present, will be the interpreter. His attachment to the United States, and his zeal in their service, will, I am persuaded, in future, realize the expectations which have been formed of him. You will continue to cultivate his friendship, and endeavor, through him, to infuse into all the Indians the uprightness of the views of the President of the United States, and his desire to better the situation of the Indians in all respects.

The proposal that the Cherokees should join our forces, will be a subject of discussion. You know the motives of this proposal; that it arises from an apprehension of their young men being constrained to join one side or the other, and that it will be for the happiness of the Cherokees that they should join ours in preference to that of the hostile Indians. You will fully and frequently inculcate the purity of the conduct of the General Government to the hostile Indians, and how reluctantly the war has been imposed on us; and further, that its views are to make a firm peace with the said Indians, as soon as they have manifested their sincere intentions for this purpose.

It is of high importance that the Southern Indians should be prevented joining the Indians north of the Ohio, and no expedient occurs, so proper to attain this end, as inducing them to join our army.

The difference between civilized and savage modes of life is so great, as, upon a first view, almost leads to the conclusion that the earth is peopled with races of men possessing distinct primary qualities; but, upon a closer inspection, this will appear fallacious, and that the immense difference arises from education and habits.

A due performance of your duty will probably require the exercise of all your patience and fortitude, and all your knowledge of the human character—the school will be a severe but interesting one. If you should succeed in acquiring the affections, and a knowledge of the characters of the Southern Indians, you may be at once useful to the United States, and advance your own interest.

You will endeavor to learn their languages: this is essential to your communications. You will collect materials for a history of all the Southern tribes, and all things thereunto belonging. You will endeavor to ascertain their respective limits; make a vocabulary of their respective languages; teach them agriculture, and such useful arts as you may know or can acquire. You will correspond regularly with Governor Blount, who is Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and inform him of all occurrences; you will also cultivate a correspondence with Brigadier General McGillivray, and you will also keep a journal of your proceedings, and transmit them to the War Office.

You will, for the present, be allowed at the rate of five hundred dollars, annually; a greater sum will probably depend on the evidence of your utility.

You have advanced you on this account, two hundred and fifty dollars; and you have herewith delivered you a sum of five hundred dollars, on account of defraying the expenses of the Indians' return. You will keep accurate accounts of such expenses, taking bills and receipts for every cent expended and charged; and you will, before you leave Governor Blount, transmit the said account and vouchers. Besides this sum, which is founded on an estimate, you have herewith delivered to you two hundred and fifty dollars. This is to serve as a contingent fund, after your arrival in the nation, and for which you will be held accountable.

You are to exhibit to Governor Blount the Cherokee book, and all the writings therein; the messages to the several tribes of Indians, and these instructions.

A stage wagon will accompany you to the navigable waters of the Holston, and also two wagons, loaded with the Indian goods; a contract has been formed for the wagons, and the hire is to be paid on their return to this city, and each wagoner is to pay the expenses of himself and his teams.

I will write to Governor Blount to furnish you with boats, to carry the Indians and their goods down the Holston and the Tennessee, to the Cherokee country; on your arrival at Staunton, you will embrace the first opportunity of informing him of your approach, that he may meet you and the Indians with a safe escort.

Your route will be hence to Reading, thence Harriss's ferry to Carlisle, to ——— ferry, on the Potomac, to Winchester, to Staunton, to ———, and to Holston. I should hope that you would travel upwards of twenty miles each day, and that you should reach the Holston in about thirty days.

You will write to me on your arrival at Carlisle, Winchester, Staunton, and Holston.

You have the invoices of the Indian goods, which accompany the said Indians; which goods are for three distinct purposes:

1st. The personal presents to the chiefs and warriors and interpreters, amounting to three thousand four hundred and sixty-two dollars and twenty-one cents.

2d. The personal presents to the chiefs, mentioned in the speech of the President of the United States to the Cherokees.

3d. The eight suits of clothing, and the silver ornaments, designed for the chiefs mentioned in the message to the Chickasaws and Choctaws.

This will leave a surplus of four suits, and four sets of ornaments, in your possession, which you will either give to the chiefs of the Creeks or others, as in your judgment may best promote the public interest. But it is to be observed, that a large quantity of valuable goods were sent from this city to the Rock Landing, in December last, designed for the Creeks.

4th. The goods for the Cherokee nation. This quantity amounts to one thousand seven hundred and fifteen dollars and fourteen cents, which considerably exceeds the promised compensation, and of which you will make a proper use, to shew that the United States mean to conduct munificently to the Cherokees.

Besides all the above goods, there is a separate wagon load, amounting to seven hundred and three dollars and ninety-three cents, put under your charge for Governor Blount; to be by him distributed for the public service. The Indians must be informed of this circumstance distinctly and strongly, so that no suspicion arise in their minds that this quantity was part of their goods.

All public goods, money, or property of any sort, passing through your hands, must be minutely accounted for; you will, therefore, keep accurate accounts of all deliveries, the motive, the time and place, and, if possible, to obtain vouchers of white persons present; but if this should not be practicable, you must take an oath to the truth of the statement.

Given at the War Office, &c.

Message from the Secretary of War to the Creeks.—17th February, 1792.

To Chinnabie, the great Natchez warrior, and the other chiefs of the Creek nation, who lately sent a talk to the President of the United States, by the Cherokee chiefs:

BROTHERS:

Your father, General Washington, the Great Chief of the United States, has directed me to send this talk to you; receive it therefore with gladness, as an evidence of his love and attachment to the Creek nation.

He recollects you, Chinnabie, and the other chiefs who accompanied your beloved chief, General Alexander McGillivray, to New York.

The treaty then made is the bond of union between the United States and your nation.

You have asked about one Bowles, who has caused disturbances in your nation; that man is an impostor, and deserves and ought to be driven out of your nation immediately.

It is not necessary to enlarge, as I have written fully to your beloved chief, General McGillivray, and sent a great white belt, as a perpetual remembrance of our friendship.

Your beloved chief will inform you of all the news, and you will obey him as your best friend.

Your friends, the Cherokees, have been well received, and have been gratified in all their requests; they therefore return home with great joy and satisfaction.

Given at Philadelphia, &c.

Message from the Secretary of War to the Choctaw nation.—17th February, 1792.

To the chiefs and warriors of the Choctaw nation:

BROTHERS:

Your father, General Washington, the Great Chief of the United States, has received your talk which you sent by the chiefs of the Cherokees last autumn. He received it with satisfaction, and holds it fast to his heart, as he does all the peaceable red people, and particularly the Choctaws.

The United States are at peace with the Creeks, the Cherokees, the Choctaws, and Chickasaws. General Washington is anxiously desirous that this peace should be rendered as firm and lasting as the mountains; he will cheerfully embrace every occasion to render our friendship closer and closer, and to unite us in bonds of brotherly love.

But, although the United States are at peace with all the Southern tribes, yet they are at war with some bad Indians, north of the Ohio. These Indians are the Kickapoos, and their allies, who are your enemies as well as ours. The war which the bad Indians have waged against the frontier settlements, is the cause of the United States raising troops, and attempting to punish the said Indians; but these Indians having, by their lies, seduced other Indians to join them, they beat our troops last year. But the United States are not disheartened at this event; they will still punish the bad Indians severely, unless they immediately come and make peace. We do not want their lands; we do not want to injure them in any respect; but we wish they could behave as good children, so that we might treat them with kindness.

BROTHERS: Your father, General Washington, desires that you will not believe any lies which these bad Indians shall endeavor to impress on you. I have told you the truth, that is, their murdering the white frontier people, which is the cause we make war upon them; and I repeat it, that unless they will be quiet, they must be destroyed.

BROTHERS: If these bad Indians continue the war, we shall send a large body of troops to fort Washington, on the Ohio, the next year. Your father, General Washington, says, that such of your young warriors as choose, may join our troops at that place. Those of them who shall come there, shall be well fed, well armed, and well rewarded after the campaign shall be over. Such of your warriors as shall join our troops, ought to be there by the first of June next. Your father, General Washington, sends you two great silver medals, and two sets of arm bands, and also two suits of rich uniform clothes, as a mark of his affection. You will point out the two great chiefs who are to receive these marks of distinction. But besides those articles, which are the forerunners of other good things, he has directed the commanding general at fort Washington to give you more extensive presents for your nation. Let him know when and where you will be ready to receive those, and he will send them to you.

Chiefs and warriors, remember the treaty of Hopewell as the bond of our union. Adhere to it on your parts as we shall on ours. The United States will be your friends and protectors upon all occasions, and you must regard General Washington as your father.

After the next campaign shall be over, General Washington invites four or five of your great chiefs to visit him in Philadelphia. He wishes to see you, and convince you personally how desirous he is of promoting your happiness. You shall be kindly received, well treated, and sent back enriched with presents. As an evidence of the goodness of his heart, and of the friendship of the United States, General Washington sends you a great white belt, to be kept as an everlasting token thereof.

Given at the city of Philadelphia.

Message from the Secretary of War to the Chickasaw nation, dated 17th February, 1792.

To Piamingo, the mountain leader, and the other chiefs and warriors of the Chickasaw nation.

BROTHERS:

Your father, General Washington, the Great Chief and President of the United States, has commanded me to send you this talk. Receive it, therefore, as an evidence of his affection, and the affection of the United States towards the Chickasaw nation.

He heartily thanks Piamingo, and the other Chickasaw warriors, for joining our troops the last season.

The Indians north of the Ohio have for several years been committing murders on the defenceless white men, women, and children, on the frontiers. General Washington sent a message to these bad Indians, to tell them they were doing wrong, and that they must be quiet, and make peace with the United States; but instead of complying with the invitations for peace, they were more violent than ever. Our troops were sent to punish the bad Indians for their crimes, but more Indians joining than was expected, our troops were defeated.

This defeat may appear a vast thing to the bad Indians, who will now think themselves great warriors; but, although we lament the blood which was spilt on the occasion, yet we are neither disheartened, or afraid to pursue the war; unless, therefore, the bad Indians come and make peace, the United States will raise a sufficient force not only to curb them, and prevent their murders in future, but, if necessary, to drive them out of the country altogether.

Although the loss of men is to be avoided, if possible, on our part, yet we can bear a much greater loss than we have sustained, without being greatly weakened, whereas, the loss of a thousand warriors to the hostile Indians, would be a blow from which they would never recover. Numerous as we are, the lives of the hostile Indians are at our disposal. We wish not, however, to cut them off from the face of the earth; but, on receiving evidence of penitence for their past crime, and proper security for their good behavior, we are willing to receive them into our protection, and to impart to them the blessings of civil life.

The President of the United States is very desirous to reward the attachment of Piamingo, and the warriors who were with him at fort Washington, and he now sends to Piamingo, and two other principal chiefs, — great silver medals, and each a suit of rich uniform clothes; and further, he has ordered presents to be sent from fort Washington to the Chickasaw nation generally, of such articles as shall be useful to them.

The Chickasaws must send a message to the commanding officer at fort Washington, giving him sufficient notice of the time when, and the place where, they will receive the goods.

These goods are sent as presents, and as an evidence of the attachment of the United States to the Chickasaws, and a reward for their friendship.

If Piamingo should, with other chiefs, choose to join their arms with ours in the cause of the next campaign, let them repair to fort Washington by the first of June next, where they shall be well armed, well fed, and, also, after the campaign, well rewarded for their services, in money or goods, as they shall best like it.

Mr. Shaw, the bearer, who accompanies the Cherokee chiefs to their own country from this city, will deliver you the message and the presents; he will receive also your answer to this request. Treat him kindly, for the sake of the President of the United States, and let him know at what time, and with how many warriors, you will join our army at fort Washington.

The President of the United States has received your talk by the Cherokees, and he has satisfied them entirely upon their business, and they are about returning home with great joy. Besides writing this talk, General Washington sends a great white belt to the Chickasaws, as a perpetual evidence of the pure intentions and strong affections of the United States to the Chickasaw nation.

After the next campaign, our beloved chief, General Washington, invites Piamingo, and three other great chiefs, to repair to Philadelphia. He wishes to convince them, by a personal interview, how desirous he is of promoting the happiness of the Chickasaws.

The chiefs who shall come forward shall be kindly received, well treated, and return to their own country enriched with presents.

Given at the city of Philadelphia, &c.

*The Secretary of War to James Seagrove, Esq.—20th February, 1792.SIR:

Your letter to the President of the United States, dated at Trader's Hill, on the river St. Mary's, near the Indian line, on the 30th of November 1791, and yours to me, dated at Savannah, on the 7th ultimo, have been both received within the last week.

Major Trescott, for whom I had written to fort Pitt, delayed his arrival longer than I expected. The rivers became obstructed with ice. Information was received of General McGillivray's absence from the nation, without whom it would have been impolitic to have taken any important measures. The arrival of certain Cherokee chiefs at this city, upon business collaterally connected with your mission; the time it was conjectured it would require you and the troops and goods to repair to the Rock Landing, combined to prevent the main objects of your instructions being sufficiently matured until this time.

You will now please to regard this letter as the general rule of conduct in the measures which you may take, for more closely cementing the interests of the Creeks with those of the United States. The main objects of your mission will herein be designated, but the accomplishment thereof will principally depend upon the wisdom of your conduct, your own resources and talents.

To assist you, however, in your operations, Captain Mills had under his charge, money and goods to the amount of seven thousand seven hundred and twelve dollars and thirty two cents, to wit: two thousand seven hundred and twenty two dollars and thirty four cents, in money, and four thousand nine hundred and eighty nine dollars ninety eight cents in goods at the first cost, independent of the transportation to the Rock Landing. I have enclosed you an order to Captain Mills for the delivery of the said money and goods to you.

Of the expenditure thereof, you will keep regular accounts—stating to whom delivered, the motives, and the times and places; and in all possible cases; the delivery must be evidenced by two commissioned officers of the troops of the United States, or two other white persons. You will please not to consider these rules as any evidences of distrust, but as general principles, operating throughout the Indian department; and you will, every six months, state your account, supported by vouchers, and transmit the same to me. In this account you will state the money or articles received and delivered, and the quantities remaining on hand.

You will also please to take an oath, prescribed by the laws, and transmit the same to this office, in order to be registered.

The following will be the main objects of your attention:

First. To quiet the disturbances which have been excited among the Creeks by the arrival of Bowles, and to have his impostorship properly exposed, and his person either secured or banished the nation.

Secondly. To have the treaty of New York complied with in all respects, as well of prisoners as of running the boundary lines, precisely according to the treaty.

Thirdly. To obtain a body of three hundred warriors of the Creeks, to join our army at fort Washington, on the Ohio, which is near where the great Miami empties into the said river.

I enclose you an open letter for Brigadier General McGillivray upon these subjects, in order that you may be fully acquainted with the views of Government, and that you may take a copy thereof, under the official restrictions of secrecy.

It is to be hoped that the accomplishment of the first object will not be attended with great difficulty: for Mr. Ellicott writes, on the 14th of last month, from the Rock Landing, and encloses a report of Charles Weatherfield, by which it would rather appear that Bowles was preparing to return to the Bahamas, as he had then retired eighty miles down the Flint river.

I am induced to hope, that, although General McGillivray had gone to New Orleans or Pensacola, yet that it was not with the intention of moving entirely out of the nation. He formerly intimated a removal of his residence nearer to Pensacola, upon some fertile lands, and it is probable that he had removed his negroes to his intended future residence; but, although I mention this, it is only conjectural.

As to Walker's information, perhaps it is to be received with caution: for I have been informed that Mr. McGillivray had entertained a penchant for one or two daughters of Walker's, and the apprehension on this subject may have occasioned the latter's removal.

At this distance, it would appear, that any strong attempts to remove even Bowles, unless in consequence of measures connected with Mr. McGillivray, would be to hazard his resentment and attachment to the United States. Jealousy is easily excited, and it would, at this time, be a delicate, and perhaps improper measure, to endeavor to establish an influence among the Creeks, independent of Mr. McGillivray. I am strongly impressed with the conviction, that his absence is a temporary one; that he will return in March or before; and that, if Bowles should not then have gone off, he will take the most decisive measures for his destruction.

It is a circumstance of the highest importance, and of which you will make the fullest use, that Mr. Hammond, the British minister here, has disavowed explicitly the least knowledge of, or support to, Bowles. He is, as it respects any of his assertions of being supported by the British Government, an impudent impostor; and it is most likely that it will prove the same with respect to his pecuniary promises. Your primary object will therefore be, to see Mr. McGillivray, and arrange with him the utter extirpation of Bowles.

With respect to the second object, you will attentively observe my letter to him upon that subject. The line marked in the treaty is the only one that can be accepted. The treaty was solemnly made and ratified, and has become the law of the land. The United States are bound to protect the Creeks in the boundary specified in the treaty, and they cannot consent to any other being marked. The true line, and that only, can be established.

The fifteen hundred dollars yearly, is given principally for that part of the treaty. The future importance of Mr. McGillivray, as it shall respect his connexion with, and support by, the United States, depends upon his carrying the treaty into full effect.

Although this object is of the highest importance, yet, considering the inflammability of the Indians, and their perturbed situation, owing to Bowles' interference, it would not be wise to make the running of the line instantly, a sole condition on which the United States will continue at peace with the Creeks. It may (if indispensably necessary to afford time for reflection, and better dispositions) be postponed a month or two, without diminishing the force of the claim or treaty. But you will hold up, in a firm, but temperate language, the ideas above suggested.

The United States will liberally compensate the Indians for any evidence of their attachment, and therefore, rewards to particular eminent characters may be held forth with a certainty of being realized: the continuance of which, however, always to be conditioned on evidences of the attachment of the party who shall receive them.

The third object is particularly mentioned in the letter to Mr. McGillivray. The entire defeat of our troops the last year, will render the hostile Indians intolerably audacious. They will have their emissaries with the Southern Indians, and unless powerfully counteracted, it is but too probable they will obtain assistance. To prevent this measure, which would be a prelude to a general war with all the Southern tribes, and also to strengthening the treaties that have been made, it is thought advisable to employ the Southern warriors to join our troops against the hostile Indians. You will endeavor to accomplish this point with General McGillivray, so that he may send three hundred of his people. He mentioned to me his desire, when the treaty was made, to find some employ for his warriors. One now occurs in which he may evince, decisively, the sincerity of his attachment to the United States.

The Cherokees will probably send a body of their warriors, and the same will also take place with the Chickasaws, and probably the Choctaws.

I enclose you three statements of the causes of the war with the Northern Indians.

It may be safely affirmed that the United States are desirous of establishing a general and firm peace with all the Indian tribes, founded on the principles of moderation and justice—a knowledge of, and reliance upon this principle, will be the pole star of your conduct. You will exert yourself to influence and attach the Indians to the President and the United States. Your exertions in pursuance of this service, will entitle you to the approbation and thanks of the President. You will, of course, avoid every thing that is harsh and disagreeable to the Indians, whom you will conciliate by kindness and mildness, instead of terrors or threatenings.

I have not mentioned the rate of your compensation, as a bill is pending before Congress upon the subject of Indian affairs generally, in which it is expected provision will be made for the agents employed in the Indian department. The appointment, for the present, will have the appearance of being a temporary one, and, therefore, a commission is not transmitted.

You will, as soon as possible, inform me of the receipt of these instructions, and of your movements consequent thereon.

The troops at the Rock Landing have been increased, under the ideas of awing and repressing any turbulent spirits among the Indians who might be disposed for mischief by Bowles' instigations.

I am persuaded that Major Call, the commanding officer, will do every thing in his power to concur with you in promoting the public service.

Mr. Ellicott, the surveyor, has been hitherto detained at the Rock Landing, with the expectation of running the line, and he will be instructed to continue there unless appearances should terminate the expectations upon that head, in which case he will return.

Although these instructions are not signed by the President of the United States, you are to consider them as formed by his express order.

In your letter to the President you mention an idea of Bowles' introducing goods, through the St. Mary's, into the Creek nation. If this should be the case, you will detain the said goods until you receive the further orders of the President thereon.

I am, sir, &c.

The Secretary of War to Governor Blount.—31st March, 1792.

SIR:

I have received your favor of the 2d of March, with its enclosures, all of which have been submitted to the President of the United States.

He approves the calling the Chickasaws and Choctaws to Nashville, the first of June next, for the purpose of conciliating and attaching them cordially to the interest of the United States.

You will, therefore, take the necessary steps to carry into full execution the objects contained in your letter, particularly the contracting for the necessary quantity of provisions.

Mr. Allison will stay here until the goods are prepared, which shall be done as soon as possible, although it is doubtful whether, until the arrival of the spring ships from Europe, a sufficient quantity of proper goods may be obtained.

You are hereby authorized to call into service, so many militia and officers, on the pay and rations allowed by the United States, as shall in your judgment be indispensably necessary for the defensive protection of your Government. Although the two companies you mention, do not appear excessive, yet the President requests it may be impressed upon you, that he regards that responsibility of character you possess, as an entire security against any excessive number. You will regulate the time for which these men shall be engaged. You will please to observe, that they will be entitled to pay and rations only—the President not being authorized to allow the militia any clothing.

Mr. Shaw must have arrived with you long before this, with the Cherokees. As he is ordered to make a full communication of all the business transacted at this place with said Cherokees, I am persuaded it was satisfactory to them, and I hope it will be so to you.

I shall write you more fully by Mr. Allison.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

The Secretary of War to James Seagrove, Esq.—11th April, 1792.

SIR:

I have duly received your letters of the 14th of January, and 20th of February, with their several enclosures. I now transmit you, herewith, by order of the President of the United States, a certified copy of an official letter from Mr. Hammond, his Britannic Majesty's minister, now resident in this city, to the Secretary of State, relative to an utter disavowal of the court of London, of having any communication whatever with Bowles. You will make use of this information as you shall think best, in conformity to the spirit of my instructions to you of the 20th February last.

By the first opportunity from this place, I shall reply particularly to your letters.

I am, &c.

“PHILADELPHIA, 30th March, 1792.

“SIR:

By the last packet I have received from my court, (in consequence of a communication from me of the reports circulated upon the subject) a corroboration of the truth of the sentiments which I had the honor of stating to you as the result of my personal conviction, in my letter of the 14th of December, relative to Mr. Bowles.

I am directed to assure this Government, in the most explicit manner, that the assertions said to have been made by Mr. Bowles, of his pretensions having been encouraged or countenanced by the Government of Great Britain, or of his having been furnished by it with arms and ammunition, are entirely without foundation. The report, also, of his having obtained from the Government of Great Britain any sort of commission as superintendent of the Indians, or in any other character, or of his having received authority to promise to the Indians protection and assistance in the recovery of their old boundary with Georgia, or to hold out to them the expectation of any English reinforcements in the spring, is equally groundless.

I feel the sincerest satisfaction in being empowered to communicate to you, sir, this additional proof of his Majesty's Government to promote a good understanding with the United States, which solicitude cannot be more decidedly evinced than by this prompt contradiction of the rumors to which I have alluded, and which are as repugnant to the truth, as they are injurious to the establishment of that mutual confidence which ought to subsist between our respective countries.

I have the honor to be, with great respect and esteem, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

GEO. HAMMOND.

Mr. JEFFERSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, &c.

I do hereby certify that the preceding letter from his Britannic Majesty's minister plenipotentiary, dated 30th March, 1792, and addressed to the Secretary of State, is truly copied from the original.

In testimony whereof, I have caused my seal of office to be hereunto affixed, this thirty-first day of March, 1792.

TH. JEFFERSON, Secretary of State.”

The Secretary of War to Brigadier General Andrew Pickens.—21st April, 1792.

SIR:

It is most probable that you are not unacquainted that hostilities have for many years past existed between certain tribes and a banditti of Indians northwest of the Ohio, and the people of the United States residing upon the frontiers lying along that river. That these evils, rising by degrees, at last became too enormous to be longer borne without attempting to curb them. That the attempts for this purpose, made both by Brigadier General Harmar and Major General St. Clair, were unsuccessful.

That the posture of affairs have induced the Congress to raise a large body of troops, and that recruits are raising accordingly.

In this stage of the business, it is the ardent desire of the President of the United States, that every effort for peace should precede coercion, and accordingly attempts are making to effect that end. But the success is too doubtful for the United States to place any dependence thereon. Every preparation will of course be made for a vigorous campaign, in case the efforts for peace should prove fruitless.

In the mean time, there can be no doubt but that the hostile Indians are endeavoring to excite the Southern Indians to join them. This event would be attended with the most pernicious effects, and it must, if possible, be avoided.

But when the passions for war of the younger part of the Indians be contemplated, it must be confessed to be a work of difficulty, and almost impracticable to keep them quiet; and, upon reflection, no expedient seems so proper, to prevent their acting against us, as inducing them to join our troops against the hostile Indians. It is presumed that, if the Indians northwest of the Ohio are offered the most moderate and just terms of peace which can be devised, and they still continue their depredations, that the United States will be justified by every principle of humanity in guarding themselves from injury by the very means used by an unjust and barbarous enemy. Little reasoning is required to establish a principle so self evident.

Governor Blount is to hold a treaty at Nashville, with the Chickasaws and Choctaws, about the first of June next, to which he will be requested to add some of the principal chiefs of the Cherokees. Some recent murders will render it proper as to the latter nation. At that treaty, offers will be made to the nations who shall be present, of joining their young warriors to our army, in case the hostile Indians should persist in their dispositions for war.

The President of the United States, who is impressed with respect for your character, has directed me to invite you to be present at that treaty, in order that your influence may be used, not only to induce the Indians to accede to the propositions which may be made to them, of the nature before described, but, if they accept, that you should command them combinedly on the proposed expedition northwest of the Ohio.

The President of the United States, upon mature reflection, has conceived that your influence over the Cherokees particularly, and the Southern Indians generally, would, if exerted at the present time, be peculiarly useful and important to your country.

And the reputation you possess will not permit him to doubt, that, if it be possible, you will not hesitate to undertake the object.

The compensation which will be allowed you, will be equal to a brigadier's pay, and, as you possess that rank in the militia, you will retain it while employed in the service, which will be in its nature temporary.

If a body of Southern Indians could be obtained, not exceeding in all five hundred in number, well armed with their own rifles, and, upon their arrival at fort Washington, to be combined with a body of riflemen and cavalry, they might be of themselves almost irresistible and of the highest utility.

In case of this measure being complied with by the Indians, the manner of their joining the army must be concerted with Major General Wayne, the commander of the troops at fort Washington, who might order boats to fall down to the mouth of Cumberland and there receive the Indians, or they might be marched by land, whichever may be considered as the best.

As this letter is written in consequence of the immediate directions of the President of the United States, and as it will be sent by express to Governor Blount, and from him to you, I pray you that you would not hesitate to communicate to him your determination by the return of Governor Blount's express, and he will instantly transmit it to me.

I am, sir, &c.

The Secretary of War to Governor Blount.—22d April, 1792.

Sir:

I have the honor to enclose you a duplicate of my letter to you of the 31st ultimo, acknowledging the receipt of yours of the 2d ultimo by Mr. Allison, and containing some general principles relative to the militia you may judge expedient to call into service, for the defensive protection of such parts of your government as are exposed to the incursions of hostile Indians; and also, containing the approbation of the President of the United States, for the proposed conference with the Chickasaws and Choctaws, at Nashville, on the first day of June next.

Having on the 13th instant received your letter of the 14th of the last month, I shall now reply to it, and the one of the 2d of the same month.

But previously thereto, I take occasion to state, that it is the most ardent desire of the President of the United States, and the General Government, that a firm peace should be established with all the neighboring tribes of Indians, on such pure principles of justice and moderation, as will enforce the approbation of the dispassionate and enlightened part of mankind.

That it is the intention of the President of the United States, that an adherence to this desire, as to a well founded maxim, shall be the leading feature in the administration of Indian affairs, while he is at the head of the Government.

That he shall lament exceedingly all occasions which shall either suspend or impede the operations of those principles, which he considers essential to the reputation and dignity of the republic.

That, in pursuance of these ideas, he endeavored that a genuine state of their situation, and of the general dispositions of the United States upon this subject, should be brought home to the minds of the Western Indians, before any coercion was attempted.

That, although the essays to this end were then ineffectual, yet it has been his directions that similar intimations should be continued.

That, therefore, every effort is making in order to impress the hostile Indians with their past errors; that the United States require nothing of them but peace, and a line of conduct tending to their own happiness.

That all which has past shall still be buried in oblivion, provided that they will immediately agree to a treaty of peace, in which they will obtain all they can possibly desire, and relinquish nothing; for we demand none of their lands.

That we are not sensible the hostile Indians, that is, the Miami and Wabash Indians, have any just claim to lands comprehended in the former treaties; but, notwithstanding, if they can show they possess a fair right to any of those lands, they shall receive a liberal compensation for the same.

It is presumed, if these sentiments could be fully impressed on the minds of the hostile Indians, (and measures are taking for that purpose) that the establishment of tranquillity on the frontiers would be the probable consequence.

But, if the hostile Indians should, after having these intentions of the Government laid fully before them, still persist in their depredations on the frontiers, it will be considered as the dictate of humanity to endeavor to punish, with exemplary severity, so incorrigible a race of men, in order to deter other tribes, in future, from a like conduct.

I have been thus particular in detailing to you these sentiments, in order that you may lay them before the assembled nations, at the proposed conference, in full and strong terms.

It will, therefore, be only in the result of the hostile Indians continuing in their hostility, that the aid of the Southern Indians would be required. But, as this result will be known, and as the commanding general will be directed to communicate it to you, by expresses, while you are at the conference, you will, of course, proceed in obtaining the number mentioned in the letter to General Pickens, which is enclosed open for your perusal and consideration.

The President of the United States, being very favorably impressed with the character of General Pickens, is greatly desirous, if the war must proceed, that he should command the Indians, combined with other troops.

You will, therefore, please, immediately, to forward the letter to General Pickens, first sealing it, and, upon receiving his answer, you will transmit it to Richmond, by express, whence it will arrive by the stages as soon as by express.

Mr. Allison has been detained for the arrival of the spring ships. But he has now provided all the goods you requested, as per invoice herein enclosed, excepting the rifles, which, unfortunately, cannot be obtained here, without taking those which are designed for the rifle corps.

If Mr. Allison can obtain the number requested, in the Southern district, he is requested so to do.

He will embark with the goods, for Richmond, on the 25th instant.

Besides the goods, which amount to eight thousand one hundred and ninety-one dollars eleven cents, he is charged with the sum of two thousand dollars, to pay for the provisions and other expenses of the treaty, as stated in your estimate, together with the sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars, contingencies of the treaty.

In addition, he is charged with the sum of three thousand dollars, to pay the expense of transportation to Richmond, and thence to your government.

He is also charged with the further sum of three thousand dollars, to pay the levies who served in the campaign under General St. Clair.

I am anxious to hear of the safe arrival of Mr. Shaw with you, and that they have gone forward into their nation, continuing in that grateful state of mind in which they departed from this place.

I flatter myself, the manner of their treatment here, and the impressions of good designed by the United States for their, and the other friendly nations, will be received with joy by all the well disposed Cherokees, and will, of course, put to the rout the ill disposed and bloody minded.

We have, in this city, at present, a numerous delegation of the principal chiefs of the Five Nations, who have been invited to make this visit, in order to prevent their being influenced to war by the hostile Indians and their emissaries. They will return in a few days, apparently well satisfied, and have engaged to repair to the Miami village, in order to influence the Indians in that quarter, to peace.

I am commanded by the President of the United States, to whom your letters are constantly submitted, to say, with respect to your remarks upon the line at Little river, that you will be pleased to make a liberal construction of that article, so as to render it entirely satisfactory to the Indians, and, at the same time, as consistently as may be with the treaty; and to observe that he is satisfied with your sentiments on that subject.

It is submitted to you, as the late depredations by the Cherokees must, in some degree, have interrupted that harmony and confidence which ought to have flowed from the treaty of Holston, whether it will not be for the public interest to invite a few of the chiefs of the Cherokees to be present at the proposed conference at Nashville.

And it were to be wished that Mr. McGillivray's affair with Bowles would permit him also to attend, provided you should be convinced of his cordiality to the post at Bear's creek, and the employment of some Creeks.

You would then have an opportunity, perhaps, of talking over the whole affair, relatively to Bear's creek, which the Chickasaws relinquished as a trading post, by the treaty of Hopewell.

If this could be established, by the general and open consent of all the tribes, it would be well; but, it is to be apprehended that starting a new object, at the mouth of Duck river, would have the effect to excite suspicions and jealousies, and unhinge any confidence they may have. That, at this crisis, the risk of inquiry would far overbalance any advantages, and therefore the attempt ought not to be made.

The distance from Duck river to Nashville, is not more than fifty or sixty miles; and, although not quite as convenient as at the mouth of Duck river, yet the difference is not so great as to require any hazard of bad consequences from the attempt.

General Robertson has, from his situation, character, and other circumstances, incurred expenses on account of the Indians, for which he has petitioned Congress. The petition is referred to me. Although general principles of equity seem to support the claim, more especially coming from a man of his character, yet it is extremely difficult to establish a general principle of law, to compensate such unauthorized advances, without fixing dangerous precedents.

The object of my mentioning this, is, that in future, and until further arrangements, the President of the United States will consent that General Robertson be considered as temporary agent for the Chickasaws, with an appointment at the rate of four hundred dollars per annum; you will therefore please to administer to him the oath of office which you yourself have taken.

It is to be observed, that the law authorizing such appointments has not yet passed; and that, therefore, this appointment can only, at present, have a temporary aspect.

He will, in future, distribute such things, and perform such duties, for the conciliation of the Choctaws, Chickasaws, and others, as you shall, from time to time, direct.

The business of the proposed conference will be interesting to the United States. I am happy it will be managed by you in person, as I am satisfied the Government may rest with great confidence in your exertions, as well as abilities, to execute its wishes.

The great object in managing Indians, or indeed any other men, however enlightened, is to obtain their confidence. This cannot be done but by convincing them of an attention to their interests. Deeply convinced of this general disposition of their protectors, they will be yielding in smaller matters.

The Indians have constantly had their jealousies and hatred excited by the attempts to obtain their lands. I hope in God that all such designs are suspended for a long period. We may therefore now speak to them with the confidence of men conscious of the fairest motives towards their happiness and interest in all respects. A little perseverance in such a system, will teach the Indians to love and reverence the power which protects and cherishes them. The reproach which our country has sustained will be obliterated, and the protection of the helpless ignorant Indians, while they demean themselves peaceably, will adorn the character of the United States.

It is the special direction of the President of the United States, that there be a full representation of the Chickasaws and Choctaws; and that all who shall be assembled shall have impressed on their minds, clearly and strongly, the dispositions of the General Government, towards the hostile tribes, particularly, as well as to all the tribes, generally.

You will find, in the letter to General Pickens, that it is the desire of the President, that the total of the Indians to be employed, should not exceed five hundred warriors; and, if the arrangement could be so made, that these should be taken in such proportions from the Creeks, Cherokees, Choctaws, and Chickasaws, as you shall judge proper. The number, so constituted, would induce them to consider the war as a common cause, as well among one another as with the United States. It must be understood, however, that the number of five hundred is not to be considered as an ultimatum, but only as a general idea to govern the number to be employed.

It will be necessary that you should intimate to General Pickens, that you are, in confidence, made acquainted with the letter to him, and that you should also know the tenor of his answer.

If the Indians should object to joining our troops, on account of not being well armed, you may assure them they shall be well supplied at fort Washington with smooth-bored muskets, but they cannot be promised rifles.

Any subordinate arrangement of characters, which you shall judge proper to accompany them, will be confided to your discretion; and, also, the nature of the rewards for their services, which, however, must not exceed the pay of the troops. With rations they will be abundantly provided. I am, &c.

N. B. In the duplicate transmitted by Mr. Allison, the blanks were filled as above inserted, and the following added after closing the letter:

Instead of the sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars, mentioned in this letter, for contingencies of the treaty, a warrant has been issued for this consideration for one thousand dollars.

The sum of two thousand dollars is now advanced for the provisions at the treaty. Any excess of this sum will be paid on the final adjustment of the accounts.

The Secretary of War to James Seagrove, Esq.—29th April, 1792.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your several letters, of the 14th of January, the 20th February, the 27th of March, and the 12th of April; all of which have been duly submitted to, and have been considered by, the President of the United States.

But, previously to replying particularly to your several favors, it is necessary that I should state, summarily, the following general ideas relatively to the management of the Indians, throughout the limits of the United States, to wit:

That it is the most ardent desire of the President of the United States, and the General Government, that not only a firm peace should be established with the several nations and tribes, upon such true principles of justice and moderation as will enforce the approbation of this dispassionate and enlightened part of mankind, but to introduce among them, gradually, such judicious measures as will lead them to the blessings of civilized life.

That it is the intention of the President of the United States, that an adherence to this desire, as to a well-founded maxim, shall be the prominent feature in the administration of Indian affairs, while he is at the head of the Government.

That he shall exceedingly lament all events which shall suspend or impede the operations of this design, which he considers as essential to the reputation and dignity of the republic.

That, in pursuance of these ideas, he endeavored, at an early period of the establishment of the present General Government, to carry home to the minds of the hostile Indians the humane dispositions of the United States towards them. These intimations preceded, without effect, any attempts at coercion.

That, notwithstanding the ill success of former pacific overtures, attempts are still making to convince the hostile Indians of their errors, and that the United States require nothing of them but peace, and a line of conduct tending to their own happiness.

That the hostile Indians will be informed, that we require none of their lands, nor of any other tribe's, but such lands as have been ceded by fair treaties. That the United States are not sensible that the hostile Indians have any just claims to the lands heretofore ceded, but, if the said Indians shall make any such claims apparent, they shall be amply compensated for the same.

It is presumed, that, if these sentiments could be fairly impressed on the Indians northwest of the Ohio, that the re-establishment of peace would be the probable consequence.

But if the hostile Indians should, after having these sentiments fully displayed to them, still persist in their depredations on the frontiers, it will then be considered as the dictates of humanity, to endeavor to punish, with exemplary severity, so incorrigible a race of men, in order to deter other tribes, in future, from a like conduct.

I have been thus particular in this detail, for two reasons, to wit: First, That you may impress these sentiments on General McGillivray, and the other chiefs of the Creeks with whom you may converse; and, secondly, that you may thereby perceive that the intentions of the Government are to employ the Southern Indians only in case of the pertinacious obstinacy of the hostile Indians.

Being on the point of the employment of the Southern Indians, it will be proper, at this place, to call your attention to that object, in order that you may regulate your conduct by the directions now given.

The desire of the employment of the Southern Indians has not arisen so much from the actual aid to be derived from them, as from an apprehension that, if there be not, at this critical period, a mode provided for the employment of their active young men, possessing strong passions for war, on our side, they will, seduced by the entreaties of the hostile Indians, take up the hatchet against us, and thereby involve us in a general Indian war.

But you will please to understand, most explicitly, that it is the direction of the President of the United States, that no greater number be engaged, conditionally on the progress of the war, than will answer the purpose before mentioned—which is, to engage all the Southern tribes in our favor, in order to prevent their acting against us.

In my instructions to you of the 20th of February, which you received, the idea was held up, as well as to Gen. McGillivray, by the letter which passed through your hands, that the Creeks should furnish three hundred warriors.

Upon further reflection, it is the desire of the President of the United States, that the whole number to be furnished by all the Southern tribes, to wit: the Creeks, the Cherokees, the Choctaws, and Chickasaws, should not exceed five hundred.

A conference is to be held by Governor Blount, at Nashville, on this and other business, with the Chickasaws and Choctaws, about the beginning of June. These sentiments, therefore, have been fully expressed to him.

And General Pickens, on the frontiers of South Carolina, has been written to, to command those, combinedly, who may be employed.

But the actual employment of them must depend upon the orders of the commander-in-chief of the troops at fort Washington, on the Ohio.

He will be instructed, that, if the overtures of peace should fail, and the measure of war should be constrained by necessity, to send expresses to Governor Blount, who will communicate with General McGillivray, and the other Southern tribes, upon this point.

It is necessary, therefore, that the commanding general should be made the source from which the ultimate orders should issue, and that Governor Blount should be the channel of communication.

Hence you will perceive that the Government do not eventually require many Creeks. One or two hundred at most will be sufficient. Your idea of one thousand would be too many, and would be attended with expensive and ruinous consequences.

We cannot promise the Lancaster rifles you mention. We cannot procure a sufficiency for the troops. Muskets and bayonets may be promised them at fort Washington, as may be ammunition.

The rewards to be promised them must not exceed, besides some small matters, the pay of three dollars per month, excepting the leaders, who shall have the pay of the officers.

Rations they shall be abundantly supplied with.

Governor Blount will furnish them from his government to fort Washington, and you will furnish them to him.

The pack horses cannot be allowed—each man may take his own provisions to Governor Blount.

Having finished this subject of the employment of the Indians, I pray your attention thereto as a matter of moment, and requiring a strict adherence. It is on this point, more than any other, that the express is now despatched, not but that the matters hereinafter mentioned, are also of considerable weight.

You will communicate to Governor Blount, and request General McGillivray to do the same, relatively to the employment of the Indians.

The first object of my former instructions of the 20th of February, has been happily effected by other means, to wit: the capture of Bowles.

The second, to wit: the running the lines agreeably to the treaty of New York, still remains as an object, to accomplish which, in a manner consistently with the feelings of General McGillivray and the Creeks, will require the employment of your talents.

If the time for running the line agreeably to treaty shall be fixed, you are hereby directed instantly to inform the Governor of the State of Georgia thereof, in order that he may direct the attendance of the commissioners as mentioned in the Creek treaty.

The third object of your former instructions, to wit, the employment of Indians, has been herein amply discussed.

Your idea of distributing the goods impartially, is certainly well founded. But it is difficult to perceive any advantageous mode of distribution independent of Mr. McGillivray.

You will please to understand that the goods and money delivered you by Captain Mills, were designed, at the time they were sent, to be the means to enable Mr. McGillivray to counteract and overthrow Bowles.

The estimate of goods you have forwarded, far exceeds any provision made by Government. The United States, besides the money allowed annually to Mr. McGillivray, twelve hundred dollars, and six hundred dollars to six principal chiefs, each one hundred, have agreed to pay the nation, generally, fifteen hundred dollars, annually, and also two hundred dollars each to two interpreters.

To these fixed sums, the United States will add occasional gratuities, as the public interest may require.

But it never has been in contemplation, nor can it be carried into execution, to give, in any considerable degree, goods to the amount of your estimate.

It is to be hoped, therefore, that no promises on your part will be made of the presents you propose. Such promises are not conceived necessary, and would tend exceedingly to embarrass Government.

As to the opinion of Mr. Bryant, or any other person employed under the British Government, of the presents necessary, it cannot be made the foundation of a system by the United States.

Bowles' appearance, and his conduct, excited an apprehension that the peace between the United States and the Creeks might be disturbed by his machinations. But, independent of him, it is conceived the peace was not endangered, and Mr. McGillivray's letter to you seems to confirm this opinion.

The reasons of your drawing so great a number of Indians to the Rock Landing, are not apparent. Mr. McGillivray does not seem to approve it. It is to be apprehended that his jealousy may be excited by the measure. You will therefore endeavor to conciliate him to the measure.

The treaty of New York is to be carried into execution by the impressions of its propriety which shall be made at the respective meetings which the Indians usually have within their own nation. The assembling of them in large numbers, without their own country, excites their avaricious appetites, which, if not gratified in proportion to their expectations, issues in disgust.

It is by residents in the nation that the influence of the United States is to be silently and permanently established, not by withdrawing them from their usual modes of subsistence to a great distance. The expense and injurious consequences of which to the United States are certain, but the advantages not readily conceived.

Another probable and pernicious consequence attends a meeting upon the frontiers; the disorderly whites assemble there in great numbers, feuds ensue, and the peace is thereby greatly endangered.

Finally, upon this point, although it is apprehended that you have gone too far now to recede, yet it is the order of the President that in future no great assembling of the Creeks be made, but in consequence of a previous statement of the causes thereof, and his express approbation obtained.

The mode you have taken to furnish the provisions, appears judicious and economical. The account of the expenses which shall accrue upon this subject, or others of your mission, you will transmit to me as soon as ascertained, together with the vouchers accompanying the same, and the sums necessary to complete the payments will be furnished instantly by the treasury, on passing the accounts.

You are hereby instructed, on every occasion which shall occur, to evince the most cordial attention to the Spanish Government and interest on the Southern frontiers of the United States. In case you should know of any intentions of any desperado similar to Bowles, or any designs of the Indians injurious to the interest or peace of the Spanish Government, you will communicate the same to the nearest Spanish officers, so that the evil apprehended may be avoided or repelled.

The communications you have been pleased to make, are cordially received by the President of the United States, who desires that you will continue them as amply as may be.

I have enclosed letters for General McGillivray, the commanding officer, and also for Mr. Ellicot, the surveyor. I shall be anxious to receive your further communications in answer to this letter.

I am, sir, &c.

The Secretary of War to Brigadier General Alexander McGillivray.—29th April, 1792.

SIR:

I have heard with pleasure of your return to Little Tallasse. Although it is satisfactory to hear from you, even through a third person, yet it is much to be desired that you would fully and frequently communicate to me from time to time.

The treaty made at New York, between the United States and you and the other Creek chiefs, happily laid the foundation, if properly used, of much happiness to your nation. But the fire then enkindled requires a renewal of fuel from time to time, in order to render it perpetual.

The interference of the impostor Bowles, and your absence, supposed to be in consequence thereof, occasioned some uneasiness. But his capture has happily removed that evil.

I sincerely hope that you will enter into immediate arrangements with Mr. Seagrove, for running the lines agreeably to the treaty of New York. You possess too much knowledge of human nature not to know, that any further unnecessary delay will excite unpleasant sensations, and that, therefore, it is the interest of all parties to remove, and prevent all causes of misunderstanding.

The system which the President of the United States and the General Government have adopted, relatively to Indian affairs, is so replete with kindness to them, that all good men ought to delight in forwarding the views of the Government.

They require no lands from the Indians; they require nothing of them but what shall tend to their own happiness. Mr. Seagrove, to whom I have written largely, will explain every disposition of the Government to your satisfaction.

Every proper measure is using to induce the Indians, northwest of the Ohio, to peace, and it is much to be desired that they may be effectual.

But, if the Indians, after being fully convinced of the humane intentions of the United States, should continue their depredations upon the defenceless frontiers, humanity, itself, will dictate a severe punishment.

In this event, and this only, some of your warriors, say one or two hundred at most, would be advantageously employed with our army. You will please to understand, on this point, that it is apprehended, that, unless they join us, they will join the hostile Indians; but I pray God there may be no use for them on either side.

Mr. Seagrove is particularly instructed upon this subject, which he will show you.

I have the pleasure to inform you, that your nephew is well, that his growth is great, that he learns as expeditiously as could be desired, that he is contented, and that his morals are irreproachable; as a specimen of his learning, he writes you the enclosed.

I am, sir, &c.

The Secretary of War to Mr. Joseph Ellicot, surveyor.—29th April, 1792.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 27th of March. The objects still remaining the same, I must request your staying where you are, until they are brought to conclusion, or until further orders.

I am, sir, &c.

The Secretary of War to the Governor of Virginia.—16th May, 1792.

SIR:

In order that you may possess all the information in my power to give, upon the subject of disturbances on the southwestern frontiers of Virginia, I enclose you the copy of a letter of Governor Blount, which was received two days ago.

It is most probable, that, upon the arrival of the Cherokees, who were at this city, among their own people, the apprehensions of hostilities from that tribe may subside.

Besides, Governor Blount has appointed to have a conference with the Chickasaws and Choctaws, at Nashville, early in June, at which the principal Cherokees will be invited.

The capture of Bowles, by the Spaniards, and the arrangements making at the Rock Landing, by Mr. Seagrove, in behalf of the United States, with Mr. McGillivray and the Creeks, will probably restore entire tranquillity in that quarter.

Judging from the information in my possession, it would appear that the United States have much to hope, and but little to apprehend, from the disposition of the Southern nations of Indians. It would appear, that if, by necessity, the war with the Indians, northwest of the Ohio, must progress, that we could obtain five or six hundred Southern Indians to join our army.

It is true that some of the Chickamagas, and others of the Cherokees, who have had considerable intercourse with the Shawanese, for some years past, have, at times, manifested bad symptoms. But the death of the Dragging-canoe, and the probable election of John Watts, a bold, sensible, and friendly half breed, to the chief direction of the said towns, would probably settle the remnants of the war on the Southern frontier.

From the information contained in Governor Blount's letter, together with such information as you possess by other channels, and this statement, your Excellency will be able to judge of the necessity of your presence upon the southwestern frontiers of the Commonwealth over which you preside.

In case, however, you should think proper to make the journey, I beg leave to repeat, what I have before mentioned to you frequently, by the express direction of the President of the United States, that he will concur in every reasonable measure for the defensive protection of the southern frontier of Virginia, which your Excellency may think proper to establish, as far as he is or shall be authorized by law.

He is impressed with the conviction, that all parts of the Union ought to be defended at the general expense, and he will, therefore, most readily impart that defence according to the authority vested in him.

The President of the United States, actuated by sincere desires of terminating the Indian war without the further effusion of blood, has directed that overtures of peace should be made, by explaining the designs of the United States relative to Indian lands, on which point there were grounds to believe the Indians had been grossly deceived.

Accordingly, these pacific overtures are in train, through various channels, and, it is to be hoped, they will be attended with good effects.

In the mean time, offensive operations are, of course, restrained, and the Indians have been desired to call in their war parties.

I have the honor, &c.

The Secretary of War to the Governor of Virginia.—30th June, 1792.

SIR:

Governor Blount, in a letter of the 2d instant, gives such information of the pacific dispositions of the great mass of the Cherokees, that hopes are entertained of the entire re-establishment of tranquillity with that tribe.

On the 23d of May, he met with a great number of chiefs, and people of all descriptions, at one of the Indian towns, called Coyatay, and received from them great satisfaction as to the sincerity of their dispositions for peace. They had appointed a still more general assembly, to be held at Estanaula, the 23d of June, at which it was expected that every point in dispute would be amicably adjusted. Upon receiving the result of this meeting, it shall be communicated to your Excellency.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Secretary of War to the Governor of Virginia.—11th July, 1792.

SIR:

Your Excellency's letter, of the 4th instant, was received yesterday, and submitted to the President of the United States.

While it is to be hoped the troops stationed on the Southwestern frontiers, may intercept every party of hostile Indians, it is the desire of the President of the United States, that no expedition be made against the Indian towns at present.

If Governor Blount be not greatly deceived, the proposed general assembling of the Cherokees, at Estanaula, the 23d of last month, (of which I informed you in mine of the 30th) will probably have decided the conduct of the Cherokees.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Secretary of War to the Governor of Georgia.—11th July, 1792.

SIR:

Yesterday I had the honor to receive your Excellency's letter of the 22d May, containing eight enclosures, and to submit it to the President of the United States.

The unfortunate murder of James Yarborough, and son, would not appear, by the enclosed papers, No. 1, and 2, to have been committed by the Creeks.

The information of Mr. Seagrove, who is acting agent to the Creeks, would lead to the belief, that the dispositions of the chiefs and influential men are pacific. He was to have a meeting with a considerable number of the Cowetas and Cussetahs, at the Rock Landing, the latter end of the last month.

At the time, it appears from his information, that the confusion excited by Bowles had not subsided, and that some further interference in the Creek councils had arisen from another quarter, and that it was probable this combination of events would retard the running of the boundary agreeably to the treaty.

It is, however, to be hoped, that, by a system of moderation and perseverance, the whole body of the Creeks may be convinced that their true interest depends on an attachment to the United States, and that they will manifest this disposition, not only by abstaining from all acts of violence, but by complying with all just requisitions.

It is to be deeply regretted, that there are many whites on the frontiers, whose resentments are so keen against all persons bearing the name of Indians, that they have adopted an opinion that it is meritorious to kill them on all occasions. The Indians, again, conceive themselves bound to retaliate every death by an indiscriminate murder.

With such dispositions on both sides, it is difficult, if not utterly impracticable, to prevent, or even to punish, every irregularity.

It will be necessary to do it, in all cases where it is practicable, and to urge the Indians to deliver up the aggressors who have taken their own vengeance. But, it is very questionable, while we are unable, in many cases, to execute our own laws, whether we ought, in justice, to levy a general war upon the Creeks, for the criminality of an individual.

The citizens of the United States are, generally, extremely adverse to an Indian war, almost in any event. Of this disposition, the Executive of the United States have had ample proof, in reference to the Indians northwest of the Ohio.

Although, perhaps, sufficient causes exist, upon an abstract view of the subject, to justify extreme rigorous measures with the Northwestern Indians, yet, the principles of policy, and the general opinion of the community upon this subject, have induced the President of the United States to endeavor, by pacific expedients, to terminate the war; and measures are accordingly in operation for this purpose; but, whether they will be successful, cannot yet be determined.

The same disposition will lead to endeavor to adjust, amicably, all difference with the Creeks, and to wait the issue of time and events, to bring them to a cordial acquiescence in the treaty of New York.

Major Gaither will soon set out for Georgia, in order to take the command of the troops. His orders will be discretionary as to the mode of the disposition of the troops for the defence of the frontiers, and, therefore, I have no doubt, but he will establish the desired post at the Big Shoals of the Oconee.

In case of a serious war with the Creeks, the number of troops to be employed will require an officer of a superior grade to a major. In such an unfortunate event, the President of the United States will make a due provision.

But, as it is not perceived there is any just cause to expect that the Creeks will make an irruption, it is conceived that a major, at present, will be adequate to the occasion.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Secretary of War to Joseph Ellicot, Esq. surveyor.—11th August, 1792.

SIR:

The running the line, agreeably to the treaty, seems to be placed at a very uncertain period. You are, therefore, hereby instructed to consult Mr. Seagrove upon this point, and, if it shall appear to him that your services will not be soon required for that object, you will return to this city.

I am, sir, &c.

The Secretary of War to Brigadier General Alexander McKillivray.—11th August, 1792.

SIR:

I have received your letter of the 18th of May last, which has been submitted to the President of the United States.

It is painful to reflect, that, after the capture of the impostor Bowles, any of his pernicious influence should remain.

But the information communicated by you and others, of the interference of your neighbors in your internal affairs, and in your affairs with the United States, is still as extraordinary and more unaccountable.

I pray you, as early as possible, to unravel this mystery, and inform me precisely of the nature and extent of this interference.

It is to be hoped, that you will use your influence that the boundary line be run according to the treaty, at as early a period as may be.

If that line concerns principally the Cussetahs and Cowetas, and they are willing to abide thereby, it would follow, that other towns, who have no right to the lands, ought not to persist in upholding the only obstacle to our close union.

Let the situation of the Creeks and the United States be fairly estimated, is there any connexion so natural and proper? Or, in case of a rupture between the United States and the Creeks, (which God forbid) is there any Power which can permanently interpose and prevent the United States from exercising such conduct towards the Creeks as they shall think proper? This is not meant in the least as a threat, but, as the cool deliberate result of things.

The President of the United States, upon his first coming into office to the present time, has been desirous of an universal peace with all the Indian tribes; nay, more, of promoting such measures as would lead them to a better state of civilization.

We have indulged, and still indulge the hope, that you will actively concur in every measure which will blend more intimately the interests of the Creeks and the United States.

Some allowance ought to be made for the state of society in which the Creeks are; their ignorance is made subservient to the interest of such bad men as Bowles.

Exert yourself greatly, sir, to restrain all parts of the Creeks from committing hostilities upon any parts of the United States. A banditti are perpetually committing depredations upon the settlements on Cumberland river; this is an old grievance, and requires an instant remedy.

The fact is but too well ascertained, that parties of Creeks go to the Tennessee, under pretence of hunting, but in reality, to murder and rob. For God's sake take some decisive measures to prevent this horrid conduct, or all the ground work of peace, which has been so well and deeply laid, will be in vain.

Governor Blount has written you on this subject, and let you be where you may, upon receiving this letter, pray attend to this request, and take thereon the necessary measures.

Your request, that the money allowed to the Creeks, should be withheld entirely, is rather singular. Perhaps, as it relates to the nation and individual chiefs, it had better be given in goods. If the allowance be too small for the nation generally, I do not doubt, but that, upon a full compliance with the treaty, the United States would reasonably enlarge it. Under the idea, that goods would be better than money, I shall direct a quantity to be placed at the Rock Landing, in order to be delivered to the nation by Mr. Seagrove, on or before the first day of November next.

Permit me to urge, that you be as frequent as possible in your communications with me, and that you appoint times and places to meet Mr. Seagrove, in order to devise ways and means for adjusting, amicably, the mutual interests of the United States and the Creeks.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Secretary of War to James Seagrove, Esq.—11th August, 1792.

Sir:

Your letters of the 24th of May and 14th of June, with their respective enclosures, have been received, and submitted to the President of the United States.

The suspicions you entertain of Mr. McGillivray's integrity may perhaps be well founded. It will therefore be an important part of your duty, that, while you appear to have full faith in his attachment, you use every rational expedient to search out his mind and inclinations towards us.

I have information from Governor Blount, relative to a Spanish officer endeavoring to prevent the boundary line being run agreeably to the treaty. Can this officer be a pretended character, set up by Mr. McGillivray, or is he really an officer of the Spanish Government, thwarting the interest of the United States? It is of considerable moment to ascertain this business.

To develop Mr. McGillivray, will be a work of considerable delicacy. Hitherto the General Government has had scarcely any other avenue than him to the minds of the Creeks. We must not, therefore, appear to distrust or make him jealous of us. We must use him as far as practicable, and devise as many other means as possible. But, to a jealous mind like his, perhaps the most indirect attempts to conciliate the Creeks otherwise than through him, will alarm his suspicions, and beget his enmity.

Indeed, all modes of acquiring an influence with the Creeks, excepting by an actual residence with them, seems precarious and temporary in their effects.

We are an agent, of respectable talents, present with them at their general meetings, administering to their convenience on all occasions, by means of artificers, husbandmen, and physicians, and always evincing himself their impartial friend and protector, with adequate means to their end, such an arrangement appears to me would be attended with more efficacy than all external applications, through bad interpreters and doubtful friends.

It is highly probable that some attempts will be made, in the next session of Congress, for a respectable establishment, generally, for the Indian department, on a conciliatory system. If it shall be adopted, an experiment will at least be made of its wisdom; if rejected, things will be pretty much left to regulate themselves. If so, hostilities will probably ensue, and be continued until the Indians are driven beyond the Mississippi, which may require a period of twenty-five or thirty years. But in case of corrosive measures, not a single particle of benefit will result to the United States generally, either in a pecuniary or moral view; but instead thereof, a black cloud of injustice and inhumanity will impend over our national character during the above period, and for many years after the extirpation of the Indians shall be effected. I trust, however that every thing will be embraced, on the part of the United States, which will be required for their interest or dignity.

Your explanations relatively to the estimates presented for goods, are satisfactory to the President of the United States, who considers your zeal and exertions as important to the public.

I have not heard from you since meeting the Indians at the Rock Landing in the month of June or July, as mentioned in your letters of the 10th of June.

I enclose you an open letter for General Mc Gillivray, which you will please to copy and transmit.

I send by Major Gaither twelve pair of silver arm-bands, four silver medals, and one hundred and thirty-two pair of nose and ear jewels.

These articles you will deliver to Mr. Jack Kinnard, and others of your friends, as an earnest of further rewards.

I shall soon have forwarded a respectable quantity of Indian goods, conformably to the intention expressed in Mr. McGillivray's letter. His expression to me is, "The money allowed us by the treaty is another subject for dispute among the Indians; 'tis too much for the few that pretend to it, and too little for the many, therefore I must desire that it be withheld entirely. The six chiefs are worthy men, and they get theirs in a way that others know nothing of."

But I believe the payment of the nation ought not to be suspended, however it might be with his own salary.

But in order that you shall be properly provided, I shall remit you shortly, his allowance, and also to the chiefs and interpreters.

Major Gaither is ordered to command the troops in Georgia, and Major Call to join the main army. You will find Major Gaither an amiable, discreet, sober gentleman, and a good officer, and who will cordially co-operate with you in all things for the public service.

Congress did not make any establishment for the Indian Department, therefore your salary has not been fixed; but I have transmitted you one thousand dollars, on account of the department, which you may appropriate to your private use.

I am, Sir, &c.

The Secretary of War to Brigadier General Andrew Pickens.—15th August, 1792.

SIR:

Your favor of the 15th May was received on the 20th of June, and submitted to the President of the United States.

Your ideas of the difficulty of establishing a peace with the hostile Indians, without further conflict, it is to be apprehended are too well founded. But it is an object of high importance, to make every reasonable effort for that purpose, in order to convince a considerable proportion of the citizens of the United States, that the thing is impracticable.

The cordial zeal with which you have left your private affairs in order to endeavor to benefit the public, is highly satisfactory and gratifying to the President of the United States.

It is probable that the service of the Indians may not be required this year, owing to the long protracted councils of the Northern Indians, who are to repair to the assembled hostile Indians, in order to endeavor to make a peace. At the time that the result of these pacific overtures shall be known, it will probably be too late to undertake any offensive operations of importance, and more particularly to engage any Indians for the purpose of their remaining idle.

But, if our pacific overtures fail, the war will be pushed with great vigor early in the spring, when our troops will be completed and disciplined for the nature of the service. In this event, auxiliary Indians may be required, and I am persuaded your taking a considerable command of them and other light troops, would be particularly acceptable to the President of the United States. Will you have the goodness to impart to me your dispositions on the case here stated, in order to be submitted to the President?

The Secretary of War to Governor Blount.—15th August, 1792.

SIR:

Your several letters, hereinafter mentioned, were received at the periods stated, to wit: yours of the 22d and 25th of April, on the 4th of June; of the 5th and 16th of May, on the 5th of June; of the 31st of May, and 2d of June, on the 28th of June; of the 4th of July, on the 23d of the same month; all of which were duly submitted to the President of the United States, excepting the one of the 4th July, which arrived after his departure for Virginia, but the purport of which was transmitted to him.

As the above letters were information consequent on my ample letters of the 23d and 25th of April, and the state of affairs; and as your departure for Nashville was expected, no particular acknowledgment has been made until the present time; and it is to be hoped this may find you at Holston, after having made satisfactory arrangements with all the Chickasaws and Choctaws.

By letters from Colonel Arthur Campbell, of Washington, to the Governor of Virginia and myself, it would seem that all the conferences at Coyate and Estanaula amounted to nothing; and that parties of the Lower towns had set off, not only to attack the boats under the charge of Mr. Allison with the goods, but also to attack you and General Pickens. These ideas are said to have arisen from the information of a friendly chief of the Upper towns.

I am very much inclined to believe, and I sincerely hope, from your letter of the 4th of July, that these fears will prove groundless. And I am the more encouraged in this, as I have been informed verbally, that Mr. Chisholm had brought in some prisoners, who had lately been taken near the Cumberland settlements, at a place called Bledsoe's Station. If my information, given by Mr. Vego of Post Vincennes, lately from Kentucky, be true, the above mentioned station was attacked by a banditti, formed of Shawanese, Cherokees, and Creeks, partly of the very men who attacked Major Doughty in 1790.

But although my hopes and belief unite for your safety and the tranquillity of the Southwestern frontiers, yet an anxiety will still remain until further information shall be received from you.

The five companies of infantry and one of horse, you have ordered into service, if the companies are nearly full, would amount to a pretty formidable force. If sufficiently alert and active, it would seem to be a reasonable expectation that they would intercept and chastise some of the banditti that have lately given your government so much trouble, and the southwestern frontiers of Virginia such serious alarms.

It is really painful to reflect, after all our efforts for peace with the Southern Indians, that affairs in that quarter are so critical. It would seem, from representations, that a few more sparks would light up a pretty general flame.

If this should be the case, it would be considered by the General Government as a very great, and by the mass of the citizens of the Middle and Eastern States as an insupportable evil.

Every thing depends upon your exertions to avert the event of a war, that will be reluctantly entered into, and at best but ill supported.

Every just pretence of grievances on the part of the Indians, if any such exist, must be removed, and if a war must inevitably ensue, it ought to be made appear to all the world, that the Government or citizens of the United States have not been the cause of bringing it on.

Understanding, as you do, the wishes of the President of the United States, a full persuasion must be entertained that you will leave no reasonable expedient unattempted, to effect a general tranquillity. Indeed, your efforts to preserve peace must, and I flatter myself will, be rendered conspicuous.

General Wayne seems at a loss what step to take, relative to any of the Chickasaws or Choctaws joining the army this campaign. I have written him, intimating that the bad season would be so far advanced before the result of our pacific overtures should be known, as to preclude any important offensive operations. That therefore it would be best not to engage any Indians for the present year. This point will be left to his judgment—his orders are to be obeyed.

But it would appear that it would be the preferable arrangement to calling any Indians this year to an ineffectual campaign, to make an agreement with them that they should hold themselves in readiness at an early period of the next year, to obey our call if necessary.

I shall expect that you will, at the earliest moment, give me an ample narrative of every thing proper for me to know.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

The Secretary of War to the Governor of Georgia.—31st August, 1792.

SIR:

I am instructed by the President of the United States to address your Excellency on the subject of certain intelligence, which he has lately received from the western frontier of Georgia. The purport of it has already been communicated to you by the Southern agent of Indian Affairs, in his letter on the 18th ultimo; and must doubtless have impressed your mind with an anticipation of the most serious consequences.

Your Excellency will recollect, that it is stated upon authority entitled to respect, that some of the western settlers meditate, if not to oppose, at least to impede the completion of the line, stipulated by the treaty of New York, between the United States and the Creeks; that instead of cultivating friendship with those tribes, every opportunity is sought to provoke war, and threats have been denounced against the persons of those who shall attempt to run the line.

From your Excellency, not only as a public officer, bound by oath to support the constitution of the United States, nor merely as a citizen, interested in the general welfare, but also as a man, feeling for the distresses to which almost your own neighborhood will be exposed from the fury of an unrelenting enemy, a co-operation to defeat these wicked schemes may well be expected. Indeed, sir, the situation of the United States strongly demands that this co-operation be immediate, zealous, and firm.

An Indian war is so adverse to strict economy, and the due order of the finances, that it cannot be too warmly deprecated by the United States; and any new and considerable source of expense, as it would tend to protract the extinguishment of the public debt, would be particularly unfortunate.

Nor can it have escaped your Excellency, that other nations have acquired a solid and profitable confidence with the Indians, by giving steady proofs of a sincere and friendly temper towards them. With these nations, long known to them, we have to maintain a competition; having no professions of ancient habits in our favor, and beginning only to establish a reputation with them. We are, therefore, liable to constant misrepresentation, even with the purest conduct, and surely we ought not to afford cause of complaint by acting unjustly. These sentiments call for the attention of no State more forcibly than of Georgia; upon which the foreign power in her vicinity might, by gaining an ascendancy over the Southern tribes, let them loose with all the horrors of their warfare.

In the spirit of these considerations was the treaty of New York made. Among the means of perpetuating harmony, a permanent boundary was the primary and most obvious. Nothing was left undone to obtain the most advantageous line; and your Excellency may be assured, that the one which has been obtained is more advantageous than any other which the United States could then accomplish, or can by any possible effort be now effected. It is greatly to be feared, that the Creeks will accede even to it with extreme reluctance. But it will be disgraceful and perfidious in the United States to suffer it to be obstructed by the evil machinations of any turbulent men whatsoever.

Under these circumstances, your Excellency will easily discover what is the duty of the federal and your own Government. The constitution has been freely adopted; the regulation of our Indian connexion is submitted to Congress; and the treaties are parts of the supreme law of the land. It would be a criminal negligence in the federal administration to pass over the gross infraction of public tranquillity, and the insult to the public honor, which are said to be in contemplation. I am authorized to declare to you, sir, in order to testify the determination to uphold you in the most vigorous exertions under the laws of your State, that those of the United States will be strictly enforced and executed upon the offenders, without distinction.

To invite your Excellency to the strenuous exercise of the power which your office confers upon you, no arguments can be necessary. It cannot be believed that any State would assume upon itself a responsibility for the waste of blood and treasure, which the want of a timely interposition, on this occasion, must produce. It cannot be believed that any State would countenance, even by indifference, those individuals, who shall presume to set the constitution and the law at defiance. While every usurpation of power will be avoided, no legal power ought to be abandoned. Permit me, then, to exhort you, as you regard the Union, and love order, to suppress those violent and unwarrantable proceedings, of which you have been apprised. The affections of the enlightened citizens must be with you in such a contest: for those who may be compelled to step forward with energy in this exigency, can have no interest, distinct from theirs, nor any wish to gratify, but that of preventing the public authority from being trampled under foot.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Secretary of War to James Seagrove, Esquire.—31st October, 1792.

Sir:

I wrote you pretty amply, on the 11th instant, by Major Gaither, on such subjects as arose from your communications, to the 14th June last, a duplicate of which is herein enclosed.

I have now to reply to yours of the 5th and 27th of July, to the President of the United States, per express; yours to me, of the same dates; and, also, to acknowledge the receipt of yours of the 4th of the present month, introducing Mr. James Leonard.

Your information of the interference of the person styling himself Captain Olivar, in the affairs of the Creek nation, and his attempts to prevent the fulfilment of the treaty of New York, is also corroborated and confirmed, by similar evidence, received from Governor Blount.

To watch closely the further movements and designs of the said Captain Olivar, and to have them attested by undeniable evidence, on oath, are circumstances of considerable moment, and on which you will please to bestow your highest attention.

But, in the pursuit of this business, or in any measures you may adopt to obviate or counteract his impressions, you will observe an entire delicacy as it shall relate to the Spanish Government, rather holding up the idea that Captain Olivar may be acting without due authority from the said Government.

For, however important it may be to ascertain the designs of the Spaniards, yet it ought to be effected in such a manner as shall not commit the United States unnecessarily, by the conduct of their officers. While, therefore, your measures are calculated to give you perfect information of the measures pursuing in East and West Florida, you will appear always to hold openly, a cordial language towards Spain, and at the same time to be extremely cautious in making any communications to its officers, excepting those for which you shall have special directions, or arising out of the state of things specified in my letter to you of the 29th of April last.

However Mr. McGillivray's influence may appear at present to be diminished, yet it was all powerful a very short period prior to Bowles' appearance; perhaps his apparent shrinking from a contest with Bowles, may have been the consequence of a defect of nerves, or an artifice to accomplish some end of the sort you have mentioned. Although his attachment to the United States may be justly questioned, yet it may be a pretty dangerous experiment to proceed as if he had lost all authority or influence in the nation, or to endeavor avowedly to contribute to his degradation. His own and his wife's relations are numerous, and of considerable importance, and would, in this event, in conjunction with his own exertions, have the power of exciting hostilities against the United States. Until, therefore, he shall throw off the mask entirely, we ought apparently to treat him as our firm friend; but at the same time, to keep an eagle's eye upon all his conduct. His temper is naturally suspicious, and if he finds his fidelity is actually suspected, his open endeavors may be used to our injury. I am persuaded his prejudices are too deeply rooted ever to be cordial to Spain, and in any estimate he may make of assistance to be derived either from that Power or the United States, he would give us the preference. But as he is indolent, and hates trouble, and as they may have made him great pecuniary offers, although he does not appear to be avaricious, it is probable that he may have temporarily given his concurrence to some designs of the Spanish officers. The point is too well established, as to his duplicity both to you and me, relatively to the Spanish officer, in his letter of the 18th May; and, in order that you may possess all the clews in my power, to unravel his conduct, I have enclosed you a copy of that letter.

It is not only extremely difficult, but hazardous, to act in the dark. Hitherto, our approaches to the Creeks have been external only; our measures have been taken in consequence of imperfect information, arising from the ignorance or designs of the informants, or, perhaps, through the medium of bad interpreters.

The more the subject is considered, the more the idea stated in my former letters, of the actual residence of agents within the most populous parts of the nation, is confirmed. Were men, of respectable characters for talents and integrity, once established among the Indians, they would possess the opportunity, and most probably the power, of regulating events as they should arise. They would acquire a knowledge of the characters of the most influential chiefs, and of the proper modes of managing them. Occasions would frequently occur of administering to their wants, and of fixing their gratitude. In short, such agents, so stationed, and acting purely for the mutual interests of the United States and Indians, would soon attain a respectable and pre-eminent influence. But the exterior impulse, or calls which are given now and then, attract principally the idle and worthless, hold out motives for diversion from their ordinary pursuits, and one gratification of a present of goods begets another.

It will therefore become expedient, in future, that you should, or some other person or persons, in behalf of the United States, take up an actual residence within the Creek nation, at least for a considerable portion of the year, and it is to be hoped the Congress will make an adequate allowance as a salary.

From the abilities you have exhibited upon the subject of Indian affairs, and the favorable opinion entertained and expressed thereof, by the President of the United States, I am authorized to say, that he considers you as the suitable character to direct the affairs of the Creeks, having under you one or two subordinate agents; but at the same time, to say, that he considers an actual residence within the heart of the nation, as indispensably necessary for the affairs of the United States; and, as it is necessary to be explicit on this head, I request your immediate information, whether such residence would be agreeable to you, and where you would fix your residence. It appears to me, that one person, at least, ought to reside with the Lower Creeks, making his head-quarters with the Cussetahs, and another with the Upper Creeks, at Tuckabatchie or the Oakfuskee, on the Tallapoosa river, whichever shall be the residence of the white Lieutenant, whose character renders his entire friendship of importance. And you, as principal, to reside sometimes with one and sometimes with the other: I have not the least doubt that you would soon be able to bring back General McGillivray to a sense of his duty, and to fix him decidedly in our interests.

If you know suitable characters, who would willingly reside among the Creeks, as before stated, whose abilities and integrity would afford due confidence, you will please to recommend them to the President of the United States, but without giving, at present, any encouragement whatever to such persons. They must neither trade or endeavor to obtain lands, excepting for their immediate cultivation. Although I am not able to say the probable amount of their salaries, I conceive it may be from five hundred to seven hundred and fifty dollars each, besides assistance of cattle, implements of husbandry, &c. to commence an establishment of the kind mentioned in the Creek treaty.

Although the foregoing reasons are considered as conclusive in favor of an internal, instead of an external communication, yet present circumstances may, in some degree, render the latter expedient.

The meeting, therefore, which you propose on the first of November next, with the Lower Creeks, has been approved by the President of the United States, on the expectation that it will, as far as possible, be restricted to the chiefs only, agreeably to your proposal; as you have conditionally agreed to this meeting, it might have ill effects, were it not complied with. The Indians will but imperfectly conceive the distinction between a conditional and an actual promise, and therefore it must take place. But, in future, you will carefully attend to the injunction contained in my letter to you of the 29th of April, to wit: That there be no great assembling of the Creeks, but in consequence of a previous statement of the causes thereof, and the express approbation of the President of the United States is obtained.

Goods, corn, and money of the sort, and for objects and amount specified in the enclosed estimate, will be transported from this city to St. Mary's, in due season, and for which you will be timely informed. [Amount of the above estimate, thirteen thousand three hundred and fourteen dollars and sixty-one cents.]

It will be confided to you to make such distribution of the goods and corn to the Lower towns as your judgment shall direct, making always a precise statement of the deliveries and evidences thereof, in the same manner as those transmitted by you on the 27th ultimo.

You will please to ascertain the extent of the loss of the Indian crops of corn, and whether it has equally, and in what degree, affected the Lower Creeks, and you will, as soon as possible, transmit the result, and an estimate of the amount of the quantity which would be an effectual relief to the parts oppressed.

If the real necessities of the Lower Creeks require a larger quantity than the five thousand bushels intended to be transported to St. Mary's; you may intimate to them that the President of the United States, actuated by his humanity and regard for them, will order a further quantity, provided they exhibit, on their parts, similar dispositions of kindness and attachment to the United States.

The advantages of removing the troops to the head of St. Mary's, are not readily perceived, were the position undoubtedly within the limits of the State of Georgia, the inhabitants being very few in number. But, according to the map in my possession, it would appear that the old line strikes the St. Mary's considerably below the head of the river. The change of officers has rendered the detachment at St. Mary's without an officer of the line. But Major Call sent Captain McLane hence, to inspect that post, and to enjoin Doctor Hayward, a surgeon in service, of merit, to remain in command until Lieutenant Nicoll, of the artillery, should return there.

The extremely reprehensible conduct of some lawless white inhabitants of the frontiers of Georgia, has been noticed in a letter to the Governor of that State, a copy of which is enclosed.

It may be expedient, and you are hereby requested to obtain well attested evidences of all irregularities tending to excite hostilities with the Creeks, in order that such measures may be taken thereon as the nature of the case and the posture of public affairs may require.

The sketches of accounts you transmitted are very proper, and will, I presume, serve to exonerate you at the treasury, where your accounts will be adjusted. I mean, however, to except your account for expense. It is probable a sum will be allowed you to embrace all your contingent charges; what that sum will be, must be left to the judgment of the Legislature, but I flatter myself it will be satisfactory.

The goods which remain at the Rock Landing will be disposed of hereafter, at that post, to the friendly Upper Creeks. To remove them would not only be expensive, but prevent the exercise of that public generosity, which, on the present occasion, seems in a considerable degree to be necessary in Indian affairs. It would have been satisfactory had you specified the quantity remaining on hand: for, although the accounts transmitted will show the deliveries at the time mentioned, yet it is not improbable, that, at other times, you have been constrained to make presents in a subordinate degree.

The Creek treaty points out the manner in which passports are to be given. It is presumed the Governor of Georgia, the commanding officer of the troops, and yourself, only, have this authority. Some copperplates shall be devised, in order to prevent counterfeit passes.

The licences for traders to go into the Creek country cannot at present be granted, consistently with what is understood upon the subject between the parties. You will, therefore, not give any such licences, and you will please to inform me whether such licences are, or have been, given by any other person. Trading houses may be set up, upon the line within the State of Georgia, to which Indians may, as any other persons, resort, to purchase goods.

I transmit you herein, certain regulations in the Indian department, formed by the President of the United States, on the twenty eighth day of August, 1790, in pursuance of the laws regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes; and also, a copy of said laws, by both of which your conduct must be governed.

I am, &c.

The Secretary of War to James Seagrove, Esq.—24th September, 1792.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose you an invoice of the articles laden on board the Sloop Polly, Captain John Smith, and Schooner Oak, Captain William Mason. The remainder of the corn, about four hundred and fifty bushels, will be laden on board another vessel. [The amount of the aforesaid invoice, seven thousand three hundred and thirty-six dollars and eighty-one cents.]

You will please to transmit duplicate receipts for those articles upon your receiving them.
I have transmitted you duplicates of my letter of 31st ultimo; one by your express, and the other by the way of Charleston; since which I have not received any of your favors.
I hope these goods will arrive safe and in good condition, and that the happiest consequences may be effected by your judicious distribution of them.
I pray you to continue your frequent and minute communications.

I am, sir, &c.

The Secretary of War to Governor Blount.—9th October, 1792.

SIR:

It is with infinite regret I have perused your letter of the 11th ultimo, which I have this day received, containing information of the declaration of war by the five Lower Cherokee towns, against the United States.

From the train of negotiations with the Cherokees, the causes of such a conduct on their parts is involved in obscurity, and the affair is still rendered more perplexed by their being headed by John Watts, from whom you have heretofore expected such assistance.

I beg leave to request as early as possible a statement of the alleged and actual causes of their violent conduct, in order that it may be explained to Congress.

As you have ample powers to call for such portions of the militia of your Government for its defensive protection as you shall judge occasions to require, no further steps can be taken at this moment.

The Congress, which possess the powers of declaring war, will assemble on the 5th of next month; until their judgments shall be made known, it seems essential to confine all your operations to defensive measures. This is intended to restrain any expedition against the Indian towns, but all incursive parties against your frontiers are to be punished with the greatest severity.

It will be of a high degree of importance on your part to confirm all the well disposed part of the Cherokee nation, and to quiet their apprehensions against our attacks.

Were it possible to make them the instruments to punish the revolted towns, it would seem to be just, as well as good policy.

Will it not be possible for you to send a faithful and intelligent agent to the Upper towns of the Creeks, to restrain the expedition of their banditti? Such a measure is indispensable.

Mr. Seagrove's communications are, it seems, more with the Lower than Upper Creeks—the depredations upon Cumberland seem to be confined to the latter.

The President of the United States will arrive here on Saturday next, being the 13th instant; any further measures which he shall direct to be taken, shall be communicated to you by the post, who will commence his operations on the 15th instant.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Secretary of War to the Governor of Virginia.—9th October, 1792.

SIR:

I have this day received a letter by express from Governor Blount, dated at Knoxville, the 11th ultimo. He states, that the five Lower towns on the Tennessee, headed by John Watts, have formally declared war against the United States, and that the warriors had set out upon some expedition against the frontiers, probably against the Cumberland settlements. The numbers of the warriors who had set out, are stated variously from three to six hundred, including one hundred banditti Creeks.

Governor Blount had ordered one regiment of the militia of Washington district into service, and had also despatched an express to Miro district, on Cumberland river, with orders to Brigadier General Robertson to put his brigade in the best possible state of defence.

Although the details transmitted do not admit of the least doubt of the authenticity of the information as to the disposition of the five Lower towns, yet, as the express has been so long on the road, and no further information having been received, some hopes may be entertained that there has not been any sudden or successful stroke on the part of the Indians.

It is observed by Governor Blount, that the Cherokees have not complained to him, in a single instance, of the infraction of the treaty of Holston. That the Little Turkey, and the greater part of the nation, have now given the strongest assurances of their attachment to the United States, and their desire for peace.

Governor Blount has long been invested with ample discretionary powers to call into service such portions of the militia of his government as he should judge necessary for its defensive protection.

The nearness of the time at which Congress is to meet, who only are invested with the powers of war, will render it essential to wait the result of their deliberations, before offensive measures can be directed, supposing the information transmitted by Governor Blount to be authentic.

In the mean time, your Excellency will be the judge, whether any future measures should be necessary for the defence of the southwestern parts of Virginia, at the expense of the Union, of the nature and in addition to those before taken.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Secretary of War to the Governor of Virginia.—11th October, 1792.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's favor of the 4th instant, and it shall be submitted to the President of the United States on his arrival, and the result transmitted to you.

I have the pleasure to enclose an extract of a letter just received from Governor Blount, containing information of a contrary tendency to that which I communicated on the 9th instant.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Secretary of War to the Governor of Virginia.—14th October, 1792.

SIR:

The President of the United States, to whom I have submitted your Excellency's letter of the 4th instant, has directed me to inform you, that he does not, from his present view of the subject, conceive any measures, on the part of the Legislature of Virginia, necessary for the defence of the frontiers, during the ensuing year.

That he flatters himself, the respectable force authorized by Congress, during their late session, together with the militia, which the laws authorize him to call into the service, will prove adequate to the occasions which may arise.

He has further desired me to tender you his thanks for your ideas relatively to the block-houses, for the purpose of cutting the communication between the Northern and Southern Indians, which he will take into his consideration; and he requests that you will be pleased, from time to time, to transmit such further ideas as may occur to you to be important, either respecting a defensive or offensive war with the Indians.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Secretary of War to the Governor of South Carolina.—27th October, 1792.

SIR:

The President of the United States has directed me to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's letter, of the 30th ultimo, with the enclosures therein contained, from General Pickens and Colonel Anderson, dated the 12th, 13th, and 20th of the same month.

Governor Blount, of the territory of the United States, south of the Ohio, has also transmitted similar information to that contained in your enclosures, relatively to the hostile designs of the five Lower Cherokee or Chickamaga towns, on the Tennessee river.

It would appear, that the five Cherokee towns, containing perhaps from three to five hundred warriors, and abetted by a number of individuals of the Upper Creeks, chiefly young men, are disposed for war; and their principal object appears to be the settlements on Cumberland river. A summary of this information is contained in the papers No. 1, 2, 3, and 4, this day received from Governor Blount.

The information from Mr. Seagrove, agent to the Creek nation, dated at St. Mary's, on the 13th ultimo, appears to encourage the hope, that the Lower towns of the Creeks are favorably disposed for peace.

The United States have existing treaties of peace and friendship with the four Southern tribes of Indians: no complaints have been made of the infraction of those treaties, nor does it appear that any of the Southern tribes have any just cause of war against the United States. Valuable presents have been given to all the said tribes, in the course of the present year, and the Creeks and Cherokees have, each of them, an annual allowance of one thousand five hundred dollars.

The Chickasaws and Choctaws are friendly, and, it would appear, so are the mass of the Cherokees and Creeks, the five towns of the former, and certain individuals of the latter, excepted; for it has not yet been made to appear that the conduct of the Creeks is the result of any deliberation of any assembly of chiefs, or of any particular towns.

It has been said, that the sudden turn that the Indians have taken for war, has been dictated by the interference of a neighboring European Power; but the evidence on this head may be questioned.

As Congress will be in session in a few days, the information on this subject will be submitted to them. The constitution has invested them with the right of declaring war. Until, therefore, their decision shall be made known, the Executive cannot authorize offensive measures; although, in the mean time, it may be necessary to make the most vigorous preparations for defensive, and eventually for offensive measures, by providing abundance of arms and ammunition.

The President of the United States has commanded me to express his entire approbation of your Excellency's sentiments and orders on this head.

The agent appointed by you, to provide six hundred arms in this city, being unable to purchase any that were suitable, the President of the United States directed that he should be furnished from the public arsenal, at the prices mentioned in the within schedule.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

The Secretary of War to the Governor of Georgia.—27th October, 1792.

SIR:

I have the honor to inform your Excellency, that it appears, by information from Governor Blount, dated the 7th instant, that the five Lower towns of the Cherokees, on the Tennessee river, commonly known as the Chickamaga towns, containing perhaps from three to five hundred warriors, have decided upon hostility against the United States: that they are aided by a number of banditti Upper Creeks, and that their first object is probably the Cumberland settlements.

As Congress is on the eve of their session, the information upon the subject will be submitted to them. The constitution having invested that body with the powers of war, no offensive operations can be taken, until they shall be pleased to authorize the same.

But, as the evils existing and apprehended from some of the Southern Indians, may be greatly extended, it is submitted to your Excellency whether it would not be highly expedient that the militia should be well armed, and furnished with ammunition as soon as possible, so as to be ready for any events.

At present, the information does not warrant the conclusion that more of the Cherokees than the five towns and the Creeks beforementioned, are for hostilities; but when the flames of war are once lighted up, it will be difficult effectually to restrain them within narrow limits.

If the information which you may receive shall substantiate clearly any hostile designs of the Creeks, against the frontiers of Georgia, you will be pleased to take the most effectual measures for the defence thereof that may be in your power, and which the occasion may require. In such an unfortunate event, however, I will thank you for the earliest information, by express, of the circumstances of the invasion, and the force called into activity to repel the same.

I have written by this conveyance to Major Gaither, and have directed him to use the highest vigilance against any accident; but, at the same time, to avoid every measure which might tend to bring on the evil we anxiously desire to avoid.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

The Secretary of War to Major Henry Gaither, commanding officer of the troops of the United States in Georgia. 27th October, 1792.

SIR:

The information contained in your letter, relative to the hostile disposition of the five Lower Cherokee towns, on the Tennessee, is confirmed by Governor Blount.

Affairs wearing such an aspect, it will be highly incumbent upon you to be on your guard, and observe, together with all the troops under your orders, the most soldierly vigilance. Constant patrols secure against surprise, and habituate the men to that sort of discipline indispensable to an Indian warfare.

But, while you take every precautionary measure against being surprised, you must also endeavor to avoid an air of suspicion to any friendly Indians; always treating them with frankness and kindness, and assuring them of the friendship of the United States.

I am, sir, &amp;c.

The Secretary of War to James Seagrove, Esquire.—27th October, 1792.

SIR:

Since my last to you, of the 31st of August, triplicates of which were transmitted, I have received your letters of the 8th and 13th of September.

The information which you therein convey, of the pacific disposition of the Lower towns, is highly satisfactory; and you cannot render a more acceptable service than to confirm it.

The five Lower towns on the Tennessee, commonly called the Chickamagas, have probably decided for hostilities against the frontiers in that vicinity. The said towns contain probably from three to five hundred warriors, and are aided by a number of banditti of the Upper Creeks, chiefly young men. It does not appear in evidence, that the conduct of the said Creeks is influenced by the result of any deliberations of any assembly of chiefs, or even of towns.

It is of the highest importance that you strain every nerve, and make use of every possible expedient, by impressing the chiefs who will be at your conference; or otherwise to restrain the rash young men from joining in any hostilities against the United States.

Were you to make a journey into the nation, to the Upper Creeks, protected by your friend Jack Kinnard, the White-bird-tail king the Tallassee king, or any others of our friends, you might be the means of preventing a war. I believe Mr. McGillivray has returned to his house, at Little Tallassee; an interview with him would have a good effect. Every effort must be made to avert a war; and if you should be able to make it appear, that you had been the mean of effecting so good an end, it would at once enhance your political consequence, and entitle you to the warmest approbation of the President of the United States.

Pray continue to write frequently and fully, upon the subject of your charge.

I am, sir, &c.

No. IV.

Information received relatively to the dispositions of the Southern Indians, and the causes of the hostilities of part of the Cherokees and Creeks.

Governor Blount to the Secretary of War.

KNOXVILLE, March 20th, 1792.

SIR:

Enclosed are copies of letters from Colonel Robertson, of Davidson County, Richard Justice, and the Glass, two Cherokee chiefs, a description of the five Lower Cherokee towns; and a report of Major Craig, respecting the alteration of the sentiments and conduct of the Cherokees in the within described five Lower towns of that nation. I rely fully on the information contained in them severally. Mr. Craig is the person I engaged to bear my letter to the Little Turkey and other chiefs, of the 12th of February, a copy of which I forwarded by Mr. Allison to you; is considered a man of veracity, quite well acquainted with the Cherokee chiefs, generally, and their affairs, as well as with the white people traders, and others residing among them, having for years been a frontier man, on Nine-mile creek, within twelve miles of Chota, and generally viewed by the whites as too great a friend to Indians. This alteration of sentiment and conduct in the five Lower towns, and which I have no reason even to suspect, has extended to any other part of the nation, is to be accounted for by their intercourse with the Creeks and Shawanese, since the defeat of General St. Clair, and the arrival of Bowles from England, and perhaps to the death of the Dragging Canoe, who, under the Little Turkey, was their head; and, as a warrior, stood second to none in the nation, except John Watts, and well attached to the United States, as had appeared by his friendly treatment of Mrs. Starke, and others, immediately after the late treaty. The purposes for which Watts is invited to those towns, as mentioned in Mr. Craig's report, is to offer him the place of Dragging Canoe, of which it supposed he will not accept, as it is known he has a dislike to living in that part of the nation, and a strong desire for peace; but there is no doubt but he will use his influence, while among them, to induce them to desist from murdering and horse-stealing; and I have hopes that it will be so great as temporarily to lessen those evils. The Glass's own letter affords proof of a violation of the late treaty; and I consider the report of Mr. Craig equally as authentic. It is no less certain, (in my opinion) when satisfaction shall be demanded, that it will be refused by the nation; and thus impressed with the certainty of a refusal, it appears to me most prudent to decline making a demand, until I shall be honored with instructions how to act on such an event. In the mean time I shall say nothing to the nation on the subject; but use all possible means, by agents, public or secret, in the nation, to keep them from committing hostilities, and to protect the frontiers by calling into service a part of the militia. One reason for declining the demand of satisfaction, as before stated, is, that (in my opinion) the Indians of the five Lower towns would consider a refusal as an open declaration of war, and act accordingly; and, by declining it, it is probable they may hope the offence will be looked over, as murders and horse-stealing, upon and from the Cumberland and Kentucky people and others, have ever and repeatedly been before the late treaty; and under that hope they may not so immediately join the Shawanese and Creeks. Judging from the talk of the Little Turkey, as quoted in Mr. Craig's report, and every other information I have obtained, I believe the Cherokee nation lying on the southeast of Chatanuga mountain will remain neuter, if any attempt should be made to punish or destroy the five Lower towns; but if those towns receive timely information of such intention, they will, very probably, obtain auxiliaries from the Creeks, but what number I am not able even to conjecture. The depredations mentioned in Colonel Robertson's letter clearly point out the necessity of protection, in the quarter where they have been committed; and the information contained in Mr. Craig's report warrants apprehensions that the next conveyance will bring accounts of much greater. I am sorry to inform you that there does not appear any hope that the attempts to raise a company of Cherokees, to oppose the Shawanese, will be attended with success.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

[ENCLOSURES.]

Colonel Elijah Robertson to Governor Blount.

NASHVILLE, 28th February, 1792.

SIR:

I this moment received information that the Indians, a few hours ago, killed James Thompson, and family; also Peter Caffey's family, within about five miles of Nashville. It appears that, in the evening, they killed Mr. Thompson in the yard, and jumped into the house and killed all the women and children, except two small ones, who they spoke to in English, and told them to grow up, and then they would come and kill them. I am raising a party to pursue them.

I am, &c.

Richard Justice and Thomas Glass to Governor Blount.

LOOKOUT MOUNTAIN, March 5th, 1792.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

We received yours by Major Craig, but as he can inform you of the Little Turkey being gone up to Major Craig's, or to your house, without knowing any thing of these letters coming this way; but we expect you'll see each other, and talk matters over, and whatever you and he agrees upon, we shall be satisfied with, as we leave it entirely to him, as he is gone your way. As he is not here, we cannot send you an answer such as we would have done had the Little Turkey been at home. But, when he returns, we shall expect to hear from you, and, whatever you and he agree upon, we shall abide by. These from your honor's sincere friends and brothers,

THO. GLASS,
RICHARD JUSTICE.

P. S.—The Glass this fall went out a hunting, without thinking of any thing but to mind his hunting, and made his hunt in peace and quietness; but some young fellows coming from the norward, meeting with some of his young fellows, and telling them that all the people here was at war, the meeting some white people in the woods did some mischief unknown to the Glass. I think your people are to blame to be going through the hunting grounds, although ours are not blameless. You may think that the Glass and his people are bad, but what I tell you is the truth; for, when it was in his power to have killed Colonel Hubbard and his party last spring, he, as it were, lifted them up and told them to go in peace. As we now think of nothing but keeping peace with you and all other white people. These from your Excellency's friend and brother.

RICHARD JUSTICE.

Description of the Five Cherokee towns, lying northwest of Chatanuga Mountain, to wit:

Running Water lies on the south bank of the Tennessee, except five or six huts which are on the north side, three miles above Nickajack, and twelve below the Suck; here some Shawanese are settled, containing one hundred huts in 1790, and is a common crossing place for the Creeks.

Nickajack lies on the south bank of the Tennessee, five miles above the Long Island village, and fifteen miles below the Suck, contained about forty huts in 1790; some Shawanese settled here in 1789 and 1790; here the Creeks and Northwards cross.

Long Island Village, which comprehends an island called the Long Island in the Tennessee, and a number of huts on the south side, is twenty miles below the Suck, and ten above Crowtown, contained ten or twelve huts in 1790; here the Creeks and Northwards cross.

Crow Town lies on the north side of the Tennessee, half a mile from the river, up Crow creek; 30 miles below the Suck, is the lowest town in the Cherokee nation, contained about 30 huts in 1790; the Creeks and northward tribes cross here.

Look-out Mountain town, on Look-out Mountain creek, lies between two mountains, 15 miles from the mouth of the creek, about 15 miles to the southward of the running water; contains 80 huts. A valley leads from the mouth of this creek, three or four miles wide, to this town.

The warriors of these five towns are now computed at from two hundred and fifty to three hundred, and are, generally, that part of the Cherokees distinguished as Chickamagas.

The Running Water, the upper of the four on the river, is about one hundred and fifty miles from this place, and the river may be passed in large canoes at all seasons.

Chatanuga mountain, which lies to the southeast of these towns, can be passed at several places, either by cavalry or infantry, with but very little difficulty, if not opposed. The base of it is said not to exceed two miles, and the height not very great.

It was in attempting to pass this mountain that General Martin was repulsed in the year 1790.

The Report of David Craig to William Blount, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, for the Southern district, made at Knoxville, March 15th, 1792.

With your letters of the 12th day of February, to the Little Turkey, and Richard Justice and the Glass chiefs, of the Cherokees, I soon after proceeded to the Look-out Mountain town, the residence of the two latter, and delivered your letters to them on the 27th: their answers thereto you have herewith. At this town I stayed several days, as did Mr. McKee, who accompanied me, before we proceeded for the Turkey's town. During our stay, I was informed that a brother to the Drugging Canoe had, about a month before, brought in a white boy 10 or 12 years of age, to the Running Water, which he said he had bought from the Northward Indians.

Whether it is true that this boy was bought or obtained from the Northward Indians, is uncertain; but, certain it is, such a boy is brought in a prisoner. On the 22d, the Glass, of the Look-out mountain, as before mentioned, and the Turtle-at-home, (his Indian name not remembered) the head man of the Running Water, arrived at their respective towns, the Glass with a white girl, aged about eight years, a prisoner, and two scalps. The girl says, the party of which she was, consisted of her father, and two other men, and her mother and several children, on their way from the Natchez to Nashville, and that her mother and one child were killed and scalped; and this, with the Indian account, agrees so far as that the scalps by the Glass brought in, were taken from a woman and child, and that the men of the party escaped: and the "Turtle-at-home," with a white boy, a prisoner, and one scalp, taken on the barrens between Cumberland and Kentucky; the party consisted of his father, himself, and others, on their way to Cumberland, with salt, and his father was killed and scalped. On the 26th of February, the scalps of this man, woman, and child, were collected at the Look-out Mountain town, (the day previous to the arrival of Mr. McKee and myself at that place) and at night a scalp-dance was there held, and Richard Justice and the Glass took the scalp of the man and tore it with their hands and teeth, with great ferocity, as did, also, the warriors generally, with all the forms, gestures, exultations, and declarations, of a war-dance. The scalp of the woman and child were not treated in the same manner, because warriors do not exult in the killing of women and children.

On the 29th of February, (during the stay of Mr. McKee and myself, at the house of a friend near Look-out mountain) an Eagle-tail-dance was held, to which came warriors from the Running Water, which was also danced with all the forms of a war-dance, exulting over the scalps, &c. as on the 26th, at the scalp-dance. Notwithstanding this conduct, Mr. McKee and myself were treated with great attention and care, (not friendship, as heretofore) by Richard Justice and the Glass, instructing us to keep close, not permitting us to catch our horses, though near at hand, lest some mischief might be done us, as there were many bad Indians about. This appeared to proceed from their considering us as public messengers.

At the house of Richard Justice is a painting of Bowles, and two Cherokee chiefs, one each side of him, under which is written, "General Bowles, commander-in-chief of the Creek and Cherokee nations." There are, also, at his house, a number of dining cards, (copper-plate) addressed to Bowles while in England, styling him "commander-in-chief of the Creek nation." This trivial circumstance is mentioned, to show, among others that could be added, that Richard Justice, heretofore one of the warmest friends of the United States, now listens, in preference, to Bowles, and adheres to his counsels.

Near this town (the Look-out Mountain) lives Moses Price, a sensible half breed, who can read and write, and who was in England with Bowles. He speaks of Bowles as a very great man; that he can actually procure for the Southern tribes, from England, men and arms to defend them against the United States; and that he can obtain a free port in East Florida to extend trade to them directly from England. He says, while he was in England, he was informed that England, by treaty of peace, did not cede the lands claimed by the Creeks and Cherokees, to the United States, and, consequently, the United States could have nothing to do with the government of them, or their trade.

In further conversation with Price, he informed me that the Shawanese, in their invitation to the Cherokees to join them against the United States, made since the last battle with General St. Clair, had added a declaration that they should consider all Indians their enemies who did not join them, and treat them accordingly, when there should be peace between them and the United States, and applauded the justice of it, adding, that it had been McGillivray's wish that a general confederacy should take place among the Indians, and that, for that purpose, he had caused the Drugging Canoe to be despatched to the Chickasaws, to try to bring the mountain leader, and his party, into such a measure; that such a thing ought to take place, and he hoped would. I repeatedly saw the Glass upon a large, handsome, black gelding, which he took at the time he captured the girl and killed her mother.

About the 20th of February, eighty Creeks passed the Tennessee, saying they were for war against Cumberland, and that they expected to be joined by many others on the way; and it appeared to be a general opinion at the Look-out Mountain town, both of whites (traders) and Indians, that neither the Creeks, nor Lower town Cherokees would ever be at peace with Cumberland, because it was so immediately in the way of the intercourse between them and the Northern tribes, and that, if it was permitted to grow, it would be attended with bad consequences to them. As Colonel Hunter's and the other boats passed by the Running Water, the Indians hailed them, and requested them to come on shore, which they declined; the Indians then commenced a heavy firing, which was returned by the boats, but, as the distance was great, it is believed no injury was sustained on either side. Previous to Mr. McKee and myself leaving the Look-out mountain, I understood that a talk had arrived from the Little Turkey, addressed to the chiefs of that and the other four towns, lying northwest of Chatanuga mountain, namely, the Running Water, Nickajack, Long-Island villages, and Crow town, the particulars of which I could not exactly collect, but understood, generally, that it was expressive of his disapprobation of their late conduct, and that he himself had sat out from his own town, with a determination to pay you a visit at Knoxville. Nevertheless, as this was not quite authentic, I thought it my duty, under your instructions, to proceed for his town, and did, until I received certain information that he had been three days on his journey; I then returned, and, at Hiwassee, was again informed that the Little Turkey had declined his visit to you, and was gone home. Twice disappointed in attempts to deliver your letter myself, I thought it best to forward it by a safe conveyance, and to proceed myself to report to you the state of affairs. On my arrival at Chota, I found the Path Killer, a particular friend of the Little Turkey's, who lives in the same town with him, and who had set out with him on his intended visit, sent forward, on the return of the Turkey, to the Hanging Maw and John Watts, at Chota, with the talk that he had sent to the towns lying northwest of Chatanuga mountain, which he gave to me, in the following words: "That he (the Little Turkey) was tired of talking to them; that he had heard what they had lately done; that he did not intend to travel the path to them any more, to hold talks; if they wanted to go to war, go, and he would sit still and look at them; that they must stay on their own side of the mountain, (Chatanuga) and not mix with the other parts of the nation. That he would go and inform Governor Blount where they lived, and that they were for war; that he was done talking to them, and the Governor and they might settle matters as they would. He asked them where they would get ammunition; would they get it from the people they were going to kill, those of the United States, or would their conjuror, Richard Justice, find it for them in caves in the earth"—with a request that I would repeat it to you. The Path Killer also informed me, that the Little Turkey had given out this talk in his own town, and in such others as he had passed before his return home, and that he had commanded him to deliver it out in such as he should pass, and at Chota, to the Hanging Maw, and John Watts, which he had done, and that it had been generally approved.

He said the Turkey desired that the Hanging Maw and John Watts should send his talk to the governor, if they thought well of it; but as he had a good opportunity by me, he thought it best that he himself should send it. The Hanging Maw acknowledged to me, that he and Watts had received this talk from the Turkey, by the Path-Killer, (he was present when the Path-Killer delivered it to me, as before stated) but thought it best that Watts should first go down to the Running Water, from whence he had been twice sent for since the death of the Dragging Canoe (which happened immediately after his return from the Chickasaws) and if he could not alter their determination for war, then they would forward the talk of the Turkey to you; and Watts accordingly sat out from Chota on the 13th instant. I have omitted, in the course of this narrative, to inform you, that while Mr. McKee and myself were absent from the Look-out Mountain town, on the intended visit to the Turkey's town, a council was held on the subject of the Turkey's talk, in which it was agitated whether they should deliver up the late murderers, in case you should demand them, and it was determined they would not. To conclude, it is my opinion, that the present prospects and information warrants a belief, and hardly leaves a doubt, that many of the Creeks and the Cherokees, generally of the five Lower towns, will join the Shawanese in war, and that they will murder, and steal horses on the frontiers, and from all weak parties, wherever found, if they do not engage in a general national war.

Governor Blount to the Secretary of War.

KNOXVILLE, May 5th, 1792.

SIR:

Enclosed are copies of my letters to the chiefs of the Chickasaws and Choctaws, of the 27th of April, by a person who will certainly overtake Messrs. Robertson and Foster before their departure from Nashville. I shall again write them in such terms as shall appear to me proper, under the change of circumstances that have taken place, and shall invite them to meet me at as early a day as the information I have received will warrant an expectation of the arrival of the goods.

I beg you to assure the President, that I never shall order any part of the militia into service, only in cases of imminent danger; and I beg leave to remark in the present, I did not order them out until many murders had been committed, although Virginia, our next neighbor, with a less exposed frontier, and without a single murder committed since the 27th of August, had called out two full companies. I have not heard of any murders committed on our frontiers, since that of the 5th of April, on the wife and children of Harper Ratcliff, mentioned in my letter of the 22d of that month, and the information of the Lower towns is, that they generally are determined to desist from the commission of further hostilities.

The proposed meeting at Coyatee, of the chiefs, to hear the report of the Bloody Fellow and associates, from Philadelphia, has not yet taken place; but I am informed it is now intended to be held in twelve days.

There are two recent proofs that the Creeks still continue to steal horses. One is Mr. John Sevier, the younger, who you know was in the month of April in the Lower Cherokee towns (Look-out Mountain and Running Water) for several days, where he saw in different parties as many as sixty Creeks, returning from the north of the Tennessee, all well mounted on good horses, mostly large and fat, besides smaller ones, for pack horses for their skins and furs, the whole of which appeared to have lately been in the hands of white people. Perhaps it is necessary here to inform you, that people who are accustomed to see horses raised by the Indians, can distinguish them generally from those raised and fed by the whites, as readily as they can an Indian from a white man.

These horses must have been stolen from Cumberland and Kentucky.

The other is, on the 29th of April a party of Creeks stole twenty horses from Crooked creek, a branch of Little river, within fifteen miles of this place. The owners immediately pursued upon the trail, and with the assistance of some Cherokee guides, overtook them about sixty miles in the Cherokee country, as they were passing a river, fired on them, and regained all the horses but one, on which the Creek who rode him made his escape.

It is supposed some of the Creeks were wounded, if not killed.

These appear to be positive proofs against the Creeks; but besides these, there are great numbers of horses stolen every week from different parts of the frontiers, by somebody unknown, no doubt by Indians, Creeks or Cherokees. To particularize, as many as eleven were taken last week from a neighborhood within twelve miles of this place.

Horse stealing is a subject of complaint (almost continual) to me, without my being able to give any redress.

The only thing I can do, is to give passports to the sufferers to go into the nation in search of their horses, and letters to the chiefs, which, as yet, has never been attended with recovery.

This business is carried on by white people and Indians in combination, and as soon as a horse is stolen, he is conveyed through the Indian nation to North or South Carolina, or Georgia, and in a short time, to the principal towns on the sea board, for sale, so as to effectually prevent a recovery.

Horse stealing is the grand source of hostility between the white and red people in this district, and I fear will actually produce it, if not desisted from.

It is a subject on which the whites are very sore, and with difficulty restrain themselves from taking what they call satisfaction, that is, from killing some of the Indians; and I can venture to assert, in positive terms, would, if they were not fully impressed with the importance of observing the treaty, not doubting but all violators of it will be punished, whether white or red, in due time.

The Cherokee who was wounded on the 5th of April, on French Broad, as mentioned in my letter of the 22d of that month, has been with me, and received satisfaction in goods.

I have the honor, &c.

William Blount, Governor in and over the territory of the United States of America south of the river Ohio, and Superintendent of Indian Affairs for the Southern district, to Pianningo, the great chief and warrior of the Chickasaws.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

This will be delivered to you by Mr. James Randolph Robertson, the son of your good friend General Robertson, and Mr. Anthony Foster. They will also deliver to you a letter from Henry Knox, Esq. Secretary of War, written to you by the order of the illustrious President of the United States, which you are to attend to as written by the President himself. You will see by this letter, that it was intended to have been delivered to you by a Mr. Shaw; but when he arrived here, he found that his business in the Cherokee nation, would not permit him to come immediately to you.

To these gentlemen I commit the medals and clothing mentioned in the letter of the Secretary of War, to deliver to you, and three pounds of vermilion as a present from myself to you.

I would have sent you the rifle I promised you, and other presents, if these gentlemen, or your people, could have brought them to you. But, I expect the pleasure of seeing you next year, on your way to Philadelphia to see the President, when that promise shall be fulfilled.

Your friend and confidant, Tathola Thompson, and Tom, arrived here fifteen days ago, expressing a strong desire to proceed as you had ordered, to Philadelphia, to which I had no objection, but wished them to stay until Mr. Shaw should arrive, who I daily expected, and who, I believed, would bring a letter for you from the President.

Mr. Shaw arriving, and having a letter, as was expected, for you, I caused it to be explained to them, upon which they agreed to return to you with Mr. Robertson and Mr. Foster, and it was my opinion that it was best for them so to do.

At Cumberland, they were well treated by your old friend General Robertson, and supplied with horses, saddles, and bridles, to come to me.

While with me, for your sake, for that of your nation, as well as their own, I have treated them with all possible attention and civility, and return them to you with many valuable presents; and they might have had more, if they could have carried them to their own country; but they could not.

When you go to visit the President, I beg you to call at this place to stay and rest yourself, and to accept of the necessary supplies for the journey of yourself and friends. It gives me pain to hear the manner in which Governor St. Clair neglected you; but I hope this will not prevent you from following your inclinations to turn out again, and join our troops the ensuing campaign, on which event, be assured you will experience a very different treatment.

From the representations of your good friend General Robertson, and your conduct last campaign, I am impressed with the great worth of yourself and your people, and shall always be happy in opportunities of manifesting to you the friendship of the United States, under whose authority I act. And whatever Mr. Foster and Mr. Robertson shall say to you respecting my personal regard for you and your people, I beg you to believe, and that I am

Your friend and brother.

William Blount, Governor in and over the territory of the United States of America South of the river Ohio, and Superintendent of Indian Affairs for the Southern district, to the chiefs and warriors of the Choctaw nation,

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS:

To Mr. Anthony Foster, and Mr. James Randolph Robertson, with this letter, I commit also a letter addressed to you by Henry Knox, Esquire, Secretary of War, written by order of the illustrious General Washington, President of the United States of America, and with it the medals, arm-bands, and clothes, therein mentioned, with instructions to deliver them to you.

You will see that the letter of the Secretary of War, and the articles therein mentioned, were originally intended to have been delivered to you by Mr. Shaw; but, on his arrival at this place, his business in the Cherokee nation would not permit him to come shortly to you, and conceiving it important that you should have the letter as early as possible, I have sent it by them. They are citizens of the United States, resident on Cumberland, who I recommend to your particular notice and attention, and whatever they shall say to you, respecting the friendship of the illustrious President for your nation, you are to pay full faith and credit to.

For myself, and I act by appointment from the President, I saw your people at the treaty of Hopewell. I saw Toboco at Philadelphia, with John Woods, and have a love for them, and shall be always happy in showing you and your nation proofs of the friendship of the United States and of myself.

If any of your young warriors have a thirst for military fame, I beg you to indulge them in joining the troops of the United States at fort Washington, as mentioned in the letter of the Secretary of War, and you may have the fullest confidence that such as go will be well fed and well paid, and it will afford a pleasing proof of your strong friendship for the United States.

The Chickasaws, your neighbors, are very good people; take care and keep friendship with them as well as with the United States. But there are many red people, not Chickasaws, who tell lies to you. Take care and don't believe them. With every wish for your future happiness, I am your friend and brother.

Governor Blount to the Secretary of War, (Extract.)—May 16, 1792.

SIR:

I am truly glad of the objections you offer against attempting to obtain a post at the mouth of the Duck, in exchange for Bear creek, as it now appears to me the attempt would probably have the consequences you state, and with you I sincerely hope all designs that would rouse the jealousy or suspicions of the Indians, will long be suspended.

When the goods will arrive at Nashville is uncertain; but it is very certain that the Indians will not be there before the 15th June, if so soon, and I fear not until towards the last of that month, so that I do not count on the business with them being completed before the 10th July.

I had hopes of closing this letter without troubling you with further accounts of murders or horse stealing; but this moment a letter is handed to me, express, in the following words:

“CAMPBELL'S STATION, May 16, 1792.

“SIR:

“Just now, Mr. Cole, one of the guard, came to this place, and informs that the Indians killed two boys this day, about 10 o'clock, at Mr. Wells', in Hinds's valley, about three miles from this place. Mr. Cole, on his scout, went there shortly after the mischief was done.

“I thought it might be right to give you immediate notice. The settlements seem much alarmed. I intend to go and follow the track. I am, sir, yours &c.

“DAVID CAMPBELL.

“GOVERNOR BLOUNT.”

Campbell's station, where this note is dated, is on the north side of Holston, fifteen miles below this place, and the place where the boys were killed is not far distant. They were of the name of Wells; one about eight, the other ten years of age; they were picking strawberries near their father's door, in his view, when the Indians, six in number, came up to them, tomahawked and scalped them, and went off without making further attempts on the family. Judging from the place where these boys were killed, suspicion falls on the Cherokees or Creeks. There is no instance of the Northern tribes having killed so low down, nor within less than eighty miles.

Having again entered on this disagreeable subject, I add an extract of a letter from General Pickens to me:

“HOPEWELL, 28th April, 1792.

“I trust the inhabitants of this State will observe the late treaty. It has ever been my wish to observe treaties, though the Cherokees have stole more horses from the frontiers of this State, these six months past, than they have done for years before. If there is not a stop put to it, I know not what the frontier inhabitants may be provoked to do. While a part, and that the ostensible ruling part of a nation, affect to be at, and I believe really are for peace, and the more active young men are frequently killing people and stealing horses, it is extremely difficult how to act.

“The people, even the most exposed, would prefer an open war to such a situation. The reason is obvious; a man would then know, when he saw an Indian he saw an enemy, and be prepared and act accordingly.

“I have the honor to be, with very great respect and esteem, your obedient humble servant.”

Governor Blount to the Secretary of War.

KNOXVILLE, June 2d, 1792.

SIR:

For the present state of affairs with the Cherokees, I refer you to the enclosed minutes of the conference at Coyatee, believing it the way in which I can best communicate it fully to you. To me the appearing change is a very pleasing one, and I am sure it will be so to you.

Enclosed also is a duplicate of a letter by me written to General McGillivray, which will show you on what grounds the Creeks may be charged with a part of the depredations committed at Cumberland.

Those lately committed in that quarter, meaning those in the past month, have compelled me to order into actual service two more companies of militia from the district of Washington, for a three months' tour from the time they arrive at Cumberland river. These make, in the whole, five companies by me ordered into actual service, and will, I hope, be quite sufficient to give protection to the frontiers.

No contractor can be had, at this scarce season of the year, to supply these troops for the price to which I am limited, eight cents. As yet, each man has furnished himself, under an assurance that he shall therefor receive eight cents per day in addition to his pay. But this has been done with great difficulty and grumbling, and the necessity for a contractor is such that I shall be obliged to give such price as will engage one, relying that the necessity will justify the measure.

Mr. Allison arrived here the day before yesterday, by whom I had the honor of receiving a duplicate of your letter to me of the 22d April, and of that of the same date to General Pickens.

The Indian goods will be here in a few days, and probably at Nashville by the 20th. They will be escorted down the Tennessee by a part of the two companies last ordered into service—a mode of getting them to Cumberland quite as cheap as marching them over the Cumberland mountain.

Yesterday, as a man was riding the public road that leads down the north side of Holston, about forty miles above this place, he was fired on by four Indians, and struck in his clothes and powder horn by as many balls, but received no further injury.

This attempt to kill was made twelve miles south of Clinch, that is, so many miles within the boundary, and most probably by the Bench and his party.

John Thompson, the interpreter at the late treaty, was here yesterday, directly from the Little Turkey. He informs me that McGillivray did not meet Mr. Seagrove at the Rock Landing in Georgia, as had been proposed, giving for reason that Mr. Bowles's party still continued to believe in him, to expect his return, and were too strong for McGillivray to manage. This information, I believe, may be depended upon.

I have the honor, &c.

Minutes of the conference at Coyatee with the chiefs and warriors of the Cherokees, in May, 1792, with the incidental circumstances relative thereto.

The killing of the two boys on the 16th, and of Mr. Clack on the Cumberland trace on the 17th, as he was coming to this place with Judge Campbell from Miro district court, induced to postpone my visit to Coyatee until the chiefs at that place had repeated their invitation to me, which they did in a very pressing manner, by two messengers.

On Sunday, the 20th, I sat out, and, as I approached Coyatee, I sent a person to give them notice thereof. They had requested that I would, giving for reason that they wished to pay me all possible honors. Upon receiving the information, the chiefs immediately dressed themselves, and commanded all the Indians of every description to appear on a field adjacent to the house prepared for my reception, and at which they had erected the standard of the United States, upon a pole nearly of the height and size of a liberty pole.

At the Tennessee, about half a mile from the ground on which they were paraded, I met a well dressed young fellow on horseback, with a request from the chiefs that I would there halt until they should be quite ready to receive me in the way they wished, of which they would give me notice. In a short time information was given; I advanced, and found their whole number, chiefs and others, (supposed to be two thousand) divided into two lines, extending about three hundred yards each, leaving an open space between for myself and honorary escort to pass. As soon as I entered the space, a firing was commenced in the manner of a feu de joie, and handsomely kept up until I had passed through. Shouts of joy instantly followed, and immediately after I had alighted, under the standard of the United States, I was surrounded by the whole number, with countenances demonstrative of more joy than I had heretofore been a witness of.

The evening was spent in eating, drinking, and cheerful conversation with Eskaqua, John Watts, the Hanging Maw, Richard Justice of the Look-out, the Breath of Nickajack, Will of the Running Water, and others.

On Monday, early in the day, Eskaqua waited on me, and said he thought it best to postpone public business until Tuesday, offering for reason, “that, to devote that day to happiness unalloyed with public cares, would be better prepare us.” It was spent in eating, seasonable drinking of whiskey, and in holding many private talks with the chiefs, and in a ball play, where great activity was displayed. Eskaqua was on the losing side, and having staked much, bore it not quite well.

On Tuesday Eskaqua again waited on me, and said he had been drinking too much whiskey to be capable of public business; that it was an accident might have happened to any man; that he hoped I would agree to its being postponed to Wednesday; he would let every body know the fault was his, not mine. Tuesday was spent as Monday had been, in eating, drinking, and a ball play, on which the stakes were very large; even chiefs staked their clothes, saving only their flaps. Eskaqua recovered his losses. His getting drunk on Monday night was supposed to be a manoeuvre to get some of the best players of the adverse party in the same situation, which he effected. He did not play himself, and none of his players drank to excess.

On Wednesday the chiefs assembled at an appointed shade, and Eskaqua waited on me, and requested my attendance, and, having seated me, addressed me, saying, he was happy to see me in their country, and offered an apology for having detained me a day longer than was necessary, which he hoped I would excuse. To this I replied, returning thanks for the friendly reception they had given me, &c. and proceeded to deliver to them an address, which I had previously written, as follows:

The address of Governor Blount to the chiefs and others of the Cherokees, assembled at Coyatee, on Wednesday, the 23d May, 1792, to divide the goods by them received for the first annual payment, agreeably to the treaty of Holston, at which were present the following chiefs: General Eskaqua, Nontuaka, the Breath of Nickajack, Richard Justice of the Look-out, Charley of the Running-water, the Hanging Muw, Kattagiska, the Broom, the Cabin, the Head-man of Ekwasse, Tuskigatahee, and other chiefs—the whole number of chiefs, warriors, and others, computed at two thousand.

BROTHERS, CHIEFS, AND WARRIORS, OF THE CHEROKEES:

It is now near a year since I had first the pleasure to meet you in council, and to form a treaty with you on the part of the United States, the object of which was the benefit of both parties.

Since that event, your nation, in a grand council, held at the beloved town of Estanaula, appointed deputies, namely: the Bloody Fellow, Nontuaka, the Old Prince, the Jobber's Son, Captain George, and other good men, to wait on the President, himself, and to ask him whether he has authorized me to form a treaty with you, and, if he had, to solicit him, on your part, to give you one thousand five hundred dollars per annum, the same the Creeks receive for their lands, instead of one thousand, as stipulated by the treaty.

The President answered you, that he had authorized me to make a treaty with you; that he had approved and ratified it; that he had instructed me not to stipulate for the payment of more than one thousand dollars per annum; but that he himself would give you one thousand five hundred dollars per annum for your lands, which sum you are in future to receive.

This at once proves to you, what I before told you is all true—the President's goodness and his love for you and your nation.

The President has also informed you, that, whatever shall be said by me on his part, you are to attend to as if said by himself. Thus you see you are no more to doubt the truth of what I have said, or shall say to you.

I was pleased that you did send deputies to visit the President, and with the persons you sent; with their conduct there, and their report since their return to you.

Here, brothers, I think it proper to inform you, that the President has been pleased to direct that the Bloody Fellow shall, in future, be known and distinguished by the more honorable name of General Eskaqua.

When first you invited me to come down, and be present at this meeting of yours, I hoped and believed, the great book, which the Secretary of War has given to your nation, containing the talks of your deputies, and the answers of the President and the Secretary of War, would here have been opened, read, and explained, but that I now find it to be done at the beloved Estanaula, in a grand national council. Then, my brothers, at Estanaula, it must be read and explained by James Carey, whom the President, at the request of your deputies, has appointed interpreter.

The choice has been very agreeable to me, as I am told he well understands your language, and I know he does English, and I believe him to be an honest man, who will tell you truth only—a man in whom you may fully depend.

You are to have another interpreter, of your own choice, and when you have made it, you will please inform me on whom it has fallen.

These interpreters are to explain all public letters and talks, and no other person must be permitted to do it. You must not permit other persons even to read your public letters: then there will be no more misunderstanding of letters and talks.

I shall now speak about the objects of the present meeting: it is to divide the goods of the first annual payment for your lands, to talk about the proceedings at Philadelphia, (not to open the book) and about what has happened since the treaty.

The division of the goods is with yourselves; I have nothing to do, with it; but I am glad to hear that you have determined, that the four Lower Towns shall have a large share of them, and that so many of the people of the Lower Towns are here ready to receive them. If they had as generally attended the treaty, they would have had a full share of the goods they paid the nation. That they did not get a full share, the fault was their own.

Thanks and credit are due to the Badger for his talk, respecting the division of these goods.

I have already spoken of the proceedings at Philadelphia, and what I have said will appear to be fully proved to you, when the book is opened and explained, at Estanaula, by Mr. Carey.

What has happened since the treaty, has appeared in a very bad light to the white people. With difficulty I have restrained those whose relations have been killed and scalped, or made prisoners, and those whose horses have been stolen, from falling on the Indians, without regard to age or sex, and taking, instantly, what they termed satisfaction.

Since the treaty, have been killed, wounded, or made prisoners, the persons described as follows:

Oliver Williams and Jasen Thompson, two peaceable well disposed men, on the 28th January, at night, encamped on the road which leads from Bledsoe's station to the ford of Cumberland, that is, on the north side of Cumberland river, where they were fired on by Indians, and both wounded, and their horses, one gun, and other articles, taken from them; they both got back to the settlements much injured by the frost, as there was snow on the ground.

Early in March a party of Indians attacked the house of Mr. Thompson, within seven miles of Nashville, killed and scalped the old man, and others of the family, and made prisoners a Mr. Caffrey, and Miss Thompson, a child.

On the 5th March, twenty-five Indians attacked Brown's station, eight miles from Nashville, and killed four boys. On the 6th, they burned Dunham's station; that is, houses, corn, &c.

On the 12th, they killed Mr. McMurray, on his own plantation, near the mouth of Stone's river. On the 5th April, killed Mrs. Radcliff and three children. On the 8th instant, killed Benjamin Williams, and family, consisting of eight persons, in the heart of the Cumberland settlement, on station Camp creek; a boy wounded with three balls, near the same place. And on the 16th, two boys killed, within twelve miles of Knoxville. On the 17th, a man within thirty miles, as he was passing the road from Cumberland with Judge Campbell, and five other unarmed men; and, besides these, within three months, a man was killed on the road from Kentucky to Cumberland, and a woman and boy made prisoners. Another party, on their way from the Natchez, of which several were killed, and a girl made prisoner; and two boats taken, coming up the Cumberland river, in which four people were killed, namely: three of the young Seviers, and a Mr. Rice, and, since that time, upwards of two hundred horses have been stolen from Cumberland, and the district of Washington, besides a great number from the frontiers of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia.

I do not say, Brothers, your people have done all these murders, and stole all these horses, because I do not positively know. But, from a variety of circumstances, suspicion falls on the people of your Lower towns, and the Creeks. I write General McGillivray, and make the same complaints.

I am well aware, that the chiefs of both nations are fully determined to preserve the treaties they have made, inviolable; but that is not enough; it will be expected of them to inform who did commit these depredations, and that they make restitution of such of the prisoners and horses as are, or have been, in the possession of your nation; and that such acts shall not be committed in future.

The President of the United States, your father, loves you, and undoubtedly wishes you to be happy, but he equally loves the white people, and it is equally his duty to protect them, and he cannot see your people kill the white people, and compel them to bear it in peace.

My Brothers, you must exert yourselves to restrain your young people, as well as all others, from such acts. Attend to what General Eskaqua, and his associate deputies, shall tell you: they will tell you how much the President loves you, and how earnestly he wishes you to do well and be happy.

Already I have told you, that with difficulty I have restrained the people, whose relations have been killed, from falling on the Indians and taking satisfaction, without regard to age or sex. Now, my Brothers, I have to inform you, that, to secure the white people of the frontiers against the further depredations of your bad people, I have been forced to order out a part of the militia upon the frontiers, from Holston to Clynch, and up Clynch, and upon the frontiers of Cumberland.

These militia are not ordered on duty to come to your country to injure you or your people, but to stay in their own, and to take care that your bad people do not come and hurt the white people.

If any of your people come into the settlement, (and I shall always be glad to see the chiefs at my house) they had best come in by way of Major Craig's, for nobody has been killed in that quarter, and the people there are not so sore as on the other side of Holston, and on the frontiers of Cumberland.

Speaking of frontiers, it may occur to you that I should say something on the subject of extending and marking the land, agreeably to the treaty. I shall write you on that head, so that you shall have my letter before you in council at Estanaula.

With respect to prisoners taken before the late treaty, I have one in my possession, who has been treated well; and I have been at all times ready to deliver him at the place appointed; and you have some which I wish restored to their friends, and I expect you will deliver them to me immediately after the council at Estanaula.

THE BREATH OF NICKAJACK then rose and said, That man (pointing to Eskaqua) has induced me to come here. The people of the Lower towns have been very deaf to your talks, but now we will hear them; (he then presented a string of white beads, the usual token of peace and friendship.) I have heard your charge of the murders and horse stealings, and I tell you truly, I do not know who committed the whole of them; but from the great council at Estanaula you shall be informed of whatever has been done by our nation, and there the prisoners in our possession, taken since the treaty, shall be delivered to any body you shall appoint.

THE HANGING MAW then gave public notice, that the council was to meet at Estanaula, in thirty nights, (23d June) to hear the report of the Eskaqua, and the other agents, and for all the chiefs to attend, and not to be absent, under any pretence whatever.

JOHN WATTS said, "You shall hear all the talks from Estanaula," and that he wished Capt. Chisolm to attend, and bring them up as soon as the council should finish their business.

In a private talk with Dick Justice, of the Look-out, he expressed great concern for what had happened since the treaty, as did several others, and said, "they hoped they should be able to restrain their young people after the council at Estanaula."

I had privately intimated to the chiefs that I wished they should reply to what I should say from Estanaula, in preference of doing it at Coyatee. They would otherwise have confessed their nation guilty of several of the murders, &c. and there were sundry frontier people present, and the answer from Estanaula will be more a national one than could have been at Coyatee; and I have no doubt but they will answer fully from Estanaula.

The chiefs and warriors of the Lower towns arrived at Coyatee on the Saturday previous to my going down. They marched in, painted black, and sprinkled over with flour, meaning to show they had been at war, but were then for peace.

Eskaqua, John Watts, and the other chiefs, received them under the standard of the United States. The former, who appears to have entered fully into the views of the United States, and the latter, as fully determined to second him, rejoiced much on this auspicious event. They may be said to be the champions of peace.

Finding the nation, in general, so apparently disposed for peace, and Eskaqua, and other chiefs, soliciting me very earnestly to give a part of the goods in my possession, in addition to those they had received at Philadelphia, I agreed to it, believing they never could be disposed of more to the advantage of the United States.

Governor Blount to General McGillivray.

KNOXVILLE, May 17th, 1792.

SIR:

I am already informed that the murders and horse stealings lately committed by the Creeks, may, in a great degree, be charged to the attention they paid to the pernicious counsels of Mr. Bowles. Nevertheless, I conceive it essential, they should be known to you; they are as follow:

Oliver Williams and Jason Thompson, two peaceable, well disposed men, on the 28th January, at night, encamped on the road which leads from Bledsoe's station to the ford of Cumberland river, where they were fired on by the Indians, and both wounded, and their horse, one gun, and other articles, taken from them. They both got back to the settlements much injured by the frost, as there was snow on the ground.

Their horses were, one an iron grey, branded on the rising shoulder I D, and lately put on, about three years old; and the other a bay, branded with Spanish brands.

In the latter part of February, eight Creeks were met in the Cherokee country, on their return from north of the Tennessee, by a young Cherokee of veracity, well known to you, with two such horses as above described, and a gun, which they acknowledged they had taken from people they had attacked on the Cumberland road, in the snow. The young Cherokee was particular in describing to me the horses, before I had a description from the owners, and he did it with such exactness, that no doubt remains on my mind but the eight Creeks whom he saw, were the Indians who fired on Thompson and Williams, and stole their horses, gun, &c.

Their own acknowledgment is a sufficient evidence of the fact.

Early in March, a party of Indians attacked the house of Mr. Thompson, within seven miles of Nashville; killed and scalped the old man and others of the family, and made prisoners Mrs. Caffray and Miss Thompson, and a child.

A few days since, some Cherokee chiefs were here with me, from the Little Turkey's quarter of the country, who informed me, as they were returning from the Chickasaw country, about the last of March, they came to a camp of the Creeks, on the trace that leads from the Cherokees to the Creeks, where they had prisoners two women and a child about two years of age.

My informants add, that there were with them two white men that had come with them from the Chickasaws, and going to Georgia, who the Creeks could with difficulty be restrained from killing, giving for reason, that they suspected them to be citizens of the United States; and my informants saved them, by declaring they lived in the Chickasaws, and were not citizens.

The description of the prisoners taken, and those seen by the Cherokee chiefs, and the time when taken and when seen, afford a violent presumption that it was Mrs. Caffray, Miss Thompson, and the child taken with them, which the Cherokees saw prisoners in the possession of the Creeks, as above described.

I have premised that the disorders of the Creeks have flowed from the villany of Mr. Bowles; permit me to add, that I am sure you are as much opposed to the commission of such horrid acts as I can be, and that I have no doubt but you will take every measure in your power to have these unhappy people returned to their country and friends. And to receive and bring them to me is the business on which I send the bearer, Captain John Chisolm, to you.

I believe he has heretofore been known to you, and I beg leave to recommend him to your attention and civilities.

I have yet to trouble you on the disagreeable subject of horse stealing.

In the course of this spring, from Cumberland and this quarter of the country, more than two hundred have been taken, stolen by the Indians; and I am informed by a gentleman of veracity, who was among the Cherokees in March and April, that he saw sixty of them in the hands of the Creeks, returning to their own country from north of the Tennessee, and the Cherokees assure me, that the whole of them have been taken by the Creeks; which, by the by, I do not credit, as I well know some of them got a part. What, my good sir, can be done to put a stop to this evil?

The white people are daily making the heaviest complaints to me of their losses, and to their credit it can with truth be said, they are strict observers of the Creek and Cherokee treaties.

I pray you, my good sir, now to interpose your influence and authority to put a stop to it. Bowles, I hope, is no more of consequence enough to prevent you from so doing.

In September last, I found myself compelled to address you on this painful subject of complaint, and I have been informed you wrote me an answer, but it never reached my hands. I shall, at all times, be happy to hear from you, to cultivate a friendly correspondence with you, and to use my efforts with your's, to keep order on the frontiers, so essential to the happiness of all parties. But I cannot conclude without informing you, that besides Thompson's family, the persons whose names follow have been killed by the Indians, by what particular ones, not exactly known, but there is violent presumption that it has been done by the Creeks, and the Cherokees of the Lower towns: namely, on the 5th March, twenty-five Indians attacked Brown's station, eight miles from Nashville, and killed four boys; on the 6th, burnt Dunham's station—that is, houses, corn, &c.; on the 12th, killed Mr. McMurray on his own plantation, near the mouth of Stone's river; on the 5th April, killed Mrs. Radcliff and three children; on the 8th instant, killed Benjamin Williams and family, consisting of eight, in the heart of the Cumberland settlement, in Station Camp creek; a boy wounded with three balls near the same place; yesterday, two boys killed within twelve miles of this place, and to-day a man within thirty, as he was passing the road from Cumberland, with Judge Campbell, and five other unarmed men; and besides those, within three months, a man was killed on the trace from Kentucky to Cumberland, and a woman and a boy made prisoners; another party, on their way from the Natchez, of which several were killed, and a girl made prisoner; and two boats taken coming up Cumberland, in which four people were killed, namely, three of the young Seviere and a Mr. Rose, but of these, the Creeks, I believe, are clear, there being good proof against the Cherokees of the Lower towns.

I sincerely lament that the necessity exists for detaining you so long on so disagreeable a subject, but I trust that necessity is a sufficient apology. I have the honor, &c.

May 31st, 1792.

P. S. I am since informed that the Creeks who had two women and the child prisoners, belonged to the Oakjoys. One of the white men with the Cherokee chiefs was Francis Willis, another of the name of Thompson, and the name of the other I have not heard. They also saw the women and child, and one of them conversed with one of the women on the fatigue she suffered in walking, and would have offered his horse to ride, had he not feared it would offend their captors, and render his own safety more precarious.

They mention that they heard one of the women complain to one of the Indians that she was tired of walking, and the Indian answered, that he would get briars and scratch her thighs, and that would make her walk fast. The reason given by these men why they did not inquire of these women who they were, and where taken by the Creeks, were the same that prevented the offer of the horse. It was the second night that the Creeks and Cherokees had encamped contiguous to each other, that the former insisted on killing the three white men, as stated in the above letter.

These circumstances are mentioned, the better to convince you that Mrs. Caffrey, Miss Thompson, and the child, have been made prisoners by a party of the Creeks; and prove, that they also killed Miss Thompson's father, and the rest of the family.

Governor Blount to the Secretary of War.

KNOXVILLE, July 4th, 1792.

STR:

I make no doubt but you will be a little surprised at receiving from me a letter of this date, from this place, but so it is that I could not leave it sooner, consistent with the good of the service I am engaged in.

The last of the goods, for the conference with the Chickasaws and Choctaws, did not arrive more than eight days past, owing to the weight, compared with the strength of the teams; and the boats could not be got in readiness to proceed with them down the river before yesterday.

The boats are under the command of Alexander Moore, the most experienced waterman in all this country, who has been four times down the river, and the goods in the care of David Allison.

An uncommon drought prevails at this time, consequently, the waters were never lower; and some difficulties as to water may be expected, but none, it is hoped, but what may readily be surmounted by the activity of the crews, who are, in my opinion, uncommonly good.

My delay here will in no wise affect the object of the intended conference, as I am informed the Chickasaws and Choctaws will not be at Nashville before the 25th day of this month.

General Pickens has been with me since the day he appointed, the tenth of June, and we set out for Nashville to-morrow morning.

By the enclosed journal of the council at Estanaula, you will see that a Cherokee escort will meet the boats, at my request, at Tuskega, to guard them against Indian depredations; it contains, also, the whole of the proceedings of that body, at that place.

As you have the whole journal, and a copy of my letters of the 4th of June, respecting the running of the line, and the exchange of prisoners, any comments appear unnecessary; but I can't help observing, that the speech of the Little Turkey's, on the subject of the line, is very different from what might have been expected from any part of the nation, but especially from him. The ostensible reason given for the absence of Eskaqua from the council, is, that some distant relation was sick, and he stayed at home to attend them; the real one is supposed to be, that he foresaw, or strongly suspected, the business would not be conducted to his wishes, therefore did not choose to be present. That given for the absence of John Watts, was, that he was gone to Pensacola, at the invitation of Mr. Panton, on mercantile business, a place to which he had not heretofore been since the war. This Mr. Panton, of Pensacola, has lately, that is, in the latter part of May and first of June, been in the Lower Cherokee towns, and some others, under the pretence of collecting old debts, and extending his trade; but there are reasons to suspect that his real business was to invite some principal characters to attend a treaty which the Spaniards are about to hold with the Creeks, at Pensacola, in the latter part of August, or early in September. Enclosed is the deposition of James Ore, a man of observation and veracity which will give information on that head.

Believing it essential to the interests of the United States, that a perfect account should be obtained of the proceedings and objects of the Spaniards and others, at the meetings mentioned in that deposition, I have engaged a man, qualified in all respects, to be present at them for that purpose.

On the eighth of June General Robertson and his son were wounded by Indians on his own plantation, himself shot through both arms, one broke, and his son through the thigh; but both are on the recovery.

Besides the parties mentioned in Ore's deposition, I have other information of parties of Creeks, and Cherokees too, having gone to Cumberland with declared intentions of hostility, particularly a fellow called the Pumpkin Boy, of the Look-out mountain, a brother of Double Head, a rising popular character among the young warriors. And, since I wrote you last, two Indians have been wounded in the settlements of this district, by whites in pursuit of stolen horses; one of them was shot as he was sitting on a stolen horse, and the other was in possession of a stolen horse, and fired first on the whites, who were pursuing of him and his accomplices.

These continued depredations, and the militia infantry turning out into actual service with great tardiness and reluctance, have induced me to order out a troop of cavalry for the protection of the frontiers, for a three months' tour, unless sooner discharged, which also serves as an escort to General Pickens and myself through the wilderness.

I have not heard any thing lately which warrants an assurance that the Chickasaws or Choctaws will turn out and join the arms of the United States, or the contrary; but I am informed that John Thompson, the late interpreter to the Cherokees, who will be at the conference, is instructed by his great friend, the Little Turkey, to oppose it.

I have the honor, &c.

[ENCLOSURES.]

ESTANAUOLA, Tuesday, 26th June, 1792.

Present, the Little Turkey, great beloved man of the whole nation; the Badger, the beloved man of the Southern division; the Hanging Maw, beloved man of the Northern division; the Boot, the Black Fox, the Cabin, Path Killer, &c. head-men of the Little Turkey's town; Keatchiskie, and Sour Mush, of Hightower; Nontuaka, of Cheestie; Teakakiskie, of Hiwassee; Richard Justice, and The Glass, of the Look-out Mountain town; the Thigh of Celicæ, the Big Bear, and the Kingfisher, of Estanaula; Charley, of Alljoy; Nanotey, of Kautokey; the Ter-rapin, of Kiukee; the Breath, and his nephew, of Nickajack; Chickasautehe, of Big Savannah, and warriors; Chinna-bee, ambassador from the Natchez and the Creeks; Leonard D. Shaw, Esquire, agent, resident in the Cherokee nation, and James Carey, interpreter.

NONTUAKA gave a history of his tour to Philadelphia; enjoining his people to listen to the talks which he and his fellow-travellers had brought back.

THE LITTLE TURKEY.—This is not the first time I have spoke respecting Mr. Jack Thompson and Mr. Carey; the former is one of my own people, and has grown to the age of a man. I always expected he would be serviceable to his country when grown up; he shall be at all public meetings, as well as Mr. Carey, who, though a white man, I consider as one of my own people, for I have raised him from a boy; together, they are to be consulted, and their words taken upon all public business. Mr. Thompson shall be considered as a speaker in all national councils, and the head-men are to attend to his talks.

MR. SHAW.—FRIENDS AND BROTHERS: As I am sensible you must have heard, from your own ambassadors, that I am sent by our Father, the President of the United States, to be your friend, your counsellor, and protector, I think it necessary to express, on this occasion, my own feelings. I thank the Great Spirit who has brought me in safety to your country, and who has brought you all here to listen to the talks of peace and friendship; he knows my heart, how straight it is toward your nation—how anxious to promote your welfare. As the Great Spirit delights in the works of peace, he, I hope, will incline your hearts to receive me favorably, whilst I read the good things your Father, the President, has committed to my charge to say to you. And now, in token of cordial friendship, I shall take your beloved chief by the arm, and, I hope, his warriors will receive me with the same friendship.

Mr. Shaw then took the Little Turkey, and the other chiefs, by the arm, and stood before them, whilst some of the young men came forward and took him by the hand; he then took out a large belt of white wampum, which he observed to the chiefs was a token of friendship from the President, and, placing it over his right shoulder, proceeded to read the book. He read as far as the President's speech, which he wished not to read till to-morrow, observing, that he had gone through most of their business at Philadelphia.

NONTUAKA.—What you have heard is only what was said by our people; to-morrow you will hear the answers to these requests.

Adjourned till to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, 27th June, 1792.

The council met pursuant to adjournment. Present, the Little Turkey, &c. as before.

NONTUAKA desired the warriors, &c. to come forward, that they might hear attentively, whilst Mr. Shaw proceeded to read the President's speech.

THE GLASS moved to hear that article of the treaty at Holston, which describes the boundary of the nation, read from the book, to know if the President had altered the lines. Mr. Carey informed him that he had not. The Glass, however, repeated his anxiety to hear it read. Mr. Shaw then read it. The chiefs murmured somewhat about the line striking Cumberland, forty miles above Nashville. Nontuaka commanded silence, till the book should be read through, that then they might deliberate on the line. Mr. Shaw then proceeded to read the remaining part of the book. After finishing, he walked up to the Little Turkey, and, in the name of the United States, presented him with a belt, observing, that he would readily attend them, and communicate any thing for them to the President.

Some observation was made concerning the proper person to keep the book; when Mr. Shaw observed, that he had been sworn, when he was appointed agent for the nation, to do justice to the United States, and that, in order to do that, it was necessary he should have the book to record their answers to the President.

THE LITTLE TURKEY told him to keep the book until the answers were made, when it must be closed till the next meeting.

THE KINGFISHER, or Jobber's Son, moved, that Captain Chisolm's papers should be brought forward, who sent immediately for them.

THE BLACK FOX desired the audience to sit still; that Governor Blount's letters were to be read immediately; and to-morrow they would have nothing to do but make their answers. Captain Chisolm then presented to the Little Turkey a letter from Governor Blount, accompanied with his Excellency's address, at Coyatee. The Little Turkey gave the letter to Mr. Shaw, requesting him to read it, which he did. The Glass observed, that, as the Governor had mentioned in his letter that no person, except those appointed, should interpret their letters, it was, therefore, proper that he should send his letter to Estanaula and the Turkey's town, and not send so many over to the Big River. With respect to the prisoners mentioned in the letter, it was observed by Dick Justice, the Glass, and the Breath, that but two had been brought into the nation since the treaty, and one before.

Captain Chisolm then, in the name of the United States, delivered a prisoner boy, named Abe, into the hand of the Little Turkey.

Adjourned till to-morrow.

THURSDAY, 28th June, 1792.

The council met, pursuant to adjournment. Present, the Little Turkey, &c., as before.

NONTUAKA.—We are all gathered together here, and there seems to be a little variance; I wish, therefore, to explain myself. My warriors, I have been to Philadelphia to see the great beloved white man. When I left our father, the President, and General Knox, my heart was easy. I came here and brought Mr. Shaw. When we left Congress, you, Mr. Shaw, were appointed to come with us here. Governor Blount was also appointed; and you, as well as we, were to attend to him. I hope there will be no disturbances, but that the President may hear there is no jarring amongst you. Governor Blount, and you under him, were appointed to do justice, both to the reds and whites. (To the chiefs.) You are my people, and I am one of yours. I hope you will pay attention to my talks. The young warriors went out, the day before yesterday, to counsel amongst themselves, but one young fellow came in and disturbed the business. [The young fellow denied that he had interrupted the business. A young warrior came forward and justified Nontuaka. The fellow continued to deny, and said he was glad to hear good talks.]

A young warrior, Comasuliskie, came forward, holding the pipe to each of the head men, assured them he had let go the hatchet, that he would always attend to their talks, and that the quarter of the nation where he lives should do the same.

THE BLACK FOX.—The Dragging Canoe has left the world. He was a man of consequence in his country. He was a friend both to his own and the white people. But his brother is still in place; and I mention now in public, that I intend presenting him with his deceased brother's medal: for he promises fair to possess sentiments similar to those of his brother, both with regard to the red and white. It is mentioned here publicly, that both whites and reds may know it, and pay attention to him. Another person I also nominate as a head-man, Taloteeskie, who is to be considered in the place of the Corn Tassel. Though some of the young fellows of the nation, and the white people together, occasioned the Tassel to fall under a flag of truce, his talks shall not be forgot. We have, therefore, appointed this man to support his talks, and we hope that both whites and reds will attend to him.

The young warriors then withdrew from their beloved seat, to consult in private—after some time, sent for the beloved men, and with them remained in private consultation for some time—when the Glass got up, and, taking the head men and warriors by the hand, said: "I have now left the business in your hands. As long as I live I will stick by you and your talks. I am now come to take you by the hand, as I am going home." He then, with Richard Justice, departed. The head-men and warriors then came forward, and

The LITTLE NEPHEW then delivered the sentiments of the whole, in the following words:

The warriors of my nation went ambassadors to Congress. They have returned; but every thing is not to our satisfaction. The warriors from this part of the nation said but little. Eskaqua, from the other river, took the business off their hands. I came from the Running Water to Hiwassee, and from that to the Hanging Maw's. I mentioned to the nation that I had sent five beloved fires, of five towns, and their talks. At that time, I put on my belt and tied up my things, to start from here to Seneca. I desired them to think of that place, the Little Turkey's old town, and the coals of fire which are yet to be seen there; and that I expected an answer to my talk, but have got none. I desired Nontuaka to mention that the white people were on our land, and that I hoped they would be removed, and give our young fellows more room to hunt. I desired them to go to the great beloved white house, and I hoped they would bring good talks. I am rejoiced at their return. Nontuaka returned when Ballew was with him. I thought he would have done something then, but he did not. I was glad to see him. The President may easily see the present situation of this nation: for, though we have raised the whites, they have become so numerous that I must consider myself speaking to my elders. When our ambassadors got to the beloved white house, they spoke with the President: for, though we are red, you must know one person made us both. The red people were made first. I also told them: Tell the President, though we were red people, to take notice of us, and take pity on us, with regard to our land: for red people were the first owners of it; that he would let us know his sentiments, respecting our land, whether he intended taking or restoring it, or what he intended doing with it, and send an answer back. I told them to tell him, if he would only sweep our lands, and send an answer back, we would be satisfied. But no answer came. We are all struck very much to think nothing is done to remove the people off our lands. Yet, if the President will take pity on us, and remove them off, we will be much better satisfied. We are beloved men, and speak once more to the President, and hope he will look to us, and consider our young warriors, who are now in council with us: for, I declare to you, they have not hunting ground to maintain their families; and, if you will but open our ground for us once more, we will be satisfied, and rejoice at the news. I hope the President will take pity on us, both old and young of the nation, if he but fully knew our present situation. We are bound up all round with white people, that we have not room to hunt. I speak once more, and hope and request that he will take pity on us, and do something in this matter. Upon his doing this, and sending an answer, it will make us all rejoice. Our father, who lives in Philadelphia, says he will take pity on us. It is now in his power to do so, if he will: for, if it is not in his power, in whose is it? And, on his answer to this, I hope we will be all happy. Our great father above made us both; and, if he was to take it into his head that the whites had injured the reds, he would certainly punish them for it: because he made both red and white, and it is his wish that they should live together under a white cloud, without darkness. It is our desire to live in peace and friendship with oldest brother. Our warriors, old and young, are here, and have consulted, and say they love their lands, and cannot think of parting from them, as they have no other way to make a living. I make not the least doubt but some of the whites are the cause of the President's wishing to purchase our land; this we are sensible of: for we have proven it. The whites settle on our land, and improve till he is obliged to purchase: for we are not of force to drive them off. We apprehend he is ignorant of the proceedings of the frontiers, who impose on us. We will stop till to-morrow, and consult. We will then meet again. Do not leave the ground, until we have finished what we have to say in answer to the President's speeches.

Adjourned till to-morrow.

FRIDAY, 29th June, 1792.

The council met, pursuant to adjournment. Present, the Little Turkey, &c. as above, except the Glass and Richard Justice.

MR. SHAW.—BROTHERS: When I first set off to come to your country, I flattered myself that I might prove the happy instrument of peace and harmony. The Secretary of War, General Knox, enumerated to me, with pleasure, the good things which our father, the President, had done for you, and what he yet intended to do; and he gave it to me particularly in charge, to inform you of these kind intentions. I was very much rejoiced to hear these things; and I came to your nation, with the greatest wishes to render you services. Though the President of the United States only promised you fifteen hundred dollars per year, he actually sent you seventeen hundred and fifty dollars' worth of goods, by your ambassadors; he paid, likewise, for the transportation of these goods, which amounted to something considerable; he sent besides, one thousand dollars' worth of clothes by me, to be presented to the beloved men of your nation, with many other valuable articles in medals and other things, all which I have nearly distributed according to direction and advice. He has, likewise, ordered me, (should you think fit) to instruct your children, to teach you whatever useful arts you may be desirous of knowing, and he has offered to supply you with every thing necessary to cultivate your farms, at his own expense. Thus you see that, by acts, and not by words only, he is a kind and attentive parent. I hope I shall be able to inform him, that, on your parts, you will pay attention to his words. Your young warriors seem to harbor some uneasiness about the line, for which, I am extremely sorry. Your father, the President, would be much grieved to hear it. I shall only observe, that the part of the line of which you so much complain, was formed by commissioners, before General Washington became President, by a treaty held at Hopewell, on the Keowee. That same part was again ratified when Governor Blount, on the part of the United States, held a treaty with you. So that, Brothers, you see, that, by two separate treaties, the line has been confirmed. I know that every thing your father, the President, can do with propriety, he will be always ready and willing to perform. For my part, I consider myself as one of your people, and that my interest will hereafter be inseparably connected with your own. What, therefore, I can do for your interest, I shall readily perform; and I shall think nothing too much. I hope, therefore, you will put confidence in me, and esteem me as your friend and brother. Should you think proper to call on me for advice, I shall deliver it with sincerity and truth. As the Great Spirit has called me from amongst my own people to reside amongst you, and has created me for the express purpose of being your friend, in compliance with his will, I shall forget all my former connexions, and attach myself to you. If I can only preserve peace, and see your children grow up in safety, and see you every day increase in happiness, I shall have accomplished my business; and if you will only follow the advice of your father, the President, he will lead you to happiness, and all that he asks in return, is, that you will be friends with the United States. But it will be necessary, that you let me know fully your mind, in order that I may inform him what your wishes are; and as he has empowered me to see his business, in these respects, carried into execution, you shall never find any remissness on my part.

THE LITTLE TURKEY.—You, Mr. Shaw, are my brother; you were directed here, which makes me very happy. This is not the first time, nor do I wish to be considered the first time, that I have spoke of Mr. Thompson as a person from whom I anticipated much good to his country when growing up; he is now a man, and I wish his talks to reach throughout the nation. Likewise Mr. Carey, whom I have raised from a boy; he is our interpreter, and is to aid, assist, and consult with the head-men.

Last spring was a year since I heard of Governor Blount's arrival in the territory, bringing peace talks, and to hold a treaty. I desired some of my beloved men to go and see him, and requested that he would take notice of them; that I would respect him for it. I mentioned that I would send my young warriors to see him, as I heard he was a beloved man from Congress; that I hoped the dark cloud would be removed, and a white one restored, with peace and friendship once more. I heard of his powers, and hoped he would do something for us; instead of that, they were there seven days with their eyes full of tears, and he did nothing to dry them. At their return from the Governor, I expected to hear good news, but was disappointed. I found there had been a deficiency, which disturbs our minds to this day; I found by their answers, that, not only they, but the Four Nations differed; that their hunting ground was gone, and they had no support without it. I remember the talk respecting the line; I wish it to be opened a little further down the river once more, as we are so bound up, that we, as well as the other three nations, have not room to hunt.

I wish the line to run from Campbell's line to the crossing of Cumberland river, on the Kentucky road; from thence to strike the edge of a big savannah, called the Barrens of Cumberland, to continue on the edge of the said savannah, on the dividing ridge betwixt the waters of Greene and Cumberland rivers, a middle course, till it strikes the Ohio. I speak this freely from my heart; if this can be done, it will be a great happiness, and establish a permanent peace. I wish the President to take this into consideration, and take pity on us. The big island of Holston has never been given up yet; it was objected to last summer, at the treaty; it is still ours; and our ambassadors mentioned it to the President and General Knox in Philadelphia. If we can have this line, we will relinquish our title to the island, which is a just one; it was justified by General Martin to Governor Blount, at the Holston treaty. Governor Blount is appointed by Congress, and has sent me many talks, but I have never had the happiness of seeing him yet. I am always glad to hear from him. Likewise, you, Mr. Shaw, are appointed from the same place; you are but a stranger to me yet, but any thing you have to say, I am willing to hear. As all men should be proved, I wish to do the same with you.

I have heard the President's good talks, which give me great satisfaction; he desires us to abide by the treaty; I mean nothing else, than to keep it and have it kept. I say nothing about any part of the line, except that part which I mentioned above; if he will open a door for us that way, I will be satisfied. I wish to inform the President, that I have consulted my whole nation; the passing of boats up and down the Tennessee, is disagreeable, and, a settlement at the Muscle Shoals, we cannot agree to, as it is the common hunting ground of the Four Nations. A station at the mouth of Bear creek, is also objected to for the same reason.

You, Mr. Shaw, say you are willing to assist us; I am happy to hear it; you must not let crooked talks disturb you, but continue your assistance. You will observe, that Governor Blount is here in place; I wish you to be of one way of thinking; you are to correspond with him, and if any partial disturbances should take place, I wish you to lay your heads together to keep peace, and I will assist.

Mr. Thomas Gegg, who has long resided in the nation as a magistrate, he has always attended our public meetings, during the time when there was no officer appointed by the United States, at our request. We hope the President will make him some allowance for his services, rendered both to the United States and our nation; we would do it, but we are poor red people, and can scarcely clothe ourselves. We wish, therefore, that it may be taken into consideration, and that he may receive a reward as well for the services he has rendered, as those he may hereafter render. Mr. Benjamin Hawkins, who is a member of your Senate, is well acquainted with Mr. Gegg, and to his recommendation we refer.

Captain CHISOLM then observed, that he was sorry his duty required him to put them in mind of Governor Blount's requests to them, per him, that he would name, and expect their answers. One was, the running the line, appointing commissioners, and the time and place of their meeting. The second was, the delivery of the prisoners in the nation, which is an important one; he told them to observe, that he had delivered up one without reserve. The last request is, recording the address at Coyatee, and waited the result.

The BREATH.—When at Coyatee, I had the pleasure of seeing Governor Blount, who then mentioned the subject of prisoners; I told him I did not wish to say any thing from myself, that we would have a meeting at this place, and I would consult my head-men.

The LITTLE TURKEY.—I have the happiness of being acquainted with Captain Chisolm, who is here from Governor Blount, who is a good faithful honest man, and I have dependence in him; I am going to send the Breath and a man from this town, to try to get the prisoners—a woman has purchased one of them, for how much I do not know; I hope, however, the Governor will not forget her. He then addressed the head-men of the different towns, desiring them to attend to Mr. Shaw, to put a stop to horse stealing, and to treat every white man well who might come amongst them, as ill treatment made even bad people worse.

Capt. CHISOLM then handed to the Little Turkey a copy of the address at Coyatee, which had been before returned, the hurry of other business not giving time to have it read. The Little Turkey desired it to be read, which was done accordingly.

The BADGER.—I have heard my oldest brother Governor Blount's talks. He sent my flesh and blood to me by Captain Chisolm, and now we undertake to send my nephew the Black Fox of Estanaula, with the Breath, to go and get the prisoner which one of my family has got. The Governor speaks so clever to us, I think it is for the benefit of our country to get the prisoners; as one of them is in my family, (the Paint) I consider it my duty to have her given up. The murders the Governor mentions, and requests information of the perpetrators of, I shall give every notice in my power. I tell you it is the Usauleys, a town in the Creeks; every person knows the loose Creeks frequently pass through our towns and do these mischiefs, and it is impossible for us to prevent them. Now I give this information, and hope it will have weight, as I wish to raise up our young men in peace and unity with the whites. I desire Captain Chisolm to wait five or six days, till I send for the prisoners. We are determined, in a council of the whole nation, to hold the white people fast by the hand hereafter.

Adjourned till to-morrow.

SATURDAY, 30th June, 1792.

Council met pursuant to adjournment. Present, the Little Turkey, &c. as before.

A letter per despatch from Governor Blount was read, containing a request of the Little Turkey, and his head-men, to despatch some of his people to Tuskegee, there to meet certain boats and canoes on their way to Cumberland, with goods for the Chickasaws and Choctaws, and to escort them through the muscle shoals; they readily complied with the request, and accordingly appointed Mr. Jack Thompson, Cotteatoy, Nontuaka, Cheelageeskikie, the Cabin, and Keatekiskikie, for that purpose the three latter are to go with the boats through the Muscle Shoals; and then return. The other three are to continue on to Cumberland. Captain Chisolm is also requested to go with them to Cumberland; they are to start from this place to-morrow. The Little Turkey says he has despatched with orders to have the prisoners delivered to Captain Chisolm on his way to Cumberland. Skeuka is to go to Teeskege and return with any despatches from thence to the Little Turkey.

Kealekiskikie, in behalf of the Council, requested Mr. Shaw to furnish them with an English yard-measure, and that he would compel the traders to sell at eight pounds of leather per garment or leave the nation.

The Little Nephew said, they intended to procure, by force or otherwise, all the stolen horses that are now in the nation, without making any allowance to the possessors, and deliver them to the owners, in order to prevent horse-stealing in future; and they have appointed persons to go throughout the nation on that business. The council wish that Governor Blount will assist the Kingfisher and John Walker in recovering two horses which were stolen from them at the treaty, or their value.

Adjourned sine die.

I do certify, that I have examined the foregoing journal, and find it a literal one, as near as the idioms of the languages will admit.

JAMES CAREY, Interpreter.

Deposition of James Ore.

TERRITORY OF THE UNITED STATES, SOUTH OF THE RIVER OHIO, KNOX COUNTY, 33:

Personally appeared James Ore, before me, David Campbell, Esq. one of the Judges of the territory aforesaid, who, being sworn, deposes and saith, that he was at the house of General McGillivray, on the 13th and 14th of May last; that he saw in company with McGillivray, a man called Captain Oliver, whom this deponent heard, was an agent from the King of Spain, in character of superintendent of the Creek nation, under the pay of one hundred dollars per month, and had there with him a Spanish interpreter by the name of Antonio; that on the second day, the deponent being in company with General McGillivray and Oliver, for two hours, during which time, he heard General McGillivray asked when he went to New Orleans; McGillivray answered, four nights; Oliver then observed that he would be glad if McGillivray would stay until the public talk was over, meaning one which he, said Oliver, had appointed to hold with the Creek nation, within eight nights from that time, which he, McGillivray did; this deponent saith, that Oliver lived in a new house of McGillivray's, and had for some months, and that he and McGillivray appeared in habits of perfect intimacy.

This deponent further saith, that he remained in the nation to hear the extent of the talk, and was informed by a white man, who understood the Creek language, and one in whom this deponent had entire confidence, that the purport of Oliver's talk with the chiefs of the Creeks was, "That the Spanish talk, the French talk, and the British, were all one; when was the day they asked them for land? But the Americans were still wanting their lands; and if they wanted ammunition and arms to defend their lands, come to them, meaning the Spaniards, and they should have them. He told them not to be crazy, to listen to every body's talk; to mind their hunting and mind their lands." He then invited them to a talk, to be held at Pensacola, where the Governor of Orleans would meet them, and to which the Cherokees were also to be invited; at which time he said they would hear a great deal more.

This deponent further saith, that he heard among the Creeks, that Oliver was to hold talks with the Chickasaws and Choctaws, at the Natchez old fields, immediately after this talk with the Creeks at Pensacola.

This deponent further saith, that he was at Kialigees, a Creek town on the waters of the Tallapoosa river, on the night of the sixteenth of May last, where he was informed, by a trader living in that town, John Oriley and Sarah Fletcher, a white prisoner, that the people of that town had brought in two women and a child, prisoners, from Cumberland, and that one of them was called Elsey Thompson, the others names they did not know; that Oriley offered to purchase them at the price of a negro, each, for their ransom; which the Indians refused, saying, they did not bring the prisoners there to let them go back to the Virginia people, but had brought them to punish and make victuals and work for them, the Indians, and said they did not think he had so great love for the Virginia people; adding, that if he was not so great a friend of theirs, they would knock him in the head for the proposal, and requested him never to talk so to them any more.

This deponent further saith, that he was informed that the Indians had put Miss Thompson and the other woman into the fields to work. Miss Thompson cried, and they put her into the house again to pound meal; and that the child was taken from the mother by one of the captors, and carried to another town, where he committed it to a Mrs. Williams, who has been a prisoner with the Creeks for some years, and treated with the greatest degree of barbarity, and with much severity, having been often beat until she was black and blue.

This deponent saith, that the reasons why he did not converse with the prisoners, and know their names and situation, were, that he was told, and has reason to believe, such proceedings would, in all probability, have been attended with bad consequences to himself.

He further saith, that he saw one party, consisting of five, and was informed there were several other parties on their way to Cumberland, with an express intention to take hair or scalps, and to steal horses; that he also saw several large and new encampments, which had signs of war about them, and appeared as though the parties were going out on some war design.

This deponent further saith, that, during his residence in the Creek nation, which was about six weeks, there were four fresh scalps brought there, said to be from Cumberland, and that the general talk in the Creek nation was, that they would never be at peace with Cumberland, for it was their particular hunting ground, and that appearances in the nation well warrant a belief of this declaration.

Sworn to, and subscribed, this sixteenth day of June, 1792.

DAVID CAMPBELL.

The deposition of Ezekiel Abel.

This deponent saith, that the — day of February last, on his passage down the Tennessee river, in company with Colonel Harry Hunter, their boat lodged on the Muscle Shoals; that this deponent, in company with one Mr. Wilson, (who had a pass from his Excellency William Blount, Esq. in his care, granted Colonel Hunter) went to shore in a canoe, to a party of Indians, in order to get assistance over the shoals; that five Indians went into the canoe, apparently very friendly, but, after going some distance up the river, one of the Indians, who stood behind this deponent, gave him (the deponent) a blow on the neck, aimed, as he supposes, at his head, with a tomahawk, which the said Indian had concealed under his watch coat; by the force of which blow the deponent fell into the water; the other Indians, or a part of them, fell on Mr. Wilson with tomahawks, which they had concealed in the same manner as above. This deponent saith, that the canoe oversat in the time of the engagement; that Wilson was, after repeated blows given him while in the water, killed, scalped, and stripped, but that he (the deponent) made his escape, after receiving several blows.

This deponent further saith, that the Indians, at all the towns the boats passed, fired heavily on them, and that a number of balls struck heavily in the boats: he also saith, that every part of the Indians' conduct to them, during their passage, seemed inimical. And, finally, this deponent saith, that he is well convinced that one of the Indians who killed Wilson, was a Cherokee, as he had last summer seen him at the treaty, and knows him by a remarkable scar on one of his thighs. And further saith not.

The deposition of Daniel Thornbury.

This deponent, being first sworn, saith, that he was at the place called l'Ance la Grace, now New Madrid, on the Mississippi, last winter, on his own private business. That, about the 11th March last, he left the said place in company with a Doctor Waters, and one Bryant, to proceed up to Cumberland settlement; that, about fifteen miles above New Madrid, at an island in the Mississippi, they met five canoes of Cherokees, which had on board nine or ten Cherokee men, and several women and children, which Indians had a chief with them called Double-head, who related to Doctor Waters and this deponent, as follows: That, last fall, they sat out from their nation to hunt, low down on the Tennessee river; that, while they were hunting, (their whole number at camp being twenty-eight men, besides women and children) a party of seven men, the Double-head being their chief, went to the Cumberland river, near the mouth thereof, and took one boat laden with salt, fired on some other boats, killed several men in the Cumberland river, and stripped some of them. Their clothes the said deponent saw; particularly a hat, coat, and pair of boots, which, on coming to Cumberland, he was informed belonged to one Curtis, who had such clothing on when he was killed. They also related, that three of their party had fired on a house in Clarksville, at the mouth of Red river; and, in short, related that they had done all the mischief which, on coming to Cumberland, he was informed had been done in the river. That his (the deponent's) two companions, and himself, had hired one Barcelo, a French trader, who had been trading great part of last winter on the Tennessee with the Cherokees, to go with them up to the mouth of Cumberland; that Barcelo told them he had seen several guns, and other articles, taken from the boatmen in Cumberland, by these Indians, and scalps also, when trading with them on Tennessee.

This deponent further saith, that, while at New Madrid, he saw twelve Creek Indians, who came there and related they had been watching the Tennessee river great part of last winter, to take American boats; that none came along while they were watching it; that they intended, from New Madrid, to go home through the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations, to engage them to join the Creeks in a war against the Americans, which, if they could not do, the Creeks would then attack these two nations.

The deponent saith, he could not speak the Creek tongue himself, but sundry people, whom these Creeks spoke with, related these circumstances; that, when they met the Cherokee party on the island, Barcelo could speak Cherokee and English, and, by his means, they principally conversed, although some of the Indians could speak a little English. Indeed, he thinks the Indians supposed his two companions and himself lived at New Madrid, as Barcelo was with them, who doubtless contributed to their safety.

JAS. ROBERTSON.

Postscript.—This deponent further saith, that, besides their trading business at New Madrid, he heard Double-head say, he intended to try to get the Indians in the neighborhood of New Madrid to join him, and the Creeks also, as they had declared open war, with a fixed purpose to cut off the Cumberland settlement. And further saith not.

DANIEL THORNBERRY.

This Double-head, or Tucalatague, is a signer to the treaty of Holston, and, at the close of that treaty, begged, and I granted him, a written permit to hunt on the waters of Cumberland.

WM. BLOUNT.

July 4th, 1792.

From Governor Blount to the Little Turkey and other chiefs of the Cherokees.

KNOXVILLE, 4th June, 1792.

BROTHERS:

Enclosed is a copy of my address to you at Coyattee (as I promised) which I request you to have recorded in your book.

By the bearer, your friend Captain Chisolm, I send you the prisoner boy, Abe; he is all I have, and to Captain Chisolm I request you to deliver such prisoners as you may have in your possession, as well those taken before the treaty as since. Captain Chisolm is a man in whom I have great dependence, and he will have them conveyed safe to me.

BROTHERS: The running of the left line is a thing I know you want done, and so do I, but I can't attend to it before I have finished my business with the Chickasaws and Choctaws at Nashville, and rested myself a little after my return home, which will not be before some time in August. I propose to you that the commissioners to run the line shall meet at Major Craig's, on Nine-mile creek, on the second Monday in October. The commissioners on the part of the United States are people of high character and distinction, namely, Brigadier General Smith, Colonel Landon Carter, and Judge Campbell, and I beg that three of your principal chiefs may be appointed on your part. The running a line between nations is a great business, and none but head-men are proper to do it.

James Carey being appointed interpreter, it will be his duty to attend, and interpret what shall be said on both sides.

I keep in remembrance that no persons are to be with the commissioners when they run the lines, except a few people to mark it.

But if a few of your principal chiefs, besides those appointed to run the line, should wish to attend, I shall be glad to see them. For head-men to see and know each other, ever contributes to the happiness of both parties.

BROTHERS: I have engaged Mr. McKee, who writes a good fair hand, to attend your council, to make for me a correct journal of what you shall do and say in council at Estanaula, and to forward it to me by Captain Chisolm. Mr. McKee, as well as Captain Chisolm, is a friend of mine, and I request you to receive and treat them both as such.

When your council rises I shall be at Cumberland about business with the Chickasaws and Choctaws, and it is my wish that Captain Chisolm should come to me there with the journal of your proceedings, provided some of you will come with him; and I again request General Eskaqua and Captain Watts to meet me there, to be present and hear the talks I shall hold with those nations; and if any other chiefs will come I shall be glad to see them, and I will be glad also to see a few of the young warriors.

BROTHERS: I have to repeat to you that nobody must read or explain your letters but the interpreters; they are appointed for that purpose.

I am your Brother, &c.

Governor Blount's Instructions to Captain John Chisolm.

KNOXVILLE, 5th June, 1792.

SIR:

Herewith you will receive, Abe, a Cherokee boy, a prisoner, who you will please to deliver to the chiefs of that nation, in council at Estanaula, which is to meet on the 24th instant, and urge them to deliver to you all the prisoners they have.

By the treaty, the exchange was to have been made some time past, at this place, and I have always been ready on the part of the United States. You will also use your endeavor to recover Mrs. Caffrey and child, and Miss Thompson, taken by the Creeks, and carried captives into their nation.

I am, sir, &c.

Governor Blount to the Secretary of War.

KNOXVILLE, August 31st, 1792.

On the 10th instant the conference with the Chickasaws and Choctaws ended; there was a very full representation of the former, but not of the latter, owing, there is reason to believe, to the Spanish influence; the minutes of which will be forwarded to you by Mr. Allison, who leaves this, in ten or fifteen days, for Philadelphia.

During the conference, General Pickens and myself received the strongest assurances of peace and friendship for the United States, from both nations, and I believe they were made with great sincerity.

The Cherokees, as well as the Creeks, commit depredations, and deserve to be punished; that is, the young and unruly part of them: for the chiefs, to a man, except Double Head, who was a signer of the treaty, I have great reason to believe, most earnestly wish for peace and friendship; but, to punish them, with a view to giving peace to the frontiers, would be like lopping off a bough from a tree, for the purpose of killing it. The root of the evil is the numerous and insolent Creeks, and it is they who encourage and lead forward the too willing young Cherokees to murder and rob. By Mr. Allison I shall forward you a report upon the state of the four Southern nations, in which I shall be as particular as the information I am in possession of will allow me.

Annexed is a list of the killed and wounded in this territory, since the date of my last letter to you; and by Mr. Allison I will forward a list, containing the whole number killed, wounded, and made prisoners, since January, 1791.

June 26, At Zeigler's Station, near Bledsoe's Lick, on the North side of Cumberland River.

4 killed,
4 wounded and escaped,
3 escaped unhurt,
13 made prisoners.

NOTE.—Of these prisoners, nine have been regained by purchase, made by their parents and friends, from the Cherokees, Shawanese, and Creeks, at the Running Water; of the four which remain, one is a Miss Wilson, now with the Creeks, the other three are negroes.

July 15, On the road that leads from Nashville to Kentucky. Isaac Pennington and Milligen, killed, and McFarland, wounded.

July 31, At Greenfields near Bledsoe's Lick, in a Peach Orchard. John Berkley, Junior, killed and scalped; John Berkley wounded: who, after he was wounded, killed an Indian in the act of scalping his son.

In July, On Cumberland River, two persons, unknown, killed, near Clarksville.

Governor Blount to the Secretary of War.—September 11, 1792.

SIR:

Enclosed are copies of letters I received this morning, at three o'clock, express from the Little Turkey, the chief of the Cherokees, the Boot, who was his immediate representative at the treaty of Holston, and the two interpreters of the United States, James Carey and John Thompson, by which you will be informed, that the five Lower towns of the Cherokees have declared war against the United States; you will observe, James Carey estimates the number who were to leave the towns on the 7th instant, to make an attack on the settlements, at three hundred.

These letters were delivered to me by Mr. Ore, who received them yesterday at Chota, at the green corn dance, where there were a great number of Indians, as well as white people, from the settlements. He was there informed by Nontuaka, and others, that the party was estimated at five hundred, of whom one hundred were Creeks, the whole commanded by John Watts; and from the best information he could collect, it appears their destination is against Cumberland, or the frontiers of Knox county.

Since writing the above, I have received a letter of yesterday's date from Brigadier General Sevier, a copy of which is also enclosed, containing the same information, with the addition of three hundred more than mentioned by Mr. Carey, a part of whom are mounted on horses, supposed to the number of one hundred; and I also enclose copies of three letters from Mr. Shaw, all of which serve to show the designs of those Indians against the United States.

I have ordered the regiment of the county of Knox into actual service for its defence, for a few days, until the destination of John Watts and his party is certainly known, and have despatched an express to General Robertson, giving him the necessary information, with orders to put the brigade of that district in the best possible state of defence.

I have also given orders to the colonels of the several counties of Washington district, to be in readiness to march on the shortest notice.

This declaration of war was very unexpected, and has given great alarm to the frontiers. Indeed, I do not find that any thing of the kind has before been done by Indians in so formal a manner.

It is my opinion the stroke will fall on Cumberland, and I fear will be very heavy. The settlements of that district are very extensive, and the guards stationed for the protection thereof no ways equal to the weight of so unexpected an attack.

Enclosed is a copy of my orders to Major Sharpe, of the 10th ultimo, which will shew the force and destination of those guards.

I am apprehensive the numbers may be thought too few, but it was with great difficulty so many were turned out—difficult with myself, lest I should be charged with extravagance, and equally difficult to get so many from the district of Washington to the district of Miro.

I hope for the honor of your immediate orders, and in the mean time shall act on the defensive, so as in my judgment best to secure the frontiers.

I have to observe, that the Cherokees have never complained to me of a single infraction of the treaty of Holston, nor do I know that one has been committed by any citizen of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

No. 1.

TURKEYTOWN, September 2d, 1792.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

Your good talk I have received, and am glad to find that you are pleased with the conduct of Mr. Thompson, and the rest of my people that was in company with him. It was my earnest request to them to do the best for your people in the boats, which I am glad to hear they did. Now, my good friend and brother, you wrote me to tell you what I thought and knew of the people that lives on the Big river. Now I will let you know, and tell you the truth, which I am sorry and ashamed for to tell you, of their proceedings and bad conduct; you may be assured it is not lies. I now tell you (as you wrote me never to write or send you word about any thing but the truth) the eighth day of this month they are determined to go off to war, all the five lower towns on the Big river; they have and will make war by themselves; you may be assured and believe me, it is not the consent of the whole nation, nor no part of it only them five towns—they agreed amongst themselves.

Now you may know where the bad people lives; both you and your people may now know where the good and bad lives. Now, I desire you and all your people not to come to war against no other towns but them five towns on the Big river, that has made war against you. The Spaniards has gave them ammunition and guns, hatchets, knives, &c. and told them it was not to go to war, but to keep it a reserve by them; you may blame no body for all this, only the Spaniards. Now as I look on you to be my friend and brother, all we good people that lives off in other towns, and especially the towns on this river, that you will not molest or trouble us, for myself and all the headmen in the nation have talked and done all in our power to have them stopped, and all our young men sent messengers to them to have them leave off, and think about nothing but peace, and not to bring war on themselves; but they would not hear them; they are determined to do mischief every way to try to bring the white people against the towns that is for peace, and threatens us all, both white or red, that if we write or send any news, to strip us of every thing, and perhaps kill us; but I shall always acquaint you with their proceedings at all events, for you may depend, I never will be deceitful to you, nor no man, especially my friends and brothers the white people.

Now my good friend and brother, write me, and let me hear good from you, and let me know whether all we that is for peace, may stay at home in our towns. I shall be always looking your way until I get your answer, and my ears open to hear your talk, let it be good or bad. I want you to send me an express back immediately, that I may know if I am obliged to run away, or to stay at home in my town.

I am, and ever shall be, your friend and brother,

THE TURKEY.

FRIEND AND BROTHER:

We are sorry to acquaint you of bad news, but we can't help it; we done all that lay in our power to hinder them. The Little Turkey will acquaint you all about it; but you know I myself, and others, are at peace, and gives out good talks to our young men. Last summer, I went with Mr. Hath to the Creeks, and he promised me that I should be paid; and I would be glad if you would take it into consideration, and send me a gun, as I am without a gun, as I want to go out soon to make my winter's hunt. I shall always remember you, and never forget your goodness, as I am in need of one. All the good men intends to go out a hunting—soon as you send the answer back, then we shall go out. Send the gun by Mr. Carey.

I am, your friend and brother,

TURKEYSTOWN, September 2d, 1792.

DEAR SIR:

I am sorry to acquaint your Excellency of the bad conduct and proceedings of the Indians on the Big river, or you may call them the five Lower towns. On the 8th day of this month, they intend to start out for war; but what part on the settlements they will fall on, we can't tell. The 11th day of this month, I got to the Turkey's town, and there the news was, that the Indians was making readiness for war. I made all haste I could back to send you this news. You told me to tell you nothing but what was the truth, and you may believe this to be the truth; and I am in hopes you will do the same by me as agreed. Those Indians will kill people every where to bring on the whites upon them that is for peace; they have said it, that they intend to do so; but when mischief is done, you will know where they come from; and you may depend the Creeks will do their part. Your Excellency has got to blame the Spaniards for all this; they have give them ammunition, guns, hatchets, knives, &c. but not to make war with, but to keep it as a reserve. These Indians that is for peace, wants to know if they can stay in their towns; you may depend these Indians will be at peace, if the whites will not come against them. Please, sir, write me and let me know whether we shall stay in our towns or not; as I have been as good as my word, I expect you will do the same by me, and send the express off as soon as possible. Don't make my letter known to the people, or even to your friends, but commit it to the fire. I will always write when an opportunity affords that way, and I hope you will do the same, and let me know how things is going, and I will do the same. Please, sir, excuse haste, for I have had hardly time to write these lines to you.

I am, dear sir, with great regard and esteem,

Your Excellency's most obedient humble servant,

JNO. THOMPSON.

ESTANAULA, 7th September, 1792.

SIR:

This day Mr. Thompson arrived here with the express from the Little Turkey, directed to you, and likewise for me to be the bearer of it to you; but it is out of my power to go with it to you: for death is my portion if I go that way; but I hope you will not think hard of my not coming; but I have got an Indian to carry it to the Hanging Maw's, and there he is to wait for the answer from you; I hope you will send him two blankets for his trouble, as it will be the means of getting another to go another time.

Sir, the five towns on the river has declared war against the United States, and this day they set off from their towns for the settlement, wherefor I do not know, but be on your guard for them; there will be about three hundred of them. Mr. Shaw went from here yesterday for Seneca: for the Creeks were determined to kill him.

Sir, if you want me to come on, write me by the bearer; and, if you want me, I will come, let the consequences be what it will. This quarter of the nation is entirely for peace, I can assure you, and wishes for nothing else.

From your most humble servant,

JAMES CAREY,
Linguister of the United States.

LITTLE RIVER, 13th September, 1792.

DEAR SIR:

I am this moment arrived from the Cherokee nation, and have the following disagreeable intelligence to communicate to your Excellency, viz: The Hanging Maw, Notowego, the Long-fellow, Tichagiska, and a number of their chiefs, and a great number of their young warriors, was this day assembled in their beloved town Chota; they informed me they had a matter of great importance to communicate, and desired I would attend at their council or town house; to which place I immediately repaired, where they informed me that part of their nation, to wit: the five Lower towns, had actually declared war against the United States, and, in consequence of which, six hundred had set out, several days since, with a determination to give a severe blow to some part of our frontiers, the particular spot I cannot be informed of; but it is not likely that Knoxville is their object; they say one hundred is well mounted, our friend Watts at their head; they are also joined by the Creeks, and one hundred of the party consists of that nation; you will readily perceive that this declaration of war is announced in a very formal manner, more so than any thing of the kind has heretofore happened, and the truth of which, you will permit me to observe, is not to be doubted; they assure me that every other part of the nation is entirely of a tranquil disposition, and well disposed towards the people of the United States. I shall be at Knoxville in a day or two, at farthest, when I can communicate to you further particulars relative to the subject. You will please to observe, that the five Lower towns spoken of, is composed of the twelve lower towns on the Tennessee and its vicinity.

I am, your obedient servant,

JOHN SEVIER,
Brigadier General of Washington District.

NOTE.—General Sevier, when he says, “observe that the five lower towns spoken of is composed of the twelve lower towns on the Tennessee,” must mean that the Indians, first called Chickamagas, originally settled in twelve small towns on the Tennessee, are the same who now live in the five lower towns; the fact is, the Chickamagas abandoned the first towns they settled in, and have now settled in five towns; it is also true that many Indians, from other parts of the nation, have also settled in these five towns. I have heretofore informed you that the Look-out Mountain town, Running Water, Nickajack, and Crow town, including Long-island village, were the four towns; the fifth, now mentioned, is Wellstown, where John Watts lives, as does the Bloody Fellow. In justice to the latter, I add, that he has made use of every exertion in his power to restrain the unruly part of his nation, and to attach them to the United States; and the whole party, who were with him at Philadelphia, remain firm. (Nontuaka is now with him, not to be surpassed either in honesty or good nature.)

It is also due to the Glass, and Captain Charley, of the Running Water, the Breath of Nickajack, and Dick Justice, of Look-out Mountain, four principal chiefs of those towns, that I inform you of their attachment to the United States, and opposition to the measures taken by their towns; they have removed themselves, and sundry of their adherents, to other parts of the nation. The names of three of these chiefs are among those to whom clothing, &c. was sent by Eskaqua, he having pointed them out as principal chiefs; and the fourth, Captain Charley, I found of such consequence that it was essential to give him a suit also, fearing, if I did not, he might feel the neglect so sensibly as to alienate his attachment to the United States.

[The foregoing note subjoined by Governor Blount.]

ESTANAULA, 13th August, 1792.

SIR:

Though I have not yet heard how soon your return is expected, I shall make use of the present opportunity to inform you of the situation of the nation. On the first instant I received a message from Wipeme, a young warrior, who promises at the talk to be peaceable; he informs me, at a meeting of twenty-two towns, it was unanimously agreed to quit all horse stealing; and that he will bring at the public meeting all the horse thieves, and make them publicly declare their future good intentions. From the Lower towns I have had advice of their rejecting the Northern talk, and their determination to be peaceable. But a new source of uneasiness has lately presented itself; the Creeks have spread themselves in small parties throughout the nation, and do just as they please. After their attack upon Mr. Wallace, (which, no doubt, you will fully hear) two of the party pursued him to Estanaula itself, and would certainly have overtaken him, had not a Cherokee, who met them by accident, designedly detained them. They, that night, stole Mr. Gagg's horse out of the middle of the town, and they have stole thirty horses, in ten days, from Hightower; and two Creeks, a few days since, were discovered way-laying some person in this town. It is even dangerous for a white man to travel from one town to another, without an escort. The intrigues of the Spaniards (seem to me) to be immediately directed against the United States. The Indians consider them in a serious light, and conceive that a rupture is not far distant. They have certainly offered to supply the Indians with ammunition: for every account I receive agrees in that point, and in such quantities that it is obvious their intentions are hostile. I should have visited the Lower towns before this, but I received information that most of the young warriors are absent on a short hunting excursion. When I visit the Lower towns, I propose taking a jaunt to the Creeks, with an intention of examining into the affairs of that nation, and of picking up some intelligence respecting Bowles and the Spaniards. As matters now stand, it will be impossible to preserve peace long here. The Indians robbed of their horses will supply themselves again from the settlements; besides, the Creeks are daily stealing from the frontiers through this nation. Before my departure, I should wish to receive your Excellency's advice and instructions, should you think proper to communicate any.

I am, with respect and esteem, your Excellency's very humble servant,

LEONARD D. SHAW.

August 29th, 1792.

SIR:

In my last letter I informed you of the frequent incursions of the Creeks, and the reason I had to apprehend some daring attempts from them. Since that time they have killed Mr. Ramsay, and a person who had lately arrived from Charleston; this happened on the 24th instant. They were very nigh killing Moses Price, the preceding day, notwithstanding he was accompanied by the Kingfisher and his wife, and they had formerly been intimate with him. Mr. Ramsay was not above thirty yards from his own house when he was killed, and scalped on the spot; the other person reached the house, but instantly expired. The open and avowed intention of the Creeks is, to kill every white man they meet, and they declare that such is their orders. The great quantity of ammunition given to the Indians by the Spaniards persuades me that we are indebted to the former for these visitations. I am apprehensive that they have formed a coalition with Bowles. Since I first sat down to write, I have been informed of a party that is now lurking about this place. I am unsafe fifty yards from the house, unless towards the town. The day before yesterday I received the first intelligence of your Excellency's return, and, from some hints, I expect every thing terminated as you could have wished. Every idea of my travelling, must, for a while, be laid aside, until matters come to some final determination. The Indians have sent a very spirited letter to the Little Turkey; and as a few days since I received a letter by Captain Faushe from Captain Roberts, commandant of fort Matthews, I took that opportunity to write to Mr. Seagrove, who, I understand, is superintendent of the Creek nation. The Cherokees are exceedingly irritated at the Creeks, and nothing but a consciousness of their inferiority restrains them from seeking satisfaction; I think it necessary to give you this information, as the facts will, doubtless, be canvassed in the first national council, which, I understand, will be soon.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your Excellency's humble servant,

LEONARD D. SHAW.

ESTANAULA, 2d September, 1792.

SIR:

As Notewego informs me he intends to visit you immediately after his departure from this place, I shall make use of him to convey to you this letter. On the thirtieth of August, six Creeks left this town, and, as I afterwards learned, proceeded immediately for the settlements; no doubt they are determined on mischief, and, unless the good fortune or the vigilance of the inhabitants defeats their purpose, they may do some essential injury. Every thing carries so much the appearance of a Creek war, that, were I to deliver my judgment, it would be, that it is unavoidable. As Mr. Thompson did not pass through this place, I have not yet heard any thing material respecting the present state of things. Whenever I see the Creeks bending their course towards the settlements, I feel distressed lest they might fall on the frontiers undiscovered, and, after committing some pitiful act of barbarity, escape. And yet, to send, on every occasion, an express, would be too expensive. I should be happy to know your opinion respecting conveying intelligence. I expect the Nettle-carrier here to-night from the Lower towns. When I was, by the advice of some of the head-men, induced to defer my jaunt to the Lower towns, I thought proper to despatch him to collect intelligence, and in a particular manner, to learn the talk John Watts brought from the Spaniards. In my next, I hope I shall be able to say something on the Spanish manoeuvres, as the Nettle-carrier is a person entrusted with all the state secrets. Notewego has mentioned to me a circumstance that he wishes me to communicate; it seems that Jack Thompson promised him, on your Excellency's behalf, a gun; but that he has never received any. His chief business, therefore, (I suppose) will be to inquire into the matter. On the 29th of August, I sent John Christy with letters, which I hope by this time have arrived safe.

I have the honor to be, &c.

LEONARD D. SHAW.

Governor Blount's orders to Major Sharpe.

Major Sharpe, of Summer county, who commands all the troops in service, for the protection of the frontiers, is to be considered as subject to the orders of no superior militia officer not in actual service. But in case of any militia being turned out from either of the counties, by the commanding officer, to chastise Indians for recent depredations, he will cordially co-operate with such part of his command as may be in that particular county. No pursuit to be continued beyond the ridge dividing the waters of Cumberland and Duck rivers. Patrols and reconnoitering parties to be kept out from the stations, in search of, and to prevent any further depredations by, the Indians, and in case any Indians should be found skulking or lurking about to the northward of the ridge aforesaid, in the woods, off any path, or fleeing, to be considered and treated as enemies, save only, Chickasaws and Choctaws, women and children.

Annexed are the names of the stations, and the number of men at each; but in case Major Sharpe should conceive it essential for the better protection of the frontiers, he will increase the number at any or either, and lessen them at any other, either the cavalry or infantry or both, but erect no new ones, until his command shall receive an augmentation of troops; and on that event, he will either augment the number at the present stations, or erect new ones, so as best to effect the object of protection. Such men of Tennessee county on duty, as are draughts, to be discharged on the arrival of the men under the command of Captain Lusk, and their places to be supplied by a part of his men. Major Sharpe will call militia officers, not in actual service, into court martial for the trial of offenders, in cases where he cannot collect a sufficient number who are in actual service. Major Sharp is to be considered in service from the first day of July. The present militia in actual service, to leave their posts on the first day of October next, (meaning those from the district of Washington,) and to march immediately, in a body, to Knoxville, under the command of Captain Beard, of the cavalry, there to receive their discharge. Those of Davidson and Summer, to be discharged on 1st October, at their respective posts, and also those of Tennessee.

Cornet Milligan, with twenty of Captain Beard's troop of cavalry, will escort the Governor to Knoxville, and there be discharged on the 20th instant.

Governor Blount to the Secretary of War, 15th September, 1792.

SIR:

Enclosed are copies of letters from Eskaqua, otherwise the Bloody Fellow, and the Glass, dated on the 10th instant, at the Look-out Mountain town, informing, that they, with the assistance of John Watts, and other head-men, had prevailed with the party that were collected for war, to disperse, and go peaceably to their hunting, with copies of my answers thereto, and of my answer to the letter of the Little Turkey.

The information contained in these letters has induced me to discharge the regiment of Knox, and to despatch an express to general Robertson of Miro district, with orders to discharge such of his brigade as may be in service under my order of the 11th instant, forwarded express on the receipt of the letters from the Little Turkey, Brigadier General Sevier, Cary, and Thompson.

Enclosed, also, is information given through Major Craig, by the Red Bird, which seems verified, in part, by the firing upon William Cockran, as appears by his deposition, forwarded herewith, and by the killing of the two young Gillaspies, on the evening of the 12th instant, at their father's house, on the south side of Holston, about eighteen miles below this place.
